Everyone is blamed except the financial interests, which control both governments and people. Tenants do not have enough money to pay their rent. Owners are penalized by a property control, the new lease system. We prevent them from using their property instead of making the financial interests serve the tenants. We prefer to take away the freedom of everyone.

Are building materials too expensive? The state takes control over materials instead of controlling the financial interests which are causing the price increases. Are labour families lacking the essentials in spite of full stores? The Minister of Finance reprimands them by saying: You are not working enough, you should work four hours more every week, and tighten your belt.

We control the victims of finance instead of finance itself and we are seeing the results. The state restrains freedom, initiative, private enterprise, private property and says that its intervention is required because the situation is abnormal, but it is very careful not to interfere with financial tyranny which is creating abnormal conditions on purpose to lead to the subjection of individuals by the state.

The victims themselves hope that such will not be the case. Everyone tries to pass the penalty or the control over to others. Workers demand price controls, but not wage controls. Producers ask minimum prices for their products in the form of subsidies, like those provided in Bill C-50 on agricultural stabilization, but are against minimum wages for their employees. Tenants want owners to be controlled, but not themselves. The owners want to control their right to higher rents, but not a control of housing conditions. Owners protect against land tax increases, but demand stiffer business taxes.

The poor, the taxpayers want big corporations to pay more taxes, but the latter cry for subsidies for research, for marketing, or simply to maintain their prices at current levels. Oil is a case in point. So, everybody is caught in the financial trap, and we are fighting each other instead of breaking the trap open. There will never be any political control over the country if the economy goes uncontrolled. It has to be controlled, that is the only way. In other words, the economy must be led to its goal. How shall we go about leading the economy? By telling it what to do. Consumers should say what to do, and producers how to do it. The government's role is to remove obstacles, to look after the free flow of economic blood, that is money, buying power. In other words, the distribution of wealth.

Recently, the National Welfare Council issued a press release at the end of which the Minister of National Health and Welfare was reminded of certain commitments made on various occasions, and I quote:

> Speaking to provincial ministers, the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced in February last the Canadian government's proposals concerning support and supplement, and he promised that:
>
> "(. . .) I can certainly state that as long as it will be in the Canadian government's power to decide, the poor and have-nots will not bear the heaviest share of economic difficulties the western world might face—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has now expired.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, this debate on the NDP motion seems very close to the one on the guidelines bill that we were discussing. However, the total program of the government perhaps leaves much to be desired. With regard to professional incomes, I wish to make some comment on this because in committee certain things have not been stressed. Professional incomes, while maybe not completely controlled, are highly controlled in any case. While they vary from, say, real estate people to lawyers to doctors, dentists, and so on, I might say as far as physicians are concerned, one of the larger groups involved, that their fees are for all practical purposes already highly controlled because the provincial governments are the paying agencies. While the increases to physicians vary from province to province, in most provinces they have been much below the average since the early 1960s. In Manitoba there has been approximately a 10 per cent increase since 1969. In fact, the guidelines will probably increase the fees in Manitoba because there will be a tendency to charge whatever the guidelines allow. As the provincial government is the paying agency, the guidelines will be adhered to. It may well happen that the guidelines will diminish productivity because physicians are like everybody else, they don't like to work except between nine and five, and only then on occasions—and if they find that rewards for service given in the middle of the night are completely taxed away, as has been suggested, I think the population will suffer.

● (1450)

I would question the point of wage and price guidelines at this time. It seems to me that the time for such a program has gone by and that it would have been of considerably more value earlier on. In fact, there is considerable evidence to indicate that the Canadian economy is doing better than the government says. Thus, I question the wisdom of total wage and price controls which are only partial and which can be construed as favouring one group as opposed to another.

We have been treated to speeches by the government, by union officials and by business containing such heavy phrases as "the plight of the Canadian economy", "there is runaway inflation" or, "we'll go down the drain". We, as Canadians, may not have been noted for having a very successful situation, but there is considerable evidence that the grim cloud that settled over the nation may not be quite as bad as it first seemed, and that in any case severe wage and price controls will not prevent severe things happening to our economy if long range policies are not put in place.

What about inflation? The latest consumer index showing just over 10 per cent does not come into the category of good tidings of great joy, but it is better than what it was last year. The declining effect of inflation on wholesale and commodity prices can be expected to work its way down to the grocery stores. For instance, the wholesale price index for September was 6.1 per cent up over a year earlier, and the price of raw and partially finished goods had risen only 2 per cent in a year. Bumper crops of grain in the United States, and to a lesser extent in Canada, have pushed down the basic price of corn, wheat and oil seed so that at the present time farmers are receiving a level of return comparable to that of 1972 before the devaluation of the American dollar and the crop failures around the world.

On the Chicago grain exchange, which is the bellwether of grain prices in the western world, wheat futures for December were $3.70, versus something like $6 a year or two ago; corn was $2.73 a bushel, versus $4 or $5; soybeans, at less than $5, were substantially less than the $7 to $9 of a year or two ago. As a matter of fact, were it not for the crop failure in Russia, wheat would be not selling for nearly as much as it is. The Canadian farmer might well have found himself unable to sell his grain were it not for this basic failure.

What about these grain prices? I suggest that they are the point at which prices start for the consumer. If there are high grain prices, there must be high meat prices, and while we in Canada do not produce all we consume—there are many commodities like citrus fruits, tea and coffee, for which we are dependent on foreign supplies—still our position is not so bad. The record grain crops in the United States, and to a lesser extent in Canada, will push down the price for livestock and poultry feed to produce an easing of the pressure at the grocery level.

What does this mean? Well, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said during the election that prices in the grocery store would drive the farm price right through the gate, through the house and out to the manure pile. To some extent he is quite right. A very serious situation could develop as far as beef is concerned. We are at the top of a beef cycle; we are liquidating our beef herds and they are selling below cost as far as the producer is concerned. If the guideline prices are applied at the grocery level—and certainly they must be if they are to be effective—it means that the price of beef to the consumer will be below the cost of production at the present time. This will lead to an abnormal liquidation of our cattle so that in the future, not very far away, when we need the excess production it will not be available.

What about strikes? It is true it has been said that whenever you read the newspaper, somebody is on strike, and we may be fond of quoting that Canada was second only to Italy last year in the extent of strikes. But they have been down by 38 per cent in the first seven months of this year. Perhaps the postal strike will change this percentage—and its continuation can be ascribed to the mismanagement of the government in handling it—but it will be a better year than most. Certainly, strikes are an increasing problem in our economy but they are no worse than they were last year. Last year was when action should have been taken to curtail strikes. Have Canadian wage settlements been outrageous? It is my interpretation that much of the demand for wage settlements has arisen from the devaluation of the American, and subsequently the Canadian dollar, by 40 per cent two or three years ago. We were so tied to the U.S. dollar that inevitably we had to devalue our currency by 40 per cent or more. Much of the increase in wages can be attributed to the readjustment that had to be made.

● (1500)

In the third quarter of this year before the government decided on wage and price controls, wage settlements in the commercial industries averaged only 13 per cent over the life of the contracts. How much further behind is this compared with the 12 per cent allowed under the guidelines for workers who have fallen behind as a result of inflation?

As for unemployment, on a seasonally adjusted basis unemployment in many industries is high, though it has reached a plateau over the last 18 months. Labour in the 25 to 55 year old age group in western Canada is very hard to come by for many industries. For instance, western agricultural industries which provide large amounts of foreign exchange for our country without the contractual link of the European Common Market, which seems only to want to buy an excessive amount of raw materials from us, not the finished products as the government had hoped, are severely hampered because no agricultural workers are available. There are rows and rows of want ads in western farm papers advertising for workers at good wages.

Our trading position is not all that favourable, but has not been quite as bad as it seemed it might be at the beginning of the year. As far as the dollar is concerned, things would be better if the Canadian dollar were slightly lower than the U.S. dollar; at the present time it is only 2 per cent lower. The foreign dollar deficit has been covered by an enormous inflow of capital funds. True, most of this represents sales of securities by provinces and will have to be paid for eventually. It is a little like the family who have a lot of money in the bank but who have to mortgage the house to get it there.

I cannot see why the government chose at this time to introduce these general guidelines, that are as full of holes as Swiss cheese, since the rapid increase in inflation is subsiding. Is the government using them as an excuse to fasten on to the economy a bureaucratic apparatus which will continue, longer than the three years, to stifle and hobble private enterprise? In this regard I agree wholeheartedly with the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who has stated emphatically his demand that the guidelines be re-assessed at the end of 18 months, that they be voted on by this parliament, and that a new bill be introduced if they are to be continued. Only in this way will we be prevented from hobbling private industry in the years ahead.

The failure of the government to bring forward an energy policy that makes sense is creating shortages for the future. We are being amply warned on all sides that the federal-provincial fight has severely reduced exploration and development. Holding energy prices at below world prices is always dangerous in the long run.

This fall the energy committee travelled to the Athabasca tar sands, among other places. There is no doubt that the Athabasca tar sands are probably Canada's greatest reserve, but their development, however, will be very expensive. With private industry being allowed $1.57 or $1.60 on a barrel of oil costing $8, there is no way the tar sands can be developed at anything like this price. Certainly at Great Canadian Oil Sands, for example, 1,600 men are required to produce 50,000 barrels of oil a day. It is simple arithmetic to prove that with workers being paid between $10 and $12 an hour the labour cost alone of a barrel of oil is around $3.

This morning's Globe and Mail carried an article pointing out that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), splashing around in his $200,000 swimming pool, does not contribute to any energy savings.

Mr. Alexander: Shame.

Mrs. Holt: Grow up.

Mr. Ritchie: This pool is heated. I don't mind his splashing around in a swimming pool, but it is heated.

Mrs. Holt: He does not splash, he is a good swimmer.

Mr. Alexander: How do you know?

Mr. Ritchie: While Canadians blithely use up the immediate pools of oil and gas at low domestic cost, governments on the other hand are choking off investment in the industry. Even the premier of Saskatchewan in his latest budget promised to do something to make the oil and gas industry more attractive to private enterprise.

I do not think that governments alone can handle these problems without the help of private industry, at least not without instituting a rigid state something along communist lines. The present oil and gas policy encourages excessive use of all these premium fuels, and there is no incentive to find new sources.

Another problem has arisen in Saskatchewan where the premier of the province has resorted to expropriation in order to take over the potash industry. Perhaps he is bluffing a little, as has been suggested, and he may have had personal reasons for taking this action, but after two decades in which private industry has been exploring and developing the huge potash deposits in Saskatchewan, the provincial government now wants to nationalize the mines. This could not have come at a worse time.

Why the government could not have obtained for the people of Saskatchewan all that was required through the tax system does not seem to be very obvious. Although prices of potash have risen from $20 to $75 a ton the industry has been prevented from reaping large profits by the federal and provincial governments taking most of the gain through taxation. What the province essentially seems to want is to end the federal government's tax share of potash profits, and if the industry is nationalized and a Crown corporation set up, corporate tax will not be levied. This again underlies the jeopardy in which the government will place itself if it argues with the provinces, particularly over the mineral and resource industries. This question should have been settled long before this.

How will the potash mines fare under the Saskatchewan government's management? This no doubt depends a great deal on world markets and continuing prosperity. Already this year excess fertilizer stocks are being reported. Eventually, it seems, supply and demand will come more into balance and the profit on potash will become less lucrative. Saskatchewan may gain the industry's profits but will lose the technical resources and marketing connections. It seems likely that, if the Saskatchewan government nationalizes the potash industry, few companies will be prepared to risk their time, their effort, and their money in developing the province's metals.

Furthermore, this would pose considerable problems for Canada's financial position. The Saskatchewan government has to raise from $1 billion to $3 billion to buy out the companies, and much of this will have to be raised in foreign markets, a formidable undertaking. It is fashionable to say that it is all right to owe debts but not to owe equity. In the long run there is little, if any, difference because the return to the borrower who lends money, either directly or in equity, must work out at the expected rate of interest. Prospective lenders in a debt situation will want, indeed will need as much money as if they had an interest in equity. I think this is a situation that we have forgotten in assessing what is best, whether to have equity or to have debt.

I believe that one of the long range factors in our economy is a failure to appreciate the value of savings. Personal savings are so important. We are exhorted to invest in Canada savings bonds and in private pensions, but are they of much practical value? One has to question them because savings of this sort have become not so popular. Indeed, in inflationary times it is often much better to spend your money than save it. For instance, a person aged 65 is better off having a new car, a new house, new clothes and a new hi-fi, for instance, than money in the bank. We have forgotten that the incentive to save in our society has been much reduced.

● (1510)

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this subject today. I listened with great interest to the contributions of those who preceded me. I am somewhat disappointed that the leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) is not here, nor that party's financial expert who sits as a member of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, nor the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) who provided the evidence for the grocery survey referred to by the leader of the NDP. I understand the leader of that party spoke to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) about having some previous engagement.

It is somewhat disappointing that this debate, which was launched by the NDP, despite the fact that we are in the midst of our consideration of Bill C-73 in committee, and notwithstanding the fact that after considerable examination at that stage the bill will be returned to the House where members will have an opportunity to discuss it further, is taking place in the absence of those experts of that party who did not see fit to spend the afternoon with us. While it is interesting to have an opposition day on this subject—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We want to hear your speech.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This is your day to be here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: I know this barracking is an attempt to cover up the fact that the leader of the NDP is sure to be here when he has a speech to make, but is gracing this place by his absence now that other speeches are being made in response.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the hon. member if he would permit a question. If he was told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) that word had been given to him, does he not know that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) is out at the CBC recording a broadcast for Sunday?

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Where is the rest of his gang?

An hon. Member: Now, now, Joe.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I might interrupt that disturbance at the other end by asking the hon. member to speak to the Chair. The hon. member did not even allow the Chair to give him the floor in order to ask his question.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the Leader of the NDP spoke to the Minister of Finance, and I recognize also that his engagement with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would certainly seem more important to him than being in the House of Commons. Nonetheless, I am simply expressing my disappointment that the few modest comments I intend to make will not fall upon the ears of those who have provoked them. I do not know whether the hon. member for Nickel Belt will also be on the CBC on Sunday, but I know that is one day I shall be doing something else.

An hon. Member: Try listening to the radio.

Mr. Abbott: The Leader of the NDP once again brought out some of those points he has let us hear before, and stated that his principal objection to the government's program lies in the fact that it does not deal with major inflationary problems such as high-cost energy, housing, and food. He then went on, as the Minister of Finance pointed out, to let us in on some supposed economic truths in accordance with his own opinions, completely ignoring the realities of what the government has done in these areas.

Particularly interesting was his reference to the oil price problem. The fact is that our consumption of energy in this country has gone up by 5 per cent.

An hon. Member: Seven per cent.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, 7 per cent, excuse me.

Mr. Stanfield: That is nothing to be proud of.

Mr. Abbott: In Europe and in the United States it has declined. The fact is that one of the reasons why Canadians have been able to continue, perhaps mistakenly, to consume energy at this very high level is that oil in Canada is still selling below the world price.

An hon. Member: What are you advocating?

Mr. Abbott: What am I advocating? I am suggesting that Canadians are now realizing that oil prices are rising internationally at a higher rate than in Canada, and unless additional funds are provided to the oil industry this country will very shortly be totally dependent on those outside sources for oil. When the Government of Canada is already subsidizing Canadian oil consumption to the extent of $1 billion, maintaining the price level, I find it somewhat incongruous that this should be one of the three principal branches of the argument advanced by the leader of the NDP.

That hon. member then went on to discuss the question of the price gouging in the food industry, which he alleges is taking place. He attempted to substantiate his argument by referring to a shopping list obtained from the hon. member for Nickel Belt, a subject matter in respect of which we have heard comments before. He read into the record certain price increases and then purported to use these as the foundation stone for his argument that severe price gouging is taking place.

The leader of the NDP castigated the government on the fact that the Food Prices Review Board did not have the power to roll back prices, but conveniently ignored the fact that the Food Prices Review Board has on frequent occasions stated that despite the most exhaustive investigations it has found that such gouging or profiteering at the distribution level is not taking place.

The other point the hon. member made reference to was related to agricultural land. He pointed out that this had been an effective argument used by his colleagues during the Ontario election, but he did not point out that one of the reasons why agricultural land is being abandoned by farmers is that they are having a difficult time getting a fair price for their produce and, like a lot of people in this House and elsewhere, they are not prepared to work for a meagre income and are insisting on getting an adequate return for their efforts or they will not stay on the farms. I think in his advocacy along this line he failed to come to grips with the real problems and ignored the realities of the situation. However, the Minister of Finance pointed out the weaknesses in his position.

In refreshing contrast, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) when speaking in the debate said he recognized there were gaps and defects in the program. I believe it was he who coined the phrase "rough justice". He did recognize the difficulties in implementing the program. He said he would like to see the time of the program shortened. In other words, he made some constructive critical observations which I think the Minister of Finance and those of us on this side of the House listened to with considerable appreciation. I think it is very true to say that there was a very real contrast between the behaviour of the Leader of the Official Opposition in this serious hour of the country's history, and that of the leader of the NDP.

The Leader of the Opposition recognized that we are in the midst of a crisis and that this country runs the risk of economic ruin. He recognized that, on the best of authority, inflation has reached the point where it must be stopped, and notwithstanding his very real objections to the program he is ready to get behind it, support it in principle, and contribute effective and critical observations.

In contrast to that we have members of the NDP unready at any point to say the program has merit. They say it lacks merit in any area but are unwilling to say that if they had to bring forward a program they would do it this way or do it that way. Instead, they trot out their time worn cliches about monster corporations, and all their phrases about no competition in the market place. Then finally, of course, they pay their traditional dues to the one sector of the community they live off, namely, the powerful labour unions, and point out that they are the ones who are going to suffer.

There is one thing we on this side of the House can say; we are not anti-labour. And we are not saying we are anti-management. We are trying to preserve the economic fabric of this country.

● (1520)

The Minister of Finance in introducing this program recognized that it has defects but he is prepared, and has already done so by amendment at the committee stage, to remedy some of these defects. He has listened to members opposite at the committee stage, as he has today. I feel certain that the overwhelming majority of Canadians are ready to take this program, defects and all, and try to make it work.

I think it is a singular disservice to Canada and to parliament that members of the New Democratic Party have chosen to join with the Canadian Labour Congress in respect of the $500,000 that has been allocated to the cause of trying to destroy this program and bring it to the ground in any way possible. The difficulties Canadians face are certainly unquestioned.

There is the further question which is very much on the minds of many of us concerning whether the government has faced up to its own responsibility in cutting its own costs in dealing with the situation. Many of us have been heartened by the declared intention of the government to reduce its own costs significantly this year. I welcome that decision, as I know do many members throughout the House. The problem of course is that when these intentions are reduced to practical measures there will be many painful realizations that programs cherished by members on both sides of the House may be concluded. There presumably will be many people losing their positions in government, people who believed they were performing very valuable functions. In other words, we will soon hear, when these cuts are inaugurated, cries of outrage from certain people who this morning have urged that cuts take place.

So, what we on this side of the House believe is that unless government plays its part at all levels and cuts its costs, unless the Bank of Canada plays its part in managing the money supply, and unless the community at large realizes for the short term at least that none of us will be winners if the economy is destroyed and we become uncompetitive in the world then the whole system will collapse. If there is that realization then the program will succeed.

I hope that in the committee, and when the bill returns to the House, members of the New Democratic Party will recognize their responsibility and realize what this country expects from them, a party which has contributed much in the past to the concepts that are now part of our social fabric. I hope that they will get behind this program and stop simply offering shallow criticisms, and mouthing the negative response of their labour friends, and get behind this program and make it work so that we will have a better society.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the need for this legislation. It is evident that rather than being a well thought out contingency plan, that has been held in mothballs since 1971, it is in fact obviously a "rush rush" job done in the list of the resignation of the former minister of finance and the then upcoming conference of the Liberal faithful, which just concluded last weekend. Given the circumstances, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talked the cabinet into accepting this type of confusing plan. The Prime Minister is obviously a reluctant convert to such a program, and the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has said he finds it all rather frightening.

Little wonder there is so much concern, not only among senior officials in government but also among the people of Canada generally about the Prime Minister's commitment to this legislation. He keeps saying to the Canadian people, "You asked for leadership and now I'm giving it to you." The evident conclusion, of course, is that he admits he was not giving leadership in the management of inflation, or of the economy in general, up until this legislation.

Geoffrey Stevens in his column in the Globe and Mail on Friday, October 17, quotes the Premier of Nova Scotia as saying at the meeting of the premiers with the Prime Minister on Thanksgiving Day, after listening to the Prime Minister outline his program, "This raises 50,000 questions". The Prime Minister is quoted as replying, "That's right, that's why we are against wage and price control".

It is obvious since this legislation was introduced that Confusion Square has moved from below Parliament Hill to the halls of government itself, to the Department of Finance and to the officials of the anti-inflation board who have been hired so far. The way so many officials from a variety of departments are being seconded to do this job, one wonders if many of them were not underemployed in their own departments. It is too bad the government does not show a similar concern for the unemployed and the underemployed spread across the various provinces of Canada.

The confusion that exists, and the uncertainties about the guidelines and the regulations, could easily have been allayed if the government, once it decided to go this route, had for at least a period of 30 and possibly 60 days frozen both wages and prices. This would have clearly shown the government's commitment to the program and allowed the anti-inflation board to do a relatively orderly job, first of all of hiring personnel, collecting the multitude of statistics that will be needed, and setting up administrative procedures, including how to deal with the many exceptions that are bound to arise in deciding whether wage changes, price increases, profit margins, and so on are in order. It is true that from a political point of view this would have looked to the Liberals too much like part of the Tories' proposal in the last election. But it seems to me that in proceeding the way it has the government has stacked the deck against itself by creating all the confusion referred to above, and by desperately complicating the anti-inflation board's problems in getting data and so on to deal with the many complexities involved in an on-going dynamic mixed economy such as ours.

I repeat, that once the government decided to go this route there should have been a more orderly adjustment, and time provided for a proper educational program to be put across, rather than the frantic propagandistic shibboleths pronounced by various members of the cabinet rushing back and forth across Canada trying to explain a program to the people that they do not understand themselves.

[Mr. Hogan.]

The Prime Minister reminds one of a confused, scrambling quarterback who has suddenly changed signals in a hurry at the line with many members of his team not being at all clear what is involved in the carrying out of the new game plan.

There are many people who criticize the Canadian Labour Congress for setting up a fund which, among other things, will test the constitutional efficacy of this anti-inflation legislation. I think that rather than criticizing them we should be complimenting them.

It is not necessary to be a lawyer to understand that the anti-inflation legislation has been introduced by the federal government under its general constitutional power to enact laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada. Even if the resulting guidelines interfere with the operation of provincial collective bargaining laws, the federal government claims the right to intervene. It has, however, refrained from applying the guidelines to provincial and municipal civil servants and employees of all provincial public bodies such as hydro commissions, school boards, and provincial Crown corporations, unless the appropriate province agrees that the guidelines will apply to them. Some question of the constitutional validity of this delegation of authority exists. The right of a province to give away its jurisdiction, as Ontario seems to have done with its agreement with the federal government, without passing enabling legislation is very much in doubt.

Let us turn to the economic reasons given for this program. One of the major economic pillars underlying the controls is the belief expressed in the budget speech of the former minister of finance on June 23, 1975. The former minister of finance said that inflation threatens to price our goods out of the world market. For weeks on end we heard the then minister of industry, trade and commerce continually using this argument in this House and outside. Since then there have been a number of cabinet ministers who have picked up this refrain. So embedded is this notion that the new deputy chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board, Mrs. Plumptre, at a recent meeting in Vancouver on October 30, 1975, insisted that this was a major reason for setting up the anti-inflation legislation, and I quote her:

● (1530)

Canada's international competitive position and ability to pay its own way in the world is being set back. We are pricing ourselves out of the market.

I underline the word "are". But the figures released by Statistics Canada at about the time Mrs. Plumptre was perpetrating a continuance of this mythology showed that import prices, which are not covered by the government's anti-inflation program, were rising twice as fast as Canadian export prices.

On a year to year basis the rate of increase was 14.5 per cent for import prices but only 7.5 per cent for exported goods. Of course these statistics were pretty damaging evidence against the mythology, for they tended to disprove the government's claim that high wage settlements were making Canada uncompetitive, and as Peter Cook of the Financial Times noted, this has been one of the main arguments for selling controls to the labour movement.

Moreover, it was just not a question of raw materials and resource products involved in the statistical revelations; the price of manufactured exports in the second quarter of this year, and these are the latest statistics we all have, were up 11.7 per cent from the same period last year, while imported prices on finished goods had increased by 20 per cent. So it cannot be argued that slower growth in export prices, as against our import prices, was just a matter of weak foreign markets for raw materials and resource products.

It is evident that on the basis of Statistics Canada price indices the terms of trade still favour Canada. I brought this matter up in a Finance Committee meeting with the Minister of Finance on November 3, and he stickhandled around the obvious evidence of the falsity of the claim of cabinet ministers and Mrs. Plumptre that we are pricing ourselves out of the world markets by saying, and I quote: "I think I would put it more on the basis of anticipation than actual fact." This might be acceptable legalese, but it is not good economics.

The truth of the matter is that there is no evidence for the conclusion that we are pricing ourselves out of international markets. I defy any hon. member opposite to give statistics from Statistics Canada which would reveal this. This evidence has to show up in the trade indices to which I have already referred.

What the Minister of Finance seems to be saying is that we are scared of this matter for the future, but if he is extrapolating from the present statistical evidence, he has no solid basis for his claim. It is more of an intuitive or alarmist type of attitude than one based upon solid, statistical or other economic evidence.

Another piece of shaky evidence which has been used in trying to defend the necessity of such controls is that wage settlements in Canada are well above those in the United States. However, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) noted in his recent speech in Newfoundland, some of the statistics used to paint labour as the villain in the inflationary process are dubious, and indeed, spurious. This comparison between Canada and the United States wage data is a prime example. The data I have seen shows that all wage settlements negotiated in the first three months of 1975 provided for future increases averaging 7 per cent in the United States and 16 per cent in Canada. What this data does not show is the possible future effect of cost of living allowance clauses.

In the first quarter 62 per cent of American workers with new settlements were covered by COLA clauses, while only 3 per cent of organized Canadians have such provision. Also, the data used for Canada, that is, the 16 per cent increase to which I referred, is calculated on the base or lowest rate of pay, while in the United States the statistics are based on average straight time hourly earnings of all workers.

A recent study by the Bureau of Labour Statistics in the United States, a summary of which was published in the Monthly Labour Review of the American department of labour, pointed out that if you take total compensation—not just for production workers, but for all employees—the difference in average compensation between the United States and Canada is even greater than the difference in compensation for production workers between the two countries. The compensation per production worker between the United States and Canada has, of course, narrowed over the last 10 years.

In this connection it should also be pointed out that collective bargaining settlements in the third quarter of 1975, before the anti-inflation legislation was introduced, show that the average annual increase in base rates in Canada had gone down 18.5 per cent in the second quarter to 16.8 per cent in the third quarter. These figures are based on an analysis of collective agreements covering 500 or more workers in industries.

On the question of industrial strife, as measured by strikes and the number of man-days lost, we have Statistics Canada figures which show that there were 5.2 million man-days lost in the first half of 1974, while for the same period in 1975, without any controls at all, this was reduced to 3.4 million, a 38 per cent decline in seven months, as the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) noted when he was on his feet.

It is very difficult to get excited about the economic effects of this program as opposed to its political expediency. It is true that we hear people say that it seems something had to be done, but surely before we prescribe such serious medicine for a sick economy we must be fairly sure that we have a proper diagnosis.

The fact is, as our leader noted in his address today, that the prices of food, oil, gas, and mortgage rates for housing constitute some 60 per cent to 65 per cent of the ordinary cost of living of the average Canadian. The legislation we are asked to approve does not cover mortgage and other interest rates, which can be thought of as a price, that is, a price for money. Food, both the prices Canadian farmers may charge for their produce and the price of imported food, is not covered under this legislation.

As we know, within the past six weeks we have received the report of the Food Prices Review Board and Mrs. Plumptre on the profits of 78 food companies. The conclusion was that profits were far from excessive and hardly a factor in rising food prices. What, then, is causing high food prices?

Wholesalers and retailers will tell the Anti-Inflation Board what they told the Food Prices Review Board, that there are no excessive profits, and the consumers, who will still have to pay high prices for food, will be faced with a sort of "the devil made me do it" argument as an explanation for the continuing high food prices they will face. Again, oil and gas are not covered under the anti-inflation legislation. In short, the government is asking the wage earner to accept pretty full controls on his wage income, while being able to offer possible restraints, and I underline "possible", on only about 40 per cent or 35 per cent of his living costs.

Little wonder wage and salary people in the trade unions are less than happy with such an arrangement. They know of the enormous difficulty in controlling prices by means of controlling profit margins and the relative ease, on the other hand, to monitor and police the wage side. What about the poor and the working poor, who had the minimum in the wage guidelines waived after pressure from us and others, but who have no guarantee that they will ever reach the allowable level, since they have no formal bargaining power, and in most cases have even less market power than in the past because of very high unemployment created by the policies of the Liberal government? In fact we have on an average, the highest unemployment which has existed since about the time of the last war.

I should like to say more on the serious matter of the level and composition of the unemployed as to region, marital status, sex, and age, but time does not permit. However, too many commentators are too ready to dismiss the seriousness of this problem for the individuals concerned and for the national economy.

Likewise I should have liked to take some time to discuss the failure of the government to place a surtax on the income of professionals, because that is symbolic of why we consider this program inequitable and unworkable.

The whole restraint program on control of pricing by means of control of profits has, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) said on another occasion, more holes than Swiss cheese.

● (1540)

The Prime Minister has said that the New Democratic Party has long advocated selective price controls and now rejects them. That is not true. We would willingly support price controls which would control the price of key commodities in the consumer retail field, and intermediate goods, if the corporate sector of the economy could justify the price increases. Our method would be to have them justify the price increases before allowing them to proceed. This would be more equitable for everybody. Under those considerations we would not hesitate to demand the same justification for selective wage increases in these sectors if they were obviously against the public interest—just as Premier Barrett did in British Columbia. But in no case would we ask the wage and salary sector, and the ordinary working people, to make sacrifices that others could easily avoid, as is obvious in this present program.

The government insists on calling this not only an anti-inflation program but an incomes policy. But, Madam Speaker, the objective of an incomes policy is not just the control of inflation but increased productivity, less industrial strife, and a fairer distribution of incomes in the economy. The danger in this program is that while the government gives the appearance of having a decisive anti-inflation program, it may not only fail to halt inflation but may at the same time produce more unemployment and under employment. What we need is government action to create jobs, especially in the high unemployment areas of Quebec and the Atlantic region, and sections of it like hard pressed Cape Breton—not destroy them; action to build houses—not raise interest rates; action to improve the lot of those on low and fixed incomes—not penalize them, and action to help lower prices and not play a losing game with profit margins.

What the government needs to do is to begin to study in earnest the policies of certain western European countries such as the Netherlands, Norway, West Germany, Austria, Sweden, and Switzerland which have managed to keep inflation at manageable levels, unemployment at low levels compared to North America, the rate of productivity growth reasonably high in spite of the international crises, and a minimum of industrial strife.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I have a great deal of difficulty understanding the complete opposition of the New Democratic Party to the anti-inflation program. It seems to me there are many things in the guidelines and in the anti-inflation program that that party should find easy to support, and I should like to look at some of them.

I think we should look back at a statement which was made many times, that we are accepting the policy introduced by the Conservative party and that it should have been introduced at least a year ago when they felt they could become the government. I think there are reasons why it was not introduced then, and good reason why it should have been introduced at this time.

The nature of inflation in the first half of 1974 could be termed demand inflation with rising prices being caused by shortage of goods. The shift to a cost plus inflation occurred subsequently, and is much more prone to limitation by controls.

At the time of the election in July, 1974, labour was definitely behind. Inflation had caused steep price increases, while wages had not risen comparably. Labour has had a successful year, but I argued early last summer that labour's gains were only catch-up gains and labour should not be blamed for inflation. Because a large part of the labour movement has been able to catch up, however, I think there is justification at this point for going into some kind of wage controls. I want to qualify this by saying there is also a great deal of inequity because significant segments of the trade union movements, of the working people of Canada, have not as yet caught up.

If the wage side of the controls is going to be successful, it will occur when there is equity. We cannot say to the person who got his settlement on October 15 that he cannot have as much as the person who got his on October 13. There has to be equity. The New Democratic Party would be better arguing for equity than for condemnation of controls.

I think we should look at the manner in which controls were brought about. I have heard the members of the NDP talk about those segments of our economy which basically create inflation, citing the Galbraithian theory, which I think is accepted by many other groups, that inflation is basically caused by that segment of the economy which can administer its own prices, while in the market segment there is a fair amount of competition and prices therefore tend to be regulated by the market itself. There is a fair segment of the economy which is self controlled, what Galbraith calls the planning sector. It was this planning sector which the guidelines were formed to control, those 500 large firms, many of which are able to accept increases in costs and pass them on as increased prices.

The government has been selective in saying that we will deal with these 500 companies in the so-called planning sector of the economy, those that can control their own costs and their own prices.

This, with respect, is precisely what the New Democratic Party has talked about ever since I came to this House—multinational corporations, etc. Here is a serious attempt to control that part of our economy which has not been controlled in the past. I think, rather than fighting us on this, they should support us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: I indicated that I believe this price and incomes control policy will work only if there is equity. Many people have said we must be strong on the price side and I agree with them, but there also has to be equity on the wage side. I think the guidelines are set up to achieve this. If the New Democratic Party were really concerned about the situation, that is what they would be working on rather than opposing us.

There has been a catch-up of 16 to 18 per cent in this last year. It does not apply to all segments of the working population, however. There are some like the pulp and paper industry whose contracts go back to April, 1973, and who have not caught up. I think the guidelines are very explicit about cases such as this. They say that if a contract took effect before January 1, 1974, some catch-up or equity is in order. We cannot expect one worker to work for $1.70 an hour less than another person because the first in the woods division signed a contract in October 1974, and the other in the mill signed in November, 1975. The historical relationship is definitely in the guidelines. The program must be equitable. Only if the Anti-Inflation Board treats settlements equitably will the program work.

● (1550)

One thing disturbs me. Some companies in the pulp and paper industry are hiding behind the guidelines. They say to their workers, "We cannot give you a decent settlement because the guidelines will not permit it." That is not correct. I say that they should offer a decent settlement and present it to the Anti-Inflation Board, and if it is within the guidelines, including the historical clause, the board will allow it.

An hon. Member: If it is not greater than 10 per cent more.

Mr. McRae: More than 10% if warranted. It is wrong for these companies to use the government as a skirt behind which to hide.

Let us also see how the guidelines affect post office settlements. There are two major unions working in the Post Office. The Letter Carriers Union was offered and accepted a fine settlement. The minister worked hard on it, for he wanted to improve relations in the Post Office. As everyone knows, in parts of our Post Office there has been an atmosphere of fear and war between employer and employees. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) wanted to correct this and offered the letter carriers a fair settlement. They signed, effective January 1 past. The inside postal employees kept on negotiating. The Postmaster General offered them what he had offered the letter carriers. I suggest it will be a good and fair settlement, and meets all the tests of equity; and I am talking of equity for labour for the working man. I think that when the inside workers of the Post Office learn the full details of the settlement and vote on it, the strike will end.

I use the Post Office as an example, because the guidelines allow an equitable settlement. We shall bring about decent labour relations only if our workers are treated equitably. Certainly there must be provision for catch-up, as the government acknowledges. The government acknowledges that some portions of the trade union movement have fallen behind and have not received their catch-up pay. The government has not created a loophole. It wants to be fair, to be just.

Last summer I spoke strongly in this House about the need for wages to catch up. I say, however, that we shall be in serious trouble if, on top of a 15 per cent or 30 per cent increase this year, another 25 per cent or 30 per cent increase is granted next year. The increase is compounded. That is why I say that the controls should come into play now. An increase of 8 per cent is to be allowed, plus an addition to allow for any increased cost of living. For example, if the cost of living rises 9 per cent, the guidelines allow wages to go up an extra percentage point beyond 8 per cent. Thus the guidelines are designed to bring about long-term equity.

I am concerned about the pulp and paper industry. Four mills in my community are on strike, and I hope that a settlement occurs soon. I am particularly concerned, because a new Canadian union is involved, known as the Canadian Paper Workers' Union. In one of the very best moves in our society, the Canadian members of two international unions amalgamated their membership to form this large trade union, which is entirely Canadian. I wish the new union success as I think it is moving in the right direction. I ask the industry not to attempt to weaken this new movement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: Many members of the House, including members of my caucus, have expressed concern about how fair the controls are to the small man, the guy earning $4,000, $5,000 or $6,000 a year, and it has been suggested that the $600 ceilings should be raised. That is a good suggestion. My caucus also suggested that those earning less than $7,400—$3.50 per hour—should be totally excluded from the operation of the guidelines so that, for instance, people earning $4,000 could have their salaries increased to $6,000.

Mr. Broadbent: How are they to get the increase?

Mr. McRae: That will need to be worked out under other programs. We said that this suggestion should be incorporated in the guidelines to meet the criticism that the guidelines do not allow for substantial increases for people at the lower end of the income scale. It is now in the guidelines.

I suggest that the guidelines will be equitable. I do not think this program can be made to work if we treat the wage earner unfairly. That is why equity is so essential. The program must be fair, and it is. I support the guidelines 100 per cent, and I think the Anti-Inflation Board will make equitable decisions. Some hon. members should be more concerned about matters of equity than with trying to defeat the government's anti-inflation legislation.

Before my time runs out let me say some words about prices. It will be difficult to monitor all prices. I suppose a very massive bureaucracy could monitor the hundreds of thousands of different price tags in the stores across the country; personally I think that is the wrong route to follow. I therefore hope that many of my colleagues, on both sides, will do as I plan to do. Let us, from our offices, monitor prices. Consumers, housewives, and others who buy commodities every day and price them every day can report to us. I plan to work with people who are concerned about prices, who shop in the major stores of the community, Loblaws, Dominion, Safeway, A and P, and others covered by the guidelines. I want consumers to report price increases to my office. I want my office to be the place where we can collect that information and, where necessary, bring this information to the board's attention. That way countless thousands of Canadians will be vigilant in monitoring prices, in watching for unjustified price increases, and in causing investigations to follow.

Some price increases concern me a great deal. For instance I am particularly disturbed at the prospect of the 41 per cent increase next week in freight rates. The CTC is supposed to be the body regulating freight rates but does not discharge its function in this respect. The railways merely file the new rates with the CTC, and that is the end of it. I think the government should be more vigilant; I think the freight rate increase ought to be referred to the anti-inflation board for full investigation and disclosure, because the railways of this country have never made full disclosure, and such disclosure is essential. I submit that the Anti-Inflation Board can affect freight rate increases and ought to consider the question as soon as possible as a matter of vital concern.

In summary I submit that the guidelines are intended to be fair, and the anti-inflation program worth while and well timed, considering that a significant proportion of this country's working people have in the recent past received significant wage increases.

● (1600)

The anti-inflation program can be equitable. I hope it will be. It will work equitably if those who had the catch-up get it. That is included in the guidelines. In the future I think we can have a much more stable and equitable economy.

I am concerned about the price side. If we mobilize the consumers of this country, individually and in groups, to support our program to prevent price increases, I think we can be effective. The anti-inflation program is a sensible effort to bring about some stability in this country, and as such should lie supported by all segments of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Madam Speaker, I rise with some sorrow to take part in this sad debate on this wintry afternoon. One always hates to see and listen to the sparrings of the recently divorced. We have heard it in what has gone on much of this afternoon, particularly the dispute with regard to the paternity of the individuals that have been spawned in terms of controls of varying kinds.

It is also sad to realize to what an extent the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has lost his position within the New Democratic Party. One knows that from his knowledge of the rules of this House he knows the workings of the democratic process. It passes the imagination that the NDP should bring in a motion that strains the rules to the point where the Speaker of this House was almost constrained to make a ruling, but chose simply to comment on the matter. One would wonder why because I am sure in the discussion in that caucus they had the advice of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. They knew they were skating very close to the rules as we know them and have known them recently. Why then bring up this subject as the debate for their day in the House? The reason is transparently obvious. An election is on in the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: It is a winter election. I did not think I would live to see the day when a modern government in that province would call an election in December, January, February, or even March, yet one has been called for December 11. As I said, the reason is transparent. It is as transparent as the ice that will cover the highways as the voters struggle to the polls to cast their votes on that day.

One finds it surprising indeed that the government there, of the same party and the same name as the people who presented this motion in the House today, should have broken so many promises made to the people of British Columbia about the election itself. The campaign starts out littered with those broken promises. They were so important to the premier of the province that, on the very night he made his victory speech, he said two things would happen before there would be another election in British Columbia. One was redistribution and one was the re-writing of the election act.

The map of redistribution is ready. It has been prepared, drawn up, and was to be published on October 31. They said it was not publicized because of the technology. We now know what the technology was and we have an election being fought on an electoral map that is out of date. This was the government that promised to change the system and change the ways of elections in British Columbia. It did not make a further promise, but there was an assumption that there would be at least a four-year term because no party in British Columbia—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I have been listening very attentively to the hon. member. He is straying a bit from the subject. Perhaps he could limit himself to the motion.

Mr. Johnston: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am discussing the motion. It is important that this House know the reasons behind the presentation of this motion today. We know that in recent months in British Columbia there has been a desperate search for an issue on which to go to the people. This is very germane to what we are talking about this afternoon. It is vital to the democratic process of this country that the public know what we are talking about this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: There is a lot more here than meets the eye. We know that last fall there was an attempt to use the Columbia River treaty as the basis for an election in British Columbia. With some help from the CBC in showing a film called "The Reckoning" twice within six weeks, this was to be a plank in the NDP platform. Thanks to some very fast work by the former chairman of BC Hydro, who set the record straight—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I must again interrupt the hon. member. Allow me to read the motion. Mr. Broadbent, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre), moved:

That this House rejects the government's anti-inflationary program—

I ask the hon. member to limit his remarks to the motion.

Mr. Johnston: Thank you, Madam Speaker. With all due respect, I will continue because one of the issues that was to be an election issue in British Columbia was the failure of the federal government to act on inflation. Surely that is germane to the fact that we now have this motion in the House.

The reason for having this motion escaped the Speaker. He found it necessary to comment on it. With all due respect, Madam Speaker, I cannot see why, when the Speaker of this House earlier today was constrained to talk about the reason for this motion being on the order paper, I cannot talk about the reason for it being before us.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Twice in this speech the hon. member has reflected on the Chair. The Chair asked questions about this motion, but ruled that it was in order. I submit for this hon. member to question that decision is a reflection on the Chair that he is not entitled to make.

Mr. Johnston: On the same point of order, Madam Speaker, not for a moment have I questioned the ruling of the Chair. Not for a moment have I questioned the propriety of the ruling. Obviously we are in a debate on this motion. I am talking about no other matter but this motion that the NDP felt constrained to present to the House today.

For a while it looked as though the back-to-work issue in British Columbia could be an election issue there, but the government moved and the unions did not provide the issue. We have heard a fair amount about strikes in this debate today.

When this very control program was initiated by those opposite, it met with a scornful reaction from the premier of the province of British Columbia. For a while it looked as though the very control program that we are debating this afternoon would be the issue for the election there. However, on casting around it was discovered that there was a fair body of support for it in the public opinion not only in the province of British Columbia but across the entire country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: If there was any support for that program it was due entirely to the campaign run by the Progressive Conservative party and the leadership of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) a year ago. It was a residue of that campaign which was unsuccessful then.

● (1610)

So we have this motion today. It speaks of controlling prices and effective control over incomes. And we note that in the Province of British Columbia in the last three years and several months the people have learned a great deal about government controls when initiated by that party, one which has beggared the forest industry, the great industry which British Columbia possesses; for the first time the industry is going to declare a loss position at the end of the year. What else? The Barrett government has stalled the mining industry in that province. Exploration crews have departed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. Johnston: It has frightened the agricultural industry through its attempts to back off the agriculture support program which was set up. This, surely, has something to do with price controls since it affects products which are very important to this land.

It has alienated the teachers, of all people, those to whom the success of the campaign in 1972 was owed more than to any other group. And it has frightened the ecologists. The premier of that province would dearly love to close down some mining activities but he doesn't dare because of the effect on provincial revenues. It has alienated the native people, lost the one native MLA who sat in the legislature for so long. It has lost $100 million in welfare over-runs which have never been explained. It has destroyed the automobile insurance industry and honoured the wrecking crew by appointing him its Agent-General in London. Thus we have a dismal history of controls in that province—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. Johnston: —and a rather strange motion before us today whose timing must be questioned both by members of this House and by everyone who takes seriously the entire issue of controls which have been imposed by that government while federal controls are being challenged by that party, and while another set of controls have been imposed by a provincial government in this country of the same type. I cannot for the life of me see how I could possibly be out of order if I talk about controls as they are being applied in British Columbia.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Right on!

Mr. Johnston: We have a price freeze there, and an election called in the middle of it. I do not think there has ever been in the history of this nation a more deliberate attempt to blackmail the public than this calling of a winter election in the middle of a 68-day price freeze.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Again I must remind the hon. member that he is straying from the subject of the motion.

Mr. Johnston: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is not for me in my wisdom, or lack of it, to predict the result of the forthcoming election, although I see some attempts being made from that corner to second guess me. I shall not comment further on that aspect at the present time. However, I will say it is transparently obvious that the S.O.S. has gone out from the Province of British Columbia. The situation of the government there is desperate. They have said to their colleagues here, "Help us out; we have only got until the 11th and we've got to do something." And so we have a motion before us today.

I felt other speakers would have raised some of the points I have made this afternoon but I realize that British Columbia is a long, long way from this chamber, and unfortunately many of my colleagues from that province are not present this afternoon. In these circumstances I felt somewhat constrained to provide some background because we shall be voting on this motion later. The leader of our party has already indicated that he is not prepared to support the motion, and I feel that if I have done anything in the brief minutes at my disposal I have said some of the things that needed to be said. Although I realize I could go on a little longer, I yield the floor now with the record a little straighter as to why this unusual motion should have been presented at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Reading this motion, Madam Speaker, one might ask whether the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) in whose name it stands has read the white paper issued by the government on October 14. He told us the government's anti-inflation program was totally unworkable in terms of controlling prices. That remains to be seen. He said it provides no effective control over profits or professional incomes. I should like the leader of the NDP to read pages 16, 17, 18 and part of 19, and then tell me why he believes there is no effective control over prices or professional incomes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Because he has read those pages, that is why.

Mr. Breau: I did not hear anything in his speech today to convince me that this kind of system cannot work. I shall have something to say a little later about controlling prices. He maintained that the program was unfair to wage and salary earners in Canada. That is one aspect I wish to deal with this afternoon because when people talk about wage and salary earners they normally think about unions, the labour movement, and workers generally.

It has always amazed me that the NDP, a party which until the last election had never succeeded in electing a single member east of the Ottawa Valley—they have got one now and, knowing his background, I hope he will be able to bring the party to reality and show them that when they talk about people, and when they talk about workers, they should not talk only about labour unions and giving the people who rule them more power in the economy—

An hon. Member: Right out of the ocean.

Mr. Breau: Because of my background, and because of what has interested me in politics, I am concerned with people, particularly with those who are the weakest, those with low incomes, and I must say that, apart from rhetoric, since I entered this House in 1968, and apart from supporting some social programs which do help the little people in society, on the question of wages or salaries the NDP is not the only party, not necessarily the sole bright light in fighting for those who are weak.

I understand that when one comes from a certain constituency one tends to speak in terms of the interests of those constituents. I remember the crusade the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) carried on in 1970, 1971, and 1972 against the Department of Regional Economic Expansion when that department was just starting out; he would look for cases involving incentives in the Atlantic provinces and elsewhere and try to dramatize them and exaggerate them without giving the program any kind of a chance. Because it was popular with the UAW and popular with workers in Toronto and some other areas close to his constituency, he carried on his crusade against that program.

• (1620)

Mr. Broadbent: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. Is the hon. member rising to ask a question or to raise a point of order?

Mr. Broadbent: I hope that the hon. member will correct the impression that he has just left.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. That is clearly a point for debate, not a point of order.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I had not yet come to my point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the hon. member rising again on a second point of order?

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to express the first point of order. My point is that motives ought not be attributed to members of the House on either side. The hon. member was attributing motives to things I have said in the past, which I submit is out of order. Secondly, if he checks the record of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion he will discover that his own minister acknowledged the errors in the program to which I drew attention. The point he made about the motives behind the objection is of the kind that I would not have expected of a man with his experience in the House.

Mr. Breau: Madam Speaker, first of all I totally and categorically reject the suggestion that I attributed motives. I was reflecting on the reason why the hon. member would normally take a certain stand on a particular program of the government. I agree that in some cases the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has not been a total success.

Mr. Broadbent: In every case I cited they have not.

Mr. Breau: The irony of the situation is that the particular case that the hon. member dramatized and exaggerated, the Michelin case, has been the most successful part of DREE. The hon. member is a national party leader so I will give him a chance since he is just starting out. If he were up to date he would know exactly what the problems of DREE have been. But from the speeches he has made in this House and elsewhere I have concluded he is not even close to understanding the real problem of regional development, though I hope he will learn.

He tells the House that he would have a national development program. I will wait and see what answers he will have regarding regional development. The point I want to make is that this anti-inflation program hits the powerful in society. That is obvious. Anyone who reads the white paper would realize what this attack on inflation does. The motion says that it is completely unfair to wage and salary earners. Yes, it will be unfair to some wage and salary earners. It will be unfair to wage and salary earners who are members of a big union, and whose big union has been wielding economic power in the last few years.

I do not bitch about that, Madam Speaker. There is nothing wrong in a free society with people trying to obtain economic power. When the leader of the NDP talks about the program being unfair to wage and salary earners in Canada, he is right. It is unfair to those who are represented by economic power groups that are bargaining in society for a bigger share of the national income.

As for the wage and salary earners who are unorganized, who are not members of a big powerful union—and there are less of those in the constituency of Oshawa-Whitby than in the maritimes, for example—if the situation had been left as it was without controls there is no way the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, or any other member, could convince me that these wage and salary earners would have caught up. The leader of the NDP knows that. The UAW and other big unions would have got better settlements from their employers. So would CUPW and CUPE.

Mr. Broadbent: The unorganized will get nothing from this program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Remember this is your opposition day.

Mr. Breau: The leader of the NDP should really not get so upset, because on some matters I do not disagree so strongly with the NDP. I do not disagree with them when they talk about redistributing income. But when that party tries to exploit the situation by saying that because the program deals with the economically powerful in society, the powerful unions, it will hurt all wage and salary earners, this is just not true.

What I should like the leader of the NDP to tell me, in the context of this program or any program that attacks inflation, is how he will—

Mr. Broadbent: I would tax the corporations, that is how.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member should know that I am further from the corporations than he is. In New Brunswick, when one buys a car it does not matter who exploits the buyer on the price of the car; whether GM or the UAW, it is still exploitation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: When the members of the NDP, with whom I sometimes agree, start talking about how this program will hurt the low income wage and salary earners—when in fact it will hurt the powerful unions in society—I just do not follow the argument. What I should like the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby to tell me is how he would devise a program of controls in the context of the kind of program we have today. He is an economist and he knows the problem. How would he give more to the low income wage earner?

Mr. Broadbent: Ask Lalonde what he was trying to get through to the cabinet.

Mr. Breau: I would expect the leader of the NDP to tell me what he would do. Perhaps he will learn to be a true leader and not heckle a poor backbencher like me. I should like to try to find a way to help people on low income in times of inflation, and that is the reason I am in politics. I should like to have a better distribution of wealth in society, in my particular region, all over the country, and even all over the world.

While I have nothing against the fact that in a free society one should be able to bargain to get more, and while you have checks and balances in bargaining, threatening, saying you will go on strike and so on, there are a lot of people in this country who cannot do this. The leader of the NDP says that if we let the labour movement get what it wants this will somehow benefit the low income wage earner. He is an economist and is experienced in politics, but this argument does not make sense to me at all. It is all very fine to let certain groups attain power; but if they use it in a way that raises the price of products so that people in some sectors of the country cannot afford to buy them, it is not helping these people at all.

Therefore I agree that the anti-inflation program will possibly hurt people of low income; but without the program of controls those people would have stayed where they were. The big settlements would have gone to the big unions, and the hon. member knows that. The fish cutting workers in my constituency, the lumbermen in the sawmills—

Mr. Broadbent: You are sounding more like Mackasey every day.

● (1630)

Mr. Breau: I am glad the hon. member admits I am making sense. The Leader of the NDP says I sound like the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), who I think will go down in history as a great Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: I was saying that the lumbermen, the pulpwood cutters, and fish cutters in my constituency would not have obtained a bigger settlement if this program had not been in existence. Those workers would have received the same settlement they are now allowed. If a situation should develop in which that is not the case I will be the first one to agree with the leader of the NDP that the program is unworkable. However, just because it hits the UAW, CUPW, and other big unions in Canada I am not going to go on a rampage and say I disagree with the program.

Let me now refer to this question of effective control over professional incomes by the provinces. If an honest and reasonable person reads pages 16, 17, 18 and 19, and understands something about the business world and the economic system in this country, he will have to admit that this program will work if given a chance. If it should not work we will then try something else. Short of a utopia, or a society in which everything is right from the start, I do not see how anyone could devise a program that would be more equitable and with more safeguards against abuse than this program.

I said earlier I would come back to this question of controlling prices. Like others I would like to hit on an idea or devise a system in which we could control prices completely in Canadian society. I would very much like to see that. The fact is that if we want to maintain the system now in existence, if we do not want an overly centralized system or an overly bureaucratic system, we will have to maintain some degree of economic freedom. I do not see how we could devise a program under which we would be able to control prices and increases 100 per cent. We have to depend on economic agencies in our society. We have to depend on labour unions, and I am sure they will be reasonable. We must depend on all these people to help make this program work.

To say that in Bill C-73 there are no powers to investigate dramatic price increases is just not to know the facts. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby suggested that Liberals do not like to be confronted with the facts. Let me suggest that he again read Bill C-73 and the white paper. In those documents he will find set forth the powers of the anti-inflation board.

Mr. Broadbent: You should read what I said.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): He doesn't want to understand it.

Mr. Breau: I listened to every word said by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, just as I always listen to what he says. I do not always agree with him but I always listen to what he has to say.

Surely there are sufficient powers in this bill that when there is an excessive price increase in some sector of our economy we can investigate and order a rollback of prices. To suggest that this program will not work is really to try to sell that kind of dogma and doctrine that only the NDP is able to sell in some parts of the country. This program is worth giving a chance. We have had experience in this country in respect of price increase investigations, and we have seen the experience of other countries where investigations of some sectors of society have been carried out in order to control wages.

I admit that it is more difficult to control prices. It is easier to check payrolls than it is to check prices of goods on the shelf. I regret that, and would like to be able to devise a system which would allow us in this economy—I see that my time has expired.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member's time has now expired.

[Mr. Breau.]

Mrs. Holt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In the fall of 1974 the members of the NDP disappeared from the House, leaving one person behind to call the Speaker's attention to the lack of a quorum. Some 42 of us were attending committee meetings, but not one NDP member was in attendance. Today is an NDP opposition day, and look at them. They number four, with one standing behind the curtains drinking coffee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. That is not a point of order.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, in July, 1974, the people of Canada had an opportunity to vote in a general election. The main issue which developed during the campaign, an issue on which the people really decided how to vote, was really the suggestion by the Convervative party that inflation in Canada was so serious that what was required to stop the inflationary spiral, so adversely affecting all Canadians, was a 90-day wage and price freeze, following which a Conservative government would work out an incomes policy.

At the time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) opposed a wage and price freeze, saying it would not work. He said inflation was an international occurrence that could not be stopped or controlled by any one country. The people in Canada by the thousands deserted the Conservative party, and to some extent the NDP, and elected, particularly in Ontario, Liberal member after Liberal member. They voted this way on the basis of the Prime Minister's promise to oppose wage and price controls.

Some 15 months later the Prime Minister, elected on his promise not to impose wage and price controls, comes to the Canadian people and says we must have those controls. He may be right. The situation may have changed, but neither he nor his ministers have yet explained to the satisfaction of the Canadian people what that change has been. Those trained seals who sit behind the Prime Minister, many of whom were elected on the basis of his promise to oppose wage and price controls, expect us to keep quiet and fall in line as they have done. We were not elected as Liberals and we are not obligated to the Prime Minister. We intend to keep asking the same kind of questions we were asking last year.

We have attempted, here in the House and in committee, to find out from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) what the inflationary problem is. We know that in the last year the cost of living has risen by 10.5 per cent. We have asked the Minister of Finance what his experts have told him they expect inflation to be in the next year. We have asked why the government thinks the situation is so serious it has to bring in legislation the like of which we have never seen in Canada in over 100 years, except during wartime. We have asked the Minister of Finance what he expects the anti-inflation program will do, and what the rate of inflation will be after the implementation of this program.

The Minister of Finance has completely rejected all invitations to inform the people about the estimates his experts have made. I think he owes it to the people of Canada to tell them what the situation is. After all, he is proposing controls on all Canadians the like of which we have never seen except during wartime, yet he is refusing to tell us what the situation is, or is expected to be.

Some of us with some contacts have made some inquiries. I have before me the estimates made by a very respected non-partisan and non-political institute, namely, the Institute of Quantitative Analysis of the University of Toronto. Let me place on the record the kind of estimate they made with the help of their computer. Their computer is similar to that used by the Department of Finance.

● (1640)

They estimate that the cost of living for the next year, without the anti-inflation program and the controls the government proposes, would have risen from the 10½ per cent increase we had in the last year to 11.3 per cent in the coming year. I do not think that is the kind of increase which would necessitate the almost war action the government is proposing.

Let us look at what they tell us the increase in the cost of living will be in the next year with the control program. As a result of this tremendous interference in the lives of the ordinary citizens of Canada, what will the increase in the cost of living be in the next year according to the University of Toronto Institute of Quantitative Analysis? Will it be, instead of 10½ per cent, 5 per cent, 7 per cent or 8 per cent? In other words, will there be a substantial reduction in the cost of living? According to the Institute of Quantitative Analysis the increase in the coming year will be 9.6 per cent.

After all the mountain of effort we will have a mouse-like decrease in the cost of living of less than 1 per cent. But the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance say that the people they want to protect, the people who need the assistance, are not the businessmen, the professional people or the organized workers because they can look after themselves. That is what the hon. member for Gloucester said, and he is right. The organized worker will get the 10 per cent which the government says is the maximum he can get. Of course he will get it because he has the economic power. But what about the poor and the unorganized workers whom the hon. member for Gloucester said will be helped by this program?

Mr. Breau: I did not say that.

Mr. Orlikow: I have in front of me a table prepared by Statistics Canada which shows the percentage of the gross national product each fifth of the population has received for the last 25 years. These figures are very interesting because they answer, I think very well, the simple question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester—what happens to the poor people?

Let us go back 25 years. In 1951 the bottom one-fifth of the people in Canada, the lowest 20 per cent of the workers, received 4.4 per cent of the gross national product.

An hon. Member: Quite a few of them were in New Brunswick.

Mr. Orlikow: Yes, and also in Newfoundland. What did the top 20 per cent receive? They received 42.8 per cent. In 1974, 25 years later, again under a Liberal government, the bottom 20 per cent, after all the so-called programs to help the poor people, received .4 per cent less than they received in 1951. What did the top 20 per cent get? They received 42.4 per cent.

I want to place on the record two other very interesting figures. I refer to the figures for 1971 and 1972. That was the last time the Liberal government tried, it said, to do something about inflation and to help the poor people. That is the time John Young and his incomes board were working. What did they accomplish? Here is the record. In 1971 under a Liberal government, with the same Prime Minister, what did the bottom 20 per cent receive in respect of the gross national product? Instead of the 4.4 per cent they received in 1951, they received 3.6 per cent in 1971. What did the top 20 per cent receive 20 years later in 1971? They received 43.3 per cent of the gross national product.

In 1972, while John Young was still charging on his white charger, the bottom 20 per cent received 3.8 per cent of the gross national product while the top 20 per cent received 42.9 per cent of the gross national product. That is an indication of how much the Liberal government and the Liberal Party care about the poor people. Liberal members and the Minister of Finance say—although they originally said that the people at the bottom could get $600 and the people at the top $2,400—in terms of an increase they have looked at it again, have found they made a mistake, and are now giving the people at the bottom $750. How can the people at the bottom get a cent? They are unorganized. How does a woman working as a waitress on Sparks Street get that $750?

An hon. Member: What would she get without the controls?

Mr. Orlikow: I was coming to that. She would get precisely the same wage she is getting now. What we propose, what we proposed the same night the Prime Minister outlined his anti-inflation proposal, and what we have proposed every day since then, and what we are saying to the provincial governments is let the provincial and federal governments get together and bring in legislation to increase the minimum wage. If we are concerned about the people at the bottom that is the way to bring up their income.

I do not say that the minimum wage should be the $4 that I believe has been proposed by the Canadian Labour Congress, but how about a straight 50 cents an hour increase in all jurisdictions, federal and provincial? This is what we should have if we are worried about the poor people. This is a concrete proposal. I will wait for the hon. member for Gloucester to propose that to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). I will make this proposal to the government of Manitoba.

The people at the lowest end of the income scale are not organized. They have no economic power and are at the mercy of their employers. I do not intend to be critical of their employers as individuals because they are engaged in a cut-throat business where, if they increase their wage rate, they are in difficulty unless their competitors do the same. However, an increase in the minimum wage rate would mean that every person at the bottom, including every employer, would be treated in the same way. It would not hurt anyone very much. This is what the hon. member for Gloucester was talking about quite eloquently. I hope he meant it seriously. I suggest that this is a quick way to help the people at the bottom.

We are told we are in a crisis situation and must have restraint. We are told that people should not receive an increase of more than 10 per cent, and that if we do this everyone will be treated fairly. I have in front of me a news story which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of October 23, 1975. I wish to read, for the benefit of the hon. member for Gloucester and others, a few sentences from this. It is datelined Ottawa. It reads:

> Salary scales of about 1,150 senior public servants were raised between $2,000 and $6,000 a year on Sept. 4 retroactive to last April 1, . . .

Then further on:

> Also affected were about 350 in level 2, the next highest group, 140 in level 3 and about 10 executives in level 4 at the top of the pay scale.
>
> Salaries for senior executives range between a minimum of $27,500 in level 1 and a maximum of $54,000 in level 4.

● (1650)

I think there is something immoral about senior public servants drawing in the neighbourhood of $50,000 per year, sitting down with policy advisers to the Prime Minister and saying that they are in a real serious situation, suggesting limiting the amount anyone's income can be increased in the next year to $2,400, and ignoring the fact that they just received their increase. If the government was serious it should have set an example. If those at the top of the civil service can receive an increase of $5,000 or $6,000 per year, how can we ask others to limit themselves to $2,400?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: It is not my responsibility to fight the battles of any particular group. I am not going to discuss now whether the postal workers are asking for too much or just enough, but I will ask a very simple question: how can we say to the postal worker that he is asking for too much when we have permitted people at the top to receive increases of $5,000 and $6,000 per year?

Let us consider the whole question of restraint. We have said that it is easy to control wages and salaries, and the hon. member for Gloucester is correct when he says that the organized worker will look after himself. If the limit is 10 per cent, the organized worker who receives $10,000 will receive his $1,000. The organized teacher will receive his $2,000, $1,500, or whatever it is. The nurse will receive a large increase.

There is nothing in the white paper, nothing in the speeches made by the minister, and nothing in the discussions held in the finance committee which would give the slightest indication that the government has really worked out a program which will control the incomes of professional people. In answer to questions today the minister said that he is working with the provinces and that he expects they will come to an agreement. We know for a fact that more than one province has said to the minister that this program will not work unless the federal government is prepared to put a 100 per cent surtax on net increases over $2,400 per year.

Of course the provinces will sit down with doctors and work out fee schedules, and of course the provinces can say that they will not increase the rates of fees which are paid, but there is nothing to prevent doctors from seeing more people and doing more work, in which case their income would go up.

If a province were to try to implement a surtax there would be nothing to prevent a doctor from moving from one province which imposed a surtax to another province which did not impose a surtax. That is why some of the provinces have asked the Minister of Finance and his officials to agree to a surtax. I know for a fact that up until now the minister and his officials have simply and completely rejected the idea. That being the case, the claim that the government is being equitable is false. It has no intention of controlling the income of the doctor, the lawyer, the architect, the engineer, and on down the list.

I do not believe this program can work at all. It is the wrong kind of program at the wrong time. Surely one does not have to be overly bright to realize that this program does not have a hope in hell of working if ordinary people do not believe that it is being operated equitably. I say to hon. members opposite that if the ordinary citizen in this country thinks wage and salary controls are for him but not for people in the upper brackets, he simply will not accept them. We will have more strikes than ever before because ordinary people do not believe this is equitable.

It is interesting to note who is doing the striking so far. It is not the long organized blue collar workers. They have not been on strike. Possibly a few of them have been on strike since this program was inaugurated, but who is on strike? Teachers, nurses, and the kind of people who, until a few years ago, would have recoiled in horror if anyone had suggested for a moment that they were part of the labour movement or the working class, are those who are now on strike.

I do not have much time left, but I wish to say that what I have said about professional people is just as true for corporations. A senior official in Revenue Canada at a meeting a week or so ago spelled out in detail how corporations, and particularly multi-national corporations, can juggle the books, how they can allocate supposed costs to different aspects of business, how they can move hundreds of millions of dollars and how they have the staff to do it, and Revenue Canada does not have the staff to control it. These companies will increase their income and their profits. The ordinary person will be restricted, and those at the bottom will do even worse in the next year than they have done in the last year. For all those reasons it is our intention to oppose this legislation and to support this motion.

Mr. Breau: Madam Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Will the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) allow a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Go ahead.

Mr. Breau: Given the fact that many of the products which people at low income levels—low wage earners which the hon. member mentioned, such as waitresses in restaurants—must purchase are manufactured by the manufacturing industry in Canada today, 80 per cent of which is centred in two or three large areas, and these two or three large centres, fortunately for Canada, have powerful unions and those workers can look after themselves, and if these groups are controlled and inflationary pressures are lessened, does he not agree that when they buy products low income earners elsewhere will benefit from this program?

Mr. Orlikow: I would give a good deal more thought to the question of the hon. member if he had expressed the same concern in the years 1972 to 1974 when corporation profits doubled, and when he and his government sat and said that that was a good thing. They should not now be saying that wages should be controlled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to the order made on Thursday, November 13, 1975, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Pursuant to special order of this House made yesterday, a recorded division on the proposed motion now before the House stands deferred until 9.45 p.m. on Monday, November 17, 1975.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to ask someone on the government side about the business for Monday. I understand we will be completing Bill C-58 under the order for closure which was made, but will we be then proceeding with the government annuities bill first, or with Bill C-20? Does anybody know?

● (1700)

Mr. Drury: Madam Speaker, we will be proceeding on Monday and hopefully conclude proceedings under Bill C-58. I am not sure whether it will be the government annuities bill that comes first or the unemployment insurance bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Obviously it will not be unemployment insurance; that is in committee. The information given to me was that it would be the annuities bill, Bill C-75.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): As it is now five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5.02 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 17, 1975

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED VOTE BY SECRET BALLOT ON GOVERNMENT OFFER TO SETTLE STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion of pressing and urgent necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I have given the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) and the government House leader notice of this motion. As Canadians have now been denied postal service for 28 days and as the CUPW has denied its membership the right to a secret vote on the government's final wage offer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House urges the Public Service Staff Relations Board to direct the Canadian Union of Postal Workers to take a poll of its membership by secret ballot on the government's final wage offer, and that such a vote be supervised by the Canadian Labour Congress.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of this motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There being unanimous consent, I shall put the motion. It is moved by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House urges the Public Service Staff Relations Board to direct the Canadian Union of Postal Workers to take a poll of its membership by secret ballot on the government's final wage offer, and that such a vote be supervised by the Canadian Labour Congress.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Too late!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that when the motion was moved, because of the usual commotion at the commencement of proceedings Your Honour failed to hear any objection to this motion.

An hon. Member: No, no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, could the question be put again?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is a most serious problem. If an hon. member alleges that he or others close to him withheld consent to the motion, and I missed that, it is a most serious situation. Previously, in such circumstance, the Chair has put the question a second time if it had been suggested that consent had been withheld. There is nothing dangerous about that precedent. When an hon. member has indicated that the Chair has missed a negative or dissenting vote cast either by that member or someone close to him, that has been sufficient for the Chair in the past. If this is the case, may I ask again if there is unanimous consent? Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion I just read can only be put with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REPLY OF CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS TO SUGGESTION SECRET BALLOT BE TAKEN ON GOVERNMENT OFFER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Postmaster General who last week indicated he had sent a communication to the CLC regarding a vote on the government's proposal. Has the Postmaster General received a reply from the Canadian Labour Congress indicating that it is preparing to encourage the union in question to hold a secret vote on the government's final offer?

● (1410)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I recall last week replying to a telegram from the Canadian Labour Congress urging renewed bargaining and so on. I did reply, as the Leader of the Opposition states, asking the CLC to urge the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, who are members of the CLC, to hold a secret ballot to see whether the government's final offer was acceptable. I went further to suggest that the CLC supervise the vote. So far, I have not had any reply.

Oral Questions

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON TAKING SECRET BALLOT ON FINAL OFFER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Last week the Postmaster General indicated he was prepared to at least give consideration to establishing some mechanism for a secret ballot on this proposal. Has the government reached any decision with regard to this? How long does the Postmaster General propose to allow the tie-up in service to continue before he makes a decision with regard to this matter?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): As we heard earlier, Mr. Speaker, there has already been overwhelming opinion in the House, not from all parties—

Mr. Baldwin: From the democratic, not the New Democratic.

Mr. Mackasey: —suggesting that this democratic right be provided to the workers as it is in civic, provincial and federal elections. As to when the government should move, as the hon. member knows, this is a very difficult question. It is a question of weighing the democratic right of the workers to remain on strike against the public interest. In a matter of several weeks, the House might be seized with the debate on the issue as to whether we have reached that particular point.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I was clear in the question I put to the Postmaster General. He had difficulty understanding it. I will put it to him in this way. The Postmaster General and members on the government side having indicated a few minutes ago that they favour a secret ballot or vote being taken under the direction and supervision of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, does the minister and the government propose to do anything about this?

Mr. Mackasey: The reason I favour it is because of the clear distinction between the government and the Public Service Staff Relations Board which is an independent body set up to supervise and administer industrial relations within the public service. This body is independent of government. Therefore, if it were to propose or initiate this move, we would frankly be free of any charge of interfering in the democratic rights of a particular union.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—CONSIDERATION OF NEEDS OF SMALL BUSINESSMEN

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Postmaster General. In answers on Friday of last week, the Postmaster General claimed that he placed greater value on democracy than the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. He explained how business and other people were keeping the mail moving. What consideration is the minister giving to the democratic right of the unheard majority of Canadians who cannot afford courier service for their postal needs and cannot afford to communicate their needs to the government by telegram?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have great sympathy with the question the hon. member has posed. It is all a matter of judgment—we cannot become too technical. It is an exercise which has to take place periodically when there are strikes on the railways, on the waterfronts and post offices when the private rights of individuals become public wrongs, and any government has an obligation to take action. It becomes a matter of judgment as to just when that moment is appropriate, and naturally the government would prefer to err on the side of caution in denying the rights of workers to be on strike legally as long as we can tolerate the effects without any real visible damage to the economy in general, though knowing fully well the impact on the fortunes of certain individuals.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—ALLEGED RELUCTANCE OF GOVERNMENT TO RESUME NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Since the government has asserted that any wage settlement which exceeds the government's wage guidelines will be subject to approval by the Anti-Inflation Board, and since the union has stated its desire to return to the bargaining table, can the Postmaster General tell the House why he shows such reluctance to resume negotiations as evidenced by his statement last week that there is nothing more to negotiate?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Before our socialist friends get excited, they should be making noises against Mr. Barrett who has legislated all labour legislation out of existence in his province. I have not said there is nothing left to negotiate. I said there was nothing left to negotiate in the $1.70 area or in the length of the contract. There may be other issues of a non-monetary nature which can be negotiated. Reading the newspapers and listening to television one gathers the impression that there seems to be a change of heart on the part of the union in the last day or so; they have indicated to the press that they are prepared to resume negotiations and we are prepared to do the same thing as long as it is fully understood that $1.70 is the limit they can possibly achieve in a 30-month settlement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—POSSIBILITY OF NEGOTIATING CHANGE IN COLA CLAUSE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Postmaster General. Can he expand the answer he just gave, particularly the statement that the government is not prepared to move any further on monetary issues? Does this mean, for example, that the government will make no change in its present position on the COLA clause question?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): We could not morally do anything with regard to the COLA clause by reason of the fact that it exists, or would exist in this collective agreement, only because it is in the letter carriers' agreement. More important, it is exactly the formula recommended by the chairman of the conciliation board, a man who was chosen by the union. I do not know anybody more qualified to judge what is a fair COLA clause than the chairman of the conciliation board who is a judge of the superior court chosen by the union in question, and I am guided by his judgment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: That item is only one of a number of other recommendations which were made; the government has not accepted all the others either. The minister well knows that the union might, for example, accept a COLA clause decision from the government—I say "might"; I have no private knowledge the minister does not have—in lieu of certain other considerations which they also have in mind. I should like to repeat my question because I am not sure of his answer. Is the hon. gentleman saying the door is shut on the COLA clause issue?

Mr. Mackasey: On the COLA clause issue, yes. I would also say to the hon. gentleman, who understands these matters just as well as I do, that I am at a loss to understand why the union should think that a vote, or even acceptance of the government's offer, would involve a loss of face having regard to the fact they were able to negotiate the only contract in the government which provides full job security and maximum security against the adverse effects of technological change, which, according to the union, was the prime issue. This question has now been negotiated, it is initialed, it is a fait accompli and we must now ask ourselves how much the government can concede, even in the non-monetary area, while still maintaining managerial control over a service the people of Canada expect and with regard to which we have an obligation to retain managerial control and not cede it to certain union leaders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1420)

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—POSSIBILITY OF APPOINTING MEDIATOR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister the following question. Given the importance of this issue, both in terms of the public's right to mail service and the union's right to strike when it is provided by government legislation, and given the fact that the negotiations clearly seem to be at the point of breakdown, with the negotiators on neither side seeming to be prepared to make a move would the Prime Minister give consideration to discussing with both sides the acceptance of a mediator in the circumstances?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the conciliation report, which is one that both parties have had time to examine and one which, I repeat, seems very reasonable in terms of its recommendations, is the step at which we should stop at this point.

[Translation]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID GENERAL STRIKE IN QUEBEC IN VIEW OF UNION POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Considering the position taken by the common front of unions especially in Quebec and that individuals such as Laberge, Pépin, Chartrand and Charbonneau are asking their members to challenge the government anti-inflation legislation and to launch a general strike throughout the province, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether he is now considering that eventuality and if the government is considering the steps to be taken to spare Canada a dreadful economic disaster?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I share the view of the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada when he refers to an eventual disaster. I would merely like to indicate that the government still has confidence in the common sense of Quebec citizens. As for the government, we are ready to be very patient to explain the merits of the legislation which the House is now considering and to meet anyone, including labour leaders. If they are worried or have valid objections, we are ready to discuss with them because we are convinced that if the effectiveness of government action against inflation was understood by all, better co-operation would be obtained not only from union members but also from union leaders.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Did the Prime Minister and the union leaders discuss the opportunity to have any further meetings? Did the union leaders ask for an interview with the Prime Minister or a member of the government concerning this famous Bill C-73 in order to discuss its conditions and possible implications?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, several meetings between ministers—including myself—and union leaders have already taken place in various provinces. I must say there has not yet been any meeting with those mentioned by the Social Credit leader. However, I have indicated that I would be available to meet these people if they want to continue the discussion, and I repeat it publicly, if it is possible for me to meet them with government ministers, I would be very happy to do so.

* * *

[English]

AIRPORTS

MIRABEL AND DORVAL—INSTRUCTIONS OF PRIME MINISTER TO PRINCIPAL SECRETARY ON INTERVENTION IN GRANTING SKY SHOPS LEASE

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to address to the right hon. Prime Minister. When in April of 1970 the Prime Minister gave permission to his then principal secretary personnally to intervene in a matter involving large sums of money between Sky Shops Export Limited and the federal Department of Transport, what were the instructions that he gave to his then principal secretary?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure upon what the hon. member is basing his assertion that I personally gave instructions. My principal secretary was, in a general way, instructed to deal with constituents—by that, I mean not only people from my riding of Mount Royal but constituents across the country—who had some reason to want to see me. I could not make myself accessible personally to everyone, but he had instructions to try to deal with every reasonable request by any citizen of Canada, particularly if they came from the beautiful riding of Mount Royal, and to make sure they had access to government services, just as I am sure it is the duty of every member of this House to make sure that happens when they get requests from someone in their constituencies.

* * *

URBAN AFFAIRS

HUMAN SETTLEMENTS CONFERENCE, VANCOUVER—REASON FOR GRANTING ADVERTISING CONTRACT TO OGILVY AND MATHER

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Would the minister advise the House why his department has awarded a contract for advertising the meetings leading up to the Habitat Conference next spring to the wholly-owned subsidiary of Ogilvy and Mather Inc., of New York instead of to a Canadian advertising agency?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, that is a Canadian company or it is in the process of becoming totally Canadian owned and, indeed, that was the understanding in respect of any agreement involved there.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, that is not my information.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: In view of the fact that this contract was awarded to the wholly-owned subsidiary of a United States corporation, I would ask if there was no truly Canadian company considered capable of handling this straightforward job, and what has happened to the government's professed policy of Canada first in this regard?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I should point out that major advertising contracts with any agency for which I am responsible are placed with wholly-owned Canadian companies, and it was my understanding that this company was in the process of becoming completely Canadian owned. If that is not the case, I appreciate the hon. member's comment and will certainly check into it.

[Mr. Huntington.]

HOUSING

NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—REASON FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTING PROGRAM IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I understand that many communities in Saskatchewan have made application under the Neighbourhood Improvement Program and have been informed that the hold-up seems to be with CMHC. Would the minister inform us why there is this delay in processing these applications as some of these communities are waiting with the hope that they will be able to get started before the winter sets in?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge these agreements have not been signed with all the provinces, and I am rather disturbed about this. I do not know if reports are coming out. I understand there has been a second change of the minister responsible for housing in that province. I have met with the past two ministers but I have not yet met the new minister. I hope he remains long enough so we get the chance to know one another.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, could the minister indicate when he hopes to meet with the new minister since it can get pretty nippy in Saskatchewan, contrary to what happens in the Toronto area?

Mr. Danson: I understand we are to meet on the 25th for a nip.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC CRIME PROBE—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF FEDERAL OBJECTION TO CONSTITUTIONALITY OF COMMISSION OR APPOINTMENT OF FEDERAL COMMISSION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In view of the continued worth and the continued revelations in respect of the Quebec Police Commission probe into organized crime, will the minister inform the House if the government would withdraw its rather superfluous constitutional objections, which I understand are to be made on behalf of the Justice Department tomorrow before the Supreme Court of Canada, regarding this Quebec Police Commission probe?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. As I indicated to the House already if the hon. member had listened when this question arose, I have already put before the Solicitor General of Quebec and my colleagues possible amendments to the Criminal Code to ensure that provincial attorneys general are able to carry on the type of inquiries they want to conduct.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, in view of my understanding that the state of the investigation by this particular probe are now at a very crucial juncture, both to the staff and counsel, I wonder if the Minister of Justice would tell the House whether he has, on behalf of the government, yet given any assurances formally, informally, public or private, to the judge conducting the inquiry and to counsel and staff involved, relating to the possible appointment of some people with the authority to conduct a similar inquiry under the auspices of the federal government itself?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be improper for me to communicate with the chairman of the commission. As I just indicated, I have had discussions about this question with the solicitor general of the province of Quebec.

* * *

● (1430)

HEALTH

STUDY OF RELATIONSHIP OF CHRONIC BRONCHITIS, SMOKING, AIR POLLUTION AND INDUSTRIAL OCCUPATIONS IN OTTAWA AND SUDBURY—REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF REPORT

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the government sponsored a study into the relationship of chronic bronchitis, smoking habits, air pollution and working in industrial occupations in Ottawa and in Sudbury? If so, when will the government release this report?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, some reference has been made by the CBC to a so-called secret report. This is not the first time the CBC has mentioned a secret report that has been public, sometimes for many weeks. Sometimes the reports even have been tabled in this House. In this particular instance a survey was conducted by the Department of Epidemiology and Community Medicine of the University of Ottawa. This was funded by the health grants program of the federal government for the Ottawa survey, and by a provincial government grant for the Sudbury survey. This was not in any way a federal survey.

Preliminary findings of the Ottawa survey were made public last summer at the meeting of the International Epidemiology Association in Brighton, England—I cannot understand why the CBC was not there—and will appear in the form of a scientific article in the December 6 issue of the Canadian Medical Association Journal. I understand that a final detailed report is nearing completion and will be released by mid-December. This report was never suppressed by the federal government for the good reason that it does not belong to the government but rather to the researcher who made the survey.

* * *

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

MINISTER'S POSITION ON POLLUTION STANDARDS FOR SYNCRUDE PROJECT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment if I could get the attention of the minister. It goes back to the Syncrude project and the problem of pollution in connection with that project. There was a report on Saturday that the Alberta Minister of the Environment, Mr. Russell, is adamant that the 287-ton figure for pollution at that site will not be changed. In view of the fact that the suppressed index contained in the report to the Alberta government equated those levels with an environmental legacy that would pale Sudbury and the San Bernadino mountains of Los Angeles, and in view of the minister's own study of the environmental impact would the minister now give this House some assurance that she does not accept the 287-ton figure? Can she also give the House some assurance that we will be going back to the 40 tons that her original report provided for and recommended?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment for Alberta did not say exactly what the hon. member is reporting. He said he was looking at the situation. As to the amount that could be allowed, I think the minister is taking into account the data he has in order to say that the level is acceptable. We are looking into the situation and are studying the effects of the emissions in the atmosphere from the development of the tar sands. I can assure the hon. member that because the federal government is involved in the tar sands, through Syncrude, the effects on the environment will fall within the policy we have established for ourselves and which we would hope the government of Alberta will want to follow.

* * *

ENERGY

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—MATTERS REMAINING TO BE NEGOTIATED WITH ALBERTA—REASON FOR FAILURE OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS TO REPORT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Dealing with the Syncrude project, would the minister advise what it is that remains unnegotiated between the province of Alberta and the federal government. Would he specify whether it is matters of environment which remain unnegotiated and whether that is the reason we do not have a report from the board of directors. Furthermore, would he advise why $100 million has been spent by the government and can he give us any assurance that this $100 million has been protected in view of the fact that we do not have anyone on the senior board of directors.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is on the management committee. That information was given in an answer to a question last week. As to the first part of the hon. gentleman's question, I answered that last week and the record will give him that information. On the last part, in respect of why we are spending $100 million with no one on the board of directors I can tell him we are confident we can conclude the agreement. We are on the management committee. I think we can fully protect the federal interest.

Oral Questions

STORMS

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO THOSE SUFFERING DAMAGE IN LAKE ERIE REGION

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, this is a follow-up question to a previous question asked regarding the violent storm on the Great Lakes. It is directed to the Minister of the Environment. It relates specifically to the unprecedented storm damage on the north shore of Lake Erie. I should like to ask the minister whether the government has taken any initiative in approaching the province of Ontario, which is assessing the damage, with a view to declaring the north shore a disaster area in order that individuals, communities and small businesses which have suffered grievous losses will qualify for federal assistance.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the department has not taken the initiative because that initiative should come from the government of the Province of Ontario.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED PERSECUTION OF ROMAN CATHOLICS BY GOVERNMENT OF CHILE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It relates to the reports of recent days of considerable persecution of members of the Roman Catholic church in Chile, the arrest of priests and nuns and even more recently the house arrest of Cardinal DeSilva, the head of the Catholic Church in Chile. I believe the minister has received a telegram of support sent by the Canadian Catholic Conference to the church in Chile and I am wondering whether he has had an opportunity to examine the deterioration of the situation in Chile and the increasing persecution of the Catholic people there.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have asked that inquiries be made concerning the present situation in Chile. I have not received a full report and would like to await that report before answering the question.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, because there seems to be a substantial erosion since the September 7 ad hoc report to the UN on human rights in Chile can the minister indicate whether he is using other sources beyond contacts with our own embassy in Santiago, realizing the difficulty we have had in the past in getting a full and complete story.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we use other sources as well.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

POSSIBILITY OF ALLOWING TAKEOVER OF WESTINGHOUSE BY WHITE CONSOLIDATED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the recent developments in the matter of Westinghouse Canada and White Consolidated Industries of Cleveland, Ohio, over the use of the name and trademark of Westinghouse, and bearing in mind that Canada is a signatory to the Treaty of Paris in which, as I understand it, we have agreed to treat foreign-owned trademarks and patents on the same basis as Canadian instruments of the same nature, and noting that we are negotiating at GATT for expansion of international free trade, will the minister agree that Canada must live up to the spirit and letter of its international commitments, and in this particular instance should possibly reverse the decision of the Foreign Investment Review Agency by allowing takeover of Westinghouse Canada Appliance Division by White Consolidated Industries.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, clearly under the circumstances, since this matter is now in the courts in the United States, it would be quite inappropriate for me to answer the hon. member concerning what our future course of action would be. In any event, it is always open to applicants under the Foreign Investment Review Act to reapply. This is not something which comes to them by any grace on the part of the government. My main concern at the moment continues to be to ensure that jobs in Hamilton are protected. The Minister of Labour, just a few minutes ago asked me if I would meet with the union representatives from Hamilton and I agreed to do so as soon as possible.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER EXAMINE SITUATION CREATED BY WHITE CONSOLIDATED BID TO TAKE OVER WESTINGHOUSE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have one supplementary which I should like to direct to the Prime Minister, if I may apologize for interrupting his conversation. Bearing in mind that all parties agree the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has handled this matter with great skill and diligence but that it has moved into an area of the interpretation of international agreements versus domestic policy, will the Prime Minister examine the matter on a top priority basis and endeavour to resolve whether the terms and integrity of the Treaty of Paris in fact take precedence over a decision of the Foreign Investment Review Board and use his office to resolve the serious matter with all possible speed as the jobs of 2,800 people hang in the balance, not to mention a long established profitable business.

● (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly consider the suggestion made by the hon. member and I certainly share his opinion of the high skill of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Probably not even my office would do things any better than he did.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ACTION AT UNITED NATIONS IN VIEW OF RESOLUTION PASSED CONDEMNING ZIONISM AS RACIST

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it is based on the fact that the life expectancy of the United Nations is in widespread doubt across the world in consequence of recent resolutions in the manner of certain member nations which have brought discredit on the votes of that institution. Has the government given any consideration to making it clear to some of these nations, which have been recipients of large amounts of assistance and of direct support from Canada, that Canada feels very strongly that they should realize that fact when they are voting in the United Nations, not in the determination of the exigencies of the moment but by the determination of a group of nations which have apparently ganged up?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would not take the same pessimistic view about the life expectancy of the United Nations that is taken by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some of the most influential press says so.

Mr. MacEachen: I still disagree with the diagnosis with respect to the United Nations. If the hon. member is suggesting that Canada should relate its development assistance to the votes of certain countries at the United Nations, then I think that would be introducing an entirely new element into our development assistance policy. We have made development assistance available to other countries on the basis of their needs, their state of development, the starvation, the poverty and the per capita income, and I think it would be a form of an unacceptable twentieth century colonialism to relate development assistance to votes at the United Nations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not believe that Canada should be a milch cow, for these nations, regardless of the irresponsible attitude that they are taking in the United Nations. I wish to ask the minister this question: what is Canada doing to ensure that some of these nations, which are the loudest in their outspoken criticism of Israel and in support of the resolution—many of them are virtually freeriders in that they are not making a proper contribution or paying their full and fair share instead of allowing the load to be carried by responsible nations?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe the right hon. gentleman will want to have it put on the record that, for example, not all the African countries voted for the resolution. A number of African countries voted against that resolution which we found so objectionable and against which we voted, and a number abstained. I believe that with the passing of time an increasing number of countries will understand the gravity of the decision which they took to support that particular resolution. It will be our intention to work toward bringing about a change in that attitude by such actions as I mentioned the other day, namely, our attendance at the conference in Ghana and our funding of any specific activities of the United Nations that flow from the acceptance of these totally objectionable resolutions.

Now, with respect to the countries which do not pay their share, obviously we will be urging upon them to accept their responsibilities as we are doing as members of the United Nations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not very successfully.

* * *

[Translation]

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DELIVERY OF PENSION CHEQUES

Mr. T. Lefebvre (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services.

Are socio-economic cheques ready for distribution and, if so, who sorted them?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, nearly 85 per cent of socio-economic cheque recipients already register their postal code on our index cards. It is because of this and with the help of my department's computers that we have been able to sort them. As for the remaining 15 per cent, we have had to do it by hand. This task was carried out within my department and of course with the assistance of the Post Office.

* * *

[English]

INDUSTRY

CANADAIR—ROLE OF COMPANY IF GOVERNMENT EXERCISES OPTION TO PURCHASE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the genial Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and it has to do with the option which the government has for the purchase of Canadair which, I understand, will expire early in December. In view of the statement made last year by his predecessor in an address to the Ontario Institute of Accountants that Canadair and its parent company, General Dynamics, has always put its own future ahead of the future of Canada, may I ask the minister if the government intends to exercise its option to purchase Canadair, and if it does, what will be its role? Will it be a merging of Canadair and de Havilland, which the government already owns, or some merging with a private air company?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, no decision with regard to the exercising of the option has yet been made, primarily because we are still examining the possibility of a reorganization of the air freight or the aerospace industry in Canada which would have the kind of linkages we anticipate that the hon. member mentioned, namely, de Havilland and Canadair perhaps working in some kind of corporate harness. This decision will have to be made, as the hon. member has said, within a matter of three or four weeks, I believe, but it is quite possible that if the assessment of the restructuring of the industry has not been finalized by that time, and there are certain other key questions which have to be resolved in that connection, namely, defence purchases and the like, we might very well seek a further extension of the option.

CANADAIR—POSSIBILITY OF CANCELLATION OF UNITED STATES ORDERS IF GOVERNMENT EXERCISES OPTION TO PURCHASE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister a question regarding reports that some officials of his department are alleged to have said that certain U.S. officials had indicated that orders to Canadair would be cancelled and no further orders forthcoming if Canadair became solely a Crown corporation and that such orders would only continue if a very major U.S. aircraft company were given a substantial equity in Canadair should the government decide to exercise its option.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have not been made aware of any such comments by American companies. I think that if the hon. member has been following such published reports as there have been, he will realize that a bigger interest on the part of U.S. companies is the acquisition of certain purchases within Canada of aircraft and the like in return for which certain undertakings have been suggested, such as that they would bring business to various Canadian companies such as Canadair. I think these commitments are of a sort that would not be provisional upon the ownership being government, private or for that matter, American. In other words, I do not think that is an issue on the question of ownership of Canadair.

* * *

● (1450)

[Translation]

AIRPORTS

REQUEST THAT PRODUCTS SOLD IN DUTY FREE SHOPS BE CANADIAN

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Since more than 75 per cent of the goods sold in duty free shops located in the various airports in Canada are imported, will the minister soon ask Air Canada to review its purchasing policy so that these stores sell articles made in Canada and foreign tourists be allowed to return home with truly Canadian products, souvenirs from Canada?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to check the figures on the proportion of goods and treat the rest of the hon. member's remarks as a recommendation.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VIEWPOINT—ALLEGED ATTEMPT TO CANCEL PROGRAM ON GROUNDS MR. MURRAY MEDICALLY UNFIT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State. It concerns the circumstances surrounding and arising out of the decision by the CBC to cancel the program "Viewpoint". Is the Prime Minister aware that in an attempt to manufacture justification for the cancellation of "Viewpoint", which is not a popular move at all, the CBC has used the device of ordering Mr. Ian Murray to keep an appointment with a CBC appointed physician, made without Mr. Murray's knowledge or consent, and that even before the examination was to be held, ordered him replaced on the grounds he would be found in that examination to be medically unfit?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly bring this to the attention of the hon. Minister and look into it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thank the parliamentary secretary for that answer. When the hon. lady is advising her minister of the question, would she attempt to obtain an undertaking from him to inquire into the circumstances of a memorandum from Mr. Bill Stevenson to Messrs. Herndorf and Wright dated today, November 17, in which this apparent victimizing of Mr. Murray the producer, is fully set forth? Would she undertake to do that?

Miss Campbell: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC CRIME PROBE—JUSTIFICATION FOR CHALLENGING CONSTITUTIONALITY OF COMMISSION IN VIEW OF INCREASE IN CRIME

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice arising from an answer given to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. I wonder if he could tell the House and the country how he can justify and square his position of legally challenging provincial rights with reference to police commissions and other inquiries into crime when crime is on the increase and is one of the most important issues, which he himself admitted when he took over the portfolio.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is no need to square the positions because they are not unsquare. Obviously, the position relative to crime in this country is an important one which I share with the hon. member. Consequently, that is why we are bringing forward very shortly important amendments to the Criminal Code. It is also for that reason that I have taken up with the Solicitor General of Quebec ways in which, should the Supreme Court of Canada find the present commission of inquiry in Quebec unconstitutional, it could be clothed with constitutional authority. I find it unusual that the hon. gentleman should regard an intervention on a constitutional matter in the Supreme Court of Canada as reckless.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question. In light of the fact that this government has continually refused to have any inquiry into the acceleration of crime, how can he justify and square, I will use the word again, his position with the fact that it is from this inquiry in Quebec that we got the information that bad beef was being sold to Canadians?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, it is because the commission in Quebec has served a very useful purpose that I am interested in ensuring, with the Solicitor General in Quebec, that any inquiry has a proper constitutional basis.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANGOLA—POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT ACTION AT UNITED NATIONS TO PREVENT FOREIGN INTERVENTION IN CONFLICT

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of his previous interest in Angola independence displayed in his recent tour of Africa, and considering reports which indicate that large numbers of foreign advisers, supplies and troops are being landed in that country with the consequent risk of civil strife there escalating into major conflict, has the minister made any representations to the United Nations urging that organization to use its influence to prevent foreign intervention in Angola?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have not taken any specific initiative at the United Nations in the way of resolutions or any move of that kind.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGATION SEX OFFENDERS AND HABITUAL CRIMINALS OUT ON TEMPORARY ABSENCES—SUGGESTED DISCIPLINARY ACTION AGAINST THOSE RESPONSIBLE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General of which I have given him notice. On November 7, the Solicitor General told this House that habitual criminals and dangerous sexual offenders are not allowed out on temporary absences. As the minister knows, I told his staff this morning, the Canadian penitentiaries service publishes a computer printout every month. This computer printout indicates there are a number of dangerous sexual offenders and habitual criminals out on temporary absences. I wonder if the minister can advise this House if he has taken disciplinary action against the institution for allowing these people out against his wishes.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, to begin with I did not say what the hon. member says I said on that particular day. I said dangerous sexual offenders were not permitted temporary absences. The Hansard was wrong and I made a correction in it. I did not say that habitual offenders were not—

Mr. Reynolds: You changed Hansard.

Mr. Allmand: No, I never said that.

Mr. Reynolds: You did!

Mr. Allmand: I did not say that.

Mr. Reynolds: You did so!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Take him up the alley.

Mr. Allmand: All right. Mr. Speaker, Commissioners' Directive 228 of the Canadian penitentiaries service reads that an inmate declared by the court to be a dangerous sexual offender shall not be granted a temporary absence. If, as the hon. member suggested, certain people are being let out contrary to that directive, he should give me the names. He has given me one already and we are checking on that. If he has any others, he should give them all to me and we will check on those as well.

* * *

PENITENTIARIES

PITTSBURGH—REASON FOR SUSPENSION OF TWO OFFICIALS

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I will be more than pleased to give the minister the whole computer printout. I do not know why he cannot get it. My supplementary question to the minister is to ask if he can advise the House whether the director of the Pittsburgh institution and the senior security director of the Pittsburgh institution have been suspended for allowing people out on temporary absences who should not be out?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is true that two officials at the Pittsburgh institution have been suspended for abuses of their responsibilities including abuse with respect to temporary absence passes but not, I believe, with respect to dangerous sexual offenders. I do not think I should say more about this at the present time because they have appealed their suspension and that is presently being heard.

* * *

CUSTOMS

REQUEST THAT OFFICE AT BARRINGTON PASSAGE, NOVA SCOTIA, NOT BE CLOSED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of that fact that Barrington Passage, Nova Scotia, has the second largest ship registry in Canada, will the minister immediately re-examine his department's plan to close down this customs office today since this will require the 605 lobster boats and 1,587 motor vessels registered in this port to travel to some other port at great expense and increased fuel consumption?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, Barrington Passage is not being closed down, it is simply being redesignated as a vessel clearing station. Vessels will continue to use that port. There has been a transfer of one employee, however; it is not a lay-off but simply a transfer to another port in the area.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN VIOLENT CRIMES AND PORTRAYAL OF VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General who is reported to have said in a speech last week that he is now satisfied, after a two year study, that there is a direct relationship between violence on television and crimes of violence and that he has had discussions with his colleagues in the government. In light of these findings, what steps does the government propose to take within its jurisdiction over the CRTC and the CTC to change the present requirement and prohibit these kinds of programs or to arrange to have these programs shown at a late evening hour?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we have had consultations with the CRTC and the Department of the Secretary of State on this matter and it is still under study. We may have more to say when the Minister of Justice and myself announce our package on violent crime before the end of the year.

● (1500)

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the minister's allegation that I heard him wrongly in the House. I point out that Hansard reports him as speaking of "dangerous criminals." After I heard his answer last week, I went to the Hansard office, saw the blues and noted that on them he was reported to have talked of "habitual criminals." I still think that what I say is correct. The Hansard reporter heard the minister say what I allege he said, and the minister or someone on his staff went to Hansard and changed that word on the blues.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. It is true that the blues said what the hon. member suggested. When I saw those words in the blues, I immediately sent a message to Hansard telling them that I had not said "habitual offenders." I am familiar with the law; a habitual offender can get a temporary absence after three years, but a dangerous sexual offender cannot. I would not say that habitual offenders cannot, when they can. I do not know how those words were reported by Hansard, but my people made the correction when they saw it, because it was wrong.

[Mr. Crouse.]

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ESSENTIAL SERVICE STRIKE SUSPENSION ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR SUSPENSION OF STRIKES IN ESSENTIAL SERVICES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-416, to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Canada Labour Code and to provide for the suspension of strikes in essential services.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, this bill, which is to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Canada Labour Code, would provide for the suspension of strikes in essential services while the government's anti-inflation legislation is in force. It is a fact that Canadians are fed up with constant work stoppages.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF POSTAL WORKERS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26, I ask leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. This specific and important matter is the continuing absence of postal service which began four weeks ago and which shows no sign of ending in the near future.

The absence of this essential service is creating accumulating hardship for all Canadians, but particularly for those who receive their incomes and revenues by mail and those whose jobs have been terminated because of disruptions in trade and commerce. It has also ended the exchange of mail with other countries, a serious consequence of which is the present and potentially permanent loss of foreign trade. If acceptable, Mr. Speaker, I will move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members no doubt are aware that the application pursuant to Standing Order 26 virtually repeats the application made by the same hon. member on Wednesday last when the Chair took some time explaining the difficult considerations which confront the Chair in situations of this sort. I indicated that, as activities within the ranks of the union involved might lead to a resolution of the conflict, it would be premature to grant the application made pursuant to Standing Order 26, but that if the hon. member were to bring it forward in a few days if no further developments had taken place the Chair might be favourably disposed to granting the emergency application.

A few days have passed and I awaited notice from the hon. member of his intention to bring forward this application in the present sitting. However, I awaited developments during the question period for two reasons: first, to determine once more the importance of the matter, and it occupied, again, about half today's question period; second, to see whether information elicited during the question period would indicate that there is activity which will give hope for the internal resolution of the conflict. I think I would be an optimist if I were to take the latter interpretation from the facts described during the question period.

The same considerations apply today as I mentioned last Wednesday. It is always difficult to decide these matters. Since parliament has given public servants the right to strike, when the public service exercises that right and inconveniences the public, does that automatically become a matter of emergency? Standing Order 26 does not reflect on one side or the other of a question, but simply provides an opportunity for parliament to address itself to certain issues. Here we are considering a matter which is obviously bringing great inconvenience to the people of Canada and if it were not for the right to strike granted by parliament it would, obviously, in every way be an ideal subject for discussion under this rule.

This being the second application, and substantial activity not having taken place since the first application of five days ago, it seems to me that the Chair ought not to resist further the application for parliament to consider this matter objectively. Certainly, there is nothing pro or con in the motion. It seems to me that if the Chair were to resist the application a second time, it would be making a judgment about the situation that it ought not to make, and interposing itself between the desire of hon. members and the debate.

I might say that this topic was touched on forcibly earlier today. Since parliament has expressed the desire to debate the matter, it seems to me that the Chair ought to grant this application. Accordingly, it would be my intention to see the debate begin at eight o'clock this evening pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 26. I qualify that in this way: it has already been ordered that a vote shall take place at 9.45 this evening on the opposition motion of Friday last. As well, debate is to resume today on the government order relating to Time and Reader's Digest. Approximately three hours remain before the time allocation order takes effect which means, presumably, that the second reading vote, all other things being equal, will take place shortly before the supper adjournment which, because of another special order, is to be at 6.30 p.m. and not at six o'clock.

There might be discussions about a convenient way to arrange these two votes without interrupting what will be an important debate which will be scheduled to begin at eight o'clock this evening. If suggestions are to be made, I will be glad to receive them. If not, I will be happy to return to the chair at four o'clock or five o'clock to make an announcement, because I am sure all hon. members will want to pay close attention to the timing of these two most important votes.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in view of the situation you have outlined, it might be useful to convene a meeting of House leaders to discuss when these votes may take place. Tentatively, I think they could be held tomorrow and we could arrange a suitable time.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of options open to us. I wonder if we could meet in order to discuss the question of when the votes are likely to be taken and, if necessary, when the debate will commence? I think we could probably discuss this matter and then communicate to Your Honour whatever decision is arrived at.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there have already been tentative discussions about the two votes. Now that Your Honour has ruled that there is to be a special debate tonight, I agree that it would be a good idea for the House leaders to meet formally and come to a definite decision about the timing of the two votes, the vote on second reading of Bill C-58 and the vote on our motion of last Friday.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask if the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) has the leave of the House to put the motion which has been proposed pursuant to Standing Order 26, in order that it can be debated at eight o'clock this evening?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Translation]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 3,115, 3,183, 3,206, 3,212 and 3,299.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

INFORMATION REQUIRED ON ILLEGAL STRIKES

Question No. 3,115—Mr. Schumacher:

1. By year since 1970 to date, how many illegal strikes have there been in the Public Service?

2. In each case (a) what group was involved (b) what was the duration of the strike (c) how many charges were laid as a result of the strikes?

3. How many of the charges (a) were dropped (b) went to trial and what was the result in each case?

4. In each of the charges that were dropped, what were the reasons for disposing of them in this way?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): 1. 1970: 3; 1971: 5; 1972: 4; 1973: 14; 1974: 12; 1975: 7 (as of October 22). Total 45.

2. (a) 1970: Clerical and Regulatory; Clerical and Regulatory, Post Office. 1971: Post Office; Post Office; Firefighters; Post Office; Post Office. 1972: Electronics; Electronics; Post Office; Post Office. 1973: Post Office; Post Office; Post Office; Post Office; Post Office; Post Office; Post Office; Post Office; Post Office; Post Office; Nurses; Clerical and Regulatory; Post Office; Post Office. 1974: Post Office; Firefighters; General Labour & Trades & General Services; Data Processing; Radio Operations; Heating, Power and Stationary Plant; Radio Operations; Clerical and Regulatory; Primary Products Inspection; Most Employees (Sept-Iles); Education; General Labour and Trades, Heating, Power and Stationary Plant, Post Office. 1975: Heating, Power and Stationary Plant; General Labour and Trades; Post Office; Post Office; Post Office; Nursing; Correctional.

2. (b) 1970: 1 day; 3 days; 1 day. 1971: 1 day; 2 days; 3 days; 1 day; 8 days. 1972: 1 day; 24 days; 1 day; 12 days. 1973: January through February; 1 day; 1 day; 2 days; 1 day; 1 day; 5 days; 1 day; 1 day; 2 days; 6 days; 3 days; 1 day; 1 day. 1974: 17 days; 22 days; 1 day; 2 days; 2 days; 1 day; 2 days; 6 days; 2 days; 1 day; 1 day; 5 days. 1975: 2 days; 1 day; February 17 to March 19; 4 days; April 14 to May 27; 3 days; 1 day.

2. (c) Charges of participating in an unlawful work stoppage were laid against the following groups of employees: 65 Radio Operations employees (October 1974); 225 Clerical and Regulatory employees (Air Traffic Control Assistants, October 1974); 912 General Labour and Trades employees (December 19-23, 1974); 543 Designated General Labour and Trades employees (February 17-March 19, 1975).

3. It is impossible to provide accurate figures on charges that may have been dropped. Because cases must be heard locally in Provincial Criminal Courts, cases had to be assigned to regional lawyers of the Department of Justice and to local agents acting on behalf of the Crown. Many cases are still current and will appear in court over the next six months. Consequently, it is not possible to provide complete or accurate information. We have received reports of fines ranging from $10 to $100 (the maximum permissible) having been imposed in certain cases; in other cases, certain employees have been found to be not guilty by reason of legal technicality or lack of evidence.

4. We are aware that some charges were dropped following legal advice that there was insufficient evidence to obtain a conviction; in some cases, sick leave was accepted as an excuse for the employee's absence. Because of the geographic distribution of cases and the fact that they have yet to appear in court, accurate figures cannot be provided.

LAND AREA PRINCIPLE

Question No. 3,183—Mr. Marshall:

1. Did the Minister of the Environment state that only ten per cent of Canada's total land area is suitable for modern agricultural methods and that only one half of one per cent of our land has first class agricultural capability and, if so, what are the details in support of such statement?

[Mr. Schumacher.]

2. Does this statement apply to the individual Maritime Provinces and, if so, in what way?

3. Is action being taken by the Department of the Environment to develop an acceptable framework of land use principles and, if so, in what way?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): 1. Yes. This information is derived through the Canadian Geographic Information System from the Soil Capability for Agriculture Sector of the Canada Land Inventory. There are approximately 19,000 square miles (12,000,000 acres) of class one land out of Canada's total area of approximately 3,851,000 square miles.

2. This statement relates to all of Canada; therefore, the percentages do not pertain to individual provinces. There is no Class 1 agricultural land in the Maritime Provinces. However, New Brunswick has 13,262,030 acres of Class 2 to Class 5 land suitable for modern agricultural methods representing 73 per cent of the Province's total land area. Nova Scotia has 4,076,884 acres or 30 per cent of its land and Prince Edward Island has 1,306,363 acres or 94 per cent of its land area in Class 2 to Class 5.

3. Yes, an interdepartmental task force has been formed to explore with the provinces, the possibility of producing a set of national land-use objectives and strategies. This task force is currently identifying and assessing the land-use impact of federal programs as they relate to land-use issues. Already reports have been produced by a number of federal departments involved in programs which affect land-use and these are under examination by the interdepartmental task force. Concurrently, federal-provincial discussions have been initiated with respect to the development of national land-use objectives.

DREE—GUARANTEED LOANS TO FIRMS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 3,206—Mr. Howie:

How many firms in Newfoundland had loans guaranteed by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 (a) what was the total amount of the guarantees (b) how many of the firms are not currently operating (c) what was the total amount of guarantees to the firms not currently operating?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: None. (a) Not applicable; (b) Not applicable; (c) Not applicable.

MIRABEL AIRPORT—TOTAL COST OF OPENING OCTOBER 4, 1975

Question No. 3,212—Mr. Nystrom:

1. (a) What was the total cost to the government for the official opening of Mirabel Airport on October 4, 1975 (b) what was the cost for (i) advertising (ii) security arrangements (iii) food (iv) liquor (v) hotel accommodations (vi) travel (vii) all other items?

2. How many guests were invited by the government?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Based on the total cost for the overall four-day program (approximately $214,000) the cost for this one-day event is estimated at: 1. (a) $95,121. (b) (i) Advertising, No cost; (ii) Security Arrangements, $7,927; (iii) Food, $36,034; (iv) Liquor, $16,860; (v) Accommodation and hospitality for foreign ministers, $4,824; (vi) Travel, No cost; (vii) Displays, audio-visuals, etc., $12,040; Rental of electronic equipment and installation, $8,456; Mirabel/Montreal bus service, $8,980.

2. 2,500 official guests and approximately 500 media representatives.

INDEPENDENT TRANSPORTATION ACCIDENT INQUIRY BOARD

Question No. 2,299—Mr. Forrestall:

Does the government intend to introduce legislation similar in principle to that proposed in Bill C-226, the subject-matter of which now stands referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communication, to create an independent transportation accident inquiry board as promised in the most recent Speech from the Throne and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The government does intend to introduce legislation to create an independent accident investigation board but the subject matter may be somewhat broader in scope than that proposed in Bill C-226.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Do the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the question period I indicated to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) that I would raise a point of order concerning question No. 3,081 which I placed on the order paper earlier this year. For some time I have criticized the practice of the Department of Supply and Services in not giving research and development contracts to the lowest bidder. These are awarded without tender. Accordingly, I put question No. 3,081 on the order paper to try to elicit further information about this particular practice. While I was at the United Nations last Wednesday, my question was called by the parliamentary secretary and it was ostensibly answered. Hansard for last Wednesday records that the answer given by the Minister of Supply and Services was as follows:

● (1510)

The question requires considerable research and the information will be communicated to the hon. member at a later date.

I am at a loss to understand the procedure that was followed. Obviously, the minister had no answer to give. I was astonished to discover that, following the non-answer by the minister, my question was dropped from the order paper. Apparently it is the government's intention, at some time convenient to it, privately to communicate information to me that I specifically asked, in the form of a question on the order paper, to be answered publicly and formally.

This is a very important matter. It is a totally unacceptable and quite improper procedure for the government to evade answering questions on the order paper by saying they will communicate the information to an hon. member privately at a later date. If I were to repeat the question and re-enter it on the order paper—and I am not sure whether that is procedurally acceptable—I would lose the priority I had, despite the fact it has been on the order paper for a couple of months. I therefore ask that my question be reinstated with its previous priority as question No. 3,081, and that the answer given by the minister last Wednesday, which was no answer at all, be disregarded.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know if other hon. members have a contribution to make on the point of order. It is a fascinating point. The Chair will consider it and make a ruling, probably tomorrow.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek clarification from the Chair on a matter which concerns all of us with respect to second reading of a bill. Since the changes in the rules and the increased importance of committees, and so on, the meaning of second reading seems to have changed from its traditional meaning. I, and I am sure all other members, would like some clarification from the Chair on this point.

We have always considered that to vote for second reading was to give approval in principle to a bill. At the same time, when the bill arrives in committee we are in a position to propose amendments, and when the bill returns to the House at report stage we may also propose amendments. If one votes in favour of the principle of a bill, approving it in principle at second reading, he could hardly propose amendments at a later stage. On the other hand, if it is not a question of approval in principle but merely to vote in favour of sending the bill to committee, it seems that we require clarification on this point.

We shall have before us today Bill C-58 which is a case in point. Many members of this House agree with the bill in principle but would like to change it somewhat by amending it; they cannot accept the bill in its present form. Are they voting on second reading to send it to committee, or will their vote on second reading be, in effect, acceptance or approval of the bill? Not only with respect to this bill, but with respect to other bills which will come before us, members should know once and for all whether, if they vote on second reading in favour of a bill, they are giving it approval in principle or simply voting to send it to committee where it can be amended.

Mr. Speaker: Without considerable and extensive debate which probably should be initiated in our procedure committee, I do not want to decide the direct question put forward by the hon. member as to whether the traditional vote, certainly as it was known before the revamping of our procedures through the 1969 amendments, on second reading giving approval in principle does or does not stand. With due respect, the question is academic.

It is absolutely clear that the vote on second reading does not in any way circumscribe the ability of any member of the House of Commons to propose to vote for, discuss or vote against amendments put forward at the committee stage or at the report stage. Whether or not that vote is taken to be a vote in favour of the principle of the bill, the fact is there is no restriction on the power of members who have voted either for or against a second reading motion to propose or in any way to support amendments put forward at committee stage. That, I am sure, is absolutely clear.

That having been said, the actual construction that has to be placed upon a second reading vote becomes an academic point to that particular argument or in reference to the vote that will take place later this afternoon.

Orders of the day.

● (1520)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, I gave a general outline of the application scope of Bill C-58. I would like now to discuss the consequences of the amendments this bill will make to the Income Tax Act, especially as regards Reader's Digest magazine.

The problem is on the interpretation of sub-paragraph 19(5)(a)ii)E) of the Income Tax Act which excludes from the application of section 19 a periodical edited or published under a licence granted by a person who is editing or publishing issues of a periodical which are printed, prepared or published outside Canada.

At first sight, this seems indeed to be the case since the very format of Sélection, if not its presentation, is managed by the parent company which allows to use under licence the name and the characteristics of Reader's Digest international edition. Besides, this situation is not unique to Reader's Digest.

Other magazines thus use under licence the format and the contents of a foreign magazine, particularly in specialized disciplines where the interest of science and scientific discoveries are made available to members of the profession, notwithstanding political frontiers. That is the case of a magazine like MD Canada, for example.

On the other hand, the full realm of publications under licence is but an enormous crab basket in which Canadian or foreign authors and publishers, librarians and publishing pirates are struggling. Why? Because for the past ten years we have been wanting to amend substantially the Canadian Copyright Act—a typical example of vagueness and inaccuracy—but not an inch of progress was ever made in this area. The result of that exercise in aerobatic interpretation in which the courts engage was to plunge the Canadian publishing industry in a latent state of disgust and of I-couldn't-care-less whose main losers happen to be the Canadian authors themselves. But that is another story.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I wanted to refer to the Canadian Copyright Act because section 19 refers to publication under license and the meaning of those words must be properly interpreted to determine how Reader's Digest is affected by that restriction. And to interpret it, one must go the Copyright Act which on the subject of licenses performs wonders of vagueness, not to say contradiction. So it is a vicious circle.

May I be permitted to illustrate the present position of Reader's Digest on the editorial content by using once again an easy syllogism.

On the one hand, by repealing the restriction of section 19 on the publication under license, Reader's Digest faces indeed an enormous difficulty, the editorial context having to be substantially different from that of the parent company, particularly in light of the interpretation given by the Minister of National Revenue—80 per cent. Well, about that 80 per cent Canadian content we heard all sorts of criticisms from opposition members about the methodology, if not the questioning of the motives that lead the government of Canada to choose that percentage. A line must be drawn somewhere.

Can a magazine that plagiarizes the editorial content of a foreign magazine be truly Canadian? Where should the line be drawn: at 50 per cent, or 65 per cent? Perhaps at 30 per cent. I admit that the decision was made, arbitrarily, to set it at 80 per cent. But that has nothing to do with censorship. Why use so strong a word for what in fact is nothing more than a guiding line, a factor of interpretation, a simple instrument in the hands of Revenue Canada?

I can understand up to a point, the reservations about the 80 per cent figure of some hon. members, but not the vehement condemnations addressed to the government because of it. Once again, by its very nature Reader's Digest cannot meet that 80 per cent Canadian content requirement without losing its originality, that is, its international character.

On the other hand, if the restraint in clause 19(5)(a)(ii)(E) is maintained, the probable interpretation will be to consider Reader's Digest as a magazine publishing under a license given by another magazine, which is foreign-owned, for the use of its format, its pool of articles, its image. Then, even if Reader's Digest is to all intents and purposes a Canadian magazine, this subclause will prevent it from enjoying the advantages provided for Canadian magazines in clause 19. The situation will be reversed, because Reader's Digest will not be able to compete with the same weapons as other Canadian periodicals.

Thus, even if the act stays unchanged on this aspect of the question, Reader's Digest finds itself in a dilemma and all the good words by those who would like to make people believe that the magazines affected by Bill C-58 will be able to adapt themselves with a little goodwill, demonstrate a reluctance to get above the simple cultural or monetary considerations we are concerned with here. Once again, the problem is the following: Do we want to see Reader's Digest pursue its operation in Canada? If so, we must provide it with the instruments necessary to adapt itself to the new context of clause 9, which is cut out of subclauses 2 and 4. In order to do that, we must either amend the definition of the publication under license in the Canadian legislation on copyright, or define in a better way that same concept by a rule from the Department of National Revenue.

To this purpose, comments have already been made by certain experts, like Mr. Harold Fox in The Canadian Law on Copyright and Industrial Designs, second edition, who says in this regard on page 106, and I quote:

> It is obvious that there are two distinct copyrights in all works written by several authors, one covering the work as a whole the other covering each contribution by the individual authors. The author, and therefore the holder of the copyright for the whole work, will be the one who composes and edits the compilation unless, of course, he is employed by another person. Also, the author of each individual contribution to the collective work will the be holder of the copyright for the part he wrote, unless he is himself employed by another person.

Thus for a periodical such as Reader's Digest, the editors of the American equivalent of the Canadian magazine would hold the copyright regarding the title and the whole publication. The copyright for each article belongs to the individual authors. As Fox says in his book, on page 304, the right to reproduce a book under licence is probably limited to the reproduction of that book in a form substantially identical to the original edition.

The consequences of this regulation are as follows: The holder of an author's permit cannot use the literary work covered by the permit as he pleases. The reproduction of the work for which the permit was granted must be under a form substantially the same as the original. Therefore any provision which grants Canadian publishers the right to use, as they see fit, a work under an author's permit, must be worded in such a way as to protect the royalites of each individual author.

This is why it has been suggested that clause 19 pertaining to editing or publishing rights should allow Canadian publishers complete freedom when it comes to publishing a work covered by a permit provided the notion of copyrights is not tampered with. That is what the Canadian publishers of Selection mean by complete freedom. I will not indulge in vacuous oratory and shall leave the House with those legal comments so that the minister may consider them and make the necessary decisions to make the task of Reader's Digest easier, as we must admit it deserves a little consideration.

In conclusion, to keep a valuable perspective of the overall scope of Bill C-58, I would like to say once again that the purpose of Bill C-58 is to prune section 19 of the Income Tax Act to give it the original intent its promotors had in mind, that is solely to promote the creation of an industry of original Canadian publishing.

Therefore, I believe that Bill C-58 deserves careful consideration, for it calls for sound Canadian nationalism, but while showing such nationalism we should protect certain rights aquired by concerned people, by providing them with the same weapons as their local competitors, thus maintaining our reputation of referee and not that of killjoy.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I listened closely to the remarks of the hon. member who just concluded on Bill C-58, dealing more particularly with Reader's Digest and Time magazine.

I think he is quite right on the importance of measures to safeguard Canadian values and introduce a nationalist note. When we read the bill, it is clear pressures were brought to hear on the government to prevent Canadians from being caught, to help magazines such as Reader's Digest.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, Reader's Digest is wholly Canadian. It is an international magazine that is read throughout the world, millions of Canadians read because it gives courses on orientation, history, geography, administration, literature. It is a complete magazine which Canadian readers are most interested in. It would therefore be, and I think it is most unpopular among a very large majority of Canadians to cause the conveniences to the people who advertise in Reader's Digest. I said and I repeat that everybody runs for Reader's Digest every month, because it is not a magazine which attempts to impose the American ideology or any other kind of ideology. It is an objective magazine, which does not aim at any kind of political partisanship. Reader's Digest informs people.

Time is another cup of tea. Time seems to establish guidelines or consider itself the leader of public opinion, especially in the United States and Canada. You can read Time in other countries, but it is quite different. Time is different from Reader's Digest, but Reader's Digest employs and maintains thousands of Canadians who spend their money in Canada, who earn a living through the revenues from that publication, and I think, Mr. Speaker, Reader's Digest deserves as much consideration as any other magazine published in Canada. We do have magazines in Canada. Unfortunately, we have none of international scope. We have La Chatelaine. We have seen magazines like Relations which were restricted to the province of Quebec, and were edited by Jesuits.

We had, I believe, a magazine called Maintenant, which has probably disappeared by now. We have Maclean which is just as American as Reader's Digest. So why go for one magazine especially? Why should we try to cut down the rights of advertisers, the rights of people, or the rights of editors who work or co-operate with Reader's Digest?

Mr. Speaker, I think Bill C-58, considering how it is presented now, is discriminating. I understand we have to put an end to our recurring discussions in the past few years on that matter, namely whether we should boycott those so-called foreign magazines in Canada. So, when you have the number of employees who worked on a magazine like Sélection, one must be somewhat tolerant and admit that those people, the Canadians who area attached to it, our fellow citizens, do not work against the interests of Canada, do not work against the interests of advertisers, but work together to maintain a worthwhile magazine.

I said earlier that that Reader's Digest is a source of information that one does not find in other magazines. This does not mean that the other magazines are absolutely useless, no. Some are good, others not so good. But when you know Reader's Digest, I think there is not a single member in this House who does not read articles in Reader's Digest every month. Why? Because you learn something. That magazine serves educational purposes in many areas. That magazine acts as a yardstick or a barometer for economic gains or economic changes by informing us of what is happening in other countries while we have it available directly.

So, Mr. Speaker, the attitude taken by my colleagues of the Social Credit with respect to Bill C-58 is logical and honest. We will be voting against Bill C-58 when we are through considering it and we wish the government would reconsider its position to allow Reader's Digest—I am not talking about Time—to continue its beneficial impact across Canada as it has done for that matter in the whole world.

● (1530)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF VANIER HIGH SCHOOL AIR CADETS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that there are 40 air cadets in the gallery from No. 650 Vanier high school air cadet squadron who are returning from Toronto where they participated in the Santa Claus parade.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications I hope it might be appropriate this afternoon, as this second reading debate winds to a close, to give some explanation in detail, as I understand it, of why these amendments in Bill C-58 are essential to the continuing health and viability of the Canadian television industry. In fact, the effects of this bill do not only relate to the over-all health of the industry but to the maintenance of Canadian culture and identity, with all the impact that television can have in Canada in helping to maintain and establish them.

As well, the bill will help further protect the availability of Canadian news and public affairs and competition within Canada of the different news bureaux and public affairs sources. Further, when communications is such a vital tool to a country like our own which is spread over a massive geographic area with a relatively small population, this legislation will, hopefully, begin to redress a problem that is threatening the very effectiveness and survival of that communications industry, certainly on the private sector side.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

May I first of all discuss, Mr. Speaker, why the government has taken this particular form of action in order to encourage the Canadian television industry and give incentives for advertising by Canadian business, particularly on Canadian television. I should like to argue that this is a positive move to encourage our industry, not to prohibit Canadians from advertising on American stations. By removing tax deductibility for commercials placed outside of Canada but beamed back into this country, we are hoping to give to a Canadian industry which is now seriously disadvantaged under current circumstances a better competitive situation.

I should like to argue that it would not be feasible to try to sustain and help strengthen the Canadian television industry through tariffs. That is simply not feasible because of the particular and peculiar situation in the airwaves. It is also not feasible because we have international agreements such as GATT, and a very complicated and technical situation would arise if we tried to take this particular problem before a multinational conference. As I said a moment ago, I also want to emphasize that when you are dealing with airwaves rather than a particular material commodity, it is very difficult to legislate except by taking a positive step such as this and to offer incentives through taxation.

I should also like to point out that it is the view of the ministry that subsidies as a means of trying to strengthen and build the Canadian television industry would be inappropriate. Specifically, they would be inappropriate because there is some danger that subsidies from government going to the private sector, in an area that has such an influence over the public, would either be abused or be accused of abusing the right to independence of those broadcast outlets. So that approach cannot be taken. As I have said, this bill is simply providing an incentive for Canadian advertisers to deal more with Canadian TV outlets. Removal of tax deductibility simply improves the competitive position of Canadian TV times sales, and this bill does nothing to stop the purchase of U.S. time by Canadians in border marketplaces.

There is every justification for this action, Mr. Speaker, and even for further action. United States stations operating in border areas at the moment and penetrating severely into the Canadian audience do not have the social or content obligations of Canadian licensees. Canadian TV licences are granted on the ability of the area to support a licence. They are also granted if an area is large enough and there is enough revenue available in that area of Canada for more than one licence. That, of course, is why this legislation today is important; it is so because the Canadian Television Commission, as the regulatory body in Canada of the airwaves, is attempting to develop second private stations in major urban centres, and has in fact in one area, Toronto, already done so.

American border stations have no Canadian content restrictions. As I say, they do not have the same Canadian social obligations. The major Canadian stations that are in jeopardy at the moment because of sales to American TV stations happen to be in the major urban centres of Canada, which also happen to be very close to the U.S. border. Thus, I am sure hon. members can understand that with a nation of 260 million to the south, and a nation here of some 22 to 23 million, Canada is hardly a threat to the establishment and dissemination of the American culture. But certainly, with no content rules, no Canadian obligation and no added costs, their penetration of our area can seriously threaten our identity and culture if that penetration undermines the very existence of healthy Canadian television. In all honesty, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that to date the lack of action by Canada over the years since television first came into its own in the early 1950s has given the advantage to the much stronger United States stations to start with, who in addition operate without those controls that Canadian stations must face.

To leave the situation as it is would mean not just the failure of expansion, the kind of expansion that the CRTC is now attempting through, for instance, the awarding of a second private station in Vancouver to Western Approaches, or the development of the Global network in southern Ontario or City TV in Toronto; the continuing situation in fact threatens the ability of the existing stations I have just mentioned and the new ones, to survive. It will affect not only their ability to produce new, more costly and better programming, but even to maintain the programming level that Canadian television audiences now have.

Under Canadian licensing, TV Stations in major urban centres in Canada must have sufficient profits so that they are not only viable in Toronto, or Winnipeg, or Vancouver, or Montreal. Private stations must also profit well enough to help subsidize smaller stations along their network who still have a sizeable capital outlay for equipment and buildings and to meet the considerable labour cost necessary to run a television outlet no matter its potential audience. So it is not only a matter of threatening the viability of these individual private stations in the major Canadian marketplaces, but also their ability to assist smaller neighbours so that throughout Canada we can have a competitive and healthy television industry.

All major Canadian television centres—Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal—are seriously affected by the currently heavy sales and drain of commercial revenues which buy TV time in the United States rather than in Canada. Yet the TV stations in the major urban centres to which I have just referred must find the revenue not only to be healthy themselves but to pay for programming and network costs which smaller communities cannot fully support by themselves.

● (1540)

This legislation is so important really because of double jeopardy, and it is necessary not only to the survival of these particular border area Canadian stations but the survival of the smaller areas in Canada as well who rely on the assistance of these major Canadian television centres. Enactment of this bill as it relates to television advertising will simply give Canadian outlets a better competitive position, dollar for dollar, in dealing with competitors who are not licensed in Canada and do not have the restrictions of Canadian TV even though they are dealing directly in the Canadian marketplace.

I would also like to note that this proposed amendment, Bill C-58, as it relates to broadcasting was recommended by the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts in 1973. The bill itself does two things in the area of broadcasting. First, TV advertising will not be tax deductible if the commercial is broadcast by a foreign broadcasting undertaking to the Canadian market. You can still purchase in the United States, but you will no longer get the tax credit from the Canadian government by spending your money outside the country. Surely that seems reasonable enough when you consider that the Buffalo stations are putting our Canadian stations into real financial jeopardy.

Second, multinational corporations in Canada will not be allowed the deduction of commercial advertising costs when purchasing time from foreign networks or groups of stations. Once more, this is simply a protection and is based on stopping multinational corporations operating in both countries from using the deduction up here of many dollars spent in the United States, thereby saving the cost of paying for Canadian advertising as well. It is important to note that despite the very serious situation I am attempting to outline, this bill allows time for the United States industry to regroup and fill the United States role for which it was licensed. As I understand it, all contracts concerning advertising which would be affected by the passage of this legislation signed before January 23, 1975, will be allowed to run out as long as they do not go beyond 12 months from the date of the enactment of this legislation.

If I may, I would like to go into some of the problems faced by particular border areas. Let me set down, if I can, just what the situation is in respect of time sales for television in major Canadian marketplaces, in terms of money staying in the Canadian marketplace and money going to the United States. The latest figures I have are for 1972, although we have some updating as well. In Vancouver, in 1972, $7.3 million was spent on Canadian television advertising. In the same marketplace, in the same year, more than 50 per cent of that amount, another $4 million, went to United States stations which had no programming obligations, no Canadian content obligations and no additional costs in respect of the Canadian audiences they were picking up.

In Winnipeg, $4.9 million was spent on Canadian television advertising and $1.5 million flowed out to the United States. In the Toronto-Hamilton area, $33.8 million stayed in the Canadian market-place and $9.8 million flowed out to the United States, again without any commitments or obligations in respect of programming on these United States stations intruding into the Canadian marketplace. In Ottawa-Montreal, $35.7 million was spent here in Canada for Canadian television advertising, with $1.5 million going down to the United States.

The drain in 1972 of almost $17 million is estimated currently to be more than $20 million a year, yet these U.S. border stations have no Canadian content requirements, no Canadian social obligations and are not licensed to operate in Canada. In fact, they are licensed only to operate within their own territory in the United States and under that licensing procedure, as I understand it, they are considered by the Federal Communications Commission in the United States to be economically viable operating within those boundaries.

An hon. Member: What about jamming?

Mr. Fleming: We will get to that. The advent of cable television in Canada has really revolutionized the situation. There are more benefits and more dangers resulting from cable. There are more benefits in that Canadian audiences have a much wider spectrum of programming available to them, but there are more dangers because the same multiplicity of stations available brings about a fragmentation of audience, and once audiences of Canadian television stations become increasingly fragmented, more and more of these stations will have difficulty surviving, with much less opportunity for improving programming and spending more money on Canadian programming.

Canada has now, through cable, these multiple station markets, especially in the Toronto area, which are seriously affected by sales of commercial time in the United States to Canadian business. I want to point out that United States stations have not, as I said earlier, licence obligations in Canada, but through cable do have the tremendous advantage of this build-up in diversity of programming. Perhaps the most significant argument we hear from areas such as Buffalo about the great injustice of what is currently happening or potentially will happen is the jamming of commercials on Canadian cable.

Let me point out the situation at KVOS in Bellingham, Washington state. That station purchases programming from the American network of which it is a member. It pays only according to the United States audience it has, but pays nothing for the Canadian audience to which it also beams and from which it also picks up so much money, to the jeopardy of our industry. It pays not a penny for its programming to Canadians. That becomes especially incredible when you think of a station such as this which the Federal Communications Commission has allowed to move its transmitter closer to the Canadian border in order to further penetrate into Canada, yet its United States sales are only 15 per cent of total time sales—85 per cent are in Canada. You can imagine the impact this has on Canadian stations. The United States audience is only a minute part of the over-all audience, yet these stations buy their programming only in consideration for the United States audience.

If you multiply by 20 or 25 years the figures I gave earlier in respect of the current drain to the United States, about $20 million annually, directly for the purchase for particular U.S. TV markets of television time by Canadian businesses, you come up with a figure that is very conservatively estimated to be in the range of one-quarter of a billion dollars that has flowed to the United States since the early fifties. That money could have sustained our own industry, and surely it is enough to have built the buildings, purchased the equipment and paid for at least a few years for all the staff costs of these American stations. At the same time, they have yet to pay one penny more for their programming because Canadians are receiving it. They have not had to produce Canadian public affairs programs or Canadian news. They have not had to represent one area of Canada to other areas of Canada. They have had none of these obligations, yet they have received this massive windfall.

● (1550)

I think I pointed out a few moments ago that KVOS in Bellingham was selling 85 per cent of its time in the Vancouver market. The fact is that the FCC, which at the moment is considering a jamming recommendation for the Buffalo stations, failed to say anything for 20 or 25 years and even assisted Bellingham by allowing it to move its transmitter closer to the Canadian border. The Buffalo stations, whose own marketplace is one half the size of the Toronto market place, have managed until recently to have almost twice as many television stations as there are in Toronto.

If one looks at the profit and loss sheets of the United States television stations in Buffalo, with one half the licensing area in the United States that there is across the lake in Toronto—and the situation in Bellingham is a minute fraction of the Vancouver marketplace—one will find that these are among the most profitable television operations in the United States. So is it unjust, even before Canadian licensing restrictions are considered, and when they have such advantages in programming and programming costs, that we should take this beginning step for the rescue of our own industry?

Over the 24 or 25 years that all these Canadian dollars have poured south of the border, these stations, to my knowledge, have never been questioned about their huge windfall gains by their own regulatory body, the FCC. Now, when we try to protect our own, we hear angry cries about the morality of windfall gains such as taking United States programming which enters our airwaves while rejecting commercials out of the United States. Surely, on moral and ethical grounds such indignation from the U.S. rings very hollow indeed.

For years their windfall gains have made them among the richest of the United States stations, despite the fact that they are among the smallest U.S. licensed stations serving urban areas. That windfall threatens our entire industry. If we in turn have United States programming and pay nothing for it, then under United States licensing not only are we not contravening any of their rules but also we are not costing them anything. In that case, what are we doing that is so wrong, and why do they cry so loudly and angrily at this point in time?

There are several unique situations, such as the border areas of New Brunswick, the area represented by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), where there are problems. As I understand it—and the hon. member addressed himself to this matter a few days ago—small businesses in that area have a problem in respect of the availability of space on radio stations in Canada. I would like to say that the Canadian Radio-Television Commission is aware of this situation and, as I understand it, already has had an expression of licensing interests from at least one source to operate in Canada and to alleviate that problem. But it is precisely this kind of area which will only be able to have truly successful Canadian broadcasting available, especially in television, if the larger centres are properly protected and encouraged and can thereby help offset costs, especially in programming in less populated regions.

In discussing Bill C-58, I have tried to outline broadly the very critical problem the Canadian industry faces. In doing so I have not only discussed the very real urgency of Bill C-58 but also some of the reasons further action such as commercial deletion is now being tested and considered. It is very important, however, for all hon. members to understand that on the issue of Bill C-58 as it relates to advertising on television, there has been absolutely no criticism nor protest from the United States government. We are amending Canadian tax laws quite appropriately to aid and encourage our own industry.

Some have argued that Canadian advertisers cannot buy time on Canadian television. Such a charge is simply a misunderstanding of the current situation. When the CRTC allowed the expansion of second, private stations in major Canadian centres it then became especially crucial to try to limit the outflow of Canadian television advertising dollars. There is time available on Global and City in Toronto. For instance, in the British Columbia area, when the new private station owned by Western Approaches goes on the air in less than a year, positive action by the Canadian government such as the amendment in this bill will be absolutely crucial for its survival.

While availability of time and cost of time is very complex, suffice it to say that unless Canadian advertising dollars are concentrated here during prime time and non-prime time, peak seasons and non-peak seasons, we will not have good Canadian programs, much less programs that can begin to compete with the much more costly products of our neighbours to the south.

One aspect of the loss of television time dollars in Canada that few people have considered is the millions of dollars never spent here because multinational advertisers can purchase network spots in the United States and at no cost at all make a major penetration into Canadian markets. Aside from the approximately $20 million a year lost through United States television time purchases in particular American border station locations, millions and millions more are lost simply because those border stations in their national advertising and network operation reach millions of Canadians at no extra cost. I do not think it is unselfish to argue that corporations selling the same products to Americans and Canadians should be prepared to pay as much per capita on advertising to Canadians as they do to Americans. At the moment, that is certainly not the case.

I would like briefly to refer to news reports and opinions expressed by some of Canada's major media participants and critics on the subject. Global is one of the new Canadian television operations that began with the greatest of hopes as an initiator of new Canadian programming. They hoped, also, to give exciting quality aspects to programming that they argued had not been available in great quantity before. Now, because of the situation I have described, Global is in serious jeopardy and is accused of not meeting its Canadian content requirements. Yet what places it in jeopardy are the stations that have no Canadian content requirements and no programming costs relative to their Canadian audience. Perhaps I could quote the president of Global Television, Moses Znaimer, in his article in the Globe and Mail of November 5, 1975. He said:

> From the American point of view, that's what the border war is all about: money, profits. The rest of the shouting about morality, about legality is a sham. Over the years, we Canadians have paid for every brick, every camera, every bit of technical facility in Buffalo's ABC, NBC, and CBS affiliates five times over. In the Toronto-Buffalo area alone, what's at stake this year is roughly $10 million: on a nationwide scale $20 million: in all probably a juicy $250 million since the porkbarrel began.

Non-Canadian Publications

Znaimer also comments in the same article about the U.S. industry's reaction to this bill even before it has been adopted. He and others in the industry charge that some Buffalo stations have cut their rates and are, in a manner of speaking, dumping U.S. commercial time in Toronto. Znaimer says in the article:

> It's a measure of the super profits that U.S. border stations have been able to generate, that they can cut their rates by 50, 60 and even 75 per cent on the Canadian side of the border only and still continue to do very nicely, thank you. Why not? As companies, they were created to be viable in their markets of origin. Everything else, all of Canada, is gravy. A free ride. (Buffalo opposite Toronto is a small, relatively unimportant market in U.S. terms. Bellingham opposite Vancouver is a town the size of a yawn. Yet, network affiliate stations in these towns have consistently, astonishingly, ranked among the most profitable in the United States).

Some of the Buffalo stations deny this so-called dumping and say they have cut their rates simply for seasonal sales reasons. The information available to me has put that claim in some doubt. Toronto Star television writer Jack Miller, on October 6, 1975, made a very good case by comparing how the FCC protects one American community from another but has no similar obligation and does not do so when a Canadian market is jeopardized. He wrote:

> If this happened between two U.S. cities, it promptly would be vetoed by the Federal Communications Commission in Washington as grossly improper.
>
> Say, for instance, that because of cable TV people in Rochester were able to see Buffalo stations as well as they could see their local one. Theoretically, the Buffalo broadcasters could go to all the Rochester advertisers and use the same argument they use in Toronto to pick up some outside business.
>
> But no, says Washington, that's not the American way. The Rochester stations are licensed to serve Rochester and they are obliged to provide local newscasts and other local program services for Rochester, so in return for that service they deserve to be protected against competition from outside stations which don't do anything for Rochester.

Miller goes on later to say:

> But as for protecting local TV, stations in Canada—well, that, of course is not Washington's business. It is something for Canada to worry about.

● (1600)

Miller, later in his column, shows the difficult problem Canadian television producers have. He says:

> Whereas a U.S. network program 60 minutes long might have a budget of $250,000 for its production, a Canadian equivalent on commercial television might get $40,000 on a good week.

Meanwhile, remember that those U.S. border stations get that much more expensive programming at a cost spread over the much larger U.S. population and the border stations particularly only buy that much more commercial production according to the portion of their audience that is American.

Bill C-58 can only be a beginning, but an important beginning, in rectifying the situation for our own television industry as it is affected along our border with the U.S. If this so-called dumping is taking place, then we have U.S. border stations already attempting to circumvent the laws of this parliament before that law is even passed. Canadians have always paid their way, sometimes too dearly. In this particular situation, hundreds of millions of dollars in windfall profits have already gone to U.S. television operations which not only have more expensive programming but pay less for it per capita than our Canadian private stations generally pay for less costly Canadian programming. Meanwhile, those U.S. border stations do not even pay for the programming their Canadian audience receives. They do not have the same licensing requirements, the same content obligations nor the same social policy commitments as Canadian licensees. Surely, with all those advantages in mind, it is not unreasonable to suggest that good things sometimes must end, especially when somebody else who can afford it much less has been paying the price.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. I should like to inform all hon. members that the House leaders have met and agreed that when the debate on second reading of Bill C-58 has been concluded later this day, the vote will be deferred until 9.30 tonight, followed by the vote on the opposition day NDP motion. The bells will ring for 15 minutes. It is also understood that at the conclusion of both votes, the debate on the postal strike will resume and continue until its conclusion.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, in participating in this debate let me begin by saying that Bill C-58 has no over-all policy with regard to periodicals published in Canada. If I were convinced that the removal of these tax concessions would truly help the Canadian publishing industry, I would find myself in favour of this bill, but that is not the case.

It would seem that the Department of National Revenue is in the field of journalism. This rather unusual situation is the result of proposed changes in the tax legislation which we are discussing now which will affect Reader's Digest, Time magazine, three trade publications and four newspapers in Canada. According to the former minister of national revenue, the Department of National Revenue will judge whether these publications will qualify as Canadian. The guidelines require 75 per cent Canadian ownership and content which is 80 per cent different from that in the parent publication. I can see some justification in having ownership and editorial control reside in Canada. However, there is no justification for a content quota. Tax authorities will not limit themselves to content, either; in each case they will decide if the publication's name and format must change.

What does the Canadian government hope to gain by this? It certainly has gained the favour of publications competing against Time, Reader's Digest, and the others. But does anyone really gain anything? It is fine to say that these publications must be 80 per cent different from their parent publications, but how is that difference to be judged, and by whom? Will difference in content mean that the stories used in the Canadian edition must be written differently? If so, is it not possible to change eight out of every ten words in a story to meet the 80 per cent limit? Does it mean that 80 per cent of the stories cannot be the same ones used in the foreign edition? That might involve dropping major news stories because they occur outside Canada. Will 80 per cent of the stories have to mention Canada? That is fine if we want to isolate ourselves from world events. Canada may be big and important to Canadians, but it is only a small power on the international scene.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Readers of Time want international news. If they cannot get a Canadian edition that gives them international coverage, they will simply subscribe to the American edition. Is the government then going to stop American publications being mailed to Canada? Just who will judge the content of the publications affected? Will it be a group of civil servants whose only contact with the print media is the morning paper thrown on the porch by the delivery boy, or will, perhaps, the Department of National Revenue ask the editor of Maclean's for advice?

Our Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) is also in the game. He has set out a number of requirements designed to push up the cost of publishing these periodicals. The theory is that as advertising costs go up, more dollars will go to all-Canadian publications. Unfortunately, theories do not always work out. In all probability this money will go into other areas of advertising.

Why is that? Because readership, not nationalism, governs where advertising is placed. Increased readership will not come by killing the Canadian editions of the affected publications. It is a simple matter to subscribe to the American editions. Increased readership comes with improved quality. Senator Keith Davies, in his report on the mass media, was concerned about the poor performance of many newspapers because of lack of competition. It seems contradictory that he would recommend, and the government would implement, a step that would destroy any competition in the area of weekly news magazines. By weakening Time Canada there are high hopes that a new, all-Canadian weekly magazine will be created. But will it be a strong, truly national magazine, or will it be national solely because it is the only weekly news magazine published in Canada? We, as Canadians, will gain nothing from this government's move in this legislation.

The government is playing games with us by interfering with content, licensing agreements with foreign publications and changing the tax structure so it will work against these publications. The government is taking this action in the name of nationalism, but the evils committed in the name of nationalism are countless. Behind this smokescreen there is still censorship. I am sure that all hon. members have received a great deal of correspondence concerning this bill. I, personally, have received hundreds of letters on this one issue. There is one letter that I wish to share with hon. members today. It comes from a Mrs. Newnham of Box 52, Jarvie, Alberta, who writes:

Dear Member:

I wish to voice my protest against the legislation being proposed to abolish tax deductions for advertisers in the Canadian editions of Time magazine and Reader's Digest, which could possibly lead to the discontinuance of these publications.

Why have the people most concerned about the government's proposed action—the reading public—not been approached, to learn their views? And have the advertisers themselves been polled to see what their reactions would be were these magazines to leave the Canadian market? Would they immediately transfer their business to Maclean's or Chatelaine? I doubt it.

According to statistics, there are 1,500 Canadians whose livelihood depends on Reader's Digest, and possibly a like number employed by Time magazine. If the Canadian editions of these two magazines fold up, that means another 3,000 people out of work. That many more on welfare for the Canadian taxpayer to support?

And if it is bilingualism that the government wants to promote, why drive out Reader's Digest? These controversial tax deductions might well be thought of in terms of money well spent on advancing the French language. Many students use the French edition of Reader's Digest to further their command of the language.

If the Canadian edition of Time were discontinued, Canadian subscribers would be deprived of much Canadian news which we get in no all-Canadian magazine, and—let's face it—Time magazine has a style all its own which no all-Canadian publication can begin to emulate. Time also gives us information on the workings of our own government, which we do not get in Maclean's.

● (1610)

With reference to Maclean's, I would suggest that the government institute a thorough investigation into the Maclean-Hunter racket—the way they train their agents to go out and exploit people, especially the elderly. I have experienced their high-pressured salesmanship tactics. I wrote a letter of protest re this to Maclean-Hunter about three years ago, but to date have received no acknowledgment.

If we must have Canadian content in our magazines, what value is there in such drivel as "Lives of Girls and Women" in the February, 1975, issue of Maclean's? Compare this with "The Women of Saskatoon" or "Women of Edmonton—Pattern Breakers" in the February and April issues of Chatelaine. Chatelaine is a worth-while magazine, but some of the contributors on the staff of Maclean's leave much to be desired. The Reader's Digest has them both beaten for interesting, informative content, and should the Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest be withdrawn, I, for one, will drop my subscription to Maclean's, at least, and subscribe to the American editions of the others, whatever the cost—and I know many other subscribers who would do likewise.

Yours sincerely,

Helen M. Newnham.

Here is a letter from a couple who have dedicated their services to Canada for many years. All they want in the later years of their lives is some good reading material. The thoughts expressed in this letter have been expressed by many thousands of Canadians across the country. As I said at the beginning, this bill in no way constitutes a periodicals' policy in Canada. It is a negative step instead of a positive one, and it is my hope that most members of this House will agree it is not the type of legislation we wish to pass.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, it is with utmost pleasure that I take part in this debate on Bill C-58. Needless to say, this legislation attacking magazines such as Sélection du Reader's Digest and Time magazine will have disastrous repercussions.

These publications are basically for the average person and adequately meet the requirements of the Canadian people. This is clear from the numerous letters received from my constituents after the announcement, by the Secretary of State, of the impending amendment to section 19(2) of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker, let me take this opportunity to air in this House my constituents' views on the subject, especially since they asked me to do so. To that end, I would quote from certain of the letters received.

I therefore enter into the record some excerpts from a letter from a lady in Sayabec:

As I have been a faithful reader of Sélection du Reader's Digest for about fifteen years, I want this magazine to continue to be available in our homes and schools. It is an interesting magazine since everyone wants to read it.

This same lady went on to say:

This magazine has international interest and can draw articles both from Canada and other countries and knows how to interest its readers in the fields of science, history, family and even recreation. There is nothing vulgar or distorting about this magazine and it could take the place of many others. Its publication certainly does not affect Canadian magazines and its loss would leave a great void for its French-speaking and English-speaking readers.

Another letter that I received from a lady in Mont-Joli said, and I quote:

I believe that most of us would be proud to own a magazine such as Sélection du Reader's Digest.

Every member of the family likes to leaf through this magazine which contains a great variety of articles. This pocket-book type of periodical is very useful to me for school work, and I can also use it as a bedside book.

I am very satisfied about this publication in its present form, and moreover, Sélection du Reader's Digest tries to meet our needs.

We can therefore conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that all the letters that I have received expressed the same opinion. It is easy to see that these people are concerned about the fact that the Canadian government is trying through this legislation to eliminate a publication like Sélection du Reader's Digest, which contains excellent articles that anyone can read.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, in general, all the letters that I have received from my constituents certainly favour maintaining Sélection du Reader's Digest and are completely opposed to the passing of this bill. I can very well understand this, Mr. Speaker.

Indeed, Sélection du Reader's Digest is very interesting and enables all classes of society to read marvellous articles. This magazine provides an opportunity to a great number of people to travel round the world at very low cost.

As for the contribution of the magazine to the Canadian economy, Sélection du Reader's Digest has an annual turnover of some $30 million, 90 per cent of which is spent on Canadian soil. In addition, almost 500 Canadian employees take part in its publication.

As for its contribution to the Canadian culture, it is easily realized that the contents of each English or French issue is entirely written in Canada and that in addition some 80 editors, graphic artists and artists work to publish the magazines and the various books offered by Sélection du Reader's Digest. Moreover, it is easily noted that many Canadians have had the opportunity of becoming acquainted through that magazine.

Mr. Speaker, considering the very high standard of those magazines, I am compelled to object to that bill, because I feel that it is essential to let the Canadian people continue to read those fine magazines which have already proven themselves.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me a question?

The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) seems to want us to believe that the government, through this bill, wants to eliminate Reader's Digest, and that Canadians, including the people from Rimouski and Gaspesia will no longer receive this magazine. Does he really believe this, because there is no question that Reader's Digest will disappear, is there?

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îlesde-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard). I suppose that some people read Reader's Digest in Bonaventure, as others do everywhere in Gaspesia and Magdelene Islands. I feel that Reader's Digest is being discriminated against at this time, and I cannot see how people could be harmed if we continued to apply the same policy.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member should join us and urge the government to decide at long last to take a position and to continue to favour a magazine such as Reader's Digest, that I read as well as my family, so that a great many people who live far from libraries and large centres, may know what is going on first of all in our own country and then in the rest of the world.

[English]

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support Bill C-58.

An hon. Member: You would.

Mr. Philbrook: That's right, I would; and you will see why in a minute. This bill seeks only to eliminate a few exceptions. It does not seek to discriminate against any existing policy. It supports the Canadian media industry but not the larger, foreign media industry. Canadians are justifiably patriotic but also international in outlook. We should value information from other countries, but not more than from our own country. There is a welcome place for foreign communications here, alongside strong and independent Canadian counterparts.

● (1620)

Bill C-58 covers television also, but let us talk first about magazines. My colleague, the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming), covered the television aspects this afternoon. Time and Reader's Digest are unquestionably the most widely read foreign publications in Canada. They have produced what they call Canadian editions and invested and operated in Canada to a greater extent than most foreign publications, which is to their credit. But they also profited well by the deal. Nonetheless, they are not, and will not be, classified as Canadian magazines until they are truly Canadian and meet all the criteria established by the government which represents the people of Canada; and they are not entitled to share in any special privileges granted to Canadian publications until they do so qualify. In recent times they have been given their chance to conform to our definition of Canadian publications but have not conformed. So, such exceptions are not justified. It might even make sense to put all publications, foreign and Canadian, on the same tax basis, but not at this time.

The small Canadian publishing industry historically has had some difficulty in competing with foreign publications. It has asked the Canadian government to support it until it is self-sufficient. This support has been given in the form of special tax concessions to its advertisers to attract advertising dollars to domestic magazines. To some extent this has helped, but not enough yet. Is any of this surprising for a young nation struggling among established powers?

Why do our own institutions need such help? Obviously, they need it partly because other countries have bigger, stronger and more established economies and home markets to support all their enterprises. Some Canadian apologists complain that our Canadian products are inferior and do not deserve the support of the Canadian government. "Let them stand up and compete like adults," they say, "and not be molly-coddled." Even if such criticism is true, Canada needs its own best communications and cultural systems and all possible steps must be taken to make it a reality. We are determined to be a sovereign nation, with all due regard for our giant neighbour to the south and the rest of the world power blocs. Therefore, certain key areas must be safeguarded. The media is certainly one of the most important. Most of us agree that the necessary ability exists here in Canada. We need a solid, concerted national effort to put that ability to full use.

One wonders why two major foreign magazines, plus a few minor ones, were ever granted the same privileged tax exemptions as Canadian products. Other foreign publications were not so lucky and yet have survived. Also, they had every right to complain of discrimination compared to Time and Digest. These exceptions do not make any sense at all. Time and Reader's Digest are rich, powerful companies. They are well established by now. Their American editions will continue to sell well here. If other foreign publications can afford to operate here without special tax concessions, why can't they? They can, but they obviously prefer not to. They are determined to keep their special privileges, as though they were Canadian, yet they would not expect the corresponding situation to be tolerated in their own country. The U.S.A. safeguards its own.

How did these exceptions occur in the first place? Was Canada so hard up for culture a few years ago that it would give up anything to get the most popular publications available at the time? Did we let the powerful U.S. government bully us into accepting these magazines on their economic terms? Did we just not think enough at the time about all the implications of being colonized in this way, socially, culturally and politically?

There are certain other irritants in the situation, certain subtle malinfluences with which we put up over the years. They are not the reasons for Bill C-58, but are relevant. They include Time's political propagandizing on behalf of the ultra conservative, right-wing philosophies of the publisher, Henry Luce, and his cohorts and Reader's Digest's red-baiting, intolerant lead articles. Both magazines were in business when Canada was trying to develop its own independent, moderate way of life and promote a more peaceful, tolerant world instead of stringing along with a pernicious cold war. Thoughtful students were aware of these insidious influences back in the early 1950s. Undoubtedly, too many Canadians were exposed to such early subliminal propaganda. The situation has changed. Now Canada is stronger, richer and more capable. We can profit from international exposure but must, at the same time, move forward with our national development of a dominant native press.

Some Canadians have charged that Bill C-58 simply represents crass commercial favouritism toward central Canada, Toronto in particular, specifically the Maclean-Hunter enterprises. Well, these Canadian institutions are there and open for the participation of all Canadians. If that is not enough, Canadians can start their own enterprises in the east or west, relieved of the burden of competing with two specially supported magazines in Canada, Time and Reader's Digest.

Some critics proclaim that most of their letters on the subject oppose Bill C-58. Of course they do; that is the kind of negative mail members learn to expect on any subject. But the polls were not opposed. Neither the professional polls nor small, private polls of the kind conducted by members showed that the people opposed Bill C-58, despite Time and Reader's Digest having mounted one of the biggest, most intimidating lobbies and publicity campaigns in Canadian political history. Last spring I conducted my own newsletter survey in Halton riding. Despite the work of the lobby, only 34 per cent of those answering opposed Bill C-58. About 44 per cent were in favour of the bill, and 22 per cent had no opinion. Even more significantly, fewer people answered this questionnaire than had answered other questionnaires. Clearly, the power lobby has created less interest in this issue than exists with regard to crime and labour strikes.

Some people take the pessimistic view that even if foreign competitors are helped less, Canadian magazines like Maclean's will remain bogged down with poor quality, little sales appeal and remain hapless nationalistic efforts. To some extent past criticisms were warranted. Articles and sections were weak, frivolous, dilettante, irrelevant, in bad taste or otherwise unworthy. Oddly enough, the bad stuff has existed side by side with good quality stuff. All the same Canadian writing and reporting has shown enough promise to warrant our support, and this is especially true at present. The new Maclean's news magazine format is a substantial improvement. I commend its capsule news highlights called "Preview", its large more comprehensive "Canada" section dealing with current events, its good international coverage in the "World" section, and the balance of feature articles, freewheeling interviews with important Canadians, and special subject sections.

Saturday Night has also made a strong comeback as a specialty magazine. Recently, a fine news magazine, Canadian Review, has begun publishing from Ottawa. These are truly Canadian magazines which will continue to grow and develop with our support and constructive criticism. I point out that already, in this new climate of interest and support, the Canadian magazine industry announced recently that it has enjoyed its best year ever. One of these days, our Canadian publishing industry and other media, like TV, may not need special support from our people. That will be a great day. Right now, our media need such support, which we will not hesitate to provide, without exceptions. Canadians will watch expectantly for results which will justify this support.

One of these days, Mr. Speaker, Canadian doubters and apologists will be proud and anxious to claim credit for Canadian media which have become distinctly Canadian, sovereign and as good as any in the world. They will be as proud of our media as they are of our Canadian film and music industries, Expo '67, the forth-coming 1976 Olympics and many other Canadian achievements. The fact is that Time and Reader's Digest will continue to function and to be welcome here, Canadian editions or not, Bill C-58 or not. Just this afternoon I received a telegram from Mr. Stephen LaRue, the president of Time magazine, as I am sure other members did, complaining about the 80 per cent

Non-Canadian Publications

Canadian content rules announced by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) here in this House of Commons as far back as October 23, 25 days ago—a dubious, last-minute manoeuvre on a very important subject. I read it and I must say that it did little to change my mind on the subject.

• (1630)

It is a privilege and an honour to speak in support of Bill C-58 and Canadian progress.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, this matter has caused considerable debate, not only recently in the bringing forward of Bill C-58 but in the whole development in recent years about the degree to which Canadians can exercise some autonomy and activity within their own communications industry. One cannot be overly optimistic that this action by itself is going to bring the utopia that many people would like to see occur in terms of increased opportunities for Canadian self-awareness and opportunities for Canadian craftsmen and various aspects of the magazine industry to make their impact felt to a greater degree.

While the substance of this bill is extremely short in terms of amendments to the Income Tax Act, the implications and the symbolic value to Canadians are obviously great. If the minister were asked the question today, I think he would indicate that no issue with which he has been identified during his time in office has generated more public concern, mail and heat, both outside and within his caucus, than this particular issue. I am sure he is well aware that while the action itself, in terms of legislative change, is not overwhelming, the implications and repercussions are great.

This is a kind of classical Canadian situation. We are in an attempt, if you like, to redress a balance which has swung increasingly against us as a people. We take a means of communication which has been popular for many decades, that of magazines. We realize that increasingly we have lost the ability to publish and communicate among ourselves in this country, not through any diabolical intent on the part of any individual, organization or government but simply in a general situation which continuously confronts this country, that of being neighbour to and closely associated with the most powerful nation in the world, not in just a military and economic sense but in the way in which the American people have excelled beyond any other in their ability to communicate and to register their ideals and ideas.

In 1961 I took a trip around the world. I visited some countries that I thought were far removed and underdeveloped. I remember in particular one sunny afternoon travelling through the back streets of Bangkok. I thought that surely to goodness nowhere in the world, on that day, could be further removed from the civilization that I knew than these little water streets, canalways, that existed in the back areas of Bangkok in Thailand. Can you imagine my surprise when I looked inside a little thatched hut on the water's edge and saw two things that reminded me of the sheer weight and energy of the American civilization from which I came, a bottle of Coca-Cola and an American television set. There was an instant awareness in that Thai household of a whole value system, a whole sense of identity that existed for a people halfway around the world. That was in 1961, 14 years ago.

Mr. Darling: Wasn't there a copy of Reader's Digest?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I did not get close enough to see whether there was a copy of Reader's Digest or Time magazine. If there had been, it undoubtedly would not have been an English edition; it would have been in a language I would not be able to read.

Mr. Baldwin: It was probably bought in the local Sky Shops.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I did not have a chance to visit there. It is perhaps interesting to note that since 1961 we in this country have been seized with two special committees of the other place, one headed by the esteemed Senator Grattan O'Leary and the other by the well-known and, in some circles, much respected Senator Keith Davey. They found themselves in substantial agreement that definite action had to be taken with regard to the deteriorating situation in the magazine industry in this country. I know that I am not going to contribute too much that is new, exciting and novel at this point in the debate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —but I will give it a good try. I will, hopefully, sum up and distil some of the wisdom that has pervaded this debate in the many days since its inception. Hon. members know that in 1950, in Canadian magazine circulation only 28.8 per cent of the magazines that were for sale or that were in circulation at that time were either of significant Canadian content or were Canadian-owned. What has happened in the meantime, in spite of the increased awareness and ability to communicate in other fields—I think of the expansion of television and the more recent expansion of feature film production in this country—has been a decline. The latest figures I have, which are for 1974, indicate that only 15.2 per cent of magazines currently in circulation in this country are what can be designated as Canadian. In total figures, in 1974 Canadian publications were some 29,467,000; American publications were some 193,288,000. That is not a fact with which Canadians can live very comfortably.

It is not a good thing to know that such a heavy aspect of one means of communication which serves as a major source of information for the development and further refinement of social and cultural values is so totally controlled by an outside source. I think hon. members know me well enough to realize I am not one who raises the flag of strident or superficial nationalism or one who feeds off a kind of virulent form of anti-Americanism. I simply believe that a country as mature and as sophisticated, and with the potential we have, should not have to rely upon or have the dependency that it does with respect to the magazine industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): If the figures that I have used with respect to the general circulation of magazines are disturbing, particularly the decline from 28.8 per cent in 1950 to 15.2 per cent in 1974, the general availability of publications is even more shocking. In 1974, newsstand sales of magazines indicate that 97 per cent were United States magazines in origin, and 3 per cent were Canadian. That can only be considered a shocking situation, one that has to be resolved. I have to say at the outset that while I support the effort that the minister is bringing forward in this bill, I am very disturbed that there has been evidence of very little action with regard to the general availability of magazines in newsstand sales. I will deal with that a little later.

● (1640)

I do not think it is enough simply to apply this change with respect to the Income Tax Act unless we are going to deal with some of the related factors that can make a reality of what I am sure the minister and his colleagues are concerned about there.

I mentioned my own experience in 1961 with the kind of pervasiveness of the American communications industry. I should also indicate that while we have had the O'Leary and Davey commissions in the last decade and a half, in actual fact as long ago as 1922 the magazine publishers' association of that day requested a tariff on foreign publications. So what we are dealing with here is not something we have suddenly discovered during the last few years, or even since the end of the Second World War when many people talked about the developing sense of a Canadian identity. The problem, of course—and it has been put repeatedly, one might almost say ad nauseam—is that there has developed in recent years a considerable sentiment and affection for two specific publications which have received a kind of special status under the present Income Tax Act. I am referring, of course, to Reader's Digest and Time magazine.

The claims—and of course we have all received mail, phone calls and representations of one kind or another—have suggested that these are important Canadian publications, in spite of the fact that they are part of large multinational corporations which find their homes in the United States. The fact of the matter is that in the case of Time, up until 1974 only 18 per cent of the content of this magazine could be considered in any way as Canadian, and with respect to Reader's Digest about 24 per cent. I have not followed at all closely the actual percentages present in recent issues of both publications, but I am willing to suspect that they have increased somewhat in an attempt to head off what has been a very obvious commitment to try to redress the balance to a more satisfactory level.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that when we think of the possibilities for the Canadian magazine industry, an essential problem is the fact that roughly 50 per cent—50 cents in every dollar—spent on general magazine advertising in this country is spent in the pages of Time and Reader's Digest. That amounted, in 1973, as I understand it, to close to $16 million. I am not aware of the figure for 1973 or 1974, but realizing inflation to be a factor everywhere I presume it was substantially over the $20 million mark.

What is of interest to me—and I do not wish to get into a long tirade here regarding Time or Reader's Digest because I think they are big enough to look after themselves—is that with respect to Reader's Digest in particular they have indicated as recently as in their last annual report that more than 50 per cent of their revenue is not from magazine sales. As a matter of fact, it comes from the mail order items in which it specializes—a variety of books, records and other items. Of course, these are well publicized in the monthly issues of Reader's Digest.

Some people have put forward the argument that we will be creating difficulties for both Reader's Digest and Time magazine in the changes being proposed. However, it seems to me that anyone who takes that position should be consistent, and since Reader's Digest has already indicated that more than 50 per cent of its revenue comes from mail order sales, then perhaps we should argue the same way for the Sears-Roebuck catalogue or for other publications which essentially want to advertise goods and services. That is really the kind of service being provided by Reader's Digest and I do not think it was ever the intent originally, when the amendments were made, to give a tax advantage for that purpose to these two publications.

I wish to make clear at the outset that I have been a long-time reader of both Time and Reader's Digest and expect to go on being so in the future, agreeing with them when I can and perhaps more often disagreeing with them, but in the main thinking that these are two publications which are worth having around because they do provide contact with a value system and sometimes an information system which is worth looking at. It is when it becomes so pervasive as to dominate substantially the Canadian scene that I think it becomes quite disturbing.

Quite frankly, I have never been happy with the fact that in the case of Reader's Digest the whole business of editorial content was one which was subject to approval by the parent office in the United States. Any company, regardless of the debate we may carry on respecting the percentage of Canadian content, which has to rely for a final content position on a board of managers of group of editors outside this country will have rough sledding with me in making that kind of an argument stick.

The basic question many of our people are asking is: Will the action the government is taking effectively make these two publications unavailable? While Messrs. LaRue and Zimmerman may have made certain noises in that direction, the facts of the matter are obvious; they are not going to stop publication, nor are they going to cease to be available, and they will not likely cease to carry Canadian content because they know that all these things sell magazines as well as selling the extras which go along with the magazines, and that they are part and parcel of being in the magazine business.

Two things may well happen. It may well be that some impact may be felt in subscription costs, but there has already been a substantial move in that area over the last few years and I do not expect to see much change. There may be some change with respect to advertising costs, but I am inclined to think they may be made a more attractive proposition to those Canadian companies who still think it in their interests to use the pages of these publications for some advertising opportunity. My essential concern is to equalize the opportunity for Canadian publications and, hopefully, to make the difference for some which are marginally or close in terms of being a make or break proposition.

I noticed in recent days, and earlier too, a good deal of strife and reaction in some of the editorial columns of the newspapers of this country talking particularly about the freedom of the press. It seems to me they missed one essential point. There can be no freedom of the press if there is no press in the first place. They, above all others, should realize this and with the deteriorating situation respecting magazine publishing and distribution on a proportionate basis in this country, it is just unbelievable that newspapers which have themselves sometimes been put in an invidious position should show what I think is a very narrow and chauvinistic reaction to what is being attempted here.

A question of more basic concern, perhaps, is the degree to which revenues may be diverted to assist other Canadian publications. There have been surveys done, I believe by Canadian Facts Incorporated, indicating that most of the revenue diverted from Reader's Digest and Time would go either to Maclean-Hunter—which is considered something of a big, bad wolf in this proposition—or to other non-periodical media, essentially not to other Canadian publications.

In the first place, I would regard even that as a net gain, although I would have some concern if that were the sum and substance of it. But if in fact some of this advertising revenue does go to other forms of media, that will not be bad, in my estimation, because we are fighting some other battles in other areas and I think they could receive some assistance there. If it goes to Maclean-Hunter, I would have mixed feelings about it because I am not totally happy about having one very large centre of magazine publishing, not only in the sense of Maclean-Hunter which has a large number of trade periodicals as well as the sort of flagship in Maclean's magazine, but for two basic reasons. First, because I think any concentration of communication in one source may not be healthy for a country; and, second, because as a person who does not come from the centre of the country but from one of the so-called disadvantaged regions, I get somewhat upset at the degree to which everything that is happening in the country gets focused and interpreted by the people who walk up and down the streets of Yonge, Bay or Bloor. I think Toronto is not the beginning or the end of this country. Therefore, I hope that more than just this particular magazine empire will be assisted.

● (1650)

I think one of the reasons we have had a bit of imbalance with respect to the Canadian magazine industry, even with respect to the degree to which Maclean-Hunter is such a major publishing giant in this country, is that only a company as large as Maclean-Hunter has been able to resist the kind of overwhelming competition created by the Time and Reader's Digest situation. Quite frankly, I think development of alternative assistance and the availability of alternate moneys for advertising revenue will be of very great importance in terms of ensuring that there is some levelling out, some dispersing, if you like, of magazine activity across the country. I have every reason to believe that the assessment made by Canadian Facts Incorporated as recently as the last couple of years is not entirely accurate. It is no thanks to this government that there has been a good deal of improvement in the prospects for magazine publishing in this country.

I realize that we have passed the day and age when we will have a number of national, slick, glossy magazines similar to Life, Look, Saturday Evening Post—magazines that have all suffered a demise in the past few years. If they could not find support in the United States, which has such a large population base, obviously they would not survive in a much smaller market area like Canada. I think the magazine industry has turned the corner from its days of depression of as recently as a year or two ago, and that there is now reason to hope that regional publications, publications directed toward a particular interest group, will receive a new burst of life through a new method of encouragement. In saying that, I want to speak specifically about the distribution system. I mentioned earlier that it is really criminal that 97 per cent of magazine sales at newsstands are of foreign magazines, essentially American, with only 3 per cent being Canadian magazines.

This situation did not happen accidentally. It did not just happen that only 3 per cent of the publications produced in this country are sufficiently worth while to be purchased by Canadian readers. It happened quite deliberately because of the very real control that exists in the wholesaling and distribution of Canadian magazine publications. It is a known fact that 13 out of the 14 national magazine distribution firms are U.S. owned. When you realize, Mr. Speaker, that not only are we on the border, so to speak, of this tremendous outpouring of magazine material, but that we are a ready source of revenue for surplus editions of each and every one of those publications, you will realize that we are particularly vulnerable to the sort of thing that has been going on for many years.

What makes this vulnerability close to total takeover is the fact that the very agencies of distribution that ensure which magazines appear on which newsstands, and with what kind of prominence and return to the individual retailer, in 13 out of 14 cases are controlled by U.S. owners. Thus, it is easy to realize that we have been almost totally had in regard to the distribution of Canadian magazine publications in this country.

The minister has had a number of representations from different sources to take some action in this field. He has been urged by the Book and Periodical Development Council to adopt some kind of strategy to deal with this problem. More recently he has been attacked by them for failing to take any definite action. I hope that when the minister appears before the parliamentary committee to deal with the substance of this measure before us and to add further information, he will also give us his own plans for dealing with the whole question of the distribution of Canadian publications. It is not good enough for the minister to say it is basically a provincial jurisdiction, that it is the provinces, one by one, that will have to sort out the situation. It is a situation which the minister knows only too well can be used in a number of cases to divest ourselves of our own responsibility respecting the general impact of federal government policy in the cultural area.

I do not feel happy in saying this to the minister, but unfortunately there has been a tremendous failure to develop a feature film industry in this country. We have spent many millions of dollars assisting, encouraging and ensuring that Canadian feature films are made; this has been done since 1967 under the aegis of the Canadian Film Development Corporation. But we have not yet found an effective means of ensuring that Canadians have access to these pieces of cultural material which are being produced.

Many years after the original establishment of the corporation the minister has managed to get some kind of agreement on a quota system for three major film chains, but unfortunately they did not fulfil the verbal part of the agreement. More recently, the minister entered into a second agreement, one that he assures us will be effective. But in my opinion this kind of registering of good faith and good will is a pretty weak gesture in terms of solving what is a fundamental issue.

Mr. Faulkner: What is the alternative?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): The minister asks me what the alternative is and I am glad he has asked that. It is really quite simple. I see he is amused at what I perceive to be a naive response to a difficult question. It seems to me it would not be beyond the creative ability or competence of the federal government to ensure that there is some stake on the part of each and every province in the country in effecting a workable distribution system that does not rely on the good will of any particular corporation, be it multinational, national or whatever.

Mr. Faulkner: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Surely.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Faulkner: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I very much appreciate the total support of the hon. member's remarks on the magazine side. I do not want to interrupt him, but he raised the question of the voluntary quota arrangement. I think he appreciates that last fall and on into this summer we visited every provincial capital and discussed a legislative quota. Our very best guess, based on those visits, was that no province other than the province of Quebec was prepared to accept a legislative quota. In view of that, what further steps would the hon. member propose that I take, as Secretary of State, given the fact that the provinces have jurisdiction over theatres? It seems to me that what I did after that, namely, get a voluntary arrangement with a commitment from the chains to produce and offer their co-operation, was about as good as I could get under the circumstances.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I thank the minister for his question. I think part of the basic problem is that the minister was canvassing the provinces with the wrong proposition. Perhaps we might get together on this at some point, but it seems to me from the experience of other countries, though not in every case federal countries where there is this divided jurisdiction, there is built in a definite economic incentive with respect to the exhibition of domestic production, and this makes sense to me. I mentioned the Eady fund in Great Britain which, to my mind, has functioned very effectively in maintaining a certain level of exhibition and distribution in that country. I hope we will move to the point of being able to propose to the provinces some arrangements. I think that suggesting to the provinces, whether Quebec or any other, that they share in the establishment of a quota system is in a sense taking the same kind of political decisions that the federal government is taking. I believe in a variety of incentives, and to me this provides no real incentive for there to be exhibition.

● (1700)

Let us say that the quota system were to be honoured by various companies as being efficient or important to them. If I were sitting in the boardroom of any one of those corporations, my very first question would have to be, "What is in it for us?" These are business people we are talking with, not the heads of churches or some kind of good will or charitable organizations. Unless there is to be some definite return or economic incentive I think they will always find ways to avoid exercising any real responsibility in this regard. That is the way I have felt for a long time.

Not only is this not likely to be honoured; that is only part of the problem. There is nothing sufficient to generate active interest, if you like. I think we want more than just the impassive or almost unhappy acceptance of the quota principle the minister has enunciated and tried to have adopted by the provinces. I would hope he or his officials would try to work out something similar to the Ead's model if that is not totally transferrable to our system. Surely some modification of that principle would be of value.

This brings me back to what I was saying a moment ago. It seems to me that if we are to be concerned about the magazine industry in this country, it will not be enough just to be concerned about it in terms of ensuring that the advertising inequities that presently exist are removed. I have already expressed some of the difficulties that may exist in the actual transfer of that 50 per cent to be spread among Canadian publishers. We have to be concerned about the level at which the consumer or the reader will be able to make these publications available to himself. If the distribution chain is very heavily controlled by outside sources, then it is obvious we have not really solved the problem.

I suggest there are a variety of ways in which the minister could deal with this distribution system. There are some immediate ones he can look at. One would be an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act to determine whether there is some measure of monopolistic practice that is preventing adequate access to Canadian publications. The second thing might be to throw open some of the government's own retailing operations, such as Info-Can, across the country. The first step that might be worth taking is to explore the possibility of making Canadian publications available through the storefront offices of Info-Can which exist in so many towns and cities in this country. At least this might be a transitional role to make sure there is access to various publications across the country.

I see that my time is rapidly expiring. I am prepared to support the measure that is before us, and I shall do so. The one major difficulty that has been raised during the debate is in relation to the 80 per cent content rule. It has received a great deal of flak in recent days. It is important that this be viewed in the kind of context in which there will be a certain amount of flexibility. As I understand this principle, and it has been applied in other similar situations, it will not result in a sort of issue by issue situation but will involve an over-all look at publications within a 12-month period.

I hope that at the committee stage we will not be so totally wedded to the proposal made recently by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) that we cannot look at some alternatives, perhaps similar to the one exercised by the CRTC of increasing the degree of Canadian content on a growth percentage basis with a view to reaching a certain goal in a fairly short period of time. I do not think we want to put ourselves in the position of doing what is right but not appearing to do what is right. I know committee members will want to spend a good deal of time looking at that particular issue.

In conclusion, I want to say that like so many other matters which have involved initiative by this government, whether in the area of energy conservation or regional development, the government has enunciated some good objectives but its implementation has been very deficient. The minister said back in 1973 that we had only scratched the surface of the problems facing the Canadian publishing industry. I want to remind the minister that he should not just use a back-scratcher when obviously we are going to require a spinal transplant, particularly for this Canadian industry which in recent years has become increasingly under fire and in need of an over-all study and strategy in order to be viable and available to all Canadians.

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I in no way want to become involved in a quota system debate. While it obviously plays an important part in the magazine industry, it does not really come into this particular argument regarding the amendments to the Income Tax Act in Bill C-58. Let me start by saying that perhaps the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) and myself should have been involved in dialogue for a few minutes earlier, because I think we could have exchanged places and capably carried out our admonitions directed to members of the government or even to the opposition. I will develop that theme as I go along.

I address my early remarks to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). I would like to tell him that we in the backbenches are not afraid to speak up and talk about the question directly. He has given me the opportunity to ask myself some very particular questions and I think that is the way it should be. That is what the debate we are having today is, in effect—an examination of the whole question. I, for one, as a member on the government side, would like to ask some of these questions out loud. Perhaps I should direct the really big question to the entire backbench. I am really asking this government to reawaken in me the feeling of doing the right thing, and removing the confusion that exists in my mind because of the feeling that Bill C-58 has put us in a bigger quandary than we have ever been in by creating the insurmountable task of answering those questions that have come before us. This question involves the matter of Canadian ownership and censorship, and I am firmly convinced that we must first remind ourselves that in order to be a Canadian citizen one has to apply, one has to live here and fulfil certain requirements and contain himself within confinements respecting patriotism and loyalty to the country and the government.

This regimentation has been followed completely by Reader's Digest. Let me say quite emphatically that I am, and always have been, a supporter of Reader's Digest. The Flynn family has subscribed to this magazine for many years. I have always been particularly proud of the fact that I have been personally acquainted with, to my knowledge, the only graduate of Reader's Digest. I am speaking about a Brother "Robbie" who has done such a tremendous job as the "hoodlum" brother in the Thunder Bay area. He has made a great contribution to the community in which he has worked, especially our native peoples. He is one of many Canadians who have been almost completely educated by Reader's Digest, and I suppose there are many more who use the magazine as a further supplement to their education. They are probably asking themselves, as many are, if they are going to get the same Reader's Digest, or is Reader's Digest being forced out of business or so completely changed in its format that they will no longer recognize it.

● (1710)

It is particularly distressing that we must look at this question from such a complicated viewpoint, because Bill C-58 comes under the guise of an income tax problem which completely compounds the confusion that exists around the total situation and the real question. There is a crisis and dilemma involved here that has caused perplexing feelings among the people in the whole community. I am sure all of us who have received enormous amounts of mail from our constituents over the past year concerning Reader's Digest, and have taken the time to answer in some detail the original question in good faith, did so in complete acceptance of the fact that in 1974, 24 per cent of the material used in the Canadian edition of Reader's Digest originated in Canada. We also accept the fact that by 1976 the amount of Canadian material will be 30 per cent, which will mean that the number of major Canadian articles carried by Reader's Digest will approach the number carried by all other leading Canadian magazines.

I agree completely that there may be a pressure group at work which has a vested interest in the publishing industry. Perhaps it is using this opportunity to eliminate competition. Unfortunately, it may have convinced some of the people who are probably very closely allied with the writing and drafting of this bill to create an impossible situation for Reader's Digest. I agree that without competition certain magazine publishers would continue to sustain their mediocrity if not deteriorate further.

One thing that further confuses me is that Reader's Digest is supposed to be taking all the cream off the top so far as advertising money is concerned. Yet as I understand it, Reader's Digest in 1973 took only 21 per cent of the gross advertising revenue going to other members of the Magazine Association of Canada. Those who took an equal amount and distributed it among themselves were Chatelaine, Miss Chatelaine, Maclean's, Le Magazine Macleans, TV Hebdo, Time Canada, Sélection du Reader's Digest, the French counterpart, Observer Country Guide, Legion, and Saturday Night, which recently suspended publication. Of course, these magazines in no way represent all magazines published in Canada.

I have no actual figures, but a guesstimate would put the Reader's Digest share of advertising placed in Canadian magazines somewhere about 6 per cent. That leaves out of the picture the advertising revenue placed in Canadian business publications, the whopping sum of $24,700,000. Take that figure and compare it to the figure for the newspaper industry, $427 million, in Canada. In West Germany it is $707 million, which really just tells us that in West Germany consumer magazines get about as much advertising as the newspapers and three times as much as television.

In Canada, consumer magazines earn a miserable one-fourteenth of the advertising loot. Someone has asked, "Why is this government presently spending, or having to spend thousands of taxpayers' dollars in persuading them to get off their fat backsides, out of their armchairs and into the playing fields of the nation?" Really, are all of us asleep while seemingly watching the government ruthlessly determining the efforts that we are now trying to make? I think that sometimes we are asleep. In this particular case I think we are asleep watching Bill C-58 go through to the detriment of many Canadians.

My friend, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart), to whom I have spoken about this bill has recommended some changes. He will present them later and I shall concur in them. I think they are worth noting. They would form the substance of an amendment which would read as follows:

Subsection 19(2) of the Income Tax Act be repealed (as proposed) and the following substituted therefor:

19. (2) An issue or edition of an issue of any newspaper or periodical shall be deemed, for the purposes of subsection (1), not to be an issue of a non-Canadian newspaper or periodical if it

(a) is edited and published in Canada and its publication functions—typesetting, platemaking, printing, circulation, advertising, customer service, treasury and administration—are conducted in Canada;

(b) is published by a Canadian corporation, proprietor, partnership or association incorporated or registered under the laws of Canada or one of its provinces;

(c) is either

(i) 75% Canadian-owned, or,

(ii) having a degree of Canadian ownership as defined in Section 257 of the Income Tax Act, publishes in Canada's two official languages;

(d) is policy-controlled by a board of directors, at least three-quarters of whom are Canadian citizens;

(e) is directed and wholly edited in Canada by a management and staff normally resident in Canada;

(f) grants complete freedom of editing to its editors in Canada subject only to copyright law;

(g) contains a proportion, excluding advertising matter, of editorial content to the extent of 30% or more which has not been previously published in a periodical outside Canada:

(h) encourages the development of editorial material about Canada which could have an international appeal outside Canadian borders.

Mr. Speaker, while I have not made the profound contribution to this debate that has been made by many other members, I hope that in some way I have at least provided some thought-provoking material for members on the government side of the House so that they might think about what they really are trying to do. I ask the members on the government side of the House to request the minister respond to some of these suggestions.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn). I agree with most of his remarks. There is perhaps one exception. When I look at page 9035 of Hansard for November 13, 1975, I find that when the government ram-rodded its closure motion through the House to deal with this matter with very little debate, indeed his name is found among those voting yea.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

● (1720)

Mr. McKinnon: It is always interesting to watch a new member come to this House filled with a sense of independence as a government backbencher. However, gradually he gets filed down until he votes nay or yea on orders from the front bench.

I received a great deal of correspondence, as has everyone else, on this contentious bill and I, like the hon. member for Kitchener, discounted a certain amount of it as having originated from the tear-sheet which was put out by Reader's Digest. But I was amazed at the number of people from my constituency who wrote separate letters to me. They did not send in the tear-sheet with "I am against it" written on the dotted lines. I have here several hundred letters and they are not second hand from Reader's Digest; they represent and effort by my constituents to tell me why they want Reader's Digest and, to a lesser extent, Time, maintained in Canada. I will give you an example of this type of letter, and in particular I will call your attention to one aspect in them. I have here one letter which reads as follows:

Reader's Digest is only one of its kind, always informative, always human, always in good taste—a most delightful magazine. I have not seen any magazine which can compare. If this is discontinued in Canada, we have only vulgarity left. I subscribed to several magazines this year which I felt would be interesting for my family. I have been shocked. Now when they arrive, I toss them in the garbage. I am no prude but there is a limit.

This theme runs through my correspondence. I began to notice it after the first few letters and have since looked at several magazines, Canadian and others. While the minister responsible for this travesty of a bill, this travesty of a democratic process, might not feel offended by the language which one sees used in too many magazines these days, many of my constituents are offended. They are offended by the kind of language in Maclean's and in a flood of other magazines from the pulp industry which can get into one's home, if one is not carefuly, via the newsstands. I do not think I am particularly prudish but sometimes it is beyond my comprehension why certain writers who have gained popularity find it impossible to express their opinions without the benefit of four letter words.

I have received several hundred letters, but from among them I should like to quote one delightful one which found its way to my desk on May 13, 1975. I presume it arrived on the desks of other members of parliament because it was addressed to all members of parliament and senators. It came from the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), and it read:

Dear Colleague,

Attached is my response to literally hundreds of letters from across Canada, primarily the west, opposing Hugh Faulkner's plan to rescind section 19(2) threatening the future of Reader's Digest and Time. This action, I feel, will also abrogate the right of advertisers, in our free enterprise system, to select the media through which to advertise. Only three of the letters favoured the Faulkner action.

I wish to quote from this letter at some length because, although I do not generally quote lengthy passages from letters, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway set out the advantages and disadvantages of the scheme quite fairly, and I would like to put it on the record. It is somewhat of a surprise to me, as it was to the hon. member for Kitchener. In this letter the hon. member said:

—I will continue my fight against the proposed action when it comes before the House of Commons—

Let me say again at this point that I was reading Hansard for last Thursday and I found that the hon. member was not present in the House when the vote was being taken, and she is not present here today. I know she was here earlier, but she was not in the House when the vote was taken. She went on to say:

—and if it comes before the Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts Committee.

In the second paragraph of her letter the hon. member wrote:

At the very time when free societies are being swallowed up in the communist thrust to achieve its proclaimed aim—world domination—this action is symbolic of a concerted effort to alienate an old and strong ally and Canada's closest friend, the United States. One wonders if we are not being used by the small but vocal Toronto-based anti-American clique.

That paragraph goes a little beyond what I would be prepared to say. It may be that a backbencher on the other side might think the government is inspired by communists, but I have never agreed with this thesis which was expressed by the hon. member when she said that free societies are being swallowed up in the communist thrust, and that this bill is symbolic of the concerted effort in that direction.

She went on to say:

Those who compare Reader's Digest with Playboy, Newsweek, the US News and World Report or other all-American publications are forgetting these publications did not offer or even try to provide ANY Canadian news or to set up offices in Canada or give jobs to Canadians.

I might say that from here on I agree with what the hon. member has said. She attached a letter which she used as a form letter to reply to her numerous constituents who wrote to her. It is undated. There is a blank space for the date and address to go in. This is what she wrote:

Thank you for writing to advise of your reaction to the announcement by the Honourable J. Hugh Faulkner, Secretary of State, that he intends to rescind section 19(2) of the Income Tax Act and its affect on Reader's Digest.

I expect they had proof readers at the newspaper where the hon. member used to work.

She went on:

I had been openly opposed to this step. It is discriminatory and unjust—a threat to the life of a first class landed (corporate) immigrant for more than 30 years. Not only has Reader's Digest provided jobs and writing opportunities to many Canadians within a small industry—magazine publishing—but more than any other magazine published in Canada, has provided features and news (mature and well researched) each month from all parts of Canada, linking this country.

I have already quoted the next lines which say that the hon. member will continue her fight against the proposed action when it comes before the House of Commons. This reminds me of the day when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he was going to start wrestling inflation to the ground, and said that if this was a wrestling match, we had already been cheated on our tickets when we came through the door although we got them for nothing. I am looking forward to seeing this fight continue.

The hon. member went on:

Your letter is one of many others that I will forward to the Prime Minister with my own statement of concern. He and other cabinet ministers are well aware of my position and it is with gratitude that I receive your letter to help prevent the demise of Reader's Digest in Canada.

There has been an attempt by certain people—in some cases misinformed and in other, deliberate distortion—to convince the public that Reader's Digest is subsidized by the government. This is not so. It is simply a case of allowing free choice of advertisers in Canada by which to sell a product.

Obviously if they are penalized because they want to advertise in the magazine of their choice, they will not necessarily turn to a new media; many could send it out of the country to Digest, USA, or to newspapers, television, Maclean's and Chatelaine already over-weight with advertising, as opposed to news and feature content.

I also feel, as citizens, we all have the right to choose the magazine we want to buy. I appreciate the fact that Reader's Digest provides Canadians, not only with a good balance of national material, but with universal and international subjects.

I also prefer Time over Newsweek, US News and World Report, etc. for the same reason; Time provides good, concise, objective record of international news along with well written, depth, packed reports of Canadian interest.

This letter went on explaining in quite some detail all the disadvantages of this bill.

● (1730)

I would ask hon. members to note particularly this paragraph where the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway continued:

Personally, as a writer, I fear the action to eliminate a market for writers and allied industries, especially beginners in this field. If Reader's Digest closes out in Canada, this could eliminate jobs in Vancouver and Montreal, lose $5.2 million in salaries for 450 Canadian employees (including $700,000 in fringe benefits and $600,000 in profit sharing); $22 million in trade with Canadian suppliers; $1.6 million in taxes; $3 million in first class postage (not counting the magazine distribution itself). The company has $8 million invested in office, printing presses, and other capital equipment in Canada.

There is always a ray of light in the Liberal party, it seems to me. For a space of time when members first come here they act as if they have minds of their own, and have not yet learned to check their independence of thought at the door. This is a first class example of the thinking of the hon. member as recently as last April.

I am not sure that I agree with the next paragraph although I have agreed with most of the points she made, particularly in the previous paragraph. She went on to say:

Unfortunately, a small pressure group under the guise of a "Committee for an Independent Canada", with vested interest in the publishing, are using this to eliminate competition. Without such competition—and quality this publication presents—certain magazine publishers will continue to sustain their mediocrity, if not deteriorate further. The Committee for an Independent Canada began with what seemed—on the surface—to have excellent objectives.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

These are her words, not mine. She continued:

However, now they are distorted—more anti-American than nationalistic. In either case, I think cultural nationalism in our present Global Village, is foolish, and immature in the last quarters of the 20th century.

I have, and will continue, to oppose any attempt to end the life and public responsibility of Reader's Digest in Canada.

That is a death shaking oath is it not? Unfortunately it apparently did not extend to November 13. The letter ends:

Thank you for your letter and the support for the continued life of a very vital segment of what I believe is important to Canadian national maturity.

Sincerely yours,

Simma Holt, M.P.
Vancouver-Kingsway.

I am pleased to register her true opinions in Hansard for her constituents and her party to know. I am sure she will be here tonight in spirit, if not in body.

The bill before us deals with three segments of the media—magazines, newspapers and television. We have heard a great deal about magazines, and rightly so, but it is likely to have an effect on newspapers as well. One wonders how some newspapers are going to have an 80 per cent Canadian content. With all the world-shaking events that occur I would suspect Canadians would want more than 20 per cent of their news to come from outside our borders.

One thinks of the Vietnam war and the Watergate crisis which happened concurrently. One wonders if any Canadian publication should be limited to 20 per cent of non-Canadian news at a time like that. I think we could run into a great deal of difficulty when we try to monitor or censor our newspapers and publications to comply with this arbitrary 80 per cent rule. It seems to have come about rather suddenly, and to be much higher than anyone had anticipated. People thought we would have a 51 per cent rule, or a 60 per cent rule. The weeks and months dragged by until it was too late for the main publishers to do anything about it. They were suddenly faced with the statement that it was 80 per cent, which made it almost impossible for them to comply.

Incidentally they have gone to considerable lengths to divest themselves of their foreign holdings of stock. Both companies have sincerely tried to get Canadian ownership of their companies up to the required level. For these types of magazines then to be faced with what, for them, is an insurmountable problem of 80 per cent ownership, is rather unfair.

When we speak of this cutting into their publications to tell them exactly what they can publish, I should like to remind hon. members that the Davey commission on the mass media warned of the administrative horrors of legislation that attempted to set Canadian editorial content requirements for the printed media. It is a rare thing for me to agree with Senator Keith Davey about anything, but I believe he knew something about publishing at one time in his life so he probably was correct when he said that would be an administrative horror and he would rather not have anything to do with it.

Various polls and surveys have been taken and I should like to quote one. According to a survey conducted by Canadian Facts, Inc., in January, 1975, of Canadian advertising executives, the Canadian publishing industry will not benefit substantially from the removal of tax advantages for advertising in Time and Reader's Digest. Only 19 per cent of the revenues freed by this measure will go to the publishing industry. Of this 19 per cent, 58 per cent will go to Maclean-Hunter publications.

Maclean-Hunter will effectively control at least half of the advertising revenue obtained by the magazine industry. It currently controls 42 per cent of the total. I think it is a very dangerous thing to have one magazine in Canada controlling far more than half the advertising revenue. We have seen the effect in other fields where we have monopoly enterprises. They would be able to control the price of the advertising that goes into that type of journal practically without opposition. I worry about the long range consequences. There would be no need for them to put out a decent magazine and to hold down the price of advertising. They would have a monopoly, and I think all of us would as soon avoid that.

Many of my constituents have written to me and every letter is exactly the same—I do not mean that literally but they stress the same points—they want to have their reading material cleaned up. They say such things as, "If the CBC is any comparison, if such a book did appear on the market shelves I would give it a try and if it matched the CBC standards, which I think are sick, I would never buy another one."

Another one asked me to use my influence to have them appeal this bill saying:

> I am in protest of this movement and ask that the Honourable J. Hugh Faulkner rescind the above-mentioned section.
>
> I am Canadian born and want this magazine as it is. I enjoy it—all of it! How narrow can Canadians become?

Mr. Woolliams: That is why he had to grow a beard—to cover up.

Mr. McKinnon: Another writer says:

> In my opinion, the Reader's Digest gives us very clean, intelligent, informative reading, with thoughts to ponder indeed. It is wonderfully honest and fair to all countries in the world, and is my main source of wide perspective.

Everybody in this world does not like the same thing, but the elitists on the other side of the House have a habit of thinking that what they like must be good for everyone. This is my first experience in three years in this House of being faced with closure. I do not look forward to them having chosen this—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): They do it in Britain all the time.

Mr. McKinnon: Does the hon. member for "St. Bonimouth" wish to take part in the debate?

Mr. Woolliams: "Bonimouth" is right!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I will.

Mr. McKinnon: I thank the hon. member for his interjection. As so often happens, it was made sitting down instead of standing up. We seldom hear him speak standing up.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): At least you can hear me.

Mr. McKinnon: I did not get the gist of what the hon. member had to say.

An hon. Member: You did not miss anything.

Mr. McKinnon: I thought he had reformed when they made him whip. The extra money he gets for that job seemed to have a salutary effect on him, and I thought it was money well spent if it kept him quiet, but I guess we cannot be lucky in every respect.

● (1740)

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) delighted me with his courage because in speaking for my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), he proved himself a very brave man indeed. Without question she can speak for herself, and there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that she will when she returns from the battle of British Columbia.

An hon. member opposite said recently during the debate that this is a bill affecting fundamental civil liberties in this country. It seems to me that the hon. member was somewhat heated over a simple amendment to the Income Tax Act.

This debate began with hon. members opposite making valid points, with many of which I agreed. But as the days wore on, something happened to my opponents opposite. The clouds began to gather; they became bigger, darker and heavier, and suddenly we began to hear obfuscation and then suggestions of a cover-up. We heard another big word, censorship. When that was uttered it created the biggest cloud of all. Indeed, we even heard of the burning of books! But I will not continue in this vein because I would be making complex something which is very simple.

Bill C-58 seeks simply to remove the special tax advantages currently enjoyed by Time and Reader's Digest magazines and certain foreign broadcasters, and that is all. This is an important issue, and I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the government's reasons for its proposed action.

In this country we happen to have a law called the Income Tax Act, section 19(2), of which permits the deduction, as a business expense, of advertising placed by Canadian companies in Time, Reader's Digest, and certain foreign television stations. The federal government proposes to remove this privilege so that advertising placed by Canadian companies in all non-Canadian magazines will no longer be tax deductible.

This is not a new policy. In 1965 the federal government passed similar legislation but decided to exempt Time and Reader's Digest—I believe in tribute to the good corporate citizenship of Reader's Digest on the one hand and, no doubt, to the outstanding corporate muscle of the giant Time. In a sense the 1965 legislation discriminated in favour of these two magazines, exempting them from the regulations which affected every other non-Canadian magazine.

What happened to the magazines affected by that 1965 legislation? Did they evaporate? Did they disappear, as hon. members opposite would have us believe that Time and Reader's Digest will disappear? No. They are all still available in Canada, either on the newsstands or by subscription, in exactly the same way as Time and Reader's Digest will continue to be. They will be as available and widely read in Canada once the proposed legislation comes into effect as the honest competition of Canadian publications given an infusion of advertising dollars will allow.

The government's action will not put Reader's Digest and Time out of business. It will simply remove from them their artificial status as Canadian magazines and the financial advantages accruing to them from that status. Discontinuing their Canadian content is not the same as removing these magazines from circulation in Canada. Both magazines will still be freely available and, as I said, Canadians will still be able to subscribe to Reader's Digest or to Time.

May I now read one of the many letters I have received in favour of this legislation, to answer the parade of Tory speakers who implied that only negative views were brought to our attention. The writer of the letter says:

> I most certainly am not in favour of Reader's Digest and Time magazine receiving preferential treatment. I sincerely hope that Hugh Faulkner does not 'give in' to the request of these two publications.
>
> Before I left for central America, I subscribed to Time magazine, hoping to receive news of Canada. When Time arrived, it was the U.S. version with the Canadian section omitted. I wrote Time complaining but received no answer.
>
> I also hope the women are able to get some just laws enacted.
>
> Good luck.

Mr. Paproski: Who?

Mrs. Campagnolo: She was referring to women members of this House.

Mr. Paproski: Read another letter.

Mrs. Campagnolo: The federal government has, in introducing this legislation, weighed the economic and cultural value of the Canadian content of these magazines against their economic and cultural drawbacks. It has been decided that, in economic terms, the money the magazines and television stations on the border spend in Canada does not outweigh the revenue gained for them by their special status and, in cutural terms, that the contributions they have made do not outweigh the stifling effect their dominant position has on Canadian magazines. Development of new broadcasting outlets in this country is similarly stifled.

Having made this assessment the government has decided to remove the special legislation which discriminated in favour of the two magazines. This is a decision which, as I said earlier, has been deliberately clouded by hon. members opposite with the absolutely outrageous distortion created by their false and misleading introduction of the idea of censorship.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite were trying to describe this debate with one word. I must say some of them were very witty. Let me try to coin a capsule description, as a new and inexperienced member who has not yet learned to keep her mouth shut. Let me say that irresponsibility is the word which comes to mind to describe, in capsule form, the remarks of hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: "Irresponsibility" is the only word applicable for such careless manipulation of the public mind. No one is judging the merits of these publications, as to wholesomeness or lack of it; no one is talking about offensive broadcasting. There is no question of censorship in all this.

Hon. members may recall that several years ago the government imposed regulations, similar in intent, on recorded music in Canada. I was a member of the organization of broadcasters who were involved at that time; I was involved with the broadcasting industry and I assure you we struggled as mightily, as ferociously as do Time and Reader's Digest today, because we were sure we should be totally annihilated by the government's "iniquitous" rule. Do you know what happened? There are actually people who profited by the government's decision. There are now Canadian producers in this country, and talented Canadians who are making their names in this country, and not across the border.

When the government imposed those regulations on the broadcasting industry of this country there was considerable concern. But that concern was met head on, just as the present concern will be met. However, in fairness to Canadian content legislation, I must say that it has not prevented our hearing American music or any other music. And we have gone a long way to creating a strong Canadian recording industry in both classical and popular music fields, and to developing Canadian talent. I am convinced that the same will happen in the next few years to our Canadian magazine industry, our writers, publishers and broadcasters, without causing distress to readers of Time and Reader's Digest, or viewers of border stations; and I am speaking of stations which were originally set up to serve some other commercial market than ours.

One member of the official opposition yesterday intoned stentorially on Wednesday that "if they can't hack it on merit alone, it's too bad." He spoke of merit alone. Mr. Speaker, if one company can project a profit of $8 million from Canada alone this year, merit alone is not involved. How does merit alone involve the Canadian station just starting, out and anaemic from lack of money, because it cannot attract the required advertising dollars, the border stations having attracted all the business?

For a moment let us look at the broadcasting industry. Large, slick, American border stations erected scant miles from the major southern metropolises of this country cynically and deliberately planned to do one thing—make a healthy profit. There is nothing wrong with a healthy profit. What is wrong is that our tax act has enhanced that profit.

In this case the words of hon. members must be examined in the context, say, of KVOS-TV, a station situated near Vancouver, B.C. It is, in all respects, a decent corporate citizen, and honourable entity, in addition to being an appreciated signal within our borders. Its audience ratings are fantastic. Its BBM'S read like magic-time. I like KVOS, but I would like it much better if it were CFOS or CKOS, or if its communication letters were of any Canadian designation and subject to the regulations of the CRTC, not the FCC, however honourable that body and KVOS may be.

● (1750)

Why do I feel strongly about this matter of television access? Why am I concerned, for example, that KVOS projects such a large profit this year, even if they have proposed to share half that profit with the emerging new station in Vancouver, Western Approaches Broadcasting, should the KVOS proposal be accepted?

Let us talk about places in this country that cannot luxuriate in multi-channel television access. Unfortunately there are still many parts of this nation that have no access to radio, let alone television. There are some that have no access at all and others who have one channel. At best they may have two. They have created together a transmitter which they have put on a mountain top and which receives a signal sometimes five times transmitted. This has been done by ordinary people like we are, or should be. These people cannot gain access for one reason. Access is not available because there are not sufficient funds in the broadcasting industry of this nation.

How can hon. members expect a person such as myself, who represents thousands of people without access to television broadcasting, and similarly hundreds who have not even radio, to get disturbed about someone who has access to ten or 12 channels? I can get disturbed, however, about that amount of advertising dollars given to a foreign television station when the people who sent me here are seeking primary access to broadcasting, access which has been denied due to revenue creeping across the border. Those dollars, all of them, belong here in Canada, enhancing the opportunities of Canadian broadcasters presently in operation and, it is to be hoped, new and enterprising groups of broadcasters in the future who will add to the Canadian cultural dimension in every corner of our country.

I hope to live long enough even to see the day when our children's and our role patterns will reflect something that is more Canadian then Rhoda, Maude, Phyllis, and Mary Tyler Moore. In respect to the hon. minister who is in charge of the status of women in this country, who has just entered the chamber, I will bow to the other gender and trust that future legislators will ensure other role models than Kojak, Petrocelli, McCloud and all the rest of those violent men, who inhabit our TV, but that is another question.

This is a simple matter, my fellow members. Magazines and broadcasters presently obtain tax privileges without being subject to any of the criteria of Canadian magazines. Foreign broadcasters can obtain special tax privileges without the slightest nod to the CRTC. Here I refute what was said by a member opposite, that special privileges do not exist. Special privileges exist, as in no other country on this earth, for two magazines and some border broadcasters of a foreign nation. In my opinion, we owe it to Canadians to change that injustice to them.

Because this is a very complex issue I wish to make a couple of final remarks. I do not want to leave any doubt in the minds of members opposite. The contribution made by Reader's Digest is appreciated; however, Canada has finally grown up and must have its own advertising dollars to continue growing in publishing and broadcasting. The government has no intention of doing away with, or unfairly penalizing, Time and Reader's Digest, and as for border television stations I submit they made their hay while the sun shone. The government's intention, as I have stated, is simply to remove them from an artificial tax advantage which they have enjoyed since 1965—which is awarded by no other country in the world—and to provide encouragement to the Canadian magazine industry and Canadian broadcasters.

I wish to make a last, simple, unclouded statement. Canadian firms advertising in Canadian magazines are allowed, in calculating income tax, to deduct advertising costs up to 100 per cent. Under the present law they can do the same for the cost of their advertisements in Time and Reader's Digest, which are foreign magazines. The government proposes to eliminate the latter deduction. The government has recommended to the House a similar amendment to the effect that no deduction against income be permitted for advertising time on any non-Canadian broadcasting station for an advertisement directed primarily to a market in Canada. These are very simple solutions to the clouds of protest that we have experienced these last few days.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether my clouds will be thunder, rain, or snow. I agree with a lot of the comments of the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo), but I must take exception to at least two. One is the distress over the part of the legislation having to do with "substantially different". The hon. member said that this bill only amends the amount of ownership that is required to become a Canadian magazine. The amendment is to the Income Tax Act. In the Income Tax Act it says "substantially different". The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) said that the substantially different part would be 80 per cent. It is to that we are objecting.

The other part is censorship, a word used by the hon. member. It is necessary that I repeat what the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) stated about the word censorship. He said, and I quote:

> Perhaps the most overworked and misunderstood word in this entire debate has been censorship. I have listened to the charges and countercharges over this particular word and this particular issue. The minister and the government in defending the bill have repeatedly stated that censorship is not being employed as part of government policy.
>
> The government is correct in saying that the regulations in the strictest terms are not censorship, and yet it is their attitude and their response to the charge of censorship that alarms me and, frankly, should alarm all Canadian people.

This should not be taken out of context. It must be kept in context. The people of Canada are of the opinion that this amendment will eliminate Time and Reader's Digest from the market. They are afraid of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Next the minister will want to get rid of multiculturalism.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Schellenberger: I have sparked some interest. I am pleased. The people of Canada do not understand these special privileges. They believe that Reader's Digest and Time have some special privileges over and above Canadian publications. That is not the case. They have special privileges as foreign publications. This has been stated time and again in this debate. It cannot be mentioned often enough.

My objection is to the content rule that has been laid down by the Minister of National Revenue and brought into this debate. Citizenship is O.K., but personally I disagree with the content rule. I have received many hundreds of letters, as I am sure other hon. members have, particularly from people concerned about Reader's Digest.

I sent out a questionnaire. One question was: "Do you support the government's proposal to abolish the special tax provisions for businesses advertising in Time and Reader's Digest?" Thirty-nine per cent said yes, 35 per cent said no, and 21 per cent were not sure. To me this means that the majority of people in my riding—and I would say they are average Canadians—are not sure what this bill will do, particularly to Reader's Digest which they hold so dear.

● (1800)

Many members have read letters into the record. I should like to read one from an old-timer in my riding. He says:

> Many years ago a friend subscribed to the Reader's Digest for us. This was before there was a Canadian edition. The friend has long since passed on but we have continued to keep up our subscription over the years.
>
> I feel that if the Canadian government now discriminates against this publication they are showing a small-time attitude. Are we as Canadians trying to isolate ourselves from the rest of the world? Are we trying to crawl into a gopher hole? It is quite a contrast to the place we have been taking in the affairs of the world. Hope you will do what you can to put down this small-time act.

The writer is concerned that Reader's Digest will no longer be in his mailbox at the end of the month. He is concerned also about our attitude toward world affairs. If we follow the 80 per cent guideline with regard to content, shall we be truly reporting world affairs in an objective way?

I do not believe we can help the Canadian publishing industry by making it so difficult for our strongest publications to exist. They may have to leave. The government's proposals do not guarantee that Canadian publications will take over the area vacated, in particular by Time in the area of world affairs.

I express concern too over the future of such publications as medical magazines, and magazines on agricultural research, for example. It seems to me that the 80 per cent content rule is unduly harsh. Any restriction based on content is wrong, in my opinion. Should I, as a Canadian entrepreneur, wish to publish a magazine containing, let us say, certain articles on agriculture from the United States I should be allowed to do so because my future will depend on whether people want to buy it. There ought to be no restriction on the basis of content. It is dangerous. It is a form of muzzling the press, and it may lead to very narrow reporting.

[Mr. Paproski.]

Then again it seems ridiculous for Canadian writers to be sent to other parts of the world to report various events, particularly when other magazines already have reporters in those areas. Have Canadian magazines the money to do this. Surely, however, it is within their scope to send reporters to write special articles on events of particular interest to Canadians.

There are other questions yet to be answered. If a Canadian publication hires a non-Canadian, does it mean that the report he writes is a Canadian Report? If an event is reported by a foreigner and is subsequently edited in Canada, is that report considered to be Canadian? How is it possible objectively to determine what is Canadian and what is not when it comes to words written on a piece of paper? We must object to this requirement based on 80 per cent Canadian content.

The main concern of the people of Canada is that they will not get Reader's Digest in their mail boxes at the end of the month although it is a publication they enjoy, and have enjoyed for many years. We in the opposition must see to it that this publication continues and that the 80 per cent rule is debated at length and, hopefully, amended.

Before I conclude I wish to quote a few words by Mr. LaRue of Time Canada, because I happen to agree with them.

> News is what actually happens and you can't make it 80 per cent different by official decree. It must be admitted that the mere selection of news is manipulation of a sort, in which all publications indulge—and I can only plead that professional editorial decisions are more likely to serve the interest of the public's right to know than news selection by official decree.

I shall end by quoting two paragraphs of a newspaper article by Charles Lynch:

> As a reluctant member of the Association of Radio and Television Artists I can tell him (the minister) that the activities of this union, in its efforts to close our orders to foreign talent, are self-serving in the extreme, and may well be contrary to the public interest.
>
> As a member of the reading public I can take note of the fact that our bookstalls are increasingly filled with Canadian publications, and that many of them are raucous pamphlets disguised as literature, or just junk. It's a question of whether homebrew junk is better for us than the imported variety.

It should be our duty to help Canadian authors and Canadian magazines to put quality magazines on the newsstands, but I cannot agree we shall accomplish this by alterating the status of Time or Reader's Digest as is being proposed or, in particular, by bringing in an 80 per cent content rule.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Blais: May we call it 6.30 p.m., Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There does not seem to be agreement with the suggestion made by the hon. parliamentary secretary, so unless other members wish to speak it is my duty at this time to put the question to the House. The question is on the motion in the name of Mr. Sharp.

All those in favour will please say, yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

● (1810)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Pursuant to the order made earlier this day a division on this motion is deferred until 9.30 p.m.

Mr. Blais: May I now call it 6.30, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary. Shall I call it 6.30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 6.12 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF POSTAL WORKERS

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Leave having been granted to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) to move the adjournment of the House pursuant to Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the continuing absence of postal service which is creating hardship for all Canadians.

Accordingly, the motion is as follows: The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, seconded by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley), moves:

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, first of all I should like to inform the House that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), the chairman of this party's caucus committee on the Post Office, is progressing well after undergoing open heart surgery last week. He will soon be out of the intensive care unit and I am sure that all hon. members would like to wish him well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): I should also like to express my hope that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) is again in good health. I am sure he has been spending long hours in his attempts to get the mail moving again. In spite of the implication by the Globe and Mail that I was somehow responsible for bringing on the spasms that the minister suffered in the chamber last Friday, I can assure the minister that we on this side do not want to see his health suffer. The fact remains, however, that his attempts to restore postal service have failed, and the mail is still piled up all over the country.

Thinking of mail that is piling up, I am reminded of the countless bags of mail that have been carted to storage places in many parts of the parliament buildings. I am also reminded of the first paragraph of my twelfth news letter to constituents, which was dated October 30. It begins:

As I write this letter, I have no idea when it may be delivered to you because once again the labour problems in the Public Service of Canada have caused the movement of mail to grind to a halt.

Still quoting:

If these words have a familiar ring, it is because they are a direct quotation from my newsletter of February 21, 1975!

I have heard some incredible figures on the number of work stoppages there have been in the past months or years, and since I do not have exact figures before me perhaps I can ask hon. members to recall the last time that they remember a year free of labour problems in the Post Office.

Of course the problems are not restricted to the Post Office. Department of Labour statistics just received for July indicate that in that month there were 273 work stoppages in existence in Canada. The cumulative man days lost in 1975 to date were 4,700,000. Of those nearly 10 per cent, or 409,000 man days lost, were in the federal jurisdiction.

The official opposition has been sensitive to the problems of the postal situation. We have been keeping abreast of developments, and last October 20 when the strike began, and after the Postmaster General had become directly involved in the negotiations, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris asked for an indication of progress. Already the minister's feelings were showing through as he made reference in his reply to the "unrealistic attitude of the negotiating team". How sensitive a remark is that, I would ask?

The official opposition has also been sensitive to the problems of the customers of the Post Office. Nearly every day since the postal service ground to a halt four weeks ago we in the official opposition have been asking when the suffering users of the mails could expect action from their government. We were sensitive to the needs of those who receive their incomes and revenues by mail, to the needs of those whose jobs would be terminated because of disruptions in trade and commerce. We were sensitive to the needs of the elderly who rely on the mails for bill paying and needed outside communication, and to the needs of businessmen, large and small, who lost orders and now face the prospect of bankruptcy.

If you can ignore the impact on the Christmas season, with the lack of greetings and parcels in Canada, think of the loss of mail exchange with other countries, with its serious consequences of the present and its potentially permanent loss of trade. Think of the international embarrassment.

The other day the minister was suggesting that I was trying to make political hay out of an embarrassing situation. Well, Madam Speaker, I think it is an embarrassing situation. It should be more embarrassing for the government, but it is certainly embarrassing to me as a Canadian.

A friend of mine who lived in Paris a year or two ago found that even then the French were laughing at the Canadian postal situation. The feeling was that a country that cannot keep its Post Office operating cannot gain much respect. I wonder, if it is any wonder, that Canada was not invited to the economic summit conference at Rambouillet in France. Or perhaps the invitation was mailed.

I heard it said on the CBC news tonight that the opposition had been paying little attention to the postal situation for the past four weeks. Apparently we are now just coming to life. I should like to ask hon. members whether the record of 44 questions put by members of the official opposition during the past four weeks would support that.

● (2010)

An hon. Member: Don't believe everything you read or hear from the CBC.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Only during four days since the postal strike began were there no questions in respect of the Post Office posed from this side of the House. At least three motions have been put by members of the opposition in the same period, the last one resulting in this emergency debate tonight.

It may be interesting to note at this stage that this is the third time this year a motion under Standing Order 26 for an emergency debate has been accepted by the Chair. The first one was in March, presented by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser); the second was in April, presented by the hon. members for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) and Joliette (Mr. La Salle) simultaneously. Those motions both involved work stoppages. The first was at west coast ports and involved a stoppage which put an end to all grain deliveries to foreign countries. The other one involved a work stoppage at St. Lawrence River ports which put an end to the movement of feed grains.

Instances will be recalled in past years of parliament being recalled or called upon to end labour disputes, such as in respect of the railway strike in 1973. I deplore the use of parliament as a labour court and I do not advocate that tonight. What I hope is achieved by this debate is an awareness of how the government has failed to act in any effective way to restore postal services. Let us see how sensibly the government has reacted during the strike. As of now the government has walked away from the bargaining table, and the Postmaster General has stated that there is nothing more to negotiate.

No action has been taken to end the work stoppage, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), although admitting that parliament must intervene at some time, has declined to make the decision that the public disservice caused by the strike outweighs the freedom of the right to strike itself. I should like to be able to canvass the country on that question. I think we would get some very interesting questions answered. But of course there is no way the ordinary Canadian can communicate with his government with this situation that exists at the moment.

Let me refer to several remarks made by the Prime Minister and other members on the government side. I would refer first of all to the Prime Minister's remarks in Winnipeg on October 21. The postal strike had not even begun at that time when the Prime Minister was asked:

[Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra).]

Would you say categorically that postal workers will get no more by striking than they would if they don't strike?

The Prime Minister replied:

Yes, that's right. Whether they strike or not, and whether we make an agreement with them that is a little higher or a little lower, it will be referred to the Anti-Inflation Board in any case and they will judge if the government is acting within the guidelines.

He went on toward the end of this paragraph by stating:

If they get a wage which is higher than the guidelines, it's going to be taken away from them by way of taxes anyhow.

A few days later in Toronto, on October 24, the Prime Minister was asked what alternatives there are for the settlement of the postal situation, and he said:

Well, we've made that quite clear. The Postmaster General . . . has made that clear on behalf of the government. We've made them an offer which we think is fair, which is more than the 12 per cent because the bargaining has been going on for ten months and because historically they were on a par with the other half of the union and we said: "We think that under the exceptions provided for in the guidelines, we can give you more than the 12 per cent, a little bit more. If we're wrong, the Anti-Inflation Board will knock us down but we think we can."

I refer to those two statements because I think this illustrates that, whatever action the government takes, the buck is going to be passed along to the Anti-Inflation Board.

Let me refer to some answers made in this House during the last few weeks. The theme has always been that the government does not want to take any action. Certainly there has been enough urging from this side of the House.

On October 27 the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) was asked whether the government had decided on the length of time the postal strike would be allowed to go on, and the answer given by the Acting Prime Minister was no. He was then asked whether any settlement reached in the current negotiations would be subject to the approval of the Anti-Inflation Board, and the Acting Prime Minister replied:

—that will be the law as soon as this legislation has been approved by this parliament.

There is no conflict there. The next day the Acting Prime Minister said it was the government's view that postal workers should resume work when the settlement is reached. That was in response to a question asking whether the government might consider back-to-work legislation.

The government has been consistent in one position. The Prime Minister and the Postmaster General have often repeated that they have no intention of taking action to end this stoppage.

It is not usual for the opposition to provide solutions to the government's problems, but very often people ask us what we would do. Of course what we would do is not really relevant because we are not the government, and it is the government that must solve its own problems.

An hon. Member: It is very easy to understand why you are over there and you will stay there.

Mr. Stanfield: Just quieten down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Let me present one or two ideas to gentlemen on the other side. It is only fair, when the government demonstrates its inability to come to grips with problems, that we should adopt a fair attitude and give some ideas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): The best solution we could probably give, and this would follow from remarks that have been made, is that a secret ballot be held under the supervision of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. The Prime Minister indicated earlier this month that such an idea deserved some consideration and he would be willing to give it that consideration at some time, but we do not know when that will be.

A more practical solution, in my view, would be to pass back-to-work legislation. This would provide for the continuation of negotiations, and perhaps arbitration. I know a joint committee is expected to report on the right to strike in essential services before too many weeks have passed.

Back-to-work legislation has a number of advantages. First, it would restore services to post office customers. It would restore labourers' wages and take the heat off the postal workers and their families, especially now with the approaching Christmas season. It would allow negotiations to continue without either side having to worry about saving face. In fact I am unable to find any argument which would lead me to believe that back-to-work legislation would be intolerable.

Another suggestion is that the government could grant more money. The Postmaster General has refused to do this, and I understand his reasoning behind that refusal. However, I think it is well documented that whatever settlement is offered and accepted will go to the Anti-Inflation Board for approval. I think that has been amply assured by the remarks of the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General.

I have another suggestion which I think should be explored. We should not follow our old practices just by force of habit. The government should consider altering section 8 of the Post Office Act. This section gives the Postmaster General the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting, conveying, and delivering letters within Canada. This should be changed to allow others to share in the privilege of performing this service. This is not the first time the suggestion has been made.

On April 25, 1974—there was no postal strike at that time—I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House concerning a postal disruption, of all things. The motion was:

● (2020)

That this House give immediate consideration to taking whatever action is necessary to repeal the grant of monopoly to the Canada Post Office in order to allow private enterprisers to offer competitive service, thereby giving the people of Canada the opportunity, in a genuinely free and competitive market, to buy postal services they need from the most efficient supplier thereof.

I remember that day because it was the only time in my three years in this House that I was able to raise the then leader of the New Democratic Party right off his seat to shout "No". Before anyone thinks this is something I am making up and that it is a silly idea, I should like to say I do have a little support.

I think there are other things such as telephone services and radio services that are provided not only by governments but also by private enterprise. Barron's, a financial weekly in the United States, recently made a contrast on the performance of the United States Post Office and the privately owned Bell telephone companies. They noted that the per worker volume in the United States postal service increased by 56 per cent over the same period in which the Bell telephone companies had increased their performance by 169 per cent. It is also pointed out that while first-class postal rates have gone up by 400 per cent, Bell's long-distance rates have been cut by up to 50 per cent. It is also pointed out that the Post Office in the United States drained off $23 billion from tax revenues during the same period that the Bell telephone companies had put $54 billion into public coffers through tax payments.

I think the moral is that Ottawa and Washington should give serious consideration to how to relieve the taxpayers of the terrible burden they are presently being called upon to carry. I do not expect the government will pay too much attention to the solutions I am putting forward with some feeling tonight; however, the purpose of my remarks and this debate is to see whether the government side will finally appreciate, through the efforts of the official opposition and the help we offer them, that the people of Canada want their postal service restored. They deserve to have it restored. It is time the government did something. It is the government which must make the decision.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Madam Speaker, the member from my neighbouring riding says, "Quit picking on him". I do not need to say that. Considering the views of the majority of the Conervative and Liberal members, I think I would find myself in an abnormal position if they were not attacking me or, as he says, picking on me. I do not mind being in that position.

Before I come to the highly bizarre motion moved by the Progressive Conservative party this afternoon, I should like to say that the postal strike is an extremely serious and troublesome matter. It causes inconvenience for the vast majority of Canadians. No one would question that. It causes more than inconvenience for people who depend on pension cheques, people who depend on welfare cheques and people who depend on family allowance cheques. For all such people it is more than an inconvenience; it involves real hardship. There can be no question about that.

If the "experts" on labour matters to my right—the Conservatives—will be quiet, I will continue. In addition to these groups, small businessmen throughout the country have found themselves in an extremely precarious situation. There is no question about that. If I may say so, the postal workers know this also. I think it is very important for us to recognize that they are workingmen and women in this country who have the legal right to strike given to them by this parliament. A conservative member says, "By mistake". Presumably that represents the position of the Conservative party. The truth is that they have that right and, as is the case with other workers, they ought to have the right to exercise it, if it means anything.

At a certain point in any strike, whether it is in the public or private sector, the public harm being done might well outweigh, in terms of responsibility, the right to strike itself and we may find ourselves at some point in the difficult position of having to support or, in the case of the government, having to recommend back to work legislation. However, this is something which should not be done lightly if we respect the rights of the workers in this country as well as the rights of the public.

Having said that, I want to come to the immediate situation in terms of the trade union and the Post Office authority negotiations. There can be no doubt there is now a deadlock, that progress is not being made. Equally, there can be no doubt that it is desirable that progress be made both for the public good and for the workers' good. In so far as those of us in parliament can judge, it appears that any contribution we make should not be one of interfering in a negative way in the collective bargaining process. Hopefully, suggestions will be made which will lead to a mutually agreeable solution.

I regard as a serious mistake the motion moved by the Progressive Conservative party this afternoon, supported by the government, which said that the the postal workers involved would have to reconsider their answer or reject the proposal made by the government and rejected by their bargaining committee. I find that is not a good approach. I say this in all seriousness to the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey). I shall be interested to hear what he has to say in the debate.

In respect of the traditional action of the employer who does not bargain in good faith, there is always an attempt to undermine the democratically elected negotiating team which is responsible to its employees. Normally, this attempt comes from the employer and not openly from the politicians. They try to say that the membership will reject its leaders. I say that because this motion would have led to putting to the membership a proposal, on parliament's initiative, which would represent only the government's position. This would be unfair to the collective bargaining process and therefore would be inappropriate. Quite apart from that, I wish the mover of the motion had checked the law and the authority of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, because it has no jurisdiction to conduct the procedures required by the motion and, of course, the CLC did not give its approval to be included in this motion. So the motion was wrong procedurally and wrong in substance. In short, it was destructive of effecting a settlement, and that is why I did not hesitate to make it clear, regardless of short run public reaction, that I thought it was a mistake, and I do not back down from that at all.

● (2030)

I was in the process this afternoon of making a suggestion to which I hope the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) will listen—if I could only get the attention of hon. members—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. At the present time the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has the floor and he should be allowed to complete his speech.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Broadbent: During the question period I made a suggestion to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which, I was pleased to see, he did not categorically reject. He said that he did not think the steps I suggested, and upon which I will elaborate now, need be categorically rejected in terms of being useful at any time, but he said they would not be useful now. I should like to make the following proposal to the Postmaster General, with the additional emphasis that it be done now and that we do not wait any longer.

I would like to ask the Postmaster General to get in touch as soon as possible with the postal workers to agree mutually upon a single mediator who could be called in now. Clearly we need such a person because, both in terms of the issues at stake and in terms of a certain personality conflict, I think—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Just a minute. I think we need someone who could deal with the issues and bring the conflicting personalities together. Second, this mediator would have the task of bringing the two sides together to try immediately to get a mutually agreeable series of propositions. Third, after 72 hours, if there has not been an agreement reached by the two sides, the mediator would publish his set of recommendations. Fourth, these published recommendations, after the 72 hour period if no agreement is reached, would be considered by the government and by the trade union negotiators. If no agreement is reached by a mediator, these proposals would then be submitted to the membership of the union for their consideration together with their trade union negotiating team's recommendation as to whether the membership should or should not accept the mediator's proposal.

It seems to me that that would be a constructive move at this time because it would not force acceptance upon the trade union membership of a set of proposals that their democratically elected membership has rejected. For me it has a very important element of fairness in it in that it recognizes—and I want to say something very briefly about the details of the points that are still in dispute—the possibility during the next 72 hours of getting a mutually agreeable solution, and that of course would be the best one by far because there are quite a number of clauses that are not in agreement yet.

The minister knows that once you get rid of the trivial matters there are, relatively speaking, a handful of issues at stake and I submit that concerning the handful of major issues at stake the positions of both sides are not radically different, that the two sides are not far apart on the important questions. Therefore, I suggest that the mediator could play a constructive role in trying to bring these people together.

What are a few of the basic issues that seem to be worthy of consideration, and worthy of some move both on the part of the Post Office and on the part of the union? First of all, there is the union's concern for a reduction in the work week. What the union wants is not something that is new; it is something that is possessed by many workers, in Canada, and indeed it is possessed in principle by over 60 per cent of the federal public employees. What they want is to reduce the work week from 40 to 35 hours. The government will not budge, but I repeat that over 60 per cent of public employees in Canada now have 37½ hours. That at least is a position somewhere between what the government is offering now to the postal workers and what the union itself wants. It is surely something in which a mediator could play a useful role.

Second, the trade union is concerned that the mail handlers' salaries be improved. I ask you, Madam Speaker, and I appeal to members of parliament to consider the point they are making here. There are approximately 2,500 mail handlers as compared to some 18,500 postal clerks. At present the mail handlers—that very small minority of the total—get some 36 cents an hour less than the postal clerks.

What the postal workers want is to remove that disparity between the two sets of workers involved in essentially the same activity, and it seems to me that that is a very reasonable request. They want for that very small group of 2,500 workers, to remove that 36 cent an hour differential which exists between them and the 18,500 postal clerks. I say that in terms of equity and fairness it seems a reasonable proposition, and that in terms of the cost to the Treasury it is infinitesimally small. So again I say that there is surely a role for a mediator to play. In terms of what the union wants it seems to me that a good case could be made for going all the way, but at least we could move some way in that direction.

Third, there is the COLA clause. The government, as hon. members may know—I am sure the Conservatives have looked at all the details with great care and consideration as they usually do in such matters—in terms of its COLA clause proposals will give 1 cent an hour for every 4 per cent increase in the consumer price index up to a total of 10 cents for three months.

The point I am making on the COLA clause is that the ceiling the government is putting on that clause should be removed, and I think it should be removed for other employees as well. Why have that cap on at all? As a general proposition it seems to me that it is good not to have a ceiling on it, but in particular in the context of the government's anti-inflation program, if it is going to be successfull, as it claims it will be in reducing the cost of living next year, it has absolutely nothing to fear in terms of the COLA clause proposal of the postal workers. So if its other government policy is successful, it will not lose a cent in removing the cap on the COLA clause. Again it seems to me that that is an item on which a mediator could contribute some advice to both sides.

There are two other issues, but I do not think I will go into details on them. I will simply assert that on the long service pay issue, and on the equal pay for part-time and full-time employees issues, the positions separating the union and the government are not wide apart.

If you look at all these major issues which separate the two parties—major in terms of their concern—you will find two things. First, they are few in number and, second, the distance between the Post Office on the one hand and the postal workers on the other is not great. It therefore seems to me, Madam Speaker, that the proposal I am making tonight for my party, namely, for the appointment of a mediator who would be given a 72-hour mandate to try to bring the two groups together, in the public interest, and to agree on something on a voluntary basis, is reasonable. If they do not agree, the mediator would then publish his own recommendations so that the public could make some judgment about the government's attitude and also, in fairness in terms of respecting the impartial nature of the mediator, the proposals should be sent to the trade union membership along with their own bargaining committee's assessment of them.

● (2040)

I think this proposal has a chance of working. I do not want to claim any more than that. It would interfere in a minimal way with the collective bargaining process, and perhaps would have a chance of getting the Post Office back into operation and the postal workers back to work under conditions they might find acceptable.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) for having moved this motion to adjourn to discuss that famous issue of the postal strike, whose study is essential and whose settlement is urgent for all Canadians.

For many years, we have been tackling disastrous strikes, more especially in the civil service. Why? Because we have forgotten the main thing, Madam Speaker, and personally, I have always been convinced that we have been elected to this House to protect the rights of the majority in Canada.

Now in this postal strike, a group of workers, whether they are 20,000, 22,000 or more, are trampling the right of 23 million Canadians to a postal service. The government should therefore require compliance with this right and refrain from walking on a tightrope. On one hand, we hear labour leaders repeat that the minister does not want to resume negotiations while the Postmaster General stated once again today in the House that he is always ready to negotiate.

In all this muddle, who is right and who is wrong? Will government try once more to sit on the fence while avoiding to take the steps that are called for the return to work and that would settle all these disputes once and for all, by creating an arbitration board granted with all appropriate powers of decision.

When will the government cease to make the public pay for its listlessness and its lack of leadership? Why not take a direct action to create and develop suitable and permanent mechanisms to ensure that such crises will not recur continually?

In the Post Office, more than anywhere else, especially in the large centres, due to the number of unions operating inside the postal service, one day we have the truck drivers' strike, another day that of the letter carriers, today it is the postal workers. It is an endless succession of strikes, and that has been going for many years, Madam Speaker.

Who is victimized by all these strikes? The Canadian public. Who could in fact settle all these strikes? None other than the government and union leaders, because they are the ones who have the ability to settle these strikes within the civil service. Madam Speaker, I suggest the government is more than any body responsible for all these strikes which are causing the Canadian economy to deteriorate. We have suggested to the government on a number of occasions the logical and equitable way to clean up relations within the civil service.

But the government prefers to play the political game and let the Canadian public believe that all the wrongs are on the unions' side. I cannot completely excuse a number of union leaders because, when I consider what is going on, and having talked to a number of postal workers in my own area, I wonder if they really abide by the democratic law which they preach both in respect of the government and their membership, when they insist on a vote by a show of hands whenever the time comes for important decision making such as going on strike.

In order to demonstrate their sincerity, since they claim they are sincere, we can see them all day long on TV to demonstrate their sincerity. Why do these union leaders themselves not propose a secret ballot to the government which is too fearful to step in, Madam Speaker?

When I mention a secret ballot, I am reminded of the New Democratic Party's action. I was very surprised at hon. members of that party opposing the secret ballot. I believe that if there is a way to express one's view freely and democratically, it is through the secret ballot. I wonder why the New Democratic Party members reject such a policy. It is the only way to be fair to everybody and I am convinced—

The Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry I have to interrupt the hon. member—

[English]

There are so many private debates going on that the official reporters are having difficulty hearing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Perhaps if these private conversations could be held behind the curtains it would help the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2050)

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I congratulate you, Madam Speaker, and I thank you very much because I was going to attract your attention to say that about ten groups wanted to deliver their speeches at the same time as me. It is annoying to have ten groups speak at the same time. I would like to be able to finish my speech quietly and my friends who are on the frontbenches will speak all night long if they wish to speak, because we may stay here all night long.

I am sorry; I would like to answer them but my time is too short.

If the minister asked for a secret ballot, I am convinced there would be surprises on both sides, and the Canadian people as a whole would know who is right and who is wrong.

Christmas and New Year are coming and I cannot conceive that the responsible persons on both sides are unable to act loyally, which would end the conflict immediately. Government and union leaders remind me of two teams of wrestlers eager to win but, unlike true professional wrestlers who fight legally in a ring, they fight at the expenses of Canadian taxpayers. Madam Speaker, this is what we cannot admit. You will agree with me that this fight is most disgusting. We note that both parties try not to lose face before their members or the public. We know that it might be humiliating for the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) to introduce special legislation requiring postal workers to go back to work and we also know that the union leaders secretly hope for such action to disguise their defeat in front of a minister who finds their demands exaggerated. After all, an increase of $1.70 an hour would give postal workers an average hourly salary of $6.26 and this, solely to sort letters, Madam Speaker. To initiate a first agreement they were offered $6.26 an hour. This is acceptable to begin with and I know by experience that many postal workers are ready to accept it, but the leaders require $2.73 an hour, which would yield an average salary of $7.29 an hour.

Let me read you an excerpt from the newspaper Le Quotidien dated November 13 last. I quote:

> On the other hand, there will be a waiting period until Mr. Bryce Mackasey returns to Ottawa, although he had not changed his stand on an increase of $1.70 an hour over 30 months. For its part, the union is asking $2.73 over 27 months. The average hourly rate is now $4.56 and the government proposal would increase the annual salary to about $13,000 from now till the end of 1976.

That strikes me as a reasonable start, until better can be achieved. In that way, the people would be given a chance. I go back to the quotation:

> Mr. Joe Davidson, president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, returning from a visit to southern Ontario branches, stated Tuesday in Ottawa that his union was ready to resume negotiations . . .

I believe Mr. Davidson is becoming more lenient. He claims to be willing to resume negotiations. I feel that may mean he will get his members to accept $1.70 initially, because he is convinced, as everyone else today, that most of the postal workers want the strike to end.

In my area, for instance, every rural post office is now open. Employees continue to get their cheques. In rural ridings you do not notice it too much but in large centres where there is no mail that bothers us a bit. Our post offices are open, they are ready, they want this to end and we are told that it is the union leaders who are too radical.

One only has to read the papers to see the number of people who want this strike to end. People say they are prepared to accept the monetary proposals. But there is a dictatorship from union leaders who want to defend the honour of their royalty over their subjects. Union leaders talk strongly about democracy and they are the first ones to care the least about it. Several members want a secret vote to get justice but union bouncers oppose it. Madam Speaker. Why? To develop their famous mail delivery service they set up at $1.25, $1.50 and $2.00 per unit. Will that result in money savings for our fellow citizens who already pay for the postal service? Madam Speaker, where are we going with such a mess? Who has the authority finally here in this Parliament? Would it be Mr. Pepin and all the others, or the minister and the government, or still the cabinet who has the authority? With that feverish fear of a possible reaction at election time, this government shirks all its responsibilities in all areas and we had a striking example of that the other day when we heard the Minister of Finance state that he had no power over the Bank of Canada. How about that! Today will the Postmaster General refuse to take his responsibilities, to do what everyone expects him to do? Will all departments join that stampede? I hope not, Madam Speaker.

So tonight we are asking this government, in awaiting other solutions, to issue a back to work order and demand a secret vote when a strike is called to protect the individual freedom of all union members who often cannot express themselves at a general meeting for fear of reprisals. That is what I wanted to say to the Postmaster General tonight, and I hope he will take his responsibilities once and for all.

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I join the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) in wishing the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), whose advice I miss, renewed health. May I also assure the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra that he was in no way responsible for my illness last Friday. I have a personal responsibility not to sit in the House of Commons one minute longer than I must, if sitting here means wrecking my health. That much, at least, I owe my family.

I could take many avenues in discussing this matter. I could talk to the negotiating team sitting behind me in the gallery, waiting with baited breath for me, perhaps, to tear a strip off them, but that would be a waste of time and effort.

I listened with attention to the philosophy expounded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), much of which I support. We must consider why, in our type of society, we tolerate strikes. I think the Post Office strike has shown from the first week that our people have adjusted to it psychologically. It is amazing how people can adjust, if they think they should for the good of the democratic system. I suggest that is happening in Canada today.

Talking about strikes, I recall Kenneth Galbraith saying one day that the only strike which really bothered him was an elevator strike, because his office was on the forty-fifth floor of the Empire State Building. He said, "Of course, the problem was easy to solve." I asked him what he did. He said he went down to the street and rented an office on the bottom floor.

As someone properly pointed out, new technology is making the Post Office less important for a greater number of Canadians. People are using computer service, new technology, getting by with telex, and using the telephone. We are sending out senior citizen cheques. It is true that small businessmen and those in the direct mail business are badly affected by this strike, but it is remarkable that fewer than 50 of the 3,800 telegrams sent registered complaints.

Our greatest support has come from people in the direct mail industry. They say, "For goodness sake, let's have one good strike and get it over with, instead of having these illegal stoppages which have plagued the office for the past five years." That is my feeling, too.

● (2100)

The leader of the New Democratic Party, a good leader, tried to have it both ways, which is not unusual. He stood up and said that the suggestion of the Conservative party was ridiculous. I suggest it was not nearly as ridiculous as his suggestion that we introduce a mediator at this late stage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: He should know that if the PSSR Act does not permit the particular power that is suggested, when we pass legislation it will be an easy matter to include since parliament reigns supreme. I have philosophically no trouble introducing into the legislation, at the disposal of an independent body, which is the Public Service Staff Relations Board, the particular power that it may need in order to bring order out of chaos in the odd strike in the public service. This is quite consistent with the power they now have. It might be the answer.

The cruel thing about the suggestion of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is that it leaves those workers, who normally would be quite satisfied with the settlement, once again with the hope that to hang on for another ten days or two weeks may bring them more.

Mr. Broadbent: Three days.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member in his excitement wants to have the best of both worlds. Just relax a little.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: We did not hear him scream when the NDP government in British Columbia took the right to strike away from the workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: His little suggestion that the mediator by settling three or four clauses would end the strike is not new. One would only add 12½ per cent to the 38 per cent already on the table, bringing the total—

An hon. Member: How do you know that?

Mr. Mackasey: It is easy to calculate. The hon. member does not know that to reduce the work week from 40 hours to 35 is 12½ per cent of the wage package. He cannot figure that out! The hon. member also said that we should reduce it to 35, and perhaps call for 37½ since most people in the public service have a 37½ hour work week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: I did not interrupt the hon. member; perhaps that was because he did not say anything to excite me. Then he complained about the formula of the COLA clause. There are about 68 on record. He did not point out that if the union were to get the COLA clause it would be only the second bargaining unit in the public service to get it. He also used the reverse argument that they should work 37½ hours because virtually everybody in the public service is doing that. In other words, he wants comparability when it suits him, but he does not want to follow the general pattern of the public service where it does not suit him.

The hon. member need not think for one minute that I am the least bit worried about face saving. I have a better suggestion than a mediator. It would save 72 hours. That is that we put out to the membership tomorrow the conciliation board chairman's report, a chairman who was selected by the union, a chairman who is a member of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec. Probably the solution to this is not to take the government's last offer, but to take the report of the conciliation board chairman, submit it to the membership of the union and see if they are satisfied with it. The hon. member may turn around for advice to those who are more knowledgeable behind him, but if he looks this way he will learn a little more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: He might learn that in the conciliation board chairman's report is no inclusion for part-time workers of week-end premiums, something we gladly included, and not through hard bargaining but because it was a social right for regular workers and therefore a social right for part-time workers. This was not included in the conciliation board chairman's report but we extended it to 5,000 part-time workers.

I will be very happy to take that report, which is a very neutral report by a very learned judge, one who was named chairman by both parties, union and management. Perhaps our mistake was trying to improve on it through negotiations instead of simply taking it at this time of anti-inflation, submitting it to the membership, and suggesting that they, like all Canadians, have the good sense to practise a bit of restraint and follow the recommendations of the judge.

Just in case some members may think that the judge's recommendations were harsh, he suggested a 40 hour week, and $1.70 over 30 months with a COLA clause, the same as the other unit. In addition, he introduced a principle that took a lot of persuasion to accept. The principle is that if you regularly work Saturday and Sunday, not overtime but regularly, you are entitled to a premium of 75 cents for Sundays and 60 cents for Saturdays. I wonder how many bus drivers, streetcar drivers—who had to wait around for 15 hours to get in five hours—railway workers, airline workers, or cab drivers get an extra 75 cents an hour for working Sunday and 60 cents an hour for Saturday. This was recommended by the judge. I accepted it in principle. I did not accept the amount, but in negotiation we gave that to the union.

Possibly the main breakthrough in the report of the judge was the clause on automation. The irony is that the Postmaster General who is now being classed as reactionary brought in that particular clause in private industry. The union said they had to have this clause if they were going to continue working in the Post Office.

We all remember "Boycott the Postal Code". That was the slogan. We all remember the union leaders telling us how effective the boycott was, and how they had nullified automation. They are sitting up there. They will tell you they were able to offset automation by boycotting the postal code. It is significant that, despite the fact that nowhere in the public service does such a provision exist, this judge felt it logical, proper, and moral in this day and age that workers be protected against the effects of technology, a view I share.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

• (2110)

It is significant that Treasury Board in its wisdom agreed to include in this collective agreement complete and utter protection against the effects of technology when introduced by management, namely, a clause which says you must notify them, the union, in writing in ample time so that they can prepare to accept or reject the right to negotiate and then, if after so many days no settlement is reached, the matter goes to arbitration. I think there is a limit of 15 days within which the arbitrator must bring back a settlement, as in the case of the railways.

So in addition to the COLA clause which is unique in the public service, in addition to the weekend premiums which are unique virtually anywhere in Canada, you have this unique provision protecting public servants against the effects of automation. Indeed, they have complete security against lay-offs due to lack of business. I would like to include one day in our collective agreement provisions which would allow the Postmaster General of the day to have his work staff fluctuate with the volume of mail which comes in. Then you might get an efficient Post Office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I might remind the postal workers and the union leaders that they have lost the equivalent of 3,500 man-year positions due to their illegal work stoppages over the last five years. They have yet to lose a single job through automation. Are we asking these workers to make a sacrifice? Do you think negotiations began in October? The hon. gentleman has gone to lick his wounds, but that is all right.

I want to make it clear that my objective is still to arrive at a negotiated settlement. On November 9, on television, in answer to a question I said on the issue of part time workers, which the hon. gentleman mentioned tonight, that we could begin negotiations there and then, that very evening. The trouble with this negotiating team is they never know when they've got a good bargain or when they have a good deal. They cannot seem to understand there does come a moment where there is just no more money to give them. If they think they are going to sit down tomorrow with a mediator, the Postmaster General or anybody representing the government, and end up with a settlement for less then 40 hours a week, or more than $1.70 an hour, for a shorter period than 30 months, they are dreaming in technicolour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: That is true whether the strike lasts a day, a week, a month or a year. It is a matter of principle here. We argue in this House sometimes about private enterprise. I think we all agree that sometimes there is bad management of business. You can get bad landlords, which means rent controls. You can get bad leadership.

An hon. Member: And bad government!

Mr. Mackasey: This has been going on since last January. Just in case anybody thinks that the bargaining unit—and I am not including myself as Postmaster General—cannot negotiate, take the case of the other union, the letter carriers. They began bargaining in January. They bargained for a certain period of time, they went to a conciliation board, they bargained and went to mediation, and in June they arrived at what they considered to be the best collective agreement they had ever obtained, an agreement which was ratified by 82 per cent of the membership.

This union came in in March with a demand emanating from a union newspaper. Coupled with this demand were certain prerequisites, as they called them. Before they would even start negotiating we had to convert the Post Office into a Crown corporation. They also wanted an immediate raise of $1 an hour before they would even begin negotiating, plus one or two minor items. Finally, after getting through the conciliation officer stage in June, which at least brought in their demands, they got to the conciliation board stage in September-October—about then—and, as I mentioned, the Public Service Staff Relations Board named Jules Moisan of the Quebec Superior Court as chairman. This was after getting both parties to agree to the judge.

Because so little had been accomplished as a result of this harassment, this demand that the Post Office become a Crown corporation before negotiations could take place, it took that poor gentleman eight weeks of constant discussion with both parties in order to arrive at what is known as the Moisan report—the report of the chairman of that board. It was not a unanimous report; it was not even a majority report in the sense that we agreed only in principle to the weekend premium without putting any monetary value on it. It is wrong to say our position was inflexible since our first position was $1.15 for 32 months and did not include weekend premiums or specific benefit for part-time workers. We were very flexible, Madam Speaker.

I realize there are others who wish to speak, and there is a vote coming on pretty soon. I do not wish to continue afterward, but I might say that by April 24 there had been no less than eight meetings with that union. Finally, in July, they met with the conciliation officer and it was July 21 before they even sat down to hear the terms of reference. The conciliation board worked from August 18 to October 7 and negotiated from October 16 to November 6. People might ask, "How come there was a strike?" The answer is very simple. While we were negotiating in good faith, the union, because it did not have a strike mandate—and I say that publicly and as an honourable gentleman of this House—arranged in the dead of night with the minority in the major cities to set up picket lines so that the silent majority, the older workers, the responsible Canadians who only want to earn their living like anybody else, found themselves confronted when they went to the workplace with picket lines they did not dare cross.

What was the advantage to the membership to go on strike in the middle of negotiations? We in the government have no right to lock out. There was no particular advantage other than frighten off the majority of workers who were more than happy with the report of the conciliation chairman if through some legal means they could have had an opportunity of expressing that opinion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. minister may continue with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I presume somebody else on the other side will be able to take up where the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) left off. I do not want to escalate any controversy tonight; I hope to make a quiet contribution, if I may. It did seem to me that the Postmaster General was threshing over some recent history rather than telling the House what he proposes to do in the present emergency. We start off from a common position.

Mr. Speaker, if some of those fellows with louder voices and keener minds would keep quiet for a few minutes, we could perhaps make a little progress. I might suggest that this is the kind of controversy in which a little reason and a little less heat might produce a little more light.

● (2120)

We start off with the position that parliament has given the postal workers the right to strike. But all parties in the House recognize that there comes a point when the public interest must prevail and that the right to strike should be curtailed or modified in the particular situation. I think we agree that serious damage is being done as the strike continues. There is great inconvenience; there is perhaps irreparable harm being done to certain agencies, such as that well known charitable agency that depends very heavily upon the sale of Christmas seals. There is no need to document the damage that is being done.

I might remind the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) that not everyone is in the position in which John Kenneth Galbraith found himself, that when he could not reach his accommodation on the fortieth floor he went down the street and rented some other accommodation. It is not everyone who can make up for the lack of a postal service by sending telegrams or using the telephone. If I may borrow a phrase commonly used by the Postmaster General, res ipsa loquitur.

The strike is continuing, with the main issue being the demand for rates of pay—I want to make sure I state it correctly—which are higher than the government says its anti-inflationary program will permit. In other words, the government's guidelines do not restrict the right to strike in this instance, but the government's anti-inflationary guidelines certainly circumscribe the scope of collective bargaining. So that when the government says it is a question of balancing the public interest against interference with free collective bargaining, we in this House must take note that the government, in the name of the public interest, has already taken a position in its fight against inflation and introduced legislation to limit increases in pay for which any labour union can bargain. I say it is proposing limits on the right to collective bargaining for a far longer period than I find acceptable.

The union is seeking increases that are higher than the government says its guidelines will permit. The purpose of the continuing strike essentially is to persuade the government to accept a bigger increase than its guidelines permit. So it is really pretty silly, if I may speak frankly and bluntly, for the government to say that it does not want to interfere with the collective bargaining process, because it has already done that.

I also say it is pretty silly for the government to refuse to restore the postal service to the Canadian people, pretending that it is preserving the legal right of the union which it has already modified. Leaving aside for a moment the question whether the right to strike in essential services should be modified, and leaving aside for a moment all the difficulties that any such question raises or that any such position brings forward, the fact is that the anti-inflationary guidelines have been adopted by the government indicating a firm determination by the government to limit the scope of collective bargaining in so far as wage and salary increases are concerned. In these circumstances, it surely is close to hypocrisy for the government to say that it will not ask parliament to order a return to work, when the government has already decreed there is no way in which the union can get the higher wages it is striking for.

I have to ask myself whether there is not another motive for the position that the government is taking. Is the government refusing to ask parliament to intervene because doing so would in some way take the union off the hook? Is the government insisting that, despite all the damage being done to the public, the union has to be made to learn that it has to accept responsibility here? Parliament would not be letting the union off the hook if there was a back to work direction given by parliament, because any such order would be within the anti-inflationary guidelines of the government.

If the government is serious about holding to its guidelines it, the government, has to place the union on the hook—if we are going to talk about someone being on a hook. It is not a question of parliament taking the union off the hook. All of us in the House, including the government, have to recognize that the government has, by adopting its guidelines, placed the union on a hook and proposes to keep it there during the life of its wage and price guidelines program. So there is no question of taking the union off the hook.

Is the government's concern that parliament might take the union executive off the hook? The leaders of this union may not be very popular. It may be popular for the government to attack them; I do not know. But the public is certainly fed up with disruptions in postal service. Surely it is not our business in parliament, and it is not the business of the government, to try to break a union executive and to put the public to great loss and inconvenience in the process.

● (2130)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I regret to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition but it being 9.30, pursuant to the order made earlier this House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion for second reading of Bill C-58, and on the motion pursuant to Standing Order 58 (9) (a) standing in the name of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). May I remind hon. members that it has been agreed, also, that the bells will ring for 15 minutes only. Call in the members.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

● (2140)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House divided on the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, which was agreed to on the following division:

(Division No. 78)

YEAS

Messrs.

Allmand
Anderson
Andras (Port Arthur)
Andres (Lincoln)
Appolloni (Mrs.)
Basford
Beaudoin
Béchard
Bégin (Miss)
Benjamin
Blais
Blaker
Blouin
Boulanger
Breau
Brewin
Broadbent
Buchanan
Bussières
Caccia
Cafik
Campagnolo (Mrs.)
Campbell (Miss) (South Western Nova)
Campbell (LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul)
Caron
Chrétien
Clermont
Collenette
Comtois
Condon
Corbin
Corriveau
Côté
Cyr
Danson
Daudlin
Demers
Douglas (Bruce-Grey)
Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands)
Drury
Dupont
Dupras
Duquet
Faulkner
Fleming
Foster
Fox
Francis
Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier)
Gendron
Gilbert
Gillespie
Goodale
Goyer
Guay (St. Boniface)
Guay (Lévis)
Guilbault
Harquail
Herbert
Hogan
Hopkins
Isabelle
Jamieson
Joyal
Kaplan
Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre)
Lachance
Lajoie
Lalonde
Landers
Lang
Langlois
Laniel
Leblanc (Laurier)
Lee
Lefebvre
Leggatt
Lessard
Loiselle (Saint-Henri)
Lumley
MacDonald (Cardigan)
MacDonald (Egmont)
MacDonald (Miss) (Kingston and the Islands)
MacEachen
MacFarlane
MacGuigan
Mackasey
Marceau
Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo)
Martin
McRae
Milne
Morin (Mrs.)
Nicholson (Miss)
Nystrom
O'Connell
Olivier
Orlikow
Ouellet
Parent
Penner
Peters
Philbrook
Portelance
Poulin
Prud'homme
Railton
Reid
Richardson
Robinson
Rompkey
Rooney
Roy (Laval)
Sauvé (Mrs.)
Sharp
Smith (Saint-Jean)
Stollery
Symes

Messrs.

Tessier
Trudeau
Turner (London East)
Watson
Young—123.

NAYS

Messrs.

Alexander
Alkenbrack
Allard
Andre (Calgary Centre)
Baker (Grenville-Carleton)
Baldwin
Bawden
Beatty
Brisco
Cadieu
Clarke (Vancouver Quadra)
Cossitt
Crouse
Darling
Diefenbaker
Elzinga
Epp
Fairweather
Flynn
Friesen
Gauthier (Roberval)
Gillies
Grafftey
Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain)
Hargrave
Hees
Hnatyshyn
Holmes
Howie
Huntington
Hurlburt
Jarvis
Jelinek
Johnston
Jones
Kempling
Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand)
Korchinski
Lambert (Bellechasse)
Laprise
La Salle
Lavoie
Lawrence
MacKay
MacLean
Macquarrie
Marshall
Masniuk
Matte
McCain
McGrath
McKinley
McKinnon
Mitges
Muir
Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich)
Murta
Neil
Oberle
O'Sullivan
Paproski
Patterson
Reynolds
Ritchie
Roche
Rynard
Schellenberger
Schumacher
Scott
Skoreyko
Smith (Churchill)
Stanfield
Stewart (Marquette)
Towers
Trudel
Wenman
Whiteway
Whittaker
Wise
Woolliams—80.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

* * *

● (2150)

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO COMBAT INFLATION

The House proceeded to the deferred division on the motion of Mr. Broadbent:

That this House rejects the government's anti-inflationary program because it is totally unworkable in terms of controlling prices, because it provides no effective control over profits or professional incomes, and because it is completely unfair to wage and salary earners in Canada.

The House divided on the motion which was negatived on the following division:

(Division No. 79)

YEAS

Messrs.

Allard
Beaudoin
Benjamin
Brewin
Broadbent
Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands)
Gauthier (Roberval)
Gilbert
Hogan
Jones
Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre)
Lambert (Bellechasse)
Laprise
Leggatt
Matte
Nystrom
Orlikow
Peters
Symes—19.

Anti-inflation Program

NAYS

Messrs.

Alexander
Alkenbrack
Allmand
Anderson
Andras (Port Arthur)
Andre (Calgary Centre)
Andres (Lincoln)
Appolloni (Mrs.)
Baker (Grenville-Carleton)
Baldwin
Basford
Bawden
Beatty
Béchard
Bégin (Miss)
Blais
Blaker
Blouin
Boulanger
Breau
Brisco
Buchanan
Bussières
Caccia
Cadieu
Cafik
Campagnolo (Mrs.)
Campbell (Miss) (South Western Nova)
Campbell (LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul)
Caron
Chrétien
Clarke (Vancouver Quadra)
Clermont
Collenette
Comtois
Condon
Corbin
Corriveau
Cossitt
Côté
Crouse
Cyr
Danson
Darling
Daudlin
Demers
Diefenbaker
Douglas (Bruce-Grey)
Drury
Dupont
Dupras
Duquet
Elzinga
Epp
Fairweather
Faulkner
Fleming
Flynn
Foster
Fox
Francis
Friesen
Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier)
Gendron
Gillespie
Gillies
Goodale
Goyer
Grafftey
Guay (St. Boniface)
Guay (Lévis)
Guilbault
Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).
Hargrave
Harquail
Hees
Herbert
Hnatyshyn
Holmes
Hopkins
Howie
Huntington
Hurlburt
Isabelle
Jamieson
Jarvis
Jelinek
Johnston
Joyal
Kaplan
Kempling
Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand)
Korchinski
Lachance
Lajoie
Lalonde
Landers
Lang
Langlois
Laniel
La Salle
Lavoie
Lawrence
Leblanc (Laurier)
Lee
Lefebvre
Lessard
Loiselle (Saint-Henri)
Lumley
MacDonald (Cardigan)
MacDonald (Miss) (Kingston and the Islands)
MacEachen
MacFarlane
MacGuigan
Mackasey
MacKay
MacLean
Macquarrie
Marceau
Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo)
Marshall
Martin
Masniuk
McCain
McGrath
McKinley
McKinnon
McRae
Milne
Mitges
Morin (Mrs.)
Muir
Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich)
Murta
Neil
Nicholson (Miss)
Oberle
O'Connell
Olivier
O'Sullivan
Ouellet
Paproski
Parent
Patterson
Penner
Philbrook
Portelance
Poulin
Prud'homme
Railton
Reid
Reynolds
Richardson
Robinson
Roche
Rompkey
Rooney
Roy (Timmins)
Roy (Laval)
Rynard
Sauvé (Mrs.)
Schellenberger
Scott
Sharp
Skoreyko
Smith (Churchill)
Smith (Saint-Jean)
Stanfield
Stewart (Marquette)
Stewart (Cochrane)
Stollery
Tessier
Towers
Trudeau
Trudel
Turner (London East)
Watson
Wenman
Whiteway
Whittaker
Wise
Woolliams
Young—183.

● (2200)

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion lost.

Motion (Mr. Broadbent) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the order made today the House will now resume consideration of the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke). Before doing so, however, the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) rises on a point of order.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I thought I might take advantage of a pause in the deliberations to announce the business for tomorrow and the rest of the week.

In the interest of getting as many bills forward into committee as quickly as possible I propose that we deal with the following bills, hopefully by Friday, Thursday being an opposition day: Bill C-75 dealing with government annuities, Bill C-61 maritime code, and Bill C-71 dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF POSTAL WORKERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House do now adjourn.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before I was interrupted by the bell for the vote I was emphasizing that the government had already substantially restricted the scope of collective bargaining as a result of its anti-inflationary program, and that consequently it was very close to hypocrisy for the government to refrain from taking any action or put any measure before parliament, on the grounds that this would interfere with a right given to the postal workers by parliament when, as a matter of general policy, the government had expressed its determination that the scope of collective bargaining would be limited during the course of its control program, and had made it very clear that there was no way in which the union could get more than had been offered to them.

I therefore had to ask myself what the real motive was for the government's failure to act. It cannot be explained on the ground that a return to work order by parliament would take the union off the hook, because the government has already placed the union on a hook that will last as long as the control programs are in place. I had to ask myself therefore what the reason was for the government's behaviour, the reason for the Postmaster General's reiteration of the position here tonight that a good long strike would be a good thing. I do not want to misquote him or misinterpret him, but that is what I understood him to say—that a good long strike would be a good thing for the country. In the circumstances I had to ask whether the reason for this was the desire of the government to break the union executive, and incidentally to put the public to great loss and inconvenience in the process.

There certainly have been cases of government intervention in the management and operation of unions. In some instances unions have been put into trusteeship. Is the government in this instance trying to accomplish through the pressure of a long strike what it is not prepared to do openly? If the government lets things go on until Easter, if the government encourages continuance of a strike of these postal employees until Easter, as the minister says he is prepared to do, the government may very well destroy the union executive, and perhaps the union itself, and would certainly also destroy a lot of Canadian people in the process.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: While John Kenneth Galbraith may be able to look after himself, there are a lot of Canadians who cannot look after themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: There has been discussion about the advisability of a vote. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) put forward a constructive motion this afternoon which the government accepted. The leader of the New Democratic party this evening suggested that was an unwarranted intervention, that there was no legal authority to do it in the first place, that it was an unwarranted intervention in the affairs of the union, and he then proposed a modification of this which the Postmaster General, in his turn, ridiculed. I had the impression from what has been said, and from my own background, that any question could be put to the membership of the union either only with the approval of the executive or by a change in legislation. That would be the case whether it is the proposal of the leader of the New Democratic Party or the proposal of the hon. member for St. John's East and legislation would be required.

The leader of the New Democratic Party did not indicate whether the union accepted his proposal. I assume he was not speaking with the authority or approval of the union. I want to say I feel certain that, if there is a way of getting a vote of the membership on a reasonable proposition within a reasonable period of time, parliament and the people of Canada would be prepared to wait for that.

● (2210)

I do not want to be unfair but I do not think the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) indicated this evening that he would take constructive action to settle this issue. He had plenty of time, although there was not enough time for him to review the last ten years of postal negotiations and tell the House what he intends to do.

In summary I say, as my time is nearly finished, that we should do all we can to bring before the membership this question in a fair way, in order that there may be a vote. If that cannot be done, if legislation for accomplishing that purpose must be introduced, then in the national interest the government should ask parliament to order a return to work, with a provision for continued negotiation for limited time. I repeat what I said several times previously. It is sheer hypocrisy, or close to it, for the government to say it cannot do that because it would be an intervention in the collective bargaining process; after all, the government has already intervened drastically. It has limited the scope of collective bargaining by adopting and being determined to enforce its guidelines.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the contributions of members of the opposition parties in this House, and I listened to the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey). I ask again what do opposition members say to the government should be done at this stage?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Get off the pot.

Mr. Francis: I will try to be fair and analyse the statements made so far. The mover of the motion, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, there appears to be some noise in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I ask the co-operation of all hon. members. I hesitate to invite those talking too loudly to leave the House, as we want as many hon. members as possible to remain. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) has the floor.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, the mover of the motion proposed three courses of action: he suggested that the government should consider back-to-work legislation, which is the sum and substance of his leader's recommendations; that the government should pay more money, although in the next breath he said that this must be approved by the Anti-Inflation Board, which is hardly a suggestion he could make in good faith in light of the clear guidelines proposed; or that we should do something with regard to section 8 of the Post Office Act which would mean, in effect, the dismantling of the department. Surely that was not a serious proposal.

Clearly the sum and substance of the recommendations of the official opposition are that we should consider back to work legislation as soon as possible. I want to examine the implications of that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not so. You are only putting part of the case.

Mr. Francis: I am drawing my own conclusions, having listened attentively to official opposition spokesmen and NDP spokesmen.

What is the position of the NDP? They favour free collective bargaining but say that under present procedures strikes now and again must occur. Further, they say that the Postmaster General, in his dealings with the union membership, is showing bad faith as an employer. That was the expression the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) used. Then the NDP suggested that we should appoint a mediator who would look at certain issues. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby elucidated his position in the clearest terms.

He suggested that the work week should be reduced. That would have added 12 per cent to the package of 38 per cent.

Mr. Broadbent: You did not listen.

Mr. Francis: The reduction of working hours is the same as an increase in pay. It is one or the other.

Mr. Broadbent: You did not listen.

Mr. Francis: The hon. member can talk all he wants. He cannot get around the fact. Then he talked about a small thing, the elimination of the differential with the letter carriers, a mere matter of 35 cents an hour. That was nothing really. The government should be able to do that. In addition, the cap should be taken off the COLA clause. That was not much; why, any self-respecting government should be prepared to offer that much. There were a couple of other small items. The hon. member mentioned long service pay, equal pay for full and part-time employees, and one or two other matters. I did a little arithmetic. My mathematics, which are not the best, say that the hon. member would have offered those on strike between 55 per cent and 60 per cent more. The government has offered 38 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Francis: I am trying to analyse. He did not quite say that he would offer that much, but he did say that a mediator should look at these things. I suggest one can draw only one inference from his wishing to appoint a mediator again, and that is that the union should expect to get more; otherwise there is no point to the process.

Mr. Broadbent: Some more; that is precisely right.

Mr. Francis: The hon. member admits my point.

What did the hon. member say about inflation? I think he made on reference to the Anti-Inflation Board. He said he hoped that the solution, whatever it may be, would be arrived at voluntarily, and would be referred to the Anti-Inflation Board. I do not know with what sort of tongue in cheek he spoke at that point. I did not hear him say a single critical word about the conduct of the union or its executive. All his criticism was reserved for the government. In his books the union had not done one thing wrong. Not one word did he say about other's rights and about the way this strike has been conducted.

I hope the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby will confer with the hon. member seated immediately to his left, for that member sits on the joint committee of this place and the Senate on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. This spring there appeared as a witness before that committee the leader of the union now on strike, Mr. Davidson. I call the attention of this House to something Mr. Davidson said in testimony. He said that there is one thing wrong with the Post Office—its managers do not have the guts to charge enough for their services. He said that first class letters should cost 25 cents to send. I ask, what will this do to the pensioners, the people about whom the hon. member's colleague—I give him full marks for his concern—is worried? Will he support a union whose leader says that first class mail in this country should cost 25 cents to send? Is he prepared to see that done? Is he prepared to side with the union whose leader has said on tape and in front of the television camera, "The public be damned!" Has the hon. member not one critical word to say about that union?

An hon. Member: Ask him where he holds his membership.

Mr. Francis: That is a good question but I do not propose to add it to my list. I simply say this: the hon. member's party must show responsibility. It cannot say one thing to the old age pensioner and another to the rest of the population.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I call this an irresponsible strike, a challenge to parliament's attempt to deal with inflation. There is a danger that the public will force parliament to pass legislation which will be a reaction to this strike, and that would be unfortunate indeed. The members of this House and of the other place who sit on the special joint committee have a serious responsibility in weighing recommendations to be made, for we must avoid that situation, and make sure that legislation is passed only if it is absolutely necessary.

● (2220)

I made the suggestion to the committee that before a legal strike could take place the Public Service Staff Relations Board should conduct a vote on the final offer of the employer and that the board should be responsible for certifying the results of that vote. I know there are problems with any suggestion of this nature. I know it will be opposed by members of the New Democratic Party, among others, but they have to answer to the people of Canada what we are going to do to stop a union executive that will not allow the employer's final offer to be voted upon in a free and secret ballot.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: In the constituency I have the honour to represent there are many small businessmen who are being hurt, and badly hurt by this strike. There are many people who are being inconvenienced, but I have been most encouraged by the calls that I have received. To a man and to a woman, they are saying the government has to set an example in this fight against inflation. There is no way in which it can capitulate before this kind of union and this kind of activity, with its clear, open defiance of the program of the government in these circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) who, just a few moments ago, indicated the proposal he made to the joint committee on employer-employee relations. I do not want in any way to detract from the hon. member's interest in that subject because I know it is sincere. However, it is my understanding that that proposal was first made in a public way by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who cannot be here this evening. Whether that is right or wrong, it is a very important consideration. As a member of the committee, I commend him for that.

When the opportunity comes to deal with the matter, which I hope will be shortly, I intend to support it. That kind of principle will guarantee that which I suspect has not taken place within the postal union, that is, the opportunity for the rank and file of the union to consider in a free and open way the offer that has been made to it.

I want to talk for a few moments about the speech made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). He talked about mediation. It may be a useful exercise, perhaps not. The hon. member asked us to consider the position of the union. He castigated the government. Not once did he ask us to consider the public interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The emphasis of his speech was the preservation of the right to strike. That is an important right, but it should not override the public interest. We should not lose track of the importance of that.

I do not want to suggest that in terms of attitude the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is the only one who can be faulted. Some blame has to be laid at the feet of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey). It was he who said in this House "Let's have one good strike and have it over with." In effect he was saying small business be damned, senior citizens be damned, people who depend on investment income be damned. I put him in no better position with respect to that statement in terms of leadership than the president of the union who said the public be damned.

A few moments ago some speakers called for leaderhips. I do not want to be unkind to the Postmaster General. In the history of this whole matter with regard to the bringing together of the parties and the settlement of the dispute there has been at least a modicum of a lack of leadership on both sides.

The purpose of the motion tonight is not to call one another names. That is not productive. It is to give encouragement to the government on one hand, and to the union members on the other, with regard to the settlement of the dispute. It is to say to the leadership of the union that this parliament does not approve of any tactic which deprives the members of the union of the right to deal with an offer that has been made by management. That is a very important matter.

The hon. member for Ottawa West did not mention the complete position put forward by this party to-night. I call his attention to the admirable speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who made it clear that this party wants, first of all, that the union membership have the right to a free vote. I do not think that there is any doubt about that in this House. If there is, let that member stand up and say so. The government ought to take this into consideration, not in two weeks, but now. If that fails, having regard to the importance of the public service and the postal service in the public interest, it is important that the government face up to the fact that the alternative, which we would all regret, is putting the union back to work. That position was put fairly carefully by the two people who have spoken thus far in this party.

This evening I received a call from a member of the postal union in the town of Prescott. There are seven members in that bargaining unit. The scrutineer called and told me that a vote was taken on October 10, 1975. They had two ballots, one of which asked "Do you accept the proposed collective agreement?". The second ballot asked "Do you support the recommendations of your negotiating committee?" or words to that effect. They were told that they were not to use the first ballot which would have put before that local, which is symbolic of a number of locals in this country, the question as to whether the government offer was good. This is what I have been told.

● (2230)

Still, they were told to vote on the second question, whether they supported the recommendation of the negotiating committee which was not to accept the offer made by the government. So they voted, this small local; there are seven of them in it. Six voted not to support the recommendations of the negotiating committee, and there was one spoiled ballot. That local was immediately decertified.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Who decertified it?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): They were told that as a result of that vote the union was authorized to continue in the position it had taken, because they had the executive committee and the negotiating committee authorization to deal only with the minority report. But the first question had never been submitted to the union membership, that question being: Do you accept the government's offer? That is the position of the local at Prescott. If that is the position of the local at Prescott, the question in my mind is: what is the position of locals across the country, and what would be the result if the government decided to move in the next little while and presented its last and final offer to the union membership?

In my submission, it would do two things: it would preserve democracy in the union, which is self-evidently not there at the moment, and it would probably lead to a return to work or at least to an overwhelming vote to return to work. I think this is worthy of the government's attention. Parliament is always in the position of being able to legislate them back to work, in any event.

What we see here is a spillover which could affect the public service far behond the right to strike in the postal service. I hear people suggesting we should do away completely with the right to strike in the public service, even though some of those who talk about such an eventuality cannot define what an essential service is; it is an extremely difficult area and one which the Finkelman committee is presently considering. I would point out that the record as far as public service bargaining is concerned has been pretty good except for the Post Office. I, for one, do not want rights which were given by parliament to be taken away unceremoniously, or even to hear people demanding that this be done because of the irresponsibility of the leadership of one union.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not think there is any person in this country connected with the union movement who wants this to happen. I do not think the members of the NDP want it to happen, but they have got themselves locked into a position which is intellectually dishonest and they do not know how to get out of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not wish to take up the time of the House unduly. The minister knows I regard public service bargaining as a complex matter, one not to be trifled with by people who wish to make a big show going around the country saying, "Let's get rid of the right to strike." The right to strike and the process of collective bargaining have been sanctioned by parliament. Before we take it away, I think we should let the main beneficiaries, in this case the postal workers, cast their votes—and if it takes a bill to do it, bring one in—on whether to accept the offer made to them by the government. I do not know whether that offer is right or wrong, too high or too low. In any case, it is subject to review by the Anti-Inflation Board. The minister nods his head.

Subject to all these considerations, to the extent it can having regard to the government's program, the membership ought to have the right to decide and the government ought to move quickly to give them that right.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, like many backbenchers on this side of the House I am glad to speak on the motion before us tonight. I am particularly happy to speak on the motion, first, to put my own views squarely on the record and, second and more important, to demonstrate the extent of the support members on our side of the House are giving to our Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), a man who has endangered his health and who has put his career on the line in the interests of achieving a fair, equitable settlement for a group of workers who have seen their incomes fall drastically behind over the past few years.

The first fight in this battle took place last spring when members of our caucus supported the Postmaster General in his attempt to convince Treasury Board that the letter carriers deserved a general salary increase. We agreed with him and argued that postal employees must be given the financial remuneration they had historically earned in the interests of restoring a measure of pride and dignity to an often maligned vocation. We won that fight and the leadership of the Letter Carriers Union is to be praised for its responsible deportment throughout the negotiations and for its part in arriving at a settlement.

It goes without saying that this general settlement should be extended to cover the other half of the postal employees, the inside workers as they are known. But here the problem became complicated. The minister was faced by an irresponsible president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers—I hope he is still here tonight to hear what some of us feel about him—and an equally irresponsible chief negotiator for the union. He found himself dealing with two men whose personal ideological and political views superseded the best interests of those they were supposed to represent at the bargaining table. As a result we face a situation in which a fair settlement is sitting on that table, the majority of the postal workers across the country ready to accept its generous terms, yet their leaders are afraid to submit the package to a national vote. If there is a better example of trade unionist totalitarianism and demagoguery, I defy members of the House to show me one.

Members on this side of the House are not anti-union. In fact if the members of the NDP did their homework they would find that two out of every four labour votes in this country go to the Liberal party. We have, historically, spoken for the workers. We are not anti-union, but we are against the demagoguery, the totalitarianism and the irresponsibility we find in our trade unions in Canada today.

The trouble is that Mr. Davidson is a product of a political culture which is radically different from the political culture in this country. He is a product of an anarchist strain evident over the past century on the Clydeside docks. As Freud saw everything through sexual eyeglasses, Mr. Davidson, like his mentor, Karl Marx, sees all political debate through the eyeglasses of class struggle and social strife.

● (2240)

There has been no tradition of class warfare in this country. We are all equal. We are all workers, not members of an upper class, middle class, or working class. Workers and management should be able to use the collective bargaining process without manipulation from those like the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers who try to impose their own political values upon a reasonable attempt to settle this dispute.

I feel I can take Mr. Davidson to task, Mr. Speaker. I was born in his country. I have studied in his country and I have worked there. I have seen the havoc wreaked upon the British economy by irresponsible trade union leadership, the trade union leadership elites that we see today. I do not want to see the same values, these destructive beliefs, transferred to the labour situation in this country.

What of the chief negotiator for the union, a man whose obviously unbending views cannot but lead one to the conclusion that he has an interest in sabotaging not only these particular postal negotiations but also the collective bargaining process in general. Perhaps—I say "perhaps", Mr. Speaker, because I am loth to utter this—he seeks to subvert the very essence and very fibre of the total political structure in this country through his ruminations and histrionics at the bargaining table.

The negotiators have asked for a 71 per cent salary increase. This has been scaled down. The Postmaster General bargained in good faith. Before monetary matters were to be discussed, the union wanted to discuss the effects of automation, and we negotiated. They wanted to discuss electronic surveillance, and we negotiated. They wanted to discuss casual labour, and we negotiated that too. Then when we wanted to get down to monetary matters, the bread and butter issues—as the Postmaster General has said, the average member of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, the average worker in this country, just wants enough money to eat and give him a good standard of living—the union came along and threw in yet another bone of contention, a cost of living clause and a reduction in the work week. How many more minor issues do we have to settle before we get down to the principal issue of money?

Consistently this bargaining team has avoided the very generous settlement proposed. I need not go into the details, but it is 38 per cent, $1.70 an hour over 30 months, a settlement that exceeds the government's anti-inflation guidelines. What is this team negotiating? What is it avoiding? Why, as has been said earlier, do they not submit this settlement to a national vote?

I see the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) is not here to face the rest of the music this evening, but he castigated the Postmaster General for advocating a deviation from normal bargaining procedure by wanting the union membership to vote on the pay offer. He is right; it is a deviation from the normal bargaining procedure. But the union and the union's negotiating team have deviated from the normal bargaining procedure from the very beginning of these negotiations. In fact the chief negotiator and his associates have been downright devious in their behaviour throughout.

So we have the spectre of these two gentlemen, a latter day vaudeville team or Pied Piper team, going on their own merry way without regard for the thousands of helpless members they are leading into debt each day this dispute continues. It is the spectre of two men on full union pay of some $18,000 to $19,000 a year, twice as much as an average postal worker makes, hob-nobbing across this country, flying, I am told, in first-class accommodation on Air Canada, eating and drinking from an apparently inexhaustible expense account paid for by the sweat of the members whom they dare say they represent. What a charade! What an injustice!

This ineffectual motion before us expresses timid concern but shies away from a substantive recommendation. I see the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) has also left. He is a hard-working fellow. He is amiable—I know him well—and he is respected by many in this House. However, tonight it appears that he and the others of his party who support this motion are ambivalent.

My colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), analysed the motion and asked what members of the opposition really wanted. What do they want? Do they want to give the workers more money? Or are they asking the government to introduce legislation forcing the postal employees back to work? The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) talks about showing concern for the public interest. That is a lovely phrase. But because they do not have the obligation to govern, hon. members opposite do not have to be specific and tell us what we should do. If they want the government to shoot holes in its anti-inflation program by awarding the postal workers more money, let them say it. If they want back-to-work legislation, let them say it. But let them not introduce a namby-pamby, wishy-washy motion like the one before us which is keeping us up well past our bedtime.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, why the members on this side are firm about not legislating the workers back to their jobs. We do not want to give the union bargaining team and its leadership the easy way out; it is as simple as that. This strike could have been avoided. We did not want a strike. The president of the Toronto local is one of my constituents, a very reasonable fellow. I have been besieged by calls from members of the union. They do not want to strike, but they are intimidated. That is what we have today, Mr. Speaker. It is not a question of fighting against trade unionism. You would have to be a fool to argue the merits of trade union activity and the benefits trade unions have brought to society.

Mr. Patterson: The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) is here now.

Mr. Collenette: Good; I hope he is listening. What we are really arguing about is the subversion of the trade union movement, and inadvertently the subversion of democracy. We do not only have to talk about this dispute; we can talk about the longshoremen's dispute where union leaders in this country defied parliament, or tried to defy parliament. Once we settle this dispute we have to get down to serious thought about improving labour relations. But I stress this can be done only after we settle this dispute. As far as I am concerned—and I am sure I speak for most of the members on this side—it will be a long way to go before we want to give parliament a job that it should not really be doing by legislating the postal workers back to work.

The real solution here lies with the workers. As each day passes, I am sure that more of them will go back to work. More will decide that to work and earn a living and accept a generous settlement is better than sitting on the sidelines while their leaders provoke great dissent and discussion across the land at the cost of the average worker. There is no doubt that the Postmaster General's stand has the full support of the people in the metropolitan Toronto area from which I come. It is also quite evident to me that workers in the Toronto area, and probably in other parts of the country, do not want to stay on strike any longer; they would love to accept the wage offer.

I could go on and on but would only be repeating what has already been said, and I know there are more speakers. If this union's leaders really had the guts to submit this offer to its workers, then they would be worthy of showing leadership and could be praised. But they are not giving this kind of leadership. They are not interested in a settlement. As I have said before, I hope members of this side hang tough over the next two or three weeks, or however long it takes.

● (2250)

You can talk about small businessmen over there as much as you like, but they are learning to adjust.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: We all have small businessmen in our ridings. The Tory party does not have a monopoly on small businesses. Small business has been one of the backbones not only of the country but of the Liberal party as well, and small businessmen can adjust. This is a red herring you throw out every time. You always talk about small business being hurt.

An hon. Member: You should talk to them.

Mr. Collenette: Where is Mr. Bullock and his 35,000 member association? What does he say? They are riding this out because they know it is about time we settle this business of strike in the Post Office once and for all.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, as the proposer of this motion I rise on a point of order. I listened very intently to the remarks of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette). He said some disparaging things about the content of this motion. Let me suggest that he might read the motion and the Standing Order under which it is proposed, since the purport of the content of the motion is simply that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, on the one hand the credit must of course go to my party for making it possible to take part in this emergency debate this evening. On the other hand it is a sad state of affairs indeed when parliamentarians once again have to digress from the regular day-to-day proceedings of the House of Commons and force themselves to discuss the problem of yet another strike. I say sad, because if the government had a half decent policy to deal with strikes in general, particularly those in essential services such as the Post Office, it would not have to depend on any special motions or Standing Orders such as this, and a majority of work stoppages could be prevented.

It is clear to see that the government not only does not have a half decent policy relating to work stoppages, but it in fact has no policy whatsoever to deal with these destructive strikes which bring many of our industries to their knees, and just as many small businessmen to a tragic end.

I do not have to expound on the fact that a strike like the one we are facing today threatens the very existence of small businesses in Canada, the existence of which has become a vital part of our over-all economy, as it is the small businessman who forms the backbone of our economic and industrial way of life, regardless of what the Liberal speaker before me said.

By allowing this strike to continue and by not presenting a comprehensive program encompassing the whole, general, broad area of exorbitant union demands, we will only assist in the complete destruction of the economy of this country. I should like to point out, however, that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) has at least taken the honorable step of sticking firmly to his final monetary offer as far as this strike is concerned. Whether we legislate the CUPW back to work, which I personally would support wholeheartedly, or we wait for events to run their own course, or whatever, there is no question but that after much suffering by all Canadians, including the union members, at one point or another the mail will again flow and we will be back to square one. That is the sad thing, Mr. Speaker.

We will be back to square one waiting for another union, perhaps in the same service, to bring the nation to an economic standstill once again. We will be back to square one without having solved one solitary long-term issue, and that is my point. That is what is so frustrating about the government which deals with a problem on a temporary basis while at the same it allows unions to build long-term unprecedented strength. The only ones who benefit are those tough union leaders, some of whom are here this evening, who receive their incentives from who knows what infiltrators.

It would not be as tragic if, as a result of union power, the productivity in our country were increased, but unfortunately the fact of the matter is that while increases in labour wages continue to rise higher than any other wages in the industrialized world, productivity in Canada has decreased by nearly 10 per cent per year. What better example could there be of inflation? The deficit in the Post Office, with all the union demands, can only be matched by that of the mayor of Montreal and his Olympic Games. In 1973 the Post Office had a deficit of $90 million, and in the last year that increased to over $320 million.

Again this would not be as serious if the postal service were at least adequate, but it seems to me the original natives of this country hundreds of years ago had a more reliable system of communication with smoke signals than we have through the Post Office today. I believe this is an obvious case of taking advantage of those who cannot fight for themselves but must depend on strong government intervention, intervening fairly on their behalf.

I am referring not only to small businessmen, whom I mentioned earlier, but to the two-thirds of the Canadian labour force which is not unionized. What about the large portion of the union membership who do not approve of their leaders, and there are many, and are either afraid to disapprove openly or who, in more cases than not, find their union votes are usually misrepresented and sometimes not counted at all because of the all too obvious voting irregularities that exist in a great many union halls in Canada today?

What seems to be the problem? There are many, and the first one is quite obvious. Look at the number of unions within some of the essential sectors of our economy. The Post Office, in fact, has five different unions. The problem, as I say, is obvious. Any one of those unions can force a strike within its own sector, just like the present strike by CUPW now taking place within the Post Office. It is an unfortunate possibility that after a settlement is finalized and the Post Office re-opens, the letter carriers will perhaps see fit to go on strike and thus bring the Post Office once again to a standstill, and we will have accomplished nothing.

The same is true in respect of the air transport industry with 15 different unions; 16 unions are involved in handling grain in this country, 21 different unions are involved in the rail service, and 35 at various ports.

Keeping this fragmentation of union power in mind I was happy to introduce a bill last July for the purpose of having union groups in a single public service sector bargaining with the Treasury Board simultaneously, and having contracts negotiated to run for a duration of three years. This would assure the taxpaying public that each essential public service sector would be strike free except for the possibility of a walk-out every three years.

In this regard I was pleased to note in a confidential memorandum to cabinet, prepared by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) some months ago, recommendations along the line which I proposed in that bill. I would be more than pleased to withdraw my own bill in favour of a government bill dealing with the subject matter or, indeed, any legislative proposals that would help keep our economy on an even keel, but it seems quite obvious that the government is not prepared to move at all, let alone in that direction.

Even with the concept of single sector bargaining, however, further steps could be taken to limit labour disruptions while at the same time preserving fairness to labour. Therefore last March I presented another private bill based on the Taft-Hartley Act. This bill would give the Governor in Council the right to bring a strike or lock-out to an end on a temporary basis if such a strike or lock-out, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, would adversely affect the national or public interest if it continued. Such an order would naturally expire upon the execution of a collective agreement, and the strikers would be free to walk out on the expiry of their own agreement.

Lastly, I was able to introduce a bill today which in plain and simple terms would on a temporary basis, and I emphasize "temporary basis", take away the right to strike in the essential services of our economy for the duration of the government's Anti-Inflation Act, now at the committee stage.

If anyone thinks the anti-inflation program enunciated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last month can work on its own merit without amendments, he or she had better think again. Unless there are a number of changes made during the committee state I, for one, will be forced to vote against that bill when it comes back to the House.

There is no question but that the time has come for decisive government action regarding the multitude of strikes which continue to plague our country. The time has come not just for a temporary end to one strike but for a comprehensive program to deal with the loss of productivity due to strikes and walkouts on a long-term basis. We will not exist much longer as a viable industrial nation if we continue to take this ad hoc approach to strikes that the government is asking us to accept as a way of life.

● (2300)

In the last fiscal year, for example, there were 177,000 man-days lost as a result of strikes in the Post Office alone. That figure has already more than doubled as a result of the current work stoppage in the Post Office. In the last two fiscal years there were over 100,000 man-days lost in air transport, close to one million man-days lost in the rail service, and over 1½ million man-days lost as a result of strikes solely by employees under the jurisdiction of the federal government. This, Mr. Speaker, cannot be and is not a healthy sign of things to come under the present Liberal administration.

My fervent wish as a member of parliament and as a concerned citizen of this great country is that we parliamentarians get off our butts, leave party politics on the sidelines, and resolve a just and comprehensive settlement to this and future labour disputes that would benefit all Canadians.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the best proof members of parliament could have that a new start must be made if a settlement of the strike is to take place is the speech the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) made tonight, because if ever there was a speech in which a minister was inflexible, obstinate, and self-righteous, this was it.

The minister preened himself on the fact that he has never made a mistake and is right in the final offer he made about a month ago, even though two months ago he was not prepared to offer a whole host of concessions which he offered in the final days before the strike started, and in the three or four days after it started. So if ever there was proof that the minister has lost his ability to be objective in an effort to settle the dispute which is inconveniencing all the people of Canada, and which is causing great difficulty to so many people in Canada, it was the speech the minister made. I could hardly believe my ears when I heard the minister say the public is adjusting quite easily to the strike and that people are not suffering.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Orlikow: Yes; he said precisely that. He said the people have not been disturbed by the strike which has already gone on for a month. He said the strike could go on until Christmas, and indeed until Easter. On Friday, because my plane was late leaving for Winnipeg, I had to wait at the airport. While I was there I sat beside a businessman who told me that he is spending $100 a day on courier service. I did some arithmetic. I admit that my arithmetic is not very good but, calculating it on the basis of roughly 200 working days, it seems to me that that businessman has an expense now in the neighbourhood of over $20,000 a year. I think he is doing reasonably well, but he is not in a position to carry a burden of that kind. If the minister is talking about a strike lasting until Easter he is talking about a figure close to half that sum.

I also spoke to a businessman in my city. He has a mail order business. He deals in electrical appliances, radios, washing machines, and similar equipment. He has done virtually no business for the last month. It is all very well for the minister to say that businessmen are adjusting. It may be that Eatons, The Bay and Simpsons-Sears are adjusting quite well, but that businessman in Winnipeg, and I am sure many others like him, are not in a position to do business.

My friend, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), just told me about the people of Vancouver Island who grow holly for sale in places like California. They usually receive their orders by mail and send out their holly C.O.D. by mail. They are not receiving any orders, and if they did they would not know how to fill them. The Postmaster General has made up his mind that people can live with the strike for six months. He can manage. The government has a telephone system, a telex system and couriers. It can manage. That does not mean the ordinary citizens can manage. It certainly does not mean they can afford the effect of a strike which need not have occurred, and which ought not to be continuing.

We heard a very impassioned speech by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette). He talked about what "we" had done to try to settle the strike. I suppose he was using the word we in a loyal party sense because I did not know that backbench members of parliament, especially government members like him who sit so far back I can hardly see them, were involved in the negotiations. I do not know how he knew that the President of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is a stubborn man. He may be; I do not know. Neither of us were involved in the negotiations.

I suggest it takes two stubborn people to make an argument. If the union leaders have been stubborn, and they may have been—I have not been involved in the negotiations and do not know what they are doing but I do know what the Postmaster General has been doing—I know the Postmaster General has been very busy both inside and outside this House. If ever a cabinet minister curried favour of the representatives of the media it is this Postmaster General who sees them every half hour if he can, and gives them his side of the story. That is what we get through the media.

I do not say that the government is wrong or the union is right, but if ever there was a campaign to vilify a group of people it is that carried on by the Postmaster General against the union. One would think that the Post Office has been generous, that it was quick in making an offer, that the offer was a good offer, and that the union and workers rejected it out of hand.

We could go back almost ten years to the first stoppage. It was an illegal stoppage because there was no legislation permitting a strike in 1966. In 1966 the postal workers were illegally on strike. Any strike in which they would be involved at that time would be illegal. The Liberal government of the day appointed a judge from Quebec, Judge Montpetit, to look into the operations of the Post Office. There are several recommendations which were made by Judge Montpetit in 1966 which still have not been implemented by the Post Office under the leadership of this so-called friend of labour in 1975. Is it any wonder the postal workers, and not just their leaders, are unhappy with the government and the department?

● (2310)

Let me refer the parliamentary secretary to the Globe and Mail issue of Monday, November 10, which on its front page has the lead story entitled "Interference by other departments hampers Post Office, memo says". Who is the memo by? Not by that flaming radical, the president of the postal workers, not by the vice-president who has been heading the negotiation. It is written by the assistant deputy Postmaster-General, Mr. J. E. Uberig.

Let me just put on the record a couple of paragraphs from that report which he made to the Postmaster General and which the Postmaster General, in his desire to fight the postal workers' union probably filed in the not-to-be-read-for-a-year-from-now filing cabinet. I want to read that because some of us say that the Post Office Department and the minister are not entirely free of blame for this impasse to which we have come. The article in the Globe and Mail reads:

> Post Office Act states that the Postmaster General shall administer, superintend and manage the Post Office.
>
> This seems to be a simple enough authority, but a number of other acts have superimposed effects on the operations of the Post Office, so as to give certain authorities to other ministers of the government or to limit severely the ability of the Postmaster General (and through him the department) in dealing with problems—
>
> Problems arise not only with wage arrangements for blue-collar workers (e.g. reluctance to entertain concept of buy-back of sick leave accruals), but also with management (e.g. tardiness in establishing new pay rates for managerial exclusions—

The article goes on:

> —"the needs of a major portion of the postal employees who are in a blue-collared, industrial-type setting" because it does not allow bargaining on such items as technological change, classifications and other issues.

The author of the memo is saying this in connection with his analysis that the postal worker should come out of the jurisdiction of the Public Service Staff Relations Act and be included among the workers who come under the provisions of the revised Canada Labour Code.

I could go on, but there you have evidence from a senior official in the Post Office Department that the Post Office in its present set-up cannot do the job which it is required to do. Let us not talk about what this man says, or what Judge Monpetit said. Let us go back to about a year and a half ago when the operation of the automatic sorting machines was coming on stream.

What was the rate set by the Public Service Commission for the people who would be sorting the mail with automatic machines? They set it at 50 cents an hour less than for people sorting mail manually. I am not a expert on job classification, but one would have to be an idiot not to accept the fact that a person watching letters spewed through the machine at the rate of thousands a minute must concentrate a lot more than a person working at it manually.

That is what the Public Service Commission and the Post Office Department wanted to impose unilaterally on the employees. The employees had to threaten a work stoppage before the Post Office Department and the government relented.

Mr. Mackasey: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes, if it is not taken off my time.

Mr. Mackasey: I am sure the hon. member would not want to use the word threaten. There was a work stoppage, I think the hon. member made that point, but perhaps he would want to explain what happened as a result of the strike.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to debate all these questions with the Postmaster General at the time when the estimates are brought before us and both he and I have time. The Minister said the government has gone as far as it can and that there is no more money. One would think that the offer which the government has made was made at the beginning of the negotiations. The fact is that there was little meaningful negotiation until the workers took a strike vote.

The minister suggests that they took the strike vote surreptitiously and that they went on strike surreptitiously. The fact is that they went on strike when the minister instructed his officials that there would have to be a settlement in an hour or there would be nothing to talk about. If anybody precipitated the strike it was the minister. What happened in the days after the strike? In the first few days after the strike they settled 128 clauses which were in dispute. Why did they not settle them before they went on strike? The minister said that they settled the question of casual workers. Of course they did. When? Either just before the workers went on strike or just after.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I never mentioned casuals. I apologize if the hon. member misunderstood me. I said we settled the issue of automation before they want on strike, and I said we did not settle the 128 clauses the day after they went on strike.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Orlikow: What I am saying is that a substantial part of what had been agreed to when the strike started or just after it started was agreed to not in the months when they were negotiating with a fair amount of good will but only with the threat of a strike, or after the strike started. We can talk about this when we have time. I say that the question of casual labour was not settled until very close to the time, either just before of just after the strike started. I say that the question of shift premiums was not settled until that time. I say that the question of premiums for part-time employees on weekends was not settled until that time.

What I am saying is that if the Post Office Department had been generous and fair, and if it had indicated it wanted to reach a settlement on some of those issues which go back more than ten years, and if the union leaders are everything that the minister says they are and everything that the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) says they are—I do not know, I am not involved in the negotiations and I am not a member of the union—then I have enough faith in the common sense and good judgment of the oridnary worker to know that they would oust the leaders who are not doing a job for them, and elect others. But that is their business and they will handle it in a democratic way. They do not need me and they do not need the minister to tell them how to run their business.

Let me conclude by saying—I think the minister was not here when I said it at the beginning—that it is obvious to me that the minister's position has hardened to such a point that there can be no settlement with this minister because what he is saying to the workers—I am not discussing at the moment the merits or demerits of their case-in that he represents the Government of Canada which has given these workers everything they can get, and that if they want to stay out six months, they can do so, but they will not get any more. I say that this is not bargaining in good faith.

The minister may feel badly, he may be insulted, but I say he is anti-labour, he is as stubborn and mean as the management of the aircraft plant in Longueuil which kept its workers out for months, or was it years? I think the minister is trying to be fair, and he honestly believes that he is a friend of labour. I say to him—not that he is 100 per cent right, or that the union is 100 percent right—that he has become so emotionally involved in this question that he can no longer look at it objectively or rationally. He outht to remove himself voluntarily from the negotiations at this point. That is why we suggest that with the agreement of both sides a mediator should be appointed to look at the whole question and report back to both parties.

● (2320)

Maybe a mediator would say that the government has given everything it has to give, but both sides could make a fresh start on this strike. The minister says it is not causing great hardship, but it is. It is causing difficulties and trouble for thousands of ordinary people in Canada. Maybe after that action has been taken the strike could be brought to a conclusion with justness and fairness to both sides.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in the short time that I have been here I think most members of this House have come to realize that I am a very conciliatory person, a very reasonable person. I suppose most members know that I am from a constituency where most voters are union members. But I also happen to be in a rather unusual situation of not only having a very strong labour representation but I am one of those people to whom the two previous speakers kept referring, a small businessman. I rather basked in the warmth of their concern for the small businessman because I realized that I am one of the few in this House.

Mr. Gilbert: Bryce doesn't worry about it.

Mr. Anderson: I had a nagging doubt about whether it was the small businessman they were concerned about. As one involved with accounts receivable which are normally sent through the mail, and upon which I depend for my survival in business every month, I have found alternate ways of receiving the funds. We no longer mail them out; we use the phone, an invention which has been around for quite a while. We telephone people whose accounts are receivable and ask them to come to the office instead of sending cash by mail. People do pay their bills when informed of the amount, and most small businessmen have phones—at least in British Columbia.

It seemed to be indicated that a high cost was involved with the use of the telephone and courier services, but it is very interesting to note that the Insurance Corporation of British Columbia, which is a government run institution, is providing an excellent service. We pick up our mail from their claims office and, not only that, but they are willing to pick up all the mail for the other independent companies and provide that service. So, Mr. Speaker, business people are perhaps being used as a political ploy to bring into this House the issue of the postal service, in order to have it said that we cannot exist without it.

Mr. Alexander: Be serious.

Mr. Anderson: I am being very serious.

Mr. Alexander: You are not.

Mr. Anderson: Most small businessmen would agree to a fair and just settlement—they would put that before an immediate profit for a few months or a few weeks. Most small businessmen are responsible—I wish some other people were as responsible.

We have had the occasional strike in British Columbia. Unions such as the IWA have been known to strike, but I cannot recall an occasion when the IWA did not inform their membership of the packet that was being presented by management. I have sometimes had doubts as to when strikes should be called and people go out on strike because, from a humanitarian point of view, the wage earner is the one who ultimately suffers.

Although I can appreciate the concern that was expressed by several other members for the public and for business, may I say in all honesty that the person who suffers most is the worker on strike. He cannot afford to lose wages because he is not one of the high wage earners in our economy.

Mr. Hogan: What are you suggesting—that we do away with strikes?

Mr. Anderson: There are several other reasons why I believe the strike was unnecessary. First of all, the mediation report was accepted by the government and, second, the same contract that was offered to the inside workers had been accepted by the outside workers.

I think it is fair to say that historically the two unions have run in tandem. Those who suggest that the inside workers should receive more than the outside workers would only sow seeds of discontent for the future. The IWA and the CPU in British Columbia generally get exactly the same wage settlement because of the type of work they do. Anyone who suggests we should start bringing imbalance in there would be sowing the seeds of discontent for future negotiations.

Third, Mr. Speaker, on October 13 the government brought in guidelines. The union must surely realize that to stay out for six weeks, two months, or whatever period, would be fruitless unless we as a government decided we would not abide by our own guidelines—that we would scrap the program and go into some sort of anarchy. It is the responsibility of the minister in this first test of how we consider the guidelines to make sure that they are followed.

There is the mediation report, parity with the outside workers, and the guidelines. To go on strike and not refer back to their membership is irresponsible leadership, and is not the fault of the inside workers.

As I said earlier, the strike was unnecessary and simply weakens the bargaining position. The government cannot lock out a union. There was no necessity for the strike, and every union member on strike is losing approximately $40 or $50 per day.

There are going to be no winners, Mr. Speaker. Business will not win, the strikers will not win, the people of Canada who depend upon the mail service will not win. Everybody is a loser, but the biggest losers are the strikers. Regardless of any final settlement, they are going to lose money. I wish more members would think about them rather than the people who might not be able to write to an aunt in Regina. That is an inconvenience, but it is not something we cannot live without. The strikers are not highly paid and they can ill afford to lose money. That is a tragedy in a fruitless, unreasonable, and stupid strike.

So far the average inside postal worker has lost $1,000. In order to gain 20 cents an hour they would have to work 5,000 hours. I do not think the minister is anti-labour any more than I am. I am concerned about the workers, not the negotiators who, like most negotiators, can take care of themselves. Mostly I am concerned about the sorters who do the work.

● (2330)

The minister has fought hard to include the automation clause in the negotiations. He has done an excellent job, considering the existence of the guidelines, the settlement of the outside workers, and the matter of the arbitration hearing.

Hon. members, I think, are not concerned about the Post Office workers' right to strike. They want to see inside workers presented with the facts of a settlement. If they do not like the settlement they can refuse it; no one says they should not refuse it if they so choose. Many postal workers, especially in my area, do not know what the package contains. That package should be made known to them for study, and acceptance or rejection.

I have been in touch with many Canadians; their message is loud and clear: if the government is serious about fighting inflation, do not give in to blackmail; do not be coerced, because the people of Canada can put up for some time with not getting mail. The people do not expect the government to give in to unreasonable demands.

I hope that those who are losing money can vote on these questions. We live in a democratic society. Surely the workers in the union should decide their own destiny. After all they are losing money and they should have a voice in accepting or rejecting the settlement. I think the government can live either with an acceptance or rejection. The workers must be free to decide. I therefore hope that the minister will find some way of ensuring that they can decide their own destiny.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the government should have initiated this debate a couple of weeks ago to obtain a consensus of the House, as most of us are fed up to the teeth with the utter nonsense involving the Post Office. Now that we are debating the issue I hope the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) will stop straddling the fence and take steps immediately to get the mail moving.

I know that the government does not want to do anything to help the bandits in the postal unions save face, and I know that the two birds who are holding up the works would like nothing better than have us order the postal workers back to the job. Then they could say that they were only trying to get the posties a better deal but the government would not go back to the table. No matter what we do to get the mails moving again, those two birds, the squeaking, howling parrot, and that Scotch buzzard, Davidson, should be sent packing. Both are no better than blackmailers, and I know that the majority of Canadians are as fed up as I am with this kind of blackmail.

I was really surprised when the great champion of the working man, the leader of the NDP, earlier refused unanimous consent for our motion under Standing Order 43 which called for a national referendum, by secret ballot, on the government's final wage offer. The leader of the NDP must surely know that there is a division in the ranks of the CUPW and that the only democratic way it can be resolved is by a secret ballot vote. Perhaps the hon. member's sentiments are with the union chiefs, not with the workers. It could be that, like Joe Davidson, he is afraid to allow the workers to vote in a supervised, secret ballot referendum.

This afternoon I was speaking to the radio station of my area and was told that in southern Ontario the following post offices are now open: Alliston, Borden, Aurora, Huntsville, Keswick, Midland, Orillia, Penetang and Bradford. This represents 56 per cent of the workers of the area, but does not include Toronto.

[Mr. Anderson.]

An hon. Member: Don't forget Elmira and Orangeville.

Mr. Darling: Yes. As I say, that does not include that postal monstrosity on Front Street, Toronto.

Mr. Nystrom: I didn't know you had bought real estate.

Mr. Darling: I have not. I talked to the radio station in my riding. There happens to be one in Parry Sound-Muskoka.

It is high time the Postmaster General put aside his fears that he might offend someone if he orders the postal workers back to their jobs. It is time for the Postmaster General to stop worrying about whether or not he will help Davidson and Parrot save face. It is time for the minister to save the postal service; then we can take any other steps necessary to prevent this sort of thing happening every couple of months.

The minister has been saying that the mail may not move again until Easter. Although this may be true if we sit by and do nothing, I think we have given the union chiefs time enough to resolve this matter if they really have it in their mind to settle the strike. It is obvious from all the grandstanding that Davidson and Parrot have been doing that they do not have any intention of acting responsibly. They seem to be basking in the attention they are getting from the media, and when I see them prancing and preening on television I cannot see that they have anything on their minds except themselves.

Some NDP spokesmen have said that the Postmaster General has behaved like a prima donna on television. Certainly he has appeared on TV, but he does not take a back seat to Parrot. I have watched Parrot for some time, and the only time his mouth did not move was for the three or four hours he sat in this gallery with his henchmen listening to the debate. Now I see that he has vanished, like the Arabs.

An hon. Member: Should that not be henchwoman?

An hon. Member: Or hench person?

Mr. Darling: Let's call them hench people.

It is a matter of record that my party has done just as much to further the cause of collective bargaining as those so-called champions of the little people over on my left. It seems ironic to them, I would think, that those solid citizens they are so pleased to call the little people, trimmed the sails of the NDP in the last election.

Mr. Nystrom: Not in the Ontario election.

Mr. Darling: The working people are pretty big people and it begins to look as though the wallop they pack in the polling booth is giving the NDP a sore jaw. The next time the NDP leader refuses to allow a simple motion an Standing Order 43 to pass, to give those people a chance to vote on whether they want to work, perhaps his own supporters should take him behind the woodshed for a little heart to heart talk.

I have always defended the right of workers to bargain and have a direct hand in deciding their wages and working conditions. This extends to the right to strike when their employers will not bargain in good faith, and to any other reasonable grievance. However, the inside postal workers have been offered a reasonable wage increase. They have also received other concessions from the government. We have come to the point now where we have to decide on just whom we want to run the Post Office, the unions or the Postmaster General. I think the choice is obvious. After all, collective bargaining means just that. It does not mean that the unions demand and the government gives.

If we have reached the point where any union, whichever one it is, will not accept any less than it demands and will withdraw its services until all its demands are met, we have already exhausted the collective bargaining process. It is not bargaining any longer, it is blackmail; and I will not sit still and allow anyone to blackmail me or my constituents.

I think that the time has arrived when we should take a close look at where we are with respect to the matter of collective bargaining and the right to strike, especially in the area of essential services. After all, we have come a long way from the days of the sweat shop, the 14-hour work day, and the rest of the horrors of the early years of the industrial revolution. We have grown up, and in most cases it must be agreed that management and labour have grown up together.

● (2340)

We have labour legislation on the books concerning almost every aspect of the labour market. We have laws governing safety measures on the job and other working conditions, laws governing minimum wages and laws that compel management to deal fairly with labour in disputes. It is time to decide just how much protection we should legislate for the forgotten Canadian, the innocent victims of strikes when essential services are withdrawn by arrogant and thoughtless union bosses who feel that they can get everything they want by denying the public their services.

We have to devise some system of mediation or arbitration whereby workers in essential services are given every right to bargain, but where they are not given the right to strike, or threaten to strike, in order to force a settlement. At the present time, for instance, aside from the fact that Canadians are not able to write or receive letters from friends and loved ones, the entire national economy is being adversely affected by the postal strike, a strike by the way that should not have been called in the first place.

Businesses are suffering through not being able to send bills or receive payments for goods and services supplied. Some businesses have already failed, and others are having a tough time trying to wait out this latest postal strike.

I have not kept score on the work stoppages, slowdowns, strikes, and other interruptions of the postal service in the past ten years, but I have heard other people estimate that these things occur every five or six months. Even if it were only once every year, or every two years, it would be too often. We have stumbled along now for several years with a postal service that is not only slow and in other ways inefficient, but is completely inoperable every few months. I say to this House that we must make a decision, and we must make it soon.

Either we are going to continue to fund a postal service that is so inefficient that it is the laughing stock of the western world, a postal service run by a handful of union bandits instead of by the Postmaster General, or we are going to decide to take a new direction. Our Post Office has gone down about as low as it can go; in fact it is at a standstill. And that seems to be the accepted posture of the Canadian Post Office. Now I believe that it is time for us to start looking up. We have an opportunity to take matters as they stand now and work out a plan as to what we want in the way of a postal service in Canada. If we decide what we want, we can get it.

Since the present strike started I have been forced to send my weekly newspaper reports to my constituency by bus. The cost of doing this is a great deal more than if I had access to the federal postal system, but a package sent from my office on Thursday evening arrives at my constituency office the following day. That is service, the kind of service we could and should get from our Post Office, but it has been many a year since we have had that kind of service from our Post Office.

I am afraid that we are past the point where we can reasonably expect to get first class mail service again, at least not in the foreseeable future. The only way we will ever have an efficient mail service, one that does not shut down every time there is a minor dispute between the unions and the Postmaster General, is for this House to give the minister a mandate to clean house in the Post Office and establish once and for all that the Postmaster General is in charge of the Post Office. Anyone who does not want to accept that simple fact should be told to seek employment elsewhere. Right now the postal employees are turning up their noses at a wage increase that will bring their annual income to above $13,000 per year and, believe me, I challenge each and every one of the people who sneer at that salary to try to find a job anywhere else that will pay that kind of money for doing what they do in the Post Office.

Joe Davidson has a lot of his members believing that he can get them that kind of money for working only 30 hours a week if they will just hold out and refuse to sort mail until the government gives in. I think that the temper of this House is about the same as the temper of the Canadian people at this point. The majority of us are fed up with Davidson's and Parrot's posturing and primping. It is past time for us to serve notice on them that their tactics are not going to work any more, not for another day or for another hour.

They have shown us that they are not interested in anyone else except themselves. Davidson has said on public television "to hell with the public". Only a few days ago he laughed and said that he guessed that he would have to live with that remark. You bet he will have to live with it. I say to Davidson, "to hell with power-hungry, irresponsible and arrogant union leaders." Perhaps "holy Joe" believes that he can bring Canada to its knees and that he can keep sticking the knife in and twisting it until he gets everything he wants. The trouble is that even if he gets everything he demands today, he will be back next week or next month, until we finally run out of patience, and run the arrogant so and so out of the country.

I think we should take this opportunity tonight to let the Postmaster General know that the vast majority of people favour his stand not to give in to Joe Davidson's blackmail tactics. I would like to be able to say that the Postmaster General has my unqualified support, but to get that he is going to have to do more than just stand pat. The minister accepted the Post Office portfolio, and the portfolio carries with it a responsibility to maintain postal service in Canada.

Standing up to Davidson's bombastic posturing is a good start, but it is only a start. To get the show back on the road the minister must take the necessary steps to see that the rank and file of the CUPW are allowed to vote in a national, secret-ballot referendum, under proper supervision to ensure that the union executive is not able to rig the election. At this point in time I do not have one iota of faith in Mr. Davidson's integrity. I think that it is very important to allow the union members to vote without fear of retaliation from the thugs in the union.

I heard on tonight's radio news that people have been threatened in different parts of the country and have had threats made against their families. That is not the way decent people conduct business. That is the way gangsters and thugs do business, and it appears that that is the way Joe Davidson would prefer to do business.

In conclusion I would like to call on all of my colleagues, on this side of the House and on the government benches, to let the Postmaster General know that we have had enough of the nonsense that has paralyzed the Post Office and that we will support him in any positive steps he chooses to take to restore postal service in Canada. I do not hesitate to remind the minister that there are hundreds of thousands of people looking for jobs in Canada. If the people in the Post Office do not want to work, then fire them and hire people who want to work.

● (2350)

Let us stop playing games and let us keep in mind that the Post Office belongs to the Canadian people and that it is an essential service. To the Postmaster General I say: let us get the show back on the road.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: I am sure the hon. gentleman and his many assistants in the department are reading the editorials in the newspapers, hearing from the little people who are urging him, 10 to 1, no, 100 to 1, in these terms: we have had enough of catering to the unions; cater to the people of Canada who thought, at one time, that they had a good postal service. I am sure the Postmaster General would like to see a return to those standards.

Mr. Nystrom: Would the hon. member permit a question? I should like to ask him whether, in his speech, he was expressing the policy of the Progressive Conservative Party?

Some hon. Members: Oh, sit down!

[Mr. Darling.]

Mr. Darling: In answer to the very knowledgeable member of the New Democratic Party, may I say I have been expressing the policy of, probably, 90 per cent of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: I have also been expressing the policy of a great many other people, and it is a policy I have favoured from the very beginning.

Mr. Nystrom: Would the hon. member permit a further question?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. This is not a question period. The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones).

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Madam Speaker, my remarks this evening will be very brief. The subject of debate tonight is of great importance to the nation, all sections of which are at the mercy of certain hardened attitudes and certain individuals.

The long term effects of the continued breakdown of collective bargaining will cause substantial damage not only to those directly involved but to the economy generally; indeed, the effect might be to drag the nation to the ground.

I have a great deal of respect for the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) mainly because at one time he happened to live in the constituency of Moncton. But the remarks of the Postmaster General tonight have done nothing but add further fuel to an inferno which is already spreading great damage and causing irreparable harm. Likewise the union representatives have in the past done and said things which should have been left undone and unsaid. Communication via the news media is no way to carry on collective bargaining.

The nation needs a postal service, and the provision of a postal service is a responsibility of government and of parliament. Most nations pride themselves on their postal services. It is time we put our postal service in place. This affects not only business but every home and every individual. The postal strike has gone on long enough now, and we can no longer allow our citizens to suffer because of the personal attitudes of the individuals concerned. There is still a chance for collective bargaining, and if both parties are still concerned about the public interest, then whether through the appointment of a mediator, or by an immediate return to work voluntarily, or by legislation parliament should concentrate, by every means possible, on getting the postal services back into operation.

This is no time to rehash history. We must look to the future, the future of the postal service, the future of our industry and commerce, the future of our people. We must put a stop to the damage and inconvenience which the public is experiencing. We have a responsibility; we must accept it, and take positive steps. We have a job to do, let us get on with that job. There has been a great deal of misunderstanding on the part of both parties. We should attempt to resolve the problem once and for all. If the Postmaster General does not intend to bring in back-to-work legislation immediately, then I would suggest, if he and his colleagues are agreeable, and if the union representatives are agreeable, that as an independent member of parliament I would be willing to sit down with both parties, not in Ottawa, but in a faraway, neutral, friendly territory, namely, Moncton, New Brunswick, in a sincere effort to help resolve the postal strike forthwith.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this particular subject which I am very concerned about because it concerns all the people of Canada, not just certain segments of our society. I am always concerned and always quite dumbfounded by some of the statements made by members of the New Democratic Party, supposedly, those strong supporters of labour.

I was going over today, while I was looking over my notes, some of the background of some of these strong supporters of labour. Perhaps I may just go through them. The leader: University of Toronto, London School of Economics.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Socialist hotbeds.

Mr. Condon: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles): Brandon College, United College and McMaster University; the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin): Radley College, England and Osgoode Hall; The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom): University of Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Condon: Finally, I found one man, half way down the list, who was labour-oriented—the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), a former CPR man and a man well respected. I am sure his background must have been Liberal because in the old days everybody was Liberal in the CPR and the CNR. I continue with my list—the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt): University of British Columbia; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), who is a strong fighter for labour: Laurentian University and St. Stanislaus College; The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas): McMaster University and Chicago University.

Mr. Gilbert: This is the best speech of the evening!

Mr. Condon: We find yet another in this motley crew of strong labour advocates—the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters): the only one I could find in the list who is proven labour because, of course, he was an organizer for the International Woodworkers Union. I go on to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman): University of Waterloo, and Wilfrid Laurier. The next one is the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), that staunch labour man: University of Manitoba. The next one we come to is the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn): the University of Western Ontario.

Then we run into one who maybe has found the secret of labour, the secret of human kindness, the secret of humanity, the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) who previously had to do with native relations, who knew the meaning of socialist justice and has proven it. How he fell off into the area of the New Democratic Party I do not understand. We cannot all be right all the time.

Then there is the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes): Lakehead College and Queen's University. Finally, because I do not want to leave out any of these prodigious gentlemen who fight for labour so strongly with their strong labour background, there is the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan): St. Francis Xavier and Boston University. Obviously hon. members of this House and, I hope the people of Canada realize the strong and entrenched element of labour in that party. It makes me feel very strong that people should realize the strong labour background of that strong, labour-oriented group.

● (Midnight)

Is it not wonderful to know how to work in a factory, to get one's fingers dirty? Not too many of the members of that group know that. They are the saviours of labour; that is the only way to go. They tried to save labour in my riding, but thank God we won the people back, some 2,000 in that area. If they follow the example they have shown in the first 18 to 19 months of this parliament, we will win an even bigger margin next time.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) said the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) was straddling the fence. I am sure everyone in this beautiful country of Canada realizes that the Postmaster General has never straddled the fence from the beginning of his political life to the present day, so I feel that the hon. member's remarks were not appropriate at this time. This gentleman is fighting for all Canadians in making sure that the fellows in the labour movement who at the present time are causing problems do not give the labour movement a black eye, as they have been trying to do in the last six to seven months. This disgusts me and everyone involved in labour.

These supposed gentlemen from CUPW—I give them the benefit of the word gentlemen, though I see the leader of the NDP shaking his head—I will leave that up to him—these gentlemen are now starting to bring the movement back to the point where my father fought for it in the thirties. People are classing the labour movement as one group, but not all labour leaders are irresponsible. In most cases labour unions are responsible. They have a responsible motive in trying to get a fair wage for hard work. These supposed labour leaders are putting down the drain all of the things my father and grandfather worked for, and I do not like that. They are turning over things for which they worked very hard. You remember the thirties when—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but he must address the Chair, not members opposite.

Mr. Condon: I apologize, Madam Speaker. My grandfather, my father, and I have been in the labour movement, and my grandfather would turn over in his grave at what is taking place. It was a fight at the beginning, but through the democratic process they were able to sit down with management and come to an agreement without civil strife. This is not what the gentlemen who are leading CUPW are doing today. They are forcing division in the labour movement and in the country, and they are losing the opportunity to put the labour movement ahead. I see the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) smiling. I am not sure what his background or his father's is, but my grandfather fought for the labour movement. He was on the railroad, which is why I have such great respect for the hon. member.

I hope every member of the House will go into the lunch room and find out what people in the labour movement are thinking. They have now reached the point where they are losing faith in their leaders. When they lose faith in their leaders they lose their direction. When they lose their direction it could be time for revolt in the labour movement. I do not want to see that, and I do not want any member of this House or anyone in the galleries to be responsible for it. If they are, then they will have to answer to a lot of people who for many years have worked to make the labour movement what it is today.

I appreciate the views of the Postmaster General. All Canada is looking at what the government is going to do now. Is it going to stand firm and strong, or is it going to back off? Certainly I would support the Postmaster General in his efforts, because I think the key to this country over the next 15 years is what we do right now.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to join all those who have spoken on the motion before us and depending on one's point of view in the debate, we all seem to be a little right since, the situation being what it is, we must confess that unfortunately once more it proves to be disastrous and shows beyond any doubt that we are not yet mature enough to find appropriate ways of preventing it from happening.

I should like to take some time to deal with that particular angle, so that we can realize once and for all the need to discover normal ways of arriving at settlements agreeable to parties concerned, not only in the Post Office, but also in all sectors of economic activity in the country, thinking precisely that that strike will end one day and we will immediately embark on another one somewhere else.

That is the most deceiving and unjustifiable thing, Madam Speaker. How come indeed, in 1975, we are still obliged to resort to extreme action to solve problems? That is not good enough. We are not living in the Middle Ages. Communications today have developed so much that, as I said, it is unacceptable that an agreement cannot be reached, that it is impossible to talk, discuss and reach a decision. That is not good enough! And moreover, we find that those means which should be used in the last resort are in current use. They are now commonplace, as it were. We live with that. We accept the fact, we admit it and are ready to go on like this.

● (0010)

This is so true, Madam Speaker, that after the first indications that a strike was possible and could last a certain time, already arrangements were being made to cope with this strike and try to deliver the mail just the same, to settle the most urgent problems, such as the delivery of old age pensions, family allowances and unemployment insurance benefits. I found it quite strange that steps were being taken even before the strike. This means that we find quite normal to resort to a contingency plan which should only be considered in an extreme situation.

Madam Speaker, it is very sad indeed to find that we have reached such a point. I would not want to decide who is right and who is wrong, but rather I wonder whether the time has not come to seriously consider ways to settle the major problems that strikes have become. Why not once and for all stop to think and find mechanisms which would make strikes useless? I would not say that the right to strike should be taken away, but I say that we are irresponsible if in 1975 we fail to find a way to prevent strikes.

Of course, as others have stressed before me, very often workers resort to this extreme method, the strike, to win their case, but that does not always reflect the views of the workers as a whole in a given area. I agree with those who advocate a secret vote and not a vote by a show of hands, so that every worker may be allowed to voice his real opinion, namely, whether he wants to resort to strike or not. It is quite obvious that, unfortunately, many union leaders seem to want to justify their role and their job. To acknowledge that fact is not being anti-labour. Unfortunately, such are the facts.

It seems therefore that these union leaders or important labour associates justify their positions. In order to prove to the rank and file that they are necessary, useful and essential, they cause or provoke troubles artificially, for, as indicated by one of the previous speakers, it is something of a paradox that while there are hundreds of thousands of workers who are anxiously seeking employment, others are not satisfied with the jobs they have. Quite a paradox!

I feel it is necessary, however, to take into account the situations as they are, and to find accordingly a solution to the present conflict, but especially, as I stated in my opening remarks, devote some time seriously considering final solutions to all the conflicts which are troubling the Canadian economy, concerning society and demoralizing our people. Let us not deny it: we have reached that stage.

Madam Speaker, the Postmaster General, the government and this Parliament must absolutely decide to put an end to that postal strike and, overmore, to find a way to avoid strikes once and for all. As I suggested through a motion under Standing Order 43, when we have found a way to avoid that strike, it will have become obsolete.

It has often been suggested, and I say it again, that we will finally have to set up labour courts, similar to our courts of justice. Those who would be called upon to judge will, of course, be chosen very objectively. They would have the same authority as ordinary courts. That is the solution towards which we must strive, which we must achieve so that, when there is disagreement between employer and employee, after discussions have been held, if no agreement has been reached then both parties can go before one of those labour tribunals who will pass objective judgment on the worthiness of the claims of the employee and the value of the objections of the employee. The judgment once passed, would then be irrevocable just as that of our courts of justice.

Madam Speaker, these abnormal situations must be done away with; I would even call them childish. I have four little boys, the oldest is 13, the youngest six; they say at home: If you do not give me this, I shall do that. This is childish.

We are adults and we are discussing simply to get to blackmail: give me this or else I stop working, give us that or we do not distribute mail any more. It is terrible to have to resort to such procedures in 1975. It is childish.

It is absolutely necessary to find a solution to ensure that these things do not happen and this is why I do insist on a basic agreement, a major settlement for all conflicts which are likely to happen; this way, it would not be necessary to discuss repeatedly a settlement in a given area.

I think that this should be taken into account and that we should move towards an immediate review in this field. True, others have talked about it before me. To whom are those strikes most harmful? The first ones to bear the brunt are the strikers themselves.

It is unfortunate that this should be so. They are those who will be the first victims. Evidently the whole society will also suffer the consequences of their action, but I believe that as representatives of the people we cannot let this go on unchecked for long.

Therefore, in my view, the minister and the government are under obligation to settle this conflict immediately with whatever means are at our disposal. But we should also endeavour to find real solutions to those problems so that they never come up to the House again.

● (0020)

[English]

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I am certainly surprised that a member of this House, especially the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) who spoke recently could be so narrow minded that he would think everyone in this country could use the telephone and would not need mail service. I am surprised at the intelligence of such a member of this House.

I have a story to tell. I want every member of this House to picture a small, remote, northern settlement which has no television, no newspapers, and depends on airstrips and the mail as its means of communication with the outside world. The story I have to bring to the attention of this House is not fiction. It is an indication of how some people try to cope with government bungling. In November of 1974 a little old lady in a remote area of Manitoba was visited by her doctor who prescribed medication for the treatment of her ailment. The nearest drug store was some 236 air miles away. This lady is a senior citizen. She is dependent on her pension. Her pension is her only means of support.

She had the problem of making arrangements with the drug store some 236 air miles away to send in her medication by mail each month on the same plane that brought in her pension cheque. The arrangements were completed and everything went well until the postal strike of last February. At that time, as we all know, the mail came to a complete stop. This really hurts the people in remote areas because the mail is their only means of communication with the outside world.

This little old lady was not going to be caught without her medication. She scurried around and made arrangements to have her medication brought in on the sched-runs which are part of the class III operations of the air carriers in the north. These are weekly runs into the various communities. Everything was arranged. She was to have a parcel shipped in a little package. It would come in on the sched-run. In this way she would receive her medication. Thankfully the strike was settled without too much delay and she was able to have her pension cheque to pay for the medication.

But this little old lady did not intend to be caught without her medication again, so she continued to receive the medication in the little package on the sched-run. She did not intend to depend on the Post Office to bring this much needed medication to her. This practice worked fine until, lo and behold, the Ministry of Transport in July made a decision. There are five airstrips in northern Manitoba that are served exclusively by air. These communities found that their airstrips were taken out of the class III operations and they were virtually left with an air system by which there would be only charter aircraft coming into their area.

The residents of northern Manitoba wondered just who would make a decision like this to cut off not only their mail but their only means of transportation. They came to the decision that the person responsible was probably some bureaucrat sitting in a comfortable office in Ottawa who had an all-year round airstrip at his service, and who was not thinking of the people in the remote areas.

Now, back to the story. After the bureaucratic ruling was made that these airstrips were not up to the national standard necessary for air carriers to operate a class III service, the operation was suspended except for charter flights. This was the second blow to strike this little old lady, but she was determined to live and cope with the decision of this great government. She made arrangements with the pilot to bring in the medication on the same day the pension cheque arrived. At last she could rest; but not for long, because, lo and behold, by the middle of October another postal strike was under way.

This little old lady was not going to give up. She had ten months of fighting with the government. She tried to outsmart the government. She was bound she would fight with the government to obtain the medication she so desperately needed. The medication had helped her regain strength so she walked down to the local post office which had remained opened. Although the post office was open it was only handling local mail. After she had arrived at the post office she spoke with the local postmaster who really did not have much to do because there was not much mail to handle. The mail was not coming in from the outside to this remote area.

After jawing for a while with the postmaster she asked if he had anything that she might read. Time was very heavy on her hands now. He said "Yes, we have some material here. On the last plane that came in before the strike we received 700 copies of the government's latest shiny new edition of 'How the Tax Dollar is Spent' ".

The citizens of Canada have no one to bargain on their behalf. This lady has no one to bargain on her behalf. She is caught in the middle. She does not belong to a union and therefore has no one to fight for her. She has no communication with the outside world. She depends entirely on the mail service to bring her news of the outside world and the medication she so desperately needs. I cite only this example. This situation could be duplicated many times if we think of the parts of Canada other than the great corridor running from Montreal to Windsor.

There is another part of the country in which people are suffering because of the mail strike. I say, let us get the mail moving again. Then we should start working on Canada's postal service in an effort to bring it back to the excellent high standard of efficiency it once had. In my estimation at one time Canada had one of the best postal services in the world. I would certainly support the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) in his efforts to get the Post Office back on the right road because it is Canada and the people who live in this country who suffer.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, before saying a few words about the Post Office I should like to make one or two corrections. An hon. member made a statement to the effect that the minister is not aware that people are suffering. He quoted the minister as having said that. I think this is very improper.

● (0030)

The minister made it very clear that he is well aware of the fact that people are suffering and are suffering a great deal. These people who are suffering are writing to him saying, "I am suffering, but I am behind you", and that is a very different thing from saying that the minister does not know the people are suffering. He is very aware of that.

An hon. Member: How did they send the letters they wrote?

Mr. McRae: I have heard suggestions in the House and outside it that would put collective bargaining back 50 years, with people who have said, "Get those posties back to work and give them 10 per cent, that is all they are worth".

An hon. Member: You have not heard that here.

Mr. McRae: I said not necessarily in here. Then I have heard other suggestions, particularly from the NDP, which would give away the public purse completely. I think that between these areas there is something worthwhile to be said.

The problems of the Post Office today are not something that just happened in the last three or four weeks. They are very long term problems which go back to the early 1960s and the relationship between employees and employers and between the management and some of the local post offices and their employees. Sometimes this situation has been described as open warfare.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) is perhaps the one person who is most aware of that. I talked to him many times before he was given this post and I know he understands these problems. We are talking about relations that in many cases are really deplorable. When he came to this job, and I talked to him about it at that time, his ambition was to get a good settlement for the postal employees and give them a feeling that they are somebody, that they are important, and to develop relations in the Post Office which would result in a decent postal service, the kind we had in the early 1960's and before. That was his aim then, and that is his aim today. So what did he do? He sat down with the Treasury Board, he sat down with the Letter Carriers Union of Canada, and he got a good settlement, far more than the Treasury Board wanted to pay.

This settlement with the letter carriers was ratified by 82 per cent of the employees, and they are a satisfied group.

Now we sit down with the other group, the CUPW. This is a group that has perhaps more problems. They do a job that many people do not want to do, it is a repetitive job, there are conflicts inside. The outside workers can get out more and when they finish their day, they can leave their work. These postal employees are good people, good, solid Canadians, the backbone of our country. They are not wild radicals, but they have problems. So what did we do? We talked to them about all kinds of problems. One of them is the fear of automation. They were concerned about automation and about their jobs and their stake in the community. This is an important concern. We talked about those concerns.

I can tell you there are all kinds of other areas in this country where that has not been the way things have gone. We have said that we would protect these peoples' jobs. We talked about casuals. We were not just talking about what to do when an extra employee comes in, but we talked about that letter sorter who knows 1,500 routes and streets and where the letters went. We talked about that skilled man. When we said we would keep casuals down to a minimum we were saying that that particular full time employee is an important person, and we will pay him time and a half before we bring in a casual because he is important, he has valuable skills, and he can produce for us.

These are the kinds of things that have gone into this settlement, the kind of things that this minister and I want to see happen. We want to see a better postal service. We know that if you give these people a better chance, they will produce, because this is what everyone does. I say to you that that is the kind of settlement we wanted. There are limits, and the limit clearly is the amount that was given to the LCUC. This limit was the 38 per cent monetary settlement. For all kinds of reasons this is the limit, and the only reason we can get this through the Anti-Inflation Board is because historically there is a relationship between the letter carriers and the inside workers.

What concerns me tonight is the suggestion I hear from the NDP that we must have more mediation. To me mediation means one thing, it means getting someone who will find a middle ground between the union and the management. In this particular area there is no middle ground, and 38 per cent is the limit.

The second thing I heard from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) was that he would like to see the postal workers' day cut from 40 to 35 hours. That is a very desirable thing, but when you suggest that you will take a 38 per cent increase and then you compound that by a 12 per cent increase, you end up with about 52 per cent. That is far more than the Treasury will bear, far more than the guidelines will allow, and in general it is not acceptable. These are the suggestions I have heard this evening.

I have heard others say that we should legislate the postal workers back to work. I think that today in this country there is a lot of support for the Postmaster General. He has suggested that in the next 24 hours he will put the content of the Moisan report to the people of this country and to the employees of the Post Office. He is saying that the content of this report has been basically accepted in the collective bargaining. It is the hope of the government, of the minister and of myself, that the employees will look at this, see that it is fair and, with the power they have within their union, will go back to work.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, it has been suggested that one's life is somehow enriched by every new experience through which one passes, but I have been wondering just how my life has been enriched by the new experience I am having tonight, because never in my life have I endeavoured to preach a sermon or make a speech at half past one in the morning. I prefer a different time in the day for it in ordinary circumstances. But I do rise tonight to add my voice to the call for immediate and decisive action to bring to an end a strike in the postal service that has seriously affected and is seriously affecting the whole country.

It is not my intention to deal with the circumstances leading up to this stoppage in postal services, nor will I attempt to attach blame for the situation in which we presently find ourselves. I think sufficient has been said tonight to indicate that it has been of long duration, it has been stormy, and it has not resulted in satisfactory solutions to the problem. We are still in the position where the country is deprived of what we ordinarily consider to be a service that is vitally important to the nation.

● (0040)

I should like to say that the time has come, and actually is overdue, when the public interest must be taken into account and something tangible done to assist them. No doubt there are legitimate grievances behind the postal workers' decision to strike. No matter what the suggestion of leadership, I cannot imagine a group of responsible people putting the country to the inconvenience and hardship of a strike if there was no ground whatsoever for discontent and unrest.

Listening to the discussions that have taken place and the questions asked in this House and answered by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), it seems to me that the government has not been sufficiently sensitive to the causes of concern, frustration and desperation that these workers have experienced.

As we consider the national interest tonight I would say the time for decisive action has come to get the postal service functioning again, and to remove inconvenience and hardship from the Canadian people who have not contributed to the situation.

What we are having tonight is perhaps the continuation of a debate carried on over the past several weeks. The question has been asked; is the postal service an essential service? Without getting too deeply involved in that aspect I would say there is a relationship between that issue and the reason why the strike should be settled forthwith. To the people of Canada who have some degree of social mobility and a measure of economic freedom, the Post Office might not be essential. To large corporations which have ways and means to circumvent the Post Office, again the institution may not be essential.

I might say here, however, that there are many Canadians with whom I come in contact who are not getting along fairly well without regular mail delivery. I was amazed to hear some hon. members speaking tonight and playing down the serious effect the strike is having on certain sectors of the economy. Millions of Canadians and thousands of small businesses look upon the mail service as an essential service, and they are facing real difficulty these days.

We have been assured that provision has been made to get social security and other pension cheques into the hands of those who require them, but that may not be as easy as is pictured. There is the prospect of some people not getting their cheques for some time and many of them are dependent on the cheques coming right on the dot. If they do not they will have difficulty surviving for a week or two. I think the postal service is absolutely necessary to those people.

Hundreds of small businesses, in my constituency and all across the country, are experiencing problems in collecting accounts and sending out invoices and so on. I was amazed to hear a member from British Columbia, who is a small businessman, say that he was getting along very well thank you. He played down the difficulties facing small businesses. Perhaps I have been speaking to smaller businessmen than he, but they say they are facing real problems. We had better not play it down. These sectors of our economy view a dependable mail service as an essential service. Most of them are not big enough to hire their own courier service, or get around the Post Office by some other means.

Numbers of non-profit organizations in this country provide humanitarian services for thousands of people and they depend on regular donations to keep functioning. They face difficulty now, however, and as a result many people are going to suffer because these humanitarian enterprises cannot carry on. That aspect of the situation should be considered.

Another aspect that warrants consideration is the undemocratic nature and dictatorial attitude of some of the union leaders in the strike. Right from the beginning the union leaders have been unwilling to submit the government's proposal to the membership for a vote. The reason is that they know the members do not want a continuation of the strike and would probably ratify the government's offer if it were submitted to a vote.

I understand that violence has been precipitated by union people at various areas across the country. In Ottawa last week an inside postal worker went on radio station CKOY to plead for support for a return to work and to clarify the government contract to his co-workers. I am told his life was threatened by the union on the open line show.

In my riding individuals who returned to work were harassed and theatened by a group who came from Vancouver. They were presumably sent on union orders to intimidate those who had returned to work. This type of conduct, if advocated by the union, amounts to an anti-democratic and dictatorial attitude. As members of the House of Commons and on behalf of the citizens of the country, we should reject outright this type of activity.

I have a telegram here and I did call the officials concerned to ask if I could read it into the record. They told me to go ahead, but still I hesitate to do so. I would not like to think that reading it into the record would bring harassment, threats, and intimidation upon them. The gist of the message is lack of responsible leadership on both sides. A request has been made for the government to legislate the union membership back to work. There is some indication of a wish to have the outstanding issues submitted to binding arbitration. That is the message coming to us from a local postal union and it indicates the attitude of many postal workers.

● (0050)

The Postmaster General should be commended for saying in the House that workers suspended by the union can still work in the Post Office. The statement will help to alleviate the fears of some postal workers. A union official indicated to me that workers have been threatened with the withdrawal of union cards, with the take-over by head office of their union, and with loss of jobs, pensions, and other benefits accruing to them from years of service in the Post Office.

I support something definite being done to bring this matter to a satisfactory conclusion, because the sorts of threats to which I referred cannot be reconciled with the union's professed concern for the welfare of Post Office employees for that attitude, if it exists, is more reprehensible than injustice from which workers may have suffered.

The Postmaster General is not without blame, as his comments have generated resentment instead of good will. He has failed to act decisively in resolving the longest postal strike in our history.

All this points to one thing, the necessity for negotiating and concluding negotiations before the expiry of the contracts. Why should the parties wait until a contract has expired and then go through the motions of negotiation, conciliation, or whatever may take place? I think these matters ought to be considered before the present contract expires; and the process can be carried on by negotiation and mutual agreement between the two groups concerned. Perhaps it ought to be brought to final arbitration and a settlement imposed in the interest of the national economy.

I appreciate the opportunity for placing my views on record at this early hour of the morning and trust that action will be taken to resolve the strike, return the workers to their jobs, and reinstate our postal service.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, let me say with all the strength of my feelings that I am proud to associate myself with the Postmaster General's actions thus far. Probably I shall be proud of his actions in future. We are dealing with an existing situation, not with a situation which may exist in the future. For that reason we must be careful to consider the best way of dealing with this matter in the present in order that we do not adversely affect events in the future.

His past actions show the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) to be a most human and interested person. He has been worried about what might happen to workers with the advent of automation. His concern was apparent when the huge plant at Mississauga was erected. He wondered if the workers' social adjustment had been taken into consideration, if their physical amenities like showers and recreational facilities were adequate, and if there was opportunity for them to socialize after work. In my presence, and on television, the Postmaster General has indicated his concern for Post Office workers, and I am confident that he, being a most human, warm Canadian, will do all he can for them.

I cannot forget what a great part the postman played in my growing up. The pension cheque was important in my household, my father being a totally disabled veteran. I remember the old postman sometimes coming to my mother and telling her not to worry, that he would speak to the sorters and bring the cheque as quickly as possible. Today, when so many people live in apartment buildings, postmen put the mail in mail boxes without ever talking to the people they serve. Yet the letter carrier can still show strong interest in those he serves. I think the Postmaster General understands all this.

Let me tell hon. members a story about the Postmaster General which he probably does not know I know. But, after all, little happens in Verdun that is not known fairly soon in places far away. Recently I was speaking at the anniversary of the church in the riding, and I learned that the Postmaster General was speaking that same evening in that city. All this took place before the present strike.

At that time we were witnessing a slowdown of the mails, and I understand that the Postmaster General was on the way home from his speaking engagement at about the present time of day, in the early hours of the morning. He turned to his driver and asked if anything of interest had happened in the constituency. He was told that a family in the constituency was expecting an important registered letter from Toronto; the family was anxiously awaiting it but it had not been delivered.

Apparently the Toronto office had clearly indicated that the letter had arrived at the old post office on Church Avenue, Verdun, but had not been sorted. The Postmaster General said, "Well, I guess we had better go down there." His driver said, "Is it not a little late? Should we not go home?" The Postmaster General said, "No" and went down to the post office.

You can just imagine the Postmaster General walking in the door of the post office in his tuxedo, and the surprise of the people behind the wicket. The Postmaster General asked about the letter, but was told that there had been so much mail that the letter probably had not been sorted. So the Postmaster General took off his evening jacket and said, "Let's look in that pile; perhaps we shall find it."

In the meantime the telephone rang. Apparently the manager in charge of the post office, realizing the urgency for the person concerned, had looked for the letter and delivered it by hand. So the Postmaster General put on his coat, looked up and said. "If you ever need any help, give me a call and I will be glad to help you any time."

That shows you how human the Postmaster General is in his relations with the workers. He does not order, does not demand, but sets an example. He shows how the people should be served.

That is the kind of person I know the Postmaster General to be. I am not ashamed to speak this way, because when I was a young man at university and he was an alderman, he hired me to work for him. So I have had some strong experience of the man and that is why I have so much confidence in him.

An hon. Member: Yes, and I have a tear in my eye.

Mr. MacFarlane: I am not interested in the hon. member's tears. I am interested in his listening, and in his saying something important, if he has anything important to say.

● (0100)

I have become convinced in the debate tonight. I have heard almost everyone stand up and say in a very sincere way what they think should be done. I did not get the impression that anyone stood up just for the sake of speaking. In my way I have spoken strongly to indicate that there are some people who have a close relationship with the Postmaster General and believe in him. That is my purpose in saying what I have said. Other members have stated ways in which they think the situation should be solved.

The major opposition has said, "Legislate them back to work to solve the situation." The NDP in its way has said, "Start bargaining all over again." The government, through the Postmaster General has said in very clear terms that we are on the beaches. That is what this is all about. This is what this war on avarice is all about.

We are on the beaches. We are speaking tonight as Canadians. Postmen, opposition, members of parliament, small businessmen, whatever your lot or your background may be, we are on the beaches. We do not feel embarrassed at standing there very firmly and saying we take the stand that the time for patriotism has come.

This is indeed a war of avarice. It must start at some point. We are fortunate that in our front echelon we have a Postmaster General who has taken that stand. That is the stand he has taken. If you listened to his speech you will note that he not so much wanted to tell you about the past but to do something now and, in doing something now, we might save the future.

An hon. Member: Say something, Gus.

Mr. MacFarlane: I have made no remarks about your university education. I think it would be worthwhile thinking of that factor and not continually saying what might or should be done. I saw many of us standing together in the fight against inflation tonight as we have done since I came to this parliament. I say we should enjoin the Postmaster General, accept his stand on the beach and accept his call which is, "Join me in the fight." In this case let us stand and say to all of those who would utilize any method of power, "Slow down the situation which has become so serious in this country." I still have to conclude that because I am not getting through to the backbenchers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Just get off the beach.

Mr. MacFarlane: Actually the beach was a very important place to be when there was only one beach left and only one island. We should not forget it. It was indeed a very important beach. If a certain man had not said we face the most terrifying of times, if he had not believed that he should stand all alone and wait to give time to those who had poor eyesight to get half ready—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is not a dry eye in the House.

Mr. MacFarlane: —unless you are willing to accept that, we are not going to attack the situation properly. If members opposite think that this is just a parliamentary discussion on whether or not we should legislate on a strike, we should not be speaking at this time of night. We are speaking on a very serious principle, whether the government at this moment is doing what it thinks is best for the good of this country and attempting to succeed in doing that without being delayed by many forces. The forces that will come after the Post Office will be many more. We are only facing one such night of debate.

I hope we will be standing here some night when I am hoarse, bedraggled, and worn, still saying one more chance. The Postmaster General is saying give those workers another chance to speak to their leaders. Let us give those leaders another chance to believe.

An hon. Member: What leaders?

Mr. MacFarlane: They are union leaders like I presume myself to be a leader in my constituency. They too are important. This the minister doesn't forget. That is the important aspect of what he is doing, with no concern for himself, his health or his person, but with a great deal of concern for people. I ask members very strongly to support him in this matter. I hope that a great deal of strength will come, not only from this side but the opposite side of the floor.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), for moving the motion that is permitting us to have this special debate on the postal crisis this evening. Because it is already one o'clock in the morning I will try to be as brief as possible. This is an extremely serious matter that we are discussing, and Canadians have been wondering why parliament has not been more active before now in dealing with the strike.

The government has indicated that nothing concrete will happen at the conclusion of our debate. Tomorrow the strike will still be continuing and the millions of Canadians who need adequate postal services will continue to be denied them. What the debate will do is to allow us to put on record the fact that our constituents are demanding an end to this strike and that the time has come for the government to act.

My colleagues and I in the Progressive Conservative party for several weeks resisted pressures upon us to call for a legislated end to the strike because we believed that the collective bargaining process should be given every opportunity to work without parliament's intervention. It must be clear by now, however, that the strike will not end without parliament's intervention, and the time for us to take action is now.

Every day that the strike continues brings more suffering for those least able to cope with its effects. For hundreds of thousands of retired Canadians this means that dividend cheques needed to pay for their rent or food are prevented from arriving, and that many of them with families abroad or long distances away have lost contact with their relatives.

For Canada's small businessmen the strike has cost millions of dollars already and the bill continues to mount each day the strike drags on. Before long many small businesses will be forced to close their doors because they simply cannot continue to carry unpaid bills for many more weeks. The cost will be high in terms of lost jobs and a declining rate of recovery from the present recession.

For the postal workers the strike has already cost each of them a considerable amount of money. One of the previous speakers used the figure of $1,000. For every Canadian, the added cost and inconvenience caused by this continuing strike will be great, and I believe that the protection of the public interest demands that the workers be sent back to work.

During the time I have been in Ottawa I have had a number of occasions when I spoke to protest the enormous inefficiency of the Post Office and the constantly increasing cost of this government department that is providing steadily declining levels of service. I have received hundreds of complaints from constituents about lost or delayed mail, or about the staggering waste of money spent to improve the public image of the Post Office. What is remarkable, however, is that virtually none of the complaints I have received has involved discourtesy or sloppiness on the part of the workers in our area. My experience is that our local workers have done more to enhance the reputation of the Post Office than any number of striped mail boxes or slick advertising campaigns.

● (0110)

What is disturbing is that morale among these workers has been declining along with the deterioration in the general level of service provided by the Post Office, because no amount of work on their part can make up for the breakdowns which occur in the postal system in our large cities. It is there that the greatest problem exists. My constituents feel the time has come for a complete re-evaluation of the Post Office and its activities. They are fed up with their mail being delayed for weeks on end. They are sick of receiving envelopes and parcels which have been torn open in transit and separated from their contents. And they feel there are better ways to spend the millions of dollars of taxpayers' money earmarked for advertising by the Post Office.

[Mr. Beatty.]

What the small businessmen in my area find particularly galling is that a government which is constantly picking their pockets, or showering them with miles of forms to fill out, or invading their businesses to scrutinize their books, or devising one new regulation after another, should prove so totally incapable of running its own operations. The simple fact is that if any businessman ran his operation the way the Post Office is being run, the government would have put him out of business long ago.

It should not be necessary to point out that the Post Office is an essential service in Canada. There is simply no other way of delivering the volume of parcels and messages that should be delivered by the Post Office if it were functioning. The reason for this is that the Post Office is the largest monopoly in the country and that, unlike the private monopolies and cartels which the government is quick to condemn, it is a coercive monopoly, one which enjoys the power of the law to protect its position. It is ironic in these circumstances that the former postmaster general has progressed from leading the country's largest monopoly to becoming Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), a responsibility he discharges by travelling the countryside denouncing cartels and monopolies and threatening to jail businessmen.

The government cannot have it both ways. It cannot continue to maintain its monopoly position and then allow the essential services it is running to be shut down for long periods. Already this strike has been the longest in our postal history and no end to it is yet in sight. If the government is serious about ensuring that Canadians receive the service they deserve it will have to take a serious look at the alternatives available for the future. I say this because the average person will not stand for continued breakdown of the Post Office. Either the government will have to encourage private competition with the Post Office, or else it will be obliged to find new ways of settling labour-management disputes as well as dramatically upgrading the efficiency of the department.

Just this afternoon I was talking on the telephone with a small businessman in my constituency. He told me he wished he could find some method of getting his mail delivered that he could afford, because the delivery services presently operating are too expensive for small businesses to use. He was just one of thousands of cases where small businesses are being paralyzed by the postal strike.

I have spoken strongly in this House in support of civil rights which are being threatened. My stand on human rights is on record and I will continue to speak out in the future when I feel they are being infringed upon. But I have never believed that to deny the vast majority of people their right to essential services constitutes the human right of anyone, nor have I felt that a situation in which one party to an issue—in this case the government—could be Crown attorney, judge and jury, is one which can best lead to the solutions of our problems. When the welfare of our citizens can be held to ransom by a small group in an essential service there is no right to strike or lock out—there can only be the privilege to strike or lock workers out. It is time for that privilege to be withdrawn in the present situation, and for a fair and rational substitute to be put in place.

Over the last several months I have talked to a number of postal workers in my area. They are dedicated and hard-working; they did not want to strike. What they wanted was the opportunity to settle their differences with the government in a fair way without leaving their jobs. They were vexed by the fact that no negotiations for a new contract had taken place before their old contract ran out, and they were disturbed by the escalating war of words between the Postmaster General and the union leadership. They felt they deserved an increase in their salaries, those salaries having been eaten away by inflation and no longer being in line with those of people in similar jobs. I believe they were justified in seeking an increase.

They were also concerned about deteriorating working conditions in the Post Office and the sagging morale of the workers. Once again they were right in their worries, and they were correct too in deploring the use of television cameras in new facilities to monitor workers as though they were presumed to be thieves even before anything was missing.

What they were looking for was a way to solve their differences with management without having to engage in a strike which would gain them little and would serve only to enrage an increasingly hostile public. They knew that if they went on strike the government would be able to legislate them back to work on its own terms, but they could see little alternative to doing so. Already many of the people in my area have gone back to work. The Elmira post office, for example, re-opened on November 7, and the Orangeville workers have also returned to the job. I believe the workers would like to go back throughout most of Ontario and I think the union leadership is aware of this fact. Surely this is the reason they are doing whatever they can to prevent their membership having the opportunity to vote on the government's latest offer.

With the irresponsible and arrogant attitude of the present union leadership it is clear the postal workers will likely continue to be denied their right to vote. That is why I was disappointed that the leader of the NDP today prevented the House from accepting a motion which could have resulted in the rank and file of the union having the opportunity to decide what course of action would be followed now.

I listened to the hon. member's rationalisation on the radio this evening and I was disappointed that he should have sought to justify his opposition to the motion on the grounds that he saw it as a means of undermining the union leadership. He knows very well that such a vote could only bolster their position if they enjoyed anything like the support they claim to have. A vote on the contract could damage them only if they had been inflating the support they claimed from within the membership. I suspect that the leader of the NDP is aware of that fact, which is why he raised his voice in objection. In doing so he did a disservice both to the union membership and the Canadian public.

The government has the power to end this strike and it should do so before more time is lost. However, hon. gentlemen opposite must also demonstrate that they are aware of the more fundamental issues underlying the strike. They must recognize that negotiations for a new contract should begin long before the old contract expires. And they must recognize that the privilege of striking and locking out in essential services must, if the public interest is to be protected, be replaced by binding arbitration which would be fair to both workers and management and, most important of all, be fair to the Canadian public.

The government must show itself willing to deal with its workers on the basis of mutual trust. The closed circout television cameras now being used to spy on the workers should be removed from work areas. What is even more important, the government must show moral leadership both in the fight against inflation and in the restoration of a belief in the importance and dignity of work.

The government has created a social climate in which work thrift, and restraint are looked upon as a sucker's game. It has asked the working people to show restraint at the same time as it raids their earnings to pay for wasteful projects such as the senseless advertising campaign for the Post Office, costing more than $400,000, which included that meaningless advertisement showing a rural doctor mailing blood samples to the city. When I saw this advertisement I was shocked by this waste of money and I put a question on the order paper about it asking how much it had cost. The Postmaster General replied that it had cost $435,000. It included the suggestion that the Post Office feels "our mail is vital".

I asked the Postmaster General how many complaints of lost or damaged mail had been received by the Post Office in 1974 and his answer was that about 125,000 complaints had been received. I asked a further question—whether the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) was looking into the possibility of suing the Post Office for fraud, since it had claimed that the safe handling and delivery of Canadian mail was vital. The answer to that question was, no. It seems that fraud in government is quite different from fraud in the private sector; government would have acted more quickly there.

The Postmaster General should take a close look at the $2 million spent by the so-called public affairs group in the Post Office who are in fact nothing more than overpaid P.R. men for the Post Office.

If the government is to restore the work ethic in Canada it must also start to look at the unemployment insurance system which all too often subsidizes clever frauds at the expense of the working man, at the very same time as people who need help because they are sick or injured are refused it by the government. It should be remembered that, when we look at the malaise in the Post Office today, it was in the unemployment insurance program that the minister worked his last magic before turning his attention to the Post Office.

This strike must be ended now, and work must begin on overhauling the Post Office to turn it into a modern and efficient means of communication between Canadians and a rewarding place to work for the thousands of people it employs. Canadians are disturbed—as indeed they should be—by the fact that while the Post Office deficit has more than tripled in the past three years the quality of service has deteriorated badly. They have a right to demand leadership from the government, and if our efforts here tonight result in the re-appraisal of government policy toward the Post Office we will have achieved a great victory for the people of this country.

Postal Strike

● (0120)

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, much has been said here tonight. Words have poured undaunted from the mouths of many of my learned and very dignified colleagues.

Mr. Alexander: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): But what do all these words mean? How many of the words spoken here tonight will be remembered when the lights are finally dimmed in these spacious surroundings? Will they all go for naught? Will these words, as so many times in the past, fall on deaf ears? I know they fall on deaf ears here. We look around from time to time and wonder who is listening.

Mr. Peters: We are listening.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): I hope members on this side listen to what is said from the other side, and I hope that from time to time members over there stop hollering for long enough to listen to what is said on this side.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Get the whip to get your boys out.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): If there are so many of you who want to speak, there is no time limit on the debate and it can be allowed to go on until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon, in which case I am sure all will have their turn.

It is so easy for us here tonight to do what we are doing now, to wage political war on each other. What do we accomplish by this? Yet the words spoken in these political battles will be forgotten as surely as many of the words said here tonight will be forgotten within 24 hours.

An hon. Member: You are turning it into a political arena.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): If you want to do that we can start right now. I do not have to repeat the message that has been repeated time and time and time again, both tonight and during the course of various stages of debate in the House of Commons. It is the voice of Canadians crying from one corner of the land to the other for reason. It is a voice crying for reason whether in this House, whether in the Post Office in the isolated outposts of the far north, in the far flung farms of the prairies, the fishing villages on both coasts, or the mighty metropolis up into the heart of Canada. What we are hearing throughout this debate is the cry to stop for a minute, listen, and look at the future.

There was a message on television tonight saying that the Canadian Labour Congress will start their $500,000 campaign to combat the government's anti-inflation measures tomorrow. I understand there will be buttons and ad compaigns, and the question we will be asked, which is one that the political leaders and the postal workers should take to heart, is: why me? That is the question that I think the letter carriers and every member of the postal workers' union is asking right now—why me? The answer is a very simple one.

Mr. Alexander: They should ask that question in Toronto.

[Mr. Beatty.]

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) mentions Toronto.

Mr. Alexander: I am telling you what the facts are.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): It is nice to hear the facts from so learned and well educated a gentleman. I am sorry I do not have those qualifications. The answer to all of this has been fully revealed in our debate tonight. Each and every one of us is a Canadian concerned about the future of our country. If the postal workers ask why they should accept the package put forward at this time by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), my answer to them and to the CLC, when they ask why me, is: because they are Canadians and their future depends on it. The future of this country depends on it.

Mr. Horner: Which side are you on?

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): You will never know. We are all concerned about the small businessman. Were the postal union members, in rejecting this contract, showing any concern for the rural mail carriers? I have not heard any member speak of them tonight, yet almost all of them depend upon the delivery of the mail to their areas. They are ready to go to work, and many of them are still at work. The previous speaker mentioned that a couple of postal stations are now open, and I commend them for that. Listowel has also been added to the list recently, and there are many others in western Ontario. Those of us who represent that part of the country can be proud of the fact that the people there take pride in their citizenship and in the fact that they want to work for a fair wage under reasonable conditions. But they do not ask the impossible.

Mail delivery in this country is something we could have been proud of over the years. Many members remember the importance of mail during the war years. Delivery of mail is important now particularly to small businesses in rural areas that not only do not have mail service but transportation to get mail delivered.

To the leaders of the postal workers I offer this old adage: By your actions you will be known. Let us look at some of the actions of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. They want to be known as responsible citizens of this country. Is it responsible to hold 28 illegal stoppages of work in 30 months? What is responsible about that? What have they achieved by going out illegally 28 times in 30 months?

I think the one message we must take from the debate tonight is that there has been a response to the question: why me? Why should the union accept the contract? The answer is: because it is a good contract. It is a contract equal to one accepted by the letter carriers, one that in many respects is above the inflation guidelines.

Why cannot the government offer more? Simply because, as has been stated many times, we cannot afford to offer more. Many times people from my constituency—I am sure it is the same in other constituencies—have asked me when are we going to say no. Now is the time to say no, and there are many more times in the future when we will also have to say no. We must show determination and deliberateness by our actions tonight, and back up the Postmaster General in saying no. We must show him that members of parties on both sides of the House are determined to back him up and continue to do so in the future. The answer for tonight, the answer for tomorrow, and the answer for the future, when someone asks "Why me?" is: because they are Canadians and it is their future we are talking about.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with interest to the debate and I would like to add a few remarks.

The hon. member who spoke before me indicated, as other members before him and the Postmaster General himself, that the current offers are final. If the government decided they could do no more, we now ask for a decision to call those people back to work. For two or three years the situation had been deteriorating. Tonight's debate is concerned with postal workers. Not so long ago there was another postal strike. In other areas, proposals came quite short of meeting the Canadian people's needs and remedy both problems and inequities.

The minister explained he could not solve the problem because of exaggeration on the part of the union. But on the other hand, the postal service has been paralyzed for five or six weeks. We recognize this is an essential service. How long are we going to ponder the issue of essential services and the public interest? Such in my view is the question every member should ask himself. I realize the minister made every effort to reach a settlement.

● (0130)

We recognize the public is faced with serious difficulties because of the postal stoppage. This afternoon again we received representations, as so many others did. In my village, the manager of a very important business firm in the area indicated he was establishing a collection service for the twelve hundred accounts to be collected during the month. There are a large number of such firms across the country.

Last week I was concerned that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) announced the introduction of an emergency service to move correspondence and also family allowance and old age security cheques, and I wondered whether the government was preparing to maintain the status quo for a long time, and that service will apparently cost at least $700,000 a month. Up to what point will that service enable the government to maintain the status quo?

However, we believe that considering all the efforts the minister made and the objections of the union, the government should take responsible action. We were asked in the evening what the opposition wanted. We want the government to take responsible action, to meet the needs of the public, and we sincerely believe that dispute could drag on for quite a long while. Some hon. members suggested mediation, we suggested a free vote of all the workers interested considering the present government offers. If all that fails, we shall then be willing to consider special legislation to bring workers back to work with a mind to public interest.

Postal Strike

Mr. Speaker, I will with your permission quote some editorials and especially the one by Claude Ryan who recently declared:

However, that is not the fundamental question the Canadian people put to the Postmaster General today . . . The only question that should interest them is in fact this one: How long can the country be sensibly left to live without a postal service in the name of public interest?

That is the question we are trying to deal with tonight.

As long as a strike is liable to produce better results than bargaining, and as the public weal can put up with it more or less, a government may be justified in allowing a work stoppage affecting a great public service to go on. But neither condition is present in this dispute.

First, according to the government itself, there is no chance postal workers will get higher salary offers than those about which they have already been told. For over a month, the government has stood firmly by the recommendations of the Moisan report. Since they already go beyond the guidelines of the anti-inflation program, any further increase would be an unthinkable blow at this time to the credibility of the government.

Second, there is also the incalculable damage that the strike causes to thousands of individuals and businesses. Many undertakings, either by the very nature of their business or because of their abundant financial resources, can quickly learn to do without the Post Office. However, this is not true for hundreds of others for whom the Post Office is an absolutely essential service. A newspaper like Le Devoir used to have nearly 20,000 mail subscribers; the famous reform launched under Mr. Kierans was to make it lose several thousands. But those it still has face for the second time in less than a year a deprivation of service directly attributable to the paralysis of the Post Office. Now what about the incomes of hundreds of businesses? In a large number of businesses called upon to transact with hundreds and thousands of individual clients, the near totality of accounts receivable are usually collected through the mail. For a newspaper, this is true particularly for subscription renewals. Is Mr. Mackasey unaware that for the past three weeks cash receipts have been reduced to their simplest expression while salaries and suppliers still have to be paid?

If postal workers cannot expect anything more from an indefinite prolongation of their work stoppage and the damage done to the public good by their strike continues to increase, there remains only one solution to the dispute: the government must reaffirm without delay the priority of the general good over the exercise by a particular group of a right whose effectiveness in this case has now been reduced to nothing.

Mr. Vincent Prince stated in turn:

It must not be forgotten that certain normative clauses have considerable financial implications and that this expedient should not be used to win gains that would go against Ottawa's new salary policy.

Indeed, this bargaining is the first significant test of the austerity measures. We can take it for granted that the federal government will be specially watchful.

Moreover, an extended strike would not affect the public and postal workers alone. The mailmen and drivers of postal vans laid off, because they were temporarily useless, will apparently have to be satisfied with unemployment insurance. They will become part of the majority taken as hostage.

● (0140)

I would like to quote some comments that I find much to the point. In today's La Presse, Mr. Guay states:

The Trudeau government has set a ceiling on price and income increases. If it is consistent with itself, it need not tergiversate about granting wage increases to postal workers as to all other government employees. In the interest of business, taxpayers and the majority of postal workers, the government has the responsibility to order the strikers back to work. In fact, it is unworthy of a government to allow a strike to last this long to break a union. Moreover, it is an absurd mistake that reflects a superficial analysis of social realities. Unions are not broken today as they were fifty years ago. On the other hand, government must set the example to play fair and to display dignity. It must not lower itself to the level of some union leaders' demagogic maneuvers. Even though the postal workers' union leaders are apt to use the government's order to return to work to save and even consolidate their prestige with their members, the government must not be distracted by such mean considerations.

Those are comments I consider appropriate, Mr. Speaker. I find them relevant, because we have reason to wonder if it is not that fight that drags on between the recognized union and the government. Which one could lose face? I wonder how far should be put away the responsibility or the theory of the face loser, considering the importance of the conflict.

I must congratulate the mover to have proposed the debate to the House, considering the problems involved. We ask the government to bring back order to the postal service. We are not accusing the minister of not having tried, but we think that the time has come for those workers to go back to work. For a very long time, we have been asking ourselves very serious questions in the public sector. We must surely think about the matter of essential services. As for essential services, Mr. Speaker, I have very personal opinions on that subject.

In the eventuality of a refusal on the part of the unions, I feel a special act should be passed to stabilize and restore an economy which is now seriously ill in Canada. How long will the government hesitate to meet that need, and answer the representations we have made this evening?

The government assumed the responsibility of giving a leadership that will encourage Canadians. We spoke of the pessimism of Canadians a while ago. We said that Canadians were concerned about the future of this country, that it was completely normal to worry about the future of our country, if we look at what has been going on for the last four or five years and consider the hesitations of the government to commit itself with regard to various measures. We are up against the problem of inflation and we are still waiting for steps to remedy the situation.

Moreover, we are hit by those strikes that harm our economy and take place in the public sector. Parliament gave the unions the right to strike. The government side always accuses us of being against the right to strike, but every time there has been a strike in the public sector, that paralyzed our economy, which harmed and hampered our society, a special act has always been introduced. If that is not denying the union members the right to strike, I wonder what is.

Let us be honest, let us not be hypocrites. I feel the time has come to reflect seriously on the right to strike. Will we have to reconsider privilege granted the union members, to the extent where they abuse it? I am asking this question both to my colleagues and hon. members opposite: Have we seriously considered what services are really essential? Mr. Speaker, we would need to establish new ways and demonstrate creativity to offer union members a fair treatment. Someone has mentioned a labour court. I am thinking about offices with a permanent bargaining court. I feel that we should think of necessity about the establishment of new procedures, because those we have now lead us too often into dilemmas such as the one we are in today.

If, on the one hand, unions show a lack of good will and refuse to co-operate in the interest of Canada, every government, including this Parliament, not only has the right but the duty to react by offering an alternate solution, so that we are now asking ourselves serious questions. I, for one, am asking it, together with many in my constituency with whom I have talked about this issue. People often ask: What is the government doing? What is the government doing to do? We are sick of these problems.

Is it necessary to remind the government of their responsibilities? Is it necessary to remind the government that we will support any measure which could reduce the difficulties faced by Canadians now? Is it necessary to be sure that the government did more than their best to find solutions? But given the ill will of some individuals, of some spokesmen for groups who definitely do not represent the interest of the community, I think the time has come to take decisions, and this evening or more precisely, this morning, we ask the government to react quickly to this matter which annoys so many Canadians. And we think that the government should react immediately by proposing mediation or by passing special legislation if the mediator's report were unacceptable to the union members, while hoping that the government would accept the report of a mediator who, in the short term, could find the solution. This would enable both parties to end the conflict and save faces. Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief because other colleagues have some remarks to make, but I hope that the problem will be settled and that we will think more in terms of the future. Taking into account the experiences we have been through, we must consider seriously these new mechanisms, and I feel it is up to the government to study carefully this matter and find solutions. And inasmuch as those solutions will respect individuals and meet the needs of a society we would like to see better, I am sure the government will listen attentively. That is, Mr. Speaker, what we want most.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, never before have I heard so many members speak on a subject about which they do not know anything. Regretfully I say I join that class.

While you and I, Mr. Speaker, have had some experience with labour, I think we would be very presumptuous if we decided we could look at a situation affecting a union with which we have never been directly involved, and about which we know very little, and say we have a solution which would be satisfactory to anyone.

I am surprised at the attitude of the Progressive Conservative party which seems to be: let us pass legislation and put them back to work and that will solve the problem. That would not solve the problem. Part of the problem is that the workers have never had sufficient guts to go on strike or in any way involve themselves in a collective agreement until the past few years. These people, in many segments of our economy, are not accustomed to negotiating contracts and co-operating with each other. They have never been very much involved with the idea of unionism which, to some extent, is represented by the phrase you are your brother's keeper and only through solidarity can you help to achieve what you wish.

Frankly I have been surprised by the attitude of so many members who believe they can legislate a settlement to this problem which would produce a reasonable mail service in this country. I do not think this can happen. I have listened to many of the remarks that have been made.

I was very impressed by the young hopeful of the Ontario Liberal party, the federal member who claims he intends to seek the leadership. I owe him a vote of thanks because I never really looked at my own colleagues in terms of their being different, but they certainly are. The number of degrees that my colleagues have, surprised me. I suppose that from now on I will have to pay them more respect because of their great educational achievements. But I was surprised that he did not know several things.

● (0150)

For instance, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was a member of a union for 50 years or so, and he had been active in that union. He participated in it, and is still paying his dues today. I would think that when he pays those dues he must give some consideration to that union. Another one of my colleagues has been active in union work for a number of years and has been connected with a number of unions in the clothing industry. I think he probably has a little experience in it by now. But because we have had some experience does not mean we really know how to solve this very vexing problem.

I have great respect for the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) but it has surprised me that he has taken it on himself to solve a problem that has been developing in the Post Office over the last 30 or 40 years, and is trying to solve that problem all at once. I am not only referring to money—I will mention that in a few moments. The Postmaster General has tried to solve these problems in a very forceful way, and he has acted as a true employer in some ways when he said that that is as far as he will go. He has issued that ultimatum on television a number of times. He has forced the workers to look at the situation, and I think this was a good idea.

He has been sympathetic with regard to some of the aspects of the situation which have been mentioned but that are worth mentioning again. One of them is the changes in the Post Office. One of the young members today mentioned the skills of the postal people. In the past they used card boxes and filing cases. They knew the routes and the streets. It is a highly skilled occupation and they are proud of their skill. Then we introduced automation. We paid absolutely no attention to the downgrading of the person who had been doing that highly skilled job, and we substituted a machine for him.

I do not know whether the postal code works. I boycott it because I do not believe it works. I do not believe that a machine can sort out a code written by pen, or pencil, or ballpoint, in whatever style of writing you have. It would have to be written in a specific place on that envelope with a certain kind of ink, because that is how cheques work in a bank. I know that the postal code could be typed and that that could work.

The worker in the Post Office has been very concerned about whether or not he will have a job and, much more important, whether than job will be important and will give him a sense of accomplishment. In my opinion the Postmaster General has given this problem some attention. He has also given attention to the problem of surveillance.

It seems to me it is going a little far to have workers going to the washroom surveilled, unless you are making blue movies. I think that with the use of other methods and with greater trust we can develop a better class of person who will no longer need to be spied upon and treated in a less than humane way, and then the job will be done that much better.

There have been an immense number of grievances in the Post Office which have never been dealt with, or at least only at negotiation time. This is happening all across the nation. Everyone is upset because teachers are going on strike, postal workers are going on strike, and garbage collectors are going on strike. All these people have been treated as less than human beings. They were part of the machine. You, Mr. Speaker, and I who have been in major craft unions were treated as individuals and we were proud of the jobs we did.

I was an underground hard-rock miner for many years. It was the top job in the mine, one of the most dangerous and best paid jobs. It was a job I was proud of doing. When I went home at night I knew I had done a good day's work. For that one had the respect of one's employer and one's fellow employees, and everyone in that industry did a good job or they did not stay very long. I sat on negotiation committees for years. The members of those committees were as interested in the guy who was the powder-monkey or the old chap who was working on a pipe fitting gang. They were as interested in the lowest paid person in the plant as they were in the best paid or the highest skilled, simply because we knew that solidarity was the name of the game and we had to stick together.

We are doing something else right now with regard to the Post Office. I would like to ask the Postmaster General whether he could guarantee on behalf of the government, if the union agrees to a supervised vote on the Treasury Board's final offer, that if it is rejected no government action will be taken but that negotiations would be reopened through mediation or in any other way, and a settlement reached. If that happened it is quite likely that the postal workers would get no benefits from it because it would have to go before the Anti-inflation Board which may well reject it because it might go beyond the guidelines and beyond the historical relationship with the other agencies, but it would be fair and in that way the workers would get as much as they can get.

I am surprised at the free enterprisers in the House who always talk about free enterprise. That is what the labour movement is in the north American context. It is a free enterprise operation. The company makes as much money as it can make, and the union demands as much money for its workers as it can. They are not taking a moral position and it has nothing to do with the co-operative idea. You get from the employer as much as you can on behalf of the people for whom you are bargaining.

I suggest that what we are doing now is to put this union—and this will apply to other unions in the future—under double jeopardy because we say they should vote on the government offer, but if they take that vote and if it turns out that the union accepts the vote, everybody will be happy, except perhaps for the leaders of the union who may not have recommended it. If they reject it, what do we do then? We pass legislation and put them back to work.

● (0200)

I suggest if we ask them to do this—if the government asks them to conduct a vote on its last offer, then the government should be prepared to say that if the offer is rejected it will continue the negotiations to arrive at a settlement, and then the Anti-Inflation Board can look at it. It could reject it or accept it, but we would have concluded negotiations in the normal way.

It seems to me that the statements that have been made about how this strike is hurting small businesses and individuals are very important. It is a fact that businesses are in very serious difficulty because of this strike. I am sure this is true of any strike, certainly of those in the public sector. I think I agree with a statement the Postmaster General has made on a number of occasions, however, to the effect that when this strike is over the relationship on both sides should be good enough so that we can really start to negotiate with the Post Office employees. It should also be good enough that the postal service will return to the standard it gave previously.

We hear of sabotage, of theft, and all sorts of things in the Post Office today. It would appear to me that if we took the motion that was proposed earlier and legislated these people back to work there would be a deterioration in our national mail service. In my opinion, we cannot afford to have it deteriorate any more. The settlement will have to be acceptable to the average Joe working in that operation otherwise it does not matter whether it satisfies the government, satisfies the union leadership, members of parliament, or some little old lady in the Pas who cannot get her medicine. I do not think this really matters.

If we are going to achieve reason on both sides, from that will come the machinery with which to make the changes that have to be made in the Post Office. For instance, junk mail should not be given to carriers on Monday morning when they have the Friday, Saturday and Sunday mail. Only the first class mail should be taken out on Monday morning instead of everything, as one postmaster insisted on doing recently.

It seems to me that we can provide a decent service in Canada but we have not been getting it. I strongly recommend to members that forcing the strikers back to work will not accomplish our objective of a better mail service. We should have that even if we have to pay for it. Equating our money with that of other countries, a 12 cent first class postage charge would not be unreasonable—providing we could supply the standard of first class mail service we had 20 years ago.

Mr. Prud'homme: May I ask the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) a question? He has twice put a question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), and if the minister would answer it then some of us might not have to make our contribution if we were satisfied with the answer. Would the hon. member put his question to the Postmaster General again?

Mr. Peters: Could the Postmaster General guarantee on behalf of the government, if the union agrees to a supervised vote on the Treasury Board's final offer and it was rejected, that no action would be taken—I am thinking of back-to-work legislation—but that negotiations would be reopened to reach a settlement? It may well be that the anti-inflation legislation would disallow that settlement, but that would not be a specific action directed toward the inside postal workers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Do we have the consent of the House for the minister to answer the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the government but I can speak for myself. First of all, we would have to supervise the vote. Perhaps this supervising could be done even by members of the press gallery or somebody neutral who would see that the vote was properly held. We would have to make sure that there was proper explanation of the settlement to the workers, namely, that if they put in the hours they have over the past three years they would earn anywhere from $14,000 to $17,000. If the vote went the way of the leadership, obviously the leaders would come back to the bargaining table in a much stronger position.

I would not want to mislead the House and say there does not come a moment when you have to put public interest above private interest, or that we would never legislate them back, but I can guarantee we would get back to the bargaining table.

I have no knowledge of which way the Anti-Inflation Board would go if, through that additional strength, the unions were able to bargain more money. I was impressed with the hon. gentleman's speech but I should like to ask him a question: you cannot compensate with money for bad conditions, or does he think you can?

Mr. Peters: I am in total agreement with that, Mr. Speaker. There is always a conflict when negotiating the conditions of work—hours and holidays and other things. You relate fringe benefits to the package that money is in. I agree entirely with the Postmaster General that money will not compensate for the other things. I think the rancour that may be created by back-to-work legislation would do the same thing—that rancour would be very difficult to overcome. Even if money were available subsequently, the damage would be such that the postal service would not be adequate or what we anticipate.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, at this time of morning hon. members may wonder if a debate like this serves any useful purpose. Having listened to a good deal of it, I think it has been a useful debate with useful contributions from all sides. I cannot say that I agree in total, or even in large measure, with some of the things said this evening, but I think in totality the House has gained a good deal of insight with respect to this difficult situation. I think we have also given the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) a number of specific points to consider as well as those involved on the union side.

It was mentioned earlier that some of the senior negotiators were here this evening. I know they will read with interest the totality of the debate. I am not going to add too much new information but I want to focus on three or four areas of great importance and of some controversy.

One point in particular seems to be the importance of the strike itself, or the importance of the loss of postal service. Partly because of the fact that this is not a new experience, that there have been, I think, 16 postal strikes since 1967, it has been possible for the Postmaster General and others to say that people have become used to the situation. I think what has really happened is that people have been in a constant state of traumatization. They never knew from week to week, or month to month, whether they were going to have a postal service that would function.

● (0210)

The minister said that the direct mail business people are in favour of a long strike to clear the air. I presume that if many have expressed a similar opinion there is support for that point of view. But let me utter a word of caution. I am not sure that the confrontation approach, this talk of clearing the decks or, to use the phrase of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), of being on the beach, is valid or convincing. I think the hon. member was using a war analogy. I am too young to be fully cognizant of its meaning. At any rate, such military-type solutions will do little.

Some talk of "if and when" the strike is settled. I think there is more at stake than simply allowing people to go to the wall. Some think that once we have driven people to the wall, once we have gone through the valley of the shadow, as it were, somehow everything will be set right. I am sure that is not the minister's position. He has had much experience ironing out labour-management problems, and I am sure that is not what he means.

I am disturbed by statements made inside and outside the House that, somehow or other, the strike is not serious. We have embarked on some crazy debates about small businessmen and others, but never said a strike is not serious. This is the second largest country in the world, although thinly populated with some 22 million people. We are all linked, on economic, social and cultural terms, with a basic mail service. Suspending mail service for four weeks does basic damage to the fabric of our country.

Perhaps all our people are not overly concerned. Perhaps those living in an urban community, to whom most amenities are available within a few square miles, can get along without postal service. They have available newspapers, radio, television, courier service, and can travel from place to place in their limited geographic locality. But this does not hold true for a large percentage of our people. I represent a part of the country which depends greatly on mail service. We depend on the Post Office day by day, week by week, and do not want to be without the service one hour, one minute longer than absolutely necessary.

Frankly I deeply resent arguments made inside and outside this House that this going to the wall, this knock-them-down-once-and-for-all strike, will resolve all the difficulties the Post Office has experienced in recent years. I do not think that is true. It is a simplistic position at best. At worst it is exceedingly dangerous, as such a position involves the denial of a basic service provided to the citizens of this country. In all honesty I must ask why the Postmaster General in this instance has adopted a position highly unusual for the government.

As hon. members know, I have been here ten years. During those years when there were work stoppages in this country's public service the government ended the work stoppages through legislation. This was done with grain handlers, seaway workers, and railway employees. The minister suggested we have never done this with our own employees. We have always done it, so to speak, as disinterested third parties when employees of Crown corporations or other entities have been involved. Technically, he is quite right, but the technical argument carries little weight with me because I am not a lawyer. My training is that of a theologian, which may not always be useful in solving some of the problems we encounter in this House.

Why is the minister advancing basically a lawyer's argument? Usually he does not adopt such rationale. Why is he doing it with respect to the Post Office, considering his great experience as Minister of Labour in the settling of difficult labour-management negotiations? Why, in a sense, is the government adopting a new position on this particular strike?

True, a number of times he said, "We will not legislate our own employees back to work." But I do not find his argument convincing. Surely his decision is based on something more substantial than a legal nicety. There are two possibilities, one of which was referred to long before this evening. I do not want to sound unpleasant, but it seems to me that the minister wants to discredit the leadership of CUPW.

Mr. Mackasey: They do not need my help.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): My colleague has put it even more strongly. My suggestion might be part and parcel of the minister's position; I hope he will explain if that is so. Others conclude, and perhaps this is closer to the mark, that the minister wants to work within the government's anti-inflation program. After all, he had considerable experience as Minister of Labour in bringing about settlements; perhaps he thinks the time has come to alter a basic aspect of labour-management relations in the public service, the legislated settlement.

Apparently the minister wants to change the sort of thing that happened in the past. In the public service we have witnessed negotiations, the breakdown of negotiations, the appointment of an outside mediator who filed a report, further discussions and, finally, a strike. The strike continues sometimes for five or ten days, or two weeks, after which there is a legislated settlement. Employees in the public service have become increasingly aware of the possibilities of a final, legislated settlement. They know that if they go on strike for a few days they will not be without pay long enough to be badly hurt and that parliament will finally legislate them back to work. If the minister is trying to cure that mentality through this particular strike, I say he is playing a dangerous game. He is, in a sense, trying to deal with questions concerning labour-management relations in the Post Office without going to the root causes, to which reference was made earlier this evening.

I think the minister is too much imbued with his previous role as Minister of Labour, when he was successful in achieving strike settlements. He operated as a kind of lone gun who could wait them out if necessary, going into all night bargaining sessions in shirt sleeves, ready to strike when the iron was hot, ready to pull a settlement out of the fire. It was very much a kind of "by the seat of your pants" operation. He received favourable credit for being a success at it.

● (0220)

The minister has reached the point now where he may be well over his head. He may well be playing fast and loose with a vital service service such as the Post Office which will find it very difficult to recover from this kind of "High Noon" treatment. I do not say this with any kind of enthusiasm, but quite frankly the minister has reached the stage where he better accept some serious counsel from other people who understand the two or three issues he is trying to deal with at the same time and in the same capsule.

It strikes me that the game the minister is playing is such a dangerous one, and one that is so uncertain of being successful, it has to be one he should not pursue at any greater length unless he believes there is absolutely no other route to follow. I do not believe that is true.

There have been a number of suggestions. They have been made by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Clarke), who put before the minister this evening a number of possibilities that are well worthy of consideration. The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) made a suggestion which deserves more than summary disapproval of the minister. A few moments ago the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) made a further suggestion to which the minister should give some consideration.

The time has come for the minister to realize that to use this device of this strike, either to reorganize the authority structure of CUPW, or to establish new precedents with regard to legislative intervention by this parliament, is not the name of the game with respect to the restoration of postal service. The time has long since passed for the minister to confer with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues and to say that there are two or three options which will achieve a conclusion to this very difficult and very costly strike, and they must be acted upon here and now.

If there is anything useful to the special debate we have had this evening it is that the minister will realize at the conclusion of the debate, which will come in the next hour or two, that the time for sitting and hoping for other than these things to happen is not going to occur. The time for him and his colleagues to exercise their responsibility has arrived. A number of options have been placed before the minister this evening. It is his duty and the duty of the government to act upon them, and to act upon them now.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, as I look at the clock I feel we have good cause to ask ourselves what we are doing here at this hour. Our very presence here at this time, dealing with this subject, is the strongest and most convincing argument I can imagine of the importance of our present debate.

The Post Office is in real trouble. The Canadian public expects us to do something about it. That is why we are here. We should express our thanks, all of us, to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) for precipitating this discussion.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

In order to understand the full significance of our presence here and our discussion of this matter, we must go back to a few real basics in the matter of collective bargaining. For example, I read in an article in the May 3 edition of the Montreal Star that the failures in collective bargaining created a need for a new approach. That is a sort of beginning.

The basics that we really must be looking at start with the concept that the Public Service is hired by the public to provide a service to the public. It is almost a tautology to say so, but it is essential we understand that is what it is all about. When that service is withdrawn or offered in offhand manner, the public feels cheated. The public pays for the service. When it is deprived of it, it is quite understandably annoyed, frustrated, and wants something done about it.

The reasons for withdrawing the service have to be determined. It may be the intransigence on the part of the union or intransigence on the part of the spokesman for the public.

An hon. Member: Or both.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It may be a mixture of both. Let us remember that there is a proxy in both cases. There is a surrogate spokesman; a surrogate for the people offering the service and a surrogate for the people demanding the service. These people think they are interpreting their constituents. They should not necessarily think that they are always correct in this.

When the public interest is seriously affected he who is in the wrong has to be brought to task, the union or the government, the negotiators on one side or the other, in order to restore service to the public, which in the final analysis is the employer in this particular situation. The determination may not be easy, but it is one that has to be made.

Much has been said in this debate this evening about strikes and the right to strike. I would like to say a word or two about another aspect of strikes that must, in my opinion, be brought to a halt. It is not inherent in any right to strike. To my way of thinking it is an aberration. I refer, of course, to picketing. Picketing is a denial of man's right to make individual decisions and carry them out. Picketing can be used to draw attention to an alleged grievance. That is a legitimate form of picketing. However, when picketing is carried to the length of causing harm to people who legitimately want to return to work, it becomes, morally anyway, unlawful. It should be made unlawful. We are the people who can do so.

Mr. Benjamin: No way.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I hear "no way". Just you wait. In this morning's paper I read that a woman in Montreal legitimately wanted to go back to work. She was hurt as she tried to go through the picket line to go back to her legitimate job. She has every right to do that. She wants to earn her wage. Why shouldn't she? Why should a picket stop her from doing so?

We have been talking about abridging the right to strike, putting brackets around it or limiting it in some way. We must also consider that there is no right to picket and keep people from doing the job they have been hired to do.

● (0230)

As to the strike itself, the strike, we all remember, is one of those elements in the collective bargaining system which was granted by an earlier Liberal government—I notice there is no applause—against the advice of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission of that day. The Heeney Report advised strongly against according the right to strike to the public service. The government of the day in its "wisdom"—and I put that word in quotation marks—decided there should be a right to strike written into the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and there it is. I have never understood just why it should be so.

I was a member of the public service at that time. I never asked for it. I would be ashamed to exercise it. I do not think it needs to be there. However, as a means of upholding the public interest in these circumstances and recognizing in the final analysis that the public is the employer, I have tried since I have been in parliament a variety of routes in the Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service to see what now needs to be done to reduce the damage which was done by extending the right to strike to the public service. That right is there, but it needs to be fenced in; it needs to be limited because obviously it has not worked properly.

I tried a variety of forms, a variety of propositions. One of them was to suggest in the committee that we withdraw the right to strike from the public service. I was told I was dreaming in technicolour—the expression was used earlier today but it was another member of the Committee who used it on that occasion. Obviously I would not be able to obtain majority support for that notion, so I tried another approach. It involved an elaboration of the Public Interest Disputes Commission which ended up in arbitration. This did not attract much approval so I tried a third approach.

My third approach had to do with liability, the notion being that, once it is determined who is responsible for the service being suspended, that entity should become liable for the damage done to the individual, to the person who wants to service; that the government on the one hand, if it is responsible, or the employee, the employee's union on the other, should be held liable to be sued for the damage which has been done to the public—to individual members of the public.

We have all heard this evening about the various kinds of damage to the public caused by a strike of the present nature. This idea, I was told, was so complicated that it would tie up the courts endlessly from now until the end of the 21st century. Again I was informed this was a no-starter.

Then there was a suggestion from one of our members who was not able to be there. A discussion was prompted and it brought forward the notion which was mentioned this evening by one hon. member, which came to the point of suggesting that we should have inserted in the law—and I am breaking no confidence now, he broached the matter earlier—provision for a secret ballot not only on the strike but on the decision to hold a strike vote. I think this ought to be done also, because there is always too much danger to an individual member of a union should he stand up and say, "I oppose a strike." He may oppose a strike, but when he gets home he finds his windows broken. Unfortunately this happens. I am not suggesting it is happening to a marked extent in this situation, but it does happen. The individual must be protected.

Too little has been said this evening about the damage which has been done to the public which has been paying for the service. The damage has been grievous. It would have been serious at any time of the year. It is even more serious at Christmastime when, for example, the United Appeal campaigns are in full spate. Christmas seals are being sold and other community welfare campaigns are operating. Many of our local community services are likely to be severely handicapped in 1976 as a result of this strike.

Many of the small businesses across the country are running into difficulties. One case immediately comes to mind, because when I was home over the weekend I happened to drop into a variety store where a man had bought his stock of Christmas cards. He has $3,000 worth of Christmas cards on his hands and nobody is buying them. He is only one of thousands who had ordered supplies in plenty of time—they were delivered by transport of one kind or another. So he has either to service the debt to pay for his purchase or he must take it out of his capital stock. This is a serious matter for the man affected by it, but it is only symptomatic of the damage being done to businesses.

It is true arrangements are being made to distribute social security cheques. But travellers, and those who are looking for their passports are greatly inconvenienced. How many of us are carrying passports back and forth? I hope we all are. I am. The purchasers of Canada Savings Bonds are having their problems. Some people who bought Canada Savings Bonds did so as a form of immediate saving intending to cash them as soon as they were delivered. But they are not being delivered. I know a person who wanted to put down a number of bonds as a down payment on the purchase of a house on November 1. He could not get them. I am still looking for them. He probably missed a chance to get that house, or else he was obliged to pay a much higher mortgage rate.

We cannot avoid the conclusion that the public interest is deeply affected and that it is the duty of the government to restore the service and see that it is maintained. This could be done by back-to-work legislation for which we have called. I would point out that we have not pushed this point of view too hard, realizing that delicate negotiations were in progress; we did not want those negotiations to be destroyed or thrown out of balance. Nevertheless the time has come, not only for back-to-work legislation but for legislation accompanied by a requirement for a vote of confidence in the executive of the union and for the negotiating team which worked out the settlement. In this way we could restore the postal service to what it should be and then, when the time comes, when the report from the Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations comes down, we hope we shall be given legislation which will restore proper working relations between the government, as proxy for the public, and the unions so that relations between those two important aspects of our society may be restored.

Postal Strike

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, in determining whether I should speak in this debate and trying to assess whether or not anything any of us could say would make any impact on the government, what determined me to make a brief speech even at this later hour was a phrase the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) used when he began his speech. He said that people can adjust psychologically to this strike.

● (0240)

I think the key to the thinking of the Postmaster General is contained in the word psychologically. Surely asking the Canadian people to make such an adjustment in a service which, as we have heard so many times tonight, is an essential service, one that the Canadian people not only have a right to but have a great and in many cases desperate need for, is to give the Canadian people the kind of government that they do not deserve. The Canadian people deserve a parliament that is not spending its time legislating grain handlers, air traffic controllers, longshoremen, airport firefighters, and now, because of hopeless deadlock, the postal workers, back to work.

The Postmaster General has said that people are not complaining, that they can make adjustments. He ought to come to my office in Edmonton and hear the personal complaints of businessmen and people who need the mails. If he did, he would not have such a lacklustre attitude.

I am not going to dwell on this point; it has been made many times tonight. I merely say that if there is insecurity, uncertainty, alienation, and frustration in Canadian society today, it is because of the absence of strong leadership by a government that will take the economic situation in its grip and do something to help businesses and people maintain economic stability.

How much longer do we need to have a strike before convincing the government that without strong action on its part the postal service will not be resumed? For reasons somewhat surreptitious, as the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) said in his intervention this evening, the government has decided not to bring into the House at this point back-to-work legislation. It will not even bring in legislation calling for a mandatory vote by the membership of the union on the government's latest offer.

We have said enough tonight to satisfy ourselves that without the continued protests of members of parliament, who are doing their best to convince the government it is on the wrong course, we would be remiss in our duty. This is why so many of us have stood up tonight. The government seems to be concerned with protecting the democracy of a few union leaders at the expense of the democracy of the Canadian people.

We have as much right to the continuation of essential services as the union leadership has the right to try to hold a gun at our heads. There will come a time when the Canadian people will finally rear up and resist the continued breakdown of society as a result of strikes. I believe that in the interdependent society that Canada has become from east to west and all through the various reaches and avenues of our life, the strike has become an outmoded weapon. The best union leaders of North America themselves are saying that the strike is outmoded.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Why then do we persist with paying tribute to the alleged sacredness of the strike? I suggest it is time we go far beyond that. I think it is why we in parliament ought to be thinking beyond the mere settlement of this strike. I have heard this kind of speech before from members of parliament. They say "Let us get by this strike situation we are in, and bring in better legislation so we will not get ourselves into this box again." But when are we going to learn? Having said that strikes are outmoded in essential services, I go on to suggest that strikes be prohibited. The Canadian people want an end to strikes in essential services.

Just what is an essential service can be defined by a public commission. Let some of the best people in the country be appointed to a commission to determine what is an essential service. Believe you me, Mr. Speaker, the money we pay them would be more than repaid by what will be saved by preventing continued economic disruptions because of strikes in essential services. With such an arrangement surely our bargaining process would reach the point where, if there were failure to agree on the terms of a contract in a declared essential service, the dispute could be sent to a labour court, a public commission, or an impartial arbitration body empowered to make a fair judgment.

I believe such a system is worth a try. It certainly is not new. Many people have talked about it for years but no one in this country will do it. The Canadian people deserve far better treatment than they are now getting. They deserve a sense of urgency on the part of government. They do not deserve to be told by the Postmaster General that they can simply adjust psychologically and start using telex and the telephone, and life can go on. Life cannot go on in the way Canadian people want it to go on, and it is time the Postmaster General was told that plainly.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Benjamin: My colleagues are anxious to hear from me. I listened carefully to the speeches for most of the night, except for the odd occasion when I might have been absent, and I have three or four things I want to say. I hope to be brief.

First, I want to say to my friends to the right who talk of essential services that they have yet to define what is an essential service. In every case where an essential service is organized and recognized as a bargaining unit, having become an essential service demands are then placed on the government by my friends to the right for an end to that which has now become an essential right. I have seen this happen with grain handlers, longshoremen, railroaders, and now the postal workers.

Mr. Beatty: We think that essential services are essential.

Mr. Benjamin: I am sure that if the people who deliver their lobster tails or pheasants under glass were on strike, my hon. friends to the right would consider them an essential service. I wish the minister were here and I hope that the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) has gone out to get him.

There is more to this than the particular strike, and I wish my hon. friends to the right would remember that. If they would think about the largest post offices in their own ridings they would know why we are in the mess we are in today, and I think they would be very hesitant about taking away the right to strike. This difficulty lies in the historical relationship between management and employees of the Post Office, and goes back a lot of years.

● (0250)

In the case of the Regina post office there is a lady employed there who has been with the Post Office classed as a casual for 12 years. There are two other ladies in that post office, I want to tell the Postmaster General, who have been there for eight years and one for nine years. He called them casual.

Mr. Mackasey: The union won't let them in the union.

Mr. Benjamin: Let me tell the Postmaster General that the union has been trying to get these three cases settled for five years now, since before he was the Postmaster General. If he wants the members of the union in Regina to vote to go back to work he should not only settle the cases of these three casuals in the post office at Regina, he should also look into some grievances, some of which are four years old.

Mr. Mackasey: There are no casuals in the union, and you know it.

Mr. Benjamin: Of course, and that is what I said, which you would know if you had been listening.

Mr. Mackasey: Let them look after their own members.

Mr. Benjamin: You see how the Postmaster General sloughs it off. He allows that dumb management he has got to get away with this crap they have been getting away with year after year. They have been getting away with it since he took over the Postmaster Generalship.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Benjamin: When this Postmaster General took over he was going to be the great knight, the great hero from the trade union movement. He was the great sympathizer with the trade union movement. He was not going to take a backseat to anybody, but was going to be on the side of labour. Where the hell has he been since he has been Postmaster General in so far as dealing—

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Benjamin: —with several hundred women in his department? With or without the union—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That is not good language.

Mr. Benjamin: With or without the union I expected that this Postmaster General was going to tell management that it must settle these grievances, some of which are very picayune, but some of which are three or four years old.

Some members of the union are wrong, but they cannot meet with the Postmaster General. He sits there being the hero and the white knight for labour. I am not an expert like the Postmaster General.

An hon. Member: And that's for sure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: I do not consider that a detriment in my own case.

An hon. Member: But we do.

Mr. Benjamin: I want to tell the Postmaster General that I have sat at the bargaining table, as he has, and I have been on the side of management as well.

An hon. Member: Good for you.

Mr. Benjamin: He is not the only person in this chamber who knows something about bargaining. I want to tell him quite frankly that his stagemanaged operations over the last few weeks have not helped collective bargaining. If he is correct, and I believe that he is, about how good collective bargaining is, then let me point out that his stagemanaged operations have not helped this bargaining one bit. Even if he was 100 per cent right—

An hon. Member: You would still say he is wrong.

Mr. Benjamin: —which he is not, he should still go back to the bargaining table. I am happy the minister has the strength to stay up all night tonight. I am very happy about that.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What constructive criticism have you brought forward?

Mr. Benjamin: If the Postmaster General would look into a lot of the things that have led to this strike he would find that many of them have nothing to do with the $1.70 cents an hour, and nothing to do with some of the other things he has been talking about, but rather relate to historical problems between management and employees of the Post Office Department.

All the minister needs to do is casually walk into a medium or large sized post office anywhere in Canada and try to get waited on, or ask question and try to get answers, and he will find out why his employees are so fed up and prepared to go to any lengths.

An hon. Member: Oh, go lick a stamp.

Mr. Benjamin: The minister should do this. I have done it and I have found out. The other thing I was going to say—no, I had better not say it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: I will go on to the next point I want to make.

An hon. Member: And that will be your first one.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) put a suggestion forward. I did not hear all of it.

An hon. Member: Go and ask him.

Mr. Benjamin: I would like the government and the Postmaster General to agree that we place the union and the Postmaster General under trusteeship so that we can look at his books and records, including those of his management people and all the memos he has received from them, some of which must have shocked him rigid. If the minister would like to propose that, I for one would be prepared to support him. Put them under trusteeship. If the minister thinks his case is that good, he would agree to make the offer to the Post Office employees to appoint an arbitrator, a conciliator, or a trustee. He should accept the idea of appointing a trustee. I would be very interested to know what the trustee might find out.

Every member of this house has had correspondence and surreptitious meetings in private with Post Office employees, and we know those people are scared silly to go to anybody, including the union, with their problems, but this great white saviour of the union movement, this fellow who is all for collective bargaining is not prepared to go to that kind of length.

I happen to think the postal union is not 100 per cent right in this instance.

An hon. Member: What a concession!

Mr. Benjamin: I think the Postmaster General is perfectly right in not wanting to get into the same kind of box some of his colleagues are in by paying one group of workers more than another group. You cannot do that without getting into a mess, and I happen to agree with the Postmaster General in that regard.

The Postmaster General should realize that one of the reasons why the employees are prepared to go on strike has nothing to do with dollars and cents. Even with a settlement on the basis of the offer by the Postmaster General, there are still thousands of employees in the Post Office Department who are being put upon, who are fed up, who do not have any protection, and over whom the union has no jurisdiction at all.

The Postmaster General sits back and accepts memos from the Post Office brass, but he does not go out and talk to some of the people who have been casuals for eight, nine and 12 years. These people are not casuals, they are casualties of the Postmaster General. I thought he was to be the one to correct these things. We have waited all these months for him to do something. I am sure the Postmaster General would be very happy if a vote could be taken that did not support the union, and the leadership was dissipated overnight. I am sure he would be very happy about that.

Mr. Mackasey: Would the hon. member permit one question? Does the hon. gentleman know that one of the requests of the union at the bargaining table is to eliminate all casuals?

Mr. Benjamin: Yes.

Mr. Mackasey: Yet he is telling me at the same time that they are fighting for more casuals.

Mr. Benjamin: No, that is not what I am telling you. The Postmaster General was not listening. I am telling the Postmaster General there is dissatisfaction in the union ranks in the Post Office Department, and whether the grievance involves casuals or part time employees, if he would check the records of management and of the union right across the country he would find that there are thousands of cases still unsettled. That is what I am telling him. Whatever agreement he reached with the union in respect of casuals, they do not trust him or believe him. I would seem to me he might do a few things about some of the old cases that are on the books.

● (0300)

If the minister wants to earn the trust not only of the rank and file members of the department but of the union leadership he will kick the ass out of some of his management types, and get the old things settled and out of the way. When is he going to do this? I get sick and tired of him telling us he has been a union member, and so on. It seems to me he has forgotten where he came from and that he has forgotten why he is here. Some of the men and women in the Regina post office tell me they look upon him as the typical free enterprise bureaucrat with a great big "B". They have some picayune grievances. They are not big things, but they are angry about them. Where has he been? He serves ultimatums. He is the big wheel who has forgotten about the bargaining process.

Until the Postmaster General returns to where he came from he will continue to have grievances in the Post Office Department, just as his predecessors had. I have not seen much improvement since he took over the portfolio from his predecessors. I submit to the Postmaster General that if he would get a lot of these things which add up to much anger and frustration among his and other employees out of the way, he would receive co-operation from the employees of the Post Office Department.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak tonight but I shall do so for two or three minutes because of the speech of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin).

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) asked earlier, "Will they learn"? I wonder when the members of the NDP will learn that they cannot have everything the way they want it. They tell us we cannot put the postal workers back to work. We have had a very responsible debate started by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke).

We have asked the government to bring in a free vote which I believe the people of Canada want to see, but the NDP oppose this. The premiers of their own party, including the premier of my province, put the meat people, the food people, and the wood people back to work. The premier of British Columbia must believe in the collective bargaining process because he has the support of labour. But he put them back to work because this was the responsible thing to do for British Columbia and Canada at this time. What this party is asking is that the postal workers be put back to work because this is what the people of Canada want, and it is what the majority of the postal workers want.

Some of the postal workers have spoken to me. I told the minister about one man who was harassed when he wanted to go back to work. I hope the minister listens to us and not the diatribe coming from the members of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate tonight with some trepidation. It is after three o'clock in the morning.

Like most members of the House I am torn between the political expediency of a short-term solution as opposed to the long-term best interests of Canadians. I, perhaps among all members of this House will suffer more, as well as my constituents, as a result of the recent postal strike due to the fact that I have the largest mail order business in my riding. Five per cent of the industrial work force in my riding could be eliminated by this strike. My constituents, including those who possibly could lose their jobs because of this strike, are strongly in support of the stand taken by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey).

I think the Progressive Conservative party tonight has demonstrated real strength behind the Postmaster General, particularly in the motion moved by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), which asks for a free vote. What we want as parliamentarians is that they have a free vote.

I think the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) has shown irresponsible leadership in trying to have further confrontation. Perhaps he should read the speech of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), one of his colleagues, who probably gave the most intelligent speech given by any member of that party.

I think the Postmaster General is for labour. No one can deny his role as a spokesman for labour. I was amazed to hear the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) question the track record of the Postmaster General.

Mr. Benjamin: He is getting bored with the whole operation.

Mr. Lumley: I do not think so, I think he is showing leadership. I do not think 28 work stoppages in 20 months, 25 of them illegal, are an indication of leadership on the part of the union. These are the types of points that have been brought out tonight except by certain members from one particular party.

I do not think that forcing these people back to work is the solution to the problem. There is no question that we must develop some long-term solution. I think the Postmaster General has stood his ground and has not taken the easy way out. He has not recommended to this House or to the government that the workers should be forced back to work. I think that is real leadership. I am surprised tonight that with the track record of the Postmaster General, when for the first time he takes a very tough stand, all of a sudden everybody should attack him. I do not know anyone who more than the Postmaster General has stood his ground in very difficult times.

It is very late, Mr. Speaker. I have appreciated some of the comments that have been made tonight. I am sure consideration will be given to those who have made very conscientious and worthwhile contributions. The contributions of others which have been critical, negative, and very irresponsible will show up on the record.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is now 3.11 a.m.

An hon. Member: 3.12.

Mr. Alexander: I just wish first to thank the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) for bringing the motion before the House this afternoon. It was a simple motion to the effect that this House do now adjourn.

It seems to me that all responsible members have taken the opportunity to bring before the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), who certainly is a very sensible person in this regard, their concern about what has been happening over the past 29 days.

I should also thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your gracious hospitality in seeing that members on both sides of the House were treated royally through the provision of sandwiches. We want to thank you for looking after us by giving us sustenance to carry on, and we thank my young colleague, the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga), for seeing to it that hon. members received apples.

● (0310)

But most important we should give singular recognition to the staff who periodically become stuck in this sort of situation. Their devotion to duty is much appreciated and warmly received. We appreciate their steadiness, their reliability, and their understanding. This includes, of course, Hansard reporters and all of those who are still working in such magnificent form.

I can see that the press too is awake, God bless them. Usually at the end of a sitting around 10.30 p.m. or eleven o'clock there is only one member left in the press gallery. Now we have four. It shows you how important this debate is and how concerned they are about its result. Surely we all would dislike being here at this hour if nothing were to happen in the long run.

I say that collective bargaining is being questioned. With all our collective wisdom on both sides of the House and outside the House we have been talking about the collective bargaining process and the time honoured right to strike. We have been talking about the recent lock-out, and somebody spoke about the final offer, compulsory arbitration, and voluntary arbitration. We on this side submitted recommendations about implementing the proposal of the public disputes commission. We have heard about labour courts, and now we have the Finkelman investigation into the Public Service Staff Relations Act. I hope that this time they will look into the definition of essential services. This is something we have to be concerned about. The Canadian people are exercised over it; they want to know what the essential services are and what we should do to maintain them to protect the public interest.

I will not be much longer, Mr. Speaker, but I must chastise the minister, friendly as we may be. I think that this strike can be divided into two situations. One is the matter of public interest and the maintenance of essential service versus the collective bargaining process and all it stands for. Unquestionably sooner or later governments have to move in order to protect the public interest, and in our view the time has arrived to do so. The government says that in its judgment this is not the time.

Surely we all realize that some 17,000 letter carriers are losing something like $700,000, and that there are 22,000 inside workers losing $800,000 a day. We have this peculiar situation where 22,000 people govern the destiny of this country. This is what people are exercised about; they do not understand how it can happen in a democracy and how the government can be so insensitive to the needs of the public. The minister may say that people can use the courier services and telex. Let me tell him that these are restricted to only a few, but there are countless thousands of people who want the mail service to operate for any number of reasons. That is one situation.

The other situation—and I think the minister will respect me when I say this—is that the minister is out to break the union, particularly the executive. We all know that. We see an ego trip here. The Postmaster General is smiling because he knows I am right on; he is smiling like a Cheshire cat. He is on an ego trip. It is a declaration of war between the Postmaster General and Mr. Parrot and Mr. Davidson. Did you ever see such a confrontation in your life?

Usually the Postmaster General is a very smooth operator. This time he likes what he is doing, and I do not blame him, but what I do not like is that he is putting the whole load on the backs of the Canadian people. With all respect, that is shameful. Anyway, who will win in the long run? Because even if you break the back of the postal union you have not solved the problem. Apart from the union in Montreal we also know there is a radical movement in Toronto. Are they next? I am not throwing this out in the hope that it will happen, but we all know there is another problem in Toronto, the minister and I know it. He has tackled Montreal first, but is it fair, is it just that this battle take place on the backs of the Canadian people who rightly deserve the service for which they pay?

The minister has impeded the collective bargaining process as a result of the government's introduction of its policy under Bill C-73. I remember the shades of 1974. What is happening? As a result of the imposition of this policy there can be a bargaining process at this time, but in any event it is a myth, because unlike the private sector those in the public sector can only go so far. If they think they have the bargaining process at hand they are mistaken. It is a myth, because when the public interest is adversely affected we have to step in and say, to heck with the collective bargaining process. This is being realistic and pragmatic.

I hope the minister will not carry on this battle with Davidson and Parrot much longer because he will not win and the unions will not win. I am also afraid that those who will really lose will be the Canadian people because the public interest cannot continue being affected so adversely. It is the minister's judgment. He was elected to lead. But surely the minister cannot be that insensitive to the needs of widows, of those who have families overseas, and to our overseas commitments and our trade.

Mr. Benjamin: What about casual workers?

Mr. Alexander: Why don't you go to sleep as you have been all night, except for that last minute speech?

All I say is that we are looking for solutions. I do not have them. I put forward several alternatives. All sorts of things are happening in terms of what we can do to make the collective bargaining process work that much better.

The minister has the ball. It is up to him to catch it, carry it, and score a touchdown, as he has in the past. Let me say in conclusion: stop the theatrics with respect to your colleagues on the other side of the fence. The Canadian people appreciate what the minister has done but there comes a time when the public interest takes precedence, and in my view the time is now when provision of essential services is paramount.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Section 13 of Standing Order 26 I am satisfied that the debate has been concluded, and I therefore declare the motion carried.

• (0320)

This House stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 3.22 a.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 18, 1975

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CHANGES IN REGULATIONS TO PERMIT GREATER COMPETITION BETWEEN CARRIERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the existence of restrictive regulations by the Canadian Transport Commission seriously limiting domestic and international scheduling in Canada by air carriers other than Air Canada and in view of the statements of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) both inside and out of this House that he was prepared to remove or amend these restrictive regulations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to immediately make a statement on motions outlining the particulars of changes to be made to regulations of the Canadian Transport Commission to facilitate reasonable competition with Air Canada by other carriers.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR TO SETTLE STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity arises from the complete deadlock in the negotiations between the post office and postal workers. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the government to appoint a mediator in the postal dispute who would be instructed to attempt to achieve a settlement within 72 hours and failing this would publicly submit recommendations to be considered forthwith both by the government and by the membership of the postal workers' union.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

● (1410)

[Translation]

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR INTEREST FREE LOANS TO HOUSE BUILDERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an important matter of pressing necessity.

Since interest rates are mainly responsible for higher housing costs in Canada and considering that it has become urgent to reduce those excessive interest rates to make the purchase of a house financially attractive to every Canadian and as the federal government has already taken the first step by introducing a bill aimed at granting assistance under the form of an interest-free loan during the first five years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the federal government take the necessary steps so that the assistance granted under the form of a loan free of interest during the first five years be extended to the duration of the loan.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

* * *

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

AUTHORITY OF EXECUTIVE CONSULTANTS LIMITED TO ISSUE DOCUMENT ON INFLATION PROGRAM GUIDELINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in regard to a document issued by the Prime Minister's office a while ago entitled "Questions and Answers on the Initial Guidelines" and circulated by Colin Kenny, director of operations in the Prime Minister's office. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin, as follows:

That in view of the fact that Executive Consultants Limited of 151 Slater Street, Ottawa, whose president is a former employee of the Prime Minister, namely, William Lee, have reproduced exactly and in entirety under their own letterhead and apparent authorship for circulation to their clients the exact document issued by the Prime Minister's office on government guidelines, the House requests the Prime Minister to state whether this firm operates under contract with his office, whether anyone in the Prime Minister's office or the government has an interest in this firm and, specifically, who gave Executive Consultants Limited permission to copy and misrepresent as their own this government material.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[Translation]

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PERMIT DEDUCTIBILITY OF COST OF WORKERS' TOOLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion of pressing and urgent necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Considering that construction workers and mechanics have to pay for their own tools which they need for their work and that tools are very costly; that without these tools, workers cannot do their work, and to encourage workers and protect them against excessive price increases of such tools, in spite of the fight against inflation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That this House request the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) to introduce amendments to the Income Tax Act to permit deductibility of cost of workers' tools from their income.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

* * *

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED DEBATE ON USE OF FRENCH IN AIR TO GROUND COMMUNICATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the guidelines issued last Friday by Mr. Walter McLish, director of civil aviation in Canada, to make the English language the only language to be used for air to ground communications on instrument flights and visual flights at more than 9,500 feet of altitude, while no provision prohibited the use of French before, and since this could seriously affect and even disrupt completely the air service of the government of Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That this House be allowed to discuss immediately this important matter which turns out to be somewhat comical and inconsistent, since on the one hand, the government of Quebec, which made French the official language of the province, would be forced to accept unilingualism in that field and, on the other hand, the federal government, which advocates bilingualism at a substantial cost, has just imposed through these guidelines English unilingualism in that same field.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSITION OF PROVINCES ON ACCEPTANCE OF FEDERAL GUIDELINES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a question to the Minister of Finance with regard to the acceptance by the provinces of the federal guidelines relating to the anti-inflation program. The minister having been unable to give the House any assurance that the Province of Quebec will follow the federal guidelines within the jurisdiction the province is reserving to itself for its own administration, can the hon. gentleman give us any assurance with respect to the Province of Saskatchewan, for example, where the Speech from the Throne appeared to indicate that the government of Saskatchewan might want certain modifications? Has the minister been in touch with the government of that province and can he assure us that the federal guidelines will apply there within the area of provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): As I told the House last week, there is to be a meeting of officials of the federal and provincial governments substantially on the question of the guideline program tomorrow and the next day. I hope to be able to report more fully to the House after that meeting as to the final position of the various provinces.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask whether the government is presenting to this House, to the country and to the premiers of the provinces a uniform program to be applied across Canada, a program which involves the acceptance of the same guidelines in all the provinces? Or is it the position of the government that this is a matter for each province to determine for itself?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think the legislation speaks very well for itself. With regard to the areas subject to enforcement, we have made it clear that except for the public sector the industries affected will be covered by federal legislation and that the federal jurisdiction will apply. With regard to the public sector, we have given the provinces the option whether or not they will choose, as Ontario has, to put the administration of the public sector under the federal government body or whether they will choose their own.

With regard to his earlier statement, may I say we have had the assurance of the Quebec minister that he will be co-operating with the present program. As I have already said, the Quebec bill speaks for itself; it is virtually the mirror image of ours.

As to what the remaining provinces do, as I said last week we hope that they will come to an early conclusion, as several provinces already have. If, in effect, they choose to put the public sector under the federal bill, it will apply in the same way from one province to another.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REASON FOR BASING PROGRAM ON INFLATION FACTOR OF EIGHT PER CENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): And if they do not, the program will go forward on the basis of variations from province to province. May I ask the Minister of Finance a question arising out of the report attributed to the Department of Finance that the rate of inflation next year is expected to be 9.2 per cent. If that is the federal government's prediction behind the control program, why has the federal government outlined its program on the basis of an 8 per cent inflation factor for the first year of the program?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I can respond to the remark made by the hon. gentleman with regard to the program, I have said that all provinces have indicated that they support the line that the federal government has taken. I hope he will not attempt to misrepresent, either in this House or outside, the fact that we do have this general support for the program and the method to be followed. In Quebec, as a matter of administration, that particular body may decide otherwise; that is inherent in letting each province exercise its own jurisdiction. It seems to me that I find in his remarks criticism of the fact that we have given the provinces this option, and that in the exercise of this option the provincial tribunal might find otherwise.

* * *

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—APPLICABILITY OF ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES TO REGULATORY BODIES

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Minister of Transport regarding the anti-inflationary policy. In view of the press release by the Minister of Transport on November 14 under the heading "railways to be subject to inflation guidelines", and in view of the legal precedent established last winter when the appeal court reversed the decision of the CTC respecting livestock freight rate increases, is the government not misleading the Canadian public in its white paper guidelines by advising federal government regulatory agencies to employ powers that they do not have? Surely, the government must have known this.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I find it a little difficult to handle that question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Hon. members who find that amusing may try and explain the question to me because it is certainly not very understandable in its form, and I say that with all respect.

The position of the government is that certain regulatory agencies have powers in relation to rates, and those may be employed in applying the anti-inflation guidelines. In addition to that, in the case, for instance, of rail rates and the CTC, to which the hon. member may be referring, the CTC does not have regular or ordinary power to object to, or interfere with, rates filed by the railways. But, of course, the CTC can assist in the determination of whether or not the 95 per cent margin rule is being followed, as an example, or whatever other rules the guidelines dictate. In those circumstances, the CTC may draw this to the attention of the administrator as soon as he is in a position to act, and he will have power to act under the bill now before parliament.

Mr. Hargrave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I will address to the Minister of Finance. In view of the remarks of the minister in this House on November 14, as recorded at page 9081 of Hansard, respecting the CTC decision on November 3 in regard to the British Columbia Telephone Company, that "cost of services to Canadians can be effectively controlled", I ask the minister whether, if the CTC is not able to enforce the guidelines, the Anti-Inflation Board will indeed be the authority that will really carry out the guidelines respecting livestock freight rates?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true with regard to the regulation of telephone rates that the CTC has been given the specific responsibility of setting the maximum rates chargeable by any company. It was in the exercise of this jurisdiction in applying the guidelines under the anti-inflation program that the commission has reduced the application of the British Columbia Telephone Company. As the hon. member knows, the CTC does not have the power under the laws, as I understand it, to reduce rates in any particular case. It could well be that under those circumstances an application to the Anti-Inflation Board might be appropriate for the purpose of regulatory control.

* * *

● (1420)

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON APPOINTMENT OF A MEDIATOR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, considering that the discussions between the post office and postal workers have obviously broken down, a fact which I think was confirmed in the debate last night, and in view of what the Prime Minister said in the House yesterday that at this point, to use his words, the government would not consider appointing a mediator, I should like now to ask the Prime Minister whether the government today would consider appointing a mediator in that dispute, giving that individual a 72-hour time limit within which to conduct mediation and bring forward a report and recommendations on his findings, providing he does not obtain an agreement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the leader of the NDP will realize, the appointment of a mediator in a sense implies that the government would be prepared to modify its position. The NDP leader knows that because of the anti-inflation guidelines we are limited in the maximum amount of monetary benefits we can offer at this time. We have gone to that limit and I think it would be misleading the people to name a mediator with that implication. If that implication is not there, I fail to follow the reasoning of the hon. member. Negotiations have reached a state of impasse and there is a strike on. The hon. member knows that this has happened in thousands of cases before where there have been strikes. If, for reasons of the greater good of Canada and of the economy, we cannot modify upward our proposal, there does not seem to be any gain in the nomination of a mediator. I must say that the New Democratic leader did not make the case any better by suggesting increases which would total something in the area of 52 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of clarification, and not attempting to score debating points. I respect the Prime Minister in this regard as I do not think he is attempting that either. Rather, I am trying to get to a solution. As the areas outlined for discussion would indicate that movement might have been made on either side, with no disposition on my part or that of my party to suggest that this movement ought to take place clearly in the direction of the union, and in view of the fact that the minister said in the debate last night and outside the House that there were non-monetary matters the government might be prepared to move on, and considering that talks are now deadlocked and with no presumption in respect of what a mediator would recommend, I should like to direct the question again to the Prime Minister. Given the open-ended nature of this assignment to a mediator with a specified time limit of 72 hours, does the Prime Minister not think this attempt would now be worth making?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the New Democratic leader is concerned with non-monetary matters I can practically give him the assurance that the Postmaster General would be prepared to sit down with the union anytime to discuss those matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I realize and appreciate the interest of the New Democratic leader in seeing this strike, which is of great inconvenience to the Canadian people, brought to an end. That is why I say quite clearly that the Postmaster General, who is nodding his assent, is prepared to meet with the union as far as non-monetary matters are concerned. As far as monetary matters are concerned, I think the NDP leader must realize that we have to bring inflation under control and we cannot bring it under control unless we have the support of all sectors of the economy, and that cannot be forthcoming when we have suggestions for increasing monetary benefits such as the NDP made last night.

Mr. Broadbent: One final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I suspect will be futile. In view of the fact that discussions are not taking place now on either monetary or non-monetary matters, is the Prime Minister saying that the minister is now prepared to sit down in an open-minded way—

Mr. Mackasey: I always was.

Mr. Broadbent: —and discuss the issues which are currently in dispute, or is he saying that he agrees with the Postmaster General, that what we need now, as he said in the House last night, is one good, long strike, and let us get it over with?

Mr. Speaker: A supplementary by the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

* * *

[Translation]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—DIFFERENCE BETWEEN INCREASES IN WAGES AND PRICES OF PRODUCTS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has just stated that a supplementary monetary benefit would amount to 52 per cent. If the 52 per cent increase becomes effective, it fully and directly comes under the cost of goods. After deduction of personal income tax at a 30 per cent rate, the real increase is only 37 per cent to pay for the 52 per cent added to prices. So how does the Prime Minister expect workers to keep up with prices in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This will be achieved in a very simple manner, Mr. Speaker. When we propose in the forthcoming year salary hikes of 8 per cent plus 2 per cent, these 8 per cent are in fact a cost of living increase. The 8 per cent are equivalent to what we expect the Consumer Price Index will be next year. We have indicated that if the CPI is more than 8 per cent, we should allow wage-earners to catch up. All the cost increases about which the hon. member is rightly concerned, are therefore included in the consumer price index and authorized accordingly under the basic formula proposed by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I am afraid the Prime Minister does not understand what I mean. Once the government allows that increase in the worker's salary, that is 8 per cent, plus 2 per cent, that total is added to the cost price of goods without, by so doing, creating any profit since industry will not be allowed to make any profit. But the government will continue to levy income tax on the increase of 8 per cent plus 2 per cent. So, if income tax is levied at 30 per cent or 20 per cent, which the worker does not have, he still has to pay the cost price of goods which includes the total amount. According to the government's formula, how will the worker manage to pay those prices?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member's question better. My reply is that, obviously, the matter of income tax is not taken into account, as the leader of the Social Credit Party indicates, in the formula of the government. But that also applies to all members of our society who have to pay income tax. In the case, for instance, of those who live off dividends, and not among the wealthiest, we tell them that dividends will not increase this year that does not mean they will not have to pay higher prices and income tax. So, once again, Mr. Speaker, our anti-inflation formula is not intended to free the people of their responsibility of paying taxes to the government, on every level; it is meant to control the inflationary spiral, and that is what we mean to do.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask another supplémentary question.

The prime minister does not seem to grasp my point. When the 8, 2 and 2 per cent increase within the guidelines is added to prices, the businessman is not a entitled to a profit according to the government's basic data, therefore, how could he pay taxes on non-profit activities? The industrialist or manufacturer will not since we are dealing with cost price, while the wage-earner will pay taxes on his 8, 2, 2 per cent salary increases. What does the government suggest in such a case?

Mr. Trudeau: This is getting technical, Mr. Speaker, but I believe I can answer the hon. member's question. When we say 8 and 2 per cent, this means the wage-earner will be able to receive an increment of 12 per cent, for example, since the costs have increased by 8. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the salary increase is 8 per cent, the other 2 per cent concern productivity and the remaining 2 per cent are for catching up.

Therefore, according to the hon. member's own argument, salaries went up by 8 plus 4 per cent while prices went up only by 8, therefore the hon. member will get 12 per cent to purchase something which went up by 8. That means he will be ahead.

* * *

● (1430)

[English]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF SKY SHOPS—ALLEGED PRACTICE OF GIVING GIFTS TO FEDERAL OFFICIALS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Solicitor General in the continuing story of Sky Shops. Can the hon. gentleman assure us that the current RCMP investigation is also looking into the practice of Sky Shops Export Ltd., and other companies involved in federal airports, making gifts to various federal officials, not only as detailed in today's issue of the Globe and Mail but also on a wiser scope and involving items of larger value?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am told that the RCMP is looking into all aspects of this matter.

* * *

AIRPORTS

DORVAL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER FROM ERIC WINSOR TO SKY SHOPS RELATING TO EXTENSION OF LEASE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Transport. Has he perused the letter from Eric Winsor, an official of the Department of Transport, to Sky Shops stating that they should desist from applying pressure in Ottawa for the extension of the lease, but rather should negotiate through local channels in Montreal, as was the case with all the other concessionnaires, and would he table this letter together with all other correspondence from Mr. Winsor?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have seen that letter.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC CRIME PROBE—JUSTIFICATION FOR CHALLENGING CONSTITUTIONALITY OF COMMISSION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Why is the federal government attempting to stop the crime probe resuming right now in Montreal?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me to be precisely the question that was answered by the Minister of Justice yesterday.

* * *

[Translation]

OLYMPIC GAMES

CONSULTATIONS WITH QUEBEC TO ENSURE FINANCING OF GAMES

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

Has the minister or any other official in his or any other department been in contact with the Quebec government concerning the new Quebec bill to ensure the financing and holding of the 1976 Olympic Games? What about the further indirect financing sources which might be developed between Ottawa and Quebec and referred to yesterday by the Quebec Minister, Mr. Goldbloom?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we are fairly regularly in touch with the Quebec government and the city of Montreal on this matter. However, the federal government does not intend to introduce further legislation to amend the financing formula of the Olympic Games at this time. I understand that my colleague, the Postmaster General, announced last week a plan designed to improve some programs which have already been put forward by his department to help the self-financing of the Olympic Games and this, within the framework of the policy already worked out by the government.

CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES ON BORDER SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the Olympic Games, I should like to put a supplementary to the Solicitor General.

In view of the most recent decision of the American Treasury to reduce quite substantially, if I am not mistaken, the funds appropriated for customs stations along the Canada-U.S. border and traffic control between our two countries, can the minister assure the House that the security of the 1976 Games will in no way be affected? And can he indicate if, since that statement was made, there have been any discussions in this regard with his U.S. and Quebec counterparts?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the story which appeared in the press has not yet been confirmed by American authorities. The RCMP will be in touch with them about this, but in any case we intend to have as effective a security on our part as is necessary to combat any terrorist activities at the Olympics.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

APPLICATION FOR NEW TRIAL IN CASE OF KEITH LATTA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a very serious question to put to the Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: It is in reference to Keith Latta, a Queen's University law professor who was convicted of murder on circumstantial evidence by the Supreme Court of Alberta, a judge sitting with a jury. In light of the fact that there has been much publicity and serious concern by people, including lawyers, that not only was this a conviction on circumstantial evidence, which is always dangerous, but evidence has come to light since the jury rendered its verdict, which can be found in the file of the department of the attorney general of Alberta, has the minister personally reviewed the depositions and has a decision been made on the application by Mr. Latta's lawyer for either a new trial or a hearing?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, apparently an application was made under section 617 to my predecessor. The department has carried out a detailed examination of the material available to them, but I have not yet personally rendered a decision on the application.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that the conviction was on circumstantial evidence and the law governing the same is very complicated, as the Minister of Justice knows, and difficult even for a lawyer to understand let alone a jury, and in light of the fact that additional evidence has come to light favourable to the accused to the effect that the deceased was allegedly threatened by known or unknown people in reference to a debt owing to a gambling joint in Las Vegas, would the minister give the case his personal attention and study it very carefully? I ask him to consider very seriously ordering a new trial in reference to this matter as it was a conviction on circumstantial evidence.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the seriousness of the situation, of course, and I will act in a way that the hon. member asks me to. I will certainly make a decision on the matter when it is fully reviewed.

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL FOR KEITH LATTA

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he is prepared to make a statement on motions or otherwise in the House of Commons indicating the reasons the Department of Justice refused a new trial in the case of Latta.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Justice has not refused a new trial. A decision under section 617 is my decision which has not yet been made.

* * *

[Translation]

AIRPORTS

SUGGESTED REALLOCATION OF PICKERING FUNDS TO CONSTRUCT FACILITIES IN NORTHWEST NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

In view of the decision to interrupt the construction of a second airport in Toronto (Pickering), can the Minister of Transport tell me if the funds appropriated to the initial stage of this project could now be used to construct or improve airport facilities in those areas of the country still not providing essential air services, for instance, in northwest New Brunswick, where the need for a decent airport is particularly urgent?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no precise question of reallocating money from one airport toward another, but the question of airport facilities for north New Brunswick is being studied and I expect a report on the question very shortly.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—DATE OF ADVICE TO MINISTER ON RATE OF INFLATION AND WAGE INCREASES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the CBC news report last night that the minister's advisers had predicted that the inflation rate will not be substantially changed or affected by the new controls program, may I ask whether or not he had that advice from his advisers prior to the cabinet's decision on controls?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I did not see the report personally, but it was reported to me and I checked with my advisers who indicated to me that they had made no such forecast. They have been having discussions with various provincial governments and with others with respect to a number of possible cases and certain eventualities, but in no sense were they forecasting a specific figure for 1976.

● (1440)

Mr. Nystrom: I should like to ask the minister whether the reported forecast that the percentage increases in wages would be less was an accurate forecast in the report last night, and if it was, does the minister still believe that wages are a major cause of inflation? If not, does he intend to amend the guidelines?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I pointed out, what they are talking about there, if it is the document which the department has in mind, they are talking about examples rather than making forecasts.

* * *

COMMUNICATIONS

DIFFICULTY OF MEMBERS IN COMMUNICATING WITH CONSTITUENTS BY TELEPHONE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am having difficulty finding the right minister, but I shall direct my question to either the Minister of Communications, the Prime Minister, the House leader or the Acting Minister of Communications. In view of the fact that there is a postal strike in progress and that hundreds of thousands of people across Canada cannot get in touch with their members of parliament through other means, is there anyone who can give an answer to a member of parliament who is trying to get back to constituents, and who cannot get through because of the postal strike? Is there anyone who can do something about this stupid and inadequate telecommunications agency on the hill and provide more lines with which to communicate with Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite like to talk but they do not like to listen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: As I reported to the hon. member during the late show a couple of nights ago, the telephone system in Ottawa, especially relating to the House of Commons, is now in the process of being expanded so that it will not only take the existing loads, which have been very heavy because of the problem of the postal strike, but also so that it will have some room left for expansion over the next several years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: Because I have been hearing the story since 1968 that it is going to be improved, and because people in isolated areas in Canada cannot participate in Canadian activities, is there anyone opposite who can provide an answer and provide a service to all Canadians in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

* * *

ABORTION

PETITION FROM LE RÉSEAU D'ACTION DE QUÉBEC—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Did the minister receive a deputation and a petition from Le Réseau d'Action et d'Information pour les Femmes about removing abortion from the Criminal Code and if so, how did the minister respond to that petition?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I received the delegation for about an hour this morning. I discussed this whole subject with them. I gave them the terms of reference of the Badgley committee. The delegation was possessed of a good deal of knowledge about the whole question, and I suggested they should contact the chairman of that committee, and apart from giving me the information, provide the chairman of the abortion study committee with the same information. I also suggested that they might want to locate a private member in the House who would table the petition in the House, as has been done with petitions on similar matters in a similar way.

* * *

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INTRODUCTION OF FISCAL AND MONETARY REFORMS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): He's back again. He is a one day a week man.

An hon. Member: How is the campaign going?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: Is it the view of the Prime Minister that in order for the restraint program of the government to work we must have immediate fiscal and monetary reform? If so, when is it the intention of the government to present specific measures before the House to stimulate the private sector and to get the economy moving again?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member recalls the white paper which was tabled a month ago, he would know that the fiscal and monetary policy is referred to there. We are continuing the general posture we adopted on fiscal stance in the budget of last June, which as the House knows, is a rather expansionary one and therefore intended to encourage continued growth in Canada.

On the monetary side, of course adjustments are made from time to time. The hon. member is aware that the Bank of Canada increased the bank rate in the month of September to nine per cent in an effort to ensure that there not be an inflationary rate of expansion of money.

* * *

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

RESTORATION OF RAIL SERVICE TO GLENWOOD AND HILL SPRING—REASON FOR DELAY

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In answer to my question in this House on November 7 regarding restoration of rail service to Glenwood and Hill Spring, the minister informed me there may be a requirement and a role for the Canadian Transport Commission. Since that time the CPR has notified Mr. Harold Boucher, President of the Chamber of Commerce in Magrath, that it is awaiting word from the CTC. Would the minister inform the House where the confusion lies, since the CPR says the bridge has to be restored in order to provide service?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is not very much confusion about the fact that the bridge has to be restored if service is to be provided. The question is the cost of the bridge and alternative ways of providing adequate service in the area. With the CTC we have been considering the question of the use of trucks immediately to move grain from that area, and some steps are going forward toward this end.

Mr. Hurlburt: In view of the fact the minister has stated that the bridge has to be repaired, would he inform the House why the CPR hauled 15 loads over the bridge but now refuses to haul any more and has cut off service to people in the area?

Mr. Lang: I am not sure at which stage the hon. member refers to the materials having been hauled. As I understand it, the bridge is not safe for service and therefore cannot be used to provide service in the ordinary course.

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

COMMUNICATIONS

CABLEVISION—REQUEST THAT COMPANIES BE GIVEN CHOICE OF TELEVISION STATIONS

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the parliamentary secretary to the Department of Communications, in the absence of the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Philbrook: Or a minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Philbrook: Is there any influence the ministry can exert on the CRTC to afford more flexibility to local cable vision companies regarding their choice of TV stations so that communities can have the choice of watching the programming they prefer, such as educational TV?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, no. This is within the jurisdiction of the CRTC, but interested parties can go before the CRTC, particularly when licensing of cable operations comes before that body, to make clear their views.

* * *

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF OLD AGE PENSION AND CHANGE IN INDEXING FORMULA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that it is almost 2½ years since there was any change in the basic amount of either old age security or the guaranteed income supplement, and in view of the fact that senior citizens are not enabled by the indexing formula now in effect to keep up either with the cost of living or the standard of living, may I ask whether the government will consider at this session an increase in the basic pension amounts set out in the Old Age Security Act?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member stated the basic amount paid under old age pension has gone up regularly during the past two years and more particularly it continues to do so every three months under the escalation clause provided in the legislation. Indeed, a new increase is expected on January 1 next.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Even though the minister did not answer my question about an increase in the basic pension rates, may I ask with respect to the indexing of pensions whether the government is considering changing the formula so that escalation will be up to date and will be related to the costs of those goods and services which pensioners actually have to buy?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the question has already been considered. As the hon. member knows, Statistics Canada is now reviewing the basis under which the consumer price index is determined. However, I say once again to the hon. member that if we were satisfied with relying on those services which the elderly buy in preference to others, in some cases the increases might well be lower than those now granted under the consumer price index.

* * *

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PERMIT DEDUCTIBILITY OF COST OF WORKERS' TOOLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Within the framework of the fight against inflation conducted by the Canadian government and in order to help workers in the low or average income bracket, who are the first victims of inflation, does the Prime Minister intend to submit to his cabinet amendments to the Income Tax Act so as to permit deductibility, minus depreciation factor, of cost of tools used by and necessary to workers who earn their living with them, such as mechanics and workers in the building trades?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is already a provision in the Income Tax Act providing deduction of a given amount that workers can use to deduct the cost of these tools from their taxable income. If the hon. member's suggestion goes beyond the present situation, I take note of it to discuss it with the Minister of Finance, so that he may consider it in his next budget.

* * *

● (1450)

[English]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION IN SERVICES IN WESTERN PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Was the Minister of Justice indicating the Solicitor General's policy regarding the RCMP when the Minister of Justice told the western provinces last week, as reported, that in future they would have to get along with a very drastic reduction in the services of the RCMP and that attorneys general had been given three weeks to comment to the minister?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I doubt if the Minister of Justice said that. He and I were in Edmonton last Friday, to discuss several matters with the provincial governments, including the new RCMP contracts. We propose a new sharing formula for double task RCM policemen who are to carry out federal and provincial duties in the provinces. We did not say personnel would be reduced. Actually, we hope to increase the numbers of personnel in those provinces.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Notwithstanding what the minister said, do those proposals indicate that there could be a serious reduction in RCMP services available to the provinces? I am thinking of the RCMP being used either as provincial police or, in some cases, municipal police.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, no, the proposals did not in any way indicate any reduction in services. Some provincial ministers said that some municipalities may not want to continue with RCMP services if there is to be a 2 per cent increase in cost; but we did not indicate we would withdraw or reduce service. Actually, in many respects we hope to increase services.

* * *

TRADE

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN CHEESE IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and relates to the serious state of the Canadian cheese industry. As in the last ten years Canadian cheese exports have fallen from about 32 million pounds annually to about 12 million pounds, and cheese imports risen from 15 million to 50 million pounds, can the minister indicate when he will announce a decrease in Canada's cheese import quotas?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to announce this today although, as was indicated by the reaction from my side of the House, I am under considerable pressure from hon. members on both sides to re-examine this matter. I am now in the process of so doing.

* * *

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and relates to his decision, as leader of the Liberal party's Quebec wing, to solicit donations directly from executives of supposedly—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher.

* * *

IMMIGRATION

REFUSAL OF ENTRY PERMITS TO KNOWN TERRORISTS—AUTHORITY FOR PERMIT TO SHAFIK AL-HOUT

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and relates to his answer to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, to the effect that we will not allow known terrorists to enter Canada. Can the minister indicate under whose auspices a minister's permit was granted to Shafik Al-Hout and if security checks indicate he is not a known terrorist or member of a group promoting international terrorism?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe—and this was repeated by the President of the Privy Council—that the policy has been long established and most recently repeated as to how such ministers' permits are granted. The PLO is considered a prohibited organization, but members of the PLO who are not themselves known terrorists are not denied ministers' permits. They require them, and they are granted when the person concerned is invited by a reputable Canadian organization and if the visit is to be for a short, specific period. The person in question was examined under these criteria. As reports indicated that he, himself, was not a known terrorist, he was permitted entry for a specific period, and the purposes of entry were known.

* * *

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—DISPARITY BETWEEN RATE ON APPLES FROM OKANAGAN TO EASTERN CANADA AND RATE FROM STATE OF WASHINGTON

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the refusal of the CPR last week to do anything about the disparity in freight rates between Okanagan apples and Washington apples, and as the loss to B.C. apple producers shipping to eastern Canada is to be a projected $318,000, will the minister take action to rectify this unfair competitive advantage in favour of United States apple producers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the minister has no power under the present law to take action.

* * *

[Translation]

AIR TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON USE OF FRENCH IN AIR TO GROUND COMMUNICATIONS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Transport.

Since all countries of the world use their official language or languages in air transport and communications, besides English, could the minister tell the House what is his policy regarding the use of French in the province of Quebec, considering the instructions his department sent recently to the various control towers in the province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, without quite accepting in its entirety the premise of the question, I confirm that the use of the French language has been permitted on VFR flights in relation to five airports in Quebec. The question of any move relating to IFR flights at other airports is being studied in relation to the safety factors involved. Certainly, at this time IFR flight communications are conducted in the English language only. There has been general approval to move in the direction of French and English advisory communications in Quebec and steps in that direction will be taken as soon as possible.

* * *

GRAIN

POSSIBLE DEFERMENT OF INCOME TAX ON RETURNS FROM GRAIN SOLD ON CASH BASIS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Considering what the parliamentary secretary said in Regina on November 10 about the mailing of the 1975 and 1976 Canadian Wheat Board adjustment cheques, may I ask the minister if the grain producer is to understand that the minister will not allow an election for tax purposes with regard to grain that was sold on a regular cash purchase basis?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would be impractical to permit individual producers to adopt a different tax position in relation to their specific cheques. We have decided to defer until January 1, and therefore to the 1976 taxation year, the adjustment cheques in relation to those who deferred their initial price. In the case of the others, the general wish of farmers, as confirmed by the recent vote of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, is that the cheques should be issued as soon as possible for the 1975 year, and that is planned. Contingency plans are going forward, to assure that the cheques can be delivered to farmers if the mail strike continues.

● (1500)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING AWAY-FROM-HOME EXPENSES

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-417, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to clarify the matter of away-from-home expenses for taxpayers who are employees of persons whose principal business is passenger, goods or passengers and goods transport and the duties of employment require them regularly to travel away from the place to which they would normally report for work.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a point of order.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PETITION FOR CHANGES IN ABORTION LAW—RELEASE OF DR. MORGENTALER

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition including about 5,500 signatures and requesting the repeal of the present abortion legislation, so that abortion be removed from the Criminal Code; the immediate release of Dr. Morgentaler and the cessation of all proceedings against him and against others on the same grounds; the creation of medical clinics where interruptions of pregnancy could be done in all security and in healthy conditions, once the woman involved has made her decision in conscience. This petition was given to me by Le Réseau d'Action et d'Information pour les Femmes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

[English]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 2,982, 3,209, 3,285 and 3,286.

[Text]

SECRETARIAT BUDGET

Question No. 2,982—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

For each of the fiscal years (a) 1971-72 (b) 1972-73 (c) 1973-74 (d) 1974-75 (e) 1975-76 what was the budget of the (i) Assistant Secretary for Security and Intelligence (ii) Government Operations Secretariat (iii) Priorities and Planning Secretariat?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): (a) See Note 1.

	(b) 1972-73	(c) 1973-74	(d) 1974-75	(e) 1975-76
Assistant Secretary for Security and Intelligence	196,242	217,575	241,973	243,000
Government Operations Secretariat	92,090	138,442	179,819	205,600
Priorities and Planning Secretariat	226,764	226,370	245,519	325,000

NOTE 1: In fiscal year 71-72, financial records were maintained for the complete office rather than on a secretariat basis.

NOTE 2: The figures given in (b), (c), (d) and (e) include cost relating to salaries, travel expenses and professional and special services. (b), (c) and (d) are actual expenses while (e) is the 1975-76 forecast.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—NUMBER OF BILINGUAL POSITIONS IN FREDERICTON

Question No. 3,209—Mr. Howie:

How many positions are there in the Department of National Health and Welfare office in Fredericton, New Brunswick (a) how many are designated as bilingual (b) what are the positions?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Seventy-six continuing full time position. Ten term positions. (a) Twenty. (b) Canada Pension Plan: District Manager; Social Allowance and Services: Eligibility Clerk; Income Security: Regional Director; Secretary to Regional Director; Information Clerk; Field Officer; Registry Clerk; Typist; Generalist Clerk (4); Chief, Family Allowance; Supervisor, Family Allowance; Supervisor, OAS; Processing Clerk (3); Chief, OAS/GIS; Processing Clerk, Term.

● (0000)

DEDUCTIBLE EXPENSES FOR CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

Question No. 3,285—Mr. Peters:

For the year 1974, what was the approximate amount allowed to each tobacco company operating in Canada as deductible expenses for cigarette advertising?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Data on deductible expenses for cigarette advertising is not compiled as a general statistical item. In any case, release of such information on a single corporation would be prohibited by Section 241 of the Income Tax Act.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—MINISTER'S SPEECH

Question No. 3,286—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs print at public expense and on Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs paper a speech entitled "Notes for a Speech by The Honourable André Ouellet on the Third Reading of Bill C-2" and, if so (a) how many copies were printed (b) what was the total cost (c) what are the reasons justifying this expenditure when the speech could be reprinted from Hansard in the usual manner (d) to whom were they distributed?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): (a) Yes, 800 English; 300 French. (b) $165. (c) The speech was never delivered in the House of Commons. Due to the time limit, the Minister was unable to speak on third reading of Bill C-2. For this reason, his prepared text was circulated to enable those interested to have additional information on this important Bill which is of concern to the Canadian public. (d) Members of the House of Commons and Senate, the Press Gallery, National Press Building, Canadian Press, United Press, Ottawa daily newspapers, CBC, Information Canada and Directors of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

[English]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 3,143 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

LIP—APPLICATIONS FOR CONSTITUENCY OF PEMBINA

Question No. 3,143—Mr. Elzinga:

1. How many applications were submitted under the Local Initiatives Programme for the Constituency of Pembina in (a) 1972-73 (b) 1973-74 (c) 1974-75 (d) 1975-76?

2. What were the names of the organizations that applied for a grant and what was the amount of money they requested in (a) 1972-73 (b) 1973-74 (c) 1974-75 (d) 1975-76?

3. Which organizations received grants and in what amounts in (a) 1972-73 (b) 1973-74 (c) 1974-75 (d) 1975-76?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Blais: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES IMPROVEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE RATE OF RETURN ON GOVERNMENT ANNUITY CONTRACTS

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-75, to increase the rate of return on government annuity contracts, to increase their flexibility and to discontinue future sales thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the 67 years since its inception, the Government Annuities Act has given Canadians some guarantee of financial security for their old age. The other day the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) told me this act was given second reading the day he was born.

The benefits provided by the annuities program filled an important void in those early days when there was an obvious lack of retirement plans and programs. We have to remember that we did not then have old age pensions, the Canada Pension Plan or the many private pension plans we have today. Due to the many initiatives undertaken by governments and the private sector, we have come a long way since then toward ensuring the basic economic welfare of the retired citizen. During the past decade, various government and private pension plans have been developed and are constantly being revised to keep pace with the demands of changing circumstances. It was with these considerations in mind that the government announced its intention in the last budget to introduce the bill which is now before us.

This act, called the Government Annuities Improvement Act, will, among other things, increase the rate of return on government annuity contracts to 7 per cent per annum, increase the range of their flexibility and discontinue future sales of annuity contracts. It will bring government annuity contracts up to date so that present annuity contract holders—there are some 280,000 of them—will no longer be subjected to the relative disadvantages of the present contract interest rate structure which varies from 3 per cent to 5¼ per cent. Raising the interest rate to 7 per cent brings their rate of return closer in line with rates offered in the private sector.

I would like to emphasize, however, that the annuities account should be regarded as an investment portfolio accumulated over the years where interest rates could vary from 4 per cent to the current 9 per cent or 10 per cent. The average yield would be situated somewhere between these two extremes. Consequently, the 7 per cent rate is based on a close study of the current yield on various public and private investment portfolios.

Our objective was to determine a rate of return in line with comparative investment yields and one that can be expected to remain current for some time. For example, if you examine the average yield on composite funds of life insurance companies operating in Canada, you will find that in 1974 it ranged from 7.1 per cent to 7.8 per cent. To be on a comparable basis with the government annuities where the government pays the cost of administration, these figures should be reduced by one-half per cent for administration expenses to 6.6 per cent from 7.3 per cent.

Even if you project these figures upward for 1975 by 0.2 per cent to 0.3 per cent, members will note that the 7 per cent rate proposed in this act is still in line and is even somewhat above the average rate of 6.5 per cent on the total national debt and the effective yield of 6.8 per cent on the government superannuation account. Though a 7 per cent rate is reasonable by current standards, it must be easily adjustable in the future. Accordingly, the rate of return will be subject to periodic review depending on future fluctuations in interest rates.

Let me give a few details about how the new rate will be applied to both matured and unmatured contracts in order to illustrate the effect of the change. For the 106,000 persons with matured contracts, the contract rates presently range from 3 per cent to 5¼ per cent, and percentage increases in actual payments under this act would range from 32 per cent to 10 per cent, respectively. The average percentage increase in annuity payments would be approximately 22 per cent. Because the new rate is retroactive to April 1, 1975, it will mean there will be a back payment for holders of matured annuities.

There are about 175,000 persons with deferred contracts valued at $640 million, that is, with contracts that have not yet matured. From April 1, 1975, these contracts will earn 7 per cent on the accumulated premiums and interest. For most contracts, the annuity at maturity will be increased accordingly. However, in the case of about 150 pension plans covering some 45,000 persons, the allocation of the increase must be decided by the terms of the plan itself.

● (1510)

To illustrate the effect if the increased interest rate is maintained, we can take the example of 4 per cent contracts not covered by special pension plan arrangements: there would be a 33 per cent increase in the annuity if it matures in ten years and a 77 per cent increase if it matures in 20 years. In addition, at maturity the annuity payment would also be increased in the same way as for the matured contracts.

One consequence of these changes is the need to raise the current $1,200 ceiling on annual annuity payments in order to accommodate the effects of the increased interest rate. This, too, as hon. members will note, is provided for in the bill. The cost of the 7 per cent increase in the rate of return is estimated to be an additional $38 million for the 1975-76 fiscal year, but we have estimated that the total additional cost to the government will slowly decrease in future years as more annuities mature.

The second major aspect of the bill reflects the proposal that no further annuity contracts will be sold after the act comes into effect. This will apply immediately to individual and group contracts. However, new registrations would be allowed covering existing employer-sponsored group contracts during the three years ending March 31, 1979, to give employers adequate time in which to make alternate arrangements with the private sector.

Our decision to cease further sales of annuity contracts is not based simply on the confidence we have in the servicing abilities of private and public institutions. More fundamentally, it springs from recognition and acceptance of the reality that average yearly sales of government annuities have been decreasing steadily over the past 27 years to a point at which only 11 new contracts were sold last year. Obviously, other public and private enterprises have been doing their job reasonably well and the need for a government program of this type has largely disappeared. Nevertheless, as I indicated earlier, we shall continue to administer existing contracts, and that will take us well into the twenty-first century because of the unelapsed time applying to so many of them.

The bill also provides for a number of housekeeping changes; some solutions which have been developed to deal with problems which have arisen in the past. By and large, these changes are self-explanatory, though I shall be glad to deal with them in more detail if requested during the committee stage.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to the fact that this step to enrich annuities is unprecedented and it is not legally required of the government. There are many people who have some part of their investments locked into low-interest rate bonds, mortgages, and so on. Nevertheless, I think we all agree that government annuities are a special case. No one could have foreseen the current interest rates at the time the contracts were entered into, and the government now intends to protect in this fashion the investments of those individuals who had the foresight to provide for their retirement.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, this bill arose out of an announcement in the June 23 budget that legislation would be introduced to increase the interest paid on government annuities held by some 270,000 Canadians. We welcomed this announcement in the June 23 budget. It was probably the only item in that budget which I sensed was universally accepted. It was the least the government could do for these persons, the thousands of Canadians who over the years had purchased government annuities in good faith, with the idea in mind that those annuities would yield a secure return on the investment and provide a source of income when they had left the work force.

I commend the government for taking action to recognize the needs of those who hold these annuities. Over the years during which these annuities have been offered for sale—that is, from 1908 to the present—the interest rate ran from 3 per cent to a maximum of 5¼ per cent. That is not a very dramatic increase over a span of 67 years. During that period, thousands of individuals purchased annuities to provide for their retirement and employers purchased them as a means of providing pensions for their employees. Most of those individuals, and all the pension funds with substantial holdings of annuities, have been in severe financial difficulty for a number of years. I believe it is worth noting that 82 per cent of the premiums received from individual annuity contract holders were deposited under registered retirement savings plan contracts.

I hope the action the government is proposing is a prelude to similar action in accordance with a formula designed to alleviate the plight of holders of perpetual government bonds. Many of these unfortunate individuals purchased perpetual bonds on the understanding that when the last coupon was clipped the bonds would be called. However, this was not done. All we heard from the government was the announcement that perpetual bonds would be redeemed by 1990. Mr. Speaker, these bonds would yield only 30 per cent of their face value if sold today. I urge the government to develop a conversion plan for them as soon as possible, thereby ending this rough justice.

We do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to take up much time of the House debating the bill before us. Three or four of my hon. friends will probably wish to take part in the discussion, but it would be our desire to have the bill sent to the committee of the whole for consideration there. I gather, though, that we cannot get the consent of all parties to such a course.

There are some matters, though, which we feel the minister might explain. For instance, we would like to know how the cost of the increased interest will be shown in the estimates. It has to be presented somewhere, of course. We should also like the position of short-term government employees clarified. We want to know what is intended to replace the system which has operated in the past under which they have converted these annuities, and the course of action they might be allowed to take.

As I say, we do not intend to take up much time on this bill. We are prepared to see it pass all stages today and I hope others taking part in the debate share this view. Thus we may alleviate the plight of these people. I am sure hon. members on all sides of the House throughout the past few years have had letters and communications from constituents of theirs explaining their plight. Many of these people are school teachers, clergymen, pension fund holders, all of whom have explained the difficulty that they are having funding their pensions with the low rate of return on government annuities.

● (1520)

I commend the minister and the government for bringing in the bill and I urge them to act with all speed. Let us get the bill through committee in proper order and return it to the House so it can be passed with all possible haste.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the minister has already indicated, and as I have mentioned on one or two previous occasions, I have a lifelong interest in this legislation. However, it is not quite as long a time as my hon. friend in the back row is suggesting. It so happens that on the very day I was born, June 18, 1908, the House of Commons debated second reading and then passed through committee on the whole the bill which we know as the Government Annuities Act. Those who made up the House of Commons of that day were divided among members who thought they were getting into an area that was no business of government, and members who were proud of the fact that the government was taking a step to assist Canadians in providing for their old age.

The maximum amount of annuity that was payable under the original act which was given second reading on June 18, 1908, was $50 a month. We have come a long way since then, in many respects. The minister correctly pointed out that this legislation over the last 67 years has enabled many people to provide themselves with a measure of security in their old age. The legislation has made this possible not only through the purchase by individuals of contracts; it has also made it possible for many employers to set up employee pensions plans under the aegis of the Government Annuities Act. Therefore, I stand here today, 67 years later, and salute the members of the House of Commons who on June 18, 1908 brought this legislation into being.

Like the hon. member who preceded me, I welcome the fact that this Government Annuities Improvement Act is going to make certain improvements in Canadian government annuities. I shall have something to say on the other side of the coin in a moment or two, but first I warmly welcome the fact that for many holders of government annuities and for many persons who are receiving payments on their government annuity contracts it will be good news to hear that their payments are going to be increased.

As I understand it from the schedule attached to the bill, a schedule that is referred to in clause 5, the increases that recipients of government annuity payments can anticipate run as follows. If one is drawing payments from a contract that was based on a return of 5¼ per cent, the increase in those payments will be 10 per cent. If the contract was based on a 5 per cent rate, the increase in the payments will be 14 per cent. If the contract was based on a 4 per cent interest rate, the increase in the payments over what is now being received will be 22 per cent. A contract that was issued when the rate was 3½ per cent will give, now, an increase in the payments of 29 per cent. And, down at the bottom, if a person had a contract that was issued when the rate was only 3 per cent, the increase he will now receive in his annuity payments will be 32 per cent.

It is also to be noted that these payments are to be retroactive to April 1 of this year. I share the hope of the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) that this bill will not take an undue amount of time to get through, but it will not really have any effect on the amount of money the recipients of these payments will receive because whenever the bill does go through the payments will be retroactive to April 1. Also, of course, the recipients will have to wait for the postal strike to end before they get their cheques anyway. In any case, we of the House of Commons of 1975 are making a significant improvement in the legislation that was passed by the House of Commons in 1908.

May I add to what was said by the previous speaker to the effect that although the minister was justified in saying that the government was not legally required to increase payments under the Government Annuities Act, the government was morally required to do so. When the government established the principle of escalation with respect to old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, veterans' pensions and allowances, judges' pensions, members of parliament pensions, and on down the line, and then added a bonus in certain cases to payments made on Canada savings bonds, it seemed to me that the government was dragging its heels by not taking action to increase payments made under the Government Annuities Act.

I agree with the comment already made that once this has been passed, something equally worth while ought to be done with respect to those perpetual bonds of 1936. I join with all those who have said that the act of the government in declaring that these bonds will finally be called in 1996, I think it is, which is recognition that they cannot go on forever, does not really answer the problem for those who have held these bonds for a long time. There are these other matters that ought to be attended to, but at the moment we are discussing the Canadian government annuities program and the provision under which there will be the increased payments by the percentages to which I have already referred. This is a decision of the government that the House welcomes and which I am sure we will support unanimously.

The other side of the coin—I should say this right away— is that although these improvements sound fairly good when reading them out, the result is that the persons on these annuities will again be put on a fixed income basis so far as their government annuity contracts are concerned. It took us a long while to win the point that retirement income should at least be geared to the rise in the cost of living, but I go further and say that it should be geared to the rise in the standard of living or rise in the gross national product. At least we have it geared to the rise in the cost of living, and that is reflected in old age security, the guaranteed income supplement payments and all the other payments I mentioned a moment ago.

● (1530)

I contend that the same should apply in respect of government annuities. I noticed that the minister made no reference to these increases being related in any way to the rise in the cost of living. He based it entirely on what has happened to interest rates over the years. The fact is that those who have government annuity contracts and are drawing payments under those contracts are persons who are drawing them as part of their provision for their retirement years. It really hits older people very hard when the cost of living goes up and only some of the elements of their income are escalated. I think the return from government annuities ought to be treated in the same way as other forms of retirement income and a formula should be devised for the increase to take place every year in accordance at least with the rise in the cost of living. Every time I say that, I feel I must get in my point that it should be in respect of the rise in the standard of living. But we have not reached that yet; that is one of the goals we still must attain.

Indeed, this action reminds me of something that was done by the Parliament of Canada in respect of retired public servants. For many years, and I mean many years—decades, in fact—we tried hard to get an increase in the pensions paid to retired public servants. The first move in that direction was made during the parliament of 1958 to 1962 when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister. I hope the fact that what I shall say in a moment will be partly critical and will not offend my friends to the right. The fact is, that government made the first move in doing something to increase the pensions of retired public servants, and it was a good first step but it was a one-shot move. All that happened under the bill that was passed during the days of that Conservative administration was the inclusion of a provision to add a percentage to the income of retired public servants.

It was most welcomed when those retired public servants got it, but a year later, two years later or three years later they found that the situation was worsening again, so the day came in about 1969 or 1970 when the Liberal government was finally persuaded that it ought to go not just for a one-shot increase in the pensions of retired public servants but ought to establish a formula for those pensions to go up year after year in accordance with the rise in the cost of living.

I submit that the same thing is happening again. Here we have the present government doing what the Conservative government did in about 1959 or 1960, bringing in a one-shot increase in payments payable under the Government Annuities Act. But it is not finishing the job. I suggest that these payments should be put on a basis so that they will escalate, just the same as other forms of retirement payments escalate under various provisions we have made.

That is the main criticism I make of this bill. Welcome though it is, and generous though this increase may sound, if you are at the bottom of one pile and the top of the other, or vice versa, that is it: you get that increase, and the new rate that you get from your government annuity stays at that rate for the rest of your life. That is not good enough, and no one should know it better than this government because this government realized through experience that what the Conservative government had done for retired public servants, though welcomed at the time, was not good enough.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Don't be unkind.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) seems to want it both ways. He says: "Don't be unkind". Perhaps he is telling me not to be unkind to the Liberals.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That's a different thing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think I made it clear that I was giving the Diefenbaker government credit for having made the first move in respect of pension increases for retired public servants, but it was a one-shot move that had to be improved. We have the same situation today; we have a one-shot move and I do not think it will stand up.

When you realize the government is discontinuing the sale of government annuity contracts, it seems to me this is all the more reason it should protect the position of those who have contracts under this legislation. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I think I should go on to say that I regret the fact that the government has proposed to discontinue the issuing of contracts under the Government Annuities Act. Of course, it is not rescinding the Government Annuities Act; it will have to go on for another 50, 75 or maybe 100 years, for all I know, until all the persons who now have contracts have lived out their days. So the Government Annuities Act has to continue. But as the minister has said, once this bill is passed and becomes law, no more individual contracts will be issued except in a few cases where substitute contracts are written for those already in existence, and after March 31, 1979, no additional employees can be enrolled in any group plans already in existence.

I suppose that one of the reasons I do not man the barricades about this and really say we should not let this part of the bill go through is, of course, the fact that the government has let the position of government annuities deteriorate in relation to other forms of retirement income that individuals or companies can purchase. That reminds me of the lobby that has gone on for years against the Canada Government Annuities Act. One has only to read the debate the day the original bill was given second reading, to which I have already referred, to note there the concern that the government might be getting into business that should be the preserve of private enterprise.

I remember with particular vividness the year 1951. We had been campaigning, quite a few of us, to get the Canada Government Annuities Act improved, and in that year the government finally agreed to take action. The minister of labour of that day—the Government Annuities Act came under the minister of labour in those days—brought in a bill to amend the Government Annuities Act, making a number of improvements, putting government annuities in a position where they would be competitive with annuities and contracts that could be purchased in the private sector.

We welcomed the bill. It was a bit of a pleasant surprise to have the government make the improvements that were included in that legislation. It came in for second reading, it was passed and referred to one of the standing committees. In those days bills did not go to standing committees automatically; the rule was to deal with them in committee of the whole and it was the exception to send a bill to a standing committee. However, this bill was sent to a standing committee.

I remember at the time wondering why it was given that treatment, but I soon discovered the reason was that there were quite a few bodies who wanted to appear and to make representations. I have never met so many insurance company heads and executives in my life, not even when we had the Canada Pension Plan before a special joint committee. They came here in force to try to persuade us that we should not proceed with that government bill which, as I say, was designed to improve the Government Annuities Act at that time.

I remember that we had a meeting of the committee one day and it looked as though we were going to lose the vote to support the bill and send it back to the House. If I can be a bit reminiscent about it, a friend of mine—he is still a friend even though he is in the other place—David Croll, was on our side and felt that this bill should be improved and we had to get it through. Between us we agreed that we just did not have the manpower in the committee, at that meeting, to win the vote se we managed to keep it going until adjournment time in order to get another meeting of the committee. David Croll assured me that there were members like the late Lionel Conacher and others on the Liberal side who were not attending that morning but whom he would get to the later meeting and we would win.

● (1540)

Sure enough, when we met the next time all the members were there and we carried the day. The bill was passed in the committee and was referred back to the House. But that was the end of it. It was reported back to the House for third reading, and when we asked the minister when we would have third reading we received no satisfaction. In other words, the insurance lobby had persuaded the government not to go ahead with the 1951 bill that would have improved the Government Annuities Act.

The minister says today that the number of sales of contracts has been dropping over the last 25 years. Well, I have been reciting something that happened 24 years ago. It is true that because government annuities have been allowed to deteriorate, the number of persons wanting to buy them has gone down greatly. That, of course, I suppose is the reason they are now to be discontinued altogether. I think this is unfortunate. I believe it would have been better to make further improvements to the Government Annuities Act so that persons who do not feel they are providing enough for their retirement through old age security, the Canada Pension Plan and other pension arrangements, could invest in their government through Canadian government annuities.

I regret very much that the ground has been prepared during these 20-odd years for the day when there would seem to be no case for continuing the sale of Canadian government annuities. So, Mr. Speaker, I regret that there are those clauses in the bill that will discontinue the sale of individual contracts and will provide for there to be no more registrations of employees, even in existing group contracts, after March 31, 1979.

The minister suggested today that this legislation over these past 67 years has helped a lot of people make provision for their old age. I agree. But the fact is that we now have other arrangements. We have old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan and many more employee pension plans both in the public and the private sector, and therefore the need for this now is not as great as it was in 1908 or in many of the years that followed. I agree. But if the government wishes to boast about the provisions that have been made and tell us how wonderful it is that we have the Old Age Security Act, the Canada Pension Plan and retirement pension plans for public servants, members of the RCMP and members of the armed forces, and so on, I submit the government is morally obligated to see to it that those programs are put on the best possible basis.

Today I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) whether the government intended to do anything in this session about the basic amount of old age security. I received his stock answer which was no answer at all to my question. He reminded me, as if I do not know it, that there is a quarterly escalation of old age security.

In a supplementary question I tried to remind him that that escalation is always behind and does not relate to the goods or services older people actually have to buy, and that as yet we do not have a perfect system of security for the retirement years of our people. If the government now proposes to take away this one means of retirement income that has been there for many years, it is morally obligated to make improvements in the other forms of retirement income. Therefore, I again call for a substantial improvement in the basic amount of old age security; I call for improvement in the public service pension plan and the RCMP and armed forces plans with which we are dealing under Bill C-52 before another committee. I call for action on the part of the government to get the railways of this country to put their pension plans on a better basis. I say we should not take away something that is there until we have improved the other plans that are supposed to provide for the retirement of our people.

I shall end where I began. The debate of 1908 to which I referred is an interesting one to read. The members of that day felt they were breaking new ground to be interfering at all in the provision of old age retirement. Some members were concerned. I have not taken the time to read what Their Honours in the other place thought about it, but I can guess that they found it quite shocking. We have come a long way from that day to the recognition that governments are obligated to provide for the security of our older people. I will not only agree, but assert that the Old Age Security Act, the Canada Pension Plan and other forms of benefit are much better than the Government Annuities Act itself, but I regret that it is being removed completely without more substantial improvements being made in the other forms of old age retirement income.

I welcome the percentage increases that those now drawing annuity payments will receive retroactive to April 1. I welcome the fact that in respect of contracts still in existence and not yet matured the rate will be 7 per cent as from that same date. But I regret that there is not in this legislation a formula for escalation year by year. As for the other forms of retirement income, you know, sir, and this House knows that the battle for further improvements in all our pension plans will go right on until we win.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the references by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to that great parliament of 1908. He spoke with such reverence and affection that I thought I may have misread history. However, I find that I have not done so. That was the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier; I believe he was in power at that time.

The hon. member spoke of that government with such affection that I thought perhaps he had been a member of parliament at that time. But I checked the parliamentary record while he was speaking and found that was not so. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has gone to his just reward, and the government of that day eventually went to its just reward and other governments came into play, including the party which is now the official opposition.

The whole history of pensions, the protection of the disadvantaged in Canada, whether one party or another has been in power has been a history of progress. While there may be comments made from time to time, partisan or otherwise, in front of or behind the curtains of this House, in respect of that progress, the men and women of that day who took those steps, regardless of the party to which they belonged, took them in the hope there would be improvement for those who were intended to be beneficiaries.

I think it is important to remember with regard to this piece of legislation that perhaps it marks the beginning of the end of an era. We must remember there was skepticism in the business community. It was an unusual idea in 1908 that there should be this kind of provision for one's old age; therefore, the private insurance companies and financial institutions, which are now the everyday common carriers of the type of protection the annuities are meant to provide, would not touch it with a ten-foot pole. However, the government of the day recognized that there was a problem.

● (1550)

We have progressed a considerable distance past the point where it can be said that the government is the only kind of organization that can provide adequate protection. In fact, this kind of protection against the vicissitudes of old age has reached the point at which it has become much more popular, so popular that the private carriers are deemed to be able to do this work. I think it is important because it relieves to a certain extent the government of the day from the expenditures that are necessary under a program such as this and allows it to look to other programs that are also necessary in our community.

I think it is important because there is an implicit recognition here that there is an opportunity in the private enterprise sector of our economy for that aspect of our economy to function. The government is recognizing that at least in this field they can begin to phase out in a just and equitable way the particular kinds of coverage which were intended by the government in 1908.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre passed rather lightly over the opportunities for Canadians to invest in their country through investing in annuities. But that, too, is being provided for in a different way. If investment in one's country is a criterion, I think we have to look at the Canada saving bonds program which is a form of investment in one's country and in which much more flexibility is provided for the owner of the bonds, in terms of his use of the fund during the time it is required. The necessity for this kind of program is not nearly as apparent from that point of view.

I am one who supports, as a matter of principle, the indexing of pensions and I have spoken in the House about that. We will have the opportunity to deal with the whole broad field of public service pensions when we deal with Bill C-52. There is there a form of indexing, although it is not quite in the sense that has been mentioned, in that the governor in council has the right to look at the conditions and to advance interest rates if it becomes necessary and, I suppose, to advance them dramatically. The minister has indicated that conditions have become such that the government must have this power built into the regulations. The government is saying, in effect, that they really cannot predict the conditions and that the Minister of Finance will not predict or forecast what either the growth rate or the inflation rate will be—and that is one of the terrors of our time, quite frankly, for the person who has recently purchased or will purchase a government annuity as some protection against financial insecurity in old age.

What is really happening is that the government is saying in this piece of legislation that things have become so bad and so difficult that even the experts are failing to predict what the conditions will be in the business and financial communities, with all our income controls and anti-inflation programs, for senior citizens and others. Perhaps it is an admission not just of the failure of the government but of the failure of our economic system in the scheme of things. That is why the minister has seen fit to put in place some form of index—I use that word in the broadest sense—by regulation.

The fear that I and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have, quite frankly, is that the event will follow the necessity for indexing and by using this kind of system the minister has taken upon himself the considerable onus of ensuring what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said would happen, that is, that the increases in the return will match what is happening in the community to a great extent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question? Is it not a fact that as the bill reads, the governor in council has power by order in council to vary the 7 per cent rate that applies to maturing of contracts but hardly the power to vary the escalation rates that apply to pensions which are in payment, and is that not a serious lack?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member is quite correct in that, and I think it is a deficiency. I was not arguing that it was not; I was merely saying that there are at least the rudiments of the beginning of some form of indexing or flexibility which is necessary. The matter to which the hon. member has addressed himself is an indication of how great the vigilance of the minister and of the government must be, because even though these annuities will apply to a smaller and smaller group of Canadians, the fact is that they are the foundation stone of many of the pension plans and retirement plans of Canadians who have nowhere else to go at this point.

We have indicated that we will not take up much time with respect to this bill. I think the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) said that we would be prepared to give consent to have this matter considered in committee of the whole House in order that any questions remaining may be answered and the matter cleared up today, which I think is in the best interests of the owners of these contracts. I do not think there would be controversy on this matter, and I hope such consent will be called for when the minister closes the debate.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that we are finally getting around to the business of correcting the injustice done to those people who have been holding government annuity contracts for so many years. This bill is long overdue and I doubt that we will take much time in debating a matter that should have been settled long ago. While I realize that we cannot go back in years and grant a higher rate of interest on these annuities, we might at least have gone back to January 1 of this year and not just to April 1. This would have made up a little for what these people have lost through the great increases in interest rates that we have experienced over the past ten years.

I thought the government would have set the interest rate on these annuities at 9 per cent to 9.5 per cent, the same as the current savings bonds. I do not see any difference in collecting public money by subscription, whether you call the program an annuity or a bond issue. If government savings bonds realize a rate of interest of 9⅜ per cent per annum, why should there not be the same rate of interest for another bond issue? Just because an issue is called by a different name does not mean it should qualify for a lower rate of interest. We should have taken the opportunity to do this last fall when the government set the new interest rates on savings bonds. At that time my party called on the government to establish the same interest rates for annuities as for savings bonds, but we had to wait a full year for that to be done.

● (1600)

The provisions of this bill would have been speedily passed through this House any time in the past ten years. While my colleagues and I welcome all the changes proposed in the bill, we should still like to see annuities more on a par with savings bonds. With regard to the restriction on further sales of annuity contracts, there is no likelihood of anyone opting to buy annuities, even at the new rate of interest of 7 per cent. I am pleased that the government will allow interest to accrue on annuities after the death or disappearance of the annuitant. That will at least be of some advantage to beneficiaries of annuities. However, I do not see any provision in this bill for people who are now holding annuities where the interest payments have stopped. Perhaps the government has some plan to correct this situation.

I am also pleased with the provisions which allow for more flexibility in managing the annuities, such as the provision allowing for the payment of moneys due on annuities to be paid into a registered retirement savings plan. I notice, too, that all restrictions on the changes which a beneficiary might make in an annuity contract have been removed, giving these annuities the same flexibility as other bond issues.

In conclusion, I should like to draw attention to clause 11 of this bill which allows for the future setting of interest rates for annuities by order in council. This should give to the government all the authority it needs to raise the rates from time to time as long as any of these annuities remain in existence. With these remarks, I hope we can receive co-operation from other parties in the House in bringing this long overdue legislation into effect. This will help those people who have put so much trust in the Canadian form of justice but who have been denied that justice in the field of saving for their old age.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I can make no claim, as was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to having a lifelong interest in this particular form of annuity. At the outset of my remarks, however, I do declare that I have an interest in this form of annuity. While absent from Canada during the war years, when one was not able to take overseas all the pay he was drawing, or when one wished to leave something behind by way of savings, I did this and my father invested in a Canadian government annuity in the expectation that the time would come when I would draw the full $100 annuity. At that time it sounded like a very valuable form of investment.

Having declared this, I do not want to be prevented from entering this debate because, as the minister knows, the announcement in the Speech from the Throne that the government was to introduce legislation amending and upgrading Canadian government annuities aroused tremendous interest across the country. I and many hon. members of this House received many letters asking when this legislation would come forward, how much the increase would be, and when it could be expected.

I therefore concur with my colleague, the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott), that this legislation is long overdue. The 4 per cent rate is so outdated in present-day terms that I think the government was forced by the number of supplications received from its annuitants to move. I am not sure it would have moved had there not been these letters and requests. Because of the interest this matter has aroused throughout Canada, we now have this legislation before us, but we had had it for only a week.

When I first quickly read the legislation I thought I might propose an amendment or two, either with regard to the rate of interest or to the backdating of the legislation beyond April 1, 1975. I was thinking of those who had the prudence 30, 40 or 50 years ago to set aside some small savings in the expectation that they would be receiving their annuities in full form in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s. They could not then have realized how small the annuity would be in terms of its purchasing power. In terms of savings, the amount saved in the 1940s and 1950s and put aside for—let us say $100—the $50, $20, $25 or $28 is just about the value they are now getting out of it.

On that 4 per cent there was no saving whatsoever. I had therefore thought I might try to move back the date when it would be applicable, or suggest an increase in the rate of interest. I was deterred from doing so for two very good reasons. One, of course, is that in the present circumstances of restraint, and having heard the figures given by the minister when he moved second reading of this bill, that for 1975-76 alone it would mean an increase of about $38 million, if my figures are correct. To suggest another year back would at least double that figure. Therefore, I refrained from taking that course.

However, I do feel that had the government acted much earlier, the increase in the back payments to bring the annuity up to its 7 per cent rate would have been easier to agree to. I am always learning about things in parliament and I have absorbed much in the course of my being in parliament for about three years. I know that in regard to a bill involving an increase in the expenditure of money or the attachment of public funds there has to be a recommendation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may put me straight on this, but I notice there is no recommendation in this bill. I hope the bill is not defective in this respect and that we will be able to proceed with it.

I welcome the degree of flexibility attached to this bill. Clause 3(2) accords the governor in council authority to regulate in respect of an annuity the 7 per cent rate, with 7 per cent as a floor. It will never go below 7 per cent, as I read the bill. In terms of excessive inflation, it might go above that figure but never below. That suggests, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, that those holding an annuity at 3 per cent can be assured $132 per month; at 3.5 per cent, $129; and at 4 per cent, $122. I hope the minister is nodding his head in affirmation. Those holding a 5 per cent annuity will draw $114, and those holding the 5.25 per cent, $110. Annuity holders will welcome this news.

● (1610)

I am not sorry to see the government no longer involved in the sale of annuities. Their sale goes back to June, 1908, when individuals bought annuities from the government. If people could have bought private annuities more easily, their private annuities would have borne rates which accommodated themselves to changing circumstances. Perhaps the rates could have been renewed every five years. Annuitants would not have been stuck with 3 per cent, 3.5 per cent or 4 per cent annuity rates. The inflexibility was written into the original act. Private companies obviously would have concluded much more flexible agreements with annuity purchasers and provided for the periodic re-examination of interest rates. I am glad that the government is no longer involved in this activity.

Nowadays a prudent saver can put aside money in many ways: he can invest in a Canadian business, buy government bonds and otherwise provide for his family's future. He can invest in his country. I am glad that opportunity is becoming more widespread. Therefore, calling this legislation long overdue, welcoming many of its features, I will not delay passage of this bill on second reading and its going to committee for further study.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take up much time talking on this bill, although I wish to bring a few points to the minister's attention. Like most members, I have received substantial correspondence from constituents on the subject of government annuities, perpetual government bonds, etc. Many people purchased annuities and perpetual bonds before we experienced our present degree of inflation. All their complaints are similar, namely, that when they made their original investments they considered them to be good, substantial, so-called blue chip investments. Inflation was virtually non-existent and they visualized their future as being reasonably stable. Their horizon was unclouded and they bought such investments to provide for their retirement years.

When I heard that the government was to bring in legislation to increase the effective rate of interest on annuities but terminate their sale, I became concerned. The fact is, people are involved with governments and, like it or not, dealing with government is different from dealing with a private concern. The government's determination to end the sale of annuities is a glaring admission of the government's failure not only in annuities but in bonds generally. It is a failure to adapt to circumstances and the economic needs of those most in need. Primarily, of course, we are talking about senior citizens and the elderly who contributed to their country by working diligently over the years. They put away money for their retirement years but now, because of present-day conditions, they are under a great disadvantage and severely inconvenienced. That being so, it is appropriate for hon. members to raise their voices in protest and ask the government if this bill is fair and if something more could not be done to help these unfortunate people.

I realize that my suggestions involve considerable expense. Some of my colleagues suggest that the bill should be retroactive, that increased interest should date back to the original date of purchase of the annuity. Annuity holders are asking for more interest. They do not say that the effective rate should be, say, 7 per cent back to the original date of purchase, but they do say that the rate could be indexed to bring it in line with the rate paid by a reasonable investment in the years intervening between the original purchase and the present. If a fair and reasonable rate at the time of purchase was 3.5 per cent, that was the going rate for investments but it is too low now: it is now unrealistic. The government in its announcement of this bill indicated that it is ending the sale of annuities because it says there is insufficient interest in this type of investment. To me, that is an outright admission that people are losing faith in government investments.

I now take issue with some of my colleagues who say the government should get out of the annuities business. I feel that the government should play a certain limited role in the field of annuities. Certainly, it raises money by selling bonds and notes but it is under the social obligation to involve itself in a reasonably limited scheme of annuities. It should make them available primarily to lower income people who have not enough money to provide for their retirement through contracts with private companies. I, for one, am sorry to see the government leave the annuities business. I suspect it is leaving because of its unfortunate experience in that business and the serious complaints it has received.

I said at the beginning that most of us receive letters from our constituents. I have received a number. One from a constituent illustrates the plight in which many find themselves. The writer is a fine person, a widow in my constituency who has made a substantial contribution to her community, province and country. Among other things, she has worked very hard all her life. In 1954 she purchased a government annuity. She invested her savings of $12,000 through the office in Saskatoon and, I believe, made payments over three years. After she finished making her payments she reconsidered the investment. Even then she had serious reservations, and at her own expense travelled to Ottawa to see the director of the annuities branch. She asked if she could withdraw from the annuities scheme but was advised that it was a firm contract in the same way as if she had dealt with a private corporation. The government was not prepared to make any exceptions to the rule. Therefore, she was tied in, if I can term it in that way—

● (1620)

An hon. Member: Hooked.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I will say tied "tied." You can put your own interpretation on it. She was in fact tied into the scheme and could expect no relief or exceptions to the rule if she made a petition or formal request to the government. This woman was then advised that the scheme in which she was involved was a straight annuity concept. She was told that if she did not take the option to put it into a guaranteed scheme for a period of years, in the event of her death over the next few years, there would be no residual interest on the part of her estate with respect to any of the funds she had invested in the annuities scheme. Rather, it would simply terminate and the contract would be finished.

As a result of receiving this information, this woman opted for the annuity guaranteed scheme for 20 years. That was well and good. I understand she received an effective rate of 3½ per cent on her investment. Another aspect of this contract which I find rather inequitable is that when this lady reached the age of 65 years, not only was she still receiving the same interest rate of 3½ per cent but by virtue of the operation of this annuity the amount that she received in old age security was deducted from the annuity. Therefore, she received something like $40 less each month than she would have received had she not been in receipt of old age security. We have spoken about the inequity of return on interest rates. However, I find it a very disturbing situation when a government plan penalizes a participant by virtue of the fact that he or she is receiving old age security payments because they have passed the age of 65.

When this matter comes before the standing committee I will be interested in hearing from the minister whether provisions of this sort contained in annuity schemes will be amended to make the scheme more equitable and to underline the concept of an annuity. It should be on the same basis as if one had an annuity with a private company. It should not be affected by the kind of payment one receives from the government as a matter of right having attained the age of 65. In addition to speaking to me, this lady has apparently spoken to the CBC ombudsman. I understand there may be some discussion of this particular problem on that program before the end of this month. I can only hope that this complaint, which was brought to the attention of the minister, had some effect in precipitating this legislation. If that is the case, I suspect Mrs. Margaret Jenkins, a very distinguished constituent, will be happy that her complaint and petition have had this effect.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

While this legislation may not go as far as one would like, it does go a certain distance toward bringing some equity to these investments as of April 1, 1975. I join with other hon. members in commending the government to the extent that they have taken action to make a more reasonable return available to participants in the annuities scheme.

In writing to me, Mrs. Jenkins pointed out that if she had purchased $12,000 worth of government bonds at that time, she would have received $540 a year, or $10,800 for 20 years until April, 1975 at which time she would have received back the $12,000. She would still have had her capital. What she has now is a guaranteed period of 20 years with her $12,000 investment. She receives something in that vicinity but she has used up the capital investment. This woman has children. She feels she has contributed to society and to her country. She saved money. Quite frankly, she does not believe she has received proper consideration. During the course of the committee proceedings I hope the minister will give serious consideration to what else might be done for people in this situation.

I am certainly in favour of restraint in government expenditures. However, there is an area of government priority that must be considered. I refer to those who are unable to take care of themselves, the disadvantaged and the elderly. These persons have a very high priority. Restraint in government spending can well take place in other areas. A rearrangement of priorities in spending would not be difficult in order to make some reasonable provision for people in the categories I have mentioned.

During the course of the committee meetings, I ask the minister to let us know whether there is any additional provision which might come within the royal recommendation, by which we can make some gesture toward persons who will receive minimum benefit from the provisions of this bill, those whose annuity contracts are coming close to termination. These are special cases. The government is regarded by citizens in somewhat different terms than private companies. I therefore ask the minister to set up within the annuities branch an administrative tribunal to look at individual cases and grant relief with respect to applications where a particular hardship or need is shown. It is all right for those who have a reasonable income to just look upon this as an investment, but many people in Canada rely extensively on this kind of investment.

● (1630)

It seems to me the minister would do Canadians a great service if he were to consider setting up a mechanism within the department through which applications or petitions could be made by people who are most seriously affected by inadequate interest rates over the years; they might be given an opportunity to seek relief additional to that proposed in the legislation. In conclusion, I appreciate the opportunity afforded me to take part in this debate. I have spoken for rather longer that I intended, but I had certain things I wished to say with regard to this piece of legislation.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to explain the absence of the Royal recommendation from the copy of the bill I have. The hon. member who preceded me mentioned the royal recommendation. I see that I have a pre-first reading version of the bill, one which does not contain the royal recommendation and I should like that correction to stand.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to intervene briefly in this debate because I, along with others in this chamber, have received letters and telephone calls from people who have asked for the very thing which is being granted in the bill now before us.

In the past, when a great many people, now older people, purchased government annuities, they did so for two reasons. First, the 4 per cent interest rate was not unattractive when compared with the bank interest rate and the interest rate yielded by other easy investment opportunities at the time. In the second place—and this was perhaps the major reason—they felt that if any investment was gilt-edged and secure, a government annuity stood in that category since it was backed by all the resources of the country.

Then a few years ago when inflation began taking hold of the economy, their investment looked far less attractive and members began receiving letters pointing this out. Several hon. members have referred to these letters but I do not believe any have been put on record. I intend to quote one of them because it expresses in a forcible way the plight of those concerned. It is from Sydney W. Mason, R.R.1, Selkirk. He writes:

Dear Mr. Knowles:

In the sixties, the government promoted the sale of Canadian Government Annuities to provide a retirement savings plan. Many people like myself put in sums in excess of $1,000 per annum as a responsible provision to retirement. In course of time the government annuity was taken out and a monthly income established. This is administered through the Unemployment Insurance Commission ... These annuities were established at a rate of 4 per cent on the capital and since that time have been paid on that basis. As a fixed income it does not change, and I am sure in those days nobody anticipated the high inflation or the rise in interest and it seems to me the government could well pay a yearly bonus to reflect conditions today, not on the basis of 4 per cent. This was appreciated in the case of Canada savings bonds where a bonus was brought in last year, and old age pensions and welfare have been geared to inflation, but those of us who had the foresight to provide for ourselves without government support are penalized and the government is "ripping us off" by investing our capital and paying us at 4 per cent.

That, I think, is the crux of the situation, and no doubt representations of this kind are the reason Bill C-75 is before us today. Following such representations as I have quoted, I wrote to the then minister of finance, now the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) and among other things I said:

It would be reasonable to ask the government to index annuities in the same manner so that their value is not completely eroded.

I was referring to the indexing of bonds.

I draw this matter to your attention at this time because no doubt in the near future you will be introducing a new budget in the House of Commons and it would be the opportune time to take some steps to protect the income of people who have government annuities and other low paying interest bonds.

I do not by any means claim that this letter prompted the minister to take action, but no doubt letters addressed to him and representations by hon. members generally encouraged him to take the step he did. The 7 per cent interest rate is to be commended. It is a great improvement on the 4 per cent figure I have mentioned. I think, though, it might be better to index the interest rate rather than provide for its adjustment by order in council. It seems to me it would be fair to index it in accordance with the cost of living, the consumer price index, and so on. Even the 7 per cent rate is not particularly attractive when one considers the interest which can be earned on savings deposited with banks, or on savings bonds. While good, the 7 per cent rate could certainly be increased without hurting anyone.

I was interested in the proposition the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) made about the need to look at the perpetual government savings bonds which are held by large numbers of people across the country. These are a millstone around the necks of their holders, in terms of investment. The interest rate is abysmally low. This is another item about which my constituents have been making representations to me, and there is a growing need for action in this area.

In conclusion, I express the hope that agreement will be reached, as the debate closes, to go into committee of the whole. Let us get this bill through and get the money into the hands of the people concerned as soon as possible.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I say, first of all, that I regret the failure of the House leader to obtain unanimous agreement among the parties to sending this bill before a committee of the whole House after second reading. It is not always easy for members interested in particular pieces of legislation to find places on the various committees which are created. A person having an interest in Bill C-75 would find, with some surprise, that the Department of Manpower and Immigration was going to handle it as originally introduced or referred to in the House by the Minister of Finance.

Be that as it may, I have a few questions which are not really suitable for debate on second reading. This is forcing members to get placed on the relevant committee if they have detailed questions they want to ask on clause by clause study. It could just as well, and more expeditiously, be done in committee of the whole. Many of us had also hoped that this bill would be given third reading today. I am glad it is not the party to which I belong that has put the roadblock in the way of its speedy passage.

There are two or three comments I would like to make, and I hope the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) will be able to answer my queries in his summing up. This being one of the dwindling number of government long-term borrowings on which Canada Pension Plan rates of interest are based, that is, the rate the provinces pay the federal government for the use of Canada Pension Plan moneys, is it the position of the government that their actions concerning this bill are entirely altruistic? In other words, does the prospect of raising the interest rate with respect to the Canada Pension Plan have any bearing on the decision, and does this measure indicate that the government's other long-term securities may be subject to adjustments—the government's definition of a long-term security being that it must be of 20 or more years' duration? There are very few securities in a government portfolio, and removing a Canadian annuity fund from that portfolio is going to affect Canada Pension Plan interest rates.

● (1640)

I think clauses 3 and 4 leave one in a considerable fuzz about the real rate of increase in pay-out. Annuities being paid out prior to April 1 will now be increased to 7 per cent interest. With a 4 per cent bond, this represents a 75 per cent increase. I am very curious as to why, with a 75 per cent increase in the rate of interest, the maximum rate of pay-out under the attached schedule is 32 per cent. That is the maximum increase, ranging down to 10 per cent for 5¼ per cent annuities. Perhaps the minister can clarify that matter for me when he sums up.

I would also ask the minister if he would be kind enough, when closing the debate, to give some assurance to the House regarding clause 19, which provides:

This act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation.

I hope the minister will assure us that the date of proclamation will follow very speedily after third reading and royal assent and that there will be no undue delay. Constituents of all hon. members are waiting eagerly for this long-awaited increase in annuity. Some have watched their purchasing power dwindle gradually over the years. This bill is, as has been said, long overdue and I am pleased to support it. I hope it will get speedy passage.

I close on a lighter note. I would ask the minister, or anybody, to explain to me the intriguing phrase in clause 8, "the purchaser has died or gone out of existence". I must confess I have been puzzling over how you go out of existence rather than die. I had no idea that there was an alternative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, may I make quick reference to the suggestion that we continue right through committee of the whole. I would have been willing to do so had I understood that this was planned in agreement with all parties, but regretfully that was not my understanding and I have made other arrangements. I hope we can deal with the bill expeditiously in the standing committee where it would lend itself perhaps to more detail.

If there are problems in getting on the committee, as one or two members understandably have indicated there might be and if there is no compromise I will be glad to answer any detailed questions and make sure that answers get back to hon. members. I realize that this does not get them on the record, as it were, but I think it will be of some assistance. Members may send their questions to me tommorrow; obviously I cannot deal with them all at this stage.

Since the bill will be going to committee I will not attempt to touch on any of the matters raised. As for the authority in the bill for the governor in council to vary the rate from the 7 per cent figure, as in clause 3(2), I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) expressed concern as to what would happen under the schedule if the rate were increased to 7 per cent, 8 per cent or whatever, just to take an illustration. It is the assumption, supported by the authority in clause 5(2), that the governor in council would also have power to vary the schedule governing interest rates. I think we are on all-fours in intent, but in committee I think I will be able to establish that that authority is in the bill.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) mentioned a case concerning an annuity. A lady had had a contract and on reaching pensionable age found that her rate of pay-out was being varied. I will take the opportunity to check that because it sounded very much to me a matter of edict by the government. I am told that it is very likely, based on the original contract she entered into and in order to have a more convenient arrangement, at her option she chose an earlier commencement date for the annuity and then deliberately phased in old age security, or whatever the supplemental benefit was. It is a little difficult to change horses in midstream, as it were, but that may be the explanation in that particular case.

With regard to the real rate of pay-out increase, I am not sure why there is confusion there. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) was quite accurate in the figures he placed on the record, as I heard them. The $100 payment, depending on the schedule, is increased in proportion to the percentage rates at the back of the bill.

As for the expression in clause 8 "died or gone out of existence", I admit that puzzled me a bit. It is really the difference between a human and a corporation. Humans, unfortunately, die; corporations go out of existence for all sorts of reasons. There may have been a better way to put it, but that is the intent of that somewhat amusing use of language.

With regard to the proclamation date, we are only reserving the implementation of this legislation in order to have the opportunity, after receiving the authority of the House of Commons, of proceeding with a certain program of administrative measures getting them in line. This will be done as quickly as possible because we are very keen to get the cheques rolling. Hopefully, this will coincide with the availability of delivery of the cheques. I look forward to discussing the bill in more detail in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

* * *

CRIMINAL CODE, CROWN LIABILITY ACT, IMMIGRATION ACT, PAROLE ACT

JURISDICTION GIVEN TO CANADIAN COURTS TO TRY PERSONS FOR CERTAIN OFFENCES COMMITTED OUTSIDE CANADA

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-71, to amend the Criminal Code and to make related amendments to the Crown Liability Act, the Immigration Act and the Parole Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the House leaders opposite for arranging that this bill be called at this time. I hope it will be possible to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs after appropriate debate and to have the bill passed by this House and the other place by Christmas. I recognize, as does the government, the concern of Canadians for the whole question of prevention and detection of crime, and peace and security. This is a major concern that is surpassed possibly only by the concern of Canadians for inflation.

The government believes that Canadians have the right to enjoy a sense of safety on their streets and in their homes and cities, a right that has long been the hallmark of our country's way of life. There are many Canadians who feel insecure in this regard at this time. The policies and initiatives which the government will bring forward to the House in the months to come will tackle the issue of how Canada must respond to social and cultural changes. Initiatives will be forthcoming in a number of areas. Some, as hon. members know, such as the national attack on inflation, are already before the House. Others, such as bills which I and my colleague, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), are working on now will be introduced shortly. They are currently in preparation and under consultation on a priority basis with the attorneys general of the provinces and others.

● (1650)

This bill which was introduced by my predecessor, now the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), during the month of July and introduced today for second reading is part of a series of measures which will demonstrate, I think, in a full and firm manner the government's determination to respond to the real and legitimate concerns of Canadians. I hope we can get it into the committee after appropriate debate in order to deal with both the substantive and technical amendments provided for in Bill C-71 in the precise way that committee hearings allow.

The criminal law amendments bill is one of a number that have been and will be introduced in a continuing review by the government of the Criminal Code. This ongoing reappraisal of substantive, procedural and evidentiary aspects of criminal law is necessary if criminal law is to reflect the changing attitudes of Canadians and to provide for more effective means of law enforcement against criminal activities. It also provides the means of evaluating the effectiveness of some earlier changes with a view to ascertaining whether further modifications or improvements are needed.

Increasingly, crime is taking on an international aspect and the amendments dealing with conspiracy and laundering are aimed at these particular problems. Changes in our mode of life, such as the increased use of credit cards, have made it necessary and desirable to introduce provisions dealing specifically with credit card theft, fraudulent use of credit cards and theft of telecommunications services.

The amendments that are being introduced in Bill C-71 result, in some instances, from particular problems that have been encountered and in others from a general realization that the present provisions are inadequate to meet changing conditions. These amendments are designed to remedy the problems that have been encountered or are anticipated.

Many of the amendments contained in the bill are the result of representations made by the criminal law section of the Uniform Law Conference, the Canadian Bar Association, the attorneys general of the provinces, law enforcement authorities and the general public. These representations are indicative of the participatory nature of the amendment process whereby all segments of the public are involved. I will at a later date, when further amendments to the Criminal Code are introduced, be discussing both these amendments and the work of the Law Reform Commission in the whole area of criminal law reform which will be going on over the next few years.

The main objectives of the bill are fourfold. They are to update certain areas of the criminal law to reflect the changes in public attitudes; for example, provisions dealing with pinball machines and interprovincial lotteries. The second is to take account of crimes which have recently become more prevalent, such as fraudulent use of credit cards, as I have mentioned. The third is to strengthen the provisions of the Criminal Code where problems have persisted, such as bail, drinking and driving offences and cattle theft. The fourth is to modernize provisions dealing with the legal process and criminal procedure, such as rape and related sexual offences.

I want to deal, at second reading, only with a number of aspects of this series of amendments. One of the major problems facing law enforcement authorities across the country in recent years has been the inroads made into our society by organized criminals, white collar criminals or syndicated crime, as they are variously called, who are adept at using the legitimate institutions of society as a means toward illegal ends. For example, consider the case of bonds or securities stolen outside Canada's borders, then passed through various front companies to be converted into cash. At the present time, section 312 of the Criminal Code cannot be used against those proceeds of theft but only against the actual goods or moneys obtained by theft, even if it can be proven by investigation that these proceeds do indeed derive from an illegal act.

By enlarging the scope of this section of the Criminal Code, as this bill purports to do, to make it an offence knowingly to possess the fruits of criminal acts whether committed in Canada or not, we will be placing in the hands of law enforcement bodies a potent weapon against organized criminals. It will no longer be possible for Canada to be used as a laundering facility along organized crime's cash flow process.

Another provision of this bill which will greatly assist police forces in deterring the activities of organized criminals and of terrorist organizations is the proposal to make it an offence to conspire in Canada to commit an offence outside the country, or to conspire outside Canada to commit an offence within our borders. Canada should not, and will not, tolerate being used as a base from which to plan crimes. If, for example, the directors of a company incorporated in Canada conspire to fleece investors in another country, they will be liable to a charge under this section of the Criminal Code.

In the second case, this section will make it an offence to plan a crime in another country for commission in Canada. This will apply to groups who plan, for example, to commit acts of violence or terrorism within our borders, even if those acts are not considered illegal in the country in which their planning occurs. This provision could have application, although I know the House would join me in hoping that it will not, in the security measures established for the 1976 Olympic Games to be held in Montreal.

The second area of the bill I want to touch upon is that relating to rape and related sexual offences. An area of the criminal law system which has been much discussed in recent years is the procedure in cases of rape. The complaint, and it is well known, is that the trial procedures through which a rape victim must go are almost as much of an ordeal as the crime itself, and that often it appears as if it is the victim who must stand trial for having suffered the assault, rather than the accused. The amendments to the Criminal Code proposed in this bill are aimed at minimizing the embarrassment the victim must undergo, thereby increasing the number of rapes that are reported and prosecuted. They also, I think, reflect society's changing attitudes toward this crime while keeping in mind the rights of the accused.

Under the provisions of this bill it will no longer be mandatory for judges to warn juries that the victim's testimony, if not corroborated by other witnesses, is an unsafe ground upon which to convict. This provision has been seen by some as discriminatory to female victims of rape and attempted rape. The repeal of the statute requiring judges to caution juries will put an end to such discrimination.

It has also been said that the cross-examination of the victim, by counsel for the defence, on her moral character and previous sexual conduct reaches the point of harassment. Under the proposed amendments contained in this bill it will be necessary for defence counsel to show cause, in a voir dire in camera, that the evidence sought in such cross-examination is of such sufficient importance that it would be unjust to exclude it. The proposed amendments would further allow the exclusion of the public from the trial or any of the proceedings of the case. The amendments would also require judges, when either prosecuting or defence counsel has applied for such an exclusion, to consider the application and give in writing the reasons for denying the order if the judge does not agree.

As another means of protecting the victim of rape, the judge shall prohibit publication of the identity of the complainant when requested to by the prosecutor, which often is a particular matter of concern in smaller communities. The judge will also be required to consider a change of location for the trial and give reasons in writing if he decides not to order a change in venue. These procedures are designed, as I say, to spare the complainant the embarrassment of having the circumstances of the case become known in her community. They will also serve, I believe, as further encouragement to the victims of rape to come forward and report the incident to police so that justice can take its course and so that the harassment which has been associated with many rape trials will no longer prevail.

● (1700)

The third area of the bill upon which I wish to touch involves clauses 47, 48 and 53 related to bail. The Bail Reform Act was passed by this House in 1972. The primary objective of the act was to prevent an accused being unnecessarily detained in custody before trial of his case. It has become apparent that there is a need to tighten up some of the provisions where abuses which are potentially damaging to the integrity of the system of pre-trial release have arisen.

The general rule remains that when a person arrested is brought before the judge, he must be released on bail unless the Crown satisfies the judge that grounds for detention exist. Detention may be justified either on the ground that it is necessary to ensure the attendance of the accused at trial, or that it is necessary in the public interest. In certain circumstances, however, it is the accused rather than the Crown who should bear the onus of showing detention pending trial is not necessary in the public interest. The presumption of innocence is a fundamental principle of our legal system but its uncritical application to the earlier stages of law enforcement, such as pre-trial release, may give rise to unjustifiable results.

The accused, rather than the Crown, should carry the burden of showing he should be released, in three exceptional circumstances. The first of these situations occurs where an accused is awaiting trial for a previous indictable offence. There has been much publicity about persons released on bail on successive occasions while awaiting trial on as many as four or five charges. The present provisions are unlikely to discourage potential offenders and may foster an unhealthy disrespect for the criminal law. An amendment to deal with those who commit an indictable offence while on bail will shift the onus to the accused and remedy the imbalance.

Second, the person who has previously abused the liberal release provisions will now also bear the onus of showing why he should be released from custody pending trial. At the present time this is not the case. To shift the onus to the accused where he has previously contravened a release order is justified, keeping in mind the general principles of the Bail Reform Act.

Third, under the bail reform provisions, the foreign or non-resident accused is dealt with in the same way as an accused domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada. The one expressed exception is that the judge may, on release pending trial, require a case deposit. In some cases, the deposit has been treated as a licence to abscond. It then becomes unlikely the offender will be apprehended and brought to trial. To meet this problem, the amendment shifts the onus to the non-resident accused.

At present, the second ground for detention that the Crown must establish is that the detention of the accused is necessary in the public interest or for the protection or safety of the public, having regard to all the circumstances, including any substantial likelihood that the accused will, if he is released from custody, commit a serious criminal offence involving serious harm or an interference with the administration of justice. The basic test is whether detention is necessary to the public interest. The likelihood of serious harm is only one of the factors to be considered.

The reference to serious harm may influence the court—and it is my belief it has—into giving too narrow a construction to the main test. The words "involving serious harm" are therefore deleted by these amendments. The onus on the Crown will be to establish that there is a substantial likelihood of the commission of a criminal offence. I think those proposed changes to the Bail Act are important to correct and remedy some of the criticisms that have been made of the Bail Reform Act passed in 1972.

The next matter upon which I should like to touch is the overturning by courts on appeal of jury verdicts. As hon. members know, there has been recently a celebrated case in which an appeal court, hearing an appeal against an acquittal by a jury, imposed a guilty verdict on the accused. Under the provisions of this bill, appeal courts will no longer be empowered to reverse a verdict of acquittal. Instead, they will only be empowered to order a new trial of the accused or dismiss the appeal.

The next matter upon which I should like to touch is begging while armed, which is a matter of concern, I know, in the city I come from and in many of the large urban centres across Canada. Panhandling, or begging has become a phenomenon affecting our major urban centres over the past few years. Often the beggars are young transients, and often, too, they conspicuously wear knives while asking for money. To many people, the sight of a knife on a youth who has stopped them to ask for a hand-out is a threatening situation. The other day we listened to a member read letters from his constituents. I could show him long, thick files from constituents of mine touching on that particular situation. Amendments proposed in this bill will make it an offence under the section of the Criminal Code that deals with assault to impede or accost another person while wearing or carrying a weapon or an imitation of a weapon.

The next area I would touch upon is drinking and driving. One of the obvious major causes of violent death in Canada is the motor vehicle accident. Too often the root cause of the accident that kills or maims is the impaired or drunk driver. Amendments proposed in this bill will both stiffen the penalties for impaired driving and allow preventive police action to remove the impaired driver from the road before he can cause an accident. The penalties for impaired driving will be increased to a maximum fine of $2,000 or six months' imprisonment, or both. The minimum penalty will be $50. For a second offence, the penalty will be a minimum of 14 days imprisonment, up to a maximum of one year. For each subsequent offence, conviction will bring a minimum jail term of three months, up to a maximum of two years' imprisonment. The provisions of this bill would also empower judges to impose a conditional discharge in lieu of conviction, which would require the impaired driver to undergo curative or rehabilitative measures.

In the area of preventive policing, police would be empowered to conduct roadside screenings of drivers they have reasonable cause to suspect of having alcohol in their blood. This measure is not a substitute for the breathalyzer system but is a supplement to it. There have also been, which I will discuss in the committee, discussions in the press and with the attorneys general relating to the suspension of driving privileges by a magistrate. I have had discussions with the attorneys general about this, which I will discuss with the committee when the bill is there.

Other amendments to the Criminal Code proposed in this bill concern themselves with attacks made against diplomats and other internationally-protected persons within Canada and make it an offence to commit or threaten to commit an act of violence against the official or private premises of such a person. Following discussions with the provinces, measures are proposed to strengthen the provisions of the Criminal Code against off-track betting and to impose minimum sentences for second and subsequent convictions for bookmaking and running an illegal messenger service.

Recently, theft of telecommunication facilities has become widespread through the use of illegal black boxes which can circumvent the electronic accounting machinery used by telecommunications companies. Amendments proposed in this bill would prohibit the manufacture, possession or distribution of such devices without lawful excuse. This bill would also amend the Criminal Code to make cattle theft a separate indictable offence punishable by a maximum of ten years' imprisonment, and also establish stiff penalties for the theft of credit cards or to forge, use or deal in forged credit cards. The amendments will also allow the courts to try the offender in a credit card case in any area of their jurisdiction where he has committed such an offence.

● (1710)

Generally speaking, those are the measures in Bill C-71 which I have gone through quickly. As I have said, I urge that after appropriate debate in this House the bill go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs where each of the amendments can be examined in detail and then referred back to the House. I think they reflect the continuing concern of the general public, of our law enforcement authorities and of the Government of Canada for the preservation of law and order in our society. Too often in recent days there has appeared to be an imbalance in this regard, and it is important that the interests of the public at large be safeguarded against certain individuals and groups in our society. At the same time, obviously we must ensure that the interests and rights of the individual are protected, but this protection can never be at the expense of society as a whole.

I emphasize again that this bill dealing with a series of amendments to the Criminal Code which are both substantive and technical will shortly be followed by further amendments to be introduced by the Solicitor General dealing with a large range of substantial changes to the Criminal Code which I hope can be introduced before Christmas.

I repeat my thanks to the House leaders for their co-operation in having this bill called at this time, in the hope that it can be dealt with in committee and passed by the House and Senate before Christmas so that members of the House, and especially those who are interested in criminal matters, will be free to devote their full attention to the next series of criminal law amendments which will be forthcoming shortly.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I should like to join the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) in thanking the House leaders and others for co-operating in bringing forward this bill at this time. I want to tell the Minister of Justice that I was very pleased to receive an answer from him today during the question period, not because of the kind of answer he gave me but because I think that in principle he is on the right track. My question was in reference to—I certainly do not want to debate it at this stage—the Latta murder trial.

I asked whether a decision had been made at the department level under section 617 because it was stated in an article in the Edmonton Journal and in the Albertan that the decision had already been made. But the minister made it very clear that this is a ministerial decision and that it will be made at his level, no doubt with the guidance of his officials. I think this shows that the minister is on the right track and I wish him well in his position as the new Minister of Justice. I think it is an honour to rise to the position of the highest law officer of the land.

Ever since I entered parliament, all the ministers of justice have been excellent, both in our party and in the Liberal party. I always had the fullest co-operation of the former minister of justice and of his predecessor who was later minister of finance. I know that the committee and members of our party will receive the same co-operation from the new minister and I wish him well.

I should like to discuss briefly the amendments before us. I might say at the beginning that we are prepared to see them go to committee for study. I foresee possible amendments being proposed and some questions being asked of department officials and of the minister to determine the effect of some of the changes that are being made in this package. I think it should be made clear that this is a package which confirms what the minister said when he first took office; that is, that he would get tougher with criminals and that as a result the government will be able to do something to reduce the ever-increasing rate of crime which is not only occurring in this country but also in other nations in the western world. The minister said openly and honestly that a similar bill was before the House under another minister of justice. Except for one or two small improvements it was really a patch job that did not bring about the control of crime in any substantial way.

The present Criminal Code of Canada is, at best, a haphazard arrangement based on British precedent, historical accident and outdated mythology. Since the implementation of the code, changes have been made by amendment in order to bring the law up to date, but we have failed to scratch the surface. I thought that that was the function of the Law Reform Commission, but we seem to be as far away from that ideal as we were four or five years ago.

I should like to refer to some of the sections which I consider to be antiquated, archaic and outdated. Let us look at the code. We can trace the foundation of the Criminal Code back to the work of Sir James Stephen. His draft code of 1868, along with Burbidge's Digest, which was really an edition of Stephen's work in a Canadian context by Mr. Justice Burbidge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, became the Canadian Criminal Code in 1892 after being presented to the Parliament of Canada by the then minister of justice, Sir John Thompson. Many of the sections of the Criminal Code have not been amended since 1892, and even if they have the same direction in our jurisprudence is maintained.

As I have said previously, the development and improvement of the code over the past 75 years has largely been by way of amendment. The desirability of proceeding in this manner has been challenged by many people, one of them being a leading Canadian authority, professor Alan Mewett who, in an article entitled "The Criminal Law, 1867-1967" which appeared in the Canadian Bar Review, stated:

> The numerous amendments present a shocking indictment of the process of criminal legislation.

Later he added:

> But it is not a cause for congratulation that Sir James Stephen would be quite at home with the Criminal Code of 1967.

I think that is a challenge to the minister. Although I am not being critical, I say that it is time we were able to do the job in the various departments of parliament. I know that this bill has been around for some time. In spite of the complexity of government today and of parliamentary responsibilities and duties, it is our job to get this bill before a committee. I ask you, Madam Speaker, whether the same unhappy conclusion reached by Professor Alan Mewett could not be drawn in 1975 or in 1976. Of course it could.

What, then, should we be looking for when we consider reform of the Criminal Code? The notion that crime can be placed in a single category is erroneous. Violent crime creates a climate of fear in the streets of our growing cities. Violent crime is on the increase in Canada, so that no one feels safe in the streets of our major cities, in the apartment blocks, in laundromats or even in garages. White collar crime, though important in economic terms, is much less visible than are crimes of violence.

● (1720)

The material cost of crimes such as petty theft, consumer fraud, violations of the Combines Investigation Act and embezzlement, dwarfs, in economic terms, all crimes of violence. It seems to me that perhaps we should philosophize for a few moments. To control violent crime and white collar crime we must have laws which are practical and acceptable to modern interpretations of life and human behaviour. That is why, when I come to the specifics of the amendments, I should like to see the code brought up to date and streamlined to modern times. These amendments should probably have been moved 10 or 20 years ago, and even then they would have made very little impact on the change in human behaviour, as far as crime in Canada is concerned.

The value of proper laws and proper law enforcement cannot be underestimated with regard to the control of crime, but I have felt for years that we must get at the breeding grounds of crime. What are those breeding grounds? Crime breeds in cesspools of injustice. Wherever there is injustice, crime will breed. It breeds in the urban slums or in the fast-growing cities of Canada. Urban poverty makes people the victims, not the masters, of their environment. A bad environment becomes the hereditary property of succeeding generations. When I travel to various areas of this city, I see children who are forced to play on concrete and cement without necessary parks which are large enough to be playgrounds. The situation is worse here than it is in Calgary. These children are brought up in conditions which foster crime.

In order to launch a major assault on crime we must attack the conditions of despair and denial of human opportunity in which crime can grow. However, crime still thrives under conditions of affluence. It seems strange to say that it is the white collar, economic crime which is eroding our system, sometimes categorized as a capitalistic system, promoting more and more controls and less freedom. Carried to a conclusion, this kind of crime against our society will lead us further down the road of controls and stateism.

In brief, police courts and prisons cannot by themselves control crime. I have never been convinced that prisons control crime. I cannot believe, in 1975 when I walk through the penitentiaries of this land and see people incarcerated in small cells, that there can ever be any real rehabilitation and reform. It may be that we live in a soft society and that we should not let them do hard work, but under certain conditions which safeguard society surely they should be permitted to do certain human endeavours—they would be not only of benefit to themselves but also a pride to society—so that they could be rehabilitated and reformed. However, under the conditions in which people live today, even on a first offence people are incarcerated. These places do not offer much hope, but, I would say, despair.

We must also deal with the underlying causes of crime, the immense and stubborn forces which pervade our environment, form our character and determine the quality of our lives. Through long-range effort in a new land of bountiful resources, we in Canada can surely conquer poverty and ignorance. We have conquered disease. Surely we can conquer discrimination, although I am not sure we have not gone too far. We should be conquering family breakdown, injustice, social tension and despair. Certainly there will be domestic despair if we have divorce laws which are too harsh. But on the other hand I see despair when in either a professional way or in my capacity of service to my country I see children with only one parent, and some of them deserted completely.

I have seen women across this land who have been deserted. They can go on welfare because of the number of children left with them and because they are without proper care centres, but they have to carry on in an environment which in the end surely does not lead to the creation of the best of citizens. And this is through no fault of the women in question. Hundreds of thousands of men have deserted their families and moved to other provinces. We have a kind of Balkan state in this country where alimony and maintenance claims cannot be enforced. These men walk away and leave their responsibilities to society.

While we must strive to uproot the cause of crime, we must put our practical minds to work in amending the various sections of the Criminal Code in such a way as to guarantee the law's respect and so that it shall not protect the rich while constituting injustice against the poor. Some say there is a law for the rich and a law for the poor, but the law is identical for all Canadians. We have gone a long way, even in my time here in this House. In addition, the provincial legislatures have gone a long way.

It is not the law which is different for Mr. Jones, who is in poverty, or for Mr. Green, who lives in affluence; it is the implementation of the law, the ability to hire the proper kind of expertise either by way of legal counsel, sociologists, psychiatrists or psychologists to help these people and to give them the same opportunity. An example of this, although not of this country, is the case of Patty Hearst. She can afford a better trial than her friends who were arrested with her because she can buy the best witnesses, the best psychiatrists, the best doctors and, I hope, the best lawyers.

Whether we like it or not, human behaviour being what it is, we only have to look at the book "A Matrix of Evidence" to determine how important it is to have highly trained and skilled people in the field of defence and in the field of representing the state when there is a prosecution. I have often felt we should have a special school for prosecutors, because many of them develop the idea that they are involved in a war. They feel that when they go to court, they have to win their case. When the Crown, which is the state, is being represented, this must be done in the fairest and most equitable way. The facts must be laid before the judge, or the judge and jury, whether they are for or against the accused. It is only for the defence to puncture the hole and to give the accused the best advantage under the law, because we must remember that when an accused sits in the prisoner's dock he has a large police force and the power of the state against him. Many times in my life I have seen very efficient counsel for the Crown, but not always the most efficient for the defence.

It is for us to bring excellence to every aspect of the administration of criminal justice, to correction, to courts and to law enforcement in every jurisdiction in Canada. Laws must be reformed. That is what we are going to do today and tomorrow. They must be repealed if enforcement is impossible, if the majority of people find them unjust and no one pretends to obey them and, above all, if no one is willing to enforce them. Surely this is the purpose of amending the Criminal Code; at least, I hope it is.

Before I discuss a few of the things with which the minister dealt, I might say that in my opinion the government has failed miserably in its fight against crime. Perhaps all governments have. According to the latest figures released by Statistics Canada, violence is up 10 per cent, about the same rate as inflation. Last year there were 545 murders in Canada, of which 450 cases were solved and 95 remain unsolved. The rate of violent crime in 1974 was up almost 6 per cent over 1973. In preparing for what I was going to say, last night I read that in the United States 19 violent crimes are committed every minute. There are 220 million people in the United States, and I would say that our ratio of crime would be identical.

Sometimes we are very complacent and point across the border or to some other country, but crime is on the march. Like all cities on the prairies, over the years Calgary has grown, but I never thought I would live to see the time when a secretary in my law firm would leave the office at around six or seven o'clock and be mugged, as they say, on the way home. A lady who has served in our firm for some 20 years was twisted around and her purse, credit cards, and so on, taken. Women on the streets are being dragged into churches and dark corners and raped. In my city and other cities housewives lock their doors as soon as their husbands leave, for fear someone will enter the house and commit rape or other violent crimes.

● (1730)

The amendment concerning rape as contained in clause 8, on page 7 of the bill, is technical. This amendment would abolish the requirement of a warning as to corroboration in the case where an accused is charged with rape or another sexual offence referred to in section 142 involving a female. Further, this amendment would exclude questions concerning the sexual conduct of the complainant with persons other than the accused in cases where the offence charged is rape, attempted rape, sexual intercourse with a female under 14 years of age or indecent assault on a female, unless notice of such questions has been given and the presiding judge, magistrate or justice considers them necessary after a hearing in the absence of the jury and the public. In other words, the court must use its discretion.

Let me deal with corroboration. I support this concept, although I shall be raising some questions concerning it in committee. There is a reason for our rule of corroboration. Rape is the easiest offence to charge, the hardest to defend. So, wise men and women over the years have said that when this serious crime is charged, which at one time carried the maximum penalty of life imprisonment, there must be some corroboration. Usually that corroboration is given by an indirect, third party. The law said that the complaint must be made as quickly as possible. If the woman, on arriving home after the alleged offence, complained, say to a friend, mother or husband as soon as possible after the commission of the offence, it was held that her complaint constituted a form of corroboration. The rule of corroboration has been necessary to ensure that no person will be convicted unfairly of a crime carrying the maximum penalty of life imprisonment.

Sometimes there are two accused persons involved in a rape. This brings me to my next point. Let me tell hon. members about a certain case. Some years ago it fell to my lot to defend two young fellows, 21 years old or so, who had been charged with rape. They were driving a girl home from one town in Saskatchewan to another ten miles away. As they drove, a certain discussion took place between the driver and the female and finally the other fellow left the automobile. According to the facts elicited at trial, a certain proposition was made to her and she said she would do a certain thing provided a certain birth control device was used. The driver called his friend back to the car and asked if he had a certain birth control device. The friend said he had, but would not part with it. The offence, or affair, then took place. According to the female complainant, those two fellows attacked her and only when she broke down under cross-examination at trial was there any admission of the events previously alluded to. So one can see why corroboration is necessary. That is why a judge charges a jury that it is dangerous to convict unless there is some corroboration of a material particular of the complainant's story.

As the Minister of Justice said so clearly this afternoon, defence counsel, in order to discredit the complainant, would cross-examine on her sexual experiences with other people and, in all probability, prejudice the jury with respect to the accused. Sometimes one felt the complainant was on trial, not the accused. Let there be no doubt that a prostitute can be raped. It is all a matter of consent or, as a famous judge said, a question of salesmanship. At any rate, the provision which will remove the right to what we call the envelope list, that is, the right to cross-examine the female on her other sexual experiences, is sound.

The right to cross-examine on character is retained, provided certain conditions are met. An application must be made, after proper notice, to the judge and the matter must be argued in the absence of the jury. Counsel can apply to the judge for permission to put questions to a female complainant about her other affairs with those she has charged with the offence because, human behaviour being what it is, it is possible that a female complainant will allege rape for a number of reasons when rape may not have taken place. Therefore, the proposed provision is good. Some ladies belonging to an association whose name escapes me would prefer the crime of rape to be called assault. They want the name of the crime changed as the very word "rape" carries with it unfortunate connotations. I suppose there is merit to calling the crime an assault as often a female person is assaulted and bodily harm done.

I am worried about the publicity given to crimes like rape. Publicity may be entirely bad. For example, two weeks ago our newspapers carried reports of a fellow in Calgary who had too much to drink and went on a hunting expedition. He went to the zoo and shot one of its fine animals. I think the Globe and Mail carried the story. Obviously, a reader imitated what he had read. Yesterday, according to reports, a fellow went out to an animal farm and shot a lion and tiger which had cost $25,000. I am not accusing the media, but it seems to me that too much prominence is given to crime. You see a certain crime reported one day and not too much later you will hear of the same crime committed by someone else in the same community. This happens right across the country. I do not think the media should carry such intimate details of crime.

We read of knives being used as weapons of submission in cases of rape. No sooner is such a crime involving a knife or a gun reported in one community than the very same kind of crime, using the same weapon, is committed either in the same community or in the area covered by the newspaper or media. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has shown that psychotics watching violence on television may be influenced by what they see and so encouraged to commit the very same "perfect" crime they see depicted on television. Only when they are caught in real life they will find that lawyers do not whisper to judges as they do on television programs.

● (1740)

I suppose the community is entitled to know what goes on in its midst. I do not know the answer. I hope we can call witnesses before the committee who have studied this from the psychological and psychiatric point of view. The more you build that kind of publicity, the more you build that kind of crime. That is an answer I would like to get in committee.

I want to deal with another subject of the bill, procedures. I have read the bill very thoroughly. I told the minister at the outset what I thought. I pointed out the danger of changes in reference to rape cases. I now want to deal with some of the matters in procedure that have been changed. My concern about changing procedures for many offences where the Crown can elect that the person either under a section—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. At this time it is only the general principle of the bill that is being debated, not a reference to a particular section.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that. I am dealing with that in a general way. The minister talked about the procedures. I am talking about procedures in principle. I did not read clauses 33 or 34. I will certainly adhere to Your Honour's rule in that regard.

I point out the dangers of one procedure that was changed in many sections. I could name the sections, but I am keeping this on a very high plane. In these sections, according to the procedure people may be charged with an indictable offence or on summary conviction. It may be a matter of theft of $200, criminal negligence, or many other things. What I do not like about that kind of procedure is that the Crown, not the accused, has the right to elect whether it will be a charge on an indictable offence, which generally carries a penalty of imprisonment, or on summary conviction, which carries a penalty of a fine. In a number of sections this power is being given to the Crown. From who do they generally get their information? The police. If the police do not particularly like a person, or for some reason think that one offence is a tougher offence than another, they will recommend that it be tried as an indictable offence. In this way it permits discrimination.

After hearing the evidence, if a person is to be convicted the judge should have the discretion of deciding whether it should be an indictable offence or summary conviction because the penalties differ.

There is something else that I wish to point out. Where an offence is indictable and calls for more than five years' imprisonment rather than a summary conviction or an offence that calls for less imprisonment, you have to get the consent of the Crown in order to get a fine in lieu of imprisonment, or a suspended sentence. That was one of the hardships in the old drug sections under the Drug Act which called for five and ten years on soft drugs. In many cases where people deserve only to be fined or suspended and placed on rehabilitation, the judge had no alternative if the Crown wanted them sent to the institutions of crime that I have discussed. I think that places it on quite a high plane.

Another fundamental and basic principle to bear in mind is that in all criminal cases, as is true in all others, the onus of proof, that is to say the duty of proof, rests upon the Crown from the beginning to the end of the case. By that mean it is for the prosecution from start to finish to carry the burden of proving the case that they undertake to prove. If the Crown falls short of satisfying you as a tribunal of fact beyond reasonable doubt that all of the essential elements going to make up the crime as charged have been established, the Crown fails and, giving the accused the benefit of any doubt that arises, the accused should be acquitted.

There is one clause that goes to the matter of principle. If you are the navigator of a ship or the driver of an automobile and you become impaired or drunk, if they take a breathalyzer test and charge you, that is one thing. However, under the new clause this can be done two or three hours later. What does this mean? Most people may say that this sounds reasonable, that the fellow was probably drinking when he got off the ship or out of his car. It is highly probable that after the fellow left the ship or the car he went home and had a couple of highballs. In order to prove that the state of his mind was not impaired at the time he got into an accident with a ship, and I do not know whether this applies to a vehicle, but if not it eventually will, he must show that he became impaired in the two hour interval before the breathalyzer test was taken.

The results of the breathalyzer test can go into evidence. This reverses the fundamental right of jurisprudence that a person is innocent until proven guilty. The accused must go on the stand or he will be in a sorry state. He must say that it is true that at the time he took the breathalyzer test he had so much in his blood and, therefore, would be guilty under the Criminal Code if he were in charge of either of these vehicles and became involved in an accident. He must prove that he had the highballs after he left the car or ship.

I do not like to see jurisprudence reversed. Once you start that trend, and it was done with the Income Tax Act, you will find that the onus is always on you. You are guilty until proven innocent. I look at it the other way, innocent until proven guilty. That is why I raise this matter which has come to my attention in this bill.

There is one other matter of procedure. For 20 years lawyers practising law in the bar associations of the respective provinces, the Canadian Bar, lawyers with experience in criminal law when taking an appeal from a summary conviction had to go to the district court or county court by way of trial de nova, which means a new trial before the higher court with the same or new witnesses. All lawyers know what I am talking about.

Under the code 20 years ago you had to file a notice of appeal within 15 days after conviction, do something else within 15 days, and set out reasons for appeal in the paid notice. It was a very tough procedure, much tougher than appeals for more serious crimes. We fought that procedure. Finally the ray of light hit parliament. I think it was under the former Minister of Finance. He agreed to a simple document of appeal being filed to the effect that a person wanted to appeal a summary conviction at such and such a place at such and such a time. The clerk advised the various people, and you were through with it. After fighting for 20 years I can say that there was little change. More young criminal lawyers were out of court because they made a mistake in procedure and the issue of justice was never tried.

Now what do we find? The easier procedure is being repealed, and appeals will be accordingly prescribed by the rules of court set by the provinces. Who makes the rules? The judges. I always get suspicious when handing over that function to any group of people, whether they be parliamentarians or judges. Do you think the judges are going to make those rules to create more work, or do you think they are going to make the rules simple to give the kind of justice that yourself, myself, and all members of this House want to see for the Canadian people?

● (1750)

How many people know who makes the rules for court? They are made by judges. I would rather see the power left in the hands of the Code in a very simple form, and I hope to move an amendment on that in the committee to widen it out. It took us 20 years to get that changed, and now it is a reform for the worse. While I am dealing with that, let me deal with one other reform.

In the Code it sets out that you have to get an appeal book, and it costs you so much a folio or a page. That should be removed. The most expensive thing in an appeal is not your lawyer. If I am going to appeal a verdict in a serious case like rape or murder what is the most expensive part of the appeal?

We have legal aid—it is much better today, but it has only come in over the last short while. The thing to do is to get your 1,000 page appeal book. Some appeal courts, and I have this experience, pay one dollar a page. Now they are insisting that every case to which you refer—and you may only refer to a part of it—must be xeroxed and put in the back. If you have had anything to do with the cost of xeroxing you know it will cost 20 cents a page.

Appeal books cost thousands of dollars. There is a member here who has just finished a civil law suit. He could tell you what his appeal book cost. It cost him more than his lawyer. Thank goodness we now have legal aid because I remember that many people came before courts of appeal I appeared before, and the judge would say, "Where's the appeal book?" The poor accused would say, "I can't afford one." I've heard it said that, "If you cannot afford one you cannot come here and discuss it, because we don't know what you are charged with and we don't know what the evidence was."

When you start tampering, dickering, and fiddling around with costs, such as the cost of an appeal book, you would be all right with legal aid, but there are lots of places and cases where legal aid does not apply. I would like to take a hard look at that because I probably will never get another appointment in Calgary for discovery, or an appeal book as long as I live. The fees that are earned today on appeal books in many, many cases are higher than the lawyers' charges and sometimes they are pretty exorbitant.

Those are some of the things I had in mind. I am not going to deal with the question of the Morgentaler case—one of my colleagues will be doing that—except to say I am pleased with the result of a triumph of a great lawyer. I might call him by name although it breeches the ethics of this House in procedure, John Diefenbaker, the right hon. member for Prince Albert. He properly called on the minister of justice—the former one—the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) to bring amendments in to the Criminal Code that no court of appeal should have the right to substitute its view as to a verdict of guilty or not guilty rendered by the bulwark of our freedom.

Originally the former minister of justice described his concern over the court of appeal overturning a jury verdict of acquittal as "largely hysterical". Well, I am going to be one of the hystericals tonight, because it is there, hysterics and all.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

I would say this in fairness to the Supreme Court of Canada. In my opinion, for what it was worth—and this takes nothing away from the principle the right hon. member for Prince Albert brought forward—I said when the reform of abortion came in it would not work. We have abortion committees in the hospitals in Calgary. They have not got such committees in the hospitals in many places in Quebec. That is a matter of principle and a matter of conscience, and both are right in that regard. But there is the same operation going on in the City of Calgary that Morgentaler did in the Province of Quebec because they didn't have any committees. Theirs are legal, but because the others are done without a committee they are illegal. Here I would say—and I take the words from Oliver Twist—the law is an ass.

The Supreme Court of Canada doesn't make the law; we make the law. When they said on the evidence that Dr. Morgentaler was guilty the court was right because without a committee authorizing the abortion he was breaking the law. The court had the power under the statute to change the verdict. The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert was right in that regard, to suggest bringing in that reform. And that is all I am saying about that. That is a change on which I congratulate the minister and I must congratulate the former minister because, as you so fairly said, Madam Speaker, it was a bill prepared by the former minister.

I do not intend to say much about bail, but I will say that really what they have done is to take the onus off the Crown and put it back on the accused. But the Minister of Justice cannot be blamed for that—he voted for it and so did many of us; I think I voted for it too. It was a government bill, though, and that change was made by the government, by a former minister of justice. Now all they are doing is just putting it back. That's why when we tinker—that's a good word, tinker—with little things, especially academics who sometimes have not had any experience, we don't know what we do.

I sometimes talk to police officers and I sometimes talk to judges across this nation. They tell me that you no sooner lock a fellow up for robbing a bank than he is out on the street because of the bail rules, and he is doing another bank robbery, back into jail, and out again in another week doing it again. There are thousands of cases like that across the land. And the pressure which has been brought on the Department of Justice to get that changed has been great. It is a good change. It is a matter of good principle.

I want to talk about the crime of theft for a few moments. Under this bill things are changed back to what they were 30 years ago. It used to be $50, now it is a few hundred. If it is $200 you can have a summary conviction charge laid and just be fined.

There is one thing I would like to mention to the minister for his consideration. That is fine and I agree with him. But you know what it does? It creates a haven for shop lifters. They go in and steal a hat, overshoes—a lot of things are stolen. I think when they get the second, third or fourth crime they should be tried on—and I mentioned the word a few minutes ago—an indictable offence. Those are some of the thoughts I have; it will be a haven for shop lifters. I can just see it.

I had a case dealing with that just lately. A couple of boys went in during the summer holidays and they changed the high record price to the cheap record price. So they were getting $10 records for $1.50. You know the tricks of the trade when it comes to that. I would ask the minister to take a good look at this theft section reform.

I see the Minister of Justice looking at me. I have done all this in 30 minutes and I did not think I could do it. I must congratulate myself in that regard. In summary I would say that we are going to support the amendments going to the committee. We hope that the committee—it's a good committee, Justice and Legal Affairs—will co-operate with us to get the best expertise, the best witnesses, to examine very carefully these sections and the changes to be made.

I would like to pay a compliment to the Department of Justice. In my experience, they are always very good to come with the explanations either outside the committee—and if you need help they will give it—or inside the committee. So we are prepared to support these changes with some idea that we might go for bail reform, on the question of rape as to its terminology, and we might ask them to slow down in some of these fields which are not thought out.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Urban Affairs; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—National Defence; the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—External Affairs.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE, CROWN LIABILITY ACT, IMMIGRATION ACT, PAROLE ACT

JURISDICTION GIVEN TO CANADIAN COURTS TO TRY PERSONS FOR CERTAIN OFFENCES COMMITTED OUTSIDE CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-71, to amend the Criminal Code and to make related amendments to the Crown Liability Act, the Immigration Act and the Parole Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

● (1800)

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Madam Speaker, before launching into my remarks on Bill C-71, may I congratulate the minister on his appointment. I think he has done a fine job in different portfolios. I remember him as minister of consumer and corporate affairs where he did a pretty fair job; in the portfolio of minister of urban affairs where he attempted to do a good job; and in the portfolio of minister of national revenue where he also did a good job. He is now in the very important portfolio of Minister of Justice and I wish him well. He is very competent and a very compassionate minister, and I am sure that in these times it is important to have the confidence of members of parliament and the public that one will do a good job.

Bill C-71 is one of a number of bills that the minister is proposing to bring forth to amend the Criminal Code. As the minister said in his statement, it is very important to balance the interests of the public with protecting the interests of the individual. We live in a violent world, and I guess we are the authors of this situation. You cannot have wars, TV programs and movies showing violence, without having problems, and we do have problems.

It is necessary to look at the total framework of life and at the different ways in which we can make the necessary changes to our life at home, at school, and in the community. It is really a question of attitude. All the amendments in the world will not change those attitudes; it is the individual who must change. Until the individual changes we will have to continue making amendments to the Criminal Code to prevent the violent acts that are being performed today.

There has been a recent influx of new Canadians, and our immigration program in the future will bring many more new Canadians to Canada. New Canadians have made a great contribution to the Canadian community, but one of the things I find striking is that when new Canadians come in contact with the law they have almost a mental and physical paralysis in meeting the law. It is very important that we develop laws that they and all Canadians can understand and comply with.

In building the right attitude toward the law it is necessary to strengthen and supplement other areas of life. I am talking about developing a healthy economic community and decent housing. I think these are instrumental factors in developing respect for the law. Even though we live in an age of violence I think there is a duty upon us to change the attitudes of individuals.

We are discussing this bill this afternoon, yet there are only one or two reporters in the gallery. The gallery should be filled with reporters, and the public galleries should be filled with members of the public so they can learn what are the attitudes and ideas of the minister and of the government and the members of this House. Unfortunately we have a full house for the question period but when it comes to a piece of legislation that will directly affect the lives of all of us, both the public and reporters are absent.

Bill C-71 is one of a number of bills to amend the Criminal Code in substance, in procedure and evidence, to reflect changing attitudes and to strengthen the enforcement of the criminal law. It has four main job objectives. First, the bill updates certain areas of the criminal law to reflect changes in public attitude; second, it creates new offences for certain practices which recently have become more prevalent; third, the bill strengthens certain areas of the existing law; and fourth, it modernizes criminal procedures and evidence.

The minister, as his press release indicated, said that this bill is the work of consultation with different groups in society, namely, the criminal law section of the Uniform Law Conference, the Canadian Bar Association, the attorneys general, the law enforcement authorities and the general public, and these consultations have resulted in the changes in Bill C-71. I heard the minister say that he hopes the bill is passed in the House and in committee by Christmas. I hope he will ensure that witnesses come before the committee to give their views regarding the different changes contained in the bill. It is important that we have the police give their views regarding bail reform, that we have the attorneys general give their views regarding drinking and driving offences, and we should have certain members of the general public give their views regarding how the proposed changes will affect them.

As a simple example, many of us have received representations from humane societies across the country regarding cruelty to animals. I do not think the change made in the bill in this respect goes far enough, but I hope representatives from the humane society and other groups will be giving us their views.

I said that the legislation updates certain areas of the criminal law to reflect changes in public attitude. May I give the House a couple of examples. We are now going to make it legal to operate pinball machines provided the prize is a free game. This has been a problem that has spread across the country in many communities. Pinball machines appear to offer a very inoffensive game for people to participate in, yet those who do have been harassed by law enforcement officials because it is a criminal offence coming under the definition of slot machines. The minister has taken up the challenge and made pinball machines legal, provided the prize is a free game.

As for interprovincial lotteries, it will now be legal for lottery tickets issued by one province to be sold in another province provided the other province agrees. Again we have had difficulty regarding lottery tickets being sold in one province with the lottery being operated in another. We have to accept the changes that have taken place in this area. Personally I am not in favour of lotteries, but there seems to be a general feeling among the public that lotteries should prevail.

The second area is the creation of new offences for certain practices which have recently become prevalent. The most striking practice among the public today is the fraudulent use of credit cards, either trafficking in them or fraudulently using them. This is a credit society. I am sure many of us recall our parents operating in a cash society, never buying anything until they had the cash available. Today people buy a lot of things without cash but on credit, and they use a credit card which facilitates such purchases. However, there have been many abuses. Many people have trafficked in these credit cards and have used false credit cards. The result is that if a person loses a credit card he has real problems in trying to recover the card or in cutting off the credit in case the card is used by some other person. Therefore I think this is a necessary move because of the change in the buying habits of the public.

● (1810)

The second area is the theft of communications services by electronic devices used to avoid payment of telephone charges. I had not heard of this use of electronic devices which people put on their telephones in order to circumvent a charge for a long distance call for which they are responsible. This is a sophisticated world in which we live, and these people use these sophisticated devices to avoid payment. This brings up to date the law with regard to theft of communications services.

The minister went into some detail about laundering the proceeds of crime, more especially securities converted into cash by persons or companies. We now have a great deal of white collar crime. White collar crime is committed in the laundering of the proceeds of criminal acts. The police have had great difficulty in convicting these people because of restrictions in the definition of laws. This is very necessary in view of the inflow of laundered moneys from other countries to Canada and, I am sure, the outflow of laundered moneys from Canada to other countries. It is important to curtail the activities of persons who participate in this type of nefarious scheme.

The next area is in respect of conspiracy in Canada to commit an offence outside Canada, and conspiracy outside Canada to commit an offence inside Canada. Again we have white collar crime operators who set up companies for the sole purpose of fleecing other persons in other countries. This conspiracy has been very difficult to stop because of securities legislation falling under the joint jurisdiction of federal and provincial governments. This is a step in the right direction to stop that type of fleecing by individuals engaged in these operations.

Another area that has been taken care of relates to international protection of persons such as diplomats and representatives of foreign governments who will now be protected against attacks upon their official premises or private accommodations. In this violent world we have seen these attacks on embassies, foreign diplomats and representatives, and the police and governments have been powerless to lay charges. This is a step in the right direction of developing international law under which appropriate charges can be laid when offences take place against these diplomats and their property. Those are the areas in which new charges have been created because of recent practices of individuals.

The third area is in strengthening certain existing laws, the most dramatic example of which relates to bail reform.

Back in 1972 many of us were proud of the then minister of justice for bringing forth the bail reform act because we knew of the many hardships and inconveniences being imposed on people, more especially those without money who often lingered in jail because they could not obtain bail. It is to the credit of this government and the former minister of justice that this was brought forward.

We have had the experience from 1972 to 1975 in which there have been abuses of the general principle of that reform by offenders, and this has created within the community a sense of outrage at the conduct of certain criminals. It has been difficult for many of us who supported that bill to persuade those people to understand that the principle of the bill was that an accused was entitled to bail unless the Crown could satisfy the court that grounds for detention existed. The Crown had to assure the attendance of the accused at trial, and had to convince the court that detention was necessary in the public interest. This was often a very difficult thing for the Crown to do in those circumstances, and it resulted in a bad reflection on the principle of bail reform.

It has been necessary to make a change, and this change is good because the main rule still applies, that an accused is entitled to bail in the first instance. The main exception is that the accused will not be released if he is awaiting trial for a previous conviction or if he has previously abused his bail provisions, or is a non-resident. Those are the three main exceptions to the rule. An additional change is that it is up to the individual, that is, the accused, to show why he should not be detained. This is a very important shift in onus from the Crown to the accused.

I think with these changes we will have better co-operation with the police. Many of us have suspected that the police felt the present reform act was operating to their prejudice and jeopardy, and they did not like it. It just did not have that sense of strength necessary for the enforcement of law. I hope the police are now satisfied that we are doing our best to maintain the main principle that a person is in the first instance entitled to bail, providing the Crown cannot show the necessity to detain an accused to assure his attendance at trial, or because of the public interest. I hope the police realize this and feel they have the co-operation of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and of all members of parliament in this regard. That is the main area in which the government intends to strengthen the existing law.

Another area relates to drinking and driving offences. There is not a person who has not either himself or through a friend come in contact with the law concerning drinking and driving offences. This has become so prevalent that many Canadians are acquiring criminal convictions under these sections.

It has been obvious to many of us that there are numerous difficulties in the application and procedure in respect of drinking and driving offences, more especially impaired driving, failure to provide a breath sample, and driving with a higher than .08 blood alcohol content.

The minister has attempted to standardize these offences and has increased the penalties. For a first offence the minimum penalty is to be $50 with a maximum of $2,000, six months, or both. On a second offence for impaired driving, or in respect of the other two offences, there is an absolute mandatory term of imprisonment of 14 days with a maximum of one year, and for each subsequent offence a minimum term of imprisonment of three months and a maximum of two years. One can see how important the law is in respect of these offences, and I am happy to see that the government has taken a rather serious attitude to this major problem.

● (1820)

Many deaths have occurred because of drinking offences. I think it is time we were tough in this regard. These changes certainly indicate a toughness on the part of the government. I am rather happy to see that the toughness in some way is softened by the judge being given the alternative to a conviction of imposing a conditional discharge which would require that the person take curative and rehabilitative treatment in accordance with the terms of the probation order. This is an important improvement in respect of people who have an alcohol problem. The happy result of this is that if the person conforms to the terms of the probation in respect of curative or rehabilitative treatment, the conditional discharge will operate in such a way that there will be no conviction, no penalty, and no fine.

The other area concerns roadside screening. The minister comes from British Columbia, as do other members on the government side. British Columbia has had experience with regard to roadside screening of a person suspected of having consumed alcohol. We have not had that experience in Ontario or in the other provinces. This is a new departure.

In the past the police could require a breath test only when they had reasonable and probable grounds to think that the person was suffering from impaired driving. Now under the change in the law if a police officer suspects a person of having alcohol in his blood such a person must undergo a test, and refusal to do so would result in an offence. I think that is one of the preventative measures that should be taken in respect of the serious problem of drinking while driving.

The federal government has vacated the field in respect of imposing a prohibition order concerning driving and is now leaving it to the provinces to impose the suspension and prohibition. This is a result of the conflict we had concerning the operation of federal and provincial jurisdictions. I would hope agreement could be obtained between the provinces so that this would apply universally across the country. Perhaps I am wrong in this view, and the minister will straighten me out in the committee, but I believe a person could have his licence suspended in British Columbia and then move to Alberta where the question would arise whether that suspension in British Columbia is operative in the province of Alberta for the purpose of the offence the minister has left in the code, the offence of driving while disqualified.

I am not sure whether that would apply. I hope the minister would straighten out the members of the committee and the public concerning this where a person has his licence suspended in one province and then goes to live in another province. There is the question of whether that licence suspension or the prohibition would apply for purposes of a criminal offence under the code.

Then there is the matter of theft of cattle and the offence in this regard. I am sure many western members, more especially those from the prairies, will be happy to know that cattle theft will now be a separate offence under the code, with a very harsh penalty of a minimum of ten years' imprisonment. There must have been a fair amount of cattle rustling in the west. We do not have it in Toronto. We have a different type of rustling. This must be welcome news to many people in the west.

The fourth area concerns the modernization of criminal procedures. The most important area is with regard to rape and related offences. If ever there has been a subject which has caused an emotional charge in people it is the offence of rape. It has almost become paranoic in respect of certain people. It has been necessary for the government to update and strengthen the law with regard to rape and related offences. These changes have come as a result of cases in court, publicity, and the harassment of complainants who have suffered as a result of the alleged rape. Therefore we in this party, as I am sure all members do, welcome the changes related to rape.

We welcome the fact that the requirement for a judge to warn the jury of the danger of convicting an accused person if the complainants evidence is not corroborated is now abolished for the offence of rape and related offences. Many people have thought this operated as an advantage to the accused. It may have had this effect psychologically. From my experience and that of others in court I never thought this operated to the great advantage of the accused, although in the minds of many members of the public it did. Therefore the necessity of the judge warning the jury of the danger of convicting an accused person without corroborative evidence has been abolished. Madam Speaker, I will move to the second part of this area after having a good dinner.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Pursuant to the order made on Wednesday, November 5, 1975, it being 6.30 p.m. I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.30 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, prior to the dinner adjournment I was speaking about the fourth area in the bill to modernize criminal procedures and evidence. The main topic is rape and related offences. May I point out to you the amendments indicated in the bill.

First of all the requirement on a judge that he must warn the jury of the danger of convicting the accused if the complainant's evidence is not corroborated is abolished in the case of rape and related sexual offences. The second change is that cross examination on past sexual conduct by the complainant with a person other than the accused will be permitted only if reasonable notice in writing is given. The judge will then decide in the absence of the jury whether the evidence is admissible. The next change is that the judge may exclude the public in rape and related offences on the application of the accused or prosecution, and if the order is denied reasons must be given by the judge for the denial. This may be applied to part or all of the proceedings. The next amendment is that the judge may also order a prohibition on the publication of the identity of the complainant when an application is made by the Crown. The final amendment is that the judge may also change the place of trial in cases of rape and related offences when he deems it desirable.

You can judge from those changes that they are substantial. As I said prior to the adjournment for dinner, rape has become one of the most emotionally charged words in our vocabulary, and there has been a great deal of stress and strain both on the victims and on the public with regard to this offence. I think that most members of the House and the public at large will welcome the amendments with regard to changes in rape.

I should like to direct my attention to the representations that have been made by different groups concerning the charge of rape. Representation has been made that the charge of rape should be dropped and the charge of aggravated assault should be widened to include sexual attacks. I would like to hear the minister comment on this proposed change, either in committee or when he winds up the debate.

Many people have felt that the technical difficulties with regard to the definition of rape, and also the emotional charge concerning the word, have presented difficulties. Therefore representations have been made that this word should be dropped and that a more precise definition of aggravated assault with regard to sexual attacks should be found. As I say, I think the minister should deal with this either in committee or when he winds up the debate.

The next amendment is with regard to jury verdicts. The amendment states that a court of appeal, when hearing an appeal from an acquittal by a jury, will be limited to ordering a new trial or dismissing the accused. This amendment arose out of the Morgentaler case. A great deal has been said about this case; probably a great injustice was committed as a result of what happened, so many of us welcome this change.

Another welcome amendment is the changing of the offences with regard to theft, possession, and fraud to give Crown counsel the option to proceed either by indictment or by way of summary conviction. This is most welcome because many young people between the ages of 16 and 25 acquire a criminal record and have difficulties obtaining employment. This will directly affect the Criminal Records Act because if a person has a summary conviction offence he need only wait two years before an application need be made under that act, whereas if it is an indictable offence he has to wait five years. Up to the time of this amendment the law was that theft, possession, and fraud were indictable offences, so the minister can be commended for this proposed change.

There are many other changes. There is the amendment with regard to summary conviction appeals with the abolition of the trial de novo. From my experience many lawyers always welcomed the trial de novo, especially when they lost in the lower court, because it gave them a second chance to present their cases and probably to strengthen them. However, now they are going to be confined to the record at the first trial and they may have difficulties, but we can discuss in committee the reasons the minister thought it necessary to do this.

● (2010)

Another change is an amendment regarding grand juries. I think we in Ontario will welcome the abolition of grand juries. I know some of the other provinces have already abolished them, but we in Ontario have not. I think this is a welcome change.

There is one more amendment I should like to discuss briefly, and that is the amendment dealing with people who are mentally ill. I am sure any person who has practised law has been in court on occasion when a mentally ill person has been charged, and the court has been helpless at times with regard to giving some treatment direction to that person. He has had to be confined, and in most cases until his trial came up, but this amendment gives him the opportunity to be remanded out of custody for observation upon consent of the prosecution and the accused. I think this will go a long way in helping these people.

All these amendments with regard to updating the law, creating new offences, strengthening the law, and modernizing the law, result in taking the drama out of court. That may be a good thing because the drama in the past has been in connection with the conviction, and it seems to me that we should shift from an emphasis on convictions to an emphasis on reformation and rehabilitation. If these amendments and other amendments direct us in that way, I think they will be welcome changes.

We in the New Democratic Party will support this legislation. We look forward to the Minister bringing forward other legislation which will strengthen the law and help individuals to take their rightful place in society.

As I said at one stage, violence is the word of the day, and anything we can to do to reduce violence is most welcome. If this bill produces some reduction in violence, if it produces a change in the attitude of people with regard to the law, and develops a respect for the law, then it will have done an excellent job. With those remarks I will close and participate further in committee.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the minister laid before us a bill to amend the Criminal Code. I would be interested to know the number of bills which were introduced in this House since the birth of this country to amend the first bill which created the Criminal Code. People in general wonder if that has become a parliamentary sport. Mr. Speaker, if it is important to have good laws that are fair and equitable for all, it is even more necessary to have those laws obeyed, and particularly to obey them personally whether one is a judge, a lawyer, a legislator or simply a citizen. One must be convinced of that truth.

Laws require changes because they are made for man. Otherwise, laws would be statutory as are all natural laws. I will say more, Mr. Speaker, the law should be made to protect man against man, and often protect him against himself. And we dare boast we are the most intelligent beings on the planet. Seeing how some people act, free by their will, one is lead to wish God had created them like ordinary natural beings, determined them ad unum. Our will dictates our actions just as our intelligence determines their quality. And since there are no two identical beings, we need laws to make social life a bit more tolerable.

Having said this, I would like first to congratulate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) for his new appointment—he holds one of the most important positions in this House—and for introducing Bill C-71 entitled an Act to amend the Criminal Code and to make related amendments to the Crown Liability Act, the Immigration Act and the Parole Act.

At first glance, Mr. Speaker, one would think that this bill is three-pronged. But after the Minister of Justice listed this afternoon all the revisions he intended to make to the Criminal Code, I think it is an omnibus bill. The minister says he will examine the detection of crime with public safety in mind. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is high time a minister of justice introduced major reforms to the Criminal Code to restore public confidence.

How often have we heard people say: There is no more justice nowadays. Everything is permitted in sex and other things. Today's murderer has become almost a hero who is being pampered and lives like a millionaire as guest of the state thanks to taxpayer money, of course, if not the incomes of his own victims. Today there is no such thing as robbery in business, since the real thieves have become financiers. Today there is no more usury, particularly since the government itself has taken the ceiling off the interest rate. We have only high finance and we are surprised to see organized crime rule as absolute master over our country. Mr. Speaker, I said in our country, in our province, but the province of Quebec is not the only one where organized crime flourishes. If you read the paper every day—I have a few with me—you can read titles like these: Vic Cotroni jailed in Toronto. He is the head of the Mafia. Cotroni's heir apparent target of Commission of Inquiry into Organized Crime. Disturbing aspects of Paolo Violi's everyday life. Strangely enough, all those names are repeated every day in the papers and those people go on living like nabobs. From time to time, things are made difficult for them, but it all stops there.

● (2020)

We are now told that the province of Quebec has appointed a Commission of Inquiry into Organized Crime to try and trace the activities of the Mafia within and without Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I think we could urge all provinces to establish their own organized crime inquiry commission. I look forward to the federal government having its own organized crime inquiry commission. I think that would be a first step towards enforcing laws which we are about to amend tonight, that it would be a start to have good commissions in order to know what is happening first and also know where the killers are and where order in society lies.

I read in a paper from Quebec that the following are discovered during inquiries, and I quote:

Drugs, extorsion, protection: headlines for the Commission of inquiry into Organized Crime. As early as next Monday the commission will initiate a public study of the Benoît project—

Do you know what the Benoît project is?

All we know about the Benoît project is that it will bring under the public eye the traditional activities of organized crime such as extorsion, protection, drug traffic and other equally unattractive activities.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, if all provinces as well as the federal government took such initiatives instead of contending that the Quebec commission is not constitutional, it would be an excellent thing. The matter is to be referred and submitted to the Supreme Court, and it would be most unfortunate if the Supreme Court should declare that commission unconstitutional. It is the only commission capable of showing the government where the problem is in order that it may propose legislation to correct it.

The minister proposes in this bill to bring in amendments concerning terrorism and the Mafia. I believe that if we are to enact good legislation we should develop an educated opinion, get date and information to find where the problem is.

If the government is serious, the basic solution would be to establish a board of inquiry similar to that now operating in the province of Quebec, to try and detect Mafia henchmen in Ottawa and Canada as a whole.

In my view, if the minister wants to do a serious job, he must first get the tools to introduce amendments he proposes to the Criminal Code.

The Canadian people want the government to enact more stringent laws if needed. The people want more stringent laws, but their main requirement is that there be respect the law on the part of legislators, those who enforce it and every citizen in general. Speaking to respect what do we do, what did we do to protect those responsible for maintaining law and order?

How often are they ridiculed and derided. This is something I am perfectly aware of, Mr. Speaker, because for 25 years I have been organizing accident investigations and other investigations of every kind. This is where I met discouraged and bewildered police officers, who had every evidence to make a fair case. They were being pushed around by judges who had other things to look after.

This is why I submit we must first protect police officers and ensure they are respected. We still have honest police officers. I have known some who, after trumped-up inquests and trumped-up judgments, were crying because they had been working for three months on serious investigations to bring about justice.

I believe that if we want to amend our civil code and enforce it properly, we shall have to develop legislation to protect those who are responsible for enforcing it.

This bill mentions drunken driving. Mr. Speaker, people are strange and governments are the same. The government favours the sale of alcohol by all available means because it is profitable and fills its coffers. The government establishes a great number of alcohol outlets, and then, when it has promoted and multiplied the outlets, it sets the police after those who have become drunk because of its own illogical actions.

If there were as many public education halls where people could be told how to act, how to fight against bad habits, if there were as many halls where people could be told why they should not drink, why they should not take alcohol, why they should not take drugs, as there are alcohol outlets, and if instead of promoting illegal outlets, the government showed people the damage done by all that trash, there would be no need for all this legislation and amendments to improve our social life.

I agree with the minister that we must bring in amendments to make the roads safer, but I have always noticed that it is when people come out of the outlets which I mentioned earlier that the police can detect more easily those who are not fit to drive, before they have to be put in jail. In the case of those who come out of the outlets promoted by the government, since this is where it gets its money, the police could simply bring them home instead of intimidating them and making them spend the night in jail. This is not being done; instead, the police patrol the roads and arrest one individual who pays for everyone else.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

If the people in charge tried to be at these strategic spots, especially during the weekends, we could prevent many tragedies.

As concerns rape, we are very happy that the statement of the victim will finally be able to be used as evidence without a third witness. The old legislation was so poorly drafted that it was very difficult for a rape victim to prove that there had been a crime because the rape had to be committed in front of two other witnesses.

● (2030)

I think that the amendment proposed by the minister will be more equitable for the victim. The bill also refers to conditional discharge. We have noted in past years that the National Parole Board was far too lenient for notorious criminals. And under the present Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) our prisons have become boarding houses where the prisoners move at will.

I think that the rehabilitation process have not improved enough to allow such freedom. Nowadays the so-called rehabilitation takes precedence over the security of victims. I wonder whether the Solicitor General is conscious of the dangers incurred by the people when he commutes death penalties and aware that the National Parole Board frees that individual six, seven or eight months after his crime.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General hears enough protests about him to try to change his mind. As far as I can see, after having heard him in the House, he is indomitable; he cannot even see other points of view. Yet, considering how much he travels, it seems to me he should consider it. I read this in La Presse, I quote:

WRATH OF LAW AND ORDER SUPPORTERS ON ALLMAND

—in La Presse dated November 6, 1975, when the crowd shouted to him, and I quote:

"Shoot them! Kill them!" That advice, those orders concerning all criminal regardless of their stature, were given, last night, to Solicitor General Warren Allmand by some hundred citizens of the municipality of Hampstead who claim to support law and order.

Those citizens, lawyers, engineers, judge (one), professors, nurses, housewives, had left their wealthy Victorian homes, discreetly screened from view by peaceful tree-lined avenues in the no less peaceful Town of Hampstead, right after the evening family meal, to hear Mr. Allmand speak to them on the prevention of crime and the control of violence.

The Solicitor General had come from Ottawa expressly to give that conference, as guest of the Hampstead Municipal and Recreation Association. Earlier in the evening, he was calm and smiling. Standing behing the oak lectern in the elementary school gymnasium, basketball nets and gymnastic rings hanging here and there, Mr. Allmand made a speech of some thirty minutes before going on to a question period on the main concerns of his department, on its main objective, namely, he pointed out "to prevent and reduce crime so as to protect society".

Mr. Allmand described in detail, and with supporting data, the steps his department intends to take to achieve its goal. He also explained the program he intends to propose to the government before the end of the year, program aimed at preventing crime and controlling violence.

Having addressed himself to the tragic events that Canadian society has experienced in matters of crime in recent years, especially last year and this year, the Solicitor General considered the issue of capital punishment.

Let us be reminded that Mr. Allmand is fiercely opposed to capital punishment.

Did we ask Mr. Allmand for the right to destroy a human life by resorting to capital punishment? Because the execution of a murderer, as he emphasized, does not erase the crime: it destroys another life.

Shoot them, replied the citizens of Hampstead at the microphone when they were not shouting it from their places.

With arrogance and intolerance some told him that he did not know what he was talking about, that he was a moralist rather than a jurist.

One could also read the following:

LES POLICIERS VEULENT "VENGER" LEURS MORTS!

The death penalty being prescribed for police murderers, policemen realize that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) once again tried to laugh at them and that is why today they are all against his proposals and changes. I think that should be food for thought for a solicitor general who wants at least to sound out the people's opinion and give them what they want and not what he has in mind.

Mr. Speaker, there would be many other points I should like to deal with because the minister gave us a whole list of amendments that will have to be enacted regarding criminals. We are quite happy and we expect to be happier still when these amendments are adopted by the House standing committee. Tonight I have touched only lightly on a few clauses of Bill C-71, so as to expedite its referral to the standing committee. I hope that this bill to amend the Criminal Code will promote law and order in Canada so that Canadians may live safe and free in their country.

[English]

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this debate in view of the importance of criminal law to the people of my city.

At a conference held in Vancouver, sponsored by the Police Commission of British Columbia, the increasing crime rate was discussed. Over the past two years we have had an increase in crime of approximately 13½ per cent. These figures include crimes of violence, such as murder, assault, robbery, and rape. In the B.C. lower mainland there is a feeling, highly vocalized by the public through numerous open-line shows and in newspapers, that the government is more concerned about the welfare of offenders in society than the safety of citizens.

The federal riding of Vancouver-Kingsway alone, known as quadrant three of the four-part police divisions, is said to have the highest per capita crime rate in North America. In Vancouver east and other parts of the core area there are pockets of serious and sensational violence. These incidents accelerate anger and fear, with blame constantly turned against the government. In some areas the elderly, and women of all ages, will not use streets, parks, or stores in the city core, including such reputable stores as Eaton's and the Hudson's Bay, where they are fearful of entering parking lots or elevators since a recent series of rapes and murders occurred in daylight in those department store parking lots and elevators.

Mayor Arthur Phillips and the police commission have faced up to this through emergency public meetings, and increased the city force by 120, ready for duty by October. Plans for a proposed similar addition next year will have to be scrapped if federal support, and in particular federal activity in the area of the RCMP, is at all reduced.

Illicit drug use and drug traffic alone are becoming extremely serious, not only in the lower mainland but in British Columbia in general. In our province we have at the very least 10,000 committed users of heroin, Every city, town—even villages and logging camps—has a permanent heroin user population. While Vancouver is still the major drug centre, Victoria, Nanaimo, the Upper Island, Prince George, Terrace, Kitimat, Kamloops, Vernon, Kelowna, Penticton, Trail and Nelson all have sizeable drug dependency problems, and contamination of youngsters increases yearly.

Other major factors of significance are as follows: up to 1969 the majority of heroin users were in the age group 25 to 29; in 1972 the majority age group had dropped to 20 to 24. Up to 1964 a youngster began to experiment seriously with heroin about age 18; today the age is down to 12 to 14, and a few mainliners are known to be nine and ten. In 1964 those known users under 20 years of age represented but 1.6 per cent of the total number of known users; by 1972 the percentage has risen to 10.6 per cent.

Drug seizures, although an infinitesimal portion of the total amount of illicit heroin brought into Canada, nevertheless are a frightening indicator of the drugs available to the youth of this province and, for that fact, our nation. In 1972, for example, 116 pounds of pure (80 per cent) heroin and 32,831 capsules worth at least $22 million at the uncut price were seized by the police. In 1973, 220 pounds of uncut heroin and 42,381 capsules worth at least $43,500,000 at the uncut price were seized.

Although hospital records are far from complete, the number of emergency treatment cases and hospital admissions for drug overdoses has doubled every two years since 1966.

● (2040)

Finally, in spite of the many pleas for action, Vancouver remains the major transit point for illicit heroin and cocaine. Far Eastern distributors have found it convenient, relatively safe, and comfortable in their dealings with Canadian distributors for trans-shipment to the United States, or as a suitable place to disguise the real point of origin of their couriers, their baggage or their commercial goods.

In speaking with Mayor Arthur Phillips, chairman of the Police Commission, he indicated that though a large number of large drug "busts" had occurred recently he would like to see the RCMP drug squad increased. This would enable the Vancouver City Police to employ men in other vital areas of crime prevention. Needless to say, the drug problem will not be solved simply by increasing the number of RCMP officers. Other measures such as drug education and the proposals contained in this bill, as well as the proposed peace and security package might assist.

The point is that even with this bill and the new crime package which is to be announced I am concerned that unless the federal government maintains its activity, particularly in the area of the RCMP, these amendments and the new crime package on peace and security will prove ineffective. I say this in view of the fact that at the present time RCMP contracts are under re-negotiation. Furthermore, I suggest the federal government seriously consider a program of financial assistance for municipal police forces, the reason being that municipal sources of revenue are limited and cannot adequately take into account inflationary pressures.

I should now like to address myself to the amendments regarding bail. Let me preface my remarks by saying I firmly believe we should not depart from the basic principles of the Bail Reform Act. There is, however, one area which deserves reconsideration.

The drug situation in Vancouver is now reaching crisis proportions. Accordingly it has been suggested to me that major traffickers, particularly those charged with conspiracy to traffic, be automatically denied bail.

At the present time I believe the law is fairly well stated as follows: in an Alberta Supreme Court case, Regina versus McClelland, the accused was charged with two counts of trafficking in heroin. The accused is 22 years old, living with his brother in Edmonton who has offered him a job pending trial. The provincial court judge ordered the accused detained; the accused sought a review of that order. At the appeal hearing the Crown opposed bail because of the seriousness of the charge, arguing that he should be denied bail in the public interest. I shall quote the decision which was reached:

I am not prepared to refuse bail simply because a person is charged with trafficking in heroin or any of the hard drugs even if he has been convicted of the same offence or a similar offence before. If he is charged with trafficking when he is out on bail or otherwise awaiting trial for a similar offence, perhaps the public interest requires him to stay in jail until his trial.

In British Columbia in an unreported decision by His Honor, Judge Meredith, in the case of Regina versus Oikle, the accused was charged on three counts for possession of heroin for the purpose of trafficking. He had a previous conviction for possession of heroin and other offences unrelated to drugs, going back to 1960. He argued that he had elected trial by judge without a jury, that it would take a year to get the trial on, and that this delay was the basis for a review of the detention order made by the provincial court judge. It was ruled that the detention order should be upheld. The report reads:

The charges suggest that the accused might have a fairly wide field of acquaintances in the drug market; it is also significant that these charges arose after his conviction for possession. Second, there is a likelihood that if released the accused may commit offences related to narcotics. Accordingly, detention of the accused is in the public interest and for the protection or safety of the public.

From the foregoing cases it is clear that the issue being discussed is that of the public interest. In the Oikle case, public interest appears to be defined in accordance with whether the trafficker is a major one.

It is my suggestion that when the bill before us is referred to committee the committee should examine whether previous charges and previous convictions be used as criteria in defining who is a major trafficker, and that such major traffickers be denied bail.

In conclusion, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) for the initiative shown in Bill C-71. I look forward to the peace and security package which is to be introduced later in the year by the hon. gentleman and his colleague, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). I might add that it is gratifying to see a Minister of Justice from my own city, and also one who has been Minister of State for Urban Affairs and has a basic understanding of urban problems—there is of course a relationship, if not a direct one, to levels of crime.

[Mr. Lee.]

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I want to participate in this debate as well. I seem to be speaking a good deal today. But I am interested in one particular aspect of the proposed amendments and I hope to deal with that area almost exclusively. It is not that I have any great expertise on the subject I wish to talk about, but assessing the various proposals put forward by the minister on sexual offences, drunken driving, pinball machines and so on, I find that my expertise is not as great as on the topic on which I wish to speak.

An hon. Member: Leave it to the other side.

● (2050)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It has been suggested that there may be more expertise on the other side than on our side, but I will not comment on that.

I want to deal with the question of bail reform and the different lengths of bail periods. I should like to start by asking the minister at some appropriate time to advise the House whether or not the amendments that are proposed in Bill C-71 are the full extent of the amendments he is contemplating in regard to bail reform. My colleague from Calgary North did raise this matter in the question period when he questioned the minister as to whether he was contemplating any amendments in addition to those in the bill.

This question also arises from the fact that, after the meeting between the minister and the provincial attorneys general, he was quoted in the press as saying that he felt the Bail Reform Act required amendment and that its provisions should be applied more strictly in certain instances.

I wonder whether the minister would let the House know if any additional amendments are contemplated, and whether he intends to bring in provisions to make bail even more restrictive than the amendments in the present legislation. Let me refer the House to a statement quoted in the Ottawa Citizen for October 23, 1975, headed "Stricter Bail Act Hinted". The article goes on to say:

Justice Minister Ron Basford . . . said Wednesday that bail is being wrongly granted in some cases because magistrates and Crown prosecutors have misunderstood the provisions of the Bail Reform Act. "The act itself is a good one", he said, "but in its application it has, in some cases, not been clearly understood by the men on the bench". The minister said it is not uncommon for persons charged in narcotics offences to be released on bail, only to go on trafficking when released. "An offender can often make enough money to pay for his bail this way," he said, "and the only way to put a stop to it is to make the act more strict."

Whether the minister was indicating that the present provisions are sufficient to cover the situation, or whether other amendments are contemplated is not clear. In looking at these provisions it is important to have some idea of the over-all picture and the context in which the amendments are brought forward. I think it is generally agreed that these provisions are desirable. I think the minister is indicating that he has something to contribute. He can remark on this now or later, as he sees fit, but I should like to raise this question with him.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, if it would help the hon. member I would be happy to answer the question now. The newspaper clipping to which he refers was a comment of mine which was directed at—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Procedurally this would hardly be acceptable because the minister has already spoken, and if I allow him to answer questions he loses his right of reply. I hope the hon. member will ask his question, and in using his right of reply perhaps the minister would take advantage of his right to answer all of the questions raised.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is a pleasure to hear from the minister, but if the penalty for doing so is to terminate the debate, since there are many others who wish to contribute, I would not want this to happen on my account. Incidentally this is the first opportunity I personally have had to extend congratulations to the minister on his appointment to this particular portfolio. I wish him the very best in his endeavours. He has a big job to do. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has indicated his concern at the growing incidence of crime and violence in this country, and the minister has a great task before him.

Certain provisions of Bill C-71 relate to the Bail Reform Act. While they are, as I have said, welcome, and I think are generally acceptable, they do not necessarily answer some problems respecting bail and the granting of bail. I echo the comments made by other speakers to the effect that unfortunately what happens is that the rather more sensational types of situations get the publicity and people thereupon perceive that the whole bail system is not functioning in the way it should. For example, we hear about a person charged with the offence of murder or attempted murder who unfortunately is let out on bail under the provisions of the Bail Reform Act, and he subsequently commits another offence of violence. This gets headlines and, as a result, people feel it is not the exception but the rule.

There is no question that most members of the House are inclined to support the general concept of eliminating situations where, for example, little old ladies are incarcerated for long periods awaiting trial. We do not want to see that type of situation obtain in this country. Nevertheless we must ensure that in cases of serious crime some protection is given to the public. This is what motivated the government to propose the amendments that are being put forward in this bill.

There are some areas with which these particular amendments do not come to grips, and I should like to refer to them. It seems to me that under the present law the courts have the right to refuse bail under circumstances contemplated by the amendments. In other words, there is power under existing legislation, if the courts wish to exercise it, to ensure that people who may cause difficulty if released from custody will not do some damage or injury, or commit a crime. The problem has been that, for reasons that I hope to develop, the courts have not interpreted the existing provisions of the legislation to accommodate such situations.

Part of the problem is that on occasion insufficient information is made available to the courts. In this technological age of computers much more attention must be given to the provision of information to prosecutors and the courts—this assessment was made by those involved in the judicial process—in order to determine whether or not an application for bail should be opposed or whether the applicant concerned should be released.

There is no computerized record of people released on bail across Canada. The availability of this information is very scant. I could refer the House to a survey done by Statistics Canada, but it seems to me there is no fund of information which would allow us to assess adequately the effectiveness of the Bail Reform Act. It is therefore difficult to be categorical so far as the success of the bail provisions is concerned.

Another aspect that I do not think the bill deals with is this: under the present situation—and the bill does nothing to change it—if an accused person is granted bail there is obviously nothing to stop him absconding and failing to show up at the hearing. The rule is that an accused must report periodically to the authorities, but the tendency has developed for the police to put the onus on the courts and not to follow absconders unless they commit another offence. If they are caught and they plead guilty to the original offence, their absconding from custody is often overlooked.

● (2100)

This is one area in respect of which the department might possibly give some consideration with a view to determining if it would be worthwhile to develop and encourage a provincial system of exchanging information across the country covering convictions for offences that have been committed while the person was on bail. If this information could be made available to the prosecutors, with the idea of a follow-up to make sure that it is, then I think some method could be developed which would prevent individuals from pleading guilty to a second offence and avoiding, or escaping prosecution on the first offence in respect of which they were out on bail. I think this would be a worth-while endeavour and well received across the country.

These proposed bail amendments are adequate but I am concerned that they will not be applied haphazardly as were the 1972 amendments. The intent of the amendments is to reduce the range of discretion and spell out quite clearly the terms under which pre-trial release can be granted. The result sought is a narrowing of the opportunity for abuse by shifting the onus from the Crown to the accused.

In the preamble to the amendments the Minister of Justice has stated that the need has become apparent to tighten up some of the provisions where abuses which are potentially damaging to the integrity of the system of pre-trial release have arisen. The presumption of innocence, he said, is a fundamental principle of our legal system, but its uncritical application to the early stages of law enforcement, such as pre-trial release, may give rise to unjustifiable results.

The maxim of the Bail Reform Act is excellent, as pointed out by members of this Chamber, but it is one thing to support progressive legislation and another thing to make permissive the principle of that legislation.

Nowhere in the original act of 1972 was there a mandate for the Crown to apply bail provisions uncritically. In fact, instructions to the courts were very specific. The accused was not to be released if the court had probable and reasonable grounds to believe that he or she would commit a new offence, repeat the same crime, fail to appear for trial, or frustrate the administration of justice. Thus it often appeared that the failure of the original act was not with its provisions but with their application by the courts. The Bail Reform Act in some instances turned into a revolving door farce in which a suspect was arrested, released, arrested, released, and so on indefinitely. The minister referred to this problem and said it had occurred within his own city.

Statistics on indictable offences committed while on bail are particularly difficult to come by because of the problem of jurisdiction and the variety of reporting systems. As I indicated earlier, there has been a survey made covering federal crime cases. This is a sampling of federal criminal cases for the period January 1, to August 1, 1973. This survey did not cover all cases but, as I understand it, was rather selective. However, some of the results are rather interesting. Some 12,698 persons were included in the survey sample, and I understand approximately 91 per cent were released either by police, by a justice or a judge at some point prior to the disposition of their cases in the courts. Of this number, according to this particular survey, about 6 per cent failed to appear in court at some time.

I am not sure how accurate these figures are because there is a lack of cross-referencing between police and court records. This makes it rather difficult to obtain a completely accurate accounting.

There are some interesting aspects of this survey which I should like to bring to the attention of the House because they do raise some interesting assessments on the way this act has been administered across the country.

In general the survey revealed that the police apparently are exercising their discretion in favour of releasing the accused. Police tend to detain certain types of offenders in custody more frequently than others. For example, only about 5 per cent of motor vehicle law offenders were held in custody, while about 75 per cent of those charged with armed robbery, and about 47 per cent of those charged with breaking and entering were held.

There are variations in the release rate between municipal and provincial police forces, and also between cities. Since this is the first survey of its kind, and there is no comparable information available for the period prior to the Bail Reform Act, it is difficult to draw firm conclusions based just on this information.

The number of persons detained in custody varied from province to province. The figures covering those cases where the police detained the accused in custody varied from New Brunswick with the very low percentage of 4.6 per cent, to Quebec where there were 34 per cent of the people retained in custody by the police. The variations in the rate may be attributable in part to provincial differences in the rate of serious crimes; that is, crimes in which the police have no authority to release the accused. However, this factor alone does not explain the differences between high custody and low custody provinces. The Quebec sample, for instance, showed only 30 per cent of its criminal code cases, excluding traffic cases, in the more serious category, but it had 34 per cent custody rate as compared with New Brunswick figures of 16.1 per cent and 4.5 per cent respectively.

The next thing which occurred to me about this survey was that municipal police forces, with the exception of those in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, are much more likely to keep an accused in custody than are provincial police forces, including the RCMP. Municipal police forces imposed custody in 36.7 per cent of the criminal code cases handled by them while the comparable figure for provincial police was 15.9 per cent.

The study showed that the police tend to detain certain types of offenders in custody much more than others. For example, 26.3 per cent of persons charged with offences under the Criminal Code, other than motor vehicle and drug offences, were held in custody by the police, with those charged with armed robbery being 75.8 per cent, breaking and entering, 46.8 per cent, and theft over $200 41.8 per cent. Persons charged with drug offences other than simple possession also had a high rate of detention in custody, some 57.8 per cent. On the other hand police released all but 5.1 per cent of motor vehicle law offenders.

A point I want to mention is that the survey revealed major differences in the methods of release employed by police across Canada. The appearance notice, used nationally in 32.2 per cent of all cases, was used in 67.3 per cent of the cases in Saskatchewan, but in only 11.8 per cent of the cases in Quebec. The promise to appear, used nationally in 14.8 per cent of all cases, was used in 39.9 per cent of the cases in Prince Edward Island, but only in 2.4 per cent of the cases in Quebec. The summons was used in 26.3 per cent of all the cases, but its use was much more frequent in the provinces east of Manitoba than in the western provinces or the Territories.

Finally, in half the cases sampled the case was disposed of at the first court appearance. In the remaining 6,284 cases, 1,433 persons were in police custody. Out of those in custody, 1,086 were released upon application to a justice, half of them upon a simple undertaking to appear at trial without any terms or conditions being imposed. Of the persons sampled in the survey, 91 per cent were released either by the police, a justice or a judge at some point prior to the disposition of their cases.

It should be noted that of the 1,149 persons who were not released at all prior to the disposition of their cases, approximately 60 per cent had their cases concluded at their first court appearance, hence the question of release by the courts did not arise.

● (2110)

These statistics raise in my mind the question of the basis upon which the department makes its assessment in respect of amendments concerning bail. It seems to me some consideration should be given to having a much more thorough basis upon which to determine the necessity for amending provisions. Much more should be done in this regard than presently is the case. In addition it would seem to me there is not necessarily uniformity across the country concerning the application of the legislation. I do not say that uniformity is in itself a virtue.

However, it would seem there may be cause for the department to think in terms of an educational program in respect of members of the judiciary, the people involved in prosecutions, in order that the spirit of the law may be more clearly understood and so that the procedures would be carried out more thoroughly with a view to obtaining some sort of co-ordination between prosecuting attorneys and the courts. I think this would be worthwhile.

I am sure no one would suggest we should tell the judges how to conduct their courts because in each case they must look at the circumstances. However, I think we must do two things. First, we must provide the people involved with the necessary information, and second encourage, as I mentioned before, the concept of computerization of information and availability of information so far as the prosecutors are concerned, so that in each case they will be able to deal with the matter as effectively as possible and protect the public interest in cases where this is appropriate.

Having made those points I reiterate the fact that it is neither desirable nor feasible to keep a person in jail for a petty offence. Generally there is a backlog of cases in each of the provinces today and therefore trials often are not held for some time after the charge is laid or apprehension has taken place. I think this is another area in respect of which everyone would agree some assistance must be given to the courts and some thought given to improving the efficiency of our courts so that they will be able to deal with the cases expeditiously. If these new amendments are to function properly, the accused will have to do more than assure the court through a promise to behave.

I should like to make some suggestions to the minister concerning further provisions to which consideration might be given. Perhaps we will have to look at the question of bail in respect of a person charged with a serious crime such as murder, or crimes involving the use of a firearm. We could look at the possibility of increasing the penalty and possibly the amount of bail, depending on the severity of the crime committed. It seems to me that an amount of $2,000 with regard to bail for a person on a charge of murder is not a very large amount. I think we should be giving some attention to the question of more serious crimes and our attitude toward bail in these cases. We may want to have a more periodic re-assessment in respect of the person on bail relating to more serious crimes.

I realize that an increase in the amount of bail works against the interests of those people who do not have money, but there are alternatives which might be canvassed, and possibly during the course of our consideration of this legislation before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs the minister might respond to this and give us some idea of some of the things that are being considered by the Department of Justice, as well as some of the long-range plans and suggestions the department may have so that we can develop the best possible legislation in the interest of everyone in Canada.

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Madam Speaker, I rise to make a few brief remarks on this very important bill, C-71, which would amend the Criminal Code in several respects which I consider to be very important.

Since this is the first opportunity I have had, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the appointment of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). He is a colleague of mine from the province of British Columbia. This appointment has been warmly received and it comes at one of the most difficult times we have had in our history so far as justice is concerned. The incidence of crime is serious all over the country. It is particularly serious in the city of Vancouver where the present minister resides. I am very pleased with the remarks he made in his debut as minister. I think the orientation he has to deal with crime in whatever form is the right one.

My brief remarks tonight will be related to the section of the bill dealing with cattle rustling. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) referred to cattle rustling in his remarks. I believe he said there is not any cattle rustling in the city of Toronto. I would not think there would be, but I want to assure members of this House that the question of cattle rustling is a serious problem in this country, and has been for a number of years.

Over the past few years since I have been a member of parliament I have received a number of very serious representations from various groups, not only in the province of British Columbia but in other parts of the country. I have received representations from the B.C. Cattlemen's Association, from the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, and from the smaller associations in various parts of my riding.

I have received suggestions to the effect that the fines are too light and that the Criminal Code is weak and does not address itself to the very serious problem of cattle rustling in a proper manner. This is the reason why I am pleased to note that now there is to be a special section in the Criminal Code to deal with this problem.

The problem was so serious, and I received so many representations from various places, that I introduced a private members' bill dealing with it during the last two parliaments. The bill in this particular parliament is C-337. I am glad it will no longer be necessary for me to press on with this particular bill.

● (2120)

My bill would have achieved a couple of things. It would have provided that every person who commits theft of cattle is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable (a) to imprisonment for ten years where the value of the cattle exceeds $50, or (b) to imprisonment for two years where the value of the cattle does not exceed $50, provided that a minimum sentence in either case shall be imprisonment for one year. This is a pretty tough measure. The thing that cattlemen want in particular is to make sure there is a minimum sentence.

I know that judges in the country do not like to have their hands tied by minimum sentences, so I can see why the Minister of Justice did not accept this particular amendment. But I want to say that the amendment which the minister brought in is acceptable to the cattlemen. It provides that everyone who commits theft of cattle is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years. This is a considerable improvement, and it addresses itself to the seriousness of the problem of cattle rustling.

Under the present law, theft of cattle is dealt with under a general theft provision. If the value of the property is over $200, it is an indictable offence subject to a maximum of ten years imprisonment. Where the value of stolen goods is less than $200, the maximum improvement is two years. Again I want to thank the previous minister of justice and the present Minister of Justice for responding to the wishes of the cattlemen by bringing in this amendment to the Criminal Code. I am sure it will deal in a very effective way with the serious problem of cattle rustling.

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, tonight I will reserve my remarks to the principles of the bill relating to the proposed changes in the Criminal Code on drinking and driving offences. I have some other remarks on other matters of a detailed nature which I will leave until we go into committee on this bill.

The amendments to our drinking and driving legislation are essentially a good beginning. However, I am fearful that if the new provisions pass as they stand now, their coming into force may be delayed or phased in as facilities needed to implement them are developed in areas where they do not exist now or where they are not yet adequate.

The amendment to section 234 of the Criminal Code allows the judge to impose a conditional discharge on a person charged with a drinking and driving offence. This means that the judge may require that rehabilitative measures are taken respecting the convicted person's consumption of alcohol or drugs in accordance with the terms of his order. In other words, while such a person is taking treatment for alcoholism and abstaining from its use in accordance with the judge's order, no penalty of fine or imprisonment is imposed. If he ceases to obey the order, the penalty is reinstated. In the case of such a conditional discharge, however, there is no record of criminal conviction and no penalty.

If my memory serves me correctly, this follows pretty well the recommendations of the Canadian Barristers' Association. I find that this is an excellent provision, one that goes to the root of the problem of our drunken drivers because it attempts to effect a cure. I think that it breaks new ground in our jurisprudence and, in my opinion, it is the type of thing we should be looking at more often. I commend the minister for bringing in this provision. I think it is a constructive one and it deserves the support of all members of the House.

I have two suggestions to make to the minister. There is a shortcoming in this procedure that comes in mind. If in fact the convicted person receives a conditional discharge and moves to another area where he commits a similar offence, the fact of his former conviction being erased by operation of law may not be known to the court or authorities in the new jurisdiction. This possible shortcoming can be overcome by a simple amendment clarifying the intention of parliament in this regard, and I commend such an amendment to the minister's consideration.

The rehabilitation facilities available to persons qualifying for such a conditional discharge vary from very poor or non-existent in some jurisdictions, to excellent in areas such as the Donwood facility in Toronto. This means that all Canadians do not have an equal opportunity to avail themselves of rehabilitative facilities, and if everyone is to be equal before the law the full implementation of this section will have to be preceded by some very serious and far reaching discussion between Ottawa and the provinces.

The provinces too will have to give consideration to amending their laws dealing with the suspension of licenses. The necessity for a conviction now forms the basis for the suspension of a license by a province. A conditional discharge carries no record of criminal conviction and thus provincial legislation, if left as it is, would not be applied in these cases.

Another feature of the amendments before parliament is the provision of the roadside screening process. At present under the Criminal Code—as differentiated from provincial legislation—a peace officer can require a breath sample only if he has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the driver is impaired. This new section, which is clause 15 in the amending bill, gives the police the right to conduct roadside screening tests where an officer has reasonable cause to suspect a driver of having alcohol in his blood. In many areas of Canada the implementation of this section too will have to be delayed until provinces train personnel and obtain the necessary equipment. The purpose of this amendment is to reduce the hazard that impaired drivers present to others and to themselves.

The amendment will certainly be a great inconvenience to a large number of people and will increase the cost of police operations, but it will also reduce many road hazards and accidents, and provide greater public safety on our highways. To many people an impaired driving charge is just as serious as armed robbery.

The strict application of this amendment will stop a few impaired drivers, but we should bear in mind that no piece of legislation will eliminate them altogether. Educating the public concerning drunk driving laws and the potential dangerousness of an impaired driver is imperative if we are to reduce the number of persons committing this offence.

Penalties are often inconsistent and based on the severity of the situation. A large number of those who appear in court on a Monday morning are charged with impaired driving, but the penalties imposed in different jurisdictions of Canada vary, and so do the programs for prevention and rehabilitation.

The new amendments before parliament will provide much stiffer penalties for those who are convicted of operating motor vehicles on our highways in a drunken or impaired condition. While the proposed legislation deals more efficiently with the detection and punishment of drinking and driving offences, it leaves one significant omission, and I would be most grateful if the minister would take this up with his provincial counterparts.

There is no mention whatsoever of any responsibility being placed on those who sell alcoholic beverages for a profit. With the inception of criminality being at the stage when a person consumes the alcoholic beverage, it surely must be incumbent on those who make a profit from its sale to provide some means of testing on the premises where the consumption takes place, so that the patron who is just a few minutes away from a serious criminal charge can save himself from a criminal record, and save other people from his becoming a menace on the highway by taking a simple test before leaving a bar, beer parlour, or lounge in an impaired condition and sitting behind the driver's wheel of a car where he becomes a menace to himself and everyone else.

Under the new penalties being imposed, there is a substantial increase. For the first offence the fine limit is increased from $500 to $2,000, and the prison term is doubled from three months to six. For a second offence, imprisonment is provided for not more than one year, where it is now limited to three months, and the minimum term of fourteen days remains the same. For each subsequent offence imprisonment for not more than one year is increased to two years, and the minimum term of three months remains the same. Amendments to the Criminal Code will provide these same penalties for failure or refusal to provide a breath sample, and for driving with more than 80 milligrams of alcohol in the blood. Whereas sections 235 and 236, the breathalyzer section and the high alcoholic blood count section, now provide only for summary conviction offences, the proposed amendments change the import of the code and create duplicate indictable offences.

● (2130)

Normally an indictable offence means that a person is entitled to elect to be tried by a jury. It also makes a serious record and has implications with respect to passports, crossing borders, pardons, fingerprinting and other matters. In addition to creating a new offence for the breathalyzer related sections, the new changes have the same penalties, whether the offences are treated as summary convictions or indictable offences. This is the same situation which now exists in section 234, driving while ability to drive is impaired. This technique has been criticized by the Canadian Bar Association.

Without question the government has in these amendments shown its intention to deal more severely with these offenders. I sincerely hope some of the suggestions I have made will help the minister in his new task.

While I have the opportunity, I should like to congratulate the minister on assuming his new portfolio and to wish him the very best of good fortune.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Madam Speaker, as many other speakers in this debate have done, I should like to start out by extending my congratulations to the minister on his appointment to his high office. He has very many distinguished predecessors, and I am sure he will add further distinction to the long line of ministers of justice in Canada. I fully expect that he will exhibit firmness to ensure that crime is restrained, and fairness to ensure that it is administered with justice and humanity.

There can be no doubt that Canadians, like people in many other countries, are deeply disturbed by acts of senseless horror and violence. A general atmosphere of fear, and indeed, in some places of hysteria, exists at the present time, and this bill represents a step forward, or perhaps a few steps forward, but I am sure the minister would be the first to acknowledge that it leaves an awful lot to be done.

The minister in opening, and other speakers later, have put forward the main features of the bill. I will not try to repeat that. I just want to deal with some of those features. I approve, and I think the House generally approved, of the Bail Reform Act. That was legislation to try to bring about an element of justice in order to ensure that people without substantial means could get their freedom pending trial, rather than leaving the opportunity of bail to those who happened to be wealthier and able to put up the bail required. It therefore had excellent purposes, but in my view the administration of the Bail Reform Act has been woefully weak, and public indignation has been aroused by some incidents. This legislation is a small improvement, and of that no one can complain.

The onus has shifted, particularly in cases where someone is awaiting trial for a previous indictable offence. One indeed wonders how a person who is awaiting trial for a previous serious offence would ever be able to get bail. I wonder whether the machinery of acquainting the bail judge or magistrate with the facts which would make the granting of bail unlikely is adequate.

Are there adequate means for gathering the evidence of previous criminal offences in other jurisdictions before bail is granted? I doubt very much whether there are at the present time, and I hope that with his provincial colleagues the minister will look carefully into that aspect of the matter to find out whether there could not be a more adequate system of getting the facts to the judges and magistrates responsible for granting bail under the act. I think there would be many fewer cases of people being let out on bail who should never be let out, and then committing more crimes, if there were a more adequate system.

I should like to touch on the drunken driving provisions. I welcome them. I think the amendments proposed are excellent. Screening tests by the roadside and the requiring of breath sampling are a necessary protective action for society. There are few hon. members in this House who are unaware of the multiple tragedies caused by drunken drivers. It is absolutely necessary that this wholesale slaughter be slowed down, if it cannot be stopped. I cannot see that to require a person to accept a breathalyzer test is a serious infringement of his rights. It seems to me that it is merely something to help protect society as a whole.

I am glad that the more severe provisions in this field have been tempered by a recognition that even the drunken driver is a human being, and that the convicting judge or magistrate is given the opportunity to grant a conditional discharge requiring that the convicted person accept conditions for curative and rehabilitative measures. There are some people to whom this disease is so serious that they can be convicted and before long be doing the very same thing they did previously.

I particularly welcome what seems to me to be a return to the sound principle that in criminal matters, at least, an acquittal by a jury should be given full force and should stand. It should not normally be interfered with by an appellate court. I think that is right. It is part of our history. The jury system was there giving juries sole jurisdiction to determine the guilt or innocence of people accused of crimes. I think the sole jurisdiction of a jury arose in the days of the industrial revolution where the English courts were sometimes used in cases of industrial strife, alleged sedition, and political matters of that sort. The English courts were used to overturn the verdicts of juries and as instruments of tyranny.

People like the famous Lord Erskine eloquently framed the jury into a potent weapon for assuring the freedom and liberty of the subject, and I must say that I hope when this bill is passed some attention will be paid to the case of an individual who has twice been acquitted in this country by a jury and, as I understand it, is still in detention.

Another feature of this legislation is to be welcomed, and that deals with its international scope. Crime has developed an international scope. We live in an age of terrorism, and hi-jacking is reported in all parts of the world. We live in an age when the diplomat, the representative from a foreign country, is not secure, but is pursued to his garden or his office, threatened, and sometimes seriously injured. This situation is helping to destroy the whole international order. The time has come for the whole international order to take much more effective steps to put an end to this particular menace. We must, by international co-operation, take firm action to end this scourge on mankind.

● (2140)

This bill does not contain any adequate and fair gun control provision, which the minister has promised but not yet produced. The minister having been in his present position for a short time only, it would be unfair and ungenerous to blame him. But I suggest, considering the recent tragedies which have occurred in this country involving the use of firearms, that their control should be given high priority and not mixed with other legislation. Let the minister introduce control legislation quickly and put it into effect.

I commend the minister for this legislation, nearly all of which is worth while and deserves support. Nevertheless, I hope he will speed the pace of criminal law reform, which is urgently needed. In my judgment many sections of the Criminal Code need amending. Many, like the insanity section, are obsolete. Others are inadequate and antiquated. We have begun making improvements but have a long way to go. I wish the minister well in his task, and I say that we urgently need speedy reform of our criminal law.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, this evening I wish to speak on a particular topic which comes within the scope of Bill C-71. Other members have spoken about other topics; with your approval I shall speak on something of great concern to sociologists and lawyers. Probably this is one of the most delicate and controversial subjects involving our criminal jurisprudence.

When we examine our rape laws, nearly every myth about women in modern society is encountered. What is particularly alarming is the great gap between society's changes in values and behaviour and similar changes in our laws. Before the early awakening of an enlightened society, a woman was considered a chattel or mere possession, and any violation of her was measured as a decrease in her value. In medieval law, rape was defined as "capturing or carrying away by force, and it may be applied to things as well as to women." Indeed, rape from the earliest times was looked on as offence against property. This type of attitude dies hard, if at all. Many believe that if a woman is a sexual person, then she cannot be raped. Thus the woman is at fault, somehow "she provoked the attack." Such ideas are not easily disproven and are often absorbed by women themselves. A rape victim then begins to wonder whether if in fact she did not cause the attack.

Although these myths are rapidly disappearing, other equally outmoded ideas still surround the concept of rape. The most evident is the distinction between "good women" and "bad women." Often when an accused is charged with rape or a related offence, counsel cross-examines the complainant—to the point which some people regard as harassment—on her past conduct and general character. This type of questioning has been allowed as relevant to the issue of consent, and often it is used to attack credibility. Some contend it leads to the appearance that the victim is on trial.

The character of the accused, on the other hand, has not regularly been in issue, unless he puts it in issue. The prosecution is not permitted to question an accused about his character, unless be becomes a witness in his own defence and tries to present evidence of his good character, or other witnesses testify as to his upright character. Neither is the prosecution allowed to question the accused about his previous criminal activities. Therefore it has been quite possible that the previous convictions of the accused for rape would never be divulged in the course of his trial. This is in contrast to the severe cross-examination of the complainant as to her previous moral conduct.

In other criminal trials cross-examination such as this is not permitted. Under the new amendments, evidence of the victim's sexual conduct with a person other than the accused will be permitted only if reasonable notice in writing is given to the prosecution. The judge will then decide, in a hearing held in the absence of the jury, whether such evidence is necessary for a just determination of the case. The judge may permit cross-examination if these matters are particularly relevant. But it would appear that if this amendment becomes law, cases where such cross-examination is allowed will be very rare indeed.

Under the present code section 142 requires the trial judge to warn the jury of the danger of convicting the accused if the complainant's testimony is not corroborated. Under the new amendments the direction is abolished for all offences listed in that section, including rape, attempted rape, intercourse with a girl under 14, and indecent assault. This deletion of the warning is not to mean that a more lax standard of proof is to be applied than in other criminal offences; it simply applies the same standard of proof, that is, proof beyond a reasonable doubt. These amendments seem simply to place women on the same footing as men, and place rape in the same category as any other serious criminal charge, which is a step in the right direction.

Amendments to section 442 provide that where the accused is charged with rape, attempted rape, indecent assault, etc., the judge must consider excluding the public when an application is made for such exclusion by the accused or the prosecution. If the order is denied, reasons must now be given. An additional amendment extends the protection to any proceedings rather than restricting it to the trial itself. The order may be made for all or part of the proceedings, and the judge may exclude all or part of the public. Again I suggest that is a step in the right direction.

There has been one noteworthy Canadian study on rape. This was a Toronto study done by Debra Lewis for a Master's dissertation in 1974. In it rape was shown to be a nocturnal crime that seldom occurs in a public area. The typical location in the Toronto study was the offender's residence, followed by a vehicle. Victims fell into the 14 to 19, and 20 to 24 age group, and were from lower social economic occupational categories. Nearly 70 per cent of the victims were single. Referring to the offender, data on arrested offenders was used and applied therefore to only 32 cases. Over 40 per cent of the offenders were over 30 years of age; 75 per cent were white and they were from lower social economic groups. In 60 per cent of the cases in the Toronto study the victim and the offender were at least acquaintances.

Rape seems to be the most unreported of all crimes, and the number of offences that are reported compared to the number in which suspects are arrested and brought to trial is lower than the rate for any other crime against a person. It seems obvious that the reason is the extremely difficult position our present jurisprudence places the complainant in when she seeks to obtain justice for the indignities inflicted upon her.

The changing public attitude toward rape and the determination to mount a real attack on the incidence of rape have been largely responsible for the government's decision to introduce the amendments contained in Bill C-71. There are, however, several very obvious amendments that have not been introduced regarding sexual offences. Use of the words "of previously chaste character" appear four times in Criminal Code sections relating to sexual offences. Among these offences are sexual intercourse with a female employee, seduction of female passengers on vessels, and even the seduction of a female between the ages of 16 and 18 years. Along with the amendments to the cross-examination and corroboration principles, these words should have also been wiped out. This again brings the character of the victim into question, and bases the crime on the prior goodness of the victim.

The Minister of Justice's (Mr. Basford) amendments have scratched the surface of the rape issue. Further intensive studies must be conducted on such aspects as the psychological, physical, and biological results of rape and related offences, before additional amendments and recommendations can seriously be put forward.

The Law Reform Commission has entered into a contract with the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry to complete a series of studies related to sexual offences. The purpose is to evaluate the effectiveness of existing definitions of sex crimes and to recommend new definitions and systems of classification. This project began in May of 1972 and is not yet completed. Let us hope that when it is completed the Law Reform Commission will be more realistic in its recommendations than in some of the lenient philosophical utterings we have heard from this expensive commission in the past. In the meantime, are women of "previously unchaste character" to be denied equality in our criminal laws?

● (2150)

I suggest it might be more realistic, and this is something for the minister to consider, to treat the offence called rape as a form of aggravated assault. It would remove a lot of the stigma and emotion presently associated with this very ugly word from the emotional and other associations it invariably brings forward in a court of law. I commend the minister for the type of approach he is now using. I hope he will not let the matter rest where it is, but will bring forward other amendments to look at the situation of the law in changing sociological and economic conditions. I see it is approaching ten o'clock. I will confine my remarks to what I have said at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I must advise the House that if the minister speaks at this time, he will close the debate.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate that the minister is anxious to get this through as quickly as possible, but there is another member who is extremely anxious to speak. He is just leaving committee and is on his way to the chamber. I refer to the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald).

An hon. Member: Which committee?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The committee on international development. He has indicated that he is on his way over. I beg the indulgence of the House to allow him to come forward and call it ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member has already spoken on this bill.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This is a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) is not here. Therefore he cannot be recognized. I will call on the minister.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Perhaps I did not make myself clear on the point of order. The point I was making was to ask the indulgence of the House—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): That may not be done. The hon. member for Egmont is not here so he cannot be recognized.

An hon. Member: Here he is.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Thank you, Madam Speaker, for your patience. Unfortunately I was in a committee of this House, and it took me a few minutes to get from the West Block to this building.

I listened with interest this afternoon to some of the comments of the minister when he was referring to the various amendments to the Criminal Code. While it is tempting to deal with all of them because they are all of significance to this House and the country, there is one in particular I will deal with because it is crucial with respect to the present situation in terms of an epidemic in this country today. I refer to the situation with respect to the offences that are committed by those who drink and drive. I have long believed that we have here a situation which has reached epidemic proportions.

As the minister and members on all sides of this House are well aware, each year we incur millions, indeed I think it would be fair to say hundreds of millions of dollars of expenses through hospital costs, insurance costs, and the enormous personal costs as a result of those who believe it is possible to drink to excess, get behind the wheel of a car, and threaten not only their own lives and those of the passengers with them but also other innocent victims using the same and who have the misfortune to come into contact with these vehicles that are essentially out of control.

I will speak a bit more specifically about this tomorrow when I have more opportunity, but I have in recent months attempted to put into effect a series of recommendations with regard to the particular situation in Prince Edward Island. I am not sure whether my office has sent the minister a copy of the lengthy report and study we have done with regard to drinking and driving offences in Prince Edward Island.

While I know Prince Edward Island is not unique in this, we have had a very unhappy history where more than 50 per cent of the accidents that have been caused in Prince Edward Island, and we have a very high accident rate on a per capita basis, have been caused by those who have been drinking and driving at the same time.

The steps that the minister is attempting to take through this amendment to the Criminal Code will be of some assistance. I hope that it is not the sum and substance of what we, as legislators, are able to do either in a federal or provincial sense. I know that much of the implementation of the recommendations that are being brought forward will remain in the hands of those who serve in provincial offices of responsibility. I believe as well that the law in some ways acts as only a final determining factor, and really only finally in a negative sense.

Increasingly we must address ourselves to programs of education and rehabilitation which will be required if we are to deal effectively with this program. The fact, however, is that we have gradually grown into a situation of such epidemic proportions that it is very tempting to believe there is little or nothing that can be done to change the direction and increase of the present situation. I believe that not to be the case.

Certain provinces, and I think of the province of Alberta in particular, have introduced some innovative and helpful programs with respect to rehabilitation. Rehabilitation is an aspect that has to be seriously considered, looking at the number of repeat offences that have taken place with respect to those who have been arrested, charged, and subsequently convicted.

I will not delay the House any longer on this matter this evening. I will merely call it ten o'clock, and hope to proceed more specifically on this aspect of the bill the minister has brought before us.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

URBAN AFFAIRS—REQUEST CENTRAL MORTGAGE NOT BUY ASHBURN GOLF COURSE IN HALIFAX

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Madam Speaker, like a well polished emerald, the Ashburn Golf Course sits on a hill on one of the sides of the great city of Halifax.

The other day I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) not to permit himself to become an urban vandal by trying to procure the land there for use in a housing development. I did that because Ashburn is a very large part of the gracious living for the metropolitan area of Halifax, and because it opens its doors and the course to all comers. It is not restricted. Indeed, if it were, I would not be arguing this cause in any way in this chamber.

Years ago the developers of Halifax, men of the nature of Mr. McCurdy and Mr. Piercey, and I refer back to the thirties, looked upon Ashburn as a possible source of development. The golfers, notably scared that they would lose this magnificent course, put together a special legal arrangement.

The Halifax Golf and Country Club is owned by a number of people who have banded together in a voting trust to keep this operation as a golf club. I am indebted to Major H. E. Crowell, Chancellor of Acadia University, an octogenarian who shoots his age sometimes on this course, for the information I am now giving to the House. A Halifax lawyer, Mr. F. M. Covert, put together the voting trust. That was about 40 years ago. Since then Ashburn has withstood the assaults of the developers. It helps make the city of Halifax a very pleasant place.

● (2200)

There are other cities within whose limits golf courses are situated. Not all cities have them. Winnipeg is fortunate. The city of Hamilton is fortunate. So is Victoria, British Columbia, and Dartmouth across the harbour from Halifax has its own golf course in the heart of the city. There are other cities as well which can offer this great attraction.

But some cities have seen their downtown golf courses go for housing development. I am thinking of Verdun. Only in the east end of Montreal, as I understand it, does there exist one municipal course. Otherwise people of that great metropolis have to drive many tens of miles before they reach a suitable course.

In the national capital area, Madam Speaker, one of the features which makes it such an attractive place, apart from yourself and some others in this chamber—one of the charms is the presence of a number of golf courses near at hand.

The reason I raised my question with the Minister of State for Urban Affairs was to get some declaration from him that his department and CMHC would not try to take over such land for housing development if there were some guarantee that these courses would be open to the public, forming as they do an essential part of living in a highly civilized style.

I think it would be a terrible thing if all urban areas were simply block after block marching away into an indefinite distance of housing and buildings, without green space or other space for people to enjoy recreation. I hope that when a reply comes from the government there will be a recognition that spaces such as Ashburn should continue as recreational areas, and that the government will never stoop to the weapon of expropriation which is the only way Ashburn could possibly be taken for housing development, since the voting members would see to it otherwise that it was used as a golf course indefinitely.

But I am not thinking only of Ashburn. I am raising this as a larger issue looking ahead at how our cities will be 20, 50 or 100 years from now, and believing there ought to be something in government policy which acknowledges the need for these recreational areas.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity this evening to reply in the name of my minister to the question asked by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) on November 14. He referred to the possible purchase of the Ashburn Golf Course in Halifax by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I wish to confirm information which I am sure the hon. member already has in his possession to the effect that the board of directors of the Ashburn Golf Course refused the corporation's offer. In the opinion of the board of directors of the golf course, the land was worth between $2.8 million and $3 million, a figure approximately double the price offered by CMHC. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not interested in the purchase of this property at the price asked by its owners as it would necessitate a housing density too high to permit an appropriately sensitive development treatment of this attractive land.

If I may add a personal note, Madam Speaker, I know that officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are looking around Halifax for a suitable site for a housing development. I am sure the hon. member will understand that if CMHC tees off on this objective with its usual drive, it should go a "fairway" toward securing enough green to initiate an attractive and suitable housing development. Let us hope that there will not be too many slices or hooks in the process, and that all levels of government will "putt" forth their co-operation in bringing to Halifax a worth-while development financed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—UNITED NATIONS FORCE IN MIDDLE EAST—POSSIBILITY OF REQUEST FOR INCREASED CANADIAN COMMITMENT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, when on October 24 I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) if Canada had received any request for increased involvement in the Middle East peace forces of the UN, I had in mind the broadened UN role consequent upon the Sinai agreement between Egypt and Israel, and the UN security vote in reference thereto.

This was before the recent vote in the UN general assembly which has brought forth in some quarters strong anti-UN sentiments. There have been those so distressed by the vote on Zionism that they feel Canada, because of that vote, should turn its back upon the United Nations and cancel our membership. Others have suggested that we show our hostility to the resolution by refusing to allow into this country spokesmen for the Palestinian people. I would not for a moment seek to judge or appraise the motives of those who counsel such action, but I think these are times when UN supporters should express themselves.

Suggestions that a Palestinian spokesman be prevented from addressing a public meeting in Ottawa do little to enhance Canada's reputation as a democracy. If freedom of speech is to be restricted only to those with whom we agree, it is not freedom at all. The UN resolution on Zionism was unwise, unhelpful, and unnecessary, and it would have been far better had its sponsors dropped it. But many UN delegations viewed it otherwise.

In an earlier day the United States had no difficulty in commanding a majority on almost any General Assembly vote. This condition no longer prevails, and U.S. Ambassador Moynihan's recent comment that the "decent countries" were in the minority side was something less than helpful.

Equally wrong are the suggestions that Canada should, with petulant disdain, withdraw from the UN because the majority of its members supported resolutions we oppose. With all its failings and faults the UN is still indispensable. I well remember the words of that great gentleman, scholar and statesman who the minister will remember, Hon. J. M. MacDonnell, who after a visit to the world body said, "If this organization did not exist we would have to invent it".

Canada is not a combatant in the Middle East conflict. There is no need for us to be pro or anti Arab or Israeli. We claim to be on friendly terms with all. Under such circumstances it would seem unfair to deny a voice to a spokesman for the Palestinian side while welcoming all those who come as spokesmen for the Israeli cause. A million and a half Palestinians live in hopeless despair in refugee camps throughout the Middle East, driven from their homes nearly 30 years ago. They were not consulted when their lands were alienated from them. How cruel to deny them the right to speak as well.

Canada is a founding member of the United Nations, one with a good reputation there. Much of our good will and high regard stems from the fine work of the people who have served on various UN peacekeeping forces in many parts of the world over many years.

I hope that if and when a call comes from the UN it will be given a positive response. Tours of duty in these sensitive areas are not without hardships and difficulty. It is hard not to be convinced that our forces generally are being too long denied the kind of equipment their competence and their duty require. But their capacity to perform their role is widely acclaimed and I am proud of their good record as are the minister and his charming parliamentary secretary.

I hope, therefore, that we will follow the sane advice of Ambassador Rae and of the Ottawa Citizen, which in a recent editorial declared that hysterics are no help. I therefore invite a positive answer from the parliamentary secretary, and I assure her I will do my best to support efforts on behalf of the UN's continuing program to reduce tensions and inhibit the prospect for further explosions in sensitive areas of the world.

● (2210)

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, let me say to my colleague opposite how beautifully his statement was expressed. This being said, I think he will understand if I address myself more directly to the question under consideration, and that is no longer the possibility but the actual request for an increase in the Canadian commitment to UNEF's mandate.

The hon. member knows that four days after his question in the House on October 24, as a result of the renewal by the Security Council of UNEF's mandate involving an increase in the size of the force, a request was received from the Secretary General. This was a request for an increase of 20 personnel for the signals element and 16 personnel for the supply unit of the Canadian contingent, applicable January 1, 1976.

Giving additional information, I should like to remind the House that our present contribution totals 987 personnel for UNEF/UNDOF, which is the largest contribution of personnel to the force by any nation. I too would hope that, as expressed by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), Canada lives up to any new request for its long-term commitment to the UN, and I would say to the hon. member that the government has not yet taken a decision on the Secretary General's request for what I think is a marginal increase in our contribution.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ATTENDANCE OF CANADA AT RESTRICTED ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING IN FRANCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on October 28 I put a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) as follows, and it is to be found at page 8604 of Hansard:

> Will the minister indicate if we have been invited to the restricted economic summit meeting in France in mid-November, bearing in mind that monetary questions are to be raised there? If not, will he explain why we have been snubbed when there will be nations in attendance that have less at stake than Canada?

The minister declined to answer, stating this was something to do with the Department of External Affairs. I then put the same question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), and his answer at that time was that the final decision had not been taken in respect of attendance at the summit, but Canada had expressed and was continuing to express its interest. He went on to state:

> The hon. member will recall that Canada has received quite important public support for its presence from the President of the United States and the Secretary of State. We are still awaiting a decision that we hope will make it possible for us to attend.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

I am sorry the Secretary of State for External Affairs chose to leave the House rather than answer this question, just as he refused to answer the question of the speaker who preceded me.

This is an extremely important point. We now know that the conference was held last weekend and that the leaders of six major industrialized countries announced at the end of the three-day meeting that they had reached agreement on questions of world trade, monetary matters, and raw materials including energy. We also know Canada was not in attendance at the conference. We must ask ourselves in the name of Canada why that is so. We had the minister's word that the government hoped it would be possible for Canada to attend, so why were we refused?

We had more at stake, as I originally posed the question on October 28, than some of the nations that did attend, yet we were snubbed by these nations which chose to hold the meeting. I believe we must begin asking ourselves whether the government's past is catching up in terms of international affairs. Is the fact that we have been failing to live up to our commitments with such organizations as NATO now registering with these nations that state, "If you will not carry your load on economic matters you shall not have the political clout and voice you deem necessary"? I think the time has come when we must put the government on the spot.

In the early 1960's some 25 per cent of our federal spending was on defence, and today it is about 10 per cent. Our defence spending has slumped to 2 per cent of our gross national product, compared to 6 per cent in the United States and an average of over 4 per cent for major NATO countries. I suggest this policy has been shortsighted and we are now paying the price in loss of international credibility and stature.

The summit conference held in Paris was an important matter dealing with economic questions which the government has claimed have an influence in Canada. In fact up until recently the government stated that international conditions were the cause of inflation in this country and that there was little that could be done about that. Now we find the government is in the awkward position of not being invited to this important conference on international matters.

If I may I should like to point out that the snub we have received is possibly due to the widespread feeling among these NATO countries that Canada wants defence on the cheap, with a political voice disproportionate to its contribution. At the NATO conference this fall our allies spoke scathingly of a country which was becoming a sponge within the alliance. One top NATO defence planner said Canada has been one of the weaker brethren, the weakest in fact after Luxembourg, since 1971 when we reduced our forces in Europe from 10,000 to 5,000.

I had hoped the Secretary of State for External Affairs would treat this matter with such importance that he would reply this evening. I am disappointed that he is not here. I believe this is a very important matter. It is important, if in truth the government believes in an anti-inflationary program, that it project itself into the international scene where our voice will be heard on the matters dealt with at the Paris summit. It is not enough to receive an official communiqué or whatever the government has received concerning that summit. Our ministers should have been in attendance. They know they should have been in attendance. I hope there will be an explanation concerning why we have received this rebuke at the hands of nations which ordinarily we have looked upon as our allies.

We are a big nation. It is time the government projected us on to the world stage as what we are, a significant nation and not one that will accept paltry communiqués from those who have made the decisions without having our counsel. I want an explanation, and every member of this House deserves an explanation.

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, may I first state that I understood the tradition in this House to be that parliamentary secretaries assist their ministers in answering questions which are dealt with at this late hour of the day. I might also add that the minister might have been quite surprised to hear about the relationship between the Rambouillet summit and our contribution to NATO. I should like to make it quite clear that France did not refuse the attendance of Canada at Rambouillet. We simply were not invited. This is quite a different matter.

If the hon. member opposite were more familiar with the defence budget of NATO I believe he would know that the position of France regarding NATO would not, in the logic he used, have the consequence of excluding Canada from the Rambouillet conference. Having said this may I remind my colleague opposite that the minister stated more than once in the House that should Canada not be invited to the Rambouillet conference "it would not be helpful"—and I am using his words—and "it would not have a favourable effect on our bilateral position." This is pretty obvious, but it does not mean we take it as a provocation. We hope that our bilateral relations will develop in harmony more and more week after week. We thought it would be very important for Canada to participate in the Paris summit.

● (2220)

[Translation]

The matter at hand involved national and international economic interests. In our estimation, our national and international interests warranted our presence, even though the Canadian market represents only about 22 million inhabitants and cannot compare with the European Community or with Japan. But, the point of view of the host country, the hon. member will recall, I think, was to keep the group of participants to a very limited number.

Still the results of the conference seem very positive and as soon as Canada will have the opportunity to analyse the reports, it will divulge its views on each point on which agreement was reached.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 19, 1975

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

HIGHWAY SAFETY

PROPOSED SUPPORT FOR THE LEGISLATED USE OF SEAT BELTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief motion to read, one which I hope will find ready acceptance and which could be adopted without debate.

In view of the utterly tragic and needless toll taken by traffic accidents each year, which has spared few Canadians from the misery and grief that accompanies the inquiry or death of persons close to them, and which is responsible for the loss of over 6,700 Canadian lives a year, and in view of the singular potential held by safety belt usage for a dramatic reduction in such senseless destruction, as has been recognized by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the legislature of Nova Scotia and, now, the Government of Ontario, in their commendable actions to ensure that this potential is not lost to Canadians, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont:

That this House encourage and support the efforts of all provincial governments across Canada in implementing laws designed to protect Canadians through the legislated use of safety belts.

Mr. Speaker: With some reservations having to do with the urgency of the motion, I suppose I might ask whether there is the necessary unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No!

* * *

[Translation]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF MEASURES TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

As part of the anti-inflation policy of this government where it is necessary and obvious that we must fight unemployment seriously and efficiently while trying to beat inflation to the ground, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That this House request the government to table before hon. members of the House a global project for efficiently fighting chronic unemployment in our country as soon as possible, with particular attention to the most deprived areas and the fact that the winter season is coming quickly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

* * *

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BAYDA REPORT ON GRAIN HANDLING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Over one year ago the Minister of Labour appointed Mr. Justice E. D. Bayda a one-man commission to investigate grain handling through the Port of Vancouver and to make recommendations with respect to alleviating delays arising through labour disputes and other circumstances.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Labour has indicated on numerous occasions that the report of Mr. Justice Bayda will be of considerable importance in helping to ensure uninterrupted grain deliveries through the Port of Vancouver in the area of labour-management relations, and in view of the fact that the government has been in possession of the report and recommendations of Mr. Justice Bayda for over four months now, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West:

That this House direct the Minister of Labour to demonstrate his own dedication to avoiding unwarranted delays by immediately tabling the report of Mr. Justice E. D. Bayda.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

● (1410)

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF FLUE-CURED TOBACCO INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a question of pressing and urgent necessity related to the tobacco industry in Canada. Whereas the cost of production of flue-cured tobacco has increased from 1974 to 1975; and whereas the buyers of Ontario flue-cured tobacco are paying less on the auction markets than was paid at the same date last year; and whereas there is much farmer dissatisfaction with the current market prices, to the point of closing down the auction warehouses; I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That this government, through the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, launch an immediate investigation into three areas of the tobacco industry. First, the buying practices and prices paid for Ontario flue-cured tobacco on the auction floors; second, the pricing of cigarettes to the Canadian consumer; and third, the possible curtailment of the export of Canadian tobacco through the pricing methods being used by the companies.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT ISSUE SEPARATE NOVEMBER AND DECEMBER FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present under Standing Order 43 a motion the urgency of which will be quite clear. In view of the fact that the government's decision to combine the November family allowance payment with the December payment and to send out only one cheque, which will not be sent out until the month of December, will cause a great deal of inconvenience and in many families real privation, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to reconsider its decision to combine the family allowance payments for November and December into one cheque to be delivered in December, and to make every effort to deliver the family allowance cheques for November as soon as possible, certainly before the end of this month.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION IN VIEW OF ALLEGED LIMITATION ON COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister following his quite correct statement yesterday that the government has limited the maximum amount of monetary benefits it can offer to the postal workers as a result of its general guideline program of controls. Has the time not arrived when parliament should be asked to intervene to restore this essential service, since the government has already restricted in fact the scope of collective bargaining on the main issue in dispute?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion before to indicate that there should not be confusion between the government's anti-inflation program, which does in fact indicate guidelines within which we hope collective bargaining will fall, and the right to collective bargaining itself. We have taken the position that employers and employees should take notice of these guidelines and find themselves bound by them in a voluntary sense. But they are only bound to negotiate in good faith. The Anti-Inflation Board will intervene if it finds that a collective agreement arrived at is not within the spirit and the letter of the guidelines.

We have interpreted the guidelines in a way which has permitted the Postmaster General to make an offer to the union. Beyond that offer it is our judgment that we cannot go without risking the offer being struck down by the Anti-Inflation Board. It is really a matter of judgment. At the present time parliament itself has certainly not indicated overwhelming or unanimous support for the position of the government, but we are letting the strike process take its normal course.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder how the Prime Minister reconciles that comment with his response to the leader of the New Democratic Party yesterday, where he is reported at page 9184 of Hansard as saying:

—because of the anti-inflation guidelines we are limited in the maximum amount of monetary benefits we can offer at this time. We have gone to that limit and I think it would be misleading the people to name a mediator with that implication.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is not equally misleading to pretend that the government is not asking parliament to restore this essential service because this would interfere with the collective bargaining rights given by parliament, when in fact the government has already modified that right very substantially.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the Leader of the Opposition must have missed part of my answer. I answered that very question and I will repeat my answer in another form, just as the question was put in another form. I said that in our judgment this is as far as we can go as an employer within the guidelines. That remains our judgment, Mr. Speaker. It does not mean that the right of collective bargaining is taken away. It means that this employer is trying to follow the spirit and letter of the guidelines, and has said this is as high as we can go. If we thought we could go higher there would perhaps be justification for a mediator. We do not think we can without breaking the guidelines, and if this is our thought it is our duty to make no greater offer than this because we would be subject, at least theoretically, to a fine if we went beyond what we think is as much as we can offer.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, fully agreeing with the Prime Minister's statement that the government is limited by its general policy as to what it can offer, and accepting that, is it not correct that the Prime Minister is simply playing with words when he pretends that it would be interfering with a right given by parliament to bargain collectively when in fact that right has already been restricted? Is the Prime Minister not playing with words when he suggests that this right has not been severely circumscribed, and will the Prime Minister frankly tell the House what is the real reason he does not come before the House to ask parliament to restore this essential service in these circumstances?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the answer is no, it is not correct to make that assumption. The government as an employer has bargained in—

An hon. Member: He is playing with words.

Mr. Trudeau: The government has bargained as ably as we can to achieve a result that was not inflationary but which would be fair to the employees. That is why there is a strike because our judgment is obviously not shared by the union leaders. At some point in every strike which adversely affects the public interest, parliament as a whole may be called upon to endorse the government's position, if the government wants to put the question before parliament, and perhaps legislation to bring the workers back to work.

Mr. Horner: Haven't we reached that point?

Mr. Trudeau: We have not reached that point yet, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, the logic of the Leader of the Opposition does not lead me in that direction. I repeat, we have as an employer made an offer which we find is reasonable and fair. The union itself has decided to go on strike. At some point in the future perhaps this parliament will be asked to say whether the government is right in its offer or not.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—PROPOSED SECRET BALLOT ON GOVERNMENT OFFER

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister concerning his answer last Wednesday to a question in the House in which the Prime Minister said the idea of special legislation under which a government supervised vote would be conducted was "a proposition which might be worth considering at a later date". I should like to ask today, in view of the continuing post office shutdown which is causing untold layoffs and bankruptcies across the country, and in view of suspensions by the union in Vancouver of workers circulating a petition urging a secret ballot, is the government now giving active consideration to this proposition and, if so, when will the government be able to advise us of its intention?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be a repetition of the previous question. I would just give the usual answer. If the opposition is to get queasy as soon as the strike begins to last and economically hurt one or the other of the parties, surely its remedy—

Mr. Horner: It hurts the innocent party.

Mr. Trudeau: —surely its remedy should be that there is no right to strike in the public service.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Some members of the House seem to take that as a religion, but until that is the law of the land, Mr. Speaker, we have to realize that a strike is a strike and it hurts people. That is the very nature of a strike.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that at sometime the government might consider action by parliament. I should like to remind him that the government has legislated the end to strikes three times in the last few years.

● (1420)

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REQUEST FOR RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Considering that the best solution to the postal strike is one that is acceptable both to the workers and to the post office, and considering that the postal workers have indicated their continuing willingness to negotiate and as recently as a press conference at noon today said they want negotiations to resume in which they would be flexible on all matters, I should like to ask the Postmaster General if the government would indicate an immediate willingness to resume negotiations as early as this afternoon.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Well, Mr. Speaker, I must confess I have not heard the union's request to resume negotiations through the media or from their unofficial spokesman here. I recall my parting words when we suspended negotiations. I said we were prepared to resume any time the union felt like calling 998-9620. There are 18 different extensions and I would be more than happy to resume this afternoon so long as the union understands there is no flexibility in the monetary items as I have already explained. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, there are as the union has pointed out many other areas that could be negotiated. We could, for instance, lower the shift premium.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There seems to have been a rather complete answer up until this point. Perhaps we could get to the supplementary.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the minister just acknowledged it was the government which suspended negotiations and not the union, I should like to ask the minister why a request that was made in a communication that was delivered to the President of the Treasury Board last Friday asking for the resumption of negotiations has not yet been replied to by the government.

An hon. Member: They mailed it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to say that we suspended negotiations. After 11 months of meeting demands, at least 25 beyond the recommendations of the judge, and faced with a demand at the last moment by the union of a 35-hour week, a $2.73 pay increase, not over 30 months but 26¾ months, longetivity pay and increased holidays beyond what was offered as well as 18 other monetary issues, I thought it was time to suspend negotiations until they came to their senses and understood there is only so much money. I am prepared to go back to the negotiating table and re-arrange some of those monetary issues. Possibly those in the top bracket might be prepared to sacrifice some money and give it to those at the bottom end of the scale.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Since what the minister has just said, if I understood him correctly, is that the government suspended negotiations because it is taking a fixed view on the monetary issue and therefore was not willing to talk about other matters and broke off negotiations, is the minister then saying the government is prepared today to let the union know it will resume negotiations with the same flexible attitude on the issues under dispute as the union has indicated it is willing to approach all matters at this time.

Mr. Mackasey: When events unfold the hon. member will understand, in his attempt to be an honest broker, that he is simply prolonging the strike unnecessarily and that there are many things that go on in private in the field of negotiations that cannot be revealed. The hon. gentleman should know what I am talking about, and if he does not, if he wants to jeopardize these informal negotiations, then he is going about it in the best possible way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

[Translation]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SALARIES OF MEMBERS OF ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—ADHERENCE TO WAGE GUIDELINES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Can the minister tell the House whether the salaries of the members of the Anti-Inflation Board have been disclosed and whether they comply with the government guidelines?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to confirm that the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board has received the status of deputy minister grade II with a salary range between $49,000 and $60,000. Mr. Pepin has, however, accepted an intermediate salary of $54,000 which is quite commendable since he has lost his M.P. pension amounting to some $8,000 a year. The deputy chairman is at the DM I level with a salary range of $40,000 and $50,000. Mrs. Plumptre has, however, insisted on receiving the salary she had as chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, that is $40,000. Finally, the other members are paid $200 per working day—less than what is often paid to consultants or what they could get in their profession.

* * *

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PORTUGAL—POSSIBLE DISCUSSIONS WITH GOVERNMENT CONCERNING DISPLACED PERSONS FROM ANGOLA

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Over the past several months has the minister had discussions with or representations from the Portuguese Ambassador regarding displaced persons from Angola, and, if a further airlift is required by the Portuguese to remove their people, is the minister considering the use of Canadian armed forces aircraft?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had conversations recently with the Portuguese Ambassador in which we discussed two questions: first, the possible economic co-operation between Canada and Portugal, and the response of the Portuguese government to the invitation extended by Canada to engage in discussions toward some forms of economic co-operation, and in that respect we expect a mission from Portugal to hold these discussions in Canada. On the question of persons who may be leaving Angola for Portugal and who may wish to come to Canada, the ambassador reiterated a request from his government that we give favourable consideration to taking additional people into Canada. I assured the ambassador that we would give further consideration to the representations which he had made.

* * *

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF REVENUES FOR 1976

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As we attempt to identify the government's fiscal and monetary stance within its so-called anti-inflation program, would the minister indicate what would be his current estimate of revenues in the fiscal year 1976, bearing in mind that he has already indicated he feels the deficit shown in the June 23 budget would still be his current estimate of the deficit in our budget this year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is useful to attempt to give precise figures as the year goes on. As I indicated, the judgment at the moment is that we would remain within the same frame as indicated.

● (1430)

POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER SPENDING PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): On October 30 the President of the Treasury Board indicated that he felt government spending would be held within his original limit. We now know that it is $1 billion in spending higher than originally shown in the budget of June 23. I should like to ask the minister to confirm whether the President of the Treasury Board was correct when he indicated that the total remains unchanged, and that if the Minister of Finance has some fresh announcements to make, he will make them. Has the minister any fresh announcements to make with regard to further spending programs with respect to the budget announced on June 23?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

HIGHWAY SAFETY

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF PRIVATE BILL MAKING USE OF SEAT BELTS COMPULSORY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. With respect to his well-known support for the legislated use of seat belts, and in view of exchange of correspondence with regard to my own bill, C-410, which would allow the government to introduce seat belts in motor vehicles operated within its jurisdiction, I wonder if the minister has had an opportunity to consult with his colleagues about the possibility of bringing this bill forward, or one similar to it, in order to provide some leadership in this area, which would obviously be very welcome.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the support given by the hon. member to the principle of legislation to enforce wearing safety belts in vehicles. I am as happy as he is about the developments that have occurred in Nova Scotia and Ontario. I hope the other provinces will display the same courage in this endeavour. About the hon. member's bill, I have not had the opportunity to discuss it with my colleagues, but I still believe that the best formula would be to leave this matter with the provinces rather than ask the federal government to enact special legislation.

[English]

COMPULSORY USE OF SEAT BELTS—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES TO ACHIEVE UNIFORMITY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the comments within the last day by the minister of highways in British Columbia about the need for some uniformity and standardization, and considering the amount of interprovincial traffic there is in this country, has the minister and/or his officials been in consultation with the B.C. minister, and are plans currently under way to assist in some useful standardization and uniformity so that more satisfactory results can be achieved from this legislative initiative?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the whole question of road traffic safety, there is a very important initiative which has been under way for some time co-operatively between the federal government and the provinces, and this is showing up by way of a good number of new technological devices, as well as advertising, and an indication to people about how to best go about safer driving. I think all of this is bound to produce some good results.

* * *

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

ATTEMPTED TAKEOVER OF WESTINGHOUSE BY WHITE CONSOLIDATED—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT JOBS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the minister has had conveyed to him by the Minister of Labour the concern of the union leaders at Westinghouse Canada in Hamilton and has indicated he will meet with the union officials to assure them, as best he can, of the security of their jobs, what ongoing action is the minister taking to resolve this matter, bearing in mind that if the delicate matter of the use of the name Westinghouse in Canada is not cleared with considerable speed, there will be serious erosion in the level of orders on the books of Westinghouse, and it may lose some of its very expert key personnel?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, once again I must remind the hon. member that his use of the word "delicate" emphasizes why I must answer with extreme caution in this case. On the matter of the relationship with the union, as referred to in my answer the other day, we have been in touch with them this morning and indicated that we will meet with them—that is, I, my officials and any others who may be involved—at a time when such talks might prove to be productive, but that may not be for a matter of two or three days because to the best of my knowledge negotiations and talks between the interested parties are still continuing.

ATTEMPTED TAKEOVER OF WESTINGHOUSE BY WHITE CONSOLIDATED—POSSIBILITY OF RENEWED APPLICATION TO REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): The minister indicated Monday that a new application could be made to the foreign investment review agency by the parties involved in this matter. Can the minister indicate that if an application were made, it would be given priority status before the agency in an effort to resolve this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): With respect, I think that is hypothetical at the moment. What I was quoting to the hon. member was the law, which indicates that any applicant who is turned down can re-apply. Whether the applicant in question wishes to re-apply is something which that company alone can decide.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESULTS OF ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING IN FRANCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with agreements arrived at or accords achieved at the recent economic conference convened by the Republic of France and in which Canada was spurned as one of the participating countries. Will the minister say what is the nature of the agreement which has been arrived at, apparently between the secretary of the treasury of the United States and the French foreign minister, an agreement which has been presented to 18 other countries to ascertain their support? The agreement I have in mind is the one which will lead to the monitoring of currency exchange rates on a daily basis and intervening to stabilize them whenever they appear to fluctuate without underlying economic reasons. This agreement on world economy, the most important ever arrived at between the nations, is one which I would appreciate if the minister could acquaint the House with and also with what the attitude of the Canadian government is with respect thereto.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can be very brief in my reply to the right hon. gentleman. We have not yet been asked to concur in any conclusions which were reached at the summit. When we are asked and when we receive a formal proposal, we will then consider it. However, that is the situation at the moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister say that Canada has not received this plan? The other 17 nations have, and surely Canada is not going to be spurned again.

Mr. MacEachen: I merely reiterate that I have not received any proposal seeking Canadian concurrence in an agreement between France and the United States.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Canada is out in the dark again.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTERS EXCHANGED WITH FRANCE IN RELATION TO ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Will the right hon. gentleman agree to table or to make public the letters exchanged between the president of France and himself about the six-nation meeting at Rambouillet?

[Mr. Kempling.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not customary to make public exchanges of correspondence between heads of governments. I received letters from other heads of government on this matter as well as from President Giscard d'Estaing. If it is in any way helpful to the hon. member, I could say that the letter, apart from being very courteous, indicates the reasoning, which the president gave publicly, for not inviting Canada; namely, the reasoning that this would enlarge the summit in a way which if Canada came in, other countries would have to participate, and so on. This is not the Canadian view, and as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated, we are not in agreement with that view. However, that is the substance of the letter, and it is nothing the president has not said publicly already.

* * *

[Translation]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF PAPERWORKERS IN GASPÉ—REQUEST EMPLOYERS BE FORCED TO NEGOTIATE

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): My question was for the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker, but because he is absent from the House, I shall direct it to his parliamentary secretary.

Because of the disastrous effects the strike in the pulp and paper industry is having on the economy of this country as a whole, but more specifically on areas such as Gaspe, which is not very healthy as it is, and because also of the refusal to negotiate, which I feel is dishonest on the part of several employers, and since Bill C-73 has not yet been adopted by Parliament, could the minister use the influence attached to his position to convince these employers to sit down and negotiate as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I most certainly am, Mr. Speaker. I do not see any reason at all why the employers in question will not sit down to the table with the union and endeavour to bargain collectively at this particular time, and I would urge them to do so.

* * *

● (1440)

ENERGY

SALE OF REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—POSSIBILITY OF PROCEEDING WITH CONSTRUCTION IRRESPECTIVE OF RENEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the $15 million loan the government is making to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for the purpose of proceeding with the preliminary stages of the construction of the CANDU reactor in Argentina. In view of the fact that the minister has told the House that the agreement is being renegotiated because the original agreement did not have provision for escalating costs which could result in AECL having a loss of $100 million to $160 million, may I ask if this loan to AECL means that the agreement has been successfully renegotiated or does it mean that the government intends to proceed with the construction of the CANDU reactor in Argentina irrespective of whether the agreement of 1973 is renegotiated?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I told the House last week the Argentine government has been advised of the Canadian government's wish and intention to renegotiate the commercial terms of that particular contract. There was a meeting several months ago, I think in the middle of August, and there is to be another one within the next few weeks at which time the bargaining would get down to the fine strokes. As to the question of the $15 million standby loan, that is to provide financing of AECL so that it can continue to honour the terms of the existing contract.

SALE OF REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—PROCEDURE TO RECOVER FUNDS EXPENDED IF SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT NOT SIGNED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Canada and Argentina have not yet concluded an agreement regarding nuclear safeguards, I want to ask the minister what procedures he has set up for AECL to recover its expenses from the government of Argentina in the event there is no safeguard agreement or that a successful renegotiation of the 1973 agreement is not completed?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been stated in the House that we feel we are very close to a successful conclusion of the safeguards agreement. I would hope that would be signed before the end of the year.

* * *

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Prime Minister. As nervous tension among his backbenchers is rising daily and obviously, as each hovers close to their telephone waiting for the call to come through advising them that they are the new minister of communications, would the Prime Minister do the humane thing and make the announcement in the near future so that these poor wretches may get back to a more stable state of mental health?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member were as perceptive of these vibrations as he says he is, perhaps there would be a bit more rotation on his own side to let some of those backbenchers come forward.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: I brought him along! A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, regarding the reason that the appointment has been open since October 14 last. Is the minister aware that today when Conservatives meet each other, they do not say, "Hello", or "How are you" but raise their right hand and say—"Hochelaga"!

* * *

[Translation]

FISHERIES

INQUIRY WHETHER AGREEMENT WITH NORWAY LIMITED TO FISHERIES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State (Fisheries).

In the light of the announcement made by the minister about an agreement with Norway regarding Canadian offshore limits, has Norway recognized only the Canadian jurisdiction to determine a fishing area, or have they recognized as well the claims made by Canada about everything which relates to an economic zone?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check into the actual wording of the agreement. But if my memory serves me well, it is only concerned with fishery. I will check into it and advise the hon. member.

* * *

[English]

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BOARD

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister advise his colleagues and particularly the government House leader to have a motion put down to refer the annual report of the Foreign Investment Review Board so that the operation of that agency and the principles on which it has proceeded to date could be reviewed by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, as has been requested by a number of people, to see how they are getting along?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no quarrel with the principle of getting full discussion on the first year's operations by whatever appears to be the most suitable means of doing so. I will be glad to discuss it with the House leader, and advise the hon. member in the House.

* * *

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON TAXATION OF PROVINCIAL CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind the Saskatchewan government's contention that the nationalized potash industry will be tax exempt, would the minister give the federal government's position on the taxation of Crown corporations in the provinces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not have anything to add to the statements made by my predecessor in this connection. In more general terms, we do not feel the provincial governments should use their jurisdiction, whether by way of royalties or by way of Crown corporations, to prevent the federal government from getting a just return for national purposes from the taxation dollar. In that sense, I think we will need to have very close regard for the form that the Saskatchewan proposal takes and we will examine it very closely before making a further statement.

* * *

HEALTH SERVICES

CLOSURE OF HOSPITAL AT CHESLEY, ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware that the Ontario minister of health today closed the community hospital in Chesley, Ontario, the first of 20 such closures planned in Ontario, depriving such areas of much needed medical facilities? The hospital serves some 8,000 area residents who will now be required to travel to Owen Sound where the medical facilities are overtaxed. Would the minister use his good offices to urge the Ontario government to restore this essential service to the area and do everything in his power to prevent the closure of the 20 essential community hospitals?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I understand the concern of the hon. member at the closure of this particular institution. I will be pleased to bring his representation to my colleague, the minister of health in Ontario. The hon. member will recognize, however, that the administration of the hospital system is the responsibility of the province.

* * *

[Translation]

AIR TRANSPORT

USE OF FRENCH IN AIR TO GROUND COMMUNICATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

Last Friday, the office of Mr. McLish, director of civil aviation in Canada, issued a guideline stipulating that only the English language is to be used for air to ground communications in almost all cases, which revives an important debate and could have serious consequences, including disrupting the air service of the Quebec government. First, can the Prime Minister say whether the federal government has had anything to do with the issuing of this guideline and, second, can he tell the House how it is possible to reconcile this guideline, aiming at strengthening unilingualism in air to ground communications, with the language policy of the federal government, which advocates bilingualism and even spends a lot of money for that purpose?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, several Liberal members having expressed their concern to me about this matter, I have had the opportunity of examining the file. I listened closely to what the Minister of Transport had to say yesterday in the House. There seems to be misunderstanding about that matter and since emotions run high on the subject I feel that it is important that the present position of the federal government should at least be understood. The instructions alluded to by the hon. member, and about which much has been written, is not new. It is a repetition of the situation that existed, thanks to the initiative of the former Minister of Transport, and which consisted in extending bilingualism to five other airports in Quebec, under certain circumstances. So, that experience marked the progress of bilingualism. The situation remains the same now. The government wanted to make an effort to see if bilingualism and the importance of security could not be reconciled. The government is very much concerned about those two elements: the effort was successful but should be studied further. Therefore, neither the House nor the people should think that there has been a withdrawal with regard to that stand. The position was progressive, it remains so, and I trust there will be more progress. But those instructions are nothing new, neither one way nor the other.

* * *

● (1450)

[English]

HEALTH SERVICES

INQUIRY AS TO REPLACEMENT FOR DR. WIGBY OF WATSON LAKE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare which perhaps more appropriately should have been supplementary to the question asked by his backbencher. Now that the government has again thrown into jail Dr. Stephen Wigby of Watson Lake, what steps has the minister taken where it is his responsibility to provide medical services for the community, and surrounding areas, served by his department and that doctor until the doctor is released from jail?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government does not throw doctors into jail; the courts do.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, since it was at the instance of the minister's department that Dr. Wigby was charged and thrown into jail for failing to comply with medicare requirements in the Yukon, what steps does the minister intend to take to provide medical service while this doctor is in jail?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, my department is always trying to provide medical services in the north in the best possible way. In this particular instance, arrangements are being made to ensure that these people receive high quality service.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHILE—SUGGESTED PROTEST OF DISREGARD FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of information recently received that the ecumenical committee of cooperation for peace in Chile (Copachi) was closed on Saturday, November 16 by order of the Chilean junta with four of its lawyers, a number of priests including its Jesuit former secretary, Fernando Salas, and a number of people associated with the council including one woman six months pregnant, being arrested or mysteriously disappearing and in view of Amnesty International's latest report documenting torture under the military junta in Chile, specifically referring to inhuman treatment of women detained by the junta's secret police—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hees: Turn the page.

Mr. Rodriguez: Don't be so anxious. Has the government approached the Chilean junta to protest this disregard for civil and human rights and if the government has not done so, does it intend to do so now?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have frequently expressed our concern about the situation in Chile at the United Nations and elsewhere. The government of Chile is well informed as to our attitude on the situation in that country.

* * *

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DATE OF DECISION ON GRANT TO CROCUS FOODS, MANITOBA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has the federal government made a decision to reject the Manitoba provincial government's request for the construction of a dairy processing plant in Manitoba by the name of Crocus Foods Limited, a plant, I may add, that was not needed in the first place?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker the department will make a decision shortly about this matter. However, the hon. member will have to wait for the two parties to publish their decision.

* * *

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise with the indulgence of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: I would like to express my best wishes to the Prime Minister on his visit to Calgary on Sunday. Is the right hon. Prime Minister, the gentleman from Montreal, giving odds on the outcome of the intellectual and cultural contest on Sunday, Grey Cup '75?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not a betting man. If I were, I would bet that the Polish Canadian who sits opposite will be disappointed next Sunday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: How about betting on the next election?

* * *

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED THREAT OF EXPULSION OF POSTAL UNION MEMBERS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—POSSIBILITY OF PROTECTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Postal union members in British Columbia have been threatened with expulsion if they continue to gather names demanding a secret ballot. What protection if any have these workers?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as public servants, they do not have to belong to a union. If suspended, they can continue to work and under the Rand formula, so long as it is accepted, their job is not in jeopardy. If they are threatened with violence, they will have the full support and protection of the proper authorities. If there is any intimidation, as there was in Regina the other day, there will be arrests. The only regret I have about the arrests in Regina is that one of the two who were arrested is a non-postal employee named O'Sullivan. There is one of that name missing from the House of Commons today. I do not know if that is a coincidence or not. However, I can assure the hon. member there will be full protection of the police against intimidation and threats. In so far as expulsion from the union, union membership is not a requirement to work in the post office.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—POWER OF PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS BOARD TO ORDER SECRET BALLOT ON GOVERNMENT OFFER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that a substantial majority of the House has indicated they favour some form of secret ballot of the union membership, has the government satisfied itself that the Public Service Staff Relations Board has the power to order such a secret ballot? If not, does the government intend to introduce an amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Board Act making this possible?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, Section 18, in the opinion of some people, does provide the Public Service Staff Relations Board with this authority. However, this is really academic because when and if some time in the intermediate and long distant future such legislation is needed, that legislation could provide the Public Service Staff Relations Board with the proper authority and with the proper penalties at its disposal in the event there is any resistence by the unions against the secret ballot on behalf of their workers. Of course, that is a long way away.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

HELSINKI AGREEMENT—METHOD OF DETERMINING EXTENT TO WHICH COMMITMENTS FULFILLED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister inform this House whether his department or some other arm of the federal government has established a plan to follow very closely the way in which the commitments of the final act of the European conference on security and cooperation undertaken at Helsinki last July are being fulfilled or violated?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a review conference will be held in Belgrade two years hence, in 1977. That is where it will be possible to assess to what extent the principles adopted at the Helsinki conference have been implemented. We have obviously expressed our concern that these principles be implemented, but this will be determined when the evaluation is made at Belgrade.

* * *

POST OFFICE

REASON FOR ALLOWING STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS TO CONTINUE

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It is with regard to the postal situation. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to allow the postal strike to continue so as to keep the public's mind off this anti-inflation policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

POSSIBILITY PRIVATE PRODUCERS ALLOWED TO COMPETE FOR GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. In his absence, I will direct it to the President of the Treasury Board. On July 4, 1972, the former Secretary of State told the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts that the National Film Board would no longer be exclusive recipient of government commissions; it would now have to compete with private producers for all contracts awarded by any federal department or agency. Do the President of the Treasury Board and the Secretary of State intend to proceed with the intentions of the former Secretary of State and allow private producers in the film industry to compete on an open market with the National Film Board for government contracts?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I cannot reply specifically to the hon. member's suggestion. I shall contact the Secretary of State and inform the hon. member of the outcome of our discussions.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I raised a point of order with respect to the business of the House prior to the oral question period at 2.15. Your Honour ruled that there could be no point of order raised during that period with respect to difficulties arising in connection with motions under Standing Order 43.

● (1500)

Unfortunately, it is not always easy to hear the preamble by Your Honour to the putting of the question, and in this instance it was difficult for me and a number of hon. friends seated around me to hear any objection to that particular motion. I know that earlier this week, on Monday, at the time of a similar circumstance, as reported in Hansard on page 9101, when a motion had actually been put Your Honour permitted the leader of the New Democratic Party to inquire, on a point of order, whether there had been unanimous acceptance of the motion.

In the same way, since it was not possible to raise the matter at the time, I would ask the opportunity tomorrow, while motions under Standing Order 43 are being considered, to put my motion, reserving the right to see whether there is unanimous acceptance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises an interesting point of order. There is, of course, a fundamental difference between the two situations. In the situation in which the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) was involved a few days ago, it was the impression of the Chair that no one had withheld consent. Any hon. member, of course, was in a position to express his resentment or unwillingness to extend unanimous consent. Further, any hon. member, even though not saying it, might have heard it from an hon. member sitting close by. It is one thing to permit a member to say that the House should take action which it can only do by unanimous consent, when it does not have unanimous consent. On the other hand, when the Chair puts a motion and hears a dissenting voice, that is the end of the matter; unanimous consent does not exist.

So this situation is quite the reverse. Although the hon. member might not have heard a dissenting voice when I asked if there was unanimous consent, I clearly heard at least one and that left me in no position to put the motion or to ask the question a second time.

The ruling I made was simply to express some concern that the revision in our procedures is such as to put a rather self-policing feature on motions under Standing Order 43. We are limited as to time, and in any case they cut into the question period. Accordingly, since they are rather self-policing in that regard, I have withdrawn extensively from interfering with the subject matter vis-à-vis the words used in the rule, "an emergency matter". I did, however, express some misgivings as to whether in fact a statement by this House with regard to the use of safety belts had any urgency to it.

In any case, I resolved the doubt in favour of the hon. member, as I usually do. I put the question and I heard a dissenting voice. It would seem to me that, with slight variations or some indication that there might be a willingness to proceed with the matter tomorrow, the hon. member ought not to be in any difficulty, although perhaps he might consider whether that rule might not be as opportune an approach as, perhaps, tabling, with unanimous consent, a notice of motion by this House at the appropriate hour which would meet with unanimous approval. However, that might be something for the hon. member to consider.

While I am on my feet, there are two other outstanding points of order. The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) raised a rather interesting objection to the treatment of a question he had placed on the order paper. I am very pleased to advise that, since the matter has now been considered, it is my understanding that there is consent in the House that since the hon. member had received a response by the government which indicated that his question would be answered some time later, under those circumstances his question ought not to have been taken off the order paper. I understand that it is now unanimously agreed that the hon. member has a good point and that the question ought to be reinstated, with the unanimous consent of the House, for an answer later.

To deal with the second point, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) put forward a bill for first reading yesterday. The Chair, noting that the subject matter of the bill pertains to the creation of new exemptions or different treatment for exemptions from taxes, would have serious misgivings that that bill would infringe upon the financial initiatives reserved only to the Crown. In the circumstances, the only fair thing to do is to warn the hon. member now that the next time the bill comes forward for consideration, he would be expected to make some procedural justification for the bill being advanced at that time. There certainly has been some concern about that question.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

Tenth report of Standing Committee on Agriculture, in both official languages—Mr. Daudlin.

[Editor's Note: For text of above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Order Paper Questions

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Translation]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 3,118, 3,179, 3,187, 3,246, 3,269 and 3,492.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

CONTRACT TO COLUMBIA ENGINEERING INTERNATIONAL LTD., VANCOUVER

Question No. 3,118—Mr. Friesen:

1. Was a contract awarded to Columbia Engineering Analysts and Consultants in Vancouver to explore the history and the future of the uses of particle board and, if so, in what amount?

2. On what date is the report to be completed and released?

3. For what kind of distribution was the study conducted?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Yes, in the amount of $65,125.

2. Report is nearing completion and release can be expected before year end.

3. The study will be available free of charge to any interested parties.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—COMPLAINTS DIVISION

Question No. 3,179—Mr. Marshall:

1. How many employees are in the Complaints Division ("The Consumer, Box 99") in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

2. What was the cost of maintaining the Division in the year 1974-75?

3. How many complaints were received from each province in the past fiscal year?

4. How many were resolved (a) in favour of (b) against the complainant?

5. What is the cost of maintaining the Division as related to the cost per application?

6. Has an evaluation been made to determine the success factor of complaints made to the Division and, if so, what are the details insofar as it concerns the value to individual Canadians?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. The authorized strength of the Individual Consumer Assistance Unit, Consumer Services Branch, is 12. The Unit handles all consumer complaints and enquiries dealt with by the Department at headquarters. Under a decentralization program completed on April 1, 1975, the field offices have assumed responsibility for dealing with the bulk of this workload.

2. The Individual Consumer Assistance Unit did not exist as such in 1974-75: The Box 99 activities were carried out as part of the programs of the five functional units which comprised the Consumer Services Branch at that time. Total expenditure by the Consumer Services Branch in fiscal year 1974-75 was $682,000 and 47 man years were used.

3. Complaints and Enquiries by province for fiscal year April 1, 1974-March 31, 1975—for the headquarters and field activities

	C	E
Newfoundland	549	120
Prince Edward Island	195	62
Nova Scotia	2,094	472
New Brunswick	1,618	389
Quebec	6,301	8,482
Ontario	10,680	6,231
Manitoba	1,253	186
Saskatchewan	1,386	408
Alberta	1,586	303
British Columbia	4,292	1,151
Yukon	44	6
North West Territories	42	16
U.S.A. & Other	168	179
	30,208	18,015

4. Company Action—Complaints for fiscal year April 1, 1974-March 31, 1975. (a) Adjusted, 4,319; Adjustment Offered, 1,147; Partial Adjustment Made, 446; Goodwill, 283; Total: 6,195. (b) Disputed (Not Adjusted), 681; No Reply from Company, 411; Company Explanation (Not Adjusted), 2,261; Total: 3,353. (c) It is impossible to classify the remaining 20,660 complaints into either (a) or (b). Some were of a general nature; others did not contain adequate information; some were referred to other federal or provincial departments or agencies and in some cases legal action was required.

5. Total expenditure by the Consumer Services Branch for the fiscal year 1974-1975 was $682,000. During this period, the staff in Ottawa answered some 16,281 of the 48,223 complaints and enquiries indicated in 3 above. The Branch utilized approximately 47 man years on a wide range of consumer service activities, including the handling of complaints and enquiries. In 1974/75, the Branch was responsible for: Handling of consumer complaints and enquiries; Preparation of background materials for the preparation of pamphlets, brochures and fact sheets for consumer information and education work; Preparation of background material for the preparation of television shows and radio shows for consumer information; Drafting of speech outlines and collating of speech material for sue in speaking engagements to consumer groups; Preparation of analytical reports and research into consumer problems; Providing guidance to the consulting service in the field; Development and guidance of the Consumer Help Office program. In 1974/75 there were no employees dealing solely with consumer complaints and enquiries and it is thus impossible to arrive at a cost-per-complaint/enquiry figure. The same situation prevails with respect to the costs of handling complaints and enquiries in the Department's regional offices since complaint handling is only one of several services provided through the regional offices.

6. No formal evaluation of the success factor has been undertaken. The ever-increasing numbers of Canadians who use Box 99 seem to indicate that a valuable service is being provided. For example, though much of the work handled by Box 99, Ottawa was shifted to the regional offices as of April 1, 1975 statistics for the period July 1-September 30, 1975 for Box 99, Ottawa, reveal a 21 per cent increase in compalints and a 94 per cent increase in enquiries over the same period in 1974. Comments on this service received by the Department are another indication of its value to consumers.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

CBC-NFB CO-PRODUCTION AGREEMENT

Question No. 3,187—Mr. Friesen:

1. Were the Independent Film Producers consulted or informed about the agreement between CBC and the National Film Board when the two agencies discussed the signing of a $900,000 co-production agreement?

2. Has CBC and/or the National Film Board hired between 27 to 37 new camera and crew units for producing films of Canada and, if so, how many were (a) new to the industry (b) residents of Montreal and Quebec City (c) members of the Canadian Association of Film and TV Producers?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the National Film Board as follows: 1. No. The CBC and the National Film Board have been holding discussions on the production of a number of programs but no agreement has been reached.

2. No.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—PURCHASE OF AIR MATTRESSES

Question No. 3,246—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What is the life span of the $50 air mattresses purchased by the Department of Supply and Services for use by the Department of National Defence?

2. Since January 1974, how many of such air mattresses have been procured?

3. Does the Department of Supply and Services rely on a single supplier or do they request tenders for the item?

4. What attempts have been made to interest other qualified manufacturers to bid on the specialized air mattresses?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. These special air mattresses have a potential life span of seven years, barring any unforeseen damages through use. The mattresses are repairable and when damaged are repaired with the use of a special kit issued for that purpose.

2. Thirty thousand eight hundred forty-five.

3. No. Competitive tenders are invited for each requirement.

4. DSS is continually seeking additional sources of supply for this commodity. Representations have been made to other potential suppliers through correspondence, visits to plants and through meetings. Relevant specifications and samples of the mattresses have been sent to manufacturers to stimulate interest. Alternative methods of construction have been considered to allow more suppliers an opportunity to compete but these changes have not proven to be satisfactory in field use.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Question No. 3,269—Mr. Schumacher:

Has the (a) Prime Minister's Office (b) Department of Transport (c) Department of External Affairs (d) Department of National Defence (e) Department of Energy, Mines and Resources (f) Department of Agriculture (g) Department of Labour (h) Department of Manpower and Immigration (i) Department of the Secretary of State (j) Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs made any arrangements, or are they planning any arrangements, for the (i) transportation to Canada and return (ii) accommodation (iii) hospitality (iv) transportation in Canada, of any foreign Heads of State or dignitaries in connection with the Olympic Games in Montreal in 1976 and, if so, what is the nature, or projected nature of such arrangements and what is the projected cost in each case?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): See the reply to question No. 2,334 of April 21, 1975. There have been no further developments to report since the reply to the above mentioned question was tabled.

FEES PAID TO OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS FOR 1973 AND 1974

Question No. 3,492—Mr. Reynolds:

What was the total amount paid to outside consultants by the government in the years 1973 and 1974 and what is the estimate for 1975?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): See question No. 151 of October 1, 1974 and question No. 897 of November 19, 1974 for years 1973 and 1974 respectively and the Public Accounts for year 1975 estimate.

[English]

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, on June 20 I placed question No. 2,833 on the order paper in the following terms:

1. How many consultants were hired by the Fisheries and Marine Service, Department of the Environment, in the past two years?

2. (a) What were their names and salaries (b) what was their length of employment?

3. Were public tenders called before they were hired?

In the last five months I have asked three times for an answer to that question. It has not been answered and I should like to ask, through you, sir, just what the government is trying to hide.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) brings us, again, to the subject of the right of hon. members to expect answers to questions. That point was raised in different forms yesterday or the day before by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty). It was raised earlier this session, with respect to starred questions, by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). It was raised more recently by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) in the context of whether a decision ought to be made by the Chair about the regularity of questions on the order paper, or whether it ought to be the right of the government to make an answer indicating that it disagrees with the procedural regularity of a question on the order paper.

I would take this occasion to bring to the attention of all concerned that one would hope that before the Chair would begin to break new ground in the handling of questions on the order paper and, indeed, various considerations which have been put forward, the members of the procedure committee might direct their attention to the entire subject of the handling of questions on the order paper, whether or not the matter ought to be reviewed and whether the understanding or regulations ought to be updated.

In light of the review we undertook last Easter on oral questions which really fall, with respect to the regulations, under those which were first established for questions on the order paper or written questions, I wonder if it is not time, now, to ask the procedure committee to direct itself to the entire question of questions on the order paper in order to try to resolve the many misgivings and concerns which have been raised. Certainly it would seem to the Chair, at least, that this development might take place as soon as possible.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Would Your Honour be good enough to call notice of motion for the production of papers No. 59? I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

COPY OF REPORT INVOLVING PROVISION OF FULL INCOME SUPPORT TO UNEMPLOYED CLAIMANTS

Motion No. 59—Mr. Marshall:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report on the development concept involving the provision of full income support to unemployed claimants while they pursue various courses of training to enhance their skills and abilities.

[English]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The programs mentioned in the hon. member's motion have worked well over the past five years but are currently under study by the commission. The study is complemented by a pilot project in the province of Newfoundland. However, neither the study nor the pilot project are expected to reach fruition until mid-1976. Consequently, a formal report on these programs is not available and we would therefore request the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Marshall: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motion be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Criminal Code

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PETITION FOR CHANGES IN ABORTION LAW—RELEASE OF DR. MORGENTALER

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the nineteenth report of the Clerk of Petitions stating he has examined the petition laid upon the table by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Dupont) and found it acceptable as to form.

● (1510)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE, CROWN LIABILITY ACT, IMMIGRATION ACT, PAROLE ACT

JURISDICTION GIVEN TO CANADIAN COURTS TO TRY PERSONS FOR CERTAIN OFFENCES COMMITTED OUTSIDE CANADA

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-71, to amend the Criminal Code and to make related amendments to the Crown Liability Act, the Immigration Act and the Parole Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the sitting last night I had the opportunity to say a few words with respect to these amendments to the Criminal Code which the minister brought forward yesterday afternoon. I was mentioning that the action taken in this legislation to deal in particular with drinking drivers reflects a basic concern on the part of the government that we try to deal with what I referred to last evening as a growing epidemic.

The minister's move, on the part of the government, to introduce stiffer penalties is, in my estimation, both good and bad. It is good in the sense that it recognizes the problem that we are dealing with and with which we have not as yet effectively come to grips. It is bad in the sense that it may encourage people to believe that primarily through introducing this type of legislative amendment we will achieve a substantial reduction in the number of tragic accidents that take place and the number of even more tragic fatalities, or that it might also have a general impact on the number of people who believe that it is safe for them to drink to excess—by which I mean beyond one drink, or at the most two—and still get behind the wheel of a car and drive.

I have been struck in recent weeks, because of tragedies that have occurred in this country and elsewhere, with the growing concern and renewed calls for gun laws to deal with situations which from time to time lead individuals who are mentally disturbed or criminally minded to use guns as weapons of personal destruction. There is no doubt that many Canadians as well as people elsewhere are exercised by the easy availability of hand guns and other similar weapons.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Surprisingly enough, I have also come to realize that people do not share the same sentiment with respect to the number of people who believe that it is within their right, or at least that it does no great harm, to operate a motor vehicle while effectively under the influence of alcohol or some other drug. Yet to me the two situations are extremely similar in nature. They are both examples of the use, the illegitimate use if you like, of very dangerous weapons.

The fact that the automobile is not primarily thought of as a weapon is part of the mythology of our time. But if we total the hundreds of thousands of deaths which occur annually in this country as a direct or indirect result of the actions of drinking drivers, we would be shocked and I think would move to call for the most widespread and effective program that we could introduce. I realize it would not be totally within the domain of the federal government to outline such a program and put it into place, but we would certainly work quite closely, as we do with any other major problems or issues, with other levels of government, particularly the provinces.

In a recent study carried out by the Ministry of Transport on night-time driving, it was shown that one driver in four who was stopped in the course of a random hailing down of motorists driving at night was found to have been drinking. That is an indication that what we are discussing here is not a few people who are criminally minded, people we would consider to be socially irresponsible; we are dealing with what is a widespread social phenomenon, though not a problem where legal enforcement or punishment would achieve the desired result.

It is not as if we were dealing with organized crime. We are not simply dealing with a few people who will be effectively deterred by the kind of increased penalties that are set out in this legislation. As I think the minister is well aware, there are a number of well documented studies that question, in effect, the deterrent impact of legislation and whether or not it can eliminate the widespread practice of drinking and then driving.

The fact is that we have not really begun to consider what it would take to eliminate or substantially reduce the number of people who consistently drive while under the influence. I am inclined to believe the increased fines are really inconsequential. I do not think that the present fines structure accomplishes very much. It may have some deterring or economic impact upon those in the lower income levels, but it does not take into account those in the middle or upper income levels of society for whom a fine is merely a minor irritation. It may be true that the move toward an indictable offence the second time around may have some kind of general psychological, deterrent effect, but I am not overly optimistic.

I believe we are dealing with a societal and community problem of very widespread proportions. I believe these legislative amendments introduced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) are useful only to the extent that they relate to a series of other measures which will be adopted both at the federal and the provincial level. Unless we are prepared to deal with the wider aspects of responsibility, education and rehabilitation, we will come back here three to five years after putting this legislation into effect and we will see little or no change. Indeed, even with this legislation in place, three to five years from now we might not have noticed any substantial decrease, and perhaps a possible increase, in the number of people who are arrested and charged for these kinds of offences or, more seriously, the number of those involved in tragic accidents.

This question concerns not only the Minister of Justice, who has well defined responsibilities in his department, but other ministries of government as well. I have heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) express great concern at the general problem of alcoholism in our society, and perhaps he, in concert with other ministers, such as the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), will have to give a great deal more time and attention to the way in which a concerted and comprehensive approach to the problem can be taken.

As I mentioned last evening, the province of Alberta has spent a good deal of time experimenting with a rehabilitation program. The province should be assisted and encouraged in this endeavour. Driver education and re-education programs involving the showing of films on alcohol and driving, as is the case in Alberta, and a general raising of awareness levels would be of some assistance, and it is undoubtedly true that a general alcohol education program for use in schools or by voluntary organizations should be encouraged and would fit very closely within provincial jurisdiction.

The province of Ontario as recently as last year produced a study showing that an increasing number of young drivers are involved in alcohol-related accidents. What impact does that have on the way in which young people are gradually brought into the world of driving in our society? In what way do we ensure that, through driver education programs in schools and through the actual procedure of driver training, temporary drivers' permits and actual driving examinations, there is included at every step of the way a very close relationship to the awareness of the individual of the impact that alcohol, drugs and other mind-distorting materials have on a young person's ability to operate a motor vehicle safely for himself and for others who use the highway?

We have usually regarded this kind of program as somehow peripheral and, while important in itself, not of fundamental importance in making sure that it is part and parcel of an individual's awareness as he undertakes the responsibility of driving an automobile. As I said last night, part of the problem is that things do not happen overnight. Just as we have grown accustomed to having the automobile with us—in this century we have been using the automobile as a basic means of transportation—we have grown accustomed to the epidemic proportions of those who are maimed or killed in traffic accidents.

● (1520)

I think it is really instructive to realize that is spite of the tens of wars that have been fought in this century, two of which we reminded ourselves about recently in our annual Remembrance Day ceremonies, and in spite of the wars that continue even to this day, there have not been as many people killed in all these conflicts as have been killed in traffic accidents in this century. When we relate this to the fact that almost every second traffic accident that occurs is the direct or indirect result of the intemperate use of alcohol or other drugs, we realize we have a problem of epidemic proportions and we know something must be done.

I mentioned the education aspect not in the narrow sense but in the very broad sense that would ensure there is an absolute awareness of the relationship between the intemperate use of alcohol and one's responsibility as an automobile driver. I think this has to work itself all the way through every aspect of the whole framework of the operation of the motor vehicle in our society.

We now have a situation in most provinces where insurance laws really act as a disincentive to the reporting of drivers who are guilty of being impaired. I wonder how much leadership the federal government has played assisting provincial governments and major insurance companies to see that there is no disincentive aspect that does not in some way or other incorporate a sense of responsibility for those who have offended the law in this way.

I have mentioned the need for education. I would also like to mention the need—this goes squarely to this bill before us this afternoon—for greater vigilance in respect of the enforcement of these provisions. It is a well known fact that there is one season of the year when the police, federal and provincial, are extremely active in the use of the breathalyzer and other forms of detection. That is, of course, during Christmas and the New Year when there are many parties and perhaps people are much more inclined to get behind the wheel of the car after attending a party when they are not sober or fit to drive.

I think that kind of selective approach is really unsatisfactory because it is obvious to me that we are dealing with a consistent pattern which is not at any one level of society, in any one part of our country, or at any one time of the year. Therefore, if we are to toughen the legislative provisions in this regard, definite action should be taken by our police forces, federal and provincial, to ensure that there is a year-round crackdown and activity in respect of ensuring that this law is enforced. In this way, people will know that if they are irresponsible enough to leave their own home or, more likely, to leave a public drinking establishment and are not capable of handling an automobile, the chances are extremely high that not only will they be stopped and questioned, but they will be arrested and charged.

I should like to make two other points which I think are important in this regard. I have said that I think the action within this legislative proposal is not in itself sufficient, though it will be of some assistance. Governments, particularly the federal government, have to consider the more fundamental question about the degree to which it has become socially acceptable to drive in this country while under the influence. I wonder how much real information we have about the types of drinking drivers that exist in this country, and how much we really know about the most effective way of getting through to them with the message that it is not right, not safe, and is simply no longer acceptable to drive while under the influence.

I think, quite frankly, we need a special task force. I mentioned to the minister last night that some months ago—I believe it was in April of this year—I produced from my own province of Prince Edward Island a report on highway safety because of our particularly shocking situation in respect of accidents and fatalities on the island. I called the report "Half in Five". The message of the title was that if we took some definite action—and this is one of the areas we are discussing here in respect of drinking drivers—we could expect to reduce the traffic fatalities and the number of accidents by as much as 50 per cent in the next five years in the province of Prince Edward Island.

I spent a great deal of time on this report dealing with the problem of drinking drivers, because I believe it to be one of the important elements in the province. One of the conclusions I mentioned in regard to the report was that I felt the time had come to have a special task force to look into the very wide-ranging and pervasive aspects of drinking as it affects those who operate automobiles in our province and in the whole of this country.

The resources of the government of the province of Prince Edward Island are obviously limited. Perhaps they are limited everywhere in this kind of restraint. But it would seem to me to make sense, in terms of federal-provincial responsibility, if both levels of government could agree to put forward the funds for the kind of task force that could really make an examination of some of the long-term questions regarding the drug impairment that occurs and the willingness or unwillingness to accept responsibility in the operation of motor vehicles on our highways.

I have already said, and I will not repeat it, why I think that kind of a study would be important and useful. It could have a number of good recommendations resulting from it. There are a number of questions I should like to see raised, not only in analysing all the social ramifications of this large-scale phenomenon in our society but in analysing and suggesting, perhaps, some ways in which we could get at the problem.

We have never spent much time thinking about the co-responsibility or joint responsibility that exists in this regard. While we have these legislative amendments before us, it might well be worth while for the minister and his officials to consider whether the time is not rapidly coming when there must be some kind of joint responsibility exercised by those who are in an automobile and who may not be under the influence but are being driven or chauffeured by someone who obviously is under the influence. I wonder whether that kind of co-responsibility is not a matter for some form of legal enactment.

In addition—and this is perhaps more of a hunch than a factual conclusion—since a large percentage of the people who are on the highway under the influence have left public premises, it might well be that those who operate those premises have in fact a legal responsibility. What is occurring now in my own province is that in some instances these licensed establishments, if it has been proven that people have in fact left under the influence on more occasions than is acceptable, are simply closed down and their licence is lost. This is more of a judgment matter within the particular jurisdiction of that province than any kind of general law or requirement under the Criminal Code of this country.

However, I believe it is a criminal act for people who, being aware that individuals are going to use their motor vehicles while under the influence, when they may have contributed to that situation, allow it to occur. Perhaps one of my basic difficulties is that I am not enough of a lawyer—in fact, I am not a lawyer at all—to know how that would effectively be put into the law without jeopardizing any other aspects of basic individual human rights.

As long as we have the scope of tragedy, the extent of carnage that is occurring on the nation's highways in this day and age, and as long as we allow many of our fellow Canadians, young and old, to become victims, sometimes maimed and invalided for life because of those who assume they have some important right to drink and drive, we will not be acting responsibly unless we introduce the most comprehensive and effective program possible.

Therefore, I support the initiative that is taken in this instance by the minister but I would urge him and his colleagues not to leave it at that, believing that by itself this measure will be sufficient to solve this very difficult problem.

● (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. Let me simply say that Bill C-71 now under consideration is a technical measure. Its only objective is to update our Criminal Code. Now what is the Criminal Code? It is the sanction of values accepted by society, the sanction of ethics and rules of conduct generally endorsed throughout Canada. It is the sanction, because those rules are accepted by the entire population. Unfortunately, certain strata of society or some individuals refuse to comply with them. Therefore, we have to draw up some regulations to force them one way or another to abide by those rules of conduct or ethics, either through the courts, the police force, the penitentiaries or prisons. Since the Criminal Code is that sanction of rules of conduct or ethics established and accepted by society, it must always be up to date and follow the changes in that total acceptance of values by society which is per se quite changeable. I thank the minister for bringing in these amendments to our Criminal Code through Bill C-71. As I say, these amendments are very technical and tend to fill some gaps that have developed in the course of years.

Indeed, one must not confuse Bill C-71 now before us, a housekeeping measure, with the long awaited amendments that will necessarily follow the findings of the Law Reform Commission which, in recent months, has supplied us with all kinds of work documents and studies on the various aspects it has considered, particularly family law, evidence, sentencing, judicialization, all law matters that have to be reformed in depth. We are waiting for the results of these works with great impatience and I hope we will see them soon embodied in a bill introduced in this House.

Therefore these technical amendments cover aspects of the Criminal Code in almost every reach in sections of current application, be it theft, rape, internationally protected persons or still, more technically, in the field of procedure. In the procedural area, for instance, this bill proposes a number of improvements which law practitioners had been requesting for quite some time. These include Clause 94, page 60, to amend the section on the trial de novo system in summary conviction matters so that, when the amount is somewhat minimal and when an appeal has been filed, there must be a new trial.

Therefore these provisions on de novo trials will be amended so that courts of higher instance may assess more easily the evidence introduced before a court of first instance, without the appellant having to establish again this evidence. In this respect, I share somewhat the fears which the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) expressed when he said that giving such a power of assessment to courts of appeal could cause problems in terms of court accessibility. I feel however that this difficulty could be examined in committee, as most of the clauses in Bill C-71 for that matter, for it is in committee that they should be examined in detail one after the other.

Since we must discuss the bill's general principle on second reading, I will concern myself with a question perhaps a little more important, that is one of the two or three items dealt with by Bill C-71 which may be of major importance and show, like a lighthouse would do for a deep water harbour or still water zone, what the global reform of criminal law will be like in Canada.

I want especially to discuss the amendments relating to evidence with regard to rape cases. I also want to discuss the protection granted to individuals having diplomatic or international status. I feel there is a gap in this area in Canads which Bill C-71 is trying to fill. There again we will review in committee the consequences of those new sections of the law.

What I want to discuss more fully is the provision about the corroboration and the amendments to the principle of evidence in cases of rape or other sexual offences, amendments brought in by Bill C-71.

Corroboration is a somewhat strange legal phenomenon. In fact, this stratagem of proof, if I can use such terms, was originally introduced in common law to support the evidence of witnesses whose credibility was questionable in the minds of the jurists of that time. We know that in common law and in criminal law, especially in Canada, one proof is enough to convict a person. The one proof is sufficient, precisely to the extent that the credibility of the witness can be estimated.

Now, for instance, in the case of rape, the jury can convict somebody of rape on the strength of the victim's evidence alone. But rightly or wrongly, it has been considered for a very long time, in sexual offences, that because of the emotional aspect involved, the credibility of the witness was questionable to say the least. I want to point out here that, probably more wrongly than rightly, the judge was requested, when making his address to the jury, to make sure he pointed out the dangers of condemning the accused merely on the strength of the victim's testimony. And so, what is corroboration? It is the possibility for the jury of weighing a second proof, a secondary testimony, secondary in the sense that it must not necessarily be related to the main proof. What does that mean? That if, for instance, there is an element of proof with regard to the victim, another element of proof, which differs from the other but is related in a way, of course, to the main accusation, then, there is corroboration and it will be easier for the jury to pass judgment on the guilt or innocence of the accused.

Therefore corroboration was a type of judicial animal developed specially for particular cases such as sexual crimes, or for cases where children appeared as witnesses, where they are unable to swear to their testimony, or again in the case of perjury, treason, false evidence and finally the testimony of accomplices.

● (1540)

They are quite particular cases where corroboration is necessary, cases where the credibility of the main witness may be very doubtful. Then, we can again ask ourselves if in cases of rape or sexual offences we should demand corroboration. I think that some historical considerations are necessary and that we must realize that 200 or 300 years ago the status of women was not the same as today. The status of women has much improved to become in 1975 equal to that of man.

But 300 years ago the circumstances were different and women perhaps considered as merchandise. What was rape at the origin? It was the fact of taking a woman without the consent of her legal owner, her husband, her father or someone else. The principle of corroboration may stem from that because at the time women were unimportant and it was then necessary to produce more evidence than in normal cases in order to condemn those who made an attempt against that property.

We realize that this concept now belongs to the past particularly in this womens' year that gives official recognition to that principle of equal status on which we all agree. So that whole concept of corroboration and sexual conduct in cases concerning women should be changed and the elimination of corroboration, or rather the address to the jury, is a positive step in this direction.

It is not enough. I think we should come to a more comprehensive and less sectarian definition of sexual offences and stop making reference to sexual offences involving female persons, and try instead to clarify this concept of sexual offence so that it is embodied in the whole section of Criminal Code concerning assaults. It could be an ordinary assault, an assault causing injury, a serious assault, a less serious assault, in short a sexual offence is generally an assault in the broad meaning of the term. I for one would favour the incorporation of offences of a sexual nature into offences of the "assault" type; we should stop considering sexual offences as a little sordid. They are sometimes sordid, but not always.

It is often said that 60 per cent of the cases of rape happen between people who know each other intimately. Therefore I think the scandalous nature should be removed from sexual offences. We must stop referring to sexual offences as being mainly related to female persons. We should include all these types of offences—rape, indecent assault, sexual assault on people who are less than 14 years old—in the sections on assault which are complete, precise, by adding one definition or two to the general nature of assaults; it will be possible to include these offences in sections on assault, thereby removing a little of this scandalous context from the Criminal Code.

So Bill C-71 aims at correcting what had almost become the victim's trial in cases of rape by removing the address to the jury in respect of corroboration, and I think it is a very important step forward. Once again, I agree a little however with the reservations made yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary-North (Mr. Woolliams). I appreciated them very much. His very wide legal experience will no doubt be of great help in committee when we study in depth the clauses of Bill C-71. I shared his reservations when he wondered whether henceforth the credibility of the witness could really not be questioned if all emotivity surrounding sexual crimes was truly abolished, and if evidence by the victim alone was really sufficient in rape cases for the jury to render a guilty or non guilty verdict in every case.

I submit, Madam Speaker, as is documented by psychological, empirical and other studies, that the jury is somewhat less stupid than commonly imagined, and that jurors are much more alert and educated now. They can judge by themselves, without the need for an extra witness and for someone to show them the road to follow. They can now judge by themselves the credibility of the witness about to speak before them, and the greater or lesser weight of his evidence.

The jury as an institution and its importance have been been discussed at length. In my view, the jury may be the most remarkable institution in our criminal law, in that twelve people that may not have a solid legal background are asked to examine, in their conscience, the facts that are presented. The jury must therefore rely on facts, and weigh them according to their merit. They must also assess the witness's credibility. I feel they are fully capable to do so without the need of concepts as archaic as corroboration, especially in cases of criminal offences.

In my view, the final solution to all offences in that nature would be, in order to strip them of any obscene aspect they now have, to include them altogether with the sections on assault. This will solve a number of problems concerning evidence, appreciation, publicity and credibility, and all the evidence problems that have developed and that arise in this kind of court proceedings.

Madam Speaker, I said I would be brief, I believe this is a housekeeping kind of bill, to update the Criminal Code. I do not think there is much to say in substance, except that it was necessary precisely to enable legal practitioners to use the Criminal Code in a sensible way. We are all looking forward to the implementation of the comprehensive reform of the Criminal Code following the studies of the Law Reform Commission. We hope that this in depth—really in depth—reform will enable us to do away with all the dead-weight that has accumulated for centuries in the Criminal Code. We hope a thorough study will be carried out to define the goals we aimed at with the Criminal Code, and insofar as the whole matter of crime and fight against crime through a criminal code will be questioned, I shall be satisfied. Until then, I only hope that Bill C-71 will be passed shortly, for legal practitioners badly need it.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, like the previous speaker, I wish to make a few remarks respecting Bill C-71, to amend the Criminal Code, superficially I should say, since it is only meant to update the present Criminal Code pending a more thorough reform. However, when that bill was introduced, the Minister, in his introductory statement, said himself that it was somewhat a minor one in that it does not deal with the problem of crime proper in Canada, but is only designed to update some sections of the act. But the great weakness of this bill is that in updating the legislation, we are updating something which is already faulty. The spirit of the Criminal Code remains exactly the same. The deterrent aspect concerning organized crime and the various types of crimes is also left out. We are only redefining terms, redefining and reclassifying crimes, such as rape, breathalizer tests, paroles, robbery, voluntary homicide, highway safety rules and the power to take proceedings in the case of technical flaws. It will be possible to take proceedings against escapees.

[Mr. Lachance.]

● (1550)

This bill takes the same approach and is in the same spirit as what we have always known in the past concerning our procedure which is, in my opinion, faulty, our crime prevention system, our penalty system and our criminal rehabilitation system. A typical example of this can be seen on page 32 of the bill, in subclauses (1) and (2) of clause 46, which read as follows:

46. (1) Paragraph 454(1)(d) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

In other words, this is only a more exhaustive explanation of the existing act. We are not changing the spirit of the law or our philosophy or our approach, we are simply redefining words. This clause goes on as follows:

"(d) the peace officer or officer in charge is satisfied that the person—

—meaning the criminal—

—should be released from custody, whether unconditionally under subsection (3) or otherwise conditionally or unconditionally, and so releases him."

Further on, in subclause (2), we see once again that the officer in charge—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I remind the hon. member that at this stage, he must speak to the general principles of the bill and not to a particular clause.

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. With all due respect, I am precisely giving a specific example of one of the philosophies of the bill as allowed under the rules of the House of Commons which provide that, at this stage, only the principle of the bill may be discussed.

So this bill deals with parole. Before I was interrupted, I was trying to show that this bill not only does not change our approach to the Criminal Code, but retains the same defective approach, in that just about anybody will still be able to grant paroles. Indeed, in the same breath the minister tells us: Hurry up, pass Bill C-71 and a little later if you are nice, if you pass Bill C-71—which does not change anything in a defective legislation—we promise you, following the study of the Law Reform Commission, a more in-depth reform later on. And only at that time will we deal either with capital punishment or the use of drugs, prevention, parole.

The minister promises, Madam Speaker, to discuss philosophy as you wish, one of those unheard of reforms. He promises a drastic reform of the Criminal Code, so that Canadians will feel safe at home. Well, that same minister not too long ago humbly agreed to put his head at stake if the death penalty was applied to certain criminals guilty of the capital murder of peace officers or prison guards.

Madam Speaker, we now have an act that has been in effect for a certain number of years, that is consolidated, but that this cabinet refuses to administer on the pretence that a minister refuses himself to administer it, otherwise he will put his head at stake. It is more or less blackmail in any case, and yet the law exists, the philosophy of the law exists. That is the crux of the matter. We were promised legal reforms but in the final analysis they do not amount to anything, they do not bring a new approach.

Madam Speaker, we have been told the same old story over and over again. I will not mention those 1974 statistics that are available, nor those for 1973 because they would startle you. I would rather quote the 1972 figures on the Canadian crime rate, which happens to be one of the subjects Bill C-71 deals with.

As the previous speakers have said, the crime rate in Canada is up by 13.9 per cent. I would like to add that in 1972 there were 2.9 victims of premeditated murders per 100,000 population, compared with 1.9 in 1971. This means an increase of one victim over that period. By the end of 1972 there were still—but that is another aspect of the problem—74 unsolved murders. This year in the city of Montreal alone, the Canadian metropolis, over 175 or 180 murders were committed. In 1972, 1,244 persons were charged with murder, including, 1,168 adults and 76 children, which points out another aspect of the crime problem in Canada, namely juvenile delinquency. How many probation officers do we have in our rehabilitation establishment for youngsters? If the minister says he is that interested in rehabilitation, how many probation officers do we have to help our youngsters who, due to a bad family environment, to evil influences, to inexistent or broken families take to the streets to commit burglairies or other offences, are sent to juvenile detention centres where they learn every possible trick to commit other offences, because such institutions are schools for criminals—and I dare say this for I personnaly visited some of them a number of times.

Madam Speaker, one just has to spend a day or two at the welfare court on Bellechasse Street in Montreal. It is worth going there to see teenagers and children testify before a judge who does his best to understand them but who cannot replace their parents.

When given a second chance, those young people have no assistance and are misunderstood just like the criminals who are supposed to be rehabilitated. We should not then be surprised, Madam Speaker, if society is not prepared to co-operate and join in the rehabilitation of criminals.

Madam Speaker, we have to pay a certain price if we want the individual to be respected in our society or if we want to have order in our community and among others, the government and our legislation must encourage our police forces and lend them efficient and daily support.

Here is a very specific example. Let us suppose that an armed burglary occurs in a jewellery shop. The owner is notified and calls the local police. The police arrive on the premises. Their specific role is to protect the life of the citizens and their property. That is what they are paid for. They go there to protect jewels or a private business, those policemen must then be ready even to risk their lives—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the hon. member for Lapointe is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Marceau: Madam Speaker, no doubt the remarks of my hon. friend are interesting but I think we will be considering a legislation that will deal with capital punishment and all those matters which will then be relevant. Right now I would ask the Chair to remind the hon. member that he is not talking about the subject matter of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Lapointe should note that the bill also bears on the Parole Act.

I was listening to the hon. member, and he tried to relate his remarks to the release on parole of prisoners. For the time being, I invite the hon. member for Lotbinière to continue his speech.

Mr. Fortin: Madam Speaker, I go back to this very specific example. Police officers, on behalf of all, governments and society, will attempt to preserve not only the citizens' life but also their property. They have to make a choice, and that choice is made on our behalf, in the name of society and that of this country's authority, namely to do everything to protect themselves and protect the citizens' life.

If gangsters use weapons, police officers must also use them to defend society and property. This is where the whole tragedy occurs; we are talking about it today and the Law Reform Commission, does the same and we will talk about it again if the minister honours his promise to proceed with an in depth reform of the Criminal Code.

When our law enforcement authorities obtain equipment which is at least equivalent to that which is available to gangster chiefs, forces are matched; laws must be applied on the basis of our trust in our police forces.

Well, it is the opposite which happens now in our society, for policemen are doing their jobs, risking their lives arresting gangsters, and often losing their lives or their limbs in the process, as was recently the case in Victoriaville, Drummondville, Moncton and several other communities. Later on, gangsters are put in jail where they live in comfortable cells, judgments in their case are quickly rendered and, not long after that, we hear that they are out again and that they have committed other crimes. Who decided that they should be released and why? Very often, some of them are even paroled by mistake. Such was the case recently in Montreal. They have to run after the prisoner. Madam Speaker, the morale of our law enforcement authorities has never been so low. Even if we adopted the most beautiful gold-lettered Criminal Code unanimously endorsed by this House, if in daily practice we were not able to give our enforcement authorities the necessary confidence and the assurance that they are backed up by the legislative authorities, we would have wasted our time. This is true whether we want to maintain law and order or administer this legislation.

Somewhere in this bill, there is a provision on road-side screening devices. It is the same thing. This is enforced every day. That is what is meant by protection of society. Many people would like to go through red lights and stop at green lights. That is what I would like anyway. But the law is not made that way, Madam Speaker. We have to abide by it. There must be some order in society. We really must have the mind and the will to enforce it.

That is why I cannot believe in the seriousness and goodwill of the government when it agrees that the Minister should put his head on the block on the matter of capital punishment, when we already have a legislation which is not enforced or which the cabinet refuses to enforce.

Madam Speaker, that is why I am very sceptical about the mini-reform which Bill C-71 constitutes; finally, it is nothing but a very superficial rewrite.

I would describe it as window dressing. It will allow some policemen to say that the federal Parliament takes care of order in society, but it will change nothing in the rising crime index in Canada, the failure of the rehabilatation program in the last four or five years. Nor will it change anything in the speed with which justice is done today. We need but look at the number of people who wait for months and months before appearing in court; nor will it change anything in the type of scandal we read about in the newspapers, and which are brought to light thanks to the extraordinary work of the Quebec Police Commission probe into organized crime. Full pages of it are published; yet, we had a Criminal Code. I remember how, in 1968, we studied the omnibus bill which dealt with all manners of subjects.

I remember the then Minister of Justice saying how wonderful the bill was, that it was a new approach. It was fantastic, it would allow the tracking down of gangsters to come, thanks to the use of electronic wire-tapping devices. Well, this is more of the same. It demonstrates once again that our approach is erroneous, that we are not really sincere in the fight against crime, that we are not really efficient in the rehabilitation of criminals.

Madam Speaker, I would like to reserve my remarks on this subject. Since it bears on general points, I shall certainly follow this bill closely and, unlike the minister, I am not overly anxious to approve a bill which, ultimately has virtually no meaning. It would be important to tell the minister that his endeavour, his patience in listening to us are basically a waste of time since this bill changes absolutely nothing but words; it contains no in-depth change.

● (1600)

[English]

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Madam Speaker, may I first of all identify myself with some of the remarks made by the hon. member who immediately preceded me in this debate, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). I think it is just as germane, with all respect to the intervenor, to discuss what is not in a bill as it is to discuss what is in a bill; that is, to discuss, particularly on second reading, what is contained therein.

I listened with considerable interest to the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) and I agree with what he said. He said that this bill is an updating of the Criminal Code, a housekeeping measure, simply another in the series of patchwork measures to amend the Criminal Code. Those who have been victims of the old Criminal Code, or those of us who act as counsel, may have other views. I am delighted to see the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) here; I am sure he is familiar with the legislation.

For many generations we have been living with a code that has been, because of public pressure or otherwise, or government leadership, subject to updating from time to time. I do not want the minister or anyone else to misunderstand my remarks. This is absolutely necessary in any moral legislation. But those of us who agree with what was said by the hon. member for Lotbinière feel that perhaps the time has come to approach the code in a different way and take a broader view.

I do not want to prolong this debate and I intend to confine my remarks to that part of the bill related to sexual offences. I should like to deal with some of the others becaue they concern all of us—problems of the highways, problems of alcohol and all the heartache and sorrow they bring, as well as the bail provisions—but in the interests of time I shall deal only with that part of the bill relating to sexual offences.

I have no complaint about the substance of these amendments and I am most anxious that the bill move into committee where there will be the opportunity for questioning and applying some flexibility. I should like to find out what prompted the wording of some of these amendments, and where the government intends to go with them; what threat they feel the amendments will answer in our society. What concerns me about this bill and many of its predecessors to amend the code is the lack of responsiveness or responsibility to come to grips with the whole spectrum of sexual offences.

Yesterday, the minister spoke of this bill as being part of a series of measures that would be responsive to a real, genuine concern of Canadians. I agree absolutely. He spoke of an ongoing review of the Criminal Code to reflect the changing attitudes of Canadians. I agree with that. We have to be responsive. When people are fearful of bodily harm or of property damage, we as legislators have to be responsive to those genuine concerns. I agree with the four aspects that prompted this legislation. The minister spoke, first, of the need to develop updated information; second, of the need to respond to the recent prevalence of certain crimes; third, of the need to deal with persistent problems that recent attempts had not been successful with; and, finally, he spoke of the need to modernize procedures. I agree that all of this is responsive government action.

This has happened with the Criminal Code for years. I can only refer to it as a patchwork of certain areas. We are responsive to that particular action whether it be because of pressure in our constituencies, interest groups bringing it to our attention, or any number of other sources of pressure put upon us. What I question when I read a bill like this is the responsibility of this reaction. I am not saying that the bill is irresponsible. I do not say that at all. I question whether there is the responsibility that is necessary in this type of reaction. What is lacking, in my opinion, is the responsibility to deal with the larger problem. The hon. member for Lotbinière dealt with that. In the area of sexual offences, we are dealing with only three or four offences.

● (1610)

In my opinion, more responsible action, rather than a responsive reaction, is called for in dealing with this part of the code. I do not confine that observation to sexual offences but I think it happens to be a rather good one. It happens to be the one we are dealing with in Bill C-71. I have had limited experience in the criminal courts. I practised criminal law for a while and thought I knew a little bit about it. When preparing for this debate, I was amazed at the vast variety and number of sexual offences contained in the Canadian Criminal Code. Some are specifically crimes against women. In other words, the sex of the victim is what we look for in search of that provision in the code which prohibits a certain form of behaviour. Others are simple crimes, unacceptable behaviour. It is the nature of the behaviour rather than the victim either directly or by implication being sexual behaviour.

Statistics Canada lists 14 categories of sexual offences. These are not individual offences, but categories. I am not an individual who becomes enthralled by statistics, but I could not help noting in the Statistics Canada report which covers three years—1969, 1970 and 1971—that in two of those years, 1969 and 1970, there were only nine of the 14 categories in which more than 15 convictions were secured in that calendar year. In 1971, the third year covered in the report, there were only seven categories with more than 15 convictions. I find it rather remarkable that there were numerous categories of sex crimes in which 15 or less convictions were registered in any year.

At the other end of the scale is the relatively high number of convictions in one or two categories. I find that in the category of indecent assault on a female there is roughly double the number of convictions than in any other category. I think we can draw only one conclusion if we look at this question intelligently and objectively: this charge has become a catch-all; it is a basket clause for all clauses where we cannot register convictions for much more serious crimes. When there is any doubt about how the Crown prosecutor will proceed with regard to a sex crime, he will proceed with indecent assault on a female person. In my opinion, the incentive which must exist to do that indicates there is something basically and seriously wrong with the Criminal Code in this particular area.

Second, the Statistics Canada report impressed me by the fact that there were extremely low conviction rates in many areas compared with the number of charges laid. In terms of percentage, in many cases there was well below a 50 per cent conviction rate. On the other hand, on the specific charge of indecent assault against a female, the conviction rate was between 75 per cent and 85 per cent. Again, something has to be seriously wrong when within this group of 14 categories we find that in 1971 there was only a 48 per cent conviction rate for attempted rape, 42 per cent for corrupting morals, and 49 per cent for rape, while indecent assault on a female or indecent assault on a male had a 75 per cent conviction rate. There is something inherently and basically wrong with that structure when we have such a variety not only in terms of number of convictions but in terms of convictions based on the total number of charges laid.

Third, the Statistics Canada report reveals that except for convictions for rape and procuring, over 50 per cent of convicted sexual offenders were either fined or given suspended sentences. I find it very difficult to determine the reason for this, particularly having in mind the maximum sentences that these various charges carry. The maximum sentences that can be imposed at the discretion of the judge are extremely high, yet over 50 per cent of the cases, with the exception of rape and procuring, resulted in fines or suspended sentences. I cannot reconcile all these very compelling statistics. They indicate that at least one section of offences under the code is not operating in the way one would expect. What concerns me on this last point of 50 per cent being fined or given suspended sentences is the possibility—I go no further than that—that our courts do not attach that degree of seriousness to these offences which one would expect of the judiciary, especially in light of the maximum sentences judges are capable of imposing for convictions under these sections.

I might also refer the minister to the Statistics Canada report which is entitled "Statistics of criminal and other offences, 1969, 1970 and 1971". In particular, I would ask that he note the rather substantial number of charges for indictable offences that were reduced to lesser offences. All of us who have practised in the criminal courts are familiar with the situation of plea bargaining, for example, where one is able to convince a Crown attorney to proceed on a lesser offence. In this particular area, however, I am astounded at the number. I do not wish to quote the statistics; they are available to the minister and his departmental officials. I am referring to cases reduced from indictable offences to lesser offences. All of this makes me wonder whether the Criminal Code is really in touch with the realities of the seventies.

I have to wonder when, if ever, the minister and his department will come to grips with the over-all problem of dealing effectively with the whole range of sexual offences or the whole range of other offences in the code. There are several offences against property, offences against the person, and so on. Let me confine myself to this aspect today, namely, sexual offences.

I am very impressed with the material I received from the Law Reform Commission. However, I am afraid I have been impressed before. I have read reports that have come to grips with the very difficult, over-all problems. As a practising lawyer, I have never been the beneficiary of any approach by government at the federal level other than a patchwork one desperately trying to keep our code up to date. In other words, I ask the minister at some stage to resist the historical tradition of this approach to the code.

I suggest, in all seriousness, that certain law school classes—I think specifically of criminal law and evidence classes—occupy a very large percentage of their time with the professor pointing out to the students the anomalies, inconsistencies and contradictions that inevitably are available to such a professor because we have approached our criminal justice for such a long time in the manner I have described.

In looking through the Statistics Canada figures, I wonder why we still have a provision for the offence of seduction of female passengers on board vessels. I think it is still in there. It certainly was in 1971. I am sure at one time it may have been necessary. I can imagine the period of large immigration of young women coming to Canada to work as domestics, being away from home, without protection of any kind, on a very long and difficult sea voyage from Europe to Canada. Maybe at that time it was essential that something be done, although I rather doubt it; I think other sections could have covered it. Why, in the seventies, we should be preoccupied about the seduction of female passengers aboard vessels is something which escapes me.

● (1620)

There are other provisions we should be questioning. Rather than reacting to the difficulties of society in a somewhat reactionary manner, we should be working out more positive responses. Why should we be so concerned about sexual intercourse with a female employee or with the seduction of a female between 16 and 18? Surely there are other parts of the code capable of dealing with this type of behaviour. When I look at the section covering seduction of female passengers on vessels, I think it would be more pertinent to worry about the seduction of female passengers on motor bikes, or hitch-hikers. If we want to regulate, let us do so with regard to female passengers on motor bikes, and female hitch-hikers. I do not think we should be reacting; I think we should be acting.

I am afraid the code is a series of regulations which display little leadership. There are many things we can discuss in committee. There are questions to be answered, and possibly some amendments to be made to these amendments. I hope that at some stage we shall begin dealing with things that are a little more pertinent. I have to ask myself and my colleagues in this Chamber, what is "previous chaste character"? Is it credibility we are looking for? In four sections of the code, if I am correct, the words "of previous chaste character" are operative words for the court to consider. I have to ask myself why this is in the code. There are, obviously, certain circumstances in which credibility, pattern of behaviour, or any number of things may be interpreted in the light of previous chaste behaviour, but surely we need not make operative words such as "of previous chaste character" of such importance.

Again, I wonder why, except in rather remarkable circumstances, we should identify the sex of a victim. Indecent assault of a female is one thing; indecent assault of a male is in another section. I ask myself why we are so preoccupied with identifying the sex of a victim. There may be occasions upon which this is necessary, but if we agree with this type of wording, why should the sex of the animal not be specified in offences involving bestiality? It is as absurd as that. I would hope that when changes are forthcoming in response to the work of the Law Reform Commission or otherwise, the minister will come to grips with that sort of question.

With respect to Bill C-71 as it deals with rape and related offences, we are dealing of course with myths, as we always do. The myth is that a "bad woman" is incapable of being raped. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) dealt very effectively with this aspect yesterday. We have to deal with the myth that the credibility of a "bad woman" is immediately in question. I was never sure what that phrase meant. As a lawyer, all I knew was that it was of benefit to hurl as much dirt as possible in the direction of such a woman, hoping that some of it would stick and that the jury would disbelieve what she said. We avoid making a value judgment as to what is good or what is bad; we simply try to paint her bad or good without asking ourselves what is good or what is bad in today's society.

I am just trying to help the minister because I have a great deal of respect for him. I hope he will not be tempted to follow a course based on reaction but, rather, that he will act positively to lead the code in directions which are not only more practical and more realistic but more in keeping with the integrity of the House, of the department and of our fellow Canadians.

I shall not deal specifically with the various sections. On second reading I would prefer, rather, to generalize. I wonder whether the minister should not be thinking of completely eliminating the offence of rape. When I consider all the aspects the Crown must prove in a rape case, I can think of behaviour which lacks those certain elements but which might be far more offensive to the victim, or to society, than rape. One important part of a rape case is proof of penetration. I can think of behaviour toward a victim which is far more dangerous than that—although it is, of course, a serious matter.

My hon. friend from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) said yesterday that perhaps we should be thinking in different terms. I suggest this to the minister for whatever it is worth: I wonder whether in this whole area we should not be thinking in terms of assault rather than intercourse. After all, that is the nature of a rape case; it is intercourse by assault. If you can prove there has been no assault, you can prove consent, which is a good defence. If we really wanted to come to grips with this area of the code, we would be thinking in terms of assault. The nature and the degree of the assault would be reflected in the sentence. If it were a horrendous assault resulting in grievous bodily harm, that would be dealt with in terms of the sentence. The crime would be criminal assault on a male or a female. I do not know why we should not consider that aspect. It is not necessary that bodily harm result, though, again, if bodily harm did not result that would be pertinent to the sentence imposed on persons committing such offences. I very much question whether it matters whether the victim is a male or a female. I think we should be directing our minds to these points.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken more time than I had intended, but I feel strongly about these matters and I appreciate the opportunity to make a contribution. These amendments, regarded in a very narrow light, are good. They are another in a series of amendments that have been made over the years. If we continue our present course, I suggest our successors will likely see the same amendments 20 or 30 years from now. I hope that in his new portfolio, in which I sincerely wish him well, the minister will regard the Criminal Code, not as legislation that should be patched, plugged, enlarged or restricted but, rather, as a great challenge, one that the minister is capable of coming to grips with. Speaking for myself, I look forward to the time when legislation is introduced, not dealing with isolated amendments to the code but demonstrating a really genuine and new approach to criminal justice in Canada.

● (1630)

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, with my non-legal mind I have been listening to the arguments made in this debate particularly on the subject of assault. I know I will get myself into a great deal of trouble if I, in a non-legal way, try to discuss the subject in the way the previous speaker did. However, I have always wondered why cases of assault have not been divided into various categories, such as grievous assault and other kinds of assault, which establish a distinction in the minds of people between assault on a man, assault on a boy, assault on a woman, assault on a child. Each one of these assaults has a different name, and the newspaper reports of them usually are as detrimental as the changes themselves. Much has been said lately about the problems a person may face if he is the victim of assault, to the extent that in Ontario victims are compensated. Eric Silk has been on a commission adjudicating cases brought for compensation for victims of assault, and surprisingly not nearly enough people who have been assaulted want to apply for compensation for their traumatic experience.

The amendments to the Code are, in the main, legalistic but a number of changes reflect public opinion and some of them can be discussed by laymen as well as those trained in the law. I should like to refer to several of the clauses in the bill indirectly and discuss them.

One part of the bill of interest to me is the change to the Criminal Code prohibiting possession of devices designed to obtain telecommunications service without payment. When I read this part of the bill I asked myself whether it was an attempt by the federal government to correct what happened in the province of Quebec recently when Bell Canada took someone to court for using extensions not provided by the company. It appears to me that the government is now putting forward this sort of legislation to make it easier for telecommunications companies to protect themselves in a field in which they legitimately believe they have the right to make charges for equipment, when that same right is not given to other utilities.

When you buy water from your local town, or a sewage connection, you are entitled to put in a Crane bathtub or one from New Departure, or any other make of bathtub. You do not have to use one supplied by the town. You do not have to use taps approved by the same authority. All you have bought is water service and you put in the connection. It is true there may be some municipal by-law limiting the number of people living in the house, probably because they do not want the sewage system to be overloaded. The water service is often metered and you pay for the amount of water used, but, as I say, they do not insist on a specific type of facility being provided.

The same is true with hydro. One of the things that the founder of Ontario Hydro, Sir Adam Beck, took into consideration when hydro was bought by the Ontario government from a number of private companies was that they would supply electrical power and facilities at very low cost. The company then started to manufacture electric light bulbs and a number of other attachments of an electrical nature for which Ontario Hydro were trying to set a standard. Finally, this idea was abandoned and anyone could buy an appliance so long as it was of an approved type. For example, a Moffatt stove can be connected to an electrical circuit—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member is dealing with the amendments to the Criminal Code. Perhaps he would limit his remarks to the amendments to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Peters: Madam Speaker, on page 20 of the bill a clause has been added which affects use of services in the field of telecommunications. It is my impression that what the government is trying to do is to give back to Bell the right to own and supply, for a fee, all facilities used in telecommunications systems, including house telephones. The courts in Quebec told the telephone company they are only entitled to charge for that which belonged to them or for additional facilities that they put in.

There are a number of companies that sell telephones, recording devices, answering services and a whole range of facilities that meet standards of approval. These items are not provided by the telephone company on lease but are owned by the householder who has them installed. I used the example of hydro, water and a number of other facilities so as to indicate that in no other field has a utility demanded more than entrance into the premises and payment for rental of any equipment provided by the company at their expense.

I hope the minister is aware that a number of private companies sell telephones and provide answering services. If he is working only in the interests of Bell Canada to ensure that only Bell facilities are to be used, he is doing a disservice to the public. I hope this is not his intention. I hope he is not objecting to people using crystals that are used for channels already being used by other facilities. It is not illegal now for you to buy a crystal, if you know the type you want, for a scanning device. It is not impossible or illegal for you to buy such a crystal and use it.

● (1640)

I hope the minister is not, through this all-embracing clause, trying now to do something that was an oversight in the previous legislation regarding wiretapping. I will not pursue this matter, but I say that from the public point of view it may be very upsetting to find that we are now passing a piece of legislation that will give the right to a telephone company to come into your house and tell you what type of device you may use, being only those devices the company is willing to rent you, rather than allowing you to buy the facility or device for installation according to your own requirements.

The second point I should like to touch upon concerns another very difficult problem about which the minister may have had some thoughts. Perhaps he may always have been so well off he has never bought a used car. Therefore, he may well believe that the police have the right to arrest you with the presumption that you are guilty until you prove your innocence. When one buys a used car it may well be that that car has been stolen, or contains parts that have been removed from stolen cars.

Mr. Basford: Madam Speaker, may I correct the impression of the hon. member by informing him that I bought a used car this spring, and this summer spent $750 for a new transmission.

Mr. Peters: Madam Speaker, the minister should have checked, because there should be a serial number on the transmission. If it was a rebuilt transmission, it probably came from some other car and in that case he should be skeptical, because the car from which it came may well be a car that was stolen for the purpose of supplying used parts.

Mr. Paproski: He bought it in Vancouver.

Mr. Peters: I am not suggesting anything wrong on the part of the minister, but if he bought a transmission that was rebuilt, it may well have come from a car that was stolen just for that purpose. I am not suggesting that is what happened, but that is what he is suggesting should be the law in these amendments.

Automobile models in recent years have a small identification tag close to the windshield on the front dash, where it can be seen. In the past there were serial numbers on only the chassis and the engine of a car. I am sure most people in this House have never looked at the number on their engine to see whether it corresponds with the number on the dash. It is up to the Crown to prove, first, that a car was stolen and, second, that the person buying that car knew it was stolen. We had a very bona fide car dealer in my home town, supposedly, from whom a number of people bought cars. It was later found that he was buying from a stolen car ring in the Rouyn-Noranda area and all the cars he was handling were stolen. When this was discovered the people who had bought cars from him found they did not own those cars. It seems to me that is a big enough penalty without saying in the legislation they are guilty of an offence for buying those cars.

If a person knows his car is stolen at this date, or even that changes have been made in the serial numbers, then he is guilty of an offence. If we make this change, it appears to me that in a non-legalistic way we are saying that such an individual has the onus of proving that he did not know the vehicle was stolen when he purchased it. Therefore, such an individual is presumed guilty until he has proven his innocence. That is a mistake and will lead to abuse. But it fits in well with what this government is doing in many cases; it is taking away the rights of the individual.

Let me give an example. This government has put through legislation that allows the police to search you at airports. Perhaps it is extending that now to the highways, so that the police can sit outside hotels where they know people are drinking. They can wait for these people to come out and immediately arrest them. In such a case the police will know that those people did not spend two or three hours in the beer parlour playing horseshoes, or whatever they play in beer parlours.

An hon. Member: You wouldn't know that.

Mr. Peters: They play darts, or whatever it is they play on those small tables—not pinball games.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I don't know.

Mr. Peters: Stan has never been in too many beer parlours, either. But these games are somewhat like curling, which you play on a small table.

Mr. Basford: Shuffleboard.

Mr. Peters: Yes, shuffleboard. It is not likely these people have spent three or four hours in that beer parlour playing shuffleboard without having something to drink. The cop can just sit outside and when these people come out, get into their cars and drive out onto the road, the cop can arrest them. The individual does not have to give any indication that he is driving improperly by crossing the line, or something of that nature. The police will automatically pick him up. This will be a beautiful way for the lazy cop to get his quota: he will probably be able to pay his salary very easily in a small community.

Every time there is a dance in these communities, the police could sit on the roadside and pick up the people as they come out, and they would be presumed guilty. It seems to me it would be much fairer to say that all beer parlours in the country could serve only two drinks to each person at any one time, and if more than two drinks were served the bartender would be guilty of an offence. This might be better than allowing them to sell as much as they can, and then send them out on the road where the police can pick them up, knowing full well that if they stop every car they will get a conviction in 75 per cent of the cases.

An hon. Member: Think of the increased conservation of gas.

Mr. Peters: This may be a way of curtailing consumption of gasoline because the police would not have to do very much driving: they could just park at the one place and wait for the customers to come to them. I suppose they do this in regard to bawdy houses. That is why the police do not like freelancers on the street, because they have to go and look for them rather than standing outside the bawdy house waiting for the men to go in and then raiding the place.

It seems to me the minister is doing a lot of things, in response to public demand for law and order, that really will not create law and order. It seems to me that many of these things favour the police and do nothing for the individual. I am sure if you asked people in this country how they felt about prohibition, you would find they were not in favour of it; yet they might agree to allow the police to sit outside our hotels arresting everybody who came out onto the street. That is an exaggeration, but that is what appears to be said in these amendments.

We have had great difficulty in providing any kind of defence to the breathalyzer. I remember suggesting on a number of occasions when the breathalyzer legislation was brought in that there be a method provided allowing the defendant a breathalyzer sample for his own use. You will remember that the then minister of justice, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) promised that when a breathalyzer sample was taken, a sample would be provided for the use of the defence. To my knowledge, that has never been successful and has been discontinued.

What we are really saying in this legislation is that these people on the road are guilty, so the police might just as well take along a receipt book and collect the fines. With the changes proposed in this legislation, they might just as well confiscate the cars and take the drivers down to the hoosegow, because they are going to receive a sentence in any case. I think the public should know that, or should be aware of the fact that this is exactly what is going to happen under this legislation. That is why I am opposed to it.

There are many changes proposed that are necessary and worth while, and we should congratulate the minister for them. I am not particularly bothered by the clause in respect of cattle rustling. I think it is amusing that we should go back 100 years and insert a special provision to prohibit cattle rustling. However, I am completely in agreement with those who maintain it is a very serious problem, even if some people derive quite a good living from it. It is a serious offence. The offence is always related to the price of the animal. There is difficulty involved in meeting the normal requirements of proof when only the insides of the animal are left in someone's field.

● (1650)

There are some interesting offences. One which I believe deserves an explanation from the minister is the one concerning begging. I would think the minister would be ashamed to include such a clause in Canadian legislation. When we have to legislate in the way they do in India or in some of the near East countries to prohibit begging, then I think we should do something about unemployment and the payments paid to welfare recipients so that this would no longer necessary. When we find it necessary to write legislation, in 1975, to prohibit begging, this says something about our society which would be better left unsaid.

There is another clause in which I am interested, although I am not qualified to speak on it and I hope no other member of this House is. It involves the problem of detention of the mentally ill. It relates both sentencing and the question of whether or nor these individuals should be tried. In my area, I have found quite often that the psychiatrists to whom these people are sent are crazier than the people sent to them. Often these people could be certified under any definition we might use. I know some of them. They would not meet any of the criteria a normal person would use in determining sanity. I know a young lad in my riding who had a serious problem. He was sent to Penetanguishene. When he returned, his doctor informed me that the would probably never be normal again. We sent him there for examination, and that is what happened to him while he was there. It seems to me this situation is often repeated.

Places like Penetanguishene would be very good places in which to produce horror movies. There probably are not too many places where one would find the kind of people who are in charge of such institutions. The people in these institutions to which we refer people are not the types who can do anything for them. I respect the judge who is sympathetic with these people, who remands them for examination and then sends them to places where he hopes something can be done for them in the way of assistance, so that they will come back with a recommendation for further care which will eliminate the need for a trial in respect of the offence they may have committed. Then there are judges who sentence people for a period of more than two years simply so that they will be able to get them into a federal institution where they can obtain psychiatric help. I have visited many of these institutions and I believe that such a judge is misguided. I believe more serious consideration should be given to this matter.

There are good institutions. I think particularly of the Clark clinic in Toronto. It has a very good reputation. Unfortunately, it is not one of the institutions to which people can be sent by a court. This institution has done remarkable work with disturbed people. It is the kind of institution to which I believe judges think they are sending people.

In this bill we are making a number of amendments concerning the mentally ill. I believe this to be one of the worst problems we have in our whole criminal structure. In this regard, I do not believe we are able to obtain the type of advice that is needed for our courts, our prosecutors or the defence. When a person is sentenced, he is frequently sent to a place at which he will receive absolutely no assistance in correcting his mental difficulty. In many cases, the difficulty will merely be accentuated because of loneliness, frustration, segregation and the other things which quite often are the fate of those committed to penitentiaries because of unacceptable, anti-social crimes.

It is right that we should try, in respect of the Criminal Code, to correct some of these things in relation to the mentally ill; but if there are no suitable institutions to which people could be sent, then it seems to me we are merely satisfying our own conscience by passing this legislation. I am sure that any lawyer in this House who has had anything to do with criminal law, and has seen a person committed to our mental institutions, knows full well that such an individual is being sent into a situation which will cause the deterioration of his condition and certainly will not help him overcome the anti-social condition he had which took him out of society in the first place.

One matter which has not received attention in this bill is that of adjournments. Sometimes when a person is charged with a small offence and attends court, he finds that the defence lawyer is not feeling good on that day and adjourns the case. Such a person has the expense involved of bringing his witnesses again and hiring a lawyer. The next time he attends court, perhaps in another two weeks, the Crown prosecutor may stand up and ask for an adjournment because he has a golf game or some other important activity. On another occasion, the judge may decide that he does not want to hear the case at that time because his holidays are coming up. Believe me, this happens very regularly during the summer. In some instances a case is adjourned for two months.

It seems to me that when many of these cases are adjourned for periods of eight or ten weeks, justice is not being done, it is not seen to be done, and in my opinion it is being abused by those who are supposed to protect the judicial system. I am quite sure there are legitimate reasons for cases being adjourned, but I do not think the excuses I have heard on a number of occasions in court are legitimate excuses which warrant bringing the person charged back into the court week after week at considerable expense, and sometimes at the loss of his job.

● (1700)

I have mentioned that some of the provisions in this bill, I believe, are the result of overreaction on the part of lawyers to a legitimate call for law and order. I also think that a number of things were left out which should perhaps be in this bill. But I hope that members of parliament will not consider it necessary to tighten the laws to such an extent that the rights of the ordinary citizen are jeopardized and he is penalized for actions which he takes which are not detrimental to society.

A great deal has been said in the last few days about drinking drivers. I am impressed with the amount of my money that the insurance company is spending to carry out surveys to find out how many accidents have been alcohol-related. I have paid for these surveys. I have not had an accident for a long time, but my accident insurance goes up and up, partly because the insurance company is trying to protect itself rather than doing something about problems over which they may have some control, one of these being the issuance of large sums of insurance money in the payment of claims, which allows people to drive when they should not be driving.

The insurance companies know very well why they collect such large premiums, and they have control over that money. It is also a fact that drunken drivers have been the cause of far too many fatalities. But I suggest that our criteria are wrong. A police officer judges the situation when he sees a car going off the white line or wandering over the road, the driver driving erratically or behaving in an abnormal way. This warrants the stopping of that car and allows the policeman to ask the driver to step out, and if he has reasonable grounds to suspect the person may be under the influence of alcohol he will take him for a breathalyzer test, against which there is almost no defence.

We did not supply the police with the means with which to test drivers on the spot, but we accept the results of the breathalyzer machine and that becomes the overriding factor upon which to convict the driver. However, the police officer need not observe any unusual behaviour; all we require is that if a driver is stopped and refuses to take a breathalyzer test, regardless of whether he has been drinking he is arrested and may be convicted. Even if there has been no abnormal behaviour and a person is observed only to have left a party, a beer parlour or some function where alcoholic beverages were served, the police officer may wait until the man steps into his car and before he even drives it can require him to take a breathalyzer test and arrest him if he refuses. That may be a great way of raising revenue for the police force, but it seems to me the minister should be fair and should provide the public with some protection against such things as speed traps and the kind of trap I have just described, both of which are permitted under our judicial system and are designed to fleece the public.

Everyone in this country agrees that if a person is unduly under the influence of alcohol so that his judgment and driving ability are affected, he should not be driving. But we do not ask him what his IQ is, and we know there are people who have driving licences whose IQ is very low and whose reactions are very slow. Some very good drivers who have more than the permissible level of alcohol in their blood are able to function much better than some people who have taken no alcohol. I watched some tests this summer of people who had taken drugs or alcohol, highly qualified drivers who drove cars on the track under controlled circumstances. It was surprising to see that those people did a lot better, even after taking large doses of drugs or alcohol, than most of us in this chamber could do, because they were highly skilled drivers and for them to be half capable still meant they could drive much better than most people.

So I suggest that we should not get carried away and pass laws without providing any defence for the ordinary citizen. We should not take away the rights of an individual on the whim of a police officer. It seems to me that the breathalyzer test is a terrible law and lawyers should be opposed to it. I have spoken to many lawyers, including Arthur Martin, whom I consider to be perhaps the greatest criminal lawyer in Ontario. He agrees that the ordinary citizen has no defence in these cases and that this is deplorable. He said it is unfortunate that we have not been able to develop any kind of equality between prosecution and defence in breathalyzer-test cases and in the operation and supervision of tests, and that we have been unable to give the defence a decent break. The law now extends to drivers who have more than two beers and it would apply even, I am sure, to most members of parliament who visit Your Honour's quarters on occasion and are served refreshments, following which they drive home. Yet we are the people who will vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has never been impaired since I have known him, not even on tomato juice, and this might apply to others here. But there are other hon. members who would be hypocrites if they voted for this provision in the bill which would convict them after drinking 2½ beers. This is the kind of change for which lawyers are asking now. We have many prosecutors and defence lawyers in the House who are very learned in the law. They should also be learned in common sense, because they seem to lack it when they get bogged down in the details of the complicated amendments in the bill before us.

I call for some defence of the average person who today may believe that this is a good bill, but when he is arrested will consider he is being harassed and unduly prosecuted. In my opinion, he would have grounds for thinking so. It seems to me that justice should also be carried out with regard to these people.

● (1710)

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, having been a member of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs since I became an MP in 1968, I am pleased to take part in this debate, not to lengthen it, nor to make revolutionary suggestions, but merely to voice my frank and sincere views on the proposed amendments.

The bill amending the Criminal Code is one among several others which are part of the permanent review of the Criminal Code, a necessary operation—as regards substance, procedure and evidence—to take into consideration the development of outlooks and create more effective means to control crime.

It is also seen as an opportunity to assess the results of recent amendments and bring further alterations. Increasingly, criminality takes an international turn. The amendments concerning conspiracy and the laundering of illegal income deal with that problem. Some practices of our modern way of life involve the increasing use of credit cards, which incites and even compels the legislator to attack specifically such problems as theft or fraudulent use of credit cards and swindling in matters of telecommunication.

Mr. Speaker, the amendments introduced at the present time are the result of various cases of some specific problems that have risen and in others, the awareness that the existing provisions have become outdated. These amendments, whose purpose is to remedy some problems that have already risen or that are expected, follow to a large extent the recommendations made by the criminal law section of the conference on uniform legislation, by the Canadian Bar Association, the provincial attorneys general, police departments and the general public opinion. Therefore, it is a participation process involving all segments of the population. Besides, the works of the Law Reform Commission will very likely lead to new recommendations along this line.

The bill now before us, Mr. Speaker, is only one of a series of bills introduced in recent years to update the Criminal Code. To me this updating is necessary if we want the Crimianl Code to remain an effective instrument of control in an ever-changing society.

I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that the proposed amendments aim at making the code provisions clearer and more precise where there have been difficulties. One of the most obvious areas is that of bail. The main purpose of the Bail Reform Act enacted in 1972 was to prevent an accused from being detained under guard without real necessity before his trial. However, it was soon realized there was an obvious need to make some provisions harsher so as to close the door to abuses capable of jeopardizing the consistency of the pre-trial release system. The general rule remains the same. When someone is arrested and appears before the judge, he must be released on bail unless the Crown gives the judge convincing reasons in favour of his detention. The changes are important, however, for in some cases they hold the accused rather than the Crown responsible for proving that public interest does not warrant temporary detention. Such could be the case of an accused who is waiting for his trial for a previous criminal act, after having abused the liberal provisions of the parole system.

The provisions governing driving while under the influence should be further defined and strengthened. Under the current provisions of the Criminal Code, a police officer cannot demand a breath sample unless he has reasonable and probable cause to believe that the driving ability of an operator is impaired, which is practically without effect, and except for breathalizer tests which, under a number of provincial statutes, law enforcement officers may carry out on the spot and at random, they cannot take preventive measures to discover delinquents.

Alcoholic drivers are a serious and constant threat on our highways. That is why the amendments proposed today would authorize the police to make road controls, to track down possible law breakers, when an agent has reason to suspect that a person is driving in a state of drunkenness. Of course, we will need the co-operation of the police forces if those amendments are not to be used to the detriment of the population. But I feel we must show confidence in those who are entrusted with the heavy responsibility of keeping order, and who have to use their judgment every time circumstances warrant it.

Mr. Speaker, another objective of the bill is to introduce in the penal code provisions to deal with the crimes that make the headlines in our society. The increase in international gangsterism creates a serious problem for our own forces. That is why we must change our Criminal Code.

Whoever has in his possession what he knows to have been obtained fraudulently commits a crime. However, that provision applies strictly to the object that was stolen, not to whatever it has been transformed into later on.

The amendment introduced today and which I fully support provides that it is illegal in Canada to be in possession of goods or proceeds while knowing that they were obtained by criminal offences committed either in Canada or in foreign countries. This amendment is meant to prevent the entry in Canada of forged goods stolen or illegally procured, but touched up, and to strengthen law enforcement forces in their fight against international gangsterism.

What is the most important, in my opinion, in the proposed amendments, is to update certain parts of the Criminal Code to catch up with the change in the way of thinking of the public. Under the amendments discussed in the House, electric billiards machines, which dispense as prizes free games, are excluded from the group of prohibited slot machines.

This change in the way of thinking, Mr. Speaker, is reflected in the provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with electric billiards and lotteries.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to recall that in Quebec, games of chance play an important role and are a source of income for a great many people. Now, Mr. Speaker, if a man in Ontario operated a slot machine and was charged, he was fined but the machine was not seized. In Quebec, in similar cases, not only did the offender pay the fine, but the machine was seized, so much so that people in Quebec were being discriminated against and yet they were not operating the slot machines in a more illegal way than people in Ontario.

This provision, Mr. Speaker, will allow people in Quebec to operate the machines and it will create and protect a substantial number of jobs. I know what I am talking about for having been appoached by many people to make representations in order that the legislation be extended to allow Quebecers to take advantage legally and normally of the games of chance, legally controlled. Of course, abuse should be avoided and people should not be encouraged to spend their salaries in games, but there is still a mentality in Quebec which we should respect, and this is to spend large amounts of money on games. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a personal remark and oppose one of the provisions in this bill. One of the amendments is aimed at removing corroboration in the case of rape.

I would like to speak strongly against this amendment which I think is not realistic. As attorney for the defence, I had the opportunity, on several occasions, Mr. Speaker, to attend trials with people charged with rape. I had the occasion to face one of the most perfect scenarios prepared by Crown attorneys who urged their clients to wear the most sexy clothes of course, as they were women. A scenario whose purpose is unfairly to influence the jury which from the outset is sympathetic to the woman in the witness box who has been the victim of the abuse. There is, in my view, in that kind of trial, an implicit condemnation of the accused and by removing the corroboration requirement we would place the accused in an unfavourable position to the extent that the basic principle of our legal system, namely that the accused must be presumed innocent until proven guilty, would practically no longer exist.

● (1720)

I grant you, Mr. Speaker, that it may be difficult for a person who has his first experience in court to express himself easily, to present his problem in a thorough and fair manner, and that, in case of a rape, the victim must be given the chance to explain her case and be protected by the law. But that is a long way from placing the accused in jeopardy. I think the bill goes much too far and does not take certain situations into account, all the more so since rape victims have often placed themselves in a situation which invited the attack. Those women have sometimes placed themselves in a position where they are in—

Some hon. Members: Ah, ah, ah!

Mr. Marceau: I am not punning, they are positions, which both in theory and practice have induced the accused to succumb, almost unwillingly. We should try to achieve a balance, a form of justice between the accused and the suspect. But I think the legislation goes slightly too far in that respect. Anyway what I am asserting today might well be proved by facts. But I do intend to keep an eye personally in my own area on trials in that respect, and I do intend to return to the charge if it actually happens that the accused, who has a right to be defended, is the victim of an injustice, even if I agree forthwith that rape crimes are sordid crimes which should in no way be protected by the law.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments are the symbol of a constant concern for the keeping of law and order in our society on the part of the public, the police force and the government. We all too often have the feeling of a lack of balance in that respect. It is important that the interests of people be safeguarded and protected from particular individuals or groups. At the same time, we have to protect individual interests and rights. But that protection should by no means be achieved at the expense of society as a whole. I intend to vote for the proposed amendments in spite of the restrictions I voiced. However, this gives to understand that a global reform of law, which is presently being studied by a commission, will be carried out as soon as possible, for criminal and penal law is one of the most important and essential tools for the protection of society. That law should therefore be adapted to the present needs and take collective and individual rights into consideration. I thank the Chair for giving me the opportunity to voice my opinion in that matter, and I hope we can pass that bill soon and enforce it just as soon, and bring more amendments to it as often as the need arises.

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I hope I will not take too much of the time of the House, but I am interested in two aspects of the bill and I want to address myself to two particular clauses. I will keep within the Speaker's injunction of not particularizing at this general stage. I want to pay some attention to clause 75; I suppose one might term it the Morgentaler appeal provision. Obviously, the case of Dr. Morgentaler is the reason for this change in the Criminal Code. I congratulate not only the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) but the former minister under whose auspices this essential reform is placed before us.

It is a very fascinating study to look at the Criminal Code and try to discover why Canada got itself into this position relative to appeal procedure. I asked the library of parliament to look at this question when the issue had so much publicity some months ago; then I had some research done by Mr. Arthur Blakely of the Montreal Gazette, who wrote a most interesting column on the subject in the July 2 issue. It was found that this provision in the Criminal Code came about without any debate at all in parliament. I think one member, Mr. Tommy Church of Toronto, objected to the provision. It came about under the auspices of a liberal—both capital and small "l"—member, the late Mr. Ernest Lapointe, minister of justice. As far as we were able to discover in research, parliament passed it without any comment at all.

● (1730)

The origin was in the 1923 amendment to the Criminal Code when the provision for narcotics offences was inserted. The provision was that there would be no appeal. This is a very cursory and rather simplistic comment at this stage of the debate, but years before, in Britain, a criminal court of appeal was set up. As was usual in those days, Canada lagged behind substantially: in criminal cases there was no appeal procedure. Senator McMeans of Winnipeg should be honoured by the Law Society of Manitoba for getting the then government to amend the law and provide for an appeal procedure. In any event, the government bought the package. I am sorry I am falling into using contemporary cliché. I determined that I would never use the word "package," but I find it all around me. We have packages of housing and packages of law. Here I am, caught in the same cliché.

In any event, the amendments were approved by parliament. As I understand it, until the Morgentaler case no court ever reversed a jury's verdict. If I am not correct about this, I hope that at a later stage somebody will tell me so. I hope I am not inflexible. The government has now seen fit to deal with what, more than civil libertarians, anybody who has an interest in law reform must have seen as a serious aberration in the law.

I want publicly to pay tribute to Mr. Blakely for his column and historical research. I hope one day the Law Society of Manitoba will in some way remember a senator who did something that a government was not prepared to do except as a compromise back in 1930, namely, having an appeal procedure.

I want to refer, as many of my colleagues have already, to the sections dealing with sexual offences, rape in particular. With the greatest respect to a person for whom I have great admiration—the previous speaker—I feel, and I hope we can talk about this at the committee stage, that it is insulting to the victim of rape to say, as I believe he did, that in many instances she is asking for it. This is one of the oldest slanders on women. I am surprised that an otherwise progressive member would fall into the trap. It is an old one, it is an ugly one, and it is one that I personally deplore.

Lord Chief Justice Matthew Hale, the famous seventeenth century English jurist, assured himself of immortality when he wrote the words, "Rape is an accusation easily to be made and hard to be proved, and harder to be defended by the party accused, though never so innocent." The trouble with the jurisprudence in this part of the law is that most people would agree with the seventeenth century chief justice. I suggest he was wrong. Rape is, indeed, a most vicious crime. I do not for one minute say that my hon. friend thought otherwise; I just meant that his attitude about victims was wrong.

Four out of five rapes go unreported. It is fair to say categorically that women do not find rape an accusation easily to be made, despite the chief justice who in his time and place was reflecting attitudes of a government of a couple of hundred years ago. Those who do report their rape soon find, however, that it is indeed hard for it to be proved. We have extensive records to show that this is the case. By and large, a successful legal defence is rather easy.

This quotation is from a horrible book—horrible in its statistical data but a very powerful exposé on the history of rape. It is called "Against our Will", written by Susan Brownmiller. It is a very contemporary book that was just received by our library. She wrote that the law requires that you examine with caution the testimony of the female person named in the information. There is the injunction that is slanderous, or bordering upon slander. There is no other crime of which I am aware where the deponent is not believed or needs support. However, in the case of rape a man usually does not believe the person; therefore, all sorts of unpleasantness results in the trial. I quote from the book:

> That the testimony of the female person should be examined with caution is the bottom line in all rape cases from the moment they are reported to that rarer moment, if ever, when they are actually brought to trial...
>
> To a woman the definition of rape is fairly simple. A sexual invasion of the body by force, an incursion into the private, personal inner space without consent... constitutes a deliberate violation of emotional, physical and rational integrity and is a hostile, degrading act of violence that deserves the name of rape.

The fact that many people have been able to speak about this subject freely is a healthy sign. This has been after a good deal of persuasion, mostly by women and, in a very dramatic way, by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. A great deal of supporting documents have been prepared, for example by M. H. Rioux and others, and all have raised our consciousness about the subject.

I congratulate the government for making a move, but I am saddened by the fact that the move is not the reform called for by the Law Reform Commission. The Law Reform Commission said that the matter of the woman's character should not be relevant in a rape case. I, for one, would have supported the minister had he seen fit to go to that extent.

● (1740)

I have just a couple of other comments to make. One is the interesting discussion by a very modern, contemporary judge, Edson Haines of the high court of Ontario, in Chitty's Law Journal of February, 1975. Mr. Justice Haines, in summary, felt a good deal of improvement could be made, not only as the minister proposes but in the attitudes of the various attorneys general and their Crown prosecutors. I hope the fact that in many of our larger cities, rape crisis centres are being established is a positive thing. I also believe that in every case where a woman is laying a charge or laying information, a woman should be present. Most of our police forces now have women police officers and this is something the municipal police forces and the RCMP could very well do.

The code changes must be supported, when parliament adopts the minister's bill, by a change in procedures, a change in our attitude toward this crime. The attitude of many people is that this is just another event in a person's life; it is tragic; it will be a nuisance to try to catch the perpetrator of the crime, and it is all part of the indignity done to women. Witness the newsstands today. I am, heaven knows, no advocate of censorship, but I think there are instances when our respect for one half of the population, or over one half of the population, should lead us to want to exorcise this evil from our newsstands. It is really one of the most insulting things which can be done to a woman.

At any rate, I hope that with this mini-reform—I call it that; I think the minister could have gone a little further; he could have accepted the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission—the attitude of the police, Crown prosecutors and men in general will undergo a fundamental change. I hope many of my colleagues will see fit to try to get from the library Susan Brownmiller's book, because it tells a terrible story, I am sorry it has taken so many years, in parliamentary terms and in terms of civility, to recognize rape for what it is.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time, I believe, on which I have had occasion to address the new Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Basford) in his new capacity. I should like to express my congratulations to him on assuming this position. I think it is an honour for any member of the bar to be named to such an important portfolio. It is particularly important now, when, as the minister himself said as he opened the debate, concern for the whole question of the prevention and detection of crime and decent security in our country is a matter of great public importance in the minds of Canadians. He also said Canadians have a right to enjoy a sense of safety on the streets and in their homes and cities, a right which has long been a hallmark of our country's way of life. I use exactly the words the minister used in the opening of his speech. I think it is important that that be said, because whether we like it or not—and as a lawyer I do not like it—there is a feeling in Canada that perhaps in terms of the administration of justice we have got a bit out of balance.

Perhaps that feeling is caused by the fact that there is a feeling sentences are not long enough, that the administration of justice in terms of penalties is not harsh enough in terms of the realities of Canadian life. Perhaps it has been brought about by the fact that our criminal law is codified. A number of things could have caused this impression. I shall not be partisan, because there will be other occasions when we shall be dealing with other matters and we shall say things about the importance of the administration of justice. Perhaps it is caused, as well, by the fact that we tend nowadays to look, in terms of the administration of justice and the administration of the criminal law, to the causes of crime rather than to the penalties for crime.

For some reason it has gotten about in society that a penalty is not a deterrent. I cannot bring myself to accept that view. It seems, having taken that position, that we have tended to overemphasize the importance of the crowding of the cities, the depletion of good housing and all the other social factors which we say somehow or other make it not necessarily the fault of the perpetrator of the crime. That is the impression, and I think it is a very dangerous impression. I am happy that this bill will go some way toward changing it.

I have no doubt that those things cause a lowering of social conditions and perhaps breed attitudes which cannot be combated by our treatment of perpetrators of criminal conduct, but there is a danger that in some respects, in terms of the administration of the law, we are getting further and further away from the principle that a man or a woman is responsible for his or her conduct, and that if the norms of society are breached there is a penalty to be paid. Perhaps what I am trying to say is that, in terms of the administration of justice, we are perhaps confusing the problem of the rehabilitation of the prisoner with the protection of society.

● (1750)

I, for one, think it is not brutalizing to say that the emphasis ought to be upon the protection of society. That is why we are having demands for gun control; it is not just because of past events. It is why we are taking a more harsh look at capital punishment and a number of other matters. It is just as much part of law reform—and this bill is one with respect to law reform—that we recognize that the enforcement of the law and that the penalties provided for breach of the law fit the crime and the criminal, and it is to this that the court must address itself. An old Scottish judge once said, "Show me the man and I will interpret the law". I think we should consider the wisdom of this ancient Scottish judge who many years ago spoke in that way.

Another matter that is not within the federal jurisdiction but which nonetheless is important to us when we consider any reformation of the law is this. Not only should justice be swift, it should be sure. It should be also fair in terms of what the criminal as well as society can expect as a result of the commission of a certain crime. I think this is what the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) was getting at when he said, in speaking of the offence of rape and related offences, that really they are all assaults and that we ought to examine the sentences we prescribe for the different kinds of assaults that there are.

I remember speaking to a retired military officer who had presided at many courts martial and appeals from courts martial. He told me that there was no question in his mind, from his experience—which was as great as any judge educated in the law in any province in this country—that there is a deterrent effect if one knows that breach of what are rules of conduct is going to lead (a) to a charge, (b) to a conviction, (c) to punishment fitting the crime, and that this is swift and sure.

One of the problems that was pointed out to me by a provincial court judge in our city, a man young in years but wise in terms of experience, is that what happens in this country generally is that between the time a man is charged with a crime and the final disposition of the trial some six to nine months elapse. This becomes important in considering the effect of bail laws. Our bail laws have been interpreted as saying that, subject to certain conditions, an accused has the right to walk free. We cannot consider the operation of the bail laws without considering the operation of the courts. When a person accused of a crime is then allowed to walk free, police officers with whom I am acquainted have told me that many crimes are committed by people on bail. I should like to see some statistics in this regard and I hope we will have some to consider when we deal with the bill in committee.

I am not suggesting that the slowness of the courts system is the fault of the Attorney General of Canada, because it is not his jurisdiction. I am merely saying that, in considering the way in which we are to interpret the bail law or how the bail laws should read, we should recognize that in terms of the operation of the courts and administration of justice in all of the provinces of this country there is a slowness today which not only can lead to the walking of the streets by people likely to commit offences, but which offers no deterrent since the administration of justice is not swift and sure. I think these are matters we will have to consider as we go down the road and deal with this bill.

I understand the minister wants to speak and close this debate, but I should just like to turn to one other matter raised in the course of the speech of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). The hon. member spoke about the road testing provisions of this bill and said they were an invasion of people's civil rights, that they did something to the operation of the criminal law in Canada. With great respect to him, I think he is wrong. In considering this question, the most important aspect has to be public safety.

I look upon the provisions proposed in the legislation as an extension of the public's concern not so much for the person who uses an automobile while his ability to control it is impaired, but for the safety of the person with whom the driver may come into contact. The number of deaths, injuries and maimings resulting from the combination of alcohol and automobile driving is such that we cannot deny that, without some additional protection beyond that which we now have, the public safety will be neglected, and the Attorney General of Canada could be criticized for that. So I do not criticize him for the provisions that he has brought in.

The hon. member for Timiskaming also talked about the impossibility of raising a defence to mechanical breathalyzer evidence. I have practised in the courts both as a Crown attorney and as a defence attorney, and I will tell him that he is quite right. It is almost impossible to offer a defence against breathalyzer evidence. This is not because policemen are crooked; it is not because they have not been properly trained; it is not because the machines are defective. None of those things are so. It is because of the use of science in the prevention of crime.

To adopt the attitude taken with respect to this matter by the hon. member for Timiskaming is to say that an accused has no other defence available to him. I think he has another defence, and that is the defence of self-restraint, of good judgment. The public has to be protected from time to time from the effect of bad judgment as well. If he feels strongly about the matter, and if the Minister of Justice feels strongly about the use of such a device and about the lack of a defence, then perhaps we should go one step further and consider making it a criminal offence—so as to keep it within federal jurisdiction—for any outlet selling liquor in Canada not to instal a breathalyzer device that a man or woman can blow into during the course of consuming alcohol in that particular place. That would take out some element of unfairness, if this bothers the hon. member for Timiskaming. However we do it, I do not think it lies in the mouth of any hon. member of this House to say that the automobile and alcohol in combination has not become a deadly weapon. It is the movement by the Attorney General in this direction that is important, and I support it as strongly as I can.

● (1800)

We must take a look at what is the right of a citizen in respect of the use of an automobile. I do not think it is an inchoate right in modern day society for a citizen to use an automobile. Rather, I believe it is a privilege in modern-day society. The privilege of using an automobile places upon the user certain obligations, and the very use of the automobile places upon the authorities an obligation to provide protection for those who do not, and even for those who do but operate within the law.

We make rules about everything else, and no one complains. We make rules about how we must operate steamships in certain ways, and we say we must fly airplanes under certain conditions. We accept these things. We accept them because it is important that there be these rules in terms of public safety. I do not see how it is unreasonable to suggest, especially in face of the horrible statistics in terms of injuries and damages, that we ought to extend the same reasoning to automobiles. I do not want to be taken as denying those who might think otherwise, of their civil rights. I suppose our job as legislators in the concept of modern society is to balance the rights as among members of the public who may be affected by the operation of our laws.

In closing, let me say something about the philosophy of the bail reform laws in this measure. There is not a strong movement in this bill away from the change in onus that took place in the earlier revisions. There could be some question as to whether we ought to reconsider where the onus lies in terms of bail, but the original onus in the bail reform act remains the same, in that an arrested person must be released on bail unless the Crown satisfies the judge that grounds for detention exist.

It may be there is some statistical satisfaction for continuing that position but I hope we are not continuing it because, once having taken a position, the government should not back off from it. It is important that in the course of the examination by the committee we at least look at the onus in terms of classification of offence and not just in terms of exceptions. There may be some offenders who obviously have not abused the release provisions because of its being their first arrest or they are not awaiting trial for a previously indictable offence, who could perhaps find themselves out of custody on to the street.

I would hope, in terms of sexual offences involving children—that kind of heinous offence against a person—that we might consider applying the rule of the onus being placed on the accused. I do not think it is a bad thing, in respect of such a charge, that the onus should be on the accused. My experience has been that if I had a reasonable client, in terms of his past history, in terms of the law, his appearance before the court and the fact that he might have some place to go—especially if I could establish through other evidence the likelihood of his appearing for his trial and not committing an offence when he was out—I have never had much difficulty in obtaining bail. There may be instances otherwise; I know it is difficult to generalize. However, I think we should at least take a look at this question in terms of the nature of the offence.

There are other things I should like to say. Generally, for the reasons mentioned by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), I approve of the provision in respect of rape. A few days ago I had occasion to speak to a woman who is the complainant in a rape case. She came to see me about Bill C-71, the bill with which we are dealing. She told me of the terror with which she faces the preliminary hearing and ultimately the trial. This woman happens to be a strong person. I do not think it will affect here in terms of the evidence she might give or the way in which she will conduct herself, but she is concerned about her family and other things. I was quite touched by this.

In terms of the requirement for a balance, not between rehabilitation and deterrence but between the two parties in the court room, the accused and the complainant, I think neither of them should be in a different position. The situation should not be out of balance. I believe these amendments do something to restore what has been an historic imbalance in the criminal law. I commend the minister for bringing them forward. I do not know whether or not we should go further. There are some groups and some members, for whom I have great respect, who think we should.

I believe this legislation is a long step forward, not only in terms of the respect that society should hold for women but in terms of the operation of the criminal law, where for too long there has been an imbalance in respect of women because the possibility of public disclosure of evidence has in a very real way made the detention and charging of an accused much more difficult. For this reason, perhaps much crime has gone unnoticed. Generally speaking, I hope I am regarded as progressive in terms of the law. I have had the honour to practice in this city for a number of years. I think most members of the bar are inclined to look at the law as a living thing. I think they are also inclined to say from time to time that legislatures do not move fast enough to keep up with the dynamics of society. This is an attempt by the Attorney General and his predecessor to do that, and to the extent they have done so, which I think is reasonable, I look forward to the committee hearings on this bill.

● (1810)

In closing, I want again to commend the Attorney General on his appointment and to wish him well in a portfolio which is extremely important to every Canadian.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take only a few minutes to present one or two points in respect of Bill C-71. I understand there is a disposition to give the bill second reading before we adjourn today. First, I should like to commend the minister for bringing in Bill C-71 and specifically the provisions relating to sex-related crimes and to rape in particular. I recall a lady coming into my office a few weeks ago and describing her experience and the difficulties she faced at the preliminary hearing and those she would be facing immediately after that. I commend the minister for taking a look at this serious problem and bringing in provisions regarding these crimes.

I want to speak very briefly on the provisions in the bill relating to interprovincial lotteries. One might say that the whole matter of the acceptability by the public of lotteries is a foregone conclusion. If we want to measure the success of lotteries in terms of participation in the Olympic lottery or, for that matter, the western Canadian lottery, I suppose we might find that they are very well received. I should like to present to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) one or two points of view. I seriously question whether at this time—I am not trying to be negative with regard to the bill, but I would like to present the concern I have—we are well advised to permit the promotion and use of lotteries for the purpose of raising money for possibly very justifiable and good causes.

Let me draw attention to the promoters and advertisers of the western Canadian lottery who use the slogan "It's my turn". They have clever ads in the hope that you will participate in the lottery. I should like to point out that in this country there are a fair number of provisions in the law to protect the public from misleading advertising and I am wondering if the western Canadian lottery advertisements are not, in fact, bordering on misleading advertising in using that slogan; because if you look at their various ads you come away with the impression that one of the people in the ad is going to win the next lottery, which is not the case at all. They might, but you do not even know if they have a ticket.

The real point—and I would like to present this very seriously to the minister—is whether we are not encouraging, through the provisions in Bill C-71, participation in lotteries which may be for a good cause but the advertisements for which might create false hopes. I wonder whether the bill does not encourage betting on a large scale, and whether it is not just another move to promote more widespread betting facilities, off-track betting facilities, for example. We know that lottery tickets are being bought by people living at the poverty level who hope to improve their lot. So I would like to present my concern to the minister and say to him that I seriously question whether the legalization of interprovincial lotteries, although they enjoy wide participation by Canadians, is really in the best interests of the Canadian public at present.

The second point I should like to make relates to the provisions regarding breathalyzer tests and alcohol-related crimes. I believe that driving an automobile is a privilege in our society and that it carries certain responsibilities. Many of us have been concerned when another person has been involved in an accident and it is proved that the person involved in the accident was impaired. But often the attitude seems to be that the person was not entirely responsible. There is a feeling in society that a person who is impaired and involved in an accident often gets off easier than the person who is not impaired and gets involved in an accident.

I commend the minister for the provisions he brings in, especially in view of the fact that youth is turning more and more to alcoholic beverages. I shall refer to a study made by Dr. Morris Chafetz, director of the national institute of alcohol abuse and alcoholism in the United States. He points out that in the United States alone, by the tenth grade 50 per cent of the nation's youth report that they are drinking at night in cars. I am sure the minister has other statistics with regard to murders, assaults, rape and other sexual crimes wherein the use of alcohol is an important factor in their commission.

In our society we all feel that we want to be happy and good looking and to remain forever young and have hair on our head. For example, what do we see in the alcohol ads on television? The liquor ads we see show young people who are good looking and having fun together with friends. This is the type of promotion we use. We do not show what happens when there is alcohol abuse. I should like to encourage the minister to enforce our legislation, whereby those who are convicted of impaired driving are taken off the road and their licences lifted for a period of time. I do not believe fines are effective, at least not in our society today. It is one of the risks people have to take.

I said that I would be brief. I commend the minister for taking at least what I feel to be very positive steps. Through a public education system as well as enforcible laws we can show society that alcohol abuse is not to be tolerated and that the carnage on our highways, loss of property, loss of life and loss of family relationships are prices society simply does not want to pay. Rather, we should direct our attention to prevention, and where there is the commission of a crime under the provisions, the law should be very swift and very sure. I commend the minister for this bill.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to have spoken, but I understand there is a feeling that we should finish the bill by tonight, if the minister could assure us that his comments will be completed at least by 6.30 or if we could agree not to see the clock until they have been completed. I really hoped to deal with the question of laundering of funds because I know the government is expert at that. I have here a transcript of the proceedings where one of the people involved in the Hamilton harbour case pleaded guilty. It makes the most fascinating reading and it is really an exposé of how laundering of funds can be carried out. However, I am going to deprive myself of the opportunity to speak about that—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Use it tomorrow.

Mr. Baldwin: —so that the minister can wind up this debate tonight.

● (1820)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should advise the House that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I was rising to my feet to be kind; then we had the interjection of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). It is regrettable that he missed some of the debate because, I think we had a useful, thoughtful and thought-provoking debate yesterday and this afternoon. I regret that the hon. member for Peace River has interjected the first partisan note into the debate.

Mr. Baldwin: No, it was not partisan.

Mr. Basford: In order not to detain members, may I quickly acknowledge very sincerely the kind remarks that many have made on my appointment as Minister of Justice. It is a somewhat awe inspiring position when one considers the predecessors from both sides that have occupied the office in Canada. I say awe inspiring, and somewhat intimidating, knowing the very eminent counsel that occupy places in this House and also those in the House who, while not lawyers, have a very deep and informed interest in matters relating to our criminal law. I truly appreciate the comments and can assure hon. members that I have always tried to conduct myself with an open mind with regard to suggestions on policy coming from all corners of the House, and I shall continue to do so.

We have had a very thoughtful discussion on this bill and other matters relating to the criminal law and the administration of criminal justice in Canada. I am not able to deal with many of the points raised in the five minutes left to me. All I can do is deal with the very useful points that have been made on such questions as rape, bail, drinking offences, conditional discharges, comments about gun control, and other things, when the bill is in committee, which presumably will be next week.

Because the debate did range a little—and I think that was useful—I want to put the bill in perspective and make it clear that this is one of the series of Criminal Code amendments that this House has now become used to. We are putting through the House, almost yearly, amendments to the Criminal Code of a substantial, procedural and evidentiary nature in an attempt, in a very complex society, to keep the Criminal Code up to date in substance and direction. Bill 71 is one of the series of Criminal Code amendment bills offered in an attempt to keep the law up to date.

Many members touched upon a point with which I agree completely—that simply amending the law from time to time or annually adjusting the Criminal Code is not solely the way to deal with the criminal law and criminal justice system. This is an important bill which makes important changes to the law substantially and procedurally but, as hon. members have pointed out, there are many other things that have to be done and need to be done.

I want to assure hon. members that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and I will be introducing a further series of amendments to the Criminal Code which are more comprehensive than Bill C-71 and will contain very important measures relating to law enforcement, prevention and detection of crime, changes in the parole system, release of prisoners and many other matters of importance. Some members pointed out that we have to go further than simply amending the law; we have to be concerned about the administration of justice. I agree with that.

At the attorneys general meeting held in Halifax on October 23 and 24, I suggested to the attorneys general and got their consent and approval to the appointment of a committee to examine things such as the prosecutorial responsibility of government. This committee is now at work determining which level of government should be prosecuting which crimes, with the objective of determining which is the most effective rationale and effective distribution of prosecutorial responsibility in this country. I just want to read this into the record:

> That the committee be further instructed to report upon the feasibility of specific actions that might be taken, in the form of administrative and other arrangements, for the more efficient utilization of available court facilities and prosecutorial personnel by both provincial and federal authorities in areas of prosecutorial responsibility that are of concern to both authorities.

That is a beginning in the way of dealing with the question that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) raised about the delay in the administration of justice. The object of that committee's work and my work is to ensure that where there are criminals and criminal activity, the matter is investigated, put before a prosecutor, put before a magistrate or judge and dealt with as quickly as possible.

Across this country there are very long case loads. There are long delays between an investigation and a conviction. That is bad for the administration of the criminal law. It is demoralizing to the police officer who, often at considerable danger to himself, especially one working as an undercover agent on a narcotics offence, often at great expense to the taxpayer, and after a long and most thorough investigation, to have to wait six or nine months or maybe a year and a half before the case comes to trial and there is a conviction. That is bad for the morale of the police of this country. It is bad in terms of the criminal community. They think they can take advantage of this system of delays that are occurring in the administration of justice. They feel that because the law takes so long to work, they have a certain immunity. It is also bad from the point of view of the community which asks, I think legitimately, whether in fact the laws of this country are being enforced. Those are three things to which we should address ourselves.

Other members touched upon the Law Reform Commission and its work. I simply want to put it in the context of this bill. The Law Reform Commission has done, and is doing, an immense amount of work in the area of criminal law reform. Over the next three of four years we are going to see in this House and in this country a great number of measures to implement some of the proposals of the Law Reform Commission.

The Law Reform Commission has issued working papers on the meaning of guilt, principles of sentencing and disposition, discovery, restitution and compensation, fines, diversion, limits of the criminal law, obscenity, imprisonment and release, the criminal process and mental disorder. Some time in the near future we will have other working papers. At the beginning of the year we will have final reports from the commission on a code of criminal evidence, sentencing, pre-trial procedure, mental disorder and change in the substantive criminal law.

I am concerned, as are other members, that this work of the Law Reform Commission and the money, knowledge and opportunity that has gone into it do not just sit on a shelf somewhere. Already within the department I am gearing up people to take those reports, analyse them and make recommendations. I have persuaded the provincial attorneys general to appoint, with me, a co-ordinator so that there is co-ordination between the federal government and the ten provincial governments with regard to the work of the Law Reform Commission and the implementation of their reports. However, as has been emphasized by many members, law reform is not solely a question of changing the law in this House or some provincial House.

● (1830)

As the commission has pointed out, and as many members have pointed out, we must change our attitudes, our procedures, our whole technique involving the administration of justice in this country. The work of the Law Reform Commission is important and it is for that reason I recently appointed Mr. Justice Lemaire, who has been vice-chairman of the commission, as chairman upon retirement of the present chairman. Thus, not only will the commission continue to have the advantage of Mr. Lemaire's capabilities but there will be continuity in the work the commission has been doing. I want to tie Bill C-71 into the further amendments which will be brought in through the Criminal Code and with the work of the Law Reform Commission which is very much before me and before the officials in my department.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Pursuant to the order made on Wednesday, November 5, it being 6.30 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 6.35 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 20, 1975

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED METHOD OF DELIVERY OF LETTERS TO SANTA CLAUS IN VIEW OF STRIKE OF EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43 of urgent and pressing necessity. Because Christmas is but a month away and this is the time of year when the children of Canada traditionally write their letters to Santa Claus, and because this is the first Christmas season in the history of Canada that the Post Office is on strike, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan):

That this House advise the children of Canada to write their letters to Santa Claus anyway and give them to their parents for transmission to their local member of parliament, who will give these letters to the Postmaster General for personal delivery to Santa Claus.

Mr. Speaker: It is certainly very difficult to set this aside as being unimportant or failing to have urgency in view of the approaching deadline. The standing order requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[Translation]

OLYMPIC GAMES

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN FINANCING OF GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

In view of the enormous deficit the Montreal Olympic Games are expected to incur, the fact that the Federal State of Germany assumed 48.6 per cent of the cost of the Munich Games, while the Federal State of Austria assumed 50 per cent of the Innsbruck Games, the fact that the Montreal Games may be in jeopardy, and bearing in mind that to date the federal government participation has entailed no real financial participation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That a quadripartite meeting be held by the federal government, the Quebec government, the City of Montreal and COJO with a view to finding an adequate solution to the problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

* * *

● (1410)

[English]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR DISALLOWANCE OF PROPOSED RATE INCREASE BY NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of recent indications that the Northern Canada Power Commission intends in the near future to raise its rates for electricity to residents of Yellowknife, and in light of the already unbearably high cost of living in the Northwest Territories, which is the highest in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instruct the government to disallow, for the duration of the government's anti-inflation program, any increases in electricity rates by the NCPC to consumers north of the 60th parallel.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REASON FOR FAILURE TO DISCLOSE BUSINESS DEALINGS OF WILLIAM TERON WITH GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter arising from an Order Paper question No. 3,359 which asked for details of government business dealings and the expenditure of public funds since April 20, 1968 with William Teron Associates, William Teron Ltd., William Teron personally and any company with which he had a connection, and I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That the Prime Minister make a statement to the House giving all reasons why the business dealings with the government, along with the amount of public funds involved, on the part of William Teron and companies in which he had an interest have been withheld from parliament; specifically, whether or not there are justifiable reasons for the government to withhold such information from parliament and, finally, whether or not the government is failing to divulge such information if it exists for purposes of self-protection or self-preservation.

Mr. Speaker: It is apparent that there is no urgency involved in that motion, nor is there any attempt by the hon. member to put an element of urgency in it.

* * *

HUMAN RIGHTS

SUGGESTED AFFIRMATION OF BELIEF IN FREEDOM OF SPEECH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the preventing of anyone from expressing his views is a rather dangerous condition in any democracy, and in view of the flagrant disregard for free speech in Toronto last night when Mr. Al-Hout was prevented from giving his point of view, I propose the following motion under Standing Order 43:

This House affirms its belief in freedom of speech as an essential ingredient of a democracy or free country, and that such freedom extends even to those with whom some might disagree.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As praiseworthy as that motion may be, if the Chair is to maintain any consistency from the point of preventing a general consideration of subjects in that motions must have an element of urgency involved, I would unfortunately have to reject that as a proper matter for a motion under Standing Order 43.

* * *

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTION CONTROL OF CHEESE IMPORTS BE GIVEN TO AGRICULTURE RATHER THAN TRADE AND COMMERCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the serious overproduction of industrial milk in Canada now, which is liable to jeopardize producers who already face enormous problems, and considering that the quantity of imported cheese amounts to 50 million pounds a year in apparent contradiction with agreements made with producers in the general context of a general contingency plan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House study this problem to bring immediate corrections to it and notably to have the responsibility for cheese imports-exports transferred from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the Department of Agriculture, as should have been done long since to avoid the problems we experience.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—WILLINGNESS OF UNION TO RESUME NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General who said yesterday in the House.

—I thought it was time to suspend negotiations until they came to their senses and understood there is only so much money. I am prepared to go back to the negotiating table and re-arrange some of those monetary issues.

I ask the minister whether the union has indicated that it is prepared to resume negotiations within the framework of the guidelines contained in the government's wage control program, and whether the Postmaster General can indicate that serious negotiations are to resume today or within a defined period of time?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have not been directly contacted by the union representatives to indicate to me they are prepared to resume negotiations. What I said was I was prepared to sit down with the union. I simply made it very clear that I wanted to be sure if we resume negotiations they could lead to a collective agreement. I also made it clear that we would have to remain within the monetary package but that there was some flexibility within that package in altering rates here and there that we were prepared to consider, and I presume we have now moved into a period of reflection on the part of certain parties. I cannot say with any certainty or honesty that negotiations will resume today, tomorrow or Saturday.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, has the Postmaster General any reason to believe that the union is now prepared to resume negotiations either today, tomorrow or Saturday within the government's wage control guidelines?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I would presume that anybody in the union would now understand that if they expect to go beyond the monetary package that was offered there just is no way. On that presumption maybe they will be ready to start negotiations Sunday, Monday or Tuesday. There has been no direct communication from the union as to whether the negotiations will resume.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in other words the Postmaster General has not taken any initiative himself to ascertain whether or not the executive of the union would enter negotiations within the framework of the government's present wage control guidelines.

Mr. Mackasey: Well, Mr. Speaker, rarely do I and the hon. gentleman disagree. I think with his experience he would understand that every time I answer these questions it could unintentionally jeopardize the possibilities. I am not about to say exactly what is transpiring at the moment.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House the Prime Minister said:

> At some point in every strike which adversely affects the public interest, parliament as a whole may be called upon to endorse the government's position, if the government wants to put the question before parliament, and perhaps legislation to bring the workers back to work.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister is: Could he indicate to the House what conclusion the cabinet reached in its considerations this morning?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we did not arrive at a conclusion to place legislation before parliament ordering the men to go back to work.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government's first objective is to let this strike last as long as it takes to break the executive of the union and, if so, would the Acting Prime Minister tell the House why the government believes the "high noon" mentality of the Postmaster General and a long, bitter strike will produce moderate union leadership and intelligent industrial relations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think I speak for most Canadians when I say I believe the Postmaster General is doing an excellent job in dealing with this strike. It is not our objective to break any union leaders. This government has a high regard for the trade union movement. We want the negotiations to continue and be completed within the framework of the guidelines.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENTS BY MR. BIDDELL, MEMBER OF ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not want to jeopardize the fine work the minister thinks he is doing in the postal discussions, so I will ask my question of the Minister of Finance concerning Bill C-73. Mr. J. L. Biddell, newest member of the Anti-Inflation Board said two days ago in Toronto that business "can expect to live with them", that is the regulations, "for only a short time", and furthermore, he, Mr. Biddell, member of the Board, foresaw "an early need for adjustment". I should like to ask the minister, in light of the statement by Mr. Biddell whether he was speaking for the government when he said this? Does this mean that either the regulations, which we do not have yet and which we might get early in December, are going to be changed soon or that the termination date of the act as it will be announced shortly will be changed by the government?

● (1420)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is evident that we have succeeded in appointing to the commission a number of independent-minded Canadians who will do their very best to make certain that this program works.

Mr. Broadbent: Or doesn't.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would say that on the question of adjustments, as the hon. member knows, there have already been amendments proposed by the government as a result of representations received from members in the House and other interests in the community. We would anticipate that when the bill receives royal assent and the regulations are promulgated, they too will have to be amended from time to time. We recognize above all that the bill has to apply itself to a very complex economy and that it will have to be adjusted from time to time to make certain that justice is done under the guidelines.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—METHOD OF SECURING COMPLIANCE WITH REGULATIONS WHICH MAY BE CHANGED IN THE FUTURE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, if the government has not yet announced its regulations, and the minister is saying that those unannounced regulations are going to be changed in the future, how can the government expect, either from the corporate sector or from the trade union movement, to get compliance, get their agreement to co-operate and implement such regulations in advance of the very publication of the regulations with which they are asked to agree?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I am sure that if we proceeded otherwise, by setting them out and saying that that is it, there would be no changes, the hon. member would be the first one to say that we should have consulted the provinces, the unions and industry. You cannot have it both ways.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTION NEGOTIATED WAGE SETTLEMENTS BE ALLOWED TO EXCEED GUIDELINES PENDING DECISION BY BOARD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a final question, Mr. Speaker, and it is a little complicated. I would ask with respect that the minister hear it out because it is put to elicit information and not to make a point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that at present companies negotiating with unions on strike, in circumstances in which both agree that although their situation comes within the provisions of Bill C-73 they are not restricted by the 10 per cent increase provision, are offering to pay workers only the 10 per cent now and insist that before any additional amount is paid a ruling must be made by the Anti-Inflation Board; since this puts the whole burden of an early settlement on the workers who are now on strike, can the minister assure the House that when the regulations are brought down early in December, if not before, that situation will be changed so that companies will be permitted, and indeed instructed, to pay to the workers in advance of a strike settlement amounts to which both sides agree they would be entitled, and then if a board decision is made to the contrary, the money could be reclaimed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Why don't you repeat the question?

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect I should point out that the bill is before the committee and therefore that kind of question here is surely out of order.

Mr. Broadbent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down, Ed.

An hon. Member: There is a 40 minute time limit on your question, Ed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Richmond.

* * *

[Translation]

OLYMPIC GAMES

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN FINANCING OF GAMES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

We are now in a position where we can more accurately assess the enormous cost of the Olympic Games and their deficit. Furthermore, we know the tremendous odds against which we are fighting to complete the program on time, make it a success and avoid waste.

Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether or not the government is reconsidering its former position on this matter, in view of the fact that Canada's reputation is at stake and we do not want the Olympics to become for Montreal what New York City has turned out to be for the United States?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has been of substantial assistance with regard to the Olympic games, first by providing certain federal services which are essential for security and for other aspects of the games. Through legislation we have also made it possible for very large sums of money to be raised by the sale of coins and stamps. If the hon. gentleman thinks we should go beyond that, we have not made a decision along those lines. Indeed, we stand by the position stated by the Prime Minister on many occasions that we will not be responsible for any part of the deficit of the games.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Considering the Acting Prime Minister's answer, I wonder if he could tell the House whether or not the cabinet intends to deal with this most important question of a huge deficit and try to find positive solutions to help the province of Quebec concerning this situation which is most alarming for the people of that province, especially the city of Montréal?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: As I said, we have acted in many positive fashions. If the hon. gentleman is asking whether we have made any decision to change the policy, the answer is no, but within the policy we have been of very substantial assistance to Montreal and to the success of the games.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINES TO MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Notwithstanding assurances given in the House on October 17 by the Prime Minister, the House was informed through the Finance Committee yesterday and today that the legislation now before the committee will, in fact, not permit the enforcement of the guidelines on marketing boards, either federal or provincial.

Has the cabinet made a policy decision with respect to enforcing the guidelines on marketing boards, and if so, has or will a directive be issued to the Farm Products Marketing Council directing that council to enforce the guidelines on marketing boards, specifically the Turkey Marketing Board and the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, which are under its jurisdiction.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the vice-chairman of the board speaking on radio this morning. She said there were some difficulties about this. We have always understood that there would be some difficulties and uncertainties as to how far the jurisdiction of the Anti-Inflation Board might extend. It certainly does not extend beyond the farm gate, but there are some difficulties even if that principle is accepted. I suggest to the hon. member that if he has any particular proposals to make by way of amendment and so on, these can be made in the committee and subsequently dealt with in the House.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTION CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY JUSTIFY PRICE INCREASE IN VIEW OF REDUCED FEED COSTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I was hoping to receive some direction as to the policy of the government with respect to the marketing boards which are not covered by the legislation. Accordingly, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who now has an opportunity, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, to assert great leadership on behalf of Canadian consumers. Has the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs been in touch with the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency with respect to a directive from the Anti-Inflation Board to justify the recent increase in the price of eggs, in light of the fact that feed grain prices have gone down?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my relationship with the Minister of Agriculture is excellent and I would not like to intervene in an area that belongs to him. On the other hand, I am sure that he has already been clearly advised to protect the consumer's interest and to make sure that his marketing boards work in the interest of both producers and the general public.

* * *

● (1430)

[English]

INFORMATION

POSSIBILITY OF ACTION TO PROVIDE EASIER ACCESS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. I had hoped to put it to the Prime Minister whose approval of the British parliamentary practice is well known, especially since the trouble with the French connection! I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he has been made aware of the fact that the British government, in the Speech from the Throne yesterday, indicated that it intends to very substantially moderate the Official Secrets Act and provide an easier method of access to information? Also, is the Canadian government contemplating a similar approach so as not to be the only parliamentary democracy remaining in the medieval ages by not having access to information?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River and I both visited Westminster recently. One of the features of their procedures that did not appeal to us was the question period. During question period here hon. members have an opportunity for an hour to ask questions of the ministry without notice.

An hon. Member: With no answers.

Mr. Sharp: The members at Westminster envy us for that, so I say to my hon. friend that we share the same views in that respect. We have looked very carefully at the bill he has put down in this respect. In principle, I think we are on the same side. The government is anxious to provide all the information that can be provided without affecting the security of the state or international dealings or the reputations of individuals. The real difficulty is that no one is quite sure into whose hands the implementation should be placed.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS ON THE BASIS OF WHICH CONTROL PROGRAM INTRODUCED

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I resist the urge to respond to some of the things the minister has said. As a test of his good faith, and the government's good faith, will the Acting Prime Minister consider tabling in this House all the documents of a statistical and factual nature which persuaded the Prime Minister and the government in the early days of October to make an 180 degree turn in direction with regard to the imposition of controls?

* * *

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—POSSIBILITY ORDERING VOTE ON GOVERNMENT OFFER MIGHT BE DENYING WORKERS RIGHT TO STRIKE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Postmaster General is based on a reply given yesterday in the House by the right hon. Prime Minister. Is it the government's position that by ordering a government supervised vote of the striking postal workers to see if they wish to accept the government's terms and return to work, that the government would in effect be denying these workers the right to strike?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in a press release yesterday the Canadian Labour Congress expressed the opinion of organized labour that in the postal dispute we should not legislate the men back to work, since they are our employees and, second, that we do not interfere in the operation of the union by asking for a secret ballot. This is not my wish; it is the desire of the Canadian Labour Congress as announced in their press release yesterday. They further suggested that we keep on negotiating. I am fully in accord with the views of the Canadian Labour Congress.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—RULING OF BOARD SOUGHT BY TORONTO SCHOOL BOARD TO AID IN SETTLING TEACHERS' STRIKE

Hon. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Did a delegation of the Toronto Metropolitan School Board meet this morning with officials of the Anti-Inflation Board to seek a ruling to assist in resolving the strike which is depriving several hundreds of thousands of young people of educational services in Toronto? If so, can the minister report on this meeting?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I take good note of the question and I will answer the hon. member tomorrow.

* * *

[English]

HOUSING

POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF RENT CONTROL ON COMMERCIAL BUILDINGS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): May I put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs? In view of the fact that the minister requested the provinces to institute residential rent controls, and in view of the obvious attractiveness of industrial and commercial office space as an investment for developers as evidenced by the continued boom in that form of construction, has the minister or his officials discussed with the provinces the advisability of instituting rent controls on commercial and industrial uses so that investment funds will not flow out of residential construction into uncontrolled uses?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): First of all, Mr. Speaker, because of the direction the lenders will be taking there will also be a boom in housing construction. It has already started. This question was raised when I met with the provincial housing ministers at our last meeting. It was not one on which we gave direction, however. Our concern was in housing itself and rental accommodation for families. This is within provincial jurisdiction and the provinces will be handling that end of things. The question of commercial space was raised, but no agreement was reached. It really does not come within my jurisdiction.

SUGGESTION PENSION FUNDS BE GIVEN LENDER STATUS UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): A supplementary question. In view of the reluctance of the minister to bring forth legislation to compel lending institutions to set aside a portion of funds for residential housing, and in view of the fact that pension funds want to participate in lending, would the minister consider offering pension funds approved lender status under the National Housing Act?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If the pension funds are interested in the mortgage investment field, we would like to encourage them. They are much more encouraged now by the establishment of the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation which will be in operation on April 1. They also have the opportunity through the Mortgage Investment Corporation which I have been encouraging. If they would lend their money at 5 per cent we could have 7 per cent mortgages.

[Mr. Stanbury.]

ENERGY

SUGGESTION UNITED STATES WILL NOT RATIFY PIPELINE TREATY UNTIL NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE ASSURED

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if the United States government had indicated to the Canadian government that they will not ratify the pipeline treaty until they are sure that a joint Canada-United States natural gas pipeline through northern Canada is assured, and that only then will the federal government be able to negotiate with the provinces the basis of a transit tax on gas?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is, not to my knowledge.

* * *

FISHERIES

REASON FOR MAKING BILATERAL AGREEMENTS RATHER THAN DECLARING 200 MILE FISHING ZONE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of State for Fisheries. In view of the fact that the minister is showing an obvious trend to enter into bilateral agreements with an increased number of nations, rightfully to protect Canada's fish resources until multinational agreements are reached, would the minister rationalize the need for bilateral agreements which can extend for many months beyond the Law of the Sea Conference, with the more simple, clearcut unilateral declaration of the 200 mile limit fisheries zone until the next Law of the Sea Conference?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member looks at the case of Iceland, which declared unilaterally and it is now trying, in a climate of bitterness, to negotiate some bilateral agreements, I think he would find confirmation of the wisdom of the course we have taken. In the legislation now before the United States Congress, there is provision for bilateral negotiations with those countries which traditionally fished off the United States shores. What we are doing is negotiating in order to be ready to extend jurisdiction by whatever method it is adopted.

INQUIRY WHETHER AGREEMENT WITH NORWAY LIMITED TO FISHERIES

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, if you would permit me, I would say to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich in answer to his question of yesterday, that the agreement with Norway is for fisheries only.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT CLARIFYING CANADA'S POSITION BEFORE NEXT LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that since the Law of the Sea Conference the minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been expressing optimism over the result in direct conflict with the opinion of some impartial experts who attended the conference who said with regard to committee Nó. 2 that the results were disastrous and that as a result of the Law of the Sea Conference the situation is more complicated now, would the minister make a statement on motions as soon as possible to clarify Canada's position before the next conference?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, we might quibble on the assessment of the results of the conference; certainly, in the area of fisheries the unified text which has come forward is one which protects most of our interests. I would not have the pretention to make a statement on motions; I would leave that in the able hands of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Translation]

EXTENT OF JURISDICTION GRANTED BY AGREEMENT WITH NORWAY

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wish to put a question to the Minister of State (Fisheries).

First I would like to thank him for his answer to my question yesterday. My question today is the following: Is that agreement with Norway supposed to guarantee Canadian jurisdiction over our fisheries in continental waters up to 200 miles or up to the limits of the continental shelf?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I will disappoint the hon. member. I will have to check, I do not have the text of the agreement before me.

* * *

● (1440)

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIA—DENIAL OF FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT OF INDIVIDUALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the recently signed European security treaty whereby the Soviet Union agreed to honour principles of human liberty, as they apply to Soviet nationals, and in view of the Soviet Union's refusal to allow Andraei Sakharov permission to travel to Norway to receive the Nobel Peace Prize, will the minister register Canada's disapproval of the U.S.S.R.'s action in a statement to this House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the signatories to the Helsinki declaration, or whatever you may wish to call the final act, undertook to facilitate the freer movement of peoples and ideas. There is also, in the same declaration, a provision for the exercise of the sovereign rights of individual persons and states. In this case, obviously, it is our view that there ought to be wider and greater exchanges of people, and greater freedom of movement; and it will be possible, when the review conference is held in Belgrade, in 1977, to ask all participants to account for their adherence to the Helsinki act or declaration.

* * *

[Translation]

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC CONCERNING CABLEVISION

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Communications, I want to put my question to the Minister of Transport in charge of Communications.

In view of the appointment of a new minister responsible for communications at the time of the last cabinet reshuffle of the Bourassa government and in view of the religious silence kept by the federal government since the resignation of Mr. Juneau who was looking after cablevision, can the minister responsible say to the House whether he met with his Quebec counterpart? If not, does he intend to do so?

In any case, can he tell the House where the negotiations between the two governments stand on this subject?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, meetings have not been held at this point.

* * *

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF COST TO STRIKERS AND PUBLIC

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It is alleged that inside workers of the post office are losing about $800,000 a day, carriers, $700,000 a day, and, indeed, all Canadians are losing financially from the post office strike. Has the government taken this into consideration? Has it any idea how large this financial loss is? If not, will the minister undertake to speak on motions tomorrow, to give some idea what the strike is costing those directly affected and the rest of the people of Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we need to argue the figures. The costs are serious.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—CRITERIA USED IN DECIDING WHEN TO END STRIKE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to hear the Acting Prime Minister's answer, as the Prime Minister has indicated several times that, when and if legislation is to be introduced to end the strike is a matter for judgment. Considering the Acting Prime Minister's answer, will he tell the House the criteria the government is using, to determine whether and if it should act in order to halt this strike. I think the Canadian people should be aware of the answer to that question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister said, this is a question of judgment. The judgment must be guided by many considerations, by regard for the principle of collective bargaining and not wanting to interfere with it, the principle of support for the guidelines, which I think is in the interest of all Canadians, including the members of trade unions and the postmen themselves. Serious costs would be incurred if this government were to weaken in its defence of the guidelines. I think some costs would also need to be taken into account if we were to override the ordinary principles of collective bargaining and order the men back by parliamentary action.

Mr. Alexander: The minister missed the purport of my question.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF AID TO CUBA UNTIL THAT COUNTRY WITHDRAWS ITS TROOPS FROM ANGOLA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the minister's statement on Angola on November 13, to the effect that the political and security situations there are extremely confused—those are his words—and that we are not at present in a position to recognize or enter into relations with any group which may claim to govern the country, will the minister undertake to withdraw financial aid to Cuba, as provided through CIDA, until such time as the government in Cuba withdraws its 2,500 Communist troops from Angola.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the answer is no.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Why not?

* * *

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED RATE INCREASE BY NORTHERN CANADA POWER—REQUEST THAT INCREASE BE APPROVED BY ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is about inflation. The government has indicated that controlling inflation is of high priority. The Northern Canada Power Commission having given notice that it will soon raise the wholesale price of electricity 113 per cent, even though living costs in my constituency are higher than in any other part of the country, will the minister take action to ensure that this increase is investigated and approved by the Anti-Inflation Board, before it comes into effect?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure the hon. member's figures are correct. I saw the figure of 40 per cent and expressed horror. I asked that any change in price be cleared with me. I am still waiting for information on this.

* * *

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—SUGGESTION BUSINESSMEN BE COMPENSATED FOR LOSS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. Considering the answer the President of the Privy Council gave the hon. member for Hamilton West regarding the length of the postal strike, will the minister advise if he has consulted with his colleagues and is prepared to recommend the setting up of a special fund, in conjunction with the CLC, to compensate the thousands of small businessmen who have lost millions of dollars which they will never recover. How long must they wait?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Come on, answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROPOSED ELIMINATION OF RIGHT TO STRIKE IN ESSENTIAL SERVICES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour and relates to the post office strike. I am wondering if, in an effort to assist his friend the Postmaster General to end the post office shutdown, the minister will now give serious consideration to introducing legislation which would bar strikes in all essential services?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked about assistance for the Postmaster General. He ought to be advised that he has the entire backing of the government and the Liberal party in his effort to resolve this particular dispute.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But he is doing it on the backs of Canadians.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): We think he is doing the best possible job to that end.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, and somebody else has to pay.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It is certainly not clear to me, or the government, that premature action to end the strike—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Premature action!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): —will, in the long term, benefit Canadian businessmen in the way the hon. member alleges.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): My God! You are out of your skull!

* * *

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RELATIONSHIP OF PROPOSED COVERAGE FOR NORTHERN NEW BRUNSWICK TO DELAY CABLEVISION APPLICATION OF RESIDENTS OF DALHOUSIE

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State, and concerns the terrible television and radio coverage in northern New Brunswick. Can he tell the House the status of the proposal for 100 per cent CBC television and broadcasting coverage for northern New Brunswick? Specifically, how does the proposal relate to the holdback of the application of the residents of Dalhousie regarding cablevision?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to give the hon. member that information.

* * *

● (1450)

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISAPPLICATION OF INTEREST ON CHARGEX ACCOUNTS BY BANKS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the minister aware of an article in last Saturday's London Free Press which reported a professor from the faculty of law at the University of Western Ontario as saying that banks which issue Chargex cards are charging interest on the unpaid balance of accounts run up during the postal strike where no statement has been sent out, despite the fact that the cardholder agreement specifically states that interest becomes payable only 25 days after the statement has been sent to the cardholder? If so, has the minister looked into this matter and can he tell the House whether the interest is being charged and collected illegally?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, I am aware of this. Officials of my department are already looking into this and if it is necessary prosecutions will be undertaken.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED RESTRICTION ON OPERATIONS OF FIELD AUDIT OFFICERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Is he aware of regulations issued by his department to regional offices relating to budget restrictions, and, if so, would he explain how these regulations, which restrict field audit officers to a radius of ten miles of regional centres are likely to affect the functioning of the offices throughout the country?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): I am always pleased to hear that my officials are aware of the need to show restraint at this time. As to the special circumstances referred to by the hon. member, I will have to look into that aspect.

* * *

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DATE OF SIGNING AGREEMENT WITH OKANAGAN WATER BOARD

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan Kootenay): My question is to the Minister of the Environment. I ask it because I will be leaving shortly for the Okanagan Valley and I should like to be the bearer of good news. Is the hon. lady in a position to say whether an agreement has been signed with the provincial government to permit the implementation of an extremely urgent program to enable the Okanagan Water Board to launch an attack on long range problems concerning the lakes of that valley?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, that agreement has not yet been signed. We are now in the final phase of the preparations, and I am confident we can sign that agreement in the near future.

* * *

[English]

FISHERIES

SEALS—SUGGESTED ACTION TO END HUNT

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries? In 1972 the interim report of the committee on seals and sealing recommended the phase-out of the Canadian and Norwegian Atlantic seal hunt by 1974 to be followed by a minimum six-year moratorium on hunting. This recommendation was never implemented. Would the minister now take a good look at these recommendations and make every effort to bring this brutal and unnecessary slaughter to an end?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): I have before me now the report of the advisory committee on seals headed by Professor Keith Ronald, a man of great scientific reputation. An assessment of the stocks shows that the stocks are somewhat lower than desirable. We are checking and rechecking this information. A judgment will be made strictly in terms of conservation and for no other reason.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ACTION CONTESTING CONSTITUTIONALITY OF QUEBEC'S BILL 22—POSSIBLE FEDERAL INTERVENTION

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice arising from the court action taken by the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal contesting the constitutionality of Bill 22. Is it the intention of the government to intervene in this action and would any such intervention be in accord with past statements of the Prime Minister on this subject?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): The Attorney General of Canada has been named as mis-en-cause or third party in the proceedings undertaken in the Superior Court of Quebec. It is my intention to file an appearance in those actions, as is the standard procedure in such matters, but to take no further action at this time.

* * *

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DATE OF DECISION ON BILL TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMITTEE ON WAR PRISONERS AND WIDOWS' PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs? In view of the fact that the President of the Privy Council has assured me on four or five Thursdays in a row that a certain matter is under consideration, can the minister tell us whether a favourable decision has been reached with respect to it? I refer to the bill to implement the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs concerning Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war and concerning the provision of pensions to veterans' widows?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I can confirm the statement made by the House leader but that is as far as I can go today.

* * *

[Translation]

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—REQUEST FOR PROBING OF IMPORTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In December 1973, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce set up a sector strategy for the footwear and tanning industries experiencing some difficulties in Canada. Canadian production was then increasing, but it is now much lower and shoes from countries where production costs are very low continue to flood the Canadian market. Can the minister tell the House whether he has studied the paper prepared by the Canadian Committee on Trade and Customs Tariffs or can he report on those conditions which could take considerable and disastrous proportions?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have been made aware of these submissions and have had some opportunity to look at them. I would remind the hon. member that the strategy with regard to the shoe industry and related industries is still only a matter of 18 months old and it is our judgment that no special or additional action is needed at the present time—the measures should be given a chance to prove themselves. In the meantime, we shall continue to examine the health of the industry on a regular basis and determine whether any additional steps may be needed in the future.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTION REQUESTING CO-OPERATION WITH COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On November 12, the United States presented a resolution in the United Nations Assembly appealing to all governments to proclaim an unconditional amnesty by releasing all political prisoners who have sought equal expression of beliefs and opinions at variance with those held by their governments and requesting all governments to co-operate with the Commission on Human Rights. Is it the intention of the Canadian government to participate in the debate in the General Assembly and to support this resolution?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian delegation has been holding meetings with other like-minded delegations on this American-sponsored resolution and, as I recollect the situation, Canada will be supporting the resolution. I presume we are speaking about the same resolution.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROPOSAL TO LEGISLATE END TO STRIKE OF POSTAL WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have refrained from asking any questions concerning the postal strike but in common with Canadians as a whole my patience is exhausted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question is addressed to the Minister of Labour. The Postmaster General having stated that he can live with this strike if it continues until Easter, does this not mean there is little or no possibility of any settlement taking place, and, in these circumstances, is it not time for the government to get rid of its gutlessness and bring in legislation to provide for the end of the strike, a return to work, and the payment to workers of the amount the government is prepared to make available within the limits of the guidelines so that labour and the department can continue negotiations without Canada being held up to ransom the way it is at the present time?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I thought the right hon. member was one of those who would not use parliament to arbitrarily deny the rights of workers by legislation unless there was assurance there would not be any long term damaging effects in terms of the free collective bargaining system. If we are to come to parliament every time there is a dislocation resulting from a strike, this parliament would become nothing but a labour court. As far as Easter is concerned, the hon. gentleman may have noticed that the Postmaster General said within the last day or so that the parties may very well be coming back to the bargaining table. It seems to me that this is the best assurance of a final settlement of this dispute.

● (1500)

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That unctuous declaration does not answer the question. At what time is Canada, and the people as a whole, going to be able to end this hold-up which is doing so much harm to all parts of our country and playing havoc particularly with small business?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would resist the right to respond to that question which has a large hypothetical element in it.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader, in light of the fact that we know what the business will be for today and for tomorrow, what the business will be for next week?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the House is aware, today is an opposition day. Tomorrow we will call Bill C-61. When that is disposed of, whether on Friday or on Monday, we will proceed to the consideration of Bill C-20.

Mr. Baldwin: Monday is an opposition day.

Mr. Sharp: I am sorry. May I amend what I said, Mr. Speaker; I had forgotten that Monday is also an opposition day. On Tuesday, on the hypothesis, which I think is justified, that Bill C-73 has been reported out of committee, we will call the report stage and third reading of Bill C-73.

Business of the House

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader two questions with respect to House business? My first one relates to the bill regarding Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war. What can the House do to get the government to act on this matter?

My second question relates to Bill C-208, having to do with Heritage Day. Is the government prepared to let that bill be decided on before Christmas?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the bill dealing with veterans' pensions and related matters is still before cabinet. No final decision has been taken. On the other question, I have had some previous discussions with the House leader of the NDP. The government has not made a final decision whether to allow that particular bill to proceed or to bring in separate legislation. We are not quite sure about the timing, as well as the substance.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the comments made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) in the House yesterday, to be found at page 9239 of Hansard. He said:

> The only regret I have about the arrests in Regina is that one of the two who were arrested is a non-postal employee named O'Sullivan. There is one of that name missing from the House of Commons today.

I wish to raise two points. I would take this time to assure the minister and the House that that O'Sullivan was not this member or, to my knowledge, any member of the family. With regard to the minister's reference to my absence from the House, this was necessitated by my having to be in Hamilton, a city with which the minister is familiar because his gracious mother lives there. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, we both attend the same church and are to be found there regularly, no doubt cancelling out each other's prayers.

Mr. Mackasey: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not know anyone whose prayers I would respect more and would do me more good. I realized early in the day that it was not the same O'Sullivan, because I was told that the one arraigned was an intellectual and a lecturer at a university.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to refer to a motion under Standing Order 43 that I presented for the consideration of the House a few moments ago asking for a statement from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as to why the government would not make public details of business, including expenditures of public funds, given to William Teron or companies with which he has been associated. Your Honour ruled, quite rightly,that I had not indicated that it was a matter of urgent and pressing necessity as required under Standing Order 43. I readily agree that I did not use the specific words "urgent and pressing necessity".

However, I rise now not in any way to improperly question the ruling of the Chair but to respectfully seek clarification and guidance from the Chair as to how the hiding of the expenditure of public funds given by the government to Mr. Teron is not a matter of urgent and pressing necessity when I have, as a member of the House, exhausted every possibility through the order paper of having this information made public but have been directly refused by the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. With due respect to the hon. member, if he has any sentiments to express which clarify the urgent and pressing necessity of any motion pursuant to Standing Order 43, the time to do so is on the presentation of the motion, not after the Chair has ruled on it. The Chair can only be guided by the remarks put forward by an hon. member at the time.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Today I directed a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) in his capacity as minister in the House who answers for the anti-inflation board. I understand that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) answers for the legislation, but once the bill becomes operative and the board is in business the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs answers for the board. The minister ducked my question by suggesting it would be more properly directed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

May I make the point that as the board becomes operative and more and more a matter of public concern, and hence a matter of concern to this House, we are entitled to ask questions about its day to day operations: these questions shall be directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. My question today concerned the revelation made by the board yesterday that it had requested justification by CEMA of its most recent increase in the price of eggs. My question, with respect, was quite properly asking the minister what action he had taken in that regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the misunderstanding is not due to the question asked. On the contrary, I am always happy to receive questions from the hon. member, but I noticed he rose to ask a supplementary and was looking for the Acting Minister of Agriculture in the absence of the minister.

I simply stated that he could direct his question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), the hon. member for Cardigan, who is Acting Minister of Agriculture.

Therefore, my reply to the hon. member had nothing to do with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) but rather with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) who is Acting Minister of Agriculture.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order respecting an undertaking, as I understood it, made in the House by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). About one month ago the Minister of Labour indicated, in response to an inquiry of mine, that the report of the commission with respect to the west coast grain handling problems in the port of Vancouver, the Bayda commission, would be tabled in the House, he said at that time, within one week or ten days. Subsequent to that we have had what is apparently a leak of the report, or parts of it, to the press, specifically the Vancouver Sun.

[Mr. Cossitt.]

• (1510)

Subsequently I was assured by the parliamentary secretary that we would be having the Bayda report tabled. This is a matter of utmost importance and urgency as far as the people of western Canada are concerned and I would suggest, again, that if a minister makes an undertaking of the sort the Minister of Labour did, he should carry it out. We would now like to hear whether that report is going to be tabled now, or so far in the future that we can forget about any recommendations the report may contain?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that I did lead him to believe this report would be tabled sooner than has been the case. The only thing holding up the release of the report has been the deliberation of my cabinet colleagues in respect of certain provisions. It is our intention, as the government, to table the report together with our response to many of its recommendations in which I am sure the hon. member is interested. The consideration of certain elements of that response has been delayed due to the preoccupation of the government on other matters of higher priority: that is the reason for the delay. But I can assure the hon. member that as soon as the cabinet has had a chance to consider the material before it, we will make the report public. I do not anticipate that this will be too far into the future.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, earlier this afternoon I hoped to be recognized on a supplementary question. A similar question was asked by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk) and in his reply the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) was not clear as to which resolution the hon. member for Portage was referring. As I have a copy of the U.S.A. draft resolution on human rights and amnesty for political prisoners tabled at the United Nations General Assembly on November 12, 1975, may I table a copy of the resolution to be included in Hansard so that this matter can be clarified?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that there is simply "no" provision in the rules of the House for private members to table documents.

* * *

ENERGY

TABLING OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD REPORT "CANADIAN OIL SUPPLY AND REQUIREMENTS"

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table, in both official languages, copies of the National Energy Board report entitled "Canadian Oil Supply and Requirements".

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PETITION RESPECTING GUN CONTROL

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition to this House in respect of gun controls, signed by approximately 10,000 people. This petition urges the government to place restrictions on the sale of lethal firearms over the counter. It should be of interest to the House that the petition was collected and given to me by Mrs. Maggie Burtinshaw of Vancouver whose son was shot to death in a shooting incident in Vancouver some time ago which, in my submission, could have been prevented had there been tighter gun control laws in effect at the time.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Translation]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 3,162, 3,186, 3,194, 3,195, 3,196, 3,197, 3,198, 3,200, 3,201, 3,202, 3,213, 3,273 and 3,287.

[Text]

FEDERAL MORTGAGE EXCHANGE CORPORATION

Question No. 3,162—Mr. Reynolds:

On what date will the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation commence business?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): As announced by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs on November 3, 1975, the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation will be operational by April 1, 1976.

SITE FOR PROPOSED MEDIUM SECURITY PRISON IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 3,186—Mr. Landers:

1. Was Saint John chosen as the possible site for the proposed medium security prison in Martinon, New Brunswick and, if so, for what reason?

2. Was the Northumberland-Miramichi area considered as the locale for such an institution and, if not, for what reason?

3. Was the detrimental effect on a city like Saint John considered when the location for an institution of this type was being decided?

4. Was a civic poll or study carried out to determine the attitude of the citizens of the area and, if not, for what reason?

5. Have the plans been made public and, if not, for what reason?

6. Has the Department of the Solicitor General given any consideration to the effect of escapes, riots, etc. on the population of the Saint John area which is possible due to the proximity of such an institution to an area with a population over 100,000?

7. Was the unemployment rate in (a) Saint John (b) Northumberland-Miramichi taken into consideration in the decision to establish the prison at Martinon?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1. Yes. To provide medium security facilities for inmates originating from the general area of Saint John, N.B., or wishing to re-establish themselves in this area upon release.

2. No. Since this area did not meet the Penitentiary Service criteria for the location of medium security institutions, in so far as this area was too isolated from a major urban centre.

3. Yes. Based on experience with similar institutions in large urban centres, it was considered that it would have no serious detrimental effect on the City.

4. No. However, the Penitentiary Service has applied to the City Council of Saint John, N.B., for authority to purchase land for the construction of such a penal institution. It was left to the City Council to determine the need for a public hearing since they are responsible for the management of the utilization of property within the boundaries of the municipality.

5. No. The construction plans are not completed. However, the general concept plan was made available to the City Council.

6. Yes. Such consideration is being given in the construction plans of these institutions. The construction plan will provide for appropriate perimeter security installations as well as the provision in appropriate competence and numbers of security staff to be employed not only on the perimeter security line but also inside the institution for the prevention of escapes and possible disturbances. In addition, it was considered that the few escapes that may occur in this type of institution would have an extremely limited impact on the community since inmates incarcerated in such institutions are not considered to be dangerous.

7. Yes. The rate of unemployment in any area of this country is a constant matter of concern to all federal government departments. Accordingly, the government has taken measures to restrict unemployment to a minimum. However, in the location of penal institutions certain other factors of major importance must receive priority over unemployment if appropriate rehabilitation programs are to be conducted in an efficient and economic manner.

DREE—INCENTIVE GRANTS TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FIRMS

Question No. 3,194—Mr. Howie:

How much money was given to firms in Prince Edward Island as incentive grants by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 and how much was given to firms that are not currently operating?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: $1,863,275 was paid to firms in Prince Edward Island as incentive grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act from April 1, 1973, to September 30, 1975. Of this amount, $8,280 was paid to firms that are no longer operating.

DREE—INCENTIVE GRANTS TO NEW BRUNSWICK FIRMS

Question No. 3,195—Mr. Howie:

How much money was given to firms in New Brunswick as incentive grants by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 and how much was given to firms that are not currently operating?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: $16,311,803 was paid to firms in New Brunswick as incentive grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act from April 1, 1973, to September 30, 1975. Of that sum, $3,809,487 was paid to firms that are no longer operating. (This figure does not include $1,193,354 paid to a firm which has been on strike for an extended period.)

DREE—INCENTIVE GRANTS TO QUEBEC FIRMS

Question No. 3,196—Mr. Howie:

How much money was given to firms in Quebec as incentive grants by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 and how much was given to firms that are not currently operating?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: $89,940,449 was paid to firms in Quebec as incentive grants from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975. Of this amount, $1,249,207 was paid to firms that are not currently operating. Action has been instituted for the recovery of these grants from the inoperative firms.

DREE—INCENTIVE GRANTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND FIRMS

Question No. 3,197—Mr. Howie:

How much money was given to firms in Newfoundland as incentive grants by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 and how much was given to firms that are not currently operating?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: $5,265,400 was paid to firms in Newfoundland as incentive grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act between April 1, 1973 and September 30, 1975. Of that sum, $95,232 was paid to firms that are no longer operating.

DREE—INCENTIVE GRANTS TO NOVA SCOTIA FIRMS

Question No. 3,198—Mr. Howie:

How much money was given to firms in Nova Scotia as incentive grants by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 and how much was given to firms that are not currently operating?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: $20,015,264 was paid to firms in Nova Scotia as incentive grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act from April 1, 1973, to September 30, 1975. Of this amount, $51,636 was paid to firms that are no longer operating.

DREE—INCENTIVE GRANTS TO NEW BRUNSWICK FIRMS

Question No. 3,200—Mr. Howie:

How many firms in New Brunswick were given incentive grants by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 and how many are not currently operating?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 134 firms in New Brunswick were given incentive grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act from April 1, 1973, to September 30, 1975. Of the firms which have achieved commercial production, six firms are no longer operating.

DREE—INCENTIVE GRANTS TO NOVA SCOTIA FIRMS

Question No. 3,201—Mr. Howie:

How many firms in Nova Scotia were given incentive grants by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 and how many are not currently operating?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: ninety seven firms in Nova Scotia were paid incentive grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act between April 1, 1973 and September 30, 1975. Of the firms which have achieved commercial production, two are no longer operating.

DREE—INCENTIVE GRANTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND FIRMS

Question No. 3,202—Mr. Howie:

How many firms in Newfoundland were given incentive grants by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 and how many are not currently operating?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: forty-six firms in Newfoundland were paid incentive grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act between April 1, 1973 and September 30, 1975. Of the firms which have achieved commercial production, one firm is no longer operating.

BIENVENUE—ANDRAS AGREEMENT

Question No. 3,213—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the government recently sign an agreement with the Province of Quebec on immigration and, if so (a) on what date (b) for what purpose (c) what are its principal terms?

2. Does the agreement permit representatives of the Government of Quebec, in Canada or abroad, to pass opinions or review applications of immigrants wishing to live in Quebec and, if so, what other provinces have similar privileges and signed agreements?

3. Will representatives of the Government of Quebec be allowed to set up staff in Canadian diplomatic posts abroad for purposes of dealing with immigration and, if so, in what locations?

4. Has the same privilege been offered to other provinces?

5. Is the agreement intended to (a) promote French speaking immigrants to Quebec (b) discourage or prevent English speaking immigrants to Quebec?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Yes. The Government signed a new Agreement with the Province of Quebec to replace the Lang/Cloutier Agreement signed in May, 1971. (a) The Agreement was officially signed October 17, 1975. (b) The Agreement outlines improved co-operative measures which the Federal and Provincial Government will use to encourage the movement of immigrants to Quebec. (c) The principal terms of the Agreement include the free exchange of information between Federal and Provincial Immigration Officers that may assist in the recruitment of immigrants destined to Quebec, the opportunity for the Province to comment on potential immigrants destined to Quebec and the establishment of the staff of the Province abroad, their location and accommodation.

2. Yes. The Agreement allows the Province to review applications of potential immigrants destined to Quebec or who in the opinion of the Canada Immigration Officer may be destined to Quebec and to comment on these cases. However, the final decision with respect to the selection of immigrants remains with the Federal Government. No other Province has signed a similar Federal-Provincial Agreement.

3. The Province of Quebec may establish staff on a permanent or temporary basis in a Canadian diplomatic or consular mission where there is a Canadian Immigration capacity and where this is deemed possible or, if this is not possible, in a "Maison du Québec" or elsewhere in cities where a Canadian Immigration capacity exists. Under the terms of the previous Agreement (Lang/Cloutier) the Province could request to have officers present in any Canadian diplomatic mission where this was deemed possible and during the life of the Lang/Cloutier Agreement the Province established officers in Athens, Beirut, Brussels and Rome.

4. Yes.

5. (a) The Agreement is intended to encourage immigration to Quebec of French-speaking or potentially French-speaking immigrants who have the ability to integrate rapidly and successfully into Quebec and Canadian society. (b) No.

LIP—AMOUNT OF FUNDING TO VILLENEUVE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 3,273—Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve):

1. Since the inception of the Local Initiatives Programme, has money been allocated to the Constituency of Villeneuve and, if so, in what amount?

2. For each approved project in the Constituency, what (a) is the title (b) is the allocated sum (c) is the year of acceptance (d) is the name of the municipality concerned (e) are the number of jobs which have been created?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. As statistics for the 1971-72 Local Initiatives Program were not maintained on a constituency basis, the total amount of funding to the constituency since the Program's inception cannot be ascertained. However, a total of $1,937,834 was contracted to Local Initiatives Program projects with addresses in the constituency of Villeneuve under the 1972-73, 1973-74, and 1974-75 Programs.

2. (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e): See table below:

Project title	Amount of funding	Location	Number of Jobs Created
1972-73
Animation Communautaire	$125,246	Val d'Or	96
Comité de loisirs de Louvicourt	8,424	Louvicourt	4
Horizon Nouveau—La Vie recommence	32,261	Val d'Or	9
Video TV	23,868	Chibougamau	11
Corporation Municipale de Barville	45,630	Barraute	15
Projet d'initiatives locales—Municipalité de La Motte	160,942	La Motte	53
Centre d'entraide communautaire	70,356	Senneterre	19
Camp Lacorne	45,630	Val d'Or	23
Garderie Communautaire	65,731	Chibougamau	13
La Garderie "les 30 petits poucets"	56,558	Val d'Or	13
Municipalité de la ville de Cadillac	74,529	Cadillac	37
Ville de Seneterre	58,617	Senneterre	32
Community Action Program Mistassini Indian Band	77,337	Chibougamau	31
Chez le petit prince	46,455	Malartic	10
Projet Scouts	7,371	Level-sur-Quévillon	4
Club de ski—Mont Surprise	7,371	Level-sur-Quévillon	5
Centre de loisirs municipaux	11,700	Lebel-sur-Quévillon	4
Initiative locale comité des citoyens de Lacorne Inc.	21,294	Lacorne	13
Parc de maisons mobiles	87,867	Val d'Or	34
Village Minier (Bourlamaque)	13,940	Val d'Or	10
Aqueduc-Égout-Électricité	64,000	Chibougamau	32
1973-74
Plage Colombienne	24,960	Cadillac	8
La Garderie "les 30 petits poucets"	32,492	Val d'Or	13
Garderie "Chez le petit prince"	22,135	Malartic	8
Centre d'entraide communautaire	45,350	Senneterre	17
Le Bien-être des familles	27,664	Chapais	10
Atelier d'artisanat "Les Mains agiles"	35,970	Lacorne	13
Garderie communautaire "La Coccinelle"	22,625	Chibougamau	9
Centre d'artisanat	23,468	Val d'Or	9
V.A.L.S. Variété Action Loisirs Service	28,860	Val d'Or	10
Accueil pour alcooliques et toxicomanes	10,310	Malartic	4
1974-75
Atelier d'artisanat "Les Mains agiles"	13,400	Lacorne	3
Parc d'amusement en plein air	17,125	Senneterre	5
Initiatives Locales des organismes de Lacorne	33,380	Lacorne	12
Aménagement Entretien Base Plein Air Lac Mourrier	35,620	Malartic	10
Aménagement du centre Obalski	9,025	Chibougamau	8
S.O.S. Service-Orientation-Secours	13,942	Val d'Or	3
L'Atelier Botricot	19,872	Rivière-Héva	6
Suivi de l'étude socio-économique et relance de l'économie de

Order Paper Questions

Project title	Amount of funding	Location	Number of Jobs Created
Cadillac	10,960	Cadillac	3
Le Bien-être des familles	15,140	Chapais	6
Centre de loisirs de l'âge d'or	22,070	Barraute	7
Centre d'entraide communautaire	50,284	Seneterre	17
Atelier d'artisanat de Malartic	24,311	Malartic	7
Projet centre de loisirs (Construction)	25,000	Sullivan	16
Rénovation des endroits de loisirs du centre communautaire	28,106	Lebel-sur-Quévillon	8
Le Cri	18,460	Val d'Or	5
C.C.V.S. Centre Communautaire de Val-Senneville	32,940	Val d'Or	10
Développement de collectivités rurales	27,400	La Motte	8
Projet d'action communautaire	14,960	Obedjiwan	7
Centre d'artisanat	16,700	Val d'Or	5
Centre récréatif de Louvicourt	14,248	Louvicourt	4
Accueil pour alcooliques et toxicomanes	13,440	Malartic	5
Atelier Échelles	18,688	Malartic	6
Aménagement municipal	28,767	La Motte	8
Érablière colombienne	10,686	Cadillac	3
La Ruche Artisanale de Cadillac	19,965	Cadillac	6
Conservation des bassins laitiers	10,684	Rouyn	5
Aménagement de terrain de roulottes	13,700	Barraute	10

BUDGET COSTS

Question No. 3,287—Mr. Brisco:

What costs are involved in the production and presentation of a budget?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): It is not possible to provide a specific reply to this question. The costs involved in the production and presentation of a budget vary from year to year.

* * *

[English]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question no. 3,502 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

1972 AND 1974 ELECTION EXPENDITURES

Question No. 3,502—Mr. Fortin:

1. In regard to the general elections of 1972 and 1974, by constituency what were the total and detailed expenditures of the government for (a) printing (b) polls (c) enumeration (d) expenses and fees of reporting officers (e) miscellaneous items?

2. What were the expenditures for the vote of military personnel?

[Mr. Andras.]

3. What were the total and detailed expenditures of the Chief Electoral Officer for (a) election material (b) telegrams (c) messenger services (d) telephone (e) postage (f) miscellaneous items?

4. What was the total government expenditure for each election?

5. What was the number of (a) eligible voters (b) actual voters?

Return tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Are the remaining questions allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova) moved:

That this House, noting the public is concerned about recent disclosures of improprieties in the conduct of public affairs, as evidenced by events resulting in criminal prosecutions with respect to government dredging contracts, the Estey Air Canada inquiry, and disturbing reports about government leasing-concessions of airport duty-free shops, urges the government to take immediate action to restore public confidence in the government's efforts to control conflict of interest and other improprieties of public officials, most especially with regard to government contract and leasing procedures and practices.

He said: Mr. Speaker, during this opposition day motion I hope that apart from the normal amount of debate and controversy which this sort of exercise inevitably involves there will be an attempt to look objectively at certain procedures and habits involving leasing and consulting practices by the government that have developed over the years. I trust there are members of parliament from all parties who recognize that normal political patronage—which everyone who is a realist concedes is part of our political system—can, if allowed to remain unchecked and unsupervised, escalate into something that can become very ugly and to a great extent undermine the trust and credibility of any government under whose administration it is perceived to become rampant. Indeed, if allowed to become a way of life it can bring all those in public life into disrepute.

In discussing the matter of Sky Shops and Mirabel, which recently has been the subject of a good deal of editorial comment and news features in leading publications across the country and, indeed, mentioned extensively in parliament during the past few weeks, it is not my intention to overemphasize these particular situations but, rather, to use them as a focal point to discuss what I believe to be a wider and more important issue, namely, that some very sloppy practices and imprecise guidelines, together with a certain amount of favouritism, are prevalent today in the use of consultants and in the granting of leases and concessions by this government. I hope that speakers from the government side of the House will be able to tell us what progress is being made on the implementation of conflict of interest rules for senators and members of parliament, and that we will not have the government House leader say, as he has in the past, that cabinet ministers should be subject to no more stringent rules in this regard than ordinary members of parliament.

I do not believe, however, that ministers, MPs or senators ought to be forced to divest themselves of all they have worked for while in private life simply because they have become part of our country's parliament. But there is a need for more comprehensive guidelines.

There seems to be, in my humble opinion, a lack of appreciation or perception by the government that the funds it administers must be used judiciously and that public property must not become the private preserve of the government's political friends. I think it is significant that I have had colleagues from different parties, including the one which governs our country, tell me they are not antagonistic to the course of action I have followed in focusing attention on matters such as the one I am going to discuss today which I believe to be politically improper and which involve an apparent lack of good judgment and business ethics.

Members of parliament who take an interest in the way that public properties are utilized and the terms of contracts involving governments can save the taxpayer a good deal of money. For example, I feel that a current exchange between myself and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) might serve as a good example of this sort of thing. This minister and I have been discussing a possible variation in the garbage contract for the city of Ottawa which involves the federal government. By reviewing the terms of bids which quoted different figures for the federal portion of the contract and by severing one of these bids from the contract, the end result may well be a saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars to the taxpayers of Canada. Should the Minister of Public Works feel he can take this practical course of action with the resulting saving, all of us, I am sure, with non-partisan views will commend him for it.

As far as Sky Shops, that suddenly famous duty-free establishment in Montreal, is concerned, a perusal of its financial records indicates that this firm paid substantially less than it should have, for several years, for the use of government facilities at the Montreal international airport at Dorval. Had a more realistic rate been assessed, comparable, for example, to that at the Toronto international airport for a similar establishment, Sky Shops could still have showed a very good return on its investment and the federal treasury would have been in receipt of a great deal of extra money from the lease of this public property.

● (1520)

I am convinced that at Mirabel, as well, proper bidding procedures were not followed and that a number of firms did not receive fair treatment when they submitted tenders for the privilege of operating a duty-free merchandising establishment there. In passing, one should look at the monopoly situation—a double-barrelled monopoly, in fact—that Sky Shops enjoys: on the one hand, an exclusive right from the Liquor Control Board of the province of Quebec to sell, and on the other hand an exclusive lease from the Department of Transport, one monopoly dovetailing into the other and each justifying the renewal of the other. This is not a very healthy situation. Perhaps the government ought to consider using its sovereign power to bypass provincial liquor boards and deal directly in cases such as this concerning the sale and distribution of spirits. That is something I think the government should consider.

Sky Shops is, as this House knows, a very interesting company. It appears that concessions were given by this organization in many forms. A senator, a former Union Nationale member of the Quebec legislature, made windfall profits quickly and for no apparent logical reason, at least based on strictly business considerations. It is obvious, as well, that Sky Shops was not reluctant at all to give certain prominent people favourable opportunities to acquire their stock at bargain basement rates. Customs officials, Department of Transport personnel and others received gifts from Sky Shops. To their credit, some of the recipients of larger gifts returned them, but that does not remove the need to scrutinize the motives of the executives of Sky Shops who, it would appear, are clearly in contravention of section 110 of the Criminal Code of Canada in giving television sets to federal employees, regardless of whether the sets were returned.

One has to question the motives of people who would put government employees in this sort of position. The fact, also, that P. Lawson Travel, part of the very considerable business empire of Thomcorps, paid what would appear to be an extraordinarily high price for the shares of Sky Shops which at the time was doing business at an airport soon to be over-shadowed by Mirabel, to which it would ostensibly lose its international flights, does nothing to dispel my feeling that part of the consideration was the knowledge that Sky Shops had the inside track on other duty-free operations which would be established in the future, particularly at Mirabel, and nothing in the ensuing course of events has changed my impression in this regard. I hope the government can do this. One of my colleagues will be developing this theme later.

Let us consider what happened to some of the other bidders who were unsuccessful in their attempts at Mirabel. I have one example of a man who in good faith endeavoured to obtain the duty-free concession at Mirabel in competition with some of the other nine bidders, including Sky Shops. I had a notary obtain a deposition, and the deponent, Mr. K. S. Kohli, is prepared to elaborate on it and to give other information if provided with a proper forum such as a judicial inquiry. However, I will quote some relevant parts of his statutory declaration and will be pleased to table the entire declaration, the original, if it is the desire of the House that I do so. One of the interesting things about the guidelines put out by the department for duty-free concessions is the fact that the department violated its own guidelines, something that does not exactly engender confidence in the system. The second paragraph in a Ministry of Transport publication reads:

> The policy of the Department of Transport concerning the award of contracts for duty-free concession is as follows:
>
> Once the bids have been evaluated, the department will advise each bidder of the rank of each bid, in relation to the others.

This has not been done on several occasions. Perhaps some of the relevant parts of the deposition of Mr. Kirpal Singh Kohli, a Canadian citizen residing at 7910 Côte St. Luc, in the city of Montreal, province of Quebec, will amplify some of the feelings of injustice that several people have conveyed to me as a result of the procedure. Mr. Kohli deposes and declares:

That I was a tenderer in response to the call of the Department of Transport of Canada for tenders for the duty-free shop concession at Montreal international airport at Mirabel in the province of Quebec.

I will not read all of this, Mr. Speaker, because it is fairly lengthy. He continues:

That upon the bids being opened and announced by an official of the Department of Transport, it appeared and I verily believed and do believe that my bid was the highest and the most remunerative to the Government of Canada and, indeed, I was congratulated as the successful bidder by certain of the other tenders;

That subsequently my tender deposit, being $20,000 in negotiable securities of Canada, was returned to me by the Department of Transport without explanation;

That knowing that the tender deposit should be retained until the tender was awarded, I inquired of an official of the Department of Transport for the reason why the deposit had been returned to me and I was informed that a mistake had been made and that the deposit should be returned to the Department of Transport;

That I returned the tender deposit to the Department of Transport in other negotiable securities of Canada in the amount of $20,000.

So he submitted that amount the second time. He goes on to say:

That on or about August 26, 1974, my tender deposit was again returned to me with a letter, as by reference to the copy of such letter, marked Exhibit A—

This is appended to the deposition. The letter simply states that the $20,000 was returned apparently for the second time and then goes on to say that the results of tendering for the duty-free shop will be announced in due course. Mr. Kohli finishes his deposition by saying:

That the letter mentioned in the preceding paragraph was the last communication I received from any official of the Department of Transport, contrary to the policy of the Department of Transport as set out in the document, of which a copy, marked Exhibit B, is attached to this my declaration.

That was the document in respect of the letter to which I referred a few moments ago. This paragraph is interesting, also:

That I was first informed that the Department of Transport has awarded the concession for the duty free shop at Montreal international airport at Mirabel aforesaid when comment thereon was made in the public press and other media following upon the presentation of a petition to the House of Commons of Canada on or about November 3, 1975—

These are one man's feelings. It may be said that he is exhibiting certain negative feelings because he was unsuccessful, but there is at least another bidder who had some interesting things to say. One of my colleagues will be dealing with this in due course. Some of the documents setting out the Sky Shops dealings over the years with the federal government are most interesting. We trust the government will table soon some of the more relevant letters and documents other than those which the opposition has supplied them. As the House knows, the situation outlining some of the rather unusual aspects of Sky Shops relationship with DOT and Senator Giguère has been a matter of public record since November 3. But at no time since then has the government tabled any documents which would shed further light on this matter. The government has gone into its usual defensive crouch.

[Mr. MacKay.]

I am sure Mr. Anton, the founder of Sky Shops, would like to testify before a judicial inquiry. This man, who founded the company and did all the work necessary to make it into a successful business, seems to have been a victim of his apparent requirement to surround himself with people who were politically acceptable. It is by no means certain that he did this voluntarily, and his reward ultimately was to lose control of his company and receive considerably less for his stock than the other shareholders. Frankly, I feel sorry for Mr. Anton who has a distinguished war record and appears to be hardworking and essentially a good type of person. But that is for another forum. Another thing troubles me about this particular aspect. It is exemplified in a statement made by, it is true, another unsuccessful bidder, but it is a statement that the man who furnished the information to me would be pleased to amplify were he given the proper forum in which to do so.

● (1530)

Many people involved have indicated their interest in testifying in what they perceive to be the proper forum. Clarence Campbell has made this remark, and Senator Giguère himself said something to that effect. In any event, such a remark made by a business associate to another bidder, a man who already operates a duty-free operation in Newfoundland, is very startling if it is true. While he was working on the bid, an associate of his, an acquaintance, came to him and said words to this effect.

Mr. Lang: Who is saying these words?

Mr. MacKay: The name of the man who made this remark—I thank the minister for his interjection—will be divulged by Mr. Farkus, who was an unsuccessful bidder, to the proper official, preferably, as he suggested, in the context of a judicial inquiry. I realize that to some extent what I am saying is hearsay and I do not intend to dignify it as anything more than that, but it is significant because of the attitude it conveys. It is not that terrible. I will clean up the wording as I go along, so that it can be phrased in parliamentary language. He said:

Why are you fuddle-duddling around with a bid for a duty-free shop at Mirabel? Sky Shops have that sewed up. The Liberal bagman has a piece of the action.

This is worth investigating. We will never get to the bottom of this matter unless we have an investigation. Like Mr. Kohli, this bidder will, under proper circumstances, be pleased to provide more details. This type of remark, true or not, has serious implications.

An hon. Member: Did you say "true or not"? It has no implication if it is not true.

Mr. MacKay: That is why we want an inquiry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Let us find out whether it is true or not. This type of attitude undermines the entire system.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: A prima facie allegation.

Mr. Lang: Stick to facts.

Mr. MacKay: I am advised to try to stick to facts. I thank the minister for his advice, but at times we do not get much of an example from over there.

An hon. Member: Tell us something else that is true or not.

Mr. MacKay: I suggest that this type of attitude undermines faith in the system and that the attitude that the fix, or bribe, is the quickest road to success brought us the dredging scandal which, as all Canadians now know, is a multi-million dollar fraud.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Don't get excited.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, don't get excited, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) says. Just relax. The philosophy of the fix, or bribe, must be stopped from spreading further, I suggest to the minister. How would we, as members of parliament, feel if our elections were determined or were thought to be determined by any suggestion of bribery? Yet many people in the business community, rightly or wrongly, feel that their endeavours are governed by things like this; and the more this type of belief spreads, the more justification there will be to adopt this type of philosophy.

It is obvious that the government and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) do not know quite what to do, except to instruct the RCMP to investigate, and I commend them for this part of it. But there has been no tabling of documents, no statement by any minister on motions, not even a press release, and no indication that anybody intends to do anything but stonewall the entire matter and wait until the pressure subsides. There are suggestions that an RCMP investigation is sufficient. How ridiculous! No one can really believe that the types of questions that have been raised thus far in this affair, and will be raised by my colleagues and myself in the future, can be successfully considered, defined and discussed in the context of an RCMP investigation, however useful such an investigation may be to amass data and evidence. It is necessary to have a forum presided over by a distinguished jurist, assisted by able counsel for all interested parties, to consider a situation such as the Sky Shops affair.

We in the opposition consider it very strange that the government appears to take the attitude that we must apparently prove beyond a reasonable doubt that inquiries should be made. Where is the government's sense of responsibility? Have they no self-starting mechanism at all? It may be that after an inquiry and the ensuing report, the government can announce there was no wrongdoing at any time and that their methods of conducting business and dealing with matters such as those at issue today are so efficient and straightforward that they require no change in procedure. I, personally, hope that this will be the case. But I would like, for example, to see them explain certain contractual aspects of the Mirabel operation, even getting down to such fundamentals as to how people are put on planes. It is pretty basic, I would think, to the success of any airport. There are 13 or 14 passenger transport vehicles now at Mirabel each costing in excess of $400,000 and, as a matter of interest, manufactured by Booth Airside Systems Incorporated of Pennsylvania, U.S.A., a subsidy of Booth Computer Corporation of California.

General Aviation, the company which has the contractual rights to operate these vehicles—the same company, incidentally, that had difficulty at Heathrow airport in the United Kingdom, reportedly because of labour problems—is not supplying technically competent people pursuant to the agreement they have with DOT, in that the operators of the PTVs are supposed to be the equivalent of experienced, heavy-duty equipment operators. I suggest to the minister that they are not. Late in October, for example, a PTV at Mirabel came in contact with a telephone pole and smashed a couple of cars. A small incident, but indicative. The operators and maintenance personnel are paid considerably less than their DOT counterparts and General Aviation makes a nice profit because of the comparatively low wages their men are paid.

Because of possible labour difficulties or other complications, one has to assume that DOT has provided back-up personnel to maintain and operate this equipment, since it is the only way to get people on the aircraft. It would be disastrous if that operation were disrupted. We know that the equipment is so unrelaible that approximately 14 machines are kept at Mirabel so that 8 or 10 of them have a reasonable chance of working at any given time. One has to ask why the Minister of Transport would countenance such a wasteful and stupid arrangement. Why do we need to have General Aviation operate these machines at all? Cannot DOT do the job? Also, why have these PTVs never been given a proper post-assembly check?

If the minister wants to know why at the official opening of Mirabel the PTV for the VIPs malfunctioned at such an embarrassing time, I can tell him. I leave to his imagination what is going to happen when these machines have to operate in the type of climatic conditions they will face during the winter. Is this the kind of expertise, in the conception of how to load passengers on planes, that approximately $50 million worth of consulting fees has achieved for Mirabel—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacKay: —an airport which, I suggest, is more like a gigantic reproach to reason than an airport. In this country we spend nearly $1 billion for consultants and outside services. Admittedly, some of these services, such as the Corps of Commissionaires, some teachers and accountants, are worthy and necessary, but it is the consultants themselves that disturb me. We pay approximately $5 billion a year for our public service, plus the money on consultants. Consultants have become a drain on this country. We cannot afford to have an expensive public service and an army of hangers-on, only some of whom are legitimate consultants, to help our public service do jobs they are being paid to do themselves.

It is interesting to look at the budget of some of our smaller provinces in relation to this type of budgeting by the federal government. Some of my figures may be a year old, some are based on projections, but they give a reasonable indication. I am not swearing to their absolute accuracy. In Manitoba, the current total provincial budget is around $1 billion; in New Brunswick it is less than $1 billion; in Saskatchewan it is a little over $1 billion; in Nova Scotia it is about this amount; in P.E.I. it is $185 million; in Newfoundland it is almost exactly $1 billion. It horrifies me to see, in relation to what it costs to run an entire province, what this government is spending on consultants. It is interesting, also, to speculate whether, if the former minister of communications and chairman of the CRTC had been successful in Hochelaga, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would have hired a $40,000, $50,000 or $60,000 a year assistant to do the job that Mr. Juneau has been given. Would the job exist if Mr. Juneau had won in Hochelaga?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1540)

Mr. MacKay: If the Prime Minister had a business of his own and wanted to hire his friend and put him on the payroll, that would be a nice gesture indeed; but do the people of Canada need this political reject in the Prime Minister's office at this time of restraint? I think not.

I know the government is deeply embarrassed about Sky Shops, Senator Giguère, Mirabel and a number of other things, and I know that it has good cause for its embarrassment. My thinking has changed a bit during the past few days and I doubt whether there will be an inquiry. I say this for good reason. I think we may not have an inquiry because the government realizes that with all the facts which would come out, facts which the Senator probably knows, about patronage, the resulting scandal would be too much for even this government to bear. Under ordinary circumstances, and if the subject were not so delicate, there would be a good chance that an inquiry would be held, particularly in view of the number of newspapers and leading columnists who have stated unequivocally that this should be done.

Several months ago there was an inquiry into some aspects of Air Canada which I feel sure will ultimately prove valuable and constructive, and I once more compliment the former minister of transport for taking that course of action when he did. There were no RCMP raids, but there was an inquiry. Recently there was an inquiry announced into the Panarctic Aircraft crash, but the amount of agonizing that had to take place before it was done had to be seen to be believed.

In closing, I wish to say to the government that it should put its affairs in order, stop pending taxpayers' money on unnecessary luxuries as if our supply of money were unending and stop paying off friends with needless, nonproductive jobs. If the jobs are necessary and productive, no one will be disturbed if they are given to competent and honest Liberals—and there are many of them around; I am the first to admit that. No one ought to be upset in that case. But I say to the Prime Minister that, despite his recurring delusions of grandeur, I doubt if there is a serious economist in Canada who is not convinced that our present economic difficulties are caused to a large extent by the spending habits of the Prime Minister and his government.

If we are reasonably to expect Canadians to support the measures parliament is now considering to solve our economic problems, measures which require a considerable amount of self-denial by citizens of this country, this government must show the way by its example. A good way to begin would be to make a diligent effort to find present abuses through an inquiry, curb them, and in future demonstrate more respect for proper business ethics and procedures in dealing with public properties and privileges.

[Mr. MacKay.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have carefully read the motion put forward by the official opposition and I want to say at the outset that it is a good motion. I particularly like some of the words in it; for example, "improprieties", which I will discuss later. I also wish to congratulate the hon. member who spoke for the official opposition. He is a good member of parliament; he does his homework.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: We all know that he is an honest man and that he will keep up the good work. However, I suggest to my good friend that although what he has been doing over the last number of months is good work, he should begin to realize that the things he has discovered which have occurred inside and outside government operations, both in the public and private sectors, are nothing more than symptoms of the kind of disease which is prevalent in our whole society. It is really a plague. It is not just peculiar to the party that happens to be the government, whether it be NDP, Liberal or Conservative.

Mr. Nielsen: What was that first one?

Mr. Benjamin: It is not just peculiar to one group of individuals in a particular sector of our society. It is a disease and a plague in our entire system. The hon. member has found improprieties. The dictionary defines "impropriety" as indecency, and it is very prevalent in our society. I am not one who is partisan, but whether a system is free enterprise, socialist, communist or whatever, in that system there must be an element of puritanism, an element of doing as well as we can at whatever work we do in an honest and equitable way, believing that there are rewards other than money and influence, such as appreciation and recognition for what we are doing. If a man stands shaving in front of the mirror in the morning and is able to look himself in the eye and not feel embarrassed but proud of what he is trying to do, whether it turns out that he is right or wrong, it is because he is doing as well as he is able to.

It may seem strange to some of my colleagues that I am trying to be somewhat philosophical about this. I am not trying to pretend for one moment that any one person, idea or system is perfect, or that no one ever made a mistake. The question is not what mistakes were made, but how they were made and for what motives. I wish to say quite bluntly and frankly that most of the world is governed and victimized by totalitarian systems and free enterprise systems, and those systems contain within them elements of greed, corruption, improprieties, or whatever other nice language one has to use in a motion before the House of Commons.

I will deal with our system because that is the one we live under. I would deal with the other systems if I were living under them, even at the risk of going to a labour camp. The mythology of free enterprise requires that profits be maximized and that we make all the bucks we can, as quickly as we can. It is all right to cut corners, to make mutually profitable deals and not to worry about who may be hurt. That is part of the system. Ethical businesses, ethical businessmen and ethical free enterprisers would be the first to turn down a case of whisky at Christmas time from business associates or competitors. They would not send a case of whisky to a friendly politician whether he be at the municipal, provincial or federal level.

Mr. Mazankowski: What about the socialists?

Mr. Benjamin: If the system is so good—and I recognize the frailties and mistakes each and every one of us makes as individuals—it would seem to me the system would require that the mistakes are not made in that way. They would be genuine human mistakes of judgment, or even incompetence—which all of us are born with to some degree—but not mistakes of a case of whisky at Christmas, or sending a gift to a municipal councillor, an MLA or a member of parliament. I doubt very much if any member of this House has not had a gift offered to him at some time in his tenure as a member of parliament. Whether they have been accepted, I do not know and I would not presume to know. It is part of the system, part of the game.

● (1550)

I want to give full credit and honour to the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). He is an honest man, and is seen to be an honest man. Also, I am confident that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and others on the government side are just as unhappy and concerned about this matter as anybody else. I am confident—and I hope my confidence is not misplaced—that they will carry out the most hardnosed inquiries possible and lay charges where they are required.

I am not going to cast personal aspersions against the Liberals or Tories, because I am not too happy about some members of the NDP either. We are all people. I condemn the kind of system that the hon. member for Central Nova represents, that members on the government side represent—going to church every Sunday and beating your neighbour the rest of the week. If you are to get ahead, the system requires that you be good at your job. That is not good enough for the so-called free society. If you have some friends and send a few cases of whisky, that gives you the jump on your so-called competitors in the free enterprise system. It is normal practice. But Air Canada may have been caught. If there were the accountability required of Canadian Pacific or other transportation companies who operate in Canadian airports as is required for Air Canada, I am sure the hon. member for Central Nova would have an even more interesting time than he is having.

I am glad this question has come to the surface and that the smell is getting around. Don't let us lay it at the door of Air Canada, however, or whoever may be in government departments, or contractors or dredgers or anybody else. That has been the name of the game since the turn of the century. We just have to look around in our own communities, in our constituencies, amongst our own associates, relatives and friends, to see the state of mind and the attitude. If these free enterprisers think there is some value to the system that is worth saving, they had better hurry. The public is not going to stand for it. Each day more communists and totalitarians are created through the free enterpriser's conduct of his own affairs and the way he treats his fellow citizens. Think of the poor American bomber pilot who dropped another load on Viet Nam and commented, "I wonder how many more communists we created today?"

It is not what we say, but what we do, that counts; who we do it to, how we deal with people and with one another. Those right-wing reactionary dinosaurs who run loose in our society had better remember that if it is all right to hang the person who commits a premeditated murder or murders a police officer or jail guard who is on duty, it should be equally proper to hang the corporate president who defrauds people of $4,000 or $5,000 then gets a jail sentence of 18 months but only serves four months and goes home every weekend.

The poor slob who is unemployed and has a couple of kids, who knocks over a service station and steals a few bills, gets a three-year sentence and serves 18 months. Is it any wonder there is disrespect for the law, and cynicism? Is it any wonder people say, "To hell with you, Jack; I'm all right." That's what the system has taught them. Whether it is a civil servant in the middle or upper income levels, or a lawyer trying to get a contract for a company, or a corporation president, they are all caught at the same game. That is the fatal weakness of this so-called free enterprise system.

As a socialist, I will not take a back seat to the free enterpriser when it comes to the work ethic. The work has to be worth while, whether it be for Air Canada, or as a member of parliament or whatever—it has to be because you love the work you are doing. How much you get paid for it is secondary, as long as you get some recognition for it. About four or five years ago a businessman in Regina who was not a member of the NDP—he would not vote for me even if I were the only one running—sent me a letter, not a case of whisky or a pat on the back. He said, "I think you are doing your best at being a good member of parliament. You are working hard. I do not agree with much of what you say and do, but I thought I would write and let you know that I think you are doing a good job, even if I do not agree with the job you are doing." This man is a free enterpriser in the best sense of the word. It is difficult for me to concede good sense when it comes to free enterprisers, but this letter concerns the work ethic.

When I look at the word "improprieties" in the resolution presented by the official opposition, I think we all have glass roofs on our houses, as individuals, as parties and as a society. While it might be a great deal of fun to find some Liberals with their hands in the till, sooner or later some Conservatives and New Democrats and Créditistes will get caught. We are all part of the system. As an agnostic, let me say to all Christians: Let he who is without sin cast the first stone.

I hope the efforts of the hon. member for Central Nova will stir the government into taking expeditious action wherever there is impropriety. I hope those found guilty of impropriety will be treated under the law as the people expect.

Mr. Reynolds: Hang them.

Mr. Benjamin: I would agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). If a corporation president who has defrauded people out of $200,000 or $300,000 can get an 18-month sentence and then get out after three or four months and appear every Saturday night on "Hockey Night in Canada", it is no wonder people become cynical and say, "To hell with it". There is good reason. People whose politics are diametrically opposed to mine scream at me about law and order. They are the ones who are part of the system that allows such a corporation president to serve four months and then appear on "Hockey Night in Canada" every Saturday night, while the poor slob who has knocked over a service station gets three years. If the revelations of the hon. member for Central Nova result in people being found guilty of improprieties or breaking the law, I hope the fines and jail sentence will be in proportion to the enormity of the crime. The blue collar criminal is treated more severely than the white collar criminal.

● (1600)

An hon. Member: What is a blue collar crime?

Mr. Benjamin: I think the hon. member knows that as well as I do. There are blue collar criminals in his constituency. The fellow who knocks over a service station is treated more severely than the bank accountant who embezzles, the corporate president who defrauds and has lots of money to spend on his defence, and the senior civil servant who can disappear or travel to other parts of the world. The poor slob who knocks over a service station is given much harsher treatment than is meted out to our so-called leaders, to the white collar people, the mandarins, corporate presidents or members of parliament when they go wrong. As they ought to set an example, they should pay a greater penalty than the rank and file is called on to pay. That is all I suggest.

I don't suppose the men being investigated in connection with the hon. member's motion are any worse than others. Yet, for a change such crimes ought to be severely punished. I am not pleading for mitigation. I don't know why I should help free enterprisers who think our system is working so well. If they want to make their system as good as they say it is, they should forget about making all the fast bucks they can. They cannot forget Christian principles seven days a week, 24 hours a day. If they want to avoid totalitarianism in its worst form, of the left or the right, our free enterprisers had better change radically and deal with wrongdoers in their ranks as severely as they deal with other wrongdoers.

An hon. Member: Are there any NDP wrongdoers?

Mr. Benjamin: I say to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that NDP supporters are not perfect. We have made lots of mistakes, some of them dandies.

An hon. Member: The truth will out!

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. Benjamin: When we catch one of our own in wrongdoing, we deal with him severely. Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me 30 seconds to finish my speech. I hope the official opposition will speak on much more than is contained in this motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. Does the House give its consent to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members for letting me talk a couple of minutes longer. If they are lucky, I shall talk no longer, as I must hurry to the airport to deliver passports to desperate constituents.

My philosophy considers what we can all contribute to society. It is not enough to be a puritan, a law and order man, to think as the dukes, lords and earls thought a couple of centuries ago. Such attitudes no longer work. If you are the head of a dredging company, a director of Sky Shops, a trade union leader, member of parliament, garbage collector, or the janitor of this building, when there is work to do, do your best no matter what your work is. The work itself is important, not how fast you can make the bucks or how quickly you can get ahead of the other guy. Greed is the motive of our system, and it will destroy us. The alternative will be a totalitarian system which none of us wants. It matters not whether you are a garbage collector; without your work, the city of Ottawa grinds to a halt. Everybody, from the Prime Minister down, needs the work of the garbage collector. It is important and noble work. Surely he should not need to give his union head or employer a case of whisky in order to get a better deal; yet that is what we do now.

We should all do our best work, not because we are paid but because we want to. We are not members of parliament for the pay. If we are criticized, often we deserve criticism. We are not here for the money, although we need money to keep balogna in the fridge and a few bucks to put away for our retirement. But that is not why we are here. The important thing is work for work's sake. I hope that does not make me sound like a puritan, because I am not. The point is, we must work because there is work to do, no matter what it is.

If the free enterprise system works so well, why cannot a reputable dredging company, or a company operating duty-free shops, make an honest tender for an honest job? Why is it necessary to collude and bribe? Surely the reason is evident. I ask my friends on my right—I call them my friends because I like them as people—to think on this: for what do they stand? They support a system which will betray our nationhood and bring about the very difficulties which other countries have gone through. It will happen, if we are not careful, through conflict of interest, impropriety or whatever you call it. Consider what Karl Marx, Mao Tse-tung and Jesus Christ have said to use over these yea so many years. In the long run it matters not if we are Liberal, Conservative or NDP. What matters is our manner of living together, the society we create and how we treat one another.

The hon. member for Central Nova has worked diligently, as I said when I began my speech. But his findings illustrate nothing more than how our social system works. He has merely discovered how a carpenter, president of a construction company or anyone else would behave in similar circumstances. No doubt the people involved in the business he investigated are basically good—as good as anyone else. But our system requires them to operate in the way they do. The situation is, if you want to get ahead, you had better make sure your company gets the contract. Do what you must to get the contract; that's the name of the game.

In case my friends on my right are overly enthusiastic later this evening, let me tell them that there is far less wrongdoing of this sort in public life, in governments, than in private business. But what is happening once in a while in government business is prevalent in private business, and has been for decades. We all know this to be the case, and no one should try to kid Joe Citizen about that kind, upright free enterpriser who goes to church every Sunday and tries to kick his neighbour in the backside the rest of the week.

● (1610)

There are some lessons to be learned here. Of course, improprieties in government and in public institutions must be continually scrutinized, and public accountability has always to be there. Let us require the same, not only of each other and of ourselves but also of the private sector. Maybe what goes on income tax returns, which are inviolate and confidential, may need a look at as well. The mood that we all know is amongst our citizens, our constituents, is there for a very good reason. There is cynicism, disrespect for the law, disrespect of leaders of whatever political stripe, and it is there for a very good reason. They have good reason for being cynical and disrespectful and saying to hell with the work ethic and to hell with enjoying the kind of work they do. It is because they have been educated since they were so high to make all the bucks they can, to get ahead of their neighbours. They have been brainwashed by deceptive and false advertising. Their priorities have been misplaced, like the government's. It is more important to worry about deodorants and snowmobiles than houses or pensions. They can increase the amount of money for the Secretariat of Intergovernment Conferences by $700,000 according to the supplementary estimates, but CMHC's land acquisition program received only $200,000.

Do you wonder why the citizen in Gopher Gulch, or Toronto, or anywhere else, is cynical and disrespectful when he sees $200 a day people sitting in Ottawa or Toronto, or reads about them in the newspaper and he cannot make a down payment on a house which he will never live long enough to pay for? Do you wonder why? What about our priorities, as well as our ethics? There is a reason people are disrespectful, resentful and cynical. All of us know this. When we go home to our ridings, we run into it all the time. It is frightening. Benito Mussolinis, Joe Stalins and Adolph Hitlers do not happen by accident.

So in the course of what we say in this debate, in the course of what the government will be doing—and I am confident they will be doing it expeditiously, honestly and fairly in terms of looking into improprieties—I hope we will all give consideration to our own priorities, our own work ethic and restoring some confidence and support amongst people generally, no matter what political or religious beliefs they may hold. If we do not do that, Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member for Central Nova has been working very diligently and well at will have gone for nought; it will have been pointless—because if you go back to 1870, whether it was Beauharnois, Sir John A. Macdonald, Wilfrid Laurier, or whoever we honour in our history, there is nothing new about this.

I would ask hon. members, again, whenever this happens in the course of wanting the free enterprise system to prevail, how many more totalitarians did you create in the course of carrying out the work of your system? If my hon. friends will do that, and if they succeed then, there will never be any need to elect an NDP government.

An hon. Member: Good!

Mr. Benjamin: I hope they will think about that. I thank my colleagues for their indulgence. What I have had to say may have been disjointed, but it is something about which I feel very strongly, and I know my colleagues do. I think all hon. members of the House feel that way.

All I am doing is asking, on behalf of my colleagues, that in the months ahead we take a look at what we are doing, at our priorities, at how we deal with one another, at how we deal with citizens, and at how citizens deal with one another under what is supposed to be a profit-motive system. If we took a good look at that situation, I suspect we could do much better.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member who moved the motion before us today for giving us the opportunity to discuss a subject which is extremely important to the good reputation of government and Parliament itself.

Indeed we were asked lately to discuss the restriction program advocated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to fight inflation. When I took part in this debate, I pointed out the distinction we should make between expenditures and waste. I would like today to emphasize for a few minutes the absolute necessity to prevent at all cost the waste caused by mismanagement, shameful patronage and the unnecessary spending arising from conflicts of interest.

Every year, the Auditor General exposes to the House the many inconsiderate and unwarranted expenditures which result in budgetary inflation. The recommendations of the Auditor General are practically never taken in consideration. Instead, the integrity and objectivity of this watchdog of government spending are sometimes questioned, even by the Prime Minister. It would seem that there is a certain premeditation as regards honest management of public funds. Of course, recent disclosures concerning contracts given to duty-free shops in airports are a typical example of what favours can be granted to political friends. Why do those things happen? Why does anybody not denounce them? Why are we deaf and blind when we know very well that this is happening? Why are there not duly mandated people working to prevent such situations? In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this suggests a certain tacit agreement among the authorities of the various departments, the civil servants and the shark friends of the party in power, that are always ready to bite into public funds. I cannot see why it should be impossible to prevent such incidents.

It is therefore very obvious that this motion is timely. Action should certainly be taken immediately so that the public may have confidence in the efforts of the government to control conflicts of interest, wastage and unworthy patronage. This is particularly important and urgent since we only have to listen to opinions expressed by taxpayers to see how the honesty and integrity of the government, and so, of all members of parliament, are abused. Unfortunately, the bad opinion that citizens have about their representatives is caused mostly by this type of careless and partisan action on the part of the government administration. In these years where authority has been undermined, where respect and politeness are considered outdated, where disorder, if not anarchy, is increasingly present, it is important to see that it is necessary and even essential that the reputation of our leaders remain intact.

Only those who are respected can be obeyed. Only the authority of those whose integrity and honesty is above suspicion can be accepted. It is therefore our duty and obligation to restore the public confidence which the government sometimes help undermine dangerously.

Mr. Speaker, some might say that nothing in this is new and that unworthy patronage and conflicts of interest have always existed. I would reply that we must not wallow in the mud just because some of our predecessors have done so.

I am therefore in complete agreement with this motion, and I hope that the government will soon show its good will and good faith in trying to correct this sad situation. It is all very well to ask the citizens to tighten their belts, to make a personal, a voluntary effort to fight inflation, but they should not at the same time witness such wastefulness of public funds, all the more so that only a small fraction of the fraudulent transactions are made public. Therefore, to prove the determination of the government to put an end to those deplorable abuses, a widespread inquiry should be launched immediately, that the real culprits of those unacceptable manoeuvres be denounced.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring my remarks to a close by pointing out that the people would be driven to despair if the government were to continue to evade the issue. I sincerely believe in the honesty and sincerity of the vast majority of Canadians. It is often said that a people have the leaders they deserve. To my mind, I feel our people deserve better.

● (1620)

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start by saying that I am sorry the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) had to head off to deliver those passports to Regina before I could address a few remarks, through you, to him about his contribution to this debate. It is somewhat interesting that on a motion that dealt with proprieties of conduct in public affairs, he found it possible to address himself totally to the question of proprieties of conduct in private affairs.

I hope his colleague from Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) will convey a message to him. He thought it desirable to speak some words in defence of the private enterprise system by way of giving it some advice. That was particularly touching since he is heading off to Saskatchewan, where not only does the provincial government, that belongs to the same party as he does, not think a great deal of the work ethic in terms of the ordinary sense of rewards and losses that go with it, but are setting a prime example of believing in taking from anyone who works and accomplishes something at any time that seems appropriate, leaving the losses with private individuals who put in their risk capital. I say that because it was a little strange to hear his flights of fancy about the private enterprise system, in face of that kind of endeavour.

The motion before the House was moved by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. McKay) and it raises a matter that members on all sides would want to take seriously at any time. The public is always concerned, and I am sure more so today than at almost any other period in our history, about the need for public affairs to be conducted in a scrupulously fair manner. They are insistent upon a high standard of conduct from government in the operation of matters of policy and the implementation of that policy. This government has been responding to that felt need by introducing a whole series of procedures and guidelines to assure, to the extent that it is possible to assure in any organization involving so many parts and so many people, that affairs are conducted according to the highest possible standards.

If there is increased responsibility on the part of government in this day to meet that proper public demand for high standards, I think there is also a high standard of responsibility demanded of politicians who represent constituencies in this House of Commons, particularly those who sit in opposition and who are therefore ordinarily engaged in criticizing and analysing. I think it is particularly important that in bringing forward criticisms or analyses, the most scrupulous conduct is in fact followed and observed.

I say this because there are some very important values in our society, and these values touch upon our very civil liberties: values such as the requirement of having proof before a proper court of law, the requirement of not subjecting persons to trial by innuendo or suggestion without charges first being established to the satisfaction of a law officer, whose duty it is to satisfy himself that there is the kind of case that warrants that kind of allegation to be put on the record. These are some very important principles, ones that I think all too often those who simply like to make news or to spread concern ignore at great peril to the foundations of our democratic and freedom-based system.

An inquiry of a broad-ranging nature is a technique that must sometimes be employed, perhaps to supplement other investigative techniques. But it is still true, and I hope members of the House understand this, that on the whole it is sound to allow investigative procedures to go forward in the usual way with experienced, trained investigators bringing forward matters for investigation, and then putting those matters in due course before a law officer of the Crown in order to decide whether specific action should be taken in relation to the matters originally alleged and now proved in a first-hand or prima facie way. These principles were not lightly arrived at in our system, yet they are very important in protecting individuals who may be involved.

● (1630)

We have always, in this country of ours, been singularly fortunate in the quality of police investigation under the supervision of attorneys general across Canada and, indeed, in the quality of independence of attorneys general throughout the history of the country. That we have the best quality in these areas I think continues always to be important, and as we have them we should bear in mind that their strength of independence and integrity allows us to follow some of the time-honoured procedures that avoid the damage that can be done, damage both to individuals and, by the casting of innuendoes and aspersions abroad, to the system of government itself.

A government would be properly criticized at any time if it did not act promptly in relation to matters brought to its attention for investigation, whether it be misconduct, whether the police may be directly involved, or whether it be in the way of handling a particular matter or affair, in which case the proper road is to check the facts to see whether there was in fact an error, correct it where that can be done and take steps to assure that the system will avoid it happening again. These are the responsibilities of government.

We have before us a motion by the hon. member for Central Nova which refers to a number of supposed incidents requiring a degree of investigation and analysis.

Mr. Nielsen: Supposed?

Mr. Lang: I said to the hon. member for Central Nova, or about him, the other day that certainly compared to some of his colleagues—and I was at that point only putting it that high—he was one of the more responsible members of the House. I grant that in the ordinary course he in fact shows a high degree of responsibility. I hope that will continue to be the target for him, rather than to take advantage of a political opportunity to introduce confusion rather than light, attempting thereby to gain a political advantage rather than the real, important advantage of better public service through bringing direct attention to the problems which exist.

I was distressed when I saw a report the other day that he had said these matters had to be trotted out one at a time, one after another, rather than brought before the authorities, in a group in order that they could be properly handled and investigated. He wanted to bring them out one at a time in order that he could sustain the momentum of public comment on these activities. I say that is a wrong attitude and that any member who has information about any kind of misconduct, or any kind of information that is at all reliable, has a duty to bring that information immediately to the authorities for investigation, or to the government if that be the appropriate way of launching an investigation, or directly to the law enforcement authorities.

It must be an important duty of any member of this House and, indeed, any citizen of this country to bring that information forward at once. I think it was obvious that the hon. member for Central Nova brought forward some important information. In the case of Sky Shops, of course, the government's direct involvement was in relation to the granting of certain leases, first at Dorval and then at Mirabel, which involved that company. The government was not itself involved in the question of shareholding or dealings in the shares of that company.

There may be questions that arise out of the evidence that has come forward in that regard and, as hon. members know, immediately that material was before anyone in authority an investigation into these matters was undertaken. Indeed, the investigation was under way before the information was brought before the House by the hon. member for Central Nova. That, surely, is the kind of responsibility this government has in relation to matters that look as though something may be wrong or there may be some problem of conduct in relation to any particular action.

The famous dredging contracts are referred to, again, in the motion; I might say "dredged up", again, in the motion, although what was involved there was not, of course, the allegation of any wrongdoing on the part of the government. I would appreciate it if hon. members opposite would assist in the process of analysing the problem by saying that there was no evidence of any wrongdoing whatsoever on the part of the government in relation to dredging, but that certain matters are now before the courts as a result of investigations which were launched, again by the government. These investigations were begun before the allegations were put before the House by an hon. member opposite.

In terms of public duty, what the government has done in a case like that is to see that an investigation takes place, to see that if there are charges to be laid they are then laid by the appropriate authority, which very often is the attorney general of a province when criminal law is involved, rather than a federal minister who does not ordinarily enforce criminal law. That is an example, I think, of the execution of proper diligence on the part of the government in relation to a matter which arose as a problem.

As I say, it would be appropriate and I think it would be desirable, in the interests of understanding, when public authority is under attack and when there is a real sign of a problem or lack of diligence, that in those cases where there is no evidence of such an act it is noted by hon. members. Then there would be the avoidance of what in this motion seems to be an interest in a particular situation which the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre could properly point out to the private sector and which does relate to the public sector.

Again, I suppose the reference to Air Canada and to the Estey report is of a somewhat doubtful nature in a motion relating to the conduct on the part of the federal authority although, of course, the corporation in question is a Crown corporation. Again, I know of no allegation on the part of anyone of any wrongdoing by the government. There were allegations or questions raised about certain matters or certain transactions, and the moment these came to light and to the attention of the government something was done. Indeed, in that particular case an inquiry specifically into the transactions—because it was, indeed, a Crown corporation—was instituted and a report in relation to that matter will be available as soon as it can be made public.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that generally speaking the hon. member for Central Nova shows a high degree of responsibility. I note some instances where that sense of responsibility seems to have failed him in the pursuit of these particular matters. I wonder, for instance, what led him to introduce the other day in the House of Commons—on November 13, I believe—in a question relating to the production of papers, the reference to a supposed sugar transaction in the Barbados by an official associated at that time with Air Canada. The matter itself had in fact been investigated to the extent thought desirable by the Estey commission. There is no suggestion, in the reference, of any responsibility even by the management of Air Canada, let alone by the government, yet it was introduced in this spurious way.

I saw another reference to political donations having been made by a company involved in bidding on contracts. It turned out, of course, that the donation referred to was by an unsuccessful bidder, yet it was all wrapped up in terms of some kind of innuendo and allegation without anything being carried through. I think that is unfortunate. This is, of course, the very kind of question that can be raised and that this government has helped to put behind all of us involved in the political process with the introduction of new election expenses legislation and a totally new approach thereto so there can be no grounds for that kind of suspicion.

There is, again, an allegation in relation to gifts to certain employees of the government. Again the law is clear, and the appropriate approach in cases of any such indication or allegation is an investigation. Certain similar instances came to the attention of the government some years ago in relation to certain employees of the government. An immediate investigation was launched and as the investigation proceeded, the evidence, as is our practice, was turned over to the appropriate provincial attorney general for appropriate action.

The law is clear in the Criminal Code that gifts are not to be accepted by civil servants, from anyone, without the express, written consent of the head of the department. That is clear, it is strict, and it is a rule that has needed to be re-emphasized throughout the civil service. As a result of that particular series of incidents in 1972-73 a new set of directives was issued reminding civil servants of the strictness of that ruling, and reminding deputy heads of departments of the need to comment upon it in any way they felt necessary or desirable for the guidance of civil servants. This is another case where, therefore, the whole of the case is made to mesh with other things without quite being clear.

● (1640)

I do not know why the hon. member for Central Nova, in this motion, went into the question of whether or not the PTV vehicles were working superbly at Mirabel airport. This strikes me as another red herring. The information I have is that they are being competently operated. He referred, with amusement, to the one which did not operate at the time of the opening of Mirabel and suggested some mechanical incompetence. I am told that in fact a fuse blew on that occasion. It may be worthy of a small investigation, but hardly the linking of that with other matters as the hon. member has done.

[Mr. Lang.]

Perhaps worst of all today was the linking by the hon. member of allegations and discussions he has been putting before the House with respect to not only a hearsay statement but a hearsay statement reporting a hearsay statement which he attributed, after I requested the name, to the first individual who reported the hearsay to him. That is the kind of statement which surely deserves, if anything, police investigation. If it has the kind of relevance that deserves an investigation, it is the kind of thing that should be followed up in that way. Anything that can be stated by that person, or a source that can be found through that person, can be followed up by the police without these matters being put in an innuendo way, without any proof or follow-up, before the House and by persons who may, as in the case of several of the persons to whom the hon. member referred, have some reason for bitterness about not having been successful in a tender process.

The hon. member referred to the particular case of a Mr. Kohli. If it is true—and I will check that fact also, since so many of these thing turn out not to be true upon examination—that Mr. Kohli never had explained to him why he did not receive consideration of his tender, then it may be that there was some impoliteness and our procedures, in order to be perfectly polite, should be improved.

But it is clear that Mr. Kohli's tender did not in fact qualify within the grounds of tendering. The square footage to which he was referring in his tender was totally different from the square footage that was available and involved in the request for tender. It was for that reason his bid was not considered among, I think, the seven or eight which were left for consideration.

The way in which a particular bidding situation goes on is perhaps always complex. When the hon. member for Central Nova referred to the extension of the Dorval contract for the first time in this House, when the contract was extended to Sky Shops for an additional five-year period several years before its time ran out, it appeared to everyone to be a peculiar circumstance. Upon investigation it was discovered that the reason was the need for some construction to make the operation a reasonable one. Construction would take a certain period to be depreciated. The operation was one that existed in the Dorval airport in respect of a duty-free shop, a shop which would be less than significant once international traffic was transferred away from Dorval, and the plan was to transfer it from about 1974-75 to Mirabel from Dorval.

With that explanation, the mystery vanished and the situation was in fact a clear one from the point of view of the conduct of the department and the people involved in this transaction. It turned out that in that particular contract the renegotiation involved the raising of the rent which had to be paid by the lessee, even for the remaining three years or so, on a lease where from its inception he had a much lower rate of percentage to pay in relation to his gross revenue.

The case of the Mirabel contract has been raised. Here again, as I have said to hon. members, I will be very glad to discuss the question in detail, particularly in the forum which I believe is most appropriate, a committee of this House where cross-examination can take place and where witnesses can be present and examined. I do not understand hon. members not wanting that kind of forum, when obviously they want to cross-examine. They appear only too eager to make some comments, although it is a little difficult to hear even what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is muttering at this particular point in time with regard to this issue.

Before a committee of the House I will be very glad indeed to look at the particular contract and the granting of the concession at Mirabel. As was said before in the House, it was a situation where an analysis of the tenders showed there were different levels of tenders and different levels of the likely rate of return on the basis of the percentages which were offered by way of rent for the service. A couple of issues which are pretty important were involved in that particular granting of tender. One of them was referred to by the hon. member for Central Nova when he said that it has been the practice, in the granting of duty-free shop concessions in relation to liquor, to pay attention to the licensing authority in the province in which the international airport is in fact located.

I think that particular consideration does deserve re-examination. I have asked that we re-examine the question of whether or not the tendering procedure should be related in any way to the licensing provisions of the provincial liquor licensing authority. Hon. members will appreciate how it may have come about that the provincial authority generally in charge of licensing for the sale of liquor was given the consideration of being the licensing authority as well at international airports. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Central Nova, that constitutionally that is not required; but having in mind federal-provincial relations, it was an understandable development.

It is in that way, for instance, that at the Toronto airport the duty-free shop for liquor is actually operated by the Ontario Liquor Board and there, as I understand it, this was done without tender and through negotiation because of the specific desire on the part of that liquor board not to have anyone but itself involved in that sale. I think that matter does deserve review because it had an impact upon the tendering process in the Mirabel case. It led, indeed, to a conclusion that one particular bidder, largely a foreign-owned bidder, should not be considered as one of the contenders for the contract because of the policy of that particular provincial liquor board which required a higher degree of Canadian ownership than that for a successful bid.

I am not trying to forecast how we, as a federal government, would or should have concluded that particular matter, or what conclusion we should have arrived at concerning whether or not a foreign bidder should have been acceptable. But I do say that in that particular case it was a consequence of relying upon the approach of the provincial liquor licensing authority that led us not to seriously consider that particular bid along with the others which were evaluated and re-evaluated with a good deal of care by a committee of officials before one bid was selected.

Mr. Speaker, in short, I say to hon. members that we have attempted at every point we can to pursue investigations into any matters which are brought to our attention about problems, whether they indeed be picayune, or a particular vehicle not operating up to complete standards. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that earlier hon. members were having some fun over whether or not the runways were properly built. Investigation confirmed to me that they are in fact of a very good standard indeed. That kind of red herring is pursued by us as we try to cater to the particular whims of members opposite regarding what should be investigated.

● (1650)

When it comes to more serious matters, matters of alleged impropriety, then I think that not only must we act with dispatch but it is important that hon. members opposite, as any citizen in this country, co-operate by bringing to the attention of the authorities all the information they may have that bears on the question, and bring it forward as quickly as possible. Then, when investigations are appropriate, this government will ensure that they are carried out with dispatch. In the ordinary course we will rely on the procedures of investigation by law enforcement officers, and if criminal matters are involved we rely upon the decision of officers of the Crown, attorneys general in this country, as to the steps that should be taken with regard to that matter.

We will not want, ordinarily, to share with hon. members or in any way to approve what hon. members may do if, by using this House as a forum and a protection or in any other way, persons are smeared by innuendo or involved in a trial of reputation without a proper investigation. That is not according to the traditions of this country and of our system of law, and I urge all hon. members to co-operate with us in ensuring that the proper steps will be taken and that proper investigations will be carried out. On behalf of this government, I can assure hon. members that whenever matters are brought to our attention the appropriate investigation and action will be taken, and we will always be glad to lay that action record before hon. members and before the public and to stand on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker)— Transport—Freight rates—Disparity between rate on fresh fruit from Okanagan to eastern Canada and rate from state of Washington; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—External Affairs—St. Pierre-Miquelon—Discussions with France on determination of offshore resource rights; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)— Transport—Government intentions with regard to use of Canadian ships to move oil from Arctic.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacKay:

That this House, noting the public is concerned about recent disclosures of improprieties in the conduct of public affairs, as evidenced by events resulting in criminal prosecutions with respect to government dredging contracts, the Estey Air Canada inquiry, and disturbing reports about government leasing concessions of airport duty-free shops, urges the government to take immediate action to restore public confidence in the government's efforts to control conflict of interest and other improprieties of public officials, most especially with regard to government contracts and leasing procedures and practices.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I heard the sanctimonious utterances of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) a few moments ago and I am sure there was not a dry eye in the House. It reminded me very much of the statements that were made in another capital city not too long ago by the president of that country who spoke with equal sanctimoniousness about those things which he said did not exist.

The minister has had to leave the House to go to an appointment, and I understand that; but I want to ask him, through you, Mr. Speaker, about a couple of the statements he made. He indicated that the government moved with great speed in the case involving Air Canada. They appointed a very reputable high court judge in Ontario to investigate that case. I want to ask him what is the difference between that case and this case, in terms of the obligations that are before the public. What caused the government to move so quickly in that case, and what has caused them not to move so quickly in the Sky Shops matter? What is the difference? I suggest there may well be a significant difference, the difference being that somewhere in the net is caught one of their own.

When the Minister of Transport talks about the equal hand which he will apply to each case, I say to him that he is talking as if he were Otto in Wonderland, because that is not the case at all. There is perhaps a difference between the Air Canada case investigated by Judge Estey, a good investigator appointed with such speed, and the case involving Mirabel with which the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) has been dealing. In the Mirabel case, the police saw fit to raid the office of a senator in this building and they saw fit to raid his home. That is a considerable difference and it adds another element in this case.

I am saying to you, Mr. Speaker—and let there be no doubt about it—that if there was justification in the case investigated by Air Canada through Mr. Justice Estey, then this case involving a member of the Senate cries out for investigation and for action. There are differences, and let us not fool ourselves in this place that a defence can be made to a legitimate request by a member who is generally regarded as having performed a heroic act in bringing forward this case with such restraint. Let us not be fooled that any defence can be made by attacking the integrity of the hon. member for Central Nova.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)).]

The minister spoke of civil liberties a few moments ago, and of the right to protect them. I agree with him; there is not a member of the House who would disagree with him. But one of the liberties of a free citizen in a free society, in a parliamentary system, is the right to the truth. I am saying to you, sir, and to anyone who would defend the stonewalling that has gone on in the House in the question period, and lately by the Minister of Transport, that it is denying not only to the House but to the people of Canada the right to the truth. It is about time we stopped doing that and realized that the House is not a place where before a member can stand up he must prove his case beyond a reasonable doubt. The Parliament of Canada is not a court of law and it is not a public inquiry, but when a member of parliament brings forward information such as the information that the hon. member for Central Nova has brought forth, then the government has a duty to act, not to evade or avoid because one of their own may be caught in the net. They have a duty to give more than the lip service just given by the Minister of Transport on the guidelines of conflict of interest. The papers on the guidelines on conflict of interest have been stuck in a committee for over a year.

Mr. Blais: That is not so.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If I am wrong, please correct me. That delay almost provides the grease for the skids to make respectable the avoidance of responsibility which the hon. member for Central Nova has asked this government to take, and which they have refused to take thus far. From what the Minister of Transport said today, they will probably continue to refuse. Let there be no doubt about it, they do a disservice to themselves, to this parliament, and to the whole idea of public trust in public life. Let us make no bones about it, and let us call it what it is. It is important, because it is the very foundation stone of parliamentary government, that it be operated by reasonable men of integrity, that everyone act reasonably, and when situations cry out for investigation that they be investigated. It is an important relationship.

● (1700)

On December 10, 1974, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) put this relationship forth very succinctly. He said the following:

We do not live and work in times when the public feels really confident about any so-called honour system which is supposed to be operating in politics and in high levels of government. Why encourage further erosion of that confidence, when the appearance of proper guidelines could start to turn things around and help to restore some confidence? Public confidence is a precious commodity, almost as precious as democracy itself, because without it the democratic system just cannot work. To encourage it requires firm action and proper priorities.

The confidence of the public has not been encouraged, and firm action and proper priorities have not been forthcoming with respect to some of the matters in this motion. The Giguère question, the findings of the Estey report, and the SIU situation all point to examples of the way the Liberal government has allowed public confidence to be undermined.

This parliament has dealt with conflict of interest guidelines to a limited extent. The conflict of interest guidelines have been set forth as follows:

Conflict of interest denotes a situation in which a member of parliament has a personal or a private pecuniary interest sufficient to influence, or appear to influence, the exercise of his public duties and responsibilities.

The proof of conflict of interest in this particular instance rests on the monetary or material gains influencing public or political decision making. The case of Senator Giguère brings into question not only the impropriety of a member of the Canadian parliament, but also the inability or ability of representatives to distinguish, at least in some instances, between the public and private interest.

Again the government has offered no leadership. For a Canadian Senator to accept stock transfers at almost an honorific price from a company whose contract is exclusively contingent upon government decisions not only raises the question of conflict of interest, but also casts in doubt the ability of a member to discern what is a conflict of interest. There cannot be any denial of that, even though many of us would like to say that we could deny it. In short, even if the minister is not culpable, and even if he did not know there were huge monetary gains to be made from such a stock transfer, the situation should never have been allowed to happen. In that it did happen, and in that the government's own guidelines do not make it clear what is a conflict of interest, the government itself becomes culpable of undermining the public trust, of which I spoke, and to which the minister gave lip service just a few moments ago.

It has been admitted by the government that the provisions which have operated heretofore are both outdated and woefully lacking in meeting with public expectations of governmental integrity. At present members of parliament are prohibited from accepting fees relating to any matter before the House, from entering into contracts with the government, from holding shares in a company which wins a public works contract, and from voting on a matter in which they have direct pecuniary interest. There is no mention of stock which the family of a member of parliament may hold. At present there are no official regulations requiring disclosure of interests.

Perhaps this government has not been the best, but another prime minister dealt with the situation. In 1964 the late Prime Minister Pearson attempted to set down a code of ethics for his ministers and their departments to follow.

An hon. Member: After a whole bunch of scandals.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): After significant trouble, as a matter of fact. I will quote from a letter he wrote to his cabinet colleagues as follows:

It is by no means sufficient for a person in the office of a minister—or in any other position of responsibility in the public service—to act within the law. That goes without saying. Much more is required. There is an obligation not simply to observe the law but to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest public scrutiny. The conduct of public business must be beyond question in terms of moral standards, objectivity and equality of treatment.

How does that stand in the face of what we know and in the face of what has been disclosed by the hon. member for Central Nova? How do we justify the fact that this paper on conflict of interest guidelines is still stuck in the morass of our committee system? In the case of Senator Giguère it is well known that he is intricately involved in Kebec Restaurants and AFC Limited. These two organizations are inextricably bound up in the transportation industry and with government tenders.

When asked if Senator Giguère was violating the present guidelines on conflict of interest, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on November 5 replied, and I quote:

—it is not apparent to me that there has been conflict of interest.

An hon. Member: How would he know?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I ask the question, how would he know? This stance, and the statement of the Prime Minister are indicative of the weakness and inadequacy of current government proposals and of the nonchalant fashion of the government in handling this issue.

With regard to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), he said he was looking after the interests of his constituents. He claims that when he was acting as principal secretary to the Prime Minister he handled the Sky Shops request in a manner similar to that in which he would have handled any constituent's request.

If the government House leader or the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) will not remind him, the minister should be reminded of the position of Lester Pearson and the Liberal government on this matter. I quote again from the letter of the former prime minister:

In order that honesty and impartiality may be beyond doubt, members of Ministers' staffs, equally with ministers, must not place themselves in a position where they are under obligation to any person who might profit from special consideration or favour on their part, or seek in any way to gain special treatment from them.

In turn, if the Prime Minister claims that he gave his secretary the go-ahead—and apparently that is what he did claim—I should like to remind the House of what the late Prime Minister Pearson said about that kind of activity. He said the following:

It is perfectly proper—indeed it is desirable—for members of ministers' staffs to be responsive to complaints as to delays in procedures or unfairness of treatment. They should bring these to the attention of the minister, or to that of the proper officials in a department. But in no case must a member of a minister's staff—or any other public servant—seek to gain for a particular person treatment that would not be accorded to any citizen . . . There can be no special treatment on the ground of personal acquaintance, sympathy or anything of that kind. Least of all must there be any suspicion of special treatment when there is cause to believe that a violation or evasion of law may be in issue.

What I am saying is that there is sufficient evidence in this case to ask to what extent there was involvement, and to demand an answer with respect to this matter, having regard to the involvement of the particular member of the other place with the matter in question.

We have demanded action on conflict of interest matters. This is the second time this party has allotted an opposition day to this subject. Other parties have also shown concern. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has a bill on the books respecting the disclosure of financial interests by senators, members of the House of Commons, and certain other persons. I hope it does not die a slow death, or I hope its death is much quicker than the breathing into life a public inquiry on this matter has proven to be.

● (1710)

I challenge the government to undertake its obligations for the sake of this institution, the members in it, and every public person whose name has become involved—for the sake of the other place and its integrity. I say do not attack the hon. member for Central Nova as your defence. Do not rely on the sophistry of that kind of defence. I ask you to take your courage in your hands and, for the sake of those other things I have mentioned, bring on a public inquiry before a judge. We would be satisfied with Chief Justice Estey or any other reasonable judge. Do not tell us that disclosure to a parliamentary committee under our rules means anything but a continuation of the kind of stonewalling that has gone on here in another form.

Is there any member of parliament who will say he is opposed to a public inquiry? Is there any member of parliament who knows something about the case that we do not know that would make him opposed to a public inquiry? If anything is wrong, open the books; if anything is wrong, investigate; if anything is wrong, find out. Do not sit on your hands and attack a member of parliament for bringing forward something which it was his duty to bring forward. That, however, is the whole of the case of the government, Your Honour.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention in participating in this discussion to try to limit my comments to the function I serve as chairman of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and, pursuant to the motion of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), to take up some parts of the subject of conflict of interest. The hon. member has since left the chamber.

Before I go into any detail in this regard I should like to bring to the attention of the last speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that he may have some concept of the conflict of interest legislation in the Canadian House of Commons that is significantly different from my own, and possibly different from that of a number of other individuals.

First of all, to correct the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, the conflict of interest legislation has not been stuck in any committee for a year. It was referred to committee on December 10, 1974; there were 21 meetings at which, as the hon. member should know, a considerable amount of effort was put in by all members, and the committee's report was tabled in the House on June 10, 1975.

The second correction I should like to make to the hon. member's remarks is that the conflict of interest guidelines are not government guidelines any longer; they are recommendations of an all-party committee which unanimously supported them together with the amendments and the deletions which we proposed.

The third correction is that unfortunately the hon. member is of the opinion there is no legislation which proscribes the holding of stock in certain companies by individuals related to members of parliament, whether of the House of Commons or the Senate. I can assure him that there is indeed such legislation, and the conflict of interest guidelines proposal No. 11 specifies these matters at great length.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You make my case stronger.

Mr. Blaker: I agree with the interjection of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. He has been trying to make his case stronger. If he deems it suitable to refer to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) as "Otto in Wonderland" he will not object to being referred to as "Wallie in Wonderland".

I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that I wanted to restrict my comments to the area of conflict of interest because of the work of the committee, and hopefully to make such comments a contribution to the discussion whether for the benefit of interested members generally or for the public.

My initial comment would be that, give or take the varying comments made on either side of the House, including those of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton to the effect that this side is attacking the hon. member for Central Nova, I should like to suggest the opposite.

I happen to represent the riding in which is found the city of Dorval. If the hon. member for Central Nova were here he would confirm that we have had some discussion on a shared interest in this problem. Hopefully these discussions will result in a solution.

The motion reads in part:

—urges the government to take immediate action to restore public confidence in the government's efforts to control conflict of interest and other improprieties of public officials, most especially with regard to government contract and leasing procedures and practices.

I would just say that members who are interested in pursuing the subject will find that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections did go into that topic in considerable detail. The recommendations go substantially beyond those laid out in the original green paper on conflict of interest.

I should like to assure all hon. members and the public that some of the most stringent regulations to be found in any western democracy are in the Canadian conflict of interest legislation. It is my understanding that the legislation in the form of amendments to existing laws, as well as new legislation, will be ready some time next spring.

That brings me to a problem which has been referred to by the Minister of Transport and in relation to which any discussion of conflict of interest deserves at least a momentary review.

One of the remarkable problems we face in the House of Commons and in the news media is the apparent capacity, whether it be by members or the news media, to level accusations without fear of having the same burden of proof or responsibility placed upon the accuser as is placed upon the individual who is accused.

I make no suggestion that such is the case in the remarks made earlier today by the hon. member for Central Nova. I do point out, however, that we face a significant problem if we permit the general principles of justice, which have guided our courts over centuries, to be abandoned in favour of changing the forum or arena either to members acting by themselves or as members of the House of Commons, or to trial by the news media. In both cases the accused has no opportunity for a reasonable, fair hearing. I do not know of any way we can limit this right on the part of members, but I do not think anyone would want to limit them in raising matters such as the Dorval and Sky Shops affairs.

I would remind the House that a free press and free news media have meant publications like the National Inquirer, and others which most of us would agree are less than tasteful, and which do not accept some of the responsibilities that go with a free press. We support a free press on the grounds that it is the best way to get the best possible contribution from an independent press.

In the same way, I think we have to support the concept of the investigations carried out by the hon. member for Central Nova, but always with the understanding that it is a privilege given to us to accuse without danger of retribution. If we abuse such a privilege, then we will be guilty of something called muck raking.

Other than that, I want to assure hon. members that other areas were covered in the matter of conflict of interest. According, in my view the government's action to date meets the demand of the motion which asks the government to take certain action.

● (1720)

We have spent considerable time studying conflicts of interest. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said so well in the question period one day, political practices acceptable ten or 20 years ago are no longer acceptable. The difficulty with drawing guidelines to cover conflicts of interest is that our views on conflict of interest are constantly changing. It is difficult for members of the House at large, those serving on the committee on Privileges and Elections, the media, or the public to agree at any one time on what constitutes improper behaviour, or what proper behaviour ought to constitute.

I note that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) suggested to the Procedure and Organization Committee this morning the establishment of some procedure in this House to provide for quick impeachment of members. Possibly that is one technique the House ought to consider.

Amendments to be brought forward, either in the form of amending bills or new laws, will prohibit the holding of dual electoral offices, prohibit the members' or senators' participation in any contract made with any government in Canada, prohibit the participation by members of parliament and senators in the management of any company which has entered into a contract with a government, require members of parliament to declare their interest in any subject matter under debate, and prohibit members from voting on a bill with respect to which they have an interest. I underline and stress strongly, for the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton who has alluded to this subject, that, without question, the regulations will pertain to the families of members of parliament and of senators.

In order to assure the population that members of this House are determined to be guided by such regulations and laws, we have suggested guidelines which will recommend that any citizen of Canada may go to the Federal Court and ask the court to examine any particular issue which relates to the behaviour, or participation in any contract, of a member of parliament or senator. The law will require the attorney general of the province to proceed with the case, on its merits, on behalf of the citizen; should the attorney general refuse, the court will be obligated under the new law, to report the action to the Speaker of the House of Commons or to the Speaker of the Senate.

As I was surprised about comments made on the government's stand on conflict of interest, I shall read to hon. members a number of suggested provisions contained in the report tabled by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The part I shall read is headed "Financial Interests". It says, as recorded on page 24:5 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections:

> It is recommended that the proposals entitled: 'Financial Interests' be expanded to the 'Office of Registrar', whose existence is intended to assure the public of the determination of members of parliament to avoid potential or actual conflicts of interest.

Here let me correct a misapprehension raised by the hon. member for Central Nova concerning regulations and restrictions which ought to apply to members of the House and senators. The hon. member suggested that the guidelines applying to ministers will not be more strict than those applying to members. His information is not correct. The guidelines for ministers will be more strict than those with respect to members. I continue quoting:

> Your committee agrees with the statement in the green paper that 'Members may increasingly find themselves in situations for which no adequate rules or guidelines exist to aid them in ensuring that their conduct respects their fiduciary duty'.
>
> Accordingly, your committee envisages the function of the registrar as being:
>
> (a) The registration of an annual statement of the pecuniary interests of each member of parliament, and the making and filing of records pertaining thereto;
>
> (b) The provision of confidential advice to members of parliament, at their request, on any matter that may concern a possible conflict of interest of the member.
>
> (c) The annual reporting to the House of Commons of a list of those members of parliament who have complied with the requirements of the law relating to registration and/or disclosure.
>
> To assure the public that members of parliament will indeed take the steps necessary to avoid conflicts of interest, your committee recommends that the draft legislation and where necessary the standing orders be so amended as to reflect the following proposal:
>
> Every member of parliament shall, within six months of assuming office and on May 31st of each year thereafter, file with the registrar, the following information, together with such additional information as the registrar may require:
>
> (1) his or her taxation returns for the year current or preceding;
>
> (2) his or her financial and pecuniary interests, direct or indirect, of every kind and nature whatsoever, including such interests of the member through his or her spouse and/or dependent children, as well as trusts of which he or she or his or her spouse and/or dependent children are the trustees or beneficiaries.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that members will be hard put to find tougher conflict of interest legislation anywhere in the world.

We shall appoint a registrar. Members will be obliged to deposit with him their taxation returns, together with details of their own financial assets and, in addition, those applying to their spouses, children, trustees and beneficiaries. Therefore on the face of it the government will more than meet the requirement referred to in this motion. It will introduce good conflict of interest legislation. True, there are loopholes, and I will not take the time of the House explaining the details. Amendments will be made to the Election Expenses Act and conflict of interest guidelines.

I remind the hon. members that the report was unanimous and participated in by members of all parties. In the view of the committee and some observers, it constitutes an outstanding guideline for members and ministers who may find it necessary to avail themselves of the services of the registrar in order to pattern their behaviour in a manner acceptable to their colleagues in the House and to the public as well. Therefore I may disagree with the hon. member for Central Nova about a certain portion of his motion, as I insist that the government will propose an exceptionally good set of guidelines.

Speaking as a member whose riding is involved in one of the topics discussed, I appreciate the hard work of the hon. member for Central Nova and recognize his contribution to the betterment of parliament.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I once knew a Liberal member of parliament whose name I will not mention, he no longer being with us, who, while a potential shareholder or subscriber to a company he sought to have incorporated by act of parliament—the company was subsequently incorporated and he became a shareholder—sat in this House, voted on that company's incorporation, and sat in committee and did the same, because he was privy to information showing that the company was to be awarded a substantial government contract from which he stood to gain much advantage. There is no difference between that situation and the one here, and I think members will agree that it was really wrong for that member of parliament to be so involved.

● (1730)

What really disturbs me is people like the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) rising and complimenting the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) on the integrity with which he spoke and presented his case, while at the same time undercutting him. The hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker) did this too, in a very nice way. I was waiting to hear, for the first time, the allegation of muck raking raised in this debate. And, indeed, it was raised. That is another problem encountered by the opposition when we raise something like this. We encounter scorn, skepticism, and scoffing from members on the government side because those members do not want anything embarrassing to be raised, anything which might muddy the waters.

Our responsibility on this side is very clear, as I see it, and I have had some small experience in raising matters such as this in the past. The event of late 1963 led, in my view, to the publication of the letter of the then prime minister on November 30, 1964, to all his cabinet colleagues, portions of which have been quoted by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Yet the caution we have received from the Minister of Transport and the hon. member for Lachine was, in effect: do not take advantage of this privilege which members of parliament are granted to raise matters with immunity in the House knowing we can do so without fear of retribution—I shall have something to say about that in a moment—and because the accused, or whoever is being spoken of in whatever fashion, is not here to defend himself or herself, as the case may be.

[Mr. Blaker.]

There are not many members left in the House, certainly on the other side, who were around in 1963 when these matters were raised and followed up throughout the next year. It may have been a coincidence, but with respect to this possibility of retribution, and opinions which members may express about other members raising matters such as this without proof positive, the belief among members opposite that we over here might, perhaps, raise matters such as this without fear of retribution is quite false.

By way of illustrating this proposition I might say that prior to the event of 1963 in which I was involved, I had occasion to discuss with the then minister of justice a certain case involving two employees of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. After certain matters were raised in the House, matters which were very embarrassing to the government and which caused resignations and, indeed, prosecutions—one person, at any rate, was found guilty of offending against the provisions of the Criminal Code—the full weight of the Government of Canada descended upon those unfortunate employees of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. They were both fired and prosecuted in the courts.

In the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court judge made the remark at that time, with respect to the prosecution of these individuals, that had he himself been in their position he would have done the same thing. But that did not satisfy "the Crown"—I put the word in quotation marks. They pursued the matter through the Court of Appeal on the basis that the judge had applied wrong principles, and were successful in getting a substantial fine imposed on those two civil servants.

What was their crime? Their crime was taking money from one vote intended to be applied for welfare for the Indian people and using it to build houses for Indian people under another vote. That was their crime against the Financial Administration Act. It is true this was not retribution against the individual member of parliament, but it certainly smacks of serious retribution to my mind. I do not have to say more with regard to the caution to be exercised by members on this side in terms of what they might take to be retribution. The wrath of the government did not stop with those two civil servants at that time.

Some 12 years having passed I can speak of these matters now dispassionately. I might say I have not spoken of them to other members of the House in the detail I have now disclosed. However, coincidentally, one might say—I, for one, do not believe it—a short two and a half months after the government had suffered serious embarrassment at my hands involving the resignation of ministers, parliamentary secretaries, and what have you, the full weight of the Department of National Revenue descended upon my shoulders.

Notwithstanding the fact that certain transactions in my business had been fully disclosed to the Director of Taxation in my district, and his approval obtained for these transactions, a re-assessment was made by officials in the Department of National Revenue, coincidentally only two and a half months after the serious embarrassment suffered by the government. The amount involved was the substantial sum of approximately $25,000. The re-assessment was appealed by me and, in substance, the case was won by me before the Tax Appeal Board. But they were not happy to stop there. They meant to nail my hide to the mast, so they tried again, this time not for a mere $25,000; they upped the ante by some $29,000 a few months later.

I wrote to the minister of national revenue at that time suggesting that what was happening was pure harassment because I, as a member of the official opposition, had had the temerity to raise certain matters in 1963, and I stated that unless the harassment ceased I would make the affair public and raise it as a matter of privilege in the House. The minister, I suppose, gave certain directions because the Department of National Revenue called off their dogs and the re-assessment was withdrawn.

That is an illustration of the extent to which the wrath of government can fall on the shoulders of members of the opposition if they have the rashness to raise certain matters in the House. The suggestion of muck-raking or smearing reputations is a very poor device, especially coming from members opposite who may one day—I say just "may"—find themselves on this side of the House, faced with the same kind of duty and responsibility as was so ably carried out today by my hon. friend from Central Nova.

Instead of engaging in the kind of platitudes voiced by the minister today I suggest he could more usefully have used his time by answering the questions which are oustanding on this matter. He suggests there are logical explanations for the granting of the extension of this lease to Sky Shops. A contract which still had four years to run acquired suddenly a five-year extension after it had been in existence for only a year. He told us the reason for this was the need for reconstruction work—there was a space problem and that a rate was to be renegotiated. That strikes me as being very strange, coming from a minister who should know better.

● (1740)

I recall a debate that we had a few years ago on the Prairie Grain Stabilization Act, or some such legislation, where $100 million was being illegally held back from the farmers of this country. A statute specifically spelt out a mandatory responsibility on the minister through whom the Wheat Board reported to distribute those funds as head of the Wheat Board. The minister stood up, this ex-dean of one of the law schools of this country, and tried to convince us that the word "shall" as used in the statute meant that he had some kind of discretion. I could not believe my ears then, and I cannot believe my ears today when the minister says that he believes this is the real reason.

The minister says that members have a responsibility to place before the government all the necessary evidence and information upon which the government can act. That is what I did in 1963, before the matter was raised in the House of Commons, during a discussion of the estimates of the Department of Justice. But nothing was done. Indeed, upon being questioned the government was given the opportunity by the now hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), and I to tell members of the House what the government was going to do about the situation that was then raised. But the government ducked. It pulled the covers over its head, and it was only then that we exposed the whole material.

What more does the minister expect from the hon. member for Central Nova, who has provided the minister with documents until they come out of his ears? The minister could not even find certain important information, namely, the liquor contract with the Quebec Liquor Board, so my hon. friend from Central Nova supplied it to him. All the time the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) had a copy of that document in his possession, supplied to him by Mr. Lapointe, one of the principals involved in this what I think is a very sorry and sad mess. How much more disclosure does the minister expect before some action is taken?

Investigations by the RCMP are fine as far as they go, but investigations were undertaken in 1963 by the RCMP. The RCMP followed the course suggested by the Minister of Transport and placed information before the law officers of the Crown, who gave an opinion. The then minister of justice rose in his place and said that their advice was that no criminal offences had been committed; in other words, whitewash it; suppress it if is embarrassing. Subsequently a very distinguished jurist from the province of Quebec differed with the then minister of justice and did in fact find that criminal offences had been committed. I refer to a royal commission specially set up by the government because it was unable to resist the pressure any longer.

The same situation obtains here. The circumstances are such that the matter cries out for a public inquiry. You cannot hide behind the subterfuge of a police investigation carried out by responsible and able police officers, because the truth may not surface if it is politically embarrassing. That is a political fact of life, one of which I have had first-hand experience. It has happened before. If a highly placed official or a government is going to be embarrassed by police investigations, then the police investigation will not see the light of day. This is why the situation cries out for a public inquiry.

I can tell hon. members opposite what the police investigation is going to find. It is going to catch the poor little employee in the Department of Transport who accepted as a gift a pen and pencil set while some guy who makes $95,000 in a few weeks is allowed to get away with a serious conflict of interest. That is not what I understood a very highly respected prime minister of this country to have spelt out in letters to his cabinet colleagues on November 30, 1964. What I understood that prime minister to say was that this kind of conduct was reprehensible and wrong, and that it would not be tolerated by the government.

All we have heard today from the Minister of Transport is excuses. What have we heard from the Senator himself? According to the Globe and Mail for Saturday, November 8, 1975 he said:

> What is wrong with having a senator do a little business now and then? Do Canadians expect senators to be drawn from the ranks of the Salvation Army or something?

That is his attitude.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Might be a lot better if they were.

Mr. Nielsen: I think so. I am one who is on all fours, if I may express a personal view here, with the efforts of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to have the Senate abolished. Conduct like this certainly does not generate any support in the minds of the Canadian public for the idea that the Senate is a useful body performing a useful task on behalf of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Paproski: It is a retirement fund.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, a nice retirement fund. What I really find reprehensible about this whole matter is this kind of reaction by the Senator, coming at a time when the government is asking everyone to tighten their belts to fight inflation. The government wants everyone to abide by limited wage rises and wants all small businesses to abide by limited price increases under rigid control, while at the same time, because a Senator has friends in high places, he is able to make $95,000 within a few weeks. One can forgive the average Canadian Joe for wondering what part of this $95,000 was retained by the Senator, who has been referred to as one of the chief bagmen of the Liberal party and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) because I was not here in 1963. I listened to his recapitulation of past history with a great deal of interest, and although the information I have obtained is second hand it does not match his information in all particulars, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker.

I wish I had also received from the hon. member some additional information relating to the motion under discussion. We have heard additional arguments very ably presented, but there was not a tittle, as they say, of additional information presented by the hon. member for Yukon. No additional information was bestowed upon the House upon which the arguments that he mounted were based.

I searched with a great deal of attention for any indication of a rebuttal of the explanation offered by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), but I could find none. There was a different interpretation, Mr. Speaker.

● (1750)

Mr. Nielsen: Would you like one?

Mr. Blais: There was an explanation given by the Minister of Transport of all the allegations presented by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. Mackay). He offered an explanation which I would suggest is acceptable to this House and founded on the truth.

Evidently my friend was not satisfied with the explanations given, and that is his right, but I take strong exception to his attempting to reinforce his arguments, not by new evidence or facts, but by dragging all the facts which were brought out back in 1963, smearing the whole picture with additional innuendoes of 1963 origin. That is not a fair method of proceeding with an argument. There has been a great attempt to smear the government by alleging that in fact we were accusing the hon. member for Central Nova of muck-raking. That is not a term anyone on this side of the House employed until the hon. member for Yukon used it.

Mr. Nielsen: That is not correct. Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The record will show that the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) used the expression before I did, and had he not done so I would not have mentioned it myself.

Mr. Blais: There was no implication that the term was to be applied to the actions of the hon. member for Central Nova, and there was no indication that the hon. member for Central Nova was doing anything but his duty. There was an indication by the minister that perhaps sometimes he was a bit over-anxious, and that some of the procedures being followed were those he ought not to have followed, but there was no such indication or accusation. Let me suggest to the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that the suggestion that there are accusations in respect of the hon. member for Central Nova is completely incorrect.

This government and this parliament stand on their records, and I include this parliament in having sought to achieve greater security of our own reputation by enacting and passing guidelines on conflict of interest. There are also attempts, which other members will deal with, to increase access to information so as to make our roles more meaningful. No one can suggest that the government is sandbagging or stonewalling in any material fashion or, indeed, at all.

The hon. member for Yukon has had his experiences, and I am sure he locks them deep within himself. He is aware of the facts as he sees them. I am not able to contradict him because I was not here at the time. All I know is that today the facts are not as he alleges, nor are they as alleged by the hon. member for Central Nova.

An explanation has been offered by the Minister of Transport in direct response to the two main allegations upon which this motion is founded. The first was that in fact there was an absence of an investigation in respect of the Sky Shops matter, and the minister indicated that in fact an investigation was proceeding even before the hon. member made any accusation. The second point on which this motion seems to be based, because it is the only other matter that has been advanced, is that a statement was made by some unknown person to some other party who is not willing to lend any credence to the statement by declaring his intention to make it public.

That statement is double hearsay and the minister rightfully said that it ought not to be accepted. The hon. member for Central Nova indicated that the statement could be true or might not be true, but he was not in a position to support it. The minister indicated that this was a proper and responsible allegation that should be investigated, and that it is presently being investigated.

The other matter which gives me concern is the complete balderdash that we received from the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. For a deputy House leader not to have known that on a matter as important as conflict of interest the Committee on Privileges and Elections had submitted its report to this House, and for him not to have done the proper research to find that out makes one wonder what sort of research went into the preparation of his speech.

When dealing with innuendo and allegation, the hon. member for Central Nova falls in the face of the blunderbuss from Grenville-Carleton. That hon. member was in the House when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) replied to the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) in relation to alleged instructions to his personal secretary on the way he was to conduct his dealings with Sky Shops. He was here and he heard the Prime Minister reply. For the record the question begins at page 9103 of Hansard. The question and answer are as follows:

MR. RON HUNTINGTON (CAPILANO): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to address to the right hon. Prime Minister. When in April of 1970 the Prime Minister gave permission to his then principal secretary personally to intervene in a matter involving large sums of money between Sky Shops Export Limited and the federal Department of Transport, what were the instructions that he gave to his then principal secretary?

RIGHT HON. P. E. TRUDEAU (PRIME MINISTER): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure upon what the hon. member is basing his assertion that I personally gave instructions. My principal secretary was, in a general way, instructed to deal with constituents—by that, I mean not only people from my riding of Mount Royal but constituents across the country—who had some reason to want to see me. I could not make myself accessible personally to everyone, but he had instructions to try to deal with every reasonable request by any citizen of Canada, particularly if they came from the beautiful riding of Mount Royal—

At that point I recall there was a chuckle from the opposition. The answer continues as follows:

—and to make sure they had access to government services, just as I am sure it is the duty of every member of this House to make sure that happens when they get requests from someone in their constituencies.

The reputation of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is of being one of the most able constituency members in the House. He deals constantly with constituency problems. Were he not able to write as good a letter on a constituency problem as Mr. Lalonde did on behalf of the Prime Minister, I would be very surprised. In fact the letter that was written by Mr. Marc Lalonde I would not seek to table.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to read to the House a letter written by the executive secretary to the Prime Minister, Mr. Lalonde, dated April 14, 1970, to Mr. Louis Lapointe of Miron Limitée, 2201 Jarry West, Montreal, Que. This is what he wrote.

My dear Louis:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter dated April 6 as well as the attached documents.

I had already seen Mr. Stoner when I received your letter. I had however raised the problem as you had indicated to me during our meeting and in your letter. I asked Mr. Stoner to instruct Mr. Windsor to proceed without delay with this file.

I must say that I am surprised by your refusal to provide a complete copy of your agreement with the Quebec Liquor Board. I cannot accept the principle whereby a public body such as the Quebec Liquor Board may enter into a contract agreement with private concerns and not make public such operation licences. I have no idea what the department will do about your refusal to produce a copy of the agreement, but I must confess that if I were in their place, I would insist to get a copy of the official document. At least I would require a certified copy endorsed by the Board in respect of the extent of your lease.

I hope there will not be undue delays in this matter and if you have any difficulty, be sure to let me know.

Yours very truly,

Marc Lalonde
Executive Secretary

Mr. Speaker, I have read this letter into the record to reply to charges made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) about the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). I believe the whole thing is quite clear, as I indicated before recess. It is a letter of a kind I could have written as a member of parliament.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton could have written such a letter. Indeed, the leader of the opposition could have written it. Those are things we are constantly asked to do by our constituents. I myself do it regularly.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the motion presented to the House and which we are debating. Obviously, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) barked up the wrong tree in this whole thing. He wanted to deal with honesty, integrity and so on in public affairs. He brought up three matters that have been explained by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), namely the dredging contracts, Sky Exports Shop and the Estey inquiry. There are now inquiries of a kind or another and we are awaiting reports.

● (2010)

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Central Nova (M. MacKay) evidently lacked seriousness in his accusations. The government is not in the least involved; he has failed to demonstrate that the government had anything to do with this. Whoever reads the hon. member's motion realizes that he is seeking action on the part of the government, that he wants an investigation—indeed he wants an investigation—and that he bases his request on two allegations which the minister has explained, first, the question of the double hearsay, which he admits may be wrong, and second, the question of the return of the tender money, which the minister has said was due on inaccurate and inadmissible tender.

As to the motion itself, the hon. member urges the government to take immediate action to restore public confidence in the government's efforts to control conflict of interest and other improprieties of public officials, most especially with regard to government contract and leasing procedures and practices.

Therefore he is attacking public officials, not the government, not hon. members, but public officials. And what surprises me most is the fact that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, who is always trying to defend civil servants in the House, is supporting this motion.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, public servants are not here to defend themselves. So, I will try to defend them because those public servants have obligations. First of all, they have guidelines to follow related to their behaviour as individuals confronted with their responsibilities as public servants; second, they have to follow guidelines and regulations set out by each department regarding contracts and the tendering and leasing procedure in general.

Regulation 75-530 dated September 2, 1975 on government dealings sets out all the limitations imposed by every department, and I simply want to quote section 5. The public is not aware of that, since it is believed that the government is free to award the contracts they want whenever they want and to whomever they want to award them. I quote section 5:

5. (1) Subject to this regulation.

(a) no contract can be agreed on, and

(b) the amount of a contract cannot be increased without the approval of Treasury Board.

(2) In cases where the present regulations stipulate that the contracting authority is not empowered

(a) to sign the contract, or

(b) to increase the amount of the contract, without the approval of the Treasury Board, the latter is authorized to give its approval.

Now, to go back to the instructions. The document was issued by the Treasury Board: "Policies and guidelines for Canadian government contracts". This document contains 41 pages of instructions given to every government department. We readily see what it deals with by consulting the table of contents: first of all, work distribution between the purchasing departments and the common services agencies; the purposes of the document, of which, firstly, the policy. I quote, as follows, from page 5 of that document:

The government purchasing procedure serves the purpose of obtaining supplies and services, of building works and signing leases through contractual provisions which best serve the specific requirements of the programs of the government of Canada. The contracts of the government should be entered into so as to guarantee:

(a) the best possible terms from the triple point of view of quality, time limits and total cost of the goods or services purchased throughout their useful life;

(b) a reasonable use of public funds; and

(c) if needs be, that national policies and objectives are taken into account.

Mr. Speaker, this objective is pursued over 41 pages. There is a section which I regard as very important, the one about the protection of the interests of the Crown, that is of the Canadian people. First, financial guarantees; second, contract arrangements; third, insurances; finally, the purchasing process, the procedure to follow to negotiate contracts between the Crown and individuals in the private sector.

We find a definition of requirements, that is what is needed. There is a list of purchasing methods, or ways of purchasing the goods that are needed. Then the price and the way of determining prices are dealt with. Mr. Speaker, invitations to tender and selection of the contractor are found on page 25 of the document. On that page the procedure to follow to invite tenders is explained.

[Mr. Blais.]

I quote clause 5.40 on page 25:

5.40 As indicated in the policy statement, the purchasing method used for a given purchase should give eligible businesses the same opportunity to deal with the government, within the application limits. The following guidelines describe different selection methods to be used according to the circumstances.

5.41 Notices in newspapers

. . .

5.42 Use of the postal lists of bidders

Mr. Speaker, I shall not read the whole document because it is very long. All I want to indicate by this is that for a long time we have had very strict guidelines on the way the government and civil servants should proceed for awarding contracts. There are restraints as to the duty of civil servants. All I want to indicate in conclusion is that it is impossible, no matter the importance of the guidelines established, to believe that we will be able to obliterate all loopholes and all frauds, human nature being what it is. We try to do away with them as much as possible, but being realistic we realize—

● (2020)

[English]

It is impossible, Mr. Speaker, to do away with human nature and criminality. For anyone to think that eventually there will be complete elimination of that conduct is unrealistic.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take part to this opposition day. It has made possible the presentation of a motion relating directly to conflicts of interest. I listened very carefully to the previous speaker who seemed quite intent on defending himself. I do not think that the motion accuses anybody. On the contrary, I think it simply requests Parliament, hon. members, to try to avoid those allusions which have been made for so many years. There were also inquiries that proved the government or governments had certain problems within their departments or services. And when the motion states clearly:

That this House noting the public is concerned—

I think this is ever more important, Mr. Speaker. You and all hon. members are aware that politicians have lost much credibility on account of rumours which are heard now and then. I realize some hon. members may be worried by our present discussions of events which were published in the newspapers. I shall bear testimony to this, shortly. We are not accusing anyone, far from it, but simply avail ourselves of the opportunity to urge the government to scrutinize all its departments and agencies and try to eliminate abuses, if any.

A while ago, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) admitted that it is not easy to eliminate all wrongdoings. But to which extent should we press the government to check those abuses or those errors—if they are—while profiteers manage to convince the public that politics is a dirty game? In my opinion, this is what we are trying to do when we say that government leaders must be free from any suspicion. I think this is an important requirement that should be met.

The newspapers recently reported such cases, which do not improve the standing of members of Parliament. I can read in a newpaper: "RCMP search Senator Louis Giguère's offices and home". I am not the one who reports it, the newspapers do; this merely proves how important it is to change the situation and, if necessary, to proceed with a judicial inquiry. I will quote a well known Montreal reporter who believes that such an inquiry should be done. Further, one can read: "RCMP search senator's offices—" This is an excerpt from another Montreal daily newspaper. "RCMP inquire on alleged fraud of $60 million at Mirabel". "Giguère case still on front pages". "$95,000 in assets". "New scandal at Air Canada". This news is reported in the newspapers. A $5,000 bribe to the Liberals.

Mr. Speaker, those are so many newspaper headlines, so many things that lead people to believe that Parliament is definitely corrupt, but I do not think that all those sitting in this Parliament are corrupt.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from an editorial by Claude Ryan who, I believe, is held in high isteem. He refers more specifically to further details provided by a Toronto newspaper The Globe and Mail, concerning the Sky Shop Exports Limited.

> Senator Giguère attempted the other evening, before his Senate colleagues, to deny any suspicion of irregularity . . . not only did it restrict singularly the full impact of the case . . .
>
> Until further notice, any strictly private individual or society is entitled in this country to make gifts to anyone, provided it is done legally. In case of gifts to political parties the Canada Elections Act now requires that they be reported to the returning officer and that this information be made available to the press and the public. But the act was not yet in force at the time of the transactions between Sky Exports Shops and Senator Giguère. Therefore, it could not be involved to blame Mr. Giguère for having bought at unusually attractive conditions in 1972 shares that he was able to sell back a few months later at an incredible profit of almost 2,000 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, the title is: "The Giguère Case; Why 2,000 per cent?

> Among the other circumstances that look fishy in this story, there are at least three which deserve special attention:
>
> (a) The directors of Sky Exports Shops had at the time a secret guarantee from the Quebec Liquor Board that they would be the only ones allowed to buy alcoholic beverages from the Board for sale at Dorval airport. It is understood that the person at the RAQ responsible for this agreement has been replaced since then. Therefore, there is reason to believe that this type of practice has come to an end. But it is important to know if federal authorities were informed at the time. According to the information made public in the last few days, it seems that they were. How can one explain that they could have been party to a practice which went directly against the rules of free competition for the granting of federal permits?

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it is indeed something to wonder about. Earlier today, if I remember well, someone mentioned a correspondence between the executive secretary to the Prime Minister, now the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and Mr. Lapointe.

Well, there is no proof in those letters that the minister did something wrong. But the question is there: how come the attitude of the government of Quebec with respect to the granting of those permits was not criticized? A few months after their permit was renewed, the exporters of Sky Exports Shop sold their business at the price of $20 a share, enabling Senator Giguère to make a profit of $95,000 within a year. Considering most of the value of that business lay in the exclusive permit it was granted by the federal government, he made quite a pretty penny indeed.

Well, representations were made to the executive secretary to the Prime Minister, now Minister of National Health and Welfare, by the chairman of Sky Exports Shop who asked him to appeal to the Minister of Transport to speed up the expected decision. The present Minister of National Health and Welfare denies receiving any monies in that respect, and we will take his word on it.

However, in his letter to the Deputy Minister of Transport, we note an apparently unusual insistance. Here is, Mr. Speaker, an editorial of a very well known daily Montreal paper which raises a number of questions and calls for answers. I think it is quite normal and in the interest of the public right that we should ask certain questions to which the public is entitled to expect answers. Earlier today, I think, someone mentioned $10,000 paid to Mr. Lapointe to have him come a few times to Ottawa, and request an extension of his contracts.

It might be important to know up to what point the government should not disclose that $10,000 expense. It does not take $10,000 indeed, Mr. Speaker, to come three or four times to Ottawa. I think agreement to that extension was obtained within one month, from January 8 to February or March.

Mr. Lapointe, I agree, made a few trips to Ottawa. He was given $2,000, $3,000 or $5,000 to negotiate, hoping there would be an affirmative response. How was that $10,000 spend? Those are questions we ask without accusing anyone, but I think the public would be quite interested in knowing where that money went and whether Mr. Lapointe really spend $10,000 on trips and meals. We have nothing against that, we would like the question to be asked, considering the amount, to come from time to time to solicit a little service for reasons we do not know either.

In any case, I think it is a question that deserves to be asked. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today invites members to ask the government for closer monitoring that we have had up to now, and particularly eliminate those scandals we have across the country. We had others, with the result that the public loses faith in men in public life, the credibility not only of this government but of this Parliament—and we make up this Parliament— is also down. It is not very interesting for us to be catalogued in a general way because newspapers indeed report suppositions perhaps, as well as allegations, and in certain cases evidence was put forward.

So, that is why we try to bring this government to shed light on matters such as those with which I dealt earlier, and which are publicly reported in newspapers, and I think nobody can blame us for working in that sense. I heard other members make certain comments today in that respect and we are trying to get rid of and eliminate those conflicts of interest. Obviously, the leaders of a government must be above suspicion. The kind of intolerable situation which undermines public confidence in the normal process of our institutions in equally important.

We would hope to bring about such things. All these articles and statements encourage many people to make easy and negative criticisms about politicians, and we are always disappointed to see such articles or scandals, because we are directly involved, whether we want it or not. We must ensure that politicians exercise great care regarding conflicts of interest. A piece of legislation was adopted hardly a year ago on this matter, and I believe that we can never do too much to eliminate these conflicts of interest. I recognize that people in public life must, and rightly so, be careful about public morality, and this gives us even more reason to demand stricter control on the part of the government. It is up to the government to throw some light and clarify any such matters which might raise some doubts about the honesty of politicians. Once again, I believe that we are justified in demanding that these things reported in the newspapers be clarified. Reporters have brought these things up and the public is expecting some answers. It is therefore important to clarify the relationship that may exist between the government and certain financial interests.

Mr. Speaker, such is the purpose of this motion and we are asking only one thing from the government: That it throw light on some points which are now unclear—and the public is aware that there have been quite attractive profits. Are these profits justified? We should be told if they are. We have nothing against the fact that an amount of $10,000 was granted to a gentleman who has some representations to make, as long as these things make sense. Those are the questions that we are asking. Men who may not have been directly involved with a department, as they now are, may have had relationships which are quite legitimate in politics, and we admit this. But once again, we are asking the government to clarify those things that we and the population find fishy and which were brought to the attention of the public. In the light of the information we might get on these matters, it is possible that the answer be accurate. And if errors were made, we will have to ask the government to take action. A judicial inquiry has been urged. A well known editorialist among many other people feels there is ground for an inquiry. I believe the government will never have been served better than by the group of members urging that the matter be aired. These members would be happy to see the government put a stop to those practices, that corruption the public is so concerned about. I believe it is in Parliament's interest and it is important to both members in this House and those who wish to enter prolitics that they should not be termed generally "shady politicians". I therefore hope the government will shed light on those things and what it will be capable of preventing their future occurrence.

[English]

● (2030)

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us, urging the government to take action "to restore confidence in the government's efforts to control conflict of interest and other improprieties of public officials," is timely, but limited and limiting in that it seems to place on government alone a responsibility that should properly be shared by the opposition, the civil service, by the media, and by all Canadians who care about the democratic process.

Present day concern about the conduct of public officials reflects a number of factors—some positive, some less so. On the positive side, public awareness and public requirements of standards of behaviour from elected officials and civil servants are higher than they have ever been. Practices which were tolerated ten years ago, such as, for example, establishing private trust funds to supplement a politician's income are no longer acceptable.

We must all welcome this greater vigilance of the public and the clearly articulated wish of Canadians that politicians not only be, but appear to be independent and not subject to inappropriate influence or an appearance of influence in the exercise of their public duties and responsibilities.

The Election Expenses Act, with its provisions for disclosure and its encouragement by way of tax credits of small donations, represents one important response of the government to this legitimate concern of Canadians.

The green paper entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest" which was prepared in July, 1973, under the auspices of the Privy Council, represents another government initiative to remain responsive to the contemporary needs and values of Canadians.

The then president of the privy council recognized that:

> ... the evolution of public standards has out-distanced the development of formal rules which should apply to the conduct of members of parliament. Furthermore, the role of the member of parliament has become more complex and members may increasingly find themselves in situations for which no adequate rules or guidelines exist to aid them in ensuring that their conduct respects their fiduciary duty. Perhaps most important, the increasing involvement of modern government in society has blurred the line between public and private matters to the extent that both the public and parliament seem agreed that a systematic and public set of standards is now required.

Although the proposals made in the green paper were restricted in their application to members of the House of Commons and senators, the green paper stated that the government intended to develop "a comprehensive policy on the standard of conduct expected of officials at all levels of government.

On December 18, 1973, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tabled an order in council setting out guidelines for public servants and those appointed to public office by the Governor General in Council. The underlying principle of these guidelines is an obligation on the part of public servants to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest public scrutiny. Public servants are, therefore, required not to place themselves in a position where they are under obligation to any person who might benefit from special consideration or favour on their part, or seek in any way to gain special treatment from them. Equally, a public servant may not have a pecuniary interest that could conflict in any manner with the discharge of his official duties.

Public servants are now expected, as are ministers of the Crown, upon appointment to office, to disclose all business interests that could be construed as being in actual or potential conflict with their official duties, and to arrange their private affairs in a manner that will prevent conflicts of interest from arising if there is any risk of that occurring. Public servants are required to manage their affairs so as not to benefit, or appear to benefit, from the use of information acquired in the course of their official duties that is not generally available to the public.

In the matter of contracts specifically mentioned in the motion of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), public servants are asked not to place themselves in a position where they could derive any direct or indirect benefit or interest from a government contract over which they can influence decisions.

In the past the matter of conflict of interest with regard to public servants was not of great public concern. It was a matter of principle that on entering the public service one severed all connections with the business world and with political parties. However, in recent years new policies in the public service have brought some changes. For example, under the Public Service Commission's career assignment program business people have been brought into the service, and public servants have been assigned to jobs in industry. In the senior executive interchange program public service appointments are filled by businessmen and women, and public servants are transferred to industry on a temporary basis. Deputy ministers have also been brought in from outside the public service.

● (2040)

In these new circumstances men and women may find themselves in situations where their public duty conflicts with their own interests or those of the company with which they have been associated. On the other hand one can argue that an official who withdraws from decision making in matters relating to his or her former business may well become ineffective in his or her public service capacity.

When the Prime Minister tabled these guidelines, Crown corporations were also asked to develop standards and guidelines for their employees. The then minister of justice was requested to review existing legislation with respect to judicial or quasi-judicial appointments, with a view to bringing it into conformity with established standards of conduct for other officials in government service. On December 31, 1973, the Treasury Board followed the Prime Minister's directive by issuing a circular to all heads of departments. The initial disclosures were to be made by June 30, 1974.

During the debate on the guidelines the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised the criticism that the order in council lacked definitions and provisions for enforcement.

In the case of members of parliament a number of statutes now contain provisions on conflict of interest. These include the Canada Elections Act, the Criminal Code, the House of Commons Act, the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Rules of the Senate, and the Laws and Usages of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, as preserved by Section 18 of the British North America Act and Section 4 of the Senate and the House of Commons Act.

Part III of the green paper dealt with possible weaknesses, omissions, and loopholes in current legislation, and considered that some provisions may be out of date and in need of revision in the light of changing circumstances. The green paper proposed that legislative provisions concerning conflicts of interest of members of parliament should be contained in a new act to be known as the Independence of Parliament Act, with the exception of bribery which would continue to be dealt with under the Criminal Code.

At present Canadian legislation on government contracts held by members of the House of Commons is found almost entirely in the Senate and House of Commons Act. The basic principle expressed is that a member of the House of Commons or candidate should not be party to a government contract as a result of which he, or she, is a recipient of public funds. This provision has been criticized on grounds of ambiguousness.

The discussion draft of the Independence of Parliament Act, which was included as an appendix to the green paper, made seven proposals with regard to government contracts. The principle, generally, is that participation in a government contract by a member of parliament constitutes a conflict of interest and a violation of the member's fiduciary duty. It was also recommended that no member of parliament should be permitted to participate in the management or direction of a company having a government contract or agreement. It was also suggested that disclosure should be made by registering annually a list of companies in which the member was an officer, director or manager.

Some of the exceptions proposed were: that a member of parliament should be permitted to own shares in publicly traded companies that deal with the government, provided the member is not a director, nor in active management of those companies, and that he or she holds less than 5 per cent of the stock, such interest to be registered annually; that a member may participate in a contract if the aggregate value is less than $1,000 in any one fiscal year, the details of such interest also to be registered; that a member may hold a government contract if the completion of such contract devolves on him by descent, marriage, or operation of law, provided the member disposes of the contract within 12 months. Again the details are to be registered.

The discussion draft proposed that the former tenuous custom of declaring financial interests in a matter during debate and question period should be formalized and incorporated in the Standing Orders of the House and Rules of the Senate. No particular sanction was proposed for a violation, although a wide variety of sanctions is available. It was suggested that the standing committees of both Houses would provide guidance regarding particular situations.

The draft suggested retention of the practice whereby a member of the House, or a senator, is prohibited from voting on any question in which he or she has a pecuniary interest. It was proposed that the Standing Orders of the House and Rules of the Senate should caution members to exercise care in managing their investments so that they do not benefit, or appear to benefit, from the use of information which may have been available to them confidentially. Severe penalties were suggested for breaches.

As hon. members know, the green paper was referred first to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, which has reported to this House. The Senate is currently discussing the report. The green paper was intended as a first step in the evolution of a systematic and public set of standards. I hope that today's discussion, together with the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the debate in the Senate will contribute to this process.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) expressed concern about the green paper being still before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Apparently he did not know that the committee reported last June. During the proceedings of that committee the same sense of urgency was not always demonstrated by his colleagues.

At early committee meetings some opposition members wanted public disclosure and severe restrictions for ministers only. Being newly elected I was surprised to hear opposition members suggest that private members of parliament could not be in conflict of interest. Some opposition members preferred to use their time questioning the authorship of the green paper instead of discussing the content or proposing new measures. Despite these initial delays all parties worked constructively on the guidelines which, as the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) said this afternoon, went beyond the green paper's recommendations and were accepted unanimously.

As the green paper stated, "the prestige and effectiveness of the Canadian parliament depend greatly on the public's confidence in the willingness of parliamentarians to resolve conflicts of interest." You will note that the reference is to parliament and parliamentarians, not to government alone. The motion before the House deals with the restoration of public confidence. Just as the green paper deals with avoiding not only conflict of interest but the appearance of conflict of interest, I take it it is the duty of parliamentarians not only to define and observe rules of conduct but also to inform the public of the existence of those rules, and thus maintain public confidence.

● (2050)

Members of the official opposition have a special responsibility to be accurate as well as hard hitting in their criticisms—to present a balanced picture of things as they are, not to attribute bad motives or behaviour without proof. A well respected member of the official opposition once said at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections that democracy is a delicate flower. Certainly the number of healthy democracies in the world today is disconcertingly small, and we cannot take ours for granted.

Free speech, open criticism, and discussion of issues are central to democracy, but negative cynical criticism and attacks on personal integrity tend to erode public confidence in democratic institutions. Maintaining and restoring public confidence require leadership by government, but also require restraint and concern for accuracy on the part of both opposition and the media.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, what we have before us today is a gently worded resolution by the quiet and gentle member from Central Nova, containing the word improprieties, and suggesting the government should take immediate action to restore public confidence. He then goes on to give one or two bits of evidence.

I want to say at the outset that the samples of evidence given in the motion are such a small proportion of the sins of the government that you hardly even know there is more than a mosquito biting an elephant. And in all the answers we have heard from the government today not one has even mentioned that $95,000. The minister made reference to picayune little points made by the hon. member for

[Miss Nicholson.]

Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). Everyone knows what we are talking about, and they carefully avoid it.

Let me just list the type of things which should be in the motion, Mr. Speaker, and I could double it and triple it if I wished. How about the dismissal of the Chief Commissioner of the Board of Grain Commissioners for only one cause—he refused to play the political patronage game of the government in Montreal?

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, how about the fact that at this very moment there are criminal court proceedings going on in Regina, Saskatchewan—the chief operational head of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has had his preliminary hearing and faces criminal fraud proceedings? And we get these moral lectures on behaviour as it should be, according to some mythical guidelines. The government, instead of trying to bring this out into the open, periodically tries to bring the Prairie Farm Assistance Act here to be repealed so we will not be able to talk about it any more.

All hon. members remember just a short while ago that one newspaper which took a different editorial position from the one the government has, lost all its government advertising. Who enforced this action? Why, it was the then minister of energy, mines and resources. Punish a person, if he disagrees with the government! This is not ten years ago in the weak days of government under Pearson. This is right now. And what did they do with that minister? They made him the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). They have the morality of a bunch of alley cats.

Look at the questions about the Montreal pipeline I put a year ago in the House. Who was on this committee representing the government dealing with the business firms and trying to get them to build the Montreal pipeline? First, I heard they were to get the Deputy Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson). Then the Energy Board officers were there. Finally, after a little bit of questioning, the minister admitted that someone from his department was there. From his office, is what he meant to say. And one of the reasons for the delay was somebody telling these companies that if they wanted things speeded up they should make sure they hired public engineering people from the right place. The minister in this case was the same minister of energy, mines and resources, the patronage boss for the province of Ontario.

If I dipped my nose into the smell which comes out of CIDA it would be a stinking mess you would have to bring into this House. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) made a trip to Israel. Did he use a government plane, a commercial plane? Oh, no. He made the trip on a friend's plane—a friend who was doing big business with the government.

Then we have the great mystery of what we will call the Austin case. The member for Central Nova tried to get several questions placed on the order paper. They were not allowed on the order paper. These questions were addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). They have been published in the newspapers but are not allowed in this House. Is the government trying to build up confidence in the minds of the people of Canada that it is running a clean shop here?

I will go further, Mr. Speaker. Even with the Elections Act of 1974 in place there is blackmail going on with the business and professional men in this country undertaken by the bagmen of the government. These are the types of thing which should be in the motion and I think the hon. member for Central Nova should be criticized because he is so moderate, and so gentle with regard to these very serious things.

Last evening I spent a little time reading through some of the recommendations of the five volumes of the Glassco Commission Report. This was a commission set up 15 years ago to try to tighten up the looseness and the duplication in government spending about which the member for Central Nova was talking. All I wish to say is that the royal commission reported some 12 years ago, recommending that we decentralize the control of this huge labyrinth of administration from Treasury Board and put responsibility on the individual departments to do more. Then it adds these phrases, over and over again, "Pay these civil servants more so they can do the job more effectively, and then insist on accountability." What they have done is raise the salaries all right. They have not decentralized it very much, and they forgot the key word, accountability.

What do I mean by accountability? When these sort of things happen to a person in charge at a responsible level, a member of this parliament, whether senator or member of this House, you ask him to resign. That is accountability. Anyone having anything to do with these sort of smelly operations should resign. Or you tell senior civil servants, who are now paid the equivalent of the salaries of corporate heads, that they are fired, without any recommendation for another job.

● (2100)

In this particular case we have the ex-minister of transport, the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), and if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wants to prove to the people of this country that this thing will never happen again, he should ask the minister for his resignation, because he presided over the treasury board, I understand, when this decision was made. Ask the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), who was working then for the Prime Minister and, according to the evidence, doing a constituency job as a friend of a man from Montreal. He gave an order that the file should be opened and acted on. I ask for that minister's resignation. Then the people will know you are taking action to stop this type of thing.

Patronage is not a new word in this House. I do not suppose that even in an NDP government you get rid of it. Even they are hiring defeated politicians. But there has to be a certain standard, or a politician loses credibility across the country. I happen to come from the province of Saskatchewan where we endured for many decades the machine politics of the Liberals, euphemistically called the Gardiner machine, but it kept on going after he disappeared.

I belonged to an administration that was here from 1957 to 1963, and many senior newsmen in the press gallery today claim that we defeated ourselves by trying to stop patronage and corruption in places like the post office, public works, PFRA and PFAA. Not one of the people involved was fired. When the 2,000 people that I had personal knowledge of were told there would be no dismissals but to keep out of this silly political business, only six broke that direction from the minister, and not one of those six was fired. They got a second warning and then were removed.

The day of hiring people for their political wallop, the day of using civil servants to act at election time, is over except for the west. The present political czar in the west—I call him the crown prince—is trying to rebuild the organization, and this explains why the Liberals ran third in so many districts in Saskatchewan last June. In the minister's own area the Liberals ran a poor third. I am simply pointing out that we have heard a lot of nonsense in this debate from hon. members opposite. No one has even mentioned the $95,000 which is evidence that infringes the members of parliament act and the members of the senate act. This absence of any mention of the $95,000 means that ministers are not enforcing accountability among their own people. As the Prime Minister said the other day, he could not see any evidence of conflict of interest in the payment of $95,000 just for being a friend.

Mr. Blais: He never said that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): My hon. friend from Nipissing reminds me of a rain barrel; the emptier the barrel, the more noise it makes when you beat it. He was certainly making a noise tonight. I know the tricks of these country people. When they have a poor case they yell at the top of their voice. The hon. member mentioned, for example, that he was not here when all these ministers were going right and left while the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was on the warpath. Nearly a score of ministers disappeared from that one administration over a period of time. The hon. member reminds me of what I told the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) some time ago, that you rarely find a good kernel of wheat in a full barrel of rat manure. Translated that means that if you keep associating with these people you become one of them.

What this whole matter adds up to is that in the last two decades we have moved into a permissive society. What started out as a move to get the government out of the bedroom has spread all through government, but instead of sex what we are talking about is a new form of permissiveness—that it is all right to put bagmen in the Senate. It is all right for them to make representations to friends, or to get friends to make representations to them. It is all right to appoint friends to high positions in Air Canada. It is all right to appoint defeated politicians to jobs across the country. There is nothing the matter with appointing a well trained, able, defeated politician. But when all of them are given an appointment, questions arise.

What we are witnessing in typical Canadian fashion is a Watergate—Canadian style. As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) pointed out this afternoon, when the Minister of Transport, an ex-professor of law and ex-minister of justice, stood up in the House and made his unctuous, sanctimonious speech, it sounded so much like the repeated disclaimers of ex-president Nixon—everything will be disclosed, everything is all right—that type of attitude proves to me and convinces me that there is a deliberate policy here of putting the lid on disclosure.

I mentioned the Board of Grain Commissioners. We do not have to go out and get a witness; the witness is sitting in the House today as a member of parliament. I refer to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton) who was chief commissioner of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and was fired by the government. Under pressure he refused to play politics with the movement of grain to the hungry people of the world, and the answer was dismissal. I am the one who said that the best thing to do when this sort of thing happens is to run for office, become a member of parliament, and whenever you have the occasion just remind the government of the type of people they are.

I mentioned the PFAA charges. I am not going to say anything about the particular charges because they are still before the court at the present time, but I am not going to hide my intentions. When the court cases are over, that will not be the end of the matter. In a court, tangible evidence has to be produced. If anyone is going to suggest to the rational people of this country that one man at a level way down designed this whole operation, that will not be acceptable to the House of Commons. We want to know how far this conspiracy to spend public money for purposes of electing government members reached into the parliamentary secretaryships, the executive assistants, and perhaps even members of the cabinet. Those are not questions you turn over to the police for investigation. This is a responsibility of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I am glad that the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore stood up today and said that was the place for them, because we will be there before this thing is over.

● (2110)

As I conclude I want to remind hon. members on the other side of the House that these dismissals I recommend are not only for ministers but for one or two civil servants right at the upper end. Once you cut the knot and get rid of them, it is amazing to find how few there really are.

Just to show how serious this is, let me put it this way. The great strength of the Canadian civil service over the years has been in the fact that they watch the politicians and they hold on to their integrity. Remember the civil servant in the deputy minister's office a few years ago when the political manoeuverers around here were trying to get an immigrant in who was offering big sums of money for Canadian citizenship. This deputy minister stood in their way, and said no. I would like to believe that he is still there, but he is not. The truth is astounding, because there was a deputy minister in Energy, Mines and Resources last year who jumped to principal clerk in the Prime Minister's office, and six months later seven senior civil servants decided to retire. That is how serious this is.

What we have to do here is ask the Prime Minister for action, and my interpretation of action in this motion is the dismissal of all those associated with this case as a warning to all those others doing this monkeyshining that they had better run for the hills.

Today is November 20, the birthday of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In the interest of getting back the confidence of the people the government should indicate its intention to stop this kind of monkeyshines by making this day in 1975 known as the Laurier day massacre of all those people sliding in and out, and doing these things.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my contribution to this debate will deal with a problem that is not only a dilemma with which the government is faced but involves a situation which has become quite intolerable as it affects not only every citizen of our country, but every aspect of their every day lives.

I want to take a rational and responsible approach by identifying the issue for debate today as a human problem. It is a human weakness to be arrogant when in a safe position of power. It is human to be loyal to one's friends who have helped and offered support along the rugged trail of political success. To fall and succumb to the dangers of such human activities is not only the weakness of the present government but, indeed, it is a weakness of our political process or system.

It is, of course, also human to try to secure one's position, and to strive for bigger and better things. Regardless of how hard we try to regulate and control the lives of individuals, we will never succeed in making everyone equal by destroying the competitive spirit in individuals and the desire to be at least equal or, ideally, just a nose length ahead of the next guy.

The politician in that sense is no different from the businessman. The latter struggles to become established, celebrates the official opening of his first plant as the achievement of a lifetime, and as soon as the first customer walks through the door and the first day's proceeds are counted, the process of expansion begins. The businessman, like the politician, must, in order to secure his position, broaden his support, expand his scope, diversify his operations, and make himself indispensable.

We hear much about powerful groups within our society today, such as large corporations which have evolved from the world of business and have become so powerful, monopolistic, and indispensable in nature that they now pose the most serious threat to the survival of the very system from which they evolved—the free enterprise world.

There are large unions too which, in order to secure their position to offer more and better concessions to their members, have made themselves indispensable and all-powerful, even ready now to challenge the institution itself.

The institution of government was planned and built with regard to these weaknesses, and in normal times the safeguards are sufficient. Unlike the businessman, the politician must expose himself to the test periodically. The government itself is subjected to scrutiny by the House of Commons in normal times. The collective work of this Chamber is exposed to sober, second look and evaluation by elders who have mastered the art of life and who have, by virtue of their accomplishments, been appointed to serve our country, if for no other purpose than to assure that the politicians who bear on their shoulders such great responsibility do not allow these human weaknesses to influence their work or their decisions.

I said that this was so during normal times. However, we are not living in normal times. Something has gone wrong with the traditional process. Somehow a very powerful and very determined group of people have been able to free themselves of the constraints of the democratic system and are ruling instead of governing. They are possessed by yet another human weakness, namely, greed. Those who belong to this group have become the masters not the servants of their constituents. They have joined in unholy matrimony with the other powerful groups that have helped them on their way.

To be appointed to the Senate today means also to be offered directorships in a series of corporate offices. To be appointed to the executive council means to receive contributions to the election campaign from the unions.

How did this all come about? Many of us have speculated about this and have reached different conclusions. Money is power, or it provides an effective means of controlling power. There is no better way to demonstrate the centralization of power which we have experienced in Canada than by examining the fiscal and monetary strategy of the government.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is right, of course, as is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), when he says that the increase in government spending does not fairly reflect the activities and the increase in public services since, as they both argue, the increase in their budget from $6 billion to $32 billion in just ten years is mostly due to transfers of funds—taking from the rich and giving to the poor, taking from certain provinces and giving to other provinces.

The fact is that today almost all disposable income from our gross national product is fed into a central hopper. The super group of which I have spoken thus assumes the right to redistribute this seemingly unlimited wealth in a way not necessarily in the interests of the country as a whole. Is it then, having regard to the human weaknesses I have spoken of, any wonder that there are some Canadians who have been identified as friends of this all-powerful group and have become very rich and powerful themselves?

I want to take a closer look at some of those people behind the scenes. Some have already been identified by my colleagues. Once close to the top they become one and the same person. Their activity and influence is not confined to just the Ministry of Transport, the Ministry of Public Works, or the Ministry of Supply and Services.

I said earlier that the actions of these barons affect every aspect of the lives of Canadians. In the interest of continuity of the story my colleagues have laid out before us, let me lay out another story. Let us take a closer look at yet another most dedicated public servant who at the present time fulfils the role in the Prime Minister's office which was formerly carried out by, in Mr. Lapointe's most affectionate words, "my dear friend Marc". While a westerner of dubious distinction, who has now gone to his reward, filled the position for a brief period of time, the job is now in the hands of a most distinguished servant of the public interest, namely, Mr. James Coutts.

● (2120)

Mr. Coutts' career is colourful, and like his predecessors he too has of course friends who call him by his first name. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Coutts also has friends who are close enough to him to make certain of his actions justifiable. He was once an appointment secretary of the former and late Prime Minister Pearson. Like so many of the people on the monopoly board of Liberal players, he retired early to assume a career of consulting. He became one of that elite group of Canadians who divide amongst themselves every year about $1 billion.

He became affiliated with the firm of Canada Consulting of Toronto, a firm which over the years enjoyed quite an impressive array of public assignments. He took some time out in 1974 to manage the affairs of our Prime Minister during those years. Madam Speaker, I could not possibly give you a complete list of that firm's success stories about which I am speaking. I refer to Canada Consulting of Toronto. But there is one insignificant little assignment which fits into my story best. It was the assignment to find a new head for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The former president was being retired, and the position had to be filled. It was not a difficult task, even though the price tag was, I understand, in the tens of thousands of dollars.

Three names were suggested. The choice was not difficult. Mr. William Teron was the obvious choice, a man with a most distinguished career in the field of housing, particularly high cost housing, because this is what we have much of in our country and are to be assured of more in the future.

Mr. Teron swiftly reciprocated. The corporation had to be restructured to make room for the technocrats who fit better into the scheme of things. Yes, Madam Speaker, as you might have guessed Mr. Coutts got the contract to recommend the changes which would bring peace and tranquility to the corporation. This assignment, I am told, was in the six figure dollar league, indeed a just reward.

Now, Madam Speaker, the new president of the corporation is endowed with a good measure of the human qualities of which I have talked earlier. He is on his way to making himself indispensable. He had little time for the former minister, and less time for the present housing minister. He has recently assumed the responsibility of the top civil service position in the Ministry of Urban Affairs.

He has been known to have the Secretary of the Privy Council write his public statements for him. He is now in a position to make, as well as carry out, the government's housing policy. The same efficiency experts who are the fear of the Housing Corporation are now also extending their activities to the Urban Affairs department. I am sure all will soon be in order there as well. But, while the enforcers of Canada Consulting are still roaming the halls of high government places, Mr. Coutts himself has moved back to a position from where he can serve his country, but more important serve his friends and those of the Liberal Party more diligently and effectively.

As you already know, he is now the principal secretary of the Prime Minister, and one wonders how many privileged Canadians feel, by virtue of their friendship with Mr. Coutts, justified to demand his services. But let us go back to our friend Mr. Teron, and let us bring into focus a short profile of his private business career. Time will only permit us to touch on the highlights of his most recent background.

In 1966 Mr. Teron, with a number of interesting people, incorporated a company called MNS Investment Limited. Along with Mr. Paul Matheson and J. B. Whitely we see names such as Paul Martin, Sr., Jack Austin, and Maurice Strong. These are very familiar names. Maurice Strong is known to us through his close relationship with the former secretary of state for external affairs and now our High Commissioner to England, who appointed Mr. Strong to oversee Canada's efforts in the field of foreign aid. Mr. Strong has lately been seen walking around carrying a Petro-Can.

In February of 1967 Etron Ltd. was incorporated to manage, I understand, the real estate properties Mr. Teron had accumulated. Messrs. Snipper, Cohen and Murray were the solicitors who incorporated the company and maintained the company's office. One of these gentlemen earned Mr. Teron's blind trust in recognition of his services.

Next we see Canadian Interurban Properties, a subsidiary of Power Corporation, acquire the assets of a company called William Teron Limited. He becomes vice-president in charge of planning and development for Interurban Properties. Plan and develop he did.

A short and unhappy corporate relationship with Campeau Corporation proved not too lucrative for Mr. Teron. We see him forming a new company called William Teron and Associates. This company concentrated on building apartments, hotels, and office buildings in large urban areas. Next we see the formation of a company called St. Maurice Capital Corporation. This group in 1970 acquired the outstanding shares of MNS Investments. The MNS shareholders, of course, gained an interest in the new company. Incidentally, among the investments held at the time or re-organization was about $55,000 worth of Brameda Resources, and we also know all about that company.

It was around that time, or by late 1970, that Mr. Teron was seen to spend much time in the office of the then housing minister. Mr. Hignetts' terms as president of CMHC was due to expire in June of 1971, but was extended for two years after much backroom activity. This provided Mr. Teron with time to round out his empire and prepare his blind trust.

Other corporate names appear to complete the web. General Mortgage Corporation is taken over by St. Maurice Capital, and St. Maurice Properties becomes another subsidiary. And then, of course, there is the firm which maintains a penthouse office suite in the Carleton Towers, and which evolved from Etron Limited early in 1974. An impressive list of friends have found refuge there.

One does not have to step off the property surrounding this building to admire the real estate empire of that select group of great Canadians. Madam Speaker, one could go on and on. The question, of course, we have to ask ourselves is, how was it possible for Mr. Teron, who became president of CMHC in 1973, to divest himself of his friends and business interests? The answer, of course, is that it is not possible. CMHC, of course, depends on many of these corporations I have mentioned as a delivery system for the national housing program. His holdings are in blind trust, and that is all that is needed to conform with the 1973 conflict of interest guidelines behind which the Prime Minister seeks refuge every time an embarrassing question is asked.

Blind trust to people like Mr. Teron means that Canadians have to blindly trust that the friends of the Liberal Party are acting not in their own interest, but in the interest of our country. If one examines the financial reports of the many and varied interests Mr. Teron held before and after assuming control of these high public offices, one comes to the conclusion that either Mr. Teron was managing his interests poorly before, or that his powerful position has something to do with the healthy growth of some of these companies after he blindly entrusted the management to someone else. In either case, this gentleman's qualifications are in question.

I want to quote from the 1973 guidelines which govern the conduct of public servants in such high offices. My colleagues have touched on the guidelines for government and members of parliament. I should like to quote three or four paragraphs:

> 3. No conflict should exist or appear to exist between the private interests of public servants and their official duties. Upon appointment to office, public servants are expected to arrange their private affairs in a manner that will prevent conflicts of interest from arising.
>
> 4. Public servants should exercise care in the management of their private affairs so as not to benefit, or appear to benefit, from the use of information acquired during the course of their official duties, which information is not generally available to the public.

● (2130)

> 5. Public servants should not place themselves in a position where they could derive any direct or indirect benefit or interest from any government contracts over which they can influence decisions . . .
>
> 8. Public servants should not accord, in the performance of their official duties, preferential treatment to relatives or friends or to organizations in which they or their relatives of friends have an interest, financial or otherwise.

Well, Madam Speaker, we will let you and the Canadian people judge in Mr. Teron's case.

I have only been able, in the short time allotted to me, to make passing reference to the activities of just one of many small groups of people who, in my opinion, are ripping off the system. I wish it were possible to demonstrate to the House how the activities of these powerful players in the Liberal monopoly game affect interest rates for domestic living in Canada—surely one of the most serious problems contributing to the high cost of housing. But time does not permit.

Let me rather pose this question, Madam Speaker: where is it all going to end? Well, times are changing. We do not enjoy the same degree of financial success and prosperity that we experienced in the post-war period. The gap between rich and poor is widening, and Canadians are about to take a closer look at those who shape the destiny of our country. What they will see is not a pretty picture, and they will demand a change.

Then there are people like Walter Rudnicki, a long time dedicated civil servant who fell victim to their frightening power play, and who will not surrender without a fight. His tragic case is before the courts, and he will not compromise is rights as a Canadian for a settlement out of court.

As I have said during my opening remarks, none of us are immune to these human weaknesses. What is going on in Canada today is only a result of the indifference and ignorance of too many Canadians who have kept this government in power for too long and have allowed it to circumvent the democratic process.

I know that there are those of our colleagues, some of whom even sit on the other side of the House, who are not of the privileged few who head their letters "My Dear Marc", or "My Dear Jim", who will help us to bring the era to an end. Let us hope it will not be too late.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Francis Fox (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Madam Speaker, I thank my dear colleague from Calgary. I was thinking about his remarkable comments on the results of a certain game.

Madam Speaker, I now come to the subject of this debate. Points have been raised, arguments have been made during the day by members of the official opposition. I would simply like to say that we had the impression today of witnessing a "de-escalation". On the basis of insinuations which seem serious by themselves, supported by anonymous affidavits which were flourished in the air, all that resulted during the debate in the colleagues of the mover of the motion themselves taking a stance against him. We witnessed a real "de-escalation", as I said. His own colleagues seemed very embarrassed to come back to the subject he had himself raised, and during the afternoon we heard apologies, people almost apologizing for being associated with the kind of things done today by the member in question.

The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) for example is maintaining that no accusations are being made. These are the hon. member's words. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) complains that the motion is incomplete. Well, if he has criticism to make about the incompetence of those who drafted the motion, he only has to turn around and face his own colleagues. Indeed he was really successful in underlining the incompetence of his colleagues who drafted the motion. It was almost an election speech, possibly unveiling his own election campaign and I hope, Madam Speaker, that it will be cleaner than the speech he made this evening.

It looks as if he chose the anniversary of Laurier to start off. He spoke of a slaughter. I have the impression, Madam Speaker, that the blue slaughter of February will be a reality well before his pious wishes for the red slaughter. He criticized my colleague the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) because he was not here in 1963 and because he does not know the great debates they may have had in this House at that time.

Madam Speaker, if the spectacle the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain gave us tonight is typical of the type of debate, of things that went on in the House of Commons at that time, I am very happy to be among the colleagues of the hon. member for Nipissing rather than those of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

And so, we had a "de-escalation" throughout the day. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) started off, followed by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who felt obliged to excuse him by saying it was the role of the opposition to make that type of accusation. The hon. member for Joliette, as I mentioned before, also said that in fact the accusations were not made against the government, that they were pious wishes because everyone is interested in improving public administration in Canada. The situation is quite embarrassing. The last speaker of the party, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) did not even speak to the motion before the House. The only thing he mentioned was a series of "Dear Jim" and "Cher Marc", making allusions to people in the office of the Prime Minister, and more particularly to the current head of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. And those very same people, on the back and front benches of that opp party, Madam Speaker, keep saying to the government that more people in private enterprise should take part in government decisions. No sooner does someone leave the ranks of that same enterprise to give the Canadian people, the affairs of state, the benefit of his experience in a certain field, people like the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River rise and with innuendos and insinuations try to prove that there is something wrong somewhere. But he never lays a charge. He only gives innuendos and, frankly speaking, I do not think this is on a level with the kind of parliamentary debates we should hear in the House of Commons.

● (2140)

It has been said that the role of the opposition was to give the kind of show we had before us today. Madam Speaker, I always thought the role of the opposition was to make loyal opposition. In fact, the title of the opposition is "loyal opposition". I always thought it meant intellectually loyal. I was very disappointed about that throughout the day.

Is it really responsible, Madam Speaker, to hold up anonymous affidavits? Is it really responsible to say that there is no difference between allegations, to use the word of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) when he said this afternoon: True or not?

After all, the Canadian Parliament has become a place where the vilest rumours can be spread and thrown at the people's face without the least evidence. Hon. members opposite have reached the point where they talk about prima facie allegations. I would advise them all to return to their law textbooks or their books on the constitution and political science, and brush up their knowledge. There is no such thing as prima facie allegations but only prima facie evidence. Allegations as such are groundless!

By the way, they are the same members who, on many occasions, have accused reporters of the press gallery of reporting false information at times. I believe they could say in turn: "Have a good look at the members throwing allegations across the House and claiming that those unsubstantiated allegations amount to evidence or point to wrongdoing.

In his brief remarks, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) particularly disagreed with his colleague who put the motion when he said that public confidence in the government was decreasing. He should ask himself what is his own party's responsibility for this situation, because day after day, the only thing opposition parties can do is to criticize thoroughly the government's position without making the least positive suggestion or proposing any alternative. No wonder the public finds that opposition parties do not have much to offer and indeed they do not offer much.

Then, the hon. member for Joliette commented that the RCMP had searched Senator Giguère's offices and home. I think it is difficult to claim that government agencies do not do anything. On the contrary, those situations they hold against us are all to the government's credit and show quite clearly that there is no one in Canada who is not equal before the law, that nobody is above it. We had other examples in recent years, namely the action brought against CMHC officers. So, there was never any attempt to try and hyde anything. When there was some evidence that criminal offences had been committed, the government took its responsibilities. There is proof of that once again in the Hamilton case, the Air Canada and Mirabel cases that the RCMP are now investigating.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) suggested this afternoon that all those allegations, all those things were embarrassing for the government. I think this is not so. It is not embarrassing for the government to discover that a Crown official or agent might have committed at a certain time a criminal offence. If such was the case, if the evidence—and I stress evidence, not allegations out of nowhere—was brought before the government, on each occasion the government took its responsibilities, brought the persons involved before the courts which then acted according to the provisions of the Criminal Code.

In spite of what the hon. member for Yukon might have said or thought, nobody questioned the right of the hon. member for Central Nova to raise those matters in this House.

But we should really ask ourselves, Madam Speaker, if it was the best thing to do. The RCMP declared they had started their investigation nine months ago already. Nine months ago, Madam Speaker, and the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) has just made public accusations.

Sensationalism is very tempting. The RCMP commissioner regretted that the member did not proceed otherwise and, besides, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) did say this afternoon that in 1963 he had lodged a complaint and put his documents in the hands of law officers of the Crown.

To be efficient an inquiry must often be carried on without the knowledge of the suspected parties. The fleeting publicity made around a good part of this case may have given headlines to the hon. member but then it may also have made it easy to get rid of files and evidence that might have helped throw some light on those matters.

Finally, instead of seeking sensationalism by revealing every day some more information an approach which can only be profitable to the member who wants to make the headlines, to the accused or to the person suspected of some illegal action, Madam Speaker, I think that every member should rather give the information to whom it may concern, as suggested by the Minister of Justice, to the officers of the RCMP so that an official inquiry be carried on.

[Mr. Fox.]

In fact, all the evidence presented to the government has been referred to the RCMP so they can accomplish the work with the great expertise recognized most of the time by hon. members opposite when they are not indulging in childish political partisanship.

The hon. member for Central Nova also mentioned things that I consider not too serious, things which did not relate to this debate at all. He started mentioning the PTV, passenger transport vehicles in use at Mirabel Airport. He found with a certain smile great relief in the fact that a certain PTV malfunctioned on the opening day of the airport.

Madam Speaker, he even went to the point of criticizing the operators of those PTV's. Those operators come from my area, they are the guys from home, the guys who were hired by Manpower Centres in three constituencies of the Mirabel and Greater Montreal areas. Those guys met every standard required by the Department of Transport, attended the necessary courses to perform their task, and they are now being childishly accused of not being able to perform their work.

I think it is somewhat disgusting to stress the kind of minor incident which was reported by the hon. member for Central Nova. Besides, he talked about Mirabel before and I guess it will not be the last time he will do so. For instance, he said, as the Minister of Transport stressed today, that some difficulty was experienced with respect to runways, and actually the Minister of Transport thoroughly disproved his statement.

That again is another example of a groundless representation, after what the Minister of Transport mentioned to the House this afternoon. But he is not afraid of those unfounded representations to the House. Not in the least.

I might also stress to him the fact that the development and design of Mirabel are the results, Madam Speaker, of the work of thousands of Quebec people and Canadians who are to us, in my area, a striking example of the genius of our province, and we will not have this kind of slander, this kind of libel which he thinks he is entitled to whether true or not, as he said when he mentioned examples this afternoon.

I shall tell him that the House of Commons is not the place for gossip, rumors, libel through anonymous affidavits. Opposition members dare cry out "shame". In my opinion, when a member rises and holds up to the House of Commons, to the members of this House, anonymous affidavits to tarnish the reputations of some people, I think this cry of "shame" does in fact fit opposition members much better.

Madam Speaker, if the hon. member, instead of wishing to enhance his reputation with gossips and rumours, brought forward some evidence of bad conduct, I would be the first one to support and back him up, because I really believe in an honest and just public administration in this country. That is just what we have and unless the hon. member has specific evidence to give us, I think he should wait until he is in position to do do.

Madam Speaker, some members opposite while they like to criticize government members prove by their protests, as soon as we pay them back in their own coin, that it is unacceptable, that in a certain way, members sitting on this side of the House must bear their criticisms whether they are justified or not. Well, I tell them from this side of the House that each time they want to launch attacks as stupid and ridiculous as the debate this afternoon, we will pay them back in their own coin, argument for argument but not like the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), insult for insult, because we on this side of the House do not believe in the kind of language used by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain during this debate, a language which is not to the credit of members opposite. Further, I know very well that a number of them would not support the kind of remarks that were made, the language used this evening by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

As far as the hon. member opposite is concerned, I shall wait, I will come to him latter on. I will discuss one by one the attitudes of members opposite, if they will wait. I now come to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). In a style exclusive to him, because nobody on this side would imitate it, he said the current situation is horrible, that we have reached the point where the RCMP are making raids in the offices and homes of parliamentarians. And in the same breath the hon. member goes on to say the government is "stonewalling" opposition charges. There is a clear contradiction there. Such inconsistent logic is hidden behind the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton's customary eloquence. And not fearing anything, he said in conclusion it is important an investigation be made on the matter, implicating no investigation is being made. If the RCMP raided a parliamentarian's office, if they are making raids here and there, how is it possible to suggest the government is doing nothing to clear these charges? I believe the hon. member is neither inconsistent or hard of hearing. He concluded in a certain manner, and I might paraphrase him in his own mother tongue: "If there is nothing to hide, open-up".

Finally, what a novel principle! Let us push aside serious investigations, let us open the door now to large public inquests. Let us open the door to insinuations. Let us open the door to innuendoes, charges they themselves called "prima facie allegations". But where then, may I ask, are our most basic principles?

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) said that procedures before "law offices of the Crown", before officials of the Department of Justice, may lead to abuse. I presume the idea was that maybe the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General, after investigation by the RCMP, would shelve the latter's report. Frankly, I wonder how far the hon. member has gone, if he believes that kind of thing would be done on this side. The hon. member said this happened before, and in the context of his own indication, since the matter has been made public, he demonstrates such a situation is now impossible. In order that such a thing be true, three things would be required. First, that the Minister of Justice put the lid on the file. Second, that the Solicitor General put the lid on the file. Third, that the RCMP commissioner put the lid on the file.

And finally, the hon. member said that it is precisely what happened. After all, if that had happened, I suppose the file would have been buried, which it has not been.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member—

● (2150)

[English]

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Madam Speaker, It is a sad day in this House of Commons when the Liberal party will not stop thumping their desks so that a member of the opposition can speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reynolds: The hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox) said this debate was getting to a low point. I thought that low was reached in his speech. He talked about 1963, Madam Speaker, and he was not here in 1963.

An hon. Member: Take your hands out of your pockets.

Mr. Reynolds: I just wish the hon. member would read the debates of 1963. He would see that the ministers in his government who resigned at that time resigned because of accusations made by members on this side of the House who made accusations against the Liberal party that was corrupt at that time. I suggest to him that the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), who have made accusations in this House tonight, have also made those accusations outside this House of Commons.

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River will make the same accusations he made in this House tonight outside the House of Commons to any press member, and if Mr. Teron wants to sue him he can do so.

An hon. Member: Are you his lawyer?

Mr. Reynolds: I do not have to be a lawyer to tell you that those facts can be backed. Next week, when the hon. member for Central Nova starts bringing out more of his file, just remember who just spoke and wanted to support us in getting a judicial inquiry into this sorry mess that is before this House of Commons now.

The government tells us to put it to the police, to bring matters up in a proper way. I have had some questions on the cleaning contract at Vancouver International Airport, the baggage contract there, the parking garage construction contract, and the new parking lot contract. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) was going to speak tonight on the car rental contracts at the Vancouver airport, but we cannot get answers from the government or the civil service about what is going on in those contracts. If we cannot get them that is why we have to make accusations in this House. If the government would make sure the opposition's questions were answered in a true and unbiased fashion we would not have to bring accusations in this House.

If we had got the information when we looked into the cement inquiry in British Columbia where some prominent Liberal members were involved and got fined—thank God we have a new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) who tells us this will not happen again—we would have seen management people who collected more in bonuses than they had to pay in fines.

My time is up, Madam Speaker, but I want to finish by saying I back my colleagues. I want to thank the hon.

member for Central Nova for bringing up this debate in the House today. We are not afraid to back up our statements, but the Liberal members are ashamed of what is happening in their party, and ashamed to bring it before the people of Canada.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 58 the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—FREIGHT RATES—DISPARITY BETWEEN RATE ON FRESH FRUIT FROM OKANAGAN TO EASTERN CANADA AND RATE FROM STATE OF WASHINGTON

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Madam Speaker, the question which I am debating tonight should concern both the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). Because of the disparity between the cost of transportation for fruit, mainly apples, from Washington state to eastern Canada, and Okanagan or Canadian apples to eastern Canada, it probably concerns the Minister of Transport more. However, this sort of problem should concern the Government of Canada as a whole.

The disparity is 43 cents a bushel box in favour of the United States apple growers, This will amount to $318,000 on the almost 890 cars of apples that have to be shipped into eastern Canada if the Okanagan Valley is to sell its large crop that was produced this year.

This is one cent per pound to the apple producer. It may not sound like much, but it is a tremendous amount to the apple producer of the Okanagan Valley, certainly when one realizes that he has to absorb it all. If he is to convince the five remaining apple buyers in eastern Canada to buy his product, he must be competitive especially as to price. With the buying power in so few hands, there is just no question of loyalty to Canadian producers anymore.

● (2200)

The Canadian apple producer must ship to eastern Canada on a delivered basis in order to meet this unfair competitive advantage. It means he must absorb the freight difference. It has to come directly out of his pocket. No one else in the total scheme of things suffers, and it is doubtful if the house wife will get her apples for a cent a pound less.

No wonder the apple producer becomes very upset. Talk about tariffs! Talk about free-trade in Canada! This one operation alone, given the high cost of transportation when the Canadian railways arbitrarily decide to charge what the traffic will bear, gives our competitors in the United States an advantage that far outweighs any tariff protection we may have ever had. And when I say this, this does not just apply to apples alone in Canada. It also applies to the many other products being manufactured in Canada, especially by the small struggling manufacturer desperately trying to build his business, to keep up and to compete.

A good example of this is the manufacture of parta-board in Grand Forks, British Columbia. This company is struggling to maintain its market in eastern Canada against the freight rate advantage enjoyed by the competition from the United States. There are undoubtedly hundreds of manufacturers in the same position in Canada, whether it be in western Canada or eastern Canada.

Going back to apples, it is no wonder that the balance of trade in apples, Canada versus the United States, has so dramatically changed over the past four years. Four years ago when I left the industry as an official, we were shipping one million boxes of apples to the United States, and the United States was shipping almost one million boxes into Canada a very good balance and one with which we were not too unhappy. However, when one takes a look at the record today, just a short time later, it is astounding to see that the number of boxes of apples coming into Canada is almost three million, or three times what it was four years ago, and the amount of apples shipped from Canada to the United States is going down under the million mark.

I say to the minister, take a look at these records, because there is no doubt that the Canadian railways have to take some of the responsibility for what has happened in this balance of trade. Over the last few years we have been very short of cars to ship to eastern Canada and for export. This could well happen again this year, which would be very disastrous on top of the disparity in freight rates.

I say to the Minister of Transport that when he replies, almost in a sad dejected way, to my question by saying that he has no power over the railways, he had better make strong representation to them to the effect that it is when these companies, or monopolies if you will, fail to perform their functions properly in the best interest of the Canadian people that we must have more government interference.

I do not like to see more government interference or government power applied, but I recognize that it must happen when the Canadian railways are failing the people. When freight rates in Canada become a bigger barrier to Canadian manufacturers than tariffs, the minister must do some in depth soul-searching on this subject. Do not tell us you have no power. The Canadian government is all powerful. Let's not have the feeling that the railways run Canada. Either they do their job properly, or you must get the power so that you can be sure that they do it properly.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member no doubt knows, he raises an issue tonight which touches close to my heart as a westerner, and about which pretty well everyone from my part of Canada holds strong views. This evening, as we discuss this subject for which I have a great deal of sympathy, most members in the Chamber are either westerners or maritimers. That shows how widespread is the concern on this subject.

Perhaps I can begin to assist my hon friend tonight by relating some background on this most contentious subject of freight rates which is of great interest to Canadians and, certainly, to the government.

For a number of years, as he indicated, the rates on fruit coming out of both the Okanagan Valley and Washington State were at pretty well the same level. Fairly recently, Canadian railways began to increase their rates to a significant extent. As justification, the railways cite increases in costs which have gone up tremendously. They argue that previous rates, even existing rates, do not seem to provide a sufficient return on investment.

To explain the differential between Canada and the United States, the railways point to such cost differences as the spread between the price of a refrigeration car in Canada and the price of the same unit for moving fresh fruit in the United States. Canadian purchases of such equipment cost something in the order of $20,000 more than they do on the American side. In addition, locomotives cost more in Canada. As a result of these factors, and perhaps others, relevant Canadian and U.S. freight rates for fruit coming from the west have started to part in favour of the American grower.

There have been extensive discussions, and probably more will follow—I hope they will—between officials of the Ministry of Transport and of the railways on this topic and, of course, on other freight rate issues.

As the hon. member knows, and as he has stated this evening, under present legislative arrangements the railways have the legal authority to establish rates within certain rules. The railways are, of course, subject to the current economic restraint program and must comply with the guidelines. In particular, I would refer here to the 95 per cent of margin rule. Further restrictions upon specific freight rates such as the hon. member has in mind, or in connection with freight rates generally, would require changes in legislation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ST. PIERRE-MIQUELON—DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE ON DETERMINATION OF OFFSHORE RESOURCE RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, I was hoping the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Baker) would be replying to my question tonight since he comes from my own province which is so lovely. In any case, I hope to get some more response with regard to a question I directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) on November 12, having to do with bilateral discussions between Canada and certain other nations on fisheries matters following the multi-national negotiations which have taken place at various conferences on the Law of the Sea.

It is obvious that bilateral negotiations are going on between Canada and other nations such as Norway, Mexico, the United States, and now these discussions are being extended to include other nations such as Poland, Spain, and Portugal. But what bothers me is the fact that no mention is ever made of any discussions that are taking place between Canada and France. It is a wonder, because Canada is in the position where even if she wanted to extend unilaterally a 200 mile limit, the French nation has a trump card in that it possesses, sovereignty over St. Pierre-Miquelon, which juts out right in front of Newfoundland. It is not only in that strategic position but more definitely in front of Canada and the North American continent.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs can tell me as often as he wants that he will take my questions as notice because he doesn't have the answers at his fingertips, but he is as well aware as I was when extracting the answers from his department that there are on-going negotiations between his department and the French authorities on the establishment of equidistant boundaries between the Burin peninsula in Newfoundland and the land mass of St. Pierre-Miquelon.

The minister knows as well as I do what is going on, and it smacks of a jellyfish attitude that Canada will not exert her right to demand that a nation with the land mass of Canada should not have to resort to accepting equidistant boundaries with a land mass of such minuscule proportions, and accept the assertion of France which continues to treat Canadians as country cousins.

● (2210)

The islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon lie, at their closest point, 14 nautical miles south of Newfoundland, but the Canadian island known as Little Green Island lies only three miles from the French coastline. Canada's view is that a median line should be drawn between Little Green and St. Pierre, which would put the boundary one and a half miles from the French coast. The French have argued that the boundary should be mid-channel between their islands and the Burin peninsula, which would give no territorial sea at all to Green Island, which is part of Canada.

I could go on and deal with the facts I have extracted from research that I have done, but it is becoming more obvious every day that Canada with its great land mass does not have the guts to say to the French nation, which is treating us like country cousins, that it has a little blob of land close to Canada which is denying Canada's right to extend its limit to 200 miles. Indeed the French are saying that they can extend their limits as of their own right.

One of the things I have not mentioned is Canada's position as it concerns France, which should be of more importance than geography. France did not invite Canada to the economic conference of six nations, and France still owes us a bill of $11 million when they kicked us out of their NATO bases. It is now 1975 and we do not have the guts to demand payment of the bill. The only excuse the government gives is that it is waiting to see what the United States is going to do about its $100 million bill and the bill of the United Nations amounting to $380 million.

I can only deplore the position Canada is taking in allowing this little blob of land, ten miles by ten, to deny our rights to protect the mineral resources of this country, a matter so important to the province of Newfoundland and to the oil resources off the shores of Newfoundland. We are allowing this nation to hold this over our heads and demand what they can of the North American continent.

To me the whole situation smacks of stupidity. It is ridiculous, and makes Canada look like an embarrassed little dot in the eyes of the world.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to reply to the hon. member. I do so, of course, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and his parliamentary secretary. May I begin by extending to the hon. member the regret of the minister and his parliamentary secretary at being unable to be present this evening to respond directly to the hon. member's concerns.

I should like to advise the House on the status of our negotiations with France concerning the delimitation of the continental shelf in the area off the islands of St. Pierre et Miquelon. With respect to the narrow waters lying directly between the north and eastern coasts of the St. Pierre and Miquelon islands and the Newfoundland mainland, the agreement between Canada and France on their mutual fishing relations which came into force in March, 1972, provides for a delimitation line between the territorial waters of Canada and the zones submitted to the fishery jurisdiction of France. Negotiations between Canada and France were held in 1972 with respect to the delimitation of the continental shelf in the area to the south of the French islands, but these negotiations have proven inconclusive for the time being.

Following the conclusion of the Law of the Sea Conference, both sides will have more time to pursue further negotiations and hopefully arrive at a satisfactory resolution of this question.

TRANSPORT—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO USE OF CANADIAN SHIPS TO MOVE OIL FROM ARCTIC

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, concern over the presence in Canada of Arctic vessels other than those of Canadian ownership carrying Canadian crews prompted me the other day, as it has other hon. members of the House, to question the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) with respect to assurances that the government was giving consideration to introducing legislation that would have the effect of requiring removal of natural resources from the Canadian Arctic by Canadian ships of Canadian registry.

For ten years that I can remember in this House such an undertaking has been the expressed concern of myself and, as I mentioned, of many others. In recent years we have had the assurance of ministers such as the immediate past occupant of that portfolio that such, indeed, was the desired objective. Indeed tomorrow, if all goes well, we should have before the House for second reading the new, and I suggest most welcome, maritime code legislation.

What gives rise to apprehension is the absence of any direction in this new bill dealing with the question of closing the area north of 60 degrees by way of legislative action.

The question was prompted by the efforts, for example, of Panarctic to secure from outside Canada the type of ship which would be capable of transporting liquid natural gas from the Arctic to the eastern seaboard. That is not to mention plans that are currently on-going in the United States for the transportation of oil and other resources out of the Arctic, that portion that lies contiguous to U.S. soil, eastward through the northwest passage and then down the eastern seaboard to U.S. refineries.

Having regard to the intention in respect of the north, I could go through a long series of correspondence. As recently as the end of July the former minister of transport, after a long explanation as to why we had not done anything particular at this point in time, went on to say in a letter signed by him:

—it would be less than realistic for me to suggest that we could, at the present time, envisage a policy which banned under any circumstances, any importation whatsoever of any vessel—or technology for any vessel—destined for use in the Canadian Arctic.

That is going a little bit far and I do not think anybody would really suggest that. What we are really going after is what was suggested by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) on October 25, as reported in the Calgary Albertan. The minister was speaking to some 300 businessmen at a conference on the north. He said the following, and I will quote only the pertinent parts. He said government policy was intended to:

"—achieve more substantial" results in the effort to keep the benefit of northern development in Canada.

In particular he said he would:

Increase the purchase of equipment and services for development from Canadian firms;

Increase the "participation of firms beneficially owned and controlled" by Canadians;

Encourage resource companies "to rationalize their sourcing purchasing in Canada for their world operations."

It is more along these lines that those in the House who have some concern for development in the north rise to seek assurances and commitments from the government that it indeed will go in this direction.

No one expects Canada to be able to supply our shipping needs over night. There are interim periods of adjustment which have to be made. The provisions for the orderly issuance of permits for the orderly development of an operational capability have to be taken into consideration. We are aware of the need for co-operation, and we are aware of the need to look elsewhere from time to time for certain types of expertise. However, we appear not only to ourselves here in this Chamber, but to those throughout the world, to be ignoring the potential of the Arctic. One of our first steps must surely be to require that after a certain date, probably 1985, no resources should be removed by water from Canada's northern waters other than in Canadian-built, beneficially Canadian-owned and Canadian crewed ships. This is the least that is acceptable to Canadians.

To fail in this will be to abandon to foreign cartels the benefits of "first in" in respect of extractive industry in the north. Surely the government recognizes the position of the shipping community in this regard. Give the Canadian shipping community a reason to start planning and it will act. Here in Canada we have the technology and the expertise; we have the capacity to raise the fundings, the capacity to expand our shipyards to accommodate the required building program, and we have the capacity to produce the trained crews. In spite of what some may think, we have a highly stable seafaring labour pool. I say "stable" in the sense that no strikes have occurred, for example, in the SIU since the departure from our shores of Hal Banks.

● (2220)

I will simply call upon the parliamentary secretary and the government to serve notice that it is in fact our intention to move in this direction, that it is our intention to bar foreign shipping from these northern waters. I call upon the government to prepare legislation for submission to parliament during this session, and not waste four or five more years while we lose the opportunity. I say that where we need foreign expertise and help let us get it, and where we need co-operation let us have co-operation, but whatever we do let us give notice to the world that it is our intention to protect the extractive industry for ourselves.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, recently there has been discussion in the House concerning the use of Canadian ships in the Arctic, at which time the minister replied to certain queries posed by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). In view of the interest which has been expressed, it is apparent that a somewhat more detailed response might be of value to the House.

The matter of Arctic shipping is an important area, and new policies to assist Canadian shipping were announced in the Speech from the Throne and in the statement of new transportation policies for frontier areas of Canada. The general theme has been one of the need to encourage Canadian ship operators, builders, and designers to take initiatives and develop the new technology and operating skills for future large scale developments. The most direct and meaningful development is that of the Arctic "Class 2" icebreaking cargo vessel, to be built and operated by the Canadian shipping industry with government participation and financial support.

I am pleased to be able to report that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) made an announcement on this very project just this afternoon. This particular vessel, which will be called the MV Arctic, a famous name in the annals of exploration of the Canadian Arctic, is a bulk carrier designed to operate in the high Arctic where two lead zinc mines are now in different stages of development. The Strathcona Mine on Strathcona Sound is due to come on stream in 1978-79. The Canadian government has an 18 per cent share in this mine. The second mine, at Little Cornwallis, so called the Polaris Project by Cominco, is presently seeking an export permit and is due to begin export in 1978-79 also.

There is no explicit policy which requires the use of Canadian vessels for movement of goods or minerals out of Canada, as there is for the coasting trade. However, in the granting of export permits both the mineral mines mentioned will be required to offer, if available, a proportion of their production to Canadian ships. It should also be noted that Bill C-61, the Maritime Code Act, which is now before the House, contains additional provisions to reserve the coasting trade for Canadian shipping.

Officials of the Ministry of Transport, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and INA are presently working on the matter of transportation and related industrial benefits associated with this element of resource development. The MV Arctic was conceived and supported by private industry, Federal Commerce and Navigation, with the co-operation of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Ministry of Transport. This support was based on the need to encourage the construction of Arctic ships which are more expensive than normal vessels, for early mineral developments, and to use this ship as a model or prototype of larger vessels for movement of oil and gas out of the Arctic to southern Canada to meet future energy requirements.

Such requirements are becoming more urgent and the consensus is that only ships can be used, at least initially, to move the oil to market. The transportation of oil from the Arctic Islands, or an offshore island in the Arctic, to the Canadian mainland is subject to the new coasting trade laws and as such the cargo will be reserved to Canadian-flag vessels.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 21, 1975

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

HIGHWAY SAFETY

PROPOSED SUPPORT FOR LEGISLATION MAKING USE OF SEAT BELTS COMPULSORY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, guided by your advice and the advice of others in this House, I would rise to propose a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the impending proclamation of legislation making the use of seat belts compulsory in one and perhaps two or more provinces by January 1 of next year, and realizing the high density of interprovincial traffic which could be seriously inconvenienced by the proliferation of differing rules in this field of public safety, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane):

That this House supports the efforts of provincial governments in implementing laws designed to protect Canadians through the legislated use of safety belts, and encourages these governments to achieve uniformity across Canada in such laws, where practical.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House before the said motion can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINES TO FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture said in response to my question on October 22 that marketing boards would be specifically subject to review by the Anti-Inflation Board and that the Anti-Inflation Board would be in a position to demand justification from marketing boards for increases in prices, I should like to know how the Minister of Finance reconciles that with his position before the House committee yesterday when he said that the Anti-Inflation Board is welcome to "monitor anything it wants" but it will have no authority over the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman would note if he went on to read the transcript, I pointed out that the Act does not provide for enforcement procedures against the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency. We had a very lengthy discussion about this in the committee, and I made it clear that indeed the board could monitor and could make inquiries of the agency in respect of any particular act, and then make reports to the government and to the public in this particular area, but it is the enforcement procedures that do not apply in that particular case.

Mr. Stanfield: In other words, Mr. Speaker, the latest version is that the guidelines do not apply to marketing boards, contrary to the impression given earlier. I understand the Minister of Finance suggested before the committee yesterday that the government would be prepared to intervene where necessary in connection with practices of marketing boards. I want to ask the minister whether it is therefore the declared policy of the government that there is no regulation of marketing boards by the anti-inflationary apparatus but that there may be intervention by the government to regulate prices by marketing boards where the government considers this to be politically expedient.

● (1110)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I gave testimony at very considerable length yesterday on this matter and responded to questions. I just say to the hon. gentleman that he should not misrepresent the position. It is the one I stated this morning. It is clear that the enforcement provisions do not apply to the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency or other marketing boards, but that the guidelines do apply and the Anti-Inflation Board can indeed monitor the conduct of that or any other marketing board and make representations on the subject either to the public or the government. I suggest that the appropriate course of action to be taken at that point would be to act under the other law that has been passed by parliament to deal particularly with stabilization programs under which the board has been created. That was the position taken yesterday and the position taken today. It is of no particular assistance to have it misrepresented, Mr. Speaker.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—AREAS IN WHICH BOARD HAS NO AUTHORITY TO INTERVENE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): It is of no particular assistance to this House to have the position with regard to marketing boards misrepresented from time to time by ministers. I am seeking clarification and am attempting to have the minister reconcile what he said yesterday with what has been said elsewhere and previously in this House. Finally, I want to ask the minister how he can say that in fact the marketing boards are subject to the guidelines when there is no one to enforce the guidelines unless the government intervenes. I should like to ask the minister also, in how many areas the government is reserving unto itself the right to intervene from time to time in this arbitrary fashion in areas where the Anti-Inflation Board and the administrator have no such authority?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are a great many laws passed by this parliament. This also was dealt with at length yesterday in the committee. I think it is very clear on the record that there are a great many other responsibilities given by parliament to various bodies, for example the Canadian Transport Commission and others, to apply the guidelines in their decisions. In no sense could this be regarded as arbitrary. We have said to the whole country we would hope the country as a whole would support the guidelines in the interest of restraining inflation in this country. I have said and repeat that the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency and other institutions in the country would be expected to observe the guidelines. If they are not doing so the Anti-Inflation Board can scrutinize their conduct and can report on this to the government. The obviously sensible course, under an Act which has been passed by parliament with regard to that agency, is that action be taken by the government under that law and that in no sensible way could be referred to as being arbitrary.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—AUTHORITY TO SEIZE BOOKS OF MARKETING BOARDS TO DECIDE ON JUSTIFICATION OF PRICE INCREASES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my questions flow from the testimony of the minister yesterday and the questions of the Leader of the Opposition today. Since the marketing boards under federal jurisdiction will be exempt from the enforcement provisions of the act hence the administrator would have no authority on the minister's own admission to seize the books of these agencies to justify their increases in prices on the basis of increases in production costs, may I ask the minister what or whom in the government will be examining the books of these agencies if in fact they do not adhere to the guidelines which are by his own admission voluntary guidelines; who will be examining these books to justify whether or not increased production costs justify increases in prices?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member of the opinion he was given yesterday by legal counsel that the board does not have the authority to seize anybody's books, but that the Anti-Inflation Board does have the right to seek information with regard to the operation of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency and, under the statute which created that agency, the government of course is entitled to have full disclosure of information from that marketing board. If, from the scrutiny that the vice-chairman of the board has indicated she will be carrying on in this particular instance, there is some indication that there apparently have been unjustified increases, the government will have the power to follow this through.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT ON APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINES TO MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In view of the discussions that took place here in the last days with the federal and provincial officials, and in view of the fact that the government itself is not prepared to set the example for the provinces with respect to marketing boards that are under their jurisdiction, may I ask the minister what agreement has been reached with the provinces with respect to marketing boards, the majority of which are under provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): As of yet there has been no agreement with the provinces on the question of marketing agencies. There is an obvious difficulty in applying a policy to the marketing boards which, whether federal or provincial, have the long run objective of providing stability in agricultural commodities and thereby ensuring not only a fair return to producers but a fair price for consumers. But this does indeed remain an important consideration that the provincial bodies, just as the federal, should operate within the guidelines to which we have asked the whole country to adhere.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PRICE FREEZE ON FOOD ITEMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Considering that when Bill C-73 finally becomes law we will have effective wage and salary control but not price control and considering that the price freezes announced by some of the food chains yesterday exclude such essentials as meat, eggs and produce, items which account for the bulk of food purchases, would the government now consider initiating a real price freeze on all food items?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I do not accept the preamble of the hon. member's question. Of course, with regard to food, as with regard to other commodities, if there are cost increases from time to time then inevitably these will have to be passed on so that a freeze for any length of time would only make certain that there would not be adequate supplies coming through on the market for Canadian consumers rather than assisting the situation.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PRICE FREEZE ON FOOD ITEMS ANNOUNCED BY SUPERMARKETS—WILL BE MONITORED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): To follow that up and to follow the announcement of the food chains made yesterday, will the minister assure the House that the items that the chains have claimed they will freeze now for a given period of time will be monitored by the government to ensure that these freezes are in fact kept on for the period which the companies announced?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I think it is clear that the chains have recognized the effectiveness of the gross margin controls that are provided for in the guidelines and the Anti-Inflation Board will be responsible for making certain that these gross profit margin controls continue to be applied and will be monitoring very carefully any mark-ups that occur.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINES TO OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a final supplementary question concerning prices but in the oil field. In view of the pervasive influence of energy prices throughout the economy, can the minister tell the House whether the government has reconsidered its position on oil prices and come to the decision that the anti-inflation guidelines should apply to the oil industry as well as to other sectors in the economy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): They do apply to the oil industry. If the hon. member is talking about petroleum companies, they do indeed apply to them. They do not apply to the OPEC nations, I can assure the hon. gentleman of that, but they do apply to petroleum companies as they do to anyone else.

* * *

[Translation]

AIR TRANSPORT

AIR TO GROUND COMMUNICATIONS—GOVERNMENT REACTION TO MR. McLISH'S GUIDELINES RELATING TO BILINGUALISM

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

When my colleague from Rimouski put his question the day before yesterday, I had an important supplementary, but unfortunately I was not recognized. Therefore, I would like to obtain today from the Minister of Transport some explanations on the matter. Could the minister say how he intends to thwart the instructions of Mr. McLish concerning air to ground communications, so that in that field we may at least respect the minimum requirements of the French fact in Canada?

● (1120)

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as was indicated by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons a couple of days ago, the current specific order to which the hon. member refers was not any essential change in policy in regard to the use of language in air traffic control. It had been understood, when my predecessor saw an order go forward which allowed the use of the French language in flights which are visual in nature, that those on instrument flights would not be allowed to use any language except English, and also that the airports would be limited to the five in question. The recent order which was issued was simply somewhat more precise in regard to definition of instrument flight as distinct from visual flight and was no change. I have been asking parties on all sides to act in the best possible faith in terms of our examination of the question of safety in relation to air traffic, while wanting to accommodate those pilots—to the extent possible and consistent with safety—who use the French language much more conveniently, or at all, compared with the English language.

The study in relation to the possible use of the French language in other areas of flight operations is going on with an assurance by me that safety will be always borne fully in mind in any change which is contemplated.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question. Could the minister say whether discussions are now being held on that subject between Ottawa and Quebec, taking into consideration the enforcement of the legislation making French the official language in Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Of course, provincial legislation has no direct bearing upon the use of language in terms of federal government operations or those controlled under federal jurisdiction where, rather, our official languages legislation is the controlling feature. Discussions are going on between my officials and various persons involved in the air industry concerning questions of language and safety. I had a conversation a week or so ago with Mr. Lalonde from the provincial government in Quebec. He is the minister responsible for certain questions relating to language.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR DELAY IN ACCEPTANCE BY FRANCE OF CREDENTIALS OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Considering that the new Canadian ambassador to France, Mr. Pelletier, has been cooling his heels for the past three weeks and more without being able to submit his credentials to President Giscard d'Estaing or Quai d'Orsay, and considering that this was to take place the day before yesterday but was postponed to today, and yesterday it was postponed again, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would advise the House what is happening and why?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall make inquiries about that, but I would not want anyone to draw the inference that there has been any deterioration whatever in relations between Canada and France.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wagner: Would the Acting Prime Minister undertake to look into this matter, to communicate with the ambassador and to advise the House if in fact this is not a further indication, in the aftermath of Rambouillet, of a deterioration of Franco-Canadian relations?

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear, but I said quite clearly that there has been no indication whatever of any deterioration in relations between Canada and France. Perhaps he is trying to create an impression like that. I deny it most vigorously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—POSSIBILITY OF RESUMING NEGOTIATIONS—ALLEGED UNION OFFER TO NEGOTIATE HOURS OF WORK

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House the Postmaster General indicated in answer to a question from the Leader of the Opposition that union and government negotiations might soon resume in the Post Office situation, and that the monetary package contained some flexibility that the government was prepared to consider. Has there been any progress in the past 24 hours to indicate that the government will be able to resolve the dispute in the near future and not have it continue until next Easter or until kingdom come as the Prime Minister said in Grey Cup country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard of any further negotiations that have taken place but I would not want the position of the Postmaster General to be misrepresented in any way. He made it very clear that as far as the monetary package was concerned the government has said its final word on that. The details do not affect that particular principle.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): A supplementary question. Has the government received any indication that, as reported yesterday in the London Free Press, the union would be willing to accept the monetary offer of $1.70 an hour but now wants to return to the bargaining table to negotiate other items such as hours of work?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if the union made that sort of offer to the Postmaster General I am sure he would accept it.

* * *

INDUSTRY

WORK GLOVES—SUGGESTED MODIFICATION OF TARIFFS AND MEETING WITH INDUSTRY REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has a decision been arrived at with respect to modifying the import tariff on cheap work gloves into Canada in view of the allegations and the concern expressed by Canadian manufacturers that the Hong Kong imports are causing grave prejudice to our home grown manufacturing industry? Is the minister prepared to meet with the industry spokesmen in the near future to discuss the problem with them?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would be quite prepared to meet with them at an appropriate date. In the meantime, activities and studies are going on in relation to this matter. I have been made aware of it and I met with the Clothing and Textile Board on Monday. I hope we will have some decision on this matter in the relatively near future, although I cannot be specific as to dates at the moment.

* * *

ENERGY

OIL—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES PRIOR TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF REDUCTION IN EXPORTS—POSSIBILITY OF RETALIATORY MEASURES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Could the minister tell the House whether there was discussion with the appropriate United States representatives before the public announcement of the oil export cuts to that country?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I met with officials of the United States about ten days ago.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question. Can the minister tell the House what the reaction of the officials of the United States government was in response to the announcement of the Canadian government's policy. Can he assure the House that no substantive retaliatory measures will be taken by the United States in other areas.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think the United States officials understand the facts as well as we do. When there is no oil to export there is no oil to export. Clearly, it was an unpleasant piece of information that I had to convey to them but they accepted it.

* * *

TRANSPORT

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE—NEED FOR IMPROVEMENT FOLLOWING WITHDRAWAL OF WOOD ISLANDS-CARIBOU SERVICE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Transport is on the same subject as an inquiry directed to him the other day by the honourable and gallant member from Malpeque. Can the minister advise if appropriate steps have been taken to update the Borden-Tormentine ferry service to meet the heavy demand being placed upon it consequent upon the withdrawal of the Wood Islands-Caribou service?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my inquiry indicated that the capacity available was in fact meeting the needs of the moment. If the hon. member has any specific information to the contrary I will be able to look further into the matter.

* * *

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED ORDER REQUIRING MANUFACTURERS TO BRING SALES TAX PAYMENTS TO FEDERAL OFFICE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Federal sales tax is normally paid by mail but in Belleville this week manufacturers are being told to bring their payments in to the federal tax office or face penalties. Will the minister countermand this very unfair order and allow manufacturers to mail their tax payments as usual so that the government will begin to suffer the consequences of their own policies?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the people who can will comply with the order. The second part of the hon. member's question strikes me as being patently unfair, and I will have to look at it.

* * *

COMBINES

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED PRICE MANIPULATIONS BY TOBACCO COMPANIES

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Could I have one supplementary, Mr. Speaker?

In view of the fact that companies purchasing tobacco on the farmers' auction exchanges in Delhi, Tillsonburg and Aylmer have consistently offered prices lower than last year, despite increased cost to farmers, all of which have given rise to allegations of price manipulations on the part of the companies, will the minister immediately launch an investigation into the validity of these charges?

● (1130)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take this suggestion into consideration and refer it to the proper minister.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Acting Prime Minister discuss these allegations with the Minister of Agriculture upon his return to Ottawa, as he is familiar with the operation of marketing boards?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF RESUMING NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): May I clarify an answer I gave to the hon. member who asked me about the possible resumption of postal negotiations. I did not hear the question accurately. A colleague has told me that one of the conditions is a change in the hours of work, which is part of the monetary package and not negotiable.

* * *

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR EXPANSION OF PENSION AREAS DEALT WITH IN BILL C-52—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and arises from the firm undertaking the parliamentary secretary gave last night to the special joint committee. He suggested, when dealing with Bill C-52, that the government would not entertain motions to expand the areas affected by the bill with respect to pensions beyond the royal recommendation. Is the government contemplating further legislation, perhaps early in the New Year, dealing with five or six major areas which the government, for whatever reason, has not included in Bill C-52.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board, at the appropriate time, will make a statement on this matter.

* * *

CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY

ALLEGED RESIGNATION OF CHAIRMAN, MR. WORSDALE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. Will he confirm if Mr. Leslie Worsdale, the Chairman of CEMA, resigned last night and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm it. I am not aware of the fact, if it is one.

* * *

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA REPORTING REGULARLY TO PARLIAMENT ON MONETARY POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance? The Governor of the Bank of Canada having said that there has never been any doubt about where the ultimate responsibility for monetary policy resides, it resides with parliament, will the minister say if consideration has been given to allowing the Governor of the Bank of Canada to report regularly to parliament, say, every three months, when he could indicate what is to be the monetary stance of the Bank of Canada for the next ensuing period?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may correct the hon. gentleman. Parliament, under legislation governing the central bank, has given ultimate responsibility for monetary policy to the Minister of Finance. When the minister makes policy statements from time to time, they result from discussions between the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance. I am not sure if it would be useful to initiate the periodic practice; certainly, it would be useful if the Governor were to appear regularly before the standing committee, to discuss the principles underlying the decisions taken from time to time on monetary policy.

STATEMENT OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA ON PERCENTAGE GROWTH IN MONEY SUPPLY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that when the Governor of the Bank of Canada appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs he indicated that, according to his estimate, the proper monetary stance for Canada would be a growth in the money supply of not less than 10 per cent and not more than 15 per cent? If the minister is aware of this, does he agree with the Governor, bearing in mind that the suggested growth in our money supply is twice as large as the growth of the money supply in the United States, which is to be kept between 5 per cent and 7½ per cent?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if the hon. member opposes the Governor's point of view, he advocates for Canada a very strict monetary policy and, therefore, a very high rate of unemployment.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a final supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? Does the minister consider that a growth rate between 10 per cent and 15 per cent in our money supply which, incidentally, will be the highest rate of growth in the past 30 years after real economic growth is discounted, is acceptable? Second, how can he relate such growth to the government's announced restraint program?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Apparently the hon. member has not read attentively what the Governor said. The hon. member suggested that the figure would be 15 per cent, after real growth had been taken into account. The Governor made it clear that one of the elements included in the growth of the money supply would be the real growth rate. What is more, the Governor set it as an objective and said, in his testimony, that it would be below 15 per cent.

[Mr. Stevens.]

ENERGY

OIL—POSSIBLE TAKEOVER OF INDUSTRY BY PETRO-CANADA TO INCREASE EXPLORATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the National Energy Board report tabled yesterday shows that the oil companies are slowing their exploration programs, despite the substantially increased profits of the first nine months of this year, on top of their astronomical profits last year, is the government not convinced that the time has come for it to use Petro-Canada to take over a substantial segment of the western oil industry, for the purpose of expanding exploration and launching a secondary recovery program in the western oilfields?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has read more than the National Energy Board report when he suggests that there has been a slowdown of exploration in Canada. Dealing with the second proposition, that Petro-Canada should take over a substantial part of the oil industry, I assure the hon. member that my party does not stand for nationalization of the oil industry in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: We believe that joint public and private enterprise can and will answer the need for Canadian exploration and development.

OIL AND GAS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PRICE INCREASES WILL BE WITHIN ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the minister is reported to have said at yesterday's press conference that the prices of oil and natural gas will probably rise after July 1 next, will the minister assure the House that any increase in price of domestically-produced oil or gas will be within the guidelines of the anti-inflation program?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker. It has been made clear a number of times that the hon. member and the House cannot expect that. Indeed, the white paper makes it clear that the oil industry is in a separate category. There may be some confusion between the hon. member and his leader as to whether we are talking about wellhead prices, or costs after the wellhead. I think the Minister of Finance made it clear in his answer this morning that the guidelines will apply after the wellhead.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary question? I do not think my leader and I ought to get together; I suggest that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources ought to get together; if you put the two together, you will have one whole wit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I ask the minister, will the consumer price of oil and gas be raised after July 1, in accordance with the government's guidelines laid down in the anti-inflation program?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if there is to be an increase in the wellhead price of oil, I expect that increase, that crude increment, to be passed on in higher prices consistent with the guidelines.

* * *

● (1140)

[Translation]

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN DREE GRANTS AND INSTALLATION OF ANTI-POLLUTION DEVICES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

Considering that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion sometimes dictates specifications to certain industries, such as those which install anti-pollution devices and which, to this effect, apply for grants, and considering that the payment of grants is delayed until the Department of the Environment has made its recommendations, in other words after the work has been done, could the minister tell this House whether final acceptance of the installation of these systems comes under the federal department or under the Quebec department of environment?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, when the Department of Regional Economic Expansion gives a grant to an industrial establishment, the latter must comply with the norms set by the Department of the Environment in two ways. First, as the federal government finances part of this enterprise, the company must comply with the standards of the Department of the Environment on the anti-pollution equipment. The province is responsible for implementation of these standards. Any new establishment must comply immediately with the standards. Now, the federal government allows these industries to amortize this anti-pollution equipment over a period of two years, which is very quickly. Therefore, it does not hamper new industrial establishments in any way.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion a supplementary question.

In light of the answer the Minister of the Environment has just given, may I ask the minister if, when subsidies are delayed because the Quebec department concurrence is overdue, it is his department's responsibility to speed up the answer or certification of the provincial ministry of the environment and can it do so to prevent the industry which is relying on the subsidies from being penalized?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell the hon. member that it is not specifically our responsibility to do so, but there is no doubt our department is eager to make payments in keeping with the agreement. We try as much as possible to prevail upon our provincial counterparts so that the measures you are referring to may be accepted and the necessary inspections carried out before the payments are made. We try to be as informal as possible to win their cooperation.

* * *

[English]

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

DATE OF DECISION ON CONTRACT CLAUSE BOYCOTTING TRADE WITH ISRAEL

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On June 2 last the former minister stated that the government was considering what its policy should be on the matter of the Export Development Corporation and the Arab boycott of Israel. On July 25, I asked that minister whether the government had completed its consideration of the matter. He replied it was still under consideration. Has the cabinet now completed its consideration and, if so, what conclusion has it reached?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, it has not completed its consideration. This has been basically as a result of my preoccupation with other matters in the few weeks since I have taken over. However, I believe it is scheduled for consideration either two or three weeks from Monday coming.

* * *

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—DATE OF RESUMPTION OF OPERATIONS

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In his absence, I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Ninety-nine per cent of the inside workers and letter carriers in the vast area of the Churchill constituency are now back to work. When will this government make arrangements to get mail moving so that Canadians and postal workers in this large area who want to work will have that opportunity?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is our hope that inside postal workers throughout the country, will soon be following the same course as those in Churchill.

* * *

PENITENTIARIES

MILLHAVEN—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON GASING AND BEATING OF INMATES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Solicitor General. The report on the investigation of the November 3 gasing and beatings at Millhaven is now before the Commissioner of Penitentiary Services. Is the Solicitor General in a position today to give the House a full report on the incident?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that following the gasing incident, there was a suspension of a penitentiary employee. That employee has now appealed the suspension. There will be a hearing shortly.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Can the Solicitor General tell the House whether any of the guards involved in the November 3 incident were involved in the 1971 Millhaven riots?

Mr. Allmand: I will have to check that, Mr. Speaker, and report to the hon. member.

* * *

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED RESTRICTIONS ON OPERATIONS OF FIELD AUDIT OFFICERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue. It is supplementary to the one I asked yesterday. The minister has notice of the question. Now that his army of auditors in British Columbia have been stripped of their armour, what are these people doing in the regional offices? Is it now time for me to inform my constituents that the Income Tax Act is voluntary in the same way that the anti-inflation program will be?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member on the beautiful way he puts his questions. Because of the notice given, I checked into the information that went to the officers to determine if what in fact the hon. member is implying is true. The last thing I want to do is strip them of anything.

* * *

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DATE OF SIGNING AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. In August the minister told officials in the Okanagan that she was going to sign the implementation agreement within two weeks. In the three answers she has given in this House starting one month ago, she said she would sign it "shortly", "soon" and "in due time". This agreement is between the province of British Columbia and the federal government. Will the minister now tell the House the real reason why she is not signing this implementation agreement?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will be signing the agreement as soon as I am able to determine from the province of British Columbia the period over which the money called for in the agreement will be spent. We are now in the process of doing that. As soon as this is completed, the agreement will be signed. We are most anxious to sign the agreement in order that the water basins of the Okanagan Valley can be properly managed.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AGREEMENT BETWEEN FRANCE AND UNITED STATES ON EXCHANGE RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. A couple of days ago I asked a question about the accord arrived at between the Republic of France and the United States in connection with that part of the meeting which dealt with one of the major causes of inflation, namely the fluctuating rates for exchange that sometimes bear a direct relationship to organized rates. The answer given at that time was that the government of Canada had not received this agreement, although the President of the United States said the agreement was forwarded to 18 countries directly or indirectly affected. Has the government received any representation from the United States or the Republic of France in connection with that accord which should be receiving consideration to meet in part the problem of inflation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall take notice of this serious question. I will find out whether, in fact, we have received any messages from either of these governments.

REASON FOR DELAY BY FRANCE IN ACCEPTING CREDENTIALS OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe in respect of the Ambassador to France for Canada. Why has there been this delay in the acceptance of his credentials in Paris? The minister said it did not have anything to do with a depreciation of the relations between Canada and France. There must be some reason why Mr. Pelletier is cooling his heels when matters as important as the one to which I have referred should be receiving consideration.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand the reason is that the president has a very long list of ambassadors who have not yet presented their credentials. I should like to say, through you, Mr. Speaker, to all members that once again I resent the effort being made by the opposition to create a rift between Canada and France.

● (1150)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the annoyance displayed by the usually equable gentleman indicates what actually is taking place is that France is fed up with the kind of treatment Canada is giving it.

Mr. Peters: It is fed up with the kind of ambassadors we send, too.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN PRIORITY FOR NATO FORCES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister. In a recent announcement, the Minister of National Defence seemed to recommend a priority in defence spending for the acquisition of a new tank for the Canadian forces in NATO. If this is so, does it indicate a reversal of priorities announced by the Prime Minister some time ago which put the defence of Canadian sovereignty first and the support of Canada's NATO forces third in priority?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in priorities. Even under the priorities which were established and still remain, it will be necessary to do something about the equipment of our troops in NATO.

POSSIBLE PURCHASE OF TANKS FOR NATO FORCES—EFFECT ON ACQUISITION OF LONG-RANGE PATROL AIRCRAFT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Assuming that spending priority is given to the purchase of NATO tanks, would this mean that the necessary funds to acquire the Boeing long range patrol aircraft would have to come from some department other than the Department of National Defence, and would the alternative acquisition of the cheaper Lockheed Orion have a capability for anti-submarine defence only and no adequate capability for fisheries and sovereignty patrol?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the Acting Prime Minister has said, our priorities remain as in the white paper of 1971. Our procurement decisions are now before cabinet. I expect to be making an announcement probably next week, but before going to Brussels in December, of the decisions we have made concerning a long range patrol aircraft and the re-equipping of our forces in Europe. This announcement will answer the questions that have been put.

I could go into a great deal of detail concerning the two aircraft that are in competition. They are both capable of performing the role but there are some industrial benefits that may be achieved which are currently being examined interdepartmentally. The conclusion will be reflected in the announcement next week.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF PULP AND PAPER WORKERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. I am sure the minister is well aware that almost 20,000 pulp and paper workers across Canada are out of work due to labour disputes, some entering their fifth month. In view of the importance to the Canadian economy of the pulp and paper industry, what action does the government plan to take to encourage both parties to begin serious bargaining in good faith?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as has been mentioned, this Anti-Inflation legislation is not designed to discourage the collective bargaining system from working within the parameters set by the legislation. We hope that the employers in question will sit down with the union, which has asked that negotiations be started and that they will keep the legislation in mind. This is what the government is urging the employers to do in this particular case, so that hopefully we can resolve this very serious strike which is most injurious to the Canadian economy.

* * *

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING PICK UP AND DELIVERY SERVICE FOR SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that government employees are being sent to pick up federal sales tax payments from businesses in some areas, would the government consider establishing a similar pick up and delivery service for accounts due to small businesses so they will have the funds on hand to meet their obligations to the government and others?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): To that specific suggestion, Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. Various groups are making their own arrangements and the government is not discouraging them.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—ACCEPTANCE BY GOVERNMENT OF RESPONSIBILITY FOR LOSSES CAUSED BY STRIKE

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the government accept responsibility for financial loss caused by the postal strike and set up a claims agency or department to provide payments to business establishments that have suffered greatly through this strike?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question was answered yesterday.

* * *

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

SUGGESTION CORPORATION NOT SELECT LAWYERS FOR MORTGAGORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Would the minister now recognize, as have all ministers responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation before him, that it is morally wrong for a government agency to select the lawyers who do the work for the mortgagors, and will he bring CMHC up to the practices of private lending institutions, most of whom have given up this disgusting form of patronage?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the corporation follows practices that are common practices in the lending field and they will continue to do so.

Mr. McCleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker; I think we are heading for a ten o'clock date. Would the minister also recognize that the suggestion would lead to less legal expenses in many cases, and this is supposed to be the age of restraint?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to look into the hon. member's representation.

* * *

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF SERVICE TO GLENWOOD AND HILLSPRING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact that at a meeting held in Magrath, Alberta in November of 1972 the ex-minister of agriculture, Mr. Olson, informed the meeting that "if any producer suffered any loss due to inability to deliver grain as a result of plugged elevators, CP rail would be responsible", would the minister inform the House whether or not he has instructed the CPR to restore service to Glenwood and Hillspring?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rather think that the former minister of agriculture's words have been taken out of some kind of context. The question of restoration of service is one, as I have said before, that depends on certain action on the part of the CTC.

Mr. Hurlburt: A short supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Minister of Transport has informed me that he has to get ahold of the CTC, that the CTC has told me they have to get ahold of CPR, and that the CPR has told me that they have to get ahold of the Minister of Transport, would the minister please inform the House how I go about restoring service to Glennwood and Hillspring?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I told the hon. member earlier, we are all trying to get ahold of each other.

* * *

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REGULATIONS COVERING EXPLORATION FOR OIL AND GAS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the recent report of the National Energy Board regarding shortages of oil and gas in Canada, and in view of the fact that there has been a severe cutback in oil exploration work in the north due mostly to the failure of the government to bring forward oil and gas regulations, can the minister advise when these new regulations will be brought down in order that the oil companies know what the ground rules are so far as exploration is concerned?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept completely the purview that that is the major cause of the diminution of exploration activity in the north. As I have indicated before, I think the final date for the fall is December 21, so I hope it will be prior to that time.

* * *

PENITENTIARIES

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF SYSTEM—REPORT OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. In view of the problems at Millhaven, problems with temporary absence leaves and possible cover-ups in the Farris inquiry, does not the Solicitor General now feel it is time we had a public inquiry into the whole penitentiaries system?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, the hon. member has made three or four allegations. There has been no cover-up in the Farris inquiry; this report will be made public as soon as the trial of the three individuals involved is over. We cannot make it public at the present time. I should point out to the hon. member that during the last parliament he and his colleagues asked for a parliamentary inquiry which was started, but it was never carried through by opposition members.

● (1200)

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, is the minister willing to fully report to this House on the reports of members who were on that inquiry? This member has received copies of every report of every member of that inquiry and I think the minister is not telling the whole story in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it is true that some of the members of the inquiry—

Mr. Reynolds: All of the members.

Mr. Allmand: —wanted to make a report and were willing to complete their work, but there were several others who were not, and in fact the parliamentary committee made no official report to me.

[Translation]

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Eighth report of Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, in both official languages—Mr. Comtois.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Fourth report of Standing Committee on Regional Development, in both official languages—Mr. Lumley.

[Editor's note: For texts of above reports, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

HEALTH

TABLING OF REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON FOOD SAFETY ASSESSMENT

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the report of the Advisory Committee on Food Safety Assessment.

* * *

[English]

BILINGUALISM

TABLING OF REPORT OF SECOND BILINGUAL DISTRICTS ADVISORY BOARD—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and in French of the report of the Second Bilingual Districts Advisory Board.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of making a statement in relation to the report of the Second Bilingual Districts Advisory Board tabled today by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp). The report in question is the result of a difficult and painstaking study. Under the chairmanship of Professor Fox, the board conducted its assigned task with unquestionable seriousness and competence, for which the government wishes to express its gratitude.

The findings, conclusions and recommendations contained in the report are those of the board and not of the government. It is now the government's duty to examine the report and to determine what will be done with each recommendation. This process has already been initiated and will be carried out with the utmost diligence. However, the government has adopted a clear position concerning the report. It is this position that I wish to discuss at this juncture, Mr. Speaker.

In line with the observations made by the Commissioner of Official Languages to parliament in his second annual report, the advisory board examined the concept of and the reason for the establishment of bilingual districts. It concluded that the concept should be retained. The government supports this conclusion and will proceed with the proclamation of bilingual districts.

Bilingual Districts

The advisory board proposed that 30 bilingual districts be delineated in accordance with section 13 of the Official Languages Act, in a total of nine provinces, to be distributed as follows: Newfoundland, two districts; Prince Edward Island, one district; Nova Scotia, two districts; New Brunswick, one district—the entire province; Quebec, five districts; Ontario, five districts; Manitoba, six districts; Saskatchewan, six districts; Alberta, two districts.

In each of the districts proposed, at least 10 per cent of all inhabitants speak the minority official language as their mother tongue. As this proportion corresponds to the provisions of the Official Languages Act, these 30 districts appear acceptable in our view. The government will examine the geographic areas delineated by the board; in particular, special attention will be given to the recommendation that the entire province of New Brunswick be made into a federal bilingual district, in terms of the real needs of the various regions of that province.

[Translation]

In the province of Quebec, the advisory board chose to recommend bilingual districts in the five areas only where, in their view, the English-speaking minority might require support and special protection. They therefore left aside certain areas where the official language minority accounts for 10 per cent or more of the population, including the Montreal area, for the reasons that the federal government already provides services there in both official languages, that it will probably never cease to do so and that the proclamation of bilingual districts would be unnecessary. The government does not accept the bases for that reasoning. The principles of the recommendation are not acceptable to us, and the government rejects the board's reasoning and conclusions to reduce in the province of Quebec the number of bilingual districts below the level authorized by the act. The government will therefore review all Quebec areas, including Montreal and Sherbrooke, and certain other areas as Rouyn-Noranda and Schefferville, using the same approach and principles that will apply to the final establishment of boundaries of bilingual districts in other parts of the country. So, Mr. Speaker, there will be one or more bilingual districts in the Montreal area, and there will be others across Quebec, according to the guidelines we intend to follow in other provinces.

[English]

The advisory board deemed it advisable, for which we are grateful, to formulate additional recommendations, the two most important of which relate to the provision of services in both official languages in a number of areas located outside the proposed bilingual districts. Instead of being concerned with the proclamation of bilingual districts, these two recommendations are designed, rather, to give meaning to sections 9(2) and 10 of the Official Languages Act which stipulate that in locations outside federal bilingual districts, government services be made available in both official languages where there is a "significant" demand.

The board therefore proposed that a "significant" demand for services in both official languages be explicitly acknowledged to exist in all the provincial capitals by reason of the fact that many federal offices located in these cities serve the entire province and that visitors are drawn to them from all over the country. In this respect, they have a major role to play in a bilingual country. The board recommended that regardless of the proportion of their population whose mother tongue or language of use is that of the minority, federal services to the public in these cities be made available in both official languages. The government recognizes the validity of this recommendation, which it accepts, and will ensure that where this demand exists, services will be provided by the federal government in both official languages.

[Translation]

Moreover, the board suggested that in any other large urban centre where 5,000 or more people currently use the official language of the minority, the demand for services of this minority be considered "significant" for the purpose of the act. The board therefore recommended that in these centres, the federal offices that come in contact with the public offer their services in both official languages. The government feels that this proposal is acceptable as concerns offices where there is a demand for such services, and as concerns the application proposed by the board for Vancouver, St. Catharines-Niagara, and four other large centres which are also provincial capitals, namely Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Quebec City. However, for the previously mentioned reasons, the government rejects the idea that this provides a sufficient guarantee of bilingual services in the metropolitan areas of Montreal and Sherbrooke. With this reservation, the government intends to implement this recommendation.

● (1210)

[English]

The advisory board recommended that all federal offices which acquired or will be acquiring the capability to conduct transactions in both official languages ensure that the public is fully aware of the availability of such services. The government intends to implement this recommendation as well.

Finally, the board recommended the establishment of a separate, continuing body to conduct research on language problems and policy in Canada. In view of present economic conditions and the scope of projects now being carried out in this sector by various public administrations, the office of the Commissioner of Official Languages and universities and institutions throughout the country, the government considers that establishment of such a body is unwarranted.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the government gratefully accepts the report of the Bilingual Districts Advisory Board, the considerable amount of data being placed at the public's disposal and the serious observations conveyed. According to the Official Languages Act, at least 90 days must elapse from today prior to any proclamation of bilingual districts. Accordingly, the government undertakes to proceed quickly but carefully, taking into account any further evidence which may arise and ensuring that none of these commitments involves any increase in the budgetary estimates. During this period we will be seeking the comments of the provincial governments.

[Mr. Drury.]

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, we have today before us a report for which we have been waiting since 1973, according to the estimates of the Commissioner of Official Languages and the wishes of the government. I must however emphasize that it concerned a very complex subject, which probably gave a lot of difficulty to the commission that had to ponder over and over again the problems and the task it had been assigned. That is certainly the cause of the delay. The whole matter of bilingual districts is very knotty, and this is revealed by the fact that four out of eight commissioners issued minority reports or statements. True, the government has accepted the principles in some of the dissident reports. You will see, as Mr. Spicer was saying in his second report, in 1972 I think, that this is a matter which will stir a lot of emotion. He was then wondering whether in fact the setting out of bilingual districts would not cause bigger problems than those the B and B Commission was trying to resolve with this initial recommendation which was in fact a principle or idea imported from Finland.

[English]

In his second annual report of 1972 or 1973—I forget the exact date—we saw that Mr. Spicer canvassed the many arguments pro and con on the concept of bilingual districts. I think it is fair to say that, having seen what had happened up to that time with regard to the implementation and acceptance of the Official Languages Act, Mr. Spicer came down on the side of seriously questioning the need for this concept. I should like to quote from page 31 of his report.

> Finally, and in the commissioner's view far more impressively, bilingual districts may be unnecessary because of empirical evidence that the act has protected language rights surprisingly well for 2½ years without them.

He also says that section 9(2) of the Official Languages Act is the main reason for that. We have progressed some three years beyond the date of the observations of Mr. Spicer, and I would challenge anyone to demonstrate that there has not been in that interval, or there has not been since that interval, much more evidence that the act has not only protected but has engendered a greater acceptance of the principle of the Official Languages Act in Canada, and in fact has seen a marked expansion in the learning and use of both official languages. Therefore, I think one has to re-examine and reconsider Mr. Spicer's original commentary pro and con in light of the situation today.

[Translation]

As the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) has said, the government support the conclusion of the Fox commission recommending that the concept of bilingual districts be accepted, and they even said they were willing to initiate the proclamation of bilingual districts, while presenting at the same time the amendments they propose, in short, their decision on this question.

I have had the opportunity to read this report only this morning and it is difficult for me, as for my colleagues, to make elaborate comments on the matter because there is a trap in all this. I hope we will not fall into it. We should not be led into considering the detail of each district where the borders and limits have been indicated, and then lose sight of the whole thing.

I doubt that it will help the discussion any. Indeed, the government says it accepts, in principle, and not only in principle, but that it accepts the representations concerning the setting up of at least 30 districts as recommended by the Commission. Still, it rejects the majority recommendation of the Commission for I have noticed that at least three commissioners failed to agree with the idea that Quebec should include only six districts, and that Montreal, because it was already giving adequate services in English met the requirements of the Official Languages Act.

I therefore feel that the minority members were right, that the government also was right in accepting the recommendations of the minority members on that question, taken as a whole. As far as I am concerned, with regard to bilingual districts, I am afraid, and this is the personal opinion I expressed during consideration of the recommendations of the Dunton Commission, that we are creating some sort of linguistic reservations or ghettos. That danger is very real!

In addition, I have always felt that the Dunton Commission report, the principle of this Fox Commission, as well as the attitude of the government, rather reflect the way of thinking of central Canada.

● (1220)

[English]

What is good for central Canada, and particularly certain portions of central Canada, is good for all of Canada seems to be the guiding rule. No greater mistake can be made, in considering the affairs of this country, than that. Canada is a very complex country. I suppose that is the most trite sort of statement that can be made, but it is very true. These decisions which are tailor-made, shall we say, for a 200 or 300 mile radius of Ottawa, but apply to Edmonton, Calgary, Regina or Vancouver, do not necessarily conform with the spirit, aspirations, characteristics and rights of the rest of the people of Canada.

While my party and I accept fully the principles of the Official Languages Act, I would say that we must proceed with a great deal of caution. I would have thought that the government, having seen the reaction to the original proposition and the views of Mr. Spicer—whom, after all, they have appointed to monitor the progress of the Official Languages Act—must realize that in many parts of Canada the creation of bilingual districts may create more problems than tend to solve them. It will certainly set a lot of people on their ears.

Then, going beyond the recommendations of the commission that bilingual services will be provided in capital cities to serve the whole of the province, the government has said that there will be some sort of subcategory of bilingual districts in major urban centres where at least 5,000 people normally use the minority language as their language of communication. I invite the hon. gentleman to try that in a city such as Edmonton. We are not going after precise figures on ethnic origin as appeared in the census, but, as I say, this is going to create more problems.

The last comment I would like to make is this, because I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are nodding. Let me point out that we have a report of this large size that has been considered in extenso for some considerable time on this important question, and surely a matter of seven or eight minutes, or even ten minutes, to use in making comments on it is well within the acceptable limit. However—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member raises a very important point. I do not want to unduly restrict members in making their comments, but I would like to point out that the minister spoke for ten minutes. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has now been speaking for 12 minutes. Since there are two other hon. members to follow, who will probably take close to that time, it does not leave much time for questions before the lunch adjournment. However, there will be time after two o'clock to continue with questions, if necessary.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I did not want to abuse the time of the House, Mr. Speaker. I am fully aware of the time limitation and was coming to my last point.

Some hon. Members: Good.

[Translation]

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We are not discussing Quebec here, but Canada.

[English]

The question that comes to my mind is that in the furnishing of bilingual services in the capital cities, according to the concept of the late Mr. Pearson that government services should be bilingually functional, there might be a tendency to move, as there has been within Ottawa, to minimum requirements in making positions bilingual. If there has been some difficulty in Ottawa with regard to that matter, I can assure the House that in Vancouver, Edmonton and other areas there will be a great deal more fuss about it, and I issue a word of caution. It is not a case of "full steam ahead, and damn the torpedoes." I think the end result and the objective of what parliament set out to do under the Official Languages Act is worth a great deal more than some of the impatience of those people who would say, "Let them have it with both barrels".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has pointed out, we were presented this morning with a report of some 272 pages. Actually, the volume is larger than that because of the numerous maps and other pages in the book which are not numbered. I have not had time to count the total number of pages.

Mr. Drury: You can go by its weight.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister suggests we might go by the weight of it. I suggest that our rule about statements from ministers and the opportunities for reply and for asking questions is a good one and it is working very well. But I think that in a case like this, when we are given such a weighty document—weighty in more ways than one—it might have been more courteous on the part of the government to table the document one day and make the statement and have the comments on the next day. Like my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West, I have had only a short while since I first saw the document, and I have been trying to peruse it while other things have been going on because it is, indeed, a very important matter.

It deals, of course, with an issue concerning which there is a good deal of emotion in this country. Almost anything that one says results in those who disagree with him wanting to put him in a certain category. My party, along with the other parties in the House, supported the Official Languages Act. We take the view that there are two official languages in this country, and there is no backing away from that fact. I do not want any word of caution that I say or that my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West, has said to suggest in any way that we withdraw at all from the recognition of the two languages in this country. That is a fact, and we recognize it.

I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West has raised points that should be considered, and I hope that in the 90-day period which must elapse before the government issues any proclamations, further study will be given. I point out, as did my hon. friend who preceded me, that there were ten members on the commission. Only eight of them signed the report, and even two of those eight issued minority statements. The other two issued minority reports. Even on the votes on the various issues which were resolved there was considerable variation, so that all told it was not only a difficult assignment given to the board but the board had great difficulty in reaching its conclusions.

● (1230)

I think the board has done a particularly worth-while service by putting in at the very beginning of its report, on pages 3 and 4, a few sentences which seek to make it clear what bilingual districts are all about. On page 3, paragraph 3, I read as follows:

> Section 2 of the act declares that "The English and French languages are the official languages of Canada for all purposes of the Parliament and Government of Canada, and possess and enjoy equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all the institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada."

Also on page 3, paragraph 6, I read the following:

> When a bilingual district is proclaimed, the federal government is required to communicate with the public and to provide its services in both official languages at each of its principal offices in every department, agency, and judicial, quasi-judicial or administrative body or Crown corporation in that bilingual district.

Now I draw special attention to paragraphs 7 and 8, which read as follows:

> 7. Although the purpose of bilingual districts thus appears to be simple and clear, we have encountered so much confusion in the public's mind on this point that we would like to emphasize the basic intention by reiterating it. The objective of creating a bilingual district is to require the federal government to provide its services in both languages.
>
> 8. However, it should be clearly understood that the existence of a bilingual district will not oblige the public to become bilingual. Far from it. In fact, just the opposite is true. A bilingual district can protect unilingualism by ensuring that an individual who speaks only English or only French can communicate with the federal government in his or her own language. The bilingual requirement that is imposed by a district does not fall upon the public but upon the government.

I should like to emphasize where the responsibility lies, on the government, not on the public. I should also like to emphasize that every effort should be made to clear up the confusion which surrounds this matter.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Paragraphs 9 and 10, on page 4, are also very important and read as follows:

> 9. It should be added that the obligation incurred by the federal government does not mean that all of its civil servants must be, or must become, bilingual. Only those employees dealing with the public under the circumstances described above would be expected to be bilingual.

Paragraph 10 means something to us in western Canada. It reads as follows:

> 10. It is also worth observing that nothing in the Official Languages Act, whether it be the clauses in the statute establishing English and French as the official languages of Canada or any other section providing for the implementation of this declaration, derogates in any way from the privileges enjoyed by any official language. Section 38 of the act expressly forbids the diminution of any legal or customary rights or privileges possessed or acquired by any additional language before or after the act came into force.

I believe it is because of misunderstanding around the principles of bilingual districts that much of the opposition has arisen, and I contend that in the 90-day period it now has, the government should think seriously about the whole matter and should note the very effective criticisms, so far as I could judge from a quick reading of them, made by Mrs. Duckworth in her minority report and also by Mr. Justice Monnin in his minority report. There is one point in Mr. Justice Monnin's report concerning Montreal, which the government has accepted, but I suggest that the whole subject is such a complicated and complex one that further thought should be given to it.

Speaking for myself and speaking officially for my party, I wish to say that this is not said on the part of persons who want to downgrade bilingualism or to get away from the facts of life in Canada. We say that because we have a country in which we must recognize two official languages, we must make all aspects of bilingualism work, and it will work better if a great deal of thought is given to all these matters. I hope there will be more thought and, indeed, thought in light of the public discussion which will take place in the 90-day cooling off period, shall I call it, which is required under the act.

I said that I noted Mr. Justice Monnin's comment, or one of his comments, in his minority report having to do with Montreal, and I am glad the government seems to have accepted his recommendation rather than the recommendation of the majority of the board. The recommendation of the majority was that no bilingual district was necessary in Montreal; that the English-speaking minority was protected by tradition, and so on. Mr. Justice Monnin did not agree. I gather the government has not agreed either, but has concluded that just as French-speaking persons in Gravelbourg, Saskatchewan, should be able to deal with government offices there in French and have that right protected by law, then so should English-speaking persons in Montreal have that right in their city.

I notice, also, a recommendation which the government has rejected—this is in the majority report—which calls for a new body to study the whole language situation in Canada. If I understand that correctly, it seems to go beyond the two languages. It seems to include the reference I made a moment ago, and I believe the government has made too quick a rejection of that proposal, saying that it is doing so because of the restraint program which is on at the present time.

So, generally speaking we give our support to the idea of making two languages work in this country, but just as we do not think English should be imposed upon people in areas which are predominantly French, we think the opposite should not happen either, and that very careful consideration should be given to the way in which bilingual districts are established. However, in the main, the points I read out from this report in paragraphs 7, 8 and 9 applying to the public generally and to civil servants, and in paragraph 10 applying to other languages, should be respected not only in spirit but to the letter.

I have just a couple of other comments to make. Let me put it this way: I think it is a good idea that a French-speaking person in Gravelbourg should have the right to get service from the Canada Manpower centre in the language he speaks. Perhaps it is more important that he should get service. The other comment I should like to make is that having been given in advance a copy of the statement the Acting President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) was going to make, I had my eye glued on him as he got to the last sentence to see whether he could say it without smiling. Mind you, he added a sentence which was not in his text, but for a minister of the Crown to stand up and try to say to us today that these things will be undertaken, but that none of these commitments will involve any increase in the budgetary estimates, is just trying to kid us. Let us not try to kid anyone by saying that bilingualism does not cost money and that bilingual districts will not cost money. That just does not go down.

I confess that these comments are necessarily general. But they are a deliberate attempt to stay away from any bigoted approach to this issue. They are an attempt to support the idea that we have to make bilingualism work in this country, but to press the point that the considerations in the minority statements and in the minority reports, and the considerations advanced today by the hon. member for Edmonton West, should be considered. In fact, there should be further study of the whole matter by the government, with the aim of making whatever is done really work. It must not have the opposite effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1240)

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the least we can do at first glance is to rejoice at the good will of the government which would like to implement the recommendations of the Bilingual Districts Advisory Board. What surprised me, however, was to hear the remarks of members representing the Conservative and the New Democratic parties. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that once again comments were expressed which bring me to think that there is a willingness, either in the official opposition or the New Democratic Party, there is readiness to accept the principles theoretically, but when it comes down to practice, they have all sorts of hesitations, all sorts of tergiversations. I find unfortunate the attitude just expressed by the two members who spoke before me since the only point they welcome is where the government says:

The government does not admit here the basis of the argumentation of the board. The principles underlying that recommendation are not acceptable to us and the government does not share the argumentation and the conclusions of the board to reduce in Quebec the number of bilingual districts below what could be allowed under the law.

And that is precisely the only point, Mr. Speaker, that will stir up diametrically opposed comments in Quebec, and that is what I wanted to point out immediately before the government gets involved once again in a dispute that could prove disastrous. I wonder why the government does not endorse that part of the report of the advisory board. It should indeed.

I am all the more surprised that although I have had the report before me for only a few minutes, I still had time to see that when the commissioners sat in Montreal eight Liberal members appeared and out of the eight, seven said they were opposed to bilingual districts in the metropolitan area of Montreal.

The government of Quebec also appeared and it said it was against it as well. So the government knows in advance that the province of Quebec is against the creation of bilingual districts on its territory.

Now, it necessarily follows that if the government does not approve the wishes which have been clearly expressed by hon. members from the island of Montreal, who are sitting opposite, we shall have to face huge problems once again. I also would like to remind our Progressive Conservative and NDP colleagues that they seem to forget the main reasons which prompted the government to deal with the matter of bilingualism across the country. Those reasons were not that English-speaking minorities were losing ground in Canada. You have to be realists. The sole reason for that concern today is that Canada as a whole, including the province of Quebec, was becoming increasingly anglicized, since, as the report says, French-speaking people can sometimes hardly order in French in the Montreal area. That is a fact. English-speaking minorities in Canada have no problems, and you know that. Let us stop dreaming and fearing, they have no problem. The only problems are for the six million French-speaking Canadians who are literally lost in a crowd of 250 million English-speaking people in North America. There is the problem! I would even say the government are taking moderate steps in setting up 25 bilingual districts outside Quebec. So, when the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) come and tell us: Watch it, a great deal of caution will have to be exercised, I find it appalling that in 1975 my friends have not yet understood that there was only one problem in Canada, and that this problem was to protect the French reality throughout Canada. It is a very well known fact, and it could not be more obvious, that there are people in the province of Quebec who no longer have any hope in that possibility, to the point that they want a unilingual, French speaking, independent province of Quebec. That is a well known fact! Let us wake up, it is no longer time to waver to say if a formula which might preserve the French language should be accepted or not.

Only last week we could once again read in the Ottawa paper Le Droit that French speaking-minorities in Ontario were becoming anglicized at an even faster rate. There is the danger. There is no problem for English-speaking minorities in Quebec. There is none at all. The problem lies exclusively on the French-speaking side.

I think the attitude of my hon. friends from the Progressive Conservative and New Democratic parties is an indication of more huge difficulties in accepting a modest attempt at solving a national problem in Canada.

As for the government, I blame it because it deliberately tries to promote disorder in Quebec, by planning the establishment of bilingual districts in metropolitan Montreal as well as in other areas of the province. This is stupid, at a moment when we are fighting tooth and nail to save the French language and to get a true French-speaking management in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, there is no need to be so ridiculous and establish bilingual districts where they are absolutely not required.

I think I had to clarify this point. Mr. Speaker, we have indicated many times what we want. French Canadians do not want to get minor improvements here and there, what they want is a complete equality. Wherever you are in the country, it is not wrong to speak French and the federal government should provide its services in French anywhere. This is our minimum requirement and it must be met if we are to maintain Canada as it is.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure a number of members are anxious to pose questions. It is now ten minutes before one o'clock. In order to get things in some sort of order, I wonder if we could first clear up the rest of routine proceedings before we begin with questions; then we could take questions until one o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

* * *

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PETITION RESPECTING GUN CONTROL

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the twentieth report of the Clerk of Petitions, stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[English]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 3,100, 3,109, 3,113, 3,169, 3,172, 3,174, 3,252, 3,274, 3,294, 3,314, 3,316, 3,353 and 3,354.

[Mr. Matte.]

[Text]

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—CONTRACTS FOR LABORATORY FURNITURE AND EQUIPMENT

Question No. 3,100—Mr. Fleming:

1. Have any government contracts been awarded by the Department of Public Works for laboratory furniture and equipment since the beginning of 1972 and, if so, how many?

2. How many called for the installation of equipment and furniture?

3. What were the names of the successful companies?

4. How many contracts was each successful in winning?

5. What was the total amount of money paid to each?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): In so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned: nil.

DISASTER ASSISTANCE—LAVAL, QUEBEC

Question No. 3,109—Mr. Roy (Laval):

1. During the fiscal year 1974-75, what was the total amount claimed in repayment for damages caused by flooding in the (a) Province of Quebec (b) Constituency of Laval (c) City of Laval?

2. Of the total amount claimed in the Constituency of Laval and the City of Laval, what was the amount of money and the number of claims accepted for reimbursement under the federal-provincial agreement for (a) individuals (b) the provincial government (c) municipal governments (d) school boards (e) businesses or industries (f) others?

3. Of the total amount accepted for payment in the Province of Quebec, what amount will be provided by (a) government (b) provincial government?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. The province of Quebec has not yet submitted a claim for payment in respect of the 1974 flood damage compensation and rehabilitation program. Accordingly, the amount of federal financial assistance to which the province will be entitled under the terms of the established federal peacetime disaster assistance program is not yet known. It is expected that the province will be submitting a claim for payment in the very near future.

2. See above.

3. See above.

VANCOUVER—SECURITY CLEARANCE OF UNIFORMED OFFICERS

Question No. 3,113—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Was secret level security clearance authorized for the uniformed officers of the Department of National Revenue Customs and Excise at the Vancouver International Airport and, if so, by whom?

2. Are uniformed Customs officers required to complete new personal history forms and, if so, for what reason?

3. Did the government take fingerprints of uniformed Customs officers after they had previously been fingerprinted and, if so, for what reason?

4. Which departments have access to or the responsibility for the records mentioned in Parts 2 and 3?

5. What is the estimated cost of this operation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Revenue and the Solicitor General as follows: 1. Yes, by the Deputy Minister, National Revenue, Customs and Excise.

2. Personal History Forms are required for the initial clearance. They expire at the end of 5 years at which time employees are required to complete new ones.

3. Fingerprinting is a mandatory requirement of the security clearance process. Employees are normally fingerprinted on entry into Government Service, however, they may be required to be fingerprinted a second time in instances when records have been misplaced.

4. The R.C.M.P. Branch of the Solicitor General's Department has access to security documents. In this Department, access is restricted to the Chief of Security Services.

5. The estimated cost to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is $15.96 for each security clearance. As we do not have the number of security clearances requested by the Department of National Revenue, we are unable to provide the total cost.

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—BAGGAGE SECURITY

Question No. 3,169—Mr. Reynolds:

1. For what reason was a security system set up at the baggage counters for incoming passengers at Vancouver International Airport?

2. (a) Did the system cost in excess of $75,000 and, if not, what was the cost (b) is Air Canada's share 50 per cent?

3. For what reason was this system installed when in the year 1974 there were only twenty-six incidents of loss and theft reported at the Airport, which under the present regulations would only cost the airlines $5,200?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. At request of airlines to prevent theft and the possibility of unintentional passenger error in claiming baggage.

2. (a) No. The cost was $30,360. (b) No. The installation was funded by Transport Canada. The Airlines pay for security personnel on the basis of numbers of arriving passengers.

3. Airline experience has been that losses have been greatly reduced since implementation of the system in 1974. Present regulations limit airline liability to $500 for any one piece of lost baggage.

NEWFOUNDLAND—FISH PROCESSING PLANTS APPLICATIONS

Question No. 3,172—Mr. Marshall:

Have any applications been received from fish processing plants in the Province of Newfoundland under the Accelerated Capital Cost Allowance Programme to take advantage of the two year write-off programme and, if so, what are the names of the plants who have applied since the inception of the programme?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): No such applications have been received from fish processing plants in the Province of Newfoundland.

NEWFOUNDLAND—APPLICATIONS CAPITAL CASH ALLOWANCE, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 3,174—Mr. Marshall:

1. Have any applications been received from the Province of Newfoundland under the accelerated capital cost allowance programme by the Environmental Protection Service of the Department of the Environment?

2. What efforts have been made to advise all farmers in Canada of the availability of the ACCA Programme?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): 1. Yes. Eleven such applications have been received from Newfoundland.

2. Publicity for this program has not been directed towards any particular sector of the economy. All polluters and/or potential polluters are included and considered for eligibility under the regulations.

SENIOR CITIZENS' HOUSING—LAC-ETCHEMIN, QUEBEC

Question No. 3,252—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Has Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation granted a loan to the Quebec Housing Corporation for the Municipality of Lac-Etchemin or its Housing Corporation and, if so (a) what was the amount involved (b) at what rate of interest (c) for how long (d) under what terms of reimbursement?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that the answer to this question may be found in the answers to Question Number 322 and Question Number 676, of the 29th Parliament, Second Session. (Hansard March 13, 1974 Page 467, and May 6, 1974, Page 2047, respectively.)

FUNDING TO VILLENEUVE CONSTITUENCY UNDER OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM

Question No. 3,274—Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve):

1. Since the inception of the Opportunities for Youth Programme, has money been allocated to the Constituency of Villeneuve and, if so, in what amount?

2. For each approved project in the Constituency what (a) is the title (b) is the allocated sum (c) is the year of acceptance (d) is the name of the municipality concerned (e) are the number of jobs which have been created?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Statistics for the Opportunities for Youth Program prior to 1975 were not maintained on a constituency basis, and thus the total amount of funding to the constituency since the inception of the Program cannot be determined. Under the 1975 Program, however, a total of $83,790 was contracted to projects in Villeneuve.

2. (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e): See Statement following: (This information is available for the 1975 O.F.Y. Program only).

1975

Project title	Amount of funding	Location	Number of Jobs Created
Carrefour des jeunes	$7,592	Chibougamau	7
Tiens-toi occupé	6,963	Chapais	7
Animation	4,345	Val d'Or	5
Opération Sondage	5,230	Barraute	4
Optimiste	6,695	Landrienne	6
Développement socio-culturel de Dubuisson	9,208	Dubuisson	6
Activités culturelles et touristiques	9,220	Cadillac	10
Organisation de nouveaux endroits récréatifs	5,482	Obedjiwan	8

Project title	Amount of funding	Location	Number of Jobs Created
Atelier d'expression dramatique	9,640	Malartic	6
Centre d'animation	4,740	Val d'Or	4
Vive l'été	8,340	Senneterre	9
Occupation Jeunesse	6,335	Barraute	6

SAINT JOHN AIRPORT, N.B.

Question No. 3,294—Mr. Landers:

1. What is the proposed (a) starting (b) completion date of the expansion and improvement of the Saint John Airport, New Brunswick?

2. What is the (a) anticipated cost (b) nature of the navigational improvements (c) nature of other improvements?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Subject to the completion of a master plan study and the availability of funds: 1. (a) Work on a three-phase programme is planned for commencement in FY 1976-77. (b) The three-phase programme will extend to FY 1983-84.

2. (a) Overall costs have not yet been estimated and cannot be verified until the Master Plan is completed. (b) and (c) The first phase involves a Maintenance Garage, Firehall, Field Electrical Centre and the provision of essential services to prepare for phases two and three. The second phase consists of navigational improvements including a second instrument landing system and extensive improvements to visual aids and runway lights. The final phase involves access roads, car park, new passenger terminal and control tower, new taxiways and resurfacing of both runways.

GRANT TO MAYNARD AMBROSE PAUL AND/OR LUCY AGNES PAUL, CASTLEGAR, B.C.

Question No. 3,314—Mr. Brisco:

1. What was the total amount of money advanced to Maynard Ambrose Paul and/or Lucy Agnes Paul of Castlegar, British Columbia, either in the form of a loan or grant for the purchase of equipment to operate an entertainment centre?

2. On what date was this money advanced?

3. What portion, if any, of money advanced by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to either Maynard or Lucy Paul has been returned to the Department?

4. Was the equipment seized by bailiffs and, if so, has it been sold and, if not, for what reason?

5. If the equipment was sold, what sum has been realized and what portion of the original loan or grant has been recovered?

6. At what date were funds advanced to Mr. and Mrs. Paul to establish the entertainment centre and what controls or constraints were placed upon them in order to monitor the success of their business venture?

7. How often was this business venture monitored by the Department?

8. Have criminal charges ever been laid against Mr. Paul since he established the business and, if so, what type of charges were they?

9. Were criminal charges ever laid on the premises of the business of Mr. Paul either against him, Mrs. Paul or some other person on the premises at the time and, if so, what was the nature of the charges?

10. What has been the total cost to the Department or to the Crown, in recovering the goods and merchandise seized by the bailiffs?

[Mr. Andras.]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Loan $45,000; Contribution $4,500.

2. Contribution, September 18, 1974; Loan, November 21, 1974.

3. $41.50 applied to interest was received. No other principal or interest payments were received.

4. Equipment has been seized by the Bailiffs and is in the process of being sold. Written Offers were accepted until Friday, October 31, 1975.

5. The equipment has not yet been sold. We estimate $4,000 will be received from the sale. Property is in the hands of Justice and will take approximately eight months to sell with possible recovery in the neighborhood of $20,000.

6. The contribution cheque of $4,500 was received by Mr. and Mrs. Paul on or about September 18, 1974. The cheque was to be deposited to a control account with the co-signature of a Department official required for release. The loan cheque of $45,000 was received by Mr. and Mrs. Paul on or about November 21, 1974. The cheque was deposited to a control account with the co-signature of a Department official required for release. Further conditions were: to maintain books and accounting records and to allow examination of these records; provide invoices, receipts, cancelled cheques as evidence proceeds of the loans were used for the purposes intended; not to encumber security, incur capital expenditures in excess of $1,000 per year, or make loans, investments or assume liabilities on behalf of others; agree to accept and act upon advice and direction of the Minister; engage independent legal counsel, accountants or other advisors as the Minister considers necessary; provide unaudited quarterly financial statements prepared by a professional accountant; maintain a general bank account to deposit all receipts and to make disbursements; renovations to building will not exceed $3,000 without prior permission from the Minister. The amount to be established by firm contract or prices.

7. The venture was monitored three times during 1974 and three times in 1975 (to June 19, 1975) by Department officials. The business was abandoned July 1, 1975.

8. A criminal charge was laid and subsequently dismissed. The charge was related to the possession of marijuana.

9. To our knowledge the afore-mentioned charge was the only charge laid on the premises of Mr. Paul.

10. The cost to date of recovering the goods seized by the Bailiff is $1,357.

UIC—CLAIMANTS RECEIVING BENEFITS IN KAPUSKASING, HEARST AND SMOOTH ROCK FALLS

Question No. 3,316—Mr. Stewart (Cochrane):

1. How many persons were receiving unemployment insurance benefits in (a) Kapuskasing, Ontario (b) Hearst, Ontario during (i) August (ii) September (iii) October 1975?

2. How many persons were receiving unemployment insurance benefits in Smooth Rock Falls, Ontario during (a) June (b) July (c) August (d) September (e) October 1975?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Unemployment Insurance Commission does not maintain individual statistics for (a) Kapuskasing (b) Hearst (c) Smooth Rock Falls. Geographically they are included in the Timmins District Office Statistics.

UIC—CONTRIBUTIONS

Question No. 3,353—Mr. Coates:

1. What is the estimated shortfall between contributions to the UIC fund and the pay-out of benefits that will occur by the end of the present fiscal year based on present projections?

2. What are the projections for the period October 31, 1975 to March 31, 1976?

3. What was the loss to the fund for the fiscal year 1974-75?

4. (a) What was the position of the fund for the years (i) 1960 (ii) 1965 (iii) 1970 (b) was there a shortfall between funds available and benefits paid in any of the years and, if so, what was the amount?

5. Was there a surplus in the fund in (a) 1960 (b) 1965 (c) 1970 and, if so, what was the amount?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In so far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned: 1. It is forecast that at the end of this year, there will be a current year surplus of $295 million which would have the effect of reducing the cumulative deficit to $123 million.

2. Bill C-69, Amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1975, is currently before Parliament, and costs for the period October 31, 1975 to March 31, 1976 will be affected by the outcome of that Bill.

3. Nil. There was a surplus of $85 million in 1974.

4 and 5. The operations for 1960, 1965, and 1970 were as follows:

	Balance in Account Surplus/(Deficit) ($ Million)
	Current Year	Cumulative
1960	(150)	321
1965	81	162
1970	(73)	473

NOTE: Under the present Act, the UIC Financial year corresponds to the calendar year.

LIP PROJECT BB 1200-9

Question No. 3,354—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the decision of LIP application BB 1200-9 for the Constituency of Cumberland-Colchester North, submitted by the Commerical Association of Downtown Amherst, that had as an objective a traffic and parking survey of the Town of Amherst?

2. At what level of consideration did the rejection of the application take place and for what reason?

3. Were any objections to the application directed to anyone associated with the consideration of LIP applications and, if so (a) to whom (b) by whom (c) were such objections oral or written?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. The application was not approved.

Bilingual Districts

2. In the absence of a Constituency Advisory Group, Departmental officials of the Job Creation Branch regional office in Halifax consulted with local representatives from Information Canada, the Department of Recreation, the Municipal Council, the Social Services Department and the Canada Manpower Centre in the consideration of 85 applications submitted from the constituency of Cumberland-Colchester North. Although the application met the basic Program criteria, other applications in the Amherst area were assessed to be of higher priority in that they more closely met the needs of the community. Consequently, due to lack of funds, the project was not recommended for funding. The final decision, however, rested with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who subsequently concurred with the recommendation not to fund the project.

3. No.

* * *

[English]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 3,124 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—PERSONNEL AND SALARIES

Question No. 3,124—Mr. Cossitt:

1. As of January 1, 1974, how many persons employed by the Department of Supply and Services were in positions earning (a) $30,000 or more (b) $20,000 to $30,000 and, in each case, what were their names and job designations?

2. For the same period, how many additional persons in the Department are earning (a) $30,000 or more (b) $20,000 to $30,000 and, in each case, what are their names and job designations?

Return tabled.

* * *

BILINGUALISM

REPORT OF SECOND BILINGUAL DISTRICTS ADVISORY BOARD—QUESTIONS ON MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. gentleman to deal with the matter in terms of the review, having regard to the public servants who would be providing services in these areas. In view of the obvious principle that it involves in the provision of services in both languages by the federal government in these districts, has the government come to any conclusion as to what level of capability would be required in that area, or how the process of designation would be operated? Would there be any requirement for units working in French in those areas that would be bilingual districts? That is my first question.

● (1250)

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the system of designation will not, as a consequence of this report, be changed. I think the hon. member is generally familiar with the current system of designation, the criteria used and the progress being made. This will not change as a consequence of these recommendations. I would ask him to repeat the second part of his question as I cannot recollect it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question concerned the requirements with respect to bilingual districts outside the national capital. I was thinking of units working in French.

Mr. Drury: Units working in French are a matter of internal organization of the government. This question is not related to that of bilingual districts. As has been said, bilingual districts are to be delineated and proclaimed to ensure that the public in those districts can receive services from the federal government in either one of the official languages of their choice. The requirements necessary for units of the federal government working in French may or may not be related to those of the bilingual district but should not have any effect on their proclamation.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask another question? I am concerned about the question of designation and the necessity for the government's proposals to go forward in terms of the application of this capability. I ask if this capability for government services in bilingual districts is to be established by way of the process of decentralization, which is the cornerstone of a policy set out in certain documents I produced on September 3, 1975. Is it to be done in that way? Is the government contemplating additional man-years of employment in order to provide for positions which may be designated in bilingual districts?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, we have formulated a plan with which, I think, the hon. gentleman is familiar, to meet the requirements of the Official Languages Act. That plan has been elaborated and budgetary provision made to fulfil it. This proposal is, in a sense, merely declaratory of that plan, instead of an alternate plan. This is what we mean when we talk about implementation of this report without additional budgetary resources.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question concerning the government's present plan? Are we now to understand that when positions in bilingual districts in Alberta or Nova Scotia are designated bilingual, that people in those positions will be sent for language training? Or, will the government utilize additional man-years of employment or implement the program through a process of decentralization by moving public servants, in order to bring about what the government intends to do by reason of its acceptance of the report just brought forward? That is the question.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman contemplates the achievement of a multiplicity of objectives through one plan. Unfortunately, this cannot be done. We have a plan for establishing institutional bilingualism within the public service, as required by the Official Languages Act. In addition, we have a proposal for decentralization in the interest of making the federal government more responsive to the people of Canada. These two programs are not directly related; they are separate. Attempting to achieve both objectives with one move will only lead to confusion in perception and execution.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thought decentralization was related to phase two.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, at what level of employment in the bilingual districts will employees need to be bilingual? How far down in the structure, so to speak, will employees need to be bilingual? In other words, how far down will the prime consideration for employment be bilingual capacity?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, briefly, it will vary from office to office and function to function. The requirement for bilingual capacity, or for institutional bilingualism, is based on ability to communicate with the public in either official language. In some instances it will mean that the elevator operator, to the extent that he must communicate with the public, should be able to do so in both official languages. Or, the person answering the telephone should be able to do so in both languages. The point is, there should be someone around who can perform all public functions necessary in this way. It is necessary for some person to do this in both or either of our official languages. How far down or up the scale such employees will be depends on their function, office and location.

Mr. Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) for a supplementary question, I ought to tell hon. members that the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker), as well as the hon. member For Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), want to ask questions. If questions are brief, I am prepared not to see the clock. But perhaps it is unrealistic to expect hon. members to limit themselves to a few minutes. I think therefore, the remaining questions should be put to the minister at two o'clock.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. When the House rose at one o'clock there was a question period in progress following a statement by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury). Upon direction from the Speaker, I will recognize four more questioners and then we will go to government orders.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, my question is in two parts. It has to do with the consultative procedures envisaged from this time on. What consultation is contemplated with the provinces with respect to the report of the advisory board? The implications in two instances are quite wide. As well, what consultation procedures are contemplated with regard to the professional associations within the public service?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will be aware that the board did have very extensive consultations, in his province of Nova Scotia, with the provincial government and with municipal authorities in some of the larger areas, as well as with local associations. We generally found ourselves in agreement with the conclusions the commissioners reached in relation to the province of Nova Scotia. I think that is clear from the statement I made this morning. However, the comments of the provincial governments on the report itself, of which they are now in possession and this will be the first time they have seen the conclusions, have been sought in a letter from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which is already in their hands, and we have asked for a response with the utmost expediency.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the further consultative procedure. It is necessary not only with respect to Nova Scotia but all the provinces. In New Brunswick there will be a significant change from the old system. Will the professional associations of the public service, such as PIPS, the Public Service Alliance, and so on, be given an opportunity to express further views on the conclusions which I presume they, too, are now seeing for the first time?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is probably aware of the existence and functions of a very useful body known as the National Joint Council, wherein discussions of this kind of thing and a number of other matters are undertaken as a matter of routine, continuing procedure. It would be my expectation that Treasury Board would ensure that the comments of the National Joint Council would be obtained.

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, can the minister assist me by confirming my understanding of some details with respect to the statement which he read this morning? Is it the intention of the government literally to overrule the report of the bilingual districts board and thereby assure the Montreal island population, or perhaps the Montreal urban area population that it will be served in both official languages? The essence of my question is whether that service will be given, not only as a matter of fact but, indeed, as a matter of government regulation and/or law.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm that the standards of availability of federal government services in both official languages which are applicable to the provinces of Canada other than Quebec are equally available by formal steps to the residents of the province of Quebec. The federal government services in that province will be under the same obligation as they are in any other province to deliver their services, where there is sufficient demand, in the language of the citizen's choice.

Mr. Blaker: I thank the minister. I now take the next logical step be referring to the minister's statement. I quote:

[Translation]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there will be one or more bilingual districts in Greater Montreal.

[English]

The question which arises immediately as a result of the concept of one or more bilingual districts within the island of Montreal or the Montreal geographical area is the problem of the mobility of the population. If, for example, the government chose to begin drawing lines on the map of Montreal, it would not take into consideration, or might not make the distinction between the characteristic of residence and the characteristic of place of work.

● (1410)

I wonder whether the minister would be so kind as to explain to the House what he means by the statement that there might be one or more bilingual districts on the island of Montreal or in the Montreal area. I suggest that the distribution of population is such that the whole area should be considered as one bilingual district.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because of the argument made by the hon. gentleman that perhaps it ought to be one district. This provides certain advantages, but equally it provides some disadvantages in terms of availability of services. For instance, the act requires that the principal offices of government departments or agencies in each bilingual district must have this bilingual capacity. If there is only one district, it means only one principal office. Obviously, the greater the number of districts, the greater the requirement by law for bilingual capacity. A balance has to be struck between the considerations expressed by the hon. gentleman and affording the maximum practical service to the public.

Mr. Blaker: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the minister, but may I put the question in reverse form? Is it foreseeable that there is some geographical location on or around the island of Montreal that would not provide bilingual service to its citizens?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking me to provide the answers to a study that we have said we are going to undertake immediately. If I knew all the answers, I would suggest that we did not need a study. It would be presumptuous to endeavour to anticipate the results that a serious and profound study of this question will yield.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I refer the minister to paragraph 10 of the report as it appears on page 4. I will read it for purposes of clarification:

It is also worth observing that nothing in the Official Languages Act, whether it be the clauses in the statute establishing English and French as the official languages of Canada or any other section providing for the implementation of this declaration, derogates in any way from the privileges enjoyed by any additional language. Section 38 of the act expressly forbids the dimunition of any legal or customary rights or privileges possessed or acquired by any additional language before or after the act came into force.

My question is this: In those areas of Canada where additional languages have, by the evolution of time, acquired rights and uses in the public service in the dealing of people with the Government of Canada, is the implementation of this bilingual districts program likely to derogate in any way from the continued use and growth of any additional language or languages in that bilingual district?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the short answer to that is no. It is not the intention, either of the Official Languages Act or this report, or the intention of the government in relation to it, that bilingual districts should have that effect; nor will the program be allowed in any way to derogate from the rights, customary or statutory, acquired by any other language or language group in Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question. The reason I ask the question stems from the implementation of, shall I say, any minority language working unit where there is now within the complement of the federal service a sufficient number of employees that it is determined there should be a French or English or minority language working unit. In most cases it will be a French language working unit. In order to preserve the additional language capability of the service, will there be a requirement to add personnel to the office or establish the French language unit in, say, a city like Edmonton, in a post office, where Ukrainian is an essential language for serving the public?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. gentleman has confused me a little. The creation and operation of units of work in which the working language is French does not, by definition, call for additional people. It merely establishes an understanding whereby the people in that unit will be able to work more efficiently in a particular language, in this case French, than they can in English. It has nothing to do at all with the speaking of a variety of other languages and the provision of services in those languages to the public.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), which I think is what he is today, if the government is prepared to affirm that it stands by the position set out in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the report, to the effect that the purpose of bilingual districts is to impose an obligation on the government, not an obligation on the public? Does the government also stand by the principle established in paragraph 9 that the creation of bilingual districts does not carry with it a requirement that the public servants in those districts be or become bilingual?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the point raised by the hon. gentleman is a very important one. I hope that readers of the report will pay particular attention to this underlying principle against which the whole report should be seen and which consequently is the basis upon which we are establishing and intending to proclaim these bilingual districts. I am not sure I agree entirely with his interpretation of paragraph 9 when he says that—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should have put in the word "all"—that it is not a requirement that all public servants in the district be or become bilingual?

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, with the addition of "all" I have no trouble at all in agreeing with the important point the hon. member has made, namely, that the purpose of the bilingual districts and the purpose of the proclamation of bilingual districts is to ensure in a formal way that the federal government and its offices will have the capacity to deliver services in either of the two official languages to those of the public who apply. Rather than forcing bilingualism upon the public, it enables them to continue to deal with the federal government in the official language of their choice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As I mentioned at the outset of the afternoon sitting, Mr. Speaker did suggest that I recognize four questioners, and this I have done. I would be ready to recognize two more on very short questions, because two additional members are standing up, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I hope questions and answers will be short because questions and answers generate other questions. I will then call orders of the day.

● (1420)

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, during this morning's session, when Mr. Speaker made reference to the questioning this afternoon, it was my understanding there would be no limitation on the questions. There are numbers on this side of the House who have questions, and I feel there should not be a limitation in respect of a matter as important as this one.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I intended to raise this point at the end of whatever the question period might be. I object to the fact that Your Honour has not, in fact, agreed or tacitly supported the position the Speaker took shortly before lunch. At the time there were a number of members standing, whose names he called. I had the floor at the time and I expected your bias to show in that regard, and when you did not recognize me I did not rise again. But, I, as a member, object violently to this arrangement where an agreement is not honoured by Mr. Speaker because the Speaker may have changed, and also to the bias that is becoming pretty evident from my own point of view in this regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair does not accept the last part of the remarks of the hon. member. I think it is a reflection on the Chair and the occupant of the chair.

An hon. Member: It is, and it was meant to be.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think it is something the hon. member should consider withdrawing both as far as the Chair is concerned as well as the present occupant of the chair.

In addition, I wish to reply to the first point raised by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson). I did not mention the Standing Order, but it does provide for the Chair to decide how long the question period should last. It is not the responsibility of the Chair to decide whether an

hon. member might have a question if he does not rise. I am not sure the hon. member for Laprairie did rise from his seat before lunch. Mr. Speaker mentioned to me that four hon. members had risen and had not been recognized before one o'clock. He put those names on a list and, of course, the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) was included.

The hon. member stood up, but if he thinks that any time he stands the Speaker will go to him immediately, let me point out that it is the prerogative of the Speaker to recognize hon. members in due course when he feels it is fair to recognize them. The hon. member yielded to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and that was his decision. As far as the reflection on the Chair is concerned, I do not accept it, and I would hope the hon. member would at least modify it or put it in other words.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I agree that we should not make suggestions reflecting on the Chair, but I had the floor and therefore did not have to yield to anyone. I called it one o'clock. What surprises me, Mr. Speaker, is that some occupants of the chair either do not know the rules or they misunderstand—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Peters: —my relationship, and this had bothered me on a number of occasions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: Members in certain parts of the House are amused by this, but I personally am not. If I made a reflection in respect of the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that reflection, but the other remarks stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As a means of explaining, perhaps I might say I was not here at one o'clock and the hon. member's name was on my list as number three.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). From the report, it seems now agreed that there is no call for establishing bilingual districts in the province of British Columbia. Now that it has been recognized that there is no call to create such bilingual districts in British Columbia, I wonder whether the Acting President of the Treasury Board could indicate that the tower which was being erected for the creation of a French language television station in British Columbia is now to be dismantled or put up for auction to anyone else who wishes to use it.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I have not received any advice from the CBC on this, so I cannot answer the question. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that his questions about bilingual districts and the provision of services in two languages by the broadcasting corporation are really not related. The radius of action in respect of the population to be served by a radio or television station is quite different from the radius of action and service to be provided to the constituents through a particular government office.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You wait and see.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have one question of the hon. gentleman about the statement he made regarding the fact that the government did not intend to increase any expenditures as a result of the creation of bilingual districts. How is the capability of providing services in two languages to be established—by training, by transfer, or by recruitment? If it is one of those that is chosen, how can the minister justify the statement that there will be no additional expenses in respect of language training in order that public servants in Canada will be able to comply with the requirements of providing these services within the districts?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, obviously the training at public expense of these people in order that they shall have the additional capacity will cost money. This is additional to a régime under which there would be no training and where there would be no upgrading of that character. The statement I made qualifying the word "additional" was "additional budgetary expenditures". We have a plan, of which I think the hon. gentleman is aware, to train, to recruit and to otherwise give effect to the designation plan of the government that has been in existence for some time. What my statement was intended to do was make it quite clear that there will be no expansion and no increase in this plan as a consequence of the proclamation of bilingual districts.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, does that mean, therefore, that the government's program, or the proposal before the government in respect of a pay differential of from 2 per cent to 15 per cent for those with the required language capability is not going to be used in respect of this particular program? Can the minister inform me whether it is the intention of the government now to proceed with that pay differential program?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I cannot inform the hon. gentleman whether we will be proceeding with this plan or not. No decision has been taken on that particular topic. It will not, however, be as a consequence of or bear a direct relationship to the proclamation of bilingual districts.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you very much.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I indicated that I had a question to ask with regard to this announcement today by the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Proceed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I should just like to mention to the hon. member that I was ready to recognize him, but he should know the basic rule, that if he wants to be recognized in this House he has to stand in his place. The hon. member did stand after I had called orders of the day. However, I will recognize him, but I wish he would not try to complicate the life of every member of this House.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the Government of Canada's rejection of unilingualism in the Montreal area and its affirmation that it will proclaim bilingual districts in that area. There is one thing, however, in the government's announcement today which somewhat bothers me: it will not go along with the recommendation that a special commission be set up to study better ways to implement bilingualism. In light of the number of failures in several areas of the bilingualism program, and the lack of real progress in bilingualism, it seems to me this is hardly justifiable on the basis of a tight budget. Does the government have any clear indication that this recommendation for a special commission can be accomplished in a different way? If so, I would like to know what that other way is.

● (1430)

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the statement I made this morning would have adequately covered this point. In the statement it was pointed out that there are now quite a number of institutions, both governmental and non-governmental, devoting considerable resources and energy to this particular question. It was our view that in a time of restraint we would be merely adding another body devoted to the same task, without any clear assurance that this new body would accomplish more successfully than the existing ones what is being done now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MARITIME CODE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE A MARITIME CODE FOR CANADA

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, they say that becoming a parliamentary secretary is a broadening experience. In my short time in this role I am certainly finding that to be true. As proof positive of that fact, here today is a prairie boy with a farming background and some background in broadcasting and law engaging in discussion on this very important bill in respect of a maritime code for Canada which is, of course, of special interest to Pacific and Atlantic Canada.

Let me say I very much look forward to the debate which will now come forward concerning this legislation, and I am particularly anxious to hear the comments of my colleagues in this House, on all sides, particularly those from the coastal areas. In May of this year, the former minister of transport introduced in this House a most important piece of legislation, Bill C-61, the Maritime Code Act. It is part of a comprehensive program of reform and revision of Canada's shipping law and pursues the modernization of admiralty law provisions which were enacted in the Federal Court Act some years ago.

This bill is intended eventually to replace the Canada Shipping Act and a number of related laws dealing with navigation and shipping. It is a modern statement of Canadian law designed to keep the best of previous statutes and agreements, and at the same time to recognize today's shipping world and its practical complexities.

In spite of amendments to the Canada Shipping Act which have been made over the years, many provisions are obsolete by any modern standard. Contemporary use of water transport for both commercial and recreation purposes has increased substantially, and with that increase there is a growing concern for protection of the rights of all Canadians with respect to the economic, sociological and environmental consequences of that expanded use.

The patchwork-quilt approach of amendments to the Canada Shipping Act has not proved satisfactory, and it is appropriate at this time to carry out an over-all revision of shipping law in the light of current and expected future needs. The study program supporting the revision and reorganization of shipping law is, of course, an ongoing one and it would seem that the most suitable way to proceed with legislative action thereon is to present the material to the House in progressive stages rather than as one single, massive enactment. This provides a better opportunity for informed comment and debate.

It might be useful to outline briefly the physical arrangement of Bill C-61 as it stands now in this stage by stage process. The main body of the bill primarily does two things: it enacts certain provisions with respect to the coasting trade in Canada, pursuant to the Darling report, and it provides the power of authority for the maritime code itself.

That code is to be found set out specifically in schedule III of the bill. The first two schedules deal simply with a series of related and consequential amendments which flow from the act. They also provide a vehicle for phasing out the old Canada Shipping Act over time, and the phasing in of the new code.

The maritime code as set out in the third schedule consists of two major sections, or books as they are called, of maritime law. The first deals with general matters; the second deals with ships. When fully completed by subsequent legislative action, the code will consist of five major books altogether. The three yet to come will relate to the law on crew standards, cargo and cargo safety, and operational standards. While the total act will necessarily be a detailed and lengthy document, some appreciation of its intent can be gained by looking at a few of the major provisions in a summary way.

First, the act will apply to all Canadian ships no matter where they may sail. It will also have force over all foreign vessels operating in Canadian waters. This means Canada will control all shipping in its own waters but will also be in a position to answer for Canadian ships anywhere in the world.

A major provision of the Maritime Code Act is a new statement of what constitutes a Canadian ship under law. Since a law is only as good as the ability to enforce it, ownership requirements have been clearly set out. Perhaps the most important of these is that two-thirds of the directors and two-thirds of the officers of any company desiring to own a Canadian ship must be citizens of and resident in Canada. This means that we will be able to preserve expertise in marine management in Canada and that owners will be available to answer in law for their ships.

As I have mentioned, the main body of the Maritime Code Act contains substantive provisions dealing with the coasting trade of Canada. Hon. members will recall that following a report by Mr. Howard Darling on Canada's coasting trade, the government announced that it was withdrawing from certain articles of the 1931 British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement and that the Canadian coasting trade would be reserved to Canadian flag vessels. Last year we gave other member countries 12 months' notice to this effect.

The Maritime Code Act gives a new definition of the coasting trade of Canada that includes the carriage of goods or passengers from any port in Canada to any other port in Canada, whether by way of a foreign port or not. This will prevent unfair advantages by foreign ships in the cruise trade; these practices are detrimental to the economic interests of Canadian shipping. This definition also includes exploration or drilling platforms which are operating under Canadian jurisdiction. Dredging and salvage, which were implied in the old definition, are now expressly included.

Only Canadian ships will now be permitted to engage in the country's coasting trade, except when the public interest or an emergency demand otherwise. Non-Canadian ships enjoying the five-year grandfather rights will also be allowed to engage in the coasting trade. These grandfather rights will expire in April, 1980. They apply to ships registered in a Commonwealth country since September, 1973, and that have been regularly engaged in the Canadian coasting trade since September, 1972.

Non-Canadian ships will be issued licences to engage in the coasting trade upon payment of a fee. This fee will replace the duties of Customs applicable at present to foreign-built ships under the customs tariff. Fees will be set by the governor in council; they will be subject to various criteria and thus may vary from ship to ship, thereby allowing flexibility. The Maritime Code Act provides for fines up to $5,000 in case of non-compliance with the act. It also provides for detainment of the ship and forfeiture of the goods carried.

The definition of "port" in the act is more encompassing and include now, for the first time, all ports in Canada. The new definition will apply in areas where federal jurisdiction is clear, bringing within our scope supervision of cargo stowage in respect of grain, timber and concentrates, and supervision over certain crew matters.

● (1440)

Now I would like to turn to some of the specific provisions of the two books of law set forth in schedule 3 in the maritime code itself. Book one establishes the applicability of the maritime code and it provides for Canadian law to be extended to Canadian ships in foreign waters and to foreign ships in Canadian waters. Recognition is given to the rights of innocent passage of foreign ships passing through our territorial seas and express recognition is given to the right of intervention on the high seas in a case involving a shipping casualty where there is a threat of damage to Canadian interests or the environment. These sections involve law of the sea issues and take into account the possibility of future international agreement on these subjects.

In order to allow for greater public participation in the regulation-making process, provision is made in book one for prior publication of regulations in certain specified cases and, at the minister's discretion, for public hearings. The regulation-making power is quite flexible, allowing classification of ships for administrative purposes and the establishment of zones which may, in future stages of legislation, be used for a number of purposes such as environmental protection or traffic safety control.

The enforcement provisions contained in book one have been revised substantially in comparison with those in the Canada Shipping Act. Matters related to the detention of ships have been expanded and clarified. Arrest in civil cases has been extended to sister ships to conform with international practice and the procedures related to forfeiture have been set out in detail. As with respect to enforcement, the procedures relating to offences, penalties and fines have been clarified and co-ordinated where necessary with provisions of the Criminal Code. A new procedure for the service of a summons in the form of a ticket, and for payment of fines by mail in the case of minor offences, has been instituted. In ticketing situations, ships would be able to continue in trade. Shipowners will be able to acknowledge their guilt by paying the required fine, similar to the ticketing of cars, or they may contest it in court.

Provision has also been made for distribution of fines to enforcement agencies and to compensate persons suffering damage by reason of the offence. A fair degree of flexibility has been introduced in the detention provisions by permitting the minister to approve security in amounts less than the maximum fine provided for the alleged offence. A detention order may also be lifted where the person charged appears to answer the charge in court or where security is given in lieu of the anticipated fine.

The main categories of the provisions of book two, the ship, are intended to deal with the ship as a structure. First, with regard to the national character and status of a ship, provisions have been clarified and related to Canadian registration instead of registration of Commonwealth ships in Canada. New provisions dealing with the marking of ships will make identification easier for enforcement agencies. But appropriate exemption provisions exist for very small vessels.

Second, in connection with ownership, the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act have been substantially changed. Ownership through the present system of 64 shares in a ship has been eliminated and replaced by a percentage system. Qualifications for ownership have been changed from Commonwealth to Canadian and, with respect to corporations, there is a requirement that two-thirds of the specified directors and two-thirds of the officers of the company be Canadian citizens resident in Canada. The primary purpose of these provisions is not to control foreign investment in Canadian shipping companies but, rather, to ensure that there will always be responsible persons within Canada to answer for the actions of a Canadian ship outside Canada. There is a clause in the act that permits present owners who will not qualify under the new law to remain owners of their ships as long as there is no change in their personal status.

Third, the system of port registry has been changed to a centralized registry system and a construction registry has been instituted to replace the recording system for ships under construction in order to allow ratification of the 1967 international convention on registration of ships under construction. The registry will be focused in the national capital region. However, it will be possible for shipowners to continue to file documents anywhere in Canada through local Customs offices which will act as a forwarding agent for the centralized registry. All the procedures relating to registry have been substantially altered in order to fit the new system, and this has made simplification of such procedures possible.

The point I think I should emphasize here, Mr. Speaker, with respect to this registry system is that centralization of records is really essential in order to provide an effective, reliable and universal registration system to ensure titles. But we will want to preserve the direct, personal aspects of registration, such as the ability to file documents, on a local basis as has traditionally been the case.

Fourth, with regard to the measure of ships, provisions relating to this matter have been considerably improved to take into account both the metric system and the new international rules relating to measurement of tonnage, and these should enable us eventually to ratify the 1969 international convention on tonnage measurements of ships.

Fifth, there are provisions relating to provincially-registered chattel mortgages. These permit any schemes concerning registration of chattel mortgages of Canadian registered small craft to continue unaffected where such schemes are provided by the legislation of any province. The only requirement is that notice be given of any such registered mortgage to the registrar of the federal registry. Thus, where there exists a provincial scheme in this respect concerning small craft licensed under the Canada Shipping Act, that scheme may be continued under the maritime code without change, provided simply that notice of the registered chattel mortgage is given to the federal registrar in order that the registry system may provide full title protection.

It may be argued that the ownership provisions of book one are too restrictive in view of the fact that the provisions of this bill require that a two-thirds majority of directors be Canadian citizens resident in Canada. It should be understood that these provisions of the code are not directly related to foreign investment but to exercise the necessary control over a ship which may be outside Canadian enforcement jurisdiction. Such a ship may engage in activities embarrassing to Canada and for which, in some cases, the Canadian government may be held responsible. In addition, these provisions are concerned with preserving an existing body of Canadian management expertise.

Subsection 6 of the Maritime Code Act provides a saving clause whereby owners of ships registered under the Canada Shipping Act remain as persons qualified to own a Canadian ship notwithstanding the new provisions, but only in relation to ships owned at the time the new provisions on ownership enter into force and only as long as there is no change in personal status of the owner. This clause will enable a smooth transition from the old requirements to the new ones and should not cause any disruption to the shipping industry.

It is possible, too, that the registry provisions of the bill may be criticized by those who object to the centralization of federal powers and agencies. Let me make it clear here that, as a westerner, I am very much one of those who generally sympathizes with these sorts of objections. Centralization simply for the sake of centralization alone, without good and substantial reasons apart from that, is something to which I object. Canada is too diverse, complicated and sprawling a land for a tightly clenched, centralized system of government and administration.

If centralization in some aspects of the government's work is to come about, it must be prompted by compelling reasons and these reasons exist, I believe, in the case of the registry system proposed in the bill. It should be pointed out that the existing port registry system under the Canada Shipping Act could be regarded as a rather wasteful and expensive one. The central registry is more efficient, both from the government's point of view in reducing cost and from the public's point of view with respect to inquiries into registration details. Centralization is necessary in order to take full advantage of modern registry techniques such as computerization of records. At the same time, the most personal aspect of registration—the filing of documents by owners—has been retained as an optional local procedure.

There may be some objection to the elimination of licensing for small craft and its replacement by the registration system on the grounds that it means increased paperwork. There is some merit for this criticism because the documentation under the licensing system was completely inadequate. Every effort has been made, however, to simplify the documentation procedure. Only craft of a sufficient value, related to size and horsepower, to warrant title protection will be registered, and all other boats will merely receive an identification number which implies no greater documentation than licensing.

Registration and the issuing of an identification number will carry a user charge. This is necessary because of the increasing cost of administration of the system. On the other hand, registration of small craft will give the boat owner adequate title protection which he did not have under the licensing system.

Mr. Speaker, may I conclude these remarks in the manner in which I began. Bill C-61 brings to Canadian maritime law a new and important measure of modernization and co-ordination in a comprehensive fashion, designed to be consistent with the practical realities of today's world. It will also place Canada in a position to speak more strongly in international maritime circles, in keeping with our position as a leading world trader. As I have said, I look forward to the contributions which no doubt will be made in this debate by hon. members from all sides of the House.

● (1450)

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be to congratulate that fellow from Saskatchewan, the parliamentary secretary, not so much for his delivery of a technical address to us this afternoon but for following in the finest tradition of seafaring men from Saskatchewan—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: —of which the Royal Canadian Navy had many and of whom we were very proud during the war, many of whom have found residence in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): There is only one in doubt, and that is the minister.

Mr. Forrestall: Having said that, I must say that I could not follow the parliamentary secretary at all because he delivered a highly technical and, I am sure, a very valuable summary of the maritime code which is in front of us. Canadians have been waiting for this code since 1854, when we had the old, British system. I suppose this is a bit of watermark for us. We have tinkered with and made hundreds of amendments to this act. We took it from what was referred to as the old merchant shipping act. Now we call it the Canada Shipping Act. It has been called the maritime act; it has been called everything. Now we call it the maritime code. The fact of the matter is that as Canadians we have been waiting since 1854 for it, and before we do away with what we have lived with for 120 years or so, perhaps our appreciation to the United Kingdom and to the British shipping community should go on record for having lent us their expertise, guidance, direction and laws until this point in time.

In a sense, I suppose I am saying I welcome this effort by the two distinguished gentlemen from Saskatchewan with respect to maritime matters, and I say that very sincerely. Frankly, credit for it, I think, must go directly to the predecessor of the minister and to those with whom he worked and with whom the present minister must work in putting in place this bill.

Mr. McCleave: And Howard Darling.

Mr. Forrestall: And, of course, Howard Darling, from whom all good blessings in the direction of an ultimate Canadian merchant fleet seem to have been flowing in recent months.

Mr. McCleave: He is everybody's "darling" except the government's.

Mr. Forrestall: We welcome this bill because, as the parliamentary secretary said, it brings together in one unified code the various sections of a number of different statutes. It brings together in one single document, as the parliamentary secretary said, five separate books which in fact will bring some order into the chaotic situation we have had until this point in time. We welcome it. We note, as well, that it reflects pretty closely the sentiments of Bill C-216 which had an abortive introduction in the House back in July, 1973. In the process of considering this matter, I hope the minister will have a few minutes to speak, but I wish to place in front of him an inquiry as to whether this bill reflects any philosophical differences from the bill introduced originally in 1973. Most of us are too lazy to go back and reread it all, and perhaps the minister could tell us the basis of his briefing.

As I have said, we recognize the need to codify and bring together under this new code the somewhat confusing legislation which we find at times in our Canada Shipping Act, the steamship act, the steamship inspection act, and on through our various fisheries acts, environmental acts, and so on, and to present it in clear language. I emphasize the need for clear language not only in the legislation, but also in the regulations which will flow from it. In that respect, I would also place before the minister an inquiry as to whether he might give the shipping community interests in Canada, as well as the House and the standing committee, an opportunity to question him with respect to certain of the regulations which it is anticipated will flow from this legislation. We would appreciate the opportunity of commenting on them and to make some observations, if the minister feels that is a proper way to approach this particular bill. The regulations cannot be changed substantively because in effect they are doing the same thing as we were doing under old acts, so I hope that in this particular instance the minister will give us an opportunity to review certain of the regulations.

We also await with some eagerness the remaining chapters in connection with this new law and the long-promised section to deal with the general headings of crew, cargo, and operational standards. These are equally important to us. Hopefully, the community will not be kept waiting too long for clarification of the attitude of the government in these areas. Hopefully, we will be able to see the balance of this legislation before the end of this session, if in fact we get around to dealing with it, and perhaps the minister might respond to that at a later date.

In connection with this matter we file the caveats which have been alluded to by the parliamentary secretary. They have to do with the registration procedures and the centralization program, and the impact this will have in terms of the convenience of shipowners, particularly small craft owners, fishing vessel owners, and so on. A further caveat which would naturally flow from that would relate to a fear we might have—and we hope for some expression, again, in committee or from the minister this afternoon—as to the administrative burden which this legislation will place upon shipowners in terms of documents to fill out, papers to file, certificates to register, and so on. We reserve the right to look fairly closely at that particular aspect.

If I did not miss too much of what the parliamentary secretary had to say, I suggest he did not deal with the intentions of the government with respect to the shipping community interest. We will very much want to have the views of the shipping community generally, the maritime associations and shipowners associations. I think we should hear from the CBRT, and probably the SIU, with respect to the implications of this for the Canadian shipping industry. I am sure the minister is quite prepared to go along with this.

There is a further caveat we should like to place on the record at this point. It has to do with my concern about the process of exemptions from the provisions of this bill. There are one or two clauses the purpose and intent of which we are not certain about. If I were to be partisan, I might say that they are to permit the polar icebreakers of the United States coastguard to go into the Arctic and transport, lead or escort massive tankers from the slopes of Alaska out through the Northwest Passage and down to the great ports off the New Jersey coast. This is being contemplated. I am not a partisan person when it comes to maritime activity, so I simply ask the minister, at some point in time in committee, or preferably this afternoon, to expand slightly on the opting out sections of this code. I ask this because I think the minister would readily agree that the exemptions in the past were granted on a sort of wholesale basis. It has been virtually a rubber stamp process for the CTC, and we would like to see this come to an end.

● (1500)

In a general way we are also concerned with the ad hoc approach to transportation in Canada. The movement of goods and passengers is a mode of transportation with which we are concerned. In two or three years' time when we complete the transportation overhaul we might end up with conflicts if not in practice at least in philosophy, and this might lead to difficulties. While we are a little bit concerned with the ad hoc approach I hasten to add that it is better than no action at all. At first blush I think it serves the shipping community reasonably well.

It is what this bill does not do that concerns me in a personal way. It says nothing about the need for a Canadian flag fleet for international seaborne trade. It says nothing about the Canadian army. As I understood it, what Mr. Darling was doing was in preparation for the rebirth of Canada's international marine fleet, which would put us in a strong, secure position with respect to the extractive industries of the north in those waters north of 63 degrees. It would be a mistake for the government not to secure the extractive industries in the north exclusively to Canadian ships, built in Canada to Canadian standards, crewed by Canadians, and subject to Canadian law.

I spoke of this matter last night with the parliamentary secretary, and I see that the minister is here this afternoon. I hope he will take my suggestion with respect to the north seriously. I do not suggest that the government is not concerned about this, and I do not suggest that we are not aware of the difficulty. As a matter of fact there is nothing in the north to take out right now, but in anticipation of what is there, the natural gas, the iron ore, the lead, I think we have a responsibility to indicate to the shipping community at home and abroad that it should develop the necessary technology and capacity to send our ships north of sixty.

There are one or two other reservations that we will deal with in committee, such as the substantive conditions of the code starting at page 12 and wandering through to page 16 or 17. We also want to look at the regulations. My colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), will raise a question with respect to the opting out clause and its impact on the carrying of passengers on foreign ships between one Canadian port and another.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

I come back to what concerns me more than anything else with respect to this bill, although I believe it is not within the capacity of the maritime code to deal with the remarks I want to leave on the record. I will be very critical with respect to the books that are to follow this first book of the general maritime code. I am concerned with the ownership of vessels and the fact that shipping procedures are rapidly changing, increasing the cost of shipbuilding and fleet operation. This has driven many small firms out of business leaving control in fewer and fewer hands, technically known as monopoly situations.

Not only that, but governments around the world have begun to look again at the century old subsidization policies. Instead of of shelling out public funds with no strings attached, they say, "We want control of your business, we want men on your boards, we want voting shares in your companies". So the foreign fleets upon which Canada is totally dependent are increasingly the arms and tools of the express national interests of foreign powers. Mr. Darling suggests that Canada cannot safely rely forever on the whims of foreign governments for the vitally important shipment of Canadian exports and imports.

Remember here that about $8 billion worth of Canadian goods were sold abroad last year and about $7 billion worth of foreign goods were brought into Canada, and not so much as 1 per cent of this enormous total was carried in ships over which Canada has legislative control. If even a portion of Canadian imports and exports were to be crippled by a decision of offshore interests, the resulting financial and economic chaos would be staggering.

Standing alone between Canada and this unthinkable situation, protecting this vital trade, are the foreign shipping cartels, responsible to Athens, London, New York, Tokyo, Amsterdam, not Ottawa, completely beyond the reach of Canadian law and even specially exempt from it. They serve us well today, Mr. Darling suggests, but they might not even be here tomorrow.

He points to the growing trend of the South American governments to insist that all trade to and from those countries be carried in their national bottoms. He points out the increasing number of bilateral arrangements between even great "free trade" proponents like the United States, enacted with no regard whatsoever for third parties such as Canada. He points to the diminishing ports of call brought about by containerization, and wonders where Canada will stand at the next notch in the ever-advancing development of ship technology. He points out that with all the federal and provincial money spent at Port Hawkesbury, St. Romuald, and Come-By-Chance, no one had the initiative or the foresight to require any type of shipping clause to protect some percentage of the traffic for Canadian ships. This is what we are hitting at.

We have closed the gulf but we have not closed north of sixty. Why? Even if the legislative process takes some time, let us tell the world that we intend to do it, and not spend 20 years in the doing of it. Nothing was done with respect to Come-By-Chance, for example. The principle is that first in will get the business, and keep it. Who is hauling oil for the refinery at Come-By-Chance? Are Canadian ships carrying oil?

● (1510)

Mr. McGrath: It is in British bottoms.

Mr. Forrestall: There is not one Canadian bottom carrying that oil.

All around, without and within, the ability of Canada to counter effectively world pressures on our foreign trade is severely limited. Worst of all is the over-riding neglect and, to a degree, international mockery to which this Liberal administration has subjected our maritime shipping policy. In a word, we are being laughed at. Mr. Darling tells us the obvious: the government simply does not care.

In the 15 to 20 years of my involvement in politics I have known only one government member, a former minister of transport, who was interested in maritime matters. Twenty years after he began talking about maritime policy the government is acting. I suspect his interest was created by his concern for labour. At least he proposed a maritime policy. Nobody else on the government side did. If the government had shown interest in shipping ten or 15 years ago, the legislation would now be in place and Canadian shipping would be carrying our goods. The north also would have been protected. If the United States had asked for our co-operation with respect to the north, we should have been able to oblige.

I also raise the question of where we buy our technology. We have bought expertise affecting the north from Finland. If the appropriate laws had been in place that would not have been necessary. If we had wanted to buy a certain technology from Finland, for example, we should have been sure that those in Finland would not pick up a telephone, buy the information from a Canadian engineering firm in Montreal, as happened recently, and sell it to us.

The minister probably has not been fully briefed by his department. At some point someone will tell him the amusing story of Canada purchasing information from the United States. The United States people, in turn, obtained the information from Finland, and the Fins obtained it from Canada. And you know what Canada paid for that information? The price was 17 times higher than it would have been a year and a half before, when it was sitting on a shelf in this country collecting dust. That is an interesting story.

Mr. McGrath: And is part of the reason for our present mess.

Mr. Forrestall: On the matter of a Canadian flag fleet, Mr. Darling expressed the following clear view:

> ... the use of Canadian flag shipping remains a valid long term objective not to be achieved at one stroke but step by step as our ability to protect our interests in the field becomes established and yields practical results.

We shall see those practical results when the government, conforming to the expressed will of the Canadian people, develops our offshore fleet and protects the extractive industries of the north.

Let us put it another way. There is not a single container ship, single tanker, single bulk carrier—and only three merchant ships—flying the Canadian flag on the oceans of the world.

Our oil, bauxite, and general cargo are imported in foreign flag vessels, for a fee. Our wheat, grain, coal, aluminum, steel, and general manufacture are exported by foreign flag vessels, also for a fee, which as noted last year came to an estimated $1.5 billion.

In addition to the impact upon our maritime regional economies a Canadian merchant fleet would have, it could also provide upward of 10,000 jobs for Canadian merchant sailors. Having said all that, I express to this House the attitude of virtually the entire shipping community that the policy process involved in shipping matters within the federal cabinet is totally inadequate for the 1970's and 1980's. The cabinet being the threshold for all decisions, most necessary decisions simply are not made. We are going too slowly. True, we must go step by step; yet surely we need more than one piece of legislation every three or four years. Let us pass legislation in this area as one package and thereby determine the impact it will have on rail transportation, air transportation, transportation by pipeline, etc.

We have the fullest confidence in the ability of Mr. Illing and his shipping advisory committee to make recommendations to government on this score, and trust the government will act on them with haste. I pay tribute to Mr. Illing and his associates. The task ahead of the committee is enormous, but it seems to be coping reasonably well. We wish him and his associates well in this work, and trust the government will adopt the recommendations of that group expeditiously.

Let me conclude with some general comments. We welcome this bill but wish it had been brought forward in 1973. We wish that we could be considering the balance of the necessary legislation, and that the government had declared its interest with respect to extractive industries north of 60 degrees and its intention to restrict those industries to the exclusive use of Canadian ships, when those ships can perform the task.

Those are all the points I wish to raise at this time, being confident that we can raise substantive matters in committee. We welcome the bill and wish the government success with the implementation of the first part.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Madam Speaker, Bill C-61 is designed to provide a maritime code for Canada. It belatedly and only partially answers the long standing need for a Canadian shipping policy.

Canada is a leading trading nation in the world. We realize, whether one represents a maritime constituency, as I do, or lives in another part of Canada, that a shipping policy which will enable us to send our goods to the markets of the world is absolutely imperative. Unfortunately successive governments have shamefully neglected Canada's shipping interests.

As the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) showed, we export annually about $8 billion worth of goods and import about $7 billion worth. On this $15 billion worth of goods leaving and entering Canada annually, we pay charges of between $2.5 billion and $3 billion annually. Less than one per cent of this tremendous tonnage is carried in Canadian ships. This difficulty has confronted us for the last 20 years.

Although I do not wish to be discourteous to the parliamentary secretary who explained the bill concisely, I was disappointed not to hear the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) make a statement about the government's long term shipping policy and the objectives it has in mind.

For many years members on all sides have urged successive ministers of transport to formulate and put forward a clearly defined Canadian shipping policy. True, Mr. Howard Darling was appointed and his group has made two excellent reports. Yet, apart from the one or two provisions introduced in the legislation which I shall discuss in a few moments, we have not seen any clear-cut formulation of Canadian shipping policy.

The nub of the matter is that Canada has allowed itself to be entirely at the mercy of the world shipping cartel. The effects were evident in 1973 and 1974 during the oil crisis when we were forced to move western crude oil to Vancouver, thence down the west coast, through the Panama Canal, and up to east coast ports.

● (1520)

At that time, when some of us were pleading with the then minister of energy, mines and resources, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), to enter into state trading arrangements by which the Government of Canada could purchase oil from oil-producing countries, the minister admitted that the multinational oil companies controlled a very large part of the shipping facilities for moving oil on the seas of the world. That situation is not going to improve. It is likely to get worse. The Arab countries are investing very large sums of money in the construction of oil tankers.

It is significant that in the last ten years there has been a switch in our sources of oil supply. Ten years ago 80 per cent of our imports came from South America, mainly, Venezuela, and the balance from the Middle East or Africa. Today 75 per cent of our oil imports come from the Middle East and Africa. This means we are going to be increasingly dependent upon the oil tankers of the multi-national oil companies and of the shipping cartel, and we will be paying a very heavy price for the movement of that oil.

One fact is very significant. During the period when we were moving oil from western Canada through the Panama Canal, of the 32 tankers used in moving western oil through the canal not one tanker was a Canadian ship. I make reference as an illustration to the UNCTAD proposal which was supported by many of the sea-faring nations. It suggested that 40 per cent of a country's trade should be handled on a national basis. Canada in that instance abstained.

Canadians have a right to ask why we are in this unenviable position. It is not because we cannot build and man ships. We who are old enough will remember that during the war Canada did develop a merchant fleet. We built ships and manned them. We had the materials with which to build ships and we had the personnel to sail them. In 1947, we had between 200 and 300 ships under Canadian registry. Today we have less than ten. In fact, the last figure I saw showed a total of only three.

Some of the ships that have been built under the government's shipbuilding subsidy program were transferred to foreign registries after the required period of time expired. That is not a situation or condition of which any nation can be proud, particularly a leading trading nation. It was for this reason that Mr. Darling was appointed to make a report. He recognized very clearly and distinctly the need for a Canadian merchant fleet. In his first report in October, 1970, he said, and I quote:

> The use of Canadian flag shipping remains a valid long-term objective not to be achieved at one stroke but step by step as our ability to protect our interests in the field becomes established and yields practical results.

When Mr. Darling said "not to be achieved at one stroke", he certainly did not mean the government should take five years from the time he filed his first report to take only a very faltering step, with no long-term objective as to whether that faltering step will lead to successive steps that will eventually give us a Canadian merchant marine.

Mr. Darling quite properly pointed out that there was a need for haste. He made it clear that shipping was being concentrated in fewer and fewer hands. Therefore we are not dealing with a free market with respect to major shipping. We face the prospect of being subservient to a shipping cartel. He points out that more and more foreign governments are investing in shipping and directing that shipping under their control so that they can use it for whatever political purpose, economic or trading objectives they have in mind. Some South American governments are now discussing the advisability of requiring all shipping to and from their ports to be carried on ships of national registry.

Because he recognized the seriousness of the situation Mr. Darling recommended that the first step should be that all ships engaged in trade between Canadian ports must be of Canadian registry. Since 1970 members on this side of the House have been bombarding the government with questions as to when this particular recommendation of the Darling report of October, 1970, would be implemented. We now have legislation which we welcome in so far as it takes this first step as recommended by Mr. Darling.

We think this legislation will be helpful. We are, however, concerned about some of the loopholes which are to be found in Bill C-61. I express the hope now that the standing committee which will be examining this bill will give some of these apparent loopholes very careful consideration. I also hope the government might be prepared to clarify and amend some of the provisions of the legislation so as to plug these loopholes.

The effectiveness of this legislation depends almost entirely on how the government handles the exemptions provided for in the bill. There are two main loopholes, as I see it, providing for exemptions. The first is clause 10 which gives the Canadian Transport Commission authority to grant permits to Commonwealth Country ships so that they are allowed to operate in our coastal trade until 1980. I commend the government for having given the required notice under the British Commonwealth Shipping Act. The notice was given in 1974 so we have complied with the required 12 month notice. We are no longer bound by this agreement.

This legislation extends to 1980 the right of Commonwealth ships which operate in our coastal waters if they are granted a permit by the Canadian Transport Commission. The only requirements are that a ship must have been registered in a Commonwealth country on or prior to September, 1974, and that 12 months prior to that date and since it must have operated in Canadian waters. There may be very sound reasons for this grandfather clause. Some of those reasons may apply in the Atlantic provinces, but I do not think they apply on the west coast of Canada.

● (1530)

I believe the committee should examine clause 10 very carefully to make sure that the criteria set out are relative to the situation, and that there is some compelling reason why this five years of grace should be granted to ships of other members of the Commonwealth.

The second loophole which provides for the granting of exemptions is to be found in clause 11. This clause allows the Canadian Transport Commission to issue licences where it is satisfied that the use of a ship other than a Canadian ship is in the public interest. That is a very general phrase. I think one could drive a convoy of trucks through a loophole like that. Mr. Darling suggested that exemptions to permit ships not of Canadian registry to participate in the coastal trade of Canada should only be granted where Canadian vessels are either unavailable, insufficient, or inadequate for the purpose. That is much more specific.

If an applicant for an exemption has to show that there are no Canadian ships available, or no Canadian ships that are adequate or sufficient for the task in mind, that is a clear cut limitation under which the Canadian Transport Commission would be empowered to grant an exemption. But for a clause to provide that the Canadian Transport Commission can issue an exemption to any ship where, in its opinion, the public interest is involved, seemed to me so general, so vague, and so indefinite that it makes the legislation which the House is now debating almost meaningless.

I think there would be a good deal of concern on the part of those who have been pressing for the implementation of this recommendation in the Darling report that under clause 11 the Canadian Transport Commission, on the grounds of public interest, could hand out exemptions to ships of all classes and sorts, with the result that the intention of preserving the coastal trade of Canada for Canadian ships could be completely circumvented.

I would also draw to the attention of the House the fact that clause 11(4) gives the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport, the authority to order the CTC to issue a licence to non-Canadian ships to participate in the coastal trade of Canada. This could mean that even where the Canadian Transport Commission has not been convinced that it is in the public interest to grant an exemption, the minister, by applying to the cabinet, can secure an order in council ordering the Canadian Transport Commission to issue a licence permitting non-Canadian ships to carry cargo between Canadian ports and in Canadian waters.

I think it is interesting that the provisions relating to how these powers will be exercised are to be spelt out in the regulations. But I point out that the regulations themselves are going to be passed by the Governor General in Council, so that the cabinet will set its own guidelines as to the terms and conditions under which it can order the CTC to grant an exemption. I submit, Madam Speaker, that this is not good enough.

If parliament in good faith is going to pass legislation requiring that Canadian ships shall be used in Canadian coastal trade, I think this House has the right—and I hope the committee will demand that right—to insist that the grounds for granting exemptions must be spelt out in some detail, so that exemptions are not granted easily, either on the recommendation of the minister or by the Canadian Transport Commission on such a vague premise as the claim that to do so is in the national interest. If we do not do this, the legislation we are now dealing with will be little more than a farce.

Let me close by saying that this legislation, which we welcome in so far as it takes the first faltering step toward the objective I have been talking about, is not a cure-all for the shipping problems that confront the country. This is why I hope that the minister early in this debate will set forth what are the government's long-term objectives.

One of the first actions that must be taken is the adoption of a shipbuilding policy by which we can build ships in Canada. When one stops to think, almost every type of material which goes into the building of a ship can be produced in Canada, be it steel, aluminum, copper, or any other ingredient. We certainly do not lack the manpower to build those ships. We demonstrated during the war that we had the personnel to sail ships.

Mr. McGrath: We can give you all the sailors you want, Tommy.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Yes, and not only from the coastal provinces. During the war we demonstrated that Canadians from every part of Canada could sail ships, with proper training. The government ought to be prepared to tell the House now that it has in mind as a long term objective the construction of a Canadian merchant fleet, that it is going to move progressively toward that end, and that the measure now before the House to give Canadian ships preference in Canada's coastal trade is but the first step—a welcome step, but it is still only the first step—in the long-term program that the government intends to put into effect.

I also think the government should take a look at its shipbuilding assistance program. I see no reason why a shipping company should be able to get financial assistance at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada, keep a ship under the Canadian flag for the required period of time, and then put it under a flag of convenience over which we have no control, despite the fact that the ship has been built with the assistance of Canadian taxpayers. It seems to me that the boot should be on the other foot.

If a ship is going to be built with Canadian financial assistance, it should remain under Canadian registry, unless the Canadian Transport Commission can be persuaded that there are good and rational reasons for allowing the owner to tranfer the ship over to the flag of another country. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I hope the minister, who has not yet taken part in the debate, will outline what the government's policy is with reference to a shipping policy for a trading nation like Canada.

● (1540)

I hope the minister will indicate what steps the government intends to take to make sure we are not left completely at the mercy of the great shipping cartels, and indicate what we intend to do in order to use our own materials and our own manpower to take Canadian goods in Canadian ships to the markets of the world. That is the kind of policy we want to hear enunciated by the minister. We shall listen to what he has to say with interest and with the devout hope that at last Canada is going to have a genuine shipping policy.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, I will try to be brief. I must first thank the parliamentary secretary for his statement in which he quite adequately summarized the bill. I will not reveal anything new by admitting that I have not read the 84 pages that make up the bill. I am not a shipping expert and I do not even live in a coastal area as is the case with the previous speakers. Accordingly, I will merely make a few general comments to show the minister what the people of Quebec, since I am from Quebec, expect from this legislation the purpose of which is to create a Canadian maritime code. The minister must be congratulated, because this code will be the first one in Canada. At last, we will have our own Canadian maritime Code to replace the old British shipping act which was our basic legislation since the early days of Canada. I think it will amount to Canada being recognized on the seas.

But despite all the minister's good intentions, we are concerned with the matter of Canadian and foreign vessel registry. I presume that everything will be clearly stated in the act. But our main concern here is that when it comes to defining the minister's special powers to licence ships, I feel we must exercise extreme caution. The act must be quite specific so as to limit the extraordinary powers given the minister. I note that every time we enact some legislation, there is at the end a provision to the effect that the minister will decide in special cases. Too often special cases become the general situation. There are good ministers, and I have no misgivings about the present one, but although ministers change the act remains. We are left with the same permissive statute whereby the minister might act against the interest of Canadian shipping. This is why I wanted to draw the minister's attention so this may be adequately debated in committee, in order that the door is not open to ministers to grant licences in "special" cases.

There is a second question of interest to every Canadian, that is merchant shipping. We are establishing a shipping code, but this is by no means establishing a merchant navy. I remember after World War II, there had been perforce a shipbuilding boom and at a certain time we had some kind of a merchant navy we could call Canadian, although it was not entirely under Canadian registry. But since that time, I believe things have deteriorated to the point that our shipping is on the verge of disappearing, as other members said before me. We have almost no more merchant ships and I wonder where the blame lies? Was there a lack of ship owners, of men interested in helping Canada have its own merchant navy, or have there been a government that did not do the effort needed to maintain and upgrade such a merchant navy?

I believe that is where the problem lies. As a matter of fact, I have been reading for years about the regressing of our merchant marine. On the other hand, our government has offered subsidies to foreign countries to come in our province in our country, to build merchant ships, because, they said, they needed to ensure a livelihood for our workers.

● (1550)

I believe that this was done with good intentions, namely to provide work, but in my opinion it was temporary work. There is a Chinese saying to the effect that if you want to help someone for a day, you must give him something to eat, but if you want to help him for the rest of his life, you must show him how to fish. With this in mind, I feel that the government would have been better advised to use this money in providing wages for our workers and guaranteeing them. This would have enabled Canada to won its own vessels, to have today a merchant marine which could meet at least 50 per cent of our requirements. Instead, millions and even billions of dollars were used to promote foreign companies while Canadians were neglected, they who could have created something for Canada, something which we now have to create.

As the previous speaker said earlier, we shall depend and we now depend on foreign monopolies for our shipping trade. We shall suffer the consequences of this situation. This has been the case for some years already. Foreign companies will set their own rates and tomorrow they will rule the seas. Transportation is increasingly becoming monopolistic. If the government does not change its mind and say it is essential to set up our own merchant marine, I believe, Madam Speaker, even with a good Maritime Code, the Canadian economy will gain nothing.

I mention this to attract the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) so that we may discuss this matter seriously when the bill is referred to the standing committee. If we cannot guarantee that Canada will have its own merchant marine in the years to come, it is useless to waste our time passing such bills. Once again, I hope that we shall take a step forward and that work will go on. I should like to add just a few words to draw the minister's attention to the issue of the environment and sea pollution.

Because the Canadian government was not motivated enough, because it has no merchant marine, it was not interested enough in supervising our territorial waters. I trust this legislation will be severe enough towards the polluters of our waters to oblige them to clean them up. Some ships come through our waters, pollute them, to oblige them to clean them up. Some ships come through our waters, pollute them, then leave it up to the government to clean up behind them.

I do hope this act will be severe enough to make the owners whose ships pollute our waters responsible for cleaning them up, and force them to clean up the mess when they have been proved responsible for the pollution.

I hope therefore that this bill will bring what seems, at first glance, to be something good for the Canadian people. Such a bill cannot be rejected off hand because it is for the good of the Canadian people, and I trust it will give us what we expect from our shipping trade.

[English]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, it seems to be my fate to be called at the hour in which the debate is to be interrupted. This has happened to me on a number of occasions. I am prepared to have my speech interrupted on this occasion. However, I believe this debate is really too important for a Friday afternoon. Friday afternoon debates might be reserved for less important matters than the one before us today. I am glad we will have the opportunity to carry this over into next week so that we may have a close look at the measure before us.

May I say that I am at least the third Saskatchewan born person to participate in a debate on the Canadian coasting trade, the merchant marine. There might have been one more. I do not know whether the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was born in Saskatchewan. I do not think he was. In any event he has certain relationships with Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He gave birth to it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Saskatchewan is having its innings. We have a noble vessel, the HMCS Saskatchewan, which performed veteran service and of which we are all very proud. Saskatchewan produced many sailors for our navy during the war. It has produced many of our maritime servers, the members of our present maritime forces.

Once again another person born in Saskatchewan stands to defend, support, and urge the creation of a merchant marine for Canada. This stands to reason after all because one of the great shippers of bulk products from Canada is Saskatchewan. Since many of our products that are being sent abroad in foreign bottoms come from Saskatchewan—and I think even the parliamentary secretary is prepared to admit this—it is right that Saskatchewan should have its say in respect of this bill.

My interest in matters relating to maritime affairs has been heightened because of the fact that I look out from my home on Vancouver Island on one of the great sea lanes of the world, a sea lane which leads Canadian commerce to and from Vancouver. We did have a large international harbour, particularly for passengers and less for trade, but still partially for trade, in Victoria, but the big trading port is Vancouver. I remember as a young man in Vancouver going down to the pier and seeing vessels bring in and carry away our trade. This gave me the inspiration to develop my interest in maritime affairs. With that I should like to call it four o'clock, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, and private bills.

Motions

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). Is the motion allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 15 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion 19 in the name of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 20 in the name of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 34 in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 37 in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 5 in the name of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 6 in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Member: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 42 in the name of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 4. Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Deductions for Volunteer Services

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE DEDUCTIONS FOR VOLUNTEER SERVICES PROVIDED FOR CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS AND GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

The House resumed from Friday, November 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Reynolds:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to provide for deductions for volunteer services provided by a taxpayer on behalf of either a charitable organization or a federal, provincial or municipal agency.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): No, Madam Speaker. On this particular motion I understand that the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) will be leading off the debate on behalf of our party.

● (1600)

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Madam Speaker, may I start by commending the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) for having brought this issue before the House. If I join in the debate it is in a spirit of constructive criticism rather than destructive nihilism. As I said, I commend the hon. member for the dedication and tribute he has paid to the volunteer sector which, until now, has all too frequently been treated with reactions widely ranging from enthusiasm to polite tolerance, and thinly veiled apprehension, to downright exploitation.

Personally I firmly believe that the presence of a strong, creative and dynamic voluntary social service force is of vital necessity to the social and economic well-being of the community. If the government is to serve the community in a way best fitted to its requirements and aspirations, then independent links in providing information about needs and gaps in services is essential, and who better than the private, independent member can assess the real human needs of that community?

More and more the peer or lateral view is accepted as authority rather than the generational or hierarchial one. More and more organizations are seeking their board members among individuals who are noted for their special experiences and personal involvement rather than, as was the case before, among those who were sought for their wealth, status or connections. In the social field particularly workers recognize that people within the situation are the ones who really perceive and can attack the problems. It can thus be argued that an ex-inmate is probably the one with most expertise on the needs and aspirations of prisoners, and that a reformed alcoholic can best help the habitual drunk. The list includes many other sectors and in each, indeed, volunteers are already working with remarkable success.

Perhaps the most pressing need of a rapidly changing society is the necessity for innovative and even experimental action, but all too often institutions tend by nature to react rather than to initiate. My own city of Toronto provided an example of this in the immigrant community. For years immigrants had been left very much to their own resources with consequential hardships, isolation, and other grave social and economic results. This was harmful not only to the immigrants themselves, particularly where language and cultural values were concerned, but also to the recipient community as a whole.

[The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin).]

That these problems were recognized and alleviated was due in a large measure to the efforts of three independent individuals, themselves immigrants, who over the years volunteered their indefatigable efforts toward the eventual establishment of an institution now dedicated to the integration through education of these immigrants. I am happy to remark that one of these volunteers of whom I have just spoken sits on this side of the House; he is the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). However, before those services were instituted, there was no existing establishment which could have carried out the invaluable work done by COSTI.

In other words, even if tax amendments such as the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta now advocates were allowed, people such as the three I described above would not benefit because the ideal to which they contributed their efforts did not exist, and therefore could not qualify as a charitable institution. Surely there must be countless similar examples.

I would now like to cite an example of a different kind, but again of the impossibility of benefit as proposed in this bill accruing to the volunteer. I refer to people who are themselves on welfare and yet do incredible good for their fellow men at the bottom of the poverty scale. The person who runs a hostel to help destitute women in Vancouver is a prime example. The mission is operated entirely from donations received. The organizer herself lives on welfare, and therefore could not benefit from tax concessions for the simple reason that she does not pay tax.

Finally I would like to add yet another example to prove why a proposal such as the one under discussion would heap upon a special sector of our society yet another inequity. Although happily the composition of the volunteer force is rapidly and dramatically changing, the fact remains that according to a recent study entitled, "Volunteers, the Untapped Potential", the largest single category, that is 52.9 per cent of volunteers, is found in the occupational category of housewife, and here again not too many housewives have to pay income tax and therefore they do not fill out income tax forms.

Even the finest of human legislation contains loopholes and inequities, but when the inequities are as obvious as they are now, then I believe that we should oppose even the proposal.

There are other considerations too. While many charities welcome volunteers, many need cash much more than they need volunteer service. This latter category would undoubtedly be prejudiced by such a change in the law. Organizations such as Save the Children Fund, UNICEF, and others such as humane societies, are examples. Look at the Red Cross—it and society will benefit more by having a surgeon operating in a hospital and donating his fee than by rendering his services to drive a car.

The administration of the scheme would create a horrendous problem, and more important still, especially in view of the present economic situation, it is estimated that the cost to the federal and provincial governments would be well in excess of $100 million a year.

Because of these and other reasons, while I do have sympathy with the substance of this proposal I must oppose it on grounds that it would lead to inequities, administrative problems, and substantial loss in revenue.

Mr. Roger Young (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, I rise today to join the debate with similar feelings to those of my colleague who has just spoken. As she so well pointed out, we all agree that the idea of encouraging people to do good works is commendable. No one would want to dissuade any citizen from good works and charitable undertakings. My question is quite simply whether this is the way to do what the motion sets out to do. The methods, not the aims of the motion, are what give me concern.

When we are considering this subject we find that definitions are the all important question. What is charity? What is a charitable work? I say that this motion is about motivation. Leaving aside the specific personal reasons why individually we do charitable work—whether it is from some hope of personal salvation or to make amends or receive absolution for our sins, or perhaps as a way of thanksgiving, not a selfish way but a grateful thanks for our own good fortune and our desire to be brotherly or sisterly and give human comfort to those less fortunate—what would this sort of motion or suggestion do to the subject of motivation? I suggest to you that there is a pyschological need or motivation which encourages us to undertake such charitable good works. In return there is a psychological and emotional feeling of accomplishment and of good will towards men.

● (1610)

I am afraid that the good intent of this motion may find itself translated into a self-defeating mechanism. Instead of volunteers, we are going to wind up with a system of paid workers. Instead of giving, people may only be seeking a tax refund. I am afraid that we will be bureaucratizing charity; that we will be purveying good will.

There is an old maxim that it is far better to give than to receive. I am afraid that we will be turning that into the statement that we should give so that we might receive. We will be defeating ourselves. This motion will encourage nothing more than a great deal of government interference, a bureaucratic control of good works.

If I may say so, I am a little surprised that such a motion springs from my friend, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), who is usually very concerned about the growth of bureaucracy and the amount of government control of our economy and our lives. This measure will do nothing more than encourage a further bureaucracy in what is essentially an individual undertaking.

Good works, charity, love, a feeling between human beings and a feeling for the less fortunate, are all things which come from within the human breast on an individual basis. They are not things we do because we expect a benign wink from the tax collector. They are not something we do because we are looking for write-offs or gimmicks. By all means, let us continue to promote and encourage charities and good works, but at what cost? I am afraid there will be a distortion created by the encouragement of such undertakings by means of a tax gimmick.

When we are legislating I think we are subject to some laws and principles ourselves right here which are akin to the various laws of physics. One of Newton's laws is that for every action there is an equal and opposite reaction. For every law we devise, for every one we put on the books looking for a certain result, we must always recognize that there is another side to the coin, or another reaction to that which we propose and put into force. I am afraid that by this motion, which seeks to encourage the doing of good works, we will translate whatever motivation for those good works which now exists into an attitude not of "what can I give?" but of "what can I get?"

Let me pose the hypothetical and ask what would happen if it were to go ahead. I think we get back to the two questions with which I began: what is a charity, and what is charitable work? What is an adequate degree of comparable compensation for those who do charitable work and for those who provide services? Is it to be a varying compensation for varying levels of people, or is it to be a variation dependent upon the service given?

Is the professional man or the rich man of more value in doing his charitable work than an hourly paid worker who is also involved in charitable undertakings, or is this dependent on the service or the performance either of them give? We can have a situation where a professional man or high salary earner does a very important job for charity and the hourly paid worker does a less important job for the same charity or a different charity, but there can be the reverse as well. There can be a case where the hourly paid worker gives a far greater service to a charity than the professional man. How are we to judge the compensation for such services and for time?

I suggest that the maze of computations is incalculable. It would be impossible to administer such a system fairly, and while we attempt to begin with a motion which seeks to create a situation encouraging good works, good will, and benevolent and charitable undertakings, I fear we will wind up with a result which will amount to gnashing of teeth, cursing of the taxman, and a feeling of bad will amongst mankind because of the jealousies which will undoubtedly arise from the fallibility of the human spirit, and the jealousies which will arise as a result of the differing prizes awarded for differing good works done.

What is a charity? Is it to be one which is already approved by the Department of National Revenue and recognized by it, one of those which has a charitable number to which you can now make a donation and receive a tax refund, or is charity a charitable undertaking? Can it also include the doing of good, the conferring of a benefit upon the less fortunate, in the kind of broader definition of charity as we now know it?

When we talk of compensating charitable services, who is to say that work for the Red Cross, the United Way agency or some other, is any more charitable than work done by the man who, without recognition to himself, but at cost, on any street in any town in Canada shovels the sidewalks in winter, or the goodhearted fellow who fixes the window which is broken, fixes shutters, or puts a hinge back on a door for the four or five old age pensioners on his block? Is he any less charitable than the person who gives a service—let alone money—to a recognized charity? What happens to him if his kind of charity is not recognized in terms of a motion such as this? I suggest that we will be creating a disincentive for those kinds of people to undertake such charitable good works.

Aside from the feeling a man can get, or his own personal rewards, I suggest there would be a disincentive because everyone will be encouraged only to give services or money to those charities which are recognized by the Department of National Revenue. That will create a disincentive for good will in the broader sense in this country. As a result there would be no return for the donor. I think this will destroy individual character and individual incentive because a person can only receive a refund if donations are given to a government recognized charity.

In summary the point I wish to make is that we all know how very difficult, if not impossible, it is to attempt to legislate morality. Legislators have known that since time immemorial. If we cannot legislate morality, how do we begin to attempt to legislate good will amongst mankind?

We have various holidays every year. We are approaching Christmas, the celebration of one who almost 2,000 years ago gave His life trying to promote feelings of good will among people. How well has He succeeded? How well will we succeed in an attempt like this, or will we really wind up defeating ourselves in the long run?

● (1620)

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to speak this afternoon on the motion of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds).

I am sure the House is well aware of the responsibilities of the Department of the Secretary of State in strengthening the voluntary sector of society. The department does this through the provision of financial and technical resources. Across Canada there are 25 field offices from which the department's social development officers maintain contact on a regular basis with a wide variety of voluntary and community organizations. Sometimes these officers assist organizations by providing them with information about governmental and other programs. Sometimes it is necessary to assist a group with a grant.

The citizenship sector has several programs designed to assist citizens' groups which are working to promote government policies such as multicultural citizen participation, the status of women, human rights and group understanding, native citizens development, and the improvement of the position of francophone communities across the country. The emphasis in all these programs is on encouraging Canadians to take a more active part in community affairs. The activity and financial support of the department's field staff help to improve the quality of Canadian citizenship.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) has spoken on numerous occasions in the last three years on the importance of the voluntary sector and on the significant role that volunteers play in Canadian life. Among other government programs the student community service program, Madam Speaker, was introduced in the summer of 1974, and one of its most important objectives was to encourage more young people to take part as volunteers in all kinds of voluntary organizations. This program has been very successful both from a standpoint of the student participants and the volunteer organizations and we are encouraged that it is making a contribution to the strength of the voluntary sector.

It should be recognized, however, that the voluntary sector faces many problems. They often find it hard to raise funds. Some are finding it increasingly difficult to recruit volunteers. Others find it a great problem to communicate with their members across the country. There is concern for a bilingual capacity among national organizations, and so on.

It was in consideration of these problems and others that the Secretary of State established the National Advisory Council on Voluntary Action a year ago. This council, composed of 15 individuals all with an active background in the voluntary sector, and chaired by Miss Raynelle Andreychuck, an able woman lawyer from Saskatchewan, has been given the mandate of studying the problems in the voluntary sector and making recommendations to the Secretary of State for ways in which the federal government can improve the situation. Hopefully this council will make some important recommendations to enable the federal government to improve the effectiveness of its support to voluntary services.

The Secretary of State has mentioned on several occasions in his speeches the possibility of changing the income tax legislation to give encouragement to volunteer activity. Most recently he mentioned this subject at the annual meeting of the Big Brothers Association of Ottawa and District in April, 1975. This is also a subject about which the Advisory Council on Voluntary Action is concerned. I am confident the council will be considering the kind of proposal made by the hon. member. It is likely in fact that a discussion or working paper on the subject of the tax system and voluntary action would be available by the council within the next year.

A most important recent study by the Canadian Council on Social Development, "Volunteers: The Untapped Potential", has provided a wealth of information about the motives, activities, and problems of volunteers across Canada. The aim of the study as stated in the book is "to test the hypothesis that there are large numbers of people in Canada who are potential volunteers; to explore the characteristics of volunteers and those who are not volunteers; and to inquire in a preliminary way into present administration and organizational practices related to volunteer activity."

One of the points this study makes is that volunteering is no longer the preserve of the upper middle class woman, and that more and more Canadians of different socio-economic backgrounds are getting involved in volunteer work. I should like to record some of the people and ideas which are attached to volunteers in this report—slightly more than half of Canada's people are involved in some type of volunteer work or charitable giving—more men are volunteers than has been believed, some 44.5 per cent—people of all ages are involved, with substantial representation of people under 25 years as well as people over 60—the percentage of volunteers reporting family income of less than $12,000 per annum was 48.2—a substantial number of volunteers are labourers, skilled workers, and clerical employees—church or synagogue work, work with youth, and fund raising provided the first volunteer experience for most people.

It is interesting to note that this report points out many aspects of volunteering and maintains that in no way do they wish to destroy the volunteer concept. In considering the future of volunteer action in Canada we must ensure that such groups as the young, the elderly, the working poor, the native people, are not prevented from volunteer service because of financial or other problems. To provide deductions to tax payers for volunteer service may not be the most effective means of accomplishing this objective.

Some voluntary organizations have already mentioned to the department the desirability of looking at provisions in the United States tax legislation dealing with support to volunteer groups. Some preliminary study of this subject indicates that these provisions are difficult to administer, and we should be very careful about adding further complications to the tax system in Canada.

Another problem which some organizations have told us about, and it is worth looking at seriously, is that under the present legislation it is not possible for some citizens' groups to obtain charitable organization status because they are essentially self-help organizations. This may be a case of the law—and as a lawyer I can speak here—not keeping up with changing social conditions. Perhaps there should be some form available to those groups by which they can incorporate themselves and obtain charitable organization status. This is one way of helping these organizations.

More and more in recent years we have seen low income groups and other disadvantaged citizens group together to improve their situation. This is a healthy trend. We need to change our traditional concept that charitable organizations are only valid when they are helping other people. So in considering ways to strengthen volunteer activity in Canada we should also be re-examining our notions of what constitutes a charitable organization.

● (1630)

There is no doubt that the volunteer tradition in Canada is very strong. The Canadian Council on Social Development Study has shown that more Canadians are involved in volunteering than had been believed, and that there is an even greater potential for volunteers. The proposal by the hon. member presents one way of strengthening volunteer service, and I am confident it will be very carefully considered by the Department of the Secretary of State and the National Council on Voluntary Action.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Madam Speaker, it is with regret today that I cannot support the motion of the member of the opposition as introduced, however commendable the apparent motive underlying that motion. Actually, the hon. member is asking this House to accept that donations of time be tax deductible. I think that beforehand it would be necessary, as my colleague for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) did, it would be necessary at least to give some description of what is charity, self-sacrifice. It should also be said how dangerous it can be to want to change the rules of the game when it comes to morality and charity. Finally, it should be said how we might attempt to reach an acceptable compromise and review that concept. But how could we achieve desirable and acceptable results without at the same getting trapped in a bureaucratic maze?

Here are a few examples. We have ski patrollers members of associations like St. John Ambulance who are being taxed on the amounts of money they receive from various ski slopes. Here is another example: Mr. X, of the St. John Ambulance, decides to go and give a weekend in a ski resort, be it Sutton or elsewhere, and that ski resort will give him $40 for his weekend. That $40 represents the equivalent of what he has to pay precisely to be able to offer his services on a voluntary basis. However, the Department of National Revenue considers that amount to be supplementary income. I think that is a clear injustice, and I think if there were changes to be made it should rather be there—accepting as expenses amounts paid by organizations, by people who give some of their time but who have to incur expenses to do so.

If one went further and calculated as tax deductible the amount of time people give, once again that would promote the development of what I call a society outside society. And I think that, perhaps by mistake, the government is unduly inclined to foster the growth of this kind of parallel society that can only be dangerous.

Here is to illustrate: in my riding, there is a program that can have very good results in some cases, and I mean the Local Initiatives Program. Every time one of those programs is used to help in recreational activities, we hear remarks being made. I met with mayors of various small municipalities that were being helped through such programs and they said to me: "Mr. Loiselle, if you could give us $10,000 grants directly instead of those LIP grants of $20,000, it would be much easier to ask for volunteer help which we used to have in the past but not any more since we can afford to pay people for services that once could be provided by volunteers in our community."

People used to help in organizing various activities but now there is too much of a tendency to pay wages. We are too strongly inclined to give people tax benefits, all kinds of hand-outs, so much so that the meaning of charity is changing. Specialists in charity work no longer exist but to take advantage of the system.

Mr. Prud'homme: How true!

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): So, Madam Speaker, such a measure would only consolidate this dangerous trend in our society, precisely the one we must fight. As my colleague said before, I think the federal government, through the Secretary of State or through the Department of National Health and Welfare, is helping our senior citizens clubs, through the New Horizons program. That is the kind of activities we should encourage, rather than privileging individuals. There is no better service than the one provided by someone doing it out of devotion. I think we are all politicians, and there are all kinds of self-sacrifice. There is the kind we see in election campaigns, for instance. Who will deny that the best election campaigner is the one who is doing it for the first time and who for once has to defend oneself and fight for a cause. I think this is also true of all charitable activities. We should rather consider other ways of encouraging volunteer work, as I said earlier. I therefore suggest, Madam Speaker, that we wait for the tabling of the review conducted by the Department of Finance on that question, and I am sure that the hon. member opposite will be given the opportunity to resume his attack with the support of his colleague and try to find original programs which will promote voluntary work in Canada.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Madam Speaker, I should like to contribute a few short remarks to this debate. I want to suggest to the House that our society should increasingly resort to volunteer action. I do not feel, contrary to the previous speaker, that self-sacrifice, or volunteering to provide services to a community that needs them should be paid. I can give instances of this and this is what I meant.

First of all, when we consider what is being accomplished on a volunteer basis in many organizations, whether they are hospitals, schools or social institutions, we realize that, more and more, our society must face very difficult problems, although it is supposed to be rich and affluent. I am referring to volunteers working in hospitals.

Formerly there were women's clubs and auxiliaries, people who gave part of their time voluntarily. Nowadays, even if there are still in my constituency people who are very dedicated in such endeavours, we see that people are not as available as before because there is no money available.

The motion before us which proposes the refund of the cost seems to me to go against the principle of asking people to give part of their time. I also know that some people in my riding devote part of their time to go and visit patients at Christmas time, to look after sick children in institutions such as Eastern Ontario's Children's Hospital, to care for elderly or needy people.

All this problem will disappear because these people have no interest in participating in a kind of 'service, expecting a payment in return.

Madam Speaker, as one who has been involved in that type of occupation for years, I wish to say that if voluntary work is to be remunerated, it becomes usury. For me this is not in keeping with the traditional society we are familiar with, not the standards of a society which claims to be charitable and humanitarian.

I am thinking in particular of school commissioners, or of people who give away their leisure time, freely or for very little renumeration. And if we were to judge the worth of a physician, a barrister or an ordinary worker, we may have to think that their work is important while the retribution is not.

In my view this motion is not progressive: indeed it is rather a retrograde step, typically conservative. It would be unfortunate if the act were to be amended in such a way that those voluntary workers would receive a salary or their services would be assessed in terms of financial considerations.

[Mr. Loiselle (Chambly).]

I think that we should encourage people to give more of their time. And they have more time now as the 40 hour work week leaves many people with leisure time and more personal freedom. I think that the problem of society is rather to orient and encourage voluntarism, to encourage people to participate in the activity of their society rather than always think in terms of dollars and cents and retribution. We should increasingly encourage people to participate, to play an active part in society without trying to get something from it, money or some other form of retribution.

Madam Speaker, I only wished to say that voluntarism is important and that we should encourage people to participate as personal involvement is very important. As one hon. member said, I think that Local Initiative Programs particularly may have fashioned voluntarism and created in our society a class of people specialized in so-called social or voluntary organizations, but always looking forward to their $100 or $130 a week. I do not say it is bad but it does twist the reality of things. Finally those people depend on needy social groups. I think it is bad to encourage that kind of groups.

I shall conclude by saying that as policians we should involve more and more Canadians in voluntary endeavours so that society can be valuable. This is why I hope the motion will be defeated.

[English]

● (1640)

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, I chose to speak on the topic this afternoon because upon first glance at the motion I found it particularly attractive to think that, as a result of some calculations I did in the House this afternoon, at $3 an hour for every volunteer who worked to elect me in the last election, it would have cost the Government of Canada in tax revenues $150,000 to put me in this House!

I am sure the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) would not want to see that amount of money spent to have me or any other member elected. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta informs me that, under the terms of the Election Expenses Act, charitable donations or consideration of time for volunteers would not be applicable. I am well aware of that. I mention that only because I was somewhat interested in finding some way of compensating those volunteers who work for me at election time.

Other than that I speak on the motion because in my constituency there are in excess of 135 volunteer groups and organizations; everything from service clubs to Alcoholics Anonymous, groups assisting senior citizens, single parent family operations, tel-aid operations, and so on. There is a population of 100,000 in the three cities of Lachine, Dorval, and Pointe Claire.

I would assume that the departmental figures as to the cost of this motion are wrong. Revenue Canada is of the opinion it would cost approximately $100 million to put such a motion into effect and thereby give the volunteers a credit for the amount of voluntary time they give. My own guess is that in one particular area of Canada alone, that is, the constituency I represent, it would cost $100 million simply for the people in that area to volunteer their time and services. They now number in excess of 5,000 people who, in one way or another, are giving time to their community. In that sense I put to the hon. member that the proposition that these people ought to be allowed to deduct their time is not likely to be very well received in terms of the amount of money it takes to run the government.

I would take up an element that I think other speakers have mentioned, that is, the question of how we can better and more efficiently assist groups of this nature. One of the most common characteristics is that they are constantly in need of good, sound advice as how to identify their problem, whether it be federal, provincial or municipal, and how to incorporate themselves if incorporation is the best procedure under the circumstances. Finally, they need advice on how to seek funds from any particular level of government which may make funds available for that purpose.

As some other members in this House do with respect to the Local Initiatives Program, I try to encourage the citizens in my area to make application to the Department of Manpower and Immigration for these LIP programs in order that they can pursue their volunteer activities with what I might call some seed money. In my area this year we put in something in the area of a quarter million dollars, a great deal of which has gone to projects the nature of which are of a mixed full-time and volunteer character. They are considered by the applicants and by myself to be essential to the well-being of the community.

I suggest to the hon. member that the problem is not so much a need for tax deductibility to attract volunteers. Rather, there is a much greater need to provide the kind of professional assistance to these people which would better enable them to identify the problems they are attempting to resolve and to obtain assistance from various levels of government in order to resolve them.

The proposition that these individuals should have their time deducted from their income tax would in some cases, such as associations for the benefit of retarded children, inevitably lead to a lessening of the amount of financial contributions made to such groups and associations and to an increase in the number of people who would prefer to volunteer time. I suggest that associations which seek to support those involved in the care, education, and concern for retarded children will not be significantly improved nor be able to increase significantly the type and quality of their production and assistance to such children by having an income tax deduction for voluntary time. Their problem is to seek and obtain more money because of the type of services they render.

The administrative problems of such a proposal have been noted in prior debate to be horrendous. I would draw an example or two to the attention of hon. members. Such a proposal would create some horrendous administrative problems, most of which relate to valuation of time. Two people volunteer to drive a car for the Red Cross. One is a doctor whose time is billed at $150 an hour, and the second is a housewife who does not earn. A driver who was paid would receive $2 an hour. Should our volunteer driver receive a receipt for $150, $2, or nothing? If we say that the value is $2, obviously the doctor will not volunteer his services at all.

In addition, the charity would have the problem of determining for each and every volunteer chore what is the fair market value of the services rendered. The problem of recognizing service donations for tax purposes was acknowledged by all four parties in the House in respect of political contributions. All parties have agreed to the amendment to the political contributions provisions contained in Bill C-65 which will forbid a credit for services rendered to candidates or political parties.

● (1650)

I referred earlier with some amusement to the possibility of considering people who work in elections as volunteers. I would remind the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta that he is among those who have agreed not to permit such activities at the political level. In view of the district that I represent and the incredibly large amount of volunteering services that continues to be provided in that area, I suggest to the hon. member that this motion is not the way to resolve the problem. Rather we should look to what one of the previous speakers said, the parliamentary secretary, who indicated that the Department of the Secretary of State would be taking a very close look at more efficient and sophisticated methods of helping volunteer groups.

I would re-emphasize that the most important characteristic that we can provide them is not a tax deduction for the services of their volunteer group, but rather direct assistance to them in getting set up and in understanding how to work their way through the three levels of government, so as to be able properly to address themselves to the task for which they are created and to obtain direct funding, not on an individual basis but on a group basis, to resolve the problem at hand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Kitchener.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the happy side very much for the recognition that they are affording me this afternoon, especially in the closing minutes of such an important debate. I am very happy to make a contribution to this well-merited suggestion that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) has given us to consider. He has added a few additional thoughts to what he has put on paper, and has asked us to consider what the income tax department might do in the way of providing volunteer workers with a receipt instead of their actually receiving payment.

Many volunteers have been mentioned, but a few groups have been missed. For example, there are the volunteer mothers who are assisting the teaching profession by helping their children spend a little more time in an environment other than the school, under the visible eye of the tender loving care that only mothers can give their children. They are doing a very commendable job and I am sure their husbands, who are making a valid contribution to the economy, would appreciate a receipt for their donating their services.

Then there are the many volunteers in our minor hockey associations who get up at four, five, and six in the morning, returning home at night at nine, ten, or 11 because we do not have sufficient rink ice time in this great winter country for our children. They drive our children, teach them and advise them, and they are spending time with the very people with whom they want to spend our time, our children. More time should be spent in that way. These volunteers would also love to have a receipt acknowledging their contribution for income tax purposes.

Then there are the coaches who volunteer their services for minor sports activities; we place a great deal of confidence in them. Then there are mothers who spend hours and hours cooking for special occasions, such as visiting teams that have to be fed and housed. Many people do this work for absolutely no consideration at all. I think it would be worth while to provide them with a receipt too.

Then there are the volunteers in our hospitals. How many hours do they spend as hospital auxiliaries supplying voluntary nursing care that patients cannot always afford for themselves? Meals on wheels are also a great contribution to our society, calling for the skill of many people who not only drive canteens but do the cooking and prepare the small utility meals that are so nutritional in value. They provide a service to people who otherwise could not afford such comforts. Again a receipt for tax purposes would be a very commendable gesture.

This week I had the experience of putting my mother into a nursing home, where I watched volunteers at work. They spend many hours supplying the teaching skills needed for embroidery, knitting, writing and reading. They spend hours making sure that sick people are happy people. I commend them to our country for the contribution they make.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flynn: Let me tell the House that to record in an analytical and statistical way the services that these people perform would be an erroneous and time consuming task that would be endless. It would create unnecessary work, even more LIP projects that we do not need. We would have to supply volunteer service to look after the volunteers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five o'clock.

Mr. Flynn: Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. It being five o'clock the hour for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I would simply like to thank all the "volunteers" who contributed this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 24, 1975

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION UNITED NATIONS BE INFORMED CANADA RESERVES RIGHT TO REFUSE ENTRY TO ANY PLO DELEGATE TO HUMAN SETTLEMENTS CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. In light of the statements by Shahik Al-Hout warning that the PLO would seek to turn world-wide pressure on Canada if Canada rejected any member of the PLO delegation to the conference on human settlements next year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House instruct the minister responsible to inform the UN Secretary General of the conference that while Canada is committed to accepting a delegation from the PLO to the conference on human settlements, we reserve the right as a sovereign state to reject any individual who violates our immigration laws and regulations.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

ENERGY

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF ENERGY RESERVES AND FORECASTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion dealing with a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

The National Energy Board report on oil, tabled in this House at the end of last week, provided new evidence of the unpleasant and even frightening fact that government officials in the NEB and elsewhere have consistently and dramatically over-estimated the depth of this country's energy reserves. This faulty estimating has lead to a series of policy errors on the part of the government. Since we in this House have no evidence to suggest the government has taken any corrective action in this area, and thus, since we can have little or no faith in current government estimates of energy reserves in this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works be authorized to inquire immediately into the reasons behind the government's consistent mis-estimating of Canada's energy reserves and to recommend corrective action to ensure that future energy forecasts are based on more sound and reliable data.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF FLUID MILK SUBSIDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since the government feels that there is a surplus of industrial milk and that the surplus of fluid milk is sent to processing industries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House urge the government to restore the fluid milk subsidy, to increase its consumption and decrease the volume of industrial milk.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

* * *

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES BE DISTRIBUTED WITHIN THREE DAYS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

Considering that the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs has offered the federal government to distribute family allowance cheques before December 5 through its distribution system so that low income families and people on welfare, who are waiting for these cheques, may be able to buy food and other essentials, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

That family allowances cheques be distributed within the next three days, either by letter carriers, if they want to, or as suggested by the Quebec government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

* * *

[English]

NATIONAL PARKS

SUGGESTED DELAY IN EXPANSION OF ST. LAWRENCE ISLANDS PARK PENDING MEETING WITH LOCAL RESIDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to my constituency concerning the government's proposed $30 million expansion of the St. Lawrence Islands National Park, and particularly arising out of the inconclusive and unsatisfactory meeting held last Thursday between about 500 of my constituents and officials of Parks Canada in what could rapidly become, if not speedily dealt with, another Pickering fiasco. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development accept the invitation that has been extended to him to personally attend with any necessary department officials a public meeting to be open to hundreds of property owners in Leeds who feel that their homes and businesses are threatened by the government's present plans for enlarging the St. Lawrence Islands National Park, that the government be prepared to answer clearly and forthrightly all questions proposed at such a meeting and finally that the people of the area be permitted the democratic right of expressing their views and obtaining answers on this matter before the government proceeds any further whatsoever with its plans.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Lavoie.]

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTED AID TO FIVE EMPLOYEES IN DEALING WITH CRIMINAL CHARGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity relating to Air Canada and the position of some of its employees here and in the United States. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Minister of Transport look into the situation with regard to the five Air Canada employees in New York City who state that the management of the company has not given them any moral of financial support in their successful efforts to acquit themselves of serious criminal charges of gold theft laid in an apparently hasty way while the employees were at work and that the minister look into and review as well the job security status of those Air Canada employees whose long tenure of service may be jeopardized unfairly by any staff re-alignment policies of the company, if they are not implemented with great care, and report to this House or the standing committee on an appropriate occasion.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

● (1410)

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Last Friday it was indicated on behalf of the government that if the postal union were to accept the fact that the monetary offer by the government was all that was going to be offered, then serious and successful negotiations could take place. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has been advised that the union accepts the fact that the total monetary package offered by the government in connection with the postal strike cannot go beyond the government's final offer, although there might be some readjustment of the offer, and, if so, are serious negotiations about to resume today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would have to ask the Postmaster General to answer that question. To my knowledge the union has been advised. It has been stated publicly by the Postmaster General and by myself, and that should be advice enough. But I am sure the Postmaster General has made that advice clear in his private discussions, too.

Mr. Stanfield: I recognize that the information has no doubt been given to the union. My question relates to whether or not the union has accepted that there is no way in which the government's financial offer will be increased. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has been advised of any significant change of events that would lead to negotiations being resumed in the very near future.

Mr. Trudeau: I must say that I have not been advised by the union that they accepted the government's position, and that is presumably why the strike is going on. I do know that there have been some officious meetings with the representatives of the Post Office and of the union. I do not know to what extent they are publicly known and I would hesitate to say any more at this time.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REASON FOR GOVERNMENT'S REFUSAL TO INTRODUCE BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I assume the Prime Minister is using the word "officious" in the sense of the French language, as distinguished from official. I would like to ask the Prime Minister the following question. In view of the extent to which the government has already limited the scope of collective bargaining under the government's guidelines laying down the increases in wages which are permissible, how does the government justify its continued refusal to intervene to protect the public interest and what is the government's real reason for not asking parliament to restore this essential service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I answered these very same questions at the end of last week. My answers are the same.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the government has called upon parliament for legislation to end strikes three times in the past two years, and in view of the fact that the stoppages in two of these instances, namely, the dock strike at the west coast and the strike at the St. Lawrence ports, were of a much shorter duration than the present 36 days of the postal shutdown, will the Prime Minister now clarify the government's reasons for refusing to introduce back to work legislation so that mail service can be restored while negotiation or mediation is carried on?

Mr. Speaker: In respect of answers which have been given on previous days to that particular question, of course the situation changes each day, and therefore a fresh question is always permissible, even though the same question had been asked 24 hours earlier, which is special in circumstances of this sort. However, it would be a flagrant abuse of the rules to allow the repetition of a question by two consecutive members on the same day, a question which has been answered by the Prime Minister and which is precisely the one the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra seeks to put.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENTS CONCERNING APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINES TO OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising from answers given by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on Friday. The Minister of Finance said in the House in reply to a question about the price of oil and the guidelines, and I quote: "they do apply to petroleum companies as they do to anyone else, but not to the OPEC countries", he said with insight. However, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said in reply to a question by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that indeed the white paper makes it clear that the oil industry is in a separate category from those covered by the white paper. I wonder if the Prime Minister would clarify this apparent contradiction between the two ministers' statements.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize, I have not had time to review Hansard for Friday, but I think I can explain what puzzles the hon. member. In so far as the price of crude is concerned, obviously the guidelines do not apply because it is set by federal-provincial agreement. It was set for a period of 15 months, I believe, until July 1 next, and the federal and provincial governments plan to get together in the first half of next year to try to arrive at another agreed price for petroleum. In that sense, the guidelines do not apply. The price is set administratively by arrangement.

In another sense, the guidelines do apply, and in that sense the companies will not be able to increase their prices by more than the increase in their costs. That is the general rule of the guidelines, and it will apply to them. In this case the cost of the raw material will be fixed administratively, as I have just indicated. The labour costs will be fixed by bargaining under the rules. There may be other costs, such as executive salaries, and so on. All these various costs will fall under the guidelines, and the pass through rule will apply.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact that the principal reason for price increases in oil in the last few years has been the increase in the wellhead price, which the Prime Minister just said has been settled in the past by negotiations with the provinces, and since, however, the government in its white paper sets out that in terms of its policy it will permit, through a staging process, the wellhead price to rise to world price levels, has the government not stated its position, in terms of its ultimate effect on the consumer price, that it has decided not to keep the price of oil down in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: The reason the price at the wellhead has been allowed to rise—although considerably less than world prices—is due, first of all, to the decision of the OPEC nations to increase the world price of oil. This put pressure on the NDP and Conservative governments in particular provinces in the west to seek a higher price, preferably world prices, if they could. We resisted the NDP and Tory governments as much as we could and obtained a compromise, which we think is much better for Canadian people than had we gone to world prices. I must admit that the NDP and Tory governments in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were willing to go along with this in the public interest. We were not able to keep the prices as low as perhaps we would have liked, at least in the first stage, but we think that through their co-operation we have finally arrived at a price which is good for the Canadian people. It does cost the consumer a bit more, but I hope the hon. member will realize that those natural resources were under the constitutional jurisdiction of the NDP government in Saskatchewan and the Tory government in Alberta, and we struck what we thought was the best possible compromise.

● (1420)

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTION OIL PRICE INCREASES BE CONDITIONAL UPON MONEY BEING DEVOTED TO EXPLORATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I know the Prime Minister would not want to distort the position of the government of Saskatchewan, at least intentionally. Since it is Premier Blakeney's view, both in the past and at present, that no increase should be permitted in the wellhead price of oil unless the future gains from that increase are used for further development—and he attached and always has attached that kind of position to the increase in price—and since at least one of the premiers directly involved has expressed that view, I should like to ask the Prime Minister why the federal government, in its anti-inflation program, does not attach that as a condition of all future price increases and make it mandatory if oil companies are going to get an increase that all such money be devoted to future exploration?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question has been dealt with by the previous minister of energy, mines and resources at federal-provincial conferences and in this House. We examined Premier Blakeney's position, which I repeat was one of wanting a considerably higher price for the oil sold—

Mr. Broadbent: For exploration.

Mr. Trudeau: —out of Saskatchewan. He had some scheme to put it in a special fund, I believe, in order that it serve the energy needs of the people of Canada. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has given some very specific figures indicating the use to which any increment or windfall that had accrued to the federal government through the increased price, was indeed serving the energy needs of the people of Canada. To mention only one figure, $1½ billion was budgeted for the equalization of the price of oil in the eastern part of Canada with the western part of Canada, and a large part of that indeed comes from the fact that we have been able to draw some benefit for the Canadian taxpayer from the export tax on oil products.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

CHEESE IMPORTS—GOVERNMENT EFFORTS TO REDUCE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, upon the Minister of Agriculture's return from the World Food Conference in Rome where he must have learned new ways of administering his department, I should like to ask him the following question. Several times I raised the matter of social prejudice suffered by the Canadian dairy industry due to massive imports of cheese. As it seems that total cheese imports for this year reach more than 50 million pounds despite agreements concluded with producers within the overall quota system, can the minister tell the House whether he is prepared to review his position very soon in that regard and what steps he plans to take?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are living within the agreement on production that we announced last April. We have told the producers the amount to produce and they agreed to what we suggested. They are concerned about the importation of speciality cheese from abroad, but there will not be more than 50 million pounds brought into Canada.

[Translation]

INDUSTRIAL MILK—EFFORTS TO DISPOSE OF SURPLUS IN THIRD WORLD

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Given the overproduction of industrial milk in Canada, is the minister prepared to accept our proposal and send our milk surplus to Third World countries, which badly need it, in order to help them on one hand and, on the other hand, to dispose of our surplus and sustain our milk industry?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the main surplus product we have in Canada at the present time is skim milk powder. There is a world surplus of skim milk powder—in Europe, New Zealand and all the countries producing it at the present time. We have ample supplies and are trying to find placement for areas of need but it is most difficult.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister.

So as to be able to take fast and efficient steps to resolve this problem of industrial milk and other agricultural product surpluses, could the right hon. Prime Minister say whether he is prepared to undertake to entrust the Department of Agriculture with the responsibility for importing and exporting dairy products and all other agricultural products?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking a question regarding the internal organization of the government. Of course, I respect the hon. member's views, but I assure him that I organize the ministerial council in such a way as to get the maximum output.

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—POSSIBILITY OF ADOPTING SOME METHOD OF CLEARING MAIL IN OFFICES

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In view of the grave injustice being done to hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have money, important merchandise, business contracts, prepaid Christmas mail orders, including Christmas presents for children which cannot be replaced due to insufficient family cash, and other vital mail tied up as a result of the postal strike, may I ask if the Postmaster General can use any mechanism whereby that mail can be released for delivery in the near future, and clear the post office system?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the obvious answer is for the union to come to their senses and bring an end to the strike. In the absence of that, I might mention that 165 post offices are open. The hon. member might relate to me his particular difficulty, as I understand that most Alberta postal office employees are now back at work.

Mr. Towers: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This being a national problem, and the bulk of the mail being tied up in large centres like Toronto and Winnipeg, I do not think action in specific cases will clear the system. I wonder if the minister can do something to clear the system once and for all, so that people can either get their orders filled or money back.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, as we approach Christmas I sum up by saying I would rather be Santa Claus than Scrooge.

* * *

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF SKY SHOPS—RELATIONSHIP OF DOCUMENTS SEIZED FROM SENATOR GIGUÈRE TO MIRABEL

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Since it has become public knowledge that among documents and effects taken by the RCMP from the apartment adjacent to Senator Giguère's were ledger cards of engineers and architects, can the Solicitor General tell the House whether the engineers and architects involved or any of the documentation taken have any connection with the Mirabel project?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we do not report the details of police investigations while those investigations are still under way.

INVESTIGATION OF SKY SHOPS—POSSIBLE LENGTH OF INVESTIGATION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF SEARCH WARRANT AND INVENTORY OF DOCUMENTS SEIZED

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Solicitor General give the House and country any indication of the apparent length of time it will take the RCMP to complete those investigations? Are we talking of days, weeks or months? Also, will the minister table the search warrant and documents detailing the inventory of what was taken, since these documents have already been put on display on national television?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I checked with the RCMP and they cannot say definitely when this investigation will be completed. New evidence leads to new sources of inquiry, and so on. It is impossible to give the date—

Mr. MacKay: Does the minister mean a judicial inquiry?

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker. The police investigation is proceeding quite well, but we do not discuss details of police inquiries in the House of Commons. If I may answer the second part of the hon. member's question, I will look into the matter, see if the documents can be tabled and report to the House.

INVESTIGATION OF SKY SHOPS—SCOPE OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. I appreciate that details of police investigations are not released, although the subject matter is often discussed in the House. As a search warrant is only issued after it is sworn that there are reasonable and probable grounds for the belief that an offence has been committed, and as the search warrant under which the police acted in seizing documents from Senator Giguère's office and residence included "all letters, notes, memoranda and other writings relating to the collection of moneys for the Liberal party of Canada" between certain relevant dates, can the Solicitor General say if the subject matter of the police investigation in this instance is whether all or part of the $95,000 went to the coffers of the treasury of the Liberal party?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I must check that, as well. I saw the information which was sworn in order to obtain that search warrant and I talked to the RCMP about it. They tell me that the investigation is of a broader nature than one merely involving Sky Shops.

* * *

● (1430)

PUBLIC WORKS

LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE, HULL—ROLE OF SENATOR GIGUÈRE IN NEGOTIATIONS FOR PROJECT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that until recently Senator Giguère was a director of the Campeau Corporation, the company building the $160 million Les Terrasses de la Chaudière in Hull, Quebec, a multi-million urban commercial complex, of which 1.7 million square feet of office space is to be rented by the federal government, has that senator played any role whatsoever in the official or non-official negotiations pertaining to that project?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can state definitively. The answer is no.

* * *

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF SKY SHOPS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF POLICE REPORT UPON COMPLETION OF INVESTIGATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has already said that he does not discuss details of police reports while an investigation is taking place. I have also heard him say that he does not table reports after an investigation is completed. Will the minister give us any assurance that when these investigations are completed, the police reports will be tabled in the House?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not. The reason we do not table police reports in many cases is that if a police investigation proves to be negative, it would be completely contrary to the civil rights of the individuals involved to publish the details of the investigation for every one to see. Very often allegations are made against many individuals and it is the responsibility of the police to investigate those allegations. In a great number of cases, the allegations are found to be false. If that is the case, I do not think it is right to publish them in the House of Commons.

INVESTIGATION OF SKY SHOPS—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I expected that, Mr. Speaker. I knew that was what the Solicitor General would say. Therefore, I have to ask the members of the government why they keep hiding behind the fact that a police investigation is being made into something that very closely touches the government, parliament and this country. Does the Prime Minister not think it is now time for a public investigation into the whole affair relating to Senator Giguère and alleged conflicts of interest? In view of reports of police raids, search warrants and evidence of substantial sums being paid, a prima facie indication of a substantial conflict of interest, will the Prime Minister set the minds of the Canadian public at ease and order a public inquiry at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had occasion earlier to remind the House that Senator Giguère offered to testify in front of a committee of the Senate, a committee of his peers, to answer to any aspect that might worry them. I understand from the Solicitor General that the police investigation is proceeding as it should. A great deal of documents have been seized from the Senator. The police investigation is proceeding. If the tables were turned and had we seized under warrant the documents of some Tory member of parliament, we would hear screams about the intervening of the police into the affairs of a member of parliament. I would not, as might the Leader of the Opposition, be inclined to put into public inquiry areas which are being thoroughly investigated by the police until there is some evidence that the police cannot carry out their role because of some difficulty of which I know nothing at this time.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ANY AGREEMENT REACHED ON SAFEGUARDS BY SUPPLIERS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada entered into an agreement with other nations which produce or can produce nuclear reactors for a new set of safeguards against the diversion into weapon material by purchasers, and will the minister at the first opportunity table in the House any such agreement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the nuclear suppliers to arrive at upgraded standards. I have not had an up-to-date report on whether a final agreement has been reached, but when such has happened, I will certainly consider making its contents known to the House.

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—DATE OF COMPLETION OF SALE AND TABLING OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Will the minister advise whether the agreement with South Korea for the sale of a nuclear reactor, which sale the minister stated in the House several weeks ago was nearly completed, has been completed and how soon that agreement can be tabled in the House, as the minister agreed it should be?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the agreement has not been signed with South Korea. The authorizing order-in-council will be sought at an early date with a view to signing such an agreement. When an agreement is signed, I will certainly make every effort to have its contents available to members of the House. I certainly will table the agreement.

* * *

ENERGY

PROPOSED PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO USE OF NUCLEAR ENERGY IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Gillies (Don Valley): In the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. Considering the latest request from the Coalition for Nuclear Responsibility, can the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether the government is planning to launch a public inquiry into the use of nuclear energy in Canada? As the parliamentary secretary probably knows, this weekend this important group called for a re-examination of the use of nuclear energy in Canada, its effect on the environment and so forth. Is the government planning to soon have an inquiry into the impact of nuclear energy use in Canada?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can say that no decision has been made on this. As the hon. member will know, there is already a public inquiry in the province of Ontario into all other methods of producing electricity. I will take note of the hon. member's suggestion and report back to him.

* * *

[Translation]

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST THAT FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES BE DISTRIBUTED AS SOON AS POSSIBLE

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Considering that the Quebec government has offered the federal government to distribute family allowance cheques, so that people in the low income bracket may use this money they have been waiting for since November 20, could the minister advise the House whether he intends to contact the proper authorities and expedite the distribution of the family allowance cheques which these people need to feed themselves?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the most effective and rapid distribution method remains that proposed by the Minister of Supply and Services. In the case of those who are in need and who immediately require the family allowance equivalent, may I remind the hon. member that the emergency services provided for under the Canada Assistance Plan are available. Every province may take advantage of them to advance all needy families the money they need, and the federal government will share equally in the cost of these advances made to needy families. This is already available, and the provinces have all been encouraged to make use of the emergency services provided under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Lavoie: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

Could the minister tell the House then whether he intends to advise his counterparts in Quebec of what he has just told us? They do not seem to be aware of this opportunity since they do not use it?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I must tell the hon. member that for several days now we have been in contact with every one of the provinces—including Quebec—on this subject.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTION CANADA RESERVE RIGHT TO REFUSE PERMISSION TO PLO DELEGATES TO ATTEND HUMAN SETTLEMENTS CONFERENCE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the threats by Shahik Al-Hout that world-wide pressure will be applied to Canada if we refuse permission to any member of the PLO to attend the Human Settlements Conference next year, will the minister publicly reject this attempt at blackmail by a person who is in this country on a ministerial permit and assure Canadians that the government will exercise her sovereign right to reject admittance to the conference of any person who violates her immigration laws or regulations?

● (1440)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The policy has been clearly stated. It is that members of prohibited organizations will only be allowed in by ministerial permit and then only if it is established that they are not, individually, terrorists or members of terrorist sub-groups. If they were in those categories, permission to enter would be denied.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In the light of the statement by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and of recent statements by Shahik Al-Hout, would the minister advise the United Nations Secretary General that Canada will not submit to threats such as we have heard in the past week by any delegation which is using the conference as a propaganda forum for its own political ends?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Unfortunately, I did not hear either the original question or the answer given by my colleague. Thus, it is difficult for me to deal with the supplementary. I was rather busy building houses here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF SKY SHOPS—INQUIRY WHETHER SEARCH WARRANT ISSUED TO SEARCH PREMISES OF LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. With reference to the search warrant with respect to the residence of Senator Giguère, I should like to ask the minister whether at the same time a warrant was issued to search the premises of the Liberal Party of Canada? Was a request made by the RCMP to do this and, if not, why not?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we do not give out details of police investigations in the House of Commons.

Oral Questions

INCOME TAX

APPLICABILITY OF ACT TO PROVINCIAL CROWN CORPORATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. It has to do with the plan of the Government of Saskatchewan to nationalize the potash industry in that province. In the event such nationalization takes place the loss to the federal treasury in company taxes would be very heavy. I ask the minister whether or not, having regard to the developments which are taking place along this line, not only in Saskatchewan but elsewhere, the government will bring in legislation to provide that a corporation set up by a provincial government in the course of nationalizing an industry within a province will still be liable for income tax?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): I do not think we need new legislation. I believe the Minister of Finance has indicated that such a corporation would be liable to taxation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To make it perfectly clear, if this potash industry is nationalized, can the minister say directly that the company set up by the government, the government agency, will be liable for income tax? If so, I would think there would be general approbation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not like to interfere with a line of questioning but the right hon. gentleman is asking, first of all, whether something might happen after a certain event has taken place, and that is somewhat hypothetical. Moreover, he is asking the minister for a legal opinion here in the House. Perhaps the question might be rephrased. If the minister wishes to answer, I do not want to obstruct the right hon. member; it is a point which I am sure is very interesting to all members. As it is, the right hon. gentleman is asking the minister to give a legal opinion and, moreover, to presuppose the existence of certain circumstances which do not exist now and are therefore hypothetical.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing hypothetical about that question. It is being carried out and I am asking whether or not the Canadian people as a whole are to be denied the company income tax. It is as simple as that. It does not ask for a legal opinion in any way, with great deference to Your Honour.

Mr. Cullen: If the Department of Finance tells us to collect the tax we shall collect the tax.

* * *

OLYMPIC GAMES

POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ASSUMING RESPONSIBILITY FOR DEFICIT OR ALTERNATIVELY ASSUMING RESPONSIBILITY FOR OTHER PROJECTS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Bearing in mind the right hon. gentleman's statements that the government does not intend to pick up any part of the Olympic deficit, could the House be told whether the government has been approached formally or informally, directly or indirectly, by the Government of Quebec, the City of Montreal or by COJO itself with a view to the federal government taking up part of the deficit, and, if so, who made the approach?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer to all those questions is no.

Mr. Stevens: Would the Prime Minister indicate whether any consideration has been given to financing, within the City of Montreal or within the Province of Quebec, certain developments which, if not financed by the federal government, would ordinarily be financed by the province, on the understanding that if the Province of Quebec takes up the deficit incurred by the Olympics the federal government would share in the financing of those other projects?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know what the hon. member has in mind, if he has anything in mind, which I doubt. I wish he would be more explicit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: When I used the words earlier, "directly or indirectly" I took it they would cover that question.

* * *

AIR CANADA

LACK OF SUPPORT FOR FIVE EMPLOYEES CHARGED WITH CRIMINAL OFFENCE—BONDING OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Does the minister intend to look into the situation with regard to the five Air Canada employees in New York City who state that the management of the company has not given them any moral or financial support in their successful efforts to acquit themselves of serious criminal charges of gold theft laid, apparently, in an improper way while the employees were at work?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I have a report on that situation and I am informed that while the corporation feels it improper to accept responsibility for legal fees—as is the case with almost any other employer—the employees in question were reinstated and with no loss of pay.

Mr. McKenzie: Could the minister investigate to see whether these employees are properly bonded?

Mr. Lang: I will look into that.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DETENTION OF MRS. PSARSKI IN POLAND—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EFFORTS TO OBTAIN RELEASE

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding

Mrs. Joanna Psarski of Georgetown, Ontario, who came to Canada a few years ago as a landed immigrant, along with her husband, and who returned to Poland for a visit on the death of her father and is now being kept in that country. I should like to commend the minister for his attempts to intercede with the Polish government with a view to getting permission for her return, and wonder whether he could bring the House up to date on the present situation as far as Mrs. Psarski's possible return to Canada is concerned.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot bring the House up to date today but I shall attempt to do so later this week.

Mr. Cossitt: Might I address a supplementary to the Prime Minister? If it turns out that Mrs. Psarski is still unable to leave Poland with the permission of the Polish government, will the right hon. gentleman consider facilitating the passage of a unanimous resolution by the House asking the Polish government for its co-operation on humanitarian grounds to allow her to return to her husband in Georgetown?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is a fact that in many instances the government of Canada has intervened with heads of state on humanitarian grounds, so the principle of such action is not foreign to us. However, in any particular case I would submit to the judgment of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

* * *

ENERGY

TAR SANDS—POSSIBILITY OF NEW MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE DEVELOPMENT—PERMISSION TO SELL PRODUCT AT WORLD PRICE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the desirability of Canada being self-sufficient in energy supplies in the foreseeable future, and since the National Energy Board now projects only a six-year supply for this country, can the right hon. gentleman tell us whether the government is contemplating any new initiative by way of tax incentives to encourage further exploration or more speedy development of the tar sands in order to ensure sufficiency of supply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would have to make a complete statement of our energy policy in order to answer that question in any satisfactory way, and I do not think this is the time to do so.

Mr. Yewchuk: With regard to ensuring quicker development of the Athabasca tar sands, is the government willing to give certain assurances to potential developers there that all their products will be allowed to be marketed and, second, that they can reasonably expect to receive the international price for it?

Mr. Trudeau: Here again, the question is general in its nature. However, if it related to any specific request I would have to examine the particular circumstances. On the international price, I believe this has been made part of our policy statement in that we would allow the price for such petroleum to reach or to tend toward the international price. I believe the expression "international price" was used, but I am not sure. I am sure a statement has been made in this regard, but perhaps I could take note of the question so the minister will be able to answer when he is back in the House.

* * *

● (1450)

[Translation]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO DEAL WITH INCREASED COST OF COFFEE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Over the weekend, a consummer association advised me that the price of coffee has shot up exorbitantly. Today, over the radio, the same news was confirmed and the government was blamed for not stepping in. May I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether it falls within his jurisdiction to check into the matter and ascertain whether prices have increased inordinately, and what position he intends to take to protect the consumers with regard to the price of coffee?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the price of coffee should have gone up so much. The hon. member should know that the product is imported and that we have very little control over the international price which is unfortunately very high indeed. The price has been going up for several months now. Still, I cannot resist the temptation of telling the hon. member, who comes from a rural area, that he should perhaps encourage the people to drink less coffee and more milk.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I take notice of the suggestion of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and I shall stress my procedure to meet his wish. However, I would like to ask him very seriously whether the board established under Bill C-73 will have some say in the control over the prices of these imported goods or whether they can be left absolutely free so that those who sell these products will be able to increase their prices immoderately?

Mr. Ouellet: No, Mr. Speaker, for all the other food products sold in stores employing more than 500 people, these stores will have to comply with the government guidelines. It means that these stores will not be allowed to increase the prices by more than the rise in production costs. Where it is not possible to establish these costs the stores will have to set a price level which is not higher than 95 per cent of the average profits these stores made over the five previous years. This procedure is extremely rigorous, Mr. Speaker, and this leads me to say that I am not at all surprised to see some food chains announce a price freeze for the next months.

[English]

EXTENDED WARRANTIES ON MOTOR VEHICLES—
GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENFORCE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that over the last three months it has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the major motor car companies did offer extended warranties, which were kept secret, in respect of certain qualitative defects on certain models in the years from 1969 to 1973, and in view of the fact that in July the minister told this House he would ask these motor car companies to co-operate with his department in order to make sure the consumers would get the benefits of these extended warranties and have their cars fixed at the companies' expense, and bearing in mind that these companies have dragged their feet in co-operating with the department and the government, will the minister now tell the House what steps his department intends to take in view of this feet dragging by the car manufacturers?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first, my department established a special work force that coordinates its activities and investigates complaints made by consumers. Second, meetings are taking place with representatives of the automobile industry and I can assure the hon. member that my department follows up thoroughly any inquiry filed by consumers. Moreover, the Automobile Protection Association also makes representations on behalf of consumers and submits complaints to the court when necessary.

[English]

* * *

OLYMPIC GAMES

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO AID FINANCING—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE FEDERAL COSTS WILL NOT INCREASE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, last week the President of the Treasury Board stated in this House that further legislation to assist the financing of the trouble-plagued Olympics will not be introduced at this time. Can it be assumed, therefore, that such legislation is in fact being considered for some other time in the future and, if not, can he assure us that no further legislation in fact will be introduced at this or at any other time?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. I do not have to comment on the second.

[English]

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that original cost estimates for the Olympic Games, as we know, have more than tripled, primarily due to the mismanagement of COJO and city of Montreal officials, will the President of the Treasury Board assure this House that direct federal costs, and I am referring to security, immigration, CBC and others, will not increase from their original estimates as well?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the anticipated cost of the federal services which are to be made available for the Olympic Games have increased in a way which may be compared to the higher outlays mentioned in connection with the development of the olympic site itself and if there is an increase it is marginal.

* * *

FISHERIES

NUMBER OF BILATERAL AGREEMENTS ON FISHING ZONES—DEFINITION OF FISHING ZONE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of State (Fisheries).

I want him to refer to my questions of last week concerning the bilateral agreements on territorial waters. With how many countries, besides Norway, does the minister hope to conclude bilateral agreements and has a schedule for such negotiations been established?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State, Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as far as I remember, I can list Spain, Portugal, Poland and the USSR; preliminary discussions are being held with Japan. The first round of talks with the United States did take place. As for the schedule, we have some problems in coordinating dates. We believe that the negotiations with all those countries will be initiated before mid-January.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Has the minister now turned from multilateral to bilateral negotiations?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Not at all, Mr. Speaker, but I must remind the hon. member that, unilateral or multilateral, the extension of the jurisdiction will require bilateral negotiations with the countries which have been fishing off the Canadian coasts.

* * *

[English]

CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY

REASON FOR RESIGNATION OF CHAIRMAN, MR. WORSDALE

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Acting Prime Minister stated he was unaware of the resignation of Mr. Worsdale, chairman of CEMA. Could the Minister of Agriculture now confirm whether Mr. Worsdale has resigned and, if so, for what reasons?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know he has resigned, but I have not been talking with Mr. Worsdale and I have not seen any correspondence. As a result, I have no knowledge of why he resigned.

* * *

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EFFECT OF ASSUMPTION OF OLYMPIC DEBT BY QUEBEC ON TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and is supplementary to a question of my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe. In light of the announcement by the government of Quebec, that it is to assume some of the responsibility for the planning and building of Olympic facilities, and since this decision will place a strain on the budget of the province of Quebec, will these additional expenses be considered when transfer payments from other provinces are considered?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): I do not think that would be a factor in establishing the equalization payments to the provinces, but I will check and report to the hon. member.

* * *

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSSIBLE REPLACEMENT OF MERIT SYSTEM BY QUOTA SYSTEM TO ENSURE EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY FOR FEMALES

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated the government wishes to ensure that within a reasonable period of time the ratio of male to female employees in the Public Service in each department, occupational group and level will approximate the proportion of qualified and interested personnel of both sexes available, I am wondering whether the minister is proposing that rather than a straight merit system the government will be introducing legislation or regulations providing for a quota system to assure that an increased percentage of positions will be filled by females?

● (1500)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member cares to look further in the speech I delivered from which he quoted he will find the determination of this government is to ensure proper and fair representation to women in the Public Service of this country.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I would rather not try to be partisan in this matter or get kudos from the backbenchers. What I am trying to determine is whether the minister can explain whether or not they have decided on a quota system or whether they will rule out a quota system.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member again can look at my speech. I have explained exactly how the system will work. There will be full co-operation by all departments under the direction of the Treasury Board in which the departments are invited to propose targets over the next five years in terms of promotion of women. The Treasury Board will review these targets with the department every year, and we will try to ensure, as I said in the speech, that all interested and able women who want to be promoted in the public service will be properly considered and will have their chance to be promoted.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

KING GEORGE V CANCER FUND WINDING-UP ACT

MEASURE TO WIND UP FUND

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-76, intituled: "An Act to wind up The King George V Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund for Canada and to authorize the sale of the assets and securities of the Fund and to transfer the sale proceeds and the balance of moneys to the National Cancer Institute of Canada".

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Translation]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 2,878, 3,154, 3,290, 3,313 and 3,328.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

DEFENCE EXPORT SALES

Question No. 2,878—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,394, is there any department which is prepared to divulge to the people and Parliament the dollar value of military equipment sold to other states and, if not, what is the reason for such secrecy?

2. (a) To what countries in each year since 1963 has Canada sold military equipment (b) what was the nature of such equipment?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Dollar values of all Canadian exports, including military equipment, are published in Statistics Canada Catalogue 65-004 (monthly)

"Exports by Commodities". With the exception of items classified under commodity class 930-99 (military weapons ordnance and parts), military equipment exports are not separately identified as such in this publication but are included in their appropriate commodity class. No department other than Industry, Trade and Commerce compiles statistics on all military equipment export sales as separate from all other export sales. Military equipment export sales figures as compiled by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce contain information provided by Canadian companies on a voluntary and confidential basis and, therefore, details cannot be made available since such disclosure could be considered a breach of confidentiality and could compromise a company's competitive position.

2. (a) Since 1963 Canada has sold military equipment to the countries as tabulated below:

Country	1963	1964	1965	1966	1967	1968	1969	1970	1971	1972	1973	1974
Abu Dhabi						x			x
Argentina	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Australia	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Austria	x	x	x	x	x							x
Bahrain									x
Belgium	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Bermuda			x
Bolivia											x
Botswana							x
Brazil	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Britain	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Brunei				x	x	x	x		x
Burma	x		x	x	x	x			x	x
Cameroun									x
Ceylon									x
Chile	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Colombia	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x			x
Denmark	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Ecuador	x							x		x	x	x
Ethiopia	x	x	x	x	x						x	x
Finland					x	x	x	x	x	x	x
France	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Federal Republic of Germany	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Ghana	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Greece	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x		x	x
Guyana											x
Iceland				x
India	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Indonesia				x
Iran	x	x	x	x	x		x		x	x	x	x
Ireland												x
Israel	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Italy	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Jamaica				x	x	x		x	x		x	x
Japan	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Kenya		x	x	x		x	x		x		x	x
Korea									x	x	x	x
Kuwait			x					x	x
Luxembourg						x					x
Malaysia	x		x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Mexico	x
Mozambique	x
Muscat and Oman								x	x	x	x
Netherlands	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
New Zealand	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Nigeria										x		x
Norway	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Pakistan	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Panama								x	x		x
Peru	x	x		x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Philippines	x										x	x

Order Paper Questions

Country	1963	1964	1965	1966	1967	1968	1969	1970	1971	1972	1973	1974
Portugal	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x			x
Puerto Rico									x	x	x	x
Rhodesia		x	x
Saudi Arabia							x		x	x	x	x
Singapore	x		x	x			x	x	x	x	x	x
South Africa	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Spain	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Sweden	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Switzerland	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Taiwan		x				x	x			x		x
Tanzania			x			x		x	x	x	x	x
Thailand	x					x	x
Trinidad			x	x	x
Turkey		x	x	x					x		x	x
Uganda		x	x	x								x
Union of Arab Emirates											x	x
United States	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x
Venezuela	x	x								x	x	x
West Indies		x	x			x
Yugoslavia	x	x	x	x	x				x
Zaire									x			x
Zambia		x		x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x

2. (b) Military equipment sales have included applied research and development, pre-production, production, licence agreements and technical assistance, installation (other than construction) and repair, overhaul and modification. "Off the Shelf" general procurement, construction, fuels and lubricants, basic raw materials and services (such as rentals and transportation) are excluded. Military equipment sold by Canada has been, for the most part, items having a high technological content and includes such items as aircraft, aircraft engines and spares, airframe and engine components and spares, flight simulators, reconnaissance drones and spares, navigation and communication equipment and spares, avionics, marine valves, sonar equipment, ammunition and components, and vehicle parts and spares.

FATTAH REPORT

Question No. 3,154—Mr. Reynolds:

Has the Solicitor General received a copy of the report from Mr. Ezzat Abdel Fattah on public attitudes towards capital punishment in Canada, and (a) if not, on what date does he expect to receive the report (b) if so, will the report be made public or available to Members of the House of Commons?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Yes. A preliminary copy of the report by Ezzat A. Fattah, Phd., entitled "The Canadian Public and the Death Penalty: a Study of a Social Attitude" was received in March, 1975. The final report was received on October 3, 1975. (a) Not applicable. (b) Publication of the report is now under consideration.

AIR COMMAND HEADQUARTERS BUDGET

Question No. 3,290—Mr. Howie:

What amount of money was budgeted for salaries for the first year of operation of Air Command Headquarters at Winnipeg?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The money budgeted for salaries for the first year of operation of Air Command September 1, 1975 to August 31, 1976 is as follows: Military Personnel, $6,286,538; Civilian Personnel, $507,095; Total: $7,793,633.

HMCS "PROVIDER"

Question No. 3,313—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Is it the government's intention to refit HMCS Provider in the near future?

2. Is the refit to be done at the refit facilities in Halifax and, if not (a) for what reason (b) in what location will it be done?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. Present intentions are for the refit to commence in the fall of 1976.

2. No. (a) and (b). It is intended to refit the Provider under contract on the west coast as the ship is based there. A contract refit is planned because the scheduled maintenance requirements for other vessels will fully load HMC Esquimalt dockyard facilities.

MILITARY AND CIVILIAN STRENGTH OF DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Question No. 3,328—Mr. McKinnon:

What was the (a) military (b) civilian strength of the Department of National Defence and Armed Forces on March 31, 1974 and March 31, 1975?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): March 31, 1974, Military Strength, 80,563; Civilian Strength, 38,886; March 31, 1975, Military Strength, 78,323; Civilian Strength, 35,050.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Do the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Energy Conservation

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO CARRY OUT EFFECTIVE ENERGY RESOURCE CONSERVATION PROGRAM

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley) moved:

That this House regrets the government's failure to carry out an effective energy resource conservation program and, in particular, calls upon the government to answer the criticism by the International Energy Agency that "there appears to be a substantial gap between principle and practice... that the (Canadian) cabinet appears to have accepted the goal of conservation without recognizing the need to implement the goal with specific actions."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion, of course, represents the position of this party that the government has done absolutely with regard to energy resource conservation in Canada. In speaking to my motion, I speak not only for the people of Canada but, in effect, for the countries of the world, because the International Energy Agency, an agency of industrialized countries designed to examine what is happening in respect of the use of energy around the world, has seriously condemned Canada for doing so little in the area of energy conservation.

In a period when the world is experiencing perhaps the most serious economic problems and difficulties since the depression, it is heartening to every citizen of this small global planet that countries of the world can get together to develop international programs for conserving energy. It is disheartening to every Canadian that when that agency begins to look at what various countries such as Canada are doing in respect of the conservation of energy, and appoints a sub committee consisting of Spain, Sweden and Belgium to investigate what Canada is doing, it should come to the conclusion that Canada is doing a very little so far as the conservation of energy is concerned. In fact, it reported to its full membership that Canada is not coming to grips at all with energy conservation.

It is not very surprising that it should come to such a conclusion, because in Canada we are spending 11 cents per capita on the conservation of energy, compared to Britain which spends 19 cents per capita for energy conservation and Sweden which spends 31 cents per capita. What is the consequence of the fact that we are doing so little about energy conservation? In 1974, consumption of energy in Canada went up 7.8 per cent, whereas in the United States consumption of energy went down .8 per cent, and that consumption of energy in western Europe went down 1.8 per cent. Throughout the world, where countries are concerned about the profligate use of energy, consumption has been cut back and is dropping, while in this country consumption of energy is rising at a very extensive rate.

It is no wonder, when there is a review by an independent group of countries looking at Canada's problem, that those countries should be appalled by the things they observed. I know the government says it is not astonishing that the consumption of energy went up in Canada when it went down in other countries because, after all, the Canadian economy was for a time more prosperous than the economies of some other countries. But consider this assertion. While it is true that the Canadian GNP went up a year ago by about 4.5 per cent when our energy consumption went up by about 8 per cent, when we compare this with the situation in a country such as Sweden, which is no different from us in respect of its location, in terms of its northern exposure, we find that there when the GNP went up, energy consumption went down.

[Mr. Speaker.]

We must face the fact that Canada is one of the most wasteful users of energy of any country in the world, and that this cannot be attributed to the fact that our GNP is growing faster than that of other countries, because this is not so. We are not using energy effectively. We have the second highest per capita use of energy of any country in the world. We use more energy, per dollar of gross national product generated, than any other country in the world.

By any measure, Canada has been profligate in the use of energy. How strange it is that now, two years after the development of the energy crisis, we must have a debate in the House of Commons about conservation of energy. How peculiar it is that two years later nothing has been done in this country to conserve energy. One must ask oneself why the government does not do anything about energy consumption and why it does not seem to care. I think the answer to why nothing has been done by the government is the fact that it does not know what the energy situation actually is in the country. The reason they do not know is that they have been fed, or used, or have had to make their decisions and policies on the basis of reports from the National Energy Board and other departments which have been fantastically wrong in their analyses and predictions. The government really does not have any foundation upon which to make any sort of policy.

● (1510)

It is to me incredible that in 1971 we could have had a minister of energy, mines and resources in this country saying that we have enough oil to last us for the next 923 years. It was nice that he could round out the figure. He also said that we had enough gas to last us for the next 328 years. I am referring, of course, to the famous speech made by that minister in Denver in 1971. Only five years ago a government spokesman, a member of the cabinet, said that we have enough energy in this country to suffice for the next 1,000 years, approximately. In 1969 the National Energy Board was saying we should export more because we had these great resources and we had everything we needed. It is evident that the government had no basis on which to make decisions, and because they had no such basis the position they have taken is that they should not do anything at all about the matter.

I know government people will say that there has been some sort of a program. What has it been? A year or so ago, when they wanted the Canadian people to become interested in energy conservation, the government published a book telling Canadians to shut off the lights; and they spent $2.5 million on advertising it. Interestingly enough, when people wrote asking for the book, it was not even available, and what is even more interesting, $2.5 million was spent on advertising when the total amount spent on energy research was only about $1.25 million. What an incredible set of priorities this government has, when it spends twice as much on advertising as it does on research to find ways in which we can conserve energy.

To be fair, I must point out that the government did some things of a marginal nature in conservation, such as the removal of the sales tax on some energy users, such as motorboats. Even there, a great debate ensued as to exactly when they did take off that tax. This also applied to snowmobiles and a few things of that sort, but they were very marginal things which could only affect the periphery of the use of energy. They also established an office on energy conservation. Since it has been established hardly anyone has been made aware of what it does.

What should the government do? A great many things could have been done. We could have changed the tax structure on automobiles, making it attractive for people to use more efficient cars. The Ford Foundation in New York has published a report which says that any country that is serious about energy conservation should require that by the year 1980 all cars sold should operate for at least 20 miles per gallon of gasoline. This government has taken no action along this line. It has taken no action on speed limits. Over a year ago the United States government went in the direction of reducing speed limits. Now we find the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) planning to meet the provincial premiers on December 12 to discuss the whole question of reducing speed limits—two years too late.

Has the government been making a great thrust to try to get urban transportation built in this country in an effective fashion? No, it has not. Has the government used any imagination in developing tax policies to encourage car pools? Not a thing has been done in that direction. Has there been any tax program or any other sort of program to increase shipment by rail? No, there has not. In the use of energy for transportation the government has no program for conservation of energy—none whatsoever. What has the government done about energy conservation in the area of housing? It recently introduced a major program to stimulate residential construction, but is there anything in that program for energy conservation? No, not a thing. Has the government given any particular advantage to the people who use more insulation in their houses? No, it has not. You would think that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) had never heard—he probably never has—that there may be a need to conserve energy in this country. Was there anything in that program to give advantages to those building houses with solar energy plants? No, not a thing.

So nothing has been done for conservation in transportation or in residential construction. In terms of industrial use, nothing has been done to encourage energy conservation. All that can be concluded is that the government really does not take this matter seriously and does not really believe that energy conservation is an important matter so far as this country is concerned, in spite of the fact that we have a far greater relative increase in energy consumption than any other country in the world.

It is argued, and may well be argued by the government, that the only effective way to conserve energy is to let prices rise. As a matter of fact, the former minister of finance has argued from time to time that it is important for the price of energy to rise so that there will be some type of conservation brought about. I have waited a long time to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) release to parliament some studies to suggest what sort of conservation would come about with a rise in prices. Of course, none has come forward.

The fact of the matter is that most studies which have been done seem to indicate that higher prices do not change energy consumption much. There are changes in consumption when total levels of economic activity change, but by themselves prices do not change energy consumption a great deal. We in this party have argued and supported the idea that care must be exercised in the way in which price changes are made, given the fact that such rises in price have different impacts in different regions and people with different income levels. But the fact still remains that the important thing is not a rise in the price of energy per se for the sake of conservation but, rather, pricing that ensures that the people who are producing energy, the explorers and developers, have a sufficient rate of return so that they continue to find energy needed for this country. One of the tragic things that happened in the last couple of years was the decision of the government to use energy as a foundation for tax revenue, rather than how to produce the energy which we will need in this nation in the years ahead.

We have reached the incredible situation of a country which should be self-sufficient in energy, particularly in fossil fuels, facing the possibility of finding itself short and having to import the energy it needs in the years ahead. We are at a period when we are profligate in our use of energy resources, we have no program to increase our supply, and we have never considered the problem of conserving what we have in an effective fashion. We are not even looking seriously at alternative sources of energy in this country. As I mentioned earlier, the total amount we are spending on energy research and development in this country is about $1.2 million, and we are spending it in seven departments. The natural result is that no effective work whatsoever is being done.

● (1520)

My colleague, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) will be speaking on alternative energy sources as this debate goes ahead, but I want to stress that the task force on energy research and development has said, and made clear, that research and development of energy conservation methods has been neglected in Canada, yet research and development should form a significant component of any energy conservation program. The task force says very firmly that the government should be spending about $10 million per year on research into ways in which to conserve energy. We are spending about $1.2 million.

Does it make any difference whether we have an energy conservation program or whether we do anything about conserving energy in the course of the next few years? Of course it does. In the first place, we could run out of our energy. It is incredible to think that this government is so unconcerned about its commitment to future generations that it would allow even the possibility that Canada would run out of energy resources, or that we would permit, because of profligate use now, a shortfall of energy for generations in the future.

What an example we are providing for Third World countries which are experiencing tremendous problems as a result of energy shortfalls! We have a government that is unwilling to conserve, to try to tighten its belt or do anything about our energy needs. It is not making it clear to the Canadian people that we have to conserve. Significantly, and most importantly, overutilization of energy is having enormous economic consequences for our country. I think every member of parliament knows the dramatic situation which is occurring with regard to our balance of payments.

Canada is operating with the largest deficit in its balance of payments history. One of the reasons for this great deficit is that we do not any more have our natural resources to export. More importantly, we are importing a large portion of the energy we have to use. With the opening of the Montreal pipeline there will be even less energy to export, and as far as our balance of payments situation is concerned we will have less revenue generated. The solution is not necessarily to export, but to import less, and the way to do that is to use less. The way to use less is to have a meaningful conservation program in this country.

One of the many charges which could be laid at the feet of this government is the fact that in spite of what has happened around the world, in spite of the dramatic situation developed by the OPEC countries, in spite of the fantastic deterioration in our economic position, the government has not deemed it necessary to start any kind of conservation program. It has never taken to the Canadian people the proposition that in our own interests and in the interests of generations which will follow us, we must do something to conserve the use of resources in this country.

There can be no greater indictment of a government that, in spite of the situation around the world and in spite of a negative report by other countries, we are doing nothing about conservation. In spite of what is going on all over the world, in this country we are increasing the use of our energy by about 8 per cent per year, when other countries are doing a commendable job of trying to reduce energy consumption. It is the height of irresponsibility on the part of the government that it has not taken to the Canadian people the responsibility of trying to do something about energy conservation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Of the many things with which one could charge this government—apart from lack of leadership in almost all areas of economic policy—when the chips are really down and when history is written, one of the things historians will ask is, where was the government when there was a chance to conserve some of our great natural resources? They will say that they did not care, they did not take the matter to the Canadian people, they did not ask the Canadian people to do something about it. That is an indictment this government will have to live with for a long, long time. And it will not be simply a political indictment, because it is much more than that. The indictment which will come down on this government from our children and our grandchildren will be that we wasted our resources at a time when we should have been conserving them. I hope the government will take very seriously the charge that it is doing nothing about energy conservation. The Canadian people want the government to give some leadership in this area so that we will not all have to face the charges which will otherwise be made in the years ahead.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) has rendered a useful service to this House and to the people of Canada by placing his motion on the order paper and drawing attention to the failure of the government to implement an effective energy conservation program. The fact is that for many years this country has faced the threat of an oil shortage, to which fact the government has been consistently indifferent. Now that threat has become a reality. This year we will be 100,000 barrels a day short of self-sufficiency, and the estimate is that by next year we will be falling 300,000 barrels per day below self-sufficiency. Yet we go on merrily as though our oil and gas resources were limitless and so far the government has done nothing effective to deal with this serious situation. If we do not do something soon, we will be compelled later to take Draconian measures such as the rationing of gasoline and home heating fuels, which could be a very serious problem indeed and very difficult to administer.

The Government of Canada, along with a number of oil consuming countries, signed an international energy agreement in which, among other things, Canada promised, along with the co-signers to endeavour to reduce energy consumption by 10 per cent. The fact is, of course, that our demand is still going up. A few years ago our consumption was about 1.4 million barrels per day, it is now up to 1.7 million barrels per day, and the estimate put out by oil companies is that by 1980 it will be 2 million barrels a day. Therefore, we can hardly blame our fellow signatories to the international energy agreement when they say that there appears to be a substantial gap between principle and practice and that the Canadian cabinet appears to have accepted the goal of conservation without recognizing the need to implement the goal with specific actions. That is a damning indictment of any government, particularly when it comes from a group of nations which are struggling with the problem of oil shortage.

It is true that the government introduced an energy conservation program on February 6, a program introduced by the previous minister of energy, mines and resources. Those of us who replied at the time the minister introduced that program said it was going to be very largely a public relations effort. That is what it turned out to be. Money spent, in the main, has been spent on advertisements, pamphlets and commercials on radio and television. The public was told that there were 100 ways to save energy and to put money in its pocket. People were told to turn down thermostats and to wear sweaters. They were even told to take fewer baths. I assume that members of the cabinet set an example by scrupulously accepting that admonition. That probably explains why this government is in such bad odour all across Canada.

● (1530)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They are all stinkers!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What has the government actually done? On February 6, the minister announced a program which was to cost $1.3 million. In the estimates for this year, for the energy conservation office there was half a million dollars, and now the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has brought in a supplementary estimate for $2,350,000. The initial vote and practically all of the present vote will be used, in the main, for advertising with respect to education, the minister says, among youth, industry and transportation systems; but there have been no effective steps and no co-ordination by the various departments of government in order to bring about conservation of energy.

What the government has failed to realize is that over the years our whole economy has been built on the concept that we can waste our energy resources because we have unlimited quantities on hand. Our economy has been geared to the idea that our consumption should go up annually. For instance, because of the high price of housing in the cities, we have pushed people out into suburban areas and even out into the country, so that they need gasoline to drive to work. The automobile industry has worked on the principle that there is more profit on large cars than small cars and have resisted public pressure for smaller cars. The building codes have been completely unconcerned about saving energy and putting in proper insulation and energy-saving devices. Urban transportation repeatedly has been set aside on the ground that it is really for the poor and the disadvantaged, everybody else should drive a car, and the bigger the car and the more energy consumed, the better.

I do not think we can procrastinate on this question any longer. I think the time has come for the government to use its very considerable powers in a number of areas in order to conserve energy in this country. I want to suggest three areas in which action has to be taken. The first is in the field of transportation, because this is one of the major consumers of energy. There has to be a move toward smaller cars; there have to be means by which the large, heavy gasoline-consuming vehicle becomes less attractive. The government has put a 5 per cent excise tax on larger cars. That will have to be substantially increased. They will have to do much more. As long as large cars give the automobile industry a bigger profit than small cars, they will be produced.

The government could help very considerably in this field by putting in tax disincentives for the automobile industry to make large cars, and tax incentives for them to make small cars. But they are doing nothing like that. The energy conservation office is powerless. According to the press, the director of that office, Mr. David Brooks, wanted to put an energy efficiency tag on all cars in the dealers' showrooms. Such a tag would have shown the amount of gasoline consumed per mile, or the number of miles per gallon of gasoline which could be obtained from that car. The prospective purchaser would then have had some idea whether the car he or she was purchasing was the one that would give more miles to the gallon. Press reports say that the government turned down that proposal. Even that very simple proposal was rejected.

As the hon. member for Don Valley pointed out, the government made an appeal to the provinces to lower the speed limit to 55 miles an hour. British Columbia acceded to the request immediately. This has not only helped with respect to the consumption of gas, but it has helped to reduce accidents in that province. How much pressure was put on the provincial governments? What attempt was made to bring provincial representatives together last February or March to lower the speed limit? Nothing at all. The only people who have benefited from the government's energy conservation program to date are the advertising agencies.

The second field I want to look at is the matter of space heating. Fuel for heating buildings, factories and individual homes accounts for 35 per cent of our oil consumption in this country. One of the first things the government should have done—and ought to do now—was put in the national building code standards which require insulation and proper energy-saving devices. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation requires that if the houses built under its assistance programs are electrically heated, they must have very high standards of insulation. Those standards should be applied to all houses in which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has any equity. This ought to be in the national building code. According to CMHC, the additional cost for a three-bedroom house is anywhere from $200 to $400. The householder would save that amount in fuel costs in the first year or so. The government has done nothing at all about building codes. We merely say to the construction industry that they should take whatever steps are necessary to insulate houses and conserve fuel, but we are still building shells; we are still putting up houses in which there is a tremendous waste of fuel.

The government ought to do something about prestige lighting. The lighting of office buildings and keeping them lit all night is an advertising gimmick. Driving home from the parliament buildings at night I notice that every high-rise office building in central Ottawa is lit to the roof at almost midnight. The government's conduct is no better. I see the National Defence building with every office lit. I see the Lester B. Pearson building lit from top to bottom. I recognize that there may be people in these buildings who have to work at night, but the whole of the buildings do not need to be lit.

Neon signs are another example; they are left burning all night. The government says it has no power to deal with that, but they could rule that this type of lighting constitutes advertising, and if they were to set a percentage on the cost of advertising and say that beyond that figure advertising would not be deductible for income tax purposes, it would very quickly cut down the amount of unnecessary lighting of buildings at night and the unnecessary neon lights that are left burning all through the night.

If the government wanted to set an example to the people of this country, I suggest they could ground the executive jets which ministers use for flying around the country telling people how to save energy. The former minister of energy, mines and resources said, as reported on page 2988 of Hansard for February 6, 1975:

● (1540)

—we hope to provide a strong example to the public and private sectors.

The government now has the chance to set an example. It is not good enough for the government to admonish the public in a fatherly way, to indulge in pious platitudes and set up an energy conservation office with a budget which will permit full-page ads in scores of newspapers and commercials on radio and television. This may lead the public to thinking the government is doing something when in fact it is doing nothing. If the government really wants us to conserve energy, it must act in a variety of areas, including urban transit. For four years we have heard about studies and reports on rapid transit, but it has never gone beyond the study stage.

The government should encourage the use of small cars, the adoption of a national building code, the implementation of rapid transit, and make sure that those who would squander this country's rapidly diminishing energy resources are prevented from doing so. If the government does not act, we shall face a serious situation in a few years. This or some other government will be required to institute rationing, along with all its administrative headaches, for we shall then be compelled to curtail the use of a resource which the government, by indifference and procrastination, has allowed to be squandered over the years.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to cangratulate the sponsor of the motion who blames this government. I quote the motion:

This House regrets the government's failure to carry out an effective energy resource conservation program and, in particular, calls upon the government to answer the criticism by the International Energy Agency that "there appears to be a substantial gap between principle and practice . . . "

On reading this motion, I realize that it only deals with the problem of energy conservation. I feel this motion is much too restricted, thus not realistic at all since the great long-term problem at the present time is the research and development of new energy sources. Indeed, at the present time and in the short term, it is very important to conserve our present resources, hence today's debate, but once again we are forced to hold a closed-circuit. I think that all hon. members in this House will agree on this point. I understand very well the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who blamed the government on the oil issue in particular.

Canadian resources are fairly restricted at the moment since technicians warn us every day that at the current rate, our oil resources will be exhausted within ten years and according to some, even within five years. Without panicking and anticipating disaster, we must face the situation. Of course, the government must be the first to take steps to reassure the Canadian people, since to govern is to look ahead. But I think all Canadians must show goodwill and do their best. To this end, all Canadians must ask themselves what they can do to better conserve oil energy.

That being said, it rests with the government to act in the interests of every Canadian. It should be pointed out that the oil problem does not exist in Canada only; since it is a depleting resource, it creates the same problems as all other vanishing resources, that is in the years of greatest output, everything is fine, everything is wonderful. Every hope is possible since it is felt that there will be no end to that abundance. Consequently, all the activities of our economic life are geared to that wealth, but it is suddenly realized that the resource will dry up one day and sooner than expected. So the situation turns out to be similar to that of Canada, namely a doubtful future.

If we consider oil-producing countries, we find that they share the same concern. All those countries are looking into the energy problem, energy conservation. I do not accept the allegations of the hon. member for Don Vally who said earlier that Canada had oil reserves for 900 to 1,000 years. The greatest experts in that field suggest that the world reserves which might be immediately developed have a 37-year lifetime at the present production rate, while non-recoverable reserves, with present technology, would only extend production possibilities by about ten years.

● (1550)

At the last world conference on energy, the proven oil reserves recoverable in the whole world have been estimated at 91 billion tons. This makes us realize that even the largest producers should consider saving an energy of such short duration.

In Canada, what has been done and what is being done to conserve oil, gas and all other energy resources? We soon realize that it is not by small measures such as reducing speed on highways or avoiding opening doors too much in winter to save heating fuel, that we will solve the problem of quick depletion of our energy resources. It is surely not by increasing prices further to force the consumer to park his car and walk that we will obtain the desired results in conserving energy. Those who have no means of transport other than their automobile to go to work will have to continue driving no matter the costs since it is a sine qua non condition to earn their living.

The problem does not exist at the consumer level only. We must first study the problem of small consumers but especially that of bigger ones such as Canadian industries that consume two thirds of our whole energy production. We must find a way to reduce this consumption, either through a marked imporvement in the situation or the research for a substitute which will be as efficient for our industries. I am referring to nuclear or even solar energy. Many will jump and shout, as is done too often, that it will cost too much.

Mr. Speaker, I ask those big talkers how much it will cost in Canada in five and at the most ten years to secure another energy source to keep in operation our industries now relying on oil when all our oil resources are gone forever. I say that then it will no longer be a matter of price because it will be too late for Canada.

That is why I say that in addition to programs for the conservation of energy resources, the government must introduce long term programs for the discovery and development of alternative new energy sources to replace oil, gas and even electricity, when these become obsolete.

Faced with these necessities on which the very survival of mankind will depend, we cannot be satisfied with a mere discussion on energy conservation, as proposed in the motion introduced by the hon. member for Don Valley. We should deal instead with the whole question of the possible energy resources which may be available to us in the future; any thing short of that would be an exercise in futility. To return to the question of the conservation of Canadian oil, nobody can deny that the government has already done something in the area of oil exports.

The fact is that, the eastern provinces and Quebec being beset by problems caused by the increase in prices by their former suppliers, the Canadian government had to call on western provinces to divert a certain percentage of their exports towards those Canadian provinces and at the same time reduce exports to the United States.

It will be remembered that in 1974 the National Evergy Board proposed to limit exports to 800,000 barrels a day. Furthermore, on November 23, 1974, the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced that Canada was cutting its oil exports to the United States down to 650,000 barrels a day.

Very recently, La Presse of November 20, 1975 published an article I want to read which was entitled as follows:

Oil reserves will be depleted in five years.

The Federal government could well be forced to further lower Canadian crude oil exports to the United States in coming years as the National Energy Board just found out that western oil reserves will be depleted in five not eight years.

Those conclusions should be formally submitted today to the cabinet which will decide on the amount of oil available for the U.S. market until 1980.

Instead of curtailing daily exports from 750,000 to 560,000 barrels next year the federal agency proposes to set the maximum at 500,000 barrels a day and end exports in 1980-81—not in 1983 anymore as suggested a few months ago.

To spare U.S. feelings and especially protect U.S. refineries which have been going to western Canada for some twenty years already it is likely that Ottawa will raise to 525,000 barrels a day the maximum recommended by the national board.

That change of mind would be that much more justifiable that the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline will not be in full operation before next summer or fall. Furthermore, the National Energy Board feels that a reversible-flow pipeline should be envisaged to allow, sometime within the next few years, the transport of foreign oil to the very heart of the Golden Triangle in Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, that means therefore that the government has done something with regard to oil exports. I also feel that something has been done to maintain the level of energy productivity in Canada. We need but consider what has been done with regard to the Athabasca oil sands, to the development of which the government has already committed several million dollars.

The government strongly encourages the big companies through income tax exemptions, thus favouring research and exploration, although I doubt that those same companies produce the results the government expects of them. But with regard to domestic consumption, does the government do enough to promote interesting discoveries with a view to reducing the consumption of fuels and thus help conserve those resources which, to our mind, are disappearing much too quickly?

I would like to draw the attention of the government on all the most promising inventions because if we had used them we would have reduced our gas consumption by up to 50 per cent; the inventors have not yet been able to submit their findings to the government or make it accept them, or else these inventions were literally swallowed up by the oil kings against whom the government always seems powerless.

Mr. Speaker, today our cars would be as efficient and consume at least 50 per cent less gas if certain inventions had not been bought by oil sales and production companies. Of course, gas consumption would have been reduced by 50 per cent and the profits of the oil conglomerates would also have gone down by 50 per cent.

But if our government were free and independent of all these international companies, not only would we not now be talking about conservation and reduction of oil consumption, but energy would be only a minor consideration for our industries, our means of transport and all consumer needs. Moreover, if the government had gone beyond conservation and done more to promote research, even though multinational oil companies might have lost a few billion dollars, we could travel today in electric cars and say goodbye to pollution in our cities, which is causing our administrators so many headaches and costing the taxpayers so much money.

It is sad that this did not happen because of the influence of financial trusts on our governments. Even though the governments continue to grovel before national and world finance, the people are waking up so that it will soon become impossible to make them believe in fairy tales. There must be some evolution in the field of energy to enable people to live with future economic principles. And I am convinced that this essential evolution will come from the people themselves because the authorities—and I mean all levels of government—are too lazy to move out of the castles that have been built for them by those who control money, the economic blood of the world. I hope that tomorrow's society will be more human and less financial, and that it will be a society where financial power is submitted to man instead of man being submitted to money as today.

● (1600)

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today, put by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), affords us a good opportunity to discuss the government's energy conservation program, the need for it and the need for its expansion. I must explain to hon. members present that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) is not here this afternoon; he is visiting my constituency of Algoma, the uranium energy capital of Canada, Elliot Lake. Unfortunately, he is travelling without my assistance on this trip, one which has been in preparation for a month or so. I do not know whether this motion today was by the design of the hon. member for Don Valley; however, I am sure it was not. But the minister will be here this evening and he will be taking part in the debate.

No one will deny the importance of the subject which the hon. member for Don Valley has raised. Although we do not agree with the precise wording of the motion, we do agree that all governments, industry, and the Canadian public generally should come to grips with the need for better conservation of our energy resources. There should be no mistake; Canada must, and will, move forward into an era in which conservation is as important a part of our energy policy as increase in supply has been. I call attention to the amount of legislation placed before the House having to do with increases in supply during the fall of 1973 and throughout 1974. On the other hand, the conservation program was really only launched early in the present year. The government will continue to bring forward additional measures which will be in keeping with this new status of energy conservation.

Changes of the magnitude required will not be easy or painless. For a long time Canada has been living in what an English author has called a "fuel's paradise", ignoring the fact that our consumption of energy was growing at rates in no way sustainable even if supply prospects were far more optimistic than in fact they are. That is why I say changes cannot be made without difficulty and without some pain. I trust that when, in the near future, the government publishes measures requiring approval and action, we shall find that everyone is with us in our efforts to conserve energy in all regions of Canada, in all sectors of our industry and in all phases of our personal lives.

Let me turn, now, to the IEA report which is really the substance of the motion before us. The motion cites conclusions from a report prepared at the International Energy Agency in Paris last spring. In order to make this report more widely available and to ensure that its conclusions can be read in context, arrangements have been made whereby hon. members can obtain copies from the office of energy conservation. Unfortunately, the official report of IEA is available only in English, otherwise I would be glad to table it this afternoon for hon. members.

A report similar to this one on the Canadian situation was prepared with regard to each of the 17 member nations of the International Energy Agency. While Canada has participated actively in this evaluation work, we are not free to release any of the other reports. Each nation can release only the results of its own study. However, I might add that in a preliminary ranking of national conservation programs Canada ranked tenth among the 17 nations. This is not a worthy position but neither is it as bad as is implied by the motion before the House. The full report contains considerable praise for the Canadian program. Furthermore, some of the criticism is based on analyses of energy demand forecasts which, at the time the report was prepared, were still those contained in phase one of our energy policy studies, that is, forecasts consistent with the low prices which were then still prevailing throughout Canada. Since that time, the government has taken steps to permit energy prices to begin rising toward world levels and consumption forecasts have been revised sharply downward.

In other words, when the report was being prepared last spring, forecasts were being based on phase one of the energy report and the comparatively low prices which prevailed in the early summer of 1973. This is particularly significant since the most important criticism in the IEA report was directed to our low energy prices. I am sure that if we moved toward raising those prices to the level of world prices any more rapidly than we are presently doing, we would encounter a fair amount of criticism from members on the other side of the House.

Nervetheless, we have to accept in considerable part the statement quoted in the motion, which is to be found on the final page of the IEA report. Though we have created an office of energy conservation, though an imaginative program was presented to the House last February, and though we have taken part in numerous discussions with other governments both inside and outside Canada, the measures which have been specifically undertaken to conserve energy are as follows: First, the removal of the federal sales tax on insulating materials brought about in the last budget. Second, the introduction of an excise tax related to weight on the largest automobiles, and the imposition of a 10 per cent tax on private aircraft and on marine motors of more than 20 horsepower. Third, the introduction of stricter insulation requirements in the building code followed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Both the hon. member for Don Valley and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) suggested that no action had been taken. In fact, the index of the Canadian code governing residential construction has been doubled from a factor of R-6 to R-12. The latter figure was previously specified for electrically heated homes but it now applies to all homes governed by the code, the one used by CMHC. The fourth item is the levying of a 10 per cent per gallon tax increase on motor gasoline for non-business use. I suggest that this is not a bad record though it falls far short of what is needed.

It was the contrast between the strong statements made by ministers of this government and the relatively few changes introduced to date which occasioned the statement about the existence of a substantial gap between principle and practice. However, I can assure the House that the cabinet does recognize the need to implement the goal of energy conservation with specific actions. Consider what has been done in nine months relative to the five-part program put forward by the minister of energy, mines and resources last February. This is a five-part program, part one of which called for putting the federal government's own house in order. Considerable progress has been achieved in this regard. With certain exceptions, lights are now turned off in most government buildings at night. I believe there are only one or two which require specific mechanical changes before this can be accomplished. A standing order requires the purchase of only compact or sub-compact vehicles unless continuing requirements indicate the need for a larger vehicle. A 55 miles per hour speed limit has been introduced for federal vehicles.

● (1610)

I might say, in responding to the hon. member for Don Valley on that point, that it was the federal government which gave leadership in reducing the speed limit for automobiles in this country, and now at least two provinces have adopted this policy. Meetings were held among officials last spring and it has been a subject raised at other meetings, as well, of conservation officials at the director level in an attempt to get the speed limit reduced. A survey conducted by the Canadian Press a few days ago indicated there were several other governments which indicated they were going to move toward a lower speed limit.

The computer-aided building design and operation team in the Department of Public Works, one of the best anywhere, has been expanded and given authority to establish training programs throughout Canada so that these techniques, which can save from 25 per cent to 50 per cent in annual energy consumption, can be made available to the public. Strenuous efforts are being made by the Department of Supply and Services to introduce energy criteria into the purchasing system.

This part of the program is, therefore, well under way. In fact, progress is sufficiently strong that we feel confident in asserting that within a very few weeks we will be setting a target of an across the board 10 per cent cut in government energy consumption in the next fiscal year—that is, 1976-77—and a further target of stabilizing federal energy consumption for the following ten years. One might wonder if such a cut is possible, given the demands on government. However, an imaginative and far-reaching program in the Department of National Defence has shown that such savings, and indeed more, are possible.

Part two of the program put forward last February involved consultation with private groups and provincial governments. Since that time, numerous meetings have been held with industry, a conference with major industrial leaders has been held, and a public meeting at which industry will indicate its own conservation goals has been scheduled for next March. Meetings have also been held with groups supporting energy conservation from a number of points of view across Canada, and a beginning has been made in talking with public utilities.

Perhaps more important, continuing consultation has been maintained with the provinces. I think it is only fair to admit that response to our initiatives among the provincial governments has been mixed. The fact is that many of the direct approaches to energy conservation lie within provincial jurisdiction. Reduction of speed limits is a good example, and in this respect we were very pleased to see the recent announcement by the province of Ontario as well as the province of British Columbia. However, we are equally disheartened by the statement of the minister of highways of Nova Scotia who rejected any move to lower speed limits. I find this a rather strange state of affairs. From a general perspective, we have to take note of the fact that Canada was almost alone among the nations of the world last year in increasing its consumption of motor gasoline, and the picture is not too much better for this year. From the perspective of a province whose gasoline prices are subsidized by the rest of Canada, the statement is equally difficult to accept. Were Nova Scotians paying the full cost of the imported petroleum they consume, they might well be willing to reduce their consumption voluntarily. They might even find the efficiency of transport thereby increased, not decreased.

Mr. Stanfield: Stop attacking the Liberal government down there.

Mr. Foster: This government is committed to phasing in the effects of higher energy prices and has attempted to mitigate the impact on regions that use imported oil. Let me say right now that such a policy is severely jeopardized if the response by the provinces is an unwillingness to conserve.

The third part of the program announced last February was related to public information and advertising. Here we take second place to no nation in the world. Indeed, the IEA report itself refers to this program in terms of its "great imagination and drive". The report goes on to suggest that "some of its productions could be studied with benefit by other IEA nations". Work on this program is continuing. For example, new material is being prepared to be used in primary and secondary school curricula, a booklet on improved furnace servicing for the home owner has just been published, and informative advertising in newspapers and on television and radio programs is going forward. Finally, let me invite each member to watch a special cartoon feature on Boxing Day, entitled "The Energy Carol" in which Mr. Scrooge will be visited by the ghosts of energy past, energy present, and energy future.

Mr. Baldwin: Burn all Hansards containing Liberal speeches.

Mr. Foster: The fourth part of this program focused on the need for specific conservation measures. I have already outlined the measures taken to date. It is no doubt the absence of further measures in this category that is responsible for the statement quoted in the motion. Let me assure hon. members once again that this government is far from satisfied with the current situation. At a recent meeting of the International Energy Agency a revised, indicative list of energy conservation measures was developed that must be given serious consideration in the further strengthening of national conservation programs. I have copies of that indicative list and if hon. members would like me to table it, I would be pleased to do so. I think it is an important list, one that is used by the International Energy Agency.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Does the hon. member have permission to table it?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, a private member cannot table anything in this House. He can have it put in Hansard without reading it. Just imagine what would happen if all of us could put things on the table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Is the parliamentary secretary speaking on behalf of the minister? If he is, he has permission to table the document.

Mr. Baldwin: No, he does not have my permission.

Mr. Foster: Without seeking permission to table it, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to let members know that the information is available. I am sure it will be of interest at least to some. I should like to invite each member of this House to review the list and consider how well Canada as a whole, and members' individual constituencies in particular, can live up to the standards on that list. However, to initiate a new action phase we will be bringing measures forward in the very near future. Perhaps we have been too cautious in some of the actions taken to date. Surely it is not too much to tell Canadians that they are going to be required to drive smaller cars and use more efficient appliances.

Surely it is not too much to require of industry that it develop reusable and recyclable products and that it find ways to use waste heat and waste materials to conserve energy. Surely it is not too much to require of our public buildings, hotels and offices that temperatures be lower in the winter and higher in the summer. Surely it is not too much to reduce speeds on our highways and by commercial aircraft, and to ask that all modes of transport operate with higher load factors. Surely it is not too much to require that pricing practices of utilities be such that consumers are rewarded, rather than being penalized, when they practice conservation.

● (1620)

The government expects within a very few weeks to have programs to do many of these things. However, not all lie within federal jurisdiction and not all can be accomplished quickly. The important thing is to make a start at each jurisdictional level and then to require changes as rapidly as possible as we move toward a new situation in energy.

Let me illustrate the potential savings from only one of the measures that is being considered. It happens to involve transportation, which the IEA report describes as a sector in which "much more needs to be done". If, through minimum efficiency standards, the average efficiency of Canadian automobiles could be raised from the present 17.5 miles per gallon to 28 miles per gallon by 1985—a shift that is both technologically and economically feasible with no change in the structure of the automobile industry and with very little effect on consumers—the consumption of gasoline would drop from the present 600,000 barrels per day to just over 400,000 barrels per day. This potential saving is all the more impressive because it is based on an assumption that the number of automobiles in Canada will expand in the next decade from eight million to eleven million and that each automobile is driven as much as are those in the existing fleet. Despite these strong forces for expansion, a simple increase in automobile efficiency would bring us to less than zero energy growth for motor gasoline over the next decade. Savings are so large, and costs so small, that one wonders how anyone can object to such a conservation measure.

Let me conclude by referring briefly to the fifth and final portion of the government's program which involves the longer term future. Conservation has been variously described as an opportunity, an ethic and a way of life. It is all these things. We no longer have a choice about whether we are going to conserve. In an era in which energy costs are rising dramatically, in which energy supplies are becoming smaller and smaller relative to the demand, and in which great concern is being voiced about worldwide effects of excessive energy demand, a vigorous and profound program of energy conservation is essential. Indeed, it may be the optimum policy for Canada.

It is seldom recognized how powerful are the effects of even small efforts at conservation. For every 0.1 per cent that the rate of growth of energy consumption can be reduced between now and 1990, there will be a reduction in energy use in 1990 by the equivalent of one Syncrude-sized tar sands plant or five Pickering-sized CANDU nuclear stations. That is capital saved and inflation moderated. In any one year, for each 1.0 per cent drop in energy consumption—something that can be achieved easily by thermostat adjustments, or by driving slightly less, or by good furnace maintenance—consumers save about $200 million at the retail level, which would reduce future capital cost for energy supply by more than $0.5 billion. Assuming the 1 per cent annual saving were achieved only for heating oil in the maritimes and Quebec, oil import subsidy payments would drop by $12 million. When the fight against inflation is so critical to our national well-being, when the need for imported petroleum threatens our balance of payments, and when excessive consumption diminishes our competitive position, such savings cannot be ignored.

Let me finally assure this House of two things. First, the government will be implementing additional energy conservation measures in the near future. These measures will affect many sectors and regions of our economy, but they are the least that we can do to protect our own position, to meet our international responsibilities and to avoid even worse disruption in the future. But, second, this House must be aware that the measures that have already been introduced and those that will be introduced to conserve energy represent only the first, immediate and easiest steps towards conservation.

In the longer term, this government will be coming forward with more important and far-reaching and, I must add, more costly measures. We are at a point where we must give at least as much attention to measures to reduce the demand for energy as we give to ways to increase the supply, and we must give equivalent consideration to investments in energy conservation as we have been giving to investments in energy production.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my heart goes out to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Foster) for having been forced to read a report like that. I used to think of this as just the posturing of the ex-minister of energy, mines and resources, but now it is very clear from the fairy story we have heard this afternoon that it should be called "Alastair in Wonderland" instead of "Donald in Wonderland".

First, we have a representative of the Crown stand up in this House and say that after all that was said in this critical report by the International Energy Agency, we are only tenth on the list instead of seventeenth. That is the government's defence. Then he goes on to put forward the argument that in the national building code, which has been in existence for several years, there is a requirement that the thickness of insulation be doubled. The question we must ask, in plain honesty is, how many builders follow the national building code? Everyone knows builders follow the municipal building codes.

Second, as one of my colleagues to my left pointed out, there is no effort at all to put before the people who are building the homes what this will mean in cost. I think in respect of the government's highfalutin' report, which a year ago I described as a posture, one of the delay factors can be found in an article in one of our leading newspapers, the Globe and Mail, which writes:

> The office charged with developing the federal government's energy conservation program is finding that, in the words of research officer Brian Kelly, "the wheels of progress grind slowly."
>
> It's also had to forgo a research director for a while in the name of bilingualism.

I shall not say any more. In structuring up these programs, when the whole world is anxious to see all the nations reduce their demands for the limited fossil fuels which seem to be available, we wonder about whether or not a person speaks French. That is about the size of it. I do not think the people of Quebec will worry for a month or two, or for two or three years, in respect of such an important program, when we need technically trained people to handle these things, if some people do not speak French.

In essence, what the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) said in plain, earthy terms is that approximately half of the energy produced and utilized in Canada today is wasted in our present system, whether it is in respect of the automobile, transportation, or whatever. The parliamentary secretary suggested that one of the types of waste is our failure to move, technologically. I think we are all aware of the inefficiency of the gasoline motor which we have had for the last 50 years. We know that changes will be made in less than ten years from now because of individual breakthroughs. But where is the federal government in this research? Is that part of the $1.3 billion? In no way!

● (1630)

There is another type of ignorance on the part of the government that is holding us back. I am referring to the fact that one of the reasons we are under pressure today on the supply of fossil fuels is that we have not run out of them. What we have run out of is proven, traditional fossil fuels in an oil well. We have 1,000 billion barrels of fossil fuels in the tar sands, or oil sands of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and if we hope to recover a mere 300 billion of that—which is several hundred years' supply—we cannot do it with the present method of financing. In the last two years I have put forward in the House financing techniques that would bring the cost of producing synthetic oil of higher quality than traditional oil out of these tar sands at $3 a barrel, instead of the $11 a barrel that this government, together with Ontario, the province of Alberta and the private companies are planning.

All I could get from the then minister of finance, after I had asked him to study carefully these proposals and told him that the large companies of the world were willing to come in with much lower interest rates if that type of financing were used, was that industry does not use this method of financing. What he meant, of course, was that Canadian business does not use this method of financing, because what Canadian business is going through is obvious to all of us. I am simply pointing out that the crisis we are supposed to be experiencing is not a crisis of supply; we have all the energy we need, if we applied to these problem the knowledge that the engineers and the scientists have, as well as ordinary principles of economics.

I want to move on to the subject of other forms of energy. I think it is well known that we have to stop this waste. Before I leave this subject, let me say one more thing. I will give an example of the type of waste which it would cost nothing to stop. I am referring to our provincial hydro systems which we have in all the provinces as well as in the territories. Not one of these provincial hydro companies has moved in the matter of management of peak loads. In the province of Ontario, the hydro company has asked the provincial government to allow them to raise hydro wholesale rates by 27 per cent, without mentioning how the cost could be held down by simply exercising peak load management.

In plain terms, out of 24 hours a day, in dense residential areas such as are found in Ontario and Quebec, only seven hours have traditional peak loads. If you take all those peaks out of those seven hours, at no cost to provincial hydro, you simply change your rate structure. There are half a dozen ways of doing it. You can charge half as much wholesale during the 17 hours, raise the rates during the seven-hour peak to double and let the individual manufacturer or householder decide whether he wants expensive power of cheap power. That would reduce by 20 per cent, approximately, the need for capital structures in place to provide the large reserve capacities to meet the peaks. This is elementary, fundamental economics which have been ignored because for years we have been getting along by stealing oil from producers at a few cents a barrel. Now that the producers are refusing to sell oil at the price the oil barons gave to them, and are asking for a price competitive with that of other fuels, we have to start thinking hard about the elementary, fundamental principles of economics.

I put that concept before the government, not because they have too much to do with provincial hydro companies but because they will have something to tell them, at least, if the people in the provincial governments are not able to advise their hydro companies how to do it. If you want to find an example of this, look at the tiny state of Vermont, only a few hundred miles from here, which has adopted this practice for over two years. It is a practice which is working. Everybody knows this, except the provincial hydro systems. I am putting this concept before the federal government for another very simple reason. Sometimes you have to tell the provinces how to do things without interfering with their constitutional rights. You have the right to advise them.

This brings me to my main point. I want to speak, now, about alternative forms of energy. Even though energy is largely in the field of provincial and private use, the function of the federal government is in research and development. In dealing with alternative forms of energy I will not bother with the exotic ones unless I have time at the end of my remarks. I just want to remind the House, again, that one of the great forms of energy that has always been available to man since he had knowledge of the wheel is the translation of the sun's power in the form of wind into electrical energy. We used to use this system on the farms many years ago, but farmers were glad to give it up because of the noisy type of propellers they had on the windmills; the generators were not of a quality which would stand up to high-speed operation, and provincial hydro systems operated along the road, so it was easier to turn on a switch rather than service the wind-power source.

The reason farmers did not like the wind-power source was that they had to save up excess power in high wind periods. I am simply suggesting to the minister, through his parliamentary secretary, that all this was 40 years ago. Today, thanks to the scientists of the National Research Council and of other countries in the last couple of years, Canada has pioneered in the development of a modern, sound and efficient windmill which runs with elliptical instead of circular blades. In any part of the country where there is an average wind speed of ten miles an hour, a person can supply his own fuel in the form of electricity.

But, of course, you come to the fact that with these modern windmills you have storage to consider. Once again, the technical knowledge is there and batteries are not necessary any longer. You simply get permission from the hydro company in the province to hook up a windmill to your meter, and whenever you are producing more power than you can use for heat and light in your home, the meter runs backward and you get a credit. This is not something that is ahead of our time; it is going on today. Ontario Hydro has said publicly that it is technically possible. Also, it is actually happening in Wisconsin. There is no trouble with the phasing and voltage in Wisconsin; you can buy a particular type of box to make sure the phasing and voltage are correct. The only trouble that has arisen between the people who are using that system and the Wisconsin power company is disagreement over whether a person should be paid, for producing surplus power, at wholesale or at retail prices. I would think the solution of this problem would not create great difficulty and that we could consider adopting such a system in Canada. At the federal level, with all the research already done, we could suggest to private individuals that we have the knowledge available on how to produce wind power. It is really available only to those in the suburbs and farm areas, but it would add tremendously to the input of power into the very large storage system called the transmission system.

● (1640)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The only way the hon. member can be allowed to continue would be by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not abuse it. I have probably been speaking too slowly. I mentioned something about wind power. There would be no cost to the federal government. I have spoken about heat pumps several times in the House. Full page ads have been used by Westinghouse and by Canadian General Electric, but what is the federal government doing to tell individuals in southern Canada—that means all of us south of Timmins—about how to use a heat pump and what it costs? It works the same as a fridge—heating homes and cooling them in the summer. Four hundred employees of Ontario Hydro are putting this system in the Nanticoke work area down in Norfolk county; they have been directed by their management to use this type of heat.

With a heat pump, the heat comes from the air for nothing; all that is needed is the power to run the fans, as is the case with a fridge. All this is technical knowledge which has been available to the commercial market for the last 50 years; but instead, we get all these booklets which have won awards all over the world for being slick pamphlets but which do not say anything except that we should save energy by pulling the blinds at night. Most people pull the blinds already. We are told to save energy by sleeping two in a bed. I keep coming back to that.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Or bundling, as my colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), calls it. I say that we should tell people the facts about heat pumps—who produces them, what they cost, how much can be saved, and where they can be obtained. The same applies to solar heating. I know the federal government this spring gave a grant of $54,000 to an engineer at Gananoque who had spent $2,000 on his home in taking some solar plates, to bring the heat down to his basement and storing it in columns of wax in a box six feet long, four feet wide and four feet in depth. He was told that that heat box could conserve enough of the solar heat hitting his roof to provide 70 per cent of his heat requirements. Last year, because the sun shone so much, he obtained 100 per cent of his heat requirements from the sun, having made a capital expenditure of $2,000 on his roof. Hon. members can examine it and tell the people across Canada about it. I could go out and talk about solar furnaces.

An hon. Member: Did you say $2,000?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Yes, $2,000 was the capital cost of the solar plates. Today, in the city of Ottawa, we are trying to produce a device for providing plates for $20 or $30 instead of the $200 or $300 which is being spent now.

I do not want to bore the House with all the details, with the excuse of speaking over my time, but I want to conclude with a fervent appeal to the government to read what is being published, not in "far out" magazines but in the most responsible magazines one can find. One example is "Pipeline and Gas Journal". I will just read a statement or two from it. Hon. members may recall that back in 1972 I asked the then minister of energy, mines and resources whether his department would look into its files to find all the requests for help and funding for research into biomass. There was not a soul in the House or in the gallery who knew what biomass was. Now they all know. That is a new way of saying, "That's a bunch of biomass". But biomass is not a joking matter. I refer to the October issue of "Pipeline and Gas Journal," the most prestigious journal for the industry in North America. This is not new, but it should be read:

> For example, at a yield of 50 tons/acre-year of dry biomass with a heating value of 6500 Btu/duy lb., about 169,000 square miles (a square that is 411 miles on each side) is required at an over-all thermal efficiency of conversion to SNG of 35 per cent to satisfy the U.S. natural gas demand.

Translated into language we can understand, this information was made available two years ago in the NASA report, but now it has hit the table of big business. A square 400 miles by 400 miles, the size of Alabama and Georgia, using a 35 per cent conversion factor, based on the research of the bureau of mines and others, could supply all the natural gas needed by the United States. In our area, a much smaller amount would be needed. I am simply saying, in plain and simple terms, that if we cannot get natural gas out of wells in the ground, the farmer can grow it. Four hundred square miles is all that is needed, using only one-third of the energy produced, to produce all the natural gas needed by the United States. Quite frankly, that comes out of trees. One can grow pine trees and produce natural gas. However, I have quoted this in previous speeches and I should like to go on and give a table of values. These are all worked out. I know the sources.

According to "Pipeline and Gas Journal" of October of this year, if we consider the present price of natural gas as laid down in Toronto, the present estimated price of gasification of coal at site of $1.61 as the unit, the cost from these sources will be about half—73 cents to $1.17. I should like to read from a very distinguished Canadian magazine called "Executive". This is actually taken from the report of the Science Council of Canada, and it reads as follows:

—energy plantations may be able to compete with fossil fuel for energy generation ... In spite of our technical inability to harvest plankton efficiently, the energy from this source could presently compete with oil at $11 a barrel or so.

It continues:

Alberta's agriculture department says the fermentation of cattle manure could provide 6 per cent of the province's needs. The Science Council reckons that all the energy needs of the country's farmers could be met with methane produced from one-third of all crop residue and one-fifth of all animal wastes.

And so on. I wish to finish my remarks by saying that the biomass technique means low capital investment, high energy return and gives a final cost which is lower by half than the price we will have to pay for existing energy sources of nuclear energy, coal gasification, and so on. I suggest to the government that we cannot rush into this. In essence, we must make the knowledge of the scientists—incidentally, Canada has led the way at the University of Manitoba and the University of Waterloo, and now the University of Toronto is taking it up—gathered at all these meetings over the last year in Canada available and understandable to the public. I think our farmers and individual Canadians should have access to this information. People want to save money. Within the space of five to ten years we could increase the total energy mix 25 per cent to 30 per cent by using these alternative sources, at a price lower than we are now paying for energy.

● (1650)

If we can get this additional supply source by utilizing waste from the growth potential of our farms—and, as the hon. member for Don Valley said, it represents half of our total consumption—we should, as the century ends, not only get rid of any tendency to worsen our international account but we could be supplying our excess energy to the world as well as lowering costs here.

This is why I can support this motion which chides the government for not doing anything effective about the problem of conservation. I say, again, that conservation is not just restrictive and trying to control consumption; conservation, in its best sense, is the best use of our resources. That means recycling and that means the lowest cost. The government does not need to provide large sums of money, but just to tell individuals in Canada, provincial governments and municipal governments of ways to save money and ways to make money. I think that would be their most useful function, and then we would not have to move motions condemning them for doing nothing about conservation.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the previous speaker for bringing in the question of biomass. I was almost prepared to take that lightly, but he has almost persuaded me there is something in it. If there is, then that would be quickly found out by all nations of the world. We are wasting an awful lot of money drilling for oil in such places as the far north, and if biomass is going to supply us with energy, we should be getting after it.

I intend to discuss this matter of energy conservation, as referred to in the motion of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), from two viewpoints. In the first place, I think we have to review the present tight situation in the world, and in Canada in particular. A great many voices and groups in Canada have raised quite a babel. These are the nationalists, the ecologists, the oil industry, the provinces rich and poor in oil, the householders or consumers, industry at large, and the sort of dissonance in the other energy source industries such as hydro, thermal electric, the gas companies, coal mining companies and their employees, as well as nuclear energy systems. Out of all this clamour—and, I believe, in some ways the clamour has been beneficial—we must try to find out how the shortage came about and how the conservation programs can help Canada through the lean period that is coming. I want to be more specific about that lean period later on.

I should just like to give a short review of the situation. Until comparatively recently, Canada was using energy, just like every industrialized country, in a profligate manner. One reason was the misinformation we had about our own petroleum reserves. Because they were potentially present in large quantity, we thought they were in our hands to use. We were ignorant of the exact amount and the expense of bringing them to market. Another reason for the overuse of our oil was the increasing world demand for energy, and other material resources as well, which was putting up the price. The quadrupling of the price of oil by OPEC in 1973 was almost a predictable next step, although in our opinion it was pretty cruel.

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources was about the only branch of government awakening to the implications of the increasing world shortages of oil. They were not caught napping completely; I should like to emphasize that. Three months before the OPEC ultimatum, the department had enunciated phase one of "An Energy Policy for Canada." It saw the need for rapid planning for both a short and long-term policy for the future—50 years at least. The department realized that this country was faced with the need to use our energy resources carefully and intelligently. It realized that conservation, a new word in the energy world, would have to be the permanent policy of this government with regard to the consumption of petroleum and hydrocarbons—in fact, all kinds of energy.

What the OPEC action had done was to change suddenly not only energy use concepts but also to cause a crisis economically. The world was already suffering from deep-seated inflation caused by increasing demands, even from the emerging nations. They wanted commodities and energy, and these had been distributed most inequitably throughout the world. When the price of any product strikes world markets with such rapidity, distribution and consumption problems are multiplied immediately. As we well remember, inflation jumped at once even in so-called stable economies. It has taken two years to understand and organize our own Canadian to the economic chaos in the world. This, in turn, has forced us to accept inflation as an evil which, in our case, can only be beaten by every section of our society voluntarily agreeing to the control guidelines on profits, prices, salaries and wages. However, that is another subject.

This rapid shock in 1973 forced the federal government to join with the provinces in taking a hard look at our problem in the light of our confederation framework. At that time, in 1973, we were in balance in oil; that is, we were producing enough for ourselves and somewhat more. We all know that the lack of transport from west to east forced us to import one million barrels daily to make up for our exports to the United States. Federal and provincial governments were all concerned about our need to develop our own resources, our need to transport oil from west to east, and also to try to keep Canadian oil prices equitable throughout Canada and, if possible, below world prices. We should be grateful that today Canadian prices are $4 to $5 per barrel under the world price.

A group of decisions was made after our federal-provincial conferences. Temporary transportation measures were taken for use inside Canada. Then extension of the interprovincial pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal was undertaken. The House will remember how we pressed into service ships going from British Columbia, through the Panama canal and on to the east coast. Apart from transportation costs, we thought Canada could enjoy one-price oil. Revenue from oil was to be properly divided amongst governments, producers and consumers and leave enough for oil industry incentives as well as exploration, research and development. When I speak of research and development, I mean tar sands techniques, gasification of coal and liquefaction of gas, as well as pipeline problems from the Delta and the High Arctic, exports of oil were to go at world prices, but Canadians would enjoy a lower price. The Energy Supplies Allocation Board would function early in our conservation program and thus be ready for future emergencies.

● (1700)

Do hon. members remember our agonizing, unnecessarily long debate on Petro-Can? That corporation has two special functions among others, those being to decide on the rate of development of Canadian gas and oil reserves and to buy oil for Canada at a favourable price. Furthermore, uranium nuclear plants were to be pushed, as it were, and interprovincial power exchanges and grids encouraged. In addition, the department established an office of energy resource development. A full inventory of Canadian resources in uranium, coal, oil and gas was undertaken. In spite of this, some hon. members allege that the government has done nothing. The government went so far as to establish an office of energy conservation which co-ordinates the activities of all organizations and institutions, governmental and otherwise, in pushing forward conservation principles and effects. The government has studied the National Energy Board's review of oil export policy. So hon. members can see that the government has done a great deal.

Some interesting facts have emerged from all these studies. Rates of development of all energy sources have been evaluated. We now realize that we can have moderate growth in demand, and supply our needs until the year 2000, but at great economic and some environmental expense. Even in the next ten years it will cost us $100 billion to supply our domestic needs. At present, energy development costs represent 3 per cent of our GNP. The future cost will represent double this figure, or 6 per cent of GNP, leaving less for housing, education and social development. It is obvious, therefore, that a conservation program has become absolutely imperative.

Our conservation program will reduce the rate of resource production and the volume of oil imports. We know that we will have a gap or hiatus in our own capacity with respect to oil and gas production in the early 1980s. That, as I say, is well known. Conservation measures will also reduce appreciably the insistent demand for capital and allow other needed developments. This program will allow our resources to last a great deal longer.

It is clear that conservation is synonymous with good management throughout the Canadian economy. It is said that if we can arrange for energy demand levels in 1990 to be 20 per cent below those projected in "An Energy Policy for Canada, Phase I," we shall effect savings equivalent to the cost of 12 tar sands plants, or over $12 billion. This can be accomplished by a 1 per cent reduction in our annual energy demand growth rate. I suggest that the figures I have mentioned merit consideration. It seems impractical to effect conservation by letting energy prices rise formidably, at will. Still, we know that in years to come we shall be forced to pay higher energy prices. We do not want to force our people to conserve merely by making them pay higher prices immediately.

The price freeze on energy has given us time to adapt to a new ethic in conservation, and to develop phased increases in costs. The government has developed a five-phase program, about which the parliamentary secretary spoke. It will divide responsibility between the four categories of user: households, manufacturers of plastics and fertilizers, industry in general, and governments federal, provincial, municipal, etc. Each user in these four categories accounts for 25 per cent of our total energy consumption.

Let me say a word about each phase of the program. Phase one is the in-house, federal government conservation program. The federal government itself is a significant user of energy and is making its contribution by saving and setting an example. It is revising its guidelines regarding the heating, lighting and cooling of government buildings. I know some hon. members are shocked to see lights left burning all night in some government buildings. You cannot switch off those lights as such buildings were planned and built long before an energy shortage was envisaged. The government's new code will deal with the efficiency of steam plants, and there will be some building changes. In addition, the government will use smaller automobiles and impose a 55 miles an hour speed limit on its own cars. It will increase the use of recycled paper. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that conservation methods practiced in one building have already saved us $100,000.

Under phase two, consultations are being held on a continuing basis with provincial governments, industry and labour. They are all being encouraged to institute conservation programs of their own. Provinces are being asked to reduce highway speed limits and revise gas and electric utility rate structures, to favour lower consumption. Last April we met with industrial leaders and urged each firm to apply individual conservation programs. I think they are trying to do this. Under phase three, a program of advertising was instituted in daily and weekly newspapers, radio and television, as well as in school brochures and booklets.

Phase four involves energy conservation measures consistent with elimination of waste and promotion of energy efficiency throughout the economy. This is to be done by imposing certain standards and regulations, tagging appliances with hints for efficiency and bringing in better insulation standards which were adopted by CMHC. It is proposed to take the tax off insulating materials; I do not think this has been implemented so far. In addition, I believe there is under way in the Department of Public Works a program involving energy systems analysis, or computer programs regarding federal public buildings. In addition, phase four envisages a program of consumer information on standards, an attempt to change certain standards and the introduction of certain tax measures.

We are studying questions like railway efficiency vis-à-vis the use of energy. Actually, the studies were given very wide terms of reference. As I say, we are studying the efficient use of energy in connection with freight rates and, as I mentioned just now, the use of recycling and packaging, the training of inspectors, and recommendations for use of returnable beverage containers. Provincial governments and municipalities were to deal with outdoor lighting, licence fees, speed limits, etc. They were admonished to institute programs in this regard as soon as possible.

I now come to phase five. This is a program stretching far into the future. Society, since the industrial revolution, has been based on production and consumption. It will be our task to change that emphasis and to emphasize services. There is now to be a premium on quality, not quantity. A change is required from raw competition to sharing, even to compassion. This will be the new emphasis. We must all change our allegiance and become a conserver society. This will mean that our new economic realities will dictate not only new domestic policies, but new international policy. The energy difficulties we face in Canada are not insurmountable, but solutions will require efforts on the part of all Canadians in the realms of cooperation, conservation and elimination of waste.

● (1710)

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, it should be clear to us now that Canada will not be able to float, unscathed and undisturbed, above the energy crisis of today and of the future. Like the other industrialized nations of the western world, we are on a collision course with the hard truth that we must import energy to drive our cars, run our industry, heat our homes and generally continue to sustain a lifestyle to which we have become accustomed. This year Canada will be a net importer of oil to the extent of approximately 100,000 barrels a day. It is a hard fact that Canada will not be able to satisfy domestic requirements with domestic production even when in 1981 the tap to the United States is effectively turned off.

Assuming the National Energy Board's reported recommendations that the export quota be reduced to 500,000 barrels a day from 750,000 barrels a day, the deficit of the oil subsidization program will be about $400 million. There should be no doubt that for the future Canada's balance of payments position will be gravely affected by increased oil imports required to satisfy an ever-burgeoning demand—a situation which will be gravely exacerbated by our inability to sustain any substantial balance of exports to our neighbour to the south.

Canada's increasing demands for energy show no sign of abating. Indeed, in 1974 Canada's consumption of energy rose by almost 8 per cent, compared to a fall of 2.8 per cent in United States consumption and 1.8 per cent in western European consumption. Canadians are also among the least efficient users of energy in the world. We rank second only to the United States in the consumption of energy per capita. In addition, statistics show that Canada requires more energy to produce $1 of GNP—national income—than any other major industrialized nation in the world.

We use almost twice as much energy per capita as Sweden, whose northerly location gives her a climate similar to our own in many areas. My colleagues have already, and will continue to do so, commented on this government's feeble response to the conservation problem and I do not intend to dwell further on that aspect of today's topic. Instead, I think it is important that we question what this government is doing to ensure that exploration for more needed resources is encouraged: in short, the problem of security of supply. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the response to that question thus far has been negative.

The fact of the matter is that the government has discouraged exploration through its regressive tax regime, its failure to put in place ground rules for frontier exploration, and its unsettled policies and ad hockery in other areas, all of which have served only to discourage risk-taking and resource development investment in this country. To illustrate these points, Mr. Speaker, I need only point to the June 23 budget which retained the most regressive measures of the budgets of May and November, 1974, namely, the denial of a deduction from income of provincial royalties, mining taxes and similar charges, the implementation of the earned depletion scheme and the 30 per cent declining balance limitation in respect of exploration and development expenses.

I think it is important to elaborate to some extent on what the denial of a deduction from income of provincial royalties, mining taxes and similar charges, really means to the industry. In layman's terms, it disallows as an expense to oil, gas and other mineral producers every penny of the stiff royalties and their equivalents being taken by the provinces. This double-taxation measure levies income taxes on resource companies for money they do not receive. It drains away a sizeable part of the cash flow left to Alberta producers after provincial royalties, and leaves British Columbia and Saskatchewan producers in an even worse position than before the OPEC price boosts.

Alberta has wisely reacted with moves that effectively reduce its royalties, giving back to producers the provincial share of the federal levy of income tax on royalties while providing expanded incentives to encourage new exploration and development in that province. British Columbia and Saskatchewan have made minor concessions but continue to be far too greedy to attract additional risk capital, and indeed the latest initiative by the NDP government of my province of Saskatchewan, in relation to the potash industry, effectively forecloses any significant resource or industrial investment from the private sector for the foreseeable future.

Restricted production and the provincial and federal royalties and tax levies have reduced the tax flow of Canada's producers by hundreds of millions of dollars this year, thus restricting the availability of capital for exploration and development. With the investor climate so bleak, reinvested and new dollars are falling far short of our needs if Canada's energy security is to be achieved. The oil and gas industry badly needs an increase in its net take after royalties and taxes to fulfil its task of replacing and expanding known reserves. Existing policies indicate more than anything else that this government is more interested in wrangling with the provinces for bigger pieces of the resources' pie than it is in providing an atmosphere of economic stability and profitability for this very important industry.

Much has been written and said about the tax measures foisted upon the extractive industries in Canada, the petroleum industry in particular, and the failure to achieve a sensible and lasting policy may well do irreparable damage to this vital segment of the Canadian economy. As stated by the then federal minister of finance:

> The over-all Canadian tax policy must have regard for the position of the resource industries in terms of international competition and in terms of the financial resources they require to bring forward the supplies needed in the years ahead.

I concede, Mr. Speaker, that the answers are not easy, but it does seem clear that both the petroleum and mining industries are being overtaxed. Within the short space of three years the resource corporations of Canada have moved from the lowest to the highest taxed segment of industry and appear to be the victims of the worst federal-provincial squabble over tax revenues in many years. The problem is a deepseated one which will require a change in outlook on the part of all concerned and a determination to do what is best for Canada, rather than squabbling like little boys.

Apart from the question of royalty or tax rates imposed by the provinces, the problems of the extractive industries have been complicated by the decision of the federal government to disallow all such payments in computing income for federal income tax purposes. Such charges, in moderation, are a proper deduction for the extractive industries as they are, in effect, part of the cost of acquiring the raw resources. As such, they are no different than the cost of goods to a retailer or the cost of raw material to a manufacturer.

The only discernible difference is that the amounts are paid, not to individuals or corporations who would be taxable upon the receipts but to provincial governments which are not taxable. This was not a problem in the past when royalty or tax rates were seen as a reasonable commercial charge for the extraction and consumption of non-renewable resources. It is a problem when the charge ceases to be a commercial levy and becomes an income tax, in effect, upon profits. While one can sympathize with Ottawa's predicament, it nevertheless seems that a complete disallowance of all payments and the like which find their way into the provincial treasuries is wrong in principle. It is wrong because a deduction would be allowed if the payment were made to private enterprise. It is wrong because the cost of supplies is a proper deduction from income. The fact that the resources are owned by the provinces does not justify a different treatment except to the extent that the provinces are playing games.

The provinces themselves are also wrong in the sense that they have attempted to collect an income tax from both the industry and the federal government in a disguised form and, in some cases, seem intent upon nationalizing the industry. However, one cannot help but wonder why, with the benefit of historical and extraterritorial data, a mechanism could not have been developed whereby provincial taxes and royalties, including such stratagems as payments in kind or sales at less than market value, would be allowed as a deductible expense for federal income tax purposes to the extent that they did not exceed certain limits. While some study would have to be undertaken, it does not seem unreasonable to suggest that a limit based upon the market value of production, or the profit therefrom, would not be too difficult to develop. After all, some resources are privately owned and commercial royalty or profit-sharing agreements do exist.

● (1720)

Other countries have shared the same experiences or problems and it should not be too difficult to develop an acceptable formula with regard to past practice in Canada and what is sensible in terms of current conditions. Such an approach would have been a sensible compromise, would have allowed the provinces a reasonable return for the extraction of non-renewable resources, and would have allowed the industry sufficient room to get on with its job. It is to be hoped that the provinces will now re-examine their taxation and royalty policies with a view to ensuring that all our resource industries can remain economically viable and produce benefits for all. It may be a tall order, but failure to do so could be disastrous to the Canadian economy.

It is clear that the measures contained in the June budget were designed primarily to force the provinces to back down on their royalty demands and allow the federal government to appropriate a bigger share of revenues from resources income. But, Mr. Speaker, because the government is so anxious to stick its finger into the pie, the chef has cut back on pie production. Overtaxation, lack of ground rules for exploration north of the sixtieth parallel, and ad hockery in policy-making generally has created a milieu in which risk-takers will simply decline to undertake necessary risks. The western Canadian drilling industry will be hard pressed to reach even the level of work achieved in 1974. The number of wells completed during the first nine months of this year was almost 5 per cent below the same period in 1974, and, with continuing emphasis on shallow gas plays, footage was down 9.4 per cent. The tally for 1975 is expected to be only 3,800 wells and 12.9 million feet of hole, compared to 4,070 wells and 13.7 million feet of hole last year.

Recent statistics indicate a total of 2,849 exploratory and development wells were completed in western Canada, including all areas north of the sixtieth parallel, in the first three quarters of 1975, for a decrease of 138 from the first three quarters of 1974, while footage was more than one million feet to 9.6 million feet. The disappointing decrease in activity was reflected in the average rig count, which fell to 127 units for the nine months—a drop of 18 per cent from last year. This represents a utilization rate of only 46.7 per cent of the 272 rigs available for work. The number of rigs working in eastern Canada—Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and offshore—averaged three, compared to four last year.

The statistics speak for themselves. Both development drilling and wildcat drilling activity is substantially reduced from last year. In short, Mr. Speaker, thanks in large part to the policies of the federal government, Canada has substantially less exploration for desperately needed sources of energy at a time when substantially increased activity is required. The task of developing new energy resources deserves, and should be given, the highest priority by the federal government and appropriate policies and regulations put in place to ensure that the necessary capital will be available and the necessary exploration and development work carried out as rationally and expeditiously as possible.

As indicated many times by various sources, between now and 1985 the petroleum industry in Canada will have to spend some $50 billion to find and develop new resources and to install necessary transportation systems. Additional billions will have to be spent on the downstream side to expand refining capacity and product distribution systems. Where is this money to come from? Well, Mr. Speaker, it will have to come from several sources, including existing companies' internal cash flow, the attraction of investment and cash flows from other non-petroleum industry companies and from a multitude of private investors both within and outside Canada. This magnitude of investment, however, is contingent on a financially healthy petroleum and natural gas industry and the recognition by governments of the exceptionally long lead times and extremely high risks involved in this industry. Co-operation, rather than confrontation, with the industry and the provinces is required.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin)—Industry—Footwear—Request for probing of imports; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—Date of decision on bill to implement recommendations of committee on war prisoners' and widows' pensions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO CARRY OUT EFFECTIVE ENERGY RESOURCE CONSERVATION PROGRAM

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillies:

That this House regrets the government's failure to carry out an effective energy resource conservation program and, in particular, calls upon the government to answer the criticism by the International Energy Agency that "there appears to be a substantial gap between principle and practice . . . that the (Canadian) cabinet appears to have accepted the goal of conservation without recognizing the need to implement the goal with specific actions."

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Speaker, other areas of the world are competing for development dollars and there is every evidence that Canadian technical expertise and personnel are being lured away by greener pastures in the United States and elsewhere. I call upon the government to encourage, rather than discourage, exploration and provide a suitable operating environment within which the industry can perform its function. If this is not done, the people of Canada will be the losers.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) for bringing this motion to the attention of the House and to the country generally. There is no question that all Canadians need to be more aware of the energy situation and of the options open to us. Conservation is unquestionably a major aspect of these issues. Let me hasten to add that I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) who pointed out that the motion before us is too limited. Conservation is only one aspect of the multivariable energy program.

To put conservation in perspective I should like to say a few words about the total energy program. In the short term there is little doubt no time exists for research and development to be done. We shall be obliged to use existing materials, gas and oil, along with other technology which is readily available. I refer to nuclear fission, the CANDU reactor. Its technology is available; it is a matter of capital. Coal is the other source of energy in the short term. It is readily available and the economics are favourable here. We have the technology to convert coal into coke, a by-product of the steel industry, and into electricity through thermal plants. The difficulty here is that of mining the coal and transporting it to the marketplace—again a matter of economics.

In the medium term, when we lose self-sufficiency in oil supplies we shall be turning to the tar sands and frontier sources such as the Arctic, offshore supplies, and so on, in an economic framework substantially different from that which exists today.

● (1730)

In the long term, and I mean 25 years to the year 2000, we will see either solar energy or fusion energy being harnessed, and we should be backing both those areas now to make sure we have those answers in 25 years.

The other two programs are really stop-gap measures to buy us time and long-term answers through either solar or fusion energy techniques. The other novel techniques mentioned in the Science Council's report on Canada's energy opportunities, which was published last March, really will not make a major contribution to our energy requirements, whether they be bio-mass, geothermal, tidal, or power from wind or fuel cells. It is really a red herring to give them undue precedence in our order of priorities.

In buying time for long-term solutions there is no question that conservation is a major ingredient, but it is only one factor in the over-all problem of energy research and development across the whole area I have outlined.

It was a great disappointment when I saw in last June's budget that $42 million had been cut from the energy research and development program. I can understand the reason for this, with the major problem facing us today being one of inflation and the great clamour from the public to cut back on government spending. There is no question but that in the short-term we have some problems to face in the inflation era which are going to affect our energy research and development programs. I am not happy with that, but I understand it. I feel there is no question at all but that we must lick inflation and lick it now, because any money being spent on or earmarked for energy research and development will have little effect as inflation eats into its value.

So in the short term we see the programs not going as fast as we would like or as fast as we deem necessary. I think we will see in the next budget, coming up next spring, a real blood bath as far as restrictions on and cutbacks to government spending are concerned. The public is asking for them and the public is going to get them, but the public is going to be unhappy about this as the public was unhappy about the ten cents excise tax on gasoline last summer. However, as I told my constituents then, that is only the first step. There are many more steps as we slowly edge our way up to higher energy costs in the future. I have told them not to scream about the fact that they are going to need more money to pay for higher gasoline costs. That is not the message.

The message is that if people are going to continue wasting energy as they have been doing, they will have to pay more for it. If they do not want to pay more money for energy then they had better conserve in their utilization of energy, whether it be by driving at slower speeds, driving automobiles with more efficient engines, or travelling less mileage. The option is theirs and the message is clear. They will have to conserve on the use of energy. The time of cheap energy has gone, and we are moving into an era of more expensive energy.

It is this whole change in attitude that has to come in respect of energy use in Canada. When we were told on Thanksgiving Day that our lifestyles are going to be wrenched, this is the translation of that phrase into real direction. We have to use less energy, or face the consequences.

I feel this is not in the direction of government intervention by legislation, or by interference in the private sector, but rather a program of using the tools of the free enterprise system. These are the ones we should use in the supply and demand picture. They are the economic tools that were mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton).

I disagree strongly with the comments of the hon. member for Don Valley that the government has done nothing. There are several things that have been done. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) suggested that we should use taxation further to encourage people to use smaller cars in the transportation sector. That is exactly what has been done with the ten cents excise tax on gasoline. It was purposely meant to do that; that is, discourage the use of gasoline. Industry was exempt from this taxation.

An hon. Member: It was meant to increase revenue.

Mr. Maine: It increases revenue to pay the bills for a one-price oil system in Canada. This system is intended to buffer the shock of higher priced energy we will be faced with in the future. The Liberal government has tried to ease us rather than shock us into this precipitous ascent in the price that other nations in the world have faced, as well as the precipitous ascent in price resulting from inflation.

I think it is a reasonable philosophy to adjust our economy slowly rather than wrench it overnight as was done in the case of nations that had to go to oil prices on a world scale immediately. So I say that the ten cents excise was a first step, but there will be more steps as we go to commodity prices for energy.

Electricity is going to be the key. The price of natural gas has already started to rise, and oil prices have gone up and are going up higher in the future. We will soon have a commodity situation in which there will be no artificial economic incentives to use one form of energy as against another. This will depend on a matter of geography rather than economics, and this will dictate the source of energy being used. The gas and oil companies which are screaming about what is being done in this regard had better realize the need for us in the long term to go to a situation where we are not providing artificial incentives in the use of one form of energy over another.

In respect of the matter of the government having done something about this, I should like to mention the Science Council's report on energy use that came out last March, its report on energy conservation that came out last July, and more recently, within the last few weeks, the council's publication called "Conserver Society/Notes". Let me quote one paragraph from that report, which shows not only the concern of the Science Council in its attempt to advise Canadians across the country but the fact that this is not just the most recent effort of the council. The paragraph states:

The Conserver Society was a notion that originated with the Science Council of Canada and was set down in our 1973 Report on National Resources Policy. We are proud of its authorship and are ready to argue its merit. It is not a concept of futurology and it is not "zero growth". Rather it embodies the central principle that Canadians must become more responsible than we are now about the use and conservation of our resources. We recognize that many critical materials are finite in supply and we seriously question the continuation of unrestricted consumption of them.

Further, as proponents of the Conserver Society, we appreciate that decisions so frequently made today in pursuit of short-term goals may incur serious, and perhaps unacceptable, long-term social costs which should be analyzed before they are accepted.

In our opinion, these views are practical, down-to-earth and relevant.

I feel that we can aptly demonstrate that something is being done. It may be slow, but all things of government are slow in this democratic process of which we are so proud. There is more to be done, and one of the things is to get the Canadian public to appreciate the changes that have to be made. For that reason I am very grateful for this debate today in that it enables us to do just that.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased to participate in a debate that has energy as the key point, and I am pleased with the contributions made by hon. members on all sides of the House. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) is to be congratulated for moving this motion and for the kind of contribution he has made, thus setting the standard for the debate as exemplified by the speeches which have already been made.

Coming from the Maritime provinces I am pleased with this opportunity of speaking because I come from one of the areas in Canada where the energy resources of the nation are critical to the people not only today but in the days ahead.

All governments have endeavoured to react to the world situation as far as industry is concerned. Governments here and in many other areas in the world have not been able to react in the way we anticipated. As the last speaker suggested, this may be because this is a democratic country in which governments move much slower than we would hope, and certainly much slower than the governments of other countries involved, such as Russia, China, and others on this globe.

From an Atlantic provinces' point of view I must say it is absolutely essential that we obtain guarantees from the government that the artificial economic disparities that exist today are not going to worsen. Our experience has shown that this results in a much heavier burden being placed on the business community, particularly because of the higher cost energy we have today.

● (1740)

I think members of parliament should assume that the people are as lethargic in many ways as governments appear to be, and should set an example by telling the people we realize there are very complicated and difficult days ahead so far as energy resource development is concerned, and that we are endeavouring in whatever way we can to react to this in an effort to put in motion those schemes which will give a greater assurance to the people of the areas that will be affected by the high cost energy syndrome that exists in the world that they will be provided with energy in all forms required, at a cost which will allow the industries which exist to be attracted to the areas of regional disparity in a continuous way, so that we do not lose the forward momentum that has been developing recently to overcome some of our problems.

I should like to talk about two things in this regard. One relates to a national power grid. The second relates to the development of power from the Bay of Fundy tides. This is not something new or different. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) shakes his head. I am sure it is not because he does not agree with me. In his career he has been a strong supporter of Fundy tidal power.

I am determined to bring once again before this House the potential that is available from the tides of Fundy. I think it is very important for us to look at one of the many problems which face this nation so far as the conservation of energy is concerned and in guaranteeing to people in all parts of this nation that they will have access to resources which may be available only in some areas of the nation. In this regard I am speaking about a national power grid.

I wish to pay tribute to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who a long time ago, in 1959, made a speech in Kitimat, British Columbia, in which he put forward the guidelines that he believed should be followed to provide a national power grid. He gave the responsibility to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) at that time to initiate discussions with the various governments in the country so that we might develop a national power grid. At that same time the then Prime Minister and that minister put into place an agreement with the Maritime provinces that produced an inter-connecting grid in that part of Canada which is of inestimable value so far as the power users of that area are concerned.

It is pleasing to note that the present government is now moving forward on that particular inter-connection so that it might be connected to Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Labrador.

An hon. Member: It is about time.

Mr. Coates: Yes, I would have to agree that it is about time, but I am not arguing about things that are happening now. I am pleased that they are happening. I say thank God this is happening. This is vitally important to the Atlantic provinces. I would have liked to have seen it happen sooner.

I note that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Foster) not too long ago made a speech somewhere in this country which I was pleased to read, in which he spoke of a national power grid and the things that would have to be done so that it could come about. I should like to say to him I am pleased to see that he and members of his department have finally dusted off a great deal of the work done by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain to bring about a national power grid.

I must admit that this was not at that time as exciting a venture to some provinces, especially Ontario and Quebec, as it is today when they see a different situation than that which confronted them in 1963. I accept the fact that sometimes governments can move only as fast as the partners with whom they are involved. I know the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain had problems in this regard concerning the package at that time. However, I reiterate that I am glad to see that the government is finally moving in a direction that will assist materially in the conservation and provision of energy as well as in its movement from one part of the country to another.

Now I should like to turn to the matter of Fundy tidal power and the most recent report that has been produced. I believe this report was produced in 1974. It recommended a number of things. I must say I am pleased that my leader, when the first report was undertaken in 1969, was a partner to the undertaking as the premier of the Province of Nova Scotia. That report which came down in 1969 was called a review board report. Since then it has been updated by the review board, and I hope it will be further updated by the report which I understand now has been signed and which I hope is being pursued with a degree of vigour that was not evident between September, 1974, and recently when the agreement was signed.

I must say I was shocked because the information given to me in the House of Commons by the then minister of energy, mines and resources, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), was not in keeping with the information presented to me by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), who happens to be the minister from Nova Scotia, and whom I asked whether certain things would be set in motion in relation to some of the recommendations contained in the September, 1974, review board report. I was told in the house of Commons that progress was being made on the new study that was being recommended, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs told me that the agreement had not even been signed for the initiation of the new study about which I had written the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

There is no way anyone can tell me there was not a lot of double talk in what I, as a member of parliament from the Maritime provinces, which are desperately interested in seeing this further study undertaken, received from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Secretary of State for External Affairs who in effect indicated that there was not even an agreement signed among the participating partners. That is not the way in which we will get things done in this country, and if the government is condemned for the lack of seriousness which it displays about the energy crisis which exists in this country it will be condemned for the sort of thing that was happening to me and to the people in the Atlantic provinces who were being led astray by the statements made in the House of Commons. It is a shocking thing that upsets the hon. member for Don Valley and every other member of the House who is seriously concerned about this energy crisis and about our potential energy resources which are not being tapped and realistically investigated, appraised, and explored so that Canadians can be assured that they will have the energy required.

● (1750)

Let me give you an example of the frustration that develops when one talks to members of the government in an endeavour to see something come about that is vitally important to the future of the Atlantic provinces. I have here a report entitled, "Bay of Fundy Tidal Power Review Board—Preliminary Reassessment of Feasibility of Tidal Power Development in the Bay of Fundy", which was issued in September of 1974. It is a big title, and the problem in getting the report under way was as big. As page nine of the report the following is stated:

[Mr. Coates.]

> Consideration will be given to the possibility of developing smaller capacity sites whose output could be absorbed in the Maritime systems, either in the raw or retimed energy form.

What that means is that the government could move forward on smaller projects at this time, and I assume that the smaller projects we are taking about would be in Shepody Bay and Cumberland Bay basin as compared with Minas Basin, which would be a much bigger undertaking and which presents many more problems associated with the harnessing of power in that area. The report goes on to state:

> As well, large capacity sites, whose output would primarily have to be transmitted, at least initially . . . will be examined.

It is on reading page 13 of the report that I discovered what was really happening so far as Fundy tidal power is concerned. I wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs because it was my belief that the proposal contained in subsection (i) of section 7 of the report on page 13 should be carried out in my constituency. The proposal contained in subsection (i) states as follows:

> The Review Board suggests that the studies be contracted and that a project manager under the direction of a management group would undertake co-ordination and control of the activities of the study contractors, integrate the results of the separate studies and prepare the necessary reports. The estimated cost of staffing the small office envisaged is of the order of $300,000 for the two-year period.

It was my belief that we had located at Amherst an organization that can do the work that is being proposed in this recommendation. It is called the Resource Management Service and it is operated under the aegis of the Council of Maritime Premiers. Formerly it was operated by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and prior to that it was under ARDA, and even prior to that under the MMRA.

That particular organization has tremendous facilities. It is financed and operated by the three provincial governments. It could put forward the data that is required to produce the requirements suggested in this report as being necessary before a final decision is made on the development of power from the tides of Fundy. I believe that if the office were set up at Amherst there would be a great deal of expediency provided to the government if it were really interested in getting an answer to the questions that were being asked in the report.

That was when I wrote the minister to ask if he would meet a delegation, or assist me in having a meeting with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources so that he could meet a delegation from that community to point out to him what was available in this facility in the town of Amherst. What happened? The minister wrote me back, not only not assisting me to secure such a meeting but saying that I was a little premature because there had not even been an agreement signed, after the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had for months been answering questions in the House that things were proceeding favourably.

That is the kind of double talk that people in the Altantic provinces hate to hear, because they discover that the government at times is not really serious about the energy problems facing the country and that people will be saddled with the same problems next year and the year after which they are saddled with now because of lethargy toward and disinterest in Atlantic Canada, of which we accuse the government so often. Only if we get the country on the rails and get the energy problems on the way to a solution can we hope to overcome the problems we face today. I hope that this debate will help to spur the government on to produce some of the resources in our country so we will know tomorrow that things are a hell of a lot better than they are today.

Mr. Peters: May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I believe this is one of the better debates we have had on opposition days, and I think the House owes a great deal of thanks to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) for having introduced the subject. I am not too impressed with government representatives who have indicated that the government has done a considerable amount in the field of conservation. That does not appear to be the fact. It is generally understood by most people who have studied the problem of energy that if conservation is not embarked upon we may be in serious difficulty.

I had the opportunity earlier this afternoon of talking to two gentlemen from the city of London who indicated that things were pretty dull in here and that this is a pretty dull debate. That was their impression, and I think it is the impression of this country as well. They asked me what the debate was about; I explained it to them, and they said there should be more interest in this subject. However, they listened for some while and did not find the subject to be of interest.

The fact is that we in this House are not sure whether there is a shortage of petroleum and fossil fuels as an energy source. A few years ago companies were indicating that we would have gas and oil for the next 100 or 200 years, and that there were large reserves, particularly gas reserves. Yet very shortly after that those same companies indicated that a shortage had developed in Canada, and that a shortage was developing around the world. No matter what we in this House think about it, the general public in Canada does not believe there is an energy shortage. Canadians believe that they have been hoodwinked by the oil companies and that the oil companies have decided to take it easy with regard to producing fossil fuel for our energy requirements because they believe "the seven sisters" have time to wait and, if they wait, they will receive a bigger return on their investment.

I wonder, and I am sure other members wonder, if we in this House really have the ability to ascertain whether there is a shortage of fuel and if there is, what the timetable may be and what we can do about it. Every time I read a report of the Energy Board I find that it is not the report of the Energy Board—it is the suggestions made by the oil companies which tell the board what our potential is, what our long term and short term forecasts may be. The Energy Board does not seem to have the ability to look at those figures and ascertain whether they are correct or just ballpark figures. For that reason the general public in Canada does not believe there is an energy shortage. As long as the public does not believe there is an energy shortage it will not take the subject very seriously. The government does not take it very seriously either. It has established an energy conservation board, but last year the budget provided it with only $1,300,000. Most of that money went into advertising.

We heard the minister make such silly statements as, "Pull down the blinds to keep the house warm; put on a sweater; and drive your automobile at a slower speed." If there really is an energy shortage then some of the things which have been suggested today should be given top priority. I am not sure there is a shortage, but if there is, and if we do not do anything about conservation on a long term basis are we not fiddling while Rome burns? Are we not being irresponsible by not ascertaining for ourselves whether there is in fact an energy shortage or whether we are being hoodwinked by the energy experts. Who in this country are the big seven oil companies?

I listened with a great deal of attention and interest to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) outline some of the alternative sources of energy we should be investigating, and it almost sounded like Buck Rogers in a Science fiction novel. Those other sources of energy have been investigated and developed to a considerable degree.

I am sure that without much effort most of the people in this country could find for themselves an alternative source of energy which would allow them to conserve probably 50 per cent of the energy they are now consuming. If people will do this, then it behooves corporations like Ontario Hydro to get off the boob tube, to start conserving, and to provide methods of conservation rather than advertising the use of more energy for this reason or that.

All energy suppliers are advertising. Every day oil companies are advertising their wares, çompeting with other companies which supply exactly the same grade of oil or gasoline. They are still being allowed to expand very rapidly the number of outlets each company has, rather than making a decision that one community will be served by one company and another community served by another company. There is no need for duplication. In effect, much of the capital costs they have been putting into real estate in the last ten years could be brought to an end, with resultant savings.

● (2010)

In reading the report, Madam Speaker, you no longer hear of the tertiary methods of reclaiming oil from our oil wells; you only read of the vast amount of money that would be necessary if we are to expand our industry into the undeveloped areas. Very little is said about the things that can be done to produce more oil from the fields we already have.

A great deal has been said about the tar sands and how valuable they may be in the future. We all know there is a large reserve there, and we also know it will take large amounts of money to develop the projects that are outlined in the projections that have been made to the end of the century. If it is not necessary to undertake these huge expenditures at the present time then we should not do so. I think it behooves the government to find out exactly what our reserves are and what our needs will be, rather than letting the industry make the decisions about the resources we have and what will be done with them.

It has been said that we have assisted in the development of smaller cars and have developed out tax structure from that end. I do not think it is that there is a greater saving on a small car than on a large car. In my province there is a tax concession if the car is American made, but there is no good small American car; they are inferior and the automobile companies made them that way—the Maverick was no good, the Pinto also, and the Firenza was no good. Every one of these cars was thrown together.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): You are losing votes.

Mr. Peters: I do not really care. If that is the way I have to get votes it really does not interest me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: I have always considered the voters who vote for me to be reasonable people. If they cannot tell a bad car from a good one then they will continue to buy bad cars and vote some other way—they may vote for my opposition.

It is a fact, and most hon. members will agree, that the three or four small cars developed in this country have been poor cars. They have been thrown together. Ford has a small car on the market, the Capri, but it is an imported car. I doubt if you could buy a Capri in Ontario and get the tax rebate. It is not an American car but an imported one. I do not think you will get the rebate on the Colt which comes from Japan, nor on the Mazda which the Ford company is importing as the Courier of its truck line. Many of these cars coming from Europe and Japan are well engineered and designed, and have high performance. They sell at a high price in this country, and in many ways are not competitive with the big American car. The reason, of course, is the currency of those countries in relation to ours.

I strongly urge the government not to consider buying the Bobcat just because it is an American car. It should buy it simply because it is a good car, not because it is an American car that has four cylinders. The government has not given any assistance to the development of a small car in this country, yet a car with four cylinders will obviously use less gasoline than one with eight cylinders.

[Mr. Peters.]

When I studied internal combustion engines in technical school I learned there is a ratio determining the amount of air to the amount of gasoline which takes the form of combustion. This can be varied by compression ratios and temperature ratios, but you must have so much gasoline for the amount of air that goes into those cylinders. If there are eight cylinders they take twice as much as four cylinders.

I think it is foolish to expect the general public to believe we are serious about conservation when we have not done much about it. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain mentioned high, low, and peak periods. There is a very expensive project in my area which operates for a little over one hour each day in the peak period. The plant cost approximately $50 million and was built to supply power for just one hour a day. That seems a very expensive proposition.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A national grid.

Mr. Peters: I am all for a national grid. It seems foolish to allow the province of Quebec to look all over the world for some way of getting rid of the power that will be generated by the James Bay project when there will be a shortage of power in the Maritime provinces and Ontario. An exchange of power could readily be arranged if we had a national power grid. The hon. member who raised this point comes from a party that proposed a national grid when it was in power, but the matter has not been pursued.

Many projects could be undertaken, and I think the Canadian public would be willing to co-operate. But the government will fail in its conservation program, this country will fail in its conservation program and this country should fail in its conservation program if we do not get independent figures that will be respected by all people in Canada, both in industry and the general public. Unless we can provide those figures I think we are going to spend a lot more money on advertising, in putting out small booklets, on running an office without very much money to establish our position in conservation, when most people in Canada do not believe we have a shortage in most energy sources.

I should like to close with a point that I do not think has been mentioned today, that is, the problem of uranium. Uranium is an excellent source of energy. It will probably grow into a source that will produce perpetual power as the years go by. If plutonium can be handled in the right type of reactor it becomes a breeder and could produce tremendous amounts of power. If this is so we will have gone a long way to establishing perpetual power. But I suggest we are not at that stage, and that Canada should husband carefully its uranium industry.

● (2020)

We are doing with uranium what we did with oil four or five years ago when we listened to the oil companies. They told us we had unlimited supplies of oil, that we should sell it to the United States while it was useful and before it became obsolete as a fuel. We know what happened. Similarly I suggest that our uranium supplies are not unlimited and that most major sources in this country have been discovered. Therefore the government should not encourage the sale of CANDU reactors around the world, as they may cause some difficulty. At present we do not know how much our electrical power needs will increase and be met with the use of nuclear reactors. That being so, we should conserve our nuclear resources and not sell reactors.

Let the government husband our uranium, a resource which will play an ever increasing role during the next 20 years. If we sell CANDU reactors and the material to power them, we may find that history will repeat itself. We shall be unable to meet our own needs because we shall have sold our resource foolishly, without knowing how much is left for our own use.

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate in the debate on this important motion dealing with a subject which is of great importance at this time. Surely nothing is more important for the future of Canada than our being self-sufficient in energy and agricultural production. The government's recently tabled white paper on the restraint program dealt with future spending priorities and underlined energy production, agricultural production, and housing. The question of energy is given the high priority it rightly deserves. If we are to be self-sufficient in energy we must embark on a successful exploration and conservation program. Self-sufficiency will only come about if we are successful in both these areas in the years ahead.

To me conservation means the elimination of waste and increased efficiency of energy utilization. This is important because, as previous speakers suggested, a good 50 per cent of all energy we use is wasted. In other words, we effectively utilize only about 50 per cent of the energy we produce. This figure should be of fundamental concern. We shall use more energy, much of it electrical, generated by the use of oil, gas and coal, but the efficiency figure will continue to decrease as we use more and more highly refined energy. Therefore conservation measures are in the best interests of Canada and economically important.

Let me dwell for a moment on the economic aspects of energy production. First, not only will development of new types of energy be very expensive, delivery will also be a problem. For instance, it takes increasing amounts of energy merely to develop new energy resources. About 25 per cent of the Syncrude output will be absorbed by energy extraction processes. The Mackenzie Valley pipeline, if and when it is built, will use a considerable amount of energy merely for the movement of the gas throughput. Clearly, new energy resources will be less efficient than previously.

What can we do to meet the challenge? It is possible to reduce demand, perhaps between 15 per cent and 20 per cent below projections for the year 2000. If we do this we shall be able to reduce the size of the delivery system by two thirds of the size of the present delivery system. This, in turn, can have an important bearing on the investment the industry will need to make in the years ahead. If we can reduce projected demand increases each year even by 1 per cent, the savings will be substantial, in the order of $2 billion. This represents a large amount of capital investment saved.

We should consider the question of energy under two headings. First, we ought to establish the conservation ethic with the Canadian people. We must ask people to reduce their use of energy even though this may have some impact on their standard of living. We must convince them to reduce waste, perhaps to reduce the discretionary use of energy. Second, we must emphasize the more efficient utilization of energy. This will entail superior designs for buildings, cars, appliances, and better industrial processes. Conservation of this kind will he dependant on better engineering and technology, as designers will design products which will use energy more efficiently without interfering with the life style of people. Perhaps in this area the biggest savings are possible.

I think we ought to be concerned about use of non-renewable resources. Perhaps in the final analysis we need not be overly concerned about amounts of energy still available, as a great many energy resources are yet to be developed and delivered. But this is not the case with respect to many other non-renewable resources. About half the world's population lives in undeveloped countries containing many non-renewable resources which contribute greatly to our present high standard of living. We have seen a significant transfer of those non-renewable resources from the underdeveloped countries to that one fifth of the world's population living in industrialized countries.

We must consider two questions concerning use of energy. If we continue to use vast amounts at present rates, if we consume so much more per capita than others do in the world, for how long can we be assured of security of supply? The population of the world will increase. It is predicted that the populations of underdeveloped countries will increase significantly. These people entertain expectations of higher standards of living. To accomplish their ends they will need to use much more energy, and many more renewable resources than ever before. So as time goes on the problem, and its urgency of solution, will be compounded.

May I mention some specific areas of concern? I suppose most people are concerned about large increases in natural gas use, and I am speaking of natural gas as a highly refined form of energy. Many realize that natural gas for long been underpriced relative to the price of other forms of energy. Natural gas has been environmentally acceptable; indeed, a good percentage of industries have switched to natural gas, after using coal, bunker C oil or some other residual oil, in answer to environmental pressures put on them. Consequently there have been a pronounced shift in the last few years in the energy business. The question is, should we allow highly refined forms of energy like natural gas to be used in the generating of electricity, or under heavy boilers?

It seems to me that if we are concerned about the future of our economy and energy supplies, and want to maintain our competitive advantage in the world, we should consider the use of natural gas in the chemical industry, paint industry, or in connection with plastics. I think we ought to give this matter serious consideration. I have often wondered what really is the best approach. Should we be working toward an equalized pricing structure with other forms of energy, or some type of program that designates the use of natural gas, reserving it for certain types of industry where a lot of jobs are associated?

● (2030)

I wish to make a few comments about our industrial sector. The industrial sector in Canada uses well over one third of the energy produced and consumed in Canada. If I may say so, they use it about as inefficiently as any sector of our economy. We in this House often have debates on energy, building standards, the insulation of residential homes, and so on. In terms of the total construction across Canada, very few large industrial buildings contain any significant amount of insulation other than a minimal amount in the ceilings. Very few have a centralized exhaust system.

In most industrial buildings where there is an industrial process, involving a considerable amount of heat there is an extremely high exhaust rate. None of this heat is being reclaimed. Most plants that use a good deal of water or other liquids for cooling, dump that liquid into the drain without any attempt to recover energy.

In terms of the tremendous amount of energy going into our industrial sector, the possibility of reclaiming a good deal of this is very high. We might ask why this has never been approached before. The point made by a number of speakers today is that the economics have not been there before. The traditional practice is to build the cheapest building possible and to have a large number of exhaust locations through the ceiling or around the perimeter. The economics have perhaps not been there until now to collect the exhaust, and have a central exhaust where you can reclaim heat.

There has been another very important reason. I feel strongly that we should be taking more action in this area. Most people involved in the industrial sector will tell you that the availability and real reliability of heat claiming equipment is not high. Many are convinced it would make good enonomic sense to install heat reclaiming equipment for air or water. Those types of equipment are available in theory and some are available commercially.

Most people in the industrial sector are not convinced that if they install this equipment that it will operate trouble free or that it will approach the efficiency level it is designed to do.

We need to do a good deal of work and give a good deal of assistance to the industrial sector in the same way that we have in rural extension in the agricultural industry to ensure them that heat reclaiming equipment can be made to work. If necessary we should be involved in the development of it.

Many people have good ideas about energy conservation related to industry. However, they are reluctant to take on the whole project development cost themselves, most of all to install this equipment and not really know about the reliability. Perhaps this is a larger risk than they want to undertake by themselves.

Most of the industrial processes in this country are selected for labour input efficiency, the number of man hours per ton or per unit. Until recently, if at all, no consideration has been given to the amount of energy per ton or per unit of output. If you look at industrial processes they can vary 200 or 300 per cent, even from competitor to competitor.

[Mr. Milne.]

We are coming to the point where we should be giving industry some leadership and encouragement to do a good energy audit in their plants to determine in each of these industries and each of the processes the amount of energy actually being used. We should be publishing standards so that industrial people can compare their performance of a plant or a certain process to see whether it is efficient or inefficient.

The time has come to convince them that they should spend a good deal of money in terms of capital to upgrade their industrial processes to make them more energy efficient. It has been possible to do that for 20 years or more in order to make them more labour efficient. It is only at this point in time that we have had the opportunity to talk to them about being more energy efficient.

To demonstrate the savings that are possible, one need only look at the commercial sector. When I say the commercial sector I think of the larger office complexes and hotels, the towers which you find in the central part of most cities. Most of those buildings operate at between 25 and 30 per cent efficiency. It does not take a good deal of design or ability in the engineering field to raise that to 50 to 75 per cent. The biggest problem has been that many of the structures are built with the idea that they will be sold or rented and whoever eventually rents or buys the structures will pay the energy costs. Therefore the person designing and erecting the building has no interest in the energy efficiency of it. I suggest that is probably going to change. People selling or renting buildings will have to answer with regard to energy efficiency. This is a very significant cost for purchasers or renters to undertake.

I will give an example. In five minutes you could probably walk from here to buildings that are using 200,000 BTU per square foot per year. Using a simple ordinary heat reclaim, that figure could be reduced almost 50 per cent to 120,000 BTU per square foot per year. Some of the more advanced designs of office buildings around the centres of our cities use only about 60,000. A very realistic figure to reach is 75,000. That is about one third of the standard. This is only using heat reclaim, storage of chilled water, and engineering principles that are very well known. In fact in most buildings there is an improved comfort level and the productivity level of people in them is actually higher with these types of systems.

To date the problem has been to convince people to spend a good deal more money on their initial cost to receive this kind of energy saving over the life of the building. What we need is a very aggressive program to sell people on the concept that they have to spend money to save money in the capitalization of a building.

If you review the life of some of these buildings it is amazing to find that the initial capital cost of some of these towers only represents about one third of the cost of owning it over the life of the building.

Close to 50 per cent of the total cost of owning a building over its life is to purchase the energy, maintenance and operation within it. We are talking about almost half the cost. Most of the time when we are doing engineering or design work we are trying to meet a very low first cost, when in fact we are incurring a much larger cost over the life of the building. There are many things that can be done.

I am encouraged by the example of the federal government in some government buildings. This is no more than giving leadership in the operation of mechanical systems in terms of the ventilation, lighting schedules, and hot water heating. It has taken 12 to 15 per cent of the energy requirements per square foot per year out of those buildings. I am not at all convinced that those operational programs have gone nearly as far as they could or should. However, it does demonstrate what can be done.

I am greatly encouraged to see in the over all conservation program of the government that it intends to word closely with both the industrial and commercial sector in giving leadership in the engineering and design aspect of it, setting out good computer programs to be used by the consulting engineers and architects. It would thus be possible to devise for each and every building the best type of system in terms of first cost, owning cost, and the amount of energy it would use. Some of the newer office buildings use not much more than half the number of lights which were installed in similar buildings only five years ago, yet the lighting level may be 20 per cent higher. This illustrates what could be done.

● (2040)

Greater consideration might be given through our tax system to those installing energy conservation systems. Over the years a number of concessions have been made to envĭronmental cost and it seems we should be equally concerned about the promotion of energy-saving measures. I would like to see a fast write-off for people who instal equipment specifically designed to conserve energy. This would apply mainly to the commercial sector and to current activity, though in time the concession could be extended to cover the refurbishing of older buildings constructed at a time when we were not greatly concerned about saving energy. These are the buildings we ought to be doing something about now.

I also feel the government should play an important role in setting out design levels which manufacturers of domestic appliances such as air conditioners and similar appliances would have to meet. If one looks through the results of U.S. research in this field one finds that there is maybe as much as 100 per cent variation in the amount of energy used in the course of the performance of two outwardly similar machines. At present we require in Canada that all electrical products be approved by the Canadian Standards Association. Most Canadian manufacturers submit their designs to the association at this point of time, and though there might be some objection—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Milne: I appreciate the opportunity to continue, Madam Speaker. I shall take only another minute or two. I think there is a good case to be made for setting out specific design levels in connection with many of the appliances we use, and for requiring manufacturers to meet those standards covering the amount of energy their products use to perform any given task.

A lot has been said about mass transit, speed limits, and smaller, more efficient cars. I think we are very fortunate in Canada to have kept our railroads up over the years. I say this having regard to some of the problems faced by our neighbours to the south in terms of moving large quantities of materials. I believe it requires something like 670 btu's to move a ton on the railroad, about 2,800 on a truck, and about 42,000 on an airplane. So it seems to me a basic strategy would be to divert as much freight as possible from trucks to the railways.

It amazes me why more of the trucks I see on highway 401 do not move by piggy back on the railway. At times it is almost like watching a train of big tractor trailers moving along that highway. Then again, in the riding from which I come one sees perhaps 500 to 600 gravel trucks a day moving from the escarpment to the city. Since we are interested in preserving energy it would seem to me there is a good case for diverting some of this traffic to the railroads. I am encouraged to think that the electrification of the railroads is being seriously considered, a move which promises certain rewards from the angle of efficiency.

Another thing we should be working toward is better co-ordination between the energy conservation program of the federal government, the various provincial governments, some of the public utilities, and the engineers of the bigger companies. I believe we all share the same concern. We might be better off if there were a highly co-ordinated program; divide the responsibility and let each sector take a serious approach to it.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) to realize that there are not many members to whom we would agree to an extension of time. But he was being so constructive in his approach that, following the suggestions made from this side of the House and urged for so long, we felt it was time a speaker on the other side had a chance to put something constructive on the record.

The policies he was suggesting are in the main exhortative. I think something more persuasive is required, something in the nature of a fiscal inducement.

I rise in shame and extreme concern to enter the debate this evening because of the knowledge that Canada has been castigated by the international community in an international report for failing—and here I quote from our motion, which in turn quotes from the report—to give practical form to its pretentions in the field of energy conservation. Or, in the words of the report as appearing, "to have accepted the goal of conservation without recognizing the need to implement the goal with specific actions".

I am distressed to feel we need this evening to underline this shortcoming, yet it must be drawn to the attention of the Canadian people that this shortcoming does exist. I draw some comfort from the fact that it is the Canadian cabinet which is criticized in this fashion as appearing to have accepted a goal without following through. But the blame spreads, Canada is the loser, and for this reason I find it extraordinary that the speakers on the other side, the last speaker excepted, should try to apologize their way out of the position the government has taken.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) told us he was not sure whether there was an energy shortage now or not. That is not the point, Madam Speaker. We need conservation measures now and we are not getting them. In their absence, succeeding generations will vilify us. We are the guardians of our resources and we should hold them in trust for those who follow. We ought not to go down in history, as go down we will unless we change our ways, as profligate wasters of our nation's patrimony. It is a horrible thing to think that this generation will be looked upon in that way by generations to come.

As I say, we need a policy of energy conservation, and we need to consider alternate sources of energy. There is a wide choice, and many have been mentioned tonight. It may be worth while to list some of the non-renewable on the one hand and the renewables on the other. I do not think the list need be exhaustive, but there are at least ten that are worth mentioning.

● (2050)

On the non-renewable side there are, of course, hydrocarbons, liquid petroleum, gas, and coal. There is, of course, nuclear fuel, which has been mentioned on a number of occasions. On the renewable side those which are more or less indefinitely renewable—eternally is a pretty strong word—are thermal, and there is much thermal energy being wasted in Canada. There is tidal power. The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) mentioned that this afternoon. So we have tidal power, and I suggest possibly there is surf power which we have not yet exploited. On the west coast of Canada there are pounding surfs that beat up on our beaches. This is power that should be capable of being harnessed. There is also the generation of electricity from hydro, wind, energy from wood and energy from bio-mass of which we have heard, and solar energy.

Solar energy is rather interesting. We seem to be so close and yet so far from being able to capture and use solar energy. I was talking to someone in the energy field the other day and he produced an absolutely staggering thought for me. I think the figure he used was two days, but even if it were two weeks, he suggested the sun poured down on the earth in that time as much energy as we poor humans can produce in a whole year. Some of this energy is being used. It is being used by our plants and we consume it later in the form of food, but the vast portion of it is wasted. It even comes through the thickest clouds and reaches us in ways that we know not how to capture. We must turn to the development of ways of doing so.

There are probably other forms of energy that we should be taking advantage of, each of which has its own advantages to offer, and each of which has its own problems to be overcome. Each of these sources must be mastered if we are to survive and preserve for the generations to come those energy sources now available to us.

Let me speak briefly about research and development, that neglected child of this government. I understand that just a little more than $1 million per year is being devoted to research and development in this field by the government.

I am having a great deal of difficulty, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. There are a number of private debates going on which perhaps could be held at the sides behind the curtains, so that the Speaker could hear the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I would even enjoy the opportunity of hearing myself, but I was not even able to do that.

I had reached the point of research and development in my remarks. There is a great need for research funds to assist exploration in these areas of potential use to mankind in order to determine which ones have the most to offer Canada in our present dilemma.

Whatever my friend, the hon. member for Timiskaming may say, we are drawing down our reserves of energy by the extent to which we use them, and we will eventually run out. Those are the non-renewable resources. Coal also has much to offer. I think if we could convert some of the jaw energy that is being used tonight into some form of usable energy we might be able to illuminate the Lester Pearson Hall without having a bill to pay at the end of the month. Of course other base products are also available.

There is one particular area of research and development I should like to draw to your attention this evening. In an earlier debate I mentioned the Wally Wagon, the product of a group of students of the University of British Columbia about two or three years ago. It was in December, 1973. I mentioned it as an example of inspired engineering aimed at solving a problem that was before us. It is also an example of the failure of the government to do anything to help. Governments are elected to show leadership. This government is showing none in this area. It is hopelessly deficient, even more deficient than the funds it extends research and development.

The Wally Wagon was powered by liquified gas under pressure. This is very easily refueled. It was a small compact car which served a commuter purpose. It handled the difficulties of urban parking and it dealt with the aspects of pollution. It was only eight feet long, or about 100 inches, compared to the 200 or 250 inches of the brutes we see running around now, occupying space for parking, polluting our air, and guzzling our gas.

This vehicle, named after Walter Gage, President of the University of British Columbia, was entered in a competition in Detroit in 1972 or 1973 and it lead in all categories including efficiency, design, convenience, economy, and it almost was pollution-free. It won against 64 other entries.

This is a tribute to the youth of this country who, on their own initiative, worked out a design to meet the requirements of the present day. I have seen this car and it is a little gem. Do you know where it is today? It is sitting under wraps in an engineering building at the University of British Columbia. It could very easily have gone into production, but there were no funds to carry it forward. It had a couple of wrinkles they wanted to get out, but there were no funds for that. It was just put aside, and there it sits. I would like to offer to buy it. I would be very proud to bring it here and drive it back and forth in Ottawa to show what can be done. I would like to have one at home as well in Victoria, and I would be proud also to show what our young engineers can do. There was just the one model, and there it is under wraps.

It is interesting to note that a second experiment is being undertaken by that same faculty at the same university. This time the car is not to be powered by liquified gas but by electricity. They are working on a new type of power transmission from storage batteries, which produce direct current, powering the engine by alternating current. The batteries are recharged each night so that it will operate the following day without problem. It can travel at about 50 miles an hour.

This vehicle is not in somebody's mind, it is actually rolling along the boulevards at the University of British Columbia. Where did they get the funds for it? They did not get them from the government.

They put forward a proposal under the Habitat Program to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson). They said they would like $500,000 to get the thing going. You would never believe the answer they got. They were told this was piddling stuff—half a million; why did they not ask for something worth while? They were told the department did not consider a request for funds under a million. It was a modest demand—well, it was not modest, actually. Five hundred thousand dollars is not modest in my language. They felt they should keep it within reasonable limits.

Their request was rejected on the grounds that they had not asked for enough. I find this absolutely incredible. However, by the time they got around to asking for a million there were no funds left. Somebody else had sopped them up. All the while of course we are handing out something like $90 million, on such things as LIP grants, which could better be put into long-range thinking and research and development.

● (2100)

At the moment we are talking about research. Development comes later. But no; we have a large program for things of very short duration intended presumably to sop up some of the unemployment. Here, however, is a project which, if carried through, could enter the world field today at a time of need for energy conservation. It is a project involving a car that would be economically operable and cheap to produce. There is nothing to help these people get it going. The government simply is not serious.

The report that the international group came out with unfortunately is right. The government is not serious in its profession of support for research. It is not serious even in its profession of belief in conservation. I wish the words of the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe could be heard by his group. I hope he stands up in the caucus and says the same thing, because the government is not serious. I even except that exciting program on Boxing Day for which we are awaiting with baited breath. What is it? Is it Good King Wenceslaus coming out? I bet it is. The parliamentary secretary promised us this great feast on Boxing Day. I do not know whether I will bother to tune in to it because I believe what we need rather than a television program is a positive program in respect of research.

Development, of course, is the second phase. Why does the government not open up the fiscal road that would encourage development, leading to production, of one or other of the vehicles I mentioned, or some other energy conservation projects such as a new way to capture some of the energies we cannot yet manage? We have been talking about the wind. There is also solar energy. I know there is quite enough wind here and I would like to eliminate a lot of it that comes from the other side. But the government's tax policies are designed to discourage rather than encourage development.

This afternoon I heard that these people at the University of British Columbia are turning out to be a very disillusioned group. They have put their whole hearts into the production of these two vehicles of completely different concept, one of liquefied natural gas and the other of stored electricity. They are receiving no help and they wonder what the government is doing. I could tell them what it is doing—nothing.

The Canadian Patents Development Limited operation is a colossal failure. It was put together in order to help those who work at government laboratories so that if they should come up with some patentable operation they would be assisted in getting it patented, on the market and working. This is no good. It is not working.

What we need in this country is something more like what the British have introduced in the form of a national research development corporation, a corps of engineers to which people who have ideas could go, such as our boys from UBC, or someone who has some ideas in respect of solar energy or ways to harness the wind. We need this not only so that the idea or device will not be stolen but also so that the people concerned may obtain positive assistance in respect of further research in this area and, if the research pans out, further developmental assistance or development inducements in the way of capital investment in their particular enterprise.

We are getting none of this from the present government. I find it deplorable and shameful that we should have to underline the fact that we are remiss in this very important area, and are in our present dilemma where our normal recognized energy costs have soared beyond the reach of many people living on this planet. Yet we do nothing. We say, "We are all right, Joe". But what about the other man?

Energy Conservation

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I very much welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate this evening. I have listened very carefully to several wide ranging and informative speeches. Perhaps there are some other adjectives I will add in the course of my remarks this evening. In particular I enjoyed the contribution of the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne). I think the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe has made a specialty of the energy field and I know all members benefited from his contribution.

I also enjoyed very much the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). I think he touched on a number of very interesting points. I hope all members here had an opportunity to hear the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Foster), my parliamentary secretary, earlier this afternoon. If anyone was unfortunate enough to have missed his speech I very much hope he will read it tomorrow because I am sure all members would benefit from it.

One of the main points which I believe has come out in this debate is the importance all members attach to energy conservation. Let me say right from the outset that I share their views, their feelings, on the importance of energy conservation. The government shares their views and is convinced that energy conservation must play a very much larger part in our working lives. Indeed the reason my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Algoma East, led off the debate on the government side was that I was today in his constituency. I was talking to the people in the community of Elliot Lake, a community very much concerned with the supply side of our energy resources, although very much concerned also on the conservation side.

I do not think I can put it any better than by saying that we do have a growing gap, a supply-demand gap, which will get worse or widen before it starts to close. There are two essential ways to approach this. One is to increase our energy on the supply side. That is one reason why I was in Elliot Lake today. The other, of course, is to dampen down the increase on the demand side, which is the energy conservation argument.

In the course of my remarks today I note that we are wasting our scarce resources. More particularly we will be faced with soaring capital costs to provide the energy, some of it essential, but some of it we could save thereby saving on the capital cost.

The estimates I have seen indicate that in the next ten years we will require an expenditure of $110 billion to cover such capital investments as new pipelines, tar sands extraction plants, electrical generating stations, power lines, uranium and coal mine developments, and gas and oil wells. That amount of $110 billion in the next ten years is an incredibly large amount, representing roughly about $20,000 for each Canadian family over the next ten years. I think all members must ask themselves where will that money come from at a time when we have greater competition for the scarce capital resources of this country than ever before.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

● (2110)

What sort of sacrifices will we have to make for other essential services if we are forced to invest $110 billion for energy? Certainly something will have to go. Other essential services will not get their share, and I am talking about essential services such as public transportation, new factories, houses, or hospitals, and you could add many more to that list. When one considers the potential magnitude of such capital costs and future inflationary pressures—I want to emphasize inflationary pressures because I think there is a close tie between conservation measures and anti-inflationary measures—the value of energy conservation becomes clear.

If, for example, by 1985 we could cut back the annual growth in total energy consumption by 20 per cent below growth rates of the 1960's—thinking of growth rates of the 1960's as something over 5 per cent—which means down to around 4 per cent for the next ten years and then 3 per cent in the balance of the century, the next 15 years up to the year 2,000—still an increase each year—if we could cut it back we could save the equivalent of the output of 15 Syncrude plants costing approximately $2 billion each.

Those are the sort of magnitudes which we in the government and all of us as members of parliament are grappling with at present. It is not just something the government by itself can do something about; it is something which members on all sides of the House will have to do something about. We must get out and sell the importance of energy conservation to the Canadian people.

Mr. Baldwin: Tell the truth. Come clean with us.

Mr. Gillespie: Before we get too far in this debate it might be helpful if I were to put some numbers on the record. Some members of the opposition have suggested that in the IEA report of the OECD it was stated that Canada had had an increase in energy consumption last year when everybody else had a decrease. I would suggest to you that that is a rather selective choice of statistics, because I could refer hon. members to page 2 of the report in 1973-1974 which shows that the total primary energy in Canada increased by 5.5 per cent. The report points out that in 1974-75 the total primary energy declined 1.9 per cent. So I think it is totally false for any member of the opposition to indicate that we have not had some decline in our energy consumption in the past year.

Mr. Baldwin: I heard him make that report in Strasbourg—he was convincing.

Mr. Gillespie: It may be that the opposition members have been selective and chosen just the gasoline sector. If they have, they are right. It is quite right that the consumption of motor gasoline in Canada has increased in the last year, 1975 over 1974, by 4.6 per cent. But if you want to see this in balance we should add that our home heating oil consumption during the same period declined by 6.9 per cent.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Last winter was mild.

Mr. Gillespie: And electricity declined by 15.3 per cent.

I am not saying that the Canadian people can take much credit for this. What I am saying is that we have made a start in the direction of energy conservation. The total oil account, as I have indicated, is in the order of decline year over year of about 1.9 per cent.

A number of criticisms have been levelled in the debate today. There have been suggestions that the government has no program, that it has done nothing.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Gillespie: Hon. members will recognize that these are wild exaggerations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: They are a sort of rhetorical flourish for the House of Commons that are absolutely without substance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is a shameful exhibition.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Exhortations, that is all.

Mr. Gillespie: Several hon. members have suggested that the International Energy Authority has criticized Canada for an ineffective advertising campaign or because it had created an ineffective board in the energy conservation office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: I hear the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) opposite me say "right".

Mr. Baldwin: I never said a word.

Mr. Gillespie: It is on the record.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not say "right". If I had said anything at all, it would have been "wrong".

Mr. Gillespie: Let me tell you what the report in fact states.

Mr. Gillies: On page 10.

Mr. Gillespie: On page 9. This may come as a surprise to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) but the report states:

The Energy Conservation Office is clearly a force to be reckoned with. It conducts a public information program of great imagination and drive. Some of its productions could be studied with benefit by other IEA countries. It already has a number of considerable achievements to its credit. For example, it has been influential in securing a requirement for energy accounting to be included in any project involving federal money.

It does not seem to me that hon. members opposite have taken the time to read what the International Energy Authority had to say about the Canadian program.

There have been other suggestions that we were criticized—

Mr. Gillies: I rise on a point of order. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the minister would read the last paragraph, which is a summary of the whole report, on page 10, to put this in proper perspective?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Energy Conservation

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to have a question from the hon. member at the end of my remarks, if he cares to put one to me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Read page 10, Alastair.

Mr. Gillespie: Let me just remind hon. members that if they had taken the time and trouble to look at our supplementary estimates—

Mr. Baldwin: We sure looked at them.

Mr. Gillespie: I am delighted to hear you have, because hon. members will find in those supplementary estimates an item of $2,500,000 plus, for additional advertising to carry the message which has been applauded by the International Energy Authority.

Mr. Baldwin: What Liberal got that contract?

Mr. Gillespie: I want to introduce a balance to this debate. I want to read a paragraph from the report of the International Energy Authority which is critical of the Canadian government.

While there is evidence that certain major sectors of the Canadian economy, which are highly energy intensive, have taken steps to reduce unit energy costs (aluminum is an impressive example), it is doubtful whether Canada's pricing policy is in Canada's best interest in the context of a meaningful conservation program. Even allowing for the arguments associated with comparative advantage, the gap between Canadian energy prices and world prices would appear too big.

● (2120)

That is a very serious observation about which all Canadians and all members of parliament ought to think very hard about. It seems to me that the opposition, and the Conservatives in particular, should think pretty hard about that suggestion. I wonder whether the hon. member for Don Valley, for example, would agree with the suggestion in the report that we should have narrowed the price gap last year. If I recall correctly, it seems to me that the Conservatives opposite were arguing very strenuously that we had raised the price too high, or that we should not have raised it at all. If I remember the debates earlier this year, it seems to me that the NDP took a rather similar view, that we should not have raised the price as high as we did, and that we should not have narrowed the margin as much as we did. Clearly they cannot have it both ways.

I suggest that the government has introduced a judicious balance between the inflationary forces and pressures associated with a higher increase on the one hand, and the need to get the energy conservation message across on the other. Several hon. members suggested that government buildings in Ottawa are beacons at night, and they were right if they were talking about several weeks ago.

An hon. Member: What about External Affairs?

Mr. Gillespie: When I became minister I myself was concerned about some of these buildings. The Lester B. Pearson building has been mentioned as an example. If the hon. member had taken the trouble to drive past the External Affairs buildings, as I did the other night around eleven o'clock, I think he would find that probably less than a third of the lights were on at that time, and being a reasonable and fair man he would probably admit that there were likely to be a few people working at that time. I understand that he himself works very late at night. Being a reasonable man I am sure he would also realize that there would be cleaning staff involved, so that I think he will see that there has been a good deal of progress.

Not so very long ago the lights at the Taxation Data Centre seemed to be on all night, but I made a personal check the other night and found that better than half of those lights had been turned off. The point I am trying to make is that there has been an important response with regard to federal government buildings. It will still take a little longer because much of the wiring and switching has to be changed, but that is coming.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who got the contract?

Mr. Gillespie: There were suggestions that we introduced a program last February and have done nothing since. Let me repeat what the hon. member for Algoma said. There are a number of important measures being taken. I am not saying they are all we want to go with, because clearly we will be asking hon. members to take further action, but I think these sorts of measures indicate the kind of lead the federal government is giving on the question of energy conservation.

The federal sales tax on insulating materials was completely removed in the last budget. An excise tax related to weight has been introduced on the largest automobiles, and a 10 per cent tax levied on private aircraft and marine motors of more than 20 horsepower. Insulation requirements have been increased in the building code, followed by Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, and a ten cents per gallon tax increase, so bitterly attacked by the opposition, was levied on motor gasoline for non business use.

Mr. Stanfield: Shame!

M. Gillespie: I remind hon. members opposite that probably the single most effective deterrent to increasing energy consumption is a higher price. Every other country has found that to be true. The opposition choose not to look at these important truths; they choose to look only at the peripheral.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: A good deal has been said about speed limits. Last year, and earlier this year my predecessor stated that it would be a commitment of the government to reduce the maximum speed for federal vehicles to 55 miles an hour, and we invited all the provinces of Canada to follow this lead. I think it is probably the single most important move which can be taken at the present time to drive home to Canadian people the importance of energy conservation.

I went down to Washington less than three weeks ago to talk to federal energy administration officials and to ask them what had been their experience. I had heard stories, and many hon. members have heard stories, that there is a federal speed limit imposed in the United States but that it is not being observed. Quite the contrary is true; time and again I have run into Canadians who have been down to the United States who have told me that it is being observed, and that while there are surely some pockets where it is not being observed with the same even handedness as perhaps in upper New York state, there are probably exceptions to any policy of this kind.

Generally speaking there is a broad commitment in the Unites States to the 55 miles an hour speed limit. I have met and talked to a number of the energy ministers of the Canadian provinces, and I was very pleased that the province of Ontario has decided to follow the leads of the federal government and the province of British Columbia in limiting the speed to 60 miles an hour on some expressways and 55 miles an hour on others. When asked my opinion about a 60 miles an hour limit, my answer to that is that it is better than a 70 miles an hour limit. I would have preferred 55, but it is certainly better than 70, and I very much hope that the other provinces in Canada will introduce measures to reduce their speed limits.

I shall be meeting with the energy ministers of the provinces on December 12, and at that time we will be discussing a number of matters related to our energy future. One of them will be the question of energy conservation, and part of that agenda item will be to try to obtain a national 55 miles an hour speed limit across the country.

Before closing I wish just to touch on one or two other items which are important in terms of energy conservation. I should like to commend the Canadian Automobile Association; hon. members may be aware that a very substantial public relations program has been launched by that association. I think it is a very responsible program—and that association has a membership of a million or more motorists in Canada—which is aimed at getting across to them the importance of energy conservation and the various ways they can conserve the energy used by their automobiles.

I have talked to public utilities—not all of them but many—and I have impressed upon them the importance we attach to energy conservation. They have assured me that they have changed completely what had been their program of pushing, selling, and promoting the use of more energy, in favour of programs designed to persuade people to use energy more effectively and efficiently to meet energy conservation goals.

There was some reference to the question of energy research and development. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich referred to this in his remarks. I share with him the feeling that more has to be devoted to energy conservation. I am sure he is aware, as are other hon. members, that at the present time the federal government is spending over $100 million per year on energy research and development. A large part of that is for nuclear energy, of course, but it covers a wide range of programs. At the present time my cabinet colleagues and I are considering the list of priorities. I can tell you that energy conservation will be at the top of the list as far as new programs are concerned.

● (2130)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Alternative sources?

Mr. Gillespie: Yes, there are new sources as separate from the question of energy conservation. Energy conservation stands on its own, and in terms of new programs it stands at the top of the list.

Let me conclude by saying that energy conservation is everybody's program. It is not the government's program, it is not industry's program—it is everybody's program. Every member of this House has a responsibility to promote energy conservation. Energy conservation perhaps more than any other single approach at the present time will help solve some of our long term problems on energy, and at the same time assist us in our anti-inflation fight.

Some hon. Members: Page 10. We want page 10.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the early part of the day, just prior to this very important debate when the minister was in the riding of Algoma worrying his parliamentary secretary to death, a motion under Standing Order 43 was put by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) which I think was a fair beginning for the day we have had in this House. This has been a very good debate and I want to congratulate the hon. member for Don Valley as I think he has done a great service to this House and Canada—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —in bringing to their attention the neglect of the government and the shameful situation that has arisen from that neglect. That motion in effect called for an investigation as a result of the new evidence of the unpleasant and even frightening fact that government officials in the National Energy Board and elsewhere had consistently and dramatically over estimated the depth of the country's energy reserves.

The motion refers to the criticism not by any party in opposition but by the International Energy Agency, an organization which could only be construed as non-partisan. It said that "there appears to be a substantial gap between principle and practice;" that the Canadian cabinet "appears to have accepted the goal of conservation without recognizing the need to implement the goal with specific actions".

A reference was made earlier to page 10, but the minister refused to put on the record the conclusion of this non-partisan report. I think it is important that this be on the record in this debate and I shall now quote from page 10. I think even the most biased supporter of the government, the most blind of the trained seals, would have to agree that this is a condemnation of the government. Here is what it says:

> In short, and without under estimating the complexity of the problems, there appears to be a substantial gap between principle and practice. It would appear that the central policy adopted by the cabinet has not yet proved strong enough to get rapid decisions. That is, the cabinet appears to have accepted the goal of conservation without recognizing the need to implement the goal with specific actions. For example, there is an impressive list of short term measures—

I want to digress for a moment. We just heard a view of that from the minister a few moments ago. To continue:

> —which do not involve large unit investment, only a few of which have been approved. There is a more impressive list of impending short term measures. There is, furthermore, little evidence as yet of any major impact of energy conservation in terms of long term measures.

That is the end of page 10 which the minister chose to ignore when he addressed the House a few moments ago.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I know he has been affected by the rarified and delightful air of northern Ontario but I am sure that omission could not be excused even on those grounds. The fact is that the best the minister could do was to say that the leadership with respect to conservation in Canada had to be provided by the Canadian Automobile Association and not by the government. That was the essence of what he said.

Mr. Gillespie: Oh, come on!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He made a fine speech. He trotted out all the statistics. He trotted out the great problem we have ahead of us. We all know we have a problem, Mr. Speaker. What we are asking is for that group that has the mandate to lead—a mandate that is perhaps regretted now by some of the Canadian people—should give more than lip service to the programs that are necessary, given the truth of the minister's statistics with respect to the problem.

That is what we wanted from the minister—why we waited with bated breath for his return from northern Ontario in the Minister of Agriculture's (Mr. Whelan) jet.

What did we get? We got more of the same kind of lip service that we got from his predecessor when he brought forward that magnificent advertising program a short while ago. That advertising program of the government, the conservation effect of which is recognized around the world as perhaps the most ineffective of all of the institutions in that department—those two things are not even an excuse—an excuse for a conservation policy.

The minister said we had to look at increasing the supply as part of the policy, and we had to demand the enthusiasm of Canadians. He is quite right, but the question that comes to mind is, what effective action is the minister going to take? Has there been any announcement of new initiatives with respect to transportation—to move people to the use of public transportation? Not one. Has there been any announcement with respect to diverting traffic from the highways to the railroads? Not one. Has there been any announcement with respect to tax incentives to have a smaller automobile produced in this country as part of the North American scene? No. Smaller automobiles have been produced but not in sufficient numbers to have any effect. The minister had better recognize that. This has been happening in spite of the minister's program and not because of it.

The best he could come up with was the bandages and band-aids that have characterized the government's policy with respect to conservation and a host of other things. He mentioned the crowning glory of the government's conservation program, the ten cents a gallon excise tax on gasoline. What will that tax do? I will tell you—absolutely nothing. It will not stop the use of cars, as many must use them because our present public transport systems are inadequate to meet the need. Therefore the tax will merely make motoring more expensive for motorists who must use their cars. If I am wrong I am sure the minister will stand up and trot out statistics to prove me wrong; but he is not doing that.

What are the government's long term views? I suggest that the government's record in the field of research and development, provision of new energy forms and services—in all those matters we discussed today—is dismal. Yes, it's record is dismal.

● (2140)

Mr. Stanfield: I'll bet lots of lights are still burning.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is why the hon. member for Don Valley proposed the motion before the House, and why we expected the minister on his return from northern Ontario to repeat in this House part of the speech he had made up there. We expected more from this minister; we expected a commitment, not lip service; action not words. We expected more than the sort of Boxing Day announcement he was considering. We expected the federal government to show leadership with respect to energy conversation—

Mr. Gillespie: Conservation! That is all this is—conversation.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I beg your pardon; I meant conservation. I suspect what is going through my mind is going through the mind of any member who listened to the contributions from the government side. With the exception of the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne), who gave an excellent speech on the long-term aspects of the problem, hon. members on the government side made a dismal contribution on conservation. The minister's performance was no better. Frankly I expected more.

Mr. Stanfield: I didn't.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I did not expect window dressing. I expected policy pronouncements. I shall go home tonight dejected and downhearted because I did not hear what I ought to have heard.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, before speaking on this important motion let me say that one thing puzzles me about the proposed 55 miles an hour speed limit. I can see the sense of restricting four cylinder cars to 55 miles an hour, but I wish the minister or some other automotive expert would explain to me how a 455 horsepower V-8 engine is to operate at peak efficiency if speed is to be restricted to 55 miles an hour. The engine will carbon up, operate less efficiently, and use more gasoline. If my assessment is wrong I hope someone will tell me. If we are to restrict the speed limit to 55 miles an hour, we should not allow engines of 450 and 500 horsepower to be built.

Mr. Gillespie: Buy a car with a small engine and save gasoline.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the minister completely missed my point. There are thousands of huge V-8 engined cars on the road and the owners will tell you that those cars will not operate properly at low speeds. Gasoline mileage will be poor if those cars cannot be driven at 70 miles an hour at least.

I now wish to comment on an important conference held in Winnipeg in 1973. I am referring to the International Biomass Energy Conference, attended by delegates from all around the world. They presented sound alternatives and suggestions for renewing our sources of energy. I have heard little from the government or minister with regard to biomass energy, and alternative source of energy. I find, on checking the estimates, that the government granted only $3,400 this year for research in the field. The money is to go to the University of Manitoba.

May I now refer to a portion of the 1973 report? Scientists at the conference said that oil and gas can be made from agricultural waste. They also said that large amounts of organic solid wastes having their origin from farm animals and agricultural crops are generated annually in the United States. On a dry basis this amounts to hundreds of millions of tons each year and is becoming a more serious pollution problem each succeeding year. Really, the conference was considering the use of manure. There is lots of manure going to waste in Canada. Conference scientists held that the indiscriminate disposal of these wastes is not only seriously affecting the ecology but is overlooking a potentially significant source of energy at a time when the country needs a more abundant supply of clean energy.

The Bureau of Mines of the United States Department of the Interior is exploring three processes for converting these wastes into low-sulphur synthetic fuels, thereby contributing to the solution of two critical problems simultaneously. I am not aware of any similar program in Canada.

The first process converts organic solid wastes to oil by treatment with carbon monoxide and steam under pressure at elevated temperatures. The net yield of low-sulphur liquid fuel from this source is about 1.3 barrels per ton of dry organic waste. This oil product can be readily stored, transported, and burned cleanly to provide energy.

A second process is direct gasification of organic waste with hydrogen to produce substitute pipeline gas. About 6,000 scf of pipeline gas are produced per ton of dry organic waste. The hydrogen for the process is generated from the residual char from the hydro-gasification.

Further, with the current energy crisis reflecting the increasing scarcity of non-renewable fossil fuels, the prospect of using renewable sources of energy is becoming more attractive. There are now several examples of the use of waste materials for energy. Many pulp and paper plants heat boilers with "hog fuel"—bark, branches, and other wastes from forestry operations. The benefits are twofold; material which previously might have been pumped into streams, causing pollution, can be used to save money on energy costs.

In Hawaii plans exist to provide 80 per cent of that island's electrical generation from plants fired by sugar cane bagasse. Not only will fuel costs be reduced and the balance of payments situation improved, but the sugar cane industry can be expanded. Sugar cane wastes are a source of pollution and their disposal is strictly controlled. Their use as a fuel is an excellent means of low pollution disposal.

Scientists say that it will be necessary to harvest an renew trees in a 300 to 400 square mile area to fuel a 400 megawatt generating plant. Costs competitive with fossil fuel generation are projected.

All growing matter, including renewable plant and animal material, and plant and animal material stored in the form of non-renewable fossil fuel, is given to term biomass. How much biomass is available for energy production in the world today? The answer to this question was encouraging enough to prompt the formation of the Biomass Energy Institute in Winnipeg during 1971. The institute is a non-profit organization which co-ordinates and promotes research and development into renewable biomass energy sources.

A major step in the co-ordination process was taken with the sponsoring of the first international biomass energy conference in 1973, when 18 speakers dealt with the three major questions facing biomass energy. They are, first, is it available in useful quantities? Second, can it be easily and efficiently converted to useful forms? Third, is its implementation and use economically feasible? I say that it is, Mr. Speaker.

Our energy requirements will also increase with food requirements; but, theoretically, if all biomass were collected in western Canada and used for energy in 1980, it could amount to almost all our Canadian natural gas requirements, or 25 per cent of our total requirement. Projecting our figures to the year 2000, we could expect easily to double the 1980 figure.

● (2150)

Crops will never be grown exclusively for energy production because of the projected high demand for food, but straw and other crop residues from food production will be used for energy production. These residues can now be collected easily and farmers will do so if the economics are attractive. In heavy crop years these residues cannot be incorporated into the soil and regulations may soon prohibit their burning.

I would also like to point out the problem that certain industries are experiencing because of fuel shortages, in particular natural gas. The cement industry can use alternate fuels in the manufacture of cement, namely, oil or coal. However, it is becoming increasingly apparent that Canada's domestic production of oil will be hard pressed to meet normal oil demand, let alone any shift in energy consumption from natural gas to oil. The same argument can be used with respect to coal. In other words, the over-all diminishing fuel picture cannot hope to meet the growing demand for energy in the future.

Even if assumptions were made that alternate fuels were available to allow for a shift in energy consumption from natural gas and that the price of fuels will be equivalent on a BTU-content basis, the increased capital and operating costs associated with converting the Inland-Ocean cement plants would be significant. For example, the initial capital costs to convert the four western Canadian plants to coal systems would total approximately $9 million. Operating cost would be higher with a coal system because of the handling and coal processing required.

If Inland-Ocean were required to convert to coal, the increased capital and operating costs would have to be passed on to the consumer. Since cement is a basic building material, increased cement prices would naturally result in increased construction costs. The point here, and the concern of the cement industry, is that they are not going to have enough natural gas to operate their plants.

On a number of occasions in the past I have urged the government to promote the polar pipeline through Manitoba. The government has a 45 per cent interest in the Panarctic pipeline. I certainly hope the minister and the government are making every effort to promote this pipeline. Let me point out that Manitoba faces a serious shortage of natural gas. New homes and businesses must find alternative fuels to supply heat and power.

Two alternative routes have been suggested for this pipeline. One route would put it through eastern Keewatin and Manitoba; the other, across Hudson Strait and down through northern Quebec. May I list my reasons for thinking the Manitoba route is the cheapest and most logical alternative. Consider the matter of construction. The Manitoba route would be an all-land route, while the Quebec route would involve the spanning of a large body of water, Hudson Strait. The building of pipelines on land involves, of course, a well understood and much practised technology; building under water does not involve any well understood technology. Surely problems would arise in connection with the under water route.

Let us also consider construction aids. In this regard the Manitoba route is far ahead of the Quebec route. The main aid to construction would be the Hudson Bay railway, which would run parallel to the pipeline from Churchill to The Pas for 510 miles. That route would provide the builders of the pipeline with cheap transportation help. The very presence of a railway and highway means that supplies could be transported quickly and cheaply to construction areas.

In the first phase of construction, materials would be taken to Churchill and loaded on supply boats, which would deliver materials to points along the Hudson Bay coast where construction would be taking place. In the later phases of construction, materials would simply be unloaded along the railway and highway at a point where construction had proceeded. As a sideline, this would provide a much needed shot in the arm for the port of Churchill and the railway.

In my remaining few moments I wish to point out that we must do all that we can to promote solar energy. It was certainly encouraging to read today that the government is going to be using solar energy to heat partially some of its new buildings.

A recent United States committee report said that country could already have been saving about three million barrels of oil a day—about half its current oil imports—if it had heeded the advice of a presidential commission in 1952 to develop solar energy. Even without a strong government program, however, solar technology has been developed and there is in place a small but significant manufacturing capacity. "With appropriate and wise government action, the industry could and would take off," the report said. "The nation could and should establish immediately the goal of providing at least 30 per cent of its building heating and cooling, and water heating increases each year from now until then," the committee report urged.

To achieve such a goal the report recommended enactment of tax incentives, and perhaps low-interest or guaranteed loans, to encourage rapid application of solar heating and cooling.

On a recent trip to Israel I noted that the majority of homes use solar energy to heat their water supply. They are certainly showing leadership in that area. However, I see very little being done in this country with regard to solar energy. I hope the minister will be pursuing that.

Adjournment Debate

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 58(11), the proceedings on the motion of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) have expired.

* * *

[English]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill C-25, an Act to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, without amendment.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—FOOTWEAR—REQUEST FOR PROBING OF IMPORTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, according to the provisions of the Standing Order, I have raised a question to draw to the attention of the House the serious problems now facing the Canadian footwear industry. I make a new attempt today because I consider on one hand that, as a result of our difficult economic conditions, we must protect our industries and on the other hand, I must tacke more particularly that problem because in my constituency the footwear industry is important, especially the town of Richmond which has several plants. Our regional economy heavily relies on the footwear industry which even provides the subsistence of many families.

It should first be pointed out that it is not a new problem. Already these last few years our industry has been experiencing difficulties and constantly losing ground. For instance on May 3, 1971, on page 10 of La Presse one could read the following headline in big letters:

DESPAIR GRIPS FOOTWEAR INDUSTRY

The article contained a statement by Mr. Eugène Rancourt, then president of one of the footwear unions, who said that in the ten preceding years at least 34 plants had gone out of business in Quebec alone, which lead to the layoff of hundreds of workers.

Ottawa was then urged to limit imports to a reasonable percentage. If I take the trouble of describing the conditions in 1971, it is because they are strangely similar to the ones we have now, which means that practically the problem has not really been solved and has even worsened.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

That is why very recently the Footwear Manufacturers Association of Canada launched a campaign to make the government realize the pressing necessity of intervening as soon as possible with very definite measures to save that important sector of economic activity. It is with this view, Mr. Speaker, that I rise in this House tonight to ask this question.

First of all, I would like to draw the attention of the government, and in particular of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), on the data that must be well established before anything else. As a matter of fact, the history of the footwear industry in Canada since 1956 is merely one of loss of a large market which was most promising. In 1956, Canada imported 12 per cent of the Canadian footwear production while in 1969, imports had reached 79 per cent. In 1956, Canada produced 58.8 million pairs of shoes and imported 6.9 million while in 1969, our production was about 58 million pairs while imports had increased from 6.9 to 46 million.

● (2200)

These figures are self-explanatory. Foreign competition is therefore great and has very serious consequences in Canada. The situation was somewhat better in 1973 for instance, when some 31 million pairs of shoes were imported, but as Mr. Jean-Paul Hanna, the president of the association, indicated at the official opening of the Canadian International Footwear Exhibition in September 1974, even though at first imports seemed to be slowing down, by the end of the year they had recuperated to reach a total net increase of 3.7 per cent.

Already in 1973 the leather industry had asked the government for increased protection against foreign shoe imports. They were afraid the number of imported shoes might reach 41,000,000 pairs, while shoes produced in Canada might fall down to 18,000,000 pairs.

In its brief to the government, the association asked for a reduction of imports, so that in 1975, in other words this year, Canadian manufacturers might supply 75 per cent of the shoe market. Now, we see today that this objective is far from being reached. On the contrary, orders for shoes from Quebec and Canadian manufacturers have dropped by 38 per cent at the beginning of this year compared to last year. On that subject, Mr. Jean-Guy Maheu, the vice-chairman of the association said the following:

If this trend were to be maintained throughout the year, 35 plants would have to close.

More than 10 per cent of the labour force have been dismissed since the beginning of the year and many have been dismissed temporarily. I think, Mr. Speaker, that these facts alone are sufficient to sound the alarm, to urge us to give immediate consideration to that problem and prevent an irreparable catastrophe. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce tried in 1973 to correct the situation by setting up what he called "his sectorial strategy for the footwear and tanning industry".

In the light of past experience since then, we realize however that, to all practical intents and purposes, that sectorial strategy can be efficient only if we ensure our Canadian production a good Canadian market. One has to be blind not to see that we must first guarantee the survival of our industries by ensuring them a good percentage of our local market. Then, we can import. Otherwise, we will risk the danger of destroying that industry, increasing unemployment and adding to the sad state of affairs whereby Canadians produce less and less and consume more and more foreign goods.

I deplore the fact that in the last few months big chain stores, such as Eaton's, for instance, seem to be buying directly from foreign manufacturers of footwear, instead of ordering them from importers, which saves them another 30 to 35 per cent. Those chain stores should remember that they live off the income of Canadians who, to buy the goods they need, have to work; we certainly will not achieve that goal if we destroy our industries through our imports.

It is far from being proven that imported footwear is preferred by Canadians both for price and quality or durability. But that is not the point. The point is whether the government is prepared to let Canada see its industries go down, and let this country become a consumer of foreign products, or whether we accept the challenge immediately by bringing back to the surface our viable industries and becoming again a productive country, by consuming first our production and even setting export goals afterwards in areas where that is possible.

I appreciated a lot the brief submitted sometime ago by the Canadian Shoe Manufacturers Association before the Canadian committee on trade and commerce and customs tariffs. It proposes in particular that the government reduce imports to a reasonable proportion, that it take immediate steps in the area of maintaining customs tariffs, that it extend the jurisdiction of the Textile and Clothing Board to footwear and that it initiate negotiations with other governments to come to an international agreement governing the footwear trade and including the setting of a quota.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him is now expired.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I want first to commend the hon. member for the interest he showed about the footwear industry. May I be permitted to refer him now to the statement made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) on November 20 last on the sectorial strategy of the tanning and the footwear industries and of which a study report was tabled in this House on December 21, 1973. In reply to his question I want to inform the non. member that the implementation of that strategy which includes several elements and measures which are closely related is moving forward at a satisfactory pace. The hon. member suggested this problem was not new but I would like to take this opportunity to explain the solutions which are now new to deal with this problem. Those steps that I mentioned will have an effect on international trade and will ensure the protection of the footwear industry in Canada. For example, under the trade policy included in that strategy the government took various steps to help Canadian manufacturers, and here are a few examples: leather footwear was exempted from the general preference condition; second, the Department of National Revenue has noted on four occasions that shoes from certain countries were undervalued and that this affected the prices on the Canadian market—action has since been taken in this regard; third, manufacturers obtained tariff reductions on three occasions on materials not available in Canada. Several cases are now under study.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to note that while this sectorial strategy applied only to the leather footwear and tanning industries in the beginning, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is now considering extending its advantages to the rubber footwear subsector. This action follows the annulment, on August 28 of this year, of the general preferential tariff for rubber footwear and the reinstatement of the most favoured nation 20 per cent tariff.

As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated on November 20 of this year, the government will continue to examine periodically the status of the footwear industry and to determine if other action is required in the future.

I therefore congratulate the hon. member for the interest that he has shown in this important industry. Moreover, as other members also said during the Liberal party caucus, we should continue to review regularly the situation of the footwear industry in Canada.

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS—DATE OF DECISION ON BILL TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMITTEE ON WAR PRISONERS AND WIDOWS' PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, November 20, as recorded in Hansard at page 9274, I put this question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald):

> In view of the fact that the President of the Privy Council has assured me on four or five Thursdays in a row that a certain matter is under consideration, can the minister tell us whether a favourable decision has been reached with respect to it? I refer to the bill to implement the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs concerning Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war and concerning the provision of pensions to veterans' widows?

The reply of the Minister of Veterans Affairs was in these words:

> I can confirm the statement made by the House leader but that is as far as I can go today.

That was last Thursday and this is Monday of a new week, so I am hoping for an answer tonight.

● (2210)

I am most grateful to the Minister of Veterans Affairs for being here for tonight's late show. I suppose there are times when members on the opposition side of the House use the question period, or even the late show, to try to embarrass some unco-operative minister, but I assure the Minister of Veterans Affairs that that is by no means the attitude with which I address him on this question. I believe he is every bit as anxious as I am to get this legislation before parliament. I suppose if I were to put to him the question I really want to pose it would be this: what can we do to help the minister to win this battle with his colleagues who make up the cabinet?

We are, of course, talking about the report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs which that committee made to the House of June 12 of this year. That report arose out of our study on the Hermann Report having to do with prisoners of war in Northwest Europe, but our studies went a bit further. Indeed the recommendations the committee made were four. I spelled them out in some detail during a late show on Monday, October 27, as recorded in Hansard at pages 8598 and 8599, so I shall refrain from repeating all that detail tonight. I would just indicate what the four recommendations were.

First, we asked that there be a special piece of legislation dealing with prisoners of war. Second, we asked that the provisions regarding Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war at Hong Kong be improved, that instead of the pension being 50 per cent including any disability assessment it be 50 per cent for all who were at Hong Kong, with any disability assessment being added on top of that with a ceiling of 100 per cent. Our third recommendation was that there be a scale of benefits for veterans who were prisoners of war in Europe. Briefly the scale was that for incarceration of up to one and one-half years the pension would be 10 per cent. For incarceration of from one and-one-half to two and one-half year it should be 15 per cent, and for incarceration of two and one-half years or over the pension should be 20 per cent. Our fourth recommendation had to do with widows of veterans. In particular we asked for a change in the well known 48 per cent rule. Our plea is that for widows of veterans in cases where the veterans' disability pension is less than 48 per cent there should be a pro rata widow's pension instead of none at all.

Now, the minister is as familiar with all this as I am, if not more so, and I say again that I know he is just as anxious as I am to get this legislation before the House. I am sure his parliamentary secretary now sitting behind him agrees with me, and I suspect that he too is hoping to hear a good answer tonight.

It is a puzzle to us how a matter like this can be around this long, and how the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) can tell me Thursday after Thursday after Thursday that the matter is still being considered by the government, and yet we cannot obtain an answer. I welcome very strongly the words of the minister the last time he answered a question of mine during a late show when he expressed the hope that the restraint program which is now around us will not apply to prisoners of war or to widows of veterans. We back him 1,000 per cent on that.

So, Mr. Speaker, there it is. The Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs gave a great deal of thought and attention to these matters. We were unanimous in our desire that these recommendations be implemented. I hope the minister can tell us tonight how soon he might be able to make an announcement and, if not, that he will tell us what we can do to help him.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to reply to the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) concerning the decision to implement the recommendations of the standing committee regarding prisoners of war and widow's pensions.

Hon. members will recall that my parliamentary secretary spoke concerning the same matter on October 30, 1975, as reported at page 8735 of Hansard. At that time he reminded hon. members that the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs at its meeting of June 22, 1972, requested that a study be undertaken to identify any physiological or psychological long-term effects which their incarceration may have had on ex-prisoners of war of the European theatre, numbering approximately 7,500. The government accepted this recommendation and on January 31, 1973, the study was undertaken by Dr. J. Douglas Hermann, a distinguished Canadian surgeon. Dr. Hermann's report was tabled in the House of Commons on Monday, November 18, 1974. It was subsequently referred to the standing committee for study on Wednesday, March 26, 1975, and the committee reported back to the House on Thursday, June 12, 1975.

In the meantime I have held consultations on this very important subject with my colleagues. As I confirmed last Thursday, this matter is still under active consideration by the government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.19 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 25, 1975

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PENITENTIARIES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ALLEGED GASSING AND BEATING OF INMATES AT MILLHAVEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of recent reports of gassing and beating of inmates at Millhaven penitentiary and in view of the fact that this was not an isolated incident in our penitentiary system and that the Solicitor General has neglected or refused to make public the report by the Canadian Penitentiary Service on the said gassing and beating allegations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House direct the Solicitor General to immediately make a report on motions on the gassing and beating incident at Millhaven Penitentiary on November 3, 1975 and to advise the House on this government's policy with respect to publication of findings by the Commissioner of Penitentiaries of guard brutality.

Mr. Speaker: The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[Translation]

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST THAT QUEEN NOT BE INVITED TO OPENING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter.

Since the federal government has decided not to give any financial aid to the Montreal Olympic Games in 1976 and that Quebec becomes solely responsible for the costs of those games as well as the expected deficit, since most Quebecers do not really consider Queen Elizabeth II as their Queen and since also the people will massively object to the official opening of those Olympic Games by the Queen, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That no invitation be extended to the Queen to open officially the 1976 Quebec Olympic Games and that if steps have already been taken, they be cancelled.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such a consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

* * *

[English]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POSSIBLE SEIZURE OF LIBERAL PARTY RECORDS SHOWING DONATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That the Solicitor General be requested to advise the House immediately as to whether records of the Liberal Party of Canada showing donations received during the period of January 1, 1968 to July 31, 1975 have been turned over to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in connection with the current investigation concerning Senator Giguère and matters related thereto and, if not, whether the Solicitor General will forthwith instruct the RCMP to obtain a warrant to seize such documents in order that actual amounts of money received by the Liberal Party of Canada can be compared with amounts showing as having been collected for the Liberal party by Senator Giguère, and finally, in order to compare names appearing as Liberal party donors solicited by Senator Giguère for any similarity to the names appearing on the guest lists of the Bonaventure Golf and Country Club in Fort Lauderdale and the Indian Creek Country Club near Miami.

● (1410)

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Finance

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTED INDICATION OF APPRECIATION OF EFFORTS OF EMPLOYEES TO DELIVER MAIL IN LIGHT OF STRIKE CONDITIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of the fact that the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is unwilling to take a poll of its membership by secret ballot on the government's final wage offer, which in fact takes freedom of choice away from its members and therefore causes undue hardship to all Canadians by resulting in the continuation of the postal strike, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House records its appreciation of the efforts of all those postal workers who are presently taking the initiative and the primary responsibility in delivering the mails to the public under extremely difficult conditions, and this House is assured thereby that the demonstrated ability of these postal workers to assist the public will attract other colleagues to their cause, and this House directs the Postmaster General to make known this record of appreciation.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[Translation]

FINANCE

SUGGESTION THAT GOVERNMENT PROHIBIT ADVERTISING BY FINANCE COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In the light of the fact that we are going through a critical period due to inflation that reduces constantly the true purchasing power of Canadians;

That this serious situation should not allow financiers to take unfair advantage of underprivileged Canadians and that the lending institutions called "finance companies" make the most of the economic crisis at this time by using misleading advertising, trying to make people believe they will be able to solve their problems by borrowing money at high interest rates;

Seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) I move:

That the House consider as soon as possible the possibility of abolishing all advertising by finance companies so that they can no longer entice Canadians to borrow beyond their means through misleading solicitation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore the motion cannot be put.

* * *

[English]

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ALLEGED POLICE RAID ON COMMITTEE HEADQUARTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity relating to our Olympic games, and I move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek):

That the President of the Treasury Board or the Solicitor General report at the earliest opportunity, perhaps on motions today, as to persistent and, it is believed, reliable reports that the headquarters of COJO in Montreal have been raided by the police.

Mr. Speaker: The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—POSSIBILITY OF UNION ACCEPTING WAGE OFFER AND RESUMING NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Apparently the chief negotiator of the postal union met this morning with the Postmaster General. In order that this House can know whether there is any basis for the resumption of serious negotiations at this time, would the Prime Minister tell the House whether the Canadian Union of Postal Workers bargaining committee has accepted in principle the fact that the government's total monetary package is final and that no further increase is possible?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of that question and refer it to the minister.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SECRET VOTE OF UNION MEMBERS—POSSIBILITY OF RESIGNATION OF POSTMASTER GENERAL IF GOVERNMENT OFFER REFUSED

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. Over the weekend the Postmaster General said that if there were a secret ballot and he lost, he would resign.

Mr. Broadbent: That is not what he said.

Mr. Fraser: Was that just an idle threat, or does the government intend to hold a government supervised vote under the authority of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, or otherwise by special legislation, and can the Prime Minister tell the House whether the Postmaster General will stand by his commitment to resign if the union members support the union executive and not him?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the second part of the question was dealt with in previous circumstances. With regard to the first part, I heard hon. members on the other side saying that the hon. member is badly interpreting what the Postmaster General said. I, personally, did not hear him.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF DAMAGE TO SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): A further supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the hon. member for York East, speaking for the government a few days ago, said:

You can talk about small business over there as much as you like but they are learning to adjust.

And in view of the fact that the Postmaster's repudiation of this position in a speech yesterday when he said "small businesses go broke during postal strikes", can the right hon. Prime Minister advise the House whether the Postmaster General's statement was based on information being received by the government and if so, is the Prime Minister prepared to tell this House just how damaging the strike is for small businesses and other people and organizations in Canada?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): How is the campaign?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will gladly take note of the question, Mr. Speaker.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT VIEW OF IMPORTANCE OF EFFECT ON SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday in a speech the Postmaster General referred to the loss of farm income and export sales caused by strikes at grain elevators, docks and railways. In view of the fact that strikes in these areas have led to prompt legislative intervention, is it the view of the Prime Minister that bankruptcy and layoffs in small businesses is of no comparable importance?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION IN VIEW OF EFFECT ON SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): A supplementary question. Have any efforts been made by the government to assess the hardship and outright damage created by the five week postal shutdown and if so, how would such information affect the Prime Minister's statement that parliament would intervene at a time when the public disservice outweighed the right to strike itself?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I answered to the previous question, I do not have any precise information on that. Some may have accumulated in the Postmaster General's office or other offices.

Mr. Fraser: We are getting it on our side.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member has the information he should not have asked the question.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Maybe it is good to get you on the record.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT BY POSTMASTER GENERAL ON POSITION OF UNION MEMBER IN LABOUR DISPUTES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and arises from the speech the Postmaster General made yesterday at a Rotary Club which included some highly disturbing comments, if accurate. I should like to ask the Prime Minister the following. The Postmaster General is reported as having said:

—the union member today is fighting the ordinary citizen, he's fighting the nation—It's no longer a labour-management conflict where management loses when labour wins, it's a labour-nation conflict—

I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the Postmaster General was stating official government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is obviously a rhetorical one. This is not government policy. This is obviously an opinion but the opinion of a minister who is highly respected by Canadians in general, by many labour representatives in particular. I think the Canadian public, and probably most members of the House, would welcome the minister expressing his concern in this way. It is certain that the labour movement has cause to consider its future in this country in the way things are evolving. I think it is a very important question that all members should be asking themselves.

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGES IN COLLECTIVE BARGAINING SYSTEM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question. It was suggested by the Postmaster General that to be opposed to the government as a member of a trade union movement now was to be unpatriotic which goes a little far for a man who believes in civil liberties. I should like to know if it is government policy as expressed by the Postmaster General when he said that the free collective bargaining system in Canada was conceived in a simpler kind of society and requires basic change. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if that is the government's policy and, if so, what kind of basic changes in the free collective bargaining system that we have in this country does the government have in mind?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should make it clear that he is not quoting the minister when he used the word "unpatriotic". This seems to be a circumlocution and perhaps a fabrication by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: On the question of the labour movement, and its leadership, I think all concerned citizens are entitled to ask those questions just as the labour movement asks itself questions constantly about the leadership the government is giving. I think any citizen and particularly those interested in the future of the labour movement should be asking themselves these questions. They are not right, ex cathedra, because they are doing something. I think the country is evolving, institutions are evolving. The government has indicated it has certain studies under way to try to better understand the way things are evolving. I see nothing wrong, on the contrary, with the minister saying that in so many words.

* * *

● (1420)

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—SUGGESTION NEGOTIATIONS BE CONDUCTED BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD RATHER THAN POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Postmaster General's words were "fighting the nation". When a critic of a government is said to take an anti-nation stand that amounts to saying he is unpatriotic.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my final supplementary question to the Prime Minister? Given this attitude on the part of the Postmaster General, and the crucial importance of having a fair-minded person conducting negotiations with the postal workers so that the postal service can be restored, will the Prime Minister, in all seriousness, not consider reverting responsibility for these negotiations to where it belonged in the first place, to the President of the Treasury Board?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I assert again that the government has entire confidence in the abilities of the Postmaster General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Since he is not here, since I have not read his speech but heard the hon. member quoting and read some quotations, I think the minister might be given the chance to send a copy of his speech to the hon. member. I repeat: in a society in which every day the labour movement and, indeed, the NDP can criticize the government of the country, I see nothing wrong with another citizen talking about the future of the labour movement—

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Broadbent: Not even when he says they are against the nation?

Mr. Trudeau: —and asking himself if the course they are on is a productive one for the future of this nation.

* * *

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST THAT FLUID MILK SUBSIDY BE RE-ESTABLISHED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Yesterday, in reply to a question I directed to him, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs suggested that I should advertise to convince Canadians to drink more milk. I wish therefore to respond to his invitation by directing a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Considering that our milk powder surplus may result from our fluid milk surpluses being channelled towards milk-processing industries, may I ask the minister whether he is willing to suggest to his Cabinet colleagues to restore the grant on the quart of fluid milk, in order to increase milk consumption and reduce the amount of milk channelled towards processing plants?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

As his answer was very short, I should like to ask the minister if, given the fact that this policy has been applied for two years and that the government has thus paid $108 million to the consumers, the government considers it has made a mistake at that time and does not want to repeat it today?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, that policy was initiated two years ago when we had not adopted social services more advanced than those of any nation in the world. Those services were adopted after the policy was announced.

* * *

SPORTS

CONGRATULATIONS TO EDMONTON ESKIMOS ON WINNING GREY CUP

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence, may I congratulate both teams for their gentleman-like and sporting manner of participating in the Grey Cup classic last Sunday, particularly my old team, the Edmonton Eskimos, who again distinguished themselves in a manner worthy of the great teams of the past, and you, Mr. Speaker for your attending with Mrs.

Jerome and adding luster to the occasion. Fortunately, no points of order required your intervention. Also, may I ask the Prime Minister if he has a report for the House on the athletic and political disaster which overtook his team last Sunday? Would he accept this suggestion: that next year he stay home and send Justin alone? Before the Prime Minister replies, I would like to remind him, speaking of Polish Canadians, of the well-known Polish proverb which I will translate into French, "Demandez un bœuf pour avoir un œuf."

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must join the hon. member in congratulating the Edmonton Eskimos for a very fine performance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I certainly cannot conceal that I was slightly disappointed with the result. I can tell the hon. member that I hedged my bets because my son Justin, who had the good fortune of sitting in the lap of the queen, drew conclusions. First, he was shouting for the Eskimos; second, he seemed very enthralled with the monarchy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Apart from the Polish proverb, which I did not quite understand, my only puzzlement is why the hon. member for Edmonton Centre did not show up yesterday in the House of Commons.

* * *

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REASON FOR ALLEGED SEIZURE OF DOCUMENTS FROM MAIN CONTRACTORS FOR OLYMPIC VILLAGE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put my question to the Solicitor General. Is he aware of the fact that the offices of the main contractors of the Olympic Games were raided this morning by the RCMP and other police forces, and COJO files with regard to the Olympic village were taken. Will the minister advise for what purpose these files were taken and whether he was aware of this?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned over and over again, we do not discuss criminal investigations in the House of Commons.

Mr. Jelinek: Is the minister aware that Joseph Zappia, one of the men involved in the consortium of the Olympic village and who also had contracts for the packaging of Olympic coins as well as the packaging of the new postal stamp memorials, is involved in this and possibly Senator Giguère as well? Is that the reason—

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the opposition seems to have a lot of information with respect to these cases. If the hon. member has some additional information, he should see the police privately, rather than raising this in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINES TO PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the minister is about to meet with the provincial finance ministers and, we understand from the press, that one of the subjects to be discussed is the inclusion of marketing boards under the legislation now before the House, will the minister advise what position he intends to place before his provincial counterparts? I ask this in view of his reply when the bill was before the committee that the present legislation cannot in fact force marketing boards to roll back prices if they cannot be justified.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are going to suggest to the provincial governments the same manner of control that we have suggested with regard to the two or three federal marketing boards which are in a position to set prices. While the Anti-Inflation Board will have the responsibility of monitoring increases in prices of particular products and making reports on them, the provincial agencies, which I understand exist throughout Canada for the purpose of monitoring the work of the marketing boards, should have responsibility for rolling back any prices which are in excess of the guidelines. As the hon. gentleman knows, I have suggested that the National Farm Products Marketing Council, in the case of federal marketing agencies, should have that responsibility, in the light of appropriate reports from the Anti-Inflation Board, to roll back prices which exceed the cost-price pass through factor proposed for other prices.

* * *

● (1430)

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—POSSIBLE DETERMINATION BY NATIONAL FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL OF JUSTIFICATION FOR PRICE INCREASE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture who answers for the National Farm Products Marketing Council. It arises from the letter written by the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency to the Anti-Inflation Board in which the latest increase in the price of eggs is justified on the basis of an upward change in feed prices in one major province. Is the minister satisfied with this rationale, has he discussed this matter with the National Farm Products Marketing Council and does he intend to instruct the Council to determine to its satisfaction whether such an increase in the price of eggs can be justified at this time?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am meeting with the Farm Products Marketing Council later this day to discuss that matter.

Oral Questions

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF PULP AND PAPER WORKERS—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO HAVE NEGOTIATIONS RESUMED

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the paper mills in the Niagara Peninsula have been on strike since the beginning of July, and bearing in mind that no meaningful negotiations have taken place for weeks, would the minister advise the House whether he proposes to take any action to get the employers and the strikers back to the negotiating table?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Technically, of course, this dispute falls within provincial jurisdiction. However, I have urged the employers in this particular case to desist from their present destructive strategy which is hurting the economy and sit down with the employees in question in an endeavour to arrive at a resolution of this issue, arrive at a collective agreement, and if necessary submit it to the Anti-Inflation Board.

* * *

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

SUGGESTED ARRANGEMENTS FOR EARLY DELIVERY OF FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services? In view of the fact that family allowance cheques—namely one cheque for November and December—are said to be in the various provincial capitals, could not arrangements be made for those cheques to be delivered right away, and an order be given to the banks that they could be cashed right away, thus avoiding the danger of scalpers exploiting the recipients of these cheques?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, we had of course provided for the distribution of those cheques on December 4 in the whole country, except in Toronto where this distribution would take place on December 5. However, I will certainly look more carefully into this problem, in light of the hon. member's remarks.

From the administrative point of view, it would be extremely difficult to distribute the cheques earlier but I will surely look into it with sympathy.

* * *

[English]

INDUSTRY

DECLINE IN INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION—INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TO STIMULATE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Statistics Canada having just reported that the index of industrial production took another sharp drop in the third quarter, and that in the last month of that quarter the index declined at an annual rate of 23 per cent, would the minister advise the House when he will be announcing to this chamber the steps he and his department are planning to take to reverse this serious, and, now, longstanding trend?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I do not know of any specific statement I will be making in the House. With regard to the most recent figures, though, the hon. member will appreciate that while I do not quarrel with the premise of his question, namely, that industrial production is not what it should be, the most recent figures are, I believe, a result of the very lengthy shutdown in the pulp and paper industry. I am considering a number of productivity proposals and I have been meeting, as the hon. member may know, with various business groups—there is to be another meeting tomorrow evening—and out of this will hopefully come some indication as to means of improving productivity. The real answer, of course, would be a major upturn in the United States market which would be of substantial advantage to us in enabling us to sell more to that country.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINE TO PROVINCIALLY OPERATED UTILITIES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance arising from the question asked by my hon. friend from St. John's East. I gathered from the minister's answer that the provincial marketing boards will be asked to assume jurisdiction to roll back any price increases but that the Anti-Inflation Board will be carrying out the monitoring. Could the hon. gentleman tell the House whether there has been any agreement entered into with respect to this matter, and could he also inform us whether the same principle would be applied to the provincially-operated utilities—hydro commissions, telephone companies and so on—which are engaged in the marketing business in the provincial sphere?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman did not understand me correctly. The suggestion has been made by way of a document which they will be considering tomorrow, that in the same way as the governing or parent body for federal marketing agencies, the National Farm Products Marketing Council, will have the responsibility at the federal level of carrying through effective decisions with regard to a marketing agency, the same kind of parent body should take similar action where it exists in a province, or there should be action by the provincial government itself. In addition, we have proposed to the provinces that goods and services supplied by provincial agencies should be monitored in the same way, for example, Ontario Hydro or the Ontario Liquor Control Board. I would have to say there has been some discussion between the provinces and the federal government as to the manner in which these agencies should be monitored and restricted. This will be another subject for discussion at the meeting tomorrow.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BOARD

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last week I asked him whether he was prepared to consult with the House leader and refer the annual report of the Foreign Investment Review Board, for consideration by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Is the minister in a position to answer that question today?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am, to the extent that I have discussed with the House leader the business to be conducted before, hopefully, we rise on December 19. I think it was generally concluded we would not be able to deal with the matter of the report before that time, but I will be glad to ensure it is referred to the committee in the New Year as appears to be sensible and appropriate.

* * *

HIGHWAY SAFETY

SUGGESTED SURVEY TO IDENTIFY HIGHWAY KILLER STRIPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether in view of the war on crime and accidents in general, he would consider the 6,000 people who were killed on the highways of Canada last year and the 160,000 who were maimed or crippled for life, and advise us whether a survey might be made to identify the killer strips which account for most of these accidents in Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the question has a great deal of merit but I am not sure whether such a survey could be conducted by the federal government even under the umbrella of the war on crime. I will certainly discuss the suggestion with my colleagues and see whether there is something the federal government could be doing. If not, perhaps it is a suggestion which the provinces will co-operate in implementing.

* * *

[Translation]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY OF QUEBEC BILL 64 TO MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Can the minister tell the House if he has been able to check with the government of Quebec whether Bill 64 makes the marketing boards of that province subject to the guidelines and, if so, does he intend to make representations to the government of Quebec?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I just said, tomorrow we shall urge the provincial governments to set their own control over the boards, much as we propose to control federal boards.

* * *

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DELAY IN PRESENTATION OF CREDENTIALS BY CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): I thank hon. members on both sides of the chamber for their good wishes. My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and is on the very important question of France-Canada relations. Could the minister advise the House of the latest progress concerning the cooling of heels by our ambassador to Paris; and would he also add whether we should expect, as a result of the forthcoming visit to Paris of our very responsive Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, that the disgraceful situation will be settled once and for all?

● (1440)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would want to assure the hon. member that there is no disgraceful situation. The Canadian ambassador to the French government has not yet presented his credentials. The proposed date for the presentation of credentials by Mr. Pelletier was postponed, as it was in the case of several other ambassadors who were expected to present their credentials on the same day, at the request of the President because of administrative responsibilities both within and outside France. I would ask the hon. gentleman not to draw any unwarranted conclusions from this postponement, which is quite normal in the circumstances.

Mr. Wagner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister kindly advise the House whether the credentials will be presented prior to a settlement of the postal strike?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POSSIBILITY OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON BROADCASTING POLICY AND DELETION OF CABLEVISION COMMERCIALS

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister received a request for government to government talks with the United States concerning Canadian broadcasting policy in general and the commercial deletion policy of the CRTC specifically?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of Dr. Kissinger's visit to Ottawa some weeks ago the deletion policy was discussed. At that time it was agreed that talks between Canadian and United States officials would be held, subject to the condition that the question was before the courts. These talks have not yet taken place.

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Has the minister been advised through his Washington ambassador or otherwise of the possibility of economic retaliation against Canadian economic interests by the United States in the event that the broadcasting issue is not resolved?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, no such view has been conveyed to me.

* * *

THE MINISTRY

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the hon. Prime Minister, who knows that I do not ask unreasonable questions or make unreasonable demands upon him. Would the Prime Minister tell the House when we may expect the appointment of a Minister of Communications?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition has made a very reasonable request and I will attempt to satisfy him in the very near future.

* * *

ENERGY

URANIUM—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF EXPORT CONTRACTS—ASSURANCE OF FUTURE SUPPLIES FOR CANADA

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the minister's announcement of yet more uranium export contracts brings the total of low-cost Canadian uranium being sold to foreigners to about one-fifth of Canada's total supply, will the government table specific details of the contracts governing these exports?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, these are commercial contracts entered into between exporters and purchasers abroad. They were screened by the Atomic Energy Control Board to ensure that several particular points in our policy were met; first, that the prices met world prices; second, that this uranium was surplus to Canadian needs and that Canadian policy was fully met; and third, that satisfactory safeguard arrangements would be negotiated.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister, therefore, give his assurance to the House that these massive commitments in no way jeopardize Canada's future supplies of uranium?

Mr. Gillespie: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

PROPOSAL THAT OPEN COMPETITION WITH BOARD BE PERMITTED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Is the minister planning an amendment to the National Film Board Act which would delete sections 9 and 11, and does he not think that a 30 year monopoly for the National Film Board is enough to establish it and to let it compete openly with the film industry in general?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have had these representations made to me by a variety of sources within the industry. I have promised to look into them, but I am not sure that is the remedy.

* * *

[Translation]

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENT OF SALT MINES IN ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE IN VIEW OF SHORTAGE

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

As huge quantities of salt have been discovered in the Îles-de-la-Madeleine, and as there seems to be a shortage of salt in Canada, can the minister tell the House whether steps have been taken to exploit those salt mines and make up for the present shortage of salt in this country?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not personally aware of any initiative along these lines. May I take the question as notice so I can inquire for the hon. member and reply to him later.

* * *

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED RATE INCREASE BY NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION—SUGGESTED FREEZE ON PUBLIC UTILITY RATES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a question regarding the Northern Canada Power Commission. On Thursday I asked a similar question and I am sure that today the minister realizes that I am talking about the proposed increase for November, 1976. In view of the fact that wages will not be allowed to increase beyond 10 per cent under the government's anti-inflation program, what steps will the minister take to protect consumers in Yellowknife from this 113 per cent increase; and has the minister considered a freeze or a subsidy on public utility rates until the wage controls are lifted?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, after the question was posed by the hon. member, I checked into it and found that the increase which was proposed for February has been cancelled. But he is quite right in indicating that an application has now been made for an increase in November of next year. I have asked that the increase be examined very carefully and that it be submitted to the Anti-Inflation Board. In addition, the parliamentary Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development of which the hon. member is a member, will have the opportunity to examine the Northern Canada Power Commission on estimates between now and the time that the increase comes into place.

* * *

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OUTLINING HOW MARKETING BOARDS SET PRICES

Mr. Wm. Andres (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Headlines were focussed upon the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency last week, emphasizing the one cent increase in the price of a dozen eggs, but the news media did not see fit to inform the public of any possible reason behind a price change at this time. No mention was made of the large increase in the price of heating fuel, which among other things is a major contributor to the cost of production. CEMA was referred to as representative of all marketing boards, which according to Mrs. Plumptre are price setters.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, would he put it.

Mr. Andres: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether the minister could inform the House how marketing boards actually negotiate prices for their commodities.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

* * *

HEALTH

PROPOSED GRANTS TO HEALTH ORGANIZATIONS WHOSE CHRISTMAS APPEALS HAVE BEEN HURT BY POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the government giving consideration to special hardship or ex gratia grants to the Tuberculosis and Respiratory Diseases Association, the Canadian Mental Health Association, UNICEF and any other group whose Christmas appeals have been literally devastated by the postal strike?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member I deplore the impact of the postal strike on the organizations concerned, and I merely hope that the conflict will be settled as soon as possible; however, I am not, for the time being, considering the possibility of adopting special financial measures in that regard.

* * *

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Postmaster General. Would he advise the House and the people of Canada how much more time he needs before he will recommend that this House move by way of legislation to require a resumption of postal service?

Mr. Speaker: Order. On a previous occasion I have ruled that it was in perfect order to ask whether or not plans were underway or under consideration in regard to taking such a step, but a question asking how much time is going to elapse before certain other events take place has a large hypothetical measure to it and in my view is not permissible.

Mr. Alexander: Then would the minister advise whether he has now reached the stage where he is prepared to recommend to his colleagues that legislation be introduced to see to it that a resumption of normal postal service is at hand?

● (1450)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Well, the hon. gentleman makes his question difficult to answer since he has not specified what type of legislation he has in mind.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I resent the Postmaster General playing footsie with a very important subject. He is well aware of the type of legislation I am discussing. It is back-to-work legislation. Would he now answer the question.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the reason I asked the question in all sincerity was that there are two types of legislation, one asking the government to legislate its own employees back, which normally is reprehensible legislation. The other is legislation which I thought was advanced the other week in a very serious manner which would recommend to the Public Service Staff Relations Board that they hold a secret ballot for the union members which would be much more acceptable in light of the fact that the board is superior to both the government and labour. Probably that would have happened by now if the NDP Party had not in turn stymied us and recommended a 52 per cent increase as basis for a settlement.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE ORDERS OF BOARD SUBJECT TO SCRUTINY OF COMMITTEE ON STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance as soon as the chorus had died down. Having in mind the interpretation placed on statutory instruments by officials of the Privy Council, will the minister affirm the fact that orders of the Anti-Inflation Board and the administrator will in fact be considered as regulations and as such subject to scrutiny by the Joint Committee on Statutory Regulations.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could refer the hon. gentleman to the rather extensive answer I gave on that point to the standing committee when Bill C-73 was before it in response to the hon. member for Halifax who is the joint chairman of the committee. There were some very precise questions in this area and I sought to answer them with the same precision.

* * *

NATIONAL DEFENCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONSTRUCTION OF CONTAINER FACILITY AT WRIGHT'S COVE IN VIEW OF PROXIMITY OF NAVAL MAGAZINE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Because of the time I will add a supplementary. Would the minister indicate to the House the present status and nature of the conversations between his department and the province of Nova Scotia with regard to the container pier facility proposed at Navy Island Cove and as well whether or not the government has determined, in respect of these same discussions, whose ultimate responsibility it is for safety measures and the whole question of the proximity of the proposed development to the naval magazine.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I know the provincial government has a plan to construct a container facility. One of the possible sites was Wright's Cove in the Bedford Basin. We have indicated to the government that the Canadian forces naval magazine is in that area and that it would therefore not be a practical place to build. I understand the provincial government is now considering other locations.

* * *

PENITENTIARIES

MILLHAVEN—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON PUBLICATION OF COMMISSIONER'S REPORT ON GASSING AND BEATING OF INMATES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that the Solicitor General either has neglected or refused up to now to give us a full report on the Millhaven incident of November 3, can he now advise the House whether he can now give us a full report and tell us what the government's policy is in respect of making public the findings of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries in cases of proven beatings or gassing of inmates by guards.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Well, Mr. Speaker, to begin with there is no written report of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries in respect to this incident. It is true there was an incident a short while ago when a guard is alleged to have used gas contrary to the regulations of the penitentiary service. When the officials of the penitentiary found that out they immediately suspended him from duty. He appealed the suspension. That appeal is presently awaiting hearing. We will have more to say once the hearing has been held. It is true that a gassing did take place contrary to the regulations and that one of the inmates was injured to a certain extent as a result of that. There were some other incidents related to that happening.

POSSIBILITY OF PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO GASSING AND BEATING OF INMATES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, would the Solicitor General advise the House whether or not the news report over the weekend to the effect that the Commissioner of Penitentiaries will be conducting public hearings is correct and if, in fact, that will be the case with regard to this incident and other incidents of a similar nature in penitentiaries across Canada.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, what we are considering is an investigation by the correctional ombudsman. She is presently away from Ottawa. I have tried to reach her by phone. I had some preliminary discussions with her. That may be possible.

* * *

MANPOWER

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSIST ESSEX PACKERS EMPLOYEES WHO FACE LOSS OF EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Some days ago I asked the minister what steps his department was considering taking to assist the Essex Packers workers in Hamilton who face the loss of their jobs. I wonder if the minister is now in a position to report any progress in providing assistance in this sorry situation.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable consultation with the representatives of the firm and the union, particularly on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Labour who has a special interest in it. I believe there are some potential offers in the state of development now and I think we will have some news within the next few days.

PENITENTIARIES

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO PREVENT ESCAPES—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF POLICY OF CONCENTRATING INSTITUTIONS IN ONE AREA

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In view of the reported increase in the number of escapes from penal institutions in my riding, including three from Agassiz prison on November 3, two from Matsqui Institution on November 8, one from Agassiz prison on November 21 where a dangerous sex offender escaped in a late model truck carrying the insignia of the Solicitor General and three from Matsqui on November 22 involving one convicted rapist and murderer, one habitual and dangerous criminal, and one habitual criminal, what steps is the Solicitor General taking to deal with these inexcusable situations and to provide security for the communities?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Well, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear about these escapes and I will check into them immediately. All I can tell the hon. member is that in the last two years we have considerably increased our security in the penitentiaries by putting in double fences, new outlook posts and so on, with the result that over the last year and a half our escapes from the penitentiaries have decreased by about 50 per cent. Whether there is a particular problem in the Fraser Valley, I will check that out, but I am very surprised to hear this information.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the lack of security and resultant danger to citizens, will the minister reconsider his policy of concentrating these institutions within a relatively small geographic area?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, that is our policy now. One of the difficulties is getting consent or agreement from other municipalities in British Columbia to accept some of our institutions. We would gladly spread them around the province.

* * *

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION THAT POLITICAL, ECONOMIC SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BE REVIEWED

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the recommendations contained in the 1966 report of the Advisory Commission on the Development of Government in the Northwest Territories, commonly known as the Carrothers report, to the effect that there should be a decennial review of the political, economic and social development in the Northwest Territories, can the Prime Minister advise whether or not he is planning such a review in the immediate future?

● (1500)

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister just caught my eye. I missed the first part of the question.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I am referring to the recommendations contained in the Carrothers report regarding a decennial review of the government in the Northwest Territories. Is the minister considering a review at this time?

Mr. Buchanan: We have been looking at that report and giving some consideration as to whether we should be establishing a similar commission or exactly how we should approach the matter. As you know, the report suggested a decennial review and re-examination of the division of the territories at the time of that review.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TABLING OF TERMS OF REFERENCE OF PANARCTIC AIR CRASH INQUIRY

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies of the terms of reference of the Panarctic air crash inquiry dated November 25, 1975, as well as the name of the commissioner of the inquiry.

* * *

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 3,173, 3,178 and 3,302.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

POLLUTION ABATEMENT TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 3,173—Mr. Marshall:

1. Did the Minister of the Environment offer to enter into contracts with all Canadian paper companies regarding pollution abatement technology cost sharing arrangements so that all paper companies can install facilities to permit recycling of process effluents similar to its contract of $1,158,000 with the Great Lakes Paper Company Ltd. of Thunder Bay and, if so, were offers made to Bowater's Nfld. Ltd., Price Bros. Ltd., and Labrador Linerboard Ltd.?

2. If offers were not made to these companies can they qualify and, if so, what are the terms of reference?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): 1. No. The DPAT Program covers development of new technology and the demonstration of that technology to show that it can work under Canadian industrial conditions. The new technology, once demonstated, precludes entering into contracts with other Canadian companies by the Department of the Environment (the new technology will be freely available to other Canadian companies). Contracts with respect to the Program are awarded as a result of industry initiating action through the submission of a proposal.

2. As the contract for this particular type of technology has been awarded to the Great Lakes Paper Company Ltd., other companies would not qualify for financial assistance. However, should any company in the paper industry submit a proposal pertaining to new pollution abatement technology that could be developed an demonstrated, that company would be eligible for financial assistance through the DPAT Program, given a favourable technical assessment.

● (0000)

STATE OF THE ART OF KNOWLEDGE

Question No. 3,178—Mr. Marshall:

What is (a) Canada's position (b) the meaning of the application of fundamental means to apply "State of the Art of Knowledge" to the management and protection of the marine environment as stated by the Minister of the Environment at the opening session of the 63rd Annual Meeting of the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea in Montreal on September 29, 1975?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Canada's position is that effective management of the living and other resources adjacent to the shores of a coastal state requires that the coastal state have the right and jurisdiction, clearly detailed in international law, which will enable it to manage and protect the marine environment and the resources therein, on the basis of the most up-to-date current information and techniques.

PANARCTIC OILS LTD.

Question No. 3,302—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources aware of the statements in the press attributed to the President of Panarctic Oil during the week of October 20 to 24, 1975 indicating the possibility that Panarctic Oil will purchase three Scandinavian crude oil tankers for transport of Arctic oil to market should that be feasible?

2. Is the Minister aware of the extent of participation in Panarctic Oil by the government and its agents and, if so, to what extent is this participation?

3. Has the Minister examined the implications of going outside Canada for such vessels in terms of the long-term viability and health of the Canadian ship-building industry and trade balance and (a) if so, what conclusions have been reached (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Yes. The federal government has a 45 per cent equity participation in Panarctic Oils Lts.

3. Prior to any decision on the marketing of oil from Arctic Islands sources a thorough appraisal will be made of all transportation possibilities, with full regard to the capabilities of the Canadian ships-building industry.

[Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate).]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESTRAINT OF PROFIT MARGINS, PRICES, DIVIDENDS AND COMPENSATION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of this stage of Bill C-73 I would like to raise a point of order, as I did the other day, regarding the technical relationship of the recommendation with the contents of the bill. I need not repeat what I said the last time with the exception that on the occasion of second reading of the bill on October 22, I raised the question as to clause 26(2) and clause 46, particularly clause 46(2) and what follows, in that they did not conform with and went beyond the concluding words of the recommendation "and to provide for the measure to expire on December 31, 1978". We know that these words are clear, unambiguous and unequivocal. They limit the power of spending money, the application of the act and all those things that flow from it.

Mr. Speaker agreed with me with respect to clause 26(2) but may I point out, with respect, that the Chair said nothing about clause 46(2). I do not have to quote the words with regard to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and the appreciation of the situation by the government House leader, but we did have the undertaking then, at my suggestion that we would rather have the bill amended to conform with the recommendation, or vice-versa; that in any case we would not see the bill withdrawn. The minister thought he was introducing amendments at the committee stage to make clause 26(2) conform in this way. However, I would indicate that the mere use of the words "three years" as against "four years" is not sufficient because contingently, as it is quite easily understood, appointment of the officials concerned who are the ones who offend under clause 26(2) could be made after December 31, 1975, and therefore offend under the Act.

Mr. Speaker, there is such a hubbub in the House that it is difficult to get my voice across to you.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With regard to clause 46(2), may I say that the offending portion consists of all the words after the words "This act expires on December 31, 1978, or on such earlier date as may be fixed by proclamation". At report stage of a bill the only Standing Order that deals with an additional recommendation is 75(6). I quote that Standing Order as follows:

When a recommendation of the Governor General is required in relation to any amendment to be proposed at the report stage of a bill, at least 24 hours' written notice shall be given of the said recommendation and proposed amendment.

However, that provision applies only when there is a government amendment, and that requires a further recommendation. There is on the order paper no amendment proposed by the government to clause 46(2). Consequently, the only alternative is that you, Mr. Speaker, should find that your ruling on clause 26(2) that all the words after "proclamation" in line 9 of page 33 offend against the recommendation is applicable and I ask that Your Honour direct that they be struck out.

Additionally, the continuing defect in clause 26(2) should be corrected by limiting the terms of the chairman and the members to the date in the recommendation. In other words, the amendment should not have been for a period of three years as against four years, but the appointments should be limited to the date December 31, 1978. After all, the recommendation is in the clearest possible terms, in the last words, "to provide for the measure to expire on December 31, 1978". There is no mention in the recommendation of a provision for an order in council to be passed prior to that date and that the order in council be debated in the House.

There is now on the order paper, as motion No. 6, a proposal that proceedings before any board or in the courts should have been initiated prior to December 31, 1978, can continue to their termination. That is a new recommendation, but it applies only to court proceedings. Motion No. 6 reads in part:

—any inquiry, investigation, examination, audit, search or proceeding . . . that was instituted before the expiration of this act—

That is, before December 31, 1978, that arises out of any other such inquiry, investigation, examination, audit, search or proceeding that was instituted before the expiration of this act. Of course, included are the powers and the duties of the chairmen and members of the boards in order to deal with the matters referred to. But there is absolutely nothing in the recommendation which authorizes an order in council to continue the act beyond December 31, 1978, and there is nothing that cures the defect in clause 46(2). On that basis, I ask that the Chair examine my proposals. I do not know what the government wants to do on this occasion, but I and my colleagues will be prepared to listen to what they have to say. However, at the moment the bill is really hung up. The ministry have had full notice of the defects. They have missed out on it, in my submission. I have no desire to hold up the bill, but we must have a bill on which we can proceed properly.

● (1510)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with regard to clause 26(2) I suggest that there is no difficulty in that regard and that quite clearly the bill does provide for a time-frame in which it can receive royal assent. I think there is some expectation that that will happen, so very clearly the maximum period stipulated there is one which would take place within the time-frame set out. Of course, it is not a minimum time-frame but it is a maximum time-frame, and if, as the hon. gentleman says, in the year 1976 it is desired to make an appointment in that particular area, then of course to comply with the statute the appointment would have to be made for a period of less than three years.

My understanding is that the amendments were put in after conversations among the legal advisers of the executive in the Department of Justice and the Law Clerk advising the table. I will be glad to take the direction of the Chair in this regard. I do not intend to offer my own legal opinion on the question but, as Your Honour knows, this was a matter of some consultation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not propose to deal definitively with the point at the moment. I would rather reserve it for some time and see if the matter can be resolved. The fact is that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has made reference to the fact that steps were taken in the committee to clear the difficulty in so far as clause 26 is concerned.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But they did not.

Mr. Speaker: That was my understanding of the remarks this morning. A problem remains, however, in respect of clause 46 which was alluded to briefly in the original argument by the hon. member for Edmonton West in addition to the very direct argument he made about the problem contained in clause 26 and its conflict with the recommendation. As reported at the top of page 8452 of Hansard for October 22, 1975, the hon. member said the following:

Incidentally, clause 46(2) authorizes this House, by regulation prior to the expiry of the bill in 1978, to continue the measure in force as specified in the order of the House. But that provision is not in the recommendation.

That provision remains in the bill at the present time and is not in the recommendation. It would appear, therefore, that the same kind of conflict which exists or existed in respect of clause 26(2) remain in respect of clause 46. However, the manner in which that question might be resolved is perhaps one for discussion. Obviously, the recommendation says that the bill must expire within a specific term, at the end of 1978; leaving in the bill the power by order in council to extend the bill beyond that time certainly would appear to be in direct conflict with that provision. Perhaps I could leave the matter because there are several motions to be discussed. Report stage has already been called for this day and it would seem to me nothing would be lost by carrying on with the several motions on the order paper at this time, in the hope that a resolution of the problem will be made.

In terms of the motions themselves, I would say that consideration has been given to the six motions which are outstanding to be considered at report stage. Only one appears to the Chair to be out of order, and I would be prepared to listen to discussion and argument on it. I refer to motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). Perhaps I could simply indicate the difficulty the Chair sees with that motion. Motion No. 1 proposes, basically, to introduce into the bill an obligation or an element of control of government spending. However laudatory that concept or control may be, the question is twofold. First, is this a bill to control government spending, or to control wages and prices, and is it the introduction of a new concept into the bill to extend to the board the obligation, indeed to put a specific control in percentage terms or in dollar terms on government spending? It would seem to the Chair that that is the case. Second, even it were possible, without going beyond the provisions of the bill, to introduce a new concept into the bill, would it be proper and appropriate to do so by way of the amendment to the particular clause—which is what the hon. member is moving—relating to the application of the bill? Again, it would seem that there is difficulty here.

Contrast that motion with motion No. 2, which directs the board in a particular or specific way to direct its attention toward government spending and to make public its findings in respect of the tabling of estimates. What, in fact, is being suggested in that amendment is not that the board take on the obligation of controlling government spending, but simply that in the powers already given it—which are to make public, or make information known about government spending or policies open to government, among other things, and their effect on inflation, or failure of the government to take advantage of those policies and their effect on inflation—the hon. member proposes to add a specific responsibility, within a certain period of time after the tabling of estimates, the board must make a public declaration in respect of those estimates and the failure or the success of the government in taking advantage of whatever policies were open to it in respect of those estimates.

That directs the board's attention to making public information about government spending and therefore I would submit it is an amendment which the House must consider. Whether it favours it or not is the question the House will decide, but at least it flows from the powers and duties which are placed in the clause which is sought to be amended and does not introduce a new concept. However, simply a statement or a publication about government spending is an extension of the board's powers. Extending it to the point in motion No. 1 where the board would be obligated in fact to control government spending seems to me to be an introduction of a new concept into the bill, and in any case ought not to be introduced under this particular clause. The hon. member for York-Simcoe may want to argue the point.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to hear your reasoning with respect to motion No. 1 and in due course I should like to reply. I was wondering whether the ruling on motion No. 1 could be deferred until later in the debate.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not think there is any objection to having a deferral. The problem is that if Your Honour decides that perhaps there ought to be argument presented at a subsequent time, I direct the attention of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) to the matter of motion No. 2. I argue that that motion is out of order as well and ought not to be dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The intention of the Chair at the present time certainly would be to accommodate hon. members by deferring argument on motion No. 1. However, because of the remarks I have made, I would prefer to hear argument now on motion No. 2. If I cannot be persuaded otherwise, I think the question of motion No. 2 ought to be discussed.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): My argument with reference to motion No. 2 could apply as well to motion No. 1. It is that the hon. member for York-Simcoe, in his motion, seeks, in effect, to delegate powers to the board which presently rest with the House. It is not only a question of a new concept in this bill but it is a whole new concept in our constitutional process.

[Mr. Speaker.]

With regard to motion No. 2, the hon. member wishes to have estimates, when they are tabled in this House, reviewed by the Anti-Inflation Board. There is no greater power or jurisdiction which is protected by this House than that of granting supply, and if we read Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice at page 676, he deals quite extensively with the question of financial procedure. He sets out that the House has an obligation, and indeed a right, to review supply if it is being submitted to it by the Crown. In effect, what the hon. member for York-Simcoe wishes to do by his amendment is to have that particular responsibility removed from the House of Commons and placed with the Anti-Inflation Board.

● (1520)

I can understand that the hon. member for York-Simcoe is rather busy and perhaps would like to see that particular power delegated, but unfortunately there are other members of the House who do not feel that it is one of the prerogatives we should remove from ourselves. When we look at the motion, it is quite clear what it sets out. It says that the Anti-Inflation Board, on top of the other powers it might have, shall—> —make explicit such implications of the failure of the federal government to co-operate in combating inflation by monitoring the respective main and supplementary estimates of expenditures for each fiscal year of such government and publicly commenting, within 21 days after any such estimates are made public, upon any failure, disclose in such estimates, by such government to combat inflation.

Evidently the hon. member for York-Simcoe does not understand the purpose of estimates. Estimates are submitted to this House in order to secure, by the approval of the House, supply for the government. It is the responsibility of this House to review those estimates and dispose of them by approving or withholding supply to the government. By delegating that particular responsibility to the Anti-Inflation Board which is responsible indirectly to this House, the House would be delegating its responsibility to that board. That would not only introduce a new concept on this bill but would seek to amend our constitution by that fact. I would suggest that this particular argument could apply as well to motion No. 1.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not object to your decision to defer debate with regard to the procedural acceptability of motion No. 1, but in case it is deferred until a time later this day when I might be in committee, I would say briefly that although I do not agree with the substance of motion No. 1, it seems to me there is a good case for its procedural acceptability. What the hon. member is trying to amend is a clause which provides:

> This act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada—

It seems to me that all he is trying to do in motion No. 1 is to spell out the way in which the act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada. I will say no more on that point, however. I have put in my nickel's worth in case I happen to be tied up in committee when the deferred debate takes place.

With respect to motion No. 2, again I am not in sympathy with the substance of the proposal, but it seems to me that the hon. member's right to make the motion should be defended. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) suggested that motion No. 2 would delegate from the House of Commons to an outside body certain responsibilities that belong to this House of Commons. I do not read the motion that way at all. As I read the motion, what the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is seeking is to give to the Anti-Inflation Board, amongst the studies that it can carry on, amongst the reports that it can make, the right to make a report expressing its opinion on the extent to which the government may be failing to live up to its own anti-inflationary precepts.

It is the responsibility of the government and parliament to make the final decisions. This motion does not give the board the power to make any decisions; it simply expands on the power of the board to make reports expressing opinions. I draw to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council that already in clause 12(1)(e) permission is given to the board to comment on——the role to be played by businesses and groups of employees in combating inflation and the implications of the failure of governments, businesses and groups of employees to co-operate in combating inflation.

Mr. Speaker, all the permission does which is already there is to give the Anti-Inflation Board the power to comment on what it believes to be governmental failures. The hon. member for York-Simcoe wants to go on and give it the power to monitor the estimates, main and supplementary, and issue its views as to the extended failures of the government. I agree in practice with what the hon. member for Nipissing is saying, that these are things we should be doing here and that we should not delegate this responsibility—even the right to make these comments—on to someone else. This is parliament's job. But at this point we are not dealing with the acceptability of the substance or the merit of the motion; we are simply dealing with the question of whether it is procedurally acceptable. I think that motion No. 2, even though I am against it in substance, should be allowed procedurally.

