House of Commons Debates

FIRST SESSION—ELEVENTH PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1909.

To-day being the first day of the meeting of the First Session of the Eleventh Parliament for the despatch of business,—Thomas Barnard Flint, Esquire, M.A., LL.B., D.C.L., Clerk of the House of Commons, Lieut.-Col. Henry Robert Smith, Sergeant-at-Arms, Jean Baptiste Réné Laplante, Esq., Assistant Clerk, and Arthur Henry O'Brien, M.A., Law Clerk, Commissioners appointed by Dedimus Potestatem for administering the oath to members of the House of Commons, all attending according to their duty, James G. Foley, Esquire, Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, delivered to the said Thomas Barnard Flint a roll containing a list of the names of such members as had been returned to serve in this parliament.

The aforesaid commissioners did administer the oath to the members who were present, which being done, and the members having subscribed the roll containing the oath, they repaired to their seats.

The clerk of the House said: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication from the secretary of His Excellency the Governor General:—

Ottawa, January 19, 1909.

Sir,—I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to inform you that the Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to open the session of the Dominion parliament on Wednesday, the 20th inst., at three o'clock.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. HANBURY-WILLIAMS,
Colonel.
Governor General's Secretary.

The Clerk of the House of Commons.

A message was delivered by Captain Ernest John Chambers, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

His Honour the Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate, when the Speaker of the Senate said:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the cause of his summoning the present parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but, tomorrow, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this parliament.

And the House being returned.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Flint, I have the honour to invite the House to the performance of its initial duty at this, its first meeting for this parliament. Of the importance of the duties which attach to the high office of Speaker it is superfluous to say a single word; of the qualities which that office demands from its occupant it is superfluous also to speak. The fact that the member chosen to fill that responsible office has already had experience in the discharge of similar duties, gives us an additional security that integrity, dignity, fairness and impartiality will distinguish his tenure of the Speaker's chair. In the British Parliament, which is the mother and model of all parliaments, there is an unwritten law, unwritten, but absolute and certain, and never varying, that once a Speaker always a Speaker, and so the Speaker of the House of Commons is re-elected again and again until his removal by death, or his incapacitation through illness or advancing age. This custom is well calculated to produce, and it has produced in the British House of Commons, the highest measure of efficiency in Mr. Speaker. For my part I have often regretted that we have not adopted such a rule in Canada. I remember when in the commencement of my career as leader of the Liberal party, I suggested to Sir John Macdonald, then Prime Minister, that such a practice would be expedient, but my suggestion was not accepted. In the same line of thought, shortly after the general elections, I consulted with the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Sutherland), who during the last parliament had discharged the duties of Speaker with signal ability and success and to the satisfaction of all parties in this House, as to whether or not it would be advisable for us to adopt the British practice. My hon. friend from North Essex represented to me that unless radical changes were made in our method of procedure and in the manner in which we treated the Speaker, whilst the honour was great the sacrifices which the incumbent of the office had to make were still greater. The assiduity which is expected of the Speaker in the discharge of his duties, especially when we consider the increasing length of the sessions of parliament in later years, has made it impossible for the Speaker of this House to attend to his private affairs and has forced him to practically disassociate himself from all other avocations. Again, reverting to the English practice, I may observe that it has been the practice of the House of Commons in England, not only by a long series of precedents, but by actual statute, to, in many ways, make the office of Speaker equal to a judicial office. In fact, the Speaker of the English House of Commons is treated as a judge of the land. He is expected to devote himself entirely to his office; he is the recipient of the large salary of £5,000 per annum, and should he resign office he is given a pension of £4,000 a year, with a peerage added. Of course we cannot give a peerage to our late speaker; we might perhaps give him a senatorship, but that has not been the practice up to the present time. We certainly cannot give Mr. Speaker a very large salary, and as to a pension I have a very vivid memory that pensions are not popular in this country. It is, therefore, not a tradition of the House of Commons of Canada to re-elect Mr. Speaker for a second term, but it is a tradition of our Houses and it is the fitness of things that the member of the Houses who ranks next to the Speaker in the previous parliament should be called to the chair. We are fortunate that in the Deputy Speaker during last parliament, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Charles Marcil) we have available a gentleman of the highest character, and who discharged the duties of Deputy Speaker to the satisfaction of all of us who were here last parliament. I, therefore, have great pleasure in proposing to the House the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Charles Marcil) as Speaker. At the opening of the first session of last parliament the hon. gentleman was elected to the deputy speakership, and as chairman of Committees of the Whole, and as occupying the chair itself on frequent occasions, I think I can appeal to the judgment of hon. gentlemen who were members of the last parliament that Mr. Marcil discharged those duties with grace, with dignity, with fairness, with impartiality and with marked ability. Hon. gentlemen who were members of this House during last parliament will agree with me that my hon. friend (Mr. Charles Marcil) has been eminently endowed by nature for the high position. We know that by experience he has accumulated a vast store of parliamentary knowledge, and we have every reason, therefore, to believe that in the discharge of the duties of the office, to which I hope he will be called by the unanimous voice of this House, he will give satisfaction to both sides, holding even the scales of justice between contending parties without favour to any and with fear of none. I move, seconded by Mr. Paterson:

That Charles Marcil, Esq., member representing the electoral district of Bonaventure do take the chair of this House as Speaker.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Flint: The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has described very fully and very accurately the position of the First Commoner in the Imperial House at London. I am inclined to share the regret he has expressed that the traditions which have surrounded the office of Speaker in that House have not in all respects been adhered to in this House. I refer to the continuance of the Speaker in office from one parliament to another. I recollect very well being in Great Britain in 1895, when there was a great deal of discussion in the British press as to whether or not Sir William Court Gully, who had been elected as Speaker in a previous parliament, should be continued in that office under the Conservative administration which had come into power in 1895. There were a great many arguments pro and con. Mr. Gully had held the Speakership only a very short time. But, in the end, the immemorial traditions prevailed, and he was re-elected without any opposition whatever. I, of course, realize that, in this country, our conditions are somewhat different in many respects to which I need not further allude. And, possibly, it has been in view of these that it has not been regarded as practicable to carry out in every way the traditions of the Imperial House. But I trust that in another respect, in respect of the dignity which surrounds the office, and the impartiality which must be observed by any Speaker if he is to retain the respect and maintain control of the House, I trust that in all these we have not at any time been behind—at least, not very much behind—the traditions of the Imperial House.

The Prime Minister has referred to the nature of the office of Speaker. It has been described in a recent very elaborate historical account of the British House of Commons and the procedure therein as predominantly a judicial office. And it is a judicial office. The Speaker must have regard to the rules, must interpret the rules; he must interpret the rules, not as a member of the political party with which he has been associated in the past, but as representing, not only the majority, but the minority in this House.

So far as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) is concerned, I can only say that in the course of my experience of him as Chairman of Committees, and, on occasion, in the exercise of the functions of the office of Speaker during the absence of the Speaker, he has conducted himself with dignity and impartiality; and, upon more than one occasion, of a rather trying character, I observed him to use a great deal of tact.

Now, there has been a subject brought to the attention of the public of this country in connection with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcil). I refer to what is well known to every member of this House—the allusions that have been made to his methods of campaigning. I do not propose, this afternoon, to affirm or deny any statements which have been made in the press; I have not the evidence at my command which would enable me to do so. But, so far as the system itself is concerned, I say that the system of offering bribes to constituencies in this country is a vicious one, and that, so far as I am concerned, I lifted up my voice during the last parliament in favour of the prohibition by statute of such acts; and I hope some day to see this wrong righted in Canada by statute. But, so far as that is concerned, the whole subject will undoubtedly be discussed later on in this House from a very much wider and more comprehensive standpoint than would be possible to-day. I do not consider it fitting that I should say more on that subject at this moment.

It would perhaps be permitted to me to say, without in the slightest degree desiring to be disrespectful, or to be understood in any offensive sense, that the very judicial quality with which the Speaker of this House is invested would negative any idea in the mind of any one of us, and I am sure in the mind of the hon. gentleman himself, that the person filling such a position could be a suppliant for favours from the administration from day to day in respect of his constituency. I take that for granted. To take any other view would be derogatory to the dignity of parliament and would lead inevitably to the decadence of our parliamentary institutions. I trust that I shall be understood in these remarks as laying down a principle which ought not to be gainsaid by any hon. member of this House. And, having said so much, I dismiss that part of the subject with the assurance that the whole question, so far as it deserves discussion, will be brought forward before the end of this parliament. I have nothing further to say at this moment.

The motion being put to the House,

The Clerk of the House (Mr. T. B. Flint) declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Charles Marcil, Esquire, member for the electoral division of Bonaventure, duly elected to the Chair of the House.

Mr. Marcil was conducted from his seat in the House to the Speaker's chair by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Hon. Wm. Paterson.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Speaker-elect). I beg to tender to this House my sincere and hearty thanks for the high honour it has conferred upon me by electing me as its Speaker. It will be my pleasure, as well as my duty, to endeavour to deserve that high honour by dealing with all questions which come before me in my official character with firmness and impartiality. I am fully sensible of my unfitness for the position, but I rely confidently upon the co-operation of hon. members on both sides of the House to assist me in maintaining our rules and regulations, in vindicating our rights and privileges, and in preserving the freedom and dignity of debate, according to ancient usages.

(Translation.) I beg to tender to this House my most sincere thanks for the high honour it has conferred upon me by electing me to the high office of Speaker.

It is my most ardent wish to deserve that high mark of confidence by discharging with fairness and impartiality the duties of the office entrusted to me.

I rely confidently on your co-operation to assist me in my endeavours to uphold our rights and privileges and also in safeguarding the freedom and the dignity of our debates, according to our established rules and parliamentary traditions.

This House could have called to the Speaker's Chair a member more deserving of such a favour.

I am fully confident, however, that my colleagues will continue to favour me, as in the past, with their kind co-operation and allow me to rely on their indulgence.

The Sergeant at Arms then placed the Mace on the Table of the House.

ADJOURNMENT—INQUIRIES FOR PAPERS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the House adjourns, might I inquire of the Prime Minister whether or not the report of Mr. Justice Cassels in respect of the matters entrusted to him by order in council during last session has been presented? I would like also to inquire what is the cause of the delay in the printing and distribution of the second instalment of evidence taken before Mr. Justice Cassels? The first instalment of that evidence was received early in October last in printed form. The resolution passed by this House last session provided that the evidence should be printed from day to day for the use of the members, but we have not received a second instalment of the evidence. I have made inquiry of the proper officers, but I cannot obtain any very satisfactory explanation except that the delay is due to some difficulty in the Printing Bureau. I would like to know when it is anticipated the balance of the evidence will be placed before the House in printed form.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am informed that the report of Mr. Justice Cassels has not yet been received, but is expected either to-morrow or the day after. I have this information only at second-hand, but I believe it can be relied upon. I shall have to make inquires before I can satisfy my hon. friend as to why the balance of the evidence has not been printed. I understand that no evidence has been printed since the early part of October. It so happened that in October we were all so busy that we would not have had time to read that evidence, but that busy time is now over and we will be able to read it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That busy time was over some weeks ago. When do the government propose to lay on the table of the House the treaties of which we have had some notice through the public press? Have those treaties been signed and will they be presented at an early date?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. All treaties which have been signed, except the last treaty, were laid before the House last session, I think in July. The last treaty which has been signed, relating to the international waters, will be laid before the House as soon as we have received an official copy.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Only one treaty has been signed recently?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Only one, with regard to the boundary waters.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THURSDAY, January 21, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication from the secretary of His Excellency the Governor General, as follows:

Ottawa, January 20, 1909.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber to formally open the session of the Dominion Parliament on Thursday the 21st instant at three o'clock p.m.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. HANBURY-WILLIAMS, Col.,
Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons.

A message was delivered by Captain Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of your honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

Then the Hon. CHARLES MARCIL, Speaker-elect, said:

May it please Your Excellency:

The House of Commons has elected me their Speaker though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their King and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to His Majesty's person and government, and, not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open parliament by a speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned to the Commons Chamber:

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to state that the House, having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen on me, and, in your names, and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 1) respecting the administration of Oaths of Office.—Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier (Prime Minister).

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In welcoming you to the performance of your duties at the first Session of a new Parliament, I desire to acknowledge with devout thankfulness the abundant harvest with which Divine Providence has again blessed us.

The Quebec Tercentenary festivities in July, which were honoured by the gracious presence of His Royal Highness The Prince of Wales, as representing His Majesty, marked an epoch in the history of the Dominion. The generous support given to this National Celebration by the Federal Parliament and Provincial Legislatures, and by the peoples of Canada, of the other Dominions and of the United Kingdom, emphasized the community of sympathy which binds the various parts of the British Empire to each other, and to the Throne and Person of His Majesty the King. The presence of representatives from the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Newfoundland, and from the great and friendly Republics of France and the United States, with the ships of war of the three nations, served not only to add lustre to the occasion, but to provide an assurance of increasing amity and peace.

I have much pleasure in announcing that a Treaty relating to the Great Lakes and other International Waterways has been agreed upon between His Majesty and the Government of the United States of America and is now awaiting ratification. Both countries are to be congratulated on having arrived at an amicable settlement which I trust will remove during the lifetime of the Treaty many vexed questions from the field of controversy. The Treaty and papers relating thereto will be laid before you in due course.

A little more than a year ago, the whole civilized world entered into a period of commercial, industrial and financial depression, which may not yet have completely spent its force; signs there are, however, that it is gradually passing away. Whilst it is hardly disputable that owing to the abundance and elasticity of her resources Canada has suffered less than other nations, this depression has seriously affected our trade, producing an appreciable shrinkage in the public revenue, and calling for exceptional caution in the administration of our national affairs.

The rapid settlement of the new provinces calls for new lines of transportation. The construction of the Transcontinental Railway has been vigorously pressed forward during the last year. The line was open for the carrying of the crops from Winnipeg to the Battle river, a distance of 675 miles.

Exploratory surveys for a railway from the western wheat fields to Hudson's bay are being pushed energetically. Four parties have been at work since August last. Upon their report it will be possible to reach a decision as to both the route to be followed and the approximate cost. The provision of the Dominion Lands Act of last session for the sale of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads has created a new source of revenue that will be sufficient to bear the cost of the railway to Hudson's bay without burdening the ordinary revenue. From September 1, when the Act came into force, until January 1, sales of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads have amounted to over two million acres, all subject to homestead settlement conditions.

The total volume of immigration has not reached the high figure of previous years, but the number of those seeking homes on our unoccupied lands has been fully maintained during the last season, and, owing to the ever closer supervision of the immigration branch of the public service, the character of these new inhabitants of Canada seems to be of the highest, and promises no small addition to the wealth of the country.

The government of the United Kingdom having expressed its willingness to include a representative of Canada among its delegates to the conference, held at Shanghai, to investigate the opium trade, my Government has been pleased to welcome an offer so significant of Canada's growing importance, and on its recommendation the government of the United Kingdom has accordingly appointed a member of the Dominion Parliament to be a member of the commission.

Representatives of Canada participated lately in the permanent establishment and organization of the International Institute of Agriculture, with its headquarters at Rome, an event of interest to our country in whose economic system agriculture plays so great a part. It is gratifying to note that among the forty-eight States adhering to the Institute recognition of Canada's agricultural importance was shown by election of our representatives to some of the highest offices of the Institute.

The appalling calamity which has befallen Sicily and Southern Italy and caused a total destruction of life and property absolutely unprecedented and unequalled in the long series of historic disasters, has induced my government to offer assistance for the immediate relief of the hundreds of thousands of sufferers who were helpless against famine and all its consequent horrors. I confidently hope that you will approve its action.

In pursuance of an announcement made during the concluding session of last parliament, a commission was appointed to examine the various lines of railway connected with the Intercolonial Railway and which might become valuable feeders thereto. The report of this commission has been received and will be placed before you.

The commissioner appointed for investigating the conduct of officers in the Department of Marine and Fisheries has concluded his labour, but has not yet reported. His report, however, is expected at an early date and when received will be placed in your hands.

A measure will be submitted to you, based upon similar legislation enacted in 1906 by the parliament of the United Kingdom, aiming at the repression of the payment of secret commissions and gratuities both in public and private business.

You will be asked to consider measures relative to insurance, the civil service, immigration, naturalization and other subjects.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The accounts of the last year will be laid before you.

The estimates for the coming year will be submitted at an early date; they have been prepared with a due regard for economy consistent with the requirements of the public service.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I pray the Divine Providence that it may guide your deliberations, and that they may tend to a further increase in the prosperity of our country and the well-being of our people.

Mr SPEAKER.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of parliament of the Dominion of Canada, be taken into consideration on Monday next.

He said: It was our intention to proceed to-morrow with the speech, but several members have suggested to me that Monday would be preferable. We are in the hands of the House and if there is no objection I will say Monday.

Mr. FOSTER. Why delay?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very good—to-morrow.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this House under Rule 10, such select committee to be composed of the following members: Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Messrs. Borden (Halifax), Paterson, Fielding, Haggart (Lanark), Calvert and Taylor (Leeds), and that the portion of Rule 10 limiting the number of members of said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

Report of the Postmaster General for the year ended March 31, 1908; Report of the Department of Labour for the year ended March 31, 1908.—Mr. Lemieux.

ADJOURNMENT—GRAND TRUNK HOTEL SITE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax.) Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourns I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if he would be good enough to give to the House at some early opportunity, if he cannot do so to-day, information as to the present condition of the negotiations, if there be any negotiations, for the erection of an hotel on a portion of the grounds of parliament. The Prime Minister will recollect that an order in council was passed some weeks before the commencement of last session by which a portion of Major's Hill park was proposed to be conveyed to the Grand Trunk Railway Company for the purpose of the erection of an hotel thereupon. The matter seemed to be of some urgency because the consent of parliament was not asked in the first instance and a Bill had to be passed afterwards for the purpose of ratifying what the government had done. According to the present conditions there would not seem to have been any great urgency for dealing with the matter before parliament assembled, because, so far as I can see, the only thing since accomplished has been the construction of a fence, no doubt of a very artistic and beautiful design on the land. I presume that is not intended as the hotel. If it were, I should be inclined to suggest that it should at least be roofed in. I most sincerely hope there will never be a hotel erected there, but inasmuch as the matter was regarded as one of urgency, we should have some explanation why that particular step was taken as nothing whatever has been done since. I am not aware that the conveyance of the property has ever been laid on the table. If any such conveyance has been made, it should be laid on the table at the earliest possible moment together with a statement of all the conditions, if any, imposed by the government on the corporation, whether in the terms of the conveyance itself or otherwise, so that the House should be made acquainted at the earliest possible moment with the actual conditions as the matter now stands.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think I can gratify the curiosity of my hon. friend. Nothing has been done since last session when the Bill was passed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Where, then, was the urgency?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It was the need of a hotel.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yet nothing has been done.

THE MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my right hon. friend in a position to give us any information as to when the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) is likely to take his seat in the House?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. On this point I cannot gratify the curiosity of my hon. friend. He is much more inquisitive than his neighbour and upon a more delicate subject. The Minister of Inland Revenue has had a misfortune which has happened to other members of former governments to which I think my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is not a stranger. My hon. friend is not as sympathetic as he should be.

Mr. FOSTER. One more question. Would my right hon. friend be able at all to satisfy the laudable curiosity of the House as to whether the commercial negotiations in that regard are progressing favourably?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know what my hon. friend means. If he means anything which is in his line of thought, it is not in our line of thought at all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. More likely in your line of action.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 4 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, January 22, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from William Sloan, Esq., his resignation as member for the Electoral District of Comox-Atlin. I accordingly issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said Electoral District.

REPORTS PRESENTED,.

The report was ordered to be printed forthwith.

Report of the investigation by Mr. Justice Cassels concerning the Department of Marine and Fisheries.—Hon. L. P. Brodeur.

The report was ordered to be printed forthwith.

Report of the Secretary of State for 1907; also, Civil Service List of Canada for 1908.—Hon. Chas. Murphy.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. WM. F. TODD (Charlotte, N.B.). Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I think it is befitting in me first to ask for the time-honoured indulgence of this House to a new member. I have heard, since I have arrived here, of the kind courtesy and consideration which is always extended to new members who address this House for the first time, and I trust that I may receive to-day from both sides of the House consideration and patience in the few remarks that I have to make. I am deeply conscious of the honour that has been conferred upon me and the county that I have the pleasure to represent in moving this address, and I hope that I shall make a speech that will be satisfactory to the members of this side of the House at least; for I feel that I come here to take my part as one of the young workers of this House. My desire is, Mr. Speaker, that in all my course in this House, I shall always bear with me the feeling that I have ever been courteous and gentlemanly to my fellow-members on both sides. I have come here to take part with my friends on the Government side in endeavouring to solve the great problems that will come up in our effort to make of this Canada of ours such a nation as she is destined to be, and to march forward with them in that progress as a nation which we and those who follow us during the years of the century to come, have to undertake.

The first clause in the speech from the Throne refers to the abundant harvest which a kind Providence has granted us. Mr. Speaker, a kind Providence will always grant us a bountiful harvest, because the agricultural industry of this country, as of any large country, is the one that represents the largest population and the largest business interest in the country. It is the only creative industry that Canada or any other country possesses, because, as we are well aware, while the manufacturing industries transform raw materials into the manufactured products, there is in agriculture that divine impress upon the soil which nourishes the seed from which grows the immense crops which are so gratifying to us, and which add so much to the wealth of the country.

In giving agriculture the first place among our national interests, we are only following the natural order and giving to that great industry the rank to which it is entitled. Among our great interests that of agriculture comes first in importance, the lumbering second, then the mining and then the fisheries. When I speak of agriculture as the only creative industry, what other industry, I would ask, is there which as in agriculture out of itself, out of the mere seed that is put in the ground and out of the four elements added to the soil, gives a return of ten for one? When we consider that ninety-three per cent of what goes into these crops is given by the air and the sun, when we consider that the immense power thus given, is estimated at 2,000 horse-power per acre, and when we consider further that the creative power thus given, equal to ninety-three parts out of the hundred, will ever be at our hands to furnish those countless crops, we can well say that Canada may look to the reaping of countless wealth from the cultivation of her soil. It is estimated that we have in the Northwest Territories 171,000,000 acres well adapted for agriculture, and, according to the reports during the past year, nearly 100,000,000 bushels of wheat were grown in the Dominion, most of it in the western country. The great wealth which is in store for this Dominion we know will spring in a great measure from the virgin soil of the west. It is by means of the wealth which we expect to derive from these western prairie lands that we hope to enlarge our transportation facilities and thus give impetus to all our commercial interests. When we consider that the great west of Canada, with a population estimated at 6,500,000 for the whole Dominion, raised nearly one hundred million bushels of wheat last year, we can well feel proud and assured of our future. The great republic to the south, with its population of 90,000,000, and which claims to be the richest country under the sun, only raised last year a crop of 660,000,000 bushels, small in comparison with ours, when we consider the difference in population. With her soil in the western states largely depleted, her farmers are travelling over to our country and taking up lands in our territory, which is the best tribute possible to our superiority as a storehouse of agricultural wealth.

I come from the far east, from a country bordering upon the sea, I come from New Brunswick, where we have also rich farming lands, still we know that the immigrants from the old world are more likely to be attracted by these western prairie lands, which have lain fallow for centuries, and which will give the farmer the maximum of profit without subjecting him to the expense of adding to that soil the fertilizers which are found necessary in the east. But no doubt the day will come when the immigrants from the mother country will see in the eastern provinces lands which, scientifically cultivated, will give a handsome return on the investment besides enjoying the advantages of being nearer the central market and having cheaper transportation facilities. From the agricultural production of this country comes a large part of the revenue which we enjoy, through our tariff, the larger part of that revenue is no doubt due to the immense wheat production of the west, and it is only due to the agricultural interests that we should furnish, out of that revenue, the needed railway and water facilities to get their crops to the markets of the world.

The next paragraph in the speech has reference to the Quebec Tercentenary. I had not the pleasure of visiting during that celebration that historic city which, by the years of her great struggles has given us zest to work for the building up of this empire. I refer to this subject with special interest because in my own province, and close to my own home, in the summer of 1603, in July—the very month in which the Quebec celebration took place—Champlain with some of his followers from old France sailed up our river, named by them, and still called the St. Croix, to the island of St. Croix, where they essayed to establish the new France. In this hope they settled upon that island in our river, believing that to that settlement they could bring many from old France to join with them in building up France's new empire in the west. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, though, in the end, it has resulted in that which is a matter of pride to your race and of gain to lower Canada, that the struggles of these colonists did not win success. Their ships sailed back, leaving seventy-nine of these people on the island of St. Croix, people who had no idea of the winter and its frightful intensity. In the hardship of that winter and the struggles against their surroundings, thirty-five of these French settlers died and were buried on that island of St. Croix, and twenty others nearly met their death. When the ships came back next summer with supplies for the little colony, the remnant of the colonists hailed them with delight. Those that were living were put aboard the vessels and were carried away from this island which since then has been largely washed away. And now it is our pride and glory that, four years later, this same intrepid discoverer, Champlain, sailed up the St. Lawrence river and on the third of July founded the historic city of Quebec. It is with pleasure that we read the account of the splendid celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of that event, attended by the representatives of so many nations and reenacting the trials, the war, the struggles of the early days in pageants that were watched with delight by vast assemblages of people. It is with pride we realize that, after three hundred years, this strong race that established the gateway of its new empire at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, and that was so long hostile to the British race, showed clearly in these celebrations their loyalty to the British Crown, showed that they were ready to march forward shoulder to shoulder with the English-speaking race in the upbuilding of this new nation.

Another subject mentioned in the speech from the Throne is the arrangement of a treaty concerning the great lakes and international waterways. In a part of that treaty, we of my own county are especially interested. I can only say that it is pleasant to know that Canada, so young as she is, has now the right to make treaties, and that the friction which has existed between the United States and Canada over these fishery matters is now about to be cleared away. We have every reason to hope that, in relation to our immense fisheries, covering in the great lakes 140,000 miles, and in the workable fisheries of the coast 200,000 miles, the frictions and troubles that have existed in the past will be wiped away and that this treaty will settle these matters at least for a number of years to come.

We are also reminded by the speech from the Throne of the commercial, industrial and financial depression which has existed. On all sides in the American community near to which I live, it has been a subject of wonder that during the great financial depression which so disastrously affected the United States, Canada was so little affected. They see that Canada's resources and her banking system are such that, in the eyes of the world at large, Canada seemed hardly to feel this crisis. I believe, as is intimated in the speech from the Throne, that we have now tided over the worst of the financial depression and that, through bountiful crops and through the prosperity of our manufacturers, we shall now see the early return of financial prosperity.

The transportation question, which is also referered to in the speech, is a burning question. And, as I said a moment or two ago, our contribution to the settling of these problems depends upon our revenue. While, as I have already said, the agricultural interests, lumbering and the fisheries do not need any tariff, yet, if in times of prosperity the people of these interests see fit to make large contributions to the treasury of this country, I feel sure that when prosperity returns this government will spend for the benefit of these interests the sums necessary for obtaining for them larger markets. Our fishermen need more protection through harbour lights, lighthouses, breakwaters and wharfs. And I feel confident that, as rapidly as possible, appropriations will be given for these works, and that this House will approve expenditures for the benefit of our great industries.

There is a clause relating to immigration. It is with great pleasure that we read the official returns from the Department of Immigration, and learn that there is coming into our further west, our middle west and portions of the east, so fine a class of settlers. Especially are we pleased to see so many coming in from the neighbouring republic, bringing with them the skill and knowledge they have acquired in the pursuit of agriculture in their own country, and the energy and means of their own which they will contribute to the development of the resources of this new country. Each settler brings with him a boundless faith in this new country of his adoption, and fairly realizes that he is making of Canada a competitor with all countries in the markets of the world, he is surprised to find when he comes here natural resources of a richness that he never dreamed of in his own country.

Reference is also made in the address to the disastrous earthquake which recently occurred in Sicily and Southern Italy; and I am sure that all Canadians were glad to hear that the government had made so generous a grant to the sufferers from that great calamity. We do not know why such things happen, we do not know what may be the inscrutable designs of divine Providence in permitting such disasters to take place; we only know and are happy to see that this great calamity has evoked feelings of sympathy from all nations, which are a credit to human nature itself. Not only Canada but many other countries have contributed many thousands of dollars for the relief of the sufferers from that earthquake.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great pleasure to me to be able to join with hon. members on this side of the House in congratulating ourselves and the country on the magnificent heritage which we possess in this Canada of ours. You may call her My Lady of the Snows, if you will. Though now robed in white, she will soon be clothed in robes of emerald green and a little later clad in the golden vestments of a bounteous harvest. Certainly we have reason to be proud of this country; we are glad to feel, as I have said before, that we control the largest fisheries in the world; we have in our possession millions of acres of arable and fertile soil, and many other resources of wealth which can never be taken from us. We are already reaping the benefits of science in the various arts employed in the development of this country, and we feel how necessary it is that we should not fritter away our natural resources, but husband them to as full an extent as possible, in order to make of Canada as great and as wealthy a country as the republic to the south of us.

Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in moving that a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to the speech from the Throne.

Mr. TODD.

Mr. JOSEPH P. TURCOTTE (Quebec County). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to second the motion made by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. F. Todd). My pleasure in doing so is further intensified at the though that in each case, has a county been wrested from Her Majesty's loyal oposition and added to the realm of this government.

The county of Charlotte, along the coast of the Atlantic, and bathed by that historical river St. Croix, the witness of Champlain's first attempt at colonization within our bounds, and that glorious county of Quebec, wherein lie our great battlefields and are enshrined the purest traditions of the Dominion's French province, have in that way both asserted their confidence in the liberal and progressive policy followed by our statesmen for the last twelve years. The trend of popular feeling thus evidenced throughout the country regardless of local, religious or national differences, is sure proof that the government are working in the interest of the country at large.

It is now incumbent upon us, Mr. Speaker, to consider the speech from the Throne, and to voice the feeling of the House in regard to it. I am in sympathy with the hon. member for Charlotte when he suggests that we should extend our thanks to His Excellency for the courtesy shown towards the House, and at the same time our congratulations regarding the general policy followed by his government. Judging from what has taken place at our first sitting, it would seem to me that such was the unanimous feeling of the House.

It was not without some misgivings that I came to take my seat in this House, having surmised from what appeared in the papers, that this was a place for everlasting discussions and downright obstruction. Those misgivings no longer exist. At the opening of the session, I heard from the mouth of the Prime Minister, a proposal of the greatest import: we were called upon to decide who should preside over the debates in this House as long as this parliament lasts. The proposal was made, the House agreed to it without discussion, and to-day we have at our head a man of experience, whose past services are the best assurance that the dignity of this House will be duly safeguarded. I am thus led to believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is customary with the government to introduce none but commendable measures. The opposition being deprived thereby of all occasion for criticism. In fact, it would have been impossible to open this first session of parliament under more auspicious circumstances.

Now, if we pass on to a consideration of the speech from the Throne, I may say it appears to me as comprising two parts quite distinct from one another. The first shows how friendly is the intercourse between the representative of the Crown and the representatives of the people. Such good nature evidenced by the head of the executive is not the mere outcome of parliamentary usage. We are aware that His Excellency is in sympathy with the Canadian people, a fresh proof of which is to be found in the celebration of the Quebec tercentenary, to which His Excellency makes a telling reference in the speech from the Throne.

In listening to the utterances of the representative of the Crown, the splendours of the tercentenary celebration were vividly brought back to our minds. Old Quebec was seen once more amidst fairylike surroundings ; the august heir of our sovereign resting in yonder citadel, under the protection of the guns ; surrounding him, the official representatives of the various provinces of the Dominion, besides those of sister colonies and of several powerful nations ; friendly fleets flying over the expanse of the finest port in the world, the colours of Great Britain, of France, of the United States, and covering the fields, crowds of people who had hastened from all parts of Canada and foreign countries to pay homage to the immortal founder of the Canadian nation.

As we all know, His Excellency was, within constitutional bounds, the leading and inspiring mind of that national celebration. To my mind, we should be mindful of it, and grateful for it, and that part of the speech from the Throne is worthy of our full approval.

The second part has reference to measures which are submitted to us. I do not propose pointing them out seriatim. On the whole, they give the impression that the diplomatic work of the government is constantly expanding. It was diplomacy, and diplomacy of a high class, which inspired that tercentenary celebration, the result being to cause the axis of the British empire to oscillate, as it were, and to make us believe that the entente cordiale between two great nations must in truth be finally concluded on the very battlefields which have been the witnesses of their heroic and glorious deeds. It was also the part of diplomacy to negotiate, through the intervention of our ministers, that treaty of commerce with France, which will soon be, let us hope so, an accomplished fact. It was diplomacy again, which prompted that extraordinary peace-making mission to Japan, a mission which put in such strong light the great capabilities of one of the youngest and most brilliant members of this government. It was diplomacy also which brought about the official participation of the Canadian government in the establishment of a permanent international bureau of agriculture, one of our ministers, the representative of our farming community being elected to fill one of the highest offices on the board of management. There are also diplomatic doings in prospect with a view to the settlement of great international differences having reference to our business intercourse with the United States, China, Germany, Australia, the West Indies, &c. It seems as though Canada, under its present government, and owing to its geographical position and to its marvellous development, were bound to become an important factor in the world's political activity.

Surely, it would be incongruous on our part, as members of the House of Commons and representatives of the people, to complain of a state of things which is of a nature to enhance the reputation and prosperity of our country. We should congratulate on that account His Excellency and the government. Neither should we stop at that, for our mandate imposes certain duties upon us, and particularly that of putting into shape and enacting governmental measures and of voting the sums required for the carrying out of such measures.

The outcome of the general elections has shown that the people have confidence in the administration. We are here as representatives of the people to see to it that their mandate is complied with.

The programme which is submitted to us contains nothing that is not a continuation or a conformation of the policy followed by the administration since 1896. The government are concerning themselves more and more with the task of increasing and extending the network of our railway system. They are carrying on with economy and caution, but at the same time with a comprehensive grasp of the whole question, the building of public works considered of interest to the country as a whole. I understand that the improvement of the port of Quebec, which towards the north is bounded in part by the verdant shores of my own county, will be one of the matters to be submitted to the judgment of this House.

As regards that gigantic undertaking, the National Transcontinental railway, it is with pleasure that we learn of its early completion. The work is being pushed through with tremendous activity. The whole line is now under contract, and we have been given to understand that by the time the next crop is harvested, Alberta wheat may be shipped by the new route, from Edmonton to Winnipeg, and thence to the Great Lakes. That means a closer bond between the provinces, and greater wealth for the country as a whole, pending the time when it will be the shortest route from ocean to ocean, and the most direct means of communication between Europe and the Far East, in accordance with the hopes conceived in early times by the discoverer of America and the founder of Quebec.

I remember having, twenty years ago, in 1889, visited the Paris world's fair, and having gone through the building which contained an immense globe representing our planet reduced a million times. On my own account, I discovered thereon America, and within America, the Dominion of Canada, and within Canada, the province of Quebec. But it was only with a good deal of difficulty that I succeeded in finding within the limits of the latter province, the city of Quebec, which was hidden under a ring of gold encircling the whole of Canada, and which, according to charts hanging on the wall, represented the ideal short route between Europe and Asia. Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian, lost as he was in the great city of Paris, felt his heart throb at that moment, and was dreaming of things which will shortly have come to pass. Such was also the dream of the statesman who, to-day, has in his hands the future of the Canadian nation and whom we have the honour to have as our leader in this House. Thanks to him and to his government, steel rails will soon have taken the place of the golden ring, and that painful catastrophe, the wreck of the Quebec bridge, will cause delay, but not a break in the carrying out of the undertaking. We have, to strengthen us in that belief, the stand taken by the government heretofore; we have also the solemn pledge given, on behalf of his party, by the hon. leader of the opposition, the very night that unspeakable catastrophe occurred. 'The Quebec bridge,' did he say, 'must and shall be rebuilt.' It was a compliment paid, unwillingly perhaps, but truthfully, to the grand liberal policy; it was also a wish worthy of a great patriot.

All these circumstances, the outcome of the general elections, your unanimous choice, Sir, as Speaker, of this House, the conciliatory stand taken by the hon. leader of the opposition, all these circumstances, I say are indications that the request of the hon. Prime Minister ('Allow me to complete my work') having been agreed to by the people, will presently be approved of by parliament.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my congratulations to both the mover and seconder of the address on the very satisfactory manner in which they have discharged the duties imposed upon them. They have gone with great particularity into various paragraphs of the speech which has been delivered to us by His Excellency. I do not propose to go into those paragraphs in the same detail or with equal thoroughness; nor do I find very much in the remarks of either hon. gentleman which calls for any criticism from myself. The hon. member for Quebec county (Mr. J. P. Turcotte), who spoke, as all our fellow countrymen of the French race do speak, with very great eloquence, referred to the confidence which has been again reposed in this administration by the people of the country. It might perhaps be not amiss to call attention to the fact that if a system of proportional representation, such as is being advocated in very high quarters in Great Britain at the present time and which is practised, I believe, in some countries, had been adopted in Canada, the government would have rejoiced in a majority of less than 5, or to be exact 4·4. After the election of the Speaker they would have been able to command the confidence of the House and the country by a majority of 3·4.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) declared some years ago that there had been an infamous gerrymander in the province of Ontario, for which the preceding Conservative administration wa reponsible. On that occasion he demonstrated very much to his own satisfaction, at least, that such was the case by taking two groups of constituencies in the province of Ontario. Each one of these groups had between 86,000 and 88,000 of a voting population. One group elected nineteen members more than the other group, and that was ample evidence for my right hon. friend and for all his followers, of course, that the conditions in Ontario at that time required radical and imperative amendment.

But, I would like to point out to him that the returns of the last general election indicate that a most infamous gerrymander has been perpetrated upon the Dominion of Canada by himself according to his own logic. I find that 563,547 votes elected 85 Conservative members and that 587,664 votes elected 133 Liberal members; in other words that each Conservative member of the House represents 6,630 of a voting population, that each Liberal member of the House represents 4,411 of a voting population, and that the average voting population for each member of the House, taking the whole vote, will be 5,280. I have no doubt that with that sense of justice which the right hon. gentleman undoubtedly possesses and which certainly he at all times is ready to claim, he will redress this evil, this injustice to the people of Canada and give us such a redistribution as will accomplish the results that should have been accomplished according to the standpoint which he took only a few years ago in this House.

But, in reply to certain statements which have been made not only by my hon. friend from Quebec county, but by the Liberal press of this country as to the expression of confidence which the government obtained from the electorate during the last contest, I would like to point out one significant fact; that is that if the government has received the confidence and endorsation of the country, my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) has tenfold more received the endorsation of the electorate. Elected in the maritime provinces by a majority of 1,400, three times the majority which the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) was able to command, there is a situation before this country generally and before the Prime Minister which demands attention. We know that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was the counsel of the hon. member for Westmoreland upon a memorable occasion to which I will not further allude, and I would ask him now to redress the injury of his much wronged client, to give up his portfolio, to restore the hon. member for Westmoreland to his own and to do that which would only be fair and right if we are to conclude that the verdict of the electorate has established that confidence in the government which has been claimed by the Liberal press and by hon. gentlemen.

Now, I do not desire to go very much over the issues of the late campaign, but there is one matter upon which I do propose to say a word, and only a word, in justice to myself and to the Liberal-Conservative party of this country. I became aware on the 21st day of October, when I landed in the county of Pictou from the province of Prince Edward Island, from some information given to me by my friends in that county, that a certain pamphlet was being circulated by the Liberal organization in the county of Pictou among the electors of the county of a certain religious belief. I had not even seen the original of the pamphlet before, I had not known that it had been put by any person into pamphlet form, but upon my arrival on the next day, the 22nd of October, in the city of Halifax, or within twenty-four hours after my arrival, I learned that a despatch had been sent from certain Liberal quarters in the city of Halifax to certain Liberal journals in the city of Montreal that that pamphlet had made its appearance in the city of Halifax contemporaneously with my arrival in that city. The innuendo, to use the words of my right hon. friend on another occasion, was unmistakable. I learned more about the distribution of that pamphlet afterwards and I have in my hand a specimen copy to which I will venture to refer at least to the extent of pointing out the use of this pamphlet which was made in some parts of the maritime provinces and to the statement made in regard to it by the Liberal organization in the province of Prince Edward Island. I have here, in my hand, one of these pamphlets containing in connection with it this fly-leaf. I have not read it, but I take it for granted that the pamphlet is reproduced here as it originally appeared in a certain newspaper in the province of Ontario. Attached to it is this fly-leaf:

This is a sample of the literature circulated by the Conservative party in Orange and Protestant settlements. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is a Catholic leader and because he is a Catholic must be defeated so says this pamphlet.

Some Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (reading):

Will you stand for this? Read and decide for yourself.

I want to say to those gentlemen who have cried, hear, hear——

Some Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That the statement that that was circulated by the Conservative party or by any Conservative organization is an absolute, a malicious and a deliberate falsehood. That is all I have to say about it, and if any hon. gentleman has any information to the contrary I can only say that I have made the most careful inquiry and I cannot find that that pamphlet was ever circulated in any constituency in Canada by the Conservative party or by any Conservative organization. In my own county of Halifax I believe that pamphlet wrought an effect exactly the opposite of that which was intended.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Because although the pamphlet was distributed by the Liberal organization in certain portions of the country where it was hoped it would have a certain effect, I believe that I obtained in the last election in the county of Halifax a larger number of the votes of the Roman Catholic electorate than on any previous occasion.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Would my hon. friend inform me whether he knows that that pamphlet was circulated by Conservatives who did not happen to belong to the official Conservative organization in the county ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If any such thing took place I never heard of it, and with all resepect to my hon. friend I may say that I have no reason to believe and do not believe that it was circulated by the Conservative organization of the county or by any person having any official connection with the Conservative party.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. I have in my possession copies of the pamphlet entitled 'The Duty of the Hour' circulated in the county of Pictou by Conservatives in that county.

Mr. CARVEL. How many did you circulate ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What individual Conservatives may have done I do not know. I shall read again this fly-leaf in order that its language may be emphasized and that the false and misleading character of the statement made may again attract the attention of the House :

This is a sample of the literature circulated by the Conservative party in Orange and Protestant settlements.

Mr. DEVLIN. That is correct.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) is usually wrong, so I think we may take it for granted that he does not depart from his accustomed usage on this occasion.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member stated that this was published in a newspaper in Ontario. Would he be good enough to give the name of the paper ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted for once to take upon myself your functions and to appoint the hon. member a committee of one to give that information to the House.

I desire at this early stage in the session to deal briefly with certain matters of comment in the press of the country during recent weeks respecting the length of sessions of parliament. I have heard and read a great deal of criticism upon the length of sessions, and I am not disposed to disagree that the sessions have some times been perhaps unduly long. It may be that there is a certain misapprehension in the minds of the public that a session is expensive in proportion to its length. As a matter of fact the indemnity of members of the Senate and House of Commons and the salaries of permanent officials of the House do not increase with the length of the session and therefore, so far as they are concerned, the expense to the public is precisely the same whether the session be long or short. Of course in other respects the expense is increased by a lengthy session.

I desire to again point out to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in no censorious or partisan spirit, who I think will agree in my statement, that the date at which a government brings down its important measures in any session has a great deal to do with the length of that session, and I pause to express the very sincere hope that this session, called as it is on a very late day, will find the government prepared and that we will have all important government measures down at a very early date.

Let us look at the sessions of the last five years. The session of 1903 opened on the 12th of March and closed on October 23. The Bill respecting the National Transcontinental Railway was introduced on July 30, after the House had been in session 141 days ; the necessary resolution was not moved until the 11th of August after the session had lasted 153 days. The Railway Subsidies were not brought down until October 10, when the House had been in session 212 days and they were not moved until October 22, when the House had been in session 224 days. A very important measure respecting the Quebec bridge was brought to the attention of the House for the first time on October 21, when the House had been in session 223 days, and moved on October 22, when the House had been in session 224 days.

With regard to these measures and to all the others which I shall venture to bring to the attention of the House, the government is face to face with one of two alternatives, either that they were not ready with these measures and purposely held them back in order that discussion might be restricted in respect to some of them at least, or that the session was not too long for the necessary measures which the government thought it was its duty to bring before the attention of parliament in the interests of the country.

In 1904 the session opened on the 10th of March and closed on August 10. Notice was given of the Customs Act on June 28, after the House had been in session 110 days and the Bill was moved on August 8, after the House had been in session 151 days. The Railway Subsidies were moved on August 8, when the House had been in session 151 days.

In 1905 the session opened on January 11 and closed July 20. The Autonomy Bills were given their first reading on February 21. The House had then been in session 41 days. The second reading of one of these Bills was moved on March 22, when the House had been in session 70 days. The second reading of the other was moved on July 4, when the House had been in session 174 days. It would perhaps be unfair to criticise the late reading of the second of these measures as the whole subject was thoroughly threshed out in the debate on the first Bill.

The session of 1906 opened March 8 and closed July 13. The amendment to the Act respecting the National Transcontinental Railway received its first reading June 27. The House had then been in session 110 days. It was given its second reading on July 3 when the House had been in session 116 days. The railway subsidies were brought down on June 25, when the House had been in session 108 days and they were moved on the following day.

In 1907 the session opened on the 2nd of November and closed on the 26th of April. The railway subsidies were brought down on the 19th of April ; the House had then been in session 148 days. They were moved on the 25th of April, when the House had been in session 154 days. The bounties on iron and steel were brought down on the 5th of April, when the House had been in session 134 days. They were moved on the 23rd of April, when the House had been in session 152 days. The bounties on binder twine were brought down on the same dates. The Quebec Bridge and Railway Company loan was brought down on the 17th of April, 146 days after the House had opened, and it was moved on the 19th of April, 148 days after the session had opened.

Then the session of 1908 opened on the 28th of November and closed on the 20th of July. The Bill to amend the Railway Act had its first reading on the 10th of March, when the House had been in session 102 days, and its second reading on the 16th of June, when the House had been in session 200 days. The Election Act had its first reading on the 9th of March, when the House had been in session 101 days, and its second reading on the 5th of May, when the House had been in session 158 days. The railway subsidies were brought down on the 15th of July, when the House had been in session 229 days, and were moved on the 16th of July, when the House had been 230 days in session. A very important resolution, regarded as such not only by the House, but by the country at large, respecting what is called the All-Red Line, was not moved by the right hon. gentleman until the 9th of July, when the House had been in session 223 days.

I point out to the House the great delays which occurred through the government's own remissness in bringing down important matters, and I express once more the sincere hope that this session will be an exception to the rule. Indeed, I for one would not be unwilling that some rule of the House should be adopted prescribing a date beyond which no railway subsidy, no estimate, no important government measure should be brought down unless with the consent of two-thirds or three-fourths of all the members of this House. It strikes me that that would tend to facilitate and expedite business and conduce as much as any other amendment to the rules to bring about shorter sessions; for I thoroughly agree that we should do everything possible, that would be fair to the government and to the members on this side of the House, to make the sessions shorter in future than they have been in the past; because there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the length of our sessions has a certain tendency to keep out of public life men whom we should be glad to welcome to this parliament, and whose presence here would be of great advantage to both political parties and to the interests of the people of this country as a whole.

Now, there are one or two paragraphs of the Address to which I desire to devote a little attention. The hon. member for Quebec County has referred in very eloquent terms to the celebration of the tercentenary at Quebec. I had the good fortune to be present. I saw there very imposing pageants of great historic interest. I saw many thousands of the sturdy yeomanry of Canada pass in review before some of the greatest soldiers of the world. I saw official representatives of the great republic of France and the United States and many distinguished men from Great Britain, including the illustrious heir to the Throne, who were present to lend importance and dignity to the occasion. But what perhaps impressed me most of all in connection with that celebration was to see the two great nationalities of the country, the English and French races, vying with each other in generous emulation to make the celebration worthy of the occasion. And it was worthy of the occasion, an event which cannot fail to bring about a better spirit and feeling, if that be possible, between the two great national races of this country.

I thoroughly endorse the proposal of the government with respect to aid to the people of Italy in the very great calamity which has befallen them. This is only a tangible expression of that deep and heartfelt sympathy which is extended by all the people of Canada to the people of Italy in this awful calamity.

Coming for a moment to that portion of the speech which deals with trade conditions, I may be permitted to notice once more how extremely solicitous the government are to point out that the depression which has been felt in Canada during the past twelve or fifteen months is world wide. There is a marked distinction in the language of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches when referring to prosperity or to depression. Let us look at what they said in 1906:

> On the opening of the third session of the tenth parliament of Canada I avail myself on the opportunity to offer you my congratulations on the unparalleled prosperity prevailing in all parts of the Dominion. The harvest has been abundant, and the trade with both British and foreign nations continues to expand in annually increasing volume, with every prospect of continued growth for many years to come.

There is a somewhat different song sung at the present time, and it is this:

> A little more than a year ago, the whole civilized world entered into a period of commercial, industrial and financial depression, which may not yet have completely spent its force; signs there are, however, that it is gradually passing away. Whilst it is hardly disputable that owing to the abundance and elasticity of her resources Canada has suffered less than other nations, this depression has seriously affected our trade, producing an appreciable shrinkage in the public revenue, and calling for exceptional caution in the administration of our national affairs.

You will observe that the prophecy put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General two years ago was that 'the trade with both British and foreign nations would continue to expand in annually increasing volume, with every prospect of continued growth for many years to come.' While the prosperity of Canada in 1906 was apparently confined to Canada alone, the depression in 1908 is world wide. In other words, the prosperity is due apparently—by innuendo at least—to the presence of these gentlemen on the Treasury benches, while the depression is world wide, or, in other words, is due to Providence. Well, I trust that the depression will be of very short continuance, and it may have one very beneficial effect at least. The people of the country have entrusted the administration of affairs to these hon. gentlemen for three or four years more. The government needed some lesson in caution; they needed some pause in the wild career of extravagance, and perhaps worse than extravagance, upon which they had embarked, and they seem to have taken the lesson to heart to some extent, and the depression in Canada will be well worth the price it costs the country if it simply teaches these gentlemen more caution, more economy and better administration of public affairs in the few brief years during which they shall yet continue to sit on the Treasury benches.

I observe that our good old friend the Insurance Bill is to visit us once more. It is two years since the report of the Insurance Commission was received, and during that time the ills which were to be redressed have remained unredressed, and the patient people of this country have been suffering in silence. I trust that this important measure will be brought down at the very earliest opportunity, and that we shall know this session, as we did not know last session, what the mind of the government is with regard to their proposals, and that a measure in the public interest may be passed by parliament and placed on the statute book.

A measure is promised having for its object the repression of the payment of secret commissions and gratuities, both in public and private business. I assume, although I do not know, that this measure is based to some extent upon the evidence, not at present before the House, which has been taken before the Hon. Mr. Justice Cassels in the inquiry which he has been recently carrying on. I have no doubt that it is essential, but how far will it go? We raised the point last session that the inquiry was too restricted, that it dealt with only one paragraph of the report, concerning only one department, and we asked that the inquiry should go further and be extended to every one of the spending departments of the Government. Events have proved that point to have been well taken. There has been, I believe, a fairly thorough inquiry, so far as the officials are concerned; but when, according to the newspaper reports, the question was put to a certain witness whether or not the percentage of overcharge had any relation whatever to contributions to the political party now dominant, the objection was at once taken that no such inquiry came within the terms of the reference. I am not finding fault with the commissioner in that regard. He was restricted by the terms of his commission; but I say that when that question was put and the actual conditions revealed, the government should have taken the earliest possible opportunity to pass an order in council extending the scope of the inquiry and giving Mr. Justice Cassels the amplest opportunity of ascertaining whether or not the people of this country have been paying prices far in excess of those which should have been charged, and whether or not that was done in order to swell the political contributions to the Liberal election fund. The system followed is very plain and simple in the light of the revelations which have been made. The ordinary citizen put upon the patronage list will sell his goods to the government at a fair rate. He will perhaps seek to obtain from the Government a little higher price than from his ordinary customers, although I do not know that that will always be the case. But when he expects to be called upon for political contributions, when he knows that the same influence which procured for him the patronage of the Government will afterwards demand from him political contributions out of his private purse, what will be the natural course for him to pursue if he be a man not specially scrupulous in matters of this kind. He will no doubt put an increased price upon his goods and in that respect reap some personal advantage to himself, the coffers of the Liberal party will also reap an additional and perhaps greater advantage, and both profits will come out of the people of this country. It is they who, out of their taxes, will pay the shot. That is what it amounts to. How far will this Bill which we are promised go? If it should go so far as to make criminally responsible those who see these things being done under their very eyes, who know that this system is being carried on, we may perhaps have, out of this legislation, conditions better than those which have prevailed within recent years. I see no difference in principle, or rather lack of principle, between the system to which I have alluded and that of offering open bribes to a constituency by saying: 'If you support the party now in power, certain public works, which are justly your due, will be constructed in your riding; but if you see fit to support a candidate not in sympathy with the government, no such works will be carried on and you will not receive your due.' Further, I can see no difference between that and the bribery of a single elector, except that the bribery by wholesale is tenfold more iniquitous and demoralizing and deserves tenfold more punishment at the hands of the law than ordinary bribery.

So far as the waterways treaties is concerned, we cannot discuss its terms until it is laid on the table. It is undoubtedly very important and I trust that the interests of Canada will be found adequately safeguarded when that instrument is before the House. We shall give any measure submitted by the government our fair consideration. I trust that the government measures will be brought down promptly, and that we may be able to complete the labours of this session at so early a date as to make some compensation for the long session of nearly eight months through which we passed just before the general election.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). My hon. friend who has just addressed the House (Mr. Borden), and who still keeps the seat which he has adorned for some years past, who has been confirmed in it, as I understand, by a recent expression of the confidence—the well-deserved confidence—of his friends, and in which he has been likewise confirmed by the expression of the non-confidence—the well deserved non-confidence of the people of Canada,—my honourable friend has paid a very grateful compliment to the mover and seconder of the Address, in which I altogether agree. My hon. friend did not travel very far, however, with those whose efforts he thus appreciated. He has something on his mind which came out almost immediately after he began, and that something had to do with the result of the late elections. These hon. members who were here last session—and there are still quite a number, though their ranks have been thinned—will remember that we were frequently taunted by our hon. friend opposite with having lost the confidence of the country and were challenged to appeal to the people. Well, we accepted that challenge, and my hon. friend is not satisfied with the result. He says that if we had a different system of representation, the numbers on both sides would be different, and he argues that we should in consequence bring down a new measure of redistribution. I have heard that before. The present system is, perhaps, not perfect, but at all events, it is the same today as in the old days. My hon. friend said that in the old days, we on this side, complained of the gerrymander. That is very true. We said we thought that the redistribution then was a gerrymander and we complained of it incessantly, in parliament and out of it, and especially during the elections; but I have yet to learn that in the last election there ever was a word of complaint from the hon. gentleman opposite as regards the redistribution.

My hon. friend also brought to the attention of the House the famous pamphlet called 'The Duty of the Hour', and he asked by whom it had been distributed. I am surprised he does not know and will tell him at once. It was distributed surreptitiously and clandestinely by the Conservative party and broadly and openly by the Liberal party. I have not had the pleasure of seeing a copy of the pamphlet, but I understand the injunction upon it was to pass it from neighbour to neighbour, not to do it publicly, but pass it quietly among the people, so that they can see all the iniquities of the Laurier government. When we found that, sir, as I understand, some of our friends openly got a supply of 'The Duty of the Hour' to be circulated, so that friends and foes might know what was contended and what were the appeals that were being made on behalf of hon. gentlemen opposite.

We come back, after accepting the challenge of our friends on the other side, very much as we were during the last session of the last parliament, so far as numerical strength is concerned. In the maritime provinces there has been a displacement of forces, but no change in numbers; we come back as strong from the maritime provinces as during last session. In Quebec, there has been hardly any change whatever. And in Ontario—Ontario upon which such hopes were centred, Ontario in which there was to have been a landslide—we are exactly as we were last session. There is, however, one part of the country where we suffered; we suffered in the west—in Manitoba and British Columbia. As to Manitoba, if I may give credence—as I do not doubt I may—to the statements made by my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton,) it is no credit at all to the opposition, and no discredit to the government that we have suffered in the province of Manitoba. My hon. friend who, generally, is well informed, who knows the province of Manitoba as well as any man can know it, whose vision is as clear as that of any man living, and who is generally accurate in his statements, has stated that, if the opposition gained the advantage over us in Manitoba, if there was a reversal of strength in the parties, it was due to the fact that the lists upon which the elections took place had been outrageously made up. I am bound to say that this statement has been denied, and stoutly denied. I am not here to pass any opinion at this moment on the statement or the counter-statement. The matter can be investigated to see whether or not the fact is as stated, and if it be as stated, what measures can be taken to prevent such things in the future. At present, I pass by the subject.

In British Columbia we suffered. We had the whole province on our side before the last election; this time, we come with diminished numbers. But I say without hesitation, and I say especially to my hon.

friend (R. L. Borden) opposite me, that the causes which led to our defeat in British Columbia are not to the discredit of the government, and still less are they to the credit of the opposition. The province of British Columbia is the only province in which the election was fought upon something like principle. In the other provinces the election was fought upon no principle; the campaign against us was simply an appeal to certain prejudices. In British Columbia, we had an open fight. I have no fault to find with that, on the contrary. In British Columbia we were assailed upon our policy. It was our policy in regard to Asiatic immigration which was in issue. And, now that the battle has been fought, I have to say that the policy brought forward by our opponents against our own policy was a policy very shortsighted, a policy which sacrificed—no, I will not use so strong a word, but imperilled and jeopardized—the best interests not only of Canada but of British Columbia itself. Sir, in British Columbia, the problem of Asiatic immigration is the one question that interests all sections of public opinion; and all classes of the people in British Columbia, to whatever party they may belong, unite in the opinion which is expressed in the words now current in the politics of that province, 'A white British Columbia; a white Canada,' meaning that British Columbia should be preserved as a home of the white race. To this opinion, to this fact, we on this side of the House have no opposition to offer, and to it we take no exception whatever. But, Sir, we differ altogether as to the means by which this end is to be attained. The policy advocated by the opposition in British Columbia, advocated with greater emphasis last election than ever, and forced upon the leader of the party opposed to us and by that leader at last reluctantly accepted, is to prevent the immigration of Asiatics into British Columbia by hostile legislation. The policy which we have adopted, and upon which the issue was fought in British Columbia, was that we should not seek to reach that end by hostile legislation, especially against a friendly nation, but should endeavour to reach that object by negotiation and diplomatic action. There, Sir, is the issue. And now, I ask: what is the policy that is conducive to the best interests of Canada and of the British empire to which we belong? Sir, to put the question is to answer it: our policy is the policy which ought to impress everybody who pretends to be a Canadian or pretends to be British as the one best calculated for the weal of both Canada and the empire. But, before I go further, let me say that I find no fault with the view maintained in British Columbia that that province should be maintained as a country for the white race. I have no hesitation in saying also that I do not attribute the attitude of British Columbia in its passionate desire for a white man's country to anything like prejudice—prejudice of colour or of anything else. No; I recognize that the origin and cause for the feeling which prevails and predominates in British Columbia is to be found in economic laws which would produce the same result in any other place in which the conditions were similar to those of British Columbia. The races of Asia, whether they be Japanese or Chinese, East Indian, have been for many generations, as we know, subjected to despotism which has reduced them to a condition of penury. In their lodgings, in their food, in their garments, they are content with the most simple necessaries of life which can be supplied with only a fraction of the wages necessary to maintain a workingman in respectability in this country. So, when these races come to this country in such large numbers as to compete with white labour, they accept wages so low that they create at once an economic disturbance. And all economic disturbances are far-reaching in their consequences. Sir, if that were the only aspect of the question, it would be easy of solution according to our friends from British Columbia. But there is another aspect of the question which, unfortunately, is too often forgotten, and to this aspect of the question I would especially ask the attention of our friends from British Columbia. Our neighbours on the Pacific coast are next door, so to speak, to those very Asiatics whom we are now asked to treat with so much contempt. The Asiatics have lain dormant for ages in respect to civilization, but they are now awakening from their lethargy and adopting western methods and western modes of living. They offer immense facilities for trade, and we see the greatest commercial nations of the world, England, Germany and the United States, vieing with each other in order to obtain a share of that commercial abundance.

Now, Sir, what should be our attitude in regard to that matter? Should we not seek to obtain a share of that abundance? Should we not take every possible advantage that our propinquity gives us over our less favoured competitors? It is sufficient to put the question for the answer to suggest itself. I may say that in this duty we have not been remiss. Shortly, or immediately, before the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we took measures to extend it across the continent to the Pacific Ocean in order to reach the Asiatic trade. This parliament acting in conjunction with the mother country, subsidized a line of steamers in order to engage in that trade with Asia. That service has been well performed during the last twenty years by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Their steamers have been ploughing the ocean during all these years between British Columbia and Japan and China, and from those countries back to British Columbia. Well, Sir, some five years ago Japan invited the nations of the earth to a world's fair. We were urged to take part in that fair, and we did so. Just before the fair was concluded we were deluged with petitions coming from all parts of Canada asking us to make a treaty with Japan in order to obtain, if possible, a share of the immense trade that would develop with that country in the future. We negotiated a treaty and laid it before parliament. It was received in this House without a word of dissent or criticism. Our friends opposite were eager for it. But we knew there was a difficulty, and that difficulty was with respect to Japanese immigration. At that time we had an understanding with the Japanese government, accomplished through the Japanese consulate here, to the effect that the Japanese government themselves would undertake to restrict their own immigrants. Unfortunately, after the treaty had been ratified there was an influx of Japanese immigration into British Columbia, as if the treaty had superseded the understanding. We sent one of our colleagues to Japan to protest. He had no difficulty in getting the Japanese authorities to agree that they would respect the understanding we had entered into with them, and that they themselves would restrict immigration from Japan to this country. The matter came up for review in this House. We presented our policy to the House, and it was not accepted by the opposition. The opposition held, on the contrary, that instead of having a treaty we should take the matter into our own hands and restrict all Asiatic immigration. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition moved this resolution :

That this House, whilst expressing its profound appreciation of the friendly intentions and courteous assurance of the Japanese government, and whilst declaring its sincere desire for the most cordial relations with the Japanese people, desires, nevertheless to record its strong protest against a policy under which our wage earning population cannot be protected from destructive invading competition, except by entreating the forbearance and aid of a foreign government.

We did not endorse these views, for the obvious reason that if the object were to restrict Japanese immigration to Canada, and if that could be done either by legislative enactment in this parliament or by friendly action on the part of the Japanese government themselves, we would prefer that it should be done by the voluntary action of the Japanese government. I would ask the leader of the opposition, Why should we—I will not put it on the ground of international comity but on the ground of our own self interest—Why should we hurt the feelings of a friendly nation when that nation was willing to do what we wanted her to do ? Sir, this was the position we took, and the position was so strong that I was not at all surprised when I saw my hon. friend the leader of the opposition accept that position, both for himself and for his party, at the opening of the last general elections. At that time I was not surprised to see that the opposition had come to our way of thinking. In that debate I used these words, speaking of the Japanese government :

If they fail to carry out this understanding that we have with them, then we shall have the power ourselves to put an end to the treaty. But that will be done only in the last resort, only when every method of conciliation has been exhausted, only when every other means has been tried and failed.

This was so reasonable a proposition that I was not at all surprised that my hon. friend, at the opening of the campaign, practically accepted it. I do not say that my hon. friend announced his acceptance to the people. But he had an ambassador to the people of British Columbia who spoke for himself and the party to which he belongs. One of the candidates in British Columbia was a gentleman whom I am very glad to see in this House—as the constituency has to be represented by a Tory, though I would much prefer to see it represented by a Grit—I mean the constituency of Vancouver. The gentleman who now represents the city of Vancouver, and whom I see before me, accepted the nomination, but accepted it with some compunction, some hesitation. In order to be absolutely sure of his ground, and before finally committing himself, he came east to interview the leader of the opposition, and obtain from him certain pledges in respect to this question and another one. In a speech delivered in the city of Vancouver by Mr. Cowan, the Conservative candidate, on the 1st of October last, as I find it reported in the 'News-Advertiser,' he used this language :

I went east and have returned, and I speak with the authority, not only of the leader but of that party that will, after October, control the destinies of Canada.

My hon. friend referred to my own attitude upon the question, with which he could not agree. But still, after having blamed myself and the government for the policy we had pursued in respect to Asiatic immigration, he went on to define what was the policy of the Conservative party :

But I have this message of my leader to impart to you, and it is made not only on his behalf but on behalf of the great Conservative party throughout Canada, that if that modus vivendi spoken by Mr. Lemieux is not lived up to by Japan, that circumstance will oblige that great party to abrogate the Japanese treaty.

Well, I fail to see what difference there is between the policy of my hon. friend and the policy of this government as defined by me in the speech a portion of which I have read. Let me read again what I said on the floor of the House :

If they fail to carry out this understanding that we have with them, then we shall have the power ourselves to put an end to the treaty. But that will be done only in the last resource, only when every method of conciliation has been exhausted, only when every other means has been tried and failed.

Let me now give the policy of the Conservative party on the 1st October, 1908, not in the very words of my hon. friend, but in the words of his ambassador, as a message to the people of British Columbia.

But I have this message from my leader to impart to you, 'said Mr. Cowan,' and it is made not only on his behalf but on behalf of the great Conservative party throughout Canada, that if that modus vivendi spoken by Mr. Lemieux is not lived up to by Japan, that circumstance will oblige that great party to abrogate the Japanese treaty.

Well, sir, I cannot but say that I feel flattered and that the government feels flattered that the hon. leader of the opposition has come exactly to the position which he had at last to accept. My hon. friend had some references and protests made to him to which I will refer immediately. He had some references and protests made to him; I do not know what the protests were, but it is quite easy to surmise what they were. There were no votes in the attitude taken by the leader of the opposition. He was told: Your policy is no better than the policy of the government, and if that is all you have to fight the government on we cannot win upon that; you must give us something better. And I must say to my hon. friend that he was equal to the mischief that was expected of him. An answer came on the 24th October. On the 24th October my hon. friend sent a telegram which was read in the city of Victoria by my hon. friend the present member for Victoria (Mr. Barnard) to the assembled faithful:

Your message received. The Conservative party stands for a white Canada, the protection of white labour and the absolute exclusion of Asiatics.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The right hon. gentleman has taken upon himself to state to this House that I sent that telegram. I beg to state that I did not send that telegram.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I accept altogether the explanation of my hon. friend.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, the right hon. gentleman should not have asserted unqualifiedly that I had sent it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, if I have done an injustice to my hon. friend I have good warrant for saying what I have said, because that telegram was read by his friend who has been elected since to support him, by the hon. member for Victoria city, it was published in the 'Colonist' the following day and approved to the echo. Perhaps my hon. friend is not conversant with the history of his own party. I have only this to say, that if he did not send that telegram, then he has obtained and his party has obtained the seat for Victoria city through false pretenses. Here is a fac simile of the telegram published in the 'Daily Colonist' of the 25th of October. It was a lie, so my hon. friend says. I am sorry, not for myself, but for my hon. friend that that party in British Columbia had to resort to lies in order to carry an election.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If my right hon. friend will permit me; I sent a telegram but the concluding portion of it was not as my hon. friend has read it. I will produce the telegram which I did send.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I put upon the table the fac simile of the telegram which was printed in the 'Colonist' on the 25th October.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My right hon. friend may put it on the table or under the table; I am making a personal explanation. I say I did not send a telegram in those words, and I say it was not addressed to the hon. member for Victoria.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I did not say that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The right hon. gentleman has put it to the House as if that were the case.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, I misunderstood my hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I said it was read by the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I will produce the telegram. The right hon. gentleman, if I am not mistaken, knew that I did not send a telegram in those words.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not understand what my hon. friend means.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, I intimated to one of his late colleagues very much the same thing.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not understand what my hon. friend means, but it was conveyed to me that this telegram had been sent. This is the telegram. It is a fac simile. However, I accept the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not know what the right hon. gentleman means by a fac simile; this is a typewritten copy of a telegram.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friends are satisfied with that I have no fault to find. I found this telegram in the opposition organ, the 'Daily Colonist,' on the 25th October last and everybody can see it there.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What does my right hon. friend mean by a fac simile?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is not in the ordinary print of the newspaper. This pretends to be a fac simile copy of a telegram as we receive it. That is what I mean by fac simile. But, let me go on. I will give some comment upon my hon. friend by the Victoria 'Colonist' on the 26th October:

Their stand upon Asiatic question.—The standpoint of the Liberals as opposed to that of Conservatives.—Duncan Ross at Victoria Theatre.

This is to be put in juxtaposition with certain words of my hon. friend which I have just quoted.

We are not in favour of abrogating Imperial treaties. We are in favour of restricting immigration.

And next, these are the words attributed to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition:

R. L. Borden's stand.

The Conservative party stands for a white Canada, the protection of white labour, and the absolute exclusion of Asiatics.

And the comment of the newspaper, upon which the electors voted on the following day, was in these words:

These are the latest and most definite statements of the two great political parties on the all-important question of whether we are to have a white or a yellow population in Western Canada. Mr. Borden's telegram was sent on Saturday night, and was being read at the Conservative smoker about the same time that Duncan Ross was making the other announcement on behalf of Mr. Templeman at the Victoria theatre.

The Liberals do not believe in 'abrogating Imperial treaties, although the text of the treaty in question contains a clause expressly providing for abrogation. They believe in restricting immigration by going down on their knees to the Mikado and begging him to keep his people at home until after the general election, when the time will come for the Liberal administration, if returned to pay its debts to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

I have this to say, that the issue has been settled, we have fought the battle, we have won, the treaty is in force, the understanding is being carried out, and we have no debt to pay to the Grand Trunk Pacific. So far upon this subject.

My hon. friend, in the course of his observations, has referred again to the statements which he had made in the last elections on purity. The last elections were fought upon the purity cry, and one of the worst forms, my hon. friend says, of political corruption is what he calls the bribery of constituencies. I have to say to my hon. friend that in this respect he is the most inveterate sinner in this House. He does not bribe constituencies, but he bribes provinces, and in the last election he attempted to bribe the province of British Columbia. The question is not new; we had it last year, but we had it in a worse form than last year and that was bad enough Heaven knows.

My hon. friend is aware and so informed the House last session, that for years the people of British Columbia have claimed an increased subsidy. That is true, the people of British Columbia have had a claim for an increased subsidy. On that question my hon. friend in 1904 addressed the people of British Columbia in these terms:

Let me say that I have given much thought to the conditions in British Columbia which in your opinion, call for special attention in considering the financial relations between the Dominion and that province. You claim not only that these conditions are exceptional and peculiar to the situation and physical character of your province, but also that they are permanent in their nature. In my opinion they are such as to command immediate inquiry and investigation to the end that any injustice clearly established may be immediately relieved.

That was in 1904. In 1906 a conference of all the provinces was held in order to readjust the subsidies of the provinces. The Premier of British Columbia attended that conference and presented a claim on behalf of British Columbia. That claim was not admitted by the other provincial premiers. After having presented it, Mr. McBride wanted to have an arbitration upon it, but the premiers there assembled declared against the arbitration, passing a resolution in these terms:

That in the opinion of the conference it is unadvisable that the claim in the way of subsidies, of any province be referred to arbitration.

The premiers there assembled, without any consideration of politics and unanimously, except for the Premier of British Columbia, determined that the matter should be then and there decided and in addition to the general subsidies which were adopted in favour of all the provinces, British Columbia was given a special subsidy of $100,000 a year for ten years. This matter was brought before the House; in the session of 1907 an address was passed praying the imperial parliament to so amend the British North America Act as to give these increased subsidies to the provinces. Not one word against that petition was then uttered by my hon. friend. It seems to me that if in 1904 the claim of British Columbia for an increase of subsidy was to be considered and if it was of such a nature that it should be arbitrated upon in a special manner, the proper time to raise the question was in 1907, when we asked for imperial legislation to give to British Columbia more subsidy. If the treatment which we then gave to British Columbia was not sufficiently generous, in the opinion of my hon. friend, that was the time to say: British Columbia does not receive enough, you should do something more for British Columbia. But my hon. friend did not say a word, he was satisfied with the settlement which had been made and which was accepted by all the premiers assembled in conference.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. May I correct my right hon. friend in one respect? When that motion went through the House in the session to which he has alluded I was not in the House; I was absent through indisposition and I certainly understood and I still understand that protest was made on behalf of British Columbia by hon. gentlemen who were present here.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend may not have been present when the resolution was finally passed, but he was cognizant of it; it came before the House not once but on two different occasions and on one occasion he certainly was present after I had left for Great Britain, and, as I understand, he never raised a word of protest. That was the time to protest, but if a protest was made it was very mild. I never understood it to take the form of a protest at all. I know that my hon. friend, during the whole session when the question was before us, never raised a word against the settlement we had offered to British Columbia. But he went to British Columbia in the summer following that session and then he fell under the magnetic influence of a very astute politician in the person of Mr. Richard McBride, the premier of British Columbia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Sir, I have nothing to say against Mr. McBride; on the contrary I say he is a very astute politician; I give him every credit for that, but I say to my hon. friend, the tempter came to him in the form of the Hon. Richard McBride. The tempter took him up to the top of a very high mountain and showed him the province of British Columbia and all the glory in it and said to him: If you will fall down and worship me, all this I will give to you. My hon. friend did not say: Get thee behind me Satan. On the contrary, he fell down and worshipped him. He informed Mr. McBride that if he were returned to power he would have the question re-opened. There came on an election—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon friend has not quoted me correctly. I said that I had made a certain pledge to the people of British Columbia in 1904 and nothing which had since taken place relieved me from the obligation of that promise.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What had taken place since that time was a petition adopted unanimously by this House in favour of British Columbia granting her $100,000 more per annum for ten years.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And without the consent of British Columbia.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Without the consent of British Columbia.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. But the province has taken the money since and that is all. Then the question came up again during the elections and as I stated a moment ago they had the pledge given by my hon. friend to the people of British Columbia, notwithstanding the legislation passed by this House. Again my friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) was not satisfied with that pledge; he thought he would have something more and in the speech to which I have already alluded, delivered on October 1, 1908, he first spoke of the pledge given by the leader of the opposition and then went on to say:

> For my part I had every reason, when that pledge was given by Mr. Borden, to expect that it would be carried and when the Conservatives of the city honoured me with the nomination I felt I must accept it on conditions. I tell you exactly what was in my mind. I did not think that Mr. Borden would refer it again to the conference of premiers but I felt that it might be referred to a select committee of the House of Commons.

He felt that it might be referred to a select committee of the House of Commons and that was not suitable to the hon. gentleman who was the Conservative candidate in Vancouver. He went on to say:

> I feared the eastern majority that would come on a committee of that kind, biased as they must be by eastern interests, and I wanted to know the mind of that great statesman, the first in Canada, who said he would bestow justice on the west. I went to the east and have returned and I speak with the authority, not only of that leader, but of that party, that will, after October 26, control the destinies of Canada; that the moment that party is returned to power the just claims of British Columbia will be referred to an absolutely impartial tribunal, and the report of that tribunal will be binding on this province only when it has been accepted by this province.

As a matter of fact then this gentleman would not trust a committee of the House of Commons where he would fear there would be eastern interests. Sir, if Tories of one province cannot trust Tories of the other provinces, it is no wonder that the people at large will not trust them.

In the same speech Mr. Cowan said:

Our claim is this: We have a claim of three-quarters of a million in perpetuity against the Dominion and Mr. Borden authorizes me to says: 'Your claim will not be referred to a committee of the House of Commons, but to an independent tribunal and its report will not be binding on you till it is accepted by this province.

In other words, the claim will be referred to an impartial tribunal in which both parties will be represented, the Dominion of Canada and the province of British Columbia, but the report of the tribunal will not be binding upon British Columbia unless British Columbia is fully satisfied with it. You will have it referred to arbitration and you will have everything you want provided you accept it, but if you are not satisfied with the judgment you need not accept it, it shall be binding on us but not binding on you. Sir, this is the policy of the purists, this is the policy of the reformers, this is the policy of the gentlemen who find fault with promises being made to a constituency. My hon. friend has told us he will bring that subject to the attention of the House; he is welcome to do so, and when he does he shall have more to say in defence of himself than in accusation of others. My hon. friend is not altogether sure of the legislation which we are to bring to prevent secret commissions. I have only this to say to my hon. friend, that the Bill which we intend to bring is based altogether upon a similar measure which was passed by the British parliament in 1906. It may be sufficient or it may not be sufficient; but if it is not sufficient, it will be open to my hon. friend to make it as ample and as severe as he thinks it ought to be.

I do not know that I have much more to add. I think I have traversed the whole of the ground covered by my hon. friend's speech. I may say in conclusion that although it is not our good fortune always to agree, I am happy to endorse everything he has said in regard to the Quebec Tercentenary Celebration. It was a very important and happy event in our history. I do not know that I need say anything more about it than this, because everything has been said already. There is one thing, however, which I think I should say, and which will receive the approbation of both sides of this House, that is, to pay this tribute to His Excellency Earl Grey. It was Earl Grey who conceived the idea, and it was largely through his zeal, energy and all-pervading enthusiasm that the idea was carried out on such a grand scale and so successfully and triumphantly.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a word of personal explanation. The message which I sent to the 'Colonist' Victoria, B. C., on the 24th of October, 1908, reads as follows:

Your message received. The Conservative party stands for a white Canada and the absolute protection of white labour.

R. L. BORDEN.

I desire to say that the telegram as it appeared was first brought to my attention by Mr. Templeman, the Minister of Inland Revenue. I asked him for a little delay until I could make inquiries as to how the mistake had been made. I received certain explanations which I may take occasion to give to the House on another day. So far as my friend the member for Victoria is concerned, if he read the telegram, as the Prime Minister says he did, on the evening of the 24th or 25th, I have not the slightest doubt—in fact, he has so informed me—that it was sent to him from the office of the newspaper, and it was not a telegram addressed to himself in any way. That is the whole explanation of the matter so far as I am concerned. I did not know of the mistake at all until after I had returned from the south in the month of December, and upon its being brought to my attention I at once made the inquiries to which I have alluded.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Mr. Speaker, one thing, I think, is quite apparent from the address which has been made by the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, namely, that he is very sore on two points—on the failure of the province of British Columbia to respond to his repeated efforts, and secondly, on the purity question. In devoting a large proportion of his time to these two points he has deftly covered up what he might have developed some of his extraordinary powers upon to a great deal better advantage to the House and to the country; but it is often the case with my right hon. friend that he makes a terrible clatter and noise about something which is of very little importance in order to divert public attention from something that he wants to conceal. That may be good party tactics or it may not. However, I think that was apparent in the excursion, the long and somewhat tedious excursion, which my right hon. friend took this afternoon to the Asiatic coasts, the Asiatic countries and the Asiatic question. I am going to leave the larger part of the Asiatic question and the British Columbia question to be discussed by my hon. friends from British Columbia who are here, and who I have no doubt are well capable of taking care of it. I want, however, to say one or two things with reference to that. The right hon. gentleman beat a retreat from a very bad and very false position which he let himself and his government into in the treaty with Japan by the laboured argument which he made this afternoon. What was the initial error, what was the lack of care and statesmanship, what was the lack of common prudence and common straight, right representation in the matter, was where my right hon. gentleman failed in the initiation of the proceedings. The opposition in this House stood for the treaty between Japan and Great Britain. True, as my right hon. friend said, they urged that that matter should be taken up, that it should be no longer delayed, and that if there were any commercial possibilities in trade between this country and Japan in that treaty, we should have the benefit of that trade, as the United States have the benefit of trade with Japan from the treaty which they have made with that country. But where the right hon. gentleman made his mistake was in two ways : first, that he absolutely neglected the admonition of the British government, and the mandates of prudence as well, in refusing the lead which the British Government gave him, to have the immigrant rights and position of Canada defined in the treaty itself. Not once or twice or thrice, but repeatedly, the British government, through its high officers, brought to the attention of the right hon. gentleman a way by which Canada could enjoy all the benefits of the trade arrangement with Japan under that treaty by adhering to it and at the same time keep Canada's sovereignty and maintain the position of the white labourer on the Pacific coast of Canada. My right hon. friend refused to take that lead, and by what was not straight representation of himself and his Minister of Agriculture, he induced this House to give its adhesion to the treaty, in the first place, in ignorance of what was really the state of the conditions between Japan and ourselves. My right hon. friend knows the circumstances. He knows that his Minister of Agriculture for three years stood up in the House and declared that he had a letter from the Japanese government itself, which made all these sureties certain, that he himself declared to this House that the Japanese government had an arrangement with this government by which only a few from each of the different provinces of Japan would be allowed to come into this country; and when in the long end we came down to the kernel of the matter, the Minister of Agriculture had to acknowledge in this House that he must have been wrong, that he never had such a letter, and my right hon. friend had to acknowledge that he was mistaken in the position he took. Sir, this Dominion will never give continued adherence to a policy which takes from it the sovereign power of standing at the front door of Canada, either on its Atlantic or its Pacific side, and saying who shall be admited to its home and its home privileges. We do not intend to say to the Emperor of Germany, 'Sir, we are a small people and we deprecate treaties; we deal in another way, and if you will pass us your kingly word that you will protect our interests, we will have no treaty obligations between you and us as to German immigration to our country. We will leave it all in your hands.' We do not subscribe to that, but the right hon. gentleman does. We stand on the coast of the Pacific to-day with the key of the front door in the hands of a foreign government, who may open that door when they please, to whom they please and as they please. After all that had been done and my right hon. friend had found out the mistakes which had been made, he said: Well, the thing is done, we believe the Japanese government will carry out their pledge to us, and we will give them an opportunity of doing so. But if they will not, we shall still have the recourse of the abrogation of the treaty. That is all that my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, said. So much with reference to that treaty, and I shall not say anything more on that point.

Then my hon. friend waxed very eloquent regarding the advantage, and indeed the almost necessity, of trade with China and Japan. Well, we on this side are alive to those advantages and opportunities, and to the nature of the treaty which exists between Japan and the British government, and our duties in that connection. But, at the same time, when there was an open way laid out before the view of my right hon. friend, by which the trade with these countries and the control of immigration to this country could have been secured and maintained at the same time, as was done by the United States, my right hon. friend forgot to take the advantage of that course and consequently was led into the trouble which now confronts him. True, my right hon. friend became reminiscent and spoke of what had been done to open up the trade between Canada and those countries. We have, he said, put transports on the Pacific, and now for ten or fifteen years these transports, some of a very high class, have been plying between the Dominion and those countries. But where was my right hon. friend when the proposal was made to put these steamers on the Pacific Ocean? When I brought down the subsidies necessary to be paid in order to obtain those steamers, where was my right hon. friend and those supporting him? They were fighting these subsidies by every possible objection. They were asserting on every occasion their emphatic disapproval of using the people's money to subsidize transports on the Pacific coast and open up trade with the Orient. Yet my right hon. friend, with that singular lapse of memory which afflicts him at times and causes him to take credit to himself for everything which has been done, even those things he most opposed, rises up in the dim, misty dawn and really believes that he himself is the first man who ever saw the sun rise. That hallucination is no doubt the cause of the declaration he made some years ago, when on the other side of the Atlantic, that one morning he woke up and discovered Canada. It was that same hallucination which caused him, after the All Red Route had been in existence some ten or twelve years, to become seized with the idea at the Imperial conference that he himself it was who was the minister of destiny and had discovered it. I would advise my right hon. friend to read over once in a while the history of Canada in order that he may not forget that there are in that history other administrations than his own. It is difficult for him no doubt to realize this. The adulation of his followers, constant, indefatigable and fantastic in many cases, takes absolute possession of his mind, and impels him to indulge in all sorts of vainglorious statements.

At Sorel, where he made his first appearance before the people who were such strangers to him, who had not heard the name of Laurier, who did not know that he belonged to their race, who had forgotten his birthplace, and to whom consequently he had to say : 'In my veins, the same blood runs as in yours.' It was absolutely necessary that he should recall that fact to their minds. 'The Duty of the Hour' was not to be compared to the necessity of informing these people that he was one of themselves. Did my right hon. friend listen to the adulations addressed to him on that occasion? No doubt he did, and became impressed with the conviction that he was the possessor of all earthly power, so far as Canada was concerned. Was it that which caused him to indulge in the ebulitions he did at Sorel, and afterwards at Cornwall, and to a certain extent at Niagara? What was Canada, he asked, when we came into power? An atmospheric star in the far nebulae, of inferior dimensions. What is it to-day? A sun that rises and sets for the whole world. Where was Canada, he exclaimed, when we came into power? Forgotten by France, which cradled our infancy, unknown to the great metropolis of the empire whose colony we are, ignored by Europe, and a negligible quantity with the United States, our great neighbours. But where is Canada to-day? I, he said, went to the British metropolis and vindicated our rights to autonomy in commerce as well as in politics. And to-day, on the banks of Loire and the Thames, the Neva and the Dneister, the Volga and the Don, the Danube and the Po, the name of Canada is in every home, and the sun of Canada is that to which every inhabitant in these distant countries turns his eyes for peace, progress and prosperity. My right hon. friend should take himself seriously to task once in a while to prevent these bad attacks of megalomania.

My right hon. friend thought it was his duty to attack the leader of the opposition on the ground of purity. He did that all through the campaign, but during all that time he uttered no strong note with reference to the necessity for a cleaner public life. Not once, however, did he omit the opportunity of holding up my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) to ridicule for his professions regarding a higher moral tone of public life. Down at Niagara, what did the right hon. gentleman say? Mr. Borden, he said, cannot possibly be as virtuous as he looks, and even Mr. Foster cannot be as virtuous as he talks. Then my right hon. friend raised his face towards heaven, and in front of the assembled thousands at Niagara said : 'Thank God I am no Purist.' And he utters the same thing to-night. And every scalawag who has been taking his ten, twenty or fifty per cent echoed the sentiment with a very unctious and hearty Amen !

Now, sir, of all the small attempts to turn an argument, that which my right hon. friend has used with reference to the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) in his statement concerning the British Columbia case, is about the smallest I have known him to be driven to in this House. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) declared, with reference to a province that he was of opinion that their financial grievance was well based, and that, if it were well based, he believed it ought to have a fair and reasonable arbitrament and judgment. Can my right hon. friend say that that was at all comparable with the kinds of bribery and corruption practised by himself and his ministers? Does he mean to say that if a member argues for the rights of a province as he sees them, and declares that he will vindicate them to the extent of seeing to it that they have a fair and reasonable arbitrament he is guilty of bribery? If he does, he will not find one impartial man in this country to share his views. Suppose that a great transportation line is needed to run through this country and that I believe in building it and go out and argue for it before the people, can any man say that I am bribing the constituencies? Is it not a germane and proper thing for a man to establish if he can, and argue for if he will? But my right hon. friend takes a different method. He does it by piecemeal and in detail—although he sometimes takes up large sections. Does he remember when he asserted: The politics of Mr. Mercier are my politics and my politics are the politics of Mr. Mercier? Does he remember when he made that compact with Mercier of the province of Quebec: You give me a majority and I will give you what you demand? If he did not do so, then the words uttered by Mr. Mercier, and which are on record to-day, must have been a misrepresentation of the facts—but I do not believe they were. Why, even with reference to British Columbia, since when has the Prime Minister changed faith? Talking about telegrams, does he remember a certain telegram he sent to British Columbia in the crisis of an election in which he stated: What you want I want, so far as British Columbia is concerned; your politics are my politics; your views upon this Oriental question are my views? Another telegram of his was to Maxwell concerning the mint. Maxwell was in extremis; he was fighting a contested election and wanted a mint for Victoria. He was telegraphed to by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier): You shall have the mint. Is there a parallel between that and the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) the leader of the opposition? This whole campaign, which has been alluded to by the right hon. leader of the government as a great triumph for himself and his friends, was, he stated, not fought out on principle. I agree with him. Leaving for the moment what the right hon. gentleman said as to British Columbia, certainly, so far as the rest of the country is concerned, the election was not fought out on principle by his party—I agree with the right hon. gentleman there. Since when has the right hon. gentleman had a principle which he has stuck to over night? The election was fought on opportunism, it was fought on the negation of popular rights; it was fought on a system of bribery in detail by himself and those who surround him. What a spectacle it was we saw in Berlin, when the right hon. gentleman stood up a young man before the constituents there, and said to them virtually: I will make this young man a minister if you will elect him. That was not bribery and corruption; that was the work of the man who thanked God that he was not a purist. And what are we to think of his Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) who called the attention of the dear electors in Berlin to the fact that he had been there before and had said something which had come true—he had promised them a clock and they had the clock ; he had promised them postal delivery in the town, and they had postal delivery in the town or, if it was not quite completed, he would see that it was completed. And what else did he promise? Rural free mail delivery. And then, in insulting fashion, he said, either at Berlin or at Niagara: Behold the bounty of the Liberal government to the farmers of Canada. By that we can gauge the principle of hon. gentlemen opposite. My right hon. friend was rather testy last night when I asked him about certain commercial negotiations and how they were progressing. He intimated that if there were any commercial negotiations they might be in my mind, they certainly had never entered his.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Never in the wide world. And yet, to-day the Speaker read from the chair the culmination of the commercial negotiations.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No commercial negotiations there.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the right hon. gentleman tell me that he did not say the same thing when the present Senator Derbyshire was got out of the way of the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham)? The intimation went through the length and breadth of this country that a senatorship was to be the price, but the right hon. gentleman said that there was no such thing, hurling back the accusation with infinite disdain. And yet, within six weeks, Mr. Derbyshire was a senator.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have told my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) before, and I repeat now, that I made no promise whatever to Mr. Derbyshire. And I say that I made no promise whatever to Mr. Sloan.

Mr. FOSTER. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is somewhat of the calibre he ascribes to Hon. Richard McBride—he is astute. He denies such a promise. But I will put one thing to him that he will not deny. In 1896 when the right hon. gentleman wanted to get into power, speaking at Sohmer park, Montreal, on the 25th of April of that year, and dealing with the question of the wholesale bribery of constituencies, he said:

It need hardly be said that the doctrine is not only corrupt but unjust. The taxes are paid by supporters and opponents of the government alike, and all have a right to share in the expenditure according to the public necessity that may exist. It is an outrage to tell an elector that he must vote as he is told, or abandon his right to the public service for which he pays.

How many times has the right hon. gentleman told that, not only to electors, but to members of this House ?

There are other questions to be considered, there are other abuses which the Liberal party want to make away with. We want to reduce the public expenditure. It has increased by over sixty per cent, while the population has only increased by twelve per cent.

Is that a fair proportion? The taxes are altogether to high. Those who say that the taxes are never too high are not the ones who pay them; they are the men who spend your money at Ottawa. There is still another very important and more vital reform which the Liberal party intends to make, and that is to introduce 'honesty' in the administration of your public affairs. I contend that the public treasury is as sacred as any private safe. I believe that the money which is in the public treasury is as sacred as the money which is in your own pocket. If you elect me to power I promise you to inaugurate an honest and economical administration.

And yet these words were hardly off the tongue of my hon. friend before he sat down and wrote a letter to Mr. François Langelier, in which he sent him a promissory note, guaranteeing either a judgeship or the governorship of Quebec if he would go into the election in support of his party. From that time up to the present the bargain-counter has never been closed, the auction block has never been out of action in this country.

The last great picture presented to us was that deal with Senator Scott. My right hon. friend wanted young blood. I do not blame him. He had two old men in the Senate, he wanted their places for two young men. They were both members of his cabinet. Sir Richard Cartwright was one and Mr. Scott was the other. I understand that my right hon. friend made a proposition to Sir Richard Cartwright, but I understand that he got a tremendous rejoinder from him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Pardon me. I desire to give the most emphatic denial to any statement that I ever asked Sir Richard Cartwright for his portfolio. Quite the reverse. I was glad to have him in the cabinet, and am still glad.

Mr. FOSTER. I accept my right hon. friend's word. We cannot get all the correspondence, I suppose it is private. But it would be spicy reading if we could get it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No. My hon. friend will pardon me. He and I are old friends, and I say here upon my word that I never, by correspondence or otherwise, mentioned to Sir Richard Cartwright that I wanted his portfolio, never.

Mr. FOSTER. I gladly accept his words. Of course it might have been done in some other way. But will he deny that he entered into negotiations with Mr. Scott? Mr. Scott seems to have been born under a lucky star. At no time in the history of this country, while Mr. Scott has been living and there has been a Liberal party in this country, has he not been an official drawing high emoluments from that government. But the period came when something had to be done, and my hon. friend consummated a deal which is as bad as any that was ever consummated in the time of the Georges. What did he do? He wanted the portfolio of Senator Scott. Senator Scott held two positions, one was a portfolio and the other a Senatorship. He hung on to the Senatorship, and he would not give up the portfolio until—what? A son of Senator Scott, an estimable young man of medium ability, was hoisted into a brand new office at the rate of some $9,000 a year, as vice-president of a commission. Senator Scott keeps the life senatorship, and his son gets a new office for life. worth to him on the ordinary expectancy of life not less than $270,000. The country pays the money. The party deal is completed. That is the deal by which he has been able to inject some new blood into his cabinet. I am not finding fault with the new blood, I have nothing to say against the old blood. I say that this transaction swells to Heaven, and reeks with everything which is opposed to good administration in this or any other constitutionally governed country.

Now what else has happened? A gentleman from British Columbia fails to get the support of his constituency, fails to get the support of his province. He remains in office as administrator. We find no fault, for a fair time. But the time comes when parliament has to meet, and when the Minister ought to be in his seat. Then what happens? Then, under pressure from the Prime Minister, a constituency in the province of British Columbia is voided of its trustee, and a seat is purchased for the gentleman who was defeated in his own constituency and in his own province. Well, that may be high politics, but I am doubtful if the country will look upon it as such. But my right hon. friend, from the time when he wrote that letter to François Langelier up to the present time, has never paused in his career of publicly bribing and privately influencing the politics of this country in that peculiar way. I might mention some other things if I had time. On July 16, 1904, I had the pleasure of moving the following resolution:

> That the Bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of amending the said Bill so as to provide punishment by fine or imprisonment for any minister of the Crown or other person who as an inducement to any voters or class of voters in any electoral district to vote for any candidate promises to procure or threatens to withhold the expenditure of any public moneys of Canada or the undertaking of any public works within such electoral district.

The right hon. gentleman opposed it, and his party opposed it. They would not accede to it, because it would have been a prohibition to do those things which they wished to do. I have been led into this discursion with reference to the purity side of the question. There are two other points upon which I would like to touch briefly before six o'clock. The right hon. gentleman has suddenly grown cautious. He puts into the mouth of the Governor General a statement that it is now necessary to be exceptionally cautious with reference to the finances of the country. There has been a fall in the revenue, there has been a fall in trade, and we must now be exceptionally cautious. When did this take place? The speech from the Throne says more than a year ago. It seems to me that the time for the right hon. gentleman to have exercised caution was that year and moreover when all the signals of distress were out and flying in this and other countries. But what was the right hon. gentleman doing then? Pushing up the expenditure until he had authorized an expenditure of $141,000,000 for the current year upon which we are now about to enter. That was the time when my right hon. friend should have been cautious. But the elections were coming on, and he did not wish to put on the curb at that time. But after all that tremendous appropriation has been made, after the elections are over, my right hon. friend comes down, about twelve months after the danger signals are up, after the time for action has passed, and says that we must exercise exceptional caution. I can tell my right hon. friend that the financial condition of this country is not a thing which can be faced with equanimity by men who are serious and have any idea of the gravity of the situation, and that it has been largely brought about by my hon. friend himself and his uncurbed expenditures and appropriations.

There is one other point, and that is with reference to the commission of Judge Cassels. I would ask my right hon. friend how he can refuse, immediately and consecutively, to extend the probe of examination, fearless and full, into the other spending departments of this government? Here I wish to call my right hon. friend's attention to something which occurred in the course of the campaign. The right hon. gentleman was meeting the charge of corruption, meeting the charge of extravagance in departmental administration and, down at Niagara, what did he say? I want the House to listen. He said:

Let me go one step farther. We are charged with having been corrupt. In the session of eight months duration which was drawn to a close a few weeks ago was there any charge made against the government such as was made against the Conservative government in the days of the Pacific scandal?

And so on.

No, sir, no charge of that kind was made, but charges were made against whom?

He goes on to say against the officials of the departments. Here is the point:

What was our conduct? We did, sir, what any honest man would have done, what any honest government would have done, what Hon. Alex. Mackenzie would have done; we appointed a commission to investigate.

What was he talking about? About the extravagance and corruption in the administration of the departments. We did what any other government would have done; we appointed a commission to investigate.

The commission sat and reported having gone through the whole matter they brought in a report in which they state that there were irregularities. There were no names given. It simply confirmed our suspicions, and, our suspicions being aroused, we appointed another commission. Something more was done. We took one of the judges of the land, a man whose honour was beyond reproach—Justice Cassels,—to carry out the investigation. Sir, could we do anything more?

There was but one impression to be taken from that, namely, that the Prime Minister of Canada said to the electorate: We appointed a commission in 1907 to investigate mal-administration in the departments. The right hon. gentleman stated that more than once. What are the facts of the case? He himself knows well. He appointed no commission to examine into the mal-administration of the departments. His own Minister of Justice says that he did not. His own Minister of Marine and Fisheries says that he did not. The commission itself declares that he did not and yet my right hon. friend was content to make the statement to the people of Canada that these charges were being pressed home, that the government did not wait for charges, that they appointed a commission in order to investigate these matters and they were going to find out and punish the guilty. The right hon. gentleman has taken up one part and a very small part of the body of the departments of this country. He has found it gangrened from the point at which the knife entered to the place where the knife was taken out again—gangrened in every respect. He has had witnesses state on oath that what was being done in the Department of Marine and Fisheries was being done in every other department. Does my right hon. friend propose to go farther? Does he propose to examine into other departments and appoint a full and free commission with power to examine into all the points in the case? Does he or does he not propose to probe the other spending departments or is he willing to allow the impression to go broadcast that all the other departments are just as bad as the Department of Marine and Fisheries? There is one thing that surprises me. It is that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) still occupies his seat—a man who, for three years, nearly, has been in that department, who has opportunities and has had opportunities for obtaining a full knowledge of his department, who has been aided by the press, aided by the committees, aided by gentlemen on this side of the House, who has had all the distinctive blotches pointed out to him and who has not only not tried to deal with them, but who has absolutely refused to do it. With such a record as has been shown in that hon. gentleman's department, not only at the centre here but in every branch where the investigation has proceeded, after it has been proved that it has been absolutely untrustworthy and unreliable that hon.

gentleman still stands before this House as the minister of that department. How often has my right hon. friend the Prime Minister said : I go by the English model. Does my right hon. friend think that any minister of Great Britain would occupy his seat if such gross negligence, or gross incapacity, or worse were brought home to him as the head of the department ? Does he not know that even in France, where they may be a little less rigid than in Great Britain, a minister left his office not long ago, simply because suspicions were thrown upon his department of mal-administration of which he himself personally had no knowledge. It is the duty of the head of a department, acting in trust for the country, to see that his department is properly managed. If he is incapable, or indifferent, or stupid, or whatever it may be, his is the responsibility and he it is who ought to take that responsibility. I am surprised that he remains still after all that record of gross incapacity and worse as a member of the present government.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. H. COWAN (Vancouver). Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the references made to me and to my conduct of the election in the city of Vancouver by the right hon. First Minister I would not have ventured to-night, unprepared, to take part in this debate. But some men, like the right hon. the Prime Minister, are born great; some, like the hon. gentleman who has just resigned from Comox-Atlin (Mr. Sloan), achieve greatness, and some, like myself by the references of the right hon. the First Minister, have greatness thrust upon them. Let me say that I have never in my public utterances mentioned the name of the right hon. the Prime Minister without the tribute of praise that I believed to be his due. But, Sir, I had not then heard the right hon. the First Minister in superficial and, may I say, in specious debate; I had not heard him on the question of immigration, on the question of Asiatic exclusion; and like every young heart who believes in the greatness of public men, I was prepared to hear drop from the lips of the First Minister of Canada words and arguments befitting the occasion and befitting this House of Commons. When I heard that First Minister say that in British Columbia and in British Columbia alone, of all the great provinces that form this confederation, the campaign had been conducted on principle and that he could not understand the results that had been brought about in British Columbia and in my constituency, I felt that it was due to myself and to this House that I should offer some explanation of those results. Sir, I know and you know that it is due to no merits of mine that a majority of 858 for the Liberal party in the constiuency of Vancouver was converted into a majority for myself of 1,582, the largest turnover, let me say it in all humility, because I take no credit to myself, in the whole Dominion of Canada. Let me explain to the right hon. the First Minister what that majority means. That majority means that the people of British Columbia, who are confronted with a condition with which no other part of Canada is confronted, who are face to face with a condition and not with a theory, do not believe in the policy of the government of to-day. Why have the people of British Columbia exercised their own individual and inalienable right of judgment in this matter, and converted a solid phalanx of Liberal members into the representation we now see from British Columbia? I shall attempt to tell you why. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government have entered into a treaty with Japan that does not conserve the interests of the workingmen of Canada and Canadian citizenship. As I said I have never on a public platform used the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier without at the same time attributing to him the highest qualities of a politician and a statesman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear, that is right.

Mr. COWAN. Never; but, Sir, that was before I listened to his specious arguments. I wish from the bottom of my heart I had never heard that speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to-day. I wish it because I cannot reconcile myself to the feeling that my idols have been shattered. I cannot reconcile myself to the feeling that a leader of public thought in Canada has so far failed to grasp and to understand the feeling and the conditions that will make of Canada a great nation. I say, Sir, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the First Minister of Canada, in declaring that we in British Columbia have fought the battle in the recent campaign on principle, has paid, unconsciously no doubt, a compliment to British Columbia. I can see that he is perturbed and cannot understand why when we conducted the campaign on principle the result has been to give me a larger turnover than he dared hope to have in his own constituency. I can tell him the reason to-night. It was because without reason and without any request from Japan he abandoned the sacred duty and transferred to Japan the power to keep Canadian citizenship untainted by Japanese immigration. I can tell him that it was because the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) on the floor of this House has declared in so many words that he is not in favour of a white British Columbia. I can tell him that it is because the hon. Minister of Agriculture has declared in so many words on the floor of this House that we believe that it would be in the interest of Canada if hundreds of thousands of Asiatics were poured into our country. I can tell him that it is because on the 3rd of December, 1907, he stood on a public platform in this very city of Ottawa and declared that he would not apply the law of exclusion to Asiatics. I can tell him that it is because almost every minister in his Cabinet and every man in his following who speaks with authority has declared in unmistakable terms that he is not in favour of reserving to this country of ours the citzenship of Canadians. I can tell him, and I am delighted to have this opportunity of telling him now and here, that when he said—distinguished and great politician and statesman as he is—that he did not share the sentiments of British Columbia, that we were making a mistake we, as befitted citizens of the great empire to which we belong, we said in our hearts, thank God, we have our own individual judgment still left to us. I can tell him that it is because he has not studied conditions, but has only studied theories. And, Sir, not only is it a great compliment to us in British Columbia that we conducted our campaign on principle, but Sir, in explanation of the peculiar fact that we have converted a solid following of seven Liberals at the back of Sir Wilfrid Laurier into a majority of five in support of Mr. R. L. Borden, my honoured leader, I can tell him that I stood on a public platform in British Columbia and said that Mr. R. L. Borden had declared that if the modus vivendi alleged—and I use the word advisedly—to have been entered into by the Hon. Mr. Lemieux with the Japanese government were not lived up to, that circumstance would oblige the Conservative party to abrogate that treaty. I can tell him why my word and my message to the people of British Columbia was accepted : it was because it was from Mr. R. L. Borden, my honoured leader. And why, Mr. Speaker, do the people of British Columbia accept the message of Mr. R. L. Borden, and do not accept the message of Sir Wilfrid Laurier ? It is because Sir Wilfrid Laurier and every member of his Cabinet have put themselves on record as saying in precise terms that they do not believe in a white Canada and a white British Columbia. And I want to say here that while we are prepared to stand steadfast to the men and to the government who will protect the sacred interests of Canada—because the interests of Canada are not different from those of British Columbia—we have in British Columbia the power of discrimination ; and while we find that Sir Wilfrid Laurier says that if this modus vivendi is not lived up to, he will abrogate the treaty, we read into that statement the statement of himself and every member of his Cabinet that he does not believe in protecting the Canadian workingman and thus protecting Canadian citizenship against the importation into British Columbia and into Canada of alien hordes that will always remain aliens. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I enter into this discussion unprepared as I am, in no partisan spirit. I want to say that I enter into this discussion with the highest appreciation of the distinguished qualities that mark the leader of the government of Canada. I want to say that we in British Columbia are not entering into the political life of Canada ; we are not taking this side or that especially because of the general questions that differentiate the two parties in Canada. We take part in this discussion—and I am standing on the floor of the House of Commons to-day at a great sacrifice to myself—not because I am a hidebound partisan, but because I believe that British Columbian interests and Canadian interests—yes, and imperial interests—demand that the blunder of January, 1907, shall be remedied and removed from the treaty laws of Canada. I say this, Sir, in all sincerity ; I believe that I am right, and whether I am right or wrong, I am acting from conviction. I am acting thus because I believe that the interests of Canada, the interests of the empire, and the interests of British Columbia in particular, demand that the treaty which allows every man-jack of the forty-seven millions of people who make up the citizenship of Japan, whether they be deaf, dumb or blind, whether thev be paupers or criminals, to enter Canada without let or hindrance, shall be amended, at least in accordance with the will of Japan herself. Ever since the 6th of October, 1896, Japan has been willing that Canada should retain to herself the power to control the immigration from Japan into Canada. That is a right which no self-respecting country should relinquish. There has not been a minute of time, since October, 1896, to the present, when Japan has not been perfectly willing that Canada should retain her own self respect and exercise the powers given her under section 95 of the British North America Act. Every speech delivered in this House and on the hustings throughout Canada has been an attempt to justify and palliate the blunder of the government in not reserving to Canada, in our treaty with Japan, the right to control or prohibit, if necessary, the immigration of Japanese labourers and artisans. The whole discussion to-day centres around that blunder in treaty-making committed by this government. There is nothing else in question. In 1895 the government then in power stipulated, as a preliminary to our consenting to any treaty, that Canada should retain the right to restrict or prohibit the immigration of Japanese labourers and artisans. That was the stand which the Conservative government of that day took. Again, in October of the following year, after the Conservative government had been defeated, the Japanese government agreed that Canada might adhere to the treaty and reserve to herself the right to prohibit or restrict immigration. Yet notwithstanding this fact and notwithstanding the fact that petition after petition was sent from British Columbia and memorials from the British Columbia government, notwithstanding every thing that a sane and intelligent citizenship could represent to the Ottawa government—notwithstanding all this, on the 25th of September, 1906, this government declared: 'We are willing to transfer to an alien government, whose citizens, when they come to Canada, remain aliens and will continue aliens to the end of time—we are willing to hand over to that alien government the right to say who shall and who shall not enter Canada from Japan.' I have said on the public platform throughout British Columbia that the 25th of September,—1906, when that news was flashed by cable from Ottawa to London, was a black letter day for this Dominion, and I now appeal to the power and majority of the government to reconsider this matter in the interests of Canadian citizenship, and recover to Canada the right she has under her constitution and which she should never have relinquished, namely, the right to control immigration. In saying that I have practically done with this question for the present, because I know it is the intention of the representatives of British Columbia to go into it on a future occasion with greater particularity and more details than I can hope to do unprepared at this moment. Let me add that this is not, as the right hon. the First Minister seems to think, a mere economic question. I yield to no man in admiration of the great empire of Japan. Let me take you back to 1852, when Commodore Perry negotiated the first commercial treaty with Japan. Since then that great country has been acquiring with peculiar rapidity and facility and form of western government and the methods of western commerce and civilization. But these people are still exercising the peculiar domestic traditions and habits of their race. I yield to no man in my admiration of the Japanese as a nation and as individuals, but the danger to Canada lies in that very fact that we have to accord them our admiration in many respects. They are aliens and will remain so. In 1894 they entered into commercial treaties with the United States, Great Britain and almost every western civilized nation. When they entered into that treaty with Great Britain in 1894, the British government in 1895 cabled the government of Canada to ascertain whether Canada wished to become a party to that treaty. I am delighted to be able to declare that the Conservative government, which was then in power, replied: No, unless Canada shall retain her right to restrict or prohibit the immigration from Japan, not only of Japanese labour, but also of Japanese artisans. These people, you know, can transform themselves from artisans into labourers with the rapidity of lightning artists.

And our government of that day had the wisdom and foresight and prevision of statesmen to say that they must add the words 'and artisans.' The United States did not adopt that precaution, and they are paying the penalty to-day. Now, when that government, in 1895, declared in no unmistakable way the policy of Canada, it was the duty of statesmanship, in the sacred interest of the Canadian workingman, to carry out that policy, whatever government happened to be in power in Canada. You must remember that this great nation, Japan, as I have said, is taking on the form of western government and adopting the methods of western commerce and you must remember that the result will be that these people will produce in the near future a new form of civilization which it will be the duty of Canada and of the United States to cope with, and which, if not coped with, will affect and taint the citizenship of Canada and therefore of the great empire to which we belong. Now, I venture to think, that this House, regardless of party affiliations, will give this matter the serious consideration to which it is entitled, and will realize that in this question of immigration we are face to face with a greater problem than any with which Canada has yet been confronted. I take part in the discussion of that problem, and I desire to take part in the solution of that problem, in no partisan spirit. I desire to take part in the discussion and solution of that problem from the standpoint of the interest not only of British Columbia, but of Canada, and of the great and glorious empire of which Canada is so important a part.

Now, leaving that subject as one with which I intended to deal to-night only briefly, I desire to refer to another subject to which the right hon. Prime Minister has seen fit to refer, the subject of better terms for British Columbia. The Prime Minister referred, as it seemed to me, though I hope I am mistaken, in sneering tones to the fact that my leader has said—as he has consistently said since 1904—that British Columbia has such a claim upon the Dominion as ought to be referred to an independent and impartial tribunal. When the right hon. gentleman sneers at that position, he sneers at the very fountain of justice itself. And when any man in Canada lacks the spirit of fair-play and justice to such an extent that he is unwilling to let the claim of British Columbia or any other province or section or individual be submitted to an independent and impartial tribunal for arbitrament, if he be a man whom I held in lofty appreciation, my ideals concerning him must suffer a serious fall. All we want is justice: dare to give us that justice. If we cannot prove our claim, we will take our medicine with equanimity. The time for expediency in this Canada of ours, has passed; the time for opportunism has passed. Give us justice and we are satisfied. Dare to submit our claims to an independent and impartial tribunal: dare to be a man. If we are wrong, we will take our medicine; if we are right, like men you will pay us our claim. The Prime Minister has told you that this question of British Columbia's claim has been submitted, if you please, to the representatives of the other provinces. It may be that I would be delighted if the money claims against myself were submitted to me for arbitrament. You can see that if we of British Columbia are right, the other provinces of Canada will foot the bill just as, if my creditors are right, I must foot the bill. Could you, with justice, put me in a position to judge of the claims of my creditors against myself? Be fair. Be just. Be honourable. Submit our claims to an independent and impartial tribunal. You will find that the splendid western spirit of manliness and fair-play will take the result and the consequences with equanimity. I have only this further to say, that I think the hon. the First Minister is quite right when he says the campaign in British Columbia was conducted on principle. It was conducted on principle, and I believe that if and when an election campaign is conducted throughout the whole of Canada on principle, men of principle will be elected and will govern this country.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). It was not my intention to take part in this debate, but after the extraordinary speech of the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and his personal reference to myself, I think it my duty to say a few words in my own defence. I do not intend to follow that hon. gentleman on the ground of personalities in which he has indulged, I do not think that style of debate is calculated to raise or even to maintain the dignity of this House. This country has before it enough weighty problems to discuss without members of this House wasting our time in discussing personal matters. For that reason I cannot follow the hon. gentleman on the ground he has chosen, I will leave him to follow alone that line of debate. But I will say this to the hon. gentleman, that I am not afraid to compare my personal record with his own. So far as integrity and honour are concerned, I think my record will compare favourably with his: consequently if I do not choose to follow him in personal attacks, it is not because I do not feel quite able to defend myself on that ground. As to my public career as Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I am not afraid, either, to compare my record with the record of the hon. member for North Toronto. He was for a number of years Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and what did he do to reform that department? Let him point to one single action of his when Minister where he tried to reform the department. He did nothing, he let things drag on as they had been doing for years, He allowed the same abuses to continue that had been existing before he took hold of the department, and he never had the courage to effect a single reform in that department, as I have done. Sir, I have effected considerable reforms in that department, and if to-day I am attacked by some of the Tory newspapers and by the hon. member for North Toronto, it is because I have reformed the administration of that department. In the first place, we had a bad system of keeping accounts. That system existed when my hon. friend was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and what did he do to remove it? Nothing at all. I have reformed that, and to-day the abuses which existed under my hon. friend's administration have disappeared, and we have now a clear and straight administration of that department.

But why are these attacks levelled against me now? We have just passed through a general election contest, and my hon. friend knows the result. He knows what he and his friends essayed to do before the elections. He spent the whole session last year in attacking me, by all means and under all circumstances, by saying the most abusive things against me personally. When the elections came on he gathered together those abuses and reproduced them in pamphlet form and scattered them over Canada. Sir, what has been the result of that campaign of slander inaugurated by the hon. member for North Toronto? He and his party were hopelessly defeated, that was the result. There is not a county throughout Canada where my name was not mentioned by the Tory speakers, but it was all to no purpose, and this government has been triumphantly returned. Why, Sir, my opponents were not able to put a candidate against me in my own county, they were not able even to find twenty-five electors to sign a nomination paper for a candidate against me. True, they sent an organizer from Montreal into my county, instructing him by no means to allow me to be elected by acclamation. That gentleman went around the county to get signatures, not in favour of any man who was known in the county, but in favour of a man from Montreal who did not know ten electors in the county. This organizer succeeded in getting 25 names, but just as he was about to deposit his nomination paper, two of the men who had signed it came up and said, 'We do not want our names on that nomination paper, we want Mr. Brodeur to be elected by acclamation. I was elected by acclamation, and that is my answer to the hon. gentleman and his friends. Not only Liberals of my county, but many Conservatives were in favour of my election by acclamation, as they told me themselves, in order to rebuke the hon. member for North Toronto for his abusive personalities. Let him continue that policy if he likes. To-night he seems desirous of continuing it. Let him go on. I do not care, I will be re-elected as long as he continues that policy. I shall not be obliged, as my hon. friend was, to desert my own constituency and my own province, but I shall continue to be elected in my own constituency and my own province, because my electors have confidence in me.

The Department of Marine and Fisheries has been attacked. I would have thought that my hon. friend would at least have waited until he had had an opportunity of reading the report of Mr. Justice Cassels. I do not want to discuss that report now because I suppose that my hon. friends opposite have not had the opportunity of reading over the report, but probably we will have occasion later on to discuss it. But, I am glad to see that some of the attacks which have been made by my hon. friends opposite, and especially by the hon. member for North Toronto, have been proved to be absolutely false as far as they concern myself. I will give the House one instance. Hon. gentlemen who were then members of the House will remember the hon. member for North Toronto last session referring time and again to Merwin and Brooks and to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who, he said, was still doing business with Merwin and Brooks. I was attacked and attacked by the hon. member for North Toronto on that ground. Let him read the report of Mr. Justice Cassels and he will find that the charge which was made against me in that connection is absolutely groundless; in fact, it is stated that the purchases which had been made from Merwin and Brooks were made contrary to and in disobedience of the instructions that I had given by an officer of the department appointed by my hon. friend for North Toronto. If there is anybody who is at fault it is not myself, but it is the hon. member for North Toronto who has placed in the service men who will not fulfil the instructions of their ministers, men who have been disobeying the instructions of their ministers.

My aim upon going into the department was to reform that department and put it on a proper basis. Abuses of the worst kind have crept in, I admit, abuses which had existed since confederation, which had existed under the Tory governments and which had existed under the Liberal government. Take the question of purchases for example. You have heard a great deal lately with regard to purchases and how scandalous it was that we had a patronage list or that we were purchasing from some particular personal. Let us read some extracts from a document which was placed before the House last year, because I do not want to refer to the report of Mr. Justice Cassels. We will discuss that later on, and we will draw from it the arguments which I venture to say will vindicate absolutely what I have done. But, let us quote from a report which was laid before the House last year. Take for example a letter of the 28th March, 1894, addressed by Mr. Art. J. Turcotte, member for Montmorency, to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, who was then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and which is as follows:

Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, K.C.M.G., Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—For the supplies of groceries at the Department of Marine of Quebec, I would much recommend you Napoleon Moffet. Hoping that you will do me that favour.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) ART. J. TURCOTTE.

Then Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper replies as follows:

Dear Mr. Turcotte,—Your letter of the 28th, recommending that groceries be purchased from Mr. Napoleon Moffet, was received by me.

Mr. Moffet has been asked, through the agent at Quebec, for his prices.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) C. H. TUPPER.

Here is a letter dated the 7th June, 1894, addressed to Mr. Gregory:

In reply to your letter of May 2, 1894, informing me that you had no correspondence with the department, regarding the purchase of groceries from Mr. O. A. Larose, I have to request you to inform me whether Mr. O. A. Larose was recommended by any one. Inform me also whether you purchased groceries from any other grocer than Mr. Larose.

The deputy minister writes that to Mr. Gregory.

It appears from the accounts, that nearly all the groceries purchased for steamers' use were obtained from Mr. Larose. I have to request you to report whether this is the case.

No competition was required in any way, shape or form. Here is an extract from a memo.:

January 14, 1905.

Re purchasing of supplies, for lighthouses. Small supplies.

With regard to what are called small supplies, such as towelling, ticking, gray cotton, &c., the agents are allowed to purchase these without tender at the lowest possible prices for good articles from merchants who have been recommended by the M. P.'s of the several cities.

Recommending by the M.P.'s, members of the several cities! That is very clear. Here is another:

April 5, 1895.

Sir,—Mr. Turcotte, M.P., has written to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries asking that crockery and smallwares be obtained from Mr. Omer Lecomte, when required, the same as supplied by his predecessor Mr. Bruneau.

I have to request you to report on the matter for the information of the department.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) JOHN HARDIE,
Acting Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

J. U. Gregory, Esq.,
Agent Department of Marine and Fisheries,
Quebec

Here is another letter:

Quebec, April 9, 1895.

Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 5th instant (No. 10729), requesting me to report upon the application of Mr. Turcotte, M.P., for crockery and smallwares to be obtained from Mr. O. Lecomte, successor to Mr. Bruneau.

Mr. Louis Bruneau was recommended for this patronage by the late Hon. Jno. Hearn, Sir A. P. Caron and others; it amounted to very little. He has gone entirely out of the business and is succeeded by Mr. Omer Lecomte, who appears to have as many good friends as Mr. Bruneau; and his getting the supplying of the few articles which may be wanted in his line will not injure Mr. Bruneau nor any one else that I know of. Please inform me if approved of.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) JOHN U. GREGORY,
Agent Department of Marine and Fisheries.

The Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

And it was approved of. These are some of the things which happened in Quebec. Now, take St. John, N.B. I see that during the elections a gentleman in that province went out of his way to work against the Liberal party. This gentleman seemed to be very much scandalized in regard to patronage. What do I find? —a letter from the Hon. John Douglas Hazen, Premier of New Brunswick, written to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, as follows:

Dear Sir,—Last year, acting on my recommendation, you decided that the dry goods, required to be obtained at St. John for your department, be purchased from James Hamilton.

No objection there.

I believe the price was thoroughly satisfactory, and I will be obliged if you will give similar instructions to your agent at St. John for this year's supplies. Mr. Hamilton is one of our very best political workers, and his party services entitle him to anything that can fairly be given to him.

Your faithfully,
(Sgd.) J. DOUGLAS HAZEN.

Here is the Premier of New Brunswick who is not asking even that a purchase list be made, that prices be obtained from some friends of the government, but that purchases be made direct from Mr. James Hamilton.

We find on May 8, 1894, another letter from Mr. Hazen reading as follows:

My dear Sir Charles,—I beg once more to call your attention to my recommendation of some time ago that the dry goods required in your department in St. John be purchased from James Hamilton. I judge from your reply at the time this recommendation would be acted upon and I will feel very much obliged if you will now instruct Mr. Harding to purchase from Hamilton if his prices are satisfactory.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) J. DOUGLAS HAZEN.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. A little different.

Mr. BRODEUR. A little different, just to purchase from one man. My hon. friend says it is another thing, but what competition is there?

We have the same thing from Halifax, and there I declare it to be one of the most scandalous matters which has been brought before this parliament. There tenders had been asked for, but before those tenders were passed upon by the Governor in Council they were submitted to outsiders to see whether the tenders would please them or not. I shall read the letter to my hon. friend.

Ottawa, April 19, 1892.

The Hon. C. H. Tupper,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

My dear Tupper,—Referring to our conversation yesterday morning respecting tenders for the supplies for the steamers of your department at Halifax, I have to ask that before the contracts are awarded you will kindly allow me an opportunity to call at your office and learn who are likely to receive them.

Your faithfully,
(Sgd.) JOHN F. STAIRS.

Before these tenders were submitted to council, when they should be a matter of secrecy between the members of the government, an outsider comes in and asks to see the tenders. What is the answer? It should have been that the tenders were private and that no one had the right to see them, but that is not what we see under Conservative administration. I have here Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper's letter.

In reply to yours of the 19th instant, requesting an opportunity to call at my department, and ascertain who is likely to receive the contract for supplying the steamers of the department at Halifax, I may say that any time after to-morrow you may call, and information will be given respecting the tenders.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

John F. Stairs, Esq., M.P.,
The House of Commons.

Could there be any more scandalous conduct than that of the late ministers in permitting outsiders to inspect the tenders before they were accepted by the Governor in Council? I brand it as most disgraceful conduct. That is one of the evils with which we had to cope. When I entered the department what did I do?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh, hear, hear.

Mr. BRODEUR. I changed entirely the system which had been in existence before. One man was no longer permitted the exclusive right to sell dry goods to the department, as had been done at St. John; we asked prices from a large number of people and lately I have gone further, I have abolished entirely the patronage list and now we are purchasing by calling for public tenders, open to everybody. The other day we had occasion to ask for tenders in Halifax, and I understand that a contract has been given to a person who is not friendly to the government. But I do not care; I want to reform the system that has been in existence since 1867, I do not wish to have any more of that patronage system. The Liberal party, unlike the Conservative party, believe in doing without that patronage system. The system does not work to the interest of the Liberal party, for we are not like the Conservative party; the Conservative party wants to make millionaires or to give favour; we want to distribute the wealth and to give to every person the advantage of an opportunity of tendering and of carrying out contracts and we wish in making purchases to obtain substantial goods at reasonable prices. These reforms I understand have not been very well received by my hon. friends opposite; they would like to see continued the same system that existed before. I am not in favour of that policy; I have decided that in my department things shall be done in an upright and honourable way. I do not wish to follow the course of my hon. friends opposite; I want to do better than they have done; I want to institute reforms and those reforms are now being carried out in the best way possible. How are these reforms being carried out? I have told you that we have made investigations, we ordered the civil service investigation, and following that the investigation by Mr. Justice Cassels. That shows that we are not afraid of making investigations.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am glad to see the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) laughing at that. How did the former government proceed? How did he proceed himself? In 1891 and 1892, when officers were charged with being derelict in their duty, what did he do? Of course he was not Minister of Marine, but he was minister of another department in which some officers were also charged. Did he appoint a judge to investigate the conduct of those officers and of the ministers who might be reproached as to their conduct? No, my hon. friend was too cautious for that, he did not do what I did, he simply appointed himself a commission in order to investigate the conduct of those officers.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be well done.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) who could be charged with being responsible for the conduct of these officers who were under his control, instead of appointing an independent judge to make the investigation said: I shall appoint myself—that will be better and less dangerous. He appointed himself and afterwards dismissed some of those officers and retained others in the public service. The course we have followed is much more courageous; we were not afraid to have an outsider go into the accounts of the Department of Marine, we were not afraid of investigation and we appointed a judge to conduct the investigation and lawyers to assist him. We have had examined everything connected with the administration of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and all of the evidence taken during the investigation can be found in the reports which have been laid before parliament. Did my hon. friend bring down to parliament the evidence which he took when he appointed himself a commissioner? No, he kept it for himself, he kept everything for himself, and now because a minister tries to do the right thing he is branded as a stupid and foolish man. I followed the course which I took because I was not afraid; my hon. friend perhaps would not have followed the same course, it might have been stupid on his part. I made it my duty to have an investigation by an independent judge and the result is as satisfactory as can be expected in the circumstances. For my part I am satisfied with the result of the investigation. I come out clear from that investigation and in spite of the insinuations of my hon. friend, in spite of his calling me stupid, I say that I stand justified before the country, having done my duty fearlessly, having done my duty to my friends, my duty to my party and my duty to the country which I have the honour to serve.

Mr. GEO. H. BARNARD (Victoria, B.C.). Mr. Speaker, I take it that if the result of the recent elections in British Columbia requires any justification, it has received it at the hands of the right hon. the Prime Minister to-day, for I think I am right in saying that the right hon. gentleman has paid more attention to the needs and wants of that province this afternoon than he has ever done since he has had the honour of leading the government. I do not propose to-night to discuss the questions on which the elections in the province of British Columbia were decided. The British Columbia members will, I think, if opportunity is afforded to them, and if it is not they will try to create it, discuss fairly, fully and freely those questions before this House, and I think the right hon. gentleman will find that the members from the province of British Columbia will be prepared to take up the gauntlet which he has thrown down to-day.

The right hon. gentleman did me the honour to refer with some particularity to the election in Victoria and to a certain telegram which had been sent by the hon. leader of the opposition to the 'Colonist' newspaper in that city; and, as I hope to stand in the estimation of the members of this House, not only on this side, but on the other side as well, as a man of honour and integrity, I deem it proper to make a statement with regard to that telegram. As a matter of fact, the telegram was handed to me when I was speaking on a platform at a public meeting in the city of Victoria on the evening of Saturday, the 24th of October, by an emissary of the 'Colonist' newspaper, a man on the reportorial staff of that paper. I read the telegram as it was handed to me, and it appeared the next morning in the 'Colonist' newspaper in the form in which it was handed to me. That is all that I knew about that telegram at that time. I heard afterwards that there was some alteration made in the telegram, but I want to say that so far as my inquiries gave me any information, it was not made either with any knowledge of mine or with the consent or connivance of any of the gentlemen who did me the honour of assisting me in any way in my election in Victoria.

The right hon. gentleman had a good deal to say this afternoon about the reasons for the result of the elections in British Columbia. I think I can fairly tell the right hon. gentleman that he did not lose those British Columbia elections on the 26th of October, 1908, but he lost them when he made a certain speech in the Russell Theatre in the city of Ottawa on the 3rd of December, 1907. The right hon. gentleman is reported in a paper which I believe is a Liberal paper, the 'Ottawa Free Press', as having on that occasion used the following words:

Japan is an ally of ours, declared Sir Wilfrid, and if there was a war in the Pacific in which Great Britain might be engaged we would have the Japanese fleet by the side of the British fleet. We would not apply the law of exclusion to the Japanese, but we recognize that there is a strong prejudice in the province of British Columbia amongst the white population against all kinds of Oriental population. I say prejudice, and I speak advisedly. I do not want to speak offensively. I know my words will be reported in British Columbia, but I speak here the same language I would speak there if it were my privilege to be there. Perhaps my words will be unwelcome there, but I tell them: You may have your views upon the question, and you are hostile to the immigration of the Oriental race. I do not care for your sentiments, and I believe you are making a mistake.

With regard to the last sentence, I understand that the right hon. gentleman made a correction, stating that it should have read: 'I do not share your sentiments.' That sentence, I may tell the right hon. gentleman, was quoted time and again in the province of British Columbia and was never contradicted, and I assume it to be a correct report. That was one of the inducing causes which made a majority of the electors of British Columbia supporters of the Conservative party. The right hon. gentleman appeared to be especially surprised at the result in the city of Victoria, and seemed to consider it necessary to impute fraud to the party to which I belong in the conduct of the election; but I think he could have found other reasons, if he had gone a little deeper, why the electors of Victoria did not care to return the gentleman who was contesting the seat in his interest. That gentleman had contested the seat four times previously, and had been defeated three times out of the four, and it was only when he came to British Columbia and dazzled the eyes of the electors with a Windsor uniform as a minister of the Crown, and that at a by-election, that he managed to get a seat at all. Now, the right hon. gentleman might, in fairness to a new member of this House at least, have taken the House into his confidence in reading that telegram this afternoon, and might have told Hon. members that it was not addressed to myself, but to the 'Colonist' newspaper and was published in that newspaper. I may say, in conclusion, that I hope my own reputation in my own community is as free as is his in his community from imputations of fraud.

Mr. MARTIN BURRELL (Yale-Cariboo). Mr. Speaker, I have no intention at this late hour of the night of taking up the time of the House on the motion for the adoption of the address; but the remarks of the right hon. the Prime Minister have made it impossible for any British Columbian member to remain silent. Two questions of supreme importance to the province from which I come entered very largely into the recent campaign, namely, Japanese immigration and better terms. The Prime Minister has referred to the fact that in the province of British Columbia the elections were fought largely on a question of principle, and, if I understand him aright, he expressed his gratification at that fact, a gratification in which we can all share. I do not know whether I can infer from his remarks that in the other provinces the elections were not conducted on questions of principle. If so, I assume that the right hon. gentleman referred to the Liberal conduct of the campaign as well as the Conservative. At one time the right hon. the Prime Minister stated that he would be guided on the great question of Oriental immigration by the sentiments of the west; but, if I remember aright, he said he would be guided by the views of the Liberals of the west. I think that is a rather narrow view He should have said that he would be guided by the views of the people of British Columbia, not the Liberals only.

In regard to the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address, I can join with my leader in complimenting those hon. gentlemen. I admit that I was not able to follow the seconder of the motion, although I recognized his grace and eloquence as a speaker. The mover of the address spoke at great length, and in the course of his speech stated that he was an agriculturist, but having been myself an agriculturist for about a quarter of a century, I may be pardoned for saying that his remarks did not smack very much of the soil.

There are four matters which were prominent in the elections that took place recently. They are essential matters of principle, and I propose to touch on them very briefly. In saying that they are essentially questions of principle, I am citing the words of the right hon. the First Minister himself ; and I may add that this description of them has been proved accurate, especially in my own case and in my own constituency, where I had the difficult task of contesting a deferred election with the government well in power. And I think I am warranted in saying that the result of that election was a very clear illustration of the triumph of principle over expediency. The four questions which were chiefly debated in the province of British Columbia—and I refer especially to my own campaign, representing as I do, by far the largest constituency in the whole Dominion—were the so-called Election Act, Bill No. 115, known out west as the Aylesworth Bill ; the question of better terms ; the question of the Oriental or Japanese immigration ; and the administration of public affairs, especially in connection with the civil service.

As regards the Election Bill, which was prominently discussed in our campaign, and which to some extent defeated our opponent because of the attitude he took on that measure last session—with regard to that Bill I shall not say anything because the members of this House who sat here during months while that measure was under discussion, must have had a surfeit of it. I shall only say that proof has since been given in a very marked way that the election laws of British Columbia are absolutely fair to both Liberals and Conservatives. The attenpt to abolish our provincial franchise excited very strong feeling in our province ; and I am glad to have this opportunity of expressing to my honoured leader and the rest of the Conservative party my appreciation of the gallant fight they put up to retain to the province of British Columbia its own franchise. In connection with this Election Bill, we have had some debate on the question of the deferred elections in Yale and Cariboo and Comox-Atlin and Kootenay. Let me say most emphatically, speaking from personal knowledge of the large constituency of Cariboo, that there was absolutely no justification for the postponement of that election, and that it was generally known, throughout the length and breadth of my constituency, to have been postponed for the sole purpose of getting a seat in this House for a man who had not the slightest chance of obtaining it without the advantage of insidious appeals to public patronage.

The question of better terms has been dealt with to some extent by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) and I shall merely touch on it briefly. In 1904 the question of better terms to British Columbia was the subject matter, to a large extent, of the campaign at that time. We were favoured with various expositions of that subject, and one of the most extraordinary was given by a gentleman who, I believe, is about to speed westward in the hope of representing a constituency which a member of this House has gratefully relinquished. I refer to the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman). On one occasion, when speaking on the question of better terms, Mr. Templeman expressed the view that one large sample of better terms would be given British Columbia when a Liberal administration was restored to power. Well, I fear the better terms will come very late in the day if it is to come in that shape.

Referring to the Prime Minister of British Columbia, (Mr. McBride), the right hon. the First Minister said he was a very astute man. Well, he is not only astute but something very much stronger and bigger. On the question of better terms, he took a broad, sane view ; and in handling the matter as he did he impressed his view, not only on the Conservatives but on the majority of the Liberals of British Columbia. When dealing as I hope to do, at length with this question later on, I propose to endeavour to impress on this House that, in bringing up this question, we are not impelled by any spirit of antagonism to the other provinces, but simply because we believe that there can be no possible sympathetic co-operation among the different provinces until equal justice is meeted out to all. All we intend ever asking this House and pressing on the government is simply that the contention submitted by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) namely, that an impartial tribunal should decide whether we have a case or not, should be acted upon.

Leaving that matter, I propose to say a few words on the Oriental question. Some time ago the right hon. First Minister differentiated between the various races which confront each other on the Pacific coast. He drew broad lines of distinction between the Japanese, the Chinese and the Hindoos. To-night, however, he includes them in the one common expression ; but there is this distinction to be noticed, and it is one which I have always endeavoured to appreciate. I am no hide bound partisan, I am quite ready to acknowledge that we are all working for the good of Canada in our various ways, although we cannot all see alike, and I do not take the ground that nothing hon. gentlemen on the opposite side can do can possibly be otherwise than wrong. We must admit that there must be many measures entitled to approval, no matter from what side they may come. As regards the Hindoo phase of this question, I believe that the action of the government was the only right and practical one, namely, to send their accredited representative to the imperial authorities in order to arrive at a solution of that question, which was different from the others in this important respect that it affected British subjects. That is a difference which is fundamental, and I trust on some future occasion to try and convince the House, that the only possible solution of this question will be found in convincing thoughtful and earnest men on both sides that the stand we take is not a narrow or provincial one but one eminently just and in the national interest. I know the opinion exists that out in the west we are a little hot tempered and not so judicial as we should be in our discussions on this matter, and we shall have to convince hon. gentlemen by logical appeal to their reason, that the views of the west are sound. You must not think, Mr. Speaker, that because we come from British Columbia and have to face conditions there which are rather acute, we are necessarily local or provincial in our views. We claim—and I think rightly—that we are not only British Columbian to the bottom of our hearts but also Canadians in the broadest sense of the word and Imperialists in the truest significance. May I add that in my own personal experience, speaking to men in the old land and following the more recent articles in the leading papers and reviews of Great Britain, the thoughtful opinions of the mother country have become fundamentally changed on the question of the influx of the Oriental race.

The day is coming, even if it has not come already, when, as it is put by one of their prominent men, it is recognized more and more every day to be the duty of the home government and the imperial authorities, no matter what conditions they have to face in other parts of the world, to stand by even the most distant and smallest portions of the British empire to build up a nation that should be Anglo-Saxon in race and tradition. I would like to add a word, because the Prime Minister seemed to imply that in one riding at least—I do not know whether he intended to include them all—the telegram in reference to the problem of exclusion by the leader of the opposition was one of the reasons why British Columbia had gone Conservative, as it were coming in under a false promise or a piece of hypocrisy. Let me assure him in the most emphatic way that, speaking for myself, not once did I say—though I expressed my sympathy with the exclusion movement as I do now—that the leader of the opposition had pledged himself to that policy, although it may be my view that not only he but other members of the House will come to that opinion. I treated the case on its merits, and the contest resulted, as I knew it would, against the former member for Yale-Cariboo, because he, in common with other members who represented—or rather misrepresented—British Columbian constituencies had ratified that treaty without a word of protest in regard to it. I can quite understand that some hon. members opposed will retort—in fact I knew this retort was made—that our leader and other members of the Conservative party also supported the ratification of that treaty, and did not lift up their voices in protest against it. I recognize that. It is perfectly true, and it may possibly be that there are two reasons for it. I am not imputing bad motives or casting slurs when I say that it is certain that the Conservative party were misled by hon. gentlemen opposed as to assurances from Japan with regard to this matter, and also by the exaggerated ideas of the importance of the trade with Japan, which, I believe, is not going to be as large as some people seem to think. Then, again, with regard to the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and Conservative members generally, I can quite understand that no man who has lived altogether in the east and has not come into daily contact with the conditions that face the people of the west, can possibly grasp the true significance of this oriental question to the people of the Pacific coast. I am sorry to add also that hon. gentleman opposite, and eastern members, generally do not avail themselves of their privileges, as they ought to do, to gain a more intimate acquaintance at first hand with the great western country which, after all, is going to be the backbone of Canada. There is this to be said, however, that the leader of the opposition and the Conservative party, when they did begin to realize what the sentiment and feeling in British Columbia was on this great question, adjusted their position to meet the sentiment of British Columbia, which, after all, gentlemen on the opposite side did not do. It is all very well to say that this was done for party purposes, but we have no right to judge people in that way. We have a right to assume, and we may assume, that the leader of the opposition felt from the bottom of his heart that he ought to do as he has done, that he recognized the importance of this question, and, when he understood the sentiment of the people of the west, he adjusted his position and took a different stand, possibly, from that which he took a year or two ago. We recognize that this question has got to be divested of all bitterness, that it has got to be put on the soundest kind of basis. I hope that some time it will be the privilege of British Columbia members on this side to put up an argument on this question, and I hope that it will be an argument of sufficient strength and fairness to practically revolutionize the sentiments with regard to the matter of the members from the east, who, perhaps, have not grasped the importance of the question.

Now, I desire, in closing, to deal for a moment with another question—the character of the administration of public affairs in this country, more especially in relation to the Civil Service. This is a live matter, for it is referred to in the speech from the Throne, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Brodeur) had occasion to deal with it in a somewhat lengthy way. One of that hon. gentleman's remarks was quite pathetic, it seems to me. He intimated that he would not deal with the campaign of the opposition on this subject, because these questions formed a very undignified theme. I think that is the way he put it. Well, not referring to the personal aspect of the matter, when charges are brought against individuals or against a government, that corruption and wrongdoing exist, it is certainly extremely undignified for some people to have it found out. But these people have to be dealt with. And here again, I may refer to the remarks of the Prime Minister on the matter of principle. I say that the character of the administration of our public affairs must essentially be a matter of great significance and vital importance to every man who values the welfare of Canada—it must be so for any man who is trying to make Canada a better nation that it is. Charges were made, and I find that the Prime Minister, in his campaign, underwent a series of changes in his attitude toward these charges as the discussion proceeded. I think I quote him accurately when I say that his first statement was that these matters were of trifling magnitude, and he would dismiss them. His second position was that our charges would be probed to the bottom and the guilty parties punished. And, his third position was that he refused to discuss the matter at all. Well, in regard to his first suggestion, I can only say that any matter that affects the character of the administration of public affairs in Canada cannot be a matter of trifling moment. As to his second suggestion, that these things would be probed to the bottom and the guilty parties punished, I feel that our experience in the west, so far as we have followed public affairs—and we try to follow them intelligently — is that, the present regime is not very successful in such probing; they have not gone very far. Judging from what they found at the top, if they were to go to the bottom, there would be a bad mess. We felt some distrust as to their probing of these matters. And then, as I say, the Prime Minister declared that he would not discuss this subject. But, unfortunately for the Liberal cause, so far as British Columbia is concerned, the people went on discussing it. They thought these were important matters, matters the discussion of which was necessary. I know that in my own campaign I did discuss them. I see one or two gentlemen on the other side who followed me very closely in the campaign amongst whom I may mention the Hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver.).

Now the gentleman who did follow me, whether closely or at a distance, will admit that I was not guilty of making any unfair attacks in regard to the administration of public affairs in the country. My own course was simply this. I left on one side the Liberal and Conservative papers, and I went to the source and took up the report of the Civil Service Commission appointed by the right hon. gentleman's government. I simply showed what this report was, and what it said, and the result was that those people who could not be influenced by the party press were perfectly willing to be influenced by an independent authority such as that commission. I would even go further and say that I can hardly understand how it is that in eastern Canada that report did not have a greater effect than it appears to have had. Of course I can understand that all moral reform is of slow growth. I am glad to have the hon. gentleman's assurance that he is reforming his own department, and although it may take some time, I trust that the reform will ultimately take place. I may add that I believe that if a similar report had been published in Great Britain on any department of the public service there, it would have driven any government from office in twenty-four hours.

Now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to refer to one other matter which concerns my own constituency, as I think it has some bearing on the question of principle to which the prime minister has referred. I refer to the question of patronage. I think that political patronage has been one of the great curses of this country, and has done more than anything else to retard the growth of a healthy public sentiment. Some remarks have been made here tonight in connection with the bribery of constituencies. I will not debate that question at any length now, but I may remark that it played a considerable part in my constituency at the last election. It is the opinion of the people in the west that the great natural resources of Canada are being too largely used and disposed of for party and political advantage. The Prime Minister, in his remarks, referred to my late opponent, Mr. Duncan Ross. Well, Mr. Duncan Ross is not regarded in British Columbia as a very high authority on political matters, particularly since November 12. But as some hon. gentlemen opposite seem to regard him as an authority, I will quote a few lines from a speech which he made subsequently to his defeat.

> Keeping a seat warm in parliament is a mere incident compared with the labour and thought required in acting as an agent of the people of Yale-Cariboo, transacting their business with the government in power. Any advice received from the member elected from this district will be immediately treated as hostile advice coming from a man elected to do his utmost to defeat that government, and any advice that will be acceptable to that government must necessarily come from one who fought the battles of the government in this district, and who went down fighting in defence of the policies and the records of the government.

Well, I do not think there is any doubt that the former representative of Yale-Cariboo did go down to defeat, considering the size of the majority against him. Now I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman and the members of his government whether that is the principle which is going to guide them in treating all advice tendered them by opposition members, viz., —as hostile advice to be neglected by the government. I would be sorry to believe, and I will not believe until I am convinced to the contrary, that any minister of this government will take so narrow a view of his responsibilities. For my own part I consider myself as representative, not only of the Conservatives of Yale-Cariboo, but of the Liberals as well. I understand that the duty of a member of parliament is to represent his own constituency, and a man would be recreant to his duty if he did not, regardless of party ties and affiliations, keep steadily in view the interest of all his constituents, whether Liberal or Conservative.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General. I do not intend to detain the House at any length. I merely wish to refer to some remarks made by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in his very interesting, and I may say very bitter speech. The hon. gentleman said that when during the last campaign, I was in the city of Berlin, I dangled before the eyes of the electors some promises which I think the hon. gentleman termed petty bribes. Sir, I resent the statement made by that hon. gentleman, and I do not think that my hon. friend from York will corroborate that statement after the explanations I propose to give.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (S. York). Your friend from York made no remark.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Speaker, what are the facts? During the summer of 1907 I was invited as Minister of Labour to a dinner given by the citizens of Berlin, irrespective of politics, to Mr. Mackenzie King. It was indeed a pretty sight to see the Conservatives of Berlin uniting with the Liberals to testify to the high character and great ability of the young Deputy Minister of Labour. I was present as his chief on that occasion. On that visit I was requested by the mayor of Berlin, whose politics I do not know, and by many of the citizens, to complete a work which had been undertaken by a former Conservative government twenty years ago. There was standing in the centre of that very interesting and beautiful city of Berlin, what I would call an eyesore. Under the government of Sir John Macdonald they had erected there a splendid post office with a tower, but that tower, as I noticed, was clockless and the citizens of Berlin begged of me to represent their views to the Minister of Public Works at Ottawa so as to secure the completion of that tower by the addition of a clock. I promised the gentlemen who approached me, Conservatives and Liberals alike, that certainly I would do my best to make their representations to the minister and that I hoped that within a very short time the tower would have its clock. I was asked at the same time to give to the city of Berlin, a very enterprising city of the province of Ontario, the system of free letter delivery within its limits. I said that if the city of Berlin had reached the population fixed by the regulations of the Post Office Department, that is to say, 12,000, and if the revenue of the city justified it, that is to say $20,000 a year, it would not be a pleasure but it would be a duty for me as Postmaster General to give to the city of Berlin free letter delivery. I came back to Ottawa. I made representations to the then Minister of Public Works. I think that my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley), who is now the incumbent of the office, had not yet been sworn in, but at a later period, after he had been sworn in as a cabinet minister and after he had taken charge of the Public Works Department, I approached him with a delegation sent from Berlin to implement the promise I had made in the summer of 1907. My hon. friend yielded to the request of the citizens of Berlin, irrespective of politics, and forthwith the clock was sent to Berlin and the eyesore disappeared. As to the free mail delivery, it was granted at once; in fact, a few days after my visit in June, 1907, it was granted to the citizens of Berlin. When I appeared before the electors a year afterwards, accompanied by a gentleman who was no more the deputy minister of the Department of Labour, I jocularly remarked, upon presenting myself before the vast audience that was present, that I had had the pleasure of meeting the citizens of Berlin a year before, that I had been asked two things from them, a clock for the tower and free letter delivery and that these two things had been granted. These could not be offered as an inducement to the electors to vote for my friend Mackenzie King. They had already been granted them. Everybody could see what time it was at the tower and everybody was receiving his letters at his door in the morning. It was simply a jocular remark, it was taken in that spirit by the crowd which listened to me and I believe that my hon. friend from North Toronto who knows the two constituencies of Waterloo in Ontario, who knows the peculiar honesty, thrift and integrity of the inhabitants of these two ridings, will not for a moment believe that for a clock in the tower or a free letter delivery, two things to which the electors of those divisions were entitled, they would be influenced one way or the other, or that they would be influenced on that occasion by the remark I made.

Now, I shall not dwell at any length on the question of graft and corruption. That question has been decided by the electors of the Dominion. I for one as a public man do not believe that the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition is a corrupt statesman. I believe he is an honest man and I believe that every man in this country thinks that the hon. leader of the government is also an honest man and one who would not stand for graft or corruption. There was no issue in the last general election but the issue of graft and of corruption. which was not one worthy of the Canadian people. The Canadian people pronounced themselves in favour of the government because they believe that our policy had been wise, honest and truly Canadian.

I have listened with much pleasure and with very great interest indeed to the speeches delivered by the hon. gentlemen who now represent the fair province of British Columbia. I have listened to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burrell) who has just spoken, and I must commend the tone of his speech. I will speak only of two features which were specially put forward during the last political campaign in British Columbia. He says that there were four features. I will speak only of two because I happen to know a little more about these. He spoke of the question of better terms and of oriental immigration. As regard better terms, let me say to the hon. gentleman that I had the great honour to sit on the special committee of the Privy Council which listened to the demands made by the united provinces of the Dominion three years ago in the Senate chamber. I listened with great interest to the requests that were made, because, as hon. gentlemen know, as the leader of the opposition fully knows, we in the province of Quebec, since 1887, have taken a very deep interest in the question. In fact, the province of Quebec, under the leadership of the Hon. Mr. Flynn, premier of that province, under the leadership later of the Hon. Mr. Mousseau, and still later under the leadership of the Hon. Mr. Mercier, had been very insistent at Ottawa upon the settlement of the question of the readjustment of the provincial subsidies. Fortunately for the province of Quebec we had won to our cause the great province of Ontario under the leadership of Sir Oliver Mowat, later on under that of Mr. Ross and later on under that of Hon. Mr. Whitney. The question came up before that committee of the Privy Council. It was there stated by the Finance Minister of Canada, by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of Justice—not by myself—I was the junior member of the committee—I simply listened and I learned a great deal—but there and then it was stated and it was stipulated that the agreement to settle the readjustment of the provincial subsidies would be a final—final one. Let me say this to you, Mr. Speaker, that no man fought with more zeal, that no man put up such a sturdy fight for what he considered to be in the best interests of his province, than Mr. McBride, but Mr. McBride was alone in his minority. He was defeated not only by a majority vote, but he was defeated by the unanimous vote at that convention of premiers. The Hon. Mr. Whitney was against Mr. McBride, the Hon. Mr. Roblin was against Mr. McBride, the Hon. Mr. Murray, the Hon. Mr. Pugsley, now the Minister of Public Works, but who then represented the province of New Brunswick, the premier of Prince Edward Island, and the premiers of the two new provinces of the far west were against Mr. McBride. He however obtained some concession. He was not satisfied, but parliament took up the question at the ensuing session and the resolutions of the conference were embodied in the legislation which was carried, I believe, unanimously, by the House. Our legislation was brought before the imperial authorities and embodied in an instrument, and is there standing forever as the expression of the will of the Canadian people. Mr. McBride went to Great Britain. He repeated his request without success. Sir, I say that the attitude taken by the Liberal party on this particular question in the province of British Columbia was far more patriotic than that taken by the Hon. Mr. McBride and his political friends. I do not blame them, it was their right. but I say that the attitude of the government should not be condemned because it was that of a government representing public opinion, and more especially that of the prime ministers of the several provinces assembled here at Ottawa.

The hon. gentleman has referred to the question of oriental immigration. The great French statesman, M. Thiers, who could coin very happy phrases, once said that on every question he preferred to take 'le juste milieu.' I would translate that freely as the statement that on every question there is a happy medium which should be adopted. He was against extremes. I also am against extremes. Every intelligent citizen is against extremes. I am against any large influx of Japanese into British Columbia; I believe, with the hon. gentleman, that it would not be fair to the labour market of British Columbia that aliens should take the place of our own people, but I am also against that other extreme of total exclusion, of a foreign race indeed but belonging to a friendly power. This government, which has been taken to task by my hon. friends representing British Columbia on this question of Japanese immigration, has nothing to fear, it seems to me, from public opinion in the province which they ably represent. The Liberal government was the first one to deal with the question of oriental immigration some years ago. At that time, there was a capitation tax of only $50 on every Chinese entering Canada. I well remember the able representative of the constituency of Burrard, the late Mr. Maxwell, in a speech which to my mind is a classical speech in our parliamentary records, requesting the government to increase the capitation tax on the Chinese coming to British Columbia. The Liberal government yielded to his request; they were anxious to meet the legitimate demands of that fairest of the fair provinces of the Dominion and increased the capitation tax from $50 to $100. The agitation continued in British Columbia, the people wished to have that capitation tax further increased. The government appointed a commission, which made a report recommending that in order to protect labour in British Columbia, the government should increase the capitation tax from $100 to $500. The government adopted the conclusions of that report.

But Sir, I shall be asked, did not that commission report also on the Japanese question? There were Japanese in large numbers in British Columbia five and ten years ago; indeed the Canadian census return show that at least 4,000 or 5,000 Japanese had settled in some of the valleys of British Columbia. The commissioners, as the right hon. the leader of the government, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) well said this afternoon, differentiated between the Chinese and the Japanese. We all know that the Chinese are satisfied with menial work while the Japanese are a higher type of men. The commissioners reported that if the Japanese government remained faithful to the pledge that had been given by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, through the Japanese consul at Vancouver, they saw no reason why there should be any exclusion against the Japanese coming to Canada provided they would not exceed the number fixed by that agreement. Will my hon. friend who has so eloquently spoken this afternoon deny that there was more than a tacit understanding, that there was a written pledge taken by the Japanese government to restrict the number of Japanese coming to Canada to 600 a year? I read that agreement last year in the House when I came back from Japan. There was, therefore, a written understanding taken by the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs. Time went on and we had more agitation in British Columbia and in other places.

I am always surprised to hear fair-minded people speak of the Japanese as an inferior race. I have been in Japan, the hon. gentlemen have not. I know that from the rumours that come from the province of British Columbia, from what we read in the press, that people are sometimes apt to consider the Japanese as an inferior race; but all those who have been students of Japanese history will bear witness to the fact that the Japanese are a rising race, a rising people, indeed the greatest race today in far Asia. Sir, the Japanese are not an inferior race. They have started in their march towards nationhood with the Dominion of Canada. Indeed they had an ancient and valuable civilization 2,000 or 3,000 years old, but in 1867 a revolution took place and the first act of the Japanese Emperor was to grant freedom of speech, freedom of thought, freedom of religious belief, not only to the Japanese, but to the foreigners as well. With respect to religion, let me say to those who are so anxious to exclude the Japanese from this country the few there are—because, indeed there are very few—that they are forgetting that from the United States, from Canada, indeed from the particular province of British Columbia, missionaries are leaving every year to preach the Gospel of Christ to the pagan races of Japan. They preach a religion of toleration; they preach principles of liberty and principles of charity, and the first thing the Japanese hear on the other side is that those who send missionaries to Japan—missionaries well received, well treated, and highly respected—are demanding their expulsion from the ports of Canada. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that in Japan they have liberty of the press and religious liberty; they have high schools and great universities. Besides they adopted in 1867 the same system of government that we enjoy ourselves, the British system. It was not until the war with China that the name of Japan became great in the civilized world, and soon afterwards the mother country, through the diplomacy of Lord Lansdowne, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, made a treaty of alliance with the empire of Japan. Sir, I am always amazed to find hon. gentlemen opposite opposed to our friendly relations with Japan. I always thought that the Conservative party in Canada was a party of imperialists—in words if not in deeds, Mr. Speaker. Let me say that the hon. gentlemen who are so anxious to break all relations with Japan——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LEMIEUX.—do not represent the view of Canada, not only Liberal Canada, but also Conservative Canada. I remember that just after the riots of Vancouver the leader of the government was invited to address the Manufacturers' Association of Canada in Toronto. Did the hon. gentleman dilly-dally with the question? No; he boldly and resolutely said that on that question, as on every other great question, he would not be panicky, but he would do his duty by Canada and the empire. And, sir, the citizens of Toronto, the citizens of Ontario, the citizens of Canada generally, sided with him on that question. Now, my hon. friend knows that Japan is the ally par excellence of Great Britain in the far east. In a few days, Canada will be invited by my hon. friend from North Toronto to contribute to imperial defence, if I have read rightly the Orders of the Day. Is that the time, Mr. Speaker, for this country to break off all relations with Japan, the great ally of the mother country? Is that the time for us to expel the Japanese from our shores and to get into trouble with that great empire? We know that there exists in Asia to-day a feeling of unrest. It may perhaps appear somewhat vain on my part to speak of British politics at large. I admit that I am not conversant with every detail of British politics; but there are things which even to a simple mind like my own appear very vivid and very true. Sir, in England to-day, every morning, the press—the 'Times,' the 'Standard,' the 'Post,' the 'Chronicle'—repeat dolefully the sentiments which are moving through that immense continent of Asia. We hear every morning of the unrest in India, and yet we are called upon by some hon. gentlemen to expel the Hindoos from Canada. Well, there are Hindu agitators who say to the British authorities: 'What right have you to govern us? We claim to be British citizens, and yet when we go to a British colony, we who have served in the British army and are still clad in British garments, we are threatened with expulsion from that colony.' Is that a proper spirit a true imperial spirit to maintain in this country? Is not the government's policy of the happy medium the better policy? Did not the government do its duty in sending the Deputy Minister of Labour to London last year to discuss with Lord Morley what steps should be taken to prevent that immigration coming to Canada? Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that if the government had complied with the request made by hon. gentlemen opposite, it would have served the interests of the British empire? For my part I believe not. I think the government pursued a wise policy, a patriotic policy, a truly imperial policy. As regards the Japanese, we are told that we have nothing to lose by excluding them, that they are a danger to white labour in British Columbia. I will explain in a few minutes why they can no longer be a danger to white labour in British Columbia. But I say, from the point of view of our commercial relations with Japan, that the existence of the treaty, without the blot which hon. gentlemen opposite would like to put upon it, is in the best interests of this Dominion. Why, sir, the right hon. leader of the government explained this afternoon that a natural sequence of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was the establishment of a line of steamers plying between Vancouver, Victoria, Yokohama and Hong Kong; and we have a right to expect from that direction a large trade for British Columbia and other provinces of the west. According to recent reports, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, is not satisfied with the steamers that were subsidized for that route fifteen or seventeen years ago by my hon. friend the member for North Toronto, the 'Empress of China' and the 'Empress of Japan.' He intends to remove them and to replace them with the 'Empress of Britain' and the 'Empress of Ireland.' But there is something more which should appeal to us in maintaining friendly relations with the empire of Japan. We are in the process of building a great transcontinental railroad. When that railway reaches Prince Rupert we shall have the shortest route between Asia and Europe. I believe the distance is something like 400 miles shorter from Prince Rupert than from Vancouver. At all events the route will be by far the shortest between Europe and Asia. Do you not then believe that the existence of this treaty is an advantage to Canada, and we may perhaps have a more favourable one later on, if we act as civilized people and friends of the empire.

I referred a moment ago to the written understanding given at the time that commission sat in the province of British Columbia—I think in the year 1900. I said that the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs had signed that pledge by which he promised to restrict Japanese immigration into Canada to a figure supposed at the time to be 600 a year. Did this government act blindly in 1907 when Japan was negotiating for a treaty with Canada? First of all, let us remember that when Japan revised her treaties in 1893, she was not so much concerned with the commercial advantages that might accrue to her through those treaties as with establishing the fact that she had attained the status of a great power and was anxious that her subjects should be treated in every part of the civilized world on the same level as white people. Were we not therefore justified in following the example of the mother country, of Germany, of France and of the United States in our dealings with Japan? All these countries agreed that the people of Japan should be treated on a footing of equality with their own people. In 1907, when the treaty was negotiated with Canada, the understanding given in 1900, through the channel of the Japanese consul at Vancouver was supplemented, not by one, but by ten or twenty written understandings by the Japanese Consul General at Ottawa. The agreement thus arrived at was that the Japanese immigration would be restricted to certain figures, and it was subject to that specific condition that the treaty was signed by the Canadian and Japanese representatives jointly. Two years ago riots took place in British Columbia and the contention was made that Japan had broken faith with Canada. But as the result of the investigation which I made in Japan and that made last year by the Deputy Minister of Labour in British Columbia, it was very plainly proven that the influx complained of was not to be assigned to the Japanese authorities, but to some private corporations in the city of Vancouver. The report of that investigation was laid on the table of the House last year. I reported myself the result of my investigation in Japan. I had the assurance of the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs that his government could be trusted to live up to the agreement signed first by the then Minister of Foreign Affairs in the year 1900, and later on by the Japanese consul at Ottawa and that we could depend on the Japanese government living up to the restrictions mentioned in those letters. The result of my investigation dovetailed, so to speak, with that conducted at Vancouver by the Deputy Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackenzie King). There, it was shown that private corporations in British Columbia—perhaps friendly to hon. gentlemen opposite—interested in getting cheap labour, had brought in from Hawaii an influx of Japanese labour. The Japanese authorities, I submit, were not responsible for that sudden large influx of 10,000 to the shores of British Columbia a year or so ago, because it has been clearly shown that they were contract labourers who came from Hawaii and were brought in under false representations made by some private concerns in the province of British Columbia. The agreement arrived at, not last year but many years ago with the Japanese consul has been lived up to, and there is not now in the province of British Columbia any undue influx of Japanese labourers. In fact, no contract labourer can be imported or filtered into British Columbia, as in the past, without the written consent of the Canadian government. That is one of the features in the agreement existing between Japan and Canada. So that no fear need be entertained of any influx of undesirables—as hon. gentleman opposite called them—to the shores of British Columbia. The Japanese authorities will respect their agreement. They will not allow the immigration of contract labourers without the consent of the Canadian government; and labourers coming from Hawaii are excluded by the order in council passed last year. We need, therefore, fear no invasion from Hawaii any more than from Japan itself.

I heard my eloquent friend this evening argue that by that treaty we have given a foreign country the key to our door and were bound to admit any alien, whether desirable or undesirable, be they blind, deaf or dumb. I can only say to the hon. gentleman that this is a very rash statement. He did not mean it, I am sure—it was a slip of the tongue. If he will read the immigration law of the Dominion, if he will read the regulations, the very stringent regulations, of the department over which the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) presides, he will see that no blind, no deaf, no dumb, can be admitted to this country. He will see that the department has gone even further and that last year an order in council was passed by which we can prevent any immigrant from coming into this country if he does not come from the country of his birth or citizenship. The effect of that order in council is to prevent immigrants coming from Hawaii. I said a moment ago that contract labour cannot come from Japan. What, then, remains? Are hon. gentlemen opposite objecting to students, to tourists, to merchants? If they are, I say their objections are not well founded. I have lived for a few months in Japan, and can assure them that the Japanese are a highly civilized people. They need not be afraid of the merchants, the bankers, and especially of the students in Japan, for these represent the higher class of their own country and the best type of citizenship in this world.

I have already spoken too long, but I wish to repeat, in conclusion, that the Japanese authorities have lived up to the agreement arrived at with this government, that no contract labourers can come from Hawaii, and also that the order in Council passed last year prevents for the future the possibility of undesirable immigration. And let me say that with the declaration made by the Minister of Foreign Affairs last year, there is no fear that there will be any breach of faith on the part of the Japanese government. The Japanese authorities have no interest in promoting the emigration of their people to America. My hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) seems to know too much. Let me make good the statement I have made that the Japanese authorities have no earthly interest in promoting the emigration of their people to America. Last year, when I saw the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Japan, Count Hayashi, he stated to me that when this agreement would be divulged he might not long retain a Cabinet position, as it would make him very unpopular. They have no interest in promoting the emigration of Japanese to America, for they have a different civilization, and when their people come back from that country they come with different ideas. In the far east there is a great respect, if not a great reverence, for monarchial institutions, and, when Japanese subjects come back from America, they return with views and ideals different from those of the masses of their people and so they soon become an element that is not desirable in Japan. They have stopped subsidizing any emigration company doing work of transport between Japan and America. And, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burrell), who seems to be so conversant with the facts, ought to know, Count Hayashi declared, when giving his explanations in the House of Representatives in Japan, shortly after my return to Canada, and in an interview with the representatives of these large emigration companies which I read to this House last year, that he would stop subsidizing such companies as were sending emigrants to America. I am told that they are now giving subsidies to companies sending emigrants to Korea and Manchuria, which, as we know, are the two new spheres of influence of the empire of Japan.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the hon. minister will allow me, I would like to ask him a question purely for the purpose of information, and because I want to understand the conditions. The Japanese Foreign Minister, in proposing that policy, believed that it would make him so unpopular that he would cease to be minister. Does not that indicate, on the part of the people of Japan, a very strong desire to come to America, including Canada?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then, I misunderstood the position.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The position was declared in the interview to which I have referred, and which I will find among my papers and send to my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden). I explained a moment ago that the revision of the treaty of Japan with the foreign powers was not so much to establish commercial relations, though that was the object to a certain extent; but as my hon. friend will see, as a student of modern Japanese history—and we are all students of that wonderful history—the object was to have the Japanese admitted and recognized in the civilized world on a footing of equality with the white races. For, Japan, after the wars with China and Russia, had admittedly become a great power. I may remind my hon. friend that the first nation that gave effect to that treaty—and the treaties with all the nations had practically the same wording with, perhaps, a slight difference in that signed with the United States—the first nation to sign that treaty was Great Britain herself. And, for the first time in many years, perhaps during a century, Great Britain signed a treaty of alliance with a foreign power and that treaty was with Japan. Is not that an object lesson?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. But what I wanted to understand, and what the minister has not made me understand yet, is this: The Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs expected that his statement in favour of the restrictions of emigration to the United States and Canada would make him so unpopular that he would be obliged to resign. It struck me that that must mean that there must be a popular sentiment in Japan against any such restriction. That is the point on which I desired information.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am afraid that is a catch question.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is not a catch question.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That may be. Public men in Japan, and especially the statesman to whom I alluded a moment ago, were somewhat afraid of public opinion, because the Japanese have a strong national pride, as is quite natural in a great people; and if the people had come to believe that Japanese emigration was restricted, the government would have fallen from grace in the eyes of her own people. But the Minister of Foreign Affairs said that although he would not subscribe to any such written exclusion in a treaty, yet, as he states in his letter to myself:

'Although the existing treaty between Japan and Canada absolutely guarantees Japanese subjects full liberty to enter, travel and reside in any part of the Dominion of Canada, yet it is not the intention of the Imperial government to insist upon the complete enjoyment of the rights and privileges guaranteed by those stipulations when that would involve a disregard of the special conditions which may prevail in Canada from time to time.

And he added:

Acting in this spirit, and having regard to the circumstances of recent occurrence in British Columbia, the Imperial government have decided to take efficient means to restrict emigration to Canada. In carrying out this purpose the Imperial government, in pursuance of the policy I have stated, will give careful consideration to local conditions prevailing in Canada, with a view to meeting the desires of the government of the Dominion so far as compatible with the spirit of the treaty and the dignity of the state.

There, Mr. Speaker, you have the whole story in that statement supplemented as it is by an agreement arrived at between the two governments, which I must say has been sincerely and faithfully lived up to so far by Japan.

Mr. RALPH SMITH moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I move:

That the order for consideration of the address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, have precedence over all other business except the introduction of Bills, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, January 25, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 2) to amend the Passenger Tickets Act.—Mr. Reid (Grenville).

RAILWAY ACT—AMENDMENT.

Mr. R. BICKERDIKE (Montreal, St. Lawrence) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3) to amend the Railway Act. He said: The Bill is largely on the lines of the one introduced during the last two or three sessions by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), and which passed this House last session but was defeated in the Senate. Public opinion is aroused to that extent that something on those lines will have to be done this session, and I hope that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) will give the Bill his attention and possibly take charge of it and put it into proper shape.

Mr. LENNOX. And on the right side.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. There is no doubt that what is often called the deadly level crossing has become so subject to accidents, especially during the past few months, that it is opportune to introduce some measure which will meet the approval of both Houses.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does it differ from the Bill passed by this House three or four times?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. It is a little milder. I do not wish to impose on the railways any more burdens than we can help. In the cities, towns and villages we should have gates at the level crossings. Outside in the country districts and prairies, I was at a loss to frame an amendment which would meet all cases, because while on the prairie a man can see a train ten miles either way, in the woods he cannot see it until he is right on the track. Possibly the municipalities may contribute to the expense. For instance, in New York state the cities contribute 25 per cent and the state 25 per cent towards paying for the lowering or elevating of the tracks, as the case may be.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman make any proviso in his Bill to protect life on level crossings on the prairies?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Yes, I do, but I leave that largely to the Railway Commission, because it is very difficult to frame an amendment which will cover every case. If my hon. friend has one, I shall be pleased to accept it. The Railway Commission, which has done such good work, more especially during the past few weeks, may be trusted to deal with this, and a clause to that effect is the only one I can think of at the moment which will meet the case.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE—AMENDMENT.

Mr. BICKERDIKE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 4) to amend the Criminal Code. He said: We have in all our large cities, probably to a greater extent in Montreal than elsewhere, a class of men who will, on the slightest provocation, draw a dagger or stiletto or pistol. We have had highway robberies to a great extent, and a class of men who will beat their wives in the fall in order to get six months comfortable lodgings in jail during the winter. That class of men should get the lash, and plenty of it. Instead of giving such a man six months in jail for beating his wife, I would give him thirty days and thirty lashes. If that is done, he will never beat his wife again. That class of criminal is more afraid of the lash than even of the rope, and I think that if more of them got the lash we should have less need of the rope.

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron). What is the difference between this Bill and the one introduced by myself last session?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I do not know what the difference is. But I know that the Bill proposed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lewis) did not carry, and I did not know whether he had got tired of it or not.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) to amend the Naturalization Act. He said: The proposed amendment is based upon a similar provision in the British Naturalization Act. It provides that, in addition to the safeguards contained in the present Act, the alien applying for naturalization shall furnish evidence, under the oath or affirmation of two British-born subjects, electors residing within the territorial jurisdiction of the court to which the application is made, — and neither of whom is to be the agent or solicitor of the applicant—that the applicant is of good character. This amendment, I may say, has been asked for by some judges in the west who have met with practical difficulties in administering the Act, and is designed to overcome these difficulties and to provide a safeguard similar to that provided in England for admission to citizenship.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act. He said: This Bill is exactly the same as that which has been passed by this House each year during the last three years, but has been rejected by the Senate. It is to protect the lives of people at level crossings in cities, towns and villages. I do not think it could be made any milder than it is and do injustice to the people of the country. As the House has unanimously passed it three times, I hope it will do so again, and that the Senate will think better of its previous action and adopt what is evidently the will of the people.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE (South Essex) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to amend the Railway Act. He said: The object of the Bill is to remove an anomaly in the present Railway Act as to the liability of railway companies for fires caused by defective locomotives. The Bill was introduced last year by Mr. Kennedy, then representing New Westminster. I think it passed the Railway Committee, but did not become law. But as I believe it to be a Bill that ought to become law, I ask leave to introduce it now.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said. The Bill is to correct a displacement of some three or four paragraphs which was inadvertently made in the passage of the Bill through the House or in the printing of it. There is no proposition in any way to effectively amend or change the provisions of the Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

VACANCY OF CARLETON.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the orders of the day are called, I desire to say that I have had the honour of being returned for two constituencies, namely the electoral division of Halifax and the electoral division of Carleton (Ont.). It becomes necessary that I should elect for which of these two constituencies I sit; and I accordingly now declare my election to sit for the electoral division of Halifax, and, for that reason, I resign my seat as member for the electoral division of Carleton.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Todd for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. RALPH SMITH (Nanaimo). Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have a word to say on the resolution before the House. After a long, hard, and tedious campaign in British Columbia, and after having been in the House seven or eight sessions, and having some good friends who should have their initiation in parliamentary work, I had made up my mind to sit quiet awaiting a later occasion to say or do something. However, matters appertaining to important interests of British Columbia have been involved in the discussion of this subject, and some of my friends from British Columbia have thought fit,—very properly—to take this opportunity to make some explanation with regard to matters affecting the representation in this parliament as compared with the last. The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) took advantage of the occasion to give some explanation with regard to matters connected with the campaign in British Columbia, and tried to account for a very radical change made in the representation of that province, and my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), and especially my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell), and, to some extent, the hon. gentleman for Victoria City (Mr. Barnard), sought to present what they thought to give to the House the impression that the reasons given by the Prime Minister for the change in British Columbia were not the good reasons and sought to present what they thought were the good reasons for that change. The two great issues they represented to this House as being the cause of the change in British Columbia, were better terms and oriental immigration. My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) sought to impress the people in the province with the belief that the salvation of British Columbia rendered it absolutely necessary that it should be represented by Conservatives instead of Liberals in this House. I do not intend to follow that argument at great length, because my hon. friends have intimated that they intend to bring up these questions in another form, at a future time. But it is my conviction that, whilst my hon. friends have been sent to this House to seek to promote legislation that will settle these two great issues satisfactorily to British Columbia, at the same time those issues were not presented fairly and justly to the people of British Columbia by my hon. friends. That is my conviction, and I am going to try and show that it is well founded.

What are the processes through which the issue of better terms has gone? How has it been considered and represented? How was it considered and represented to the electorate of British Columbia? The issue of better terms, in point of fact, was absolutely settled by the united provincial conference. The provinces, and especially British Columbia, had been agitating this question for a considerable time, and they appealed to the Premier of the Dominion to call a conference of the provinces to take into consideration the question of a readjustment of the terms of union between the provinces and the Dominion. The whole question of better terms, so far as British Columbia is concerned, was presented and finally determined by a tribunal comprised of the representatives of all the provinces. Sir Wilfrid Laurier asked this parliament to consent, not to what his government thought was right or reasonable, but what these several provincial premiers at that conference had decided was the proper thing. That, Sir, was the foundation of the case. Whatever be its merits or demerits whether the conclusions reached were reasonable or not, the one thing certain is that the conclusions were reached by the unanimous opinion of the several representatives of the provinces. My hon. friend from Vancouver shakes his head. Does he dispute the fact that the documents are on record? Does he dispute the fact that a request was made to the Premier of Canada to call a conference? Does he dispute the fact that the Premier of British Columbia accepted the proposal to represent the province in that conference? Does he dispute the fact that the representatives at that conference stated what they thought was right and reasonable for British Columbia?

Mr. COWAN. British Columbia was not a consenting party to that proceeding.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. My hon. friend says that the decision was not unanimous. I am dealing with the fact that the action of this government was based upon the conference of the provincial premiers, and was not dictated by this parliament. I am trying to impress that fact upon the House, because the issue of better terms in British Columbia, which had served a good purpose in the provincial election of 1907, and contributed largely to the success of our hon. friends in 1908, was not presented on that basis; on the contrary, it was presented as involving an act of injustice on the part of the premier of this country. Read the speeches of the hon. member for Vancouver, read the speeches of the leader of the Conservative party in British Columbia, read the letters sent out by these gentlemen as representatives of that party, and what was their grievance? Was it their grievance that the united provinces had refused to give them everything they thought they ought to have? Not by any means; their grievance was that it was Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party who had refused. Their grievance was not against the decision of the united provinces, because the moment they admitted that fact, it eliminated the possibility of their success in the political struggle. The only possibility of making the issue a successful one politically, was to attribute their grievance to the Liberal party at Ottawa.

Now I am ready to make this statement, that in my opinion British Columbia has a grievance. My hon. friend from Vancouver on Friday last took the lofty ground, in theory, that if these great issues were to be settled they must be settled by eliminating the political factor, that political partisanship must be eliminated if these questions were to be decided. But my hon. friend does not practise what he preaches. He sought to prove that the Oriental question in British Columbia, if it was ever successfully settled, must be determined by every member of this House ; that this great issue provincial, national and imperial, would have to be approached by the serious consideration of every political factor involved in it. But my good friend does not practise what he preaches. I do not hesitate therefore to state my opinion that the question of better terms in British Columbia has been used in that province entirely and absolutely as a political football. I give my hon. friends credit for doing it well. Their course in taking the complaints to the foot of the Throne and coming back to the federal parliament, and their repeated statement that the Prime Minister of this country has no regard, for the administration of justice in British Columbia, had a wonderful effect. But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Whitney, who was the representative in that conference from Ontario, that Mr. Roblin, who was the representative in that conference from Manitoba, that all the provincial leaders, Liberals as well as Conservatives, in that conference, unanimously decided on the terms that they considered fair to the provinces ; and the Prime Minister of Canada laid aside the conclusions of that conference before this parliament exactly as they had been stated at the conference, and requested parliament to give British Columbia what that conference had unanimously agreed upon. I am stating the case in this House, because I want to have it reported to the people of British Columbia generally ; I had no opportunity of doing it during the election, and I am stating the case in this House as I stated it in my own constituency. I contend that the statement of the case made by my hon. friends opposite the other night was neither fair nor just. I wish to read to this House a statement for the benefit of my hon. friend from Vancouver, written by a member of the McBride government, the president of his council, a Conservative member in the local legislature, sole proprietor and manager of the most independent and respectable Conservative newspaper in British Columbia. I want to read from the 'News Advertiser,' the leading Conservative newspaper in British Columbia, for an endorsation of the position I have taken in this House and what it thought of our hon. friends opposite and the position they took in the province :

There is one other matter in connection with the subject that seems to require some reference. If the provincial interests are to be served in the most effective way, the question must be dealt with as one entirely outside of party politics. It was so regarded in the provincial legislature, in the interprovincial conference and in the Dominion parliament. To be consistent in holding that view, Conservatives must refrain from charging that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been the cause of the provincial's failure to obtain what it sought. If any one can be held responsible it must be the interprovincial conference, which decided what the extra sum granted to British Columbia should be. It is not difficult to understand why the various provincial premiers were not willing to give more liberal recognition of our claims. They had to consider what would be the attitude of their respective legislatures, and electorates to the subject. If the matter was referred to them at all, we do not see how Sir Wilfrid Laurier could refuse to abide by their decision. From what passed in the Dominion parliament, we must assume that Mr. Borden would have acted as Sir Wilfrid has done, had he been in power. It cannot be wise, therefore, if we hope to succeed ultimately in our claim, to attack Sir Wilfrid Laurier and throw the matter into the arena of party politics. Nor, although we are opposed to him do we think such a course is fair to Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

That is an important statement coming from the source that it does. That is from the most independent and intellectual Conservative newspaper in British Columbia, and I am glad to have the opportunity of presenting that editorial, because I know that my hon. friends will accept the rebuke of that paper. One thing is certain, that if the question is to be amicably and reasonably settled, it must be settled by the influence and the co-operation of every province of this Dominion.

Now, I come back again to my good friend the member from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), who came here on a special commission to see the leader of his party. This was a burning question in the provincial election, and he was anxious to do what he could to restore its influence in the Dominion election. So he wanted to have a statement on the question from the leader of his party. I do not know whether the hon. leader of the opposition will endorse my hon. friend's statement of the proposal for the settlement of the question, but this is what he said to his friends in Vancouver:

To-night I speak with the authority of our honoured leader, whose party will on the 26th control the destinies of Canada, that the just claims of British Columbia, the moment of the party's return to power, shall be referred to an absolutely independent and impartial tribunal. The report of that tribunal will become binding upon British Columbia only when accepted by the people of this province.

I do not know whether the hon. leader of the opposition will be prepared to accept that as the statement that was given to my hon. friend ; but one thing is certain—it was a good vote catcher. He said to the people of British Columbia: You have nothing to lose; the expenses of the inquiry will be met for you, and if you do not like the result, you do not need to take it, for somebody else will pay the cost.' I do not think that is a position that any responsible diplomatic influence of this country would endorse. Neither do I think that any leader of any great party in this country would get the endorsation of the representatives of the various provinces of this Dominion to a proposition of that kind. The question went to the conference of provincial premiers, and if there is to be special consideration by this absolutely independent tribunal, that independent tribunal itself must be created by the representatives of the provinces themselves ; and if they are not going to stand by the decision of that absolutely independent tribunal, then I want my hon. friend to say what will be the next tribunal to which he will refer the case, if the people of British Columbia refused to agree to their recommendations.

Now, as I have said, I believe there is need of consideration in changing the terms of union with British Columbia. It is a question that must be settled with the agreement of the different provincial factors of this Dominion. The Premier of the Dominion said to the provinces: 'Decide what you think is right and reasonable and whatever you decide I will bring before parliament and seek to have put into operation in your interests.' I submit, Sir, that that position was never put before the people of British Columbia. The whole contention was : You need not look for the adjustment of your rights to the representatives of eastern Canada. Our friends opposite sought by innuendo and insinuation, to convey the impression that the representatives of the interests of British Columbia were not to be found in eastern Canada—an impression that in my opinion is disloyal to the interests of British Columbia, and an impression which, after the people of British Columbia have time to think, will not redound to the security of our hon. friends in the position they occupy to-day. The people of British Columbia are suffering a kind of temporary inactivity in the consideration of political questions, and they accepted the statements of our hon. friends on that question without proof. The question has to come up for consideration later on, when I shall have an opportunity, as the one member from British Columbia on this side of the House, to discuss it further.

Now, I want to deal with the oriental question. The Conservative representatives from British Columbia have been sent to this House to save the province from an influx of hordes of orientals. I consider that the facts connected with the legislation on that question give to the people of British Columbia no reason for looking to their Conservative representatives in this House for the settlement of the question. In order to prove my case it is necessary for me to look a little at the history of this question. Let me ask, who created the oriental question in British Columbia ? Was it the Liberal party or the Tory party ? The oriental question in British Columbia was created twenty-five or thirty-five years ago, when the Conservative government of that day appointed their own commission, and their own commission reported that oriental labour in British Columbia was a necessity to the development of that province.

Mr. Speaker, the real evil of orientalism in British Columbia to-day is not, as our friends opposite would try to make it out, the recent influx of certain classes of orientals ; the foundation of the oriental evil in British Columbia was laid by the Conservative government 25 years ago when, instead of inaugurating a system of white immigration into British Columbia, they adopted the report of their own commission which said that oriental immigration was absolutely necessary to develop the resources of that province. But the gentlemen opposite never tell the people of British Columbia anything about that; they consider the whole question at the present day in connection with the Japanese immigration. For 15, and 16, and 17 years after that date representations were constantly made by the people of that province to the Conservative party in power to redress the wrongs which they had inflicted on the province in connection with their immigration policy. Let us look for a minute on the other side of the picture, and, Sir, I placed these facts before my constituents just as I am placing them before this House now. I had not the honour or the privilege of submitting my views to the good people of Vancouver, but I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) who represents that constituency will not gainsay the facts as I now state them. The Liberal party came into power in 1896 and the first parliament thereafter the tax was increased to $100. The commission which had been demanded by the people of British Columbia was granted by the Liberal government, and two and a half years from the date of the report of that commission everything that British Columbia had ever asked in regard to the regulation of orientalism in British Columbia was passed into law. Let hon. gentlemen look back at the petitions and the resolutions presented by the different organizations in that province and they will find that the demand prior to that time always was that there should be a tax of $500 upon the Chinese. There was no Hindu question then and practically there was no Japanese question. True, the Japanese question came for consideration before that commission, and the commission reported to parliament that at that time it was not a serious matter and that it would be unwise to pass restrictive legislation since the representatives of Japan had promised that it was not their desire or intention to send Japanese immigrants into Canada. And from the year 1903 up to the time these special contracts were made to bring in this large number of Japanese there was no intelligent agitation, and no representations made to this parliament by petition or otherwise in any strong way whatever, in favour of special restrictive legislation against the Japanese. It is important that the members of this House should not forget that the legislation which the people of British Columbia had been demanding for 16 years prior to 1896 had been entirely refused by the Conservative government. On the other hand, it should not be forgotten that all the legislation asked for by the people of British Columbia was conceded absolutely, within five or six years of the advent of the Liberal party to power.

Now Sir, I come to the question of the Japanese treaty, and I shall consider what our friends opposite say as to the effect of passing that treaty—or rather of our agreeing to the British treaty—on the interests of British Columbia and of Canada. Unfortunately, after the passing of this treaty certain employers of labour in British Columbia organized to bring in large numbers of Japanese. Let me first remind this House that whatever responsibility there is associated with the concluding of this treaty, it is a responsibility which is equally shared in by every member of this House on both sides. I want to say also that my hon. friends opposite had absolutely no authority—according to the statement made by the leader of the opposition himself the other day—they had absolutely no authority to state to the electors of British Columbia that if the Conservative party were put in power the Conservative party would do more than had been done by the Liberal government. All through the campaign in British Columbia the one impression sought to be made was that there would be an absolute guarantee that the Conservative party would readjust the oriental question and would do more than the Liberal government had ever done in that direction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I am very glad to hear my hon. friends opposite endorse that statement, but I would like to ask any one of these gentlemen from British Columbia what evidence he has that the leader of the Conservative party would, if he had the power, do more for British Columbia in connection with the oriental question than the Liberal government has done up to the present time. The forged telegram which was read in the city of Victoria purported to be a declaration of the leader of the opposition that he would stand for absolute and entire exclusion, but when that telegram was forced on the attention of the leader of the opposition in this House the other day he renounced any responsibility for it. Can any of these gentlemen opposite give any tangible evidence? Can they quote from a statement made by any of the leaders of the Conservative party at any time, that more would be done by them in the settlement of the existing difficulty than has been done by the Liberal government?

Now, Sir, what is the present condition of the oriental question in British Columbia? Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite have not looked carefully into that matter. True, they depreciate the importance of the Lemieux settlement, but I have looked up the record and I have official figures in my possession which I think will surprise many hon. gentlemen in this House. I make the statement on my responsibility as a member of this House, that whatever could have been accomplished by inserting in that treaty restrictive powers, has been accomplished by the settlement made between the Postmaster General and the Japanese authorities. That arrangement has been honourably carried out to the letter. I will concede that however important and satisfactory that settlement may be, the people of British Columbia have not confidence that the Japanese authorities will carry it out. I will make that admission frankly. The complaint in British Columbia was not against the settlement itself, but it originated in the lack of confidence which the people had in the integrity of the Japanese authorities to carry the settlement out in the spirit in which it was made. However that may be, we have to take things as we find them and when the practical people of British Columbia realize that the Japanese are not coming into that province since the date of the settlement, they will, I believe, admit that it has been effective. The direct effect of that settlement came into operation in June, 1908, and I must confess that I was myself surprised at what the public records show since then. I believe in having the facts as they are whether they are for us or whether they are against us. If this question is to be settled it must be settled on the facts and not on any political feelings which may be introduced, and I have every confidence in the intelligence and judgment of the people of British Columbia that when the facts are made known to them they will gladly admit that the settlement has been effective. As I have said, the practical effect of that settlement came into operation in June, 1908. Only 51 Japanese came into British Columbia in June, 1908. Of these 51, 22 were women and children, so that as a matter of fact only 29 Japanese labourers entered British Columbia in June, 1908. In July, 1908, 39 Japanese entered British Columbia, and of that number 16 were women and children, leaving only 23 Japanese labourers coming into the province in the second month after the settlement. In August, 1908, only 27 Japanese entered that province, and of this number 19 were women and children, leaving only eight Japanese labourers. In September, 1908, only 21 Japanese entered the province and of these seven were women and children, leaving 14 Japanese labourers entering in September. In October, 31 Japanese came to British Columbia, and of these eight were women and children, leaving 23 labourers entering the province in October, 1908. In November, only 12 Japanese came into British Columbia, and in December only 16. Thus in the whole period of six months since the settlement, only 198 Japanese have come into the province of British Columbia.

Let me remind my hon. friends from British Columbia of another thing. During the same period of six months the immigration of Chinese was extraordinary. In June, against 51 Japanese, there were 154 Chinese; in July, against 39 Japanese, there were 418 Chinese. What is the conclusion? That the successful enforcement of the Lemieux settlement drove the employers of British Columbia who always want orientals, to pay the $500 head tax on every oriental labourer coming into British Columbia. Thus it seems to me that the settlement of the question of Japanese immigration has been very successful in attaining the object which the people desire, that is that the Japanese should be kept out. If they are kept out by the settlement of my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) there can be no complaint. Our hon. friends received the political advantage of the suspicion of the people of British Columbia that the Japanese would not adhere to their contract, but these figures demonstrate clearly that the Japanese government have lived up to their contract. What are the conditions of that contract? There are two or three important conditions that perhaps may not be known to all the members of this House. One is that Japanese coming into Canada must come directly with passports from Japan, cutting off absolutely the immigration from the American islands where the principal immigration used to come from. The next is the definite provision that no contract Japanese labour may be brought into British Columbia without the consent of this government. I cannot imagine that any restrictive legislation connected with the treaty itself could accomplish that purpose in a more direct and practical way than it has been accomplished by the settlement of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux). As I say it is what the people want, they want to keep the Japanese out and the settlement has kept them out successfully.

Is there any evidence of the operation of that provision? Yes. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company some time ago wanted to put 300 Japanese on their irrigated lands in the district of Calgary. The company made an application to this government to suspend the provisions of that agreement and let them bring these men in under contract, but the government refused to do so and the 300 Japanese labourers could not be brought in and placed upon the irrigated lands, contrary to the terms of that agreement. Thus the agreement has been successful and that is exactly what the people want. I think I am right in the statement that that agreement, that is the treaty between Britain and Japan, expires about 1911. My opinion is, and I say it boldly, that if the present condition of Japanese immigration can be strongly maintained for the next two years, by the operation of the settlement which the government has with Japan, then in the renewal of the treaty necessary to meet the sentiment of British Columbia absolutely, may be inserted and that will give absolute satisfaction to the people of British Columbia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. My hon. friend is excited at the position I take, that this thing ought to be remedied according to his own judgment. If this suggestion is wrong my hon. friend's leader was wrong. Not a single man on the other side of the House said a word with regard to the matter, no one made any complaint, every one said that this was in the best interests of Canada, and there was no suspicion that the understanding that was arrived at with Japan would be interfered with in any way. The intention of every man in this House was to accomplish a principle of commercial interest that was good for British Columbia, and we did not know until we had passed the law that some other precaution might have been taken. Of course my hon. friend lays great stress on the necessity of taking that precaution. He goes further and on Friday night made the statement that the treaty with Japan made it impossible for this parliament to regulate Japanese immigration under any circumstances. He said that the 40,000,000 Japanese, the blind, the halt, the lame and the undesirable, could all come into this country and according to the terms of that treaty nothing could prevent them. I looked up the record and disputed that opinion last session very strongly. Of course my hon. friend is a lawyer and I am not; all I do is to apply common sense and I am convinced that in many cases that will get ahead of the lawyer. What I said last year and say again is that my hon. friend's reckless statement that the ordinary general laws of this country regulating immigration into this country do not apply to Japanese because we have a treaty is an entirely false position, and yet it is a position that was presented repeatedly by these gentlemen to the people of British Columbia. They said that the ordinary immigration law against undesirable immigrants to Canada could not be invoked against Japanese because of the treaty with Japan. I looked up the record and what do I find? Since the treaty was passed 48 Japanese have been deported to Japan direct, for physical reasons. Under the operation of the system of medical inspection under the medical superintendent of immigration in Vancouver, in my hon. friend's own city, 40 Japanese have been deported under the general law and regulations of this country, disproving the very wild position taken by the hon. member the other night and taken by every one of these hon. gentlemen before the electors of British Columbia. I venture the statement that the general electorate of British Columbia, from the discussion in this House and from the general argument on this question in British Columbia in the last campaign, believe that the Japanese had a privilege in entering this country not enjoyed by an Englishman, an Irishman, a Welshman or a Scotchman. My hon. friend still adheres to that position, he believes that yet and takes the responsibility of saying it. Why, the favoured nation clause in the treaty could not give the Japanese more than we gave British subjects. Surely no one can conceive that legislation would be passed by this House which would make possible the conferring of privileges on Japanese greater than those extended to British subjects. What we did was to give the Japanese the rights given to British subjects and no more. But if the hon. gentleman's contention means anything, it means that by that provision we gave the Japanese more extensive rights in this country than we granted our own people and other British subjects. Does the hon. gentleman still take that position? That is one of the beautiful delusions which will soon be shattered in British Columbia, and our hon. friends opposite will pay dearly for having caused them.

Mr. BURRELL. Did the hon. gentleman find that in the campaign against me in my constituency that view was presented? Did he not find that his own advocacy resulted in an overwhelming defeat of the gentleman he supported on that question?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I just happened to speak in two places in my hon. friend's constituency. That of course accounts for my hon. friend's election. If I had taken a greater part, the result would probably have been different.

Mr. BARNARD. The hon. gentleman could not get a majority of the votes in his own riding.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barnard) says I could not get a majority of the votes in my riding. But, Mr. Speaker, if I had forged telegrams, I might have got a good deal more.

Mr. BARNARD. Is the hon. gentleman not prepared to accept the statement I made in the House yesterday?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I am going to deal with this forged telegram now.

Mr. CAMPBELL. May I be permitted to ask a question. I understand that the hon. gentleman is a representative of labour. I would like to ask him if he is here as a representative of white or yellow labour?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. My hon. friend is a new member and he will of course learn by experience. I am surprised that my hon. friend for Victoria (Mr. Barnard) should insist in butting in and out at this serious part of the debate. He stands in this House to-day as the consequence of a forged telegram, and I say that telegram was forged on the authority of the leader of the opposition. When I discussed the question in Kootenay, not in the presence of the hon. gentleman but in the presence of an intelligent representative of his, it was stated by that representative, two weeks after that telegram was published, that the leader of the Conservative party had committed himself to the entire exclusion of Asiatics from British Columbia. I then gave the leader of the opposition this credit. I stated on the platform at Nelson that I did not believe he would take the responsibility of sending any such telegram. I brought down here my files for the purpose of asking my hon. friend the straight question, but that was rendered unnecessary by his disavowal of the telegram. But in the 'Colonist' of the 25th of October last that telegram appeared on the front page. It appeared in the 'Colonist' on the 25th of October, the day before the election, and was distributed in every coast city and elsewhere throughout British Columbia. For the three weeks following the by-election, that telegram appeared dated from Halifax the 24th of October, 1908, and it read as follows:—

> Your message received. The Conservative party stand for a white Canada, the protection of white labour and the absolute exclusion of Asiatics.

My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, has stated in this House that he never sent any such telegram; and yet for three weeks that telegram was distributed throughout the length and breadth of British Columbia and was never repudiated.

Mr. COWAN. May I say that the hon. gentleman is mistaken. That telegram was never distributed or printed, or read in the constituency of Victoria. I never heard of that telegram until Friday afternoon last in this House.

Mr. SMITH. My hon. friend is committing himself to an enormous responsibility when he says that telegram was not distributed or read in the constituency of Vancouver. Do the electors of Vancouver not read the 'Daily Colonist'? Is that newspaper not sent over by the steamer on Sunday morning?

Mr. COWAN. The hon. gentleman knows well that the 'Victoria Colonist' does not get distribution in the city of Vancouver. He knows perfectly well that the statement I have made is correct. That telegram was not printed in Vancouver, it was never read by me in Vancouver, it was never heard of by me until I came to this House.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I accept of course my hon. friend's present statement, but that statement rather intensifies the responsibility taken by the friends of the leader of the opposition in Victoria. My hon. friend says that the people of Vancouver did not read the telegram, but the people of Vancouver read the 'Daily Colonist', and in the 'Daily Colonist' you have what purports to be an exact copy of a telegram from the leader of the opposition in Halifax, and that was distributed in every coast city the day before the elections. A special sheet was distributed in Nanaimo on the day of the election stating 'For White, British Columbia'. My leader, said the Conservative candidate on the day of the election, stands for the entire exclusion of Asiatics, and this information was sent broadcast throughout British Columbia, because everybody in British Columbia reads the 'Daily Colonist.' My hon. friend himself must be affected by the rivalry which Vancouver has against Victoria if he refuses even to read the newspaper of the latter city. But that does not exonerate my hon. friend from the responsibility for this telegram. The point I make is this, here is a telegram signed by the leader of the Conservative party which promised the people of British Columbia what they wanted on this question.

This telegram had its influence. It was distributed widely. I met it on the platform in the Kootenay district, as I have stated. And to my hon. friend who is to follow me, I may say for his information, that on the platform I gave the leader of the Conservative opposition credit by saying that I did not believe he had said such a thing. But the fact remains that a principle materially affecting the interests of British Columbia was announced over the signature of the leader of the Conservative party, that he himself, since the gathering of this House, has declared was absolutely untrue, but which, in my opinion, affected very materially the result of our elections. And the last man I would have credited with this was the hon member who got a dozen majority in the city of Victoria, and that same hon. gentleman read this telegram, not as it was sent by the leader of the opposition, but as it is found in the 'Colonist' to-day, and as it was distributed throughout the province of British Columbia. The hon. gentleman said on Friday last that it was an emissary of the 'Colonist' office who brought the telegram to him. But he will not say that it was not a political adversary who brought him that telegram. He knew that the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), just a few weeks before, had taken a mandate from the leader of the opposition on this question. That hon. gentleman announced plainly in the press of Vancouver that the leader of the opposition and the Conservative party were prepared to abrogate the treaty with Japan if the conditions of the new settlement were not adhered to. I am sure that my hon. friend from Vancouver will endorse my statement. The hon. member for Victoria, when he read the forged telegram in Victoria, had read repeatedly the mandate stated by the hon. member for Vancouver on an entirely contrary principle. I say that my hon. friend is not absolutely free from the responsibility for reading that telegram.

There are two ways of settling this oriental question in British Columbia. I will join my friends opposite in any reasonable method of settlement; but it can never be settled by forging telegrams; it can never be settled by approaching the question exclusively from a partisan point of view. The attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) in this debate was absolutely a partisan position. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was his great cause of complaint. 'I wish,' he said, 'that I had never heard his speech.' Well, after we got the information about the forged telegram, we were not surprised that he wished he had never heard that speech. For more reasons than one, we shared the hon. gentleman's wish. I have said that there are two ways of settling this oriental question. One way is for employers of labour in British Columbia not to employ orientals. The second way is by reasonable legislation. I am not sure that any one of the hon. gentlemen I have referred to can subscribe to the first principle. They stand for a 'white Canada.' Their whole programme was for a 'white Canada.' But I question whether one of the five men can stand up in this House and say that he never employed an oriental in British Columbia. 'He that is without sin, let him cast the first stone.' Don't all speak at once. We stand for a white Canada for everybody in British Columbia, but the five Tory representatives.

My hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) stated the other night that he appreciated the settlement of the Hindu part of this question by the Dominion government. There are two things I appreciated in my hon. friend's statement. I appreciate very highly his generosity in admitting that that question had been settled in a broad and statesman-like way, and I appreciate his kindness as an employer to his own workmen.

Mr. BURRELL. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ralph Smith) a question? I think he will admit that in all my campaign the whole of this matter brought before the House——

Some hon. MEMBERS. That is not a question.

Mr. BURRELL. I would ask if he heard me discuss any phase of the question except that of the Japanese? And did I not differentiate between the Japanese and the Hindus?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. My position in this House is that I do not differentiate between the Chinaman the Japanese and the Hindu. And I say that that is the position of the average man in British Columbia.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Prime Minister does.

Some hon. MEMBERS. The government does.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I did not need to be reminded of that. But I say that I do not differentiate, and if the government does, then, of course, on that point, I am at variance with the government. But what I am pointing out is that, so long as the employers of labour in British Columbia employ orientals, the demand for orientals will be encouraged, but the moment you destroy the demand the supply will look after itself. And I want to make this statement—for I think this is a time to put the case plainly—that these hon. gentlemen who stand for a 'white Canada' do employ yellow men. And so long as these gentlemen come to this House with crocodile tears, bemoaning the depressed condition of British Columbia and declaring their desire to defend the white labour of British Columbia against the yellow races, yet spend their own money in encouraging the presence of these orientals in British Columbia, the people of that province will not believe for very long that they are true advocates. The subterfuge may be successful on election day for once. But 'chickens come home to roost,' and when the electors' facts become known, the permanency that these hon. gentlemen expect in their political lives will be absolutely destroyed. I have preached against orientalism——

Mr. COWAN. Good.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. What does my hon. friend (Mr. Cowan) say?

Mr. COWAN. I say that 'preached' is good.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I have preached against orientalism strongly, and I do so yet. But I have practised what I preached, for I have never spent a dollar in the employment of an oriental. And it is my business to put it up to these hon. gentlemen that they are not consistent advocates on this burning question for British Columbia. They must clean their own doorstep. If their influence is to be of importance in this House, they must give a guarantee that they do not encourage with their money and through their business that class in British Columbia of which they complain and over whose presence they pretend to be broken-hearted.

I believe the effect of the settlement of this question has been reasonable and fair. I believe that when the facts are presented to the people of British Columbia the government will get credit for its position. When the contract with Japan expires, two years from now, if, in the judgment of the people of this country, it is absolutely necessary to have restrictive legislation associated with the treaty, that is the time to put it through. But I submit that, according to the figures before this House, Japanese immigration has been reduced by the settlement, and yet encouragement has been given to oriental trade which is entirely in the interests of the great undeveloped province of British Columbia. I venture to think that that is the position that the people of British Columbia will stand for when they realize the meaning and importance of what has been accomplished, and the government must see that this exclusion must continue.

I have spoken longer than I intended to do, but it is important I should speak long. I am the only representative on this side, and I have to reply to all my hon. friends opposite. I am in earnest on this question, because I am a believer in a white British Columbia, and I am glad to say that I put that belief into practice. I think this government ought to go as far as possible to exclude these people, and that we ought to encourage white people instead to come to British Columbia and assist us in developing that great province. As long as you have 30,000 orientals in that province, you make it impossible for white labour to come in from the British Isles. I repeat that while our Tory friends have made the province of British Columbia an oriental country, and never did a thing when they were in control to restrict oriental immigration, the Liberal party have taken vigorous steps against Chinese immigration, and have entered into a reasonable agreement with the Japanese government to restrict immigration from that country. They have successfully reduced the emigration of these people to British Columbia in the last six months, down to 18 persons in the month of December last, and this must continue. If this government compelled the government of Japan to stand to the integrity of that agreement, the people of British Columbia themselves, four years hence will support this government in their Japanese policy.

Mr. A. S. GOODEVE (Kootenay). As a representative of British Columbia, I desire to say a few words on the issues that have been raised by the First Minister with regard to this question, and I also propose to deal with the arguments advanced by the Postmaster General. I wish to say with regard to the question raised by the First Minister, that if this government was so signally defeated in our province, it was due to the four factors mentioned by my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell). In my constituency at least the question of the deferred election and the presence of the Minister of the Interior in that riding, had a great deal to do with the majority I obtained. The sense of justice and fairplay so eminently characteristic of the west, resented the deferred election. Our people felt that they were being unfairly and unjustly treated, and they showed their resentment. In regard to the second issue, there were certain districts in my constituency in which we conceded a Liberal majority ; but after the Minister of the Interior had come in and spoken on behalf of the Liberal candidate, and explained the policy of the government, as we considered, authoritatively, he found the sentiment in those districts altogether hostile, and the result was that in those Liberal districts I received a very large majority.

Now, Sir, in dealing with the issues raised by the Postmaster General, I desire to say here that I was delighted, on this the occasion of my first appearance in the House, to hear the eloquent language of the minister, but I regret to have to say that, while admiring his eloquence, I cannot also admire his logic. I regret to say that I can neither agree with his logic nor with his conclusions. I also desire to thank the hon. gentleman for the compliments he paid to our splendid province and its representatives. He has argued, as most of the speakers on the government side have argued, up to a certain point in agreement with the position taken by the people of British Columbia. I think I can say that as regards the economic phase of the question, we are in accord. The First Minister himself has stated much more eloquently than I could hope to do, the exact economic changes involved in bringing these Asiatics and orientals into the province of British Columbia. He has explained that owing to their environment in their native country, to the fact that for generations they have lived in poverty and distress, the presence of any considerable number of them in that portion of Canada creates a disturbance in the economic conditions. We are at one on that part of the question. But it seems to me that when hon. gentlemen opposite reach a crucial point in their argument, they fail to follow it out to a logical conclusion ; they point in a more or less distracted way to the old flag and in various ways endeavour to avoid the logical conclusion of their argument. That has been the case with all the speeches from the other side that I have listened to so far. They say that if it was only the economical question that was in dispute, that could be easily settled.

But they have gone on and told us that there was danger to the empire at large. Sir, what are the arguments they have advanced in support of their attitude in that respect ? Not only during the last campaign, but during the last eight years, I have failed to find a single argument advanced by any member of this government to support their contention that the people of British Columbia are guilty of any disloyalty to the empire in the attitude they have taken on this question. Both the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General have told us that if we push the policy we have taken with regard to this question to a conclusion, we are likely to disturb the friendly relations existing between the empire and Japan. Now let us look at this question from a non-partisan standpoint, as one appealing to the whole Canadian people. My good friend the Postmaster General says that the people of British Columbia do not understand this question, that they do not understand the people of Japan. He says, they have not visited Japan, as I have done. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is true, we have not been so fortunate as to be able to visit that beautiful country he describes, at the expense of the Canadian people. But I venture to say that if we were sent over to Japan as delegates from the province of British Columbia, or from the Dominion of Canada, we would not come back and recommend to this parliament that they should place the control of immigration into Canada in the hands of the Japanese government. I will go further and say that if the Postmaster General himself would visit that great province of Manitoba, that was so eloquently referred to by the mover of the address as the granary of the world, if he would go farther and visit the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and observe their flocks of cattle on a thousand hills or if he would go still further west and stand on the summit of the Rockies and look over that sea of mountains, to quote the words of a Liberal leader of former days, if he would take note of the splendid natural resources of that great province, of her lakes and rivers, of her immense wealth in minerals, fisheries and timber ; if he would look over this vast heritage and realize that the men who are called upon to develop these immense resources are of the Canadian race, descendants of the great Anglo-Saxon race that has done so much for the civilization of the world, I venture to say that even the Postmaster General, however much he may admire our little brown friends in Japan, would not say that we should give up to them the task of peopling and developing that province.

I venture to say that even the hon. Postmaster General would hesitate to hand over this vast Dominion to these people, as he is advocating at this time. The answer of the hon. Postmaster General is that we have the assurance of the Japanese government, both by word of mouth and in writing, from the year 1900, and that assurance has been repeated in ten or twenty communications from that government since that time, that there would be no immigration from that country to Canada exceeding 600 a year, and yet I find in Hansard, in a speech of the Minister of Agriculture delivered in this House seven years afterwards, the statement that in ten months 8,125 Japanese had come into Canada. What explanation does the Minister of Agriculture make of that fact ? He said : It is true, 8,125 Japanese came into Canada from January to September, but of that number some 4,000 come from the islands of Hawaii and some 900 came in under contract for certain immigration agencies or bureaus, and a certain number passed through to the United States, leaving something like 3,000 remaining in Canada according to the minister's own figures. But when we go behind the statement of the Minister of Agriculture, we find that every one of those immigrants had a passport direct from the Japanese government, as was brought out at the investigation in Victoria. This shows that there is nothing in the spoken or written promise of the Japanese government. What difference does it make to the labourers or artisans of British Columbia whether these men are brought in under contract or as free labourers? If you bring 900 or 9,000 Japanese into the labour market, under contract, you are doing the very thing that we in the west and the whole of Canada are fighting against. We want this country for our own Canadian people. But we find that the wages of our labourers and artisans are being cut down by the influx of these people into our country. We are told that this is more or less a local question. When it comes up for discussion, as it will later on, we shall be able to bring forward such facts and arguments as will convince both sides of this House that it is not merely a provincial question affecting the province of British Columbia alone, but a question affecting gravely the whole Dominion of Canada, and affecting the whole British empire.

There is a side of this question that has never yet been touched upon, so far as I have seen, on reference to Hansard, or heard in any of the speeches I have listened to from time to time. The hon. Postmaster General has referred to the fact that the Japanese are aggressive and intelligent, and he afterwards took credit to the government that by increasing the head tax on the Chinese from $50 to $500, they had done much to shut out the Chinese. He did not agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo, but said: 'I make a clear distinction between the Chinese and the Japanese'; and he went on to explain what the distinction was. He said that the Chinese engaged in more menial occupations than the Japanese, that they were not so advanced in western civilization. I want to point out that that is the very thing that makes them all the more dangerous. On this point I will call the attention of the government to the report of their own royal commission, consisting of three Liberals, appointed to investigate this question some years ago, when the various boards of trade and labour organizations throughout British Columbia and the other western provinces were bringing the question to the attention of the country. That commission consisted of Mr. Clute, who has since become a judge, Mr. Foley and Mr. Munn. That commission investigated the question with a good deal of care, and the gist of their report was that the admission of the Japanese into the Dominion, and particularly the province of British Columbia, was more dangerous and more inimical to the interests of the people of Canada than an influx of even the Chinese. But, Sir, notwithstanding the finding of their own royal commission, notwithstanding that they sent one minister twice and another minister once to Japan to study the question, the government of Canada have done practically nothing other than to get the personal assurance of the Japanese government that they themselves would restrict this immigration. The hon. member for Nanaimo tells us this afternoon that under the agreement made by the Japanese government with the Postmaster General the immigration of these people has been restricted to such an extent that in certain months of the year not more than twenty-three or twenty-four come in. But the agreement the Postmaster General made could not possibly restrict immigration from Japan. I find from a stenographic report received by the Japanese newspapers on the discussion that took place in the Diet of Tokio, the minister with whom he had the correspondence spoke as follows :

Japanese newspapers received in yesterday's mails give stenographic reports of the discussion in the Diet at Tokio regarding the question of Japanese immigration to Canada. Count Hayashi, Foreign Minister, in the course of a long speech is reported as having declared that after the Vancouver riots Canada asked Japan to negotiate a treaty differentiating labour immigration from her shores and that the Japanese government had replied that it could not possibly negotiate any treaty differentiating injuriously against its own nationalists, and that all negotiations having that object must be futile.

Nevertheless, Canada has sent Hon. Mr. Lemieux to this country last November, with instructions to negotiate such a convention if possible. In that respect the envoy's mission had failed, but he had received assurances from the Japanese government that would continue to exercise to the full all the functions delegated to it by law in this matter.

Notwithstanding that at that particular time the Postmaster General was negotiating this very treaty, this minister of the Japanese government claims that the only treaty that could possibly be made must be carefully defined within these lines. Such a treaty is certainly not such a treaty as was described by the Postmaster General in his speech on Friday last. I quote further from the remarks of this Japanese minister:

Mr. Lemieux had asked for an interchange of documents in that sense, and despatches were given which have already been published. The question then arose as to exactly what immigrants were to be vetoed, and it had been agreed that no restriction whatever should be imposed with regard to the following, namely:

This is the gist of the whole matter:

first, travellers, merchants and students; secondly, Japanese subjects who, although belonging to the labouring class, had their wives and families in Canada; thirdly, labourers who had returned to Japan from Canada and who contemplated going back to Canada; fourthly, contract labourers, that is to say, men having fixed employment; fifthly, Japanese subjects discharging the duties of domestic servants and accompanying their employers; and, sixthly agricultural labourers Obviously the only labourers not included in this category were those who drifted to Canada without any resources of their own and on the chance of finding employment.

In other words, this is a distinct declaration that the Japanese government would enter into no negotiations with the Postmaster General for a treaty which would debar these particular classes from free entry into Canada. It was not argued by any member from British Columbia—at any rate it was not argued in my constituency—that the treaty gave any special privileges to the Japanese outside of the Immigration Act, but what I do say is that the Japanese government distinctly stated that they would not be restricted further than our Immigration Act restricted other nationalities. The fact is that the Japanese government have simply given an assurance to the Canadian government that in so far as it is reasonable or in so far as they themselves are satisfied they will restrict immigration, while at the same time they hold themselves free at any time to allow the immigration of all these classes which I have enumerated and which include the very labourers and artisans about whom we have been speaking.

We grant that the Japanese are a people who are rapidly taking up with western ideas. They have a territory of over one million square miles and a population of over forty million people. The Postmaster General argued on Friday last that we are constantly increasing our intercourse with these eastern nations, and he suggested that when the time came, and it was rapidly approaching he said, that we would have an 'all red route,' intercommunication between us and oriental nations would increase more and more. Therefore, Sir, the danger will be getting greater as the years roll by. The Japanese people with their enormous population crowded into such a small area are naturally casting their eyes around to see wherein their surplus population may find a home. And, if we have the same great influx of these people into the fair lands of our western shores that we have had in the past, let me ask this House what would be the result? In British Columbia we have a large territory and a sparse population, and if the influx of orientals were to continue the time is not far distant when the alien and foreign population would exceed the native population. There is this difference between oriental and European immigration, that the orientals cannot and will not assimilate with our people. We never look to the time when by marriage and inter-marriage with the Chinese and Japanese these orientals shall become assimilated with the people of our race. Every man in this House knows that is an impossible thing. I ask you then, in what position will Canada be when we have several hundred thousand of these orientals, remaining loyal to their own flag and unassimilated with us. Do hon. gentlemen think what the result might be in case of war? There is not a single Japanese who leaves his native land who is not enlisted and who does not report every three years to his home government. What would such men do in the case of a call to arms for the defence of Canada? Hon. gentlemen opposite may perhaps say that I am raising a bugaboo, but is it not well that in the government of a nation we should look to the future? We trust, Sir, that the alliance between the British empire and the Japanese empire may long continue, we believe it will, but when we are dealing with such a question as this we must look at it in all its aspects. It is only ordinary prudence that we should endeavour to see what may occur in the future, and what effect our policy of to-day may in the years to come have upon our country and our empire. Only to-day I read a despatch in the newspapers— I may say, however, that I have no confidence in that despatch—only to-day I read in the newspapers that one of the leaders of the people to the south has declared that if the United States should continue in their policy of withdrawing their warships from the Pacific ocean it will mean war. I mention that merely to show what the trend of public opinion is and how the people of the United States realize that the great Pacific slope is looked at with longing eyes by these oriental races. It is therefore necessary that every Canadian, no matter what his politics, should realize that this is no longer a question for British Columbia alone. It is a question that concerns every man, woman and child, not only in the Dominion of Canada, but in every part of this great empire of ours. We should view it from that broad standpoint, we should realize that any action we may take now should be taken for the benefit of the whole empire. When the question of this treaty with Japan first arose it was submitted to the government then in power in Canada, and they suggested to the Colonial Secretary that Canada could only accept that treaty if there was a clause in it giving us control of our own immigration. The question remained in abeyance for several years, and although the present government of Canada had all the information concerning it before them, although they had sent their ministers three times to Japan to study the question, although the British government itself had called the attention of the Canadian government especially to the matter and asked if they wanted any restriction, this government said: no, and they deliberately signed that treaty without any provision whatever for the restriction of immigration into Canada. We in British Columbia are meanwhile the sufferers from the economic disturbance caused by the results of this treaty, and so we realized more than did the people of eastern Canada what this disturbance means, and we took up the issue. When the question comes up later on we shall endeavour to place our arguments in such light before this House that I think the House will agree that some steps must be taken to restrict the Japanese in their free ingress and egress to this country. That is the whole question. We are just as loyal to the empire as are the gentlemen who sit on the government benches; we admire as much as they do the progressiveness of the Japanese people, but we say that in considering this question we have got to view it in the light of a business proposition. Why, as the Postmaster General argued should they feel any offence, why should their feelings be hurt because we make laws in regard to the restriction of the entrance of their people into this country? Would it not have been a reasonable proposition? Do we not impose similar restrictions in regard to our own people? We know that under the Immigration Act we restrict the entrance of even our own people into the country. Then is there any reason why we should not in the same way restrict the immigration of Japanese?

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith) has made much of the fact of a certain telegram having been sent to Victoria in regard to this question. Speaking for my district, I never saw that telegram, I never heard of it, I never heard it read or knew anything about it until I heard of it in this House on Friday afternoon. It had little bearing in my district of Kootenay. Some one may have read it, and I accept the word of the hon. member (Mr. Ralph Smith) that it was read in his presence, but as he stated I was not present at the time and I repeat that I never heard of it and know that it had nothing whatever to do with the question. I was surprised that the hon. member (Mr. Ralph Smith) seemed to think the whole crux of the question rested on that telegram. Yet what was the real argument in regard to it? Simply that if he was correct, if his arguments were correct, then the people of British Columbia are very much in earnest on this question. If that telegram swayed votes in favour of the opposition as against the government, there is only one conclusion to be drawn and that is that they are very much in earnest in regard to this question and want it settled along lines that will preserve to them the good heritage of this Dominion of ours.

In regard to the question of better terms, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) said that the Hon. Mr. McBride's mission at the conference of the premiers in regard to this question was a failure. I venture to differ from him in regard to that. When the province of British Columbia applied for an independent tribunal to try their case, they were refused, and instead of giving them an independent tribunal the government called for a conference of the premiers of the various provinces to go into this whole question. There was nothing wrong in that, but I appeal to your sense and judgment whether or not that was an independent tribunal as putting the claim of one province against the claim of another province. Every member, every school boy, knows that if any one of those premiers had given more to one province than he obtained for his own, the first question asked of him on returning to his constituents would be: Why did you not get as much as the other provinces? That is natural, that is right and that is fair and yet I can prove to you that our claim was so just that even the biassed and I say advisedly, prejudiced tribunal admitted the right of the province of British Columbia to special consideration and so the Hon. Richard McBride did not fail in his mission here at that conference. I have here the resolution adopted by that conference, a tribunal composed of premiers, every one fighting for his own province. Yet they felt that our position was so just that they passed this resolution :

That in view of the large area, geographical position and very exceptional physical features of the province of British Columbia, it is the opinion of this conference that the said province should receive a reasonable additional allowance for the purposes of civil government in excess of the provisions made in the Quebec resolutions of 1902, and that such additional allowance should be to the extent of $100,000 annually for ten years.

I rather regret to say—I may be wrong—but I thought I detected certain sarcasm beneath the words of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when he said that the province accepted the $100,000 for ten years, or $1,000,000, although they said it was not enough. Is there anything wrong in the province having accepted that concession ? Would you have them act as children and when they asked for a cake and get only half a cake throw it down and say : I will not take it ? I venture to say there was nothing wrong in the province of British Columbia accepting the $1,000,000 that was offered them, at the same time entering their protest that it was not a fair or adequate amount under the conditions. Mr. McBride's mission was not a failure.

Then the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) said that Mr. McBride went to the foot of the Throne and again was not successful. I intend to prove from the resolution that Mr. McBride was successful. After having obtained an admission from a prejudiced tribunal that the province was entitled to special and exceptional terms to the extent of $1,000,000, Mr. McBride went to London. We had from the First Minister himself a statement that that was a final and unalterable settlement, that it had been settled by the conference of premiers of the provinces and was final. But, Sir, the premier of the province of British Columbia did not so regard it and I am glad to say that in this he was supported by the leader of the opposition in the British Columbia House at Victoria, Mr. J. A. Macdonald, who himself moved a resolution in which he said that the amount was inadequate and that therefore they did not want this to be a final and unalterable settlement. The result of that was that the legislature unanimously, Liberals and Conservatives alike, agreed to send the premier of the province to the foot of the Throne to argue that the rights of the province were denied by the Liberal government at Ottawa. I venture to say again that they were successful because I find that when the premier of the province of British Columbia went home and placed this matter before the British government he obtained this communication :

Downing Street, June 5, 1907.

To the Hon. Richard McBride, Hotel Victoria, London.

I am directed by the Earl of Elgin to inform you that His Lordship has given the most careful consideration to the documents which you presented to him and to the views advanced against the proposed amendment of the British North America Act fixing the scale of payments be made by the Dominion of Canada to the several provinces.

2. Lord Elgin fully appreciates the force of the opinion expressed that the British North America Act was the result of terms of union agreed upon by the contracting provinces and that its terms cannot be altered merely at the wish of the Dominion government.

I am to add that no mention will be made in the imperial act of the settlement being final and unalterable, such terms being obviously unappropriate in a legislative enactment.

I venture to say that the hon. the Postmaster General was incorrect in both the assertions he made. Mr. McBride was both successful in the conference and successful with the home government. He had these words struck out so that in the future we can easily obtain justice and fair-play for our province.

Mr. JAMES DAVIS TAYLOR (New Westminster). Although the ground has been very fully covered by other members from British Columbia, I consider it my duty to rise and add my quota to the explanations which have been made regarding the special case of the province of British Columbia. Let me say at the outset that I appreciate the compliment paid to the members on the Conservative side from British Columbia by the right hon. the leader of the government when he said that in our province this election was fought on principle, and I wish to congratulate the Conservative members generally on his further statement that in the other provinces the test was not so much of principle as an appeal to sectional feeling and prejudices. I would like to point out that the result of the appeal to principle in British Columbia was a substantial Conservative majority, and that the result of the sectional appeals throughout the rest of Canada was a Liberal majority. We have the admission of the right hon. gentleman himself to this effect, when he told us that his party had adopted a pamphlet issued against it by a certain organization in this Dominion, but intended only as an address to those interested in the principles of that organization. Well, we have the First Minister admitting that his party had circulated that same appeal in quarters hostile to the organization which issued it, and had done this for the purpose of injuring the Conservative party.

It seems to me that this debate has taken a most extraordinary turn, and that we have reached a new era in parliamentary affairs when we find the leader of the House, in his speech on the address, making no mention of the legislation promised and giving no explanation of any of the measures outlined in the speech from the Throne, but instead making theatrical production of shoddy in the shape of a disputed telegram and laying a copy of it on the table, although it was well known to his associates at least that that telegram had been repudiated by the hon. gentleman whose name was signed to it. It certainly was a most unusual experience for a new member to be taunted, as the hon. member for Victoria was taunted the other night by the leader of this House, with having secured his seat by false pretenses and with occupying a seat which by right should belong to another. I think we should have further explanation as to the origin of that telegram. I think we should have heard something on that point from the hon. member from Nanaimo (Mr. Smith), who took up a good deal of time this afternoon. We should have heard something from him regarding the control of the 'Colonist,' in which that telegram appeared It would certainly have come with very good grace from him to tell the House that the 'Colonist' is not in any sense of the word a concern in which the Conservative party has any proprietary control. The 'Colonist,' so far as its ownership is concerned, is a thoroughly independent newspaper, and its editor is one of the most pronounced and prominent Liberals in all British Columbia, and a close personal friend, if I am not very much mistaken, of the hon. member from Nanaimo, who this afternoon sought to make the House believe that this telegram had emanated from sources entirely favourable to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barnard), and that the Conservative party should be held responsible for the use made of it. I would like to add that the facts I have mentioned regarding the control of the 'Colonist' are very well known to the members of this government. It seems to me—and I say it with all the humility which becomes a young member making his first appearance that it is not in accord with parliamentary traditions that stigma should be cast on a whole party because of a document as to which that party cannot be held responsible. I wish to add that I do not impute any wilful wrong to the 'Colonist' newspaper or its editor. In justice to one of the great newspapers of British Columbia—and with which I had at one time a pretty long connection—I can say that, so far as I know, that newspaper is conducted now, as ever, on the most honourable lines. I would like to have an explanation as to how this telegram came to be distorted, but I would not for a moment attribute any wilful distortion to the 'Colonist.' But when you examine the words substituted, namely, 'The absolute exclusion of Asiatic labour,' and contrast them with the words said by the leader of the opposition to have been in the telegram signed by him, namely, 'the absolute protection of white labour,' when you contrast these and get your mind away, for the moment, from the enormity of making any alteration whatever in a telegram published with the signature of the author, you will find that, after all, there is very little difference between them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. You will find, I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is very little difference between them. I would like to impress that particularly upon the hon. member for Nainaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith), and ask him, as the representative par excellence of the labour interest, what difference he sees between the absolute protection of white labour in British Columbia and the exclusion of Asiatics from British Columbia. To my mind, the terms, in meaning are identical. But I can well see the point which the right hon. gentleman who introduced this matter before the House might have made against the leader of the opposition if he could have fastened upon him the responsibility of sending the telegram as it appeared. It is quite plain to any one who considers the matter that in the face of the Japanese treaty, in the face of the possibility that the sender of that telegram might, within a short time, have had to assume the responsibility of leading the government of this country, it would have been a very undignified position for him to take to send a message which might have been interpreted as a message of defiance to the Japanese people with whom we had a treaty. Under the treaty, and the agreement in connection with it, the condition of affairs in British Columbia with respect to the Japanese would have been very much better than it had been in the past, especially the then recent past. While we can well understand the caution which would move the leader of the opposition in sending the telegram, I say, as a member of the Conservative party in British Columbia and in this House, that, whether or not our leader sent the telegram, that our policy was one of absolute exclusion of Asiatics from British Columbia, I do believe that that is the policy of the Conservative party of Canada, and I do maintain that, so far as the members from British Columbia can be influential in shaping the policy of the Conservative party, they will stand to a man in favour of the exclusion of Asiatics from our magnificent province.

Another reason suggests itself to my mind —and probably will suggest itself to the minds of others—for the extraordinary heat shown by the leader of this government in connection with this Japanese question. It occurs to me that this Japanese treaty was of the nature of a personally-conducted excursion into the realm of legislation, and that it followed the appearance of the siren within the precincts of the Privy Council. It appears to me that the fatality attending upon these personally-conducted excursions has had an irritating effect upon the right hon. gentleman. When we see the latest excursion of this kind followed by the disappearance of the Minister of Inland Revenue, and when we recall that a previous essay of this nature was followed by the disappearance of a Minister of the Interior, and when we remember certain negotiations from which the Minister of Railways was excluded, followed by the disappearance of that Minister of Railways, we can understand the heat with which the subject is approached by the Prime Minister, and his natural annoyance that a third should have been added to the cabinet fatalities, and that he should be held, in a measure, responsible for the disappearance of his unfortunate colleague.

Now, we heard the right hon. gentleman challenge the patriotism of the members from British Columbia when he said—I speak from recollection—that our attitude with regard to Asiatic immigration was a menace not only to the interests of Canada but of the whole British empire. Sir, we are not a peculiar people in British Columbia. The most of us are Canadians from the eastern provinces who have been attracted by the greater opportunities of the west, but who, in our progress westward, have not had our vision narrowed. We have not lost anything of our affection for Canada or for the British empire because we have removed from Quebec or Ontario to British Columbia. But we think we can claim that we see this Asiatic problem with clearer vision than that of our fellow countrymen who have remained in the east. We do not want to see the Japanese planted in our fields. We do not want to hand over our fisheries, as has been the case with the Fraser river, to the swarm of their boats. Emphatically we do not want to surrender our anchorage in the harbour of Esquimalt or the harbour of Vancouver to the warships of the Japanese nation. The Prime Minister suggested that these ships would be likely to ride at anchor there at a future date to protect us from molestations by enemies of our Empire. I may say that no man in British Columbia that I ever heard indicated that he looked for foreign molestation from any quarter which would cause us to welcome the protection of the Japanese fleet. I do not know that any person in British Columbia has ever feared that the time would come when the power of the British navy would be insufficient to protect our shores. If I have heard criticism in that respect, it has been of the policy of the Canadian government, which policy has dismantled our only naval station in British Columbia and has made of the great naval yard at Esquimalt little but a wreck and has left us, indeed, at the mercy of any hostile vessels that might have come there. I say, we are not apprehensive of hostilities from any quarter. But when we think of these matters, we remember that a few years ago we had a naval base and that to-day there are no ships of war there. And when we look for the cause, we find it largely in the refusal of the government of Canada to contribute to the cost of imperial naval defence or to take any part in negotiations said to have been set afoot by the British authorities with the view of a businesslike arrangement to that effect.

Before I leave this subject of oriental immigration I would like to say that the position in British Columbia is very much aggravated by the attitude of this government towards the Japanese who have come to our province and are naturalized there. It is bad enough to have these people monopolizing our industries, especially to have them take possession of the sockeye fishery of the Fraser, but when we find the government proposing to put these orientals by thousands upon the voters' list in British Columbia and so place them in a position to swamp the white vote, then the electors of a riding such as New Westminster, which I have the honour to represent, believe that it is time for a pause, believe that it is time to take most resolute action to arouse public opinion to the danger to which we are exposed, the danger of humiliation in an electoral sense brought upon us by the most peculiar attitude of this government in relation to the Japanese. We find on the records of three or four years ago a most indignant remonstrance by the then Minister of Justice of Canada against an Act of the legislature of British Columbia denying to Asiatics, the right to be registered on the voters' list of that province.

The Minister of Justice of that day, endorsed by his colleagues, declared that the province of British Columbia should not be allowed to deny the privilege of the franchise to naturalized subjects of His Majesty; and that representation should be made to that province to the effect that naturalized Asiatics should go upon the voters' lists. Now when this proposition came to be discussed by this government they knew the extent to which the Japanese had been naturalized in British Columbia, and in New West minster particularly. It is part of the Dominion fishery laws that no man can obtain a fishing license for the salmon fishery unless he is a naturalized British subject. We had at that time close upon 3,000 naturalized Japanese holding fishing licenses, and the proposition of the government virtually was to put that whole 3,000 on the voters' list in British Columbia, mainly in the riding of New Westminster. I appeal to any person who can understand the meaning of an Act of that kind, I appeal to his sense of fair play, whether any community would be true to itself that remained inactive, and did not strain every nerve to resist such a proposition, that did not do as we have done, and form Asiatic Exclusion leagues, which have done so much to educate the people of British Columbia and to make possible the emphatic answer we returned to the policy of this government.

Now a few words on the subject of better terms. It seems to me that the case has not been so fully stated by the members of the government as it might have been, seeing that they are so much more conversant with the facts than the average men can be. This is a matter of first importance in British Columbia. Our application for an increase, which we call better terms, had been before the government of Canada for about six years. We were able to show by the most detailed calculations that we were paying into the federal exchequer a sum in excess of the other provinces proportionately, and that we were not getting back what was rightly due us. We were exasperated that the government, year after year, made no reply to our appeal for redress, and virtually ignored us. Finally the premier of British Columbia received an invitation from the Prime Minister of Canada to come down to Ottawa, not to discuss the matter with the other provincial premiers alone, but to discuss it also with His Majesty's ministers, with a view to a solution of a long standing problem. Mr. McBride's grievance began when he arrived at Ottawa and proposed to discuss with His Majesty's ministers the special claim of British Columbia, that did not involve the other provinces at all. We had a claim that was not shared by the other provinces, and we addressed that claim solely to the government of Canada. I say that when he came to Ottawa, and when His Majesty's ministers refused to discuss that claim, and told him that he must take it before a conference of provincial premiers, that the federal government would not consider any representations at all except such as came from that conference, then of course Mr. McBride was forced to take his case before those premiers, and according to all the reports we have received he presented his case in a most heroic manner. I say that he achieved a signal triumph when he obtained from the conference of provincial premiers a verdict that in consideration of the special disabilities of the province, we were entitled to a 'reasonable compensation' in addition to what we received from all other sources. Now, Mr. Speaker, those were the terms of the resolution passed by the provincial premiers, namely, that we were entitled to reasonable compensation. And what we hold now, what we have been pressing on our constituents during the recent campaign, is that the government of Canada, as at present constituted and then constituted, distinctly refused to enter into any calculation to ascertain what was a reasonable compensation. We were told that we must accept the frivolous sum awarded by that conference, and the government refused to make any calculations to ascertain whether it was reasonable or unreasonable. On the other hand, we have received from the leader of the Conservative party a distinct pledge that if he were placed in power he would refer our case to an independent tribunal to ascertain the amount to which we were entitled, and I appeal to any fair-minded man whether the leader of the Conservative party can be accused of bribing the province of British Columbia, whether he has not acted fairly towards the province and whether we would not have been unworthy of the support of our constituents if, having been turned down by the present government, we had not made the appeal of the leader of the opposition to put himself on record. Can any person in this House or out of it hold for one moment that a fair and distinct promise publicly made by the leader of a party upon a great public question like that, can be regarded as a bribe? I wish to refer for a moment to the extraordinary attitude taken by the minister representing British Columbia in the Cabinet. We were told by Mr. Templeman that the question of better terms was as dead as Julius Ceasar. Well Sir, our reply is the empty seat of the Minister of Inland Revenue. He it is who perhaps is as dead as Julius Ceasar, and were it not for the esteem in which the late member for Comox-Atlin is held bv his constituents, and deservedly held, as a gentleman who has been most diligent in looking after the affairs of his riding, the Minister of Inland Revenue would remain as dead as Julius Caesar. Whether or not he will have opposition, I have no information, but I say that if the Minister of Inland Revenue is resurrected, it will be solely because of the compassion of the electors of Comox-Atlin for that hon. gentleman, because they will not desire to see the undoubted sacrifice made in vain, which has been made by Mr. Sloan in retiring from this House.

Now I desire to say a few words bearing more directly upon some of the subjects mentioned in the speech from the Throne. I dissent from the position laid down by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that because he has been re-elected by his constituents, and because this government has been returned to power, he has a right to regard the charges made against himself and this government as having been disposed of. To my mind the minister and the rest of the members of the government still stand arraigned at the bar of public opinion, and must be judged by their action upon the report of Mr. Justice Cassels. In regard to the reference in the address to this report, I would remind you that in 1891 we had a similar condition of affairs in this House. We had a serious arraignment of the government of that day. We had a report presented exonerating a minister of guilty knowledge of irregularities in his department. But he resigned his portfolio, because he felt that he had not been sufficiently conversant with the operations of his department, and had not discovered the irregularities that the commission found to exist in it. We had an amendment to the Criminal Code at that day, introduced by the then Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson, providing certain punishment for offences of that nature. It seems curious that no steps have ever been taken, under the special clauses inserted in the Criminal Code by Sir John Thompson, to deal with offences by employees of the government against the government. I for one would have liked to have heard on this occasion how it is that there have been no prosecutions under these provisions, whether it is because Sir John Thompson was so poor a draftsman that he was not able to draft a section covering cases of this kind, a supposition which I do not think any one in this House will admit for a moment—or whether it is the benevolent intention of the government to absolve all the persons shown to be guilty of having used the money of this country for their private benefit, by passing an Act which shall not be retroactive but apply only to offences committed subsequent to its adoption. I think we should have some explanation why there have been no prosecutions, why matters in this respect have been allowed to drift.

Mr. Speaker, I have no more to add. I have to thank the House for the patience with which they have listened to me on this occasion, and to join in the hope expressed by my colleagues from British Columbia that on a more fitting occasion we shall have the subjects of more particular importance to our province brought before this House and discussed at greater length, so that we may have a thorough understanding as to the attitude of the government and as to what we may expect to be done for the advantage of British Columbia during the term of this parliament.

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron). Mr. Speaker, owing to indisposition I was unable to hear the first part of this debate. I have, however, read the speeches delivered on Friday and have heard the hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House to-day, and I wish to congratulate the province of British Columbia on the contingent which it has sent to represent it in this House. The hon. gentlemen who have preceded me have been discussing the yellow labour question. I wish for about ten minutes to discuss a white labour question, one which is very material to the interests of Canada and is of special personal interest to the members of this House. It is a question affecting labourers who, most of them will claim, are harder worked and less paid than any others on this continent; I refer to the labourers for the Dominion of Canada whom I see around me. I wish, Sir, to bring to your notice—and I do so without any political animus whatsoever, but simply for the good of Canada—the question of the length of the session. For eight long months, mostly within a year from now, the parliament of Canada was in session here. The question which I wish to ask is this: To what end did the legislation of those eight months tend? Did it tend to benefit the Dominion of Canada for the time spent? The opposition and the government were like two hostile fleets reconnoitering and manœuvering for one purpose only—to influence the impending general election; they were trying to get the weather gauge on each other; and I contend that if that session had lasted but three months, it would have served the general good of Canada quite as well as it did. I do not mean to say for one moment that one side is more obstructionist than the other. In what I am about to say I do not mean to reflect on the members from British Columbia who have spoken in this debate, because so far as I have heard or read their speeches, they have not conflicted with each other; there has been no tautology or reiteration in them. But the habit has been growing in this parliament that when a member from one of the smaller provinces makes a speech on a subject pertaining to that province, every other member from the province gets up and goes over the same ground. There should be some changes in our practice. We have drifted into a system of managing the public business that is very detrimental to the interests of the country. We take longer to do the business of the country than any other parliament on the face of the earth. I have looked into the matter, and I find that during the eight months this parliament was in session last year we passed 157 Bills. In the province of Quebec the legislature was in session one month and twenty-two days and passed 218 Bills. In the province of Ontario the legislature was in session two months and twenty days and passed 146 Bills. The imperial parliament at Westminster passes on an average between 200 and 300 Bills in a session shorter than ours. In the United States there are introduced into congress upwards of 15,000 Bills on the average every session, and upwards of 2,000 are passed. The sessions last an average of five months. I contend that we in this parliament have drifted unconsciously into a system of carrying on our parliamentary business which is not suitable to this country. We have adopted the poor rules and not the good rules of the parliament of Great Britain. Now, I do not for one moment advocate what is known as the closure and there is a misconception in the public mind that the Speaker in the British parliament has the power of closure. However, we must remember that the Speaker of the English House of Commons is an entirely different official from our Speaker here. In England the Speaker of the House of Commons is like a judge of the land, appointed for life, but here he is elected each parliament.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So he is in Great Britain.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, but in the British House the same Speaker is re-elected.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yes, the election is a mere convention.

Mr. LEWIS. The same gentleman is elected from parliament to parliament in England. Now, power could be given our Speaker to see that all reiterations were omitted, and as is done in England all questions could be answered in writing and published in 'Hansard,' and if there is anything objectionable in the answers it could be referred to later. Another thing that would tend to lessen the length of the sessions would be to insist that all speeches delivered in the House should be of original matter and in the hon. member's own words.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS. If he found it necessary to refer to documents the quotations could be handed into the 'Hansard' and the Deputy Speaker could act as reviser and strike out anything that might be objectionable in these quotations. That would materially shorten the session. As to the length of speeches, the hon. member who introduces a Bill should be allowed one hour and the gentleman who follows him should be allowed one hour also; the remaining speeches could be curtailed.

Mr. STAPLES. How are you going to justify the three and a half hour speech you made yourself.

Mr. LEWIS. I have seen the error of my ways and have reformed. And with reference to that particular speech, had I been allowed to hand in my quotations to 'Hansard' instead of reading them—and I may say that these quotations are being used to-day and were used last session by the government to found legislation upon—had I been allowed to publish them without reading them my speech on the transportation question would not have lasted over twenty minutes. There is an old proverb in the oil regions which might be applied to the speeches in this House, and that is that if a man who is making a speech cannot strike oil in 30 minutes he either has a very bad auger or he is boring in the wrong hole.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not only expressing my own opinion, but I am expressing the opinions of a great many people throughout this country. The greatest movements in the history of nations have arisen, not in the parliament itself but around the smithy fires, in the hotel waiting rooms, in the railway cars, and in the corner stores. I have a letter here which was written to me at the end of last session by a gentleman who lives at Snowflake, Manitoba, and who left my native town 15 years ago to seek fortune in the west. He is a strong Liberal and he wrote me that a bunch of them were gathered around the big stove in the store the other evening discussing the federal parliament, and the merchants, the commercial travellers, and the farmers there assembled had come to the conclusion that there was too much talk and ballyragging in the House of Commons and that if there was more common sense displayed there would be a better administration of the laws.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS. Another matter of considerable importance is the question of the health of the members of this House. I do not now refer to gentlemen who have been a number of years here and who have grown up on the foul atmosphere, but the figures which I have compiled show that the average number of deaths in the Canadian House of Commons is greater than in that pestilential climate where they are building the Panama canal. During the last ten years 39 members of this House of Commons have died in harness, which shows a higher average than the preceding 10 year period when the sessions were shorter. I leave it to hon. gentlemen who were here last parliament to agree with me that with the exception of some old veteran war horses, there is not a man who has sat for four years here who is not ten years older than he was four years ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, Mr. Speaker, we should certainly get through this session in three months. I had no intention when I rose to speak for more than ten minutes, but some of the hon. gentlemen who desire to come after me are anxious that I should continue until six o'clock.

Some Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to say, Sir, that the greatest speeches that the world has ever known lasted under one hour.

Mr. LENNOX. With the exception of yours.

Mr. LEWIS. Patrick Henry's famous oration lasted 22 minutes; Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speech on the South African question lasted 32 minutes; Sir John A. Macdonald's speech on Confederation lasted 35 minutes; Burke's great speech on the impeachment of Warren Hastings was 90 minutes; and Thomas D'Arcy McGee's famous address on 'the land we live in' only lasted eight minutes. The speech which gave Bryan the nomination for President of the United States, a speech which is described as the speech of 'the cross of gold,' lasted only 12 minutes. Last parliament I brought forward a number of Bills with reference to criminal matters, which I am glad to see the government have adopted in principle this session, and are about to crystallize into legislation This year I shall have the honour to submit to the House a Bill with reference to immigration, which I believe will be in the interests of Canada and the Empire. I notice a newspaper paragraph to the effect that the Salvation Army are bringing out to Canada this spring 8,000 immigrants. The army officials say that, owing to the fact of these immigrants all going to positions that have been secured for them they need not have the £5 demanded of ordinary immigrants.

I observe also a statement that the first batch of refugees from the awful calamity in Italy have left for New York and that 200,000 of them are coming to Canada. While we are willing to help these unfortunate people in their distress so far as lies in our power, we must not relax the vigilance with which we guard immigration into this country. I have in my possession a map prepared by the Immigration Department of the United States showing where the undesirables come from to that country, and it is exactly the spot where this awful calamity occurred. I object, from my place in this House, to the importation of men of that class or men of any class who are not able to go on the land and to pay their way to this Canada of ours.

While the town and the district from which I come have felt less than any other locality in Canada the distress of the last year, for every factory in my district has been working full time, and we have handled in my own town of Goderich ten million bushels of the 28,000,000 bushels of grain that passed through Canada and have to-day a manufacturing output second only to that of the city of London in Western Ontario, still we have ten times more paupers to care for, as they have in every town and city in Canada, than we had five years ago. It is time to stop such a condition and these men who come here ought to be in a position to go on the land.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GLEN CAMPBELL (Dauphin). Okemas, apitchi ne minuentum chi wabiminan ka abiun. I have, Mr. Speaker, congratulated you in the language of the aborigines of this country and I wish to follow that with my personal congratulations in the English language which you so well understand. I congratulate you on your election to be the first commoner of this great Dominion, and I believe that the Conservative party agree with me in that congratulation. They might have had some fault to find, Sir, with the method adopted by your government to elect you to be a representative on the floor of this House, but seeing that you were elected there is no man on that side of the House whom the Conservatives would sooner see fill the seat that you now occupy with so much grace. And while we congratulate you, I feel that we should also congratulate the First Minister on his choice of you for the position. He owed it as a matter of courtesy to the French race for the manner in which the French people of all Canada supported him. It is only to be expected from a politician such as the First Minister is, that he should have sufficient politesse to recognize what he owes to the people of his own race. And while I say that, I want to take exception to the charges that have been made by the Liberals throughout Canada, that the Conservative party has been raising the race cry. Speaking as a member from the west that is certainly a charge that does not lie against our people because we of the west have read and studied the history of Canada, and we have the same admiration for the men of the French race who have helped to build up our country that French Canadians have for them. We look on Champlain and Jacques Cartier and de la Verandrye and le Gardeur St. Pierre with as much veneration as any Frenchman can. We do not forget that the first missionary, the Rev. Father Messager was a Frenchman. We reverence him; we do not forget that in 1731 he sacrificed his life for his Christ and his religion in the western wilds. We do not forget these things; we venerate these Frenchmen as highly as men of their own race could. I deprecate the charges that are thrown in the teeth of the Conservative party, that we raise the race cry. I deplore it. But, Sir, the raising of this race cry is due to the fact that the Liberals, guided by their honoured leader, get out and say on the hustings at election times—more particularly in the west, I presume, because it is the west I know best —I deplore that the Liberals in the French parts of the different constituencies do not say: vote for the Liberal party, but their cry is: vote for Laurier because he is a Frenchman. That is the kind of thing that raises the race cry, and that is the kind of thing I deprecate. I am on my feet to-night, Mr. Speaker, not because I had any desire as a new member to speak, but because the right hon. the Prime Minister cast a slur on the Conservative government of my little province with regard to the preparation of the voters' lists in that province. I am speaking to-night for much the same reason as the hon. gentlemen from British Columbia have spoken, and spoken so well. These hon. gentlemen from the Pacific province have delivered a message to this House which must not be disregarded. I want to say, Sir, that I am absolutely in sympathy with them, and I am in sympathy with them for the reason that I am a protectionist. I believe in protecting our own people; I believe in protecting the white labourers and the white artisans, and more particularly the farmers because I am a farmer myself. I believe in creating such a condition of affairs in the west as well as in the east, that white labourers will get proper remuneration for the work they do. I believe in building up the Dominion and every province in the Dominion with white labour so that the white labourers and the white artisans who earn the money and who are generous spenders will create a local market in the populous centres for the produce of the farmers, from whose efforts results the wealth of this country. I am not going to follow that phase of the debate very much longer, further than to say that my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith) was perhaps right when he told the House that he was not an employer of labour, but he might have gone further and told the House that he was a representative of labour, that he was an employee of labour when he came to this House, and that he sold them and sold them for a price.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I would like to ask my hon. friend if I understood him to say that I sold the labour men for a price; is that what the hon. gentlemen said?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is going beyond parliamentary language.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If you decide that I should withdraw that expression——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is an imputation that should not be made against any hon. member of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I should be very pleased to comply with anything you say, Sir. And perhaps, Sir, at this stage of the game, coming, as I do, from the wild and woolly west, bred and born there and not up to the ways of the effete east, I shall have to put myself in your charge. I can promise you that as far as I can, I will conform to the ways of civilization, and will try not to make it necessary for you to call me to order, if you will promise me that you will not call me to order any oftener than you can help.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) will understand that the expression referred to ought to be withdrawn.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will withdraw the expression at your order, Mr. Speaker. Now, the matter which particularly brought me to my feet was the reference made by the Prime Minister to the fact that the Manitoba elections had gone against him and his government. I regret exceedingly that the Prime Minister is not in his seat, because I would like to have said what I have to say in his presence and in the presence of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) whom he designated as his authority for the statement he made to this House. The Prime Minister said that the reason, and the sole reason why the Manitoba elections had gone against his government was that the lists were most outrageous, and he quoted as his authority the hon. member for Brandon. But he qualified his quotation of that member as a reliable authority by saying that he thought he could give credence to the hon. member for Brandon. Were the Prime Minister in his seat, I would tell him that he has another thought coming, and I will explain to you, Mr. Speaker, why I say so. The Prime Minister said the lists were most outrageous. Were he here, I would ask him if he had ever read the Franchise Act of Manitoba. Had he read that Act, marked, learned and inwardly digested it, he could not have failed to see that, if lived up to, it was the fairest election law on the statute-book of any province of this Dominion. It is absolutely impartial. No appointee of the government has the right to put any name on the list, with the exception of the judges of Manitoba, who I understand, are appointed by the Dominion government. Any man, twenty-one years of age, a British subject, whether by naturalization or by birth, who has lived one year in the province of Manitoba and has lived three months in the constituency, can and must get his name on the list, if he goes and makes personal application. And there is no case—and I state this advisedly—that can be shown of any man, whether Grit or Tory, Independent, Socialist or anything else, who had the right to get his name on that list and who has taken the oath to that effect being kept off the list. These are the absolute facts, as I call all men to witness, and I defy even the hon. member for Brandon himself, and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy) who comes from Brandon, to deny what I am stating. I will prove it in this way. The 'Telegram,' which is supposedly a paper in the interest of the Conservative party in Manitoba, came out with a challenge. Let me read that part that pertains to this subject :

> Firm in this confidence, the 'Telegram' will pay $25 to any qualified elector, who, not being on the voters' list and applying in the regular manner, was refused the right to register in the last revision of the Manitoba voters' lists.

I am not calling any Conservative to prove this case, but I call on every Liberal in the province of Manitoba. I call on every Liberal member who sits here. For, had any Grit in the province of Manitoba known of any case, do you think he would not have tried to earn that $25 ? Would not the hon. member for Provencher, who had an election staring him in the face, have tried to earn that $25 to assist in paying his election expenses ? Even the hon. member for Brandon, who is reported to be a millionaire,—why, $25 would have gone a long way, I feel sure, to save his personal pocket in the cost of his election. And not only that, but it would have justified the stand that the Prime Minister took the other day when he said that he had been defeated by a list which was outrageous. If 'outrageous' in the dictionary of my right hon. friend means right, and proper, and honest, I agree with him. But if it means, what ordinary English dictionaries tell us it means, I cannot agree with him. If he said the lists were outré from the Liberal point of view, or from the point of view of the Liberal party heelers of Manitoba, I would agree with him, because from their experience, a straight list is something that they cannot comprehend.

May I digress to the extent of going back to the system followed by the Greenway government, the former Liberal government of Manitoba ? When the Greenway government were in power, they brought out one list which one of the most prominent Liberals in Manitoba characterized as a monstrosity of monstrosities. No Liberal can say that of our lists. I venture to say that in the little constituency that I have the honour to represent, where there are between 8,000 and 9,000 voters, not more than ten names had been left off the list that should have been put on, and these, I fancy, were left off by a typographical or clerical error. Besides, of the men whose names were so left off, the majority were supporters of mine. How different from the time of the Greenway government.

They had a Franchise Act and they appointed a partisan registration clerk. He took in the names that were handed to him by any Liberal, and the names that were handed to him by a Conservative were quietly shelved. They had petty lawyers as a rule—I say rule, because it was the rule that obtained in Dauphin—they had a petty lawyer from Winnipeg appointed as judge. I went to him with over 240 names—I am speaking from my own experience—names of my own supporters. I took them to the court of revision for the constituency of Dauphin, and Dauphin, remember, is one-third of the whole province of Manitoba, extending from one side of the province to the other. I went with him over that constituency and gave evidence, and got Liberals to give evidence. I did everything legitimate in the power of man to do to get these men on the list, and out of those 240 there was so few put on the list that it didn't matter much one way or the other. At every court of revision when I gave evidence or procured evidence in regard to any name I wanted on the list, this petty lawyer from Winnipeg who was appointed as a judge, this partisan Grit who was appointed by the Greenway government, would say: I will take this name to Avisandum. He took the list to Avisandum, and that person took it down to Winnipeg. I thought I had sufficient education to understand what Avisandum was, but I did not understand till afterwards that Avisandum meant Theodore Burrows in the city of Winnipeg, the Greenway candidate. That is the way things were manipulated under a Liberal government in our province, and I defy any man in all Canada to controvert successfully what I am saying. The result was that I went out into the election, a by-election at that—because the gentleman I have just mentioned never ran an election in his life till this last time—I went into that election and was counted out by two. And how was that majority of two procured? It was procured by stuffing the ballot box at Fisher river, where only eight men voted. Four of them voted for me, four voted for my opponent, and the others were found in the ballot box. Some of the men whose ballots were found in the box were visiting in England; two of them were visiting in the happy hunting grounds, above or below. Those were the methods, that was the style of education I had to learn in regard to politics. I have already mentioned the fact that I could call every Liberal in Manitoba as a witness to the truth of what I say with regard to the Manitoba Franchise Act. I have already mentioned the fact that I could call upon the ex-Minister of the Interior, the member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton), to deny the truth of what I say. He cannot deny it, because he knows it is true. The other members from Manitoba cannot deny it, because they know it is true. If any Liberal was disfranchised in Manitoba through the fault of the Conservative party in that province, he had a right to be. The challenge came out in the Conservative organ of Manitoba to get out like men and say: That is false and here is the evidence. And when they did not do that, it was time for them to sit down and for ever hold their peace.

I am glad, Sir, to see some reference in the speech from the Throne about the building of the Hudson Bay Railway, and I hope that the right hon. the First Minister, in sending out his survey parties, will carry out the promises made to the people of my constituency by the ex-Minister of the Interior, the member for Brandon, and the promises made by my opponent in the late election. Both of them had the Hudson Bay road surveyed to the house and doorstep of every farmer in my constituency, and I hope that the Prime Minister will see that his survey parties will carry out the promises made by these gentlemen on the public platform in Dauphin.

There is another matter I wish briefly to refer to, and that is the timber regulations that prevail in my locality and in the province of Manitoba. This is not a matter of national interest, but it is a matter that concerns deeply every man in the district I have the honour to represent. That is not a prairie country like most of the territory of Manitoba, it is a scrub country. A change was made some years ago in the inducements that had drawn most settlers into that country. These inducements were free timber in unlimited quantities. Settlers were induced to come in for the reason that timber was there in unlimited quantities, and it could be cut and used freely, and in any quantity desired by the settlers. Those were the regulations that obtained when settlement first came into Dauphin. Those regulations were changed lately, regulations that had been in force since 1896. At present a farmer can only take from the forest reserve to the amount of 10,000 feet per year, and the amount the farmer has to pay for that 10,000 feet is exactly double what he had to pay under the former regulations. Now, Sir, if a petition were sent round to the people of that district, there is not a man there who would not sign to have the regulations changed back to what they were before. I might go into this subject at greater length, but I do not wish to detain the House. I may add that when the new regulations went into force the reeve of the new municipality of Dauphin was a Liberal. He is now president of the Liberal Association of Dauphin. Two of the councillors moved a resolution praying that the regulations be changed back to what they were before. Copies of that resolution and that prayer were sent to the various municipalities throughout the province, and over 50 municipalities responded by signing that petition to the government of Canada to change back the regulations. Before I came here I had the pleasure of speaking to the Minister of the Interior on this matter. I told him that I did not desire to make political capital out of it, because I represent the great proportion of the honest Liberals of my constituency as well as all the Conservatives in my constituency. All I desire is fair play to the people in the locality from which I come. All I ask of the hon. Minister of the Interior is the privilege of discussing this matter with him for half an hour, and I know he will grant all I am asking. I have passed over—and I regret that I have—the reason that I might have given the right hon. the First Minister for the defeat of his party in the province from which I come. In the words of a dead language, they are 'multum in parvo.' One word very nearly describes the whole situation from the Manitoba point of view; that word is 'Siftonism.' It is a word that we had to coin. We were compelled to coin a word to describe properly the whole situation. It could perhaps be described in the words of the commission who made inquiry into the Department of Marine and Fisheries—found conscienceless, ineffective and without any regard for the public weal. That is what defeated in Manitoba the government of the right hon. the First Minister.

Before I sit down I want to refer for a moment to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Brodeur). He was like the rest of the ministers, in that when fault was found with the administration of his department, he laid the blame on some poor old Conservative hack. He did not blame himself for want of horse sense; he blamed some poor Conservative employee. That has been the history of the Department of the Interior. Some years ago the whole law of Canada was changed in the matter of the regulations with regard to the giving of timber to applicants—changed for a few months—changed by the then hon. Minister of the Interior, the present member for Brandon

(Mr. Sifton)—changed long enough to give fifty square miles of the best timber in the riding that I come from to his brother-in-law for a nominal sum—giving it away without any tender, simply as a gift from the people of Canada; a gift that lasts not for a few years only, but just as long as he likes to keep it; a gift which evidently, in the experience of the poor Ruthenian farmers who live in that neighbourhood, includes not only the timber, but the little hay which grows in the swamps; because last year the employees of this gentleman seized three or four tons of hay which had been put up within the bounds of that limit by a poor Ruthenian farmer who was trying to eke out a living in that neighbourhood. It is shameful, when you think of it, for the brother-in-law of the Minister of the Interior to get anything he asks in the way of timber at a dollar a thousand, and to have the law of Canada changed so that he can get it, and the farmers, who by the labour of their hands and the sweat of their brows are building up that western country, obliged to pay $3 a thousand and to take not more than 10,000 feet, and with no redress if any one else comes in and takes their stuff, while the Mounted Police of the Northwest Territories are brought down at public expense to conserve the interests of my late opponent, Mr. Burrows. Isn't it rotten, Mr. Speaker? There is no other word that I know of that can properly describe it.

I was speaking of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. His speech was very similar to the speeches made by my opponent in the campaign through which I passed lately. They were a whine from beginning to end. He was excusing himself all the way. The French axiom, 'Qui s'excuse s'accuse,' describes his position. I would give the hon. minister a pointer. I understand that he, or his department through him, has been spending during the past year public money on musical instruments in the way of fog-horns. These fog-horns, I understand, do not benefit any of the members on either side of the House with the exception perhaps of one. I would suggest, Sir, that he buy musical instruments that will be a benefit to most of the members of this House, such as megaphones and ear trumpets, so that the members on the back seats can hear what is said.

Motion (Mr. Todd) agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That the said address be engrossed and be presented to His Excellency the Governor by such members of this House as are of the honourable the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have a motion to present to the House which I hope will receive its unanimous assent. I move:

That Gilbert H. McIntyre, Esq., member for the electoral district of South Perth, be appointed Chairman of Committees of the Whole House.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs) moved :

That this House will on Thursday next resolve itself into a committee to consider the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When does the House anticipate that the estimates will be brought down and when may we expect the remaining volume of the Auditor General's Report ?

Mr. PATERSON. It is intended that the estimates will be brought down this week.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I understand that the Auditor General's Report is in the hands of the printer and will be ready in a few days.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. PATERSON moved :

That this House will on Thursday next resolve itself into a committee to consider the ways and means for raising the supplies to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to know whether or not there is any truth in the announcement in the press that a supplementary convention has been signed between Great Britain and France in respect to the confirming or modifying the convention which was drafted last year and ratified by us.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). The rumour is correct. I have had communication from Mr. Fielding to the effect that a new arrangement has been entered into with the French government; the only substantial change from the old treaty being as regards fat cattle and conditions for slaughter.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. CHAS. MURPHY (Secretary of State). As this motion calls for considerable detail, I would ask to let the question stand as a notice for motion for a return.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question will stand as a notice of motion for a return.

LANDS SOLD FOR GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC STATIONS, &c.

Mr. FOSTER—by Mr. Taylor (Leeds)—asked :

What lands, at what price, and to what persons or corporations have been sold along the route of the Grand Trunk Pacific for station, terminal or town site purposes?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). As the reply will be somewhat voluminous, I would ask that this question stand as a notice of motion for return.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question will stand as a notice of motion for a return.

SOUTH AFRICAN VOLUNTEERS SCRIP.

Mr. FOSTER—by Mr. Geo. Taylor—asked:

1. What number of scrip have been so far issued on account of South African Veterans' land grants, and what area of land do they cover?

2. Have any employees in any of the departments been, to the knowledge of the Government dealing in this scrip? If so, who, in what departments, and what action has been taken by the government in relation thereto?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior):

1. 3,767 South African bounty land certificates have been issued, covering an area of 1,205,440 acres.

2. Two officials of the Interior Department, Messrs. J. N. Ferguson and J. Anderson, were reported on the 11th November last to have entered into negotiations with certain volunteers to purchase their volunteer land certificates on behalf of friends. On inquiry being made it was found that in the case of Mr. Anderson he had undertaken to procure the certificate of Mr. George Morse, of Montreal, and in that of Mr. Ferguson the certificates of Mr. Frank H. Prior, of Toronto, and Mr. B. K. Snider, of Montreal. In explanation of their action they represented that they were not aware that in so doing they were violating the provisions of the law. The Dominion Lands Act provides that employees of the Department shall not locate scrip, but makes no provision against their purchasing bounty warrants. While the action of the officials was in fact within the letter of the law, it was considered to be so contrary to its spirit that both men were suspended for a month without pay, and notice was issued to all officials and employees that dealing in volunteer bounty warrants would be followed by instant dismissal.

4. If not, what addition and repairs, and at what cost in respect to the dredge and scows, respectively, have since been made or contracted for, and with whom?

10. Will the Minister lay on the table of the House the order in council authorizing the purchase and also the reports of the examining experts on which the purchase was based?

11. Have any other dredges been purchased since the end of the last session of parliament by the Department of Public Works? If so, from whom, at what price, whether by tender or otherwise, on whose special report, and what additions and repairs made since, and at what cost?

3. No, but dredge was in working condition.

4. No repairs to dredge, excepting new boiler to be installed by the Polson Iron Works Company, Limited, at a cost of $9,300. Contract, in the sum of $3,500, has been entered into with John Inglis Company for repairs to scow.

5. (a) Massena, N.Y.; (b) Delivered by the owners at Cornwall; from Cornwall she was taken by the government steamers 'Hercules' and 'Speedy' to Toronto.

9. No.

10. Yes.

11 and 12. No.

I assume this question not to refer to any dredges which are in process of being purchased, the purchase of which has not yet been completed. I mention this so there should not be any misunderstanding. My department has arranged for the purchase of a Fruhling dredge. The Fruhling dredge is manufactured in Germany and is peculiarly adapted for the dredging of silt, but the purchase is not to be made and no money is to be paid until the dredge is delivered in British Columbia, set up ready to work and after it has been tested for such time as shall be satisfactory to the engineers of my department. I therefore do not consider it to come within the question asked.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). A system of delivery of mail matter by letter carrier is provided whenever the population of a municipality reaches 12,000 and the gross postal revenue $20,000.

The department also provides for the delivery and collection of mail matter to persons residing in rural districts along and contiguous to the line of travel of any existing stage route of one mile and upwards in length, provided that such persons do not reside within one-quarter of a mile of the corporate limits of any city, town or village, and that they shall erect a box (approved of by the department) upon the roadside, to be located in such a manner as to be reached by the courier without dismounting from his vehicle or horse.

2. Is it anticipated that this convention will soon come into force? If so, when?

3. For what reason has France failed to approve the convention?

4. Is the delay or failure to approve the convention on the part of France due to any alleged inaccuracy or inexactitude of statement or representation on the part of Canadian representatives during the negotiations thereof?

2. What duty was it subject to?

3. Was this duty collected, and to what did it amount?

4. What quantity of raw wool, similar to wool produced in Canada, was imported into Canada during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1907?

5. What duty was it subject to?

6. Was this duty collected, and to what did it amount?

7. Was the duty to which raw wool imported into Canada is subject under the Act bona fide, imposed and collected in the fiscal year 1907?

8. The same information as above is asked as to the fiscal year 1908?

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs):

1. The raw wool imported in the fiscal years ending March 31, 1907 and 1908, is as follows:

Combing or lustre wools, dutiable—	9 months ending 1907.	12 months 1908.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. According to the classification of imports by customs officers at ports of entry, there was no raw wool imported subject to customs duty for the fiscal periods ending March 31, 1907, and March 31, 1908.

The raw wool which is subject to customs duty is described in the tariff as follows:

Wool, viz.: Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Southdown combing wools known as lustre wools and other like combing wools, such as are grown in Canada, per pound:

British preferential tariff..	2 cents.
Intermediate tariff..	2½ "

THE WOOLLEN INDUSTRY.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

1. How many woollen mills were there in Canada at the end of the fiscal year ending in 1896, and at the end of each subsequent year, and what was the annual output?

2. What quantity of Canadian wool was used by Canadian woollen mills in each of those years, and what was its value?

3. What quantities of foreign wool, similar to Canadian-grown wool, and what quantities of other foreign wool, tops, noils, waste, rags, and other raw material were imported into Canada for manufacturing purposes in each of these years, and their values?

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). With reference to the first question, the government have not got that information. The nearest I can give it to the hon. gentleman is what the Census Department have furnished me with from the census of 1901.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the hon. gentleman mean that that information is probably correct; I understand it is not.

Mr. PATERSON. I can only give what the official documents show. The hon. gentleman asks for each year, and of course that is not within our knowledge. The nearest I can give is the census of 1901. and then there was an intermediate census of the manufacturing industries of 1906. This is the information I have:

	Census 1901.	Census 1906.
	$11,307,440	$12,676,642

With reference to the third question——

Mr. LENNOX. What about the second question as to the quantity of Canadian wool used by Canadian woollen mills in each of these years and its value?

Mr. PATERSON. We have no means of ascertaining that. We could not tell that unless we had a return which would have to be voluntary on the part of the mill owners themselves and all we have to go by is the census. The answer to the third question is as follows:

—	Wool, combing or lustre wool, such as are grown in Canada, and worsted tops from such wool.		Wool, not further prepared than washed, N.O.P.		Noils and worsted tops, N.O.P.	Rags, all kinds, and waste except mineral.

The Customs Returns do not indicate whether these imports are all used for manufacturing purposes or not.

Mr. PATERSON.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

1. What is the number of manufacturers and manufacturing firms and companies in Canada?

JUDGE CASSELS' COMMISSION.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

1. Has the government instituted criminal proceedings against the persons shown by the Cassels commission to have defrauded the government? If not, why not?
2. Does the government propose to prosecute these persons? If so, when?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The government has not instituted criminal proceedings. The matter could not be looked into by the government until the report of Mr. Justice Cassels had been received.

DREDGING CONTRACT—ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

1. Has the government recovered or taken action to recover $39,933, of which the country was defrauded by the action of George McAvittie and C. S. Mayes in connection with a dredging contract? If not, why not?
2. Has the repayment of this money been demanded? If so, when and from whom? If not, why not?
3. Does the government propose to take action for recovery of this money? If so, when? If not, why not?
4. Has the government consulted with or taken the opinion of the Department of Justice as to its rights in the premises, and particularly as to the right of action for recovery of said money?

Mr. SPEAKER. The words in the second line which reads 'of which the country was defrauded,' appear in the question by an oversight and should not have been allowed. These words contain an allegation of fact. With these words stricken out the question may be put.

Mr. LENNOX. I will insert the word 'alleged' so that the question will read 'alleged to have been defrauded.'

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not the word 'alleged' in the question.

Mr. LENNOX. It can be considered as inserted.

Mr. SPEAKER. If these words are stricken out the question can be put.

Mr. LENNOX. Then the question would not have any meaning. If the question says 'alleged to have been defrauded' we would comply with your honour's suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the question may be allowed to stand until it has been drafted.

Mr. LENNOX. Let it stand.

2. On the 15th July, 1905, the select committee appointed to inquire into and report regarding the various telephone systems in Canada, presented a report submitting to the House the minutes of their proceedings with all evidence taken by them. Owing, however, to the voluminous nature of the evidence and the late period of the session the committee felt it impossible for them to come to any conclusions or make any recommendations to the House on the subject referred to them.

ADJOURNMENT—INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS TREATY.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the House adjourns, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he can inform us when we may expect that the recent treaty negotiated with the United States will be laid before us. As I understand, it is already before the Senate of the United States; if that is so, there seems to be no reason why it should not be laid on the table of this House. I recollect that last session we had rather a long delay during which a treaty was accessible to members of the Senate of the United States, but was not accessible to members of this parliament. I must confess that I do not understand why that should be the case. It may be that there is good reason for it, and I would like to know what the reason is.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand the reason is this: Under the American constitution, the treaty making power is vested in the President and Senate of the United States, and no treaty can come into force unless it has been ratified by the Senate and by the President. Under our constitution, the treaty comes into force on its ratification by His Majesty the King. The treaty is now on the ocean for the ratification of His Majesty, and perhaps I may be able to inform my hon. friend later whether we can lay it before the House before it has been ratified by His Majesty.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 9.30 p.m.

If so, what was the nature and character of such application or applications, communication or communications, proposal or proposals, and at what date were they respectively made or received, and if any such were in writing, will the government place a copy of the same respectively, upon the table of this House?

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE AND FISHERIES—PURCHASE OF SUPPLIES

Mr. FOSTER asked:

1. Are all supplies for the Marine and Fisheries Department and for the Public Works Department now being purchased on the basis of public tender, and advertised for in newspapers, irrespective of party leanings, and upon contracts made with the lowest tenderer in each case?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (for the Minister of Marine):

1. All material and supplies required for the Department of Marine and Fisheries are now purchased through the purchasing agent, who was appointed in May, 1908, without regard to the lists known as the patronage lists which were formally abolished on November 4.

With regard to the supplies required by the different agencies of the department for the present year, I may state that lists of all supplies have been prepared and tenders are being asked by public advertisement in the press. Tenders have been received for the supplies required for British Columbia, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and are now being considered.

For all such other articles required which exceed in value the sum of $5,000, advertisements are placed in the public press calling for tenders and the contract awarded to the tenderer offering the best terms.

Where the value of the articles does not exceed $5,000, the leading recognized dealers and merchants are supplied with a list of the department's requirements and requested to quote, and the order is paced with the firm offering the best terms.

This is the method adopted by all large railroad and industrial concerns.

The purchasing agent who was appointed in May has had a free hand to purchase all supplies not obtained by tender at the lowest obtainable prices.

Mr. FOSTER.—May I call my right hon. friend's attention to the fact that one portion of the question does not appear to have been answered—as to whether these public advertisements were inserted generally or specially. Are they inserted in newspapers irrespective of party leanings? Otherwise, it does not seem to me a perfectly public advertisement.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER—I cannot answer as to that. I give the answer as it is given to me from the Minister.

NEW WING OF HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. FOSTER. In reference to a question asked by me yesterday two portions of which were stated to have been answered by Mr. Speaker, one portion does not appear to have been answered. I would like to call the attention of the minister and Speaker to it. I wanted to know the number of employees that had been provided for in the new rooms.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think that information was handed in in the answer which I gave, and I think it appears in 'Hansard.' Has my hon. friend looked at 'Hansard'?

Mr. FOSTER. I was looking at 'Hansard.' If I find it I will let the minister know.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think the hon. gentleman will find it there; if not I will get it for him.

RECEPTION AND OPENING OF PUBLIC TENDERS.

Mr. J. D. REID moved:

That in the opinion of this House tenders received in any department of government should be immediately placed in safe custody under seal so as to prevent any possibility or suspicion of tampering; and should be opened in public at the time and place mentioned in the advertisement and in the presence of at least three principal officials of the department; and the persons so tendering or their duly authorized agents should be at liberty to attend at the said time and place and see such tenders opened and recorded, if they so desire.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). I was going to suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) that perhaps he will allow this motion to stand over, and, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the hon. member, I will read to the House a regulation which has been passed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, and which, I think, my hon. friend will see, upon consideration, completely meets the case. I may say that the regulation which has been passed is in accordance with what has been the rule in a number of departments, but it has been thought well to place it in the form of a regulation so that it will be applicable to all departments. I will read it to the House, it will appear in 'Hansard' and then it will be considered by my hon. friend and other members before the motion comes up for consideration. The regulation is as follows:

At the Government House at Ottawa,

Monday, January 18, 1909.

Present.

His Excellency
The Governor General in Council.

His Excellency the Governor General in Council is pleased to approve and doth hereby approve the following regulation in regard to the reception and opening of tenders for government works and supplies:

Where tenders are called for by any department of the government they shall be addressed to the officer of the department specified in the notice calling for tenders. In the notice it shall be specified that the tenders shall be under seal and endorsed 'Tender for .....,' specifying the work or supplies for which tenders are called. When received they shall be stamped by the official to whom addressed, with the day and hour of their receipt, and placed under lock and key until such time as it shall be found convenient for opening them.

They shall be opened in the presence of the minister of the department calling for tenders and one of the principal officials of the department, designated by the minister, or, in the absence of the minister, or in cases where it is not convenient for him to be present they shall be opened by two officials of the department to be designated by the minister. When opened each tender shall be initialled by both officials opening them.

Mr. J. D. REID. This had better stand for consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Very well.

Mr. J. D. REID.

He said: If that is unopposed I will move it.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). I would call attention to the general nature of the question. It says: prior to the general election of 1900, and of course that would embrace a great number of years. What does it mean?

Mr. LENNOX. It means from 1896.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is a very long period.

Mr. LENNOX. It will confine it to 1896.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think you can find it in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not think so.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Better let the question stand.

ADJOURNMENT—TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. With reference to the matter which I brought up yesterday, namely, the communication to this House of the treaty between His Majesty and the United States of America, I am perfectly familiar with what the Prime Minister stated, that treaties made by the United States government must have the ratification of the Senate. It was not in connection with that I desired to make my point. So far as I understand, a treaty made by the United States government becomes to all intents and purposes public property when it goes to the Senate. I may be mistaken in that. The Senate, I believe, does sometimes deal with treaties in secret session, when of course they are not matters of public property. I do not know how it may be in the present instance. What I object to is that the terms of this treaty should have been made the property of the people of the United States and of their legislature and should not at the same time have been made the property of the people of Canada and of this parliament. There may be diplomatic difficulties in the way, I do not know about that. All I desire to do is to emphasize, subect to any superior knowledge of those difficulties which the Prime Minister may have, my belief that that treaty, when placed before the Congress and the people of the United States, ought at the same time to be placed before the parliament and the people of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know that I have any other knowledge on this subject than is common to everybody. I am not prepared to controvert the statement made by my hon. friend, that the moment a treaty is submitted to the American Senate it becomes public property in the United States. My impression is—I speak subject to correction, and I would like to have the point cleared up between now and to-morrow—that the treaty is communicated to the Senate, but not to the House of Representatives. As to that, I will make inquiries. So far as we are concerned, my hon. friend knows that a treaty is not communicated to parliament unless and until it is ratified by the King. That is the etiquette of our system, and that is the only reason why this treaty has not been communicated to parliament. I know that there is a good deal of inconvenience felt on this side of the Atlantic for the very reason stated by my hon. friend. I believe that in the United States a treaty may be given to the press some time before it is given to the Senate. We do not admit anything of that kind in this country, as my hon. friend knows, and it is simply because in this matter we follow the traditions of British diplomacy, under which parliament does not receive the treaty until it has been signed by His Majesty the King. But I quite agree with my hon. friend that it is inconvenient that we should not have the matter made public in this country as soon as it is in the United States.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Of course, we are all quite familiar with the doctrine which the Prime Minister has laid down very correctly, that the treaty-making power under our constitutional usage resides in the King. But he may exercise that power by entering into a convention subject to the consent of the Imperial Parliament or the parliament of any great dependency of the empire. I think that course was pursued, if my memory serves me correctly, in the case of the French treaty. No doubt in that case another reason prevailed, namely, that the treaty could not become operative without an enactment of this parliament. But apart from that altogether, it might perhaps be desirable to consider whether or not a treaty such as that recently negotiated should not be framed in the same terms, especially when it is a treaty concluded between His Majesty on behalf of the Dominion of Canada and the people of the United States, whose treaties do not become valid and binding upon them until they have been ratified by the Senate. I do not know whether I make myself clear to my hon. friend. A treaty which we make with the United States is not valid or binding upon them until it is ratified by their Senate. It might be worth considering whether or not our treaties dealing with important subjects should not have a clause to the effect that they should not become binding on His Majesty until they have been ratified by the parliament of Canada. I hope my right hon. friend will take that into consideration. It seems to me that it might very well be taken into consideration, and it might possibly lead to a different mode of conducting these treaties than that which has prevailed in the past.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no exception to take to the suggestion made by my hon. friend. On the contrary, I am quite disposed to agree with everything he says. I would go further. Even admitting that the King alone has the treaty-making power, I see no reason why, the moment a treaty is signed by the parties who negotiated it, it should not be given to the public even before it is ratified by His Majesty. Although the present treaty has been signed, I may say we have not yet received an official copy of it.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Part I of report of Department of Trade and Commerce for fiscal year ending March 31, 1909.—Mr. Paterson.

2. What was paid under same heads during fiscal year 1907-8?
3. How many stations are there and what number of messages were sent for and received by the government during 1907-8?

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries):

1. Construction, $132,641.65, maintenance, $67,556.83. Total, $200,198.48.

ROOMS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR asked :

1. Outside of the Chamber of the House of Commons, the reading room and library, how many rooms are available in the parliament buildings for members of the House of Commons, including members of the administration and the staff of the House of Commons?
2. What is the total floor space of the said rooms?
3. By whom are the said rooms occupied, to whom have they been allotted, and what is the floor space of the rooms in question in each case?
4. Under whose direction has such allotment or arrangement been made, and when was it last made or revised?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). I would ask that this question might be allowed to stand. But while upon my feet, with the permission of the House, and with the permission of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), I would like to call attention to an answer to a similar question which he complained was not sufficient. I would say to my hon. friend that I have now the information which he desires ; and in doing so, I would point out to him that the question of which notice was given, asked how many cubic feet of space there were.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will read the question which immediately preceded his answer he will find that it was floor space. The mistake was made in the first insertion. I suppose my writing was so good that the clerk could not read it well.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was put cubic space in both cases, and that is what misled the officials of my department. I thought the question had been answered. But if my hon. friend says it was owing to his handwriting, which I thought was very good, I will cheerfully accept his statement. But the answer was in accordance with the question of which notice had been given. I have now the answer to the second part of the question :

b. 43 new rooms added in new building containing 18,320 sup. feet.

13 new rooms in old building containing 4,722 sup. feet.

c. 7 rooms eliminated containing 1,617 sup. feet.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY—ALLEGED OVER-CLASSIFICATION.

Mr. LENNOX asked :

1. What action has been taken by the government, the Transcontinental Railway Commission, and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, since April 28, 1908, to determine the questions then at issue between the company and the commission as to alleged over-classification, or to ascertain whether there had been over-classification upon the eastern division of the Transcontinental Railway, and the extent of such over-classification, if any, and with what result?
2. Have all differences between the company and the commission been adjusted? If so, how?
3. Who acted for the government or commission, and who for the company, in investigating and determining the matters aforesaid or in endeavouring to do so?
4. Under what provision of the contract, or statute relating to it was action taken?

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) :

1 and 3. Early in the month of May last the question of alleged over classification was submitted to the chief engineer of the Transcontinental Railway, and the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, arbitrators. They completed their work in the month of July and failed to agree. Whereupon the said engineers determined to choose a third arbitrator, and after several names had been submitted, no decision was reached until November, when Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, general consulting engineer to the government was chosen. Mr. Schreiber on the 21st of November consented to act, and the matter will be taken up as soon as conditions will permit.

2. No.

4. Under clause seven of the agreement of the 29th of July, 1903, between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific, chapter 71, 3 Edward VII.

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY.

Mr. ARMSTRONG — by Mr. Taylor — asked :

1. How many mail boxes for the rural districts has the government purchased and how many of said boxes have been delivered to the government?
2. Where were the rural mail boxes manufactured, and was the contract for them let by tender or private arrangement?
3. If let by tender, how many tenders were received, and what are the names of the tenderers and the price quoted in each?
4. Were any boxes for rural mail purposes manufactured in Canada? If so, how many, and what is the name of the manufacturer?

6. What is the price charged patrons for mail boxes in rural districts, and does said price cover cost paid by government to manufacturer and include duty, freight and delivery?
7. Have many boxes been paid for by patrons to January 1, 1909?
8. 10. What was the estimated increased cost to the government of the adoption of the Postmaster General's proposal, of September last, in which he agreed to furnish free mail delivery to people living on established mail and stage route?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General) :

1. 6,000 boxes.

2, 3 and 4. The boxes were obtained under an official arrangement from the International Mail Equipment Company, New York City.

5. The department has been advised by the Customs Department that the duty on these boxes and fittings will be at the rate of thirty per cent, but the Customs account for the same was only received at the department on 25th of January, and has not yet been paid.

6. $3, which covers cost paid to manufacturer, but does not include duty, freight and delivery.

7. 134.

8 and 9. See statement.

10. 25 per cent increase over present contract prices.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.
2. (a) L. L. Hutchinson, dated 22nd September, 1908, for 60 days, on a corner lot 60 by 90 feet, at $1,200; (b) Michael O'Neil, dated 6th October, 1908, for 60 days, on a corner lot about 32 by 181 feet, at $2,700; (c) Thos. Boyd, on a corner lot 42 by 100 feet, at $1,200; A. Jackel, on next lot, 24 by 100 feet, at $850; total on a corner lot, 66 by 100 feet, at $2,050; both dated 22nd September, 1908, for 60 days.

GARRISON COMMON—TORONTO.

Mr. MACDONELL asked:

1. When did the government agree to convey or transfer the property known as the Garrison Common Toronto, to the city of Toronto, or to the National Industrial Exhibition Association, Toronto?
2. What is the cause of the delay in making the said transfer?
3. Through what departments of the government has the matter to pass and in what department is the matter now delayed?
4. Have not repeated requests been received by the government from the city for the transfer?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence):

1. An order in council was passed on the 16th May, 1904, authorizing the sale of the Garrison Common property to the city of Toronto, under certain conditions. This was ratified by legislation passed during the last session of parliament.

2. The delay has been caused by the negotiations between the government and the city of Toronto as to the meaning of certain conditions of the order in council referred to and several other points connected with the sale. Negotiations are proceeding with the prospect of a satisfactory termination at an early date.

3. Through the Departments of Interior and Militia and Defence, which departments are acting in accord in the matter.

4. The city authorities have, on several occasions recently, requested the conveyance to be made.

TORONTO NEW BARRACKS.

Mr. MACDONELL asked:

1. When was the site for the erection of the new barracks on the Humber river, Toronto, purchased, or agreed to be purchased by the government?

2. What is the cause of the delay in commencing and proceeding with the erection?

3. When does the government intend to commence the said work and will the estimates to be brought down this session contain any appropriation therefor? If so, how much?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence):

1. Under the terms of the order in council of May 16, 1904, authorizing the sale of the Garrison Common to the city of Toronto, it was stipulated that the city should convey to the Crown, in part payment of the purchase price, a property known as the Baby Farm, as a site for the new barracks.

The city of Toronto has not as yet conveyed this property to the Crown pending the completion of the negotiations for the transfer to the city of the Garrison Common property.

2. The delay is in part caused by the fact that the exchange has not been made.

3. I am unable to answer.

PRINTING OF SESSIONAL STATUTES.

Mr. MACDONELL asked:

1. On what day did the last parliament prorogue?

2. On what day were the statutes of the last session of parliament printed for distribution to the public?

3. What is the reason for the great delay that usually intervenes between the end of each session, and the public distribution of the Acts passed thereat?

4. Is the government aware that the public, and more particularly the legal profession is greatly inconvenienced thereby?

5. Has the government received any complaints because of such delays?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Secretary of State):

1. July 20, 1908.

2. Both volumes of the statutes were delivered to the members of the government on December 14, 1908, and to the public on January 14, 1909. Separate copies of the Public Acts were issued on August 20, 1908, and of the Private Acts on September 20, 1908.

3. The statutes are yearly increasing in volume. Last year there were about twelve hundred pages or two hundred and sixty-eight pages more than the previous year.

NORTHWEST REBELLION, 1885—ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. MACDONELL asked:

1. Has the government under its consideration the matter of making grants of veteran's land to the members of the Northwest Mounted Police force who took part in the Riel or Northwest rebellion of 1885?

2. Did the members of the regular or permanent forces, who participated in the rebellion, receive veteran's grants? If so, what were the corps or forces, and what, approximately, was the number of such grants?

3. What would be the approximate number of grants now required to be made to members of the police force, if those who served in the rebellion were accorded the right to receive veteran grants?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister):

1. When the subjects of rewards for services during the Rebellion of 1885 was under consideration of the government of the day, a distinction was made between the Mounted Police, whose ordinary duties of maintaining law and order were within the limits of the disturbed districts, and the militia, who were called upon to leave their homes and occupations, at great personal inconvenience, resulting in many cases in serious embarrassment to themselves and families.

This distinction was marked by excluding the police from participation in the issue of scrip.

In 1893 the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories passed a resolution praying that the Dominion government would grant scrip to the Mounted Police, and on several occasions members have asked questions in the House. The reply has always been adverse to reconsideration.

2. We have no information, but probably about 700. The Minister of Militia will answer the second part of this question.

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). The answer to the second question is:

2. (a) Yes.

2. For what purpose was the money expended?

3. What depth of water is there at this wharf at low and high tide?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works) :

1 and 2. The sum of $533.01 was expended, in October, 1907, by the Department of Public Works in constructing an approach to the site of the proposed wharf, petitioned for by the inhabitants to serve as a landing for sea manure and to aid them in the industry of gathering oysters, which are abundant in this bay.

3. The wharf will carry a depth of 5 feet at high water and will be dry at low water.

3. Does the government not think that the legislation respecting graving docks may retard the progress of the City of Quebec?

4. Is it the intention of the government to build at Lévis or Quebec a new graving dock or a large floating dry dock, of dimensions sufficiently large to receive not only our largest ships now afloat, but also the largest ships which may soon come to Quebec?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works) :

1 and 2. Yes.

3. No. On the contrary, it was expected that the amending legislation passed at the last session to encourage the construction of dry docks would be sufficient to enable a company to procure the necessary capital to construct a large graving dock upon the St. Lawrence.

4. Sufficiently answered by the reply to No. 3.

Is it the intention of the government to add, during this session to the present portfolios that of Minister of Labour, as a separate and distinct branch of the admisistration?

2. Is the government aware that the Japan 'Weekly Chronicle' in its articles declares,

Mr. Preston is really outrageous in his statements and insinuations against foreign merchants,' and further states, 'it would be well perhaps if his government recalls him before he does any further harm to his reputation,' and it further states. 'Mr. Preston is again busily at work endeavouring to foment a feeling of animosity amongst Japanese against the resident foreigner'?

3. Has the government taken any action? If so, what?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister):

1. The department has received a communication from the Kobe Board of Trade, but not from the Kehoe Board of Trade.

Mr. J. D. REID. It was Kobe in my question.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. 2. No.

3. No.

OPENING OF GOVERNMENT TENDERS.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville) moved:

That in the opinion of this House tenders received in any department of government should be immediately placed in safe custody under seal so as to prevent any possibility or suspicion of tampering; and should be opened in public at the time and place mentioned in the advertisement and in the presence of at least three principal officials of the department; and the persons so tendering or their duly authorized agents should be at liberty to attend at the said time and place and see such tenders opened and recorded, if they so desire.

He said : Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with this notice of motion, let me say that I believe it is the desire of every member of this House that this session should be got through with at as early a date as it reasonably can be. I believe that will depend entirely on the way the government proceed with their business. Yesterday I felt very badly indeed that this House was compelled to adjourn at 3.50 p.m. I believe that if the government had brought down some of those measures that are mentioned in the speech from the Throne, or if they had had some of their business ready and had proceeded immediately after we were through with the notices of motion, it would have helped to shorten the session. But, I find that in the speech from the Throne there are some measures mentioned that we have not yet had notice of on the Order Paper, amongst them being Bills that are really not party measures, but which will require careful examination. I refer more particularly to the Insurance Bill. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister Sir Wilfrid Laurier may say that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is away from this country, and that we may have to wait until he returns. But, this Bill must be printed and ready to be submitted to the House, and I cannot see any reason why it should not have been introduced the day following the opening of the session, printed and distributed among the members in order that we might be in a position to discuss it at the proper time. Again, to-day, I find on the Order Paper, five or six Bills that the government are introducing; yet they are not prepared to move their introduction today in order to get them printed and distributed among the members. I hope and trust that the government will proceed with these Bills, and that instead of adjourning, as we did yesterday when the House had been in session only forty or fifty minutes, they will be prepared to go on with these Bills, so that we may get through with the government measures at the earliest possible moment, and try, if possible, to get away before the warm weather sets in.

This is exactly the same motion that I put on the Order Paper last year. I have not changed it in any respect. Last year the Prime Minister objected to the last part of my motion, which reads as follows:

And—

The tenders

—should be opened in public at the time and place mentioned in the advertisement and in the presence of at least three principal officials of the departments, and the persons so tendering or their duly authorized agents should be at liberty to attend at the said time and place and see such tenders opened and recorded, if they so desire.

The Prime Minister wished to consult with some of the officials and see how this would work, the result of that investigation, in so far as I understand, is embodied in this regulation that has been approved by the Governor in Council and was submitted to the House by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) yesterday. As far as I can see there is no difference between this regulation and the practice that has been carried on by the government for a number of years. In the first place I do not see that there is any difference in the first part of this regulation, in which it states that all tenders are to be addressed to the official of the department who signs the call for tenders, and that they are to be kept by him in a safe place until opened.

In addition to that, the Minister of Public Works has now made it a regulation for all the departments that tenders must be opened in the presence of the minister of the department calling for tenders and one of the principal officials of the department designated by the minister, or, in the absence of the minister, or in cases where it it not convenient for him to be present, they shall be opened by two officials of the department to be designated by the minister. So far as that is concerned, it would be convenient for the minister, if he desired to help any of his friends, not to be present when the tenders were opened. We had a case before the Public Accounts Committee in which there was a grave doubt as to whether the tenders produced were the genuine tenders as sent in. They may have been all right, yet it turned out that the tenders were opened by the commissioner and his stenographer. The minister may designate his private secretary and the private secretary's stenographer to open the tenders, which practically leaves the matter in the hands of one individual. According to this regulation, it seems that the government are bound to adhere to the system of the minister and any one of his officials that he desires opening the tenders. I do not wish to throw any doubt on the minister in charge, but I feel that it would be much more satisfactory, and in the interest of the minister, if he were to have the tenders opened by three of his principal officials without himself being mixed up in the matter at all. For some reason or other the government will not accept that part of my motion ; perhaps they will say why. I cannot understand either why the government object to the tenders being opened in public. For the benefit of the new members I may say that last year I gave instances of the way tenders are opened in, I believe, the majority of cases in the United States. As samples, I will read from two advertisements which I have taken from a United States paper. Here is one :

Notice to Contractors.—Sealed proposals indorsed 'Proposals for Switchboard and Feeder Cables, Motors and Interior Wiring for Four Staff Residences,' at the New York State Agricultural Experiment Station, Geneva, New York, will be received by L. P. Haviland, Chairman of the Building Committee, New York State Agricultural Experiment Station, Geneva, New York, up to ten o'clock a.m. on the 18th day of January, 1908, when the bids will be opened and read publicly. Proposal shall be accompanied by certified cheque in the sum of $200, and the contractor to whom the award is made will be required to furnish surety company's bond in the sum of $1,500. The right is reserved to reject any and all bids.

Here is another :

Sealed bids or proposals will be received by the Acqueduct Commissioners on Tuesday, January 12, 1909, at which place and hour the bids will be publicly opened and read.

After the tenders have been opened, any member of this House can obtain them on a motion for papers, and therefore I cannot see why the officials who open them should not open them in public or read out the names of the tenders and their prices. This does not oblige the government to accept the lowest tender, if good and sufficient reasons can be given for not doing so. As the tenders are for public works in which the whole public are interested, I think it is the duty of any government to give the public all the information it can to show that it is doing what is right and proper and in the interest of the people. I have no desire to make this a party matter. I am making this suggestion entirely in the interest of the public. For years it has been the policy of the government—I do not say this government or its predecessors—to ask for tenders in two different ways. For large amounts they have advertised for tenders in the newspapers, and for smaller amounts they have simply written letters to half a dozen of their friends throughout the country, asking for prices for what they require. I claim that that is unfair to the people. I contend that everything over a certain amount, say $2,000, should be made a matter of public tender, by advertisement in the newspapers ; and if the tenders are opened in public, I am satisfied that an enormous amount of money will be saved to the people. Moreover, that will give the people of this country confidence in the ministers administering their departments. I simply appeal again to the government this year to accept this resolution. Also because we have a new House. We have now 80 or 90 members who were not here last year, and I ask them to consider this matter, not in a party spirit, but in the public interest. My proposition that the tender should be opened in the presence of the persons tendering, should they desire to be present, is a fair one. It acts well on the other side of the line and there is no reason why it should not act well on this side. At all events there can be no harm in giving it a trial for a year or so and see the results. For those reasons I beg leave to move the resolution which, Mr. Speaker, I have put, in your hands.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). I am sure that no member on this side of the House can yield anything to my hon. friend in his desire that, in the opening of tenders, every possible precaution should be taken to safeguard the public interest. As my hon. friend has said, the practice in the past has been to put tenders under lock and key, as soon as received, so that there could be no reasonable possibility of their being tampered with. The practice also has been to have the tenders opened by officials of the department and the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer unless there were some good reasons—such as his failure to give satisfaction in previous contracts or his financial inability—for submitting the matter to the Governor in Council for consideration as to whether or not the lowest tender was the best offer. As there has been some consideration given the question of the reception of tenders, both on the part of members of the opposition and members supporting the government, as well as by the government themselves, it was thought well to frame a new regulation which would lay down a rule applicable to all the departments. In doing this the government had to take into consideration the circumstances, more especially in regard to the Intercolonial Railway, whose head working office is at Moncton where tenders for supplies of various kinds are necessarily received. Had it not been for the fact that in the past it has always been considered desirable that tenders for supplies for the Intercolonial Railway should be received at Moncton, the rule would have been adopted that in every case tenders should be opened in the presence of the minister and his deputy or, in case of the unavoidable absence of the minister, then by the principal official of his department; but in the case of tenders received at Moncton it would not be possible for the minister to be present.

Mr. J. D. REID. They could be opened by the officials.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, they could be opened by three officials if there be any magic in having three instead of two. Had the regulation said three, by hon. friend would have said four.

Mr. J. D. REID. Two could open them at Moncton even according to your regulation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let me read the regulations and ask hon. members if they do not think it is sufficient to safeguard the public interest;—

Where tenders are called for by any department of the government, they shall be addressed to the officer of the department specified in the notice calling for tenders. The notice should say specially that the tenders shall be under seal and indorsed: 'tender for such and such work and supplies.' When received the tenders shall be stamped by the official to whom addressed, with the date and hour of receipt, and placed under lock and key until the day appointed for opening them. They shall be opened in the presence of the minister of the department calling for tenders and one of the principal officers of the department designated by the minister or, in the absence of the minister, in cases where it is not convenient for him to be present they shall be opened by two officials of the department designated by the minister. When opened they shall be initialled by both officers opening them. In all cases where the minister can reasonably be present, he must take part in the opening of the tenders and there must be one of the principal officers of the department present. And in every case the tenders, when opened, must be initialled both by the minister and his deputy. In cases where the minister cannot be present then it will be necessary for him to provide some official to take his place and he shall designate the official.

Mr. LANCASTER. What virtue is there in the minister being present ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The minister has the responsibility of his department and it is his duty to see what the tenders are when they are opened. I would hesitate to cast off the responsibility which the duties of my office place upon me, and throw that entirely upon one of my officials. It does seem to me that in providing that the minister shall be present and that the deputy minister—who occupies a position of great responsibility and almost complete independence—should take part in the opening of the tenders, we have a reasonable safeguard.

Mr. CROCKET. Does the minister think that my hon. friend's resolution would do away with the reception of tenders at Moncton for Intercolonial Railway supplies?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No; it does not, and that is the reason why the regulation provides that, where it is not convenient for this course to be adopted, the minister may designate two officials, and that provision is intended to apply to tenders received at Moncton. It seems to me that the only material provision in the motion which is not in the regulation is that all tenders shall be opened in the presence of the persons tendering. In other words that before the tenders are opened, notice shall be given all contractors so that they shall be present.

Mr. J. D. REID. I say that they may be present if they so desire.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then they must be notified of the time and place for opening the tenders.

Mr. J. D. REID. You can put that in the advertisement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The advertisement states that tenders will be received up to a certain day and hour.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. And opened on a certain day and at a certain hour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, the notice does not say that.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster). It could say it and ought to.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The motion provides that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Of course I understand that in order to carry out the idea of my hon. friend it would be necessary to give to the tenderers some notice so that they could be present when the tenders were opened. Apart from the inconvenience of that course, it is not desirable in the public interest that the public or the contractors should be present at the opening of tenders. My hon. friend has said that this course is adopted in the United States. His argument would have been stronger if he had been able to show that in any British country, in Great Britain or in any province of Canada, such a course had been adopted. My hon. friend knows that the course which has been pursued during the last ten years is the course which has been pursued during the whole 41 years of confederation.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend must be aware that the public have never been asked to be present at the opening of tenders in connection with any of the departments of this government since confederation.

Mr. J. D. REID. From the investigations that have taken place it would seem to be necessary.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will discuss that in a few moments with my hon. friend. My hon. friend has not been able to show that in Canada or in any province of Canada which has been under the control of either Liberals or Conservatives, it has ever been found desirable to adopt the course which he suggests, and it is a fair argument to raise before we entirely change the policy established in respect to both Dominion and provincial contracts, that my hon. friend has not been able to show either in the very full investigations which have taken place before the Public Accounts Committee or in any other place that any minister of the Crown or any official of the Crown who has taken part with him in the opening of tenders has been untrue to the trust reposed in him by tampering with the tenders.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the timber limits ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It has not been shown either in respect to tenders for timber limits or for lands of any kind or in respect to contracts for public works, that a minister or an official selected by him to be present at the opening of tenders has ever acted except in the public interest in the awarding of contracts. Take my own department. I shall take no credit for what I am about to say, but the rule is, and so far as I am able to learn it has always been strictly adhered to, that the tenders are received by the proper official, kept under seal, opened at the proper time and the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. By whom ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. By the minister and the deputy minister. Of course the minister does the actual awarding of the contracts and then the matter goes to council in the ordinary way. I do not pretend to say that in that respect we are any better than our predecessors, but I have never heard that under Conservative or Liberal rule anything has been done under the present system of receiving tenders by which the public has suffered and it would be a reflection it seems to me, and a very severe reflection upon the members of the government if the House were to hesitate to express its approval of the regulation which has been adopted. Before passing this regulation, very careful consideration was given to the matter, more especially by the Prime Minister and by the heads of the departments receiving the greater number of tenders and we were of the opinion that it would not be in the public interest to have the contractors present. It very often happens that there are two tenders for nearly equal amounts, and the next tender might be for an amount considerably greater than the amount of the two lowest tenders. If the tenders were opened in the presence of these contractors, they would see what the lowest tenders were and they would see that the next highest tender was perhaps a good many thousand dollars higher. They might easily put their heads together, have the lowest tenders withdraw, forfeiting their deposits, and thereby the minister would be compelled either to award the contract to the next lowest tenderer or to call for new tenders. Since I have been a minister I have seen some surprising differences in the amounts of tenders submitted for various public works. There was one case not long ago in which tenders were called for the erection of a public building in a western city in which one of the tenders was very nearly 100 per cent higher than the lowest.

Mr. HUGHES. Issued by the same man?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, not issued by the same man but by independent tenderers, who apparently had nothing whatever to do with each other, and if I had the tenders here I could cite numerous instances in which there has been a difference of many thousands of dollars between one or two of the lowest tenderers and some of those who might be called the higher tenderers. I have not sufficient faith in human nature not to believe that when such a convenient opportunity was presented the contractors would in many instances combine together, have the lowest tenders withdrawn and thus compel the department to accept a very much higher tender or else invite new tenders, which would not be in the public interest. I think it much better to allow the officers of the department to deal with the tenders as it is ordinarily done, awarding the contract to the lowest tenderer, issuing an acceptance of the tender and taking the necessary steps for the entering into the contract so as to have the lowest tenderer bound before the public and the other contractors are made acquainted with the different tenders which have been received.

It does not seem to me that my hon. friend has shown to the House any good reason for making such a radical departure from the practice which has been so long pursued without any objection, without any loss to the public, without any wrongdoing, so far as the public records show, or so far as my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid) has been able to inform the House. I think the onus is upon my hon. friend of showing reasons which he has not adduced to the House before he asks us to enter upon such a radical departure. Therefore I feel it my duty to oppose the motion which my hon. friend has submitted.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker. The principle which we are called upon to consecrate, appears to me to be a very important one, and I was surprised to hear the defence which has just fallen from the lips of my hon, friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) in regard to the regulation adopted by the government. That regulation, so far as I can see, does not meet the exigencies of the case at all. There is one thing absolutely certain, and that is a very general impression throughout the country, that there is something unfair in the manner in which tenders for contracts with the government are dealt with. There is not a man in any province of the Dominion, outside perhaps a limited circle of active politicians, who, if he were asked if public works in Canada were tendered for in a regular manner and awarded to the lowest tenderer, circumstances being equal, would not burst out laughing in your face. That is the general impression. That general impression, I would add, prevents a great number of the very best class of contractors from tendering. There are men who are eminently capable of executing our public works at a reasonable price, and would be content with a fair and just profit, who abstain from tendering because they share that general impression that it is absolutely useless to tender unless you have some pull with those who dispose of the contracts. There is no doubt about that whatever. There is not a member of this House who has not been able to satisfy himself of the existence of that widespread impression. Is it not necessary that we should dispel that impression? Does not this proposed resolution have for its purpose to dispel that impression, and to provide for the tendering and awarding of contracts under the safest possible circumstances, without in any way interfering with the exercise of the judgment of the responsible minister? I say it does. What does the regulation provide for? It says that when tenders are received they will be put under lock and key. But that is not a safeguard of much importance. The very worst frauds perpetrated in regard to tenders have been effected when the tenders were put under lock and key. This resolution provides for something totally different. Tenders have to be sealed and put away; the moment they are sealed and put away they cannot be touched until the authority who has to decide who will get the contract, is in a position to pronounce. It seems to me there is a great deal of difference between the two provisions.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), twice, three times, more than four times, repeated the assertion that since confederation, neither in the federal or the provincial sphere, had anybody every heard of any contract or any tender being improperly handled. Now that was the statement of my hon. friend; and coming from a gentleman of his vast experience, four times repeated, I must say it surprised me not a little. While I do not attempt to give instances, I appeal to the experience of those who have been in politics for some time, no matter which party ruled, whether they have not heard of irregularities in the awarding of contracts and the handling of tenders. There is no doubt that there has been in this country, federally, provincially and municipally, a crying abuse in this respect. That abuse exists to-day. In order to dispel the general impression I refer to, and to convince the public at large that that system is going to be done away with, so far as we can do it, seems to me this resolution is necessary, and would cure a very grave situation indeed. Then again, Mr. Speaker, is it not inportant, does it not carry out the idea that we hear expressed every day on the street, that the tenderers themselves, more than that, the public, but particularly the tenderers, should be able to be present when the tenders are opened? They have not a voice in the decision, that is done privately on the responsibility of the minister. But what could contribute to make the opening of tenders, the recording of these tenders, more effective, more authentic, so that no doubt could exist, than the right of the public, convened under the advertisement which invited tenderers, to be present, and for the tenderers themselves, whose interests after all deserve some consideration, who have gone to some trouble in making calculations and financial arrangements, to be present when these tenders are opened, in order that all may know what those tenders are? My hon. friend has supposed an extreme case, where there may be some low tenderers and some higher, and the lower ones might be eliminated, and, if you please, their deposit forfeited, in order that the highest tenderer should remain. I would be prepared to say that for my part I would take the risk, and we are all prepared to take the risk, of such an improbable possibility. As regards Great Britain, the mover of this resolution has shown that the custom is carried out. It is very generally carried out in the United States. But every one knows that in England the greatest publicity surrounds the opening of tenders for all public works. In England, as I have stated time and again, in this House, all supplies wanted by the government are invited by tender, the greatest publicity is given to the tenders received, and I am perfectly convinced that if we refer to the regulations which govern the awarding of tenders followed by the government in England, we will see that there is just the same publicity that we advocate here.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think not.

Mr. MONK. I believe so. At any rate. I am prepared to establish that there is a very different publicity in England surrounding the giving of contracts than what we find here. But we are not dealing with England, we are dealing with our own country, and with conditions that we know to exist here; we are dealing with an impression firmly established in the entire nation that irregularities exist in regard to tenders and contracts. You cannot meet a contractor on the street, you cannot meet a man who takes any interest in public matters, who, if you put to him the question, will not answer : Why, everybody knows that this is a matter of favour. That is the impression. How can we efface it? By providing such a rule as this, and I have shown why I think it is important that such a rule should be adopted. We are endeavouring to reform our public service, we are endeavouring to improve the administration generally. This is a crucial matter, and I have great pleasure in supporting the proposed resolution.

Mr. H. GUTHRIE (South Wellington). If I might offer a word or two on the resolution, I would say that, judging from the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Monk), his complaint, if he has one, against the regulation which has just been made by order in council in respect to the opening of tenders, is that greater publicity is not given in the first place, and in the second place, that there is some suspicion throughout the country of wrong-doing in regard to the system of dealing with tenders. I point out in the first place that whether sufficient publicity is given or not by way of advertisement, the motion of my hon. friend does not deal with that question. His motion deals only with the question of opening tenders. The only distinction, as far as I can see, between the regulation passed by order in council and the motion of my hon. friend is that the latter requires the presence of one more person when the tenders are opened than is called for in the regulation, and he gives to the tenderer the opportunity of being present when the tenders are opened. I deny that there is any very general misunderstanding or any very great suspicion throughout the country in regard to the manner in which the government deals with tenders, but I say that if any suspicion does exist it exists solely and only on account of the charges which were made in this House during the last two or three sessions, by hon. members opposite and in each case disapproved. Time and time again charges were made that tenders, in regard to timber in particular, were not fairly dealt with.

An hon. MEMBER. Insinuations.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Insinuations were made from day to day, investigation took place and in some of the investigations which did take place hon. members opposite, seeing the position in which they had landed themselves, had not even the courtesy or grace to continue the investigations to the conclusion to give officials against whom they had made insinuations an opportunity of clearing themselves. No charge has been established, though many charges were made, and if hon. gentlemen have induced the public to believe that there is wrong-doing in regard to the tendering system of Canada they should go the whole length and establish some of the wrong-doing. I am satisfied for my part that the regulation which has been passed in regard to tenders meets the case fairly and very fully. It provides for the presence of the minister and of one other chief official of the department when tenders are opened. My hon. friend's motion provides for another man. If two are not sufficient, would three be any better? Why not four; why not five? Surely we must trust somebody in the conduct of public business, and if two high officials, or the minister and another high official of any department are entrusted with the duty of opening tenders, this House and, I think, this country will have confidence in their doing right on each occasion. There has never, in so far as I know, been a charge made that any tender has been tampered with. Tenders, when received, have been kept secretly and sacredly and the order in council provides that they shall be addressed to the proper officer of the department and that they shall be marked tenders for such and such work or for such and such supplies and that:

When received they shall be stamped by the official to whom addressed with the day and hour of their receipt, and placed under lock and key until such time as it shall be found convenient for opening them.

I do not see any greater safeguard you can have unless there is so great a suspicion in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite that they will not trust two high officials of the department. For my part I think that the end will be served by the provision as contained in the order in council, and without discussing the question which has been so well answered by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, as to whether or not the parties tendering should be present when tenders are opened, I beg to move as an amendment to the motion:

That all the words after 'that' be eliminated from the proposed motion and that the following be substituted therefor: The method of inviting, opening and considering tenders, as embodied in the order in council of January 18, 1909, is in the opinion of this House, a proper safeguard of the public interests.

Hon. JOHN G. HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, the question of opening tenders is a moot one in this House and has been again and again brought up for discussion. The objection to the plan of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) as embodied in the order in council, I intend to deal with, and I also propose to say something with regard to some of the remarks of the hon. mover of the amendment to the resolution. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) seems to think that we ought to make a statement of some wrongs or frauds that have been perpetrated and prove them before we can introduce a resolution. Is it not sufficient to show that it is possible that a wrong may be done under the present system and if a remedy can be applied, is it not our duty to apply it? The minister proposes in the regulations that these tenders shall be opened by the minister and one of the officials of the department. It may be his private secretary. To my mind it is a most objectionable system for the minister to open tenders at all.

Under the constitution he has a right to superintend his department and if the regulations provide that a couple of officials shall open tenders, he can be there if he likes to see that the work is properly performed without an order in council or anything of the kind. What has been the system hitherto with regard to the opening of tenders? I presided over the Department of Railways and Canals for a number of years. The tenders were received, sealed and put into the safe. A certain time was provided at which they should be opened. They were opened by two of the officials named in the department for that purpose; that is to-day, the deputy head and the secretary of the department. If there was anything wrong in reference to the tenders, as to the time of their having been received, as to the amounts not totalling up, as to there being mistakes made or anything else, it was the duty of these two officials to report in writing to the minister and the minister was to be guided by the facts in reference to whether one tender or another should be accepted. In reference to the tenders down at Moncton, as my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid) has stated, the system adopted by the British government is similar to that which we had in Moncton. There was a book provided in which the name of everything required from a box of tacks to a paint brush or an anchor was mentioned. This was sent broadcast from one end of the British empire to the other, and tenders were invited for the supply of these particular articles. These tenders were received and were awarded in every case to the lowest tenderer. If there was a difference as to the quality of the article which it was proposed to supply it was left to an outside technical department to determine whether one article was better than the other. A number of parties were asked to tender for a particular kind of work or a particular article. There was a list prepared. There was no difficulty at all about getting on the list; anybody could get on the list. Any responsible party who had the selling of these particular goods in the maritime provinces or in the province of Quebec could be put on the list. He tendered for a particular article. If one party was the lowest and the contract was awarded to that party by the officials at Moncton the officials had to give the reason for their action to the department here, the awarding of the contract had to be approved by the head of the department and a contract never was given until a sample of the article was sent to the technical branch of McGill College in Montreal for examination. In this way, for instance, we would determine the quality of oil, or of steel. Then, on the report of the technical branch of McGill College the contract was awarded. In no case, when I was at the head of the department, was a contract awarded in any other way, and in no case were tenders received privately for any work or orders given privately for any material. Everything was done by contract. The minister (Mr. Pugsley) objects to the public being parties to this——

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend let me ask him a question ? I have been very much interested in the course which he says was pursued in the Railway Department, and unless the hon. gentleman informs me to the contrary I presume the same course is being pursued up to the present time, but will my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) tell me, if, during his day, the contractors were ever notified to be present at the opening of the tenders.

Mr. HAGGART. I shall deal with that. I do not know what the system is at the present day, but I know what it was in my day and I can state that except for a few trivial works on the St. Lawrence canals where it was impossible to give the work by contract, everything even to a paint brush was purchased by open competition while I was minister.

Mr. J. D. REID. It was done on the canals then too.

Mr. HAGGART. That is the only course that should be pursued, and it is the course which the law requires this government to pursue but they evade what is embodied in the law. The Minister of Public Works says there has been no reason shown for a change in the system. Does he completely ignore the statements which have been made in this parliament during the last two or three sessions with reference to the granting of timber limits and the awarding of contracts ? Why the very fact that it is possible that such charges could be made is sufficient to call upon the government to ensure that nothing of the kind shall occur in the future. Did any one ever hear of any person objecting to publicity in the opening of tenders in Great Britain? Everything is above board there, except of course in certain cases where the specifications for a new type of torpedo boat or a new implement of warfare may be kept secret, but in regard to general matters such as the building of war ships and the building of everything else required by the British government, fancy a minister of the Crown there interfering in the awarding of contracts or thinking it was necessary for him to be present for the purpose of guaranteeing fair play. Why, Sir, in Great Britain there is not a suspicion of fraud or a suspicion of anything but the fairest of play in the awarding of contracts. The Minister of Public Works deprecates adopting the American system and he says we should look to other places for example. Well, the American system was adopted because a suspicion had got abroad that there had not been fair play in the awarding of contracts and so the tenders were opened when the tenderers were present. But, says the Minister of Public Works, the government may suffer ; two or three of those who are awarded contracts may combine, forfeit the securities deposited and get a higher price. Well, every contractor gives two securities and if the government find that a contractor deliberately refuses to perform his contract the remedy is in their own hands.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman misunderstood what I said. I did not say they might combine together after they had entered into the contract, I said they might do so before the contract was actually signed.

Mr. HAGGART. How could they combine after they had entered into the contract ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That, is exactly what my hon. friend said.

Mr. HAGGART. I could mean nothing else than that they might combine before entering into the contract. Will that satisfy my hon. friend ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Did not the hon. gentleman say that in addition to the deposit there would be a guarantee in the security that would have to be given when they entered into the contract ?

Mr. HAGGART. What I referred to was the deposit made by the party who was tendering for the contract. He could be made to forfeit that and not only that but he has to give the names of two securities who are satisfactory to the government for the due performance of his contract. But, independent of all this, suppose he does not forfeit his deposit or suppose the government does not proceed against the securities, cannot the minister say to that man who defaults : You had a chance, you contracted to do that work within a certain time, you refuse to fulfil it, I will have nothing to do with you and I will never give you a contract again. Therefore, there is a responsibility on the contractor greater even than his deposit and greater than the two securities which he gives. Any idea of combination before entering into the contract is something the minister need not consider at all because there is no probability of it. In order to secure honest dealing, at least what the contractors consider honest dealing with the department, it is but fair to them that they should have an opportunity to be present when the contract is opened and there can be no possible objection to that on any grounds. The minister says there is no necessity for it. Is he unaware that from one end of the country to the other this government is under suspicion. So far as I am concerned I state from my place in this House that while I was a member of the Conservative government I never knew of any wrong-doing being perpetrated in reference to the awarding of contracts. I state from my place that such a thing cannot be charged against any government of which I was a member. But, from one end of the country to the other that is not the opinion to-day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It seems to be.

Mr. HAGGART. Your majority does not prove it, because there may be other things than the dealings of this government with contractors which affected the result. There is nevertheless a feeling throughout Canada that contracts have been awarded by this government to political hacks through favouritism or worse. What we ask is that there should be applied the remedy which is provided in most civilized countries. We ask that as is done by the American government there shall be the additional security of honesty in awarding contracts that the parties who tender shall be present. To that there can be no honest objection.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, what amused me was the position taken by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). He says there has been no charge made of wrong-doing in handling tenders or awarding contracts, and therefore there is no reason for a change. But the hon. Minister of Public Works proposes a change himself. Therefore if the logic of the hon. member for South Wellington applied to the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid), it applied with equal force to the hon. Minister of Public Works. Why did the minister propose a change ? Why did the Governor in Council make a change? For better safety, presumably. Why for better safety ? Because there is either a suspicion or knowledge that tenders have not been properly opened, and contracts have not been properly awarded in the past. Therefore it does not look very well for the hon. member for South Wellington to play the part of a handy man and address such an argument to the House, because it is not in consonance with the argument of the minister himself. What did the minister say in reference to this matter yesterday ?

I was going to suggest to my hon. friend that perhaps he will allow this motion to stand over, and, with your permission Mr. Speaker, and that of the hon. member, I will read to the House a regulation which has been passed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, and which I think my hon. friend will see, upon consideration, completely meets the case.

The hon. minister is prepared to meet the case himself. What case ? The case the hon. member for Grenville desires to provide for. There is either a suspicion or knowledge of wrong-doing, and who proposes the change ? The government themselves, who are behind the scenes, and know whether there is or is not wrong-doing. This makes the case ten times stronger against them, because, if there was no wrong-doing or suspicion of wrong-doing, and if it was incapable of being established that there was wrong-doing, they would fight it out like men, and stand by what has been the practice and refuse to make a change. But is it a fact, as the hon. member for South Wellington says, that there have been no charges ? No charges ? Were not charges made over and over again in this House last session in connection with the awarding of timber limits ? No charges ? Circumstantial evidence, which in a murder case would be strong enough to hang a man ten times over, will not be accepted by the government. I venture to say that there is not amongst the hon. gentleman's own friends one in a hundred but honestly believes to-day that there was wrong-doing in connection with the awarding of those timber limits. Then we come to ordinary public contracts. Take the tenders for dredging. Why is it that all the dredging plant is to-day practically in the hands of reformers ? Why is it that the plant which was owned by Conservatives when the present government came to power, lay idle year after year until it was sold or transferred to reformers ? Because the owners of this plant had no opportunity of an honest deal to get a contract for dredging and were obliged to dispose of their plant.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does my hon. friend know that ?

Mr. SPROULE. I was just about to say that I have been told it by the very men who had the plant. But after they sold it or went into an arrangement with a reformer, they had no difficulty in getting contracts. Will the Minister of Public Works pretend to tell the House that there was no collusion in that case in which it is alleged that a tender for dredging was changed from 50 cents to 55 cents a yard in order that there might be a rake-off of $35,000 ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What case was that ?

Mr. SPROULE. The McAvity case.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend desires an answer, I will say that so far as I have been able to ascertain, so far as the records of the department show, and to the best of my knowledge and belief there was no alteration of the tender. There were two tenders put in, in answer to public advertisement, and the lowest tender was accepted.

Mr. SPROULE. How does the hon. minister reconcile that statement with the statement of the contractor, who says he was willing to tender at 50 cents a yard, but by getting a friend to interfere on his behalf he got 55 cents a yard ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will answer that. I will say to my hon. friend that there appeared one morning in St. John what purported to be a certain solemn declaration which had been read by Mr. Hazen, the leader of the Conservative party, at a great political meeting in St. John, and that declaration did not purport to be signed by the party who professed to have made it. I know myself that it contained statements which were absolutely false, absolutely without foundation, and immediately an application was made to Mr. Hazen, who was the Attorney General of New Brunswick, to have the original of that declaration filed. Mr. Hazen replied that he had returned it to Mr. Mayes, and, although repeated requests have been made from time to time to have it produced so that it may be seen what was in the original, they have refused to produce it, and it has been concealed ever since the election.

Mr. SPROULE. That seems to me to be all beside the case. This man went to a certain individual who was known to be friendly to the government, and he got the contract at the larger figure. Who advised him to do so ? The minister himself who was awarding the contract. Is that creditable either to the minister or to the government ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does my hon. friend say that the Minister of Public Works gave the advice ? Will the hon. member be good enough to repeat what he said ? I did not quite hear him.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to make a correction in that respect.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. It is rather amusing to hear the laugh come from the source it does. There is a good deal behind it that would be worth bringing out.

Mr. TALBOT. Make the correction.

Mr. SPROULE. I have as much right at any time to make a correction, as much right as any other member of this House. I was only mixing up two ministers ; but is it not a fact that the recommendation came from the very source that had the power to give the contract ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What does that mean ?

Mr. SPROULE. According to the information disclosed in the public press, it did come from that source.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If I understand what my hon. friend means, I will say that he is entirely and absolutely in error.

Mr. SPROULE. In connection with that very case, there is the undeniable fact that the man who was willing to put in a tender at 50 cents a yard, got it increased to 55 cents a yard, and got it increased by virtue of the advice of the very individuals who had an opportunity to handle the tenders.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does my hon. friend make the assertion that a tender was put in at 50 cents a yard and was subsequently changed to 55 cents? In cases of this kind it is desirable that we should be accurate and that those who make statements should know what they are talking about. There have been falsehoods without number circulated with regard to the matter to which my hon. friend refers. They were scattered broadcast throughout Canada at the time of the election, and had not the shadow of a foundation of truth. So far as the records show, so far as I know, and so far as any statement has yet been made, no tender was altered from 50 cents to 55 cents a yard; but there were two tenders put in, in answer to public advertisement, and one of those tenders was for 55 cents a yard.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the minister say that the same man who tendered for 50 cents did not afterward get 55 cents?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will repeat what I have said. I have said that the man who tendered at 50 cents did not get 55 cents. The hon. gentleman is referring to entirely different tenders. In answer to a call by public advertisement, there were only two tenders submitted to the department—one for 55 cents and the other for either one dollar or one dollar and twenty five cents per cubic yard.

Mr. LENNOX. Was not that the same work that the same man tendered at 50 cents before?

Mr. PUGSLEY. On a previous occasion?

Mr. LENNOX. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it was.

Mr. SPROULE. I have what I regard as good ground because I saw the statement in the public press, and it was not denied by the minister. But who gave the advice to Mr. McAvity to put in a higher tender? It was Mr. Pugsley himself.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Again the hon. gentleman is absolutely and entirely mistaken. I gave no such advice, and I venture to say that my hon. friend did not see in the newspapers that I gave any such advice.

Mr. SPROULE. I say emphatically, if my memory is correct, and I believe it is, that I did.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Your memory is mistaken.

Mr. SPROULE. My recollection is that the newspapers said that Mr. Pugsley advised Mr. Mayes as his solicitor.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend makes a statement that it was I who gave the advice to Mr. Mayes to raise his tender from 50 cents to 55 cents. That statement is absolutely without foundation.

Mr. LANCASTER. He did not say that. He said he saw it in the papers.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. minister is indulging in a great deal of unnecessary special pleading and improper interference with my right to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has the floor, but it is customary to allow a minister to make a personal explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I rise to correct the statement made by my hon. friend. He said, if I heard him correctly, that he had seen it stated in a newspaper that I had advised Mr. Mayes to raise his tender from 50 cents to 55 cents.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What did the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. SPROULE. What I intended to convey, and what I think I did say, was that the minister advised him to put in a tender at 55 cents per cubic yard for work which he had tendered to do the year before at 50 cents per cubic yard.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let me say that I never gave any such advice and I defy the hon. gentleman to produce any newspaper in which he saw that statement made.

Mr. CROCKET. Did not the Minister of Public Works see the solemn declaration of Mr. Mayes, and will he say that Mr. Mayes does not there allege that the minister referred him to Mr. McAvity, and that Mr. McAvity advised him to increase the tender.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is a very different matter. Settle one thing at a time. What does my hon. friend from Grey say to my correction?

Mr. SPROULE. I did not hear what the minister said the last time. I do not agree in the contention that there is no need of a change unless a case of wrong-doing is proven. I think it is quite sufficient to have a well-grounded suspicion of wrong-doing to justify the government or parliament in providing some remedy. But in this case there is more than suspicion because in case after case, submitted to this House last session, the facts were established over and over again. I am now referring to the dredging contracts. It is well known, at least in Ontario, that Conservatives who own dredging plants cannot get a government contract unless they pass their plant over to reformers or join in with reformers. But once they take in some prominent Reformer or friend of the government, they can get contracts and make lots of money. How is it that the dredging business is so remunerative to-day, compared with ten or twelve years ago, if there be no wrong-doing? No one who knows anything, can fail to reach the conclusion that the reason the business is so remunerative to-day is because of wrong-doing and not because of the carrying out of a proper system of tender and contract. That is the impression all over the west, and it is well grounded, and it is high time we should have a change. Surely there can be no objection to those who tender being present when the tenders are opened. I can see strong reasons for some change that will inspire and restore public confidence and give the public some assurance that when a man tenders for timber limits or dredging or public works or anything else, he will be fairly and honestly dealt with.

Mr. A. C. BOYCE (West Algoma). When I heard the motion proposed by my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid) I was not surprised to find that it did not receive much sympathy from the government and I could appreciate the uneasiness of the members of the government over this attempt on the part of the opposition to take away from them what is practically their life's blood, by means of which they have been able to secure a majority of seats in this House. This resolution is in principle one of the most important ever submitted to Parliament. It aims at the very crux of the corruption which is eating out the heart of the country and has done so much to lower public morality. Well may the cabinet ministers from the first minister down to the Minister of Public Works, look grave and concerned over this matter. It was certainly in very poor taste for the Minister of Public Works to defy public opinion as he has done, and to deny that there is in this motion a principle of public morality which it is the bounden duty of every minister, as well as every member of parliament and every honest, loyal Canadian citizen, to maintain and uphold to the best of his ability.

I do not propose to repeat what has been said, but there are two questions to be dealt with in connection with the opening of tenders. There are two evils, with which the government is very familiar, which the right hon. the leader of the government knows right well are rampant, and which have led to the worst corruption and government mismanagement. What are they? One is the lack of protection against absolute secrecy from the time the tender leaves the hands of the party tendering until opened in the presence of some responsible minister or officer. I need not refer at length to the debate of last session upon the notorious timber deals, where tenders were opened by an officer now sitting in this House, opened in secret and in a manner which did not give confidence to the people who were tendering or to the people of this country and which did not work out for the conservation of the national assets of this country.

The next principle involved is that of the publicity and consequently the security of the dealings with the tender. I was surprised at the speciousness with which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) attempted to evade that question. I can see no objection to tenders being opened in public. Surely the public moneys ought to be conserved, and surely when the public moneys have to be expended it is to the public interest that the lowest tenderer should get the work provided he is competent and that his and all other tenders are honestly and fairly dealt with. There is an aspect of this debate which is ludicrous in its incongruity and inconsistency. In the last election we saw an hon. gentleman from New Brunswick parading around the country promising works here, there and everywhere to anybody and everybody in order to obtain the support of that province for the government of which he was a minister. Is there any significance in the attitude taken by the Minister of Public Works now? Does he see in this measure some means by which he will be less able to deliver the goods which he promised at that time? The speech of the hon. minister conveys the impression to my mind, and I am sure to the minds of the people generally, that what he desires is not the security of the tender not the secrecy of the tender until it shall be opened in public, but a laxity of procedure and secrecy from the time the tender leaves the hands of the tenderer until it is proclaimed absolutely in the hands of a politician, a member of this House. I understand that the hon. gentleman did in a burst of righteous zeal, when his mind was in that state of exaltation from which we sometimes get the evanescence in this House, state that he had dispensed with the patronage system in his department. His speech in opposition to this motion possibly evidences the manner in which he proposes to dispense with the patronage system in the Public Works Department, and I suppose that is about all the sincerity one can attach to the words of the Minister of Public Works, especially when he is on the stump.

The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) objected very seriously to any suspicion being cast with reference to political interference with tenders. May I recount to the First Minister an incident which occurred during the last election with which he may be familiar as it has been brought to his attention? The works of the Algoma Steel Company were closed down for lack of orders. Tenders were invited by the National Transcontinental Railway Commission for some 40,000 tons of steel rails and the Algoma Steel Company, the Dominion Steel Company and the United States Steel Company were rival tenderers for this order. The tenders were in, supposedly sealed and secret, and they were to be opened on the first of September. The government candidate in West Algoma came to Ottawa, brazenly announcing that he was coming here to secure for the Algoma Steel Company as large an amount of that contract as they should receive. He was a new candidate and so was not as cautious as some of the others. The tenders were opened and the Algoma Company, most unjustly as we thought, got only one-third of the order. But that gentleman paraded all through the county boasting if he had not come to Ottawa and exercised his influence in respect to these secret tenders not a pound of these rails would have been awarded to the Algoma Company. The Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Graham) visited Sault Ste. Marie and when he appeared on the public platform I addressed an open letter to him asking him to give to the people of that county an affirmation or denial of these statements. The hon. gentleman said that he had not time to attend to it at that time. Are there other similar instances? Yes, Sir. I have in my possession now a letter from a gentleman now occupying a seat on that side of the House asking in reference to vested interests in Northwest timber lands, whether the man who had the vested interests, namely, a license, was a Liberal or a Conservative, because that might make a great deal of difference, and if he was an active Conservative worker he might be able to get the land away from him. Hon. gentlemen opposite say there are no charges or suspicion of charges of political influence in the awarding of tenders. The administration of every department as revealed in the last two sessions reeks with it, and if the Minister of Public Works were to travel for a thousand years from end to end of this country he would not be able to satisfy the people of Canada that there is honesty, probity, secrecy and propriety in the opening of and dealing with tenders. It is just as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) says, the mercantile world bursts out laughing at you if you allege that this government deals honestly with tenders for public works. I come now to the question of the interest of members on the government side of this House in tenders. Two sessions ago I asked a question of the Prime Minister with reference to a member of his party who I believe as a member of parliament obtained contracts, which if he had obtained in his own name would have constituted a breach of the law, but to avoid that he incorporated himself, his wife, his cousins and his aunts into a corporation called by his own name with the word 'limited' after it. The right hon. gentleman when asked the question simply said that he was not aware whether the hon. gentleman referred to had any connection with the corporation to which I referred. That is another affair. You have the matter of the dredging contracts, to which my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has referred, and there you have a state of things most revolting. You have practically a state of things where certain dredging firms, in which members of parliament are largely interested, members, and ex-members and defeated candidates of the Liberal party, have formed a nice little ring by which they might know when tenders are to be asked for dredging; and that one man writes out a tender for two, one man signs for another, the same tenders go in the envelope of another firm, and so on. Where is secrecy, and where is competition there? The Minister of Public Works has had that brought to his attention, and he sneers at it.

Now just a word in regard to the principle involved in this motion. If the Minister of Public Works desires in any way to pose as being sincere, I see no reason whatever why he should not accept the principle of the motion. I see no reason why the right hon. the Prime Minister, who has secured the confidence of the country for another parliament, should not see in this motion a means of effecting the reform which I understand he has promised in this very matter of departmental administration. My right hon. friend said at Niagara Falls, when confronted with this state of things, that he himself was no saint. I sincerely hope that my right hon. friend, knowing the condition of affairs, as he must know it, will see in the acceptance of this motion by himself something which will redound to his credit, and something which he can claim as a fulfilment of the promise he made on the hustings. If such a resolution were carried and put into effect, what great sums of money would be saved to this country. But I fancy there is no danger of this resolution going into force, for the reason that this resolution is aimed at the very life of this government. What would become of the party heeler? What would become of the hanger-on? What would become of the man who is waiting for a tip, who provides the money for election campaigns, the man whose interest must be protected at all costs? What would become of him if all the tenders had to be kept sealed? Why, Sir, the principle of secrecy is as abhorrent to the members of this government, apparently, as it was to the Department of the Interior at the time of this nefarious timber limit deal that was exposed last session. Mr. Speaker, I unhesitatingly support this motion because I think that the principle of it is one which will work excellent results for the stability of Canadian institutions.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey). Being one of the new members from the province of Ontario, I would not have ventured to address you to-day were it not that some reference has been made to dredging contracts. I come from a riding which is the home of a dredging and construction company, and perhaps you will pardon me if I say a few words with respect to this motion. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has said that if there was a feeling of insecurity in this country with reference to the opening of tenders, it was a feeling which had been engendered by the action of the Conservative party, especially during the last session. Now, if that is so, there must be some reason for the change in the manner of opening tenders. If a change has been made in the manner of opening tenders by the Minister of Public Works, it must be because he, from an inward consciousness, believes it is necessary to do so, or because he believes that the Conservative party was justified in making the accusations they did. I desire to say from my seat in this House that I believe the Conservative party were justified in making the accusations they did last session. It has come to pass in this country that people believe that it is necessary to be a member of the Reform party, to be of the same political faith as this government, before you can secure a dredging contract from this government. In my own constituency, the North riding of Grey, as you all know, we have representing us in the local house the Hon. A. G. MacKay, leader of the Liberal opposition in the province of Ontario. It may be a coincidence, but it is so, that that gentleman is also president of the Owen Sound Dredging and Construction Company; it may be a coincidence that, although the assets of that company are worth anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000, he and the relatives of a late Liberal member in this House, own all the stock of that company except three shares of $300, and that these 3 shares consisting of $100 each are distributed nominally among three other persons for the sole purpose of constituting the necessary five in order to be incorporated as a dredging and construction company. That is the company about which there was so much examination in the Public Accounts Committee. We find that that company had obtained contracts from this government practically without any competition whatever; they obtained contracts from this government, as you know, by one consulting with the other, and the tenders, as you know, went into the envelope of one tenderer, and in that manner they were able to get these contracts. Then the Minister of Public Works, in order to alleviate somewhat the pressure of public opinion against this government, changed that system to a system of letting contracts by tender. I understand that when contracts were subsequently let by tender, the figures were higher than they were during the time that contracts were let without tender.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend allow me to correct him?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I wish to correct my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. Order. He ought not to be interrupted.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is customary for an hon. member having the floor to allow a minister of the Crown to put a question, or to give an explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do this in all kindness. The hon. gentleman stated that contracts for dredging were let without tender. The hon. gentleman is in error. The evidence is that they were all let after public advertisement and receipt of tenders, and let to the lowest bidder.

Mr. LENNOX. Renewed without tender.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, they were not renewed without tender.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I accept the statement of the Minister of Public Works. But if I understand the matter it is this, that there was a time when the Minister of Public Works adopted the system of letting contracts without tender; that there came a time subsequently when he adopted the principle of letting contracts by tender; that when he let these contracts without tender the work was done for a certain price, but that after he let the contracts by tender the price went up.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman has been misinformed.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That is the statement made in my riding, and it was made by members of the Liberal party for the purpose of proving that the system which was in force previously, of this administration letting dredging contracts without tender, worked better than the system now in force of letting contracts by tender. But that only goes to prove our argument and contention that the affairs of this country have got into such a state because of the patronage system adopted by this government that there is not a Conservative probably in the whole Dominion of Canada who owns any interest in dredging or construction companies or in any company which has to do with public affairs. They have practically abolished the principle of competition to such an extent that even when contracts are let by public tender there is nobody to tender but the friends of the administration and there is really no competition. I say to the Minister of Public Works that it is just such a condition that has produced amongst the people of Canada a feeling of distrust and a belief that no man will tender for public works unless he has some political pull with hon. gentlemen occupying the treasury benches. So, I say that it behooves hon. gentlemen opposite to take advantage of every opportunity that is offered to them for the purpose of restoring the confidence of the people which they, by their actions, have displaced during the last twelve years. If there be some little objection made to the principle of allowing tenderers to be present when tenders are opened, the objections are comparatively insignificant as compared with the benefit to be derived from allowing them to be present. That is the position I take. I do not know that I can say more than that, but I desired to give expression of my emphatic approval of the original motion made by my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid) and to say that it will receive my hearty support and that I have always been in favour of the principle of letting contracts by public tender in a bona fide, upright and conscientious manner.

Mr. A. B. CROSBY (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I have to ask the indulgence of the House while I say a few words in regard to the question before us this evening. I would not have undertaken to say anything had it not been that the question of tender and contract came up in the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House. Therefore, I feel that I am compelled to say a word on this matter. I was somewhat amused to hear the arguments that were put before us as to why we should not have this motion passed. One of these arguments was that set up by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) in which he said that if we give you three members you will ask for four. I say let us have four if we need them and if four are not enough let us have five ; and if five are not enough let us have six, I say that we will ask for the whole House of Commons if it be necessary in order to have this work done in an honest and business-like way. If we cannot have it properly done in the Department of Public Works, or in any other department, we will then move to have these tenders opened on the table of the House and before every member in order that it may be honestly and properly done. Therefore, I say that it was to my mind a very unreasonable and unfair argument for the Minister of Public Works to make in opposition to the motion of my hon. friend. The question is : Are three better than two ? Is there anything wrong with the third man in these departments or is there any reason why he should not call them in ? What is the matter with him ? What is the reason ? Is he too busy? I am informed that the departments are well equipped with officials ; in fact, all the evidence that we have in the country is to that effect. Have you no confidence in the third man ? If you have confidence in him, what is the reason for saying he should not be there ? Is there any reason why the tenderer should not be there ? As the Minister of Public Works said we will have to give him notice. Tell him that the tenders will be opened on a certain particular day and if he is not there it will be his fault and not yours. That is the position I take. In the constituency that I have the honour to represent we have had a great deal of difficulty over tenders. It has not been between Conservatives and Liberals but between Liberals and Liberals, because we have Liberals and Liberals in our constituency. What has been the condition ? The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden) knows very well that in that particular constituency we have a gentleman who supplies ham and bacon to the Militia Department there. What is the result ? A good Liberal sent in a tender for those supplies at the same time as the successful tender was sent in, and he proved to the satisfaction of the public at least, whether he proved to the satisfaction of the department or not, that his tender was lower than that of the man who now has the contract. Moreover, the gentleman who put in that tender is now supplying the gentleman who received the contract to supply the department, and if anybody desires the name of this gentleman I will give it to him. I have risen because in the constituency which I have the honour to represent as the junior member this matter has been brought up and dealt with at very great length. Therefore, diffident as I feel about getting up upon this, almost my first day in the House, I could not forego the opportunity of placing myself on record upon the question. To my mind no argument has been presented to convince this House that the resolution of my hon. friend for Grenville (Mr. Reid) should not be adopted. On the contrary, every argument which has been advanced from the other side of the House indicates very strongly to me at least that I should support this motion. We should not treat this as a party question, are we not here representing the people ? Have we not been sent here by the people ? Should we keep any information away from them ? Should we not give them all the information we can ? Should we let them be part and parcel of the government of the country or should we, having got their votes to place us in this parliament, say to them that we do not want to let them know anything more, until perhaps four or five years from now when we may go back to them and again seek their support, in the meantime forgetting all about them? Would anybody say to the people in his constituency that he would oppose such a resolution as this? Would any member from any constituency in the Dominion of Canada stand face to face before his electors and say that he would refuse to support any measure that would give information to the people with regard to tenders and contracts? Would he say: We are going to award these contracts as secretly as we possibly can? He would not dare to say that but he would say: If there is anything wrong, if you think there is any better way in which these contracts can be awarded we will be glad to adopt it and to give to the people all the information that they may require in order to satisfy them as to the manner in which this business is done. We are here for the purpose of dealing with these matters. I do not consider it a party question. It should not be a party question. It is a question that involves the security of the people of Canada.

I was somewhat surprised at the conversational argument which took place between the Minister of Public Works and one hon. gentleman on this side of the House. What was the argument? To my mind it was an effort to try and persuade those who were listening that something had not happened that had happened, simply by saying: I did not say that particular thing at that particular time or date, and I am not going to tell you what I did say or at what particular time I said it; you must guess it. The question was asked why it was that some gentleman in St. John was enabled to secure $35,000 or $36,000 out of the contract for which amount he had performed no service. We in our part of the country have not been informed as to how this was brought about. I do not know how he got this money, whether the contractor put his contract in for fifty cents and was told to increase it to fifty-five, and to give five cents to some one else, the fact remains that some one got $35,000 or $36,000 to which he had no right and for which he has never given a day's work to this country. That is how it appears to me. In the city of Halifax we have had a great deal of the patronage evil, so much so that it is almost a wonder to see my colleague and myself here.

My colleague and I have been returned to this House because the good Liberals of the city of Halifax are beginning to realize that public men in offices of public trust must deal properly with the money of the people of Canada. The people of Halifax believed that in order to bring about that desired end they could no longer return to parliament the two former members, and they were two very good men in private life; no better men ever came to this House in their capacity as private citizens. But the people of Halifax came to the conclusion that supporting as they did the government of the day in all its transactions, they were useless as members of parliament, and they told them: You must stay at home. Of course, Sir, it may happen that my constituents will at some future date lose confidence in me, but if they do it will not be because during my career in this House I have not stood up under all circumstances for an economic and honest expenditure of the money of the people. It is not necessary that I should cite as examples contracts that have been awarded in my own city, but let me ask, what better security for square dealing can a minister of the Crown have than that when he calls in his first man and his second man to be present with him, there should also be present the men who have tendered. In what more honest way can the rights of the public be guarded. The Minister of Public Works has told us that the tenderers might conspire to secure a higher price, but cannot the same thing occur to-day under the present system. Will we be in any worse position in that regard, if the resolution is adopted than we are now. I say no. I say that the collusion between tenderers which the Minister of Public Works seems so much afraid of is far easier of accomplishment to-day than it could possibly be under the system which the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) proposes. I shall support the principle of the resolution before the House, and I shall support it because it is a resolution that the people of my constituency sent me here to support. I take it for granted that there is not a man in this House who can go before any intelligent audience in the Dominion of Canada and defend any other principle than that which is embodied in the resolution which I shall be most happy to vote for.

Mr. ALEXANDER B. WARBURTON (Queens, P.E.I.). Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Crosby) that no intelligent man can go before an intelligent audience in this country and defend the principle of the regulation which has been suggested by the Minister of Public Works, I feel that I could go before such an audience and successfully uphold what the hon. minister (Mr. Pugsley) proposes. I represent constituents who are just as intelligent, I think more so, than those represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Crosby), and I would not be at all alarmed to go before my people and defend the regulations passed by the Governor in Council and to-day submitted for our consideration. I therefore have much satisfaction in supporting the amendment of my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), which I believe meets all the requirements of the case. I am a new member and therefore not acquainted with the procedure of this parliament, but was under the impression that a discussion such as this was more likely to take place during the last session of a parliament than at the first session of a new parliament. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have heard practically the same kind of talk as we have heard to-day, on thirty-five public platforms during the last campaign. We had charges brought against the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), but we found in every case that those who made the charges were utterly incapable of proving them. The hon. gentleman from Assiniboia, next to the hon. member for Brandon, was, during the last campaign probably the most abused man in this Dominion. He can have no idea of the manner in which his name was bandied about the country, and if he had had a thousand ears they would all have been burning. But, in every instance where charges were made against that hon. gentleman and against others with reference to the procedure in connection with the opening of tenders, the accusers invariably stopped before they got to the end. We were told that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) was in office the tenders for timber limits were opened in the secrecy of a dark room. But those who made the charges never told all that happened; they never told the people that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) waited in the Public Accounts committee room day after day to get a chance to prove the falsity of these charges. They did not tell the people that the Conservatives tried to close up the proceedings in the Public Accounts Committee before the hon. gentleman could have had an opportunity to vindicate his own reputation. When the campaign opened I was not so well informed as to the proceedings in this parliament as I hope to be in the future, but I had with me the report of the Public Accounts Committee and the evidence taken before it, and I was able to show to the people that the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) gave his evidence fairly and squarely before the committee, and that his secretary gave her evidence clearly and well, and that that evidence proved beyond a shadow of doubt that it was false to state that the tenders had been opened in any fraudulent manner whatever. It occurs to me as rather peculiar also that the hon. gentlemen who to-day have addressed the House from the Conservative benches have also neglected any reference to that phase of the question But, Sir, I may say that the people of Prince Edward Island took no stock in the charges which were made, and that Conservatives and Liberals alike came to the conclusion that this was but a repetition of the same old story which they had heard repeated so often by our Conservative friends and that there was no foundation for the charges, and so my colleague and I redeemed our constituency for the Liberal party, and placed it with the other constituencies which have returned members here to work for the good government of Canada. In not a single instance, Sir, did the Conservatives succeed in proving the correctness of any of their charges against any member or supporter of the government or against the government as a whole. These charges of general wrongdoing are very easy to make, but they are not so easy to prove. There was ample opportunity last session, if I read correctly the reports of the Public Accounts Committee, to prove this or any other charge that might be made, and to prove it up to the hilt; and what I am surprised at is that if these charges were so notorious and glaring, they were not then proved up to the hilt.

I listened with much pleasure and satisfaction to the certificate of good character given by the Minister of Railways of the former Conservative governments to the various governments of which he was a member. His statement of the good character of those governments and of every member of them was somewhat of a surprise to me, because it rather clashed with the ideas I had formed of the political history of this country for a good many years. The earliest knowledge I acquired of the political history of Canada after confederation was that during the rule of the Conservative party we were always hearing of something notorious and corrupt, and that redounded to the disgrace of Canada, beginning with the Pacific scandal of 1873, and ending with such performances as that in connection with the Curran bridge.

A good deal of the discussion this afternoon seems to have taken the form of an attack on the Minister of Public Works. It is not necessary for me to say anything in defence of that hon. gentleman, for I know of no man better able to defend himself. But the fact seems to have been overlooked that the matter referred to was brought before the minister's own province of New Brunswick in the shape of an affidavit, and that the gentlemen who made use of that affidavit were compelled to withdraw it, and withdrew it in shame.

Mr. LENNOX. To change the date only.

Mr. WARBURTON. I am aware that it is alleged that there was an error in the date; but in making affidavits which attack the character of a public man, no lawyer has any excuse for making errors even in dates. If any hon. member of this House had been concerned in making that affidavit, and stated that that was an honest mistake, I would be compelled, under the rules of the House, to accept this statement; but when the men in St. John, who made these statements deliberately, and read them before a public meeting, say that that was an honest mistake, I for one refuse to believe them. However, that matter has been judged by the people of this country. The changes were rung on these charges on every platform throughout the length and breadth of the land, and the people of New Brunswick, the province from which the Minister of Public Works comes, gave a decided verdict in his favour, sending him back to this House with a representation of eleven out of thirteen which it seems to me is a remarkably good certificate of character

We have head references to dredging contracts. In the part of the country from which I come I have herd no complaints on that score; the dredging contracts have been carried on satisfactorily, and at no very great expense. I did hear that the Minister of Public Works was badgered in this House last session for extending contracts for dredging purposes which had already been let, and that there was such an outcry that he gave way and called for new tenders, with the result that the new prices were considerably higher than those for which he could have renewed the old contracts, and the Dominion of Canada consequently lost a large sum of money, I think over $100,000 a year.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby), spoke of the good work done in Halifax by the good Liberals and Conservatives of that city. Well, Halifax is a very fine place, but it has had a peculiar record in Dominion politics. Some years ago it was represented by my good friend the late Hon. A. G. Jones; but there seems to be a lack of stability about it, for it frequently changes from one party to the other. It seems to be something like the monster which is always crying for more, more, and looking for something new. It has always been looking to the government to do something more for it, whether building elevators or something else, though it is a very wealthy city. I suppose in doing this it is consulting its own interests. I expect that four years hence it will change its representation back again to the Liberal party, and eight years hence it will perhaps change again. In the county I represent we have also good Liberals and Conservatives. They took the record of the present government into favourable consideration, with the result that they enabled my colleague and myself to bring that county back to what is and should be its natural home, and unless things change very materially, we propose to keep it there.

The hon. members of the opposition seem to be suspicious of everything. I suppose oppositions are born suspicious—it comes natural to them. Our hon. friends opposite are very often suspicious. A few months ago they were even suspicious that the country was going to turn out the present government and put them in office. But the results of the general election have shown most conclusively and satisfactorily that that suspicion was absolutely unfounded. I do not propose to take up any more time of the House in discussing this matter. I think it has been fairly well thrashed out, and being a new member I shall not trespass any more, Mr. Speaker, on your attention.

Mr. ERNEST ROY (Dorchester). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the present debate having hitherto been carried on in the English language, it would not appear amiss that I should add a few words in French.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) stated a moment ago that the principle at stake being one in which everybody must concur, no intelligent man in Canada could reasonably vote against it.

I am well aware that in a large number of Canadian constituencies, this argument was used for the purpose of injuring the Liberal government in public opinion and more particularly of discrediting the administration of the departments of government as regards the awarding of contracts. It must be conceded that, in the majority of constituencies, the people pronounced very clearly upon the issue thus placed before them by the Conservative candidates. What was the principal question submitted to the people during the last general election? Our opponents accused the government of being corrupt and of spreading corruption by awarding contracts, not for the general advantage of Canada, but in the interest of the friends of the Liberal party and to the detriment of the national treasury. Such were the charges made by our opponents. Were those charges substantiated? They were repeated in the constituency where I had the honour of running and the Liberal candidate was returned. When asked: Have you any means of proving the truth of such charges, have they been investigated and with what result? they were constrained to admit that no proof had been adduced, and the people understood the situation. They felt that groundless charges should not be considered. It was sought to create the impression that all public contracts were granted by favour. It was said and repeated that the government could not be acting in the public interest, but that they considered only the return of the Liberal party and the private advantage of their friends.

The resolution now submitted by the member for Grenville is but a continuation of the same policy. It seems to me that the majority in this House should therefore reject it. Our opponents were either right or wrong. The people by their recent verdict have declared them wrong.

The people having thus given judgment, should we go any further? If, as the hon. member who preceded me remarked, the investigation had established that contracts were being granted contrary to the interests of Canada, not one member, I am sure, would have opposed the new method now suggested for putting a stop to all further abuses in that respect.

I have no desire to prolong this debate, but I consider it my duty to explain why I shall presently vote against the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid).

It is a question of principle, says he. It is true. It is a question of principle, more especially as regards ministerial responsibility. It is the minister's duty to award contracts and to do so in the public interest. In such cases the lowest tender is not always the best, and each case should be considered on its merits. Does it not frequently happen that a tenderer is not in a position to properly carry out the contract? The tender may frequently be made by a man who, with the support of a few friends, is entering into an enterprise the nature of which he knows nothing, a man of small experience and perhaps over confident. In such cases should not the minister use his own judgment? Ministerial responsibility comes in here and it is the fundamental principle over our system of government. The responsible minister decides in what manner contracts shall be awarded.

What is the subject of the resolution now submitted to the House? Does it not tend gradually to deprive the ministers of that responsibility? Is it not natural that the head of a department should consider not only the amount of a tender, but also the qualifications of the tenderer? This appears to me to be the true principle that should guide us, the maintenance of ministerial responsibility. If the minister were bound by hard and fast rules, what would become of the principle? The head of a department would become a mere machine, moving in obedience to rigid and inflexible rules. He would be nothing, his initiative would be gone and the system of responsible government would give place to one of independent commissions. That, I believe, would not be going forward, but backward.

I will say no more. In former parliaments, my county of Dorchester was represented by a Conservative, and this fact confirms me in my intention of opposing the resolution. Since 1896, that riding had constantly favoured the Conservative policy, but this time it has returned a supporter of the government, although every argument which has been adduced here to-day was used during the campaign.

Mr. P. E. BLONDIN (Champlain). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am a new comer in this House and I think it incumbent upon me to say something on the question now submitted. I do not consider it, as have done some of the members who have spoken before me, an attack directed against the government. It is, to my mind, the enunciation of the principle that we should constantly seek more perfect methods in the awarding of public contracts, and I cannot understand why we should oppose such a resolution.

Has it been shown by any of the previous speakers that the resolution is not of a nature to further safeguard public interest in the granting of contracts? It matters little whether the government view this proposal as a reflection upon themselves. That is not the standpoint from which I consider the question. Conditions are never so perfect as to preclude improvement. The object of this proposal is to give further security and thereby fuller satisfaction to the public in connection with the granting of contracts. It has not been contended as yet that, under our present system, public interest is as fully safeguarded as it would be under the system advocated by the member for Grenville, and no argument has been made so far on that point of a nature to induce to vote against the motion, which accordingly I shall support.

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle). Mr. Speaker, what has taken place this afternoon shows that there is some unrest in the country with reference to the awarding of contracts. I think it would be a great misfortune if the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) should carry. That amendment, as I understand it, states that the regulation which has been laid before the House by the Minister of Public Works forms a sufficient and a complete safeguard of the public interest in regard to the opening of tenders. The fact that there is a great lack of confidence throughout the country in regard to this question should itself warrant very strong measures in regard to the care of tenders for the future, even if it were possible that the measures proposed by the government were under ordinary circumstances sufficient. I do not, however, think that they are sufficient; they fall very short of what they should be.

It has been stated that the precautions which it is proposed to take are just as great as those which are taken in Great Britain. I have some knowledge of the precautions that were taken in some of the departments in Great Britain some years ago and have no reason to suppose that they have been relaxed. In Great Britain they take a great deal more care of the tenders themselves. In the departments of which I have knowledge the tenders are sealed on receipt, by the department itself. The regulations now proposed contain no such provision. After the tender has been sealed in Great Britain it is placed under lock and key, and in some departments it is further safeguarded by the use of duplicate locks with keys in possession of different officers.

I know that in at least one department the tenders were opened in the presence of at last three of the senior officers of the department, and further that in one department it was the custom not to allow the junior clerks to serve too long a term in a position in which the tenders actually passed through their hands, so that every precaution is taken to prevent any possibility of tampering with the tenders. I do not think it will be alleged that these precautions have been taken there because of charges of maladministration in regard to the tenders; they have been taken in order to provide against any possibility of any suspicion being cast, and in order to give confidence to persons putting in tenders for public works or buildings or for the supply of articles to the public authorities in Great Britain.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend seems to have a good knowledge of the practice in at least some of the departments in Great Britain. Does he know that the contractors or the public have been invited to be present at the opening of tenders?

Mr. LAKE. Of course I am speaking from recollection, and I was not present when the tenders were opened, but in the particular department of which I have knowledge I do not think the public were invited to be present and I do not think they were present, but I am not quite certain upon that point. Anyway the logical sequence of what I have said is that it is advisable in this country, at least in the present state of public feeling, that we should have every possible safeguard, and I think the government would be making no mistake if they added to the safeguard which they have proposed, and I feel it would be a great pity if the House should adopt the amendment proposed. The proposals of the government are open to criticism. Personally I do not like the idea of having the minister as one of the officers to open the tenders. No doubt in most cases the matter will ultimately have to go to the minister, but the opening of tenders should be left to the senior permanent, non-partisan officials; the presence of the minister is introducing the political side into the detailed workings of the department. I hope the government will not allow the amendment to pass, but will give further consideration to the matter and that the House will not put itself on record as endorsing a regulation which does not go far enough and does not sufficiently guard the interests of the country.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford). Mr. Speaker, it is more on account of the spirit of the motion of my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid) and of the speeches by which it has been supported than of the motion itself, that I personally refuse to accept it, because I cannot see that it makes any great difference whether one, two or three persons are present when a tender is opened. The motion and the speeches in support of it have been inclined to cast a reflection on the ministers of this government which personally I do not believe is deserved. It has struck me as peculiar in listening to the speeches this afternoon that there should be such an amount of suspicion in the parts of the country from which our Conservative friends come, because this is the first time in my life that I have heard of any suspicion that the tenders were not properly opened or that contracts were not properly awarded by this government. I very well remember a tender for a public building during the time of my friend the late Hon. James Sutherland, when Mr. Sutherland as Minister of Pubic Works went so far as to put up the money for the deposit for one of the tenderers, a friend of his and of mine, at the same time telling him most distinctly that although he was a very strong personal friend of his, and although he thought a great deal of him his tender would have to be the lowest or he would have no chance of getting a contract. It was only this afternoon that I heard that our ministers are so dishonest that the contracts are not properly awarded. I am sure that the suggestion cannot be well founded, that it is entirely a matter of imagination. I have in my private and semi-public life often heard people accused of graft or of having some hidden reason for doing certain things, although I knew personally and absolutely that there was no ground for the charge except the mean suspicion of the mind of the person who originated it.

I can see nothing in the argument that the minister himself should not be one of those present at the opening of tenders, because under the constitution, so far as I have read it, the matter has to go to the minister eventually and he might just as well open the tender as have his secretary or some other subordinate official do so. After the receiving of tenders, the mere sealing and locking up of the document is of little importance, although I have no doubt they are sealed when they are put away. After all it is a matter of trust. If the minister and one of his subordinates wanted to be dishonest, the presence of the minister at the opening of the tenders would not greatly increase their opportunities of doing so. No matter what safeguard we adopt the tenders will have to be sent to some one. Perhaps they might be sent in some conspicuous manner, by a balloon or something of that kind so that every one could see them, but as it is essentially a matter of trust, I do not see what advantage would be gained by that.

What difference does it make whether there are one or two or three of the minister's assistants present at the opening of tenders? If the minister were dishonest he could keep any wrong-doing as secret with two or three subordinates as with one. But what reason have we to suppose the minister will be dishonest, that he will not do what is absolutely fair? Is it not the privilege of every member on either side of the House to ask the minister what the tenders have been and all particulars?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. NESBITT. If that is the case, would not the minister be a green fellow and a very innocent fellow who would vary a tender? A man in any part of the country, in my constituency or any other, who tendered for any contract would certainly find out the amounts of the other tenders and if he could not find it out himself, would he not ask some member of this House to find out for him. Now you might say that after the tender is let there is no recourse. But at the same time, is it not asking too much of our credulity to believe that any minister would be so innocent as to confirm a tender that was not the lowest unless he had some very good reason to believe that it was in the public interest to confirm it, especially in view of the fact that he might have to tell this House at any moment what the tender was, and all the particulars concerning it? Looking at all the circumstances surrounding this motion, it seems to me that it has been moved for the sole purpose of casting a reflection on the minister of this government, and for that reason I shall vote for the amendment.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). I have listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Nesbitt), and I have only to say that if his theory is carried out to its logical fulfilment, we would do away with all safeguards, and make everything a matter of trust in all the departments of the government, as well as in all corporations, leaving everything as a mere matter of confidence in a person's integrity. I think that would not be a very successful way of conducting departmental business. I do not think my hon. friend the Postmaster General would let it go that way in his large department. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island seemed to feel as if it were altogether out of place to say anything more in criticism of departmental uprightness and the like of that, because the matter had been brought up in the general elections and the government had been returned to power. Well, that is a rough and ready, but not the most thorough, vindication of the acts of the government on the ground that they carried a majority of the constituencies.

But I wish to make a little more clear what I am afraid the Minister of Public Works left a little hazy with reference to the McAvity affair. It is important that we should have a proper conception of the facts, so far as we can get them. Now what are the facts? If we go by affidavits, and if we place alongside the facts of the affidavit of Mr. Mayes the affidavit of Mr. McAvity, and what he met in Mr. Mayes' affidavit, and what he did not meet that is what he denies and what he practically admits.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOSTER. No, I must make my statement now. I have known my hon. friend a long time pretty well, and I know he would like to break in and make a speech of about fifteen minutes every ten minutes of the time which is allowed me, and I do not propose to let him do it. By and by, if I see there is a good opening for my hon. friend, I will let him in. Now there was a man by the name of Mayes, who lived in the city of St. John. Mayes was a contractor, and owned dredging plant and apparatus, or hired dredging plant and apparatus—that was his business. There was a man in the city of St. John by the name of McAvity, who was not a dredger and did not own a dredging plant, and had not up to that time, or since so far as I know, had anything to do as a part owner, or whole owner, or in any other capacity in reference to dredging. But Mr. McAvity was high in the councils of the Liberal party; he was the high chief muck-a-muck in the city of St. John; he was the great head of the patronage distribution in the city of St. John. There was a man in the city of St. John by the name of Wm. Pugsley, at that time Attorney General of the province. Now Mr. Mayes, the dredger and contractor, put in a tender for dredging at the rate, I think, of 50 cents per cubic yard. That tender was not accepted. It is immaterial whether there were other tenders or not. Mr. Mayes went to Mr. Pugsley, who was at that time the Attorney General of the province, and recounted his difficulties. Mr. Pugsley, according to Mr. Mayes' affidavit, told Mr. Mayes to go and talk it over with Mr. McAvity. Well, we can each take what each one wishes as to what was the significance of talking it over with McAvity. Mayes took the advice, according to the affidavit, and talked it over with McAvity. McAvity, who was not a contractor, is not a dredge owner, said to Mayes, I am going to Ottawa, meet me at Ottawa on a certain date. Mayes went to Ottawa, found McAvity there, met him on that same day. McAvity says to Mayes, What are you willing to do this for?—according to the affidavit—and Mayes says, I tendered for it at 50 cents per cubic yard, I can do it for that, and I am willing to take it now for that. McAvity says to Mayes: Why not make it 55 cents, and give the other five cents to me? Mayes says to McAvity, What will you do? Will you join me in capital in buying a dredge, or hiring a dredge, and help me out in that way? If you will, we will go in together and share the profits. McAvity said to Mayes, I am not in that business, but if you get the contract you can easily raise the money at the banks. They went to the minister of the department, the minister being the hon. Charles Hyman. Mr. Mayes sat down outside, and McAvity went inside to the holy of holies, or the holiest of the holy, whichever you prefer. After having been in there for a certain time, McAvity came back and said to Mayes, I want you to go in and see the minister, and explain to him how it would be better to get a contract for 400,000 cubic yards—they had been talking about the expense—and tell him that if you went to the expense of getting large machinery you ought to have a heavy contract in order to make your profits. Mayes agreed, the affidavit went on, and explained the whole matter thoroughly to Mr. Hyman, and came back. Then Mayes and McAvity talked about the matter, and Mayes said to McAvity: Well, we will think about it, and see about the agreement, and the like of that. McAvity, according to the affidavit, drew out an agreement ready for signature, and said, I have an agreement here, why not sign it now and get the thing arranged? Then the two talked with reference to the part McAvity was to take, and it ended in this, according to the affidavit, that McAvity promised nothing more than that he would use his influence to get a large contract of 400,000, or so, yards, but he would not take part in hiring the dredge or in going into the business on the partnership plan. Then, according to the affidavit, Mayes said to McAvity: Well, what is your part in this? Oh, well, said McAvity, write whatever you please, write something and I will sign it. And here is the regular agreement, written by Mr. Mayes and signed by Mr. George McAvity:

And whereas the said George McAvity is to receive moneys out of the performance of the said contract, he agrees and promises to use his influence and endeavours with the Minister of Public Works or office of the government at Ottawa, to increase the number of yards to be dredged at the aforesaid site of contract.

(Sgd.) GEORGE A. McAVITY.

I am not reading the whole affidavit; that, I think, is about the essence of the affidavit. The hon. Minister of Public Works places a great deal of weight upon the fact that there was a mistake in the affidavit, that it was incorrect.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? Does my hon. friend vouch for that being an affidavit that has been sworn to?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose I shall have to read it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is not the question.

Mr. FOSTER. (reading)

I, Gershon S. Mayes, of the parish of Lancaster, in the city and county of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick, contractor, do solemnly declare that on the first day of September, 1905, on the advice of Hon. William Pugsley, who was then Attorney General of the province of New Brunswick and is now Minister of Public Works of Canada, I had a conversation with George McAvity of the city of St. John, in said province, merchant, relative to tenders for dredging which was then to be done in the harbour of St. John by the Public Works Department of Canada of which Hon. C. S. Hyman was then minister.

Then continues a recital of the whole matter and finally:

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me at the city of St. John, in the city and county of St. John, this 12th day of October, A.D. 1908.

W. H. HARRISON.

A commissioner for taking affidavits to be read in the Supreme Court.

That is all I have to read; let it be interpreted as it may. But the Minister of Public Works says: Do you not see there is an absolute error. On October 15, 1907, said the original document, I received a telephone message from Dr. Pugsley asking me to call in and see him next day. The Minister of Public Works says that is an error. The very evening that the statement is made Mr. Mayes comes out and says:

St. John, October 13, 1908.

Hon. Wm. Pugsley,
Minister of Public Works,
St. John, N.B.

I notice by this evening's papers that you comment on my affidavit stating that you obtained $2,000 from me on October 16, 1907. The date should be October 16, 1905, and the error is entirely a typographical one which I regret and have taken the proper steps to have corrected.

I remain yours, &c.,
G. S. MAYES.

It was unfortunate that a mistake should have been made, but we are all mortal and we all make mistakes; that is, nearly all of us make mistakes and it does not cast a reflection upon Mr. Mayes or derogate one single iota from the real gist of the statement that he made a typographical error, which, as soon as it came to his notice, he immediately made good and gave the right date. Now, Sir, what is the statement? It is that Mr. McAvity received from Mr. Mayes $35,933 of the public money of Canada. Mayes had tendered to do the work at fifty cents. He came to Ottawa prepared to tender at fifty cents. The man that Mr. William Pugsley had told him to go and talk it over with met him at Ottawa and said to this man Mayes, according to the affidavit: Why not make it fifty-five cents? The work is not worth more than fifty cents, you can do it for fifty cents, but where do I come in if you only get fifty cents for it? Make it fifty-five cents, do exactly the same work and no more and let me have the five cents. The addition was made and he got it. Now, Sir, what happens? Mr. McAvity makes an affidavit. I have it here. Mr. McAvity takes good care, neither in his affidavit nor anywhere else to dispute in any way the fact that he had received five cents additional and that he had put it into his own pocket, but in his affidavit he tries to justify it by saying that he had a good many conferences and a good deal of trouble and bother about it and therefore he felt justified in taking that amount of money. These are the plain facts of the case. It is not true that Mr. William Pugsley was exactly in the same official position in 1905 that he occupied in 1907, but Mr. Gershon Mayes asseverates in the statement he makes that Mr. William Pugsley, the Minister of Public Works, when he came into office, knew that an arrangement of this kind was being carried on between Mayes and McAvity and that he endeavoured in various ways to facilitate McAvity's interest. Now, Mr. William Pugsley, the Minister of Public Works, may deny that and he has a perfect right to the denial, but this vital statement made by Mayes, and the great main truth is that a middleman comes in and takes $35,993 of the people's money for which he made no return of service to the public, it is sworn that he did, it is not denied and it is in fact admitted. The Minister of Public Works, the guardian of the department, the Minister of Justice, and the Prime Minister himself all know it, and yet when they were asked by a member of parliament representing the people whose money had thus been wrongly taken as to whether they have done anything or intend to do anything what was the minister's answer yesterday? No action has been taken by the government. Here is the minister's answer:

The government is not aware that it has a claim against the parties referred to for the amount mentioned or any amount. The records of the Department of Public Works show that tenders for the dredging referred to were called for by public advertisement and that the contract was awarded in a regular and proper manner to the lowest tenderer.

Two, 3 and 4 answered by the reply to No. 1.

The questions asked in Nos. 2, 3 and 4 are these:

2. Has the repayment of this money been demanded?

3. Does the government propose to take action for the recovery of this money?

Mr. FOSTER.

4. Has the government consulted with or taken the opinion of the Department of Justice as to its rights?

These were the questions asked and the minister's reply is that the government is not aware and that the government does not propose to ask anybody to make it aware. What I put up to the Minister of Public Works and the First Minister is that here is $35,900 of the people's money gone astray. If the affidavit is true, if it be true that McAvity has not gainsaid it by affidavit and he has not and would not, if it is true that he has practically acknowledged that he has got it and there is no doubt in the minds of the people generally that he has, what does this government propose to do about it? It may declare that it has no responsibility, and make no move, but as long as there is a shred of conscience or an ounce of consistent thinking and of principle in the people of Canada the position will be taken, the position will be forced, and the position will make way for itself that these are not the proper guardians of the people's money.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that a question which simply deals with the best mode of treating public tenders cannot be discussed without dragging in what seem to me to be irrelevant matters, and without making statements which are calculated to draw the House away from the real issue which is involved in the motion and in the amendment before the House. What the amendment proposes to do is to provide for everything which I think has been suggested this afternoon as being really necessary to safeguard the public interest. It has been urged, and properly urged, that it is desirable that when the tenders are received that they shall be under seal; that they shall be addressed to the proper officer of the department, and that when received they shall be placed under lock and key until the time shall come to open them. All that has been provided for by the regulation which has been passed by the Governor in Council and of which the House has been informed. We cannot of course guard in every way against the dishonesty on the part of an official, because if an official should desire to be dishonest he might by some mysterious means have the envelopes opened and after examining the tenders have one substituted for another, but it has never been suggested that this has been done or is likely to be done. The regulation provides that those tenders shall be kept under lock and key; that they shall be kept secret until the time comes for their being opened by the minister and the deputy, or by two of the principal officials of the department in case the minister may happen to be absent. It does seem to me that my hon. friends opposite have not shown that the public interest can be any better safeguarded by having present when the tenders are opened, three officials of the department instead of the minister and the deputy minister as is provided for in the regulation. The only other question which seems to be involved as a matter of principle in the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid) is as to whether or not it is desirable that the contractors who have put in tenders shall all be invited to be present at the opening of the tenders. My hon. friend (Mr. Lake) who dealt with the subject very fairly, stated he had a knowledge of the course which is pursued by the British Government in such matters and he says that so far as he knows it has never been customary in England to have the contractors present at the opening of tenders. I have shown to this House that never since confederation has it been suggested that it was desirable that the contractors should be invited to be present, and never has that course been considered advisable by any provincial government in Canada. I ventured to suggest reasons why such a course should not be followed, and notwithstanding all that has been said by hon. members opposite I affirm that in my opinion no good purpose would be served, but on the contrary that it would give an opportunity to contractors to collude together to withdraw their tenders if they saw fit, and to force the department either to accept a higher tender to the disadvantage of the country, or to reject all the tenders and invite new ones. My hon. friend from North Lanark (Mr. Haggart) told the House that there never had been any wrong-doing or any suggestion of wrong-doing in connection with the Intercolonial Railway when he was a minister. I do not question the accuracy of the statement which the hon. gentleman makes, but I do say that the very course which was pursued by him is the course which is being pursued to-day. In the case of all supplies which are required for the Intercolonial railway every opportunity is given to obtain them at the lowest market price; the tenders are opened by responsible officers of the department and if any question arises which requires expert advice that expert advice is obtained. Now, let me ask my hon. friend—and I think he will answer with that spirit of fairness which he is always disposed to manifest, let me ask him why he wants that course departed from so far as the Intercolonial is concerned? The hon. gentleman said it is because there is a feeling in the public mind that there is something wrong in the way that tenders are now opened, but let me tell the hon. gentleman that if there is any such suspicion in the public mind it has been created by the disposition on the part of gentlemen opposite to make insinuations without any evidence to support them, and to make charges of graft and wrong-doing without having the slightest tittle of evidence to support such reckless statements. During the last campaign these insinuations were pressed from every platform in Canada, and the result of the election shows that the majority of the people believe that this government and the various members of it are endeavouring honestly and conscientiously and to the best of their ability to discharge the important duties they have been called upon to discharge. Now, let me say to my hon. friends opposite, and I say it with all sincerity, that although a great deal has been insinuated against my department, it is open to any member of this House to make a motion for the bringing down of the orders in council awarding contracts for Public Works in this country, and they shall be readily brought down. Since I have been a minister, contracts have been awarded involving the expenditure of a good many millions of dollars, and if a motion is made I am quite willing they shall all be submitted to the closest scrutiny of this House or of any member of a committee of this House. I have pursued the course followed by my predecessors in office since this government came into power, and public tenders are called for by public advertisement for all works which involve an expenditure of over $5,000, except of course in cases of emergency where there has not been time to call for public tenders, and in these cases the special circumstances must be submitted to His Excellency in Council and must be passed upon. Now, Liberals and Conservatives alike have put in tenders for these works, and when hon. gentlemen opposite say that Conservatives will not tender for Public Works at the present time they are stating that which they have no knowledge of and which the facts will prove to be untrue. Conservative contractors do tender equally with Liberal contractors and if the Conservative contractor happens to put in the lowest tender and if he is a responsible contractor certified to by the officers of my department as capable of carrying out the work, he is given the contract in every instance. If hon. gentlemen desire to have the records brought down they will be able to see that the statement which I now make is true, I believe the same applies all through the departments of government. Hon. gentlemen opposite have given as one reason why the tenderers should be notified to be present when the tenders are opened, that there was no more danger of collusion and no more danger of the withdrawing of tenders than there is at present. But there is this difference. Under the present system the tenderers do not know until the contract is awarded what is the bid of the other tenderers, whereas if they were present they would know. Under the present system they do not know, unless the other tenderers choose to tell them, and so they cannot say what would be the result of withdrawing their tender and refusing to enter into the contract. But if they knew that one or two tenders were for small amounts, and others were for larger amounts, it would be the easiest thing in the world for them to collude together.

Mr. HAGGART. Does it not strike the minister that they might ask one another and find out after the tenders were in?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is true, but contractors are not in the habit of asking each other after the tenders are in. They do not know what to do, and it is in the public interest that they should not know what to do, until the lowest tenderer is notified and is invited to enter into the contract. That makes the bargain, and when the contract is once entered into there is the security to the Crown for the performance of the contract.

Now, having dealt thus with the resolution which is before the House, let me refer briefly to some matters which have been brought up by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and by some other gentlemen. I had supposed, Sir, that, with the recollection of what took place in the province of New Brunswick in the recent election, my hon. friend from North Toronto would have been the last man to want to refer to the matters which were discussed during that election, and upon which the people, to the best of their ability, passed their judgment and rendered their verdict. The hon. gentleman has referred to what he is pleased to call an affidavit made by Mr. Gershon S. Mayes. Let me ask my hon. friend if he can vouch for the paper from which he has read having been an affidavit and having been actually sworn to or declared to?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Mayes vouched for it himself.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was to my hon. friend from North Toronto that I addressed the question.

Mr. FOSTER. I have read what I have read, and my hon. friend may take whatever he chooses out of it. After he makes his speech he will get his answer.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend declines to answer my question. Let me say that I and others are deeply interested in knowing whether this alleged affidavit was actually sworn to, and, in case it was, we are anxious to know in whose possession it is to-day, so that it may be available for use in the courts of justice. Let me say to you, Sir, that in the city of St. John during the recent election it was whispered to me that upon a certain night, when a great Conservative meeting was to be held in St. John, a meeting which was to be graced with the presence of Sir James Whitney, the premier of Ontario, and I think the Hon. Mr. Roblin, the premier of Manitoba, as well as other distinguished gentlemen, a bombshell was to be exploded which would drive me as Minister of Public Works out of public life. Well, I was curious to know what was this bombshell that was to drive me out of public life, because I may say to my hon. friend from North Toronto that though a good many things have been said against me by himself and by gentlemen who have been associated with him, it has always been a sort of protection to me in the public mind that I had many early and pleasant associations with my hon. friend. We happened to have gone from the same county, almost from the same settlement, in one of the country districts of New Brunswick, to the university when we were boys. We went in the same year and entered the same class, and it was always my pride that I was able to follow my hon. friend, even at some little distance, along the lines of good conduct.

Mr. FOSTER. You were safe there.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and when these charges were made against me from time to time, particularly in the last election, my friends and the people generally would say: 'Oh, well, you can't be so bad as they say you are, because we never thought you would be as good as Mr. Foster, and think of the horrible things they say about him.' Well, Mr. Speaker, you will pardon the digression, but on this occasion I was curious to know what was to be said about me, and I had a friend go to this great meeting and see what was this terrible bombshell that was to be exploded. I found that it was in what purported to be an affidavit or declaration, which was read by the Hon. Mr. Hazen, the premier of New Brunswick, and the leader of the Liberal-Conservative party of that province; and among other things it stated that in the month of October, 1907, after I had become Minister of Public Works, and was charged with the duty of administering the affairs of that department and deciding as to contracts which might or might not be let by the department, Mr. Gershon S. Mayes, a contractor, had an interview with me or had been interviewed by me, and that I had intimated to him that it would be very desirable for him to have a friend at Ottawa to watch his interests, and that he gave to me at that time, when I was Minister of Public Works, the sum of $2,000. That alleged affidavit, as I have said, was read by Mr. Hazen at this great Conservative meeting, it appeared in the papers the next morning, it was telegraphed that night throughout Canada and I believe appeared in every Conservative paper from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what my friends in the various sections of this country thought; I do not know what my honoured leader thought; but I know what I thought. I realized that if my leader thought there was a shadow of foundation of truth in that statement, I should not have been able to remain a member of this cabinet for a single day. The charge was made against me by the premier of New Brunswick that in October, 1907, after I had become the Minister of Public Works, charged with protecting the interests of the people of this country, I had been so recreant to my duty that I had received a large sum of money from a contractor who was seeking for business with the department over which I have the honour to preside. Sir, a more infamous charge was never made against a public man. On the following morning I called up the secretary of the Liberal-Conservative Association, Mr. Harrison, before whom the affidavit purported to have been signed; for, as it appeared in the morning paper it did not purport to have been signed by Mr. Mayes. I asked Mr. Harrison about this alleged affidavit and said: 'Surely there must be some mistake about it, because I had no transactions of any kind or description with Mr. Mayes after I ceased to practise my profession in St. John and entered the Dominion parliament.' He said he did not know that there was any mistake about it, but he would look the matter up. Later on I ascertained that the date when I had received moneys from Mr. Mayes, instead of being 1907, should have been 1905, two years before, at a time when I was not a member of parliament, not Minister of Public Works, but was acting as solicitor and counsel for Mr. Mayes in important matters.

It is said that Mr. Mayes corrected the statement he had made, but let me say this, that neither Mr. Hazen, the leader of the Conservative party in New Brunswick, nor, as far as I was able to observe, any leading member of the Conservative party or any leading Conservative newspaper, which had been the means of circulating this vile slander regarding myself and spreading is from the Atlantic to the Pacific —not one of these parties ever took any effective step to correct the mistake they had made, to express regret for it and set me right before the people of Canada, and it remained for me, as best I could, to vindicate myself and make the truth known. But, Mr. Speaker, you know that a lie travels very fast and it takes the truth a long time to overtake it; and throughout this Dominion, there are no doubt many people who, even to the day of the election, believed that I was guilty of the crime charged against me by the leader of the Conservative party in New Brunswick.

Regarding the answer I made to the question of my hon. friend, I do not see how any other answer could have been given. Assuming the statement he made to-day to be true, what does it prove? All that it proves is that, upon the advice of Mr. McAvity, Mr. Mayes put in a tender at a larger figure than he thought, before he left St. John, he could have tendered to do the work for. The tenders which had been called for previously had been called for a good many weeks before that time and were subject to conditions which Mr. Mayes was not able to comply with. One of the conditions was that parties tendering should have a dredge in Canada at the time of filing the tender with which they could perform the work. What Mr. Mayes wanted Mr. McAvity to do, so I understood, was to endeavour to get that disability removed because there was no suitable dredge in the maritime provinces capable of doing the work, and thus enable him to bring in a dredge from the United States. True, Mr. Mayes came to me as his solicitor, who had been his legal adviser in important matters for a number of years, and asked me could I suggest any business man in the city of St. John with whom he might associate in his dredging operations. I mentioned Mr. McAvity as one of the leading business men in the city of St John.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will those hon. gentlemen who are good enough to applaud my remarks tell me why I should not name Mr. McAvity? Mr. McAvity was then, as he is now, a prominent business man in the city of St. John. More than that, I had known Mr. McAvity as a man whose integrity had never been questioned and with whom it was an advantage for any one to be associated in the carrying on of any undertaking involving financial strength, the exercise of judgment, and qualities of that character. I recommended Mr. Mayes to see Mr. McAvity. I supposed that Mr. McAvity was joining in the undertaking by putting up a part of the capital; but as to what the arrangements were, I never had any knowledge until certain statements were made by Mr. Mayes during the recent election contest in the city of St. John. What do the records show? They show that when the tenders were previously called, there were two or three—two if I remember rightly. One was by Haney & Miller from Toronto at one dollar and thirty-five per cubic yard. The other, that of Mr. Mayes, was for fifty cents per cubic yard.

Mr. FOSTER. 55 cents.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, 50 cents; but one of the conditions was that the tenderer must have a dredge in Canada, at the time of filing the tender, prepared to undertake the work. Mr. Mayes could not comply with that condition. Several weeks after new tenders were called for; and upon representations made to the then Minister of Public Works, and in the exercise of his judgment as minister, being convinced, I presume, that there were no dredges in the maritime provinces capable of doing the work, he omitted that condition and tenders were called for without that stipulation.

An hon. MEMBER. Who was then Minister of Public Works?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. Hyman was then the Minister of Public Works and the records of my department show that there were only two tenders sent in—one from Haney and Miller of Toronto, who tendered again, and their tender, if I remember rightly, was at $1.25 per yard; and the other was from G. S. Mayes at 55 cents, being a difference of 70 cents between the two. Let me ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether—even supposing that my hon. friend from North Toronto has any ground for entertaining so poor an opinion of the late Minister of Public Works as to suppose he would inform Mr. McAvity of what was in the other tender—let me ask you whether it is at all likely that such a wide difference would have been left between the two tenders as the very big one of 70 cents per cubic yard?

Mr. FOSTER. Did I insinuate anything of that kind?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman said that it is the duty of the government to proceed against Messrs. McAvity and Mayes for the recovery of the sum of $35,000; and that statement, if based at all, must be based on the allegation that the late Minister of Public Works was in collusion with these gentlemen to defraud the treasury. Let me tell my hon. friend—and I tell him as one who has some little knowledge of law and what any respectable barrister will tell him—unless the late Minister of Public Works was in collusion with these gentlemen to defraud the treasury, the government has no claim against either one of them, because the tender of Mr. Mayes was the lowest and was accepted, being the lowest, by the then Minister of Public Works. No claim could therefore be made by the Crown to-day against Mr. McAvity or Mr. Mayes.

Let me say something further with regard to this matter, and I shall be glad at any time to have it fully discussed. The affair did not end there. This affidavit, or alleged affidavit, which was read at this public meeting, was not all there was to this matter, because, although Mr. Mayes has said in it that he was willing to do the work at 50 cents per cubic yard, it is to my knowledge, as Minister of Public Works, that Mr. Mayes was persistent in his demand that I should increase the contract price to 90 cents per cubic yard. Let me to say to my hon. friend that the statement I made in the city of St. John during that campaign, after the matter had been referred to—which statement is borne out by the records of the department—was that from time to time after the contract was entered into and after I became minister, Mr. Mayes was persistent in the demand that I should increase the contract price to 90 cents, that being the price he was charging for doing other work. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Mayes was willing to do the work for 50 cents, yet we find him afterwards contending that it was worth 90 cents; and the principal reason why this attempt was made by Mr. Mayes to destroy me politically was my refusal to yield to the solicitations of himself and Mr. McAvity. I held them to their bargain. They claimed that they were losing money, but I forced them to carry out their contract—and I believe that, under my management of the department, so far as this contract is concerned, the government got good service and value.

At six o'clock the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1909.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 17) to amend and revise the Immigration Act—Mr. Oliver.

Bill (No. 22) respecting the hours of labour on public works—Mr. Verville.

ANIMALS' CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 18) to amend the Animals' Contagious Diseases Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the hon. gentleman make a brief explanation?

Mr. FISHER. This is but a short Bill for the purpose of remedying a misarrangement of this Act in the revised statutes and to restore the provisions as they were in the old Act before the statutes came into force.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Were they changed in any important particular in the revised statutes ?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, there was a transposition from one clause to another of the limit of the valuation of where compensation should be paid in case of slaughter, thus changing the amount fixed. This restores the amount to that provided for in the old Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 19) to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the hon. gentleman explain ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The object of this Bill is to amend the Post Office Act as regards lost registered letters or parcels. There are two kinds of registered letters in the postal service. We have an international registered letter and a domestic registered letter. At the last congress of the International Postal Union held at Rome, three years ago, it was decided that when a registered letter or parcel sent from abroad was lost in the country to which it was addressed, the postal authorities of the country should compensate the sender or, at the request of the sender, the addressee, to the extent of fifty francs. England and Canada have adhered to that regulation and therefore we are bound to compensate for the loss of any registered letter or parcel coming from any foreign country whenever it is lost in Canada. What we are doing towards compensating foreigners to the extent of fifty francs we intend to do for our own people. This regulation exists in the United States and also in Great Britain. In Great Britain, if a registered letter or parcel is lost, the sender, or the addressee, at the request of the sender, must be compensated to the extent of £5. If the loss is less than £5 the amount of the loss is paid. In the United States the sender, or the addressee of a lost parcel or letter is also compensated to the extent of $25. The Canadian postal authorities intend to do for Canada what they now do for foreigners.

Mr. HENDERSON. May I ask the minister if he proposes to make any reduction in the postage on drop letters in rural districts which was referred to last session?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Well I have just explained the objects of this Bill. We may have occasion to discuss later on the question which my hon. friend is raising now.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 20) to amend the Government Railways Act.

Mr. HAGGART. Explain.

Mr. GRAHAM. It will be remembered by those who were present during last session that an amendment was made to the Government Railways Act to make the procedure for the collection of damages for loss of any kind more in conformity with that provided for by the General Railway Act. I find that two or three clauses were left out of that amendment last year that should have been embodied in it in order to make it more in harmony with the General Railway Act. This is to remedy that difficulty.

Mr. CROCKET. Does the Bill give the Exchequer court jurisdiction to deal with such cases against the railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. The old Act gave the Exchequer court full power in that regard.

Mr. CROCKET. What I meant to ask was, if the Bill gave the courts of the provinces jurisdiction in such cases?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a large question and one that involves the principle of whether the Crown shall forfeit its right to have certain cases tried before the Exchequer court. We are not dealing with that in this Bill; we are simply trying to make the Act of last year clearer.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals), moved for leave to introduce (Bill No. 21) to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Please explain.

Mr. GRAHAM. This Bill is intended to place the water-powers, the development of which is being largely increased, particularly along the Trent Valley canal, under government control in respect to rates to be paid by the public to the lessees of the government. There is a clause in the Bill providing that any disputes as to these rates shall be settled by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is not government control.

Mr. LENNOX. Is that confined to the Trent canal?

Mr. GRAHAM. I mentioned the Trent Valley canal because the situation there was the special reason for introducing the Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is it to apply to all government canals?

Mr. GRAHAM. The Bill is general in its terms.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN asked :

1. What was the number of (a) permanent employees, and (b) temporary employees respectively in the service or employment of the government upon or in connection with (a) the Intercolonial railway, and (b) the Prince Edward Island railway upon (a) the first day of each month, (b) the 15th day of each month, and (c) the 31st day of December, all in the year 1908?

2. What was the total amount of the pay-roll of each of the said railways for each of the said months?

3. Were salaries or wages raised or lowered for either permanent or temporary employees during the said year upon the said railways or either of them?

4. If so, on what occasions and to what extent on each occasion?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). This is a large question and we have to get our information from Moncton which takes a little time. We have asked for the information.

THE INSURANCE COMMISSION

Mr. MACDONELL asked :

1. Why was not the evidence of British actuaries taken by Mr. Shepley in England in the Insurance Commission not included in the printed evidence of the commission?

2. What did this evidence cost the country?

3. Why was not the evidence or the report of Mr. Dawson, actuary of the commission, included in the printed evidence?

4. Was the evidence above mentioned placed on the table of the House last year together with the printed volumes of evidence? If not, why not?

Hon. WM. PATERSON (for Minister of Marine).

1. No evidence of British actuaries was taken by Mr. Shepley in England in connection with the Royal Commission on Life Insurance. During the adjournment of the Commission in August, 1906, Mr. Shepley, then in London, invited with the approval of the Commisioners British actuaries to give expressions of opinion on matters relevant to the inquiry. A shorthand report of these verbal opinions, not given under oath, was taken, and the extended notes, together with a written memorandum subsequently submitted by one of these actuaries, constitutes exhibit No. 668, in the record of the evidence returned to Parliament. Exhibit No. 668 is now in the possession of the Clerk of the House of Commons. These opinions were read before the Commissioners and were made an exhibit (Volume 4, p. 3211 of the printed evidence). The practice adopted by the Commission in this case of incorporating expert opinion in the record by exhibit had previously been followed in at least one somewhat similar instance.

2. The cost of obtaining these opinions was $62.85. This is exclusive of any charge made by Mr. Shepley for his services in eliciting these views. Inasmuch as Mr. Shepley was paid a general fee for all services it is not possible to state what sum, if any, is applicable to this particular service.

3. Mr. Dawson, actuary to the Commission gave no evidence before the Commission. He acted altogether in an advisory capacity, and gave the Commission information and advice on such actuarial matters as were referred to him. Such information and advice formed no part of the records of the Commission.

4. Answered by the foregoing.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AT TRURO.

Mr. STANFIELD asked:

How many men, not on the regular staff, were employed at Truro on the Intercolonial Railway during the months of September, October, November and December, 1908, respectively?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). We have to send to Moncton for the information to enable us to answer such a question as this, and often the officials at Moncton have to send to the outside stations, all of which requires certain time. When I ask any of these questions to stand it does not mean that we have not taken steps to get a reply.

Question to stand.

ROYAL MINT.

Mr. ARMSTRONG asked:

1. What is the amount of gold, silver and copper coins manufactured by the branch of the Royal Mint in Canada and the amount of said coin not disposed of since it commenced operation up to January 1, 1909?

2. How much silver in its crude state has been offered for sale to the management of the Royal Mint from Canadian mines to the year 1908, and what quantity has been accepted?

3. What reason does the government give for not purchasing all the silver in its crude state that is offered?

4. What is the system used in deciding from whom to make purchases?

5. How many Canadian mines have sold silver to the government and what are the names of said mines and the quantity purchased from each?

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). I have been asked by the Finance Department to ask my hon. friend to allow this question to stand as a notice of motion.

Question to stand as notice of motion.

THE ROSS RIFLE.

Mr. NORTHRUP asked:

1. How many Ross rifles were accepted by the Militia Department in the year 1908?
2. How many were returned to the Ross Rifle Company in that year?
3. How many Ross rifles have been accepted up to date?
4. How many have been issued to the (a) permanent corps, (b) militia, (c) mounted police?
5. How many Ross rifles are there now in store?
6. How many of these have never been issued?
7. What is the total amount of the payment to the Ross Rifle Company to date?
8. What claims for damages have been sent in for injuries received through the use of the Ross rifle?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). I have had to send to Quebec for the information; I think I will have it on Monday.

Question to stand.

G.T.R.—MADOC AND ELDORADO BRANCH.

Mr. NORTHRUP asked:

1. Has the government taken any steps to secure the re-opening and operation of the railroad between Madoc and Eldorado and that it should be completed and continuously operated?
2. Has the government taken any steps to recover from the Grand Trunk Railway the bonus of over $2,000 paid to it on condition that the line of railway between Madoc and Eldorado should be completed and continuously operated?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). 1 and 2. No.

WIRE FENCING.

Mr. TAYLOR asked:

1. Did the Department of Railways and Canals call for tenders for 144 miles, more or less, of wire fencing during the summer or fall of 1908? If so, were the tenders asked for by public advertisement or by circular?
2. How many tenders were received and from whom?
3. Was the contract let, and at what price and to whom?
4. What quantity of wire fencing was purchased by the Department of Railways and Canals during 1908, either by tender or otherwise, and what were the prices paid per mile?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). This is somewhat a large question; there is no objection whatever to answering it, but I would ask my hon. friend to let it stand as notice of motion for a return.

Question to stand as notice of motion.

GOVERNMENT DEPOSITS IN BANKS.

Mr. MACDONELL asked:

1. In what bank or banks in Canada does the government deposit its moneys?
2. If the government deposits in one bank, or in a limited number of banks only, what is the reason for such discrimination, and what advantage does the country derive from such preference to such bank or banks?
3. Have all the chartered banks doing business in Canada, an opportunity of receiving government deposits, and doing business with the government, on the same terms as the bank or banks with whom the government deposits and does business aforesaid?

Hon. WM. PATERSON (for the Minister of Finance):

1. Montreal, British North America, City and District Savings, Commerce, Dominion, Eastern Townships, Hamilton, Hochelaga, Imperial, Merchants, Molson's, Nationale, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ottawa, Provinciale, Quebec, Royal, Standard, St. Stephens, Toronto, Union of Canada, Union of Halifax.

2 and 3. By order in council of the 27th October, 1885, it was declared not desirable that the number of banking accounts should be extended. Since that time no new accounts have been opened with any bank.

DRY DOCK SUBSIDIES ACTS.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

1. Have any new subsidies been arranged for under section 3 of the Dry Dock Subsidies Act of 1908? If so, to what companies and where are docks to be constructed?
2. Have any additional subsidies been arranged for under section 4 of said Act? If so, with what companies and at what points?
3. What will be the annual expenditure under each head?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works):

1, 2 and 3. No.

PROHIBITION OF CIGARETTES.

Mr. BLAIN asked:

Will the government at this session pass legislation to prohibit or restrict the sale of cigarettes?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is not the intention of the government to introduce this session any legislation in amendment of the legislation of last session on this subject.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—STATION FREIGHT CLERKS.

Mr. MACDONELL asked:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) :

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes. There have been no subsequent orders dealing with the same question. Order herewith :

PRIVY COUNCIL, CANADA.

At the Government House at Ottawa,
Wednesday, the 27th day of May, 1908.
Present.

His Excellency
In Council;:

Whereas during the present session of parliament an Act has been passed repealing subsection 1, of section 30 of the Immigration Act, chapter 93 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, and substituting the following provision therefor:

'30. The Governor in Council may, by proclamation or order, whenever he considers it necessary or expedient, prohibit the landing in Canada of any specified class of immigrants or of any immigrants who have come to Canada otherwise than by continuous journey from the country of which they are natives or citizens and upon through tickets purchased in that country.'

And whereas it is considered expedient forthwith to prohibit the landing in Canada of immigrants who have come to Canada otherwise than as set forth in the said provision;

Therefore His Excellency in Council is pleased to order that from and after the date hereof the landing in Canada shall be and the same is hereby prohibited of any immigrants who have come to Canada otherwise than by continuous journey from the country of which they are natives or citizens, and upon through tickets purchased in that country.

(Sgd.) RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. LENNOX asked :

1. Was there an order in council passed during the session of 1907-8 by which certain immigrants are required to have $200 on entering Canada?

2. Will the hon. the Minister of the Interior bring down this order and lay it on the table of the House?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) :

1. Yes.
2. Yes. Order herewith :

PRIVY COUNCIL, CANADA.

At the Government House at Ottawa,
Wednesday, the 3rd day of June, 1908.

Present.

His Excellency
The Governor General in Council :

Whereas by the order in council of the 18th January, 1908, it is provided that in accordance with section 20 of the Immigration Act the Immigration agent at any port shall require every immigrant, male or female, eighteen years of age or over, to have in his or her possession money to a minimum amount of twenty-five dollars, in addition to a ticket to his or her destination in Canada, unless satisfactory evidence is furnished that the immigrant is going to some definite employment or to relatives or friends already settled in Canada, who will take care of such immigrant, and by a further order in council of the 27th March, 1908, this arrangement is continued in force.

And whereas Canada is looking primarily for immigrants of an agricultural class to occupy vacant lands, and as immigrants from Asia belong as a rule to labouring classes, and their language and mode of life render them unsuited for settlement in Canada where there are no colonies of their own people to ensure their maintenance in case of their inability to secure employment, it is necessary that provision be made so that such immigrants may be possessed of sufficient money to make them temporarily independent of unfavourable industrial conditions when coming into Canada.

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council is pleased to order that the amount of money required to be in possession of each immigrant as a condition to his being permitted to enter Canada shall be and the same is hereby increased to two hundred dollars in the case of all Asiatic immigrants other than those with whose countries the government of Canada has special arrangements or those concerning whose countries special statutory regulations exist on the part of Canada, the conditions as to tickets to destination to retain as at present.

(Sgd.) RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

The Honourable
The Minister of the Interior.

LEVEL RAILWAY CROSSINGS.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac). Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I desire to ask the hon. Minister of Railways if his attention has been called to an accident which occurred at a level crossing near Kingston on the 26th inst., by which two people lost their lives and a third was seriously injured; also if he is aware that some five or six years ago an award was made by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council respecting this crossing, with a view to having a subway constructed; and, if he is aware of such an order, will he call the attention of the Board of Railway Commissioners to it, with a view to having it carried into effect. I would also like to ask if, in view of the increasing number of fatalities such as those mentioned in the papers of the 26th inst., it is the intention of the government to bring down legislation at this session effectually to safeguard the lives and property of the people of this country at level crossings.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). In reply to the very important question of my hon. friend, I might say that this question of level crossings is one of great interest, not only in this country, but in every country where there is rapid transportation by railway. It is becoming even more important in countries where there is rapid transportation not only by steam railways, but by a network of electric railways. In reply to my hon. friend's first question, my attention has not been called to the accident referred to other than by the report in the newspapers. I know the locality very well, and I understand, as my hon. friend says, that some years ago, perhaps earlier than he suggests, a decision was arrived at by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, before we had a Board of Railway Commissioners, ordering a subway to be constructed at that point. The cost was to be divided between the county, the railway company and I think the city of Kingston. The city of Kingston objected, as the crossing is outside the city, and the county took the position that it could not afford to bear its share of the cost. The matter has been in abeyance ever since. I know from experience, and from having passed over frequently the locality, that it is a dangerous spot. There are five or six tracks, then there is the local train from Kingston together with the trains coming over the Grand Trunk Railway, and it forms part of the railway yard, thus making the crossing a very dangerous one.

My hon. friend asked the larger question, namely, how we propose to deal with the level crossings.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What was the nature of the privy council order ?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not heard the particulars of it. It was the division of cost that attracted my attention more than anything else and the obtaining of information as to why the order was not carried out. This large question of level crossings is one that must be dealt with. There are level crossings of course where there is practically no danger, being in long stretches of level country where every one can see for miles, or at any rate for a sufficient distance in each direction to protect himself against an on-coming train. But the situation has become somewhat changed from what it was some years ago. During the past ten years at least, the speed of trains has been increased to meet the public demand for rapid transportation, not only the express but other trains as well, and the driver in any ordinary carriage is very easily deceived in judging the time it takes for an approaching train to reach him. Many a driver is apt to misjudge the time a running train takes to reach a crossing. A running train takes a very small period to cover a quarter of a mile, when it is running at a mile a minute ; and in this connection the public are not always blameless. We grow careless in crossing railway tracks, but this other question arises that in this as in many other cases, the public ought to be protected against themselves. It does not relieve the situation at all if we say that a man was killed on account of his own carelessness. If some provision could have been made to protect his life even against his own rashness, such protection certainly ought to have been afforded ?

This question has been engaging my attention to some extent because, being familiar by travel with almost every spot in Ontario where these accidents have occurred, my interest has been excited to a greater degree than it would be if they occurred in some remote locality. I have in my mind some crossings which are very dangerous. In driving, myself, I have stopped as much as one hundred yards from the track to listen if a train were coming because I could not see it at any distance. I have had communications in a confidential way and many conversations with the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, who, for a year or more, has been gathering data in this matter. The board have asked the different railways of Canada to give a map showing the various crossings on their line, laying particular stress on the dangerous ones, and also marking out specially these where people have actually lost their lives. But after we know all that, what is to be done ? That is what my hon. friend would like to know. He would like to know what is the position of the government in the matter. Well, I am not absolutely in a position to say what the government intends doing ; but perhaps the House will permit me just to say a word on the question without at all intimating that we have arrived at any decision.

The question of level crossings is one that involves five parties. The one most interested of course is the family to which death has come by an accident. The general public is deeply interested in having some protection at the dangerous level crossings. Then there are the municipalities, the provincial government and the federal government, and then there are the railways. In point of liability, perhaps we had better commence the other way. There are the railways, the Dominion and Provincial governments, the municipalities and the public.

Mr. LENNOX. And the railways.

Mr. GRAHAM. Of course, they are the first on the list. The opinion of the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners is that, in a great many instances, the cost should not all be borne by the railways; and the commission has the power, under the Act, to provide, and has provided in some cases, that the municipality interested shall bear some of the cost. This much ought to be borne in mind with regard to the municipality, and I am speaking without having given that phase a great deal of consideration but only casually. The municipalities have erred possibly in having allowed the railways to establish a certain right within these municipalities themselves. One right which they have allowed to be established in many instances, and which never should have been given is the right to the water front. That having been done, the Board of Railway Commissioners have held, and not without some justice, that the municipalities which have done this ought to bear a portion of the cost. The municipalities are bound to be benefited, to a certain extent, by having the danger, which they allowed to be created, removed. Then why should the provincial government give any aid or assistance to the removal of the difficulty ? I am not trying to force the hand of any provincial government, but am merely pointing out these considerations to the House which may help us in dealing with the question when the time comes. Many of our steam railways have been constructed under provincial charters. Even when they have been taken over by the federal authorities, the beginning of the trouble was created by rights given them by provincial governments ; but outside of that, the provincial governments have the same deep interest in this matter that we all have. It will be asked why should the Dominion government assist? I am not saying that the Dominion or provincial government or municipalities ought to assist. I am merely pointing out some arguments which have been placed before me and which I think worthy of consideration. If it be held by the board, and with some reason, that the railways should not bear all the cost, somebody has to bear the balance of it. Would it not then be wise to consider carefully whether, in working out a scheme—if we want to make it a success, and not merely with the object of gaining a victory over the railway companies, and municipalities, or of their gaining a victory over us, but having for our sole object the remedying of the evil and the protection of the lives of the people—would it not be wise for us to consider the situation of the federal authority—not the government but the whole parliament—in this matter ? Would it not be worth our while to consider whether we ought not to join hands with the provinces and municipalities and create some fund out of which the expenses might be apportioned, so as to avoid quarrelling or cavilling, or having a municipality refuse because the crossing was not in a city or because it could not bear that portion of the expense. We would then be in the position that when the Board of Railway Commissioners gave a decision ordering that so much be paid by the railways and so much by the province or municipality or Dominion, that order would be binding, and we would have this menace to public safety removed in a manner that would be satisfactory and not involve any great burden. This matter has been brought before me very hurriedly, and it is a very large question of which I am merely giving an expression of opinion in the hope that before the session closes we may come to a conclusion which will be satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the minister have any objection to bringing down the order that has been referred to, with any information available as to the respect, if any, in which it has not been carried out, and the reasons why it has not been carried out ?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is, the order of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will make a note of that and have it brought down.

Mr. BARKER. I would suggest, also, that the minister should bring down not only that particular case. but all similar cases, in which the order has been made and not complied with.

INQUIRY FOR PAPERS.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER (North Toronto). I would ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) if he will bring down the order in council in reference to the dredging. In answer to a question the minister said he would bring that down. I understood that he would be willing to do it without a motion.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, without a motion.

OPENING OF GOVERNMENT TENDERS.

House resumed adjourned debate on motion of Mr. J. D. Reid (Grenville):

That in the opinion of this House tenders received in any department of government should be immediately placed in safe custody under seal so as to prevent any possibility or suspicion of tampering; and should be opened in public at the time and place mentioned in the advertisement and in the presence of at least three principal officials of the department; and the persons so tendering or their duly authorized agents should be at liberty to attend at the said time and place and see such tenders opened and recorded, if they so desire.

Mr. GRAHAM.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). At the hour of adjournment yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I was speaking of the affidavit, or alleged affidavit, to which my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) had referred, and which had been read by the leader of the New Brunswick government in a meeting held in the city of St. John. I stated to the House that that affidavit contained false statements of a most outrageous character, and statements which no public man ought to have read at a public meeting, reflecting upon the character of another person, whether that person were in public life or whether he were simply a private individual, without first having seen the person to whom the affidavit referred, inquired of him as to the fact and ascertained whether the statements were true or false. In a court of law, as every lawyer knows, even where matters of small moment are involved, before a party is allowed to read an affidavit, in ordinary cases, he is compelled by the rules to furnish a copy to the opposite party, so that that party may have an opportunity of answering.

Mr. LANCASTER. Not unless it is demanded.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Whether it is demanded or not, the rules of the court provide that an affidavit should be served and notice given, so that the party concerned may have the opportunity to answer. But at this meeting to which I refer, Mr. Hazen, who is the leader of the Conservative party in New Brunswick, and who appeared at that meeting as leader—so that the Conservative party cannot shirk responsibility for his action—without notice to me and without having made any inquiry into the truth or falsehood of the statements, read, upon the eve of the election, this affidavit involving a charge which, if it were true, would have damned me for ever in the eyes of the people of Canada, and, as I have said, would have driven me at once from public life. But, as I have said, the statements were absolutely false. The statement was that a public contractor, Mr. Gershon S. Mayes had, in October, 1907, after I had become Minister of Public Works, made a payment to me of $2,000, and coupled with the payment was the intimation on my part that it would be beneficial to Mr. Mayes to have a friend at Ottawa to look after his interests in connection with his contracts with the Public Works Department. Fortunately, the nature of this statement came to my knowledge almost at once, and I was able to show that, so far from my having received any money from Mr. Mayes, or having had any transactions with him at the time stated, the last money I had received from him was at a time two years before that, and long before I had become a member of this House. It was at a time when I was acting as solicitor and counsel for Mr. Mayes, —and let me say that I had been his solicitor and counsel, advising him in important matters for a number of years before I received this payment from him. Well, as I stated yesterday, although I corrected this statement against me, and did what I could to have that correction sent broadcast over Canada (for I wished to put myself and the party to which I have the honour to belong right before the people of this country), yet—and I say this to the disgrace of the man who read that false affidavit and sought to do me that irreparable injury—he has never had the manliness to express regret for what he did; and the Conservative papers which published that false affidavit have never had the grace to express their regret for the false information they had given to the people. The reason why I asked my hon. frined (Mr. Foster)—who, let me say, has, in my opinion, done himself no credit by fathering this false affidavit and presenting it to the House—the reason, I say, why I was anxious to know whether he was aware whether an affidavit of the character he read is in existence or not is that I desired to know whether that affidavit was sworn to by the gentleman by whom it purports to be sworn to. I wanted to know whether that affidavit is in existence or not, for, if it is, it will be possible to found certain proceedings upon it, and if it is not in existence or has never been sworn to, this will not be possible. Through my solicitors, Messrs. Barnhill, Ewing & Sanford, I have made repeated applications for that affidavit. Application has been made to Mr. Hazen, who read it at the public meeting to which I have referred. He is, and was then, Attorney General of New Brunswick, and the Crown officer whose duty it would be to take action, if there had been any defrauding of the treasury of this Dominion, or any criminal offence committed, as has been suggested, by Messrs, Mayes and McAvity, or if I, as Minister of Public Works, had committed the crime so great as that charged in this affidavit. And what does Mr. Hazen say with regard to it? He says that after reading the affidavit and making these serious charges, he surrendered the affidavit back to Mr. Gershon S. Mayes. But, though my solicitors have applied to Mr. Mayes he has declined to give it and has refused to answer letters addressed to him.

There is something further to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. For hon. members opposite have gone out of their way in this discussion, and have not confined themselves to the question whether it is or is not desirable to pass the resolution, but have dragged into this discussion matters relating to these dredging transactions in the city of St. John, and also matters relating to other contracts which have been entered into by the Department of Public Works. And, that being so, it is desirable that I should deal somewhat more fully with this question than I would otherwise have felt warranted in doing. For, let me say, when the hon. members on the other side have read in this House the charges they have recklessly made throughout this country, when they insinuate that there has been graft in the conduct of affairs of the various departments of government, when they insinuate that the members of this government have not honestly and faithfully discharged their duties but have given favours to their friends, we are not only prepared to answer their charges but are prepared to carry on an aggressive campaign against them for their conduct in the elections through which this country has recently passed.

Now, Sir, what will be said of these extraordinary and outrageous affidavits? My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has stated that Mr. Mayes had entered into a contract with the Department of Public Works to perform dredging work in the harbour of St. John at 55 cents per cubic yard, which he intimated was more than it was really worth and more than Mr. Mayes would have been willing to do the work for. Upon that question let me invite the consideration of the House to this fact that later on public tenders were invited for work in the harbour of St. John of no more difficult character than that which had been previously awarded to Mr. Mayes and instead of tendering under public competition at 55 cents per cubic yard, which my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) intimates was too high a price, Mr. Mayes tendered at 90 cents and was the lowest tenderer, and was awarded the contract, with regard to which I understand no complaint has been made. After I had become Minister of Public Works, Mr. Mayes and Mr. McAvity requested me from time to time to relieve them from their 55 cent contract, claiming that the work was very hard and urging that as work had been given in the harbour of St. John to the Dominion Dredging Company also at 90 cents per cubic yard, the same price as Mr. Mayes had last tendered for in public competition, I should at least be willing to pay him for work which he claimed to be more difficult the sum of 90 cents per cubic yard. I refused to do that. I said to Mr. Mayes: You have entered into a contract and whether you gain or lose by it it is my duty to hold you to your bargain and I propose to hold you to your contract. Mr. Mayes also urged that, in addition to getting 90 cents instead of 55 cents per cubic yard, as under this contract he was getting only $5.60 per cubic yard for rock while under the new tenders, both he and the Dominion Dredging Company were getting $19.60 per cubic yard, which was claimed to be a reasonable price, he should at least be allowed $19.60 per cubic yard for the many large boulders which were being excavated at great expense. I refused his request and he became, as the correspondence which I produced before the electors will show, considerably annoyed, because he thought I was treating him harshly and not showing him that leniency he had a right to expect in view of the fact that contracts on easier terms had been let under public tender afterwards.

Later on Mr. Mayes came to the conclusion that he would like to get out of the dredging business and he made a proposal to me that if I would buy his dredge for my department at the price of $150,000 he would be perfectly satisfied and would abandon any claim. Associated with Mr. Mayes in this desire that my department should purchase his dredge was another gentleman very prominently connected with the Conservative party. I may say that Mr. Mayes is entitled to the credit of the virtue, if it be a virtue, of also being and having been for many years a prominent member of the Conservative party. Associated with him in this desire was his counsel, Ald. Baxter, of the city of St. John, who is vice-president of the Liberal-Conservative Association of the city of St. John.

Mr. CROCKET. Is the hon. minister not aware that Mr. Baxter, to whom he referred, made a solemn declaration in which he denied emphatically that he had any pecuniary interest or any interest of any kind in connection with the dredge.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CROCKET. And that he had no interest in Mr. Mayes whatever, except his interest as his solicitor and counsel.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is entirely consistent with what I said. I said that associated with him in the desire that my department should purchase the dredge was Ald. Baxter, vice-president of the Liberal-Conservative Association of St. John. Upon one occasion, shortly before the election, I received a telegram which has also been made public, signed by Mr. Baxter, stating that his client was getting very impatient and urging me to close at once for the dredge, otherwise intimating that Mr. Mayes would make it unpleasant for me. I have forgotten the exact wording of the telegram, but that is its purport. That was followed by statements which were made to me by different friends, among them by Mr. Osman, a very prominent citizen of New Brunswick, formerly Speaker of that province, who came to me one day in a state of considerable excitement, because he is a true, a warm friend of mine, and has been so for many years, informing me that Mr. Mayes had told him of his desire to sell the dredge to the department, and that unless I purchased his dredge, disclosures would very soon be made which would be of a most unpleasant character and would do great harm to the Liberal party and to the Minister of Public Works. Among other things Mr. Osman told me that he had been shown a photograph of a cheque which Mr. Mayes had given in payment of this note to which I have referred, and Mr. Osman had been led to believe that this payment had been made to me after I became Minister of Public Works. When Mr. Osman told me what Mr. Mayes had said, I replied to him: Mr. Osman, did Mr. Mayes tell you that instead of getting this money after I became Minister of Public Works, I had received it from him for legal services when I was solicitor and counsel, and two years before I became a member of the parliament of Canada? He said: No, and I said: Tell Mayes to go ahead as fast as he pleases. I have nothing to fear and nothing to conceal.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. What was the year in which the minister received the payment?

Mr. PUGSLEY. In 1905, nearly two years before I had become a member of the government.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. You said two years before the party swore you had received it?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is right, the party swore I had received it on the 15th of October, 1907, after I had become a member of the government and when I was Minister of Public Works and at a time when it would have been a crime, not merely a political crime but an actual crime of the worst character for me to have received money from a contractor having dealings with my department, but as a matter of fact the money had been received in October, 1905. I refused, as I said, to purchase the dredge, and the next thing which took place was that this affidavit was handed to the leader of the Conservative party in New Brunswick, who made himself the instrument of seeking to obtain vengeance for Mr. Mayes because I had declined to accede to his improper requests, and in the hope, as I have said, that he might do me irreparable injury. It has been said by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) that it was explained that this was a typographical error. By a typographical error I understand is meant a printer's error. Would it not strike you, Mr. Speaker, as it struck the people of my own constituency and the people of New Brunswick, as an extraordinary thing that every Tory newspaper in Canada should have committed the same typographical error and that this affidavit, as it was published in all the Conservative papers throughout Canada, declared that I had received this money in 1907 after I had become Minister of Public Works. If you look at the newspapers of that party you will find that it was discussed editorially all over Canada, and that it was intimated that the political days of the Minister of Public Works were about coming to an end. Afterwards it was stated not to have been a typographical error but an error of the typewriter. But, as I have said, the most material part of this matter is that the Conservative party, through their leaders in New Brunswick, lent themselves to this unholy operation of seeking to destroy the character of a public man, and, put it in the best way you can, they were utterly reckless as to whether the allegation was true or false, and when it became known to them that they had done this great wrong to me, a wrong as great as ever was done a public man in this country before, they had not the manliness to express their regret for the conduct of which they had been guilty.

Mr. EMMERSON. They did not even correct it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, as my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) says, they did not even correct it. But, fortunately if there is one characteristic of the people of New Brunswick which stands out more prominently than any other, it is that they love truth, they love justice and they love fair play. When the people realized what a despicable attempt was being made to win victory for the Conservative party they resented the course of hon. members opposite, or rather the associates of hon members opposite, in the province of New Brunswick, and by their verdict they showed that they did not approve of tactics of that kind.

I am not here to say that I had anything of great importance to do with the result in New Brunswick. I recognize, as our friends in this House must recognize, that it was the strong personality and splendid statesmanship of the gentleman whom we are all proud to follow that did so much in New Brunswick as it did all over Canada to ensure the success of the party. But, to me who had been made the representative of the province of New Brunswick, it was a great satisfaction that we were able to come back with eleven seats out of the thirteen to which New Brunswick is entitled in this parliament. It is a great satisfaction to me that we shall no longer be able to see our friend here who formerly represented the constituency of Kings and Albert, that our friend who formerly represented the constituency of Charlotte is also absent from the place which he occupied in this House and that our esteemed friend who formerly occupied the constituency of Queens and Sunbury is absent. The result in the province of New Brunswick not only bears testimony to the confidence which the people of that province have in our great leader, but it is also an evidence of the fact that they admire truth, justice and fair play.

Now, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House have also, as a pretended reason for passing this resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) alleged that there has been graft and wrong-doing in connection with the receipt of tenders. I endeavoured to show to the House yesterday why I think it is not in the public interest that tenderers should be invited to be present at the opening of tenders. I think I satisfied the House that there is no good reason for departing from the course which it is admitted is pursued in the mother country, has been pursued ever since confederation in this country and has been pursued and is pursued to-day by the governments of the various provinces of Canada. I believe that every right thinking man in this House will agree that I am right in the view that if a public man, or a representative of the people, does not take the course which the people have the right to expect of their representatives, when they make insinuations such as were made here yesterday, if he does not avail himself of the opportunity of making and proving his charges before the committees of this House his allegations must be regarded as having no foundation. In this instance hon. gentlemen opposite have utterly failed to prove the insinuations which they have made. In so far as the opening of tenders for timber limits is concerned, the men who, of all others, could give the truth in regard to these tenders, proved before the committee last session that there was no irregularity in regard to them, that the tenders were received in a regular and proper manner and that the timber limits were awarded to the highest tenderers in every case. I say without hesitation, and I say it emphatically that it was proved before the committee at the last session of parliament, that it was stated in this House and that it was not denied. As far as the tenders which are received by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, by the Department of Public Works and by other departments of the government are concerned, it has not been shown that in any case there had been tampering with tenders, that any tender had been substituted for another, or that the lowest tenderers had been passed over except in special circumstances where the tenderers had been unable to carry out their contract or where they had previously failed to give satisfaction, and, as I stated yesterday, in every such case, the circumstances have to be submitted to His Excellency the Governor General in Council and must be passed upon in council before the lowest tender can be passed over. Let me say to my hon. friends opposite that in every case where this course is adopted the reasons are set forth in the recommendation to council and it is open to the committees of this House and to any member of this House to have placed before either a committee of the House or the House itself the recommendation to council in which will be found stated the circumstances under which such a course is adopted. There is no secrecy about it ; every thing is open after the contract is once awarded and every paper can be brought down which any hon. member may desire to have brought down.

Now, my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middleboro) made a statement to this House yesterday and if he, with his eloquence, his fluency of speech and his apparent sincerity, repeated that statement from platform to platform in his own constituency, I cannot wonder why he is here as the representative of that constituency to-day because if the facts which he stated yesterday were true he would be able to make a strong appeal to the people of his constituency to withdraw their support from the government. What did the hon. gentleman say ? He said yesterday that very important dredging contracts involving large amounts had been let without tender, and that subsequently, upon complaint being made in this House, I had, instead of continuing these contracts, put them up to tender, and it had been claimed that a certain amount of money had been lost to the government by reason of doing it. That was the statement which my hon. friend made and it was an important statement. But let me say to my hon. friend that one very important matter in connection with it is that it lacks the essential element of truth.

Mr. MIDDLEBORO. The statement I made was that that was the statement which was made by the Liberals of that riding, and if it lacked the essential element of truth it was because they had made it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I venture to say that my hon. friend's memory does not serve him as well as I would like it to, because I cannot conceive it possible that any Liberal member could have made that statement. I have no doubt that what the Liberal members stated was this: that there were certain dredging contracts which I as Minister of Public Works had the power to renew and which I had proposed renewing, but which by reason of protests made by gentlemen on the other side, Mr. Bennett among others, and after I had given the matter consideration and remarked that the forms of the previous advertisements rendered it somewhat doubtful as to whether the tenders were not limited to one season, I declined to renew them and again called for public tenders. I have no doubt that these Liberal members stated that as a result of calling for public tenders, in this way the country was put to an expense of two or three hundred thousand dollars which it would not have been put to had I extended the original contracts. That, I assume, is the only statement which Liberal members made and that is the only statement they would be warranted in making. I cannot conceive it possible that any other statement was made by Liberal members in the constituency which my hon friend represents. These contracts which I was proposing to extend, I may say, had all of them been obtained after public tender in the first place and after keen competition. These were the facts which were before the Public Accounts committee. The tenders were produced before that committee and it appeared in every instance that the contracts had been awarded to the lowest tenderers, and that of course is a very different state of facts from that which my hon. friend (Mr. Middleboro) has presented to the House. Some gentlemen upon the other side of the House stated that Conservatives will not tender for dredging work because they feel they will not get fair play. Sir, I have yet to learn of any Conservative contractors in this country who hesitate to put in a tender to the Public Works Department. I have yet to learn the name of a single Conservative in this Dominion who claims he has been unfairly treated in connection with any tenders he may have put in to that department. I would ask my hon. friends opposite that instead of indulging in these insinuations—which do themselves an injustice as they do injustice to the members of the government; I would ask these hon. gentlemen to do me the fairness and to do the government the fairness of giving the name of a single Conservative contractor in Canada who says that his tender was improperly passed over or that he was improperly dealt with in the awarding of contracts under tender. In the most sincere way I invite hon. gentlemen opposite to do that. In the eyes of the people of Canada they must do it before they can expect the people to take any stock in the insinuations they make. Sir, it has been my pride since I have been a member of this government and in charge of one of the great spending departments, and I believe that it has been the pride of every member of this administration, so to conduct the affairs of his department as to do justice to every Canadian irrespective of his political leanings. The records of my department, and, I believe, the records of all the departments of the government, will show that this is the course we have pursued from the day we took office.

Mr. SPROULE. The commission did not say so.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The commission says nothing to the contrary so far as I remember, and if the commission does say anything to the contrary it can give no fact upon which such a statement could be based.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must ask the pardon of the House for having taken up so much time in the discussion of this matter. I have said all I think it is necessary to say, but I do just want to make a reference to what has sometimes struck me as a most extraordinary thing, namely, that gentlemen in the Conservative party should think it so important that they should get possession of the reins of government as to deem it justifiable to resort to such tactics as I have described. Those of us who are charged with the duties of government have at best a hard task. Our work is not easy; our responsibilities are great; and while it is a great source of pride to be able to serve the public, yet it does seem to me that there is nothing in the position of a minister of the Crown, which should induce people to become lost to every sense of honour and of decency in order to reach that position. I have often wondered; I wondered in St. John when that false affidavit was read; I wondered the other day when the House learned that upon the eve of the election a forged telegram had been sent to British Columbia purporting to be signed by the leader of the opposition for the purpose of influencing the electors there to render a false verdict upon the issues on which the government was appealing to the country, what reason there could be to induce men to stoop to such things. It does seem that following the example of the leaders of the Conservative party in this House (and by that I mean all the members of the opposition), in indulging in insinuations and making reckless and unfounded charges of graft, their followers throughout the country were so desirous that the Liberal government should be ousted and the Conservative party come to power, that they seemed to feel that they were justified in resorting to any tactics, even to the reading of false affidavits and the forging of telegrams, to achieve their aim.

Mr. O. S. CROCKET (York, N.B.). Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate and I would not have trespassed on the time of the House had it not been for the references which have been made by the Minister of Public Works to the so-called Mayes charges in connection with a dredging contract in the province of New Brunswick, and his further reference to the result of the elections in that province as a vindication of himself. It was to be expected that the Minister of Public Works would attempt to plume himself upon the success of the Liberal candidates in New Brunswick, but I am convinced that if the conduct of that campaign by the Liberals were fully exposed to this House and to the public of Canada, the very unbecoming plumage with which the Minister of Public Works has adorned himself would rapidly vanish. The great boasting of the Minister of Public Works about the results of the elections in New Brunswick would, I am satisfied, give place to chagrin and dismay if the truth were known in connection with the conduct of that campaign by the Liberal party. The fact is that the campaign as conducted by the Liberal party in the province of New Brunswick was one of the most discreditable that has ever occurred in that province. One of the first moves in that campaign was the purchase of two of the daily papers in the city of St. John, the Daily 'Telegraph' and the Daily 'Times' and the muzzling by that means of the entire press of the metropolis of New Brunswick. That consummation, I may add, was accomplished, I understand, by Mr. George McAvity and Mr. John E. Moore, two bosom friends of the Minister of Public Works, Mr. George McAvity being the very gentleman who got away with the $36,000 rake-off in connection with the contract that has been discussed on this motion. Mr. John E. Moore, I may say, is also now a contractor with the Public Works Department, and is, I understand, receiving under his contract fabulous prices for dredging in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him what are the prices which he says are fabulous?

Mr. CROCKET. The Minister of Public Works knows what the prices are.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I know they are not fabulous; I know they are reasonable.

Mr. CROCKET. There is no doubt that these gentlemen acquired the St. John 'Telegraph' on behalf of the Minister of Public Works. Perhaps the hon. minister will deny that he himself was associated with both of these gentlemen in the purchase of that newspaper property.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will say that they are very excellent newspapers.

Mr. CROCKET. That was, as I have said, one of the first moves of the Liberal party in connection with the campaign in the province of New Brunswick. Then, we had the Minister of Public Works himself making the most reckless promises that were ever made by a Minister of Public Works throughout the province of New Brunswick. He promised, as I understand, in one speech in the city of St. John, to dredge out practically the whole of Courtenay Bay at a cost to this country, as was shown, of $5,000,000. That was only one of the promises which the Minister of Public Works made to the city and county of St. John. We had also the race and religion cry worked in the province to an extent that was unknown in the previous political history of that province, and in connection with the circulation by the Liberal party of the pamphlet which has already been referred to in this House, entitled, 'The Duty of the Hour.' There were also employed in several, I will not say all, of the constituencies of the province of New Brunswick, the hugest corruption and bribery funds that were ever used in the constituencies of that province. In view of these facts, there is very little for the Minister of Public Works to boast of in connection with the result of the voting in New Brunswick. But, aside from the facts that I have mentioned, can that result be accepted by this House as a vindication of the Minister of Public Works with respect to this charge, or the many other serious charges which have been made against him in that province? What does he say as to the result of the voting in the city of St. John, where this affidavit and the counter affidavits were read?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would you allow me to answer ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CROCKET. Does the Minister of Public Works deny that his colleague upon the ticket in St. John, Mr. Pender, was defeated, and that the seat for the city of St. John in this House is now occupied by our honoured friend Dr. Daniel ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. With a reduced majority of about 800.

Mr. CROCKET. But a majority nevertheless of the electors of the city of St. John, and notwithstanding the fact that the Conservative party had not one single newspaper in that city to put before the electors the issues of the day, and notwithstanding the promises which I have already mentioned of huge appropriations for public works in such a constituency, which we all know has for years been looking for such appropriations for the development of its winter port.

Mr. EMMERSON. Where was the 'Daily Standard' ?

Mr. CROCKET. My hon. friend knows very well what the 'Daily Standard' was—a little poster that was published by the Liberal Conservative party, printed in a job office, and distributed throughout the city —a paper which of course could not get its matter before the electors as effectively as the old established newspapers. Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is anything in the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works with respect to the significance of the voting in New Brunswick, I think it is up to him to account for the verdict of the city of St. John, which went unmistakably against him.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the city of St. John I obtained a majority of something like 300 or 350.

Mr. CROCKET. I am not able to speak as to that, because I have not examined the returns particularly ; but I do know that the Minister of Public Works appealed to the electors of the city of St. John to elect Mr. Pender, his colleague, and on one occasion he said that his vindication would not be complete if Mr. Pender were not elected with him. Mr. Pender was defeated, and the inference is that the verdict of the city of St. John was against the Minister of Public Works. Now, that is all that I think it is necessary for me to say in connection with the result of the elections in the province of New Brunswick.

With respect to the charges themselves, I do not intend at this time to go fully into them, because it seemed to me that this matter was rather suddenly precipitated into this debate, and perhaps rather irrelevantly. Such a matter cannot obtain in a debate of this kind the attention which its importance demands. It seems to me, however, that with such serious charges, characterized as serious by the Minister of Public Works himself, hanging over the hon. gentleman, it is the duty of this parliament to institute some sort of an investigation ; and when that investigation is had, the details can be discussed more profitably than at the present time. I want, however, to refer to the manner in which the Minister of Public Works has treated the question. It seems to me that he has passed over entirely the gravamen of the accusations which have been made in Mr. Mayes' affidavit. He has devoted practically the whole burden of his speech to an error in date which appeared in that affidavit. I wish now to call the attention of the House to the paragraph in the affidavit or solemn declaration of Mr. Mayes in which that error appeared, and I take this from the columns of the St. John ' Globe ' a Liberal newspaper.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A what ?

Mr. CROCKET. Does the Minister of Public Works say it is not a Liberal newspaper ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not say any thing about it, I am asking you ?

Mr. CROCKET. I notice at all events that it figures in the Auditor General's Report for quite a respectable sum. Here is what Mr. Mayes says in his affidavit :

> On October 15, 1907, I received a telephone message from Dr. Pugsley, asking me to call and see him the next day, which I did. He said: Mr Mayes, I am in need of money, and it would be nice if you could help me.

I do not know whether that allegation is true or untrue.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I say it is absolutely false.

Mr. CROCKET. It has however a very characteristic sound :

I said, doctor, what for? You know that I have paid you some $1,300 in my second case against Conolly which you have in a way offered to pay me back because you have said that Mr. Emmerson was so slow in bringing up the matter, and I have not the funds. I am carrying a big load and am paying large amounts to the Bank of Montreal for overdrawals. Just then Mr. Geo. McAvity came in, and Dr. Pugsley said that Mr. Mayes' business was getting on so well that a little money would be very acceptable. I again said I was carrying a big back load and that I could not see why Dr. Pugsley should ask me for money. I said: what do you want it for—a loan? Well said Dr. Pugsley, you see it will be nice to have some one who could do something for you in Ottawa, there was always something to be done, and if I could not give him a cheque, that I could give him a note for three or four months. I asked him how much, and he said: Oh, about $2,000 or $2,300. I said, that is too much, but I suppose I will let you have a note for four months for $2,000. Dr. Pugsley then made the note and I signed it. He said he felt sure he would give me good return for it or pay it back?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What is the date of that ?

Mr. CROCKET. As printed, the date is October 15, 1907.

Mr. PUGSLEY. After I was a minister. What is the actual time, do you say ?

Mr. CROCKET. I intend dealing with that. I have read the declaration with respect to the giving by Mr. Mayes of his note for $2,000, and I have read it as the declaration is printed. Mr. Mayes did not state in that declaration, as the Minister of Public Works endeavoured to lead this House to believe, that it was given to him when Dr. Pugsley was Minister of Public Works ; but there is no doubt in the minds of any one in the province of New Brunswick that the date was an innocent mistake. I want, in this connection, to call attention to a subsequent declaration which Mr. Mayes made on the 14th of October, and which was widely published in the press, with respect to this alleged mistake, the House will then be able to judge what justification there was for the attack the hon. minister has seen fit to make on the honoured premier of New Brunswick. In a second declaration, sworn to before Mr. Beverly, R. Armstrong, signed by Mr. Mayes on the 14th of October last, Mr. Mayes says with reference to the date of this alleged interview :

I further say that up to four o'clock in the afternoon of the 12th instant, I had not given, or caused to be given, to any member of the Conservative party, any intimation that I was about to make the declaration I did. During the afternoon I obtained an appointment with Mr. J. D. Hazen, to whom I submitted the matter, I further say that when Mr. Hazen read my declaration at the Queens rink, on the evening of the 13th, he turned towards me, when reading the date '16th October' and hesitated at '1907,' I called out '1905,' and he read '1905.'

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question ? If it be true that Mr. Hazen's attention was called to the error in the date, how does my hon. friend reconcile that statement with the fact that Mr. Hazen read in public this affidavit, which appeared in the morning paper and was spread broadcast throughout Canada, with a false date in it ?

Mr. CROCKET. Does my hon. friend hold Mr. Hazen responsible for the printing of the declaration in the minister's own party papers ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do under these circumstances.

Mr. CROCKET. The hon. minister makes the statement that Mr. Hazen read that declaration with respect to this interview, in which the interview is stated to have taken place on the 16th of October, 1907, but surely Mr. Hazen, when he, in his reading, corrected the error, is not to be held accountable for the error which appeared in the papers the following morning. I think that the House will be able to judge pretty well as to the value of the whole statement of the Minister of Public Works, with reference to the matter of these charges, by the manner in which he has dealt with this error in the date. He attacked the Premier of New Brunswick and the whole Conservative party for having entered into a heinous conspiracy to make this charge against him, as of a date when he was Minister of Public Works, and he said yesterday that there was not a Conservative newspaper in New Brunswick which had corrected that error. Let me say that there was not a Conservative newspaper in New Brunswick which I have read with reference to this matter, in which I did not see, the very day after the declaration was read, mention of the error which had been made, I also saw that it was corrected in the Toronto 'News', the 'Montreal Star' and 'The Mail and Empire'. In every paper which I saw. I read of the mistake in the date which had been made, so that it looks very much to me as if the Minister of Public Works were endeavouring to draw the proverbial red herring across the trail. What I ask the House to bear in mind is the statement I have read as applying to the month of October, 1905. The Minister of Public Works says that this is the most infamous charge ever made against a public man in Canada. Perhaps in that statement he is correct, but does he say that the charge is very much less infamous as applied to him in October, 1905 ? He was then the Attorney General of New Brunswick; and if the statement of Mr. Mayes was correct, the Minister of Public Works was getting a rake off from a contract with the department of which he subsequently became a minister. That charge having been made —and I am not here to say whether the charge is true or not—as a member of this House and a citizen of this country, I am very much astonished that the Minister of Public Works should be content to rest under the accusation for four or five months without having instituted proceedings of any kind for the punishment of Mr. Mayes, who, he says, has done him such a grievous wrong and whose charge, the minister himself says, if proved, would damn him for ever and drive him out of public life.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I said that if it were true that I, after having become Minister of Public Works——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, that is what I said. If after having become Minister of Public Works and at the date given, October, 1907, I received moneys from a contractor having business with my department, I should be at once driven from public life—I should not be worthy to remain.

Mr. CROCKET. And I would ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), and I would ask also the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), if these charges made in this affidavit with the date corrected are true, is it proper that the Minister of Public Works should be retained in his position? This charge has never been retracted, with the exception of the correction of the date, it stands un-withdrawn; Mr. Mayes still insists upon it. And surely the Minister of Public Works who is one of the best lawyers in the maritime provinces and perhaps in the Dominion of Canada, ought to know that if Mr. Mayes, made a false statement in a solemn declaration, he is liable to prosecution for perjury.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, if you can get at his declaration; if you can find that which he has concealed and refuses to produce.

Mr. CROCKET. I am aware that the Minister of Public Works endeavoured to give the House the impression that the reason he took no steps in the prosecution of Mr. Mayes was that this declaration, as published in the St. John press, did not appear to have been signed. But has the minister the slightest doubt that Mr. Mayes signed that declaration? Was there not read in this House, yesterday afternoon, a letter by Mr. Mayes, addressed to the minister speaking of this solemn declaration as his affidavit? Yet with such a letter in his hand the Minister of Public Works would still endeavour to create the impression that he was unable to follow Mr. Mayes with a criminal prosecution. Furthermore as an able lawyer,—one of the ablest, as I have said, in the Dominion—he knows that Mr. Hazen, having read this declaration in a public meeting, if that statement were false, if any of these statements were false, he not only has an action against Mr. Mayes for perjury, but he has an action against Mr. Hazen for libel. Yet we have not heard, down to the present time, of any steps having been taken by the Minister of Public Works, or by anybody on his behalf, looking to the punishment of these gentlemen who have done him what he has characterized as the most grievous wrong ever done to a public man in the Dominion of Canada. The minister's course in this matter is in marked contrast with the course which he is alleged to have advised his predecessor in the cabinet from the province of New Brunswick to take in relation to certain other charges which did not involve that hon. gentleman's conduct in the administration of his department. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works has profited by the lesson which he taught his predecessor on that occasion.

Now, this allegation with reference to the giving of a note to the Minister of Public Works, when he was Attorney General of New Brunswick, in connection with this contract, is not the only serious allegation in that declaration. There is, to my mind, a more serious allegation than that, an allegation that more directly involves him as Minister of Public Works. The declaration states that, after the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) had become Minister of Public Works, after he had assumed control of this and all other contracts of the department, he sought to, and did, hold up Mr. Mayes in the interests of Mr. McAvity and the payment of this graft.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I desire to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Crockett)—and I say it in the strongest manner possible—and I am going to ask him now to accept my statement as a member of this House—that that is absolutely untrue, that I never held up Mr. Mayes, but that just as soon as the estimates of the engineer were put into the department in the ordinary course, and after the ordinary delays, the payment due to Mr. Mayes was made. The only exception was an amount of some $4,000 or $5,000, held back because Mr. Mayes had not performed his contract for cleaning out certain berths in the city of St. John which he had agreed to do in the contract with the city and for which my department had agreed to be responsible. With that exception, there was no holding back of Mr. Mayes' money. I will ask my hon. friend to accept my statement and not to read what I say is a false affidavit or persist in his statement.

Mr. CROCKET. I hope the hon. minister has not understood me as stating that this statement is true——

Mr. PUGSLEY. But, Mr. Speaker, an hon. member of this House cannot read a statement concerning another member which that member says is false.

Mr. SPEAKER. The statement of the Minister of Public Works, as a member of this House, must be accepted.

Mr. CROCKET. I understand that. And I do accept it. I have no wish to do otherwise. But the question before the House is——

Mr. SPEAKER. As to that, I may say that I have allowed considerable latitude. I allowed the minister to speak a second time on a point of personal explanation. I do not wish to interrupt the hon member (Mr. Crocket) but I hope he will not go too far from the question before the House.

Mr. CROCKET. As I stated, I rose simply to refer to certain statements which the Minister of Public Works had made in connection with this matter, and would not have risen had it not been for the speech that the hon. gentleman was permitted to make in this behalf. I have no hesitation in saying that I do accept—I must accept as a member of this House—the statement he has made. I do not wish any hon. member to suppose that I am reading this declaration as vouching for the truth of it. I am answering the statement and argument which the minister has made with reference to the whole transaction, and especially the excuse which he sought to make for not taking the proceedings, which I think that he, as a member of this House and minister of the Crown, should have taken for the punishment of those who were guilty of what he has characterized as a malicious and scoundrelly —I think that was one of the words he used—falsehoods.

But when the Minister of Public Works sought to create the impression in the House that the whole gist of the charge with reference to himself related to this question of the date, October, 1907, he was considerably in error. I was about to point out what is to my mind more serious and what directly involves him as a minister of the Crown, the statements that I referred to and which the Minister of Public Works has denied. The Minister gave as a reason for not taking the proceedings which he would have the House believe he was so keen to take the fact that he was not satisfied that the affidavit was sworn to, for the reason that, as published in the papers, it did not purport to be signed by Mr. Mayes. I have already referred to the fact that the Minister has in his possession a letter from Mr. Mayes admitting that he had signed it. More than that, I have here a copy of a solemn declaration as publicly made by Mr. Mayes in which he reiterates with greater detail the charges made in the first declaration and which does bear his signature and which was sworn to before a Commissioner for taking affidavits, to be read in the Supreme Court of New Brunswick.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon.friend tell me, because I do not remember, does what purports to be the second declaration contain any reference to myself?

Mr. CROCKET. Reference to yourself?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CROCKET. It is full of them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does the second affidavit repeat the statements about payment to me of moneys? I have not seen it.

Mr. CROCKET. I will read some statements contained in the second declaration. Among the statements that are contained in it and that I think involve the Minister of Public Works in a corrupt transaction, assuming they are true, are these: This is a conversation which Mayes alleges he had with the Minister of Public Works and these are the words of the Minister as alleged by Mr. Mayes:

> Now Mr. Mayes, I want you to settle up with Mr. McAvity and when that is done I will give you the balance.

That is one statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I want to state to my hon. friend that that statement is entirely untrue. My hon. friend cannot read here an affidavit which a member of this House says is false unless he makes it his own, and he must be responsible for it. He cannot bring false affidavits and spread them on the records when a member of the House states the allegation is untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not permissible under the rules of the House to contradict a statement of a member of the House by an affidavit from another party.

Mr. CROCKET. You heard the minister ask me if the affidavit contained statements in reference to him?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. minister (Mr. Pugsley) said it was false and the hon. member (Mr. Crocket) must accept his statement, and cannot contradict it.

Mr. CROCKET. I do. I am not discussing the question of the truth or falsity of the charge, I am discussing the minister's pretext for not prosecuting Mayes for uttering that false statement. If that statement is not true, as the minister has alleged, why has he not proceeded against Mr. Mayes for making it? That was the very point I was discussing. Furthermore, if the minister would like any other extracts from the affidavit I would be glad to read them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I would say is that I do not think it is right, I do not think it is conducive to the dignity of the House or to good feeling in the House, that a member should read statements the truth of which he knows nothing about, particularly when another member makes the statement that what he has read is not true and I do unhesitatingly make the statement that what my hon. friend has read is absolutely untrue. It does seem to me my hon. friend should accept the statement.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. He has accepted it for that, but there are others.

Mr. FOSTER. You had better read the other statements and get the minister's denial of them.

Mr. CROCKET. I accept the minister's statement, and the emphatic denial he has given this afternoon is the very reason why he cannot excuse himself for lying down under such serious accusations for six months and then attempting to convince the parliament of Canada that the reason he did not take the proceedings he should have taken was that there was no affidavit that purported to be signed. The affidavit from which I am quoting does purport to be signed, and the minister saw it published in the papers in St. John. He was fully aware of all the statements made in all these declarations. I do not think that this is the time to enter into a discussion of all the details of this transaction and it is not my purpose to go over them, but I would like the House to bear in mind the very concise statement which was made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) yesterday afternoon, setting out the salient points of Mr. Mayes' charges, points which have not only been so solemnly affirmed by Mr. Mayes but which have never been denied down to the present time. Leaving out any question of error in the date of these affidavits, I ask the members of this House if they think it is in the interest of Canada that public business should be allowed to continue on such a basis as that exposed by Mr. Mayes' statement. Mr. McAvity has himself made a solemn declaration in connection with these matters and notwithstanding that there is no denial of the gist of the charges which have been preferred by Mr. Mayes,—and indeed I may call attention to the agreement which is in existence and a copy of which was annexed to this declaration, and which was signed by Mr. McAvity :

And whereas, the said George McAvity is to receive moneys out of the performance——

Mr. EMMERSON. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the matter with that?

Mr. CROCKET.

Mr. EMMERSON. If no one else takes the point of order, I think it is time we got back to the resolution. I am within my rights in raising the point of order and I think there should be some recognition of the dignity of the House with respect to the discussion of a resolution.

Mr. CROCKET. I think, with great deference to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson), that he is rather late in rising to a point of order. He sat there following with the greatest interest and I thought with admiration—

Mr. EMMERSON. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) started it.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no, he didn't ; it had quite a long run before I got at it.

Mr. CROCKET. I will not be much longer.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member insists on the point of order, it will suffice to read the motion to indicate what the subject is. I allowed considerable latitude because it was a subsidiary question. The Minister of Public Works was allowed to speak a second time on the score of personal explanations and I hope that the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket) will go back to the subject before the House.

Mr. CROCKET. I must bow to your decision but it is hard to reply to the hon. gentleman without being able to deal with the very question raised by the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. FOSTER. Does it not strike Mr. Speaker and the members as well that if the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) is to be allowed to make those very strong assertions with reference to the hon. Mr. Hazen, Mr. Mayes and others, that it is rather hard, when the other side of the case is put, as it is being well put by my friend from York (Mr. Crocket), that he should be cut off? We ought I think to have some little thought for people who do not have places on the floor of this House. I would not object if the very strong assertions had not been made by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley).

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was defending myself.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman accused Mr. Hazen and Mr. Mayes of conspiracy, which is even worse than the accusation that was made against him,—certainly quite as bad. Now, when it is attempted to show the other side of the case in the interest of Mr. Mayes and Mr. Hazen it seems a little unfair that the person who is doing it should be cut off. I think that Mr. Speaker might allow the hon. member for York, N.B., to present this side of the case and then rule straight down on anybody else following afterwards.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It would rather seem to me that the position is this: The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in his speech, introduced this utterly irrelevant matter personal to the minister, and the minister ought in reason to have the opportunity, which he was allowed, to reply to that. But the whole irrelevancy was largely introduced by the hon. member for North Toronto, and if it is irrelevant I think it should be cut off here.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, you have had an ex-Speaker of the House, a gentleman who is not now the Speaker, make a statement before you to-night, which statement, I am bound to say, is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am in the judgment of the House as to that.

Mr. FOSTER. The member for North Toronto did not start this question. I leave that to you, Mr. Speaker; I leave it to 'Hansard.'

Mr. PUGSLEY. Who did?

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the late Speaker of the House to take back that statement.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This question was introduced upon a motion made by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid).

Mr. FOSTER. We all know that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We all know that and we all know also that it was the hon. member for North Toronto who introduced this affidavit, if my memory serves me aright.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be true, as my hon. friend says, that I introduced the affidavit, but why was the affidavit introduced? Because the matter had been started beforehand and discussed and it was necessary for the affidavit to be introduced.

Mr. EMMERSON. With the indulgence of the House, I will explain why my point of order is taken.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member spoke to the point of order and we will have to settle it first.

Mr. EMMERSON. I want to make a personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point of order has to be settled first. Rule 19 provides that:

No member shall . . . speak beside the question in debate.

The question in debate is contained in the motion and in the amendment thereto. I have allowed considerable latitude, and I think we have had a fair statement of both sides of this case. There is another way of bringing up this Mayes matter before the House, there is another procedure which can be adopted, and in the meantime I think we should adhere to the question before the House.

Mr. CROCKET. Mr. Speaker, I must, of course, bow to your ruling, but as I stated before I rose to discuss the statements that were made by the hon. Minister of Public Works in connection with this matter and to discuss them alone. It is somewhat surprising that the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) should have sat through the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works, to which he listened with such intense interest and admiration, without this point of order occurring to him, and that he should first be heard from in connection with points of order when I sought to rebutt some of the arguments which were addressed to this House by the Minister last evening and this afternoon. I must say, however, Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, that I thought this matter was somewhat irrelevantly precipitated into this debate and as you have decided that it is not relevant to the motion which is before the House, any further observation I have to make I must, of course, confine to the question of the motion. I do not think it is necessary for me to say that I will very heartily support the resolution that has been moved by my hon. friend from Grenville. I think that instances have been given in this House, instances have been proved in the various committees which show the absolute necessity of some further safeguard being thrown around the reception of tenders and awarding of contracts. I have been somewhat surprised at some of the statements which have been made by some new members who were not of these committees and by some old members who were of these committees, to the effect that there had been no instances in which there was any ground for suspicion in connection with the awarding of public contracts. But, it is not necessary now to rehash those instances. I am firmly convinced that the experience of the last eight or ten years has shown that there is an absolute necessity for greater care being exercised along the lines that are proposed in the resolution of my hon. friend from Grenville. I shall therefore have very great pleasure in recording my vote in favour of the resolution, and I know it is a vote that will be cordially approved by the people whom I have the honour to represent.

Mr. W. O. SEALEY (Wentworth). Mr. Speaker, in connection with the matter of doing public business it seems necessary to trust somebody to a moderate extent, and it would seem that the people of Canada have decided on the 26th October last to trust the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the able cabinet by which he is surounded. The amendment to the motion would seem to imply and provide for the least possible trust that could be imagined. That trust should be placed in the ministers in charge of the various departments, who are directly responsible to the department and who have been elected for the express purpose of assuming charge of public affairs. To entrust this duty to the minister and the chief officers of his department would seem to be as safe a plan as we could possibly adopt. It would seem to be a practice along the line of British institutions generally as well as being in accordance with our system in Canada. But the motion, if I understand it aright, is intended to substitute the United States method of dealing with tenders whereby three officers of the department are present together with bidders or their representatives, or as many of them as care to be present. While the proposition of the hon. member who moved the resolution and of the other hon. gentlemen who support it may have the appearance of fairness, in actual practice what do we find? There is no place on the face of the earth where there is more newspaper or verbal complaint against the unfairness of the system and the generally unsatisfactory conditions of things that exist in the United States. It is true that in the United States tenders are opened by three officials of the department and as many bidders or their representatives as care to be present. But one of the officials generally attending is an office boy who cuts the paper envelope with a knife, another is an office boy who removes the bid from the envelope and another is a higher official who reads and announces the bid. After this is done the business generally lies in abeyance for about ten days. During that time the bidders are cognizant of whom their opponents are, and in many cases there are several bids in the same interest.

At the back of every bid there are about fifty conditions as to formality and if the powers that be should not award the contract to the lowest bidder it is returned to him marked 'informal.' I am satisfied that if the supporters of this motion could realize the millions of dollars that this system is costing the United States they would not be so enthusiastically in favour of it. So many are the conditions that there is scarcely any bid that cannot be thrown out by reason of informality, and if thrown out for informality, the securities are released and the bidders are relieved from the loss of their deposit or of their security to carry out the substance of their bid. The supporters of this motion are therefore trying to substitute for the British method which has worked so satisfactorily in this country, a system which has proved so iniquitous in the United States and which has been very costly to the government of that country.

Mr. SEALEY.

I might say that the United States system encourages the practice of the bidders being represented by what are termed bidders' agents or bidders' brokers who earn their livelihood by that means, and whose conduct has led to grave irregularities. If the motion before the House were calculated to safeguard the public interest in any way it would be worthy of our support, but as the experience in the United States has proven that it is the very reverse I feel it is in the best interests of the country that I should support the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie).

Mr. DUNCAN H. McALLISTER (Kings and Albert). Little did I expect that I should address the House so early in my first session here, and necessarily I am but little acquainted with the procedure of parliament; but as the representative of Kings and Albert in the province of New Brunswick I must strongly resent the statements made here to-day by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Crocket). I tell you, Sir, I was ashamed of him—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McALLISTER. Yes, I was actually ashamed of him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McALLISTER. I tell you, Sir, that when he referred to the last campaign—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Some indulgence must be given to a new member.

Mr. BOYCE. When he says he is ashamed of another member.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think we must adhere to the rule which Mr. Speaker has already laid down in the case of my hon. friend (Mr. Crocket).

Mr. McALLISTER. I was about to say—

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will my hon friend (Mr. McAllister) be good enough to take his seat for a moment. I did not protest against your rule, Mr. Speaker, because undoubtedly the debate had strayed from the point, although perhaps it might have been better to have allowed my hon. friend (Mr. Crocket) to have continued his remarks. However, I do not dissent for a moment from your judgment, but that rule having been laid down it must be adhered to and the rest of this debate must conform to the motion before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I had intended calling the hon. member (Mr. McAllister) to order, but he had not exactly reached that stage when it was necessary for me to interfere. The hon. member will have to confine himself to the motion and the amendment before the House.

Mr. McALLISTER. If I have made any error I apologize for it and I will take it back; but I do say that if I heard that remark made outside the House I would be ashamed of my hon. friend from York. I have been quite accustomed to that sort of campaign—

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I beg to invite your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have ruled that hon. members cannot discuss anything outside the motion and the amendment before the House. A discussion on the recent elections is irrelevant.

Mr. McALLISTER. Well, Sir, I will have to postpone the remarks I intended to make, but I shall never rest easy until I have that question discussed in the House. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not at all in favour of the resolution of the hon. member (Mr. Reid), for I do not think it would improve matters in any shape or form. I believe that the manner in which tenders are opened at the present time is good enough for Canada and that the people are well satisfied with it. On the 26th day of October last, when that affidavit was brought up against—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PATERSON. How do know what affidavit he is going to speak about?

Mr. McALLISTER. When that affidavit was brought up against the Minister of Public Works—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is a shame to interrupt a new man.

Mr. McALLISTER. I hope those gentlemen over there won't get excited; their colleague got pretty well excited all through the campaign. I am not accustomed to parliamentary procedure, but the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Crocket) had made certain statements and I thought it my duty to answer him. I think that when we have a man as worthy as the Hon. Wm. Pugsley——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PATERSON. That is not out of order.

Mr. McALLISTER. When we have a man as worthy as the Hon. Wm. Pugsley in the position of the Minister of Public Works I do not think we can have any better guarantee that the department will be well conducted. I am sure he will take the responsibility and whatever responsibility he takes is good enough for any of us. I seem to be affording hon. gentlemen opposite a certain amount of amusement, and as I have not come here for that purpose I shall resume my seat.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up more than a very few moments of the time of the House. It seems to me that the real difference between the resolution and the amendment is whether the minister of a department is to be one of a number to open the tenders for the great works of this country. If any great corporation had a great work to be done and called for tenders, it seems to me that it would be reasonable that the president or managing director of that corporation should be present and see the tenders opened. Upon him is the responsibility for the proper management of the corporation's business. In the same way it is the duty of the minister, who is the responsible head of the department, and in whom the confidence of the people has been placed, to be present and see that the tenders are opened in the regular way. Let me ask the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution: Do the Conservative Premiers of the Dominion of Canada ask that their representative heads of the several departments shall not be present as one of a number to see the tenders opened? Does Mr. Hazen in the province of New Brunswick say that the Commissioner of Board of Works shall not be one of a number to be present when tenders are opened? Does Mr. Roblin, does Mr. Whitney, does Mr. McBride, ask the legislatures of their several provinces to pass legislation that the minister, the head of the department, forsooth, shall not be present when tenders for works in his department are opened? It seems to me that the motion of my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid) is simply a motion of want of confidence in the government of the day; and surely, before he makes such a motion, he should ask his friends who lead the Conservative party in the several provinces what they are doing in this regard. It does seem to me that our affairs are quite as safe in the hands of the re-responsible heads of the different departments. My hon. friend said that there were not safeguards. Does he name a case? Is it insinuated that in the case of the Mayes contract, for example, there was tampering with the tenders? Such an insinuation, I understand, is not made, and therefore that particular case is not relevant to the matter before the House, and cannot be pointed to as a reason for passing the original resolution instead of the amendment. In fact, had the original resolution been effective when that tender of 55 cents of Mr. Mayes and another for $1.25 from a firm in Ontario had been considered, no other result could have happened than did happen, namely, that the contract should be awarded to the lowest tenderer.

Now, I want to say only a word about the second clause of the resolution, namely, that the public should be present, or, if you like, those who tender should be invited to be present, when the tenders are opened. There may be something to be said in favour of that; yet there is another side to the story, and I think the Minister of Public Works was quite right when he said that it was possible that collusion might occur and that the interests of the public would not be safeguarded if that were done.

I have heard much to-day about the expenditure on public works in the city and county of St. John; but let me say for my own county that all contracts for public works there have been awarded to the lowest tenderer. Not only has this been the case with contracts for great public works; but not one mail contract, during the four years that I have represented the county, has been awarded except to the lowest tenderer. I have a case in my mind of a tenderer for a mail contract who came to me and said, 'Can you tell me who has put in the next tender to mine, which is the lowest?' As I was not familiar with the ruling of the department, I asked the question on behalf of my friend. What reply did I receive? This, Mr. Speaker: 'It is against the rules of the department to announce the tenders until the contract is entered into.' My friend, I suppose, had an object. He and his brother had put in two tenders, and he was anxious to know whether his brother's came next to his or not. If it had and he had known of it ahead, would the lowest tender have been effective? No; he would have withdrawn it, and the contract would have gone to the next tenderer. There are cases of that kind, and, as the Minister of Public Works has stated, sometimes the next tender is a hundred per cent above the lowest one. I have in mind another case in which a wharf was built recently in my county, and in which a gentleman not from my county was the lowest tenderer at $19,000 in round numbers, and a gentleman from my county tendered at $34,000 in round numbers, nearly a hundred per cent difference. But, as I have said, in this as in every other case the lowest tender has been accepted. This is an evidence that the interests of the people are safeguarded under the rule embodied in the order in council.

An hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House has said that the fact that this order in council has been passed is an evidence that something was wrong, but that is not necessarily so. I am aware that hon. gentlemen on the floor of this House during the last session did, by insinuation, by innuendo, declare that there were irregularities, but they failed to substantiate their charges in the Public Accounts Committee. So far as I am concerned, I want to say that I am perfectly satisfied that the interests of the public are fully safeguarded if we leave the matter in the hands of the ministers of the several departments and an official, or, in the case of the absence of the minister, two high officials. It seems to me that the resolution is simply a motion of want of confidence in the ministers who have just come from the people with an overwhelming majority.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (Leeds). I merely want to ask my hon. friend a question for the purpose of removing a rumour which may or may not be correct. My hon. friend has advocated very strongly the continuance of the present system. I would ask him if since he became a member of this House, he and other members of his family have become an incorporated company, and if he has, in the name of that company, tendered for contracts in the Department of Militia or the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and been given contracts——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. My ruling of a moment ago applies to anything outside this motion or amendment.

Mr. H. H. MILLER (South Grey). I merely propose making but a few short remarks, as I do not wish to take up the time of the House. The hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) suggested, in his opening remarks yesterday, that some method ought to be adopted to shorten the sessions of this House. In that I quite agree with him. I do think that some method might properly be adopted which will get us away from here in less than seven or eight months, but I do not think it was consistent with this suggestion that the gentleman should immediately have proceeded to take up the time of the House in discussing a suggested remedy for an evil which is purely imaginary. In my opinion the mode of letting contracts by tender is much the same to-day as it has been since confederation. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), who was formerly a cabinet minister himself, says that when the Conservative party were in power, no evil resulted from the method then followed. The Minister of Public Works tells us with equal earnestness that no evil exists and no wrong has resulted from the continuance of just the same method by the party now in power. It seems to me that we are bound to accept the statements of these two gentlemen until some proof be brought forward that they are not well founded. If there were that measure of evil resulting which is complained of by our hon. friends opposite, if the allegation of the hon. member from North Grey (Mr. Middleboro) be true that no Conservative contractor or business man will tender to-day for government work, surely we would have heard of many complaints from them on that score. I observed, however, this afternoon that when the Minister of Public Works challenged our friends opposite to mention a single instance in which a Conservative had ceased tendering or abandoned what had been his business formerly, not one accepted the challenge. It may be true that there are complaints but from whom do they come? They come entirely, Mr. Speaker, from Conservative politicians, and not from business men. True my hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Boyce) gave one instance of a Liberal candidate having returned to his riding and told his people during an election campaign that he had been influential in getting for a local firm a certain portion of a public contract in that constituency, the member for Sault Ste. Marie stating, by the way, that it had not got as large a portion as it was entitled to. Surely we cannot, in all fairness, accept that as sufficient evidence in support of this motion. It is no doubt natural that political candidates should endeavour to secure all the credit they can for public works done in their constituency, and perhaps have, in some instances, an exaggerated, if not an erroneous, idea of the credit to which they are entitled. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), in support of his contention that evil exists and that bad results flow from the present system, which is a continuation of the old system, cited the case of the Mayes contract. Well, I shall not refer in any objectionable way to the declaration of Mr. Mayes, which has been discussed in this House, but I do not understand that in the declaration or any of the correspondence it has been shown——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLER. I am simply referring to the question of tenders and to what might have happened had other methods been in vogue. I say that no attempt has been made to show that Mr. Mayes received any advantage.

Mr. STAPLES. The hon. gentleman is out of order. You, Mr. Speaker, are generally fair to both sides, and I ask your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. My ruling would apply to any hon. member when he goes beyond the limits of the motion and amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I bow, Mr. Speaker, to your ruling. I say that no case has been brought forward to show that any contractor has ever had any favour given him in the matter of tendering in any case. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has said that statements will be made and suspicions will exist. No doubt statements will be made. The hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket) made the statement that newspapers had been purchased, which is probably true, but surely no crime. We have had the statement made by him that a supporter of the government has received a contract from the Public Works Department at fabulous prices, but there was no evidence adduced to support it. And when asked at what prices the contract was let, he could not tell, and I presume did not know. Nevertheless the statement was made. He also made the statement that an enormous bribery fund had been used by this government in the province of New Brunswick, and that statement was equally made without any evidence to support it. We are told that suspicions exist. Well, if this House is to provide a remedy which will remove suspicion from the minds of all the people, we shall be here twelve months out of every year, and then not have accomplished our task. People will be suspicious, do what we will or can. If my hon. friend the leader of the opposition were in power, there would likewise be suspicions. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) would not be suspicious, nor would my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid), or Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Boyce), but there would still be even then suspicious people. Were the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in charge of a department, suspicion would be a million times greater.

Under the present system it is provided that two persons should be present when tenders are opened. It is suggested that it would be better if three persons were present. I do not know upon what principle that contention is made unless it be upon the principle that there is luck in odd numbers. I fancy that, if the present regulations provided that three should be present, our friends opposite would ask that four be present. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) whom I respect very highly and who always speaks very fairly, believes, as he has the right to believe, that the minister at the head of the department ought not to be present when tenders are opened. I quite agree with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) that, surely, if there is any one who ought to be entrusted with any important work in connection with a department, it is the gentleman at the head of the department who, in the first place, has been elected by his own constituents to represent them, and in the next place has been selected by the Prime Minister to assume the responsible position as head of the department.

It has been urged—and there is more contention upon that ground than any other—that the tenderers themselves should be present when tenders are opened. I think the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) has given very good reasons why the tenderers ought not to be present. May I be permitted to suggest one or two additional reasons in support of the same view? I can easily imagine a case in which it may be necessary for the minister in charge of a department to make further inquiry as to the ability of a given tenderer to carry out the contract. Oftentimes it would not be wise or proper, in fact, it would be most unbusinesslike, to award the contract to the man who puts in the lowest tender. The very fact that his tender is exceedingly or absurdly low would, of itself, be sufficient evidence that he would not be able to carry out and properly complete the contract. I remember a case in which tenders were called for a certain work. There were two tenders. But one of these tenders was so ambiguously worded that it was not certain whether the price did, or did not, include the heating for the building that was to be erected. If it included the heating, it was the lowest tender, but if it did not it was not the lowest tender. In such a case, I consider that the proper thing to do—and the thing that was done in the case I have referred to—was to get in touch with the man who put in the tender that was not understood and ascertain whether his tender did or did not include the heating. And, in fairness to all the parties who tendered, it was very important that the figures of the different tenderers should not, in the meantime, be made known to any one.

It will be remembered that the hon member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) said that all business must rest upon the trust that men have in men. But the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) said that he was afraid that if we had such abundant faith in men, we would not, in the ordinary affairs of life, do our business very successfully, but would have to use a greater degree of caution. That, perhaps, is reasonable. I think that the hon. member for North Toronto may well set it as a gauge—that each of us may set it as a gauge—what would a man do in such a case if he were engaged not in public business, but in his own private affairs? A trustee, as I understand it, is expected to act as a prudent, intelligent, and honest business man would act if the circumstances were the same and he was handling his own affairs. Applying that to the matter before us, I would ask whether there are not many members of this House who have been members, it may be, of a church trustee board, of a school board, of an hospital board—and has any member of this House ever known any such case where tenders were called for and the tenderers were admitted when the tenders were opened? I have never known it to be so; and I do not think it is the custom for a man, in his own private business, when he has asked for tenders, to ask the tenderers to be present when tenders are openeed.

Some one has mentioned dredging. I had thought that, after the objections made by an hon. member in this House last session, to the matter of dredging, our friends on the other side would not again have mentioned the subject. But I find that my hon friend from North Grey (Mr. Middleboro) a gentleman for whom I have a great deal of esteem, refers to a certain dredging company in the north part of my own county and within his own riding. According to yesterday's 'Hansard,' the hon. gentleman said :

In my own constituency, the north riding of Grey, as you know, we have representing us in the local house the hon. A. G. MacKay, leader of the Liberal opposition in the province of Ontario. It may be a coincidence, but it is so, that that gentleman is also president of the Owen Sound Dredging and Construction company; it may be a coincidence that, although the assets of that company are worth anywhere from $200,000 to $300,000, he and the relatives of the late Liberal member in this House, own all the stock of that company except three shares of $300, and that these three shares consisting of $100 each are distributed nominally among three other persons for the sole purpose of constituting the necessary five in order to be incorporated as a dredging and construction company. That is the company about which there was so much examination in the Public Accounts Committee.

Now, I do not think that my hon. friend added anything to the debate in these remarks, or that he proved anything by his statement. Does it prove that the present method of letting contracts by tender is a bad method, that a man who happens to be engaged in political life, and happens to be a Liberal member of a provincial legislature in this Dominion, may get a contract? Do our friends suggest that some method of letting contracts should be adopted under which no man who is a Liberal could obtain a contract? If they do, the resolution of my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid) does not go sufficiently far. If my hon. friend from North Grey endeavoured to injure the reputation of Hon. A. G. MacKay by this reference, I think he has failed in that also. I do not think it is right, or fair, or kind, to introduce into this House unnecessarily the private business of other persons. I maintain that Hon. A. G. MacKay has just as good a right as any other man in Canada to own an interest in a dredge, and to put in tenders for dredging contracts, provided that he does it honestly, openly and above board, and that contracts are given to him only if he puts in the lowest tender.

The name of a lady is dragged into the debate, the widow of the late Dr. Horsey, who in his day was a member of this House.

Mr. MIDDLEBORO. Who dragged it in?

Mr. MILLER. The hon. member for North Grey Mr. Middleboro).

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read the 'Hansard.'

Mr. MILLER. I am asked to read the 'Hansard.' I will:

In my own constituency, the north riding of Grey, as you all know, we have representing us in the local House the Hon. A. G. MacKay, leader of the opposition in the province of Ontario. It may be a coincidence, but it is so, that that gentleman is also president of the Owen Sound Dredging and Construction Company; it may be a coincidence that, although the assets of that company are worth anywhere from $200,000 to $300,000, he and the relatives of the late Liberal member in this House, own all the stock of that company except three shares of $300.

Mr. MIDDLEBORO. Where is the name? Who brought the name in first? The hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. MILLER. The hon. gentleman might just as well have mentioned the name as to say: the relatives of the late member.

On motion of Mr. Miller, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, January 29, 1909.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Report of the Transcontinental Railway Commission.—Mr. Graham.

Report of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.—Mr. Graham.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Hon. G. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). May I ask the Minister of Railways if the report of the commission appointed to look into the wages of employees on the Intercolonial has been presented to the House; I have seen it referred to in the papers.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). I have no recollection of a commission being appointed for that purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. I remember reading copious extracts from the report of some commission; the minister ought to know if he appointed one. There was a report that the employees were too numerous and that if they were fewer the money thus saved could be devoted to raising the wages of other employees who are necessary.

Mr. GRAHAM. That was the finding of the board under the Lemieux Act with reference to the claims of freight clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the Minister of Labour might bring down the report to the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is contained in the report of the Department of Labour presented on the first day of the session.

THE RESTAURANT COMMITTEE.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the second report of the joint restaurant committee be adopted and that the following be the members of the House of Commons on the permanent joint restaurant committee, namely, Messrs. Sutherland, Barker, Monk and Harris.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That had better stand until to-morrow.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a question of privilege. I observe in the Toronto 'Globe' two recent editorials with regard to a telegram which I sent to 'The Colonist' on the 24th October last. The portion of the editorials to which I desire to call attention is this:

Mr. Borden has supplied the public with the information that in a private statement to Mr. Templeman he repudiated the garbled despatch. He admits therefore that he was, immediately after its use, well aware of its existence. Why then did he not make his disclaimer public? The change in the text of the message was sufficiently great to make the Act of the garbler one of virtual forgery, and yet Mr. Borden has allowed three months to pass without, so far as the public know, taking a single step to put himself right in the matter.

I stated in the House, when the matter was referred to before, and I again state, that it was not until after I had returned from the south in the month of December that I became aware that any change had been made in the telegram. I also stated, and I again state, that I then immediately called upon the management of the paper foran explanation. I had no reason to believe until after the middle of December that any change had been made in the telegram. I then wrote immediately and received a certain report with regard to it from the management, in which it is stated most distinctly that no person connected with the management had been responsible for it, and bringing to my attention certain matters which I will not now detail to the House until I receive from the management of the newspaper certain further reports which they have promised, because they have made investigation and are still making further investigation into the matter. So far as the newspaper is concerned, I have not the slightest control over it, editorially or otherwise, and I am no more responsible for the change in the telegram than I am for the mis-statements in the editorial columns of the 'Globe' with regard to it. I only regret that gentlemen in British Columbia who say they suspected I had not sent a telegram in these terms, did not, during the course of the by-election, bring the matter to my attention by telegram when I would of course have put it right at once.

LEVEL RAILWAY CROSSINGS.

Mr. H. LENNOX (South Simcoe. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to a statement in the press that a letter was sent by him this week to the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and that the latter had replied. In view of the importance of the subject and the deep interest of the public in it, I would ask the hon. minister if he would bring down a copy of his letter and of the reply and lay them on the table of the House.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). Under the circumstances, the matter has become largely public, but it was not intended at all that the correspondence should be published. I would prefer not to be asked to bring it down until I have thoroughly gone into the matter. The question is still in abeyance, and I may have some proposals to make later in the matter, and therefore think it advisable not to bring down this correspondence just yet.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN.

Mr. LENNOX. I am quite willing to accept the minister's opinion as to what is best to do, but the matter has been referred to in a great many papers. However, I am quite willing to take the view of the hon. gentleman in that regard. An extract of the letter was published in the papers.

Mr. GRAHAM. It was not intended that it should.

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS TREATY.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would ask the right hon. First Minister whether or not he has any further information to give to the House as to when we may expect the production of the treaty recently signed with the United States relating to the waterways. Also whether any convention or treaty has been signed touching the adjudication by the Hague Tribunal of matters relating to the Fisheries, and, if so, whether that will also be laid before the House at an early date, and whether the convention has the assent and approval of the Imperial authorities and the Colony of Newfoundland.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). With reference to the waterways treaty, His Excellency the Governor-General communicated yesterday or the day before with the Colonial Office, and through it with the Foreign Office, for the purpose of having the treaty sent us at the earliest possible moment consistent with the rules of the service. With regard to the second treaty, it has been agreed to by Newfoundland and Great Britain that the question of the Newfoundland fisheries and all the matters in dispute should be referred to the Hague Tribunal. In a treaty of this kind, as the hon. gentleman knows, the most important feature is the settlement of the questions to be referred. The matter has been discussed by the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State at Washington and is now under the consideration of the Newfoundland colony.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, that it is expedient that the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the head of a department, based upon a report of the deputy head, may grant to any officer, clerk or employee under the deputy heads in the inside service as defined by the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, who was in the public service at the time of the coming into force of that Act, an increase of salary of $150 a year, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained ; that in the case of any officer, clerk or employee who has received an increase of salary upon organization and classification under the said Act, such increase shall be offset against the increase which such person might otherwise receive under any Act to be founded on this resolution; that no increase under any Act to be founded on this resolution to any officer, clerk or employee shall exceed the difference between his present salary and the maximum salary of the subdivision in which he has been placed upon organization and classification under the said Act of 1908; that all increases provided for hereunder shall take effect from the first day of September, 1908; that all sums of money voted by parliament for the financial year ending on the 31st day of March, 1909, and applicable to the payment of salaries or increase of salaries of persons in the inside service shall be applicable to the payment of increases of salary granted under the Act to be founded in this resolution, so far as such sums are not required for the specific purposes for which they were granted; and during the said financial year there may be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada such moneys required for the payment of increases of salary hereunder as have not been voted by parliament.—Mr. Fisher.

He said: This resolution is the complement of the action of last session when the government introduced an amendment to the Civil Service Act, which amendment was founded on the report of the Civil Service Commission in 1908. That report largely confirmed and somewhat amplified the report of a previous Civil Service Commission in 1892. Speaking of the general terms, the reports of the two commissions coincide in a marked degree. The government of the day had no hesitation in believing that the judgment of two such important bodies, appointed some years apart and composed largely of different individuals, one appointed by a Conservative government and the other appointed by a Liberal government, deserved every consideration and action upon it. The government which appointed the commission of 1892, and which remained in power for some four years afterwards, did not see its way clear or was not able to act upon the report of that commission. We thought, however, that we were not only justified but called upon to act upon the report of the commission of 1907. Speaking in general terms and as shortly as possible, I may say that these reports, the last one at all events, embodied five principal recommendations: (1) that the entry into the Civil Service should in future be through a competitive examination instead of, as had been the case up to that time, through a qualifying examination; (2) that the service should be reorganized and classified on a somewhat different basis, the classification dealing rather with the duties than the personnel of the offices; (3) that an independent and non-political body of the Civil Service Commissioners should be appointed who would have charge of the competitive examinations and generally of the administration of the Civil Service under the government; (4) that the salaries of the Civil Service should be increased in consequence of the largely increased cost of living during the many years in which the salaries generally had not been greatly increased; (5) that a system of superannuation should be worked out and adopted for the benefit of those retiring from the service. The Bill of last session covered three of these recommendations. We introduced the system of competitive examinations for entering into the service; we established a non-partisan and independent commission under whose authority those examinations should be held, and who would have other powers in connection with the administration and development of the service under the government; and we adopted a scheme for a reorganization of the departments on the basis of the duties of the offices rather than their personnel. We left over the question of a special increase of salaries due to the increased cost of living, and we left aside for the moment the question of superannuation. The resolution which I now have the honour to propose to the House covers the fourth of these recommendations; and let me say a word or two in regard to the reason for carrying out this recommendation of the Civil Service Commission of 1907. That commission had before them an elaborate calculation of the cost of living, which showed that it had increased in a very great degree during the last few years, and also showed clearly and conclusively that the salaries of civil servants had not been increased proportionately, while men in private employments in Canada and men otherwise earning a living for themselves had an increase of revenue perhaps commensurate with or fully equal to the increased cost of living. I may point out that since then the Association of the Civil Service have submitted to the government another memorandum in confirmation of what the Civil Service Commission said in that respect, and I am informed by persons who live in Ottawa that even this year, when there has been somewhat of a check in the general progress of industry and commerce in the country, the actual cost of the necessities of life has not come down in accordance with that check of general business. I would also point out that the change in the scale of salaries of civil servants has been very slight ever since the original fixing of those salaries in 1857. I have under my hand a statement which shows that those who entered the service at that time entered it at $500 a year, just as they did two years ago. That was in the fourth class, where they were expected to remain only two years, when they went into the third class as a matter of course and received a salary ranging from $600 to $800 a year. In the second class the salaries ranged from $900 to $1,100 a year, and in the first class from $1,200 to $1,400 a year. This was in 1857, 51 years ago. I need not point out that the cost of living has immeasurably increased since that time, that the work and responsibilities imposed upon the Civil Service of Canada have greatly increased, and that their relationship to and standing in the community has become so enlarged as to require that they shall have greater consideration in this year of grace 1909 than they had when Canada was a small, inconsiderable and cheap country in 1857. Some increases were made in 1903 by the present government. The third-class clerks were left at the same salary, but they largely took the work and the position of the former temporary clerks who entered at $400 and went up to $600 a year. The third-class clerks were made to go from $500 to $700, a slight increase for those who were doing the same kind of work. The junior second-class clerks, who in 1902 and before that had from $600 to $1,000 were raised to from $800 to $1,100. The second-class clerks, who before that had been from $1,100 to $1,400 were raised to from $1,200 to $1,500. The first-class clerks, who before that had been from $1,400 to $1,800, were raised to from $1,500 to $1,900.

The Bill of last session, by its reorganization of the service, and its new classification, added to the salaries of the various divisions, and I will now go over these divisions and the salaries attached to them. The Bill of last session divided the service into three general classes, under the deputy heads, and each of these classes was further divided into two subdivisions. Beginning at the bottom and working upwards : The clerks under subdivision B of the third division get from $500 to $800. These correspond, as nearly as possible, to the third class clerks of the old classification, whose salaries were from $500 to $700. The third-division, subdivision A of the new classification, corresponding to the junior second-class clerks of the old classification, had their salaries fixed at from $900 to $1,200, instead of $800 to $1,100 as formerly. In the second division, subdivision B which corresponded to the senior second-class clerks, the salaries were to be from $800 to $1,600. Under the old classification, these salaries were from $1,200 to $1,500. I would like to explain that the low commencement in that division is due to the fact that those from the outside passing the examination of the specially high character required for that division may be put straight into that division instead of going through the other divisions, and they have to go in at a lower rate proportionately than would otherwise be expected. Subdivision A of the second division which corresponded to the first-class clerk of the former classification, are given salaries of from $1,600 to $2,100. The first-class clerks of the old classification had salaries of from $1,500 to $1,900.

Mr. FISHER.

Subdivision B of the first division have salaries of from $2,100 to $2,800. Under the old classification, the chief clerks corresponding as nearly as may be to this class, had salaries of from $1,900 to $2,500. Then, we established a new subdivision, subdivision A of the first division, consisting of the higher officials, such as assistant deputy heads, chief clerks in charge of branches and other more important officers, who, under the old classification, ranged generally from $2,400 to $4,000 and who, in the new subdivision, range from $2,800 to $4,000. Last session, when this was done we had applications from the Civil Service for further consideration in the way of salary increases. We believed that this change of the classification and general raising of the limit of the classes as to salary would effect a very considerable advantage immediately to the members of the Civil Service. We believed that, in consequence of the increase of the maximums of the classes, we would give a pecuniary advantage, although not immediate, to those who thereby would be able to rise to a higher salary eventually than, under the old classification, they could attain to. We could not tell at that time, until the classification was worked out, just to what extent this would affect the civil service generally here in Ottawa. I confess that, personally, I believed it would accomplish more than it seems to have done. I was confident that a very large number of clerks would get immediate relief. I believed that the future relief by the raising of the increases to a higher maximum would be a pecuniary advantage to them which would satisfy them, although I understood and realized that that would not give them the relief in consequence of the present and pressing increase of the cost of living. It was not, however, until the classification of the different departments was worked out that we had details and knowledge which could prove to us—and did prove to us—that the immediate benefit to the Civil Service here in Ottawa, which we hoped and expected would come to them by this Act of last year, would not accrue. Having discovered this, and having had the representations of the Civil Service and the report of the commission, urging a general increase, we decided that we must take the matter up and deal with it now at the earliest occasion possible when we had the information at our disposal, and grant the relief to the Civil Service which the commission recommended and which their services to the country and their condition in regard to the cost of living seemed to completely justify.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the minister state at what time that was come to ?

Mr. FISHER. Since the facts of the reorganizations were before us so that we could see the condition of affairs.

Mr. FOSTER. And at what period could that come to be the fact ?

Mr. FISHER. Within the last month. the reorganization orders in council were only passed within a week or two. We had them before us and had the information in detail, not in all respects complete, but sufficient to show us that what we had expected was not going to come about. We waited, however, until the detail was amply before us, confirming us in an impression which had been coming home to us by the knowledge of the working of the classification by each minister in his own department, and which had come home to the Civil Service themselves and which they had represented to us as the basis for the further insistence and demand that this further relief should be given. I am reminded of what is perfectly obvious—that the principle of the relief was adopted last session. The measure of it we hoped would be greater under the Bill which we introduced and passed last session. When we found that the measure of it was not sufficient to meet the demands and necessities of the case, it was our duty, having adopted that principle, to carry that principle to its legitimate conclusion and to introduce this resolution which I am satisfied meets the whole necessities of the case.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the minister state when that principle was avowed last session ?

Mr. FISHER. It was avowed when the report of the commissioners was endorsed, in the debate which occurred last session declaring that relief was required. And in my explanations of the details of the measure last session, I pointed out that the measure which we were then proposing would, I believed, to a very large extent, meet the necessities of the case. My hon. friend can refer to the report of the discussion in 'Hansard,' and he will find that stated there in no equivocal terms.

Let me say a word or two with regard to the recommendations of the commission. I find that their recommendation is in general terms, and as follows :

Your commissioners are of opinion that, somehow or other, the immediate question of salaries should be dealt with. They cannot recommend general increases, but they would suggest to your Excellency in Council the advisability of at least taking votes for granting increases to deserving officials, and that for eastern Canada, both in the inside and outside service, such increase might be at the rate of 15 per cent for officials whose salaries are under $1,500, and 12½ per cent for salaries above that rate; and for the western provinces, where, no doubt, a greater need prevails, these scales should be 25 and 20 per cent to the same proportion of incomes and all provisional allowances should cease.

Your commissioners suggest that such increases should only be granted on rigid examination, but as time goes on, if the suggestions of your commissioners are carried into effect, the special increases should be abolished and a scale of salaries laid down suitable to each department and office in the public service.

The Bill of last session provided for laying down a scale of salaries suited to each department and office of the public service, but it did not provide for immediate relief in consequence of increased cost of living. We believed that the arrangement of salaries and reorganization of the service would bring such a measure of relief to so large a number of individuals in the service that it would be sufficient to meet that demand. But we have found since we had our classification completed that that expectation was not borne out, and we now propose to remedy that defect.

Mr. LALOR. Does this only apply to the inside service, or to the outside service as well?

Mr. FISHER. The Bill of last session applied only to the inside service, and this Bill, being the complement of that one, applies at the present time to the inside service alone, the inside service as defined in the Act of last session. Now, I wish to explain why the government has departed from that portion of the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission regarding a percentage increase.

Mr. LALOR. I would ask the minister what he calls the inside service?

Mr. FISHER. The Act of last session defines it. Let me say first that the salaries of the classes and of the officers generally in the service are almost all round figures of hundreds, and hundred and fifties, and so on. If we took the proposition of the Civil Service Commission and gave increases of 12½ and 15 per cent on the various salaries we found there would be a great many odd figures in the salaries of the officers. Anybody can see how inconvenient that would be in the estimates, and in working out the monthly pay in the accountant's office and in the Auditor General's office. We therefore dismissed the idea of absolutely adhering to a percentage basis in every detail. Then the question came up as to what groups of salaries we could deal with in round figures, and we found that 12½ per cent for the higher officers and 15 per cent for the lower, adopting the percentages recommended would work out in groups ranging several hundred dollars of difference in the salaries. Giving $100 increase to all those between $500 and $800, and $150 to all those between $800 and $1,200, and so on, we found there would be a result which we did not think was in harmony with the views of the Civil Service Commission, and which we did not think so equitable as the decision which we have arrived at as final. In working out groups or schedules of salaries with the approximate percentage of increase, we found also that lower officials would get very much lower increases, and the higher ones, especially those with very high salaries, very much greater increases. We had representations from the civil servants themselves, we had formed our own ideas; and from the fact that the Civil Service Commission recommended a higher percentage for those lower down in the service than they did for those higher in the service, we came to the conclusion that it was the lower officers in the service that needed help in greater degree than the higher officers. I have had made up for me tables of various kinds. I have studied various plans, and after considering the question with careful attention, and on the recommendations embodied in a memorial which was sent by the Civil Service Association proposing different alternatives, one of which we accepted, we have adopted the principle of giving a flat increase to everybody in the service.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. To every person in the service. I do not think the resolution provides for those at the maximum of their class.

Mr. FISHER. I will point out the exception in a moment. The general principle is a flat rate of increase to everybody in the service, and after careful consideration and after counting the cost, we decided that $150 would be a fair treatment. I am glad to say that the delegation of the Civil Service Association which interviewed the Prime Minister and myself, afterwards agreed to that; and I am glad to say that since that agreement they have placed the matter before a special meeting of the Civil Service Association, which passed a resolution thanking them and thanking the government for the decision which has been taken. My hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) asks about some details. If he will notice the resolution he will see that there are exceptions. First, in the case of an officer who has received an increased salary upon classification and organization, that increase shall be offset against the increase provided here. As I said to begin with, this Act is the complement or continuation and fulfilment of what was designed in the Act of last session. By the classification and reorganization certain increases did accrue. Those men had, therefore, under the action we took last session, received their increases, and it would not be right for them to receive an additional increase. If their increase is $150 or more they will receive no increase under this Act; if their increase is less than $150, it will be subtracted from the sum of $150 which otherwise they would get under this Act. There is another exception. By the Act of last session we deliberately laid down the principle, with the unanimous concurrence of parliament, that certain classes of work were worth certain salaries, that men in certain subdivisions doing the work which pertained to those subdivisions, should get so much a year, going on to the maximum. In such a proposition as this, if we made no exception to the rule, there would be a considerable number of people who, being close to the maximum of the subdivision in which their work is placed by the reorganization, would be raised above the maximum of that subdivision. One of two things would result: Either we would have to promote them into a higher class, disarranging the reorganization, and give them a standing in the department which their work did not justify; or we would have to give them the whole of the increase, and they would be paid a sum higher than that which the Act of last session decided was a just and fair payment for the class of work they were doing. We therefore made the second exception, which is that no increase under this Act shall go beyond the maximum of the class in which the individual is.

Now, let me say a word or two as to what results from that. I will have to recall the memory of the House to the fact that last session we raised, in a general way, the maximum of the classes generally by $100 and, in some cases, by $200. Anybody who came into a particular class, with very rare exceptions, when the Act of last session came into force on the 1st of September, came in $100 below the maximum of his class. He is there still. He was there on the 1st of September. This Act will come into force and be applied as from the 1st of September last. Therefore, there are very few cases in which the individual will not get at least $100. There are a few and there even a few—a very few—only 35 in the whole service out of over 2,700—who will get no increase at all under this Act and who, under the reorganization of last session, got no increase. The number who will get less than $150 is inconsiderable, speaking from memory, something under 300. All the rest will get $150 or more.

Mr. LENNOX. Will these 35 that the minister mentioned be absolutely without any remedy at all, or is there going to be any provision for them ?

Mr. FISHER. There is no provision for them.

Mr. LENNOX. The fewer the greater the hardship.

Mr. FISHER. They are already in the enjoyment of the highest salaries paid for the class of work which they are doing in the departments.

Mr. LENNOX. Do I understand there is no grievance in these cases ?

Mr. FISHER. Well, I will not say that some of these individuals will not feel a grievance but they are at the maximum of their classes. Parliament has decided that that maximum is the salary which ought to be paid for work of that class. If there are among them clerks who will justify promotion to another class they will then be able to reap the advantage of that promotion, but they have had the advantage already of being paid the utmost that the class in which they are is declared to be fairly paid, and therefore I do not think that they have a very serious grievance in not getting anything to-day. When you come to find, as is the case here, that of 2,700 odd of those employed in the city of Ottawa there are only 35 who are in that category, it will be admitted that the details of this Act have been worked out in such a way as to give an exceptionally large measure of remedy to the Civil Service.

I think that these explanations pretty completely cover the reasons for the introduction of this Act. They will render the Act quite comprehensible to members of parliament. I have felt that I was bound to explain somewhat the Act of last session, partly because, as I said at the beginning, this Act is complementary to that Act and partly from the fact that there are a large number of members in the House who were not present when the Act was passed and when it was discussed in all the fulness of its details. Therefore, I have thought it well to take the two together as I have done. At this stage of the debate I do not think it is necessary for me to go into further details. The result is such as to cover fully, entirely and, I think I may say, in an extraordinary degree, the recommendations of the Civil Service Commission. There is one more figure that I would like to give to the House. It is in regard to the percentage of increase. I spoke a few minutes ago of the fact that not a large amount of remedy was given by the classification. The actual amount was $36,238 added to the salaries in Ottawa. Under this Act $347,145 will be added and the total under both Acts will be $383,383. The average percentage rate of the whole increase is 13·12—very close to the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, worked out without any idea when we actually went into the details of just how it would come out. This is, to my mind, in an extraordinary degree, a complete carrying out of the recommendations of the commission. The average rate of the special increase is 11·88 per cent, and under the classification and this special increase together it is 13·12 per cent. The number receiving the special increase under this Act is 2,605, the number who received the increase under the classification alone, which, I confess, was a great surprise to me, when I found it out, was only 59. So that the classification which we had hoped and expected would give a very large number an increase and a very considerable amount in dollars and cents added to their salaries only gave an increase to 59 and only added $36,238. Now, we are going to give everybody in the service, except 35, some measure of increase and the whole average of increase is 13·12 per cent.

I would just add that the Act of last session came into force on the 1st of September. This Act being a complement to that Act, we believe it is only fair and just that the Act should take effect as from the first September last, it being altogether in this fiscal year, and we therefore think it proper that the Act should take effect on the salaries and that we should start payment from the 1st of September. I would just add, in addition to the details that I have given, that there is a clause at the end similar to the clause at the end of the Civil Service Act of last session and similar to the clause at the end of the Civil Service Act of 1903, providing the necessary machinery to carry out the provisions of this Act. Later on I will have much more detail to give when the House goes into committee on the Bill, and if required I will only be too glad to answer all questions when we go into Committee of the Whole.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. When you talk of organization according to the duties of the different departments, what we used to call the theoretical organization, who prepares that—the commission or the departments themselves ?

Mr. FISHER. I will have to give you an explanation of that point. Section 6 of the Act of last session defined how a clerk under the classification in the old service was to come under the new Act. It seems to be rather mechanical in its operation. When we came to discuss classification and reorganization—and I may take my hon. friend into my confidence and tell him that we had to do that after the assiduous task of carrying the elections in the country and the prior work of preparing for them—when we came then to discuss the matter the consequence was that my colleagues and myself had not a very great opportunity of going into the theoretical organizations of our departments. However the Act defines that we should make a reorganization. The Department of Justice informed us that clerks with fixed salaries must come, without any deviation whatever, into the subdivision which their salary entitled them to. The classifications therefore which have already been adopted and passed under section 8 are largely the mechanical transfer of the old service into the new classification. In some of the departments we have made changes; I myself have made some changes in the reorganization. I would be sorry to think that the reorganization was final and conclusive. I do not think that with the short time at our disposal, and in view of the duties which have devolved upon us during the last few months, we have been able to really thoroughly consider and discuss and come to final conclusions upon the proper organization of our departments. As I said to a Civil Service delegate not long ago, I think that work will have to be done more completely and more thoroughly in the near future, and possibly from time to time as events and circumstances and knowledge arise. That, however, is the classification which we passed not very long ago, and in that classification the clerks in the old service are transferred into the new classification under the operation of the new Act, partly mechanically, partly automatically, and partly in consideration of the duties discharged and the theory of the organization of the department.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not quite understand what the minister means by that; can he give us some particular instances?

Mr. FISHER. I will have to think that out. I have not charged my mind with particular instances.

Mr. FOSTER. You say partly mechanically and partly automatically.

Mr. FISHER. I mean that some of the ministers have been able to proceed at once. For instance, I believe that the Minister of Inland Revenue, when the Mines Branch staff was brought into the inside service found there were some officials whose duties and qualifications from the technical and scientific standpoint would require them to be put in a higher classification than their salaries in the outside service would allow, and the Department of Justice declared that they should be put into that subdivision in the new classification which their salaries would indicate. The Minister of Inland Revenue thinks they ought to be in a higher subdivision in consequence of their duties and their qualification and we will have to make a change so as to provide an opening for them in the higher division. I am not sure whether the Minister of Inland Revenue has done that in the classification or not, but he spoke to me about it. That is one instance I can give to my hon. friend on the spur of the moment.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the minister would bring down the orders in council which would show the House exactly what departments have been reorganized and to what extent there was reorganization.

Mr. FISHER. Certainly; the orders in council will be laid on the table. I may say that I do not think that any of the departments look upon their organization under these orders in council as complete.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). In the debate of last session we pointed out to the minister that there seemed to be some inconsistency between sections 5, and 6, and 8, and that it was not very clear how the ministers could proceed to harmonize the provisions of these sections. Before this resolution can be properly discussed it is very necessary that we should understand the reorganization of the various departments and that we should have these orders in council laid before us so that we may properly consider what has been done. I would suggest also that we should have the Act of last year in pamphlet form. My hon. friend from North Toronto has made application for a copy in that form and he has been unable to procure it.

Mr. FISHER. I have a copy here in pamphlet form and I thought there were hundreds of them.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So far as the increase to the Civil Service is concerned I do not know of any good reason why it should be confined to the inside service alone and why the outside service should not be included as well. The Civil Service Commission pointed out that the salaries of some civil servants in different parts of the country were so low that not only hardship but even cruelty was involved, and during the debate on the Bill last year I strongly urged upon the government that this should be taken into consideration. I would like to tell the minister that every argument he has adduced here this afternoon in favour of this increase to the inside service is equally an argument for the consideration of the outside service. Section 3 of the Act of last year defines the inside service to be:—

3. The Civil Service shall be divided into two divisions, namely, the inside service, which shall consist of that part of the public service in or under the several departments of the executive government of Canada and in the offices of the Auditor General, the Clerk of the Privy Council, and the Governor General's secretary, employed at the city of Ottawa, or at the Experimental farm station or the Dominion Astronomical Observatory near Ottawa, but not including the officers, clerks and employees employed at Ottawa in the second or outside departmental division as defined by paragraph (b) of section 4 of the Civil Service Act, or in any office of a purely local character; and

The outside service, which shall consist of the rest of the public service.

The statute of course makes a clear distinction between the two branches of the service, but the increased cost of living does not make any discrimination between them, and the remarks of the Civil Service Commission of 1907 with respect to the increased cost of living have general application to the whole of Canada and not to the city of Ottawa alone. Therefore, when the government are proposing what may be regarded as a very proper measure of justice to the Civil Service at Ottawa they are apparently leaving out of consideration altogether the numerous officials in the outside service throughout the country who are receiving no increase of salary and who have no consideration in the terms of the resolution which the hon. gentleman has placed before us now. I think we ought to have a pretty full and pretty frank statement of the reasons which induced the government to deal with only one branch of the service and to leave absolutely without any consideration or regard this other branch. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the terms of the Civil Service Commission of 1907 apply to these outside officials? Does he not know that the report of Mr. Justice Cassels, laid on the table of this House within a week, refers to officers of the outside service, who administer funds sometimes to the extent of $1,000,000, and who, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Cassels, have been without sufficient consideration, considering the importance of their duties, for many years past? Why should all these be put out of consideration, and why has my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture said not one word to-day indicating the reasons why the same considerations which have induced him to bring this motion before the House should not have induced him also to pay attention to the legitimate claims of those who are embraced within the outside service?

Then, there is another matter upon which I think we ought to have some information. I think the Minister of Agriculture or the Prime Minister ought to lay before the House the terms of a famous circular which was distributed among the members of the Civil Service at Ottawa during the last election campaign, bearing the imprimatur of my hon. friend the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) and endorsed in a very emphatic way by the right hon. the Prime Minister himself. It is refreshing indeed to hear that right hon. gentleman laying before this House the idea that my suggestion of an inquiry into the claims of the province of British Columbia was a direct bribe to the people of that province, when we have his own signature to this circular distributed among the civil servants of Ottawa when he was a candidate asking for their votes at a general election. That circular is ten thousand times worse than the worst possible construction which could be put upon my pledge to the people of British Columbia in 1904. I think the right hon. gentleman is the last man in this country to talk about bribes to constituencies or to any one else. His whole record, since he has been the leader of this government, ought to induce him to refrain from uttering one word on that subject, either in parliament or on the public platform of this country. The circular was undoubtedly issued, and my right hon. friend can produce a copy of it. His letter appeared in the public press, and why should we not have that laid before us, so that we can see whether the promises then made are being implemented by the resolution before the House? I am surprised under the circumstances that the Minister of Agriculture should not have laid it before the House before we are called upon to discuss the resolution. No doubt my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture would be thoroughly ashamed of it, so that he may perhaps be excused upon that ground. We are, however, undoubtedly entitled to the orders in council setting out the reorganization of the service, so that we may know whether the reorganization has been mechanical, or whether in any cases it has been discretionary, and if so upon what principles that discretion has been discretionary, and if so upon what principles that discretion has been exercised. I will not deal with the subject further at this stage. In committee we shall have an opportunity for a full discussion, and I would like to know from my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture when it would be practicable for him to lay on the table of the House the information to which I have referred.

Mr. FISHER. I have no doubt that I can give it to the House before the next government day, that is, next Tuesday.

Mr. GEO. H. COWAN (Vancouver). Mr. Speaker, I could heartily agree with the resolution of the hon. Minister of Agriculture were it based on a principle, the application of which would be as wide as the causes which occasioned it. I understand that this increase is to be given to the inside service because the cost of living has increased in the district in which the members of this inside service reside. Now, I can tell the hon. minister that the cost of living has increased in a much greater ratio in other parts of Canada; and, as the hon. leader of the opposition has said, if you are basing the increase on a principle, let that principle apply wherever the causes of increase are in existence. In British Columbia, I am prepared to show, the increase in the cost of living in the last four years has been 47 per cent; I am prepared to show that in detail; and, as a result of that great increase in the cost of living, the wages and salaries of other trades and professions in British Columbia have increased, not to the extent of 47 per cent, but to a very great extent indeed. In that province, however, where we have only members of the outside civil service, there has been no increase in salaries to meet this extra cost of living. Not only has the cost of food and other necessaries of life increased, but the taxes of British Columbia have been greatly increased. I do not know whether this House is aware of the reasons why the taxes of British Columbia have gone up by leaps and bounds. I do not know whether the minister is aware that British Columbia is obliged, in order to make revenue meet expenditure, to impose a real property tax of 1 per cent, a wild land tax of 5 per cent, a personal property tax of 1 per cent and an income tax of from 1½ to 4 per cent. Rentals and taxes in British Columbia have gone up, to be absolutely accurate, the one 60 per cent and the other 45 per cent in the last four years. Yet that portion of the Civil Service resident in British Columbia is entirely ignored by this resolution. It is so not only in British Columbia ; it is so everywhere outside of the confines of this city of Ottawa. I had to come here to learn that the cost of living had increased in this city, but that the moment you get beyond the limits of this city the conditions as to the cost of living remain as they were in 1857. I had to hear this resolution of the hon. Minister of Agriculture before I could realize that fact. In British Columbia it is not a fact, and if the hon. minister wishes to apply a principle and not merely to implement a pledge given in an election campaign, it will be his duty to apply that principle wherever the cost of living in Canada has so increased that it demands, for the support and maintenance of civil servants and their families and households, an increased salary.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I do not find fault at all with my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) for the vehemence of his observation nor with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition for the warmth of his argument. I think I can successfully answer both. First of all let me say that this resolution is introduced to carry out a principle which is very easily understood the moment you reflect upon it. Last year we undertook to reform the Civil Service, which comprises two branches, the outside and the inside. We undertook last session to reform the inside, but took the power to also, at a later date, operate a similar reform in the outside service, I may say to those hon. gentlemen, who were not here last session, that it was then shown that, as a matter of history, wherever Civil Service reform has been operated, whether in Great Britain, the United States or elsewhere, it was introduced and made effective by gradual stages. No government has ever yet undertaken, so far as I know, such a task as to reform at once both the outside and the inside service. In the United States and Great Britain they proceeded by stages, and we are doing the same thing. We have undertaken to reform the inside service, reserving the power to do the same with the outside, which we intend doing as soon as possible after we have got through with the inside departments. As my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has explained, the present measure applies to the increases of salaries and in this we are carrying out the suggestion of the Civil Service Commission in their report. My. hon. colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has quoted the very paragraph of the report upon which we base our present action, but it can bear repetition :

> Your commissioners are of opinion that somehow or other the immediate question of salary should be dealt with. They cannot recommend general increase, but they would suggest your Excellency in Council the advisability of at least taking votes for granting increases to deserving officials, and that for eastern Canada, both in the inside and outside service, such increase might be at the rate of 15 per cent for officials whose salaries are under $1,500 and 12½ per cent for salaries above that rate: as for the western provinces, where no doubt a greater need prevails these scales should be 25 per cent and 20 per cent to the same proportion of incomes and all provisional allowances should cease. Your commissioners suggest that such increases should only be granted on rigid examination, but as time goes on, if the suggestions of your commissioners are carried into effect, these special increases should be abolished and a scale of salaries laid down suitable to each department and office in the public service.

Mr. SPROULE. Does that apply to the outside service ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, to the inside and the outside. I would say to my hon. friend that London, Rome or Paris was not built in a day. Last year he knows we undertook to deal with the inside service and at the same time took power to deal with the outside service when we had completed the job in the first instance. One of the consequences of a reform in the inside service was the increase of salaries. The suggestion made by the commissioners was that this increase should vary from 12½ to 15 per cent ; but after having discussed the matter with the Civil Service Association and after having given it the best consideration we could, we came to the conclusion that we would meet the suggestion of the commissioners, if we gave a general and flat increase of $150. The principle which we ask the House to carry out is to give the increase of 15 per cent recommended by the commission, and we proposed that by giving a flat increase of $150 to all the members of the service. We are providing that if any official has received an increment of $150 in his salary, he shall not get the increase because he has received it already. That is a principle very simple and easy to understand, and I think it will appeal to members of the House. This Bill makes provision also that the increase shall date from the first of September. Why did we do that ? We did it because the Bill of last year came into force on the first of September, and this is intended to be a complement of the legislation then adopted.

My hon. friend (Mr. Borden), in rather hot language, has said that this was a bribe which I offered the city of Ottawa for the Civil Service vote. I have only this to say to my hon. friend. If the matter had come up for the first time, when my young colleague from this city made the suggestion in one of his addresses, there might be something in the charge of my hon. friend. When my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) was in Ottawa supporting his candidate, he charged the government with having acted cruelly—that was the very expression he used—towards the service in not having increased their salaries long ago, and if then I had given the first intimation that the government proposed increasing their salaries, there might be something in what he says. But what were the conditions ? During last session when we had under discussion the Civil Service Bill, or at all events the report of the commissioners, I expressed the very same idea. That was reported in the press of this city, and never did I hear that report challenged. This is what appeared in the Citizen of the 18th of April last :

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been waited upon by a deputation representing the Civil Service Association, headed by the president, Mr. Kingston. The delegates submitted to the Prime Minister the necessity of giving effect this session to the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission in the matter of increase of salaries. The commissioners suggested for eastern Canada, both in the inside and the outside service, increases at the rate of 15 per cent for officials whose salaries are under $1,500, and 12½ per cent for salaries above that rate. The reply of the Prime Minister is said to have been encouraging. It is understood that the government had already decided to grant the increases, and that the necessary resolutions are in course of preparation for presentation to parliament at an early date.

This was published in this city while parliament was in session. The Bill was introduced shortly after and never was any objection taken to the statement I there made that we were favourable to the increase suggested by the commission. And if we had last year introduced the resolutions which were then in course of preparation, I understand, from the language of my hon. friend opposite, that he would not have objected because it was due to the Civil Service that their salaries should be increased. If we had introduced those resolutions last session, we would then have met with the approval of my hon. friend. We stated that it should be done right away. The Civil Service Commissioners had said in their report that it should be done and that no time should be lost. But the resolutions were not introduced, and why not? Everybody knows the reason; we had not time to do it. The Civil Service Bill was introduced as soon as we had received the report of the Civil Service Commissioners. But it was not until the 8th of July that the Civil Service Bill passed its third reading. And parliament prorogued on the 20th of July. After the Civil Service Bill had passed, everybody knows, parliament had no time to take up the resolution we have now introduced. But we were committed; we had pledged ourselves to it; our friends of the opposition, if I remember well, were pressing us to do it, and so was the press of the country. Was it extraordinary that we should say, in the course of the elections, that we would introduce this resolution, that we would increase these salaries, and that the increase should date from September 1, the date when the Act came into force? It was contemplated at the time the Bill was introduced, and the only fault found with us by my hon. friend opposite was that we had not introduced this legislation before. But the reason was obvious—we had not the time to do it last year. Anybody can see the wisdom and reasonableness of the course we said we would take, that this legislation should date from the time the Civil Service Bill came into force, the 1st of September.

My hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) says that this was a bribe to the electors of Ottawa. It took him a long time to make that discovery. It is very strange, if this was such an outrageous proceeding as he now says, that he did not discover it during the elections. He and his friends were upbraiding us and accusing us of bribery and all sorts of wrong-doing; why, then, did he not mention this among the many sins which he attributed to us? I can understand it well. My hon. friend thought it would not be safe to make such a statement at that time,—it was safer to wait until after the elections were over. And now, in a fit of virtue, he says that this was a very extravagant and corrupt proposition to make to the civil servants of Ottawa.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What was the date when it was made?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. About the 20th of October.

Mr. FOSTER. And when were the elections?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. On the 26th of October. If my hon. friend has forgotten the date, I have not forgotten it. But I do not see that the date has anything to do with the question, for I will do my hon. friend the justice to say that in five days he could have done a great deal of mischief had he so desired. But I know not only what he could do, but what he could refrain from doing. I know that he could await the opportune moment for bringing this matter before the country. That is the explanation, and I think it will be accepted as fair and the proposition as reasonable and perfectly legitimate. It will be seen that we have done the very thing that should have been done under the circumstances.

So far as the outside service is concerned, it must come under this system of reform, of course. But we are doing one thing at a time; we are completing the reform of the inside service, and when that is done we will apply ourselves to the reform of the outside service also. But let me say to my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), and also to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), that it is possible to give a large measure of relief to the outside service without legislation of this kind. We can do it in the estimates by providing for it year by year. My hon friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has already done it, having given the officials in his department increases two years ago. I do not remember the figures, but they were substantial increases. And this applies to British Columbia as well as to other parts of the country. I think that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) has done the same. But, though we have, to a certain extent, improved the condition of the outside service, we equally recognize that the measure is not final, but that the question will have to be taken up at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). I listened with interest to the explanation of the resolution made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). I may say at once that, so far as concerns the principle of giving this measure of relief to the civil servants that were affected by the new Act, there has been no disagreement in this House for a considerable period. I think the government was pretty well forced last year to bring in a Bill for the amelioration of the Civil Service and organizing it upon new lines. They were forced to this by public opinion outside, and the effect which was given to that public opinion by the opposition in this House. My hon. friend will remember that, early in last session, I introduced a resolution in this House affirming the feasibility and advisability of having the Civil Service of Canada put on a basis of merit and examination as regards both entrance and promotion. He will remember also that, at that time, the government thought it its duty—certainly it pursued the course—to vote down that resolution. The members of the government voted that way themselves, and their followers obediently followed them, as is usual, and solemnly declared that the principle of applying to the Civil Service examinations for entrance and promotion was not a proper principle or an advisable one to follow But, though they voted down that principle, and the proposed action, at a later period of the session they brought in a measure of Civil Service reform embodied in the Act which was passed. The Prime Minister has just now declared that they had not time to bring in this resolution last year. He gave the date—I do not recollect now what it was, but it was toward the close of the session—when the Civil Service Act was passed. But he was careful not to give the date when that Bill was first submitted to the House, nor did he explain why so long a time was allowed to elapse between the introduction of that Bill and the time it was pressed forward to completion.

Well, he says, they were not prepared at that time. No they were not prepared, they had not time to give to this legislation. What is this legislation ? What does it require ? Not a great deal of thought, not a great deal of analysis. They are simply passing a piece of legislation which says, we will add $150 to every employee, with the exception of 35. Now it does not seem to me that it takes much thought to bring down a measure like that before the House, or much time to pass it through the House. If it were a complex matter of grading salaries according to merit, and of giving a proper increase on the ground of merit, and that therefore you had to go through the record of 2,700 employees at Ottawa and make proper revisions and proper grading, then the hon. gentleman's plea would have something in it. They had not time to do it ! But this is an absolute rule-of-thumb application. No matter whether the man has been in the service one day before the 1st of September or ten years before the 1st of September, the man who is only one day in gets the flat increase, and the man who has been in ten years gets nothing more than that same flat increase.

Had not time! and that is the reason it was not brought in last year. My right hon. friend and the minister who introduced the Bill say they bring it down in order to carry out the recommendation of the commission They do! What is the report of the commission? The report of the commission is absolutely opposed to the flat rate business, and I think the report of the commission is much to be preferred to the slap-dash method which has been adopted by the minister who introduced the Bill. What do they say:

> Your commissioners cannot recommend general increases; but they would suggest to Your Excellency in Council the advisability of at least taking votes or granting increases to deserving officers, and that for eastern Canada, both in the outside and inside services, such increases might be at the rate of—

And so on. So the Civil Service Commission, men who had gone into the question, men who had devoted time to it, men who were considered able and adepts, after having spent a year in the examination, gave their conclusion, and it recommended an increase to the outside and inside services, an increase, not on the horizontal principle, but an increase to deserving officials. After your commission have gone into the question and made an examination, does the First Minister say that he has followed, even a long way off, the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission? He has absolutely negatived the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, and he has done it without investigation, simply to be able, in a trice, to pass a horizontal addition of $150 flat rate to every individual in the service, no matter whether he was put in a day before the 1st of September, or was put in and did good service for 10 years before. So I think that inconsistency is absolutely shown. These gentlemen are not looking at the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, they are not anxious to carry it out. They slap the Civil Service Commissioners in the face, and say, away with your recommendation! We do not intend to give this increase according to merit and desert, which is the principal of this Bill, if it has any principle—we do not intend to take the trouble to look into that, we intend to give every man in the service, high or low, deserving or undeserving, competent or incompetent, the eleven-year-man or the one-day man, a flat increase of $150; and thereby, says the First Minister, he shows an absorbing desire to carry out the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission which he appointed. I say this method is one which is not only unscientific, but absolutely unjust from start to finish; and the ministers adopt this method because they either do not want to take the trouble themselves of making a discerning examination, or hand it over to their Civil Service Commissioners who, in conjunction with the deputies of each department, might be very well competent to do it, they do not intend to adopt either of those plans, but they adopt this method of an easy, ready, flat increase of $150 for each one.

Well, my right hon. friend excused himself from the gentle admonition given to him by the leader of the opposition, and contended that if he had probably transgressed the spirit of the laws governing elections in this country, at least he had proved himself a much lesser transgressor than had my hon friend who was charged early in the session by the Prime Minister of attempting to bribe the province of British Columbia by declaring himself to be in favour of a just arbitrament of any grievances that might be shown to exist in that province, in certain lines. My right hon. friend not only introduced this legislation last year from a very well conceived idea that it might be useful to him in the course of the elections, but deftly and very ingeniously he used it to the utmost advantage, and in doing so made an exhibition of a Prime Minister of Canada in an election in the city of Ottawa, in the Dominion of Canada, such as I am bound to say will not find a parallel in the history of any prime minister of any constitutionally governed country. Now my right hon. friend is fond of saying: I am a Liberal of the old English school, I take John Bright and William Gladstone as my exemplars. Does the right hon. gentleman, in the wildest flight of his imagination, suppose such a thing as John Bright, if he had been Prime Minister of Great Britain, or Mr. Gladstone, who was Prime Minister, or Lord Rosebery, or Mr. Asquith, or any other British premier, going to the city of London, to a constituency in which he himself was standing, and making an absolute promise such as he made to this constituency, which was interpreted in no other way, and could be interpreted in no other way, than a deliberate bribe to a very large and deserving class of the population? How smoothly the right hon. gentleman tried to get out of that. Why, he says, the opposition last winter in parliament were willing that these increases should be given. I myself, he says, somewhere in Ottawa, said that I was favourable to an increase. What is the difference, he says, between the position of the opposition and my position carried out during the elections. There is every difference, and nobody knows it better than the right hon. gentleman himself. If he had put that increase through last year, your Civil Service would have been placed on the level of independent men, with their rights defined by statute, that is where they would have been.

Left as it was,—and for that very purpose, one may I believe,—many of them were in dire want, many of them were pressed by the necessities of every day household economy, many of them were pressed by maturing bills which went beyond the income that they had given to them. They had come two years ago and a year ago and put their plea and their case before the government, they had had their plea and their case practically approved and yet they had been denied their increases. The Minister of Finance of the government of last year made it plain that he could not vote for it because it involved too great a strain upon the finances. That was the state of things. Then, why, he asks, did not my hon. friend raise the hue and cry before the elections were over. Why did not my right hon. friend make his bribe in time to let the country know what he had done and raise the hue and cry? This letter is dated the 19th day of October. When it was published I do not know, but certainly not before the 19th. It would take some days to get it out and circulate it. You will not be wrong if you say that the right hon. gentleman calculated it so that it should come at the very crucial moment, a few hours before the election, do its work and be heard of outside as little as possible. Is that clean politics? The poor devil who does not know to-day where he will get enough to put him through to-morrow and who succumbs to the dollar bill that is offered to him as the price of a day's labour if he will go and vote for a man must be visited with pains and penalties, he must be reprobated as a man guilty of taking a bribe. This gentleman, the leader of the government, the Liberal of the old English school, goes and offers $347,000 a few days before the election to the electors to vote for him. Yet, he sneers at purity. Why should he not? He has earned the right to do so. He could not pass this simple debate through without sneering at the virtue of the hon. gentleman who leads this party. He has established his right to sneer at every political and public virtue in this country.

Now it may be well just to see what this circular is, to see whether it is simply a suggestion, to see whether it is simply just an idea that it might be reasonable to do something. The hon. the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) makes the following statement. But, before we go to that let me say another thing which I had almost forgotten. There was a special reason why a bribe of $347,000, as figured out by the minister who brought down the Bill to-day, should be held out within a few hours of the vote in the city of Ottawa. What was the special reason? The right hon. gentleman had last session and the session before declared that everything was right in the timber limit and land leases and under the mellowing influence of argument and logic like that, one of the chief recipients of the bounty in the practically unpaid franchises from this country was, by his party, nominated to contest the city of Ottawa. They nominated him and he passed into the contest.

An hon. MEMBER. What has that to do with this?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I am not responsible for the election of the hon. gentleman. He will have to ask his constituents if he cannot see what this has to do with it. That gentleman was the nominee of the party in this city, and his canvass went on. But, the word that came to the right hon. gentleman's ear was more doleful and more hopeless each day until the Macedonian cry came to come over and help us or we are lost. The right hon. gentleman, with the loss of the constituency staring him in the face, with the fact patent before him that he would lose in the metropolis and capital of this country, by a peculiarly Liberal method of action, ousted the choice of the party in this city and placed himself in the gap with the present junior member for Ottawa. Then came the opportune time and to make the election sure the promise was made of $347,000 if the Civil Service would do the right thing. The Civil Service trembled, many a man voted honestly—I am not going to say that any one did not vote honestly—but they were between their necessities and the insidious, relentless canvass which went on every hour, day and night;—'Remember that the premier is going to represent this city; remember that he is all-powerful; what he wants done will be done; if you want your salaries raised be careful to be on the right side with the premier, who holds it in the hollow of his hand.' So he does and so he promised them. The statement of the hon. junior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) is as follows, and that was, I find, given out in the Ottawa Free Press on October 13, not long before the election:

> Despite what the government had previously done in its endeavour to put the service into proper shape, it was felt, some two years ago, that a civil service commission should be appointed. That commission made certain recommendations, one of which was that the Civil Service should be taken out of politics. The government passed an Act last session to carry out that recommendation, and it went into force on September 1.

One note of comment on that would be that if such a thing did take place it took place simply for the service in Ottawa, but it did not do anything for the service of the Dominion.

> I want to say quite frankly, as a man who has had something to do with legislation, that you cannot expect any Act, or any great change such as this, to be put in force and carried out in a few weeks. It takes time to accomplish any great change, and when the civil servants look into that point and see what these changes mean to them, they will not complain. In every class, the minimum and maximum of salaries is raised $200.
> The Act is meant as a permanent benefit to the civil servants of Canada,—

The civil servants of Canada! The Civil Service in the city of Ottawa—> —and is not fair to criticise it after looking at it for only three or four weeks.

> What has the government done? The deputy ministers have taken hold of this Act and started to reclassify the members of the Civil Service.

And yet the minister to-day, in introducing his Bill, said that they had not done a blessed thing until after they had got back from their elections, and then they were so tired out that they could not do anything; hence the flat increase.

> To reclassify such a large body of men, so many different considerations being concerned, is bound to take some time.

Who in the world has attempted to reclassify them? The minister says that they are not going to attempt to reclassify them. Instead of reclassifying them to find out the merit and desert of each, they adopt a horizontal, flat increase, which requires no classification.

Those gentlemen who have gone into the matter are, however, I understood nearly ready to make their report of the reclassification, which shows that they have taken it up earnestly. Then it has to go to the cabinet council. During the last few weeks of course, ministers have been busy with elections, for they, like we, have to see that a good government is returned.

That's good :—

They are engaged in different sections of the country assisting various candidates.

Assisting various candidates ; that's good:—

They are engaged in various sections of the country assisting varions candidates who are going to make up the parliament of Canada and the defenders of the Liberal policy. But the civil servants will be looked after on their return after the 26th.

That's a full promise.

What I want to say with regard to reclassification is that the large number of civil servants will actually receive a cash benefit.

The minister to-day declares that under the reclassification they would only receive a benefit of $59,000, but that under this horizontal increase the total will come up to $387,000.

They do not have to wait until next session for their money. The money under the Act comes out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada and it is there for the civil servants as soon as the classification goes through.

Now comes the gist.

The Civil Service Commissioners also recommended, for the inside and outside service, a general increase based on merit of 15 per cent under $1,500, 12½ per cent over $1,500 and 25 per cent to those in the west. I want to pledge my word here and now that I will do all in my power to see that that recommendation is absolutely carried out as soon as this reclassification is settled and the Civil Service is put on a proper basis.

I want to remind the hon. junior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) that he has some work cut out for him; he was honest in making that promise, he intends to implement it now.

I want to say further that in all cases not only the increases through the reclassification but also the increases to be given under the recommendation of the commission will date back to the 1st of September, the date on which this Act came into force.

Here is the Bill; here is the minister explaining it, here is the Prime Minister supporting it, and they absolutely do not intend for one moment or in any degree to go into the matter of merit so that the junior member for Ottawa must go to work and convert his Prime Minister and his Minister of Agriculture who is bringing this Bill down. It is not 'ought to date back,' not that it is my opinion that they should date back, not that I will strive to have them date back. Now, this is submitted to the Prime Minister who is a candidate in the city of Ottawa where there are 2,700 civil servants, a large proportion of whom have votes, and the Prime Minister on the 19th of October writes:—

Ottawa, 19th October, 1908.

My dear McGiverin,—I have read with care the statement which you made in your speech reported in the 'Ottawa Free Press" of Tuesday, October 13, with regard to the Civil Service. The opinion which you therein express seems to be fair and reasonable, and I am prepared to endorse it, and you can say so.

I may add that the Civil Service Commission was appointed to advise the government, and that after due consideration the suggestions which they have made seem to me, as they seem to you, reasonable, fair and equitable.

I have no authority at this moment to pledge the government. I only express my personal opinion, and the course which I will recommend to my colleagues.

Believe me as ever,

Yours very sincerely,

(Sgd.) WILFRID LAURIER.

H. B. McGiverin, Esq.,
Ottawa.

Well, does not that carry the whole thing? The Prime Minister who creates his colleagues, out of indifferent material often—the matter that went into Adam as necessary and proper for the creation was scant enough but it was pretty good material. My right hon. friend is also a creator ; he creates his colleagues, he sustains his colleagues, he dismisses his colleagues when they don't please him; as the man in the Scripture of old he says to one of them: Do this, and he doeth it; and to another: come, and he cometh; and to another: go, and he goeth—but he does not go with exactly the same equable temperament as when he was told to come. And the right hon. gentleman, a candidate for the city of Ottawa where there are 2,700 civil servants whose plea for years he has absolutely denied, and to whom he has neglected to give redress, this right hon. gentleman says: Here am I the all powerful; here am I the creator of the Cabinet and what I tell you is that I will recommend this to my colleagues if I get in—and he couldn't get in except by their votes. It was a straight out-and-out bid in the form of a promise and in the form of a menace, and in the whole history of parliament and of the public life of Canada I doubt if a similar specific and glaring instance can be found. Well may my right hon. friend raise his hand to Heaven and say: Thank God I am a purist; he has earned the right to say so.

Mr. H. B. McGIVERIN (Ottawa). Mr. Speaker; in rising to discuss the resolution which has been so fully and completely presented by the Minister of Agriculture I do not wish to occupy the time of the House at any great length. But there have been certain statements made here which I shall discuss just as soon as I have expressed my feeling in regard to the resolution. This resolution, as has been stated, is to implement the Civil Service Act passed last session. That Act was passed during the last few weeks of the session and it is universally admitted that it was a great step in advance towards Civil Service reform. It was expected that the recommendations made by the Royal Commission on the Civil Service appointed two years ago would be fully given effect to by that Act. While the resolution to-day simply deals with the question of salaries, the Act of last session dealt with salaries to this extent, that it increased considerably the minimum and the maximum of each class. An arrangement was also provided for, so that the re-defining of the duties of each class should be attended to, in the first place, by the deputy minister, and, after the first reclassification and re-definition of duties, by the Civil Service Commission.

Now, a great deal has been said of the statements which I made to the electors of this city, and a great deal has been attempted to be made of a letter which the right hon. leader of the government wrote to me. I fail to see anything wrong in what I stated to the people of this city. I fail to see one statement that was made by me that can properly be claimed to have been in any way a bribe. I stated that I believed that the recommendations of a Royal Commission, which had been placed before parliament, and which had to all intents and purposes received the sanction of parliament, should be carried out as soon as possible; and I said that I would do all that lay in my power—and I am proud to repeat that statement now—to carry out a measure of reform in the Civil Service, which I believe to be not only in the interests of the citizens of Ottawa, but in the interests of the people of this country. In regard to statements made before the electors of this city, I might refer my hon. friend, the member for North Toronto, to a statement that was published in the Ottawa 'Citizen,' the senior Conservative organ in this city, on the 23rd of October, from our opponents, Mr. Birkett and Dr. Chabot, as follows :

> If given the trust by the electors of Ottawa, we will use our utmost endeavours to see that the recommendations made by the Civil Service Commissioners to parliament last session shall be carried out, and at once, and we have the assurance of our leader that this will be done.

That may not have been a bribe, because it was too much of a bluff. It was well known that the electors of this city would honour themselves in electing the right hon. leader of the government, the leading citizen of this country, and the leading citizen of the capital. I made no promises during that election. I made statements to the people of what I would do, and I will endeavour in the future, as I have done in the past, to live up to what I said. I do not think that the hon. member for North Toronto has proved anything by reading from that circular, and I am satisfied that the citizens of this city know that no promises were made to them except that what was fair and right, in the interest of the city, should be done.

In regard to the question of a flat increase as against the percentage of increase which was recommended by the Royal Commission, I see very little difference except in this respect, which is to me a very important one. Any one who examines the report of the commissioners on the subject of a percentage increase will see that their remarks are based wholly on the increased cost of living, which must necessarily affect the smaller salaried men of the Civil Service to a greater extent than those of the higher classes. Therefore I am more in favour of the flat increase than I am of the percentage proposition. The $150 increase will be more of a godsend to those receiving lower salaries than any percentage of increase would be to the men receiving higher salaries.

I trust, Sir, that this resolution will soon become law, because the men who are doing the work of the country in the Civil Service cannot too soon be put upon a fair basis of recompense. I am sure that the new members of this House will soon learn, from their intercourse with them, that the Civil Service of Canada is second to none—that the members of the service are obliging, intelligent, and only too ready to assist in any way the government of this country; and anything that the parliament of Canada can do to improve the Civil Service is not only of benefit to the Civil Service itself, but in the interest of the good government of this country.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright). Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say a word on the resolution. I was in some doubt as to just how far the government would go in this matter; but after hearing the right hon. the Prime Minister, I feel convinced that the government will take up at a very early day the question of the outside service, and at the same time include in their consideration a very large class of men who do not exactly come within the scope of the Civil Service Act; I refer to the large number of mechanics and labouring men, who are engaged by the government to do day labour. I heartily sympathize with this increase which is given to the inside service; I believe they are well deserving of it; and I think the time has come when those who are working for the government should not be the worst paid men in this country. It seems unfortunate that men who are devoting their time and talents to the service of this country should be underpaid, as I feel that they are. I heartily sympathize with this resolution, and I trust that before very long something will be done for the outside service and for other classes of people who are working for the government.

Mr. JOHN BARR (Dufferin.) I wish to enter my protest against this Bill. No doubt it will be a surprise to the Civil Service throughout the Dominion, and I venture to say that the promise given by the First Minister to give the outside service relief at some future date will not by any means satisfy them. No doubt there is reason why those living in Ottawa should receive additional compensation, but there is no reason why those living outside Ottawa are not entitled to similar treatment. It cannot be proved that living in Ottawa is more expensive than in any other city of the same size even in the province of Ontario, and when we go to the far west we find conditions existing there which considerably enhance the cost of living. It seems to me a most extraordinary argument that while we shall give an increase of salary to those residing in Ottawa, we will not do so to those living outside, and the reason given us is that the government has not had time to take their case into consideration. Notwithstanding the fact that this Civil Service Bill was brought down over a year ago, the government has not had time to consider the outside branches. But they have had time to consider the claims of the inside service in Ottawa, and no doubt that is due to the fact that in their case the political exigencies were much greater, because in Ottawa there are some 2,700 employees who have the right to vote and it was necessary to secure their vote in order to elect the government candidates. That, I believe, is the only true reason why they have been given greater consideration than those outside. Take, for instance, the customs officials throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. Many of them live in towns where the cost of living is much greater than in Ottawa. I submit that in this respect there is no difference between Ottawa and Toronto, and in many of the outside cities and localities the government officials have to work longer hours than those in Ottawa. The outside Civil Service officials have, in many cases, more work and greater responsibility than the inside, yet they are not given the consideration which they were entitled to expect. That consideration was promised by the First Minister to the Civil Service as a whole without distinction; and both the inside and the outside should receive the increases promised. It is well known that we have civil servants who work probably as hard as any other class, but it is equally well known that we have in the service many officials who are simply kept here because of political pull. It is in the best interests of the country that all should be treated on a par without regard to politics but solely to merit. The country demands a better service, and the man who does good service should receive better consideration than the one who does not, yet the reverse is often the case. If the recommendation of the commission in this respect had been carried out, we would have a better service. I do not believe that we would have the graft which has been going on for the past few years. I again enter my protest against the outside service being treated differently from those who live in Ottawa. I protest against this procrastination in giving justice to our officials who are not resident in the Capital. This measure ought to include all classes of civil servants, and hon. gentlemen opposite will find that the country will not endorse their unfair treatment of one class of public officials as compared with the other.

Mr. SPROULE. We are told by the government that there is some principle in this Bill. I would like to know what it is. It only applies to those officials who are fortunate enough to reside in this city and who consequently had something to say in determining the results of an election in which the right hon. the First Minister was a candidate. These people are to get consideration whereas those residing elsewhere are not to be considered at all. If it be a principle that we are only to take one city at a time and work a reform in that city, I wonder how long it will take the government to go through every locality in the Dominion and make a complete civil service reform. The junior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) has said that there is a principle in this Bill which is embodied in that introduced last session. What was the principle in the Bill of last session? It was to take the Civil Service out of politics. Bringing my judgment to bear on the statement of the junior member for Ottawa and that of the First Minister, in his reply to the letter from that hon. gentleman, I would say that the principle adopted is to put the service under political influence instead of taking it away from that influence, especially when their votes are apt to turn the scale. But all civil servants should get the advantages of the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, even though they happen to live in a locality where these votes were not specially needed. Was that taking it out of politics? I think it was putting it into politics. If there is a grosser example of bringing the Canadian Civil Service into politics, I do not know where it is to be found.

In the statement of the junior member for Ottawa to the Civil Service, it is pointed out that they do not have to wait nor be under any uncertainty as to parliament voting the money, because it is to be taken out of the consolidated revenue fund. Who had the authority to make that promise? The hon. gentleman was then only an aspirant for parliament, and had neither the authority to make that promise nor the power to carry it out. It was given an appearance of authority by the Prime Minister that such a resolution as we have here would be passed. Had it not been supported by the high authority of the Prime Minister, it would have been of no value. But this is a binding promise, and means something. I have not before me the Act for the punishment of bribery at elections but it clearly provides that the person making certain promises comes under the penalty of the law. If a more flagrant violation of that Act occurred in the last election than that committed by the Prime Minister and his colleague in the city of Ottawa, I do not know of it.

The junior member for Ottawa declared that he would do his utmost to have the recommendations of the commission carried out in toto. But those recommendations did not apply to the civil servants in Ottawa alone. It is quite proper, I presume, that the civil servants in Ottawa should get this increase, we raise no objection to it. But why does no proposition appear in this resolution to implement the promise that was made so far as the Civil Service outside of Ottawa are concerned? Not only does the junior member for Ottawa not carry out the pledge given in his circular, but he has not even said a word with regard to it.

Another feature is this: The government last session introduced a Bill which was duly enacted into law. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) tells us that the increases under that Act, when figured out, would give an increase in the public expenditure of about $59,000. That is my recollection of the figure, and if I am wrong I hope he will correct me. But the same hon. gentleman tells us that to carry out the promises made under the Bill to be founded on this resolution will involve an increase of $343,000 of expenditure. And, just as this increase is greater, it was a more potent lever to get votes for the persons requiring them at the time, the Prime Minister and the junior member for Ottawa.

Another thing that seems very strange to me is this: The resolution before us provides that these sums may be paid out of any unexpended moneys for the Civil Service voted last year. In other words, money voted by parliament for one purpose is diverted to another purpose. Every dollar voted last year was voted for some specified service. But now we are told that any moneys voted for the Civil Service and unexpended can be paid, under this Bill, to the civil servants in Ottawa. If this is to be done, it is hardly to be wondered at that the government, the year before last, took the money voted for one purpose and applied it for another. Money that was voted for an exposition in a foreign country was taken to pay the travelling expenses of a minister. Even that minister himself practically admitted to this House that he did not regard this as exactly right, though he was not prepared to admit that it was altogether wrong. The government has no right to take money voted last year for a special purpose and use it for the purpose of paying the Civil Service at Ottawa an amount beyond what was voted to them in the estimates. Such a procedure is only introducing the thin end of the wedge of a practice which may be very embarrassing for the government in the future. They are not trying to live up to the spirit and letter of the votes of parliament. When it goes before the Auditor General, I would like to have his opinion whether it would be in strict compliance with the vote that was given last year to use it as it is proposed to use it by this Bill.

Mr. SPROULE.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee on the resolution.

Mr. FISHER. I would suggest that as this resolution differs little from the Bill which will be founded upon it, we should pass the resolution and permit the Bill to be introduced, the details of which can be discussed better when the Bill itself comes before the committee—if the leader of the opposition agrees to that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would prefer not to do that. Any discussion that takes place upon this resolution in committee will not be repeated when the Bill is introduced, therefore I do not think any time will be lost. If my hon. friend finds it convenient to have the information brought down on Tuesday, we may go on with the Bill then.

Mr. FISHER. I am quite ready to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend. I think I will be able to bring down those things which have been asked for, on Tuesday. I have given instructions to have them prepared; and no doubt other information will be asked for from time to time. I propose therefore that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 1, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier presented the report of the special committee appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the select standing committees of the House, which was, on motion, concurred in.

CIVIL SERVICE CLASSIFICATION.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER laid on the table the classification of certain departments of the inside Civil Service.

ILLICIT OR SECRET COMMISSIONS.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 31) to prevent the payment or acceptance of illicit or secret commissions and other like practices. He said the object of this legislation is fairly well indicated by the title. It is proposed to enact that the payment or acceptance of illicit or secret commissions and practices of that nature shall be an offence punishable either by indictment or upon summary conviction, according to the gravity of the circumstances. The measure is one of general application. We have already upon the statute book, in the shape of sections in the Criminal Code, enactments against the receiving of secret commissions by agents in the employ of any Government in Canada or of any municipal corporation. But this legislation proposes to go further and make it criminal on the part of any employee to accept any secret commission in consideration of favours to be given at the expense of his employer. This legislation is in substance the enactment adopted on the subject by the Imperial Parliament two years ago. The Bill as drafted is an adaptation of that legislation and simply proposes to adopt, for the purposes of this country the legislation which, in that respect is now on the Statute Book of Great Britain. The clauses of the Criminal Code, to which I have referred, will none the less have their application to transactions within their scope and which may have already taken place. The enactment now proposed will to some extent cover the same ground, and it is proposed to increase the incidence of punishment and to make offences of the general character I have described fall within the provisions of the Act. The Bill consists simply of a clause defining the terms used in the proposed legislation and one declaring that every one who falls within the description of the proposed statute is guilty of an offence and liable, either upon indictment or summary conviction, to the penalties proposed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT—AMENDMENT.

Mr. JOHN BARR (Dufferin) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 32) to amend the Railway Act. He said this Bill is somewhat similar to the one introduced last session. Its object is to facilitate the crossing of railways by telephones, telegraphs, watermains, viaducts, and so on. The difficulty under the present law is that permission must be asked from the railway company before any such crossing can be made. In the rural districts, the railway companies demand $5 for each crossing. In my opinion this is most unjust. If the parties refuse to pay the $5, they must apply to the railway board. This involves the drawing and filing of plans and the employment of legal counsel and necessitates considerable delay and expense. We know that the railway commission is overworked, and the result is months' delay before the sanction of the board is obtained to any application of the kind. At present telephone companies, small and great, are being built throughout the length and breadth of the country, and are accomplishing considerable good by bringing the rural districts in close communication with the towns and villages; and it is unfortunate that they should be frequently hampered and delayed in their efforts by reason of difficulties and delays in crossing the railway tracks, besides being put to a great deal of expense through having to make application to the railway commission. By adopting this Bill, which provides that the railways cannot demand or receive any compensation from telegraph and telephone companies for the right to cross a railway track, we will relieve the railway board of a good deal of work. Another provision in this Bill is that application may be made to the station master within the jurisdiction, or of the most convenient station master; and if no action be taken by the railway company during fifteen days, the applicants may go on and cross the railway tracks. So far as watermains and viaducts are concerned, they must give fifteen days' notice and pay the expenses of the engineer who will examine the work. If this Bill be carried, it will lessen the work of the railway commission, and relieve the telegraph and telephone and watermain companies from the long delay and expense now unavoidable.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—MAIN ESTIMATES.

Hon. WM. PATERSON (for the Minister of Finance) delivered a message from the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message as follows:

Government House,
Ottawa, February 1, 1909.

GREY.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 31st March, 1910, and in accordance with the provisions of The British North America Act, 1867, the Governor Genaral recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

On motion of Mr. Paterson, the message of His Excellency, together with the estimates, were referred to Committee of Supply.

WRITS FOR COMOX-ATLIN AND CARLETON.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the orders of the day are called, I desire to ask the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) whether or not the writs of election for Comox-Atlin and Carleton have been issued.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think they have, but I will give my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) a definite answer to-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

THE FISHERIES—SETTLEMENT WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN asked:

1. What progress has been made towards arriving at a settlement with the provincial governments with respect to the fisheries?
2. Has Mr. Bastedo made any report upon the matters with respect to which he was appointed?

3. If so, what is the nature of his report and when will it be brought down?

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries):

1. Not much material progress has been made.
2. Previous to accepting another position Mr. Bastedo made some reports regarding provinces visited.
3. The reports were of a tentative nature, and under conditions obtaining in respect thereof, the present moment would not seem to be opportune for bringing them down.

LOBSTER-PACKING LICENSES IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. SINCLAIR asked:

1. How many licenses to pack lobsters were granted by the Department of Marine and Fisheries in Nova Scotia for the year ending December 31, 1908?
2. Referring to the returns received by the department on or before September 1, 1908, under the provisions of section 39 of the Fisheries Act, how many of said licensees failed to pack any lobsters during the said year?
3. What is the name and address of each of the said licensees who failed to pack any lobsters during the said year; and the locality where the factory is situated?

4. (a) 2,830. (b) 6,574. (c) 1,000.

In addition 3,861 rifles have been issued to rifle associations.

It may be noted that all target practice in the different camps of instruction, where service ammunition was used, was done with Mark II. rifle with Mark III. sights.

The exact number of these rifles used in each camp has not been stated in the camp reports, with the exception that at Charlottetown 100 were used for musketry training; Niagara, 500 were used for musketry training; Sussex, 600 were used for musketry training; Three Rivers, 200 were used for musketry training; Calgary, 100 were used for musketry training.

In these camps and in all others, excepting Kingston and London, arrangements were made to supply Ross rifles for target purposes to the different units as they reported at the firing point. All preliminary instruction in rifle shooting was given with the Ross Rifle.

At London and Kingston, where ranges were not available for service shooting, practice was carried on with gallery ammunition and the Lee-Enfield rifle used for the purpose. In these camps rifle exercises and instructions in musketry were given with the Ross rifle.

8. Three claims for compensation have been received, viz.:

(a) J. T. Seale, Eastman, Que., transport, $9.20; compensation, $15; total, $24.20.

The accident in this case was due to the rifle bursting, owing to an abnormal pressure of gas, the cause of which is not known. The rifle had also been tampered with, the 'bent' of the cocking piece having been filed away considerably.

(b) Sidney A. Fletcher, New Westminster, B.C., $500. This accident was caused by the rifle bursting, due to a defective cartridge.

(c) D. St. Dennis, Slocan, B.C., $114.55. The accident was caused by the rifle bursting, due to a double bulleted cartridge.

Accidents have also occurred with the Lee-Enfield, notably at London, where the firer of the rifle was injured and the man next to him at the firing point killed. In this case the department paid the funeral expenses and also the bills incurred for medical attendance.

8. Is he still employed in the railway service? If so, is it proposed to continue him in the employ, for what period and upon what terms, how will he be paid and on what authority, and is it proposed to use the voucher method in his case?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals):

He, of course, will be paid by voucher, the usual way in which superannuated men are paid, i.e., the amount included in the superannuation, payment is deducted from the salary, the balance paid by voucher. The authority for such payment by voucher is section 24, chapter 17, Revised Statutes of Canada.

That policy has since been adhered to.

'It is said every contractor in the country was an open enemy of Morse. The manner of his departure was exceedingly dramatic. It is stated by some well-informed railway men that the government notified Mr. Hays that they could not get on with Mr. Morse and that he was persona non grata to them'?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. None whatever.

2. (a) The government has no knowledge of such being the case; (b) expression of opinion on this point is beyond the purview of the government; (c) the government is not aware that any well informed railwaymen made such a statement, but if they did it was wholly unwarranted.

The Chief Electrical Engineer of the department has visited all the plants referred to within the last twelve months.

8. No. A fixed quantity is stated in the license, but it is expressly provided therein that said license shall be subject to the regulations established by the Governor General in Council. These regulations provide that 'Any license issued hereunder shall be revocable at will by the Governor in Council if the licensee refuses or neglects to comply with any of the conditions from time to time imposed by the Governor in Council with regard to the supply and distribution of electrical energy, gas or fluid in Canada and, moreover, whenever such electrical energy, gas or fluid is required for

Mr. BARNARD asked:—

1. Did the government use its influence, as provided for in article 9 of the terms of union with British Columbia, in any way to secure the continued maintenance by the imperial government of the naval station at Esquimalt, either before, after, or at the time the said naval station was abandoned?

3. Has the naval station at Esquimalt been taken over by Canada.

4. Has any arrangement been made for the taking over of such station?

5. Has any expenditure in connection with the said naval station been authorized by the government of Canada, or to the knowledge of the government of Canada, by the imperial government? If so, to what amount, and for what purpose?

MUTILATION OF ENVELOPES.

Mr. ARMSTRONG asked:

1. What means have been taken by the Post Office Department during the past year to remedy the constant mutilation of envelopes passing through the mail?

2. Has the government received complaints regarding the management of the post office at MacKay, Ontario, and the condition and delivery of mail at that place? If so, what is the nature of said complaints and what action has been taken to improve the condition found there?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General):

1. No evidence has been submitted in this department to indicate that there is any constant mutilation of envelopes passing through the mails, nor is there any reason to believe that such cases are at all frequent. Complaints are occasionally received as to the damaged condition of mail matter, but upon investigation it is generally found that the damage is due to the fact that the paper used in the manufacture of the covers in which such matter is inclosed is of inferior quality, and not sufficiently strong to resist the ordinary friction and pressure which it must sustain by coming in contact with other mail matter during course of post.

2. There is no post office in the Dominion known as 'Mackay.'

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY—ESCAPE OF CONVICTS.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR—by Mr. Blain—asked:

3. When and how was the report, if received, acknowledged?

4. If such report was received, was any reward offered for the recapture of these convicts? If so, what was the amount and the date of publication of the offer in British Columbia?

5. Had the department any knowledge or communication from outside the penitentiary with the convict Miner prior to his escape? If so, was such communication by authority granted any officer of the department at Ottawa?

6. Has the attention of the Minister of Justice been drawn to statements in the press that the officer in charge of the British Columbia Penitentiary at the time of the escape has it in his power and has the inclination to make sensational disclosures in this connection?

7. If so, is it the intention of the government to take steps to bring out any disclosures in the power of the former deputy warden to make?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice):

1. Yes; 8th August, 1907.

2. Yes.

3. Report was made by telegram, received on 9th August, stating that 'Four convicts had escaped,' and by a further telegram, received at the department 12th August, stating that 'Bill Miner was among those gone.' On 12th August the minister instructed that a reward of $500 should be offered for Miner's recapture, and printed notices of such reward were issued from the office of the Commissioner of Dominion Police on 14th August. When such notices first reached British Columbia the department is not able to say.

5. No.

6 & 7. Only by an item which appeared in several newspapers published on 29th

January, 1909, stating that the officer who was in charge of the penitentiary at the time of the escape was in a position to make disclosures with regard to the matter. 2. The law is intended to be carried out by municipal market inspectors.

3. No, but dealers evading the Act are liable to prosecution.

STEEL CORPORATIONS.

Mr. A. C. BOYCE (West Algoma) moved:

For a return showing all importations of steel bars, steel ingots, rolled iron and steel, steel rails and structural steel, into the Dominion of Canada, by months, since the 31st day of March, 1908, and up to the 31st January, 1909, showing (a the quantity imported; (b) the country from which imported; (c) port of entry; (d) the value of the imports; and (e) the amount of duty paid thereupon.

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs). My commissioner informs me that this will be a very much longer return than the hon. gentleman can possibly desire. I do not know whether it would be better for him to drop it and take another return that would be available. He could not get this return before the end of the session.

Mr. BOYCE. There was a memorandum brought down which gave what I wanted down to 31st March, 1908. All I ask is that it should be extended down to the 31st January, 1909. The statement is a very short one, containing only two pages. It was handed the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) by the hon. minister, and all I ask is that it should be extended to date.

Mr. PATERSON. Was that return as comprehensive as this motion? Do you want me to take in all these steel bars, steel ingots, rolled iron, &c.?

Mr. BOYCE. No, not if they were not in that return. All I want is that return extended.

Motion agreed to.

NATURAL RESOURCES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN moved:

That in the opinion of this House it is advisable to appoint a select standing committee on natural resources who shall have authority to inquire into and consider and report upon all matters appertaining to the conservation and development of the natural resources of Canada, including fisheries, forests, mines, minerals, waterways and water powers, and to whom may be referred from time to time any report, document or matter touching the subject which they are appointed to consider.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no objection to my hon. friend going on with his motion, but I do not think the government can close the debate on it to-day.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My remarks will not be very lengthy. So far as the exact wording of this resolution is concerned, I shall be very glad indeed to accept any suggestion from the government or any hon. member of this House. My object is to point out that public interest in the conservation and development of the great natural resources of this country might be stimulated by action of parliament. We have at present a committee on agriculture. That committee has engaged for the most part in thoroughly non-partisan work and work which has been of great advantage to the people. We thoroughly realize that agriculture must be the principal basis upon which the future wealth of this country depends; but that consideration should not blind us to the further fact that we have, outside of agriculture, in the fisheries, forests, mines, minerals, waterways and waterpowers of this country, very great resources, the extent of which we do not at present realize, and the development and conservation of these are of very great importance to the people.

Now, in speaking of 'development' and 'conservation' I believe that these two words should be the watchwords of the country with regard to its natural resources. Conservation does not mean non-user; on the contrary, it is consistent with that reasonable user of these great resources which is absolutely necessary for their development. And, on the other hand, development does not imply destruction or waste; it ought not to imply destruction or waste, but these great resources should be both developed and conserved, so that they may be of the greatest possible advantage to the present generation and may also be handed down as a continuing heritage to those who come after us in the work of upbuilding this Dominion and the British empire.

We have had a great many stimulating addresses throughout the country on the importance of these great resources. One might expect that the parliament of Canada would be one of the great forces in awakening public interest in our resources, and the consideration of means by which the development and conservation of these resources should be carried out. But owing, I believe, to some extent at least, to the fact that we have had no committee of parliament specially charged with the consideration of our natural resources, parliament has not taken the initiative to any very considerable degree, and the stimulus of public interest and public attention in respect of these matters has come to us almost altogether from outside sources. I do not desire to put out of sight the most excellent work which the Canadian Forestry Association has done in awakening public interest in our forests. Nor do I desire for a moment to put aside consideration of the forestry congress or conference called by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) some three years ago, which I had the privilege of attending, and which, I think, did very good work in awakening public interest in this matter. I think the Prime Minister, at that time, announced that at some future date a further conference or congress of the same character would be called. I have no doubt that the effect of that meeting was to stimulate public interest and to educate the public in appreciation of these great resources, and in that way to assist the object which we are all interested in accomplishing. Nor do I put to one side the work which has been accomplished by the forestry branch of the Department of the Interior. I know that that branch has been established only a short time ; I know that it has not yet had an opportunity to accomplish the very great work which has been accomplished in the United States of America by the forestry service presided over by Dr. Pinchot. I have had, during the past three or four years, the privilege of receiving from the forestry service of the United States a number of the publications which they issue from time to time. If I brought them all here and laid them on the table of the House—and I do not suppose that I have a complete set—they would make a pile a foot or a foot and a half high. I have brought a few, which will show that these publications are of a most practical, interesting and varied character. An example is one published in 1908, called 'The Use Book,' containing almost a complete manual of the work which the Forestry Service of the United States accomplishes, giving directions of an extremely interesting and useful character to the people who may desire to solicit the co-operation of the United States Forestry Bureau. There are a number of pamphlets of a thoroughly practical character issued to the farmers and others throughout the country. For instance, 'Practical Assistance in Tree Planting,' 'How to Grow Young Trees for Forest Planting,' 'How to Transplant Forest Trees,' 'Progress of Forestry, 1905,' 'Forest Planting Leaflet'—these are issued in very great numbers, instructing farmers and others interested how transplanting should be done—'Consumption of Pulpwood in the United States,' 'Lumber Cut of the United States, 1906,' 'Wood Used for Pulp, 1905,' and so on in great variety and giving a vast amount of useful information. I desire it to be thoroughly understood that I refer to this not as casting any reflection on the work of the forestry branch of the Department of the Interior. I believe that the officials engaged in that branch are doing the best they can. They have been engaged in the work only a short time, and, while it is not practicable to go to the Forestry Branch of Canada and obtain all the information that is available to one who consults the publications of the Forest Service of the United States, I have no doubt that that condition is being remedied as rapidly as possible, and that we shall have in Canada, in the near future, a Forestry Bureau which will give the same information, the same evidence of active and aggressive work in this connection as is given by the Forestry Service of the United States under the very able presidency of Dr. Pinchot, who spoke in this city not long ago upon these subjects.

I would say, in that connection, that the attention of the people of the United States has been called very thoroughly to the importance not only of the development but of the conservation of their natural resources. I do not know that I can do better, in order to call the attention and awaken the interest of our own people in this matter, than to quote a few words from the very able and interesting address which Dr. Pinchot delivered in this city on the occasion of his last visit. He came, as I understand it, to bear a message from the President of the United States to His Excellency the Governor General and the right hon. leader of the government inviting the co-operation of this government in a conference or congress to be held in the capital of the United States, the delegates to include not only representatives of the United States, but also representatives of Canada and Mexico, in order that the people of the entire continent, through their accredited representatives, might consider methods of co-operation in this work of conservation of the natural resources of the continent. I do not know when that convention is to be held, but the announcement was made, on behalf of this government on that occasion, that the government of Canada proposed to send representatives to the meeting. I was very glad indeed to hear that announcement, and I am sure that the right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues may count upon the co-operation of the members on this side in this work which has already been attended with such beneficial effects in the United States. Now, going back to Dr. Pinchot's address, I desire to quote a few words from it. Speaking of the steps taken in the United States towards the conservation and development of their great natural resources, he said:

> The appointment of a waterways commission was the first step. The second was the great convention of governors of States in Washington last May, at which all the States were represented, at which for the first time the attention of the nations was called to the waste going on. The next step was a meeting of the National Conservation Commission at which the governors of half the States were present and delegates from other States, and at which both the outgoing president and the incoming president attended, and spoke, the latter being the chairman, and committing the new administration thoroughy and confidently to the policy of conservation left by the old administration; so that we know that in the United States, for four years more at least, this attempt to carry over for our children some of the things we received from our forefathers is going to continue. The first piece of work the National Conservation Commission did was to prepare an inventory of the national resources of the country, a somewhat rough and ready one, but so far as I know this is the first time that any nation has toted up its balance sheet and attempted to get an approximate knowledge of its supplies of natural resources. In other words, we have taken stock in the ordinary way in which any prudent man takes stock of what he has, so that we may inform ourselves of what we have, because we are to depend mainly upon ourselves for our supply hereafter. We are beginning to realize that; and, like a man cast away in a boat at sea, we are beginning to find out how long our water and food will last, and what we ought to do to save them. We learned a great many very striking facts. For example, we discovered that a preventable waste in our coal supplies amounts to some $300,000,000 every year; that if we go on increasing the use of them at the present rate, they will probably be gone by the middle of the next century—a long time perhaps, and yet not long in the life of a nation; that our iron supplies, which are just as necessary as our coal—the high grade ores—will be gone by the middle of this century; and that our oil and gas supplies will probably be gone by the middle of this century. We found that our lands are being washed into the sea at the rate of 800 million cubic tons per year—that our farmers have been losing over $500,000,000 a year from easily preventable soil erosion, $130,000,000 a year from injurious animals, and two or three times that amount from injurious insects and other forms of preventable waste; that some of our public lands were being disposed of in such ways that the number of homes on the lands were not being increased, which is the real test; that we are cutting our forests three and a half times faster than they are being produced; and that our forests are only growing at the rate of twelve cubic feet per acre per annum when they might easily grow at the rate of forty,—which shows the great loss of wood material that might be made but that is not being made. We found that of every thousand feet of lumber standing in the forests only a little over 300 feet gets into use; that the waste in logging, in milling, in seasoning, in working up afterwards, used up from the standing trees all but about 310 board feet for every thousand board feet standing in the woods. And a very large part of that waste is preventable. We found that the reasonably available water-powers in the country at the present time would move every railroad train, every trolley car, every wheel and every spindle, light every house, and answer every use of power in the country. That is to say, if our vast supplies of coal were burned up, they might easily to a great extent be replaced by the use of our water-powers which are at present largely going to waste. We found that our water-powers were in process of being monopolized by two or three great companies—that our water-powers, east and west, south and north, were being acquired as rapidly as those wise and far seeing men could get hold of them, and were thus in danger of being monopolized when our coal supplies were either exhausted or so depleted as to have greatly risen in price, in the hands of one of the most far reaching and oppressive monopolies that has ever existed on the face of the earth. In any country where fuel is scarce, as in California after the oil is gone, every source of power, so far as men of science know at present must come from the streams; and when that time comes, every railway train and trolley car will be run by electric power from water, every house lighted and heated, every gallon of water pumped for irrigation, every bit of manufacture, every bit of printing will be done by electric power from water. At every point the average citizen will come into daily contact with the monopoly that controls the water-power if it is allowed to pass beyond the position of government regulation. So that we feel it strongly that one of the great problems of conservation, with us as with you, is to see that our water-powers are kept in a position where they will serve the public and not the great corporations first and the public afterwards. We learned that our navigable streams cover about 26,000 square miles. We spend $500,000,000 on our rivers and harbours and about half of that on our streams; and yet our navigation has declined in spite of this enormous expenditure, and our streams are less navigable than they were fifty years ago because the soil is being washed into the streams faster than the government is able to dip it out in order to keep the streams in their original condition. How long the present conditions may be expected to continue, and what ought to be done about them, is the question we have to consider.

Now every one of these pregnant statements of Dr. Pinchot seem to have considerable application to Canada as well as to the United States. I would like to say in this connection that in a recent message addressed to Congress by the President of the United States, this language is used in referring to the work done by the National Conservation Commission which has recently met in the city of Washington:

The principle of the community of interest among all our people in the great natural resources runs through the report of the National Conservation Commission and the proceedings of the joint conference. These resources, which form the common basis of our welfare, can be wisely developed, rightly used, and prudently conserved only by the common action of all the people, acting through their representatives in state and nation. Hence the fundamental necessity for co-operation. Without it we shall accomplish but little, and that little badly.

Then he quotes the words of the resolution, which are as follows:

We also especially urge on the Congress of the United States the high desirability of maintaining a national commission on the conservation of the resources of the country, empowered to co-operate with state commissions to the end that every sovereign commonwealth and every section of the country may attain the high degree of prosperity and the sureness of perpetuity naturally arising in the abundant resources and the vigour, intelligence, and patriotism of our people.

Now having touched upon these inspiring utterances of Dr. Pinchot, which were listened to with the greatest attention and interest by every person present, let me, before dealing very briefly with the various resources such as forests, mines, etc., with which we are endowed in Canada, refer to a very patriotic work which has been done in the province of British Columbia by Mr. A. C. Flumerfelt, who has offered, during the past two or three years, prizes in that province for the best essays upon the potential resources of the province of British Columbia. I daresay that every hon. gentleman in this House has received a copy of the essays, embodied in pamphlet form, which are the results of Mr. Flumerfelt's patriotic endeavours. They contain a vast amount of information with regard to the natural resources of British Columbia, and I do not doubt that when our Canadian forestry bureau gets to work, when possibly some conservation commission is established in this country, we may have pamphlets of this kind with regard to all the natural resources of Canada, for we need them very badly at the present time.

Now, I would like to say to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister of Canada, and I am saying it without casting any discredit upon the government, without casting any discredit upon the forestry bureau which has been recently established, that I have spent, during the last year a great deal of time, first and last, endeavouring to find out only a few things regarding the various resources of Canada. I wanted to find out, in the first place, whether the forest resources of Canada are enormously greater, as, I thought at one time, than the forest resources of the United States; I wanted to find out what is the total acreage of the land in Canada which we can regard as properly available for the purpose of producing merchantable timber for export or for use at home; I wanted to ascertain how rapidly we are cutting that every year; I desired to ascertain how rapidly it is being replaced by the natural growth of the forest; and I am bound to say that, at the present time, there does not exist in Canada any official information whatever on these points, so far as I am aware, taking the country as a whole. Some information may exist in respect to one of two of the provinces, but taking the Dominion of Canada at the present time, there is absolutely no official information on those heads. I am not saying this in criticism of the present government or of any previous government, but I am saying it for the purpose of indicating to the Prime Minister, and to my colleagues in parliament, and to the people of this country, the urgent need of thorough and systematic work for the purpose of obtaining this information and placing it before the Canadian people.

I shall not this afternoon attempt any lengthy dissertation upon the natural resources of Canada. The greatness of the subject itself would be appalling to any man who would attempt to deal with it exhaustively. Let me speak first of the fisheries. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) brought to the attention of parliament last year the importance of having a select standing committee of this House upon the fisheries. At that time I concurred entirely with the view expressed by my hon. friend upon the importance of the fisheries and the necessity of some action by parliament for the purpose of stimulating interest and also bringing about a more efficient operation of the fisheries in this country and better preservation of them for those who are to come after us. The fisheries of the Atlantic and the Pacific coast as well are of very great importance to the people of Canada. I do not believe they are carried on as thoroughly and effectively at present as they might be. I believe that we have on both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts many species of fish which are not now sought, but which will some day be utilized for food, and I believe also that the fisheries of the Atlantic coast might be made to supply the needs of the people of Quebec and Ontario to a very much greater extent than at present. This must depend to some extent upon means of transportation and upon better methods by the fishermen and better co-operation among them. I am glad to say that there is to-day more co-operation among the fishermen of the maritime provinces, especially of Nova Scotia than there has been in the past. All these things might be encouraged and stimulated by a committee upon natural resources, because I would suggest that if such a committee be appointed, there should be sub-committees on fisheries, forests, and mines and minerals, each taking up the particular subject assigned to it; in that way such a committee could do a very great deal of work along a line that I believe to be in the public interest, the development and conservation of every one of these great industries.

Coming for a moment to our forests, one realizes that the forests of this country should be and are one of the greatest sources of our national wealth. The subject of forestry has been studied and developed upon scientific and common-sense principles in Europe. Many parts of our own country are unsuitable for agriculture but are eminently suitable for forestry.

Those who are interested in this subject would do well to consult an article of Dr. Fernow in the 'Forest Quarterly' of December, 1908, from which I propose to quote a little later. Dr. Fernow points out that a very large area indeed, of several of the provinces of Canada can be usefully employed for forestry purposes and for no other purpose.

I shall take but one illustration of many that could be given of the use that is made of mountainous lands in other countries. Saxony has under state control 430,000 acres of rough mountain land—an area not larger than an average county in Canada. From this she has taken two hundred million dollars in the past fifty years. During that time the cut has been doubled and is of infinitely better quality than it was fifty years ago. Then, only 17 per cent of the cut was serviceable, now 79 per cent is serviceable and the standing wood in the state forests has increased by no less than 16 per cent. The gross revenue per acre has increased from $1.75 to $6.67, and the net revenue per acre from 95 cents to $4.37. Canada possesses a forest area at least a thousand times greater than that of Saxony. While I am not advocating a policy of expropriation for the forest lands, nevertheless Canada and the several provinces of Canada do retain under state control an enormous amount of land which can be usefully employed for no other purpose.

There has been an enormous denudation of forest lands in the United States and the people of that country are beginning to realize that the true principle to be applied to forests is the principle of harvest and not that of destruction of the resources from which the harvest comes. It is estimated that the United States have at the present time 500,000,000 acres of forest lands. The estimates in regard to Canada vary greatly, from 800,000,000 acres to 1,700,000,000 acres. After consultation with a person who has studied the subject and who possesses an official status in this country, I am convinced that the actual area in the United States as well as in Canada available for the purpose of producing merchantable lumber whether for export or for use at home would not exceed 250,000,000 acres in the one country or the other, and I am also convinced notwithstanding the enormous denudation of the forests in the United States that the United States to-day possesses, contrary to what is generally believed, forest reserves slightly greater than those of Canada; and it must further be borne in mind that the forest resources of the United States are being renewed probably more rapidly than those of Canada. because in the southern parts of the United States, where a very considerable portion of their forest area still remains, the growth is probably more rapid than it is in any part of Canada with the possible exception of the maritime provinces. I make this exception because a gentleman who is now engaged in lumbering in Nova Scotia, who has had experience in Sweden, in Scotland, in Newfoundland, in Ontario and in Nova Scotia, tells me that the spruce forests of Nova Scotia are renewed more rapidly by natural growth than those of any other country in the world.

The paucity of our information in Canada is amazing both as to the extent of resources, area cut, waste and destruction and as to the period for which forests will last under present conditions. Of course when I refer to the present conditions I do not wish to put out of sight the enormous destruction by fire every year. Lumbermen will tell you that if you look over the history of forestry in Canada, an infinitely larger amount of lumber is destroyed by fire than is cut by lumbermen and this very important consideration should engage the attention with the provincial governments to the end that this enormous loss and destruction may be checked, so far as possible, in the future. Very valuable work has been done in the United States by forest patrols. Any one who will examine the reports of Dr. Pinchot, as to what has been done in the United States, particularly in the western portion of the United States, towards guarding against fires will realize that a very great work in this same connection can be carried on in this country, and I believe has been carried to some extent already, so far as our western forests are concerned by the Forestry Branch of the Department of the Interior. I do not, in the slightest, desire to minimize the good work which has been done by that Branch.

A word as to the lumber cut of the United States as compared with that of Canada The lumber cut of the United States, so far as I can obtain any information or details amounts to about 40,000,000,000 every year in merchantable lumber. If you add to that the railway ties, the pulpwood, the cordwood, the fence poles and the other wood that is cut from the forests of the United States, I am informed by Dr. Pinchot, to whom I applied for information on this subject, that the total annual lumber cut of the United States would amount to the equivalent of one hundred thousand million (100,000,000,000) of board measure. Now, how much are we cutting in Canada at present? I am unable to inform the House as to that with any degree of accuracy, but we have the following figures in the census of 1900 :

Our total cut, 1900—	—	Value.
Sawn lumber M. feet.....	3,657,000	$29,800,000
Other descriptions, fence posts, railway ties number	25,418,000	2,460,000
Cordwood pulp, &c., cords..	9,615,000	17,156,500
Timber, cubic feet.....	11,727,000	1,500,000

We have then to inquire what is the annual destruction of our forests by fire, and what are the total resources of timber in Canada to which we must look if we are concerned as to whether or not the supply will equal the demand in years to come. The best information I have been able to get on this subject is contained in an article by Dr. Fernow, published in the Forestry Quarterly for December, 1908. I wish I could read the whole of this article to the House, but I am afraid it would be too much for me to attempt to place it all on 'Hansard.' I will, however, ask to be allowed to quote two pages of the article because they contain very interesting information and statistics as to what the total forest resources of Canada amount to and where they are situated. Dr. Fernow was at one time head of the Forestry Department of the state of New York, and he is now professor of forestry in the University of Toronto; that university being, I believe, the first in Canada to take the highly commendable step of establishing a school of forestry. Dr. Fernow is reputed to be one of the most reliable authorities on this continent as to the timber resources of Canada and the United States. He has gone into this subject very thoroughly and exhaustively in this article, and if the House will bear with me I will quote a little from it. Speaking of British Columbia and of the western forests generally, he says :

In the mountain mills the average log sawed at the mill is 12 inches, of this description some 15,000,000 acres may be found in the southern Rocky Mountain type, which figured at 5,000,000 feet, gives another 75 billion feet, or altogether for the western Canada forest 300 billion feet. One might easily double these estimates without finding the supply inexhaustible. Every effort is being made to get rid of this valuable limited asset of the province.

Then Dr. Fernow continues:

Taking Ontario alone with a total land area of 126 million acres, of which 80,000,000 are still unsurveyed, we find that the distribution of these lands among three types of forest country occupied by the province gives 30 million acres to the southern hardwood type, 50 million acres to the central southern Laurentian type, and 46 million acres to the northern forest. Not quite 25 million acres are disposed of to private owners. From the assessment lists we learn, that of these, 14 million acres are cleared, of which 12·4 millions are in the peninsula, Lake Ontario and in St. Lawrence valley, and 1·7 millions in the southern Laurentian plateau. The wood lots on these farms are assessed at 5·5 million acres, nearly 2 million acres are reported as slash, and 2·8 million as swamp and waste 2·4, 2, and 1 million of the latter respectively in the three sections.

Applying a general experience figure for waste land incapable of recuperation, we would come to the conclusion that 85 million acres or two-thirds of the province will always remain in woods, except so far as it may be turned into grazing lands.

Mr. Whitson of the Crown Lands Department, one of the best informed men on these matters, places the figure as at best 70 million acres productive forest area, and the stand of pine outside of the licensed lands (12·5 million acres are licensed, and were some time ago estimated to contain 24 billion feet, the annual cut being around 800 million feet) and of forest reserves (10 million acres) at 10 billion feet B. M. and the pulpwood at 288 million cords. He also states that of the jackpine not 10 per cent is fit even for railroad ties.

For Quebec the distribution of land areas may be made as follows :—

Of the 218 million acres (342,000 square miles) around 144 million acres belong to the northern forest. 50 million the same amount as for Ontario, to the southern Laurentian; the St. Lawrence valley with 5 million acres represents mostly farm area, and the balance of 19 million acres may be accredited to the Acadian region. There are about 9 million acres in farms, of which 7·5 millions are in crops, and 1·5 millions is waste land, hence the total forest and waste land area is over 210 million acres. An estimate by Langelier, superintendent of forest rangers, places the standing lumber of the white and red pine at less than 40 billion feet, and spruce sawlogs at over 100 billion, all other saw material (including jackpine) at about 18 billion feet or altogether less than 160 billion feet.

The maritime provinces with somewhat over 57,000 square miles, together with the eastern townships of Quebec, south of the river (30,000 square miles) belong to the Appalachian or Acadian forest type. This area is practically cut out as far as pine is concerned, and relies now mainly on spruce for saw timber.

In New Brunswick 12 million acres are estimated to be under wood, the composition of which, by good authorities, is figured at 60 per cent spruce, 10 per cent pine, 5 per cent hemlock, 5 per cent cedar, 20 per cent hardwoods. Here the larger portion is owned privately, some 10·5 million acres. Of the 7·25 acres of crown lands all but about one million acres is under licenses, the latter area being barrens or burnt.

The small remaining area of timber land on Prince Edward Island is in calculations like these entirely negligible. New Brunswick together with Nova Scotia which represents an area of some 14 million acres, may round off the total stand of saw timber in the eastern provinces to 300 billion feet and for the whole of Canada to 600 billion feet. We might readily double these estimates and still remain within reasonable limits of the truth, if a closer utilization, especially on the Pacific coast, and more careful lumbering generally were practised, and if the fires running with tolerable regularity through the slash did not destroy much of the growing timber besides the young growth.

I invite the special attention of the House to what he says in conclusion:

Considering that the above estimated stand of saw timber, which others have considerably reduced, would not suffice to supply the present annual consumption of coniferous material in the United States for more than 15 to 20 years, and the import into Great Britain of this class of material for more than 60 to 80 years, the need of securing better knowledge of the conditions of this resource and of employing conservative methods in its use are apparent.

I think every member of this House who has given the subject the slightest consideration will agree with the latter conclusion at which Dr. Fernow has arrived.

Having spoken at this length with regard to the forests, let me say one or two words about the waterways. I regard these as a natural resource. They constituted at one time the only means of communication through the country. At the present time they constitute the cheapest means of communication and of transportation for the carriage of the great products of the country. In so far as the resources of the country will reasonably permit their development, they should be developed—not as political expediency or purely local demands may require, but upon a comprehensive and carefully prepared system based upon the probable future needs of the entire country.

Then, with respect to the water-powers, I am sure that every hon. gentleman who has heard this afternoon the words of Dr. Pinchot with regard to the importance of the water-powers of the United States must be impressed with similar considerations as applied to Canada. If the water-powers of the United States are so important as he says they are to the people of the United States, I believe that the water-powers of Canada are of infinitely more importance to the people of this country. I believe that their permanence under fair conditions can be assured, and I have not much doubt that if properly conserved, these water-powers will prove a more valuable asset to the people of Canada in the future than all our coal and other minerals, all our iron, all our gold and silver combined. They should be investigated, estimated and scheduled. They should not be subject to exploitation for purely individual profit, but should be conserved as an asset held in trust by the state for the benefit of the whole people. I realize that the committee on agriculture and also a committee of the Senate have made some investigation into matters touching the waterways of Canada. I believe that a committee such as I suggest could do a splendid work along the same lines. That committee could investigate also another subject to which attention has been called by Dr. Pinchot in the portion of his remarks which I quoted this afternoon the destruction of our forests and the consequent denudation of our hills and mountains, which converts our streams into torrents in the spring and dry beds in the summer and early autumn. A great authority in the United States, Professor Shaler, estimated that up to 1896 in the upland regions of the states south of Pennsylvania 3,000 square miles of soil had been destroyed as the result of forest denudation, and that the destruction was then going on at the rate of 100 square miles of fertile soil every year. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the equivalent of hundreds of fertile farms is being washed into the sea every year as the result of our neglect of the proper conservation of our forests.

Our mines are subject to different considerations from the forests and the waterways. The mines must, in the very process of development, eventually become exhausted. But there is good reason, it seems to me, for adopting the view that they should be administered under such a policy as will prevent waste and speculative exploitation, and that, so far as they are not required for immediate operation, the state should retain ownership and control ; and it may be that later on in the history of this country, the state will have to take a step even in advance of what I am now suggesting in that regard.

The question is, what are our resources? At what rate are they being dissipated or wasted ? How can they be developed in the interest of the whole nation ? In view of these considerations, Mr. Speaker, I thought it only right to place upon the Order Paper the motion which is now in your hands. I suggest a committee on natural resources. The work of such a committee could be distributed among subcommittees, and might be made of great service in many ways both to the government and the people. We hear a great deal, both in the United States and in Canada, of the decadence of our legislative institutions, the decadence of the influence of parliament, in these latter days, when almost all the work of government is confined to the members of the Cabinet. I know that that process has gone on in Great Britain, and it is curious to observe that exactly the same development in that respect is to be seen in Canada—that is, the continued decline of the influence of parliament as a parliament, and the continued increase of the power of the Cabinet. I do not know that that development is a very healthy development, and I suggest to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that we might perhaps assist in restoring to parliament as a parliament—not as a partisan parliament, but as a parliament earnestly striving to do some work of value in the public interest—some of its influence. If we could have committees such as the one I suggest, to take into consideration matters of great public interest, matters which perhaps for the time being, in the exigencies of the political situation, could not be taken in hand by the government itself, they might serve a very useful public purpose. The reports of such committees need not be acted upon immediately by the government of the day. For example, I believe that public attention should be directed to the pulpwood of this country. I realize what the conditions are in Quebec, the maritime provinces and other parts of the country. The people of this country do not understand that at the present time, while our producers are receiving for their pulpwood about $6 or $7 a cord labour bestowed upon it in the United States, when that pulpwood goes across the borders, make it worth $50 or $60 or $70. I realize that the subject is not free from difficulty ; but it seems to me that a committee of this House, taking up such a matter as that, and bringing before the committee the men who are most strongly opposed to taking any step towards utilizing our pulpwood in our own country, and inviting them to state their reasons and to argue the matter out, could do a work for the conservation of the national resources of this country which could not be done by the government of the day. So, while men everywhere in Canada are lifting up their voices for the conservation and development of our natural resources, it seems to me that some initiative should come from parliament, and that the members of parliament, without regard to party, sinking for this purpose all partisan considerations, should take up this work and endeavour to accomplish something for the good of the country. It is purely in that spirit that I have brought this matter to the attention of the right hon. leader of the government and of this House. I am not concerned about the verbiage of the resolution, or whether the committee shall be appointed on the motion of an hon. member on this side of the House or an hon. member on the other side. But I would like to see something done, and I trust that the suggestion that I have taken the liberty of submitting to the consideration of the House will receive the favourable consideration of the Prime Minister and his colleagues and of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and that in some manner it will be acted upon during the present session.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Lunenburg). I shall not, Mr. Speaker, take up much of the time of the House discussing this resolution. By the expression 'conservation and development of the natural resources of Canada,' one is led in these days to consider mainly our water-powers and timber resources, and I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. the leader of the opposition in that connection. Though I have not given these two matters sufficient personal attention to hope to contribute anything of interest to the debate, there are a couple of points to which I wish very briefly to refer. My hon. friend referred to the fact that last session the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) proposed that a select committee should be named to deal with matters relating to Marine and Fisheries, and I notice by the Order Paper that that hon. gentleman has given notice of his intention to renew his resolution of last year. In my judgment there is a considerable contrast between matters which come within the purview of the Department of Marine and Fisheries and those which are generally understood to come within the meaning of the term 'natural resources,' and I trust therefore that when the House comes to determine what shall be the scope of the proposed committee, it will eliminate anything relating to Marine and Fisheries. However, I am sure that there will be no great difficulty on that score, and that the hon. leader of the opposition will concur in my suggestion. There is just one other matter which is recalled to my mind by the mention by my hon. friend of a lumber operator in Nova Scotia, Mr. Miller, who does a large business in the county of Halifax. Mr. Miller has carried on lumber operations in many European countries and takes a deep interest in the conservation of our Canadian forest resources. I remember his telling me personally, not so very long ago, that he imported from Scotland spruce tree seeds for the purpose of seeding a certain number of acres of his holdings in the county of Halifax each year. For the last three years, he has made it a practice to seed about fifty acres each year of the land he cut over the preceding year. Some two or three years ago he imported from Scotland a quantity of these spruce seeds, naturally thinking he was doing some good to the country as well as advancing his own private interests, and being under the impression that these seeds were free of duty. You may imagine, Mr. Speaker, that he was rather mortified to find he was compelled to pay duty. The only suggestion I have to make is that the Minister of Customs should reduce his revenue tariff just a little bit by putting spruce seeds on the free list.

Mr. PATERSON. Parliament makes the law, and I only carry it out.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I would like to make a few observations regarding one matter which has attracted my attention for some years past. Whether the committee asked for, could, if appointed, do the work or not—and I do not think they could—it is very desirable to determine, at the earliest date, to whom these water-powers belong. Of late years a great many people are coming to this parliament to get incorporated for the purpose of controlling water-powers all over the country. We have had a Bill read the first time to-day for that purpose, and that is the same Bill which was thrown out last session by the Senate. It is quite clear to me that the desire of the incorporators is to get control of the water-powers of three important streams in the province of Ontario. Five or six years ago, I asked if the question had yet been determined as to whether these water-powers belonged to the provinces or to the Dominion. I can understand that the Dominion may control navigable streams, but many of these streams are not navigable, and on some of the latter the most valuable water-powers are found. It is for the purpose of getting control of these water-powers and streams that these companies are being incorporated. Some four or five years ago I brought this matter up and asked the government to have the question determined by some tribunal so that we might know whether the control lay within the provinces or the Dominion. If the water-powers belong to the provinces, the provinces ought to have control, because these powers will be one of the most valuable provincial assets. If they belong to the federal authorities, let the federal authorities determine how they shall be controlled. But if there be a joint interest, let it be determined what belongs to the provinces and what to the federal authorities. But the question ought to be determined at the earliest possible moment. It is absolutely necessary that it should be in order to stop the efforts of individuals or corporations to get control. I hope the government will not forget this phase of the matter and endeavour to have the question settled at the earliest possible moment.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I am happy to say that I have no word of dissent to express regarding the principle involved in my hon. friend's motion. The government is prepared to accept it and indeed would be prepared at once to grant this motion but for a consideration which I shall present later on to my hon. friend. He has said that the tendency of the present age is towards the decadence of parliament. I am not prepared to agree with him on that point, though I admit that the tendency is rather to put more and more responsibility on the government. Formerly members of this House would take the responsibility of certain legislation, but it is now felt better to draw the attention to, or the government to, certain subjects and expect the government to take them up and carry them to a successful issue. This motion is somewhat at variance with the principles of parliamentary government as they came to us in 1867. We have several committees in this House, but all are intended for the one purpose only, namely, to aid legislation. We have the Committee on Railways to which all questions affecting railways are referred. We have the Committee on Banking and Commerce to which commercial questions are referred. We have the Committee on Private Bills to which is referred measures that do not affect railways or public works or banking. We have also the Committee on Agriculture, but that is a departure from the accepted doctrine which prevailed in 1867 when we got our constitution. That committee is not an aid towards legislation.

It is a committee of general information. And the work which has been done by that committee cannot be too highly praised. It has, almost every year, brought valuable suggestions to the attention of the House, and it has been the leader in legislation which has been most useful to the country. It has not initiated legislation itself—it could not do that,—but it has brought to the attention of the House from time to time important suggestions which the country demanded. The suggestion of my hon. friend for a committee on natural resources is in the line, as he has said, of the Committee on Agriculture. It is not, as I have said, according to my reading of parliamentary institutions, as they have been. But parliamentary institutions must move with the times. I think the suggestion of my hon. friend is a good one. But I have one observation to offer, and one which I will ask him to consider between now and the time when this debate is resumed—as I intend to propose in a moment that it should be adjourned for the present. He has included in the work of his proposed committee a very wide sphere of action. He proposes that this committee should deal with fisheries, forests, mines, minerals, waterways and water-powers. A committee of that kind, it seems to me, would be cumbrous. He has suggested that the committee might divide itself into sub-committees. I would suggest that it would be more in accordance even with the object he has in mind to make, not one committee only, but several committees. Exception has been taken by my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to the inclusion of fisheries in the work of this committee; he suggests that a committee should be appointed to deal with this subject alone. I agree with my hon. friend from Lunenburg, and also with my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) who moved a resolution last year, and has repeated it this year, that the fisheries should be the subject of a committee by itself. We might deal with the subject of fisheries as we have dealt with the subject of agriculture. Next, mines might very well be made the subject of one committee's operations, as agriculture has been and fisheries would be. I think we might also have a special committee for forests. Possibly, there might be another for waterways. But forests and waterways are so intimately connected that, perhaps, they might be made the subject of one committee. I think we will all agree in what has been shown by the expert opinion quoted by my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) in his very interesting speech that, if we wish to preserve our waterways, we must preserve our forests. If our land is denuded of its forest cover the country must pay the penalty of ruined waterways. As these two naturally go together, we might give one committee charge of forests and waterways.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And water-powers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. And water-powers. I would observe that it might be better for the general convenience of the House if we had more committees with less numerous membership. Our committees, at present, are unwieldy. The activity of members seeks exercise in some way, and all desire to be on committees. If, instead of six or seven committees, we have more, we might reduce the membership of the committees and engage the activity of members dealing with important subjects of which those committees would have charge. So, as I have suggested, we might have a committee on fisheries, a committee—already established—on agriculture, a committee on mines, a committee on forests and waterways—or, possibly, one on forests and one on waterways; as to that, I would not give a definite opinion, but we invite the opinion of the House. If these views are in accord with the general object which my hon. friend wishes to attain, I think I would be prepared to agree with him altogether. My only suggestion, as I have said, is that, instead of having one committee as is proposed by my hon. friend, we should appoint several committees. I will not press the matter, but will move the adjournment of the debate so that my hon. friend may consider the suggestions I have made.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So far as I am concerned, I would be prepared to fall in with the suggestions of the Prime Minister I can see no possible objection to the appointment of several committees; in fact, I might have made the motion in that way, but one naturally felt that it would be a rather startling proposal that four or five new committees should be appointed, and that it would be better to begin by proposing one. No doubt, the work would be better done in the way the Prime Minister has suggested.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT—LEVEL CROSSINGS.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act. He said: Perhaps the Prime Minister would like a word or two of explanation, but he will hardly desire more, as this is a well-known Bill. It has been discussed in this House for five years. After three years' discussion, it was passed by the House unanimously exactly in the form in which it is now, and for the last three sessions it has been passed by this House in that form and rejected by the Senate. The Bill is designed to provide for the protection of the public at railway level crossings in cities, towns and villages. I should think it would suffice to point out, as I have already done, that the Bill exactly as it is now, and after a full consideration, has been passed by this House. I may say that it was amended to its present form when the present member for Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) was Minister of Railways and Canals. It was the subject of consideration by a special committee, where it was discussed for days and days, and where all that the railways had to say upon it—which was a great deal—was heard and voluminous evidence taken. The Bill was reported to the House unanimously by the special committee, and was unanimously passed by this House and sent to the Senate. Towards the end of the session of 1906 it went to the Senate, and naturally, one would think, without my making that remark, that it might have had some attention when it went there. I wish to point out to the House that it went to the Senate very late, because a committee of this chamber had spent a good deal of time during the session in getting it into that form, and it was not considered possible by the Senate to deal with it then. But the next session previous to the last session, when the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) was Minister of Railways and Canals, it was passed unanimously by this House, and again last session. Therefore I think I can well ask this House, without going into a long discussion of the Bill, and in view of the great number of accidents that are happening at this time, to confirm the action of this parliament the last two sessions, and send this Bill, which is exactly in the same form, again to the Senate for their consideration this session.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The last House has expressed its opinion of this Bill of my hon. friend, and I do not think that the old members would be inclined to revise their opinion. Therefore, unless some of the new members find it unsatisfactory, and unless we hear from them, I think the motion ought to be carried.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, considered in committee, and reported.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I thought this was one of those cases that should be referred to the Railway Commission.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman was not on the special committee that dealt with that subject. We dealt with the suggestion of the then Minister of Railways, and I fell in with it. The railways complained that they would be put to an unnecessary expense if they had to deal with a lot of crossings which years ago had been ordered to be protected by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The court is extinct, but the judgments remain, that is, the court has ceased to exist—I call it a court, to use simpler language. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council, years ago, gave orders in regard to certain of these crossings, and the railways contended before the committee that or if we referred this question only to the Railway Commission they would be obliged to go to elaborate expenses, to call witnesses, to take levels by engineering experts, and so on, and that a great many of these protections already ordered might well stand until the commission saw fit, for some reason, to change them. Therefore, the Bill is drawn so that they are not required to do anything else as long as they comply either with the orders of the Railway Committee, that is, the orders of the Privy Council, or of the present commission, the authority of which might apply to the crossings in question. It was at the request of the railways, to save them expense.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT—FIRE CAUSED BY LOCOMOTIVES.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE (South Essex) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 7) to amend the Railway Act. He said: The object of the amendment which I propose is to enlarge the classes of property for which a railway company shall be liable in case of fire communicated by a railway locomotive. In 1903, section 298, as it is at present in the Revised Statutes of Canada, was enacted. That provided that whenever damage should be caused to crops, lands, fences, plantations, or buildings and their contents, by a fire started by a railway locomotive, the company should be liable for damage so caused, with a provision limiting the amount of such damage in case the railway company could show that it was not guilty of any negligence. The object of the present amendment is to strike out the words which specify the kinds of property to which damage may be caused and for which the railway company is responsible. You will notice by section 298 that it is confined to crops, lands, fences, plantations, or buildings and their contents. Now, it has been found in the experience of people owning property adjacent to railways, that there are other classes of property which are not enumerated in this section; for instance, building material. If a house is set on fire a railway company is liable under this section; if the house is not erected, the lumber, shingles and other materials upon the ground are not covered by this section. Another class of property which frequently suffers, in my constituency particularly, is cordwood and bolts for staves ; if they are destroyed, they do not come within this section.

Mr. LANCASTER. And fence rails not yet put up into fences.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. A case has arisen in the courts of Ontario in regard to marsh hay which has been baled. The contention has already been set up that this does not come within the definition of crops, and the courts held that it does. But the case is still subject to appeal, the words are capable of some misconstruction. I therefore move that these words be struck out, and that the section as amended shall read as follows:

> Whenever damage is caused by a fire started by a railway locomotive, the company making use of such locomotive, whether guilty of negligence or not, shall be liable to such damage.

So whatever property is damaged, the company will be liable for such damage. The section was introduced last year by the then member for New Westminster and was referred to the Railway Committee, and passed in almost the very words of the Bill I am now proposing. The only difference was that instead of leaving the question of liability entirely at large the Railway Committee inserted words making it read 'damage to any property.' I have no particular objection if the House thinks it proper to add these words, but I would prefer to have them omitted. For instance, damage might be caused to a human being, a house might be set on fire and the inmates injured. But if it were limited to property there would be no liability in that case. It seems to me there is as much reason to make it apply to injury to human beings or, say, to live stock, as to property, and, as it has been fully considered by the Railway Committee, I think the House might pass it through the Committee of the Whole without sending it to the Railway Committee.

Mr. LANCASTER. My recollection is that the railways, before the Railway Committee, said that they would be content to have the Bill in its present form or with the word 'property' in. I am entirely in accord with the Bill as my hon. friend introduced it. In my part of the country we have had many of these cases where the result of the present law was almost ridiculous. Men had fences burned and piles of very valuable timber ready to build other fences with; they could recover for the old fence, but not for the piles of material because the Act did not mention rails of that kind. We had one case of piles of lumber ready on the ground to repair a driving house which was partly pulled down and the extraordinary condition existed that the man could recover for the partly dismantled building but not for the new material which was brought there to replace it and which was a total loss. We had also a case where a man was very seriously injured in rescuing his family and his furniture from a burning house. He was injured by reason of the fire but he could not recover anything from the railway, not even his medical attendance. I do not think the House can do better than pass the Bill as presented by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. A. H. Clarke). It was well considered in the Railway Committee last year, and I think it was unanimously approved by that committee.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia). I consider this amendment absolutely necessary. I know that in my constituency a man spent a considerable amount of money in planting out trees around his farm. A railway set fire to the prairie and destroyed the trees to the value of a couple of hundred dollars, and he had no redress whatever. If this Bill is passed it should cover any such cases.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Would the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) state why this was limited by the introduction of the word 'property' in the Railway Committee?

Mr. LANCASTER. As I remember it, Mr. Kennedy, then member for New Westminster, inserted the word 'property,' thinking it would make better reading, and the railways agreed to that change; but the Bill as introduced by him was very much in its present form. The only suggestion brought forward by the railways was that they should be subrogated if there was insurance, just as when they pay off a mortgage. But that was considered to be impracticable by the committee and finally that objection was withdrawn by the railways and I understood they had no further objection to the Bill.

Mr. F. L. SCHAFFNER (Souris). I wish to express my very great appreciation of this Bill. Any one who has lived in the west, where the railways are becoming very thick, knows that every fall, during the cutting of hay and of grain there, great losses are sustained by farmers from this cause, and it is a question which every member from the west has had brought to his attention. I am exceedingly pleased that the Bill is receiving the unanimous support of both sides.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). This Bill, while not lengthy, is very wide in its scope. I know that last session, even before it got before the committee, it was the subject of private consultation, and it was agreed by every person that the Act as it now stands is not satisfactory, that it is too circumscribed, and that when any damage occurs it is a matter of practice at least that the railways take the exception that the property destroyed does not come within the terms of the Act. The railways urged that when they have to pay damages the amount of insurance the party received should be deducted. However, the committee practically passed the Bill unanimously, with the condition that the word 'property' wiping out all restrictions, should be added. If my hon. friend who has introduced the Bill wishes to put it into the form of last year I have no objection to proceeding with it; if not, we should send it to the Railway Committee. I would not care to change it materially and rush it through without referring it to the Railway Committee.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE (South Essex). I would rather have it as it is now. It seems to me we are only inviting disputes. The question may come up what 'property' means. I would very much prefer leaving it at large so that if any damage occurs they should be liable for that damage whatever it is. It would perhaps not be as good a Bill for the lawyers, but it would save confusion. If the House wishes to add the word 'property' I will acquiesce.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

THE RESTAURANT COMMITTEE.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received a message from the Senate announcing the appointment of the Hon. Senators Campbell, Landry, Lougheed and Watson a committee to assist the Hon. the Speaker in so far as the interests of the Senate in the restaurant are concerned.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY moved that the order for the second reading of (Bill No. 5), to amend the Naturalization Act, be discharged. He said : The suggestions on which this Bill is based came to the Department of the Secretary of State from the Department of Justice. My attention has been drawn to certain errors and omissions in the Bill as introduced, and I therefore desire, with the leave of the House, to withdraw it, in order that I may discuss with the Minister of Justice the representations that have been made with a view to redrafting and re-introducing the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and order discharged.

DOMINION LANDS' ACT—AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 8), to amend the Dominion Lands' Act—Mr. Oliver—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The explanatory note states :

The above clauses are practically the same as the corresponding ones in the Act; they are not intended to change the law. The necessity for re-enacting these clauses is that they are not in their proper order in the Act. They are now placed in the order originally intended.

What are the corresponding clauses in the law at present ?

Mr. OLIVER. Clause 5 of the Bill is clause 7 of the Act, clause 6 of the Bill is clause 6 of the Act, clause 7 of the Bill is clause 5 of the Act, and clause 8 of the Bill is clause 8 of the Act, but the words under subsection 7 of this section, are inserted in order to make the proper connection. In explanation of the Bill I may say that inadvertently, at some stage of the passage of the Bill through the House, three subsections of section 15 became misplaced, thereby altering their sense as they are read in the Act ; and this Bill is merely for the purpose of putting them in the places which will give them their proper reading and meaning according to the original intent. It was what might be called a clerical error, and I desire to have it corrected at the earliest possible moment. I wish to say to the House that it is not intended to make any other amendment to the Dominion Lands Act at this session. Though it might be found desirable in some points to amend the Act, yet it having been in force only a short time, I do not think it advisable to make any changes at such an early date.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the Bill really does not affect any change in the law, why is it necessary to make the change at all ?

Mr. OLIVER. Because the paragraphs, having been misplaced, do not read to give their true meaning. These are subsections, one relating to another, and when they are out of their proper places the proper relation is broken. All we want is simply to put them in their proper places, so that they will mean what they were intended to mean, and really did mean as first drafted.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. In subsection 8 of the Act as passed last session, providing for compensation to be fixed by arbitration, are the words, 'in the manner hereinafter provided.' I do not know whether the minister attaches any importance to the words or not.

Mr. OLIVER. There is provision in the latter part of the Act for arbitration, and whether the words are there or not, the effect is the same.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. At all events, that is what is intended ?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Privy Council Department salaries, $32,825, contingencies, $7,400.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). The salary of the clerk of the Privy Council has been raised from $3,575 to $5,000 under the Act of last session.

Then there is the assistant clerk of the Privy Council, whose salary was $2,100 and who is now receiving $2,850 under the last Act. All the other increases are simply statutory. There have been five messengers for the last twenty years, but three were paid out of contingencies and have now been transferred to the Civil Service list. The contingencies for printing and stationery have been increased $400. We have dropped altogether the clerical and other assistants. The messenger's estimate, which was paid out of the regular items, were formally paid out of this vote for contingencies. There is a decrease there of $3,000.

Department of Marine and Fisheries—Salaries, Professor E. E. Prince at $4,000, $228,640.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). The reasons for the increase are these: There were several officers who were not included in the inside service, but in view of the change of the law last session they have been transferred to the inside service. The deputy minister has had his salary increased from $4,000 to $5,000 by the law of last session. Professor Prince has been appointed Canadian commissioner under the treaty passed with the United States. His salary before was $2,500 and in view of his appointment as treaty commissioner we have raised his salary to $4,000 in order to put him on the same footing as the American commissioner. By the treaty it is provided that two commissioners have to be appointed for the purpose of drafting regulations. One is appointed by the American authorities and the other by the Canadian or British authorities.

Mr. DANIEL. For what term is he appointed?

Mr. BRODEUR. For four years, if I remember right. The regulations which have to be made will have to be made for four years.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will this commission have any jurisdiction over our inland fisheries, say, on Lake Ontario?

Mr. BRODEUR. The treaty covers Passamaquoddy bay, the St. Croix river and two lakes in the province of Quebec, also the River St. Lawrence where it forms the boundry line and the great lakes. Lake Ontario is included.

Mr. HENDERSON. The western end of Lake Ontario from the Niagara river, is not a boundary line, but is Canadian on both sides, and the people there are much alarmed lest this treaty may destroy the fishing industry entirely. What have the Americans to do with regulating the fisheries in a section such as that?

Mr. BRODEUR. The situation is absolutely the same as in the case of Lake Superior. Although the western part is entirely within American territory it has been found advisable that the whole lake should be included. This treaty will not have the effect of destroying the fisheries, but quite the reverse. Those who have studied the subject claim that for years the fisheries were more or less destroyed owing to the fact that there were no regulations or that the regulations were not similar. On the American side there were three or four authorities making regulations on the same lake, which were all dissimilar and it was found advisable that they should be uniform. And the result will be, certainly, instead of destroying the fisheries, to protect the fisheries. That is the object that both British and American representatives had in view when the treaty was passed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see that the minister is more familiar with the facts than I am, but I am informed that in the western portion of Lake Ontario, which has Canada for its southern as well as its northern boundary,—I mean that portion of the lake opposite the county I have the honour to represent,—there is an important fishery, the cisco herring fishery. I am informed that the licenses, this year, will have a condition compelling the fishermen to use nets with a mesh of 2¾ inches. For the last fourteen years, they have been fishing with a mesh of 2⅜ inches. If they are compelled to use a larger mesh, the effect will be to prohibit them from fishing, for they cannot catch these fish with this class of net. What they fear is that this regulation which has been given out will be confirmed by this new commission or under this new treaty, and they are seriously alarmed for their industry. I trust the minister will bear in mind the peculiarity of the fishery of that section of the lake. I may tell him that the officer whose salary we are now discussing is quite familiar with the cisco fishery and with the class of fish found in that part of the lake. All I ask is that these people should be protected. Their all is bound up in this fishing industry. There is no use of saying that the fishing is being destroyed. The fish there were as abundant last year as they ever were. That is the information I have. I was there during the autumn, and there is no complaint that the fish are being depleted, in fact, the fishing last season was excellent. But if the fishermen are compelled to use the larger mesh, it will make no difference whether the fish are plentiful or scarce. The fish do not grow large, but those that would be caught with the larger nets would be the mother fish, the breeders. I understand that a petition has been sent to the minister very recently. On inquiry on Saturday, I learned that it had not reached him then, but when it does reach him, I hope he will give it his serious consideration and will not allow the larger mesh to be made obligatory under the regulations.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am under the impression that no change has been made in the regulations governing the fisheries in that part of Lake Ontario. Had any such regulations been passed, I should certainly have had knowledge of the fact, and I think I should have remembered it, but I have no recollection of any such change. The other regulations are not in force, they are not even drafted. But the two commissioners have been appointed under the treaty, as I have said, to draft these regulations. I will bring the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) to the attention of Prof. Prince, and will see to it that the fishermen are properly treated.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am under obligation to the hon. minister for what he has said. My information comes direct from men engaged in the fisheries, and I understand they get their information from Mr. Tinsley, of Toronto, who, I presume, does not speak without the authority of the minister, for he knows perfectly well that, while he has to do with the licensing of the fishermen, no change in the regulations can be made without the consent of the minister. I hope the minister will stand firm in the interest of the fishermen, and that he will consult his officers and any one else who can give him information on the subject. I feel sure that if he does this he will not permit any change in the regulations that have been in existence during the last fourteen or fifteen years.

Mr. BRODEUR. Of course, I am speaking subject to correction on this subject. But I have been giving the matter great consideration and study recently, and I feel sure that any such change in the regulations would have been impressed upon my memory. I certainly have no recollection of such a change having been made.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I would suggest that this item be allowed to stand. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) is not here, neither is the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). This item is increased this year from about $115,000 to about $228,000, a very large increase and one that calls for explanation. There are a number of items that are non-contentious, such as items 10, 11, 12, 21, 23, 25 and 26. These, I think, we might dispose of.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have no objection to allowing the item to stand, but I would not like these figures to be considered as representing an increase in the export on the fisheries. There have been a few increases, but the figures just read do not explain the situation. The hon. gentleman will see that the figure for last year, $115,250, represents the salaries voted under Civil Government last year. But by virtue of the law passed last session, all the officers in the fisheries branch in Ottawa, some of whom were paid out of the different votes, are now to be paid out of the Civil Government vote.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I understand that. But I find, at page 24, that the number of officers last year was 78 temporary and 77 permanent, a total of 155. Now, there are 171, a very considerable increase. I am sure that the number now is double what it was in 1896, though the work is practically the same.

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I would ask that this item be allowed to stand until the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr Foster), who was at one time Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is present.

Office of the Auditor General—Contingencies $6,500.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. There is a decrease here of $11,500, but I see that $11,000 is transferred to salaries.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Exactly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Chairman must take into consideration the fact that we only had these estimates placed in our hands a short time before the House rose at six o'clock. We have had no opportunity of looking at them, and I trust he will not cry 'Carried' too soon. We are handling a good deal of money.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is really not much money handled under this item

The regular service last year was $71,000, this year it is $88,000. The contingencies were $18,000 last year, and $6,500 this year. The figures total about the same as last year.

Department of Finance and Treasury Board —Salaries, $107,812.50; Contingencies, $11,000.

Mr. DANIEL. I notice in this item that a third division, subdivision B, appears to be added this year that was not on before, and apparently 43 persons are taken in from the outside service. Is the cost increased?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes. The regular vote for contingencies last year was, in round numbers, $70,000, this year it is $107,000. This increase is explained by the fact that some 43 employees were taken from the outside service and put in the inside service.

Mr. DANIEL. I presume there will be 43 fewer people in the outside service than there were before?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the object of bringing them in from the outside service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As provided by the Act of last year.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It appears that a great many of these men are to have their salary increased by $150; is that in addition to this vote?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. So that what we are voting now as salaries to these men is not what they are to be paid. A considerable number of them are to be paid $150 each more than is put in the estimates.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is a serious matter to take into consideration. The salaries here are very much the same as they were last year.

Mr. PATERSON. With the statutory allowances.

Mr. HENDERSON. What about them? Are we ever to hear anything more about them? Are they to drop out of sight?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There will be statutory increases every year until a civil servant reaches the maximum of his class. The allowance increases from year to year by $50 until he has reached the maximum of the class he belongs to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was in hopes that we had got this Civil Service matter about where we could comprehend it. It seems to me the First Minister has not simplified the matter at all. He is going to add $150 to the salaries of a certain number of men, not all the men. Then some men, we do not know how many, we do not know who they are, are to have their salaries increased year by year by $50. Now, if the Prime Minister could appoint a committee of this House to make the matter a little more obtuse than it is, I would like to see them at work.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am quite willing to take the suggestion of my hon. friend. I have been some thirty years in the House, and I cannot say that I understand the Civil Service Act yet.

Mr. ROCHE. How many civil servants are now at the maximum of their various classes?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I cannot say.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is another question. A civil servant will get his $150 added this year, for I suppose the government intends to put that Bill through. Will that do in lieu of three years of statutory increase, or is the statutory increase to be over and above the $150.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is a big lump. That means that each one will get $200 this year of an increase, at least a great many of the men. The impression has gone abroad in the country that all they were getting was $150 each, and that that was a settlement of the whole account. I do not know whether the First Minister, during the election promised more than that or not, I think it was only $150 each that was promised. But now it seems it is getting worse and worse; the increase is more than he promised.

Department of Trade and Commerce—Salaries, $38,837.50; contingencies, $19,350.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am satisfied there are no increases except those authorized last year by the Civil Service Act, except the annuities branch, which is a new branch altogether.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Does the Prime Minister think it necessary to continue this branch or has he any thought of abolishing it as recommended by the minister who presided over it a few years ago ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Far from it, it is more useful than ever.

Office of the High Commissioner for Canada in London, salaries, $10,600.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is no increase there except what is authorized by the statute of last year.

Mr. HENDERSON. Who is the secretary referred to there ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Griffith.

Mr. HENDERSON. That increase of $200 to the assistant secretary has no relation to the $150 or the statutory increase, that is only an additional sum given to him ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. The next one has an increase of $100. I find there are a great many increases outside the statutory increases of $150. There seems to be an increase all along the line.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. These increases were authorized by the statute of last session.

High commissioner's office, London, contingencies, $19,775.

Mr. HENDERSON. Would the minister say how that compares with say 15 years ago ? Away back in the 90's we heard a good deal about the expenses of the London office. Are we doing the work there as reasonably as it was done then or are we getting a little more extravagant in England as we are in Canada ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I was in the House at that time, 15 years ago and I never heard my hon. friend complain that we were extravagant in those days.

Mr. HENDERSON. I never complain, but I heard the right hon. the Prime Minister and his friends complain by the hour, denouncing the extravagance of the London office. I am afraid they have forgotten their virtue of those days. I do not know that we have any better service than we had 15 years ago.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We have a very good service.

Mr. HENDERSON. I called at the London office about two years ago and I tell you I would not give Mr. Griffith $5,000 for his services. I have not a very high estimate of the way he treats strangers, much less members of parliament. I do not care if he reads that in 'Hansard.'

Mr. C. JAMESON (Digby). Has the Prime Minister any information as to the amount of the income tax on the salary of the High Commissioner?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I shall obtain the information at a later date.

Office of general consulting engineer to Dominion government, salaries, $7,250.

Mr. AMES. When Mr. Schreiber acts as arbitrator as I understand he is doing on the present occasion to settle differences between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the government, is he paid extra ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think so, it is not so intended.

Civil Service Commission, salaries, $19,075.

Mr. AMES. When did the Civil Service Commissioners definitely take office and commence work ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think they were appointed on the 1st of September. I cannot say exactly when they took office but about that time, in September.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Who are the commissioners ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Professor Shortt and Mr. Larochelle of Montreal.

Mr. HENDERSON. Would the Prime Minister be good enough to state in very brief detail what the duties of these men are ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It would be difficult to put their duties into brief words. The duties of the commissioners are being defined by themselves now, they are establishing rules for the carrying on of their work. As my hon. friend knows, their chiet duty is to select officers for the recruiting of the Civil Service. We have no power at the present time to appoint anybody to the service. For instance, the Minister of Customs would have to write to the Civil Service Commissioners that there is a vacancy of a certain character in his department and asking the commissioners to supply an officer, and the commissioners would appoint the successful competitor in the examination.

Mr. DANIEL. Do the commissioners select the man who has the highest marks?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think so. I cannot say they do it mechanically, but the theory of the Act is that the successful competitor shall be appointed.

Mr. HENDERSON. And would the Civil Service Commissioners have a right to reply to the Minister of Customs, saying: You have a sufficient staff already; you do not need another man and we will not let you appoint one. I for one am desirous that the inside and outside service should be well paid. I much prefer they should be well paid than that they should be underpaid. I have said before, and I say again, that in the Civil Service we have a great many educated men, men of ability, and men who are most accommodating and obliging when you meet them, but I do believe that the inside service is overmanned. I have the idea, I may be wrong, that you could dismiss from the service 500 officials and still have enough to do the work. I do not ask that any of these officials should be dismissed, because it would be a hardship, but I do think that when a vacancy occurs that vacancy should not be filled until there is a most careful inquiry as to whether there are not already sufficient employees to discharge the duties of any given department. I would have the officials work longer hours; I do not think there is any difficulty in an able-bodied man, or woman either, working six hours a day. Why, in my youth I used to work twelve and fifteen hours a day and think nothing of it, but now a man gets fatigued after five or six hours work and he has to get out and play lawn tennis to recuperate his health, and we provide him with grounds for that purpose. I do not find fault with that, because that is probably as good a way as any other to occupy one's leisure time. But I do press on the government that a general opinion prevails in this House and outside of it that the service in Ottawa is overmanned. I am told that there are men in the service today whose time is largely taken up in simply revising the work of others who have not acquired a competent knowledge of their duties, and that these men who do know their business would be quite sufficient to do all the work that the service calls for. I would not advise the government to do any wholesale weeding out, because, as I have said, it would be a hardship to dismiss these employees, but if vacancies were not filled except in cases where it was absolutely necessary to do so, in eight or ten years you would be astonished to find how much fewer officials you could get along with. Then I would be in favour of the principle that those who remain in the service should get increased pay so as to encourage them in an energetic discharge of their duties. I am sure the work of the departments could be better done under such a system than by bringing in new men every six months, or every month or every day for that matter and schooling them in their duties. I do not look for so very much from this new system of appointing civil servants. The First Minister may knit his eyebrows; perhaps he realizes that the old system of pull would be better. By this competitive examination system you may get a man well up in algebra or Euclid or English grammar, or he may be a university graduate, but he may not be worth a button when he comes to perform some minor duty in the department. I understand that the examination will only be along the ordinary lines as a test of education.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDERSON. Suppose you want an officer for the Customs Department, will he undergo an examination calculated to test his knowledge of the difference between cotton goods and woollen goods so that he may be able to determine the duty which should be paid? If that were so, then you would want to have as many commissioners as there are departments; you would want a man for the Fishery Department who would be able to conduct an examination as to the quality of the nets and the size of the mesh that would catch a big fish or a small fish, and you would want another for the Militia Department which would be able to decide on what were the qualifications for a soldier. I have no hope that this commission is going to accomplish what we anticipate for it. I believe we will find that in the end pull will have as much to do with it as anything else. At all events I would urge on the government that vacancies should not be filled unless it is absolutely necessary to fill them, and if you have $347,000 additional to give to the civil servants I would divide part of that amongst the officers who remain in the service, weeding out the surplusage as vacancies occur and paying better the men who remain. If this were done, I am sure ycu would have more satisfaction amongst the civil servants of the country. Then when I and others go to the different departments we shall find the officials thoroughly posted in their work and prepared to give us the information we desire instead of meeting a young man who, from no fault of his own, is utterly unacquainted with the business he is assuming, and will perhaps be out of the office again in six months or a year and a new man put in his place. I trust the government will take up my idea and think over it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am very much disappointed at the remarks of my hon. friend. I thought he would give us some encomium for what we have done, but instead of that he gives us a lot of blame. My hon. friend, after paying a graceful compliment to the Civil Service, went on to say that it was largely composed of men who could not do their work and whose work had to be supervised by other officers; and he suggests that when vacancies occur we should not fill them. Well, if vacancies occurred in the offices of some of the good men who do the supervising, and the service were left to the incompetent ones, what would become of it? My hon. friend will see that the best course is to go on and apply the law as we have it, making appointments by competition and not by pull, as my hon. friend thinks is the case now. That is one of the prejudices of the other side. In order to satisfy the fastidiousness of my hon. friend we passed the present law, under which we have no pull. All the pull is with the commissioners, who I am sure are impartial; and I am sure that under the operation of the law we shall have a good service, every man doing good work without his work requiring to be supervised by any other man.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course, my remarks could not apply to every one in the Civil Service. No civil servant will take exception to them in that respect, because no one could expect a man who has been in the service only six months to be as competent as those who have been there for six years. You find in the service a great many men who are well up in their work and always accommodating and obliging. These are deserving men whom I want to see well paid. The First Minister asks what we would do when one of these good men drops out. I think the best thing would be to promote the next man below him. In that way you will fill the bill better than by appointing a raw recruit.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Who determines the appointments in the different departments—the minister or the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. PATERSON. The Act provides that officers requiring technical or professional knowledge may be appointed otherwise, but the great bulk of the appointments to the Civil Service are by competitive examination. For example, a clerk in the cheque branch of the Customs Department dies, and the Commissioner of Customs reported to me that it was necessary to fill the vacancy. Thereupon, as the Act provided, the Commissioner drew up a requisition to the Civil Service Commissioners to furnish us with an officer, and I as minister wrote 'approved' upon it. That requisition goes to the Civil Service Commission. They hold an examination, and we know nothing of the man they send us. I think they are using the old Civil Service examinations in a measure, but no doubt they will have new examinations before long. The young man who is sent to us was not known before either to my deputy or to myself, and he takes the position—not the position or the salary of the officer who died; but we said to him, 'We have a vacancy in the cheque department, and we require one who writes a good hand, is good at figures and mathematics, and has a retentive memory.' We put him into the class in which the officer who died was placed in the reorganization of the service, not at $1,300, which I think he received, but at the minimum of the class.

Mr. AMES. Suppose there is a vacancy in the first class, do you make a new appointment to that class, or do you move one from the second class to the first and one from the third class to the second, and make a new appointment to the third class?

Mr. PATERSON. In this case it is done by placing the new officer at the minimum of the class to which he is appointed.

Mr. AMES. And all the others are passed up one grade accordingly?

Mr. PATERSON. No; their salaries remain as they were. They receive the statutory increase year by year, but a new man goes in at the minimum of the class.

Mr. AMES. Who fills the place of the first-class man who drops out? Is there a promotion made?

Mr. PATERSON. No, there is no promotion made in that case.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Who determines whether the department is over-manned or not —the minister or the commission?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If a new appointment is to be made, the government must come to parliament for an appropriation, and then the appointment is made in the way stated by my hon. friend.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to make a few observations in regard to the inconvenience to which members of parliament are frequently put in trying to do business with the departments. The present custom is for a portion of the service to leave their offices for lunch from twelve to one o'clock, and another portion from one to two o'clock. We usually come here between nine and ten in the morning to get our mail, and after we get through with that there may or may not be committee work, and then it is pretty near twelve o'clock. If we go to the departments to-day to do any business, as a general thing, we are met with the answer that the clerk in charge of that branch is away at lunch and will not be back until one and we cannot very well get the papers ? We go back after one o'clock and we find that the head of the branch is at lunch and will not be back until two. There are thus two hours in which we cannot do any work. It would be a much better system for all officers to leave for lunch at twelve and be back at one or leave at one and be back at two. You go there at two o'clock and often they are not back and you have to wait until nearly three when you have to go to the House, and by the time the routine business of the House is done the offices are closed. Then on Saturday, these members who do not leave the city make an effort to overtake their accumulated work, the morning is usually taken up with routine work of mails, until it is noon, then at one o'clock the departments are closed and the whole afternoon you can do nothing. That is the experience of most members who have been here any length of time. Some change should be made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sure that there has been no change in the service in my experience but I shall speak to my colleagues about my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. SPROULE. A few years ago this question was brought up and it was then intimated that a large number of the junior clerks might have their lunch hour from twelve to one or from one to two, and the senior officers either from twelve to one or from one to two. At present it happens that just when you want to do business, you cannot get any one to do it.

Mr. AMES.

Mr. AMES. Under what department or minister does this Civil Service Commission fall ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is like the Auditor General absolutely independent of the ministers.

Mr. AMES. Will there be a detailed report each year ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not want to find fault, but in any industry in this country the employees generally work from at least eight in the morning until six in the evening, I do not know what the particular hours are for the civil servants, but at the very best they are no longer than from 9.30 a.m. until 4 p.m. I have gone to the offices and have found that even at 10 a.m. the officials are often not there. I do not think it would be a great hardship upon the officials if they went to work a little earlier in the morning and quit work a little later in the afternoon. If that were done, we could dispense with a good many of them. Any man in this country should be able to work from 8 a.m. until noon and then from one until 5 p.m. Let the right hon. the Prime Minister inquire of any manufacturer whether his employees do not work from 8 a.m. until 6 p.m.; I believe that the ministers themselves and their deputies are there from at least 9 a.m. until 6 p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. And later.

Mr. J. D. REID. Yes later. I honestly believe that an employee in the service at Ottawa should work from 9 a.m. until 5 or 5.30 p.m. And if they did we could dispense with quite a number. I agree with what my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said, that it was almost impossible to do anything in the departments for this reason. You go there at ten a.m. and find a lot of people waiting to do business before you, and by the time your turn has come, the officials go to lunch. Then by the time you can get back after lunch, the office is closed. Is it unreasonable to ask that these men should be on duty from nine till twelve and from one till five, or seven hours per day. I have been told by an ex-official, and one of the best, that as a rule the officers only get there about ten o'cleck, then they go away at twelve or one, and at four o'clock they are gone again. This man was always there at nine sharp and worked until six and was glad to do it, as he could get through his work more satisfactorily in that way. I do not wish to impose any hardships, but I believe that any man who accepts a position in a government department should be there at nine a.m., take an hour for his lunch, and then remain until 5.30. If that were done, we could do with a good many less officials.

Mr. GERMAN. It is rather interesting to listen to my hon. friends. For years when the Conservatives were in power, exactly the same conditions existed and we never heard from them a word of protest.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GERMAN. I would like the member from East Grey to point to me one utterance of his criticising the civil servants for not being in their departments during every hour of the day, while the Conservatives were in power.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not wonder that my hon. friend did not hear me because he was so seldom here, but I have made the same criticism on numerous occasions and can turn to 'Hansard' to prove my words.

Mr. GERMAN. I could not possibly keep track of everything the hon. gentleman has said because he has so much to say on everything. But I have had as much to do with the civil servants, in at any rate three of the departments, as any other member of parliament for the last twenty years, and I will say this. Take the Department of Railways and Canals and the Public Works Department and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, which has been so much talked about, there has not been an hour in the day from ten a.m. until six p.m. when you could not find one of the leading officers there to do business with.

Mr. J. D. REID. You are an exception; they favour you.

Mr. GERMAN. I believe I am not an exception. They were there when the Conservatives were in power, and they are there now. The chief officers of this department are in their offices from ten in the morning to six at night, with an hour for lunch.

Mr. J. D. REID. That is what I admitted.

Mr. GERMAN. Then I cannot see what the hon. gentleman has to complain of. Surely, with these hours, they are performing their duties. Most of these officers having been appointed years ago are probably Conservatives in politics. But I believe that the public servants of this government are as fine a body as can be found in this or any other country. They are attentive and faithful in the performance of the services for which they are paid. They are intelligent and accommodating, and will grant any favour that is in their power. Why any hon. member of this House should complain of them I cannot understand, unless it is that my hon. friends opposite want to get some of their own friends into office. I am not sure that I am in favour of the Civil Service Commission. If I were a minister of the Crown I would appoint my own officers, and would not want the Civil Service Commission to appoint them for me. I would select them myself, and I would select good ones, and I would have a body of officers that, I am sure, would satisfy even my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid).

Mr. J. D. REID. The hon. gentleman (Mr. German) tries to censure me because I did not complain of the hours of the Civil Service when the Conservatives were in power. I was then, of course, a new member. In the remarks I made I was not censuring this government in particular, Even though the hours are the same now as when the Conservatives were in power, is that any reason why, if I should think the hours should be longer so as to reduce the number of employees, I should not mention it at this time? The hon. member for Welland states that the deputies, or a few of the leading officials, are in their departments until six o'clock at night. I admit that you can go there at that hour and find, probably, the deputy minister and his secretary, or the minister and his secretary, and perhaps the chief clerk. But 95 per cent of the officials have gone, having left as soon as the clock struck four. If the deputy and private secretary and the minister can work, as I believe many of them do, from nine o'clock until six every day, and probably long after that, why should not the other officials do the same? A clerk in the Civil Service should perform as many hours as he would in any manufacturing concern. I may be wrong in that opinion, but I hold that opinion until I am proven wrong. I contend that the officials here would not be overworked if their hours were from 9 o'clock in the morning until 5 or 5.30 in the afternoon. I believe that such a rule would help the minister and the deputy. When these leaders in the department remain late, they must require papers from the different rooms, and if officials were there they could supply them. And, if the hours were extended, is it not reasonable to expect that fewer clerks would be required to do the work? I am not finding the slightest fault with the members of the Civil Service. I admit that we have a good service; the officers are accommodating and willing to do anything they can to assist one who has to do business with them. All I say is that if the hours were made what seems to me reasonable hours, fewer clerks would be required to do the work. But so long as the law is that the officers can go at four o'clock——

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is no law to that effect. The clerks of the Public Works Department do not leave until 4.30.

Mr. J. D. REID. Well, even admitting that it is 4.30 o'clock, it strikes me that that is rather early in the day for the officials to leave. I venture to say that there are many men in this House who employ large staffs of clerks, and I would like any one of these to say if he makes the hours for his staff from 9 to 4 or 4.30. You will find that, as a rule, the hours are from 8 in the morning till 6 at night, and many of them even come back after six o'clock. I believe that if the departments were open from 9 a.m. to 5 or 5.30, one-third of the civil servants would not be required. I say that without any disrespect to the members of the Civil Service.

Mr. TURRIFF. The hon. member (Mr. J. D. Reid) is not altogether right as to the number of hours civil servants work. I have had some experience in the Department of the Interior. The clerks of that department must be in attendance by 9.30 in the morning. They have to sign a book. At 9.30 a line is drawn and the book is taken into the deputy minister's office and any who arrive after that time are noted as being late. They get an hour and a half, not two hours, for lunch, and they sign the book when they go out and when they return as well. In the Department of the Interior the clerks work until 4.30 p.m. in the summer and during the winter until 5 o'clock. I know that is not the rule in some of the departments, but in the Department of the Interior these are the hours. As pointed out by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) the deputy ministers and many of the chief clerks are at work at 9 a.m. and remain in their office until half past five or six p.m. I agree with some of the remarks that have been made on this subject, that those clerks who reach the office at half past nine o'clock and scarcely get to work before ten, and leave at four in the afternoon, are not doing a proper day's work. I think there ought to be a uniform regulation made by which the hours of service in all the departments at Ottawa should be of the same length, and it would do no harm if they were made to last till five in the afternoon the year round.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. It seems to me the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) has put up a few straw men for the sake of knocking them down. I am sure he defended a great many things which have not been attacked. The hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) spoke of appointing fewer men and giving them longer hours. I have felt ever since I have been a member of this House, while not wishing by any means to ask anything unreasonable from the civil servants, that the hours they work are too short. Whatever the law may be, it is the practice that we have to deal with; and the practice is, notwithstanding the remarks of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), that the great proportion of the civil servants leave their offices at four o'clock in the afternoon. I may mention an illustration that came to my notice yesterday, showing the effect of short hours. A young man told me that he was formerly in the Civil Service and I asked him why he left it. One reason he gave me was this: he said, because, when my duties are over at four o'clock in the afternoon, I have too much time on my hands. I believe there is a good deal in that. The young man and the young woman who get out at four o'clock have too much time for mischief.

Mr. SPROULE. In view of the observations of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) I wish to say that I neither intended to, nor did I reflect in any way on the civil servants. I do not hold them responsible for this arrangement, because I understood it was made by the deputy ministers in concurrence with the ministers, that a proportion of the employees should go away between 12 and 1 for lunch, and another portion between 1 and 2. I do not blame them at all, nor do I insinuate that they were wanting in intelligence, in courtesy or in diligence. I said nothing about that at all, because I found them to be the reverse, in my experience. I was speaking about the inconvenience of the present system.

Mr. McGIVERIN. I would like to say a few words on this subject, as one who for many years has had a good deal to do with the various departments of the government. I am glad to hear my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) speaking for the Interior Department. In my experience, while the hours named have been from 9.30 to 4.30, if you enter a department at any time before 6 o'clock, you will find in it a number of clerks still at work. While it may be said that from 9.30 to 4.30 are not long hours, it will be found throughout the country generally, if you take the practice in insurance companies, banking concerns, and others of a like nature, that the hours are no longer than from 9 until 4 o'clock, and in many cases until 3 o'clock. In my experience I have never known of any inconvenience or delay occurring in the different departments by reason of the hours of work ceasing at 4.30 in the afternoon. If there was work to be done after that hour, it was always done by a senior official or by a junior official. While a good deal has been said throughout the country about the duties of the civil servants, and some fun has been made of their short hours, I want to say now that this opinion is altogether unfounded. As I said the other day, any one acquainted with the different departments and the work as done in them will find, if he takes the trouble to ascertain, that the work is thoroughly well done during the present hours. We must not forget that long hours do not necessarily mean good work. When the work is being done as satisfactorily as it is at present, I do not think the civil servants deserve some of the criticism that has been levelled against them.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Nobody has said the work was not well done.

Mr. J. D. REID. I was glad to hear the honourable the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin). I did not know that he had so much experience with the departments as to know how the work was being done. This is the first time I have heard that he was inspecting the departments to see what work was being done. We have never heard any of the ministers get up and make a statement such as we have just heard from the member for Ottawa, namely, that he knew that all the work was done at 4 o'clock or 4.30, and that if it was not, the officials stayed there longer. Now, I have it from an official, a gentleman who was high up in one of the departments, that the clerks do not get there until just before 9.30 in the morning, and at 4 o'clock in the afternoon 95 per cent of them walk out the minute the clock strikes 4, whether the work is done or not. If it is not done, they leave it until the next morning. This gentleman was high up in the department, he gave me this version of the case, and I would prefer to accept his opinion to the opinion of the hon. member. The hon. gentleman suggests that in banks and other institutions the clerks do not work any longer. But it is a well known fact that when a bank closes at 3 o'clock in the afternoon the clerks have to remain at least two hours afterwards to balance up their books, to write letters, and get things into shape. They go to work before 9 o'clock in the morning, and I have heard from managers of banks that it takes them two hours after the bank closes to finish up their work. They have only one hour for lunch. The hon. member for Assiniboia says that the hours in the departments are from 9.30 in the morning. They work for two hours and a half until 12 o'clock, then they have an hour and a half until 1.30 for lunch, then they work until 4.30 in the afternoon.

Mr. TURRIFF. In summer, till 5 in the winter.

Mr. J. D. REID. That is five hours and a half a day. Will any man in the Dominion contend that five hours and a half is a day's work for any man in an office? The hon. member for Welland knows well enough, because I believe he is interested in some manufacturing industries, that if the clerks were not there at 8 o'clock in the morning and did not work till 6, he would dismiss them promptly. Here in Ottawa I think myself that the officials should commence at 9 o'clock and work till 5 or 5.30. I am not blaming this government any more than their predecessors. It has been the rule probably ever since confederation. I claim that if the government would make the hours from 9 a.m. to 5.30 p.m. they would not require as many officials. People arriving here at 3.30 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon would be able to get work done and return home on the night trains. They cannot do this now on account of the short hours of the service.

Item allowed to stand.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The discussion recently has not been relevant to the question which is the Civil Service Commission; they have no power whatever over the hours of the Civil Service.

Mr. C. A. WILSON (Laval). Are we to understand that the Commissioners have jurisdiction over or anything to do with the discipline of the employees of this House or are they simply appointed to ascertain the qualifications of the different candidates who apply for the Civil Service? Then what is understood by the distinction between the inside and the outside service? Are the officials of the Customs Department or the Militia or Public Works Department in Montreal or Toronto paid out of the appropriation for the inside service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. C. A. WILSON. What about the discipline then?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have suggested that this item stand. A good deal of information has been asked for and can be given next time.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Before we leave the vote for Civil Government, would the Prime Minister explain whether the bringing in of the outside service to the inside service will account for the increase from $2,061,000 to $3,933,000? If you add to that the increase from $347,000, the increase being granted to the Civil Service you considerably more than double the amount of money that was given to them in 1908-9.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The outside service in Ottawa has been taken into the inside service and the salaries are now voted by parliament, whereas formerly they were voted in a lump sum in many departments. It is only a transferring of figures.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would that be sufficient to double the amount?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is my impression, but I will have it looked into.

Governor General's secretary's office, salaries $20,125.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the increase there?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is in consequence of the Act of last year. The only large increase is that given to Sir John Hanbury-Williams. The intention was to bring his salary to the rank of subdivision A.

Mr. SPROULE. Would all that increase of nearly $9,000 be taken up by the increases of the three names mentioned here?

Mr. PATERSON. Five are brought in from the outside service.

Mr. SPROULE. What are the names ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will get them later on.

Charges of management $303,200.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The only increases are from the outside service.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. How do you make the large decrease?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I cannot answer that.

Mr. SPROULE. There is a decrease of $16,250.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I presume the explanation is that the $24,000 put in last year for the printing of Dominion notes is not in this year. Against that there are some increases amounting to some $8,000 altogether. One is an increase in the amount for the removal of foreign coin from circulation and about $2,000 in salaries at Charlottetown, Winnipeg and Halifax.

Mr. AMES. There is an item, 'Commission for payment of interest on public debt, purchase of sinking funds.' To whom is that commission paid?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I cannot give the explanation to my hon. friend this evening; I shall give it to-morrow.

Mr. AMES. Do I understand the First Minister will give a statement on that to-morrow?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. HENDERSON. We have asked the item to stand on the promise of the First Minister that he would give us an explanation. We want to know all about this commission before the item passes. We do not expect that the right hon. gentleman would be in a position to answer the question to-night but the item should stand until we get the information.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My understanding was that the item should pass on the promise that I would give the explanation to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. My experience in this House is that when we let items go in this way they are never called again and we never get the explanation. The surest way is to allow it to stand.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very good.

Mr. HENDERSON. That will be the rule for this session.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Oh, not this session ; just this time.

Item allowed to stand.

Some resolutions reported.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What business does the government purpose taking up to-morrow ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The resolution of Mr. Fisher about the Civil Service ; then the estimates.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at ten p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1909.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

COMMISSION TO BANK OF MONTREAL.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I promised yesterday to my hon. friend from St. Antoine Division of Montreal that I would give him an explanation of the item in the estimates 'Commission for payment of interest on public debt and purchase of Sinking Funds.' The explanation is this. The amount is payable to the Bank of Montreal Financial Agents of the Dominion under agreement entered into by Order in Council of the 7th November 1892, and the 11th November, 1902. Under this agreement the Bank receives for the management of loan, including payment of interest and dividends, transfer and inscription of stock, investments for and management of the Sinking Fund (except brokerages and stamp duties, £150 per £1,000,000 per annum). With regard to the brokerage it is just the amount of commission to be paid by the trustees for the investment of securities for the Sinking Fund.

Another hon. gentleman opposite asked me the amount charged in the office of the High Commissioner for payment of the income tax. The income tax is paid by the High Commissioner, and the amount last year was $685.83. The item will be found in the Auditor General's Report, Volume I, under letter G. I hope my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) will revise his bad opinion of the government and realize that we are true to our word.

THE RESTAURANT COMMITTEE.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works) moved that the second and final report of the joint restaurant committee be adopted.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What are the functions of the committee?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They are set out in the report which was made by the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, and which was appointed last session. The motion is that their report be adopted, and that these four gentlemen be appointed members of the joint committee. Their duties will be to take charge of the operations of the restaurant, and will be those of the ordinary club committee.

Mr. FOSTER. The House would like to have a little information as to these operations. What is it that is going to be established and how is it going to be paid for?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall have to get the report of the committee.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Has the report been printed ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think not. It was submitted by Mr. Sutherland, and he asked me to make this motion. I regret that Mr. Sutherland is not here as he presented the report, and was on the joint committee of last year when he was Speaker of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is no very urgent haste in the matter. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will take some means of having that report made available to members in printed or some other form. I appreciate very much what has been done in connection with the placing of the restaurant on a better basis, but at the same time it would be well to know what we are doing before taking these steps.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the report been printed in the Votes and Proceedings ?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, a few days ago.

Motion withdrawn.

BY-ELECTIONS CARLETON AND COMOX-ATLIN.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yesterday my hon. friend asked me if the writ had been issued for the Comox-Atlin election.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And Carleton.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The writ was issued yesterday for Comox-Atlin, and will be issued to-day for Carleton. The nominations will take place on the 22nd of February. Mr. Tierney is the returning officer.

THE MARINE DEPARTMENT INVESTIGATION

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When will the balance of the evidence taken before Mr. Justice Cassels be printed. There is a very considerable amount of evidence yet to be printed, and it would expedite business if it were placed before the House at an early date so that we might come to a conclusion whether a debate is necessary.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Secretary of State). When a similar inquiry was made a short time ago, I sent to the Printing Bureau and found that the work was in progress and that considerable time was involved in getting the remaining volumes printed. I have asked for a definite statement to-night as to the time it will take to complete them and will try and have definite information for to-morrow.

THE INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS TREATY.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is there any further information as to when we may expect to have presented to the House the terms of the recent treaty with the United States regulating the waterways ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sorry to say I have no information to give to my hon. friend; but I am in daily expectation of receiving a despatch on that subject which I will be glad to communicate to him.

Mr. FOSTER. Turning to page 74 of the Votes and Proceedings, I find the information is chiefly remarkable for what it does not give. We shall have to have something more than a line or two stating that we have appointed a committee in the interim. What the House would like is some knowledge of what it is proposed to do, how it is proposed to do it, and what is to be the outcome.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will endeavour to get the information.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 8) to amend the Dominion Lands Act.—Mr. Oliver.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES.

On the order for House again in committee on the following proposed resolution :

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the head of a department based upon a report of the deputy head, may grant to any officer, clerk or employee under the deputy heads in the inside service as defined by the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, who was in the public service at the time of the coming into force of that Act, an increase of salary of $150 a year, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained: that in the case of any officer, clerk or employee who has received an increase of salary upon organization and classification under the said Act, such increase shall be offset against the increase which such person might otherwise receive under any Act to be founded on this resolution; that no increase under any Act to be founded on this resolution to any officer, clerk or employee shall exceed the difference between his present salary and the maximum salary of the subdivision in which he has been placed upon organization and classification under the said Act of 1908; that all increases provided for hereunder shall take effect from the first day of September, 1908; that all sums of money voted by the parliament for the financial year ending on March 31, 1909, and applicable to the payment of salaries or increase of salaries of persons in the inside service shall be applicable to the payment of increases of salary granted under the Act to be founded in this resolution, so far as such sums are not required for the specific purposes for which they were granted; and during the said financial year there may be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada such moneys required for the payment of increases of salary hereunder as have not been voted by parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Speaker leaves the Chair, I would like to ask the minister a question. I have in my hands a classification of people in the inside service, by Order in Council, 25th of January, 1909, as on the 1st of September, 1908. I find a long list of names with the divisions, and evidently the positions of the different persons, with former salary and proposed salary. Is that all that is contained in the order in council respecting a reclassification of the departments?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). So far as I know, it is. I have not looked at this, but I think it is an exact transcription of the order in council. Possibly with slight exceptions, that is all. There may be others. In one case, the Justice Department says, a certain gentleman who had been in the outside service in receipt of $3,000 a year, must go into subdivision A of the first division. that seems to be absolute under the law. That is an office which, when it ceases to be occupied by the present incumbent, I think ought to be in subdivision B of the first division, and I directed that an addendum should be made to the order in council declaring that. There may be others, I do not know.

House went into committee on the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. I find a great deal of difficulty in proceeding with this resolution at the present time, on account of lack of information, and I will frankly explain to my hon. friend where I find the difficulty. This makes provision for adding $150 to each member of the Civil Service who, since the 1st of September, has been upon the establishment books, as I understand it, and who has not, having been at the head of the class, received already an increase by virtue of classification—that is in brief. Well, of course I dissent from the principle of making a flat increase without any discrimination as to merit or services. But let that go for the moment. There are other difficulties. For instance, suppose that a gentleman or lady has been appointed to the service on, we will say, the 29th of August; is that person to get the $150 flat increase as well? That is one question which may do for a time. Again, suppose that on or about that time, or not long before, some person in the department received an increase of $100, $200, $300, $400, $500, and then on the next day, the 1st of September, went into the new classification in his proper place; does that person also get the $150 increase? That stands for another type. Suppose another instance. Suppose that some one who was on the contingency list in one of the departments of the inside service at a very small salary, has desired to get into the classified service at a larger salary, and thereupon resigned his position in the inside service and was appointed a few days before the 1st of September to a position in the inside service at an increased salary, and was then transferred from the outside into the inside service after the 1st day of September; does that person also get an increase? Also, how many of these different categories are there? Unless we get a straight statement from the minister that none of these three classes, or at least neither of the two classes I mentioned last, are to receive $150 increase under this resolution, I do not know that we are in a position to go on with this Bill. We may be doing a great injustice to certain persons. That information I have asked for by way of question, and by way of a resolution which has already passed the House. It is impossible in a few days to bring this down; but none of these returns with this information ought to take more than two or three days to be put into shape so that we can have it before the House. I do not like to decide a question like this, with so much involved, on the basis of so little information. I am not trying to block the resolution or the legislation, but it will take a little time any way.

Mr. FISHER. In reply to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), I recognize the importance of the information for which he has asked, and I think it is quite right that the hon. member and the House should have that information. It will take a few days to get it, perhaps a week, I do not know until I get at it. But I may say now in general terms that the resolution provides for dealing with the service as on the 1st of September. Whether the individual may have been in the position which he occupied on the 1st of September, one week, or one year, or ten years, there is no provision in this Bill and no intention to go back of the 1st of September. I may say to my hon. friend that I do not wish to enter into the merits of the various questions he has brought up until the information he has asked for is before the House. But I will just say in general terms that after considerable discussion and investigation it was decided to make this Bill a complement of the Bill of last year. That Bill made a change in the Civil Service to take place on the 1st of September; we believe therefore that this Bill should deal with the Civil Service as on the 1st of September. I dare say that there may be a few instances, I could not tell how many, where people may have come into the service, we will say, within a month of the 1st of September; there may be others where they came in within three months, others within a longer time. We did not consider that any other date than the 1st of September would be as proper, or on the whole as just, a date to take. And if we undertook to deal with it at all, we had to fix a date, arbitrarily—if my hon. friend chooses to use that term—for the Act to begin to apply. I think I have answered almost all the suggestions that the hon. gentleman has made of contingencies that might arise. I do not mean to say that this Act is going to give absolutely the same treatment to everybody in the service. I think that every Act that is framed must necessarily have some slight inequalities in its incidence upon individual members of the service. We have discussed the various ways of doing it, and have concluded that this is, perhaps, the manner in which the least inequality will arise, and one which is just and fair. If my hon. friend desires it, I can only ask that the committee wait before concluding this matter. But I would suggest to my hon. friend, and other hon. members, that if there are other points on which they would like to have information, they might make them known now, so that I could be prepared to give all the information desired when the matter is taken up for discussion again.

Mr. FOSTER. That is perfectly right. So far as I am concerned, I have gone over the matter carefully, and have put the points on which I wished information, and other members can do the same. There is one other point that I would call to the attention of the minister. He proposes to take general power to withdraw from the consolidated revenue fund whatever is required for the payment of these salaries without taking any special vote. I would deprecate that. Last year, when the House passed the Civil Service Bill and passed the estimates also, the session was about to close. It was absolutely impossible, at that time, to tell how much money would be required for the purposes of this Act. Therefore, we gave general power to the government to take from the consolidated revenue fund whatever might be necessary for the purposes of the Act. But you are in a different position now. The session is only beginning, and you are not face to face with an unknown computation, but can find out exactly what you will need. Therefore, instead of trying to avail itself of this general power, which should only be given in an emergency, the government should bring down an estimate of what is necessary to pay the Bill and have that estimate passed by the House. The minister, I am sure, quite understands that he had better have as few of these anomalies and exceptions as possible, especially in relation to the appropriation of money.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the minister be good enough to bring down a statement showing the number of employees brought in from the outside service and placed on the staff under this Act? My reason for asking is to be found in the figures of the estimates. In 1908, the Civil Government estimates amounted to something over $2,060,000. This year the amount is over $3,960,000. In addition, there will be this $347,000 granted to the civil servants under this proposal for a flat increase of $150 each. It is very confusing when you look over the different departments, and have no means of knowing the number of men brought in under this arrangement.

Mr. FISHER. I should be glad to bring that information down.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the minister object to having the names given as well?

Mr. FISHER. No objection.

Mr. TURRIFF. Has the government come to any conclusion or worked out any plan to put all the service on an equal footing? At present it is most unsatisfactory. One department lets its clerks out at four o'clock, and in the adjoining office the clerks work until five o'clock. This has been a source of annoyance in the service for many years past. We are now granting an annual increase to the civil servants amounting to nearly half a million dollars. I do not object to that; I wish to see the civil servants well paid. But when we are doing this, I think it is up to this House to see that the country gets something in return for this large increase. That can be brought about without doing any injustice to any of the civil servants. I claim that the civil servants who go to work at 9.30 a.m.,—and in some of the departments they go at ten o'clock, for I meet them as I am coming up town—and leave at four o'clock, with an hour and a half in the middle of the day, are not giving an honest day's work, and are not giving value for the money we are paying them. I think the service should be put on an equal footing. And, in view of the increased salary we are giving, if the government insisted that the civil servants should be in their offices at nine o'clock, and work until five in the afternoon, with an hour and a half off in the middle of the day, that would not be asking too much. And I want to tell the House that the best officers in the different departments are doing that to-day. The best officers are at work at nine o'clock in the morning, and stay there until five, and many of them until half past five or six o'clock, and even come back in the evening if necessary. Those who do the least while there are those who come the latest and leave the earliest. This is a matter that others beside the civil servants are interested in. The whole country is interested, for the country pays the salaries. I would like to have some answer from the minister as to what the government propose to do in that connection.

Mr. J. D. REID. I am most agreeably surprised at the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Turriff). Yesterday, he had quite a different speech——

Mr. TURRIFF. Not at all.

Mr. J. D. REID. Yes, the hon. gentleman then was quite satisfied that the civil servants should go to work at ten o'clock.

Mr. TURRIFF. No.

Mr. J. D. REID. The speech that the hon. gentleman made——

Mr. TURRIFF. Read it.

Mr. J. D. REID. It was in opposition to the speech that I made. But if he had taken my speech of yesterday, and read it here, he would have seen almost word for word what he has said now. Evidently, he has changed his mind——

Mr. TURRIFF. Not at all.

Mr. J. D. REID. Certainly. Yesterday he was proving that some of the civil servants stayed as long as half past four, and that was an awful hardship——

Mr. TURRIFF. No, no.

Mr. J. D. REID. Certainly, he——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Reid) to the fact that he is referring to a past debate, which is out of order.

Mr. J. D. REID. I accept your correction, Mr. Chairman. So far as that is concerned, in the remarks I made yesterday——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Order.

Mr. J. D. REID. Can't I refer to my own speech ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is a past debate.

Mr. TURRIFF.

Mr. J. D. REID. Then, I withdraw that also. For my part, I do not wish to find any fault with the civil servants, for I believe they are good men ; but I agree with what the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has said that to have the Civil Service go to work at 9.30 in the morning—and many of them seem to go at any time between 9.30 and ten—and work until four, with an intermission of an hour and a half in the middle of the day, is not enough. That is only five hours of actual work, and I claim that eight hours would not be an unreasonable time for these men to work. If they went on at nine and quit at five, as I believe they should, it would only be seven hours work, giving them one hour for lunch, as they have in banks and other institutions. In fact, I believe that in banks and other business houses some of the clerks do not even have as long a time as that for lunch. These men not having heavy work or brain work of a sufficiently arduous character to require shorter hours, should put in a reasonable number of hours' work and I agree with what the hon. gentleman has just said that there should be a Bill or some understanding whereby government employees should work a uniform number of hours. If the government do not bring it in I hope some other hon. gentleman will and if he does I shall support it.

Mr. FISHER. The practice is a little different in different departments. I am not prepared to say off hand what it is, but I think the Civil Service Act contains a clause dealing with the hours of work. If not there is a rule laid down under the Act. But I know that the practice is slightly different in different departments. I appreciate the difficulties which arise from that. In my own department some of the officers stayed a little longer than others, it created a great deal of ill-feeling and jealousy and I was obliged to ask my deputy minister to arrange that they should all come in and leave at the same hour. I think there are very few civil servants who do not reach their offices at 9.30, the usual hour at which they are required to be there. There is a book kept in which they have to enter their names with the minute at which they arrive, and the officers who are in charge of the different branches would certainly take to task any civil servant who was frequently arriving after the hour at which he was required to be there. I believe there are rare exceptions—not as many as my hon. friend would indicate. The hours are usually from 9.30 until 4 o'clock, with an hour or an hour and a quarter for lunch. I think in some departments an hour is allowed, and in others an hour and a quarter. I do not know of any department in which an hour and a half is allowed, but I am speaking subject to correction.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes a six hour day.

Mr. FISHER. Practically a six hour day, and I think that is the general rule. The question of adding to that, in consequence of the increase in salary now, is one that is worthy of consideration, but it has not been embodied in this resolution, and I doubt the advisability of it. If it were adopted it ought to be by way of an amendment to the Civil Service Act. This resolution is not an amendment to the Civil Service Act. This resolution provides for the introduction of a Bill for one particular thing, and when that one particular thing has been carried out this ceases practically to operate. I did not think it was wise that it should be an amendment to the Civil Service Act because it is of a temporary character and the Civil Service Act is a law which deals with and regulates the Civil Service permanently.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. Does it fix the hours?

Mr. FISHER. I do not know whether the Act actually fixes the hours or not. I am not sure; I would have to look it up to see. If it does not, I do not quite know how it is that the hours are fixed. They can be fixed, I suppose, by ministerial orders in the different departments themselves. It would be very much better that they should be uniform, and that they should be fixed in such a way that they would be definite.

Mr. BARR. It does seem to me that hon. gentlemen in this House must come to the conclusion that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is wrong in his understanding as to the hours of work of the members of the Civil Service. In visiting the different branches of the service we find it difficult to do business because of the non-arrival of members of the Civil Service, and I do think that they should be in their places during the time the House is sitting. We do know that hon. gentlemen are worked very much harder than the civil servants. We also know that their time is very much engaged and that unless they have an opportunity of doing their business in connection with the different departments before ten or half past ten, their business is interfered with. Committees meet at ten o'clock and we have no other time in which to visit the departments. It is the exception to find these men in their places at half past nine. I would suggest that the rule should be that they should be in their places during the time that the House is sitting and that they should arrive at their offices at nine o'clock. I do not believe it possible that there is a a tab kept upon them. It seems that many of the junior officials come and go just as they choose. I am informed that while there is a rule regarding the hours of attendance in some cases, in many instances there is no rule and that many officials have almost a free hand. I do not think that any business man could do business as it is done in our departments. As far as the deputies and heads of the departments are concerned they are conscientious men and do their work properly, but I think that many of the subordinates are not fulfilling the duties of their positions as they would be compelled to do in a bank, or in the commercial world. I think that the servants of the people should attend to their duties just as regularly and as punctually as men are required to do in any other walk of life. I do not think that civil servants are underpaid. I think that the outside service have much more work to do and much greater responsibility than the inside service. The whole system should be carefully looked into and a better system devised.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I would like to ask the minister a question that I have asked of several of the older members of this House and to which I have been unable to get a satisfactory answer. I would like to know who comprise the inside service and who the outside service?

Mr. FISHER. I would not like to answer off hand. If my hon friend will read the section of the Act covering that point I think he will see. I could not, off hand, do anything but read the definition in the Act.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to ask the minister if there are any civil servants in Ottawa who were not brought in under the Civil Service Act of last year?

Mr. FISHER. There are in the city of Ottawa the departmental services and also some services which pertain to Ottawa just as similar services pertain to Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg or any other city. The employees of the Ottawa Customs house and the local office of the Inland Revenue Department, for instance, were not brought into the inside service by last year's Bill, but are still in the same position as similar officials in Montreal or Toronto. It is only the departmental services that were brought into the inside service under the Bill of last session. A large number of people were paid out of lump votes of one kind and another in the city of Ottawa in the service and these were all brought in.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the minister be good enough to bring in a statement of the number of those in Ottawa who were brought from the outside service into the inside service ?

Mr. FISHER. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I would urge the minister to add to the list of those who will receive this increase the railway mail clerks throughout Canada. They are men who loyally perform their duty and who live a hazardous life; they belong to that department which has a surplus, and I do not think there are any harder worked men in the Civil Service of Canada than the railway mail clerks.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the committee rises, I would ask whether or not the return just handed to us embodies all the conditions of the various orders in council establishing the reorganization of the different departments ?

Mr. FISHER. As far as I know it does; I have not seen the return myself. The instructions were that the orders in council for the reorganization of the departments should all be included. I understand that the Interior Department order is not there as it was not completed. There will have to be also two resolutions of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I understand that. The statute of last year, section 8, subsection 2, made the following provision:

The order in council shall give the names of the several branches of the department, with the number and character of the offices, clerkships and other positions in each, and the duties, titles and salaries thereafter to pertain thereto.

The return brought down has four headings, first, a name, second the title, character and duties of office or position, third former salary, fourth proposed salary. Under the heading or 'title, character and duties or post or position' the only thing that I observe is the title of the position which the officer is to fill, and I do not observe anything defining otherwise the character or the duties of the office or position. It seemed to me when we were discussing the matter last year that it would be exceedingly important that the duties of the office should be defined as far as possible. I am not at all insisting that the duties of each officer should be brought down and laid as a return on the table of the House, but I think they ought to be defined in the department, and it seems to me that any order in council dealing with the reorganization of a department which is confined to conferring a title, such as clerk or stenographer or something upon a particular officer and stating whether his salary is the same or greater, is not a compliance with the statute of last year nor does it fulfil one of the principal objects of that statute. I am not so much concerned with the hours of service of the civil servants in Ottawa; in fact I know some institutions where it is absolutely forbidden clerks and employees to do any work after office hours or in the evening for the reason that reasonable hours are given for doing a reasonable amount of work in office hours, and any clerk who is not able to do that reasonable amount of work within these reasonable hours is prima facie considered unfit to continue in the service of the institution. I think reasonable hours of service should be assigned, and should be set out with some particularity in order that every person in the service in Canada may know that by virtue of his position in the Civil Service, certain duties are incumbent on him and he must perform this amount of work in office hours, in ordinary conditions at least. I realize that in time of emergency, for instance, during the session, it may be necessary for clerks to work outside of office hours, possibly in the evenings; but the duties should be defined and every clerk should understand that he has certain things to do within certain hours. I mentioned last evening some matters that had been brought to my attention by men previously in the service who stated to me, as one of the crying needs of the service, some means of inspection. I do not know that these orders provide for inspection, but I think the time of the Civil Service Commission might be employed to some extent in that way either through themselves or others. I know that in most great corporations there is a thorough system of inspection by which the heads of the corporation are able to know from time to time, by the reports of competent people, whether every officer of the corporation is able to perform his duties. I was told by a young man not now in the service that the man next to him when he was in one branch of that particular department, occupied nearly all his time in reading novels during the day without any one to inspect or supervise him; and the man next him was occupied in some other manner of as little advantage to the people of this country who were paying him his salary. The same young man told me of another man in the same department who had worked industriously and indefatigably who had worked after hours night after night and year after year to qualify himself for the duties of his position, who had passed an examination in a certain outside institution which gave him a very high status, and who was working on in the department on a very small salary, having received absolutely no consideration or recognition for the honest, able and indefatigable endeavours which he had made to qualify himself better to serve the people of this country. It is with matters of that kind that it seems to me efforts at reorganization of the departments should be concerned, and I hope that the endeavour of last session to improve the Civil Service of this country will not stop short of some thorough system of inspection such as that employed by some of the great corporations of this country. I trust that my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture will take this into consideration, because I think it is vital and essential to placing the Civil Service on the best possible basis.

Mr. FISHER. I may say to my hon. friend that the Act of last session provided, under certain circumstances, for an inspection and report upon any department by the Civil Service Commissioners. There is not and never has been any provision for regular continuous inspection. I am not prepared to say that that would not be a good thing ; at the same time, I doubt very much the value of it. Such instances as my hon. friend has just adduced are clear evidence that some officials above those described was derelict in his duty. It was the duty of the deputy minister or the chief of the branch in which these persons were employed not to have allowed that kind of thing to go on. I think the responsibilities and duties of the higher officers of the Civil Service would be rather interfered with if any ordinary inspection system were to be adopted; they would perhaps be less inclined to look closely after the details of their administration. I have had opportunities occasionally of administering one or two departments other than my own, and while I have no doubt that while such cases as those mentioned by my hon. friend do occur sometimes, they are rare exceptions to the general rule. As a general rule, the officers of the different departments are kept up to their work by their immediate chiefs, who again are looked after by the deputy minister in a pretty business-like way, though in a large service like this, with upwards of 2,500 employees in Ottawa, a few instances of the kind mentioned may occur, instances which is is hard to overcome. There may be some body who is intolerably lazy or inefficient. and if he were to be dismissed from the service at a time when he could not go on the superannuation list, and after he had been paying into the superannuation fund for a good many years, with perhaps a family dependent upon him, such an action might seem unduly severe. It requires a good deal of determination and perhaps hard heartedness to visit such a man with the just measure which his delinquencies would properly bring down upon his head. But I believe the instances of that kind in the service are rare, and, as a general rule, while the hours are shorter than those in commercial life, and while the salaries are pretty good in comparison, the average civil servant gives a fair return for the salary he is paid; the service is efficient, and the business of the country well carried on. I had an opportunity during the last year of studying closely, in writings at any rate, the systems of the United States and Great Britain, and I venture to say that today the public service of Canada is carried on more economically and more efficiently, in proportion to the number of men employed than the service of either of those two countries.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I cannot concur in the view which my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has advanced as to the possible results of a system of inspection. Under a system such as is carried out in a bank, when a branch is examined, and it is found that any of the subordinate officials are not performing their duties in a satisfactory way, that fact is set down as a black mark against the chief of that branch whose duty it was to see that the subordinates properly performed their duties. Therefore, a system of inspection, instead of lessening the supervision of the man in charge of the subordinates, ought to increase it.

Mr. HAGGART. As I understand, under the Act the theoretical organization of the departments is left to the deputies themselves; the duties appertaining to each office and the salary attached to it are prescribed. In trying to improve the service, why not adopt the system of inspection that exists in England? Why not also adopt the system of registration that exists there? This will show what every man in every department does every day, and the commission could ascertain whether he has being doing his duty or not. You may have efficient heads of the departments, but unless you have a registration of the duties and the work done by each officer you will always have pets in the department who will do nothing while the others will be doing the work.

Mr. FISHER. I may say that the Act of last session provided for a record of the clerks to be kept. There was nothing of that kind in the former Civil Service Act. The Act of last session did not go perhaps as far as my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) suggests, and I do not for a moment say that what he suggests is going too far; but it did provide for a record of the work of every clerk, so that when his name came up for promotion or increase of salary, that record could be referred to.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice running through the papers the last few days some very strange statements with regard to the system of overcharging civil servants for loans. The statement is made by members of the service and parties outside that the departments are the happy hunting ground of loan sharks, especially on pay days. If that be the case, some deputy head or other officer is very lax. The government buildings should not be allowed to be used for business of that description. No doubt when a civil servant is approached by gentlemen of this kind before his fellow colleagues, such insistent gentlemen can get what they like, especially if the official be a little sensitive. Somebody ought to take this matter in hand and see that traps are set in these preserves for that kind of poacher.

Mr. FISHER. I quite agree with my hon. friend. Some years ago it came to my knowledge that a certain individual was pursuing some of the clerks in my department and I gave instructions that he was not to be allowed to come in at all. I do not think that the departmental offices are the places for that kind of business. It is private business which ought to be done elsewhere and outside office hours. I have read the accounts in the paper and agree that the thing should be put a stop to; but how to stop it I am not prepared to say. No doubt many of those who are in the clutches of the usurers, if they are usurers, have got there by reason of their extreme weakness or more or less laxness in their conduct.

Mr. HUGHES. They are often unfortunate.

Mr. FISHER. No doubt, but very often their indebtedness is due to gambling and other things they ought not to indulge in. The matter comes within the administration of the criminal law in this province. As I am not a lawyer, I cannot well give an opinion as to how it should be dealt with. But in the public interest the thing ought to be stopped because no man who is in the clutches of an usurer, and is deeply in debt, can do good work for his employer. In this case it is the country which is the employer, and the heads of the departments should do what they can to prevent that kind of work going on inside of their departments.

Mr. SPROULE. The record is not such a one as my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has mentioned. It is simply a record of the efficiency and conduct of the employees. It does not show what work they are doing.

Mr. FISHER. Their efficiency would be gauged by the amount of work they do. If one clerk did only half as much of the same kind of routine work as another, he would be called inefficient and the other efficient.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that a report every three months by the chiefs of the branches to the deputy head on the efficiency and conduct of the employees does not give much information as to the work they do. It does not give any record of what mechanical work they perform.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I hope the hon. minister will not lose sight of what I mentioned, namely, that the orders in council do not seem to prescribe the duties in accordance with what the statute demands.

Progress reported.

Mr. FOSTER.

SUPPLY—C. P. R. NEW STOCK.

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). I intend to take up the time of the House for a few minutes in calling attention to a very important matter. Had I thought the House would have gone into Committee of Supply to-day, I would have notified the government of the item I proposed to bring to the attention of the House, and I regret I have not been able to do so. But the subject is one of so much importance to my mind that I hope we shall have further opportunity of discussing it in this House. I read in the last annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway the following clause:

> To be in a position to provide additional money from this source (issue of stock), if and when necessary, your directors thought it wise to ask the consent of the Governor General in Council to a further increase of ordinary capital stock from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000. This consent has been formally given.

In other words, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the greatest institution in this country, has been given authority, according to the statements of its president, to increase its capital stock from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000. Whether that be so or not, I have only the authority of the president of that company; but in the 'Globe' newspaper of the other day I found this statement:

> Small holders of the Canadian Pacific write to 'The Globe' asking why the company cannot give some information as to the basis upon which the new common stock will be issued. Possibly the best answer is that the company itself must first ask the Canadian Parliament for authority to issue the stock. The Canadian Pacific might not be able to say that it was the business of no outsider what method it used to raise new capital, and at the same time benefit its proprietors. It might be able to say this if there were no Railway Commission to fix freight rates, having regard to the profits earned and capital actually invested. The Railway Commission must take into consideration the rights enjoyed by shareholders as well as the dividend return, when considering the application of shippers for the reduction of freight carrying charges. Nevertheless it would be well to remember that in spite of its wealth the C.P.R. is face to face with a good deal of competition, and to meet this will require all the money the road can secure. If the directors prefer to give the shareholders what is practically a stock dividend, instead of a money bonus, from the land fund for instance, they might very easily justify their position. While its control is here, the great bulk of C.P.R. stock is held abroad, and is in the hands of very important interests. It would be unfortunate if the company was forced to take any position which the foreign shareholders would consider as unfair to them, as the confidence of European and British investors alone has maintained the premier Canadian stock at a high level, and has been the means of bringing the country itself to the favourable attention of foreign financial centres.

I propose to show to the House that it is of the utmost importance to the people of this country how the capitalization of our railways is increased, and that, for that reason, there ought to be some control of the government over the issue of securities by railway companies. I shall show that the Act for that purpose passed in the State of New York in 1897 has been of the utmost advantage to the people of the State. Can it be shown that the giving to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of power to increase its capital stock from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 without imposing conditions was of advantage to the public? I contend that it is in the public interest that such new capitalization should be in the form of bonds, and not in the form of stock. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company could borrow on bonds, probably, at 4 per cent, but if it floats stock, it expects to put aside in its net earnings at least 10 per cent to cover the interest on that stock. I propose also to show that, if the company is allowed to issue stock, that stock should be sold to the public at the highest rate it will bring, and all the money realized should be put into the treasury. But the proposition, as I understand it, is that the ancient and discredited example of the American railways should be followed, and that the issue of stock should be of the nature of what is called 'cutting a melon' for the benefit of the stockholders. In other words, this $50,000,000, which would bring, perhaps, 150 on the market—it is quoted at about 175 and has been as high as 200—shall be issued at par, which will have the effect of dividing $25,000,000 taken from the people of Canada among the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that this flotation shall be added to the money on which the shareholders are drawing 7 per cent with prospects of still greater earnings. I contend, therefore, that, especially when a company is as well established as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, its issue of securities should be in the form or bonds, but, if stock is to be issued, it should be put upon the market for what it will bring, and the money used for the benefit of the road. I totally agree with this idea of 'cutting a melon' representing $25,000,000 for the benefit of the shareholders, and especially do I denounce it in connection with a company like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has already been so heavily bonused in money and land, given a great franchise. I learn from the 'Statist' and the 'Economist,' the two leading financial papers of England, that the Canadian Pacific Railway to-day is establishing surplus earnings equal to 10 per cent on its stock. If it is the intention of the company to take that much out of the traffic earnings, I think that charge is altogether unfair. Suppose that the company wants $50,000,000, as the president says it soon will; if it availed itself of the current price of stock, even discounting to-day's quotation by 25 points, it could raise the money by an issue of $37,500,000 of stock. Or, if it issued $50,000,000 of bonds, it could raise the money at 4 per cent, an annual charge of $2,000,000. In the form in which they propose to issue it, this will represent a fixed charge upon the earnings of the road, paid by the people of this country of $5,000,000 a year, or $3,000,000 more than should be paid, and this proposed method of issue capitalized, represents $75,000,000. In other words, this proposal, which some people ignore or say is of no moment, means that the passenger and freight rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway are to be burdened, quite unnecessarily, with a fixed charge to pay interest on $75,000,000. For, no railway maintains itself except out of the charges it makes upon the public, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company proposes to take from the public, by this unfair, improvident and improper flotation, enough to pay the interest on $75,000,000. Only 38 per cent of the net income of the Canadian Pacific Railway is required to pay the interest on its bond issue. Why should not 60 or even 70 per cent of the net income be used to pay interest on bonds? To maintain a proper equilibrium between the stock and bond issues, at least 75 per cent of the net earnings should be devoted to the payment of interest on the bonds. If this issue is allowed, there must be heavy unnecessary traffic charges. It cannot be otherwise. The State of California has made the announcement that because of the improper watering of stock of the railways in that state by Mr. Harriman, the traffic charges have had to be advanced by the amount of $10,000,000 to pay the interest on that water. I have been told that this is no concern of the people. But I contend that it is every concern of the people, for freight charges are based upon fixed charges, interest and dividend charges, and, unless the greatest care is exercised in authorizing these flotations the public will suffer. To show that the public have suffered, I think I can say with perfect fairness that the financial troubles of the last few years in the United States have been largely due to the over-capitalization of corporations, and especially railway corporations. Dividends have to be paid on all this water, and the money has to come out of the people.

To show that the American people are not neglectful of the situation, I wish to point out that in 1897 the state of New York, perhaps following the good example of Canada, established a railway commission, which to my mind is the finest piece of legislation I know of in New York state. I also wish to say that we have in Canada an excellent Railway Commission, and my object mainly here to-day is to see that the government put into their railway law the legislation which has been put into the law of the State of New York governing these things. I will read the provision in the New York law. Section 55 of the Public Service Commissions Act reads as follows:

A common carrier——

For instance the Canadian Pacific Railway corporation.

——or street railroad corporation organized or existing, or hereafter incorporated, under or by virtue of the laws of the State of New York, may issue stocks, bonds, notes or other evidence of indebtedness payable at periods of more than twelve months after the date thereof, when necessary for the acquisition of property, the construction, completion, extension or improvement of its facilities, or for the improvement or maintenance of its service or for the discharge or lawful refunding of its obligations, provided and not otherwise that there should have been secured from the proper commission an order authorizing such issue, and the amount thereof and stating that, in the opinion of the commission, the use of the capital to be secured by the issue of such stock, bonds, notes or other evidence of indebtedness is reasonably required for the said purposes of the corporation, for the purpose of enabling it to determine whether it should issue such an order, the commission should make inquiry or investigation, hold such hearings and examine such witnesses, books, papers, documents or contracts as it may deem of importance in enabling it to reach a determination.

Now that I contend should be our law. The Governor in Council, when this $50,000,000 was authorized, if it has been authorized, should have exercised some discretion and probably would, if we had it in our law. My chief object in bringing this matter before the House to-day is to urge upon the government the insertion of a clause in the Railway Commission Act of Canada which will give the Railway Commission authority to control all such issues, and that the railways, before they can get such authority, shall be obliged to establish that it is in the public interest that the authority be given. Though that Act was only passed in the United States in 1897, and the commission was organized less than 18 months ago, they have had before them up to the latest date I could get, seven applications for an increase in stock and issue of bonds. It is a very illuminative thing to read the findings of the commission on these various applications. I will read two or three short paragraphs from them. For instance, on an application of a company on April 7, in connection with the Lehigh & Hudson River Railway, and on which decision was given May 7 last, there is this statement, and the commission is living up to it.

It is sufficient for present purposes to call attention to the fact that some obligations may be the proper subject of capitalization and other obligations may not be. One purpose of the Public Service Commissioners Law is to restrain and limit the hitherto irrepressible elasticity of corporate capitalization to the matters which may properly be capitalized, and the same discriminating scrutiny should and will be extended to indebtedness as to other subjects enumerated in that statute.

Now the same sin, and it is a great public and political sin, prevails in Canada today; that sin is the hitherto irrepressible elasticity of corporate capitalization, it must be restrained, it must be limited, it must be directed in channels which will make the least charge on the railway, and therefore on the public. It has got so bad in the United States, as I said before, that the financial panic we have heard so much of is said to be due to this extensive and improper capitalization People say that Roosevelt is the man who brought on the panic in the United States. I say that the panic in the United States is largely due to this over-capitalization that has taken place there; and it will disarrange our finances here and it will make our railway charges here exorbitant if we do not check it. I say the time has arrived when we ought to check it in this country. Here is another deliverance of the Railway Commission in New York:

In other words our order should not operate to increase the interest charges upon this property by one per cent or any per cent for the next sixteen years without some corresponding increase in the company's assets in property or in cash to be devoted to the construction and improvement covered by the case under consideration. Indeed it may be questioned whether a present low interest bearing bond should be permitted to be retired by a bond bearing higher interest in any event when the present bond would run a reasonable period before maturity.

The Railway Commission in the United States says that a railroad company should not even be allowed to substitute a bond of a high rate for one of a lower rate, because it knows that every such increase of that kind is to the detriment of the people and must end in the increase of freight rates. Now, if we are to work out the great object that we had in view in establishing this Railway Commission—and we are working it out, the commission is doing good service in this country every day, and I give the government credit for enforcing that commission fairly and strengthening it in different directions—but if it is to do what we intended it to do, that is, to regulate the freight charges of this country, it must also do another thing, and regulate the security issues of the companies if it wishes to keep the freight rates at a reasonable figure. If unnecessary capital is issued, or if stock at a high dividend rate is issued where a low interest bearing bond will do, we are simply failing to effect a cure, we are stopping a leak at one end and allowing a leak at the other. My main object to-day is to bring to the attention of the government this statement which is made in the Canadian Pacific Railway annual report, that the authority has already been given, and also to draw the attention of the government to the need of making a provision in the Canadian Railway Act which will give the Commission full power to pass judgment on all the proposed increases of capital and bonds of any railway company in this country. I have heard it argued in this House that it is no concern of the people what the amount of stock issue may be. I say it is of great concern to the people, not only the amount of the issue but the character of the issue; and when a railway is once established, its issue for development and extension purposes ought largely to be confined to bonds instead of stock. I say it will be a scandal, a scandal that no public man can justify, if there is to be perpetrated in a few days, as I believe there will be, the cutting of this 'melon' whereby $50,000,000 of securities are to be issued to the shareholders at par. It is not in the public interest, it is not to the credit of parliament that the law should remain as it is to-day. I ask the government to give the most careful consideration to this state of affairs, and that before this session is over, indeed before this thing can be perpetrated, if the authority has been given, in some way it should be regulated, and that no increase of security shall be allowed until the reasons for that increase, and the nature of the security that is to be issued, shall pass the scrutiny and receive the sanction of the Board of Railway Commissioners of this country.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) who has again shown that he pays particular attention to the way in which large corporations are managed and particularly to the railway problem. The question of the financing of these very large concerns is one that cannot be settled off hand and cannot be managed unless it be by men who have given it a great deal of attention and who, year after year, have profited by the experienced gained. It will go without saying, no matter what any person may think of certain lines of conduct, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that it is one of the best managed companies in the known world to-day. While we want to maintain our rights as a people there is one condition that we must maintain, and that is that the credit of the undertakings of the Canadian people and on behalf of Canadian people must stand high in the markets of the world. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has carried out its undertakings in a marvellous degree. When it was first launched there were differences of opinion as to how it should be done no doubt, and honest differences of opinion. They had their difficulties in the beginning, in the carrying out of the construction of the road, and they had their financial questions to grapple with. The parliament of Canada assisted them to an extent that it was thought by the majority, at least, was justified. But, leaving all that aside, up to the present time, the Canadian Pacific management stands out as one of the best in this or any other country. When this company, after years of experience, finds that the interests of the people in one particular portion of the Dominion demand a further extension of railway accommodation, it is their business, it is their duty to the people of Canada to, as far as possible, acquiesce in that request and give the people of the great west the railway accommodation that they are asking for. No person will take any exception to that. The only question that can be raised in connection with it is that we regret that the railway companies are not able to give the accommodation as rapidly as the great needs of the west demand that they should, and it is our duty, not only as a government, but as a parliament, to aid any company as far as we possibly can in the endeavour to bring the markets of the world as close as possible to the doors of the people who have gone into our unsettled country in the western part of Canada. We have spent a large amount of money and we are to-day spending large amounts of money to do that very thing. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company come to the government and ask them to allow them to increase their capital stock. What for?—in order that they may yield to that demand and obtain the capital to build lines into parts of the country that do not now have railway accommodation. The necessity of this, of course, need not be argued for a moment, because every one agrees that it is necessary. But my hon. friend takes exception to the way in which it is done. I may say there is room for argument as to which is the better method; there is no doubt in the world about that. But the government on this occasion followed the examples and lines they have always followed with regard to increases in capital stock. If a company come, make a good case, and state that they want to extend their line for the benefit of the people or to take care of the traffic of the country, we have always given them an opportunity to do it in this way. This is no new departure. This is the old line of conduct. Whether it is the better way or not is open to argument, and I was glad to hear the remarks of my hon. friend with regard to it. The men who are engaged in large undertakings, in the management and securing of capital, particularly in a time like this, must take into account the difference in cost or interest between issuing new stock and selling bonds. But is there not another difference? Is there not a difference between placing a new mortgage on a property that now exists and extending the sphere of the proprietorship? The stockholders are the proprietors; the bondholders are the holders of what we might commonly call a mortgage on property and there is a difference. It might make a marked difference in the value of the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway and in the credit of the company itself if they were to issue a large amount of bonds at any price in order to raise more funds to extend the lines of the company. We must most certainly, as far as possible, keep intact the credit of the company, and we are part proprietors of the great Canadian Pacific Railway in this country, and the better way to keep their credit intact, the better way to advance it, as far as the effect on the market and the stock is concerned, will be by an issue of stock rather than by another large bond issue. It strikes me that those in the financial world, particularly when the finances of the world are in a sensitive condition, will look at it in that way, and while I admit that it is open for argument, I contend that there is a strong argument from the financial standpoint in favour of an issue of stock rather than another large bond issue. My hon. friend very rightly refers to New York state, but this much must be remembered, that it is a far more difficult thing, ordinarily speaking, to finance an undertaking in a new country where the opportunity for traffic is much less than in a thickly settled country——

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. The Canadian Pacific Railway has the best credit in the world.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, because it is managed along the lines I have indicated rather than along the lines that my hon. friend has indicated.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. No, they have issued bonds heretofore, but they have quit doing it.

Mr. GRAHAM. I know. In Canada we have a very small population per mile of railway. No country has as great a mileage of railway per head of population as the Dominion of Canada, but to reverse it, no country in the world to-day has a greater tract of territory per mile of railway than has the Dominion of Canada. We are a very large country with a comparatively small population. New York state has a very dense population, and California has likewise. In the states of the union to which my hon. friend referred the density of population gives the railways a traffic which the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other road in this country, cannot expect to have for years. In other words, the Canadian Pacific Railway, as well as other railways in Canada, are dealing with what is to be in the future rather than what is at the present time, and it is necessary for them to be given every opportunity by the government and parliament of Canada to retain their financial position which stands high in the world to-day. In granting this extra issue of stock, as I said before, the government have done what they have done before, not in the dark, not in secret, but in the open, prepared to bring down the order in council if necessary and prepared to explain why this has been done. I say again, we think it was the wisest thing to do; it is, of course, open for argument, as my hon. friend has said, but under all the circumstances I would be prepared as head of the Railway Department to do the same thing again, to allow the Canadian Pacific Railway under present circumstances to obtain this money in order to extend its lines into the great Northwest country where they need more railway facilities.

My hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) has raised one other important point, that is the question of referring questions of this kind to the Board of Railway Commissioners. There is a good deal to be said in favour of that course, and I promise my hon. friend that I shall give the suggestion the consideration of which it is worthy. There is, however, this further question whether the government that is responsible to the people—more directly responsible in Canada than are the members of the American government who do not have to go to the people for election, while we are constantly in contact with them—should decide on cases of that kind, or whether, they should be referred to the Railway Commission for first consideration, coming to us for final decision. I promise my friend to give the whole question full consideration.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, the question introduced by the hon. member for York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) is one that has been before this House for a great number of years. It was debated again and again in the Railway Committee where Mr. Mulock drew attention to the increased rates to which the people of the country must be subjected by reason of the watering of stock or the increased issue of bonds or stock. The hon. gentleman says that there is legislation in the United States against any issues of this kind. That may be perfectly right, such matters may be left to the Railway Commission as the Minister of Railways suggests to judge whether it is or is not right that an issue of stock or of preferential securities should be made in a certain way, but the Railway Commission have jurisdiction over all these matters and it is their duty to see that the people who eventually have to pay for these things, pay for only the actual cash which has been invested in the undertaking and do not pay the fancy prices that the railways put on their securities.

What are the facts in reference to the particular thing of which the hon. member complains, an issue of a certain amount of stock, I think $50,000,000 to build 600 or 700 miles of railway in the Northwest ? If that money was to be raised on the undertaking itself it could not be raised on any better terms than it is now being raised. The undertaking of this work lessens the property which the present owners of the Canadian Pacific Railway have—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. No, no.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. It does.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It does.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. It lessens it to the value of the undertaking, and have not the owners of the road a right to take that into consideration in awarding the stock to the new proprietors? But if they do as they do in some places in the United States and may do in Canada, it is the duty of our commission to see that in fixing the rates for these roads the fair consideration shall be the actual amount of cash that has been put into the undertaking. The principal reason for seeking to prevent the watering of stock is the idea that some day or other the country will become possessors of the railways. If the railways were taken over by the state their valuation would not be fixed at all on watered stock but would be fixed as in the case of any other undertaking or corporation on the basis of what it is worth as a going concern at the moment it is taken over. That is the consideration and the only consideration with the government. It may have an effect on some people owing to the fear that the railways will exact higher freight and passenger rates from the people because a price has been given to the stock which does not correspond to the value of the property or, in other words, the security has been watered. But to guard against such a result as that, we have appointed a commission for the purpose of protecting the people of the country in these matters.

In reference to the particular matter at issue, the people of this country desire the building of 600 miles of railway in the Northwest. How are they to get the money? Can they raise it on the undertaking itself?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. On the whole property of the concern.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. You raise it on the whole property. Then have not I, as a stockholder in the Canadian Pacific Railway, a right to consider whether the building of that property would affect the security that I have ? That is the primary consideration and the holders of Canadian Pacific Railway securities have a right to decide upon it. The only consideration worthy the attention of the people of this country is that in the eventuality of the state becoming the possessor of the railways they shall get them at their proper price and value. This is provided for in nearly every Railway Act of the British parliament. I admit to a certain extent with the hon. member for York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) that the tendency of legislation in this country and of ideals throughout the world is that in all matters of transport the people of the country should have control either by ownership, or as we have done here in this country, by the people ruling the railways through a commission in regard to the fixing of rates.

All these attacks upon property are not a benefit or essential to the people of this country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. It is not an advantage to have these matters discussed on the lines pursued by my hon. friend here.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Oh, oh.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. The proper line is to take a reasonable view of what is necessary in the interest of the country and I think that it is in the interest of the country even on the proposition laid down by my hon. friend. that this legislation should pass.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). There are two things that ought to be taken into consideration when such a proposal is made, either to the Governor in Council or to the Railway Commission. It seems to me that the first question is the money needed and for what purpose ? Is it for the purpose of better accommodating the public or providing some want which up to that time has not been provided ? And the second, if this obligation is to be incurred, how can you best raise the money so that the smaller amount will do as much good as a larger amount raised in some other way. It seems to me that it resolves itself into this. We have given the Canadian Pacific Railway and every other corporation of the kind a large consideration in money and lands to provide services for the public and therefore the country has an interest in this question as well as the Canadian Pacific Railway and we must always have an interest in it.

We did that good service for the public. The public therefore has an interest in it. Now, the public ought to get the benefit of that service by paying the smallest possible rate in the way of freight or passenger charges. Suppose the company wishes to build 400 or 500 miles more road, and require this money. For what purpose do they require it? In the first place they require it in the interest of the public, as the public has demanded the accommodation, and that, I assume, should be fairly taken into consideration by the Governor in Council before they decide whether they will allow the company to sell more stock for the purpose of raising the money. They reach the conclusion that the money is needed in the interest of the public, and that it is proper to give that authority to the company. Then, I think they should consider, how can this service be supplied to the public at the smallest possible outlay? If the sale of $37,500,000 of stock will provide capital enough to supply what is needed, surely there is no justification for selling $50,000,000. Because if $50,000,000 of stock is sold, those who use these roads, either for the transportation of their goods or for travelling, must pay the interest on that $50,000,000. They could get lower rates if they only had to pay fixed charges on $37,500,000. It seems to me that this can be accomplished by putting the stock on the open market and selling it at the highest figures that it will bring. The Americans are doing this. They are compelling some of the companies that come and ask permission to sell stock, to sell it at public auction, realizing that the smallest amount of stock that can be sold for the most money is the best bargain that can be made in the interest of the public. If that is being done in the United States, I do not see why it could not be done in Canada. I have never yet been able to see either the wisdom or the justice of allowing men controlling a public utility, for which we pay large sums of money, to sell stock at 170 or even 150 and put $50 out of every $100 into their own pockets; using it, not to give a better service to the public, but only to increase their own wealth, and imposing upon the public the necessity of paying higher freight and passenger rates in the future.

Mr. THOMAS CHISHOLM (East Huron). I just wish to say that the company could raise all the money it requires to extend its lines if it would sell all its land in the Northwest at a reasonable price. The land has been culled over until a great deal of it is of inferior quality, and the company is asking in some cases as much as $25 an acre for it. It is asking prices which the settlers cannot give, and in this way the company is retarding the progress of the country. Let the company sell the land at a reasonable price, and it can get all the millions that it requires to build all the branch lines needed in that western country.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee of supply.

Department of Inland Revenue — salaries, $87,700.

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs). This provides merely for the statutory increases and for six men of the outside service who have been brought into the inside.

Mr. SPROULE. The Government has been providing in the new Civil Service Act for increasing the salaries of the civil servants. Do they intend at the same time to keep up the old statutory increase?

Mr. PATERSON. I understand that the increases provided for in the Act will go on.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the minister mean the old statutory increase of $50 a year, to which every civil servant thought himself entitled, or the statutory increase provided for in the new law?

Mr. PATERSON. Under the old law, there is a provision for a statutory increase of $50. That is changed under the new law, and that $50 is included in this amount which we are asking now for next year.

Mr. SPROULE. Then will that statutory increase be continued or replaced by something else. Heretofore there was a very wide difference of opinion as to whether it was automatic or not. For a long time it was considered automatic, but ministers of this government have said that it was contingent on reports made by the deputy minister, and that even then each minister might exercise his judgment. The ex-Postmaster General (Sir Wm. Mulock) contended over and over again that he had no right to give these increases and did not give them for several years.

Mr. PATERSON. As a general rule the increase will be given unless there be some record of want of diligence. In cases where there is such a record it will not be given. But as a rule it will be regularly given until the maximum is reached.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any annual report on each official by the deputy head or only in cases where a report is asked for? If the statutory increase does not act automatically, there ought to be an annual report. If the increase is only given in such cases as the deputy head may recommend, injustice may be done to some official. There ought to be some fixed principle.

Mr. PATERSON. I understand from my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr.

Fisher), who is more familiar with the provisions of the new Act, that a report has to be made by the heads of the different branches every three months to the deputy head. The deputy head reports to the minister and his report also goes to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. T. J. STEWART (Hamilton West). Does the Act provide for a statutory increase of $50 per year to all the Custom house officers in the outside service ?

Mr. PATERSON. It applies to none of them.

Mr. T. W. CROTHERS (West Elgin). How are we to understand the operations of the Act of last year in conjunction with the Act which it is proposed to pass this session ? Here is an individual in the first division, subdivision A, whose salary last year was $2,700. Under the Civil Service Act, the minimum to which he would be entitled would be $2,800 in that division. I understand that $50 is the annual increase to which he will be entitled, beginning the first of September last. I would like to know whether, under the Act contemplated by the resolutions of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, this man will receive an additional sum of $150, making his salary this coming year $3,000, instead of $2,850.

Mr. FISHER. Did my hon. friend cite the case of a clerk at $2,700?

Mr. CROTHERS. His salary for 1908-9 was $2,700. It is proposed now to make it $2,850. I understand he is placed by the Civil Service Act of last session under subdivision A of the first division, of which the minimum salary is $2,800, and that his salary may go up, at an increase of $50 per year, until it reaches $4,000. $50 has been added to the $2,800, making his salary $2,850. My question is whether, under the Act foreshadowed by the resolutions of the Minister of Agriculture, this individual will have this year $150 in addition to the $2,850, making his salary $3,000 instead of $2,850. I understood the right hon. the leader of the government to say yesterday that such was the case.

Mr. FISHER. I do not know the individual case, but this appears to be a man who was in subdivision B of the first division this present fiscal year, because he is getting $2,700, which is $100 below the maximum of that division. Apparently the department intends promoting him to subdivision A of the first division at $2,800. This item is wrong because in the first division the statutory increase is $100 and not $50. However, I am informed that this $50 is for the six months at the rate of $100 increase each year. Therefore, although this gentleman is to be promoted to subdivision A of the first division and will get six months of the statutory increase of $100, he will practically get this fiscal year $2,850. He was in subdivision B of the first division on the first of September at $2,700. Under the resolution, to be eligible to get $150, he would be obliged to stay within his class, so that he would only get $100. Therefore, under the resolution before the House his salary on the first of September will be raised to $2,800 and he will have that until his promotion takes place into subdivision A of the first division, when he will have $2,800, which is the minimum of that division, and then would get his statutory increase of $100 per year in the ordinary course.

Mr. CROTHERS. The question I have asked is whether this particular individual will be entitled to the additional $150?

Mr. FISHER. I said he would get $100 of the $150 on the first of September because he could not go above the maximum of his class until promoted. He would then be promoted and would get the ordinary statutory increase of $100 per year, which is to be provided for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not seem to me that the Act is very clear, or else the explanation of the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Agriculture is wrong. My inquiry was whether the statutory increase was given automatically or whether it was contingent on something else. The answer was that it was contingent on a good report. To ascertain what is meant by that, let us turn to the Act. It is provided that the Civil Service shall be divided into two divisions, namely, the inside service and the outside service. The inside service is defined as consisting—

Of that part of the public service in or under the several departments of the executive government of Canada and of the Auditor General, the Clerk of the Privy Council, and the Governor General's secretary employed at the city of Ottawa, or at the Experimental Farm station or at the Dominion Astronomical observatory near Ottawa, but not including the officers, clerks and employees employed at Ottawa in the second or outside departmental division.

Now, when you turn to the Act to ascertain what record is to be kept of the employees, on which they are to qualify for increase, you find it provided that :

A record of the conduct and efficency of all officers, clerks and employees below the first division shall be kept in each department.

It appears by the first section that I have read that the first division is the inside service. And a record of all below this first division, or inside service, is to be kept. Surely that is not clear.

Mr. FISHER. It seems to me quite clear. Under section 3, there is a clear definition of what is meant by the inside service and what is meant by the outside service.

Mr. SPROULE. The inside service is the first division.

Mr. FISHER. No, it is the inside service, and the inside service is divided into divisions and subdivisions.

Mr. SPROULE. The Act clearly says 'The Civil Service shall be divided into two divisions,' and the first of these divisions is the inside service. And section 40 provides for a record of conduct and efficiency of officers, clerks and employees below the first division.

Mr. FISHER. That refers to divisions under section 5. If my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) will refer to that section, he will see that it defines the divisions and subdivisions.

Mr. FOSTER. If we are clear about that, let us understand this first case. As I understand it, this clerk comes under the Act in subdivision B and is getting a salary of $2,700.

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. He goes into subdivision A, the minimum salary of which is $2,800. That is, he receives an increase of $100 by that promotion. Does that reduce the other increase by $100 ?

Mr. FISHER. The general increase which we are now providing comes into force on September 1. At that date, this officer was in subdivision B at $2,700. Under the resolution which is now before the House, he gets as much off that $150 increase as his position in that subdivision permits—that is, he is not increased beyond the maximum of his sub-division.

Mr. FOSTER. So, he gets $100 ?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, because $2,800 is the maximum of the division. Then, apparently, it is the intention of the Minister of Inland Revenue—about which I know nothing—to promote him into subdivision A of the first division, the minimum salary of which is $2,800. Therefore, he will receive that salary on going into the new subdivision.

Mr. FOSTER. He, at that moment, receiving $2,800 ?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Or $2,850 ?

Mr. FISHER. No, $2,800. He will be promoted into the other subdivision, the minimum salary of which is the maximum salary of the other. But he will be eligible for the statutory increase, which, in the first division, is $100 a year. And apparently the accountant of the department has provided for that occurring half way through the next fiscal year, and has, therefore, only asked for $50 of the statutory increase instead of $100.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose this holds with all these employees. Now, the regular employees under the old Act were 36 in number ?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And the regular employees—so to call them for convenience sake—in this new schedule are still only 36.

Mr. FISHER. They are given here at 42.

Mr. PATERSON. Six from outside.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, six have been brought in. Now, I would like to analyse that in the case of this department and see where we are. Who are these who are brought in from outside ?

Mr. PATERSON. They were paid out of outside votes.

Mr. FOSTER. What were the names, and what were they getting?

Mr. PATERSON. Lewis is one, he was getting $600; and doing clerical work. Cantin was getting $500. Ekins was doing clerical work, and getting $600. Then there were two messengers, Bourgouin, who is getting $750, and L. Roy, who is getting $500. Then there is provision made for Davidson, another messenger, at $500.

Mr. FOSTER. Provision made for a vacancy is not the addition of an outside man. Here you are taking in a number of outside men.

Mr. PATERSON. We are making provision for the appointment of another.

Mr. FOSTER. You have only transferred five men from the outside, now you want to add an extra man as messenger. How long had these five clerks been in the employ of the department?

Mr. PATERSON. Over a year.

Mr. FOSTER. All of them?

Mr. PATERSON. I would not be sure.

Mr. FOSTER. We would like to be sure. This is a test case of the working out of this aggregation of laws.

Mr. PATERSON. Bourgouin has been on since June, 1903. I will get the rest of the information for the hon. gentleman during the evening.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is an error in having it six, it should be five; then the one ought to be in the other column. In the next, the laboratory, you had eleven men, who seems all to have been brought in from the outside, and in the chief technical engineer's branch the same. The same in the weights and measures, the same in the methylated spirits. I would like some information on all these. The minister may think this is calling for a good deal, but this is on a special occasion, and we would like to see how the thing is working out.

Mr. PATERSON. These are brought in under Act of Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. But how will we know that all sorts of irregularities have not taken place in bringing them in? Now we are putting them where they go on the establishment, where they have a regular status, where they can get all the advantages of the Civil Service Act. We want to know how they got in. We know that when they were in there last they came in through the door of examinations, and were regularly appropriated for. Here you are putting thirty-two new clerks on, and we want to know their status and standing before we translate them to this haven of rest.

Mr. PATERSON. Supposing you knew that, what good would it do? Under the law we are instructed to bring these men into the inside service, and we do that, even if they have only been on six months or three months.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister says he was compelled by law to bring in these six men. There were only five, and they wish to smuggle in another.

Mr. PATERSON. No provision was made for him last year. I will get the information the hon. gentleman asks for. But I will ask the hon. gentleman to note this. Take, for instance, the laboratory branch, where you have eleven men who have been paid out of outside votes. Parliament passed a law that these should be brought into the inside service, and we are simply carrying out the law and bringing them in. Now, does it matter whether these men have been in the outside service fifteen years, or one year, so far as carrying out the law is concerned? Must they not come in, and if so, what will be the value of these particulars the hon. gentleman is asking for?

Mr. FOSTER. What the law says in effect is that the men who have been in bona fide employ in the outside parts of the departments here, should be taken on at the salaries they have had. That may be done in many different ways. I am not saying this is not all proper and straightforward, but the question already put has brought out one fact, that you claim six men and you only had five.

Mr. PATERSON. We have a provision for that.

Mr. FOSTER. You are putting on a new man. In the same way, we would like to know with reference to these others.

Mr. PATERSON. Supposing I admit that this is a fact, that this one should have been put in the other column? No provision was made in the estimates of last year. Still I press my question on the hon. gentleman. I suppose that I could give the particulars with regard to each of these officers of the department. They have been bona fide in the service, but paid for out of the outside votes. Under the reorganization they will be bound to be brought in no matter whether their term of service has been for one, or five, or seven years. Therefore, I was asking the hon. gentleman whether any good purpose would be served by getting these particulars,—I do not object—as to how long each one of these had been in the service. Supposing he had been only a year, we would still have to bring him in under the law.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose he had only been in one day?

Mr. PATERSON. Well, that would be running pretty close.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be running close, but it would be doing more than that; it would be showing a piece of sharp practice on the part of the minister.

Mr. PATERSON. It would depend on whether there was a necessity for the services of the officer when he came in.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, there is no need taking up an hour quarrelling over this. If the minister promises that we shall have the information let him give it to us pleasantly and we will get along all the better.

Mr. PATERSON. Is there any other information you want?

Mr. FOSTER. That is all I see at the present time.

Mr. PATERSON. Shall we pass this item?

Mr. FOSTER. Better get the information.

Mr. PATERSON. Shall we take the next item?

Mr. FOSTER. I imagine we will run up against the same thing with every other minister. I do not believe there is a minister prepared to give the information as to the hundreds and hundreds of men they are putting on the outside list. I propose to ask each minister, and I suppose that when I do each minister will reply that he does not know a blessed thing about it.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think that is quite a fair statement of the case.

Mr. FOSTER. It may not apply to them all.

Mr. FISHER. Personally I would be prepared to give the hon. gentleman that information. There are about 200 of my officers who have been paid out of the lump vote for the outside service but who have been working here in Ottawa and doing exactly the same kind of work as those in the inside service. By the Act of last session these people were all brought in. I confess that I did not have prepared a statement of all these officers and of their duties, but I will have it prepared.

Mr. PATERSON. You will find it in the Civil Service list.

Mr. FISHER. No, I confess that they will not be found in the Civil Service list.

Mr. PATERSON. In my department they will be.

Mr. FISHER. In mine they will not be. They were not in the inside service and they were not in the outside service according to the Act.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, this is a thing which, when it is once done, is done.

Mr. FISHER. I quite agree with that, but I do not think it is quite fair for my hon. friend to intimate that because we have not that information off hand we are trying to force the thing through. Knowing what the hon. gentleman wants I will have the information for him when the items are taken up. Perhaps it would be well to take up these items and discover what information is required and then we can leave them over until that information is obtained.

Mr. PATERSON. What shall we do meanwhile?

Mr. FOSTER. Go on with other government business that is ready.

Mr. PATERSON. We have this ready.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not seem so.

Mr. PATERSON. Is there any information wanted about the Inland Revenue vote?

Mr. FOSTER. Is there anything more than the general vote?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. FOSTER. This is for clerical assistance?

Mr. PATERSON. There is no change whatever. Suppose we go on to outside service of the Inland Revenue Department and see if anything is wanted there.

Mr. FOSTER. If the minister wishes it, although I suppose we will have the real man back here some day. Why not take the minister's own department—Customs?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. PATERSON. There the same question will arise, I suppose.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, take the outside service.

Mr. PATERSON. The Deputy Minister of the Department of Inland Revenue has been granted leave of absence; I think he is going away on Thursday and I thought that perhaps you would allow his estimates to pass.

Mr. FOSTER. If you take up his estimates we will go through them.

Excise—salaries of officers and inspectors of excise, &c., to provide for increases depending upon the result of excise examinations, $426,-400.05.

Mr. CROTHERS. Would the minister give us the particulars of that?

Mr. PATERSON. There is an increase of $9,277.49. This represents the regular statutory increases.

Mr. BARR. What will be the result if these officers do not pass the excise examinations?

Mr. PATERSON. They will not get promotion unless they pass.

Mr. BARR. Then, of course, the money will remain in the treasury?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. This $9,000 is simply for statutory increases for the present staff? Are there any additions?

Mr. PATERSON. No, I understand not.

Mr. FOSTER. This simply provides for the statutory increases which will come to the different officers after proper examination?

Mr. PATERSON. That is as I understand it.

Mr. J. ARTHURS. (Parry Sound). I find on page 23 that $31,307.93 has been accounted for as for the services of men brought from the outside to the inside service. This increase of $9,277 would apparently be added to that making a total increase of $40,584.93.

Mr. PATERSON. No, that would not be connected with this. This is excise. There are none of the other items apparently in which there are any increases, so that there would not seem to be much room for explantation. It seems to be a very carefully prepared estimate : the vote has been kept down in every item except where it has been increased by statutory increase.

Mr. FOSTER. The increase is not heavy.

Travelling expenses, rent, fuel, stationery, &c., $90,000.

Mr. FOSTER. We would like to have this item divided into its various heads.

Mr. PATERSON. I could not do that off hand.

Item allowed to stand.

Stamps for imported and Canadian tobacco, $85,000.

Mr. PATERSON. Those are the stamps for placing on the tobacco. About that amount of money is required each year.

Mr. FOSTER. Where are those printed?

Mr. PATERSON. In Ottawa under contract.

Mr. FOSTER. What is this item of commissions?

Mr. PATERSON. As I understand the vote for the year before was $70,000 and this was spent within a few hundred dollars, and it is estimated that this year they will require this amount, but they cannot say how much will be left of the $85,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the commission?

Mr. PATERSON. This is the commission paid to collectors of customs for duty collected by them, some $10,000; and a small item of $100 to the postmasters in Quebec who sell these twist tobacco stamps.

Mr. FOSTER. I was counting that commission in as part of the $85,000, but it is a vote by itself. Then I find all that was spent for the stamps was $69,577 in 1907-8.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, that is right.

Mr. FOSTER. What has been spent this year up to the present time?

Mr. PATERSON. We ought to be able to tell that but we cannot tell you how much was spent in the whole year.

Mr. FOSTER. But you can tell how much was spent until now on an estimate. It may be that the tobacco business has grown so that you require $15,000 more for stamps. That would be a pretty rapid growth.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, it is growing. It can be got if the hon. gentleman insists upon it. I will try to have it after recess.

Mr. FOSTER. There is another point. You have a vote of $10,000 to pay collectors. In 1907-8 all you spent was $4,800. How is it that you want a little more than double that this year?

At six o'clock, Committee reported progress, and House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at 8 o'colck.

SECOND READINGS.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

Stamps for imported and Canadian tobacco, $85,000.

Hon. Wm. PATERSON. (Minister of Customs.) I presume my deputy is getting the information asked for before recess and is not here yet. Could we not pass the In-Inland Revenue items and give the information on other items?

Mr. FOSTER. It is hardly fair to ask the House to pass a million dollars or more just on good will. The minister should have made himself acquainted with his estimates, or should have had the deputy ready.

Mr. PATERSON. I am referring to the item under 'Civil Government.' That is not a million dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister has not the information.

Mr. PATERSON. It will be here.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the minister wants us to pass the estimate and take the information afterwards?

Mr. PATERSON. All I ask is to close up this item 14, and then we will go on with Customs or Justice.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, if the minister has the information about these outside men we will go into that.

Mr. PATERSON. That was all that was asked for, and it will be here.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, let it stand until the information is ready.

Mr. PATERSON. But it keeps so many other items back. And what is the use?

Mr. FOSTER. The minister should have his work ready.

Mr. PATERSON. It was not anticipated that such questions would be asked.

Mr. FOSTER. Any deputy with a head on his shoulders, or any minister in charge of the estimates might have anticipated that such questions would be asked.

Mr. PATERSON. The deputy has a head on his shoulders, and so has the minister, and neither anticipated that—

Mr. FOSTER. Then it is time they did.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Before the item is finally passed, I would like to get some information with regard to this sum of $60,000 to enable the department to supply methylated spirits

Mr. PATERSON. We are proposing to let that stand in the meantime.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Item 94 stands. Resuming item 14, Department of Inland Revenue

Mr. FOSTER. The minister will see that we are up against the same difficulty as in item 294. The minister has not the information, and the deputy is not here. If the minister has any item ready, let us take that up, and wait until the deputy comes. Perhaps the Minister of Customs' own estimates are ready.

Mr. PATERSON. I explained the reason why I wanted to get this through. Of course, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), does not sympathize with it, all right. The deputy has been given leave of absence on account of impaired health, and this is the last night he can be here. I thought it would not be too much that the question asked might be allowed to remain, the information to be supplied by the department.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there nobody who can give the information?

Mr. FOSTER. No, no one ready.

Mr. PATERSON. No one is ready with such information as has been asked for, because nobody anticipated that such information was either necessary or desirable. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) is ready to go on with his estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. If the ministers are not ready, we cannot do business.

Mr. PATERSON. The ministers are ready to answer anything that will serve any good end.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the minister see that we are doing here what has not been done before within my memory?—We are adding six or seven hundred names to the establishment. Does the minister expect us to pass such votes without asking questions? Why, it is simply absurd. I do not think there is another minister who would ask us to do that.

Mr. PATERSON. This is not a case of six or seven hundred names. In this item, we are adding five names, and these are simply taken in from the outside service. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), asks the names. I do not object to that. But what purpose will such information serve? I ask the hon. gentleman that question. If any saving of money were proposed, or if there were any ground of legitimate criticism, it would be different. But such questions, as I say, were not anticipated. We say we will get the information. Of course, if the hon. gentleman will not allow me to go on, I cannot go on.

Civil government—administration of justice—salaries, $94,648.75.

Mr. SPROULE. There is a large increase here.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). The increase is merely apparent, not real; it is caused by the transfer of the salaries of a number of officials from different portions of the estimates to their present position. Under the amending Civil Service Act, the inspectors of penitentiaries, whose salaries were $3,100, are now called clerks in the first division, subdivision A., and their salaries are provided for in the third item on page 12 under the head 'Administration of Justice'—two clerks at $3,150. Before the statute of last session, that amount of $6,300 would have appeared under the head of 'Penitentiaries.' The increase is only the $50 statutory increase.

Mr. FOSTER. The names are Stewart and Dawson?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. Yes, Mr. D. Stewart, and Mr. G. W. Dawson. In the same way, Mr. W. P. Archibald, the Dominion Parole Officer, was receiving a salary of $2,000. He was provided for previously under the head of the Penitentiaries Branch. He becomes a clerk in the first division, subdivision B. The effect is to increase his salary by $100, $2,100 being the figure in that class. That is one case of an actual increase in the Department of Justice under the new classification. There are, I believe, seven such cases altogether in the department.

Mr. FOSTER. How much of a flat increase will he get?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I presume, though I speak without consideration, that he would be entitled to the full amount of the flat increase in addition to his salary. I ought not to make that answer without referring to the terms of the Civil Service Act. It depends whether or not he is at the maximum of his class. Then E. J. Adams, architect, penitentiaries branch, is another official who was previously provided for under the head of penitentiaries. He now becomes a clerk in the second division of subdivision A, at the same salary as before.

Mr. FOSTER. What is his present salary?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. $1,650, there is no change. He was not classified until this year. He has now been classified in the second division, subdivision A, at the same salary as he had before. These four officers had salaries aggregating $9,850, and that is an apparent increase of that amount in the salaries of the Justice Department, whereas in truth it is merely a transfer in the estimates from one branch of the service to another. Then four clerks, by the operation of the recent statute, have become permanent clerks, whereas they were previously temporary, and provided for under the head of contingencies. These are T. Morris, $800 ; Miss L. M. Pillar, $550 ; a messenger Jobin, $700, and another messenger Hamel, $273.75. These are not cases of increase, but simply of transference from temporary employees to the permanent service.

Mr. FOSTER. What do they get when they come in ?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. The figures I have given. They are provided for in the items mentioned on page 12, under the head of Administration of Justice.

Mr. FOSTER. It reads there, $637.50 instead of $550.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I am not sure whether the $637.50 item in the printed estimates is intended for Miss Pillar or not. If it is, as is possible, it is the annual increase which she would be entitled to before the end of twelve months, added to this $550.

Mr. FOSTER. The annual increase then would be $87.50. How do you make that out ?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. Assuming that the $637.50 is intended for Miss Pillar, it would be an increase of $87.50 over the $550 at which she stood on the 1st of September last ; and it is to be accounted for, I suspect, by the circumstance that she is intended to be recommended for a special increase under the statute, $50 in addition to the statutory increase, that is an annual increase on the whole of $100, and this $87.50 would be the fraction of that amount for the portion of the year after the anniversary of her entrance into the service would arrive. Then the two messengers stand at the same figures exactly as they were receiving previously.

Mr. FOSTER. $75 was added.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. One was $273.75 which, with the statutory increase, would now be $323.75. One was $700, and $775 was intended to cover his salary. I do not know any reason for the $75 as distinguished from $50. I am not able at the moment to explain why that is $775.

Mr. FOSTER. One question with reference to the last four, when they were appointed to the service, or if they had been in the service for more than a year.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. They were made permanent on the 1st of September last. When they entered the service I am not able to state without reference to papers that I have not with me. They were all in it when I took charge, and had been for some time. My statement that they were in it when I took charge is, I think, not applicable to the messenger Hamel. He is a boy, who was taken into the service by the deputy a year or more ago. He was there before the 1st of September, I cannot state when he came in. Then a further circumstance accounting for that apparent increase between last year's total vote and this year's, is in the increases which have been attendant upon the new reorganization scheme. Those increases aggregate $900, or $1,000 it will be, because one of the propositions which I had made when the brief from which I am speaking was prepared, has not been carried out.

These increases are, first, Mr. F. H. Gisborne, who, before the classification of last September, was receiving $2,450. He has been graded in the first division, subdivision A, at a salary of $2,800, which, with the statutory increase, would be the $2,875 item in the first division, subdivision A, in the printed estimates. Mr. Gisborne is a barrister who has been a first-class clerk, or chief clerk under the old system in the department for many years. I do not remember exactly when he entered the service, but it was in the time of Sir John Thompson, eighteen or twenty years ago. Then, Mr. Chisholm, another gentleman of whom exactly the same thing can be said, a qualified barrister and discharging very important duties in the way of examining and certifying titles to properties which are bought for government purposes throughout the country, was recommended by me to council for grading in the first division, subdivision A, but that recommendation has not been acted upon and he remains classified in accordance with the salary which he was receiving on the 1st September last; that was a salary of $2,000. He has been graded as in the first division, subdivision B, at a salary of $2,100; so that there will be an increase of $100 to him, an increase of $350 to Mr. Gisborne, $150 to Mr. Coté, who is the registrar of applications for clemency in the case of criminals, and who was receiving $1,950, but who goes into the first division, subdivision B, and so receives a salary of $2,100. Mr. Narraway, accountant of the department, received $1,900 before last September, he has been graded in subdivision B of the first division and now receives $2,100. He will thereby receive an increase of $200. Miss Asselstine, stenographer, penitentiary branch, was receiving $800 before September; she is classified in subdivision A of the third division at $900, so that she will have an increase of $100. Mr. Archibald, parole officer, who was previously receiving $2,000 is now graded in subdivision B of the first division and will receive $2,100. These increases, by reason of the new classification, aggregate $1,000. Then, the difference between the figure of last year and that of this year is further accounted for by the statutory increases which I have detailed and which aggregate $1,225. Coming to the courts, which are now made branches of the department to the extent of being included in the classification under the new Civil Service Act, we have to some extent, the same thing occurring as in the department proper. There is an increase to Mr. L. W. Coutlee, the assistant reporter.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the minister take them in the order in which they are given here?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. This is the only increase by reason of the new classification. Following them in the order in which they are given here, the first item of $4,000 used to be statutory. It is now provided for in this vote. It provides for the registrar of the court. There is no change. The next two, in the first division of subdivision B, are the two reporters of the Supreme Court. There is an increase of $200 to Mr. Coutlee by reason of the reclassification. He had been receiving $1,900, he is now to receive $2,100, being graded in the first division of subdivision B. In the second division, subdivision A, are Mr. Lawson and Mr. Bligh, clerks in the Supreme Court, in whose case there is no change.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the salary of the other reporter?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. Mr. Masters, senior reporter, was receiving $2,350 before September 1. There is no change. There are no other changes otherwise in the Supreme Court. In the case of all the other officials of the court they are graded in accordance with the salaries they were receiving on 1st September last.

Mr. FOSTER. They are the same as before?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. The same individuals and the same salaries in each case. The same thing is true of the Exchequer Court. The salary of the registrar, which is $3,000, is not changed in amount, but it used to be provided for under the statute. Now it is included under Civil Government, otherwise there is no change. The same individuals are continued at the same salaries respectively being graded in accordance with the amounts they were previously receiving.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you also take the Dominion Police?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. The Dominion Police, I should have mentioned, are in the same position as the two courts.

Mr. FOSTER. Who are these two officers?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. The commissioner, Mr. Sherwood, provided for previously by statute, was receiving, I think, $2,950 previously and is now receiving $3,050 by a statutory increase of $100 from the 1st October. The other officer is Mr. Cawdron, whose salary was previously part of the Dominion Police appropriation and who is now to be provided for under Civil Government. He was getting $1,300 before and by the statutory increase from the 1st April he will be entitled to $1,350.

Mr. FOSTER. What are his duties?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. His duties are largely clerical as secretary and factotum of the commissioner, he and the commissioner constituting the staff except for the men on the force.

Contingencies, $10,400.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. The explanation of the decrease of $2,100 in this item is that the return which I had the honour to present to-day in regard to paroled prisoners was provided for in that $2,600.

Mr. FOSTER. You are not anticipating such another this time?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. No.

Department of Inland Revenue—salaries (including A. McGill at $3,000), $87,700.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman asked for the names of the six temporary employees who were transferred. They are:

Name.	Date of Appointment.	Salary.
J. W. Z. Cantin	Aprll 1, 1908	500
H. B. Lewis	Nov. 22, 1907	600
E. G. E. Kins	Dec. 20, 1907	600
E. Bourgeois	June 30, 1903	750
L. Roy	Feb. 1, 1908	500
A. S. Lyon	July 9, 1908	500

Mr. FOSTER. Had Cantin and Roy passed the Civil Service examinations?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. J. D. REID. To what positions were they appointed ?

Mr. PATERSON. One was a messenger and the other a clerk.

Mr. FOSTER. Are there any other increases in that statement. other than the statutory increases outside of the additional salaries of those six ?

Mr. PATERSON. No. The deputy says there were two increases one from $800 to $900 and the other from $850 to $900, Miss Griffith and Miss Baird.

Mr. FOSTER. They came by virtue of the classsification ?

Mr. PATERSON. By virtue of the Act. I am safe to say that there are no increases except under the Act and the ordinary statutory increases.

I was also asked for the names of the 11 laboratory employees with their classifications, salaries and dates of appointment. They are as follows :

Name.	Classification.	Date of Appointment.	Salary.
			$ cts.
A. McGill (chief analyst)	1st Div. Subdiv. A	July, 1887	3,000 00
A. Lemoine	2nd " B	July, 1901	1,200 00
J. A. G. Valin	2nd " B	January, 1901	1,200 00
E. L. C. Forster	2nd " B	July, 1908	1,250 00
C. C. Forward	2nd " B	August, 1908	1,250 00
E. Davidson	3rd " A	June 1902	900 00
S. E. Wright	3rd " A	October, 1893	900 00
E. Belisle	3rd " A	August, 1905	1,000 00
A. C. Macfarlane	3rd " A	March, 1907	900 00
J. A. Rickey	3rd " A	June, 1907	1,000 00
J. Ladouceur	3rd " A	April, 1902	900 00
			13,500 00

Mr. FOSTER. Did these go in at exactly the same salaries they were receiving?

Mr. PATERSON. They went in at the same. Of course, the statutory increase is always understood.

Mr. FOSTER. Why are there two additions?

Mr. PATERSON. The two extra assistant analysts were required and passed their examination before the Inland Revenue Board.

Mr. FOSTER. What extra work was put upon them?

Mr. PATERSON. The staff was short owing to the death of Mr. Macfarlane. Mr. McGill was promoted to Mr. Macfarlane's place, and the additional work necessitated these two appointments.

Chief electrical engineer's branch, $6,900.

Mr. PATERSON. There are six there. Does the hon. gentleman want the names and salaries of these?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON. O. Higman at $2,800. The hon. gentleman knows that he has been a long time in the service. In July, 1901, J. A. Whyte, at $1,200; in June, 1906, C. J. Evans, at $950; in January, 1908, N. R. Cole, at $900; in May, 1908, E. D. K. Matthews, at $550; in January, 1908, M. E. E. McKell, at $500.

Mr. FOSTER. What were these men appointed to do? What is their particular work? How is it you have had to add so largely to the electrical branch?

Mr. PATERSON. Mr. Whyte is inspector of gas metres; Evans is a mechanical expert; McKell is a stenographer.

Mr. FOSTER. The information I wanted to get was this: You have added three to the electrical engineering branch during 1908, making six altogether. What is the extra work which has made it necessary to double the staff?

Mr. PATERSON. Three of them were temporary and were paid out of contingencies. There is no additional staff.

Mr. FOSTER. Although they were paid out of contingencies three of them were appointed in 1908. They were not working before that. How did you happen to double the staff in 1908?

Mr. PATERSON. Simply because of an increase of work.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not enough. Can you not find out what it was?

Mr. PATERSON. A general increase in the work of the department all the time. The deputy cannot specify.

Mr. FOSTER. This is electrical engineering work; what is the work they do?

Mr. PATERSON. Two of these mechanical experts adjust scales and metres. Formerly they were sent to outside places to do the work, but it is thought better to have it done in the department.

Mr. FOSTER. That disposes of two. What about the other one?

Mr. PATERSON. One is a stenographer.

Mr. FOSTER. The expense of examining and testing them before was paid out of contingencies, I suppose?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, so I understand.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the department find that by employing the two the work is done at a cheaper rate or in a better way?

Mr. PATERSON. The work is better done.

Weights and Measures inspection branch, $5,000.

Mr. PATERSON. This covers the salaries of James Fyfe, first division, subdivision A, salary $2,800. E. C. Way, appointed in May, 1908, 3rd division, salary $800. Mrs. L. Barbeau, 3rd division, appointed August, 1906, salary $500. T. Burgess, lower grade, appointed August, 1892, salary $900.

Mr. FOSTER. What necessitated the addition of Mr. Wade in May, 1908?

Mr. PATERSON. He is a thoroughly trained scale inspector, and the department thought they were fortunate in securing his services. Mrs. Barbeau is a typewriter and Mr. Burgess is a carpenter. In the methylated spirits, W. Armstrong, superintendent of warehouse, gets $2,000, appointed June, 1887. F. Parent, $1,200, appointed in May, 1891. James Hogan, warehouseman, appointed 1902, $900. F. H. Popham, assistant warehouseman, $750, appointed July, 1904.

Travelling expenses, rent, stationery &c., $90,000.

Mr. PATERSON. The items of this expense will be found in the excise report, page 136.

Mr. FOSTER. How much has been expended, so far, out of that amount ?

Mr. PATERSON. I cannot give the hon. gentleman that information.

Stamps for imported and Canadian tobacco, $85,000.

Mr. PATERSON. Up to November 30, the amount expended for tobacco stamps was $53,588.52, or at the rate of $82,482.80 for the present year. The demand for stamps cannot be calculated definitely, and sufficient stamps must be kept on hand to meet all possible demands of the trade. Of course, any unexpended part of the vote lapses at the end of the year.

Mr. FOSTER. The expenditure on stamps seems to be increasing rapidly.

Mr. PATERSON. Only through the increase of tobacco manufacture, I think.

To pay Collectors of Customs for duty collected by them, 1908-9, $10,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I see that in 1907-8 only $4,281 was expended. How is it that $10,000 is required ?

Mr. PATERSON. The years overlap the accounts do not come in, and some must be paid out of the next year. The amount given can hardly be taken as the yearly expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. What amount has been expended so far this year ?

Mr. PATERSON. Nothing. The accounts will not come in until the end of the year.

Mr. FOSTER. If they come in at the end of the year, then this $4,281 must represent what was paid for 1907-8.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, unless some came into the next year. They take amply sufficient in this vote to cover that.

Mr. FOSTER. That is it—the vote seems very large in proportion to the amount expended.

To enable the department to supply methylated spirits to manufacturers, the cost of which will be recouped by the manufacturers to whom it is supplied, and to pay for rent, light, power, freight, salaries, &c., $60,000.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is this to supply the users of methylated spirits with cheap material ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What does it cost the government to make it, and at what rate is it supplied to manufacturers ?

Mr. PATERSON. It is sold at actual cost of manufacture—53 cents a gallon.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many manufacturers use it ?

Mr. PATERSON. Hundreds of them—it is used very generally.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Have experiments been made with a view to furnishing agriculturists with a cheaper grade of methylated spirits or denatured alcohol ? I do not need to tell the minister of the opportunities afforded agriculturists in many of the countries of the world to procure cheap denatured alcohol for use as a source of power on the farm.

Mr. PATERSON. This is the cheapest the government has been able to produce, and, as the price is dearer than that of gasolene, gasolene meanwhile, keeps the lead.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. But, if it can be made in Germany at 20 cents or 25 cents a gallon, is there any reason why we should not carry on experiments with a view to supplying it at a similar price ?

Mr. PATERSON. I am told that if you allow for the difference in the gallon measure of the two countries, it is not sold cheaper in the United States than here. In Germany, it is made out of potatoes, and the labour employed is paid wages that would not do for our people.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The only place of manufacture is Ottawa ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does not the minister think it would be wise to manufacture in other places, for instance, in the Northwest ? The charges for freight from Ottawa to distant parts of the country must be enormous.

Mr. PATERSON. That is under consideration, I believe. There are no spirits, I think, manufactured in the Northwest, and the freight would be the same on that as on methylated.

Mr. MILLER. One reason why the spirit is sold in Germany at a lower price than in Canada is that the German government pays a bounty on the production there, and that lessens the price to the consumer in Germany.

Mr. BLAIN. Is this a new idea on the part of the government, to supply methylated spirits to the manufacturer at cost?

Mr. PATERSON. No, we have done it for a great many years.

Mr. BLAIN. How much was expended last year?

Mr. PATERSON. About $46,000.

Mr. STAPLES. Can the minister tell us what is the customs duty on methylated spirits?

Mr. PATERSON. If it comes in under the head of spirits, $2.14 per gallon.

Mr. STAPLES. Have any experiments been made with it as a motive power to take the place of gasolene?

Mr. PATERSON. I am not aware that there have been any experiments made in this country, and the deputy doubts if there have been any made in the United States. Gasolene is cheaper.

Mr. STAPLES. I understand that experiments have been made in other countries, and that they have proved satisfactory. I am seeking this information on account of the manner in which gasolene has been utilized as a motive power in the west. We are rapidly working into gasolene ploughing, and things of that kind, and if we could get methylated spirits in free of duty it would be a great advantage to the agriculturists of the west. If the government would allow me to make a suggestion, I think it would be well for them to experiment along those lines and ascertain what its value would be as a motive power.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Power-ploughing is the coming system of ploughing, but power-ploughing when done by steam entails very heavy machinery. If you could do power-ploughing by gasolene or alcohol the machinery is much lighter, and you get over the whole difficulty of supplying a power plant with water and with fuel. The great trouble in power-ploughing now is to get water to the engine, and to get fuel to the engine. But if we could have gasolene or alcohol at a cheap rate there is no doubt the whole system of ploughing would be revolutionized, to the great advantage of the agriculturists. The suggestion made by my hon. friend (Mr. Staples) is well worth the attention of the government.

Mr. PATERSON. That is quite true, and if anything cheaper than gasolene could be found, it would be a great advantage. Methylated spirits at the present price cannot compete with gasolene.

Mr. STAPLES. If you have not made the experiment it would be well worth a trial. There is a large appropriation asked for here, some $60,000; I think it would be well to spend a portion of that in experimenting along those lines.

Mr. MILLER. As I understand it, that this $60,000 all goes back again, that is the cost of producing methylated spirits that are sold to manufacturers for manufacturing purposes. The United States government, for nearly ten years, have been taking a deep and active interest in the question of denatured alcohol for such purposes as the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples), and the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) have mentioned. In the United States they can manufacture denatured alcohol cheaper than we can manufacture it in Canada from any of the sources from which we now do manufacture it. If we could manufacture it as they do in Germany, from potatoes, or in France, from sugar beets, we might perhaps produce it more cheaply than we do now from grain. But the United States can produce the ethyl alcohol from corn much cheaper than we can produce it from the grains we have in this country. They are experimenting in aid of agriculture, and have experts who for years have been carrying on special experiments along that line. It seems to me that it would be perhaps more prudent that our government should not spend any money for a year or two, but wait the results of experiments that are being carried on across the line.

Mr. STAPLES. I may say to my hon. friend (Mr. Miller) that if they have been experimenting with corn and such grain as they can grow to advantage in the United States, why can we not experiment with the grain we are growing in this country? I think it is not asking too much in the interest of agriculture to expend a portion of this large amount for that purpose. I would suggest that until we are able to produce methylated spirits in this country we should not exact such an enormous duty. Why not let this in from Germany, and let us have the benefit of it in the west until such time as you can put on the market a commodity that will answer the purpose for which we desire it.

Mr. PATERSON. There would be great danger in the matter of revenue, and there might be in other directions too, if you were to let it in free.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. But the minister must see that cheap alcohol, outside of all questions of drink, is being used more and more in the industries, whether it be in the shape of methylated spirits, or used as a preservative, or in connection with science. I find an agitation all over the country, and you find it in the scientific press of other countries. The demand for cheap alcohol for industrial and other purposes is increasing, and it is well worthy the attention of the government whether we should not try and give the public cheaper alcohol than we do at the present time. I know there is a danger to the revenue, and that would have to be guarded against. But the American government have come to the conclusion that it is necessary for them, and that it is their duty to find a way of producing cheap alcohol for industrial uses.

Mr. HERRON. Many requests come from my part of the country appealing to the minister to take off the duty on methylated spirits. I believe that if it were not for the enormous restrictions put on by this government it would be manufactured to a greater extent in the western country. The people there think it very strange that they should have to pay such an enormous price for this article that could be manufactured from the refuse of the products of the farm that are now practically going to waste. Potatoes, frozen and damaged grain and even straw could be utilized for this purpose. I think it would be well worth the serious consideration of the government to see if there could not be some means taken to permit of the manufacture of these products in the west. I hope the minister will think it over seriously.

Mr. PATERSON. The department are closely watching all the experiments that are being tried in the United States. As far as I am aware none of them has been successful yet. In reference to the production of the Northwest, if there were a distillery there that was producing alcohol the department could easily permit the manufacture of methylated spirits, but I understand that alcohol is not produced in the west yet, and that until it is done I do not know how you could reduce the cost.

Weights and measures, gas and electric light inspection—salaries of officers, inspectors and assistant inspectors of weights and measures, $72,500.

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase of $4,650.

Mr. PATERSON. That is due to new appointments and small increases of salary granted to deserving officials and in no case exceeding $100.

Mr. FOSTER. What are the new appointments?

Mr. PATERSON. J. F. Bugeaud and A. B. Caldwell, appointed January 1, 1908, at $400 each.

Mr. FOSTER. Where are their districts?

Mr. PATERSON. Gaspé. H. Spicer and J. C. Thompson appointed at Winnipeg at salaries of $600 each. They are down for $100 more, so that they will be increased to $700.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the minister know the receipts of the Weights and Measures Department as compared with the expenses, and do the receipts come any where near paying the expenses?

Mr. PATERSON. The total revenue collected during 1908 was $83,021.32 as against $54,927.26 for the nine months ending March 31, 1907, and the total expenditure for 1908 was $101,492.24 as against $69,466.15 during the nine months ending March 31, 1907. So that it runs about that much of a deficit year by year.

Salaries of gas and electric light inspectors, $39,200.

Mr. PATERSON. The increase is due to new appointments and small increases in salaries.

Mr. J. D. REID. Who are some of the new appointees?

Mr. PATERSON. Mr. H. Fraser of Belleville, who was appointed on January 2, 1908; his present salary is $1,000. Mr. Renahan of Toronto, appointed March 1, 1908, at a salary of $900; and Mr. Roche of Ottawa, who was a temporary employee, but has been made permanent.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. How many inspectors of electric light meters are there?

Mr. PATERSON. About sixty altogether of gas and electric light.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The public are complaining about the inspection of electric meters. They have no knowledge that there are government officials who will inspect them, and it is complained that many companies through the country have their meters set to run fast.

Mr. PATERSON. The meters must all be inspected, I believe, on installation, and if any complaint is made subsequently it is attended to by an inspector. If the charge is not sustained, the person making the complaint pays for the inspection, and if it is well founded the company pays for the inspection.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. A great many of these instruments are imported from the United States. Have the instruments to pass inspection by the government before they pass customs?

Mr. PATERSON. No. They must be inspected before they are installed.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. In towns?

Mr. PATERSON. Under the Inspection Act, any place.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. If I owned a plant in a town of 5,000, imported my meters from Pittsburg and installed them in the houses myself, what protection is there for the public against these instruments?

Mr. PATERSON. You would be liable to a penalty.

Mr. BARR. Does that extend to villages?

Mr. PATERSON. Everywhere. For the year 1908, 41,062 were verified. Every five years I believe they are inspected.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wish to support my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. J. A. Currie) in the position he has taken in regard to this matter. In some of the smaller towns we experience trouble in getting the inspector to come and investigate the condition of the electric light plants and inspect the meters. In the town where I live we have trouble now and have had for some months, and the man who manages the plant in that town informs me that he has several times asked the inspector to come down from London and inspect the meters for him, but has been unable to get him to come.

Mr. PATERSON. Will the hon. gentleman give the name of the place so that the officer can be communicated with?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Petrolea, Ont.

Mr. PATERSON. That will be attended to by the deputy.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe). The question I asked has not been answered—how many electrical inspectors are there besides the gas inspectors?

Mr. PATERSON. The same men act in both capacities.

Mr. CURRIE. They must be good men, for it takes a high grade electrical engineer to inspect an electric meter.

Mr. PATERSON. It is a mechanical test, I understand.

Mr. J. D. REID. Who is the last inspector appointed?

Mr. PATERSON. Major Harris was appointed in January, 1908.

Mr. J. D. REID. What was he doing before he was appointed?

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know.

Mr. J. D. REID. Where did he come from?

Mr. PATERSON. Brockville, I understand.

Mr. J. D. REID. Perhaps the Minister of Railways and Canals can tell us who this man was or what he was doing.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know what he was doing immediately before his appointment, but he was a graduate of McGill University in electrical engineering and took very high honours. He had experience on the Pacific coast and was manager of the Brockville electric light for one year.

Metric system, to provide for the delivery of lectures and the publication of maps, charts, pamphlets, &c., $3,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What is being done in the way of lectures?

Mr. PATERSON. Nothing for the last two years.

Mr. FOSTER. Then why do you take the vote?

Mr. PATERSON. The money is expended in supplying metric sets to schools.

Mr. FOSTER. $3,000 worth?

Mr. PATERSON. No, it has not been spent every year.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. When are we going to have the system adopted?

Mr. PATERSON. I suppose that with the diffusion of these samples the people are being educated in the system, and when they are sufficiently educated to demand it I suppose it will come like other measures.

Mr. FOSTER. How much was spent last year?

Mr. PATERSON. $98.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the use of taking a vote for $3,000 when you only expect to spend $98? I thought this was a year in which the government were practising economy. Does the minister think it is a good idea to take votes when you do not intend to spend the money?

Mr. PATERSON. We do not know what we may do.

Mr. FOSTER. If the minister does not know what he is going to do, on what basis does he ask parliament to give him the money?

Mr. PATERSON. The minister may perhaps expend more in the way of distributing the samples this year than he has done before.

Export of electric power, $2,500.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Will the minister tell us what this is used for? What organization has the government for the regulation of the export of electric power?

Mr. PATERSON. Under the law every company exporting electric power must apply for a license, and there is an inspection and travelling expenses connected with the work.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Is there an official in charge of it?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, Mr. Higman has that under his charge.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Where can we find a report of what the official has been doing in the last year?

Mr. PATERSON. I am told there is a report; but I think a question on that subject was asked by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) the other day and the answer will be found in Hansard.

Intercolonial Bureau of Weights and Measures, $216.

Mr. J. D. REID. Explain that.

Mr. PATERSON. That is Canada's annual contribution to this bureau. This is not in reality an increase, but appears here owing to the fact that the supplementary estimates for the current year did not by an oversight include this amount.

Adulteration of food and fertilizers, under the administration of Act respecting fraudulent marking, $30,000.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many convictions were obtained during the past year under this Act ?

Mr. PATERSON. Quite a number, but I have not the exact number.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The general impression is that the Act was not carried out very strictly, not only with regard to the adulteration of food but also of fertilizers. On looking at the report from the Inland Revenue Department, we find that there is a great deal of adulteration both of food and fertilizers and it is important that it should be stopped.

Mr. PATERSON. My hon. friend is quite right. My deputy tells me that it is intended to bring in a Bill this session that will enable us to deal with the matter more efficiently than in the past.

Mr. STEWART. Will it cover anything but fertilizers ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, only fertilizers.

Mr. J. D. REID. Are fertilizers which come from the other side inspected ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many officers are in the department for the purpose of enforcing the carrying out of the Adulteration of Foods Act ?

Mr. PATERSON. Sixteen confidential inspectors outside.

Mr. BLAIN. How much money was expended last year in salaries ?

Mr. PATERSON. $3,700 was paid the inspectors and over $12,650 in the laboratory.

Mr. BRODER. What is done when the samples of adulteration are collected ? Are the names published ?

Mr. PATERSON. The parties are prosecuted where fraud is intended and the names published.

Mr. BRODER. Many a time the merchant might not be aware that the goods purchased are adulterated.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, and it is then rather hard on him to publish his name.

Mr. BURRELL. When a manufacturer is found guilty of adulterating food products is a fine imposed ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, when he does it fraudulently.

Mr. BURRELL. Do the fines amount to anything serious ?

Mr. PATERSON. Not to a very large amount.

Mr. BURRELL. Would it not be advisable to increase very heavily the amount of fines in cases of fraud so that there would not be so heavy a drain on the finances of the department in connection with the Act. The general impression is that the fines are not heavy enough.

Mr. PATERSON. They are not very heavy, that is true.

Mr. J. D. REID. Last year the amount of fines collected by the government on adulterated fertilizers was $10. Was that all the amount that was collected ?

Mr. PATERSON. I do not think there was over $150 collected altogether.

Mr. J. D. REID. According to the papers there has been considerable adulteration of food product. Surely the minister will not admit that there has not been one instance in which a fine was imposed during 1908 for the adulteration of food.

Mr. PATERSON. There have been several but perhaps not as many as there should have been.

Mr. J. D. REID. Where will we find it? On page J-28 of the Auditor General's Report I find under the heading of fines and forfeitures:

Electric light..	$125 00
Excise..	593 62
Fertilizers..	10 00
Gas..	20 00
Weights and measures..	74 00
Total..	$822 00

There is nothing there to show that there were any fines or forfeitures for adulteration of foods at all.

Mr. BURRELL. The country feels generally that it is highly important that the law against adulteration should be strictly enforced. It is only fair that the people who fraudulently adulterate food should pay a large portion of the cost of inspection.

Mr. PATERSON. I am informed that there have been a number of fines imposed. It appears in the Inland Revenue Report with other items—adulteration of food, fines and penalties, $148.25—not a very large amount.

Mr. J. D. REID. I find a list on page J-36 of the Auditor General's Report, under the head of 'Adulteration of Food,' and totalling $148.25. Does this mean that fines were collected from the men whose names were given?

Mr. PATERSON. In some cases the prosecutions may not have been pressed. Hon. members can understand that, while the officers endeavour to enforce the law as best they can, yet an adulterated article may be found in the hands of an innocent holder, who would not know that he was violating a law.

Mr. BURRELL. Is not the remedy against the manufacturer? Is not his name on the package? And, if so, surely he can be held. I find that in Ottawa there are ten analysts and a dozen scattered over the country. This is a very expensive staff to keep up, and yet there seem to be no results to show what they have been doing for the enforcement of the law.

Mr. J. D. REID. And I would like to know exactly how they find out what foods are adulterated. Here at page J-25 of the Auditor General's Report, is a list of salaries and contingencies under 'Food Inspection.' J. Hogan, Kingston, was given a salary of $198.52; J. Talbot, London, $49.98; A. E. Sanderson, Ottawa, $11.66; T. Kidd, Seaforth, $500; H. J. Dager, Toronto, $90.28; J. J. Costigan, Montreal, $350. Is there not a general inspector who goes to different places and collects samples?

Mr. PATERSON. The department send to their collectors of excise to procure samples of certain articles and forward them to the department. For this service, these officers are allowed a small sum.

Mr. J. D. REID. What is the position of this man, T. Kidd, Seaforth, who was paid $500?

Mr. PATERSON. He devotes himself to that work and does nothing else. He is the only one.

Mr. J. D. REID. His travel account amounts to $162.90. He cannot have travelled much for that.

Mr. PATERSON. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Reid) is right.

Miscellaneous—Proprietary or patent medicines, $5,000.

Mr. PATERSON. This will be required to meet the expense of administering the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act which comes into force April 1, 1909. A similar sum will be included in the supplementary estimates for the current year.

Mr. J. D. REID. Has the minister any details showing how it is intended to expend the money?

Mr. PATERSON. It will be necessary to pay expert medical men to ascertain what is necessary to constitute the proper medicines and so on. Also, literature will be necessary for distribution.

Mr. BLAIN. Have the officers been selected yet?

Mr. PATERSON. No officers are being appointed. This is being administered by the present staff.

Department of Secretary of State—Salaries (including P. Pelletier at $3,000), $53,737.50; contingencies, $6,500.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Secretary of State). In explanation of these estimates, I may say that the amounts are those at which all these officers were brought under the recent Civil Service Act with the exception of the Assistant Under Secretary of State. He has been senior chief clerk, and takes charge of the business of the department in the absence of the Under Secretary. He has had 21 years' experience in the department, and his duties include the supervision of certain applications under the Companies' Act, the applications that are made in the French language. The late Secretary of State, in view of Mr. Pelletier's duties, recommended that he should be given this increase of $200. There are no new appointments in the department.

Mr. J. D. REID. Are you positive?

Mr. MURPHY. Perhaps the hon. member refers to a position in the first division of subdivision B. That position is vacant by reason of the transfer of Mr. Foran, who was formerly in the department, and who has been made secretary of the Board of Civil Service Commissioners. That office is retained, but no appointment has been made to it as yet.

Mr. J. D. REID. How many of those that were on as temporary officers were made permanent?

Mr. MURPHY. Three messengers, J. A. Jessop, J. Brankin and H. H. Duggan.

Mr. J. D. REID. I think this item should have been allowed to stand over, because we did not expect it was coming up to-night.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) had some pertinent questions which he wished to ask the minister.

Mr. MURPHY. I shall be pleased to answer any questions to-morrow which any hon. gentleman may desire to ask me.

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister said that Mr. Pelletier had an increase of $200. I see on page X—3 of the Auditor General's Report that he got $2,700 last year. Is that the same gentleman the minister refers to?

Mr. MURPHY. That is the same gentleman, he got an increase of $100. He came in at $2,800 at the minimum of that class. This provides for an addition of $200.

Mr. J. D. REID. Are the gentlemen mentioned on page X—3 the same gentlemen who come in under this item of $30,000?

Mr. MURPHY. I think so.

Mr. J. D. REID. When was H. H. Duggan appointed?

Mr. MURPHY. He was appointed last year, I think about seven or eight months ago, at a salary of $500.

Mr. J. D. REID. I would like to get the exact date to-morrow.

Mr. AMES. Is this a new item, $600 for a private secretary?

Mr. MURPHY. No, that is a continuation of the same item.

Mr. AMES. Formerly a private secretary was a first-class clerk. Is he now outside the Civil Service Act?

Mr. MURPHY. No.

Mr. AMES. Why is he listed here as in receipt of an allowance instead of listing him as an employee?

Mr. MURPHY. He would not get the $600 unless he were put in here in this way —allowance for private secretary. It is the same in all the departments.

Mr. AMES. Why is a change made in that particular method of doing it? In the Auditor General's Report the private secretary is included among first-class clerks. Is this an extra $600 given to an employee who gets another salary in another capacity?

Mr. MURPHY. No. I understand it has been the practice in the past to pay the $600 to a gentleman occupying a position in the department, whether he be a first class or a second class clerk. My information is that this amount has been paid for years past in the same way.

Mr. AMES. In the Auditor General's Report we see that A. Brophy gets $1,500 as a first-class clerk, then he receives $600 more for acting as private secretary.

Mr. MURPHY. That is correct.

Mr. AMES. Then my question was not properly answered. I asked whether that $600 went to an employee who was already drawing a salary under another head, and the minister said no.

Mr. MURPHY. I did not so understand the hon. gentleman's question. If that is what he means, I must answer yes.

Mr. AMES. The $600 goes to an employee who is already receiving a salary in another capacity?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Let us understand it. The private secretary of a department is taken from one of the clerkships. My own opinion is that the system is all wrong, but it has been the rule in this government for years My opinion is that a minister ought to be able to select his private secretary, pay him a straight salary, any salary he likes. The practice has been to take a private secretary from the employ of the department. He receives the salary that he gets as a clerk and this $600 is combined with it to make up his salary as a private secretary. This has been the practice for years. He does nothing as a clerk, he does his work as a private secretary, but he is taken out of the ranks of the clerks and given this salary.

Mr. AMES. Is this $600 extra allowance uniform in all the departments ?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. AMES. Plus whatever he received in the way of a salary as an ordinary employee ?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Might I ask the minister to urge upon the government that they change this system and put into force the system that he has suggested to-night ?

Mr. GRAHAM. Speaking for myself, I have always taken very strong ground, even before I came here, on this subject, believing that the minister should be in a position to select his private secretary from wherever he chose. But, it has been the custom to select him from the department and add this allowance to the salary that he is receiving as a clerk. There is now a clause in the Act which provides for a private secretary being taken in, but he must be brought in at the minimum of the class in which he happens to fall. Take my own private secretary as an example ; he was a temporary clerk and in order to get him as my private secretary I had to bring him in under the second division of class B at $800 and the $600 added only gives him a salary of $1,400, which is an absurd salary for the secretary in a department like that of Railways and Canals. He is brought in at the reorganization at $800 but in next year's estimates I am going to ask that his salary be placed on a fairly decent basis. The ministers are hampered in providing for their private secretaries by that rule, but it has been the practice in the past.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. The practice originated in this way : In former days a minister would bring in a man who suited him and he would employ him as his private secretary. When the minister was going out of office he would ask for an appointment of some kind in the department in order that he might be retained. I imagine that is the way it arose.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Contingencies, $6,500.

Mr. J. D. REID. What is the explanation of this ?

Mr. MURPHY. There is a reduction of $1,000 ?

Mr. J. D. REID. How is that explained ?

Mr. MURPHY. It is estimated that for clerical assistance a vote of $1,000 instead of $2,000 will be sufficient. This is to provide for the extra clerks that may be required to get out returns or anything of that kind during the session. There is always extra work in the department by reason of the connection of the Printing Bureau with it.

Department of Railways and Canals—Salaries (including M. J. Butler at $8,000; G. A. Bell, at $2,800, and C. B. Robinson at $1,200), $129,662.50.

Mr. J. D. REID. Give us an explanation of that.

Mr. GRAHAM. The explanation with reference to Mr. Butler is that he being the deputy minister with a salary above that allowed by the statute, his name has to be mentioned. The name of Mr. Bell is also mentioned. He is the head of a branch that I have provided for in the estimates. He was brought into the department in 1900, I think. He is a very able man and his duties are to audit all the accounts in the department and in connection with all the railways throughout the country. If, for instance, a railway applies for a subsidy it has to prove that it has expended a certain amount and I have to send him all over Canada to audit these accounts. He has to meet the auditors of the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific Railway and other companies. His salary is increased over $1,000. I want to bring him into the branch as the head of it. He is one of the ablest men in the service. In the reorganization under the Act I could only bring him in at the salary he was getting, but in the estimates for next year I name him so that there cannot be any question as to the legality of the matter. My private secretary is Mr. C. B. Robinson. I had to bring him in at $800 under the Act because he had to come in at the minimum of the class in which he was employed being the second division of class B. I propose to give him a salary of $1,200 in addition to the $600 which will make his salary $1,800. There are two others whom I should mention. Mr. Bowden has been put in class A which will give him $300 of an increase and Mr. Alward who has charge of the law department and becomes the solicitor, the former solicitor having resigned some months ago, is put in class A, and his salary is raised several hundred dollars.

Mr. J. D. REID. What position did he occupy last year ?

Mr. GRAHAM. He was assistant to the law clerk.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Is he a barrister?

Mr. GRAHAM. He is a barrister of standing and has been in the department for years. It is a very important branch and I am putting him at the head of it as he is a very capable man.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many men were brought in from the outside service ?

Mr. GRAHAM. There are some in our department who have been working there since 1872, 1880 and 1890, but they were never made permanent. Some forty-five of these are now made permanent.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Were there any appointments in 1908 ?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, Mr. McCrimmon, a young man, was appointed in the third division of subdivision B just at the beginning of 1908 at a salary of $650.

Mr. J. D. REID. What is he doing ?

Mr. GRAHAM. He is a clerk in the records branch.

Mr. J. D. REID. Is he the only one ?

Mr. GRAHAM. He was the only appointee in 1908. There were some in 1907.

Mr. J. D. REID. How many in 1907?

Mr. GRAHAM. Seven I think altogether. Of course these are appointed to vacancies that occurred; we made no new positions in 1907.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. In 1908-9 the amount expended for this purpose was $63,000; but for this year it is $129,000, a difference of $45,000. Would the bringing in of the outside service make that difference?

Mr. GRAHAM. There were some increases in the reorganization and some statutory increases amounting to a little over $8,000. My accountant informs me that we have several vacancies in our department that have existed for some time. We did not fill them last year, but we may fill them this year.

Mr. J. D. REID. How are the vacancies caused?

Mr. GRAHAM. In every department there are so many clerkships. New ones are organized and old ones are sometimes dropped. These have been provided for for years in some cases and some men have been promoted, but during the last year we did not fill some of these vacancies. The reorganization of the department has taken place and one or two of these vacancies must be filled by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Does the commission make technical appointments too?

Mr. GRAHAM. There is a clause that for special reasons appointments may be made upon the commission giving certificates.

Mr. J. D. REID. If these vacancies have existed for a number of years, the minister must know that it is not necessary to fill them this year. What are the vacancies?

Mr. GRAHAM. We found some of these in the outside and some in the inside service. In the reorganization of the service it is almost impossible for the head of a department to see just how matters are going to work out under the new Act, and though we make provision for these vacancies, if we find that it is not necessary to fill any of them we will drop them. Under the old Act we could take a general vote and employ assistance under that, but under the new Civil Service Act we cannot do that, and in order to protect ourselves we make provision for these possible vacancies. Under this Act there is no elasticity. If we want a man in the department, we have to go to the commission and explain that there is a vacancy and we cannot promote unless a vacancy exists.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the total number of employees in the department?

Mr. GRAHAM. Eighty-four. We are asking for 95, including these vacancies.

Mr. BLAIN. What will be the total increase of salaries under the new classification?

Mr. GRAHAM. Under the classification coming into effect on September 1 the increase is $3,800.

Mr. MAGRATH. How many employees last year drew $63,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. Thirty-nine. The total number is now made up of both inside and outside employees.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. PATERSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. J. D. REID. What will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. PATERSON. As to-morrow will be private members' day and the House will rise at six o'clock that will be in the hands of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Of course, if the private members' work runs out, we shall go on with civil government.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Minister of Public Works for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1908.—Mr. Pugsley.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 33) respecting the Niagara-Welland Power Co.—Mr. Guthrie.

Bill (No. 34) to incorporate the Ontario and Michigan Power Company.—Mr. Conmee.

Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Salisbury and Harvey Railroad Company.—Mr. Emmerson.

Bill (No. 36) respecting The Southern Central Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. W. McIntyre.

Bill (No. 37) to incorporate the Western Canadian Life Assurance Company.—Mr. Knowles.

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company. — Mr. Dubeau.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT—POWERS OF RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (E. Hastings) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 39) to amend the Railway Act. He said: Last session the government introduced a Bill to amend the Railway Act so as to confer certain additional powers on the Board of Railway Commissioners, giving the Board jurisdiction in complaints made by the Crown or by a corporation with regard to certain specified matters. The list included a number of matters on the face of it, but mainly matters with regard to which negotiations are not usually conducted as contracts made between a corporation or the Crown and the railways. I propose to add to, along the same line, that the commissioners should have power in contracts made with regard to the operation of the road. It is well known that contracts are made between municipalities and the government or a railway company, and that in the overwhelming majority of cases, they refer to the operation of the road. In consideration of the operation of the road, a bonus is given by the municipality or a subsidy granted by parliament. Exactly in the line with the government measure of last year, I propose to give the commissioners authority with regard to such contracts.

In one other respect this Bill goes further than the amendment of last session. Under that law, appeals of the kind to which I have referred can only be made in cases between the Crown or corporation and the railway with which the contract was made. It is well known that, in this country, there are practically only two or three railways. In the great majority of cases contracts are made between the Crown or a corporation and some minor railway which has been subsidized for a part of the country through which it runs; and, usually, after the contract is made and the railway constructed, this minor railway is absorbed by one of the larger railway corporations. The result is that the larger railway has the benefit of the money which the municipality or Crown has expended, while the municipality or the Crown loses the benefit of the contract on account of which alone the money was advanced. The Bill which I have now the honour to propose would allow the board to act in such a case, and would provide that the railway which has possession of the property in consideration of which the bonus is given should be held responsible for carrying out the contract made by the road which has been absorbed and which, having gone out of operation, cannot be held to its contract. This, it will be seen, is on the same line as the government Bill of last session, but it extends the principle a little further in the two directions I have indicated.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAND GRANT OF QU'APPELLE, LONG LAKE AND SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY.

Mr. McCRANEY asked:

1. What was the area and approximate location of the land grant to the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Steamboat Company for the construction of the railway from Regina to Prince Albert?

2. Under what authority was such grant made, and when was it earned?

3. What persons and corporations have acquired this land grant, and in what amounts?

4. What quantity of land has been patented to each?

5. Has the Saskatoon and Western Land Company acquired any other lands from the government than those which form part of the grant above-mentioned?

6. When were the selections of the Saskatoon and Western Land Company made, and what has been the cause of the delay?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of Interior). 1. 1,625,344 acres. The area reserved by the original orders in council dated respectively December 30, 1884, February 4, 1891, June 10, 1892, and August 1, 1902, was all in what is now the province of Saskatchewan, and the selection of lands to satisfy the area earned as above was all within the tracts so reserved. The location of the tract may be described as an irregular shaped block in central Saskatchewan, extending from the north limit of the Canadian Pacific Railway main line belt reserve to township 52.

2. By Chapter 60 of 48-49 Victoria, assented to July 20, 1885, and Chapter 23, of 50-51 Victoria, assented to June 23, 1887.

3 and 4. An area of 128,000 acres was assigned to the Land Corporation of Canada by assignment dated February 5, 1892. These lands have all been patented.

Applications for the issue of patents in the name of sundry persons were filed in the department by the company to the number of 117 for areas in each case of one section or less area between March 20, 1891, and September 5, 1902. These lands have all been patented.

A patent for an area of 2,240 acres was applied for in the name of Harvey Matthews of White Bear lake, Minnesota, dated September 22, 1902. This land has been patented.

An area of 30,614·90 acres was assigned to Edmund Boyd Osler, and Herbert Carlyle Hammond, of Toronto, and Augustus Meredith Nanton and Harry William Nanton of Winnipeg by assignment dated December 30, 1902. These lands have all been patented.

An area of 97,164·06 acres was assigned to Augustus Meredith Nanton of Winnipeg by assignment dated December 30, 1902. These lands have all been patented.

An area of 839,640·97 acres was assigned to the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company by assignment dated October 25, 1902. These lands have all been patented.

An area of 239·92 acres was assigned to the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company by assignment dated March 21, 1903. This land has been patented.

An area of 493,269·34 acres was retained by the government as security for certain advances to the railway company under an agreement dated August 5, 1889; of these lands an area of 1,442 acres has been patented in the name of sundry persons on the application of the assignees of the railway company.

5. Of the above area of 1,442 acres, 1,284 acres has been patented to the Saskatchewan and Western Land Company, Limited.

No other lands comprised in this railway company's land subsidy have been patented to the said Saskatoon and Western Land Company, Limited. The said Saskatoon and Western Land Company, Limited, has not acquired any other lands from the government.

6. The Saskatoon and Western Land Company had no right of selection on account of this railway company's land subsidy. The selection of the area of 493,269·34 acres retained by the government as security as above and of which area the said Saskatoon and Western Land Company, Limited, is the grantee of 1,284 acres as above, was completed on September 13, 1906, by the assignees of the railway company, and was confirmed by order in council dated May 8, 1907. The unpatented lands comprised in this selection have been recently assigned by the said assignees to Canada Saskatchewan Land Company, Limited.

Mr. MEIGHEN asked:

2. If so, what is the flow of water in cubic feet per minute over the weir at Newmarket?

3. Has the government any information or estimates of the number of lockages that can be made through the Newmarket branch of the Trent Valley waterways at Newmarket each day (a) at high water, (b) at low water?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. Yes; during the summer of 1907, and throughout the summer and fall of 1908, gaugings were made once a week, by Mr. Kerr, divisional engineer, Newmarket, of the east branch of the Holland river, south of Newmarket.

2.—Summer and Fall of 1907.

Number of Readings.	Month.	Weir No. 1 Cu. ft. per M. Newmarket.	Weir No. 3 Cu. ft. per M.	Total Cu. ft. per M.

On the 27th March, 1908, a gauging of the spring flood was made of the river south of Newmarket, and on the Boagertown branch the combined flow of the two streams amounted to about 139,000 cubic feet per minute.

Mr. Kerr has not sent in report for gaugings for year 1908.

3. (a) Lock at Newmarket, takes about 52,000 cubic feet of water for a lockage, and say fifteen minutes for a lockage would equal four an hour; so that the flood discharge of the river for one and a half minutes, will operate the Newmarket locks for one hour; (b) at low water the canal cannot be operated without storage reservoirs south of Newmarket, which must conserve the spring floods for use of navigation during the summer months.

In addition to main reservoirs, the level above each lock is designed to store a depth of two feet of water, above normal navigation level of six feet.

EXTENSION OF TRENT VALLEY WATERWAYS.

Mr. JOHN A. CURRIE asked :

2. Is it the intention of the government to lay this report before the House? If so, when?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. Yes. Surveys have been completed; but the plans in connection with the report, are not yet ready.

2. Yes, when the report is received and considered by the government.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works) :

   (c) 6th October, 1908.
   (d) $5,500.

2. It is not the present intention of the government to proceed this spring with the construction of the post office at Elmwood.

FORTIFICATIONS AT ESQUIMALT.

Mr. BARNARD asked :

1. Has any expenditure in connection with the naval station at Esquimalt been authorized by the government of Canada, or to the knowledge of the government of Canada, by the imperial government? If so, to what amount, and for what purpose?

2. How many guns were left by the imperial authorities at Esquimalt when the imperial troops were withdrawn from British Columbia?

3. Is the government aware that one or more of said guns are said to have been left lying unprotected from the weather for months beside the public highway leading from Victoria to Esquimalt?

4. What was the numerical strength of the imperial troops at Esquimalt immediately before they were withdrawn?

5. What is the numerical strength of the permanent corps at Esquimalt at the present time?

6. What is the numerical strength of the permanent corps at: (a) Halifax, (b) Kingston, (c) Quebec, (d) Toronto, (e) Winnipeg, (f) London?

7. What force is considered by the Militia Department to be of adequate strength to maintain and man the fortifications at Esquimalt?

8. What was the cost, for the last fiscal year, and upkeep of the permanent force at: (a) Halifax, (b) Quebec, (c) Kingston, (d) Toronto, (e) Winnipeg, (f) London?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence):

1. This is confidential and cannot be given.

2. The same number of guns as were left at Esquimalt by the British government are, however, still there.

3. The guns are where they were placed by the imperial troops. Their future disposition has been arranged with the full concurrence of the Imperial War Office.

4. Approximately 350, but the department has no information as to the exact strength.

5. 142.

6. It varies considerably from time to time, but by the latest returns it is:

Halifax, 1,269 (This includes 69 civilians paid out of the vote for the permanent force).
Quebec, 363.
Kingston, 317.
Toronto, 262 (This includes 1 civilian paid out of the vote for the permanent force.
Winnipeg, 106.
London, 107.
Esquimalt, 142 (This includes 6 civilians paid out of the vote for the permanent force).

7. 152.

8. This cannot be precisely stated, for the cost of the active militia attached for instruction to the several schools cannot be separated from it, and further it is largely affected by the number of men stationed at each place at a given moment which fluctuates for various reasons, e.g.: recruiting. The expenditure at each station during last fiscal year was as follows:

(a) Halifax	$761,086 90
(b) Quebec	226,540 13
(c) Kingston	165,702 16
(d) Toronto	229,207 07
(e) Winnipeg	81,028 48
(f) London	75,545 58
(g) Esquimalt	103,052 50

I have added Esquimalt, as I suppose that information is desired.

Mr. BARNARD.

3. Will the government advertise for tenders in connection therewith, and when?

4. What is the estimated cost of the proposed work?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works):

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY BETWEEN THEDFORD, ARKONA AND PORT FRANK, ONTARIO.

Mr. ARMSTRONG asked:

1. Has the government decided to establish rural mail delivery on the routes between Thedford, Ontario, and Arkona, and Thedford, Ontario and Port Frank?

2. If so, what is the cause of delay in establishing said routes?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (for Postmaster General):

1 and 2. An application was recently received at the department for the establishment of a rural mail delivery service between Arkona and Thedford, and has been referred to the proper officers for inquiry and report.

The department was also asked to establish a rural mail delivery service between Thedford and Port Frank, but on account of the courier refusing to undertake such service, tenders are now being invited for a new contract for the conveyance of the mails between the two terminal points, including the collection from and delivery to the rural mail boxes.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG asked:

1. Have any contracts for the carrying of mail, which expire in the month of April, 1909, been renewed without asking for tenders?

2. If any such tenders have been renewed, where are the routes situated, what is the price paid for carrying the mail, and what is the name of the carrier, and his place of residence?

4. Will it be sold by auction or otherwise, and on what terms and conditions?

5. Is it the intention of the government to throw open any or all of it for homesteading?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior):

1. On the 21st of January, 1908, the Swan Lake Band of Indians surrendered to the Crown 5,283 acres, comprising portion of the Swan Lake Indian reserve, No. 7, Manitoba, containing 2,880 acres, and Indian reserve 7A, in the province of Saskatchewan, containing 2,403 acres, which surrender was on the following conditions,—

(a). That the minimum price at which the Swan Lake lands are to be sold will be ten dollars per acre.

(b). That the minimum price at which the Battleford lands will be sold will be six dollars per acre.

(c). That the Indians' equity shall be considered as one-third of the price of the land.

(d). That the first payment to be made to the Indians at the time of formal surrender shall be equal to one hundred dollars to each soul of population.

(e). That the second payment, being balance of the one-third of equity, shall be paid as soon as sufficient funds are realized from the sale of the land.

(f). That the interest on the funded moneys placed to the credit of the Indians from the sale of these lands shall be paid to them on the per capita basis at the time of the annual treaty payments.

2. The land has not as yet been placed in the market.

3. It is the intention to place the land in the market at an early date.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

Are any negotiations in progress or have any proposals been made for construction or extension of dry docks under the provisions of the Dry Docks Subsidies Act of 1908? If so, by whom and at what places?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). The answer is: Yes, by the Vancouver Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company, at Vancouver, B.C. In order that my hon. friend may not be misled by this. I may say that there were applications made to the government under the previous legislation, and it has been intimated that they will ask to come in under the new legislation, but no new proposals have been actually received except this one.

MR. W. T. R. PRESTON.

Mr. GERMAN asked :

1. Has the Department of Trade and Commerce received any complaints from any Japanese board of trade in Japan, other than the foreign boards of trade, criticising Mr. W. T. R. Preston's work as Canadian Trade Commissioner?

2. Has the said department received any complaints against Mr. Preston or his work from any officials of the Japanese government?

3. Has the said department received any complaints against Mr. Preston or his work from any newspapers or trade papers published in Japanese?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) :

1. No.

2. No.

3. No.

4. Yes. The statement is made by the 'Yorodzu Choho' of Tokio that Mr. Preston is a gentleman to whom the best thanks of all the Japanese are due and complimenting Mr. Preston upon two articles of his which appeared in the 'National Review.'

STEEL RAILWAY CARS.

Mr. SPROULE—by Mr. George Taylor—asked:

Has the government had their attention drawn to the alleged fact, that in the railway wreck which took place only a few days ago on the Pennsylvania Railway in the Allegheny Mountains, where both the engines and wooden cars were crushed into a mass of ruins, that a steel Pullman car immediately behind the engine escaped without, as account states, a scratch? If so, is it their intention to make inquiry, and if true, introduce the use of steel cars on the Intercolonial Railway, so as to ensure the greater safety of life to the travelling public?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. No. The government has not had its attention drawn to the wreck; but the experience had with the strongly built sleeping-cars has shown that they have gone through wrecks time and again, without injury. There is no doubt whatever that steel cars would have a higher resisting effect than wooden-framed cars ; but sufficient experience has not been had to reach any definite conclusions with regard to the same. The greatly increased cost of changing to the service of steel cars, however, will preclude the possibility of this being done for many years to come.

USURY ACT, 1908.

Mr. STAPLES asked :

1. How many persons were prosecuted under the Usury Act of 1908?
2. Under what clause or clauses were those prosecutions taken?
3. Who were the persons prosecuted, and what was the penalty enacted in each case?
4. What amendments, if any, have been made to the Act since 1906?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice) : The answer is made in the supposition that the intention was to refer to the Money Lenders Act, 1906.

Prosecutions for offences against this statute form part of the administration of justice in the different provinces of the Dominion, and are entirely under control of the provincial authorities. This government is therefore not possessed of any information from which any statistics on the subject could be given. No amendment has been made to the statute.

MAIL AND STAGE ROUTES.

Mr. ARMSTRONG asked :

What is the total number of existing mail and stage routes in Canada and the total number of miles covered by such routes?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). Owing to the time that will be involved in obtaining this information, it is requested that this question be allowed to stand.

TRADE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. ARMSTRONG asked:

1. What means, if any, has the government taken to improve our trade relations with Germany?
2. What was the total exports of agricultural products to Germany from Canada in the year 1908?

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs):

1. The answer was given to a similar question put by the hon. member last session, and which the hon. member will see in Hansard.
2. The total exports of agricultural products from Canada to Germany during the calendar year 1908 amounted to $551,920.

PRE-EMPTIONS AND HOMESTEADS.

Mr. AMES asked:

1. Between April 1 and December 31, 1908, what has been the total acreage sold as pre-emptions and purchased homesteads?
2. What total amount of money receivable by the government does this represent?
3. How much was paid in during the above mentioned period?
4. Approximately what quantity of agricultural land remains undisposed of within the surveyed area?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior):

1. Pre-emptions—1,979,860 acres.
   Purchased Homesteads—99,279 acres.
2. $6,229,699.43.
3. $129,295.82.
4. 41,500,000 acres.

PROTECTION OF OUR COAST LINE AND SEAPORTS.

On the order:

Resolved, that in the opinion of this House, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position and national environments, and of that spirit of self help and self respect which alone benefits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.—Mr. Foster.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries asked me to notify him beforehand when this resolution would be taken up. If the Prime Minister sees no objection I would like to take it up on Thursday next.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is quite agreeable.

An hon. MEMBER. Do you mean to-morrow?

Mr. FOSTER. A week from to-morrow.

DEVELOPMENT OF OUR FISHERIES.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Guysboro) moved:

That in the opinion of the House it is advisable to appoint a Select Standing Committee of the House to deal with questions relating to Marine and Fisheries as they arise from time to time, and that the rules of the House be amended accordingly.

He said: Mr. Speaker; during the last session of this House I had the honour to move a resolution similar in its terms to the one I now propose, and while no opposition was offered, yet no action was taken to carry its purpose into effect. Of course, you will recollect that the government were so very much engaged during the last session, and the opposition were so very busy trying to get into power that my resolution necessarily did not receive that attention which its importance deserved. I trust, Sir, that I will have better luck this time and that some action will be taken by parliament to give effect to my proposal. I was very much interested in the speech of the leader of the opposition delivered in the House last Monday in favour of conserving our natural resources. That speech contained a great deal of valuable and useful information, and we will of course all agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) as to the vital necessity of conserving the natural resources of Canada. However, in the motion which I now place before the House I am not thinking so much about conserving natural resources as I am advocating the development of a great Canadian industry which has enormous possibilities for adding to the wealth and prosperity of our land. My idea is that it would be a great improvement over existing conditions if we should have a special Marine and Fisheries committee meeting year after year and devoting its labour and research to the development of the fishing industry of this country. There seems to be a growing tendency amongst all legislative bodies to relegate the general work of legislation to special committees which have opportunities for ascertaining the facts, considering them, tabulating them, and placing them before parliament so that parliament may consider the results, and take whatever action is needed, or that may be recommended. For example, 100 years ago there were only five select standing committees in the Congress of the United States, but as the country became larger, as new states were added, and as new interests arose the committees of Congress increased until during last session there were no fewer than 50 committees considering different questions.

They have such committees as that on elections, ways and means, appropriations, judiciary, banking and currency, coin and weights and measures, commerce, rivers and harbours, the merchant marine and fisheries. Thirteen members constitute this latter committee of congress which deals with all questions relating to the merchant marine and the fisheries. It was made a standing committee on December 21, 1887. They have also committees on agriculture, foreign affairs, military affairs, naval affairs, the post office and post roads, public lands, Indian affairs, territories, railways and canals, manufactures, mines and mining, public buildings and grounds, Pacific railroads, improvement of the Mississippi river, education, labour, militia, patents and so on, 50 committees in all to do the work of congress, which is apportioned to these various committees and tabulated and made ready for consideration by the House. In the Canadian parliament, as you are aware, we have ten select standing committees of this House, the committees on agriculture and colonization, banking and commerce, railways, public accounts and so on, all doing useful work. In Great Britain there is a committee on trade which under the rules of the imperial parliament, deals with questions relating to marine and fisheries. In the province of Nova Scotia, for 50 years prior to confederation, there was a select standing committee of the legislature of that province for the consideration of questions relating to the fisheries. This was also true, I believe, of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, I am not familiar with the practice of the other provinces. At the time of confederation, when all questions relating to the fisheries were handed over to the federal parliament, these committees were discontinued in these local legislatures and it is rather a remarkable circumstance that we have allowed fifty years of confederation to pass away without a select standing committee of this House to deal with questions relating to marine affairs or to our fisheries.

In raising this question last year I gave the House considerable information that I had collected showing the great importance of our fishing industry. I pointed out our immense coast line on the eastern shore of Canada being about 6,000 miles in length. Then we have also a very prolific fishing district on the western coast, and including the northern waters we have about 15,000 miles of coast line in this country. We have a great many people engaged in this great industry. In the province of Nova Scotia alone there are 25,000 men engaged in it. If you multiply that number by five, to include their families, you have about 125,000 persons, about one quarter of the whole population of our province directly dependent on the fishing industry. Taking all of the provinces of Canada we have about 76,000 men on our coasts making a living on the sea in this way. If you include the men and boys and girls engaged in packing, there are about 88,000 in all, showing that a very large proportion of the population of Canada are engaged in this industry. A very large amount of capital is invested in the industry and the output each year amounts to something in the vicinity of thirty million dollars. The industry is only in its infancy. It is capable of great development. The two great requisites for the development of this industry are better transportation facilities and a better market.

The source of supply, the ocean, is inexhaustible; it is simply a question of putting the fish on the market in a proper way.

The present administration have done a great deal in that direction for which they should receive credit. They have provided a system of cold storage for bait which has done a great deal in Nova Scotia to assist the fishing industry. In former years it was very difficult in the spring to find bait for the fishing vessels. The bait visits the coast in the fall of the year and disappear in a few weeks. But by the present system it is preserved until the spring when it is ready for use and in that way the ships and fishing boats are able to fit out and go to sea and to work in the early part of the season which they could not do formerly. Then the present administration have done a great deal in the way of the propagation of fish along the coast, the propagation of lobsters for example, which is one of the most important branches of the industry. They have also given us better transportation facilities, they have given us an increased number of refrigerator cars and have placed a daily fast freight between Halifax and Mulgrave and Montreal. The train of course does not reach Montreal in a day but it leaves daily, it has a schedule time and we know it will arrive there in reasonable time. The express rate per hundred for carrying fish from Halifax or Mulgrave to Montreal has by this arrangement been reduced from $1.50 to 38 cents which has done a great deal to stimulate the industry in that direction. Then the government has done something in the way of subsidizing steamers to collect fish at points where the Intercolonial Railway touches the sea, which is also very important and at those points where the steamers have called the trade has expanded in much greater ratio than at other points where they have not these facilities. I believe that a great deal more can be profitably done in that direction. An expansion of this system would not only furnish business for the Intercolonial Railway but also develop this important industry along the coast. Then we have also had, as you know, a number of breakwaters and wharfs constructed along the shores of the maritime provinces all of which have been useful in the development of this great industry. The coast has been well lighted and buoyed during the last few years. All of these things are assisting but a great deal remains to be done. I am glad to see that the Department of Trade and Commerce has taken this matter up and shown some interest in it. I am also glad that the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) is showing an interest in this great question and that the government are continuing the good work they commenced some years ago. I submit that there is a great deal of work for this committee to do, and I feel sure that there will be no opposition to it on either side of the House. I shall therefore not take up more of your time but shall move the resolution which is in your hands.

Mr. C. JAMESON (Digby). Representing, as I do, a constituency the people of which are largely interested in the fishing industry, I cannot refrain from making a few observations with regard to this resolution. There is an impression throughout the country, I think I may go further and say there is a belief throughout the country, that the Department of Marine and Fisheries is in need of the services of a surgeon. I do not know how deeply that belief has penetrated this House, but the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution, instead of suggesting the bringing in of a surgeon, has advised calling in a standing committee. Well, Mr. Speaker, standing committees are no doubt of great value. For instance we have a standing committee of this House on agriculture which has done excellent service, but the value of which is not perhaps always recognized, because notwithstanding the fact that the Standing Committee on Agriculture has done excellent work, we find that the different governments of the day have, each in its turn, from time immemorial, claimed all the credit for abundant harvests and leaving Divine Providence, the farmers and the Standing Committee on Agriculture out in the cold. My hon. friend who has moved this resolution, has made, it seems to me, a very excellent case for some change in the administration of the Atlantic fisheries. There can be no doubt that those fisheries are of the utmost value and capable of great development, but it is equally undoubted that they are not to-day in that flourishing condition they ought to enjoy and which, with better methods of administration, they would experience. I have no desire to occupy much of the time of the House, but I think it well, at this particular stage, to draw attention to the decrease in the number of those permanently employed in the Atlantic fisheries during the past quarter of a century. In doing this I take, as the basis of my computation the number of persons to whom the bounty has been paid out of the funds set aside by the Dominion government for that purpose. It seems to me that such is the only true test to be applied in order to arrive at the actual number of those constantly engaged in that industry; and I find that these figures fall very much below these given in the Year-book from time to time.

In the year 1882 the total number of fishermen drawing bounties was 29,932. In Nova Scotia the number was 17,473. Eight years later—and I may say that I have divided the quarter of a century into three periods—in 1890 the number had increased to 39,050, being an increase of 9,118. In that year there were 20,673 fishermen employed in Nova Scotia who drew bounty, being an increase in that province alone of 3,200. In 1898 the number had fallen to 29,402, a decrease of 9,648; and in the province of Nova Scotia the number fell to 17,278, or a decrease, in that province alone, of no less than 3,395. In 1907 there was a further decrease. The total then stood at 25,920, showing a falling off of 3,482, while in Nova Scotia it stood at 13,917, or a decrease of 3,361. In other words, in less than 17 years, the total decrease in the number of drawing this fishing bounty was no less than 13,130, and in Nova Scotia alone no less than 6,756.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Has my hon. friend the figures showing the catch of fish in those years?

Mr. JAMESON. I have not the figures under my hand, nor do I think it possible to secure figures giving accurately the catch of fish in any statistical work published by the department. A great deal of what would be valuable statistical matter, if accurate, is obtained by the department from year to year, but I fear that in this connection very little importance can be attached to those statistics because they are not altogether reliable. The same condition prevailed in Great Britain a few years ago, and when it was brought to the attention of the particular board or department having charge of such matters, the suggestion was at first scoffed at that anything could be wrong in connection with the statistics published; but a most careful and complete investigation showed that these figures, published from year to year, were absolutely without value, and, upon the best information which I can obtain, the statistics regarding our Atlantic fisheries are to-day utterly valueless as giving any accurate idea of the total catch of fish or its market value. Let me point out one instance in which these returns are untrustworthy. A certain quantity of fish is caught and later on the fish is dried and exported as dry fish. The fishery officer comes along and asks each fisherman how many thousand pounds of green fish he has caught, and takes down his reply. Then he goes to the man who cures these fish and asks him how many cured fish he has handled during the year, and this man says so many thousand quintals. The fishery officer then adds the total of green and cured fish together, and thus, in many cases, double the quantity of fish actually caught is included in the total column. I am not saying that any particular blame attaches to the fishery officers or the department. The practice is one which has grown up and which is due more or less to the fact that it has been found very difficult indeed to get reliable information of this character. So that it is high time, if we are to make these statistics of any value to the country, that a careful revision of the work should be undertaken; and no better means for doing that could be found than this committee which my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has suggested. The fact that there has been a decline in the fishing industry of the maritime provinces is one to which I wish to draw particular attention. That they are declining many of our fishermen are ready to admit and at least throughout Nova Scotia, our fishermen have for some time become alive to the fact that some change is necessary, if they are to get the most profit that can be had out of the fisheries. With that obect in view they have associated themselves together at the different fishing stations along the coast into organizations known as Fishermen's Unions. These unions meet together from time to time to discuss everything relating to their interests and frame resolutions. Then, annually or more frequently, delegates from these unions meet and endeavour to harmonize the resolutions which have been passed by the various local committees or unions and transmit them, perhaps I might say for the benefit of the department, at least I can say for the benefit of those concerned. In this connection, I wish to pay a tribute to the gentleman who was instrumental in having these unions organized and who, I was informed almost single-handed, carried through the legislature of Nova Scotia the Act under which they have come into existence. That gentleman is Mr. M. H. Nickerson, a member of the legislative assembly of Nova Scotia, sitting, I think, for the county of Shelburne.

There has been, throughout the province of Nova Scotia, an agitation on the part of many interested in the fisheries in favour of the creation of what is known as a fishery board, after the pattern of the board of that name which exists in Scotland. I am not personally inclined, with the information I have under my hand and with such study as I have been able to give to the work which the Scotch fishery board has carried into effect, to say that I would advise the creation of just such a board at this moment but it is a fair subject for careful consideration. The conditions in Scotland differ very considerably from those in Canada with respect to the legislative status of the board. In Canada, we have the administration of the fisheries under a department of the government and the department should do practically what the fishery board might be expected to do, with the exception, perhaps, that the Fishery Board of Scotland is composed in part of men appointed to represent the fishermen themselves. That fishery board is composed of seven members, four representing the fishermen, one a legal adviser, one an expert, and the chairman. The chairman is the only one who receives a salary, the others getting only their travelling expenses. The object of the fishery board in Nova Scotia, if created, would be, briefly, to remove, if possible, the administration of the fisheries absolutely from the caldron of party politics. That, I think, is a condition which, gentlemen on both sides of the House will admit, is most desirable. Then, they would endeavour to devise and frame suitable regulations with respect to the fisheries and would see to the proper enforcement of these regulations. They would also establish a standard pack and package in connection with the fisheries. Some of the fish which are put up in Nova Scotia are not of as high quality as they might be, or as are put up in some other countries while some are of the very highest quality. This possibly, is owing to the fact that no standard of cure, or pack, or package, has ever been established. That course would necessarily be along educational lines, which would be most desirable, and could well be carried out through the medium of these fishermen's unions, to which I made passing reference a moment ago. Another object of the fishery board would be to seek wider and more profitable markets for the product of our fisheries. That is something most devoutly to be desired. As it is now, the ordinary fisherman has no market beyond the purely local one; but through the medium of these fishermen's unions some plan might be devised whereby a more co-operative work could be carried out, so that the fishermen would gain greater profit from his labour. And let me tell the hon. members of this House that the fishermen are worthy of the utmost consideration that can be bestowed upon them, and that any assistance that can be rendered them by the administration of the day or through the medium of this standing committee would be no more than they are properly entitled to. They are men who, day after day, and year after year, are obliged to go out, and, at the risk of their lives and property, endeavour to win a livelihood for themselves and their families from the turbulent sea. I know that in my own county there are a large number of men who are fishing throughout the entire year; and to prosecute the fisheries in the winter season on the rugged and blustery Atlantic coast or in the Bay of Fundy is certainly no child's play. The man who follows such a life needs a hardy frame, strong limbs, and the heart of a lion.

Now, I wish to refer, before closing, to a new feature which has developed in respect to the in-shore fisheries of certain parts of Nova Scotia and more especially within my own knowledge, to those of the western part of the province: that is, the doing away with the old-time sailboat and adopting in its stead the more noisy but more profitable vessel propelled by a gasolene engine. In a speech made in this House a year or two ago, in moving a motion similar to that now before the House, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) said, or quoted from some writer who said, that the initial cost of embarking upon the inshore fisheries was comparatively insignificant, that all that was necessary was a boat, a few nets, or lines and hooks, and a tub of bait. Conditions have changed in the fisheries, as in almost everything else, and to-day, the fishermen who win their livelihood from the sea have to adopt modern methods and bring their appliances strictly up to date. The cost of a staunch and fairly roomy fishing boat now is much greater than it was even four or five years ago, because it must be made strong enough to carry the gasolene engine. Then, the cost of the engine itself is very considerable, and the expense of operating it amounts to from 25 to 50 cents a day. So, hon. gentlemen will see that the fishing which is prosecuted now throughout the entire year, entails a much greater expense to the individual who carries it on than when sailboats only were used. And the advantage, not only to the fishermen themselves, but to the country, is that in using these boats they can go out even against an adverse wind, and can get off at almost any time of the tide, and in that way many valuable days are saved and the fishermen are enabled to take advantage of the slack tide to ply their avocation, which they could not always do in the old-time sail boat.

In conclusion, I heartily endorse the motion of the hon. member for Guysborough in favour of the appointment of this committee. Perhaps I have trespassed unduly upon the time of the House in speaking as I have. As a new member, perhaps I am scarcely justified in occupying so much time. My apology for taking up the time of the House is the importance of this matter from the standpoint of the people of the county I represent, and of many other counties in the province of Nova Scotia. I trust it will be the aim of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to unite in an earnest effort to put this industry upon the best possible basis, in order that the fishermen as individuals, and the country generally, may benefit and prosper thereby.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). I wish to make a suggestion in connection with this motion. We have a good many committees in this House, and the members of those committees have a good deal to do. I think the moving of this resolution is a proper time to bring to the attention of the government and the House the need of a better distribution of the work between this House and the Senate. I believe the time has come when the Senate of Canada ought to be reorganized and be put in a position to take up some of the work that this House now has to perform. If that were done, instead of the Senate now being off on a holiday for a month, they would be discussing fishery questions, they would take up the question of the conservation of the natural resources of this country, they would take up the bankruptcy matter, which was before them some years ago, and which they handled very well. While I have every sympathy with this motion, and would like to see a committee of this House appointed to deal with the question involved, I desire also to say that this House, and perhaps the other House—because I believe they are ready to consider the question as a co-ordinate branch of parliament—should unite in a reorganization, so that the Senate may take up some of these great public questions and deal with them, and thus relieve this House of some of the work it has now to undertake. This House has at present a great deal to do, probably it has more than we can do, and do it as well as it ought to be done. So I take occasion to suggest to the government, not only the consideration of this motion, but the consideration of some plan by which the work would be distributed between the two Houses to the advantage of the performance of public business.

Mr. A. B. CROSBY (Halifax). The motion introduced by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) is one of great interest to me as a member from the maritime provinces. The question he has discussed whether we shall have a standing committee of this House to deal with questions relating to Marine and Fisheries. The arguments advanced by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) afford a strong reason why we should have such a committee. Such a committee would relieve this House from considerable work and discusion that now devolve upon it in relation to these matters, and would undoubtedly be able to give to them better and more consideration than single members of the House could do. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) has suggested an argument for this committee that I had not thought of before, and that was that the Senate had adjourned no doubt to go a fishing because they had nothing else to do, and if such a committee were formed, some of them might find something to do in connection with it. When you travel along the shores of the province of Nova Scotia—and I am now speaking in the presence of hon. gentlemen who are acquainted with the facts—you will frequently come to a fishing district which, some years ago, was very prosperous, whereas the district is now more or less depleted. You will understand of course that I am now speaking of the shore fisheries. You would probably find some empty houses in the district, whose former occupants, the fishermen, have gone to town or somewhere else. When you go through an interior county and find a farmhouse without a tenant, you make up your mind that the farmer has gone somewhere else, and that the soil is not being tilled. So it is with the shore fishermen. I do not blame this on the government, but I do say, as the hon. member for Guysborough has said, that it is time we had a committee of this House to which matters of that kind might be referred. I have no desire to disparage the manner in which the fisheries are administered by the Marine and Fisheries Department, I do not mean to say that anything has been left undone by the department that should have been done, because I presume they are doing all they possibly can. Nevertheless, our shore fisheries are becoming less every year, and I could say a great many things in relation to that question which might perhaps not be pertinent to the motion before the House. Now my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) said that a fisheries board was required. I think every hon. member of this House has received some resolutions or a report of some gentlemen in the east who are interested in the fishing industry, and who wish to form a fisheries board. I think this also is a matter that could well be referred to such a committee as has been suggested. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the fishing industry generally of Nova Scotia is less prosperous than it has been, but the shore fisheries have certainly become almost a thing of the past, but I may say especially with regard to that good old county of Lunenburg, that were it not for the deep sea fisheries that have been carried on and developed by the good people of that county, our Nova Scotia fisheries generally would not make as good a showing as they do make to-day. Any one who is acquainted with the shore fisheries and with the deep sea fisheries, and can make a distinction between them, will recognize that while the fisheries generally have increased greatly during the last twenty or twenty-five years, the increase in our deep sea fisheries has been very good, but not what it should have been. I do not mean to say that last year was better than the previous year, because variations are sometimes caused, not only by the condition of the fisheries, but by the way the returns are made, and the lack of good luck that happens to deep sea fishermen. Our deep sea fisheries have increased by leaps and bounds in the last twenty-five years ; but our shore fisheries—and by shore fisheries I mean those which are worked within the three mile limit by what we call boat fishermen—that industry I am sorry to say has decreased in Nova Scotia, and that is an industry that we should strive in every way to revive and develop. We talk about our great valuable lands in the west, and we are proud of them. We talk about the development of these lands, and we are proud of it, and are determined to do everything we can to promote that development. But even if you were to do nothing with those lands and let them lie uncultivated, they would still be there just the same. But if you fail to help and assist the shore fishermen, if you allow the shore fisheries to die out, it will be very difficult indeed to re-establish them in the position we have seen them occupy. I think therefore that the appointment of such a committee as is proposed will be a step in the right direction

The cold storage matter has also been referred to, and I congratulate the government on having carried on the cold storage system. But a great deal yet remains to be done, that system is not yet doing all we expected it to do, it is not giving all the accommodation that the government no doubt expected it would give. Now one of the ways by which we can help that system is to appoint a committee who will consider matters relating to cold storage. Cold storage is intended to provide bait for the shore fishermen as well as for the deep sea fishermen. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that any further argument is required to show why such a committee should be appointed, after we have heard the strong arguments advanced by the hon. member for Guysborough. I think this House should have no hesitation in appointing such a committee and I am sure that this industry, which is of very great importance to us and of paramount importance to the Dominion of Canada, will be benefited by the appointment of this committee. This resolution takes a long step in the right direction and I trust this House will have no hesitation in passing the resolution of my hon. friend from Guysborough.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Lunenburg). Mr. Speaker, when a resolution similar to the one now on the Order Paper was discussed last year it met, if I remember correctly, with favour from my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) and, I think, from my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), as well as others. I think that the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and his followers also concurred in the resolution. Unfortunately, however, it evoked some lengthy discussion, which, I think, occurred on a Wednesday sitting. When six o'clock arrived some hon. member was on his feet discussing the resolution and he unfortunately moved the adjournment of the debate which placed the resolution at the foot of public orders and it was never reached again during the session. I am very glad that the remarks made by all the other speakers to-day have been very brief and to the point, and I desire to say that my observations will not unnecessarily prolong the debate as I would like very much to see this resolution carried before six o'clock. Before giving a few reasons why I think this committee should be appointed, I wish to say that my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson), presented some statistics which I think were intended to give to the House the idea that because there were in recent years a lesser number of applicants for fishing bounties in the province of Nova Scotia there was a reduction in the total value of the fish taken in these waters. I do not think that is correct. I do not wish to provoke any discussion upon the value of our statistics, but I want to say to my hon. friend that in recent years the statistics regarding the number of applicants for fishing bounties have been far more reliable than they were in the years to which my hon. friend referred. The fishing industry is doubtless a great asset. I think that even we who come from the maritime provinces are apt to overlook its great value. We are apt to think of the great agricultural resources of the west, of the mineral resources and of the timber resources of our country, but we should remember that we take, I think, according to statistics, fish from the seas to the value of $40,000,000. I agree with the hon. member for Digby that there is a necessity for better statistics relative to our fisheries. If I remember correctly last year the value of the fisheries, according to the blue-book issued by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, was about $38,000,000. I think these figures considerably underestimate the value of our fisheries. There is this to be remembered concerning our fisheries: While we are taking annually fish to this great amount from the seas, exporting them to foreign countries and bringing back to Canada coin or some other valuable returns, we are not necessarily depleting our fisheries. We all know that the constant production of crops from the soil lessens its value and productivity and that if we cut down our timber resources it takes considerable time for the timber to reproduce itself. Without any expense on the part of the government our fishermen can go to the waters surrounding this country and take from them fish to a very considerable value which adds very much to the national wealth. I wish to give just a few reasons why I think this committee should be appointed and I just wish to refer to four or five matters which I think this committee should deal with. If the committee is appointed I have not the slightest doubt that the work which it will do will be proof of the wisdom of its appointment. A year or two ago I discussed the treaty of 1818 between Great Britain and the United States of America which related principally to the north Atlantic fisheries. On that occasion I took particular pains to discuss a feature of the treaty of 1885, I think the treaty of Washington, which established what is called the modus vivendi and which permits American fishermen certain rights, which rights are prohibited to them in the treaty of 1818. On that occasion I found that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, a great many of my colleagues from the province of Nova Scotia, and a great many members of the House, were of the opinion that the people of this country did not wish to abrogate the modus vivendi clause of this treaty. I thought it was a great mistake to have ever given these privileges to the United States, and I was always very much surprised that that very eminent statesman, Sir Charles Tupper, should have consented to these privileges being granted However, they were granted and they have been continued by this government since they came into power in 1896. If I appeared before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or before any member of the government, or before the Governor in Council, and ask for a revocation of the modus vivendi, I probably would be asked to give reasons for it. I probably would be asked the question if the people of my province desire the revocation of these privileges. It would be very difficult for me to answer that question. As far as my own county is concerned I could answer that question very quickly in the affirmative, I could say the same concerning many other counties in the province of Nova Scotia, but in some counties there would be some opposition to it. I think it is very important that the government should know what is the opinion of the people of the maritime provinces on this question. We should summon before that committee men competent to give evidence on this question and have it made a matter of public record. The other day my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) was called to Washington to act in conjunction with a representative of the Newfoundland government to prepare a case for reference to the Hague tribunal during the present year. I have no doubt that the interests of Canada and the interests of the maritime provinces in particular were well safeguarded by the Minister of Justice, but he has very little information which he can gather in the Department of Marine and Fisheries concerning this question, and I think that if we had had considerable evidence from people who understand the operation of the modus vivendi clause of this treaty in the blue-book, it might have been very valuable to the Minister of Justice the other day at Washington. Last year we had some legislation regarding the Norwegian coasting trade in Canada. I understand that under some old treaty and under some order in council passed by the Canadian government, Norwegian vessels were permitted to engage in the coasting trade in Canada. When the resolution came up before the House of Commons last session very few men in this House were in a position to give an intelligent vote upon that measure. It is true there were some gentlemen in the House who had given some attention to it, but it was largely a one-sided expression of opinion that came from them. There was a great deal to say for and against the abrogation of that order in council. Now I say had that committee been in existence last year we might have had some representatives of those who wished to continue this order in council and we could have summoned representatives of those who were opposed to the further continuance of the order in council. In this one respect, such a committee could have done valuable service for this country and it might have contributed very much to the enlightenment of hon. gentlemen on that measure.

We heard the complaint made year after year that our Canadian shipping is decreasing and so it is. It is difficult to see what the remedy for that is, but a remedy there may be, and a committee to which would be specially delegated matters relating to Marine and Fisheries could very properly summon to Ottawa gentlemen who are capable of giving expert opinion in reference to the decay of our shipping interests, and making suggestions which might tend to revive and develop it. Another important question is that with reference to steam trawl fishing. In our Atlantic waters, fishing operations are carried on by steam trawlers which come from France. These steam trawlers ply out of two or three ports and in many of the other fishing ports of France there is considerable opposition to this mode of fishing. In certain parts of Nova Scotia it is a very live issue. I hear many complaints from fishermen in my own county who suffer injury to their nets and trawls by the operation of these French steam trawlers. This is a question which has engaged the attention of the British government for many years and they have appointed one or more commissions, but I suppose like all other questions there are two sides to it. However, it is high time that the Department of Marine and Fisheries should take this question up for consideration. It would be a very easy matter, if this committee were constituted, to summon persons who are acquainted with this mode of fishing and ascertaining their best judgment as to whether steam trawl fishing is injurious or otherwise. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) spoke of the appointment of a fishery board. No doubt there is a great deal to say in favour of the appointment of such a board, and there is something to be said against it. That also is a question on which this committee might advise the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and his officers. There are many gentlemen in Nova Scotia who have given a great deal of attention in recent years to this question, and I am sure they would be glad to come before such a committee and give valuable information. On many occasions this government and preceding governments have appointed commissions to travel through the country in order to ascertain the views of the people upon lobster fishery regulations and other questions concerning our fishing industry. My experience of these commissions is, that while they visit a great many sections of the country and examine a great many witnesses and present a report to the department, the evidence taken is generally so voluminous that it is not, and indeed cannot be read by members of parliament or by anybody else. I doubt very much if even the officials of the department can afford the time to acquaint themselves with the details of the evidence taken by these commissions. In my opinion a special committee of this House would do better work in connection with many of the questions, do it more expeditiously, and at less cost, and give more practical results. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I express the hope that the committee called for by this resolution shall be appointed, and I doubt if amongst all our select standing committees there can be found one which can do more excellent work than this committee would be capable of doing. I am sure such a committee will prove a very valuable aid to the Minister of Marine, to his department, to the officials, to every member of the House of Commons, and to the country generally.

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.) I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say a word or two by way of supplementing what has been said by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. McLean). I can assure you, Sir, that it is with great interest I have listened to the discussion which has been promoted by the resolution moved by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). In this parliament we are called upon, from time to time, to deal with great questions; questions in which are involved the prosperity and the happiness of our people, but in my opinion no more important question than the one now under consideration could be submitted to us. I was very much edified by the speech of the hon. gentleman who moved the address in reply to His Excellency's speech at the opening of parliament. I was much pleased that he gave such prominence to the agricultural industry as one of the great sources of our national wealth, nor do I think that the hon. gentleman over-stated the importance of that industry, but, Sir, the vast importance of the fishery industry of Canada must not be forgotten by this parliament. I think I may fairly conclude from the tenor of the speeches of hon. gentlemen that there is no controversy as to the propriety of adopting this motion. I take it for granted that the consensus of opinion is that a committee such as that proposed is a proper insitution to add to the existing organization of the House of Commons, and that being so it is perhaps not necessary for me to prolong the discussion. But, Sir, may I have your permission to make one or two observations with respect to the statement made by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) to the effect that the fisheries of Nova Scotia are declining. I am not disposed to accept that as a fact. I believe that the changed conditions which undoubtedly do exist in respect to our fisheries are not due at all to their depletion, but rather to change in the methods of prosecuting the industry. We must not forget that many years ago the most remunerative return from the fisheries of the maritime provinces accrued from the salt fish. Forty or fifty years ago there was a large and remunerative market for salt fish, but from year to year that market has dwindled, until to-day the necessity has arisen for the fishermen of the maritime provinces placing the products of their industry upon the markets of the world in the form of fresh fish.

I believe that there are great opportunities of development in this country that can keep the fishing industry quite apace with all possible demands which may be made upon it by reason of the increased population of the western provinces. The government are each year spending large sums of money to induce immigrants to occupy the fertile plains of the west, and are building railways to afford these people railway accommodation and such means of transportation as will give them the best possible facilities for the handling of the products of their labours. One of the most important of all the duties which this committee would be called upon to discharge would be to consider that very question of transportation. We are face to face with the fact that the fishermen of the maritime provinces are not able to send the products of their industry into the centres of population throughout Canada and as a consequence the fishing industry is not as remunerative for them as it otherwise might be. I do hope that one of the first matters to be taken into consideration by this committee is that very question of transportation, in order to see if we cannot devise some means by which the fresh fish of Nova Scotia can be sent forward to Ontario, Quebec and the west with that facility with which the manufactured goods and the flour of Ontario and western Canada are sent into the maritime provinces. The interchange of commodities spoken of some thirty or forty years ago as likely to arise from the construction of the Intercolonial Railway has not taken place with that plenitude that the supporters of confederation at one time hoped for. I am rather inclined to think that the balance of trade has been altogether against the maritime provinces; the people of Ontario and Quebec, enterprising as they are, have got rather the best of us in the matter of trade, and while they have sent down hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of their manufactured products into the maritime provinces they have taken very little from us except the actual money paid for the purchase of their goods.

It is upon the natural resources of the maritime provinces that we must rely to make up that interchange of commodities which should exist between the eastern and western provinces. We do send some coal into Quebec and a very small portion into Ontario, but apart from that item we send scarcely anything into western Canada or into the great central provinces. The question of transportation is the obstacle which has retarded the development of the increase which I have suggested, and I am firmly of the opinion that that condition might be ameliorated if this question of transportation were taken up and the products of the fisheries of the maritime provinces were given a special rate by which they would be able to reach the populous centres of Canada.

I have said that the apparent decline in the fisheries of the maritime provinces is not due to the depletion of that industry but rather to a change of conditions. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) referred to the fact that in western Nova Scotia the sail boat is largely disappearing and the fishermen are resorting to gasolene boats for the prosecution of their industry. I must confess that I am not sufficiently familiar with the customs regulations on that point, but as the time has come when it is absolutely necessary for the fishermen of the maritime provinces to prosecute their calling by gasolene boats rather than by the ordinary sail and row boats, the purchase of these engines is going to amount to a considerable item to the fishermen. The Minister of Customs might then well consider if he cannot find his way clear to reduce to some extent at least the duty on gasolene engines which will hereafter become an actual necessity for the fishermen of this country.

The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean) referred to another question which is of vital importance to the people of the maritime provinces, that of the coasting privileges enjoyed by vessels flying a foreign flag. That question was to some extent settled, I understand, by an order in council passed some six or seven months ago, but there are, it appears to me, other questions involved in that which may well occupy the attention of this House and the appointing of a committee as suggested this afternoon would simplify to my mind a great many of the difficulties that would be encountered were we obliged to present these questions to the full House. I do not imagine for a moment that the people who are engaged in the fishing industry of Canada are less capable of prosecuting their calling than they were in the past. I am convinced that were the opportunities given to them and were the changed conditions which have come about in the last twenty years in relation to that industry, simplified and made easier for them by means of such legislation and such acts of co-operation as this parliament can bring about, the shore fisheries of the maritime provinces would be as profitable as ever they were.

To illustrate this point, let me say that in the last season the fishermen of the maritime provinces, or of Nova Scotia at all events, enjoyed the satisfaction of getting the greatest amount of shore fish that they have taken in any season during the last forty years. The catch of mackerel in Nova Scotia far exceeded that of any other year and naturally we would be inclined to the opinion that last year was a most profitable year for the fishermen. I regret, however, to have to say that the very contrary was the case. The fishermen of Nova Scotia, not having markets or means of transportation available which would enable them to send their fish fresh into such markets as purchase fish in that condition, lost a large proportion of their catch by reason of being unable to cure them; and when they cured them they lost a great proportion of their profit by reason of the falling market resulting from the large catch in eastern Nova Scotia. Thus we come back to the great question of transportation, which after all is the one affecting the price of fish to our people and I would be glad indeed if this committee, if appointed, would take into consideration that question, which transcends, I believe, all others affecting the prosperity of our fishing population.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North). Mr. Speaker, representing as I do a very large body of fishermen in the maritime provinces, and as almost all of the members of this House who represent fishing counties have spoken, it would probably be regarded as indifference on my part if I allowed this opportunity to pass without saying something on behalf of the large body of fishermen in my county. At the outset, let me congratulate the hon. gentlemen who are new members in this House, like myself, who have spoken on this question, particularly the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) who has just taken his seat, upon the very excellent presentation of his case and of his own abilities as a representative which he has made in this House. The same would apply to my hon. friends, the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) and the member for Digby (Mr. Jameson). The only little cloud upon the horizon in the remarks of my hon. friend from Digby was the introduction of party politics into this matter. That was not at all necessary and did not add at all to the strength of his argument.

Mr. JAMESON. What politics did I introduce?

Mr. McKENZIE. I refer to my hon. friend's statement at the outset that it was very necessary to perform a surgical operation on some part or limb of the Marine and Fisheries Department. He almost provoked me into saying that possibly an operation might be beneficial somewhere else just as well. But leaving that point—and I have no other fault to find with the observations of the hon. member—and possibly his introduction of politics to the extent he did was because he may have thought it necessary to stamp himself clearly and distinctly so as to show to which side of the House he belonged, and we know that some of the men in the colony opposite might be charged with supporting the Opposition while they are supporting the Government—let me say that although I may be called a new member, I was in this House a little while once before, and had then the opportunity of saying something very much along the lines of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution (Mr. Sinclair) and I wish to express my endorsation of what he said. My hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) has given much credit, and with perfect truth, to Mr. Nickerson, member of the local House for the county of Shelbourne, for what he has done to improve the condition of our fishermen. But let me tell my hon. friend that I was also in the local House at that time and so was my hon. friend who moved this resolution (Mr. Sinclair), and the first time that Mr. Nickerson ever appeared as a member of a committee appointed to deal with fishery matters, was upon a committee moved for by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). Yet it would almost appear, from the remark of the hon. member from Digby that Mr. Nickerson had to fight a battle in the local House in order to get such concessions for the fishermen of Nova Scotia as they were entitled to and in order to bring their case before the public. My experience in the local House does not bear out that contention. I always found that the members of that House were ever willing to do whatever they could in behalf of any industry in the maritime provinces or in any part of Canada which could be benefited by anything our local legislature could do. I would not like to charge any member with a desire to do otherwise than promote to the best of his ability any industry in this country which might tend to the general welfare and add to the comfort and wealth of the people. The consensus of opinion expressed to-day in favour of the resolution before us would bear out that remark. I do not think that we have to expect from either side other than the fullest and best assistance in all such matters. As regards this resolution, it is not necessary that I should say anything in its behalf because there is only one side to it. No one can question that the case is a strong one and that the fishing industry is most important and if the appointment of the committee is going to aid the further development of that industry there can be no possible objection. So far as the county I have the honour to represent is concerned, I may say that we catch more fish on the coast of Victoria county than possibly in any other county in the Dominion, and we enjoy the reputation of making the best cured fish that can be procured in the maritime provinces. There is a gentleman in Halifax, whose name I do not recall at the moment, who last year was called upon to gather for some people in the United States a large quantity of first-class fish. I am proud to say that he found more of the high grade fish he required along the northern part of Victoria county than in any other part of the maritime provinces. I agree with my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) that it is not the Department of Marine and Fisheries alone which can assist in developing this great industry. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries and his department have done much, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), but the Department of Railways can also come into play in this matter. That department can do a good deal in furnishing the proper kind of cars fitted for this industry, and we look to it to furnish first-class cars and give us such rates as will enable us to place our fish in the markets of central Canada and incidentally in some of the markets further west and also in the United States. The Department of Public Works can also do much to help out the fishermen, especially along the exposed coast in Nova Scotia, and in that connection our position is perhaps not as well understood by some of our members from the west as it ought to be. We find that our fish are taken away from our very doors by Americans who are better equipped than we are, and with whom we cannot compete successfully on account of our lack of harbour facilities and of large vessels and boats. The consequence is that American schooners come from Boston and other places along the coast right up to the edge of the three-mile limit and sometimes within that limit, and catch our fish and carry it to the United States markets and sell it there whence it often finds its way back to Canada and is sold in Toronto and Montreal and other large centres. That is the condition of things which exist to-day, and it does not require any argument to point out how much better it would be to have our fish caught by our own people, along our coast, and carried directly to our own markets and sold to our own people. Our fishermen would then get better prices than they can to-day, even when they sell to Americans and our consumers would get fresher fish at less prices. It will therefore be necessary for the Public Works Department to spend some money in giving us harbours of refuge at different places and thus enable our fishermen to compete with the Americans who have larger vessels and are in a better condition to catch fish. I cordially endorse what my hon. friend from Richmond has said to the effect that wherever possible we should do something for our fisheries, by lowering the customs duties, particularly upon their nets or engines or whatever else enters into that industry, and in every other possible way. I may say in conclusion that I agree entirely in the observations of the different gentlemen who have addressed the House in this matter. I did not rise for the purpose of making out a case because that was made out by the mover of the resolution, and the case required only to be stated to the House in order to make it clear that whatever we can do to carry forward this great industry should be done by the government with the assistance of every hon. member of this House.

Mr. J. W. MADDIN (Cape Breton South). Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to take part in this debate and to express my approval of the resolution as moved by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). I agree with some of the speakers who have preceded me that the fishing industry in Nova Scotia has decayed to some extent of late years, and that this is true of the fisheries of the whole Atlantic sea-board of Canada. A number of causes have contributed to the decadence of this industry, most of which have been enumerated by the speakers who preceded me. But I would suggest that one reason why the fisheries of Nova Scotia, and the maritime provinces generally, are not prosecuted more closely than they have been of late years is to be found in the local conditions obtaining in the fishing villages. The social conditions and environment are so different from those of other parts of the province that there are but slight inducements to the rising generation to remain in these fishing villages. For instance, I would call the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) to the fact that there are a large number of fishing villages on the Atlantic sea-board in which they have only one mail a week. Cut off from railway facilities, from telegraph and telephone lines, these places are so isolated, so cut off from society, that there is but little to attract the rising generation to continue to live in them and prosecute the fisheries. I agree with the speakers who have preceded me on both sides in approving this resolution. I believe a committee such as is proposed, will have a far-reaching effect in restoring conditions in connection with the fisheries of the maritime provinces. And, if the scope of this committee is made wide enough, and its inquiries go far enough, they may develop a number of causes that have led to the conditions now existing and that are not generally known to the members of this House or to the people of this Dominion. It was only a matter of eighteen months ago that I counted 31 American schooners fishing off the coast of my county in broad daylight and well within the three mile limit, and no gunboat there to protect the interests of the people of Nova Scotia. It is pretty well known that a large percentage of the mackerel catch of the Gloucester fleet around our coast are taken within the three mile limit. And it is well within the knowledge of some members of this House that a vessel loaded to the hatches with mackerel, caught within two miles of the shore was taken to the port of Halifax, and that, after the vessel had lain there two or three weeks, her owners paid $400 and she was released. Our law is clear on this subject. If that vessel was guilty of infringing our law both cargo and vessel should have been seized and confiscated, but if she was not guilty, both should have been released without penalty. There are American capitalists who would readily capitalize companies to-morrow to come within our three-mile limit, deplete our inshore fisheries, and load their vessels to the hatches with mackerel, if they could do it on paying a fine of $400. Then, if I may, I would bring to the attention of the House the question of license for the packing of fish. In the province of Nova Scotia, I believe, the whole catch of the lobster fishery is packed by ten or twelve concerns. Under the conditions that exist, whilst the fishermen are paid a certain amount per pound live weight, they are not informed with regard to market values of the packed article and so do not know what value to put upon their catch. I am at a loss to know, and should be glad to be informed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or any hon. member of this House, why it is that a man who catches lobsters cannot come ashore and can them as he dries his codfish or pickles his herring or mackerel. Why so important an industry as lobster packing should be a monopoly in the hands of ten or twelve people who are enabled to get a license to pack the catch is a matter wholly beyond me. With regard to the other aspect of the question, the social conditions in the fishing villages, this might be helped by daily mail services, and this is a subject that the Postmaster General might take up in the broad manner which has characterized him in other things. I do not wish to approach this question in a partisan spirit or drag politics in. I well believe that it is the desire of the Postmaster General to facilitate the mail service and to grant services as far as possible. If he would take into consideration the claims of the fishing villages in the isolated parts of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—and perhaps in the province of British Columbia for all I know—it would go a long way to make the homes in these villages more attractive to the young people and so induce them to remain. I strongly endorse this resolution of the hon. member for Guysborough, believing that it will result in good to those who go down to the sea in ships and brave the perils of the deep, who are such an important class to the Dominion of Canada, and who at great danger to themselves are contributors in no small measure to the wealth of Canada on both the Atlantic and Pacific sea-boards.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, N.B.) It seems to me that we have wandered far over this resolution, and that we have discussed the merits of the fishing industry more than the merits of the resolution itself. I may add, however, that there can be no question that the problem of transportation is so intertwined with that of the fishing industry, that if anything can be done to improve transportation it certainly would be in the interest not only of the producers but of the consumers of fish in Canada. It seems to me that Ontario and Quebec should consume more of our eastern fish than they do. It is to be regretted that fish coming from the American sea-board should be brought in under duty and consumed by the cities of Toronto and Montreal instead of their bringing in fish from Halifax or other sea-board towns in Canada. In my own county, the urgent matter is transportation.

For example, a petition has been presented to the government asking them to build a branch line along the Miramichi river, and along the sea coast, a coast where large quantities of smelts are at present taken and during the summer season large quantities of Atlantic salmon. These fish, during the winter season, have to be teamed about twenty miles to the nearest Intercolonial railway station, and then, if they are to be sent off in a fresh condition, must be sent by express. I want to say that the express rates, although they are lower than in former years, are still too high, and if anything can be done to bring about a reduction in the express charges on fresh fish. I believe it would be in the interest of all concerned, of the consumer as well as of the producer. It seems to me that if the committee suggested in the resolution can assist in any way to bring that about it would certainly do some good. It is really singular that now we seem to be united on the importance of this resolution, and yet parliament has been discussing the management of the Marine and Fisheries more or less for the last forty years without action in this regard. Judging from the expressions we have heard from both sides, we wonder why a committee of this nature was not heretofore appointed. I certainly think it would be in the interest of the country at large that it should be appointed at once.

Mr. J. W. DANIEL (St. John City). I did not anticipate making any remarks on this resolution, but after hearing the statements that have been made by hon. gentlemen on both sides, I feel that I cannot allow the opportunity to pass without saying a word or two. I have great pleasure indeed in supporting the resolution which has been brought before the House by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). Although I come from a part of the country where the inhabitants are perhaps not so deeply interested in fishery questions as they are in Nova Scotia, still I can say that the fisheries of the Bay of Fundy are very valuable, and should be preserved and developed. We have there, on both sides of the bay, both on the Nova Scotia side and the New Brunswick side, very valuable fisheries indeed. The regulations that have been framed, I was going to say enforced, but I cannot go that far—the regulations of the Marine Department in regard to bay fishing, and inshore fishing, and river fishing are not carried out. I have heard it stated over and over again that the fishery overseers find it almost useless to prosecute men for breaking the regulations, because as soon as a man is reported, influence is brought to bear in his favour, the fine is remitted, and the fishery officer is discouraged from doing his duty. A great deal of that is done. I think that if a special committee such as proposed by this resolution were appointed to look into these matters, and were given some measure of control, the regulations of the department would be better carried out. Several other important matters in connection with the fisheries have been brought up this afternoon. There is the curing of fish, and the packing of fish. I understand from a little booklet that has been distributed among the members that the packing of fish in the maritime provinces is very badly done, that there is no standard package, that the packages leak, and the fish put into them are allowed to deteriorate in quality; the packages are not tight enough and strong enough, and the brime leaks out to the consequent damage of the fish. These are some of the important matters that such a committee might look after. Then there is the matter of dynamiting fish. I saw in the press the other day that some American fishermen were driven off from some of our inland waters for dynamiting fish. I may say, although I have heard it contradicted in this House, that the inland waters of Canada are not the only waters on which dynamiting takes place. I have myself, when sailing on the Bay of Fundy, heard shots fired by persons who were dynamiting fish. This is something that ought to be looked into, along with the other matters I have mentioned.

Then there is the matter of the dogfish nuisance which has several times engaged the attention of this House. Last year I think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was presented with a petition from the Board of Trade of St. John, who were requested to do so by a large number of fishermen residing on the Bay of Fundy, the petition dealing with the Dogfish Reduction Works. A copy of it was put into my hands, and I took the trouble to communicate with several persons whom I thought would be able to give me some information as to the success or non-success which was attending the establishment of these reduction works. I will ask the House to listen while I read some of the communications I have received. They are from practical men, and would be of value in a consideration of this subject. The first letter I wrote was to A. H. Whitman, of Canso, N.S., whose name I think the minister will remember, and I am sure the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) is acquainted with it. I asked my correspondents to reply to the following questions:

1. Are the reduction works an advantage to the fishermen? If so, in what way?

2. Is the price paid for dogfish fair and reasonable?

3. Do the establishment and use of the reduction works have any effect in diminishing the numbers of dogfish?

Mr. DANIEL.

I will first read Mr. Whitman's letter, which is signed by A. H. Whitman & Son, Ltd.:

Canso, N.S., January 23, 1908.

J. W. Daniel, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—We have your favour of 13th instant, and may say in reply that the dogfish reduction works here have not yet reached a point where they can be called a commercial success.

They operated only a few weeks last season while the dogfish were so plentiful as to interfere with the catching of food fish. We were much less troubled with dogfish in 1907, than for several years past, and are of the opinion that they are leaving these shores.

The quality of both fertilizer and oil manufactured each year has improved as the men have become more familiar with the work. The fishermen will not catch dogfish when they can get any other fish to catch. The quantity caught makes so little impression upon the hordes that used to infest the coast that it cannot be noticed.

Messrs. E. K. Goodwin, George Walsh, John McNeary and James Lumsden are four intelligent fishermen here who probably have opinions of their own about this dogfish work. As a rule the fishermen are glad to have it in operation, but unless dogfish are very plentyful it is operated only at a loss.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that I asked this gentleman to furnish me with the names of some fishermen who would be able to give information as to the success or otherwise of these reduction works. I will read the replies I received from these men, every one a practical fishermen:

Canso, N.S., February 15, 1908.

J. W. Daniel, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your favour inquiring about the dogfish reduction works, and in reply beg to say.

This is the question :

1. Are the reduction works an advantage to the fishermen, if so in what way? Materially in giving employment at the time when no other branch of fishing can be successfully prosecuted on account of the dogfish pest.

2. Is the price paid for dogfish fair and reasonable? No, I think not, it does not warrant a general outlay for catching them.

3. Does the establishment and use of the Reduction Works have any effect in diminishing the number of dogfish? I cannot say, there is so few caught that they are not missed much from the great schools that invade our shores. I might say that one of our oldest citizens, who has made a success of fishing, says in his opinion the Reduction Works is the best thing the government has ever done for the fishermen.

Hoping you may use your influence for the establishment of a number more along the coast, I remain, yours very truly, E. M. Goodwin.

The next letter is from James R. Lumsden:

1. Are the Reduction Works an advantage to the fishermen? If so, in what way? Yes, in the first place when the dogfish come in on the shore it puts a stop to all other fishing as they destroy nets and gear. The fisherman can make very good pay in catching them.

2. Is the price paid for dogfish fair and reasonable? Yes.

3. Does the establishment and use of the Reduction Works have any effect in diminishing the numbers of dogfish? I do not think the Reduction works has been in operation long enough to answer that question, but the dogfish in our bay for the year 1907 were the scarcest they have been for years. Whether the Reduction Works had anything to do with it or not or some other cause I don't know. My opinion is that there ought to be several reduction plants along the shore as it is quite a task for one plant to do the work because it cannot grind up all that is caught in this place.

I remain, yours truly,
(Sgd.) JAMES R. LUMSDEN,

The next reply is from George Walsh:

Dear Sir,—By the use of the Reduction Works these pests become an industry and are disposed of for value which certainly is an advantage to fishermen.

The price paid for dogfish is fair and reasonable.

Use of the Reduction Works has an effect in diminishing the dogfish.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) GEORGE WALSH.

There is only one more letter and I will read that:

Sir,—In reply to your respective inquiries re the Reduction Works at Canso, I wish to say they are a great advantage to our fishermen; they afford a market for dogfish which infest our fishing grounds from August until about the end of October and which formerly prevented our men from fishing during those months.

At the price paid for dogfish a man can make a fair day's pay when fish are plentiful.

Dogfish were not nearly so plentiful on our fishing grounds last year as in former years. I believe the numbers of dogfish will decrease in proportion to the number of reduction works in operation.

I am, sir,
Yours truly,
(Sgd.) JOHN McNEARY,
Canso, N.S.

These are the opinions of practical fishermen and each one of them approves of the establishment of dogfish reduction works. As far as the Bay of Fundy is concerned we have no dogfish reduction works there and I know from practical experience, having seen them, that the Bay of Fundy is filled with these pests to the detriment, I was almost going to say, destruction, of the food fish which come into that bay in such large quantities. They are so destructive that they destroy the nets, they destroy the food fish that are on the hooks of the trawls even as they are being hauled from the bottom of the sea up to the boats to be taken in by the fishermen. When I spoke upon this question before I referred to a very graphic description given to me by one of the fishermen whom I interviewed after he had come ashore and who assured me that of a catch upon the trawls, which contained about 2,000 hooks, 1,700 food fish, as they drew them up to their boats, had been eaten off to the heads by the dogfish and destroyed; so that instead of having a good haul of food fish the man who had spent his time had simply made a haul of heads of food fish and the hooks that were hanging to the trawls. That is something that took place to my own knowledge in the Bay of Fundy and it is a striking example of what is taking place there all the time. I think that matter is one that might well be taken up by a committee such as is foreshadowed by the resolution before the House moved by the hon. member for Guysborough. There are other points which I might bring up but most of them have already been brought before the House by those who have preceded me. I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution.

Mr. HONORE GERVAIS (Montreal, St. James). Mr. Speaker, I would ask the House to be allowed to say one word in support of this resolution. There is only one course to be taken by the House and that is the adoption of this resolution. Many things have been said and well said in favour of the resolution. There is no doubt that the trouble with regard to the fishing industry does not lie with the lack of improved apparatus or of facilities for catching fish, but I think that the whole trouble comes from the lack of proper facilities for selling the fishermen's product. As a matter of fact, most of the fish caught along the shores of the maritime provinces are sold in the United States, and the people of Montreal have been in the habit for the last twenty years of importing part of this same fish into Canada. We have been paying for the last ten years as much as $5,000 per week to the railway companies for the transportation of fresh fish from the United States to Montreal. We have been paying to this government as much as $3,000 per week for duty on that fish. I think that the difficulties against which the fishermen of the maritime provinces are now contending arise from the lack of proper facilities, such as refrigerators and fish markets, in the great cities of the central portion of Canada. By establishing a system of fish refrigerators along our coast, by building especially equipped railway cars for the transportation of live fish according to the German fashion, by transporting the fish rapidly from the seashore to the great cities and by the construction of buildings or fish markets in Montreal, Toronto and elsewhere for the proper handling and sale of fish, the existing difficulties will be largely overcome and the fishermen of the maritime provinces will again enjoy that progress and prosperity with which they were blessed in bygone days.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Mr. Speaker, before the minister replies I would like to say a word or two with reference to this question. Those who are older in time and experience in the House I think cannot but feel very great satisfaction in listening to the discussion which has taken place this afternoon. The discussion has not been directed to the end of passing the resolution. That I suppose was a foregone conclusion from the first; the discussion has rather tended towards eliciting information and suggestions from a great many different points of view as to the fishery industry in all its phases. With reference to the resolution itself, I have not heard any good reasons why the two departments of Marine and Fisheries should be included in it. There is a very wide field of work for such a committee with reference to the fisheries, but it seems to me that the department itself ought to be quite capable of dealing with what are peculiarly marine matters. Now, we are going to have this committee and very possibly it is but the forerunner of other such committees. We must keep in mind that while economizing the time of parliament we must not by the appointment of committees deprive the House itself of its proper workers. As a rule our committees are too large; they might with a very great deal of profit be very largely diminished in the numbers of their members, because the larger the committee the greater the aggregate of party feeling in it and the more numerous the extraneous questions which are discussed. In my opinion the actual power for work of a committee increases in the ratio of the fewness of its members. We lose a vast deal of time in some of our large committees, and holding this opinion I would not have this committee composed of more than 15 or 20 members, selected from both sides of the House. I would have it an absolutely good working committee, not a committee which would be fishing for this or fishing for that, but a committee which went straight at its object of conserving our fish resources and broadening and developing the industry. If we are to have committees on our great natural resources there will be three or four more of such, and, in my opinion, no man can serve efficiently upon more than two committees. If he does his work well on one important committee, that, together with his work on the floor of this House, and the conduct of his correspondence, gives him plenty to do. With reference to the fishery question itself, I think it will be acknowledged by all members of this House that the tendency is, each year that passes, towards the greater depletion of the fisheries. That is the tendency in our lumber industry, it is the tendency in our coal and mineral industries, but it is more particularly the tendency with regard to our fisheries. Our population is continually increasing, fish foods are more eaten, the means of transportation are every day becoming better and cheaper, fresh fish is more easily obtained and there is a greater consumption of it. As the price of fish rises, and it is constantly rising, old methods give place to new; the less destructive methods of catching fish are supplanted by more destructive methods and the constant effort is to take as many of the denizens of the waters as possible from their habitat and transfer them to the tables of the people. All this is a constant menace to our fisheries. There is more than that. Don't let the people of the maritime provinces think that the only fish in the world are to be found in the salt water. The fisheries in our inland waters are of immense benefit to our people. The source of supply from these inland fisheries is near to the people and it is most important that there should be a perennial never failing supply of fish from these inland waters. Both the inland and the salt water fisheries are of course important, but with the distribution of the increased population in our country, the inland fishery industry is perhaps more important still. If, in view of the increasing demand, you allow destructive methods of fishing then the inland fisheries will be depleted in such a ratio that it does not require very long vision to see the practical disappearance of our food fish. To-day the vast majority of fish that are taken from our inland waters are transported to the markets of another country and are eaten by people in Chicago, Detroit, or Boston, who do not care if it is the last fish in the stream so long as they get it on their breakfast table. The Minister of Marine, the members of the government, the members of this House, have read the statistics and they know that this is the truth. It is time there was a stop put to it. It may be ultra doctrine but it is a doctrine that every good Canadian will subscribe to that the food fishes of this country exist primarily for the consumption of the people of Canada, not even for the consumption of this generation of Canadians but for the consumption of future generations. If we set our minds to it, it is possible for us to keep up a perennial supply of fish in these inland waters, as well as in our salt waters, so long as Canadians require fish food. I do not believe that any one will doubt that. But we have to be more heroic than we have been. The minister has got to be able to say to the supporter who comes to him, when both of them are absolutely certain that all the fish have been taken out in that season that ought to be taken out, that he will not permit any extension of the close season, or any departure from the regulations, that he will not yield to any request or any pressure, however strong. I know as an administrator in that department and as an observant member of the body politic, that this is a tremendous force in this country, and we have got somehow or other to eliminate patronage from the fisheries of this country. That one sentence contains it all. We have got to place this branch of the public service either departmentally or by a commission, under hard and fast, scientific, reasonable, common-sense jurisdiction and administration. If we do that we can have fish, if we do not do that we will come to a time when we will not have fish. I have a letter from a man who knows what fisheries are, because he was born amongst them, brought up with them and spent a part of his life in both fishing and dealing and has taken a wide interest in the subject. What does he tell me? Within ten years, unless we do something more than we are doing now, it will not be possible to get a decent sized lobster along the Atlantic coast of Canada. We have been warned about that. The lobsters have been a diminishing race until they have almost entirely vanished from the coast of the United States, they have been pushed gradually, further and further north until they have now passed the Maine coast which has a very little remnant of lobster fishing left and the Americans are invading our coast. To-day you boil lobsters from 4 to 9 inches long. The law says you shall not, but the inspector does not say you shall not nor does the administration. This man writes and gives instances where inspectors shut their eyes to the fact that hundreds of thousands of lobsters were boiled last year and canned which were from four to nine inches in length, more nearer four than nine.

Now we must, government and opposition, set our faces like flint with reference to these great fish resources of this country, if we hope to keep them and to hand to our children those inestimable blessings of food fishes which have been ours so luxuriously and abundantly. To-day we have six million people, before long we will have twelve million, then twenty, then thirty, then forty million, and still I say that if we do rightly in this matter our forty million people can have their food fishes many years from now just as we have them now, but they cannot unless we take hold of this matter.

Then we want education. I do not believe that a fisherman, although he is born in the brine and goes to sea every day in the year, ever passes the time when some good information will not be useful to him. Your farmer is in the same position, so is every man. We do not grow up into special knowledge. What has been done by the Department of Agriculture? Whatever has not been done or has been done, whatever have been the lapses or excellencies of that department, one thing is certain, that by a persistent method of generally enlightened education they have taught the farmers of this country and have brought them up by large strides ahead of where they were before this education began. I think a similar method of education can be adopted for the fishermen. It is one thing to catch a fish, it is another thing to land that fish on the table of the ultimate consumer, so that the fisherman shall have as large a proportion of the profit as possible, and this cannot be done unless proper methods are used. I am not here to teach the fishermen, I cannot do it, I do not know myself what is necessary, but I say that the Fisheries Department ought to lay itself out to get at methods not so much of catching fish, the fishermen will attend to that, but methods of curing, packing, and all that tends to make the ultimate market value the highest possible and so bring the greatest profit to the person who is engaged in the business. I am heartily in favour of this resolution. I was glad to hear our young men take such sane ground and such intelligent ground with reference to this matter as they have this afternoon. I have seldom heard a debate in this House participated in by so many young men which has been so free from anything that was not germane to the subject and which has been stuffed so full of good common sense, as the speeches we have heard this afternoon from our young members.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). Mr. Speaker, I think we must congratulate ourselves upon the contributions which have been made to this debate by some of the new members of the House. Their knowledge of local circumstances has enabled them to give us the best information upon the important question of the fisheries. I hope this will not be the last time when this question of fisheries will come before the House and we will hear such speeches as we have heard to-day. I congratulate the new members very heartily upon the way in which they have discharged their duties in the circumstances, and I am sure that this debate will have a very good effect on the relations between these members and the administration of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Several important questions have been dealt with during this debate. I shall first discuss the question which is at issue, namely the formation of a new committee of this House. Committees of this House are formed for the purpose of dealing with the ordinary legislation or with the work of the session. The session is called for a special purpose, for the purpose of passing laws and making legislation, the voting of supplies and the controlling and investigating of expenditures. Bills which come up before this House are generally referred to the committees in order that a few members may devote more time to the questions involved in these Bills than would be possible in the House. It would be, I think, contrary to the ordinary principles which are followed in the British House of Commons if we were to form committees which will make all sorts of investigations. I understand that in some cases investigations are absolutely necessary, but the particular work which the committees are called on to perform is the work of legislation. That is, I am sure, the object which my hon. friend had in view when he proposed that a committee of this House should be appointed to look into the questions relating to Marine and Fisheries. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) said a few minutes ago that no reason had been adduced in the debate why the Marine should be joined with the Fisheries in this committee. During two or three of our last sessions some very important Bills were brought before this House relating to marine. These were referred to special committees which investigated and reported, and these reports were embodied in the laws we passed last session. When last year my hon. friend made a motion for the formation of a committee on Fisheries, I asked him whether he would not be willing to add to this resolution the subject of Marine, as the two were very closely connected, and might be investigated by the same committee. That was the object I had in view. Various important Bills come up nearly every year concerning Marine, and I thought that since it was the opinion of the House and the government that we should have a Committee on Fisheries, it would be just as well to give to that committee the power to deal with the questions of Marine. That is why I asked my hon. friend to add to his motion questions affecting Marine as well as those affecting Fisheries. In England and in the United States it is the same committee which deals with both questions. I am glad to see that there is no objection at all to the formation of this committee, and the government accepts with the greatest pleasure the motion made by my hon. friend, and in a few days will be able to submit amendments to our existing rules, which no doubt will receive the unanimous consent of the whole House?

My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), has mentioned some of the things which have been done by the government, and has spoken of the importance of improving our transportation system. Several other members have also dealt with this question, and I may be permitted to say a word or two on it. I was sorry indeed to find out, when I came to the department, that a large quantity of our fish, instead of being shipped direct from the maritime provinces or the great lakes to our centres of consumption, were sent to the United States and in some cases reshipped from the United States to Canada. It is a great pity indeed that our fisheries should be exploited by American fishermen in this way, and I thought that by encouraging the transportation of fish from the maritime provinces and the great lakes to Canadian centres we would hereby divert that trade from the United States. I was also sorry to hear that some of our banking institutions were not very willing to lend money on our fisheries. I do not know why they refused to give advances for the development of that valuable industry, with the result that the business, instead of being carried on by our own people, was carried on by Americans. I have no objection to our exporting some of our fish, as we are producing much more than we consume—and have to depend on foreign markets to some extent, but I regret, in common with my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), that any exporting should be done to our detriment and that our fisheries should become depleted. It therefore becomes necessary to find out whether there be not some means of preventing it. As regards transportation, let me state what we did last year with the $25,000 voted by parliament. During the months of September, October, and November, the department made an arrangement with the Express Companies by which these companies charged the shippers of fish only two-thirds of the regular express rates, and collected the other one-third from the department. This gave the shipper from Halifax to Montreal $1 per 100 lbs. The express rate from Boston to Montreal is 80 cents, and the duty $1, making the total $1.80 per 100 lbs., thus giving an advantage to the shippers from the maritime provinces to Montreal over the shippers to American ports. The result has been extraordinary. It is true that the Minister of Customs received less revenue from fish, evidently as the result of the policy we have pursued. But I have been glad to hear from merchants in Halifax and in Montreal that there is a larger demand for fish brought direct from our Atlantic sea-board. One merchant in Montreal, I am informed, received 50,000 pounds more within one month than he used to receive in former years. This he attributes to the policy we have adopted. The cost to the department is almost nothing. I have not the figures by me at the moment, but they are very small. We intend to continue the policy, and have agreed to renew the arrangement, beginning on the 20th instant.

I do not think it necessary to go at length into a description of what the government has done for the development of the fisheries. I may mention briefly the cold storage for bait and also the cold storage for fish that we have established. Each of these is very important, the latter being the means of putting the fish on the market in the proper condition. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Daniel) has referred to the dogfish. The reduction works that we have established are more or less of an experimental nature. I realize that they have not been a commercial success so far. For that reason, we cannot expect private parties to enter upon this industry now. But we are going to carry on these experiments for some time yet, and, should we be able to prove that this work can be carried on on a commercial basis, we expect that private capital will embark in the industry and that there will be no further necessity for the government to carry on these experiments. We have established also hatcheries in different parts of the country, and it is expected that, with the money to be voted for next year, others may be established. My hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) has spoken of the way in which our statistics are collected, and has given an instance in which figures were collected from the fishermen and afterwards from those in charge of curing establishments and the two were added together in the report. I should be greatly surprised if this could happen. However, if my hon. friend has the exact information at hand, he would oblige me greatly by giving it to me, in order that a recurrence of such instances may be prevented.

Mr. JAMESON. I would like to ask the minister if an officer of his own department was not sent to Nova Scotia to inquire into this very matter of discrepancy in these statistics?

Mr. BRODEUR. If my hon. friend will give me, even privately, the information in regard to the case he speaks of, I will see to it that instructions are given—or repeated, for instructions have already been given—as to the way these statistics should be collected. We have no desire that the results as shown by the figures should be different from what they are in fact. My hon. friend from Digby has spoken of the question of the fishery board. I agree with him; I am not ready to accept the idea of forming a board on the same lines as that which they have in Scotland. I do not think the time has come when such a board can be formed here to advantage. I find that the people in Scotland at the present day do not take advantage of the inspection provided by the board to so great an extent as might be expected. So long as the imperial government gave the money for the branding of the herring, the system went on very well, but when the payments ceased and the standard was raised there was a change. I see that during 1906 out of 1,967,862 barrels of herring sold, only 306,033 barrels were branded under the authority of the Fishery Board. Of course, a tax has to be paid for the branding of that herring, and people there, like people in this country, do not wish to be taxed, and so they are not taking advantage of this system of branding to as great an extent as formerly, owing largely of course to the high general standard of private trade marks.

My hon. friend (Mr. Jameson) says—and the same was said by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster)—that party politics should not interfere with the administration of fisheries. So far as the department is concerned, there is no party politics in the administration of the fisheries. We see to it, as well as we can, that the regulations are observed. Of course, it is not an easy matter to enforce regulations restricting the fisheries; such regulations are usually unpopular. The suggestion made by my hon. friend from North Toronto deserves consideration—that we should carry on an educational campaign to cause the fishermen to see that the enforcement of the regulations and the improvement of the methods of curing and packing would be in their own interest. As to this question of curing and packing, some years ago we engaged the services of Mr. Cowie, an experienced man, to come and teach our people to cure herring as they are cured in Scotland. The teaching given by this gentleman has, I believe, been appreciated, and I do not know of any place where his visits have not been received with delight by the fishermen and also by those engaged in curing and packing the herring.

My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean) referred to the very important Question of the modus vivendi. I would not like to discuss that question at length, but, speaking for myself, I think that the modus vivendi is not of so much benefit as some people believe. The result is that when the Americans come into our waters and procure this license to enable them to purchase supplies and outfits, to ship crews and to tranship cargoes, they are practically taking the business away from our own fishermen, they are simply controlling the business which should be done by our own fishermen, and any profits or benefit that might accrue in those fisheries go to Americans instead of Canadians. That is the view I take personally of this matter. If this committee were formed, I would like to see it study this question, and I hope that some day it will be put in a position to investigate it. I think it is a most important question. This is a business that we should try to keep in Canadian channels for the benefit of our own people. There is no reason why this business should be controlled by Americans instead of Canadians. We have the resources, we have the money, we have the intelligence among Canadians, and we ought to control the business. That is my personal view of the matter.

My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has alluded to the question of steam trawlers. In some parts of Europe steam trawlers are considered a very desirable method of fishing, but I do not think that so far they have been considered as such in our own country. Even in Europe there is a great divergence of opinion as to whether they should be used or not. In some parts of France, however, steam trawlers are used to a considerable extent, they are sent into the north sea and also to the grand banks. But in some other parts of France, especially in Normandy and Brittany, the people are strongly opposed to the use of steam trawlers. In this country there is only one opinion, and that is that steam trawlers should not be permitted within the three mile limit and the bays. So general is this feeling that we passed lately an order in council prohibiting the use of steam trawlers within such limits. Now, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) stated that some American boats had been fishing within the three mile limit, and that although they had been seized by some of our own boats, they were let off without a penalty.

Mr. MADDIN. What I said was that I saw thirty-one vessels fishing within the three mile limit. It was not one of these that was seized, but another vessel was seized, as I was informed by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby), and was taken to Halifax and held there for three weeks, and then released on payment of a fine of $400. But that was not one of the boats I saw.

Mr. CROSBY. Mr. Speaker, I thought we were discussing the question of the appointment of a committee. If I had known that this discussion was going to take so wide a range, I would have been glad to discuss some of these outside questions myself.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has the floor.

Mr. CROSBY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has a right to make a point of order.

Mr. CROSBY. I must say that instead of discussing the question of the appointment of a committee we have been wandering over the whole fishery question in this country as it has existed for the last ten years.

Mr. BRODEUR.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The discussion has certainly been broad, but I think that it all had relation to the advisability of appointing such a committee as is proposed, and brought forth the reasons therefore, and consequently it was in order.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand that we have been allowed to discuss the question of the fisheries generally in order to adduce reasons for the appointment of this committee. My hon. friend from Cape Breton stated a fact to which I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment. He stated that some American boats had been fishing within the three mile limit. I am greatly surprised to hear it, because generally speaking our fishery cruisers on the Atlantic coast are very diligent; their instructions are to follow closely American vessels coming there to fish, and to see that they do not come within the three mile limit. I would be greatly surprised to hear that our cruisers have been found remiss in this matter. The officers of our boats are men of great intelligence and experience, like Captain Knowlton, for instance. I would be surprised to hear that he had allowed an American vessel within the three mile limit. I know that when an infraction of the law does occur they take immediate steps, with the means at their disposal, to ascertain the fact, and if they find that the vessel is fishing within the three mile limit she is immediately seized.

Mr. CROSBY. I may say that the vessel I referred to was taken into Halifax and tied up there, and Captain Knowlton let her go. I am not here to discuss that matter now, but I will be glad to do so at any future time.

Mr. BRODEUR. Will my hon. friend give me the name of the boat in order that I may make some inquiries?

Mr. CROSBY. I will do that.

Mr. BRODEUR. Of course, we must remember that it is sometimes difficult to find out exactly whether these boats are within or without the three mile limit. They are cute, they generally keep on the border line, and when they see one of our cruisers coming they immediately get outside the limit. So it is very difficult to detect them in a violation of the law.

Mr. CROSBY. I understood the hon. member for Lunenburg to tell the minister that if a boat is seized and held up she has either got to be confiscated or released. I would like to follow him on that subject, but I will not do so now.

Mr. BRODEUR. If it turns out that in some cases our officers have been remiss in their duties, I will see that no such thing occurs again.

Mr. CROSBY. I did not intimate that anybody had not done his duty.

Mr. BRODEUR. I will not continue the discussion any longer. But in view of the reasons which have been given to this House in favour of the appointment of a committee, I may say that I concur heartily with the motion, and see no objection to its being adopted. We will see that rules are drafted later on, and will bring them down for adoption by the House.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

RAILWAY ACT—AMENDMENT.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I would ask my hon. friend to allow this to stand. I want to get something practical out of this legislation on level crossings if I can, and I am referring this Bill to the Chairman of the Railway Commission. He is in Winnipeg, I am sending all the Bills to him. I am not trying to block the Bill or anything of that kind, but I want to get his expression of opinion on all these things and see if I cannot get something practical out of them.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Bill is a public Bill and if the matter is delayed and then sent back here from the Senate, probably, it will never be concluded during this session, and this slaughter of the people at the railway crossings will go on as it has gone on notwithstanding the fact that we have tried to stop it for three years. This Bill has been very carefully considered by this House for three years. It is the product of the combined intelligence of the whole of this House after five years of discussion. I do not think that the chairman of any railway commission can tell us how to make this law. I have every respect for the Chairman of the Railway Commission as an administrator —that is his business—but I do not agree that the Chairman of the Railway Commission can give us any pointers with regard to this legislation. We as legislators are here to make law for him to carry out It is his business to carry out the law that we make in this parliament. It is the people's business to make laws, and although I have the greatest respect for the Chairman of the Railway Commission and for the present Board of Railway Commissioners, it is not within their province to tell us anything about the kind of law that the people want passed; it is their province to carry out to the full the law that we may make. In view of the fact that this House for three years unanimously adopted this as a proper piece of legislation to relieve this terrible evil existing in the country, the slaughter of helpless men, women and children at all these level crossings, we should not further delay. The House of Commons has dealt with it, the House has done its duty, three years ago the House of Commons put it up to the Senate to do their duty, it has not yet been attended to by the Senate and I warn the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) that I shall have to blame somebody if this Bill is not read a third time and sent on to the Senate as quickly as possible.

Mr. GRAHAM. I agree with a great deal of what my hon. friend has said, but we want to have something practical. As he remarked, this Bill has been passed three times by the House of Commons. I am in hopes that we can deal with this question in a way that will bring about the result that my hon. friend has in mind, and that we all have in mind, and that is to get rid as quickly as possible of the dangerous level crossings. I know it is our business to legislate but there is no person so competent to give us advice as to the most practical way to bring about the desired result as the men who are putting the law into force.

Mr. LANCASTER. They do not know the evil like we do.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend will see that the men who have to apply the law will be able to give us a lot of useful information as how best to accomplish the object we have in view.

Mr. FOSTER. Then we would have to refer all our Bills to the judges.

Mr. GRAHAM. There have been a great many Bills in the parliaments of the country that have been referred to judges before they have been passed so as to get them into the shape in which they will bring about practical results.

Mr. FOSTER. I never saw one taken out of the House in this way.

Mr. GRAHAM. This is not taken out of the House. My hon. friend is mistaken about that.

Mr. FOSTER. It is taken out of its order.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is not taken out of the House nor out of its order. I am asking this House to let the Bill stand as hundreds stand, and I am giving a reason in support of that request that will appeal to the country. It is that I may have an opportunity of conferring with the Chief of the Board of Railway Commissioners, not to defeat the object of this Bill, but to bring about the practical results that we are all looking for; that is to do away with the dangerous level crossing.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals that there has been the opportunity of a year at least to obtain the opinion of the Chairman of the Railway Commission upon this Bill. It has passed the House at least on two occasions, passed the House unanimously, and it has gone to the Senate by a unanimous vote. It seems to me rather late in the day, after the Bill has been before parliament for so long and there has been so abundant an opportunity to obtain the views of the Chairman of the Railway Commission upon it, to suggest a postponement on that account. I have every possible respect for the opinion of the Chairman of the Railway Commission in this connection, but if he desires any modification, if he suggests any modification and if that modification commends itself to the government it can be presented to the Senate and it can come back to this House for consideration later on. It does not seem to me that the suggestion of the minister is based upon any reasonable consideration for the reasons that he mentioned. In the first place, there has been abundant opportunity for more than a year to obtain the views of the Chairman of the Railway Commission. If that has not been done, it has been due to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals having too much on his mind—I suppose too much work. Well, that is not a good reason for asking delay now. Send the Bill up to the Senate and the views of the Chairman of the Railway Commission can be obtained and acted upon by the government if the government think it advisable that there should be any modification of this Bill.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac). Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the county of Frontenac which I have the honour to represent has on different occasions seen fit to petition this House, the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and at the present time the Board of Railway Commissioners, that action should be taken for the better protection of the public at level crossings I feel that I should say a word why I think this Bill of my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) should receive its third reading at the present time. I am led to think that there is some reason for this delay other than that which has been advanced by the Minister of Railways. He tells us he wants to consult with the Board of Railway Commissioners, but in view of the fact that at the last election word was sent out by the Grand Trunk Company to its employees in the county of Frontenac to cast their votes against me and in favour of my opponent, I am led to wonder if there is not another reason than that ostensibly given by the Minister of Railways. On three occasions has the House of Commons given expression to its opinion with regard to level crossings, and I was in hopes that to-night that expression of opinion would be repeated by a unanimous assent to the third reading of this Bill. The toll of death at these level crossings throughout the county of Frontenac is ever increasing. In a distance of some seven miles from the village of Collins Bay up to the Grand Trunk crossing at the outer station where two lives were lost on the 26th inst., there have been some fourteen or fifteen lives sacrificed. The rails of the Grand Trunk are red with the blood of victims along that piece of track. How much longer is the sacrifice to continue; how much longer are we going to withhold an emphatic expression of opinion that an end must be put to this state of things. There is no difference of opinion in my county about immediate action being necessary. The people are not only unanimous that action should be taken but they are indignant that action has not been taken sooner. I believe that the railway commissioners are desirous of protecting life and I know they are doing good work, but they are doing that work independently of this parliament. Why should the House delay action now? Will not delay at this time encourage the Senate to repeat its former treatment of the measure? If this were the first time such a measure as this were presented to the House there might be a reason for delay, but this Bill having been passed on several previous occasions there is no necessity for delaying it now, and I voice the opinion of my constituents when I demand that it shall receive its third reading to-day.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). We have had this Bill before the House until it has been termed a hardy annual. We have had it up for five sessions; it has been before special committees; it has been before general committees; it has been thrice passed upon by the House; we have enunciated as a House of Commons our policy upon the Bill and that policy has been frustrated by the Senate. Although I have great respect for the railway board, I do not think this parliament should surrender its judgment entirely to it. I was anxious the other day that we should have the opinion of the railway board upon the broad question of railway crossings from one end of Canada to the other, as transmitted to the minister. The very first day parliament met I put a series of resolutions on the Order Paper with reference to that matter, but this is a specific question which the hon. member (Mr. Lancaster) has advanced persistently from year to year and upon which we have proclaimed the policy of this House of Commons to the country. And because the Senate, for good reasons or otherwise—I am inclined very decidedly to think otherwise—has seen fit to bowl out this Bill there is no reason why we should delay it now unless the Minister of Railways can advance substantial reasons for a change of policy. I trust before this session ends the House shall fully consider the whole question of railway crossings throughout Canada, but that is another question altogether and it affords no reason why the special provisions of this Bill should not pass.

I am puzzled at the attitude of the Minister of Railways who thinks it desirable we should have the opinion of the railway board, and yet when the policy of the railway board on the general question of level crossings was transmitted to the Minister of Railways the other day he did not think it well that it should be submitted to the House. No doubt the Minister of Railways had good reasons for withholding that information which was so much desired by this House and so earnestly desired by the people of Canada, but is it logical that he should now recommend delay until he consults the railway board when he has in his possession the opinion of the railway board on a cognate question and refuses to submit it to parliament. The government has had ample time within the last year to consider the attitude of the Senate; they have had ample time to submit this question to the railway board, but in the meantime the sacrifice of life has been increasing and the conditions call for the immediate passage of this Bill. As has been said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), when it is considered by the Senate any reasons that are proper to be submitted to them, by the railway board or otherwise, can be submitted by the ministers for consideration of the Senate and they can send it back for our consideration. In this way proper time will be given for the proper reconsideration of this Bill which was not passed and could not be passed last session by reason of the delay in forwarding the Bill. I have a great desire that in this session we shall have a consideration of the broad question of railway protection throughout Canada, but that is no reason for delaying the passage of this Bill which we have already considered.

Mr. W. B. NANTEL. (Terrebonne). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer to this House a few remarks in French. I do not intend to make a speech, but I only wish to ask the hon. Minister of Railways a question. It seems evident that the conditions require the immediate passage of this Bill, and still the hon. gentleman recommends delay until he consults the Railway Board. Should the Board of Railway Commissioners express the opinion that it is not desirable to pass such a law, are we to bow to their decision? Not by any means, that is no reason for delaying the third reading of this Bill. I wait the answer of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is not a question at all of putting their jurisdiction against ours but we have been dealing with this for two or three years and I am anxious to have a practical result from it in a broad way. I have had a good deal of discussion with the Chairman of the Board of Commissioners upon this question, and I have asked him to put his views on the matter in a concrete form in the way of a Bill and let me read it in that form. My request is a very reasonable one; I would like to have the chairman consider this and give his ideas in concrete form. The Bill submitted by him might not be what we want, but it will be a great help. This is far beyond a private question, it affects the lives of the people. I have a message from the chairman of the Commission saying that he will do this and give me something tangible in a few days.

Mr. LANCASTER. I suppose the Minister is anxious to stop this continuous killing of people in this country. How will sending this Bill to the Senate in the usual way prevent what he wants to do? The people are demanding protection in this matter. There has been no suggestion in committee or on the second reading of any change in the Bill, and why should it not go to the Senate in the usual way? Every man's constituents from Halifax to Vancouver are demanding the stopping of this toll on human life, and unless something is done the people will take the matter in their own hands. Trains will be derailed, although I do not recommend such a course, if they are going to run at 60 miles an hour through thickly peopled portions of the community without thought of what occurs to the people on the highways. The people will not stand for all this nonsense. Let us get the opinion of the Chairman of the Railway Commission, and of everybody else that will help us, but let us not delay sending the Bill to the Senate. If the railrailways want to maintain the speed of their trains, we want speed to counteract the result of that speed. I cannot see why an extraordinary and unusual course should be taken in regard to this Bill. The minister does not pretend that the Bill would not be good law or wise legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM. My request is very reasonable. My hon. friend will see that the delay I am asking him for does not interfere with the passage of his Bill, as the Senate have adjourned until the 25th.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) is within his rights, and if he wants to press his Bill he can do so, and nobody will object. I call his attention simply to this: he has this legislation very much at heart, and in this he has the sympathy of every man in this country I am sure. What we have seen recently is simply appalling, and a stop not only should, but must, be put to it. I would ask him, however, if he is following the better course to reach the end he has in view, in which we are all prepared to second him. The legislation which he has promised is very drastic. It has twice passed this House unanimously, but it has met with a different fate in the other chamber. The only reason why it was not passed by the Senate is evidently its very drastic character. The moment this Bill passes, every railway company is liable to very heavy penalties. My hon. friend will agree that while it is reasonable that the railway company should be compelled to slacken the speed of trains when passing through thickly settled portions of the community or should take extra precautions if they want to maintain their speed, there are quite a number of localities where a level crossing is not likely to produce very severe danger.

Mr. LANCASTER. This is limited to congested portions.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Exactly, but even so a question arises as to what is a congested part, and further there are many congested parts, and if the companies may be unable, with all the good will they might have—and I do not think they have very much good will in this matter—to at once comply with the requirements of this law, they would be subject to these penalties. The Minister of Railways has already taken up the question with the man who, above all others, is competent to advise in this matter, that is the Chairman of the Railway Board. They have been in conference upon it, and my hon. friend expects that he will have before many days an answer to the inquiries that he has put to the Chairman of the Railway Board, advising him as to what in his judgment would be the best legislation.

The matter has been taken up in other countries. I understand that the state of New York has a Bill similar to the Bill of my hon. friend in intent but not in enactment whereby it is contemplated and enacted that the Bill shall come gradually into force, and perhaps it may be advisable to adopt a similar course here. My hon. friend loses nothing by this delay, but if he wants to go on he is within his right and I shall not interfere. Let me suggest to him that the Bill comes to-morrow as the first order of the day. If it is not dealt with to-morrow it comes up on the following Thursday as the first order.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will that be the result?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly. I have no intention to take away the right of my hon. friend. This Bill will come up to-morrow. If it should not, it becomes the first order of the day on the following Thursday. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Foster) set down the important motion he had for to-morrow, but he and I forgot that on Thursdays public Bills take precedence of notices of motion, and therefore we shall have to select another day. He will have an opportunity to-morrow or the following Thursday to go on with his motion.

Mr. LANCASTER. I hope the Prime Minister does not think that my sincerity will entirely run away with my judgment. I see the wisdom of what he points out and I want to hold the friendship of the House with regard to this Bill. I do not want to antagonize people in this House or outside, but I want to prevent this terrible toll if possible. On the understanding which my right hon. friend gives that this Bill will take the head of public Bills and orders, I am content, and I assume that the Minister of Railways will accept his suggestion and accelerate it as much as he can.

At six o'clock the House adjourned.

THE ROSS RIFLE.

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence):

In the answer given to Mr. Northrup on Monday, last, (page 346 of 'Hansard') in regard to the claims for damages that have been put in for injuries received through the use of the Ross rifle, it is stated that the accident to Sydney A. Fletcher, New Westminster, British Columbia, was caused by the rifle bursting. This is incorrect. The accident was caused by the cartridge case bursting and injuring the firer's eye. The rifle was not injured at all.

MOTION AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

For a copy of all corespondence, orders in council, papers, and documents relating to the question of fisheries in the Pembina river, in the province of Manitoba, and of regulations or agreements with the United States government in reference to rivers running from one country into the other.—Mr. W. H. Sharpe.

LEVEL RAILWAY CROSSINGS.

Mr. LENNOX. Can the Minister of Railways tell me when the return will be brought down as to the number of accidents at level crossings, which was ordered on my motion at the opening of the session?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). This requires quite a lot of research, but I am asking the officials to furnish all the information required by the House as speedily as possible.

REPORT OF MR. JUSTICE CASSELS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. May I ask the Secretary of State when the report of Mr. Justice Cassels will be printed and laid before the House?

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Secretary of State). I have been furnished with a memorandum showing that the first volume of evidence consisting of about 350 pages was issued in October last. It is explained that there was a gap in the manuscript caused by the evidence given in French not being translated into English. That has since been done and the second volume consisting of about 350 pages will be distributed early next week. The third volume is in type and will be distributed on or about the 16th inst., and the remaining volumes will follow in quick succession after that.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When may we expect the information promised by the Minister of Railways (Hansard, page 268) concerning the orders of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council in relation to level crossings.

Hon. Geo. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I have already brought down the order in reference to the crossing at Kingston. It is quite difficult, I understand, to get these orders of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, but an official of the Railway Department who was formerly an official of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, is endeavouring to get them.

PROTECTION OF OUR COAST LINE AND SEAPORTS.

Mr. FOSTER. Yesterday a day was set for the resolution which I propose to submit to the House, but afterwards the First Minister stated that that being government day——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not government day, but public Bills and Orders.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there any objection to taking the discussion up on Tuesday, the 15th ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is government day.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not sufficiently important ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will try to arrange a day for my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. If it does not come on that day I am afraid it will have to go over for another fortnight.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very good.

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS TREATY.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Some time ago the hon. the leader of the opposition made inquiry as to the waterways treaty which is now being considered by the Senate of the United States. I told my hon. friend we would communicate with the home authorities, and I have to-day the authority of His Excellency the Governor General to give to the House the despatch which His Excellency has received on this subject from the Earl of Crewe, the Colonial Secretary. The despatch reads:

London, January 29, 1909.

I am in receipt of your telegram of January 28, and from your telegram of January 9, I gather that your responsible advisers have the full text of the treaty before them.

According to press reports there seems to be some misunderstanding as to the presentation of the treaty to the Dominion parliament.

In this country the treaty-making power is the King, acting on the advice of his responsible ministers, who in cases of treaties which affect a Dominion Act of course in full consultation and accord with the government of the Dominion concerned.

In the United States the treaty-making power is with the advice and consent of the Senate, and until the Senate of the United States of America approve of any treaty it is not the practice to publish or present to parliament either in this country or in Canada, or to publish in the United States or to present to congress. The fact that the Senate of the United States see the treaty before the parliament of the Dominion, but not before government of the Dominion, is therefore entirely due to the terms of the constitution of the United States.

I am in hopes that your responsible advisers will clearly explain this to parliament, and will point out that the relation between the parliament of the Dominion and the government of the Dominion in this respect is practically analogous to that between the Imperial parliament and the government of His Majesty the King.

(Sgd.) CREWE.

PASSENGER TICKETS ACT.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville) moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend the Passenger Tickets Act. He said : Last year I presented this Bill in exactly the same form, but the Prime Minister did not wish it to go to the committee on account of the absence of the Minister of Railways. The Bill proposes to add two clauses to the Passenger Tickets Act. In this bill I ask that the mileage book issued by the railway companies should be good on their trains. At present if a passenger has purchased a thousand mile book and presents it on the train, the conductor cannot take the number of miles off, but has to insist on the passenger paying for a ticket. All that the owner of a book can do is to get a ticket in exchange at the station for the number of miles torn off by the agent. On the other side of the line, they issue these books, but there these books are good on the trains. I claim that when a railway company sells a mileage book, that book ought to be valid on the train as well as at the station. In Canada the railway companies charge 2½ cents per mile for their mileage books. On the other side of the line they charge 2 cents per mile; and I understand that some of the American railway companies which run trains partly through Canada, issue mileage books, which are good in Canada, at 2 cents per mile. It seems to me that our railway companies should reduce the rate to 2 cents per mile for these mileage books, and if necessary limit the duration of these books to a certain time. This matter is one which I would like the Railway Committee to discuss. Another clause in this Bill deals with the interchange of tickets from union stations. There are a number of stations in Canada which are called union stations because they are used by more than one railway company. Often the trains of different companies start almost at the same time and passengers are apt to take the wrong train. A passenger who has bought a ticket by the Canadian Pacific Railway will sometimes take the Grand Trunk Railway by mistake, and the conductor of course cannot accept his ticket. My suggestion is that if any one should happen to get on the wrong train, going to the same point, the conductor should accept his ticket, and the company would then collect from the other company who sold it. It may be said that if the passenger has the money, there is no reason why he should not buy a ticket and collect the other one from the other company. But it takes two or three months to get the money back, and often the passenger may find it almost impossible to collect it. He may be living at New York and may take the train in Toronto for Montreal and take a Canadian Pacific Railway train instead of a Grand Trunk Railway or vice versa. If he had purchased a Canadian Pacific Railway ticket and then by mistake took the Grand Trunk Railway train, there is no reason why the conductor should not accept that ticket and hand it to the company who would in turn collect the amount from the Canadian Pacific Railway. This would not cause the companies any great inconvenience, because every day they are selling tickets on which they must collect the money from one another. For instance, I purchase a ticket at Toronto for Ottawa. Half the trip is on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Canadian Pacific Railway have to collect from the Grand Trunk Railway the amount from Brockville to Ottawa. My proposition therefore will not impose on these companies any extra trouble worth mentioning. I have in my mind a case in which a woman got on a train in Toronto bound for Montreal. It was a night train. She had a Canadian Pacific Railway ticket and by mistake she got on the Grand Trunk Railway train. She had not enough money to pay for another ticket so that the conductor had to put her off at Port Hope. She was taken back to Toronto and had to stay there until the next morning so that she could not get to Montreal until the next night. This was a great inconvenience, especially as this woman had been called to Montreal on account of sickness in her family. I can see no reason why the Grand Trunk Railway should not have accepted her ticket and then collected the amount from the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Does my hon. friend know of any other case?

Mr. J. D. REID. I have heard of others but I do not suppose there are many. There are, however, some in which the hardships are very great. It is easy for a passenger to take the wrong train, and these mistakes are made generally by persons who may not have the money to purchase other tickets. These are points I would like the Railway Committee to consider and discuss. I do not want to take up the time discussing the question, as we can do that much better in committee. The right hon. the Prime Minister gave a good reason last year why he could not allow it to go to the committee, but now that the Minister of Railways is here (Mr. Graham) I would ask the right hon. gentleman to let the Bill go to the Railway Committee.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). I am not sure that we ought to hold the railway companies responsible for the mistakes which the rest of us make. While there is something in the contention of my hon. friend, I presume that there is no very extensive grievance through people getting on the wrong train with the right ticket. If the great body of the public were in the same position as my hon. friend and myself, it would make no difference to them which train they got on, but unfortunately for them they are not in that happy condition. The trouble possibly arises primarily in the fact that the stations are not constructed as they ought to be for great traffic. In a properly constructed and conducted union station of large proportions, it is almost impossible for a passenger to get on a wrong train because he cannot get in or where the wrong train is. As regards the question of mileage books being honoured on the trains, there is room for argument and I would like to hear some discussion of it by the Railway Committee. I have had conductors on Canadian trains honour my mileage coupons and I think the order which provides that they do not accept the mileage coupons except at the station, if it exists, must be of recent date However, that is worthy of discussion. There may be reasons of convenience and safety to the companies which justify such an order.

As to the question of the rate at which the books ought to be issued, I stated last night that the Canadian parliament has adopted a course with reference to the control of rates through a Board of Railway Commissioners, both as to freight and passengers, and I believe we ought, at least for the present, to give that board a fair trial in the arrangement and adjustment of rates, both passenger and freight. If there be any hardship, any reason why passenger rates should be reduced from one point to any other point, the Board of Railway Commissioners has full power under the Act to hear that complaint and adjudicate upon it. When it is said the railways of Canada must give a mileage book rate of 2 cents per mile, it is well known, particularly in a new country, that there are parts of these railway lines, and the entire road of some companies, that could not stand a rate of 2 cents per mile; but parliament, in its wisdom, has placed these matters in the hands of a Board of Railway Commissioners, deputing them to adjust the rates in different parts of the country according to the conditions that exist in that part of the country. There are some sections on new roads where it would be very unjust and unwise to tie the company down to a rate that might be perfectly fair on some other part of that same line or on some other line, and the difference of conditions existing in different parts of the country has led parliament to place this control of rates in the hands of a Board of Railway Commissioners, and I might say to my hon. friend that I am willing to have some other parts of the Bill discussed in the Railway Committee, and cannot say that this part shall not be discussed, I set my face against that part of it and say that the government could not consent to changing our policy in that direction. If there is any complaint the board has been established for the purpose of adjudicating upon such a complaint.

There may be some difference of opinion in the committee as to this interchange of tickets. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that one line now collects a rate for another line, but there is this difference: The line on which the traffic originates has a joint traffic arrangement with the line with which it connects and they divide the receipts pro rata according to their joint tariff arrangement. Under this proposition there is no joint tariff arrangement because under the system suggested, the Grand Trunk, for instance, if it sold a ticket, would simply originate the ticket and would have the contract, and it would work out that the road that originated the traffic would pay a percentage to the road that completed the traffic for collection and its part of the freight, and we would find here that the road that sold the ticket and got no profit would have to pay the road that did not sell the ticket, but got all the profit for collecting its ticket. You could not make that work in practice unless you could make the law work backwards in this particular case. My own view is that it would be difficult to work. I have had some experience in selling tickets in the past. The ticket seller has to make his returns daily; the conductor takes up a certain number of tickets and his collections must correspond eventually with the ticket seller's report of tickets for that day. If we allowed that mixing up of tickets and required one railway to honour the tickets of another railway, we would interfere a good deal with the rights of these companies and the contracts they make with the passengers.

Having said this much and explained my position in regard to the price of mileage tickets, I have no objection to having this Bill go to the Railway Committee for discussion, without committing myself to any part of the Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER. I agree with the Minister of Railways that the matter of the rates might perhaps as well be left to the Railway Commission. The minister has not dealt with the clause requiring the conductor to accept these mileage tickets. If a man once pays his money to any agent of the company, why should he have to exchange the tickets he thus buys for any other ticket? The railways sell these tickets for their own benefit, and having sold them that sale should be final. I would think that principle of the Bill ought to be sustained.

There is some need for the part of the Bill compelling a railway to honour the ticket of another railway whose trains start from the same station, as in the case of the Union station in Toronto. I have often seen people put off the train at South Parkdale because they had tickets of the other line. The trains leave at nearly the same time and there should be some protection for people who take the wrong train, particularly as the trains of the same railway do not always leave from the same platform. It might be advisable to enact that where the trains leave the same station within half an hour of each other the tickets of the other line should be honoured. The railways could honour each other's tickets in this way and adjust their accounts at the end of the month as they do in other matters. In some parts of the country there is an evil such as is sought to be remedied by clause 7b of this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

RAILWAY ACT—AMENDMENT.

On the order:

Second reading of Bill (No. 3) to amend the Railway Act.—Mr. Bickerdike.

Mr. ROBERT BICKERDIKE (St. Lawrence, Montreal). I understand that, under the arrangement arrived at just before the adjournment of the House last evening, it will be impossible for me to go on with this Bill, as the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), has taken us into his confidence and informed us that he intends to bring down a Bill to cover this case. Had this Bill gone on, I should have desired to propose an amendment in the form of additional clauses. With the permission of the House, I will read these clauses, which I commend to the favourable consideration of the Minister of Railways. My contention is that the whole of this matter should come under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission. They are the only people, I think, who can deal with it intelligently. Therefore, I would have proposed to introduce the following:

2. All highway crossings at rail/level shall be constructed, protected and maintained in accordance with the orders and regulations of the board.

3. The board may determine what highway crossings at rail level, now used, are, in its opinion, dangerous, and thereupon the board may direct the company to change the curve of the railway at such crossings, or alter the approaches thereto, or erect gates thereat, or make such other changes as the board deems necessary for the protection of persons using such crossings. Provided that no company shall be required to make such changes in any one year at more than twenty-five per cent of the crossings upon its railway which are determined by the board to be dangerous.

2. The board may direct at which of such dangerous crossings the necessary changes shall be made during the first year and so on in each succeeding year until all such dangerous crossings have been so changed.

I hope that this principle will be incorporated in any measure on the subject that is adopted.

Mr. SPEAKER. That can stand as a notice. Stand.

Mr. LANCASTER.

CRIMINAL CODE—AMENDMENT.

Mr. ROBERT BICKERDIKE (St. Lawrence, Montreal) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 4) to amend the Criminal Code. He said: As I said, when I introduced this Bill, the object is to add to the number of cases in which the lash may be used. The first is for those who carry concealed weapons and use them on the slightest provocation. The next is in the case of assault upon females. The section says:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years imprisonment, and to be whipped, who assaults his wife or other female and thereby occasions actual bodily harm.

The Bill provides the same in the case of those guilty of robbery; and the fourth case is that of assault with intent to rob—highway robbery. In my opinion, in all these cases, the judge should be given discretion to sentence the offender to the lash as well as to imprisonment.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). Before the second reading is carried, I would like to say a word on the general subject adverted to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bickerdike) who has introduced the measure. In doing so, I wish to be understood as expressing the individual opinions on the subject which I myself hold, and as not desiring that those opinions should carry any especial weight except such as my position as one of the members of this House might involve. I am opposed to the whole principle of inflicting punishment upon criminals by the use of the lash. I regard it merely as a survival of the days of primitive man, when the only canon of punishment known was the law of retaliation, which exacted an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life. In later days, days which, while not within living memory, are not yet so far gone by, the principle of retaliation seemed still to survive in regard to many offences known to the British law. In the days of the Stuarts punishment by the infliction of personal pain was the rule, perhaps, rather than the exception, and we read of the use of instruments of torture. We see these instruments of torture preserved in our museums, and we think ourselves better than our forefathers, who applied the rack or the thumbscrew or the boot, or other means of inflicting bodily pain upon those who had offended against the law or who were charged with some such offence. We consider ourselves, in modern days, to have become more civilized, to have attained truer ideas of the principles upon which punishment legally and judicially imposed for offences against the criminal law ought to be administered. And yet the principle, or practice, of flogging for certain offences still applies, and provisions that it may be the means of punishment still appear upon our statute-book. I am not proposing that there should be alterations; I am not prepared to set up my individual opinion against the opinions of very many men thoroughly as well able to form sound judgment upon this subject as I can be, and I am not proposing to amend the Criminal Code by reducing the number of cases in which whipping may be administered. But there are serious practical difficulties in the way of carrying out the law as it now stands in the few cases in which whipping is a part of the punishment which the law prescribes. One practical question is: Who is to be the official who shall administer this punishment? The judge adds to his sentence of so many months, or so many years, imprisonment—quite as an off-hand matter, it may be—a provision that the prisoner shall be flogged once, or twice, or it may be three times, during the course of his sentence. That is all the court does in the matter; no directions are given, but it is left to the officers of the law to carry out the sentence of the court. The prisoner goes to some jail, or prison, or penitentiary, and the responsibility for seeing that the sentence is carried out rests upon the head of that institution.

The warden of the penitentiary sees perhaps for the first time when the prisoner arrives accompanied by the warrant of commitment, that flogging is to be administered to this man. Is the warden himself to handle the knout, or is he to delegate that duty to one of his subordinate officials; and if to one of them, is the warden to select the man who shall carry out the sentence of the court? In practice the matter is reduced to that. The warden has to nominate some one of his subordinate officials and instruct that man, putting I suppose the instrument of punishment into his hands, to lay the lash on the bare back of the prisoner. That punishment will be either a farce, a perfect mockery, or it will be something so terrible to think about that it ought, I think, to give any one concerned in the infliction of such punishment, or in ordering it, pause before he pronounces the words that would condemn any fellow human being to such degradation, and to a punishment of that description. It all depends upon the willingness of the executioner, upon the amount of energy he puts into his right arm when he lays on the blows. The punishment may be a farce, or it may be something terrible to contemplate. I suppose it is intended to be a real thing, that it is meant to be a whipping laid on with all the strength that the warden or guard of the penitentiary who may be willing to administer it, can put into his blows.

I do not discuss the moral effect upon the man who administers the punishment. I think, to say the least of it, that it cannot be an elevating effect. I do not wonder when I find that many and many a man who has accepted a position as guard or warden, or police official in our penitentiaries, says, when ordered to administer a whipping, this is not within my contract, I did not come into the public service of Canada to be a quasi executioner. It accordingly reduces itself in practice simply to what I say, that there are some particular guards in the penitentiaries who are willing to do this thing; there are others who are unwilling, and we have to select such means as we can find. In the custody of our prisoners in penitentiaries or in jails no matter, I may say, how highly the prison offence which they may commit would seem to deserve the lash, no matter though the offence may be one of such an effect upon the other convicts as practically to destroy the whole discipline of the institution, no matter though the offence may be one arising out of pure ugliness on the part of the convict the lash is not used. We have upon occasion, and in extreme cases, used an instrument of punishment best described by the word paddle, and with which we administered a sound spanking upon the convict. I see a considerable difference between the two things. The lash is designed to tear the flesh, to bring blood; the other instrument will at least leave no external sign of injury. At times we punish in our penitentiaries by turning the hose upon the prisoner, in a confined cell so that he cannot escape when the water is turned on. We find that a very effective punishment indeed. It produces discomfort. It may be that at the time of the infliction it produces more or less of a sensation which might properly be described as pain, but it produces no ill effects. For my part, and for every reason, I state myself to be entirely opposed to the principle of punishing an offence against our laws by something which is literally nothing but an infliction of bodily pain.

It is said that there is a kind of fitness, a kind of special propriety, in punishment of this sort for offences against women. There might be other punishment suggested that would seem to be even more proper. No man I suppose, in this House or out of it, would seriously suggest the mutilation of an offender against these laws; and yet in conversation men say to one another at times that that would be the proper punishment. Is there any difference in principle? There may be a difference in degree; but so far as I am concerned, each proposition seems to me to rest substantially upon the same principle for its foundation.

In regard to this particular measure which has been proposed by my hon. friend, four specific offences are mentioned as those which he proposes to add to the list of crimes already mentioned in the Criminal Code for which whipping may be inflicted by the presiding judge, or the presiding magistrate, who disposes of the charge. The possession of a deadly weapon is one, also assaults, not assaults of the character which are commonly spoken of as criminal assaults, indecent assaults, but the ordinary assault and battery of a man beating a woman. Then highway robbery, or assaults with intent to commit highway robbery. Now taking these in turn, I may say to my hon. friend that so far as the offence of carrying a deadly weapon is concerned, my views go entirely with his own. I see no justification whatever in this country for a man carrying upon his person about the streets a weapon which can only be used for purposes of offence. A knife may be a deadly weapon, a razor in the hands of a desperate man may be a most deadly weapon. But these are generally instruments of usefulness. I would not be disposed to extend to the carrying of instruments of that character the special punishment which my hon. friend is proposing here, or any special punishment. The carrying of a dirk or dagger, a weapon that may be used only for the purposes of stabbing, is altogether a different story. But even in that case, while every one would, I think, agree, while certainly I would agree, to the fullest extent with the views of my hon. friend that the carrying of such weapons ought to be made punishable, I would not be willing to add to the imprisonment the punishment of whipping. So with regard to the offences of highway robbery, robbery with violence, or an assault with intent to commit such robbery.

I am perfectly aware that, as a matter of record, the offence of garrotting at one time became so prevalent in England, in London particularly, that extreme measures had to be resorted to in order to stamp it out, and the punishment of whipping was prescribed. That was carried out by the judges, and as a consequence the crime of garrotting was in a short time at an end and no longer known in that portion of the world. But I may concede to my hon. friend, or to any one who advocates the application of whipping to offences of the character of highway robbery or assaults with intent, that if there were such an unusual condition of things in any community in this country as seemed to call for very special and extreme measures of repression, whipping might be for a time used as a means of putting an end to what might be called an outbreak or epidemic of the character I am referring to.

But, I know of no ground for believing that any such condition of things does, at the present time, exist anywhere in Canada. In conversation my hon. friend mentioned to me the prevalence of offences of this sort in certain portions of Montreal, and I have been unable to avoid noticing, in reading the files of prisoners' cases, of applicants for clemency during the last few months, or during the time that I have been in charge of the Justice Department, that these offences did seem to be more prevalent in the city of Montreal than anywhere else in Canada. There are more frequent convictions for offences of that character apparently in Montreal than in Toronto or any other of our larger cities. But there have been no representations made to the department from judges, juries, or other quarters that the offence of assaulting with intent to commit highway robbery, or the actual commission of highway robbery, has become so rife in Montreal or anywhere else in the country that such special, extreme measures to repress it are necessary and in the absence of such representations I certainly feel myself unable to go with my hon. friend to the extent of enacting that such offences, wherever committed in Canada, should henceforth be punishable, at the will of the presiding magistrate, by the use of the lash.

There remains the offence of assault and battery where a woman is the victim of it, and in this regard I will admit that the application of the law of retaliation, (because it simply comes to that) is more justifiable because the apparent fitness of things seems to make it more proper, or less improper, to demand whipping as a part of the punishment than in any of the other instances that my hon. friend has selected in the measure now under consideration. I have, even in regard to offences of this character, the feeling which I have already expressed. I think that simple imprisonment ought to be, and would be, in all ordinary cases, a sufficient punishment for the beating of a woman by a man, but the offender is one for whom no man worthy of the name would have any sympathy and whom no man would wish to protect. I certainly do not wish to stand here as the defender of such a man. I am prepared to offer no opposition to my hon. friend's measure in so far as the second clause is concerned, making any one convicted of an offence of the character described against a woman liable to be sentenced to flogging. I certainly think that even in such cases sentence to such a punishment ought to be sparingly pronounced, but there may be cases in which it is the only way to protect our women from the assault and beating of a husband, or, it may be, of a father. At any rate if my hon. friend is willing to limit the provisions of his Bill to the second clause, I shall offer no opposition to it, but as far as the other clauses are concerned, while I speak, as I say, my own sentiments alone, and am speaking for no other member of this House than myself, I am opposed entirely to the position of my hon. friend.

Mr. AYLESWORTH.

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron). Mr. Speaker, I am surprised and sorry that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Aylesworth) has expressed the opinions that he has just delivered himself of in this House. I am glad to know that it is solely as the member for North York that he has spoken. My opinion is that his expressions still may do harm, as he is also the Minister of Justice for Canada. I consider that a man who is brutal enough to commit any of the brutish crimes which are outlined in the Bill of my hon. friend for Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike) should be punished in a physical way, in the only way that will affect him. One of the main reasons that the hon. member for North York has stated for not inflicting this punishment is that he cannot get any one to inflict it. That is a matter of detail and we need not discuss it here. Otherwise we might say that a man should not be hanged because we cannot get any one to hang him. I congratulate the hon. member for Montreal on his Bill and I hope it will carry; crimes of the class in question are rampant and must be put down.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Mr. Speaker, I merely rise to express my dissent from the propositions laid down by the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth). The Minister of Justice, in his remarks, spoke and I think very properly and very naturally from the standpoint of the criminal, but he uttered not one single word from the standpoint of the unfortunate victim. I have always understood that in all penal legislation the one great thing was the defence of the inoffensive portion of the community. If it be true that offences of this character are being committed in this country, if it be true that the existing means of punishment have proved insufficient to prevent such offences, then I think this House should be prepared to resort to any means that may be necessary to protect the women of this country. I quite agree with all that the Minister of Justice says against the punishment that may degrade a man. I believe that it was a disgrace to the British navy that flogging existed to the extent to which it did, because we all know that the British seamen were, on the whole, a noble band of men, but I fail to see how a brute such as the one of whom we read in the papers the other day, convicted of an offence against his own daughter, a girl of 18, could be degraded by any punishment that could be inflicted. I desire to say that I shall support the Bill of the hon. member as it is, not for a moment as a matter of vengeance, not at all in order to be vindictive, but simply as the surest and best means of putting a stop to these offences. The Minister of Justice himself must admit that in cases of extreme emergency the very course suggested would be a course sufficient to wipe out such an offence as this. Therefore, on behalf of the inoffensive portion of the community, the women and children of this land, I am prepared to support this legislation. In fact, I would go a step further and say that I have often felt that the provision on the statute-book applicable to this offence is really for the benefit of the lazy loafer. As perhaps every man in this House and every lawyer knows a man unwilling to work is supported by an honest, industrious wife until patience ceases to be a virtue and he is taken to court. She lays a complaint and the husband is punished by sending him to the county jail where, all during the winter, he lives in comfort and luxury, while the poor woman that he has sworn to support is obliged to go out and support herself and her family. If the hon. gentleman would introduce another clause to provide that those men who failed to support their wives and children should not be rewarded by being sent to the county jail where they will not have to work, but would be given an adequate punishment it would have the effect of compelling them to do their duty in this regard.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). My hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) has not apprehended the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice said in his opening remarks that he was simply expressing his own opinion and his own opinion was that he was against the suggested punishment of flogging in all cases, but he stated that in so far as offences against women were concerned he left this clause to the judgment of the House. He expressed his own opinion but he did not go any further. He presented objections which I think are worthy of consideration with regard to the other disposition of the Bill which concerned offences there described, such as garrotting which was at one time prevalent in England. But, there is a class of beings who beat their wives and they deserve no sympathy from anybody. I would have no compunction whatever in giving the man who beats his wife or who beats a female a taste of his own medicine. However, when the Bill gets to committee it will be for hon. members to consider whether they are prepared to apply the lash for the other offences described in the Bill. For my part I would hesitate to say that a man who carries a concealed weapon should be whipped, or even that a man who commits such a heinous offence as robbery should be subjected to the lash. We all remember that some years ago the offence known as garrotting was so prevalent in the city of London that the magistrates asked that the lash be applied for that offence, and the law having passed in a very short time afterwards the offence disappeared, which shows that the passage of such a severe law may have a very salutory effect in suppressing certain offences. I do not know that at the present time the offence is so prevalent in the city of Montreal—where it seems to be more prevalent than elsewhere—as to warrant such an extreme measure as inflicting the lash. I think this Bill should be read a second time and then go to committee so as to further elicit the opinion of the House. I repeat that I think my hon. friend from Hastings did not quite apprehend the views of the Minister of Justice who merely suggested that it should be left to the House to determine what should be done.

Mr. A. M. BEAUPARLANT. (St. Hyacinthe). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I did not expect that this bill would come to-day for its second reading. This is not meant as a reproach against my hon. friend from Montreal (St. Lawrence). On the contrary, I acknowledge that he was entitled to press with the utmost expedition a piece of legislation which he holds as good. Therefore, I will not deal with this question; I merely intend putting upon record my disapproval of the proposal which the hon. member for St. Lawrence has just put forth.

We often hear it said that we live in a progressive era. Then, I think it would be a backward move to pass this measure.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Justice saying that, as a matter of principle, he is opposed to this bill. Such an attitude on his part is consistent with that spirit of toleration which in my opinion is the liberal tenet. At the same time, it seemed to me that the statements put forth by the hon. member West Huron (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. member from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) who have dealt with this question from the opposite side were tainted with the spirit of former days.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence no doubt seeks a most praiseworthy result, that is the betterment of men, but is he positive that he will achieve his end by those violent means?

I contend that the enforcement of such a punishment renders him who undergoes it an irreconcilable foe to society: Now then such cannot be the aim of society which has the least interest in bringing about that result.

That punishment is not only a disgrace for the culprit, but the dishonour is shared by the members of his family. That is unjust, still it is so. Public opinion will overlook and forget the jail and the penitentiary, but it will not overlook such a punishment. It looks upon it as upon the death penalty. Recent events have justified my fears on that point. A man was hanged. He left behind him a brother and two nephews who were leading a quiet and honest life in Montreal. The nephews were two good natured workmen in a manufacture and were surrounded by the esteem and good will of their fellow-workers. Immediately after the hanging they were the butt of the most offensive and cruel remarks. They could not but be morally affected by such a situation. They found work elsewere but they were again tormented in their new employment. The result was that being constantly wronged, they became wrong-doers themselves and now they are both in the penitentiary.

Some will say that this is an exceptional case, but I rather think that it is an instance of what happens unfortunately too often. Therefore I contend that upon no account has society the right to do such an injury to people who are no offenders against its laws, especially when it has for its own protection other means which do not involve such lamentable results. To achieve that end society can rely on the jail and the penitentiary which ought to afford enough protection to the community.

I maintain that the existing legislation countenancing that ignominious punishment ought not to be tolerated any longer. However we are now discussing the proposal put forth by the hon. member for St. Lawrence and I must content myself with impugning it. The disgracing punishment by the lash has a demoralising influence upon the man who undergoes it, so that he cannot pluck up his courage and become an honest man again. That is a sufficient reason to reject it. Moreover I think that, the hon. Minister of Justice antagonizing this proposal, we shall hear no more about it.

Mr. JAMES W. MADDIN (South Cape Breton). The Minister of Justice, in reviewing this Bill, has said a great deal in which I concur. I agree with the hon. gentleman in all that he said with regard to the infliction of punishment, and I think the member for Hastings misunderstood the Minister of Justice, because as the Criminal Code now stands whipping is provided for all offences of an indecent nature committed against women.

However, when it comes to imposing corporal punishment for such offences as carrying concealed weapons or wife-beating, I submit that in doing this we are returning to the days of barbarism. Before hon. members vote on this measure, they should bear in mind that, under our criminal law, power is vested in the magistrates to summarily try cases of certain offences, such as indecent assaults and wife-beating, and the punishment in such cases is of a very arbitrary nature. In our Penitentiaries Act it is provided that persons condemned to imprisonment for less than two years may be confined in a county jail and not be sent to penitentiary at all. Within recent years, in many of our municipalities, where hard labour is imposed, the prisoners are obliged to work on the public highway. In a number of counties in the province from which I come, the judges in cases where imprisonment may be imposed for two years, are in the habit of making the term 12, 15 or 18 months in the county jail of the county where the offence was committed. Thus if the lash is to be applied for these various offences, the Bill will go further than its mover contemplated. The duty is not then cast on the warden of the penitentiary but on the keeper of the county jail and the sheriff of the municipality, and I submit that these are men of considerable refinement and good breeding and it would be exceedingly repugnant to them to take up the lash and apply it to the back of one of their fellow creatures.

This is not a new question by any means. For a number of years it has been agitated throughout the leading law publications, both on this side of the Atlantic and the other, and the consensus of opinion seems to be that it is not wise to return to the lash for trifling offences. In fact the majority of authorities are of the opinion that it is unwise to apply the lash in any case. As regards that part of the Act which punishes a man for wife-beating, I wonder what the mover of the Bill has to say about the woman who beats her husband.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I would say, serves him right.

Mr. MADDIN. As a matter of fact, if statistics were well and intelligently collected throughout the length and breadth of the country, while the records would not show as many cases of husbands beating wives as of wives beating husbands, still there are a number of such cases. I agree with my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) in having no regard for the man who strikes a woman under any provocation. But my hon. friend has taken but one view of the case. I have no regard or sympathy for the man who hangs about the house, a drunken loafer, living by the earnings of his wife. But what about the diligent hard working man who works eight or ten hours per day, and when he comes home finds his supper not ready, his children not washed and his wife gallivanting about the country. What is sauce for the goose might very well be sauce for the gander, and the mover of this measure might well be asked to incorporate in it husband as well as wife beating.

There is another very serious objection. So long as those who administer the laws of the land do not look with favour on a particular statute, that statute will not be successfully applied. I do not think it is to the discredit of our judges to say that the majority, in cases where whippings are imposed are very loath to impose it. As a matter of fact the punishment is optional just as it is in this Bill, and in a large number of cases the judges are very loath to impose it. In my short experience where I reside, I only recall three instances in which the lash was imposed, and for some reason or other it was not in these cases applied. What will be the result if legislation of this kind be adopted? If the lash is not applied now in cases where it may be imposed, it is not more likely to be applied when imposed in more trifling cases, and a law which is not enforced will be looked upon by the criminal as so much dead wood which he need not take into account. Therefore I say that while the lash may have a tendency to lessen the outbreaks of crime of a certain violent character, I have no doubt that the diet described in Oliver Twist, which was supplied in the parochial workhouse, and the other rigours of that workhouse would be sufficient deterrents in cases of a less serious character, such as are dealt with in this measure.

Mr. W. B. NANTEL (Terrebonne.) (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I shall say but one word on the question which is now before the House. I entirely agree with the hon. Minister of Justice on this point. In the first place I do not think that the circumstances prevailing in Montreal, for instance, would justify such a measure. I hope that we shall never go back to the barbarous ages, which in my opinion would be the result of this measure. The offence however odious, for which flogging is intended as a punishment, is after all but a mere misdemeanour, therefore it is more or less serious.

As a matter of principle, I am in favour of the death penalty, although I am entirely adverse to flogging. I will say more, I would favour the wiping of that punishment out of our criminal code. With still more reason, I cannot approve of it in such a case as this when there is no motive to enforce it as the offence is not serious enough. Therefore I hope that this legislation will never become a part of our criminal law.

Mr. A. B. CROSBY (Halifax). I am largely in accord with the hon. Minister of Justice as to this Bill. The fact that the majority of the lawyers in this House are opposed to such clause is one reason why I favour it, because that is an indication to me that it will have the effect of decreasing offences of that character and there will be less work in the courts for some lawyers. My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) put the question why there should not be some provision for the protection of men. Well, the man who goes to his home and is beaten once by his wife and then is foolish enough to go back, deserves to be beaten the second time.

That is not the case with the poor woman; she has to stay at home all the time, she has frequently to submit to abuse in order to care for her children. The man at whom this punishment is aimed is the very man who will frequently trouble and bother such a woman, disturb her and her family and eat the food which she has provided by her day's hard work for her children. Therefore I am quite in accord with the punishment proposed. I am quite sure that the difficulties in connection with the infliction of the whipping can be overcome. We cannot be too careful or too severe in this particular, and while I agree with the Minister of Justice in all the other matters to which he has referred, I am in sympathy with the section of the Bill regarding the care and protection of our women.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee on the Bill.

On section 1—Whipping for possession of weapon.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. After listening to the discussion I have decided to accept the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice. It is not exactly what I expected to get, but I am one of those who will take what I can get and hope for more later on. I move that clause one be struck out and shall move amendments to clause 2 and clause 4.

Motion agreed to, and section 1 struck out.

On section 2,

The following section is inserted immediately after section 292:

292a. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment and to be whipped, who assaults his wife or other female and thereby occasions actual bodily harm.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I would call attention to the state of the existing law upon a cognate subject. Section 292 of the Criminal Code provides a punishment of two years imprisonment—not three,—and whipping, for any man who indecently assaults any female, or makes such an assault with the woman's consent, where such consent is procured by fraud. I would suggest to my hon. friend that there can be no reason why an assault which is not indecent should be the subject of a more severe punishment than that which the law now prescribes for an indecent assault, and therefore would suggest the substitution of two years for three years. If that is done the purpose of my hon. friend can be accomplished more neatly by simply adding to the present section 292 a third subclause which would make the section read:

Every one is guilty of an indicatable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment and to be whipped who indecently assaults any female, &c., &c.

And 3,

Who assaults his wife or other female and thereby occasions her bodily harm.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would agree with what the Minister of Justice has said except the last few words. I was going to move to strike out the words 'or other female,' I believe that any man who assaults his wife and does her harm cannot be punished too severely. I have no sympathy with the statement that a man could be assaulted by his wife; I do not think there are many men whose wives can hurt them very much. But I do say that any man who assaults the woman he has undertaken to care for for life ought to be lashed. I do not think the same punishment should apply in the case of any female; such a provision would undoubtedly give rise to many cases of blackmail. In many cases in the Criminal Code the prosecution are called upon to corroborate in some material particular the serious offence against the female. This is a good and salutary provision. If you put it in this way and make any man subject to the lash for assault upon a female occasioning bodily harm, you will have a serious condition of blackmail. I do not think it necessary. There is already this serious punishment for men who indecently assault females. I would move, in place of the amendment of the Minister of Justice, to strike out the words 'or other female' because such cases are already dealt with in the serious case of indecent assault. I think the only assault, other than an indecent assault, for which a man should be lashed is an assault upon his wife.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I certainly object to that; I think a man is just as guilty, if not more so, if he goes and beats another man's wife than if he beats his own.

Mr. LANCASTER. No, for exactly the reason I say, a man and his wife might levy blackmail. Then a man swears to protect his wife and he does not undertake to protect the other.

Amendment (Mr. Lancaster) negatived: Yeas 62, nays 71.

Mr. BARR. Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to the fact that a large number of those who voted were not present when the question was called.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. By the vote the amendment is lost.

Mr. BARR. I have asked for a ruling on a very important question, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to have it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The rule of the House is that a member may not vote on a question unless he has heard the question put.

Mr. BARR. Then, I sumbit that a large number of those who voted on the other side could not have heard the question, because they were not in the Chamber when it was put.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is impossible for the chairman to choose out those who came in late.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I move the following amendment to section 2 :

Assaults and beats his wife or any other female, and thereby occasions her actual bodily harm.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As I understand the amendment, it is that all the words in section 292 be struck out and the words just read be inserted.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That will not carry out the purpose suggested by the Minister of Justice. It requires provision in the line mentioned by him, namely, to append this as a subsection of section 292. To pass the amendment in the form proposed will make absolute nonsense, and, if put on the statute-book, would make us all ridiculous.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is moved that section 2 as it stands in the Bill be expunged, and the following be inserted instead :

Section 292 of the Criminal Code is amended by adding thereto the following:
Or (c) assaults and beats his wife or any other female, and thereby occasions her actual bodily harm.

Mr. SPROULE. It does seem to me that the statement of the Minister of Justice ought to be heeded. If we provide a law to inflict a punishment and there is no provision for the infliction of the punishment, we commit an absurdity. Is the Minister of Justice prepared to suggest an amendment which would provide some one to inflict the punishment ?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. Perhaps not every hon. member has a copy of the Criminal Code before him; therefore, in order to understand what we are doing, I will read the section as it now stands :

292. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years imprisonment and to be whipped who (a) indecently assaults any female; or, (b) does anything to any female by her consent which, but for such consent, would be an indecent assault, if such consent is obtained by false and fraudulent representations as to the nature and quality of the Act.

That is the clause as it now stands. If the amendment is carried it will subject any person who, by assaulting any woman, occasions her actual bodily harm, to the punishment of two years imprisonment and being whipped.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would ask the minister if that is one of the sections in regard to which corroboration is required; because if not, I certainly must oppose that amendment. It will be a very dangerous law to put upon the statute-book if it is not accompanied by a requirement for corroboration. I have not the statutes before me, but perhaps the minister can tell us. Let us know what we are doing.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I may say in reply to my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) that I am not able to answer his question on the spur of the moment. My impression is strong that no corroboration is required, but I may be in error in that respect. I suggest that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the committee rises I would like to add a word along the line of what my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said. The Minister of Justice made a very emphatic and cogent argument against the whole principle of this Bill. The two principal points he made were, in the first place, that the infliction of this punishment for any offence is degrading and ought not to be imposed. In fact, if the argument of the Minister of Justice were carried to its legitimate conclusion, the enactments already upon the statute-book in that regard should be eliminated. The other point which the minister made is that it is impossible to carry out the punishment, that there is no person appointed by law upon whom that duty can be imposed, unless you are to presume that the warden of the penitentiary or the keeper of the jail can himself select one of his subordinates, and order him to perform what the minister regards as a degrading duty, degrading not only to the person who receives the punishment, but degrading to the person who inflicts it. Now the committee has arrived at the conclusion that in respect to one offence the punishment by whipping or flogging should be extended. Well, it seems to me that before this committee rises we ought to have some statement from the minister as to what the law is in that regard, and that this Bill should be amended so that the duty of carrying it out shall be imposed upon some definite official, who, if he fails to carry out the law, will himself be guilty of an offence. We ought not to put these punishments upon the statute-book and leave them to be disregarded, as they have been in the past, according to the testimony, not only of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, but of gentlemen of the legal profession in this House who have given their experience.

Progress reported.

OPENING OF GOVERNMENT TENDERS.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Reid (Grenville).

That in the opinion of this House tenders received in any department of government should be immediately placed in safe custody under seal so as to prevent any possibility or suspicion of tampering; and should be opened in public at the time and place mentioned in the advertisement and in the presence of at least three principal officials of the department; and the persons so tendering or their duly authorized agents should be at liberty to attend at the said time and place and see such tenders opened and recorded, if they so desire, and the proposed amendment of Mr. Guthrie thereto.

Mr. H. H. MILLER (South Grey). When I was speaking a few days ago in reference to this motion, I made some allusion to the remarks of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) in reference to dredging contracts that had been let to the Hon. A. G. MacKay. In the course of his remarks the hon. member for North Grey stated that in these days Conservatives did not tender for contracts of any kind with this government, because, owing to the manner in which contracts are let, it was of no use for them to tender. I think that statement is not according to facts. I remember talking a little while ago with a very prominent Conservative in this country, and he referred to the frequent remarks of a gentleman who was, during the last parliament, a member on the opposition side of this House, and this gentleman with whom I was speaking said that this late Conservative member had dredging contracts on the brain. He said it was true that some men in this country were making a large amount of money out of dredging contracts, but they do not all belong to one political party. He said that one of the most intimate of his personal friends is a Conservative who has made a considerable amount of money, and is making money to-day, out of dredging contracts. I did not ask him to give me the name of his friend who was so making money out of dredging contracts, because it was none of my business. I simply give you his statement for what it is worth. I understand that a Conservative named Poupore, formerly a member of this House, is a prominent contractor with this government, and is I hope making a reasonable amount of money out of his contracts. I understand another gentleman——

Mr. CROTHERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. gentleman speaking to the question before the House?

Mr. MILLER. I am also informed that a gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not hear the hon. gentleman's last words, but I presume the rules of the House will be observed.

Mr. MILLER. I shall endeavour to observe them. I think I am. I am speaking in direct contradiction of the words used by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and of his argument, and I think that certainly has a direct bearing upon the motion before the House. A man named Boone from Sault Ste. Marie—

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I rise to a point of order. I do not so regard it. My hon. friend from York, New Brunswick (Mr. Crocket) was making a reply to the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) and he was called to order because he was not discussing the question directly before the House which related to the opening of tenders. The point of order having been taken the Speaker then in the Chair sustained him. I would respectfully submit that exactly the same principle should impel the hon. gentleman now addressing the House to speak to the resolution and not introduce matters that are obviously not relevant under the ruling which has already been pronounced.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As the House is aware, I have just taken the chair and did not hear the remarks that were objected to. If the point of order is pressed I shall have to call back the Speaker to rule on the matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. The mover of this resolution gave as a ground in support of it—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should await the return of the Speaker.

Mr. MILLER. I will endeavour not to infringe at all. At the present time I do not think I am infringing the rules or saying anything which is out of order. In discussing the matter of opening tenders—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but a point of order has been raised, and it has not yet been settled.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is not pressed.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman does not press his point of order, of course, the hon. gentleman who has the floor may proceed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman waives his point he may go on.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The point of order is pressed; perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Miller) may waive the line of argument.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is what he should.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly I am quite prepared to do that. But, if I am ruled out of order I scarcely know on what ground I can stand.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLER. I contend that I am in order. It has been argued that tenders are not properly opened, and that certain bad effects have resulted. I am endeavouring to prove that these bad effects have not resulted. Then I wish to show that what the hon. member for North Grey has stated, that owing to the manner in which tenders are opened it is impossible for Conservatives to obtain contracts from this government, is not a fact, and I am endeavouring to show that Conservatives have obtained and are obtaining contracts as the result of tenders they have put in to this government. I understand that Mr. Poupore has many times received contracts from this government as a result of tenders that he has put in under the method that is now in vogue.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I rise again to the question of order. I submit that the hon. gentleman has no right to discuss the tenders of Mr. Poupore or any one else under the ruling which you pronounced when this debate arose on a previous occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have already decided, on a point of order being taken, that the debate must be confined strictly to the motion and the amendment thereto, and anything irrelevant is out of order. I am not prepared to say that the last words were relevant not having heard them.

Mr. MILLER. My argument and what I was stating was this: I understand that the motion before the House declares that the present method of opening tenders is not a good one, that evil results follow, and that in consequence some new method ought to prevail. In support of the resolution it has been stated that Conservatives do not tender for public contracts, and that men of all shades of politics belonging to all parties, ought to have fair play. I want to show that the argument is not a proper one, that the statements are not correct, and that it is not so that as a result of the present method of tendering Conservatives do not obtain fair play. In order to prove my contention I have been endeavouring to show and will show—and perhaps that is the reason why the point of order is so persistently urged—that Conservatives have obtained, do obtain and may obtain contracts from this government as other people do.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I venture to submit that this is no more relevant than was the consideration of the question regarding dredging contracts in the harbour of St. John. If this is relevant then that is relevant.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I might just call your attention to the fact that in this motion which is being discussed certain amendments to the regulations applying to the reception and opening of tenders were suggested by the mover to prevent any possibility of suspicion or tampering with tenders. Every gentleman on the other side of the House supporting this resolution, either directly or indirectly, stated his suspicion that there was tampering with tenders. Surely the hon. gentleman is permitted to answer that? Surely that is cognate to the question before the House? It is entirely different from the case of the Mayes dredging contract because that was clearly irrelevant. nobody having asserted that there was anything improper with respect to the reception or opening of those tenders.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, my ruling is well-known to the House. Having decided that a certain matter is out of order it is no argument to say that it is in answer to what was said because a lot of what was said was irregular. I hope that hon. gentlemen will follow the rule and confine themselves to matters relevant to the question under discussion. Bourinot says that illustration is sometimes permitted, but to undertake to discuss any specific case under this resolution would be clearly out of order.

Mr. MILLER. I bow cheerfully and always to your ruling. I contend that I was doing what you say I am permitted to do—using this case as an illustration. I am prepared to show a long list of names but I am content to let that pass. I want to say in conclusion that it seems to me that it would tend very much to shorten the sessions of this House if members would confine themselves to charges which are not founded upon suspicion but which they can back up by evidence. The mover of the resolution suggests that there should be three persons present in place of two at the opening of tenders. Does he think that that would make any real change in the conditions or that if there is wrong-doing with two persons present there might not be equal wrong-doing with three? I do think there may be something in the suggestion of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake), who spoke a few days ago. He gave it not altogether as a suggestion but as a statement of the practice in some departments in Great Britain, and it was that the persons who are present when tenders are opened are changed from time to time, and that they are not always the same persons who are performing that duty. I think that the contention of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was well founded, and that there is a great deal in it that if you say that contractors must be present when tenders are opened you simply lend yourself to a system that permits conniving and conspiring, and which will cause a great deal more evil and produce worse results than can or do exist to-day. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) said:

I have always been in favour of the principle of letting contracts by public tender in a bona fide upright and conscientious manner.

No doubt the hon. member was sincere when he said that, and I should think every member of the House could use the very same words with an equal degree of sincerity. But the trouble with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Middlebro) is that like too many of his friends on the other side he is prone to let his suspicion rather than his reason govern him. I believe that we should endeavour to adopt all methods that it is possible to adopt even if it were only for the purpose of lessening the suspicion of our friends on the other side of the House. If it were possible that the Auditor General or some such official in whom we all have confidence could be present when these tenders are opened, I would be agreeable to the adoption of such a system, but in the meantime I think the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) is the better of the two proposals before the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The amendment which has been presented by the hon. member (Mr. Guthrie) declares that the method of inviting, opening and considering tenders as embodied in the order in council of June 18, 1900, is in the opinion of this House a proper safeguard in the public interest. That order in council makes the following provision:

Where tenders are called for by any department of the government they shall be addressed to the officer of the department specified in the notice calling for tenders. In the notice it shall be specified that the tenders shall be under seal and endorsed 'tender for . . . . ' specifying the work or supplies for which tenders are called. When received they shall be stamped by the official to whom addressed, with the day and hour of their receipt, and placed under lock and key until such time as it shall be found convenient for opening them.

It does not seem to me that this provides any sufficient safeguard in the public interest. What is the meaning of the provision that the tenders shall be under seal? So far as I can understand, it only means that the person tendering shall affix his seal after his name, and it does not even go to the extent of providing that the tender shall be sealed up in a package or envelope. That may have been the intention of the gentleman who drafted the order in council, but he certainly did not say it. Therefore, there is absolutely no provision in the order in council as to tenders being inclosed in an envelope, and yet it is considered by the member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) a perfectly adequate safeguard. The other safeguard provided in this order in council is that the tender shall be placed under lock and key. That is the most absurdly slipshod expression I have ever heard of in an order in council or any other document, if the intention is to safeguard the public interest. In short, the order in council omits every single one of the very necessary safeguards which are contained in the resolution presented by my hon. friend from Grenville. The motion declares :

That in the opinion of this House tenders received in any department of government should be immediately placed in safe custody under seal so as to prevent any possibility or suspicion of tampering; and shall be opened in public at the time and place mentioned in the advertisement and in the presence of at least three principal officials of the department; and the persons so tendering or their duly authorized agents should be at liberty to attend at the said time and place and see such tenders opened and recorded, if they so desire.

When this motion was presented to the House last year, the right hon. the Prime Minister endorsed it in every particular except one, and that was with reference to the tenders being opened in public. But, even if you omit that provision, you will see that the order in council falls very far short of the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid). Under the circumstances the attitude of the government in inviting the House to approve of a supposed safeguard which is not a safeguard at all, ought not to commend itself to our judgement. I believe that the provisions contained in the resolution of my hon. friend from Grenville are the provisions which will commend themselves to the people of this country as adequate and necessary safeguards in the public interest.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Lunenburg). Some of the discussion on this resolution has been relevant, but a great deal of it has been irrelevant. I am as anxious as any other hon. gentleman in the House that a vote should be taken before six o'clock, and, therefore, I will prolong the debate for only a few moments. I purpose supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), and I will construe my vote as being an affirmation that the regulations now in force are preferable to those proposed by the hon. member (Mr. J. D. Reid). I agree, to some extent, with the leader of the opposition when he says that the existing regulations are not absolutely perfect; the drafting is very imperfect indeed. The present regulations respecting the reception and opening of tenders for government work and supplies are, that they shall be stamped by the officials to whom they are addressed with the date and hour of receipt, and then placed under lock; that at a later date they shall be opened before the minister and an official of the department, and in the absence of the minister by another official of the department to be designated by him. The resolution of the member for Grenville proposes two changes only; first, that the tenders shall be opened in the presence of three officials, and, secondly, that the public as well as the tenderers shall have an opportunity of being present. Wherein are the present regulations defective, and if they are defective how can the suggestions contained in the resolution of the member for Grenville remedy the defect. I submit in all fairness that the recommendations contained in the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) are not of a business like character and cannot commend themselves to anybody. To my mind it is utterly unimportant and trivial as to whether one or two or three or one hundred and three persons are present at the opening of the tenders. If there is any stage at which tenders should be protected it is while they are being received by the official of the department to whom they are addressed and while they are in his possession, and it is a mere waste of time to discuss how many persons shall be present when tenders are opened or whether the public shall be present or not. The resolution before the House does not suggest throwing around the officer who receives these tenders any protection or safeguard whatever.

Mr. J. D. REID. Will not the fact of having them opened at the time and place mentioned in the advertisement do that ?

Mr. MACLEAN. I shall come to that later. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) was right the other day when he said we must trust some one official in matters of this kind. As he said, the business of the world is carried on by reason of trust which man extends to his fellow men. Well, under the present regulations, and even under the regulations as proposed to be amended, the tenders would all be received by one official. If you do not trust this official what would you require to do in order to safeguard both public and private interests. You would require to have two or three men to watch this official as he opened his mail every morning, and two or three others keeping eye on the lock, and two or three more sleeping with this man at night, which might seriously disarrange domestic affairs. You would have to make sure that on the day and at the hour for closing tenders, the time piece of this official was right, and perhaps you could not even trust the clock and a committee of two or three would have to go out and ascertain the time of day by the sun. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle made a very good suggestion the other day. He suggested that if there be any objection to the mode of receiving and opening tenders, it is at this point the amendment should be made and not as regards how or when tenders should be opened, because that is after all, a very trifling matter which ought not to occupy the attention of the House one second. If you are going to make an amendment, I would say, let the officer who receives the tenders endorse on it the time and hour of reception and sign that with his own hand. Let him then pass the tender on to another officer, to be called the custodian of tenders, and let him also mark the time of reception as the former official. Then when the time for the reception has expired let these tenders be brought before the minister or his representative and be opened in the presence of the minister and these two officials.

As regards the proposition to have these tenders opened before the public, there is nothing in it to commend it to the judgment of this House. Just see what inconvenience that would occasion. But first let me say that the lowest tender is not always accepted. In some instances it may not be wise to accept it, either because of the financial inability of the tenderer or some other good reason. Imagine then what would follow if every person who tendered knew who were the other tenderers and what were their figures. One can easily understand how, when the lowest tender was rejected, the party who made that tender would storm the department in his attempt to satisfy the minister that he was quite competent and trustworthy and ought to get the contract. It is easy to understand how he would appeal to parliament and how hon. gentlemen opposite would make frenzied attacks on the government for not having accepted the lowest tender.

As to whether one or two or three are present at the opening of the tenders that is a matter which is utterly irrelevant and unimportant. But if you take these regulations as they stand, they are open to the construction that the tenders shall be opened in the presence of three officials. In this connection I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to what I think is imperfect drafting. The last clause reads: 'They shall be opened in the presence of the minister of the department calling for tenders and one of the principal officials of the department designated by that minister.' My reading of that clause up to that point is that the tenders are brought before the minister and one of his principal officers, and are opentd by the officer who received them, so that they are opened in the presence of three persons. True the remaining portion of the clause rather weakens my contention because it says: 'Or in the presence of the minister or where it is not convenient for him to be present they shall be opened by two of the officials of the department to be designated by the minister.' It seems to me that there is a little confusion here which requires to be removed.

My hon. friend the mover of the resolution (Mr. Reid) laid special stress upon that part of it which provides for the opening of these tenders in public and in the presence of any of the tenderers who may see fit to attend. Of course if the tenders are opened in public it follows that the parties tendering may be present, but it would be very unfortunate if that feature were introduced into the regulations and it is one which ought not to commend itself to this House.

Mr. CROTHERS. I quite agree, I simply want to emphasize one point in addition to those mentioned by the hon. leader of this side. The regulations provide that in the absence of the minister, he may name two officials who may open the tenders. The hon. Minister of Public Works in introducing these resolutions, told us the other day that that provision was inserted to meet cases in which the minister could not be present, and he cited Moncton where tenders are opened for hundreds of thousands of dollars and where it would not be convenient for the minister to be present.

Mr. GRAHAM. At present there are no tenders opened at Moncton.

Mr. CROTHERS. I was not referring to what the Minister of Railways said, but to what the Minister of Public Works said, that they were opened at Moncton.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not want to interrupt, but I would not like that impression to go to the public, and I want the House to understand that tenders are not opened at Moncton.

Mr. CROTHERS. I accept at once the statement of the Minister of Railways that the tenders are not opened at Moncton, but I do not know anything to prevent them being opened there. As a matter of fact, he says they are not, but they might be opened at Vancouver, or Victoria, or anywhere else in Canada. The regulations give the minister power to name two officials without stating who the officials shall be or their status. They may be two subordinate officials, and I submit that the provisions enabling the minister to name two subordinate officials anywhere in Canada would not command the confidence of the people in this country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Guthrie.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at Eight o'clock.

House in Committee of Supply.

Department of Customs.—Salaries and contingencies, $214,675.

Mr. PATERSON. The first item is Commissioner and Chairman of Board of Customs. Last year the salary was $4,000 under the Act When he comes into class A of 1st division, it is $5,000. It is automatic. The assistant commissioner last year received $3,600, and the statutory increase will make it $3,700.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thought the statutory increase was $50.

Mr. PATERSON. In the 1st division it is $100. The maximum of this salary is $4,000. Then, in the second division, subdivision A, there are 13 salaries to be provided for. There were 8 before, and 5 were brought in from the outside. Before that there is the first division, subdivision B. That subdivision runs from $2,100 to $2,800. There are six estimated for in that, three that are permanent and three that were brought in from the outside. In the second division, subdivision A, which runs from $1,600 to $2,100, there are thirteen estimated for. Eight of these are in the inside service and five are brought from the outside. The next is second division, subdivision B. There are 121 estimated for, 104 of whom are brought in from the outside or were temporary. That class runs from $800 to $1,600.

Mr. TAYLOR. You have made an increase of one? You had 104 outside, 16 inside and now you are providing for 121. Where does that extra one come in?

Mr. PATERSON. That is a position not yet filled. We are estimating for a typewriter that we will have to secure.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will this typewriter be appointed by the commission?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is that the case with all officers? I had my attention drawn this afternoon to the question as to who would appoint the clerk of the committee on agriculture to succeed Mr. McLeod. Would that also come under the commissioners or would he be appointed by the officers of the House?

Mr. PATERSON. That is within the jurisdiction of this House, as I understand it. There are 23 in the third division, subdivision A, which runs from $900 to $1,200. Seven of these come from the outside. The third division, subdivision B, runs from $500 to $800. Five are brought in from the outside. Then, in the next class, that of the messengers, there are six estimated for. Five are brought in from the outside and there is an addition we are providing for. We will require another packer.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the minister just explain why it is necessary to have another packer. Is the work so much greater this year than last that it is necessary to have another? The feeling of the House is that the number of civil servants should not be increased but rather a reduction should be made. I hope the government will do what they can to keep down the expenditure and not make any more unnecessary appointments.

Mr. PATERSON. There is a great deal of work of that kind. All the different ports and outports have to have their stationery sent to them and the work of these packers consists largely in that. For some time we had an extra employee from the Department of Public Works doing that work, but we prefer to have an officer of our own. I agree with my hon. friend that it is desirable when our revenue is decreasing that we should go carefully. While we are providing for these appointments it does not mean absolutely that additional officers must be employed. I think the commissioner feels that it will be necessary to have this typewriter and this messenger, but if he finds he can get along without them the appointments will not be made.

Mr. HENDERSON. The minister has indicated that the work of these messengers is largely in connection with sending out stationery to the ports and outports. Of course, the larger the number of outports the larger the number of messengers that will be required. I understand the government has given an assurance that there will be a customs port established at Milton in my own county. I understand this because the gentleman who opposed me in the recent election gave the people there the assurance that there would be a customs port opened at that point. I suppose that this is one of the results of it. Evidently there is going to be an additional customs house and with that I am finding no fault. I would be very glad if the minister would open a custom house there. It is the county town and I do not know any reason why it should be without a customs port any more than any other county town in the province should be without one. Perhaps the minister can give us an assurance to-night as to whether he intends to implement the promise or not and if a port will be opened there. We had the very strongest assurances that a port would be opened in the interest of the people there. I take it for granted that the promise was given by the minister no matter who should be elected. I will not assume for a moment that the minister simply intended to open a customs house there if my opponent was elected because that would be a kind of bribery held out to the electors that I do not believe the Minister of Customs would countenance. I believe that if he made the promise that a customs house would be opened in Milton it will be opened no matter who is elected. I have sufficient confidence in the minister to believe that he would not hold out a bribe to the people of that county or say that in the event of a supporter of the government being elected a customs house would be established. I am bound to believe he is too honourable a gentleman to offer a bribe of that kind to the electors. The people did not elect a supporter of the government, but nevertheless we expect that whatever promise was made in good faith by the minister, or the candidate who gave the assurance, will be carried out. It will be very useful to have a customs house at that place, and as the government has determined upon it I would like to have it as soon as possible. Perhaps the minister can inform the committee when it will be done?

Mr. PATERSON. When these estimates are through I am going to ask the committee to go on with the outside vote and then that question will come up.

Mr. J. D. REID. You could answer that in a few minutes.

Mr. PATERSON. I suppose my hon. friend and myself are very much of the same mind. If there has to be a member of the Liberal persuasion from Brant, I suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) would as soon see me here as any one else. And on the other hand if there is to be a Conservative from Halton I am pleased it is the hon. gentleman. I do not claim any superior virtue, but I should not consider it proper for me to say in any county: If you will elect so and so you will get something, and if you don't you will not get it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would not have asked for this to-night if I thought the promise were only to be carried out in the event of the return of a supporter of the government. I do not believe the Minister of Customs would make any such one-sided pledge. Was the statement simply made by the hon. gentleman who opposed me to catch a few votes, or did the Minister of Customs make the pledge?

Mr. PATERSON. A great many requests come for these custom ports from members on both sides, and in the Northwest especially.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Answer the question straight. Did you make the promise?

Mr. PATERSON. No. I did not make the promise to Halton. I do not make any promise in connection with any of these requests. We say we will inquire whether the business will warrant it or not, and speaking now for Milton, I should judge it is a point that would deserve consideration if we find ourselves able to open any other port. If there has been a promise given, then because the election turned the way it did will not effect the question in any way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. A. HAGGART. It is reported in the press that Colonel Scott, collector of customs at Winnipeg, was about to be superannuated and a successor appointed. Would the Minister of Customs give me some information as to that?

Mr. PATERSON. I have been asked that question outside the House. So many statements get into the newspapers that are without foundation that one cannot keep track of them. All I can say is that so far as I am concerned, I have taken no steps in the direction of relieving Colonel Scott from the duties of his office. Colonel Scott has not asked to be relieved of his duties, and my personal inclination is that so long as an officer can discharge his duties properly and wishes to remain I do not view with favour a change being made. There has been no action taken on my part looking to the immediate retirement of Colonel Scott. I suppose Colonel Scott is now at an age that if he asked to be superannuated his request could be complied with under the superannuation Act. There has been no intimation on my part as to superannuating Colonel Scott against his will. Does that answer the question?

Mr. A. HAGGART. I think that answers it. Colonel Scott we know to be an energetic man who does not require superannuation, and of course the minister is speaking for the government.

Mr. PATERSON. I did not catch that.

Mr. A. HAGGART. The Minister of Customs has told us that Colonel Scott has not asked for superannuation, and I infer he will not be superannuated until he asks for it?

Mr. PATERSON. So far as I am aware he has not asked for superannuation, and of course if anything were to be done it would have to emanate from the Department of Customs.

Mr. J. D. REID. Are we to understand that so long as Colonel Scott is able to perform his duties satisfactorily he will not be superannuated until he asks for it?

Mr. PATERSON. I have not had the question brought before me for action. I do not know how the report originated. What I have said is so long as the duties of an office are performed satisfactorily I would not be inclined to make a change unless, of course, the public interest would render it desirable.

Mr. CROCKET. Has there been any request for the superannuation of the collector of customs at Fredericton?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not like to interrupt hon. gentlemen, but I would point out that a discussion on the outside service has no relevancy to this vote for the inside service.

Mr. CROCKET. But the discussion has been allowed.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is true, and I was about to suggest that it was not relative to this vote.

Mr. CROSBY. Will it not look bad in the eyes of the people that while the customs revenue is decreasing the government is adding to the number of officials?

Mr. PATERSON. It is for that reason that we are proceeding with great caution, but I think we are meeting the wishes of hon. gentlemen on both sides that there should be an increase in the salaries, and that the staff should be maintained at a strength sufficient to do the work. Although the amount received may not be so large there is still a great volume of correspondence to be attended to.

Mr. CROSBY. If we are going to open new ports there might be some excuse, but the minister has not told us that new ports will be opened.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Would the minister give the names of the 129 officials who were brought into the service during the last 12 months?

Mr. PATERSON. These were not all brought in during the last 12 months because many of them had been in the service for years. Some years ago we thought it desirable in the public interest that a number of statistical officers who formerly prepared statistics at outside points should be brought to head quarters at Ottawa so that the statistics would be gotten out at an earlier period and be of more use to the commercial community. These officers were brought to Ottawa about eight years ago, many of them had been in the service for years and years before that.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman wants to know the names of the 129 who were brought in during the last 12 months.

Mr. PATERSON. The accountant gives me the following appointees during the year 1908: F. Clemenson, appointed July 16, resigned September 15; R. Braid, appointed March 26; J. Devlin, August 24; C. W. Dunlop, February 25; A. M. Dupuis, March 17; W. H. McElroy, March 7; F. H. Wood, June 17; Miss Sherry, July 17; T. A. Hastings, August 1; F. Barrette, February 5. The commissioner informs me these appointments were mostly made to fill vacancies.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand there are a number of officials engaged in compiling the Trade and Navigation returns and others engaged in preparing the returns of the Trade and Commerce Department, which are practically of the same nature. An arrangement might be made to have the figures for the two branches in the one publication and unnecessary expense saved.

Mr. PATERSON. The Trade and Commerce Department have no statistical officers and they use our tabulation.

Mr. HENDERSON. The returns of the Minister of Customs deal with imports entered for consumption and the Trade and Commerce returns give the imports whether entered for consumption or not. The returns prepared by the Department of Customs are most essential, but in the figures of the Trade and Commerce Department there is considerable duplication, which causes a great deal of expense and confusion as well.

Mr. S. SHARPE. An item of this kind should not be allowed to pass without a protest from the members on this side, because the Minister of Customs has increased his staff by ten or twelve, which will entail a minimum increased expense of $8,000 a year, while at the same time the revenue is decreasing. I think the Minister of Customs is not conducting his department with that measure of economy which he would have us believe.

Mr. PATERSON. I think that the hon. gentleman did not understand me. They have not been increased by that number.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. But there have been some ten new appointments in the face of a decreasing revenue.

Mr. PATERSON. They have been mostly to replace those who left the service.

Mr. J. D. REID. Whom do they replace?

Mr. PATERSON. Mr. Dunlop replaces another who resigned. Mr. Dupuis replaced Mr. Wall, who went to the Post Office Departement and Mr. Wood replaced another Mr. Wood, who resigned. Mr. Hastings succeeded Mr. Bellis, who was promoted.

Mr. J. D. REID. Whom did Mr. McElroy replace?

Mr. PATERSON. He is a new appointment.

Mr. J. D. REID. And Mr. Barrette?

Mr. PATERSON. He is also a new appointment.

Mr. J. D. REID. And Miss Sherry?

Mr. PATERSON. That is another new appointment. Mr. Braid is a stenographer in the commissioner's office.

Mr. J. D. REID. Then the hon. gentleman admits that at least six or seven thousand dollars are added to the expenditure of the department?

Mr. PATERSON. No, $800 is the highest salary.

Mr. J. D. REID. And Mr. Devlin?

Mr. PATERSON. That was a new appointment in the statistical branch.

Mr. J. D. REID. That makes about seven new appointments.

Mr. PATERSON. Five new appointments the accountant tells me. That is pretty economical out of a staff of one hundred and seventy-six.

Mr. S. SHARPE. With a decreasing revenue?

Mr. PATERSON. But we worked along all the time with an increasing revenue with a staff which we would have been justified in increasing. Last year was a year for revenue of which we never saw the like, and we are in hopes that this year there will be a renewed increase, a hope no doubt which my hon. friend shares.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. If the hon. minister will read his speeches of two or three years ago when we had an increasing revenue, he will find that he justified the increase in his staff by the increase in the revenue. I have always been willing to admit that he was not so great a sinner as his colleagues, but I am afraid that, in face of the decreasing revenue of last year, he has shown that he is being led away by the bad example of his neighbours, and is increasing his staff in the face of a decreasing revenue.

Mr. PATERSON. In looking back at the speeches of other years, one forgets the circumstances at the time.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. What right has the hon. gentleman to increase the number of employees in his department when there was not the same amount of work to be done? It looks as though he had just appointed some friends to fill positions which were made on purpose to accommodate them.

Mr. PATERSON. My hon. friend is a business man and he knows that we may have a decreasing revenue in a year when trade is depressed and yet have an increase in the work. There might be as many entries with a shrunken revenue as with a larger revenue. There would be as many invoices, or more, only they would be smaller in amount, and these would entail just as much work as in a year of greater revenue. We have not filled two of these places which became vacant, and I have not found the heads of my department at all extravagant.

Mr. BRODER. The decrease in revenue rather affects the outside service, because the bulk of the customs work falls on the customs officers throughout the country.

Mr. PATERSON. But the statistical work deals with all of them. Let me give another reason for the extra work. As the tariff existed prior to last year, certain material was allowed in free for certain purposes, and the importer would simply make a declaration that these articles were for those purposes and they came in free. We found that the practice was abused and that goods brought in free for specific purposes had, in some cases, gone out of the hands of the importer into those of other men who were not entitled to this privilege. I then changed the system and said that these articles, though free under the tariff, should pay the duty, and then the importers would file their claims for a rebate, which we would check by our officers. Hon. gentlemen can therefore understand how much work that cast on the department, but I believe that the department gained more in revenue than it cost by the extra expenditure.

Mr. OSLER. The other evening it was admitted that some action should be taken to make civil servants work longer hours; and in view of the increases in their salaries they ought to work longer hours.

Mr. PATERSON. What does the hon. gentleman suggest as the number of hours they should work?

Mr. OSLER. The feeling of the House was that the present hours were too short.

Mr. PATERSON. What hours would you suggest?

Mr. OSLER. From nine to five would be suitable and reasonable, I think.

Mr. PATERSON. Not speaking of one department more than another, but dealing with my own department alone, because it is now under discussion, I may say that our hours now are from nine to five.

Mr. OSLER. If the hours of the other departments were increased, could not some clerks be transferred from those other departments to the customs ? Certainly it is not well to increase the staff with a decreasing revenue. The only possible justification, one would think, would be the expectation that the revenue is going to increase.

Mr. PATERSON. I am not passing judgment on the other departments. I give the hours that my department observe. We think that we get good work out of the officers.

Mr. CROSBY. Is it not well to consider all this before we provide salaries for additional officers ? I have listened to gentlemen here who tell us that we have five or six hundred officials more than is necessary. If we are to add five more to the customs alone, it certainly does not look well. It seems most unfair to the people of the country to increase the staff while the revenue is decreasing.

Mr. PATERSON. As I say, I am not passing judgment on other departments. Work in others may be heavier for all I know. I have given our hours, and I may say that those are observed, for there is an attendance book. The minister does not have to sign it, but if he had, I think he would be found the only sinner. He does not attend very early, but perhaps makes it up in later hours.

Mr. CROSBY. The minister holds to the principle of increasing the staff with a falling revenue ?

Mr. PATERSON. No more than is necessary.

Department of Customs.—Contingencies, $9,000.

Mr. PATERSON. There is an increase here of $2,000 in sundries. This increase is only apparent, as the travelling expenses of officers at Ottawa whose travelling expenses, prior to September 1, 1908, were paid out of the vote for Board of Customs, in 1909-10, will be paid out of this vote for civil government contingencies. In 1907-8 the travelling expenses of these officers amounted to $1,673.95. Besides, there are the sundry expenses of the statistical office, $341, which will have to be paid out of contingencies.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I would draw the attention of the minister particularly to the argument used by himself a moment ago. I find the increase, over and above all that was paid to these members of the outside service to be over $1,600. To that add $150 per head for those who are brought in and those who are already in. And, in addition, there are the new appointments. Referring to the estimates of 1896, the total of employees in the inside service was 32. I find now that those in the inside service number 45, but the additions from outside make the total almost double what it was. In 1895, the expenditure was $36,800, whereas the expenditure now although it is impossible to distinguish between the two divisions, would be over twice the amount. Ten vacancies have occurred, but instead of trying to reduce the staff, the minister has filled the vacancies and appointed new officers besides. The minister's argument at one time was that the staff must be increased because the revenue was going up, but now that the revenue is going down there is no decrease in the staff. Now the same hon. gentleman argues that a diminution of the revenue brings about no decrease in the necessary work. If this can be justified, surely the revenue is no guide to the expenditure of this government.

Mr. PATERSON. Going back to 1896, you find a different position altogether.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. We had an economical government then.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not want to say anything against my predecessors. I think that the gentlemen that you have had at the head of this department were pretty close—I do not know but that, perhaps, they were as close as I am. But look at the comparison of revenue; nineteen millions in 1895, last year fifty-eight millions—three times the amount. We are going to drop eleven or twelve millions this year, but I expect we are going to pick up next year and these are the estimates for next year. I am sure that all hon. gentlemen will join with me in the hope that the revenue will increase. Since 1896 the revenue has increased threefold. I do not think the number of entries increased that much, but still there was a vast increase in the number of entries. An entry of $10 takes as long to make as an entry of $1,000.

Mr. CROTHERS. I am not able to follow the hon. minister's logic. When asked for an explanation for that increase in the number of his staff by 5 clerks, he told us that with a decreasing revenue there was as much work as when there was an increasing revenue. That might be a reasonable answer for retaining the same number on the staff, but it is not an answer for increasing the staff by 5 clerks. Then, in explaining the expenses on sundries, he proposes to increase the allowance by nearly 50 per cent. We who are from the rural parts of the country and not acquainted with handling millions, would like to know all about these sundries. We know that sundries, like charity, often cover a multitude of sins. I would like the minister to explain not only the expenditure of $1,500 or $1,600, but to explain to us new members from the country the whole sum of the sundries.

Mr. PATERSON. I am from a rural county like the hon. gentleman himself. This sum of money was paid last year for the same service, travelling expenses of officers that were in the outside service.

Mr. CROTHERS. Generally, what are the sundries for?

Mr. PATERSON. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Auditor General's Report, page F—5 he will see the customs contingencies all set out.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $1,800,000.

Mr. PATERSON. There is an increase here of $95,000.

Mr. BARR. Can the minister tell us how much of this $95,000 increase is due to overtime earned by officers? I should think that when these officers work only four and a half hours a day we should not have so much overtime.

Mr. PATERSON. At centres such as Halifax, St. John, Montreal, Hamilton and other places trains are coming in at all hours of the night and you have to have officers there to attend to them. In Montreal a steamer comes in; she unloads day and night and you have to have your officers there to attend to that. The hours of these officers are from 8 to 6 and in the olden times they got no overtime. When they worked overtime we used to make the railway and steamboat companies pay them. The companies came to my predecessor as well as to myself and reported that they saw no reason why they should do that. They said that the revenue of Canada should be looked after by officers in the pay of Canada and, with a disinclination to swell the expenditure of my department for some years, I took the position of my predecessors and waved them off. Finally their argument prevailed with me. I could not see any reason why a railway or a steamboat company should have to pay officers of the Dominion government. It was our duty to look after the Dominion revenue. I might have said: Do not run your trains at night; do not come into the harbour at night, and if I had said so they would have been forced to pay the officers. We assumed that burden ourselves, and now these men who were largely paid in days gone by by the transportation companies are paid by ourselves, except that if they want any Sunday labour we will not give it to them. We give it to them on holidays, but on Sundays we do not. With officers working during the day the question might arise as to whether a man having worked from 8 to 6 o'clock is in a position to do two or three hours more labour, but unfortunately in many cases the pay of our officers at these large ports is such that it is impossible almost for some of them to live on what they get, and there is a very great desire on their part to augment the salaries which they earn between eight and six by putting in two or three hours at night and getting 25 cents an hour for it. The question has occurred: Would it be better for us to engage men specifically who should go on at six o'clock at night and remain until six o'clock next morning to do the work that is now done or allow these men to have a few hours extra work, which work arguments their salaries and which, they claim, does not give them more than they require to provide a living for themselves and their families. That is the whole explanation.

Mr. BARR. Can the hon. gentleman tell us approximately the amount that is given for overtime? Is it not a fact that there are some who are employed for night work?

Mr. PATERSON. About $95,000.

Mr. BARR. It says 'including overtime.'

Mr. PATERSON. The payments are set out in the Auditor General's Report by provinces as follows: Ontario, $24,048.58; Quebec, $34,382.67; New Brunswick, $8,-812.40; Nova Scotia, $5,320.55; Manitoba, $5,205; British Columbia, $13,295; making a total, with the amounts expended in Prince Edward Island, Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Yukon, of $94,346.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. These items will be chargeable other years as well as this year. That does not account for the increase.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know anything as to that, but the hon. gentleman asked a specific question and I was answering that. What we want to do with this vote is to provide that in case we have to open some new ports we may be able to do so. We are fighting shy of that as far as we can. We have so many applications.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Are there any new employees to pay out of this amount?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, there will be new employees. But we have to estimate that we may, notwithstanding our disinclination to increase the number of ports, find cases that are of such merit that we will have to yield. We want to do as well as we can this year and we want to do as as little as possible in the way of supplementing salaries, though, if our feelings were consulted, we would do a great deal more. With the decline in our revenue we will have to ask the officers to be patient with us, more especially as within the last two or three years in the Customs Department there have been increases of salaries to outside officers of between $200,000 and $300,000. While that seems a large sum of money, but when you spread it from the Atlantic to the Pacific with nearly 2,000 employees, you can see that it would not be a very large increase for any one. There are some who have complained to us that in our division of the money their cases have been overlooked. We do not intend to give it to every one, but there are some cases in which they say that an injustice has been done to them. We propose to ask for a few thousand dollars so that if there are some cases of exceptional merit which have been overlooked we may be able to deal with them, and, if there are new ports to be opened, that we may have the money to open them. There are new towns constantly developing in the Northwest which to-day may not be of much importance, but which within the next twelve months may have to be established as customs ports.

Mr. LALOR. I believe that the outside service is underpaid in many instances and I congratulate the Minister of Customs that he has decided to increase the salaries of his officials in the outside service. I believe that will meet with the commendation of the House. Is the minister giving the increases on account of merit or simply as a percentage on the present salaries?

Mr. PATERSON. We have endeavoured to consult with the collectors at the large ports and we have taken the reports of our inspectors at the smaller ports in making these increases. Three years ago there were to be found men in Montreal who had been fifteen or twenty years in the custom service and who only received $500 a year. We were able to increase their salaries first to $550, then to $600, and then to $650. My aim is that in the large cities where living is expensive, every officer shall have at least $700 a year. They work faithfully from eight o'clock until six, and I think the Dominion of Canada will not want them to work for less than $700 a year. If I get this money I will consider some of these cases. I say frankly and fairly that no consideration guided the department in the distribution of this money which could be considered an unworthy reason. I know of course from the date of their appointment how they came into the service but I can say that simply because they did not come in under me, no officer was debarred from that which was his fair due. You will have to trust us in the distribution of this money to do what we think is right and fair to the various officers. If any hon. gentleman knows of any case where merit has not been recognized and if he lets me know I will be very pleased to consider it.

Mr. GOODEVE. In view of the invitation given to us by the minister I wish to mention a very peculiar condition of things in connection with the custom office in the city of Rossland. In the early days of Rossland we had a large custom business there, but with the collapse of the boom the number of entries and the custom business generally decreased very materially, so that there was not employment for one half of the former staff. Mr. B. R. Macdonald who was Collector of Customs at Rossland, and who I do not hesitate to say is one of the very best officers in the whole service, applied to be removed to Prince Rupert, believing that would become an important place and that his long and faithful service justified promotion. He was sent to Prince Rupert but was not appointed collector. Things drifted along at Rossland for some time, and the remaining officials in the office were sufficient to carry out the work, but eventually the collectorship was declared vacant. There was in the office at Rossland a man who had been in the service for seventeen years or more and who had been collector, but no sooner was the collectorship declared vacant than the Liberal Association called a meeting to receive applications for the position and they recommended a certain man who not only had absolutely no experience in custom work but who had never done clerical work of any kind in his life. He was a blacksmith. I am not reflecting on his occupation in any way. I respect the man very much and he was a clever man in his own business, but he had no experience in clerical work and yet because he had been an influential party worker he was, on the recommendation of the Liberal Association, placed in the position at $1,600 a year, over the head of a man who had been in the service for seventeen years. Now, here is a case in which merit has been overlooked. Here was a man taken from a blacksmith shop and given a salary of $1,600 a year while the two other men in the Rossland custom house who had served for years received $900 a year and $1,200 a year respectively. All the new collector at Rossland had to do was to go to the office each day and one of the regular officials who was well versed in the law, and who was now made subordinate to him, had to instruct him in his duties. For this sinecure, as I say, he is receiving $1,600 a year. No wonder there is an increase of $95,000 in this vote. Now, there is more in the story. When Mr. Macdonald went to Prince Rupert, although he was one of the best men in the service, he was refused the appointment of collector and a man who had never been in the customs service and who had no experience whatever was appointed to the position. Strange to say when the new political appointee to the collectorship found that the boom did not come at Prince Rupert as he expected he believed he could make more money back in the city of Vancouver and he resigned. These are too glorious instances to show how the money of the people is wasted. Why does this collector at Rossland receive $1,600 a year practically for a sinecure? The other men were doing the work and doing it well, and I venture to say that there is a continued falling off in the revenues of the office; so that there was absolutely no need for the appointment. And why did not the men who had long worked in the service of the country receive that advance which the minister says he gives to those in the inside service? Why should not the outside service be treated in the same way as the inside? The hon. minister assured us that when a vacancy occurs in the inside service the other men are moved up but he has not carried out that principle in the outside service. It is appointments made in this way which destroy confidence in the government of this country. I would like an explanation of the instances I have referred to.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman is no doubt stating that he thinks it his duty to point out to this House, but I do not think he knows all the circumstances. My recollection is that Mr. MacDonald, who was collector at Rossland, asked to be transferred to Prince Rupert on the ground of ill health and his request was granted.

Mr. GOODEVE. He was collector at Rossland, and he asked for a similar position at Prince Rupert, but another man was made collector there and Mr. Macdonald was made subordinate to him.

Mr. PATERSON. But he is there and is in receipt of his salary. As we presumed, Mr. Macdonald was going to remain at Prince Rupert and another collector had to be appointed instead of giving the appointment to Mr. Grigor there was another person recommended, and I hope he is a good officer. If the hon. gentleman says he is not, I shall have to get reports on him from my inspector. I may be asked why the position was not given to Mr. Grigor. I am informed that he has to do relieving duties at times, because in a province like British Columbia, we require to have at these different ports an extra man to take the place temporarily of an officer at another port who may be ill. If there has been any injustice done, I shall be very sorry, but I do not think I am open to the charges of extravagance. My hon. friend will not say we should discharge an officer at any port simply because there may be a falling off in the revenue.

Mr. GOODEVE. What I complain of is that they took an outside man of no experience and unnecessarily placed him in office in view of the decreasing revenue and entries. They did so purely for political purposes. I was not referring to Mr. Grigor, whom the hon. Minister has mentioned. Mr. Grigor is a good man and a friend of mine, but during my election he deliberately left his office and went to Nelson and stayed two weeks there electioneering against me while all the time he was drawing his salary. I am not saying any thing against him because he has had experience in the office and is a personal friend of mine, but what I object to is that out of that increased vote of $95,000, I can point to two instances where the money of the country is paid to men who are appointed simply because offices had to be made for them.

Mr. PATERSON. But there was a vacancy was there not ?

Mr. GOODEVE. When the revenue and the entries were falling off, the office could have been left vacant. When one man could fill it for five or seven months without any assistance what necessity was there for making another appointment. I am not asking the minister to discharge anybody because it would be most unfair to discharge an employee on the ground that there was a temporary falling off in the revenue; but when an office became vacant and there was no need to fill it, why appoint a man to that office, especially one who has no experience. In that one instance you could have saved $1,600. I am not reflecting upon your appointee further than to say that the office should have been given to the man who had done good and faithful service during 17 years.

Mr. PATERSON. It would not do to leave a port without a collector.

Mr. GOODEVE. Why not give the place to the man who deserved promotion ?

Mr. PATERSON. The thing has been done and if it be wrong we will have to look into it. But you could not leave the port without a collector. The vacancy was caused by the collector asking to be removed to Prince Rupert. We went on for a time with the officer in charge and then another officer was appointed temporarily to do the work. I suppose that Mr. Stephens was not able to attend to all the work.

Mr. GOODEVE. There are three employees in that office. I am not divulging anything of a private character because it was published in the Daily 'Press' that the Liberals had called a meeting for the express purpose of recommending a man for the appointment. There were three or four applicants, and among them were men who had been long in the service and were entitled to promotion. The government passed over a man who had done faithful service for 17 years and who still has his old salary of $1,200 and they placed a political partisan over his head in the office at $1,600.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Will the minister take note of the facts that this customs officer whom he appointed at $1,600 a year engaged in political work ?

Mr. PATERSON. I was very sorry to hear that.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the minister dismiss this officer, according to the resolution of the House for which he voted, that civil servants must not take any part in elections? It is charged that one of his officers vacated his position and went out on the stump for two weeks at a time, in aid of the Liberal candidate.

Mr. PATERSON. I trust the hon.gentleman is mistaken. If the hon. gentleman will write me a letter stating that this officer neglected his duty and spent his time electioneering against him, I will write to the officer and ask him what explanation he has to make, as I think it is always fair to the officer to do.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman made the statement from his seat in the House.

Mr. GOODEVE. I am not making a charge against the officer but against the minister and his department for making an appointment for political purposes. We have two excellent men there; Mr. McDonald is one of the best men in the service, and I have no charge to make. But I am asked to vote for an increase of $95,000, the revenue is falling off, and here is a case where an unnecessary officer is appointed.

Mr. PATERSON. I think it was proper to fill the office and I have never yet, I frankly confess, considered the fact of a man being a Liberal as a bar to his appointment to office, other things being equal; that is not done under party government.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Does this vote contemplate an increase in the staff?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. How large?

Mr. PATERSON. I cannot tell you that, it will depend on the requirements. Of course in a country developing as rapidly as Canada is we cannot estimate exactly what increases will be required in the Customs service 14 months ahead.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Does that include the port about which the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) inquired, Milton?

Mr. PATERSON. There is one of the points we have to consider.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Is that estimated for?

Mr. PATERSON. We have not worked out any detailed scheme as yet.

Mr. LALOR. The hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) has brought up an interesting question as to the principle followed by the minister and his department in making appointments in the Customs service. We are told that in the inside service men are appointed according to merit and service; is the same principle followed in the outside service? Are appointments made by the promotion of efficient officers to vacancies or are they made by an outside political pull or by the award of a patronage committee?

Mr. PATERSON. Promotion does not follow in the outside service as a matter of course. As a rule if a collectorship at a port becomes vacant a new appointment is made.

Mr. J. D. REID. There have been promotions, but it is not the rule.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, there have been promotions, but that is not the rule.

Mr. LALOR. Does not the minister think it a better policy to promote a man who has done efficient service rather than appoint a new man? At Port Colborne a vacancy was caused by the death of Mr. Sidey, but I notice a new man has been appointed, and the local paper states that although he is the son of a worthy citizen of Welland, he has been for a number of years living in Chicago. In such a case, where there are good officers, they should have been promoted.

Mr. PATERSON. I think there is only the one official there.

Mr. LALOR. There were two, Mr. Ramsden the landing waiter, and the late Mr. Sidey.

Mr. PATERSON. Mr. Ramsden held a dual position, partly under the Customs and partly under the Railway Department.

Mr. MAGRATH. The answers given by the minister have been most satisfactory to me. I understand this item deals with the outside officers. There has been a good deal of talk here about the salaries and hours of the inside service. I have always believed that the inside service has been starved, and I am pleased to see that their salaries have been increased. Is there any indication of increase in the salaries of the outside service? Are the salaries provided by this item the same as have been in force for some years? because I have the same feeling towards the outside service. It, too, is being starved. The cost of living has increased greatly in the last few years. I hope the minister has that feature in view.

Mr. PATERSON. This year we granted increases to officers in the different provinces as follows:

Province.	Number of increases.	Aggregate amount.
Ontario..	310	$23,430
Quebec..	274	14,400
New Brunswick.	55	3,100
Prince Edward Island.	13	800
Nova Scotia..	124	6,600
Manitoba..	52	3,650
Alberta..	14	1,200
Saskatchewan..	13	1,050
British Columbia.. ..	63	5,150

These are the increases granted during the past year. The hon. gentleman will see that this is a small increase among so many officers. Many of the increases have been only $50 or $100 or $150, but the hon. gentleman can readily see that even with the increased amount granted each year for three or four years past by parliament the increases have not been large. But when you spread it over about two thousand officers from the Atlantic to the Pacific it gets pretty thin.

Mr. MAGRATH. If it is convenient for the minister to give it, I would like to get some information. Take the case of a customs port with a revenue of $200,000 a year, what is the salary paid to the chief officer there? I want to make a comparison between the salary of a first-class clerk in the inside service and that of an officer in charge of a port such as I speak of, and distant, perhaps, two thousand miles from Ottawa. If I can get the information, I believe I can show that such an officer is not properly paid.

Mr. PATERSON. There is a little difference in the provinces, but in such a case as the hon. gentleman speaks of, the salary of the collector would be from $1,500 to $1,800. Of course, there are other officers at the port.

Mr. MAGRATH. Does not the minister sympathize with the idea that these men should be paid more?—for I believe they should.

Mr. PATERSON. I can certainly ask for more if the House will give it to me. Personally, it will be very pleasing for me to do so. But I have asked all I can venture to ask, and even when I ask for the amount I do, there seems to be a disposition to criticise me very closely.

Mr. MAGRATH. I do not believe there is a business in this country in which men having the custody of $200,000 a year are paid only $1,500. I have no desire to embarrass the hon. minister, and am satisfied with the answers he has given. Some gentlemen here do not appear to be satisfied with the conduct of affairs in British Columbia, but I would remind them that they are overlooking that doctrine 'To the victors belong the spoils'—a doctrine which has been developed as a hot house plant. but this, however, is not the time to discuss that.

Mr. CROSBY. I do not want to vote money until I have some idea what is going to be done with it. As junior member for Halifax, one of the leading customs ports of Canada, I desire to say that, if it were not for the overtime that the officers there work, they would starve—a man has to work night and day for a mere existence. We have from 67 to 70 men there working at salaries of from $650 to $750. The collector is a man who left a very lucrative business to take his present position, a man held in the highest esteem by the citizens of Halifax. He receives $3,200 a year. I am not complaining of what is paid to the inside service, but you pay a first-class clerk on the inside service more than you pay our collector. If it were not for the honesty of the people of Halifax and Nova Scotia, we would not get as much revenue as we do. If these officers were not honest men, they would pay themselves. The minimum, the very lowest, salary that an officer should be asked to work for in a port like Halifax should be $1,000 a year, and it should run from that to $4,000 for the collector. Next to the collector comes the surveyor, who now receives a salary of $1,500. Then we have two chief clerks getting only $1,200 a year, then the cashier at $1,150. And there are from 10 to 15 who run from $1,000 down. with about 70, as I have said, with between $650 to $750. I do not think that we should have more officers, but we should try to pay the officers we have fair salaries. If the minister will give me some reason to believe that the money he asks for is going to be used to augment the salaries of these men, so that they can make a decent living for their families, I am prepared to support this item. Perhaps the other cities are in the same position, but I do not think their position can be quite as bad in this respect as that of Halifax. If the Minister of Customs can say that he will look after Halifax, and that the minimum salary of a customs officer in Halifax shall be $1,000, that will do, and I shall feel that there is a desire on the part of the Customs Department to treat the cities outside of Ottawa fairly. I am not saying a word against the inside service or the gentlemen who occupy positions in it, but while Halifax is a pleasanter place to live in, it is as dear as Ottawa. I want to see our men get something like a fair share of the money we vote for the department. If the minister will assure me that he is going to deal with those officers of whom I have spoken—and he knows the collector of Halifax and the officers there, and I am sure he will agree that they are, as I have said, a fine lot of men; I will say no more.

Mr. PATERSON. Unhappy is the lot of a Minister of Customs, with some critics asking him to increase his estimates tenfold and others declaring that he is already asking an unreasonable amount. I admit that our officers in Halifax are good, they work hard, and I suppose living has increased in Halifax as it has in other places. But when you ask me to bring them up to $1,000, I would have to come to parliament and ask for over half a million of money, and I do not think parliament would be disposed to do that. Last year, for instance, the increases amounted to $59,450, that was distributed over all the provinces. Here I am only asking for one-tenth of what the hon. gentleman asks me to do. Within the last few years we have made increases running into the hundreds of thousands. While I am proposing $60,000 to increase certain salaries, I am bringing upon myself a mass of communications and representations, and raising hopes from the Atlantic to the Pacific that I shall not be able to gratify, because there will not be a man in the service, scarcely, who would not wish to get a share. We will pick out what we consider the most deserving cases. Every officer in the Dominion will think he is entitled to a piece of it.

Mr. MARSHALL. I think we ought to be fair to the minister. I think he is perfectly right in asking for this increase. I understand he will not use it unless it is necessary. We must remember that this country is growing, and there will likely be new offices opened. While we are criticising the expenditures we must be fair. In my own town, for instance, we have a very good officer who is getting, I think, only $700 or $750 a year. If the revenue went down one-half, are you going to close that office? That man cannot work for less than that, and it is not fair to ask him to do it. I am in sympathy with this estimate the minister is asking for. Any person can see that it is necessary to provide for the future. There is another thing. It is impossible for the minister or any other minister to make appointments that will please everybody. I understand that these appointments are made on the recommendation of the local executive of the Liberal party. If there is an appointment made in Rossland, as has been explained here to-night, I fancy the minister is governed by the reports from the executive, and I fancy that if we were in power, in making appointments, the advice of our local representative would receive earnest consideration. I can understand, as the minister says, that he does not know whether there will be one more or a dozen more officers required next year.

Mr. SPROULE. I notice here the ever recurring phrase 'Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary.' I understand when we amended the Civil Service Act that one of the purposes was to do away with that very thing.

Mr. PATERSON. The new Act does not apply to the outside service.

Mr. SPROULE. You are dealing with the outside service now.

Mr. PATERSON. We are working under the old Act, and I had to put in these words, because otherwise we could not pay for overtime.

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister explained a few minutes ago that part of this increase was required to enable the customs to pay the officers for their overtime work.

Mr. PATERSON. That has been done for several years.

Mr. J. D. REID. I understood that the system in vogue for several years was that when officers went to the railway stations after hours, they collected from the railway for their overtime. I have understood since that instead of allowing the officers to collect from the railway the government collects from the railway and divides that among the officers. I wanted to know if that is the case. In my own town, for example, for years and years the officers would go down to the Canadian Pacific Railway, perhaps at 9 or 10 at night, and for their overtime they would send in a bill at the end of the month for $40 or $50 as the case might be, and the Canadian Pacific Railway would pay it. Now has the Canadian Pacific Railwav been relieved of that expense, do the government pay it now and collect nothing from the railway, or does the government collect from the railway and divide it among the employees?

Mr. PATERSON. No. In the old times, as I have explained, we required the transportation companies to pay for this overtime. But they never paid the officers direct, we did not permit that. The government collected from the company the amount of the overtime of the men and paid it to the men. The railway companies did not pay the officers direct. But a few years ago, when parliament sanctioned the change I asked for, we relieved all the transportation companies of this payment of overtime, and it is now paid out of the Dominion treasury. We require the transportation companies to pay now only in exceptional circumstances. For Sunday labour we will not pay, but we make them pay to us, and we divide it up among the men.

Mr. CROSBY. In the city of Halifax is it not a fact that the merchants pay the extra time of the officers ?

Mr. PATERSON. I suppose this is what the hon. gentleman refers to. Importers bringing goods into the county are supposed to deal on a cash basis. We do not let them have their goods until we get their money, that is a safe way of doing business. But as there are large importations made by merchants who do not want to pay all the money at once, there has been known for years what we call the bonding system; that is, we have a bonded warehouse in which they may store their packages of dutiable articles. They do not want to pay the duty all at once, which may amount to a very large sum, and they put their packages into a bonded warehouse and take them out as they wish, five or ten packages at a time. They apply to us, and we send one of our officers to open that warehouse and deliver to them the number of packages they want, and collect the duty thereon. For many years we charged a uniform rate of $40 for a bonded warehouse. One man might put $300,000 worth of goods in a bonded warehouse, and another only $50,000 worth, perhaps another $10,000, but none of them would pay more than $40. In the case of a large importer we found that it would take perhaps the whole time of one of our lockers to attend to that one house, while another man who paid as much for his store house, $40, might only require the service of a locker once or twice a week. We thought that was not fair. We said: We will make the men pay us who have bonded warehouses, it is a privilege given to them, they are saving the interest on the duty which is a large amount and if they are going to take the time of our officers for their own convenience and benefit we will establish a uniform rate that they shall pay for the time that they use our officers.

Mr. CROSBY. Surely the Minister of Customs does not mean to tell us that about the ordinary bonding system in the customs.

Mr. PATERSON. That is the only way that the merchant pays anything and that is what the hon. gentleman is asking about.

Mr. CROSBY. I think there is another way. I think the Minister of Customs has given a wrong impression of the bonded system. He has given the impression that a man puts his goods into the bonded warehouse because he wants to save his money. Does the minister mean to tell us that there are not hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of goods put into the bonded warehouse and then shiped out to another country?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. CROSBY. Well, then, how are they saving money in that case?

Mr. PATERSON. How did they get the goods there? Do you suppose that we leave the doors open to them to go and put the goods in without an officer being there?

Mr. CROSBY. That is where you get your revenue.

Mr. PATERSON. If they do not have the services of the officer they do not pay him.

Mr. CROSBY. Oh, that is not the matter I am discussing. Did the minister not say distinctly that the reason for the bonded warehouse was that a man could put his goods in there and save his money because he would not have to pay the duty until he took them out? I am sure that 25 per cent of the goods go out of the bonded warehouse in Halifax without paying duty at all, and the deputy minister of Customs knows that. I do not want the impression to go abroad that the merchants in Halifax put their goods into the bonded warehouse for the purpose of saving money when they do not.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. A. K. Maclean). Carried.

Mr. CROSBY. I beg your pardon. I am not carried yet. Is it not a fact that the merchants pay for the overtime of the officers after hours? There may have been a change made but if so it has been made recently.

Mr. PATERSON. I am very sorry if I have offended the hon. gentleman in any way by my allusion to the fact in my explanation that the bonded warehouse means a saving to the merchants storing their goods there.

Mr. CROSBY. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if I am not right in my statement about the warehouse?

Mr. PATERSON. I am going to answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CROSBY. Well I want an answer, yes or no. If I am right I am right, and if I am not, I am not.

Mr. PATERSON. I said they put their goods in there for the purpose of saving revenue. Let me put it in a happier way and say that by virtue of putting their goods in there they save it, and I do not think it is any disgrace to a man to do it and I see no cause for offence. If these goods are going to be re-exported they cannot go into the bonded warehouse unless our officer is there to see them go in and they cannot take them out a month or a year after unless our officer is there to see the goods as they go out. For the services the officer renders they pay and they pay nothing else.

Mr. SPROULE. Is not that officer paid his regular salary from the vote we give every year?

Mr. PATERSON. He is paid his regular salary, but do not confuse this with overtime. The officer doing this does not get the money paid for the bonded warehouse. It comes into the Dominion Treasury.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Has the minister any idea what amount was collected for the services of lockers last year?

Mr. PATERSON. It was $29,000.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Does the minister not think that the government, having relieved the railways of a similar charge, it would be a proper thing to relieve the commercial community also? Are the railways and steamboat companies more deserving a consideration in the monetary sense than the mercantile community? That is a question I would like the minister to consider during the coming year. It is not so much the amount of money that they are required to pay for the services of an officer as the difficulty of getting an officer when he is wanted.

Mr. PATERSON. It is an advantage to a man to be able to defer the payment of duties and especially when it runs into thousands or tens of thousands, or, as in some cases, hundreds of thousands of dollars. But he is one man perhaps in a business community of a hundred of fifty who gets that advantage. Should the other men who do not avail themselves of it, and who get no benefit from it, contribute towards that expense or should we not get that $29,000 for the service rendered to the man who has the benefit of it and place that money in the Dominion Treasury? Outside of the question of overtime, the money comes into our treasury. The principle is that the man who gets the benefit pays for it, while the man who does not take advantage of it pays nothing for it. I am sure that the merchants using the bonded warehouses will admit that it is absolutely fair.

Mr. CROSBY. The minister has not answered my question. I asked him if there was not money paid by merchants and shipping men at Halifax for extra time. I would like to get that question answered, yes or no.

Mr. PATERSON. I am told that there have been $101 paid by all the bonded houses for overtime throughout the Dominion of Canada, and that has only been when they wanted an officer before eight in the morning or after six o'clock at night.

Mr. CROSBY. Can I get the minister to leave bonded warehouses for two or three minutes and tell me if there has been any money paid to tide waiters and officers on ships which come into Halifax to discharge cargo by steamship agents and shipping men?

Mr. PATERSON. For Sundays.

Mr. CROSBY. And for no other time?

Mr. PATERSON. No other time.

Mr. CROSBY. How long has that been the case?

Mr. PATERSON. About three years.

Mr. CROSBY. I thought it had taken place very recently. I would like to know when they were relieved.

Mr. PATERSON. That is a reform we have made.

Mr. CROSBY. A reform! Then, I want you to make another reform and give the men the money you have taken away from them. If you will give them the same proportion I am prepared to vote for these estimates.

Mr. PATERSON. If they have the services of this officer between eight in the morning and six at night, according to the hours they use him for their own benefit, they must pay us, the money goes into the Dominion Treasury and it is not given to the officer, but if they take an officer before eight in the morning or after six at night they pay us that money, which money we pay to the officer and which has amounted for the whole Dominion of Canada to $101.

Mr. CROCKET. Is it the intention to superannuate the inspector of customs at Fredericton?

Mr. PATERSON. It is proposed to superannuate the collector at Fredericton.

Mr. CROCKET. Has the minister any objection to state what applications he has received for the office, and from whom?

Mr. PATERSON. I am safe in saying we have received no applications yet and I do not know that I am anxious to get them. The superannuation has not been passed and we are not yet in a position to fill the office.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the Minister of Customs purpose making the further reform of providing out of the consolidated revenue fund a sufficient sum to pay the cost of advertising the meetings of these political committees who recommend appointees. Would not that be a logical addition to the expenditure of the country?

Mr. PATERSON. I have not had an opportunity of studying how this was done in times past but I will look into it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The minister has not only looked into it but he has acted upon it in the case of Rossland. In view of the exposé in that case I should think the minister ought to pay the extra salary of $1,600 out of his own pocket.

Mr. CROCKET. Did the collector at Fredericton apply for superannuation?

Mr. PATERSON. I am not aware that he did.

Mr. CROCKET. I understood the minister to say when speaking of Winnipeg that there would be no superannuation except upon the application of the collector himself. Why is that rule departed from in the case of Fredericton?

Mr. PATERSON. I qualified that statement by saying that the collector should be able to discharge the duties of the office. The public interest may require the superannuation of a collector without his applying for it.

Mr. CROCKET. From whom has the minister received any information that the collector at Fredericton is not capable of performing the duties of the office? That statement of the minister will be a surprise to the people of Fredericton.

Mr. PATERSON. We judged from the inspector's report, that it was advisable this step should be taken.

Mr. CROCKET. And without any application for superannuation being received from the collector himself.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. CROCKET. When does the minister propose to superannuate the collector at Fredericton?

Mr. CROCKET.

Mr. PATERSON. It is in process. These superannuations have to pass the Treasury Board who inquire into the merits. You can superannuate an official for cause after he attains 60 years of age, but the Treasury Board do not approve superannuating a man simply because he is 60 years old unless it is for the benefit of the service.

Mr. TAYLOR. The benefit of the party.

Mr. PATERSON. Oh no.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is this action taken upon the report of any person?

Mr. PATERSON. The report of our inspector.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the minister bring that down?

Mr. PATERSON. I don't think it would be well to ask for that. The inspector reports to us confidentially in a measure, and to publish the report might hurt somebody's feelings. I have no objection to bring it down, but I would rather show it to my honourable friend. Of course I do not impute anything wrong but it was considered advisable to superannuate the collector in this case.

Mr. CROSBY. I believe that the minimum salary of customs officials in the city of Halifax should be $1,000. I believe also that they should be brought under the Civil Service Act because there is always a tendency for the man with a pull to get more than others who have not the pull, and I know very good officers in Halifax who have not had an increase of salary for several years. The only way they can get fair treatment is to bring them under the Civil Service Act. If the minister would indicate there would be a general increase in the salaries of the Halifax officials, I would be satisfied..

Salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors of ports and of other officers on inspection and preventive service, including salaries and expenses in connection with the board of customs and salary of chief and general inspector at $4,000 per year, $135,000.

Mr. PATERSON. There is a reduction of $104,500 in this vote caused by the transfer to the inside service of officers whose salaries were formerly charged to the vote for the outside service.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was there any particular group of officers so transferred?

Mr. PATERSON. It would principally refer to the clerks in the statistical office.

Mr. J. D. REID. Were there any new officials appointed in 1908 under this item?

Mr. PATERSON. They would be included in the names I have given. I have given the names of the new employees of my department.

Miscellaneous—Printing and stationery subscriptions to commercial papers, flags, dating stamps, locks, instruments, etc., for various ports of entry, express charges on samples, stationery and forms, legal expenses, premiums on guarantee bonds and uniforms for customs officers, $87,500.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the minister refer to page F—42 of the Auditor General's Report? He will there find an item of $827 paid W. G. Charleson—a name that comes up frequently in our public accounts—for a lot of goods. Were these goods purchased by tender? I find an item of 24¼ dozen of padlocks amounting to $250.50, or equal to $10.33 a dozen.

Mr. PATERSON. These are all purchases made at different times during the year and tenders are not asked. The locks are for bonded warehouses, and have to be a special kind of padlock, which cannot be opened by the ordinary key. The purchasing officer is one who has been in the department for 30 years and in whom we have full confidence, and he has certified to the price as reasonable.

Mr. J. D. REID. I suppose the minister has a patronage list the same as the other departments?

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, very little.

Mr. J. D. REID. We find in all these items the same names cropping up as appears in the patronage list of the other departments. The hon. gentleman takes the ground that becauses he has the certificate of his purchasing officer the prices are reasonable. Well, when we complained of the excessive prices in the Public Accounts Committee last year we had the minister pleading that it was an outrage to insinuate that any of their officials would certify to prices which were not absolutely correct. The result of the investigation, however, made by the commission appointed by the government themselves has proved that such certificates are not at all to be relied on, and this man Charleson is one of those who charged prices much higher than are charged private individuals for the same goods. Although the Minister of Customs does not require to purchase as many supplies as some of the other ministers, he is just as guilty as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) who is smiling now over the way in which he administered his department, and which enabled him to distribute among his friends hundreds of thousands of dollars robbed from the people, a fact which he must have known because it was brought to his attention by members on this side.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the Minister of Customs say that he still keeps a patronage list after the disclosures made by the Cassels' Commission ?

Mr. PATERSON. We have very little in the way of patronage. I have no personal knowledge of the particular item in question, but I am informed that these are largely goods bought at different periods. These locks have to be made with keys different from other padlocks, and we have to make a special arrangement for their manufacture. However, as the question has been raised, I shall look into the matter tomorrow.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the hon. minister ascertain what kind of kettles were bought at $1.75 ?

Mr. PATERSON. I am told that they are for testing tea in the laboratory.

Mr. TAYLOR. You can get the very best copper kettles at $1.25 and we are paying $1.75.

Mr. PATERSON. There is 50 cents to be accounted for.

Mr. SPROULE. It is not quite enough to ask us to accept the statement that because these prices have been certified to by an experienced officer they are therefor all right, because when we examined into the purchases for the ice-breaker 'Montcalm' and found cups and saucers charged at over $1 a piece, and the prices certified to as fair and reasonable we ascertained afterwards that these charges were simply robbery. When we look through the Auditor General's account and see the large number of supplies purchased from the same firm, Charleson & Co., who supplied these locks, and many of them charged at exorbitant prices, according to the judgment of those in the trade, we are justified in coming to the conclusion that there is something wrong. We are justified in concluding that there is something wrong and in asking that in view of the recent disclosures of the evils of the patronage system, the minister shall abandon the use of the patronage list in making purchases for his department. Charleson is on the patronage list and is able to sell goods to the department, but time after time we know that goods have been supplied by him above the market price.

Mr. PATERSON. For the little purchases we have to make in my department, I do not think we could adopt any other plan than our present one. I could not have more confidence in any purchasing agent than I have in our present one, and to advertise for the articles would cost five times what they are worth.

Mr. SPROULE. My question is, will the goods be purchased without resorting to the patronage list, will instructions be given to the purchasing agent to buy where he can get the goods at the lowest price?

Mr. PATERSON. I will look into the matter.

Mr. SPROULE. It is a question of principle, not of a few items here; it is a question of the interest of the country.

Mr. PATERSON. I admit that the interest of the country is supreme, but it is not in the interest of the country to go advertising for a few hundred dollars' worth of goods bought during the year.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not want him to advertise.

Mr. PATERSON. These purchases can all be investigated before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. The minister says he has a purchasing agent who has been in the service 30 years and who is perfectly honest. The rule has been that this agent has been told to go to Charleson's and purchase say tea kettles. Charleson says the price is $1.75, but at another store it would be $1.20. If the minister has allowed rake offs of 50 per cent on tea kettles that is not working in the interest of the country.

Mr. PATERSON. I hope he does not think I got a rake off. I did not know that anything was bought from Charleson. Certainly it was not done under my instructions. The commissioner hears what has been said and I have no doubt that he will investigate it in the morning; I will myself if I can think of it.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think that is going far enough. Some of the other ministers without being asked have undertaken to abolish the patronage list, and surely it is not too much to ask the hon. minister to do so.

Mr. PATERSON. You do not want to make me promise to adopt a new system until I find out whether it is best. Leave that to me.

Expenses of maintenance of revenue cruisers and preventive service, $30,000.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. I think this item will have to stand, as we are referred to for the details to section 'O' of the Auditor General's Report, which we have not yet received.

Mr. PATERSON. I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. George Taylor) would not want this item to stand, particularly after the full discussion we have had. There is a decrease of $10,000. This steamer 'Constance' is used in the customs preventive service in eastern waters. The Marine Department manage the vessel and we recoup them for what they do. The captain is our officer. And, as I have said, there is a decrease of $10,000. I hope the hon. gentleman will not ask that this item stand; in fact, I know he will not. Well, we will call that carried. This next amount is also one that will commend itself to the committee.

Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for secret preventive service, $5,000.

This money is required for purposes which, possibly, we may not wish to disclose. The money is at the disposal of the Justice Department. The audit is a confidential one, in which, I think, the leader of the opposition shares.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. We have no objection to that item. But to the previous item, if you will look at the Auditor General's Report, page F—43, immediately after the item of the steamer 'Constance,' appears certain charges for the steamer 'Arctic,' and we are referred to page F—37 of the Auditor General's Report of 1906-7. We have not had an opportunity yet to look that up. And the charge for the 'Constance' here is $25,078.54, for which no details are given. Therefore, I think the vote should be allowed to stand. It will only take a few moments to put it through when we have had an opportunity to see the next part of the Auditor General's Report if everything is right with these amounts for the 'Constance' and the 'Arctic.'

Mr. PATERSON. I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. George Taylor) will not press that, and that any hon. member on that side who has influence with him will get him to withdraw his objection. The expenditure on the 'Arctic,' so far as we are concerned, was to pay the expenses of sending a customs officer to assert Canada's sovereignty in northern waters by collecting customs dues from the American and Scotch whalers there.

Mr. CROSBY. What revenue did he get?

Mr. PATERSON. Not much, it is true, but though it was only the hundredth part of what it cost to send the officer there, I am sure the House will agree that it was only proper to assert Canada's sovereignty in those waters.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I thought Captain Bernier did that by raising the flag?

Mr. PATERSON. So he did. But we sent a customs officer with him and when we send a customs officer it means something, for he gets the hard cash.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. So far as I am concerned, if the minister, on some item of the Marine Department——

Some hon. MEMBERS. On the supplementaries.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I understand that there are to be no supplementaries.

Mr. PATERSON. I am afraid we shall have some for this year, but I hope none for next year. I am ready to give the information at any time.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. On some item of the Marine and Fisheries estimates, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) will allow this item to be discussed.

Post Office Department—Salaries, $488,944—Contingencies, $65,755.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. On what page of the Auditor General's Report are the expenditures for last year given?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). The part in which these appear is not yet printed. But this is for the inside service only.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Let the item stand. Surely the Postmaster General is not going to ask us to pass this without the report?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not know what special questions may be asked with regard to this. I am confident I can give all explanations to satisfy hon. members. If this were for the outside service I could understand that there might be some difficulty, but it is for the inside service——

Mr. J. D. REID. I would remind the Postmaster General that there are many members who never saw the Auditor General's Report, and, of course, they would like to have an opportunity to study these details.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. As a matter of course, the item cannot be pressed without the Auditor General's Report if any objection is taken.

Mr. PATERSON. Take Public Works.

Public Works Department—Salaries, $324,800. Contingencies, $15,000.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). Previous to the coming into effect of the present Civil Service Act, there were only 36 employees of the Public Works Department on the Civil Service list, while there were about two hundred employed, the large majority of whom were not on the permanent list. Under the new law these are now brought into the Civil Service. If hon. members will refer to page 26 of the Estimates they will see the details. The number of officers to be provided for is 237, nearly all of whom were in the employ of the department previously.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Will the minister give us a list of the appointees of the Public Works Department during the last twelve months?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I cannot do so to-night, but I should be glad to furnish it in answer to the inquiry made.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Better bring down the information, and meantime let the item stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think I can give the explanation. We propose providing for one additional engineer and one chief draughtsman, amounting to $4,200. In addition, we provide for an additional clerk in the third division of subdivision A, amounting to $900. Then the statutory increases for 1909-10, for 196 employees, amount to $5,262.50. Then we think we do well to make provision for unforeseen additional appointments or other changes to the extent of $5,000. Then there is the balance covering the differences between the annual increases in the salaries and the increases authorized by order in council dated May 5 and August 6 and August 31 of 1908, amounting to $8,958. I have a list of the names of all those who were in the service when the Civil Service Act came into force, also of the 196 employees who have been brought under the Civil Service Act. I will read them to the hon. gentleman if he desires.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is an enormous increase in the vote, and I would suggest that the minister put his explanations as fully as possible upon the 'Hansard,' and then we will let the item stand and take it up to-morrow when we can see the explanations.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Won't the hon. gentleman let it go through to-night? I will be glad to give information later on in a return.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would be glad to accommodate the hon. gentleman, but I would prefer that he put his explanations fully upon the 'Hansard' so that we can understand them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not wish unduly to press the item, but it is early in the evening. I think I have given quite a full explanation already. In addition I have here the names of all those who were in the temporary service and who were transferred to the permanent service by virtue of the Civil Service Act. Those names I need not read to-night, because they are all embodied in the order of classification which has been brought down to the House. The hon. gentleman will find there the names and present salaries, and also salaries under the reorganization.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Generally speaking, is the increased vote due to the fact that men are placed upon the regular permanent staff who have been paid out of many other votes of different characters in the public works estimates during previous years?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. As an illustration, turn to the miscellaneous, and the hon. gentleman will find that there are two votes alone showing substantial decreases. Take the miscellaneous vote on page 7 of the estimates. Last year there was a vote for the engineering branch of $185,000, this year we are only asking for $145,000. The reason is that the engineering staff resident in Ottawa was largely upon the temporary list, and they all go to the permanent list. In the same way, under the architectural branch, there was $65,000 last year, and we only ask for $25,000 this year. Then in the estimates of this year the temporary and non-professional branch at Ottawa amounting to a very large sum, is wiped out altogether, and that is what makes the difference and accounts in the largely increased amount for the Civil Service. The amounts for temporary clerks are struck out altogether, and the amounts for engineering and architectural branch are reduced in the vicinity of $80,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Comparing this vote for 1909-10 with the vote last year covering the same items, in different forms, was there an increase or decrease, and for what amount ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The increase would be $25,000. That is made up by the salary of the deputy minister, increased by $1,000. We provide for an assistant deputy minister at $3,600, and we are providing for an additional engineer and a draughtsman $4,200 for both, also another third class clerk. We also provide $5,000 for other increases in the staff that may be found necessary during the coming year. Then the remaining $8,958 is made up by the differences between the annual increases in the salaries and the same increases which were made by orders in council of May 5 and August 6 and 31 last.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Could you tell us offhand how much of the increase is due in the first place to additional employees, in the second place, to statutory increases, and in the third place, to increases of any other character ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The new employees get statutory increases as well. I have just given them to my hon. friend.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is contemplated by the provision of $5,000 ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is contemplated possibly there may be some additions to the staff required, some additional architects, and possibly some addition to the cement branch, and in the clerical staff as well. The work in the department is increasing. One might suppose from the reduction in the estimates that the work was not increasing. But I want to tell the committee that the work goes on just the same. Under the estimates provided last year the architectural branch and the engineering branch still go on making their plans and specifications, because we do not understand that the work provided for last session is being dropped, it is merely postponed. All the necessary work will have to go on in order to fulfil the policy adopted by parliament last session.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The minister has not given the figures as they are stated on page 26. He says there is an increase of 2 in the first division, and 1 in the third division. But if he will look at the second division, there were fifty-eight temporaries and eleven permanent, and he is asking for seventy-five, an increase of six in the second division. He has not stated that to the committee at all but the figures are here before us.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That would be included in the $5,000. I say that amount is for possible increases. There are a number who are not actually in the employ of the department now, but I have put in $5,000 for the purpose of covering that.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman estimates 75 at $98,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. As against 69 before.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. That increased six over last year and then my hon. friend is asking for an extra $5,000 so that he may appoint more.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In making up the $28,000 I have put in $5,000 as the possible amount which may be required for these additional clerks.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend is asking for 9 and there is a reduction of 2 in one of the items in the third division. There are 43 outside and 4 permanent, making 47. take 2 from your 9 new appointments and it leaves an increase in the staff of 7 in the face of a falling revenue. Then I want that information because I am informed that just before the Civil Service Act took effect there was a large number added to the staff.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There were no additions to the staff just before the Civil Service Act came into force.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. There were a number of employees added to the force; I do not know whether you call it the staff or not. Then I want the names of the new appointees.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend is entirely in error. Possibly he may have in his mind that some additional labourers may have been employed, but there were no additions to the staff just before the Civil Service Act came into force.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Does the transfer from the outside to the inside service mean a change of occupation or residence?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. In the Public Works Department there was an organization of what was known as the temporary non-professional class. Away back in the time of Sir Hector Langevin this system was adopted. The number of those who were in the civil service was very small as compared with the temporary appointments. That system was carried right on until the Civil Service Act came into force on the 1st September and which brought all these into the permanent service. It does not mean any change in the employment at all and they have been brought in at the salaries which they had been receiving before the 1st September.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think we will take the minister's statement and look it over, and possibly it may obviate any further discussion. Let the item stand and we will look over the statement.

Item allowed to stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What item shall we take up?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think we had better adjourn now.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is very early to adjourn. Had we not better take up public buildings chargeable to capital?

Ottawa Astronomical Observatory—additional buildings, etc., $14,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This vote of $14,000 is asked to make provision for the construction of a residence for the chief astronomer, and also to complete coelostat house and standardizing hut in connection with the astronomical observatory. The proposed building to be occupied by the chief astronomer is to be a brick building with a stone foundation two and a half stories in height. The residence of the chief astronomer will cost about $16,000. As a great deal of the work of the chief astronomer has to be done at night it is necessary that he should have his residence close to the observatory. The vote of last year was $23,000, and we are now asking for $14,000 to finish the work.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Has the contract been let?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The contract for the residence has not been let.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Has the $23,000 been expended?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not all. There was a contract for a coelostat hut and standardizing hut at $13,900, besides which there was the cost of heating, electric wiring, etc.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I thought that $23,000 was voted for the new building under contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was voted for the standardizing hut and the new coelostat house, the contract for which was $13,900, heating apparatus $1,000, electric wiring, $500, etc.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. To whom was the contract for the building let?

Mr. PUGSLEY. To Messrs. John O'Leary and M. J. Whelan, of Ottawa, the lowest tenderers. Messrs Doran & Devlin were the lowest tenderers for the residence.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Were public tenders asked for the residence ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and five tenders received.

Mr. STAPLES. Where is this residence going to be located?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Close to the observatory.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Is it the policy of the government to erect residences for the chief clerks?

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is a residence for the chief astronomer.

Mr. STAPLES. What salary does he get?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know at this moment; he is an officer of the Department of the Interior. It is my duty as Minister of Public Works to provide the necessary accommodation for the chief astronomer.

Mr. J. D. REID. Were there only two tenders for this building?

Mr. PUGSLEY. For the coelostat house and standardizing hut. These were the lowest tenderers.

Mr. STAPLES. I think the minister should be able to give us the salary that the chief astronomer is getting. If he is getting a large salary why should the people of Canada furnish him with a $15,000 residence? We have had instances in this House where the government have built residences for people in the service who are receiving enormous salaries. A great many of the people who pay the money have to live in small houses and paying a man a salary such as I am told the chief astronomer gets and furnishing him with a $15,000 residence is exacting more from the poor labouring classes of this country than should be exacted by any government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Ordinarily speaking my hon friend would be entirely right. The government does not, as a rule, provide residences for its employees, but my hon. friend will see that to enable the chief astronomer to perform his work properly it is necessary that he shall be at night constantly at the observatory. The observatory is two or three miles from Ottawa and it would be very inconvenient for him to reside in Ottawa. I resisted the pressure for a considerable time, but on urgent representations made to me I felt we would have to erect a residence for Mr. King.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Is there any diminution in his salary in consideration of his getting this house free of rent.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. J. D. REID. What is the amount of the tender for this residence?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The lowest tender was $12,300.

Mr. STAPLES. Are we to understand that $15,000 will complete this residence? My experience is that these buildings cost twice their estimated cost.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This contract is for the building alone and then there will be the heating and wiring, and I assume from the information I have that $3,000 or $4,000 additional will be necessary.

Mr. STAPLES. Is it essential that the chief astronomer should have a residence for his family close to the observatory. Even though he has to work at night, he is not any worse off than any others in that respect, and I don't see why it is not possible to provide him with suitable quarters which will not cost anything like this enormous amount. Why should we build such an expensive residence for a high paid official when the poor labouring classes of the country have to live in huts ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I hesitated, just as my hon. friend (Mr. Staples) would have done were he in my position, to build this residence, but there was no house close to the observatory which he could get and it would be unreasonable to ask him to build one himself. It was brought to my notice that a good many years ago a residence was erected by the Conservative government on the experimental farm for Dr. Saunders and for some other officials.

Mr. STAPLES. What did it cost?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is a very fine residence and making allowance for difference in cost of material and labour it would be quite as expensive as this one.

Mr. STAPLES. The whole policy of the government seems to be to give advantages to the highly paid officials, while withholding from under-paid officials who do the greater portion of the work, that consideration to which they are entitled. I know men who are working in the Civil Service in this city for $40 and $45 a month and who are expected to rear their families on this miserable pay. But when we come to the highly paid officials the policy of the government is to increase their emoluments by leaps and bounds.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In view of the fact, that, instead of adopting the report of the commission to give a percentage on salaries which would be an advantage to the highly paid officials the government proposes to give a flat increase of $150 to each civil servant, the criticism of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Staples) is hardly just.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. This building is to be erected right under the eyes of the Department of Public Works in Ottawa with their immense staff and yet they pay Mr. John Sharp as clerk of works for 143 days at $4 per day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. Sharp is one of the staff of the Public Works Department and his services in this case are properly chargeable to that building.

Mr. WRIGHT. I voice my protest against putting $20,000 into a building for the accommodation of any civil servant in Ottawa. I think a $10,000 house to be good enough for any man we employ.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. But that is not a patch on it, for if the hon. gentleman looks at the Auditor General's Report he will find the government paid to the Office Specialty Company, (a pet company here in Ottawa established to get business from the government) $5,970 for library fittings for this building.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is for the observatory itself and not for this residence.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The item says here: 'For fitting library steel cases, gallery and stairs, and bevelling below the gallery, $5,970.' I want to draw attention to another item on the same page. E. P. McGrath & Co. have supplied 182 lineal feet oak for transit house at 15c. per lineal foot; two inside doors with fan lights, and two pine door frames with fan light and oak door, with locks, &c., supplied and set up, $132.15.' Just fancy $61 per frame door with a fan light in it. Were these bought by tender?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend will see that the first item is for fittings for the library, steel cases, gallery and stairs and panelling below the gallery, less the amount of $970 paid the previous year. In the laboratory there is a library because there must be various works which are of great importance to the chief astronomer. There must also be records of his observations from night to night, which must be preserved, and it is not improper that they should be kept in steel fittings so as to make the inside of the building as fire proof as possible. Then the stairway from the bottom to the upper gallery must be of iron, as they are in all large libraries. This was let by tender. There are only two firms which make these fittings in Canada, and tenders were received from the two.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Is there a library also provided in the residence?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Will there be a man employed in that building as caretaker?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I don't propose to furnish a caretaker.

Mr. BLAIN. Are the two firms from which the hon. gentleman asked tenders on the patronage list?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There are only two firms in Canada where these goods can be got. One is in Ottawa, and the other is in a city in western Ontario. Before purchasing, a very careful examination was made of the fittings made in the United States, and used generally in the public offices in Washington and the different state capitals, and the chief architect ascertained that the prices asked us were fair and reasonable.

Mr. S. SHARPE. In view of the strong condemnation of the patronage list by the Civil Service Commission, does the hon. gentleman propose to abolish it ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have given instructions to abolish it as far as possible, and invite public tenders. I am now considering the establishing of a purchasing department, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has done, in accordance with the report of the Civil Service Commission, but that organization will take a little time and the person in charge of that branch will have to be thoroughly experienced and reliable.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. How comes it that the hon. minister paid $2.50 per barrel for 85 barrels of cement bought from Kirby & Co., when he could buy that cement at Hull for $1.80?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was but a small quantity and no tenders were called for.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. You could purchase it by retail at $1.65. I see the familiar name of Chas. Patton down for four fire extinguishers at $15 a piece, or two more than last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Last year the order may have been a large one and $15 is a reasonable price, for they are very good articles.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Does this item include the furnishings for that house as well as the building?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. S. SHARPE. What is the necessity for such a large house? Has the gentleman a large family or does he expect to, or are other gentlemen going to live with him?

Mr. BLAIN. Does the minister propose to furnish the house?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have no intention to ask for such a vote. That might properly be done by Dr. King himself.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the minister think a residence of this cost is required?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will be perfectly frank. When the plans and estimate were first presented to me I said I thought the house was too expensive and asked the chief architect to cut it down and this has been done.

Mr. BLAIN. What will the total cost be?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The lowest tender is a little over $12,000 and with the heating, wiring and plumbing it will likely cost somewhere between $15,000 and $16,000.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Has the work started yet?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Personally I cannot allow this item to go without a very strong protest. I can see no pressing necessity for a public building of this kind when hundreds of buildings are required all through Canada that are not provided for in the estimates. In North Ontario, for instance, the minister, the day after the issue of the writ, sent an officer of the department to Uxbridge to get options on lots for a post office to cost $8,000. The options were for sixty days and the urgent public necessity for a building of that kind was strongly urged. The people there are in need of that building far more than this gentleman is of a residence; that post office will serve from 3,000 to 5,000 people while this serves only one, and I would suggest that this appropriation should be dropped and one for the Uxbridge post office substituted. I must strongly protest against this large item when there are other more urgent and pressing claims.

Mr. BLAIN. Was any vote passed last session for the erection of this residence?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There was a vote for additional buildings in connection with the observatory and I explained to the House that it was contemplated to errect a coelostat house and other buildings and a residence for the chief astronomer.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Does this Mr. Sharpe get $4 a day all the year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, he is employed permanently.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. That is $1,460 a year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. And he earns every dollar of it.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. Who purchased the 85 barrels of cement at $2.50 and who paid $106 for two pine door frames and a fanlight in the two doors? Who ordered these and certified to the accounts?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They would be purchased under the direction of the chief architect who is responsible for the purchase and also the price.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. Who else tendered for the work awarded to the Office Specialty Company?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I cannot tell whether the other concern tendered or not, but prices were asked from both companies.

Mr. WALLACE. Where is the Office Specialty Company situated?

Mr. PUGSLEY. At Newmarket.

Mr. WALLACE. In what county is that ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would know better than I do.

Mr. WALLACE. I thought it might be in New York.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I could suggest a use for this money, which, I think, would be much more in the public interest than building a handsome residence in Ottawa for this already well-treated official. I desire to present the claims of the city of Chilliwack, in the constituency I have the honour to represent. I have been looking through these estimates to see what provision was made for the public building in Chilliwack promised by a minister of the Crown, who has disappeared for the time being, but who did us the honour to visit us during the election. He promised that, if the government was sustained, we should have a handsome public building for post office and customs purposes erected in Chilliwack. Now we are told that an era of economy has set in, and we cannot have the building that was promised. But when we examine the estimates, we find that economy is only in spots, and the high spots struck by this era of economy are those that have the good fortune to be represented by members of the opposition who will stand up for the rights of the people, and that the expenditures to provide the comforts of civilization are centred around the seat of government in Ottawa. As an hon. friend near me remarks, we all had to buck these promises. It is time to register our protest in the most solemn way. I think it is due to this House that we should have some explanation from the government as to why they have gone back in this most heartless manner upon the promise made by their defeated colleague to the people of Chilliwack.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The question the hon. member (Mr. J. D. Taylor) has asked is a very proper one. It was a matter of very great regret to me to be obliged to postpone for the time the consideration of a post office building at Chilliwack. An appropriation was made last session and the necessary steps were taken towards securing a site, but tenders were not called for because there was delay in acquiring a site. But I would say this, in justice to myself and as an explanation to our friends on both sides, that when the time arrived when, by reason of declining revenues, we had to make a reduction, in the public interest as we thought, in the expenditures, we found there would be great difficulty in discriminating amongst the public works which had been provided for last session, for all seemed to have very considerable merit. I could say to my own conscience that I have not asked for a vote for a single public work in any part of Canada which could not be justified on public grounds. What we did was this : We drew the line sharply between public works in respect of which tenders had been called, or which had been undertaken by day's work and those in regard to which no tenders had been called. In doing this an enormous reduction was made in my estimates, something over $8,000,000. I desire to say to our friends on this side of the House that nothing has occurred in my public life that has given me greater regret than to be obliged to postpone the building of wharfs, public buildings and other public works in the various constituencies throughout Canada to which parliament was pledged last session. I wish to express, in the most sincere manner, thanks to our friends in parliament who have yielded to our views and have acquiesced cheerfully in the determination, upon grounds of economy, to postpone—I trust for only a short time—the construction of these public works. I may say to my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. J. D. Taylor) that Chilliwack does not stand in a different position from many other places throughout the Dominion. We have not discriminated between our supporters and opponents, but have treated all alike, acting upon one principle, and postponing the construction of these public works. We have also felt it necessary to postpone some for which tenders had been called.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. What about the minister's promise ? We do not mind a promise made by an ordinary candidate, but, when a minister makes a promise, that pledges the government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What minister ?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I was just about to remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) of the facts. During the campaign in Chilliwack, the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman), the minister who represents the province of British Columbia, on his responsibility as a minister, and expecting that his statement would be taken as that of an honourable man at par, told the people that if they and others would assist, and if the government were returned to power, a most substantial government building would be constructed in Chilliwack. I submit that conditions have not changed since the tenth day of October, when the Minister of Inland Revenue upon the stage of the theatre in Chilliwack, made that promise, and that the government is in honour bound to carry out this pledge, even though the people of that riding did by a very substantial majority return the present member instead of the gentleman put forward by the government of the day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Was any statement made as to when this building was to be commenced? The hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Taylor) must have patience.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. As we do not seem to be very busy, and as time is not pressing, I would like to inform the committee of something that did occur at that time. We were discussing at Chilliwack a matter of very pressing importance for British Columbia, the matter of better terms——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. A. K. Maclean). The hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Taylor) is departing from the resolution if he is going to discuss the question of better terms.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening to the debate all evening, and have heard a large variety of topics discussed, but have not heard anybody called down yet for being out of order. I do not think I am going further astray than those who have preceded me. In answer to the minister who has asked the question, I would like to explain the circumstances which occurred at this meeting in Chilliwack. We were discussing the question of better terms. In answer to our argument that we were not receiving from this government the terms we had a right to expect, we were told by the Minister of Inland Revenue that the province of British Columbia was about to receive better terms from the government at Ottawa. But, he stated, instead of giving this money to be squandered by the McBride government, they were spreading it over the province in the shape of appropriations for government works of all kinds. Why, he said, we have given you a substantial public building in every place of any importance in the province; we have purchased in Chilliwack a valuable site, and we intend to erect a first-class building upon it. Of course we all understood, every reasonable man would understand, the minister to mean that having purchased a site he intended to proceed immediately with the erection of that building. I submit that it was not businesslike on the part of this government to buy an expensive site in the city of Chilliwack, promising the people that if this government were returned they would erect this building, and then, after the government had been returned, to turn around and say: We find that the finances are so straitened we have no money with which to erect a building, and we propose to allow the lot to stand idle and take the money we intended to expend in Chilliwack and with it erect a palatial residence at the city of Ottawa for a highly paid official of this government. I submit that is not the proper way in which this government should treat the people of British Columbia.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. PATERSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. What business do you propose to take up to-morrow?

Mr. PATERSON. I did not ask the Prime Minister, but I suppose we will go on with the estimates, probably Civil Government and Public Works.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. Friday.

SUPPLY—CANADIAN RAILWAYS.

Hon. WM. PATERSON moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, before you put that motion I again must trespass on the time of the House for a few moments to refer to the question of what I might call the delinquencies of Canadian railways in connection with their capitalization. I wish to point out, in view of the wide powers that have been given to the Canadian Pacific Railway in the matter of capital that when such powers are given, the service accorded to the people ought to be considered, and I think I will be able to show in a very short time that to-day even so great a railway as the Canadian Pacific is not giving the public the service that it ought to give in consideration of the great franchise granted to it and the enormous resources that it has at its command. It will surprise any one who looks at the railway service now given to this country to see the preference that is given by our Canadian railways—that we subsidize with land and money, roads to which we give splendid franchises—to the traffic of a foreign country. They devote their main energies to accommodating the traffic whether passenger or freight that originates in a foreign country. In the province of Ontario we know that the great Canadian Pacific Railway, with all its resources, gives its first attention to what is called the American trade. In Toronto and all along the main line in Ontario you see what are called the produce and beef trains from Chicago which are given the right of way and precedence over Canadian traffic. There are people who are prepared to say, and I believe they are right, that the rates accorded to this traffic that originates in the United States are lower than those which are accorded to the produce of our Canadian farms. Talking to railway men, they have told me that the one class of train over the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway running through the province of Ontario that ranks as to right of way almost with the accommodation train is the beef train from Chicago. You find that the chief executive and the chief officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway apparently are devoting their best attention, their best engines, the right of way over the road and things of that kind to the accommodation of American traffic that originates in Chicago. I do not think that ought to be the case and yet it happens to be the case. Local traffic is neglected. In the city of Toronto we have asked that great Canadian Pacific Railway Company to give us a suburban service which would be as much for the benefit of the country lying around Toronto as for the city and they have told us deliberately that it is not their intention to supply a suburban service and that the people should go to the trolley lines if they want a service of that kind. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have also taken that position. The Grand Trunk have told the citizens of Toronto that if they want a suburban service, if they want the same kind of treatment that is accorded to the people of Montreal, where an excellent suburban service is given by both railways, they cannot have it, that there is not the business for it to do that they cannot see any money in it and that they cannot afford to make the experiment. Yet the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is accumulating a net surplus that is equal to ten per cent of the stock of the company.

There is another thing that we have been told by this great corporation and by the others and that is that we cannot look for any kind of improvement in relation to the traffic of Ontario, and that the one ambition of the company is to extend its system. Expansion is the great idea of the railway magnates rather than service to the country, and the Canadian Pacific Railway to-day are very busy building up their extensions in the United States. They are acquiring great systems of railway over there and they have told us that they have not time to attend to the Ontario business because they are too busy with the expansion of their road. They say that they are also occupied with the expansion of their system in the west. That may be all right, but I contend that they ought to give more attention to the local traffic, to the reduction of rates on local traffic and to an equalization in rates as between Canadian and American traffic. This is a serious charge to make, and when a railway company like the Canadian Pacific Railway come to the government and ask for an increase of their capital, as this company have asked for an increase of their capital, some terms ought to be put upon them. They should be asked : Are you accommodating the traffic in your own country ? But apparently they can do what they like in Canada; they can carry passengers in the United States for two cents a mile and they can charge Canadians three cents a mile. That is unfair. I have contended in this House time after time that we should have a two cent a mile rate in this country, and especially on the railroads which give a two cent a mile rate to their American traffic. And the answer given to me is: This is a new country; Canada is not like the state of New York; we will have to charge three cents a mile in Canada. No, Canada is not like the state of New York and it is not like the state of New York because the great Canadian Pacific Railway, for one reason, is in a position to have a net surplus of earnings equal to ten per cent on its capital stock, a state of things which is unequalled by any other railway in America to-day. I do not want to be told again that I must have some consideration for the Canadian Pacific Railway and other railways because Canada is a poor country with a sparse and scattered population, in view of the fact that that population is paying a net profit to the Canadian Pacific Railway of ten per cent on its stock.

There is another disastrous feature of railway operation in Canada and that is the wanton disregard by these great corporations of the lives of the people and the lives of their servants. The sacrifice of human life on the railways is increasing from year to year. The railways tell us they cannot afford to provide life-saving devices and yet here is a company proposing to give $35,000,000 as a gift to its shareholders. In the little city of West Toronto in my constituency hardly a week or a day passes that there is not a funeral of some person killed on the railroad. We have the strange spectacle in West Toronto that now we hold an annual memorial service for the railway men killed by trains and forty or fifty names are called out on the death roll at this annual service. I am told that the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway must be maintained and so it must, but is the credit of that corporation to be maintained at the expense of high rates to be paid by the Canadian people and at the expense of an immense loss of human life. How many railway crossings could be protected out of this $35,000,000 that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is to-day taking from the public and making the public for ever pay the interest on? When I say that the net surplus earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway are over 10 per cent on its capital I have as an authority the 'Statist' and the 'Economist,' two of the leading financial journals in England. It is all wrong that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be allowed to what is commonly called 'Cut a melon' and distribute it in the shape of from $25,000,000 to $35,000,000 among its shareholders, and which it can only do if it is allowed to continue charging exorbitant rates. On that surplus they could well afford to reduce their rates ; on that surplus they could well afford to give the farmers of the west lower transportation for their products; on that surplus they could afford to provide devices to safeguard the lives of the people. I read in their report that last year they issued $24,000,000 of the same kind of stock among their shareholders and they succeeded so well that they wanted to repeat it to the tune of $50,000,000. So long as they are allowed to do that there never will be another bond issue, there never will be another mortgage debenture sold and there never will be any preferential stock issued. This of course is an alluring system of finance for the shareholder of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and he is largely a European who is growing fat on the Canadian who has to pay railway tolls. My contention is that the reputation of the Canadian Pacific Railway is now so well established in the financial centres of the world that it can get all the money it wants for the extension of its lines by the issue of bonds. But, they have other resources. They have over 8,000,000 acres of land in Alberta and Saskatchewan and they have 4,000,000 acres more in British Columbia, and for some of this land they are asking $25 an acre, but even taking it at $5 an acre it will give them all the money they want to build new lines. I have been told by some wiseacres: You are interfering with the credit and the standing of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the money markets of the world, and yet they have this 12,000,000 acres of land worth from $12 to $20 an acre none of which they need to touch. It is true that in the past they have sold a great deal of their land and put the proceeds into the road, but hereafter that land is to be kept as a guarantee that they will be able to pay 10 per cent on this stock which is sold to the shareholders at par when it would and should command a premium of 75. I was also told not very long ago that New York was the only state that could protect the issue of securities, but, I have good authority for saying that when Mr. Taft is inaugurated a month hence the chief plank in his administration, after tariff reform, will be that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall take complete charge of all kinds of securities issued by railways which do an interstate business. I was glad to hear the Minister of Railways say the other day that he thought this question was well worth considering, and I hope he will give it a good deal of consideration and that he will find a way to regulate the issue of these securities by the railways. There cannot be a regulation of railway rates until there is a regulation of the issue of securities, and securities should not be permitted to be issued unless the railway can show that it has no other resources in its treasury. The Canadian Pacific Railway has to-day a treasury the extent of which nobody knows. It is all very well to say what a fine railway it is, but do you think that its annual financial statement tells the whole truth about what is in its treasury and what its resources are? Not at all.

There is a great deal more. Before the road is authorized to issue a single dollar of additional stock, it should show that it cannot use its resources to carry on financing in a more economical way. It has still 12,000,000 acres of land and other great resources that it could mortgage, and so could easily raise the money it requires. Considering the preference given to traffic that originates outside this country and the lack of attention to local traffic, and considering the extravagant system of financing that it proposed, I think we ought, once and for all, to tell the company that, if it wishes to raise more money, it must raise it on some system that is less a tax on the man who pays the traffic charges. For we must never lose sight of the fact that it is not the railway that pays the interest charges on these securities, but that these are paid by the people who have to bear the traffic charges. Until I have further information I must again say that the order in council to which I have referred was most unwisely issued. I hope the minister will give us a copy of it—he has promised that he would bring it down. I contend that it would not be wrong, in view of the facts I have given, to recall and reconsider that order in council, calling upon this great railway to show that it cannot raise the money it requires for the extension of its line other than by the issue of stock at 100 when its stock is bringing 160 or 170 in the open market. I have not a word of criticism to pass on the Canadian Pacific as a railway proposition. We are all proud of it. It has opened up the country and will do a great deal for the country. But a railway is something that concerns the people; it is part of the administration of the country, and it ought to seek to serve the people quite as much as to make its investments attractive to the capitalists of the world. It is all very well to speak of maintaining a reputation in the money markets of the world, but it is also important to do justice to the Canadian people. In that connection I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals whether or not the provision in the original charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway, under which we are not to interfere with their freight rates as long as they do not exceed ten per cent, has been commuted. I was told by a previous Minister of Justice in this House that that clause had been commuted, but I am not sure as to that, and I would like to know the facts now or later at the minister's convenience. I know that the feeling in the Canadian west is in favour of regulating the issue of securities by these railways, and we are only beginning to realize that this is the keynote of the regulation of freight rates. I have already told the House, and I tell them again, that the reason the great capitalists of Europe neglect American railway securities is that they distrust them. Within a few years these securities have been sent back to the Americans, and the trust companies and savings banks who had loaned money on these shares have had to take them over. The investors of the United States are not taking them, and the people of Europe refuse to take them. Why? Because these railways have been over-capitalized. We read in the papers that the American roads are moving to exclude the Canadian Pacific from their territory on the ground that the Canadian Pacific carries freights at less rates than they can—I am a little doubtful about that—due to the fact that the American railways have such enormous fixed charges through over-capitalization. So we see there is real danger in over-capitalization, and the only way to take charge of the traffic rates is to take charge of the issue of capital. I leave this subject for the present, but I intend to return to it until we have some assurance that the regulation of the capital of railways is a matter of public concern that must pass some form of public inspection with a view to making the railway charges as low as possible.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I will not detain the House with any lengthy remarks, for the hon. gentleman (Mr. W. F. Maclean) and I discussed the matter pretty fully the other day. I am afraid I should have to repeat what I said then. But, even though it be a repetition, I may say that the question of rates and the question of service, as to both freight and passengers, have been handed over to the Railway Commissioners, and I stand to my opinion that, having adopted this course, we should follow it until it proves a failure—which I think it will never prove. I think that the Board of Railway Commissioners have done a work as good as any like body in the world, perhaps better. As to the order in council to which the hon. gentleman refers, I will have pleasure in bringing it down. I overlooked it.

MARINE DEPARTMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the discussion which has gone on is not to be continued—and, so far as I am concerned, I will reserve my remarks for another occasion when my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) proposes to bring it up—I would like to mention two matters. The Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) yesterday gave an explanation—or what he seemed to consider an explanation—of the extraordinary and unusual delay that has taken place in the printing of the evidence taken before Mr. Justice Cassels. He told us, what we already knew, that one volume of about 325 or 350 pages had been printed or distributed early in October. He promised another volume next week, and the third volume in two or three weeks from now—I have forgotten the exact date. He told us also that a fourth volume would be out at some time in the future, which he did not undertake to define. Now, I want to tell my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) that I regard his explanation as the most extraordinary statement I ever heard in this House in regard to the printing of a public document of so much moment as the one to which I have alluded.

Let me point out to him why I regard his explanation as extraordinary. Every day we have debates in this House from three to twelve or one o'clock, which debate takes up more space in print than a single day's evidence before Judge Cassels. That debate is printed and ready for examination by any hon. member in this House by ten o'clock on the following morning. Yet my hon. friend comes to this House, when evidence taken in September last has been withheld from us in a printed shape for four months, and seems to imagine that his statement is an explanation which the House ought to accept. I say that that evidence, with ordinary diligence such as is applied in the printing of Hansard, could have been ready for distribution the very next day after it was given, yet four months after that time we are told in a very philosophical way that we will get part of it some time next week, another part in three or four weeks, and another some day in the future, which the hon. member does not name. My hon. friend said that the delay is partly due to the fact that a portion of the evidence was taken in French and there was some delay in translation. If my hon. friend will apply the analogy of Hansard to that, he will find that Hansard is translated into French and printed and is not more than ten days behind the English edition. The translation need not cause a delay of over a week or two at the outside. My hon. friend had better look into the matter and give some reason why the distribution of the evidence is delayed. I am not disposed to accept that which he is pleased to call an explanation; and I shall venture to treat this matter as of sufficient importance to engage the attention in a considerable debate at no distant day, unless we have an investigation made into this delay in the Printing Bureau.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Secretary of State). I do not know that at the moment I can add anything to the information given yesterday. Like other ministers in charge of departments, I am dependent for information upon the officers who are charged with the actual carrying out of the work. In the main I think it will be found that the work at the Printing Bureau is done with as much expedition as is possible in work of that character. Speaking with the diffidence and lack of experience of a new member, may I say that I do not see the analogy between the printing and the issue of Hansard and the getting out of something altogether outside the regular line of work, such as the collection of evidence and the issuing of it in pamphlet form. If there be any means of expediting the work, I shall see that such means are adopted.

THE INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS TREATY.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. With respect to the dispatch which was read in the House yesterday by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, I wish to make a few observations: The dispatch is as follows:

London, January 29, 1909.

I am in receipt of your telegram of January 28, and from your telegram of January 9, I gather that your responsible advisers have the full text of the treaty before them.

According to press reports there seems to be some misunderstanding as to the presentation of the treaty to the Dominion parliament.

In this country the treaty-making power is with the King, acting on the advice of his responsible ministers, who in cases of treaties which affect the Dominion, acts of course in full consultation and accord with the government of the Dominion concerned.

In the United States the treaty-making power is with the advice and consent of the Senate, and until the Senate of the United States of America approve of any treaty it is not the practice to publish or present to parliament either in this country or in Canada, or to publish in the United States or to present to congress. The fact that the Senate of the United States see the treaty before the parliament of the Dominion, but not before government of the Dominion, is therefore entirely due to the terms of the constitution of the United States.

I am in hopes that your responsible advisers will clearly explain this to parliament, and will point out that the relation between the parliament of the Dominion and the government of the Dominion in this respect is practically analogous to that between the Imperial parliament and the government of His Majesty the King.

(Sgd.) CREWE.

There seems to have been a misconception created in Great Britain, and evidently the same impression is in the mind of the Colonial Secretary, that some remarks which have been made in this House were directed against the action of the imperial authorities, and that the government of Canada was not held responsible by this parliament for any action taken in connection with this treaty. So far as any remarks of mine may have created any such impression, I desire to say that they have been absolutely misunderstood. In respect of a question of this character, I hold the government of Canada responsible to the parliament of Canada for its policy and action, whether in relation to negotiations with the United States or in relation to upholding the rights of this country in any communication or negotiation between the government of Canada and that of Great Britain.

I appreciate what the Secretary of State for the Colonies has said regarding the practice by which the Senate of the United States deals with treaties in secret session. Before the arrival of his dispatch I looked at the United States authorities and I found that the practice in the United States is exactly as he states. But it is only a practice. I have under my hand the constitution of the United States, and that constitution imposes no obligation on the Senate of the United States to deal with treaties in secret session:

Art. 2. Sec. 2 of the Constitution of the United States, as contained in the Principles of Constitutional Law by Principal Cooley, is as follows:—

The presidents have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the senators present concur.

The article does not impose any obligation on the Senate of the United States to consider these treaties in secret session, and I am convinced, from information which has come to me in connection with this very treaty, that citizens of the United States, who may feel themselves interested in any of the matters affected by it, can without very much difficulty obtain all desired information regarding it before it is published in the press or laid upon the table of Congress. So that while in theory the Secretary of State for the Colonies is absolutely correct, I venture to say that in practice there is a disadvantage for Canada in the way in which these matters are dealt with. The people of Canada do not know at present whether or not this treaty contains any matter which may make it necessary for our parliament to legislate in order that the provisions of that treaty shall become effective in every respect. But I venture to think that that information might possibly be obtained by interested persons in the United States. It would be remarkable in a Senate, composed of I do not know how many members, and with these matters coming to the knowledge of a great many persons who are officers of the House, if the information desired could not sometimes be obtained by interested persons.

I do not know whether the provisions of this treaty would be regarded as extending, by the terms of compromise, to cession of territory. It is needless to point out to the Prime Minister or to any hon. gentleman in this House, that if any easement or right is created by the terms of that treaty in respect of Canadian territory, then that treaty does by its terms amount to a cession of Canadian territory in that respect; and I would like to point out to the right hon. gentleman that under the recent British practice all such treaties are presented to parliament at a very early date, and that parliament is invited to ratify them by an act of parliament, which seems to be regarded as necessary by later authorities. For instance, I find, on reference to Anson on the Law and Custom of the Constitution, edition of 1908, page 106, that:

> In 1890 Queen Victoria, concluding a treaty with the Emperor of Germany, which provided among other things for the cession of Heligoland to the emperor, was advised by her ministers to make the cession conditional on the approval of parliament.

The treaty was not only presented to parliament but was made conditional on the approval of parliament. That was one of the points that I made the other day and I was not attributing the slightest blame to the imperial authorities in regard to it. Whatever credit or blame there may be in respect of a treaty of that kind ought to be attributed to the government of the day, and I would entirely attribute it to the government of the day in Canada. When I was dealing with this treaty the other day I pointed out the advisability, in respect of the important questions which must be covered by it, in respect of its possibility involving a question of cession of territory, that it ought to be presented immediately to the parliament of Canada; and, further than that, its effect ought to be made contingent upon the approval of the parliament of Canada. I observe that in the treaty relating to Heligoland this course was pursued by the ministers of the imperial government who advised Her Majesty.

The citation from Anson proceeds as follows:

> This invitation to parliament to share in the exercise of the prerogative rights of the Crown, and therewith to assume the responsibilities of the executive, was much criticised in debate.

It then refers to the opinions of Mr. Gladstone and of Mr. Balfour. Mr. Gladstone criticised the action of the government; and Mr. Balfour spoke of the question as being in a nebulous condition, but asserted that eminent legal authorities, consulted specifically, had maintained the necessity or parliamentary consent. He no doubt referred to the law officers of the Crown and to other persons, probably of equal eminence in the profession of the law, who had been consulted in regard to it.

I quote further from Anson as follows:

> The course taken in 1890 was followed in the case of the Anglo-French convention in 1904, in which various points at issue between the two countries were settled on terms which involved cessions of territory to France. No question was raised in either House of parliament, except as to the expediency of the terms, when the Bill which embodied the convention was under discussion.

There was no relevant discussion of any importance on that occasion; the only incident of value was that the course taken in 1890 was again taken by the British cabinet in 1904 in advising the Crown with regard to the Anglo-French treaty of that year; and that there was no criticism or comment thereon in parliament.

Inferences might also be drawn from the well known case of Walker vs. Baird, decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1892. This case related to interference with the working of a lobster factory on the coast of Newfoundland. The owner of the factory was stopped by an officer entrusted with the enforcement of an agreement made between the Crown and the Government of France. The owner of the factory brought an action and it was alleged to be no defence that the conduct of the officer was an act of State. Whether or not it could be authorized by the treaty making power of the Crown was discussed but not settled, inasmuch as the statement of defence assumed that the mere allegation that the acts were done in pursuance of a treaty took the matter out of the jurisdiction of the courts.

Lord Herschel's judgment in the case is no doubt familiar to the legal gentlemen in the House. It is quoted in part in this work. Speaking of the argument, Lord Herschel said this:

It was admitted that the Crown could not sanction an invasion by its officers of the right of private individuals whenever it was necessary in order to compel obedience to the terms of a treaty.

Then he continues:

Whether the power contended for does exist in the case of treaties of peace, and whether if so it exists equally in cases akin to a treaty of peace, or whether in both or either of those cases interference with private rights can be authorized otherwise than by the legislature, are grave questions upon which their lordships do not find it necessary to express an opinion.

But they did express an opinion upon the point raised in the case and did hold that the mere making of an agreement between Great Britain and France, in addition to or in interpretation of a treaty. did not authorize the executive of Great Britain or the executive of Newfoundland to interfere with private rights without the sanction of an Act of parliament. Thus, in so far as the fulfilment of this treaty may require any interference with the rights of private citizens in this country, in respect of their lands or otherwise, the sanction and approval of parliament are necessary; and that is another reason why, in my opinion, the treaty ought to have been made conditional upon the approval of the Canadian parliament in the first instance.

The right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies has stated in a very broad and comprehensive way the practice in Great Britain with regard to the production of these treaties to parliament. I desire, in my observations in regard to the doctrine which he has laid down, to express my most sincere respect and deference for any opinion emanating from a gentleman holding so high a position, not only in the imperial councils but throughout the empire, as the Earl of Crewe, Secretary of State for the Colonies. But I desire to say that my brief researches into this subject do not lead me to exactly the same conclusions as those which have been arrived at by the right hon. Secretary of State for the Colonies. In the despatch to which I alluded he says :

It is not the practice to publish or present to parliament either in this country or in Canada, or to publish in the United States or to present to congress—— before the ratification of the treaty, that is before the treaty has been approved by the Senate of the United States. Until this treaty has been approved by the Senate of the United States there is no ratification of the treaty. In that respect I do not think that the practice has been quite so consistent as the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies would have us believe. It is very difficult to obtain reference to precedents from 1887 down. It is unfortunate that Todd's work, the last edition of which bears date in 1887, has not been brought down to a later date. Thus, twenty-one years have now elapsed since any edition has been issued. But taking it down to 1887, I find the doctrine enunciated by Todd as follows—I am reading from volume 1, page 367:

Until of late years, it was not usual to lay before parliament treaties prior to their ratification by the governments concerned. A contrary practice has recently prevailed in several instances.

That seems to be inconsistent with the very general and sweeping statement which has been placed before this House by the Prime Minister in terms of the despatch from the Earl of Crewe which I read a moment ago. Then Todd proceeds to deal with the instances. For example :

In 1865, the government submitted to the House of Commons a 'Sugar Duties and Drawback Bill,' the object of which was, 'to give effect to a treaty which had not yet been ratified, and therefore could not be presented to the house in the usual form, by command of Her Majesty; but for the information of the House, as the treaty required legislation a copy had been presented as a return from the Treasury.'

In 1870 a treaty of neutrality with Belgium was for special reasons informally communicated to both houses of parliament on the day of prorogation, although its formal ratification had not been completed. The same course was taken with regard to the Treaty of Washington in 1871, and in the case of the French Commercial Treaty in 1873.

So here are at least four cases in recent years up to 1887, in which the practice described by the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies as a universal practice, was not followed. I would venture to believe that if the records were searched from 1887 down to the present time some further illustrations of a departure from this supposedly universal rule might also be found. I do not myself see any great danger or detriment to the people or to the executive of a country in making a treaty known after it has once been signed If any such danger or detriment is likely to occur, why did it not occur in the cases which I have quoted from Todd. What detriment to the public interest, what detriment to the executive or the people occurred by reason of the communication to parliament of these four treaties in 1865, in 1870, in 1871 and in 1873? Mr. Todd does not point out that any unfortunate results were observed as arising from the communication of those treaties to parliament on those occasions. I venture to think that the communication of this treaty to parliament in the meantime would have been attended with no detriment to the public interest, and no embarrassment to the executive, and would have been a more desirable course to follow than that which has been pursued. I sincerely trust that the treaty may be laid upon the table of parliament at a very early day. I do not know what length of time may elapse before the Senate of the United States may come to a conclusion upon the subject. So far as my information goes they have not yet ratified the treaty. Am I right in that understanding?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand it has met with constant opposition in the Senate.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So at the present time we do not know whether or when it will be ratified. Of course my right hon. friend will understand that it might take a very long time. It might not be determined by the Senate this year, it might not be determined until next year, it might not be determined until the following year.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps not at all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, are we for ever to remain in ignorance of the terms of this treaty? Is that the result? It seems to me an undesirable and unfortunate result, and one which should not necessarily follow from observing diplomatic usage; because in the four instances which were adduced by Mr. Todd up to 1887, the number of which might be increased no doubt by further research, we find several treaties communicated to parliament before ratification, and we have not observed that any detriment to the public interest has resulted from pursuing that course. Under the circumstances I conceived it to be my duty to make my views known to parliament and to the country, as I had introduced the matter in the first instance.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no fault to find with the remarks of my hon. friend, nor with the spirit which has inspired them. In my opinion, however, he has not rightly apprehended the spirit of the communication which I laid before the House yesterday, coming from the Earl of Crewe, the Colonial Secretary. The spirit of the communication is not to make it clear to this country that the Canadian government ought to be held responsible to the people, and that they are either to be blamed or commended for the treaty they have negotiated. That responsibility we fully assume. The Canadian government was represented in the negotiation of that treaty by a gentleman appointed by ourselves as one of the commissioners, namely, Mr. Gibbons, of London, who has been for some years chairman of the Waterways Commission, and whom we considered, from his experience in that capacity, was eminently qualified to look after Canadian interests. I may say at once that we accept full responsibility for the treaty. If blame is to be attached to it, we would be responsible; if credit is to be attached to it, we should be equally the beneficiaries. The despatch of the Earl of Crewe was the result of an inquiry made by His Excellency the Governor General to have the treaty placed at once before parliament, and therefore before the Canadian people. The answer of the Earl of Crewe has been commented upon by my hon. friend a moment ago. My hon. friend has, I think, brought in some matters which are not immediately connected with the subject in hand. He has, for instance, suggested the question whether the treaty-making power in this instance should be supplemented by the parliament of Canada, or whether in such a matter the prerogative of the Crown is paramount. My interpretation of parliamentary law in this matter has always been, that in all treaties except treaties of commerce and treaties affecting the revenue, the paramount treaty-making power is vested in His Majesty.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I did not question that, my observations were directed to the practice rather than to the power.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think the argument of my hon. friend dealt with the treaty-making power. In my humble judgment the treaty-making power is vested in the King, except in matters affecting the revenue. My hon. friend also brought forward an instance to the effect that if the treaty involved a cession of territory, the paramount power resided in parliament. That is the proposition of my hon. friend.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My right hon. friend is quite right; I did take that position as one supported by considerable authority.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Well, although supported by considerable authority, my hon. friend conceded also that the question was not free from doubt. As I understand the quotation of my hon. friend from such an eminent authority as Mr. Gladstone, it went to show that he argued that the treaty of the sovereign is paramount and that parliament has no authority in the matter. Then, it will depend upon the terms of the treaty as to whether or not the treaty, to become effective, has to be supplemented by the action of parliament or whether it is complete by the exercise of the power of the King. In my opinion this treaty is such that it is complete by the signature of the sovereign. Whether or not the treaty is wise or unwise, at the present time, it is legal, in my humble judgment. If it were declared that the treaty had to be supplemented by the action of parliament, then parliament would have to pronounce upon it. If, on the other hand, the power of the King is complete, then it will be open to parliament to censure or approve the treaty as the case might be within the exercise of its power in that respect. But that is a question beyond the issue. The main question that was introduced to the House by my hon. friend on a former occasion was as to whether the treaty should be communicated to the people. For my part, I agree altogether with my hon. friend. I see no reason whatever, the moment the treaty has been signed, and even before it is ratified by the sovereign, why it should not be communicated to parliament. I am at one with my hon. friend as to that. It has not been the practice to do so. I am very glad that my hon. friend has brought to my attention the authority of Todd upon the subject, showing that what has been the usage of parliament has been departed from in three cases.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Four.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In the four cases which are cited the usage of parliament in this respect has not been followed. I must say that I was not aware of this, and I shall take the opportunity of looking over the authorities myself and again call the attention of the Colonial Office to them. I repeat what I said a moment ago that for my part I see no reason at all why, the moment the treaty has been signed by the plenipotentiaries, it should not be communicated to the parties interested. I might observe to my hon. friend that while the treaty has been submitted to the Senate of the United States, according to the terms of the constitution, it has not been communicated to the House of Representatives.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. No, certainly not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Therefore, in that respect the Americans have themselves accepted the usage that the treaty is not to be communicated to the public until it has been ratified, but we must recognize that parliamentary usage must develop with the times. In former days when the press had not the power that it has at this moment it was quite consistent that a treaty should not be communicated to the people until it had been ratified by His Majesty the King. But in these later days when the press has acquired such power in the national life of every country, I think it would be not a disadvantage but an advantage to the country itself to know what are the provisions of the treaty in which it is interested before it is ratified. If the parliamentary usage were to be changed in that respect it would be an improvement, and it would give more satisfaction to the people of Canada. I repeat that I have no fault to find with my hon. friend, but that on the other hand I agree with him and I shall look at the authorities to which he has called my attention and then communicate with the Colonial Office with reference to the matter.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, in support of the position taken by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), I may say a few words in reference to this interesting question. The paramount power to make a treaty is with the Crown, provided the treaty does not interfere with a subject's allegiance to His Majesty or deprive him of any property. The doctrine was laid down and discussed in this House again and again during the debate on the Washington treaty, and upon several other occasions. The doctrine was also laid down in a case which was decided in reference to South Africa. South Africa at one time was acquired by the British forces. After remaining two or three years in possession of the British it was ceded by an Act of the sovereign by the exercise of his paramount power. An action was brought by a subject owning property in the South African Republic on the ground that he was deprived of his allegiance by the Act of his sovereign. The court held that he was not deprived of his allegiance because the possession which was acquired did not form part or parcel of the empire and the Crown had the right to dispose of it. But at the same time, the Privy Council upheld the doctrine that no act depriving a subject of his allegiance or depriving him of any part of his property which was part and parcel of the British empire, without the consent of the parliament of the country, was legal. I hold that to be an incontrovertible doctrine. The sovereign has the paramount power to exercise the right of disposition with respect to any property provided it does not interfere with the allegiance of a subject or take a portion of the empire and give it to another. This treaty cannot do so. I suppose it does not deprive any subject of his allegiance or property and it is therefore in the paramount power of the sovereign. But, the modern doctrine is this: Parliament claims the right now, having acquired the right by the practice to which my hon. friend has referred and in respect to which he has quoted authorities, of being a party to the treaty. We take the ground that everything affecting the interests of the colony or the Dominion, it being within the British empire, must receive our consideration. We claim that right and we must have it. I think that under the constitution, the right of the Crown is undoubted if it does not interfere with our allegiance or deprive us of our property, but the modern constitutional doctrine which we have acquired by practice is that any treaty affecting our interests shall be submitted to the parliament of this country for its consideration and approval.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply

Department of Agriculture—Salaries (including G. F. O'Halloran at $6,000) $322,100. Contingencies, $13,500.

Mr. SPROULE. What accounts for the large increase in this item?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). 195 clerks have been brought from the outside service into the inside service and the increase is entirely due to that, with the exception of the statutory increases.

Mr. BARR. Were any new officials appointed?

Mr. FISHER. There is no increase otherwise than by bringing in the Experimental Farm branch, the Statistical branch, the Seed branch, the Veterinary and Live Stock branch, the Dairy branch, and the Archives, as provided in the Act of last session.

Mr. BARR. Have the salaries been increased all along the line?

Mr. FISHER. There are 13 who by the reorganization of the inside service get increases.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the total of the salaries for each of the different branches of the department?

Mr. FISHER. Experimental Farm, Ottawa, $31,700; Public Health, $6,450; Health of animals, $21,250; Live Stock, $12,-100; Seed division, $24,900; Dairy division, $30,500; Meat and canned foods inspection, $6,250; Cold storage, $3,200; Exhibition, $2,-500; Census and statistics, $28,450; Archives, $28,212.

Mr. SPROULE. How many of these 193 have entered the service as permanent clerks without having passed the Civil Service examination?

Mr. FISHER. Twenty-one clerks who were formerly paid out of Civil government contingencies had passed the Civil Service examination. The others were appointed from the outside service which did not require the Civil Service examination, but it is possible that a few of them had passed the examination

Mr. SPROULE. What I want is the percentage of those temporary clerks who are now put into the permanent service without having passed the qualifying examination.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think the hon. gentleman quite understands the situation. These clerks were not temporary clerks, and were not in the Civil Service at all. Though their labours were in Ottawa, they were in outside branches. But, under the Act of last session, they were brought into the inside service. Before that change, they were not paid as civil servants, but were paid out of lump votes, as, for instance, the vote for the Archives, the vote for the Dairy Branch, and so on. But there were temporary clerks who were in the Civil Service under the operation of the old Civil Service Act. These were paid out of civil government contingencies, which was a lump vote under civil government. But, under the old Act, they were required to pass the qualifying examination. There were 21 of them in my department, and they all had passed the qualifying examination and held their certificates. But the rest of this total number of 193 were not in that category, they were not in the Civil Service at all, though they were in the employ of the country, and had not been required to pass the examination, but had been appointed on their merits. These are now brought into the inside service.

Mr. SPROULE. I was judging from the heading of the list, 'Outside and temporary.' But if all these 21 have passed the examiners, how was it that they were temporary clerks?

Mr. FISHER. If the hon. gentleman observed the old Civil Service, no doubt he was aware that there were many permanent 'temporary' clerks. Though appointed as 'temporary' clerks, some of them have been in the department for fifteen or twenty years. They were paid out of a vote, which the hon. gentleman no doubt will remember seeing in the old estimates, for 'clerical assistance,' which came under civil government contingencies.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, but my recollection is that these were not obliged to pass the qualifying examination.

Mr. FISHER. I believe there were instances in the old service of people being appointed to temporary positions without passing the qualifying examination. This must have been done by some means, which, I confess, I do not understand, for I have always understood that the old Act did require such an appointee to be one who had passed the qualifying examination. As a matter of fact, the 21 in my department have passed that examination.

Mr. HAGGART. Surely the minister is mistaken. For instance, in the Railway Department, there are many specially employed, such as professional men—engineers and others. These are what may be called 'temporary' permanent clerks.

Mr. FISHER. But they are not paid out of a vote for clerical assistance under civil government contingencies.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister has not been quite as frank with me as my question deserved. I did not ask how many were paid out of civil government contingencies, but how many there were. I put the question in the form I did, because, last session, the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), when explaining this Act, told the House that there were a large number of temporary clerks who might be regarded as permanent, many of them having been twelve, fifteen or even twenty years in the government's employ, and the majority, if I understood correctly, had not passed the qualifying examination. These he proposed should be put into the Civil Service at once. I desire to ascertain how many of those in this list have been put on in that way. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is dealing with those paid out of civil government contingencies, but there are a good many others not accounted for.

Mr. FISHER. I tried to explain that these others were paid out of lump votes, such as I have described, Archives, Exhibition branch, Dairy branch, Seed branch, and so on. These were permanent employees in the service of the country, but they were not civil servants.

Mr. SPROULE. And were not required to pass the qualifying examination?

Mr. FISHER. No. But, according to my understanding of the law, those paid out of civil government contingencies had to pass the qualifying examination.

Mr. SPROULE. The change with regard to this 193 employees means that the amount for salaries here is increased from $84,000 to $322,000. Is there a corresponding reduction in the branches from whose votes these employees were formerly paid?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, there has been a corresponding reduction in these votes. For instance, in Archives, the hon. gentleman will find that there is a reduction of $32,000. The salaries, as a matter of fact, came to $28,212, so that we have reduced them by nearly $4,000. In census and statistics, there is a reduction of $23,500. Now the salaries transferred into the civil government amount to $28,450, which is a little under $5,000 more than the difference. We have started a new system of monthly crop reports, for the carrying on of which I need $5,000 more. The whole reduction in salaries is $28,500 but I have added under the census service $5,000 which diminishes the reduction from $28,500 to $23,500. Take the experimental farm, my hon. friend will see there a reduction of $32,000. The salary reductions were $31,700. We have therefore reduced the vote $300 more than the amount transferred to civil government and so I could go on through all these votes.

Mr. CROTHERS. Take the item, first division, subdivision A, on page 24, $34,850, so that we may see just how the Civil Service Act of last year works out. It would be interesting to know the salary that each of these paid clerks got in the outside service last year and what it is proposed to pay this year. There were eight brought in from the outside. What salaries were they getting when they were in the outside service?

Mr. FISHER. I shall give the list. Dr. Montizambert, who is in charge of the Public Health and Quarantine, has $4,000, and Mr. Saunders, the director of the Experimental Farm has $4,000.

Mr. CROTHERS. Give the salaries they had last year and what they are getting this year.

Mr. FISHER. In these two cases the salaries are exactly the same in each year. They had been getting $4,000 for many years back.

Mr. PERLEY. How is it their salaries were not increased?

Mr. FISHER. If my hon. friend had been listening, he would have heard me say that there are thirty-five in the service whose salaries are not increased by the classification or the proposed Bill and these are amongst them. Mr. Archibald Blue, head of the Statistical Branch has $4,000 and had the same last year. Dr. J. G. Rutherford, Chief Veterinarian, $4,000 last year and $4,000 next year. Mr. J. J. Ruddick, Dairy Commissioner had $3,500 last year and the current year. Next year, by the statutory increase under the Act he will have $3,600. Dr. Doughty, Archivist last year and the current year $3,200. Next year with the statutory increase $3,300. J. F. Roy, Assistant Archivist, $3,000 last year, and the current year, and $3,100 next year by the statutory increase. A. L. Jarvis Secretary and Acting Deputy, $2,600 last year, and $2,800 under the reorganization which took effect on the 1st September. Mr. Jarvis was at $2,600 in the old Civil Service, but by the reorganization he was put into the first subdivision at $2,800. By the Civil Service Act, having been at the maximum of his class for some years, he was elligible and legally had the right to the statutory increase of $100, which would make him $2,900 since the 1st September. During the coming fiscal year he will be entitled again to the statutory increase of another $100, and therefore we are providing that amount for the coming fiscal year. G. H. Clarke, seed commissioner, $2,800 last year and the current year, and we are providing $2,950. He will be eligible for the statutory increase only. P. E. Ritchie, registrar of copyrights and trademarks and administrator of the Gold and Silver Marks Act, was chief clerk at $2,050. He is put into the first subdivision at $2,800, and in the course of the next fiscal year will have the statutory increase of $100. We therefore provide $2,900. These are the ten clerks, of which eight were formerly in the outside service.

Mr. S. SHARPE. When the deputies of the other departments receive $5,000, why should the deputy minister of Agriculture get $6,000 ?

Mr. FISHER. He is also Deputy commissioner of patents, and parliament decided last year to give him as such an extra $1,000.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I would like some explanation from the Minister of Agriculture with regard to the increase of salary to his deputy. I see that this gentleman was increased to $6,000, while the salary of the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue was increased from $4,000 to $5,000. Why this difference in favour of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture ? It is alleged that this officer fills several positions. Even if it were true, he could not give to those duties more time than he can dispose of. When his salary was $5,000, was it not considered a sufficient salary, especially when the other deputy ministers, except the Deputy Minister of Justice and the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, can only receive that amount ?

This gentleman was receiving $5,000 a year, and now he is being paid $6,000. It seems to me as if he was treated with greater generosity than others. When a man receives a salary sufficient for a respectable living he should not be increased in that way.

There are a great many employees in the different departments who are not so highly paid, and who do not receive any such increases. The salary of many of our judges is not so high as that. In Montreal, for instance, the Circuit Court judges are only paid $3,000 and we refused them an increase. I say it again, I find it strange that the government should have increased the salary of this deputy minister from $5,000 to $6,000, and I am awaiting the explanations of the minister.

Hon. Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to discuss this question anew if the hon. member from Terrebonne desires, but this increase has been agreed upon last year. Therefore, it is not a new increase. It was made last year, when we voted the estimates of the fiscal year. This item is only the continuation of the same salary paid last year to the Deputy Minister of Agriculture. The hon. member says that there are some judges who are not so highly paid. Judges of the Superior Court in Montreal are paid more than that.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) I said the Circuit Court judges.

Hon. Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) I may tell the hon. member that the duties of this deputy minister are of a very special character. As Patents Commissioner he has judiciary functions to perform. Some very important cases are brought before him very often. He has to decide upon issues in which sometimes are involved millions of dollars. To fill this position it requires a very competent man, and who possesses at least a knowledge as sure and as learned as any of the best judges of the Superior Court of Quebec. This question has been fully discussed last session, and the House has agreed to pay that salary to this deputy minister. I am not, therefore, asking any more than the continuation of the same salary.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) But, nevertheless, he has received an increase of $1,000 this year.

Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) No, not at all. He was paid $6,000 during the current year; that is to say, since the law passed during the last session has been in operation.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Would the minister state the net additions to his staff during the past year ?

Mr. FISHER. I could not give the number positively for the past year, I have been dealing with the current fiscal year only. There is only one addition during the current fiscal year.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Does this appropriation contemplate any additions ?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, we will have to have one more official in the Archives Branch and provision is made for that. He will be in subdivision 'A' of the second division, a special translator, who will be appointed under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Will there be a promotion ?

Mr. FISHER. No ; he will have to come in from the outside as there is no one in the branch competent for that work.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the minister give approximately the amount of increase ?

Mr. FISHER. I would not like to speak at a guess, but would repeat in general terms that there are no increases except the statutory increases under the Act. The lump sum increase is due to the bringing in of clerks from the outside service.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Could the minister give a statement of the number of officials and clerks in his department devoting their time entirely to agriculture ?

Mr. FISHER. I suppose my hon. friend would not wish to include in that category the clerical branches, such as the accountant's branch, although they are largely engaged in work connected with agriculture. Perhaps it would be better if I should give him the number of officials in the non-agricultural branches and let him subtract that from the total. That statement would be about as follows :

Branch	Number of Clerks.
	1st Division	2nd Division	3rd Division
Archives (including provision for one appointment)	2	12	20
Census and Statistics	3	6	22*
Copyright and Trade Marks	1	2	5
Patents Branch	1	19	26
Public Health (two employees)	.....	.....	.....

*And one messenger.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What about exhibitions ?

Mr. FISHER. One stenographer in the deputy's office attends to the correspondence of that branch, but the rest of the exhibition branch are still in the outside service.

Mr. TAYLOR. I see by the details at page 23 that the minister is apparently asking an appropriation to pay the salaries of 269 officials, which would be an increase of 16 over the number of last year, including the outside servants who have been brought in. If any manufacturing or mercantile institution in Canada ran its business in this way, increasing its staff with a falling revenue, it would be in the bankruptcy courts in twelve months.

Mr. FISHER. While there is an apparent increase it is not a real increase. Several of these votes are there in consequence of promotions. I anticipate in the coming fiscal year to promote some to higher divisions, and I have to make provision for their salaries. There are two vacancies by death and these are not included in the 193 brought in. I want a translator in the archives and I also require an assistant entomologist and botanist at the experimental farm. Dr. Fletcher, who was entomologist and botanist, has unfortunately passed away, and I will take this opportunity of saying that in his death Canada has lost one of the most efficient public servants of the country. His untimely demise is most deplorable from every point of view, and it is practically impossible to fill his place. I am making provision here for the bringing in of two men to fill the joint position held by Dr. Fletcher, and I hope there may be a little enlargement of the work. I have no hesitation in saying that if that work is to be continued and extended as it ought to be in the interests of agriculture in this country, it will require two men to take the place of that lamented and most efficient officer. The work of the department is growing all the time and men must be found to do it. The farmers of Canada are constantly complaining, and even hon. gentlemen opposite frequently complain, that I do not do more work for the agriculture of the country. I am trying to meet that in the most efficient and profitable way to the agricultural industry and the additions that are here provided for are necessary to continue and increase the work of the department.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) The hon. minister, when answering to my question a moment ago about the salary of the patents' commissioner, said that this employee was filling a quasi-judiciary charge, that he had to give his decision upon very important cases. I will ask if the commissioner is a lawyer?

Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) Yes, Mr. O'Halloran, who is deputy minister of the Department of Agriculture, is a lawyer, and he was very prominent at the bar at Montreal.

Mr. NANTEL. Then, it is a lawyer who fills the charge of deputy minister of Agriculture?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, he is a lawyer.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I have no complaint to make of the officials in the patent office who are very courteous and very obliging, but it seems to me that they sometimes get the cart before the horse. When an application for a patent goes in, instead of first deciding on the patent ability of the invention they deal with certain informalities in the papers. I think the first question to be decided is whether the invention is patentable, and if there is any little informality in the papers they can then be returned. The present system causes great delay and expense and finally the invention may be decided not to be patentable at all.

Mr. FISHER. I am not very expert in the process of law, but I believe it would lead to very grave irregularities and possibly injury to the applicants for patents if the suggestion of the hon. gentleman were carried out. If a patent were to be issued and there were irregularities in the papers there would certainly be a lawsuit to annul the patent. After having been in the hands of the examiners for a month or six weeks it would be very much more difficult to correct informalities than to have them corrected at once. To make a patent valid, it is absolutely necessary that all the conditions provided by the law shall be followed with exactitude. It would involve the department in a great deal of repetition of work and it would endanger the future of the patent if the suggestion of the hon. gentleman were carried out. The present practice obtains in all patent departments of all countries as well as in Canada, and it is the result of the experience of 40 odd years in issuing patents.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The informality could be corrected before the patent issue and then there could be no question of the validity of the patent afterwards.

Mr. HUGHES. There are advertisements appearing in the farmers' magazines under very peculiar circumstances concerning the distribution of thoroughbred horses. Some time ago a gentleman in Victoria county had a memorandum sent to him asking him to apply for one of these animals when it would be furnished free, and all fees would go into his own pocket. I wrote to the department to ascertain the facts and I received a very satisfactory reply, but I would like to know if the minister has any further information to communicate with reference to this.

Mr. FISHER. It is a matter which the department officially knows nothing about. These advertisements are not issued by the department nor with any recommendation or guarantee from the department. I understand that some of my officers know these people, and they have said, entirely unofficially, that they believe them to be perfectly honest and honourable people. More than that I cannot say. My hon. friend will quite understand that it would be impossible for the department to aid private enterprise in this way, and this is entirely and absolutely a private enterprise which the department has nothing to do in any shape or form. I have nothing further to say than I have already said with regard to the people concerned in it. Personally I know nothing.

Department of Labour—Salaries, $27,100; contingencies, $1,450.

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Minister of Labour). There is an increase of $5,450 in the total amount asked for. First, there is an increase of $1,000 to the deputy head, and an increase of $100 for the secretary of the department. By the way, I may say that since the election of Mr. Mackenzie King as a member of this House, Mr. Acland, the secretary of the department, has been promoted as deputy minister, and a new secretary will be appointed in a few days. There have been some new appointments which, together with the statutory increases, make up the balance of the increase. The Department of Labour has become more important since the operation of the new Compulsory Investigations Act, and more work is thrown upon it.

Printing and Stationery, including printing of 'Labour Gazette,' allowances to correspondents, administration of Conciliation and Labour Act, travelling expenses, &c., and $500 to be paid W. J. Glover as accountant, $30,700.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This is the same vote as we took last year. The printing of the Labour Gazette, we expect, will absorb $14,200; allowance for correspondents, $5,000; accountant, $500; stationery, $1,800; travelling expenses, $4,000; printing for the department, $2,500; miscellaneous, $2,600. The Labour Gazette is printed by the Printing Bureau, and the estimate is based on a possible issue of 14,000 copies per month. The Labour Gazette is sent to all the institutions in the country, to every member of the House, to our ordinary subscribers, and is sold to the various labour unions. As regards allowances for correspondents, for which we ask $5,100, we have forty correspondents whom we pay $100 per year. We have one legal correspondence who is charged with the duty of making legal reports. We have secured for this service a very eminent lawyer, recommended by the Minister of Justice, whose name I forget at the moment. He receives $300 a year to report specially on labour cases that come before the several courts. We have correspondents in the principal centres of the Dominion. This year we may go a little further. We have been asked by some important centres, especially in the west, to appoint correspondents for those places; but as we had fixed a certain number for the various cities and towns which were entitled to have correspondents, we were debarred from appointing new ones. But when the reorganization of the department takes place, I feel sure that the new minister will extend his favour to some other cities and towns.

Mr. RHODES. In regard to these correspondents, does the service they perform depend entirely upon their own discretion, or are they called upon to contribute certain articles?

Mr. LEMIEUX. If the hon. gentleman will look at the last issue of the Labour Gazette, he will see what the work of the correspondents is. They have to report on the special conditions of the labour market of the several centres where they are located. They have to inform the Minister of Labour of the scale of wages paid, and the changes that take place, and also report on the accidents that occur. Their work is framed by the department. Especially do they perform the work of statists, that is to say, they gather what we call labour statistics.

Mr. RHODES. Does the department define the answers which the correspondents are to give?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. I notice, for example, that the correspondent at Amherst, N.S., is A. D. Ross. May I ask how it came about that Mr. Ross was appointed?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I could not single him out of the 48 and answer the hon. gentleman. The labour correspondents, as a rule, are appointed at the suggestion of the labour unions of the district where they reside. We generally take the best equipped man for that work.

Mr. RHODES. This correspondent would not have been appointed at the instance of the labour union of our county because he is the editor of the Liberal paper in Amherst and has absolutely no knowledge of the labor question beyond what any ordinary individual might have. My remarks in respect to this correspondent are not made in any spirit of factious opposition, but I desire to find out if the department is endeavoring to get the men who are best adapted to make a report upon labour conditions. I would say with all deference that it would occur to me that there are many other men in that district who are much more competent to deal with labour conditions than the gentleman whose name I see here, although that gentleman is a very admirable man within his own particular sphere—that of newspaper work.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In some districts I have been taken to task by my hon. friends because I have appointed some Tory editors.

Mr. RHODES. I have no objection to this gentleman's politics. I merely mention the fact that his sphere is newspaper work. There is no reason why he should give a report upon labour conditions in any better manner than any other individual. In fact he has no special knowledge of the labour conditions, and it would occur to me that if the correspondents throughout the Dominion are chosen from the same field as this man, the usefulness of the Labour Gazette must be very materially impaired.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I shall not make a plea for the Labour Gazette; it speaks for itself. In the last two or three years it has been considerably improved. This is evidenced by the requests that I receive from every part of the country for the free gift of the Labour Gazette. Of course, subscribers have to pay for it. Generally speaking our correspondents are very fair.

Mr. RHODES. I am not questioning the fairness of this correspondent. I believe he is a gentleman who would do the very best with the knowledge that comes to his hand, but he is not a man who is qualified to give a good report upon labour conditions in the country because he has no special knowledge of them.

Mr. MONK. Who are the correspondents employed by the department in Montreal?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The corespondents employed in the province of Quebec are as follows: Quebec City, P. J. Jobin, and E. Little; Three Rivers, Joseph J. Ryan; Sherbrooke, H. Logie; St. Hyacinthe, V. V. Phaneuf; St. John's, A. D. Pepin; Montreal, G. Audet; Maisonneuve, E. Pelletier; Hull, R. Laferriere. As regards the special condition of the labour market and labour affairs generally speaking in Montreal, Toronto, and Winnipeg, the deputy minister and secretary of the department deal chiefly with these large cities although we have our special correspondents there also. But, as they are the chief industrial centres the department has a knowledge of the local conditions at these points.

Mr. MONK. What is the total amount you pay to these local correspondents?

Mr. LEMIEUX. One hundred dollars a year each; we have 48 in the Dominion and one legal correspondent for the law reports.

Mr. MONK. Is the correspondence published in the Labour Gazette?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. BARNARD. I would like to ask the minister if Mr. Ditchburn of Victoria was recommended by the Trades and Labour people.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I could not answer my hon. friend. He must have been recommended by the Labour Union. The minister of Inland Revenue of that time was certainly asked for his advice on that point.

Mr. BARNARD. Following the lines of my hon. friend of the right (Mr. Rhodes) I might inform the minister that Mr. Ditchburn was the campaign secretary and has been conducting work in Victoria for the last eighteen months on the Liberal side.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Of course, my hon. friend would not expect that a correspondent of the Labour Gazette who receives $100 a year would not take part in the campaign although they are not selected because they are campaigners. Is not Mr. Ditchburn a journalist?

Mr. BARNARD. He belongs to the typographical union.

Mr. LEMIEUX. He is a man of some ability, if I remember well.

Mr. BARNARD. I do not deny that for a moment; he managed to make a very good fight.

Mr. BURRELL. I notice the name of A. B. Docksteader as correspondent in Nelson. Is that the gentleman who ran in the Liberal interest in the last provincial campaign? Although I admit, as the minister says, the salary is very small, and the minister is anxious to get good correspondents, it is very singular that they have all very strong Liberal proclivities. Their labour sentiments are very strongly tinged with labour liberalism, so called.

Miscellaneous, Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, $16,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The amount required for the purpose of administering this Act is uncertain depending on the number of compulsory investigations which take place during the year. During the first year of the operation of the Act the expenditure amounted to $19,233. During the second year it is likely that the expenditure will reach $16,000, and we take this figure as the amount which may likely be spent. The amount is not very large when we consider the service rendered to the country by the administration of the Act.

Mr. AMES. This money, I suppose, is paid largely in fees to persons who consent to act as arbitrators in these various industrial disputes?

Mr. LEMIEUX. As my hon. friend knows the board appointed under the Investigation Act is composed of three persons, one appointed by the employers, one appointed by the employees, and the third selected by these two, or, if they do not agree, by the minister himself. The Act provides that the chairman shall receive $20 for each day's sitting and the other members $15. If they sit only half a day they receive only about half of that amount. We have been surprised, in view of the number of investigations that have taken place, that the amount has not exceeded $19,000 the first year and $16,000 last year. We generally had as chairman of the board men of a very high type, like Professor Adam Shortt, who was anxious in each case that a settlement should take place, and therefore took great pains to see that matters were expedited in a proper spirit and concluded within a reasonable time. Really, it is remarkable that while last year we had so many investigations they did not cost more than $16,000.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Does the department pay all the arbitrators?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. MONK. I want to ask my hon. friend, as this Act has been in operation for some time, if the labouring classes themselves are quite satisfied with it as it stands to-day. I have heard a good deal of dissatisfaction expressed over certain dispositions of the Act, and these complaints must have reached the Department of Labour. It would be well that we should be informed as to what these complaints are. In consequence, what are the amendments which have become necessary? What amendments does the government intend to place before the House this session? and how soon shall we see those amendments?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am glad that my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has brought to the attention of the House the views expressed by some of the labour unions concerning the operation of this Act. Generally speaking, the Act has worked well; it has been but little criticised by either the labour unions or the employers. In fact out of fifty-one cases submitted to boards of arbitration, there was only one case in which the findings were not accepted by both parties. The complaint made against the Act by some of the labour unions is that the onus of applying for a board, in the case of a strike or a lockout, should not be always on the party which threaten to strike, but on the party which really causes the strike. Let me explain by referring to the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and its employees. We were told by the labour representatives, a few weeks ago, that the strikers would have preferred that the department should appoint a board at the request of the Canadian Pacific and not at the request of the men. They contended that if a strike was threatened, it was due to the fact that the company had given notice that changes would be made in the schedule of wages and in the character of the work. The men say: We apply for a board, and, if later, we do not accept the findings of the board, the public is prejudiced against us. On this question, will you allow me to read a very sensible article published by a newspaper not friendly to the government, but in this matter nonpolitical, and a paper which, I am pleased to say, generally takes very high ground on these questions of capital and labour. I read from the Montreal 'Gazette' of Tuesday, January 19, that is, just after the interview of the representatives of the labour unions with the right hon. leader of the government and myself:

THE LEMIEUX LAW.

The complaint is made of the Lemieux Act by the labour unions that the cumbersome machinery employed in the first stage of bringing the Act into force gives the employer an advantage, the incidental delay enabling him to prepare for a strike.

The case is well put by the Montreal 'Gazette.'

In other words, the unions complain that the keen edge has been removed from the axe, and it is no longer possible in the particular trades and industries coming under the Act to take the employer by surprise and force him to grant unreasonable demands. In setting up this complaint sight is lost of the fact that the primary aim of the Act was not to assist either the employer or the employee, but to protect the innocent third party—the public, which, in the case of a cessation of transportation facilities, or of coal supply, &c., really suffers the greatest actual loss and inconvenience. Similarly the intent of the Act is that when a decision is rendered by the arbitrators the force of public opinion will compel the parties to accept it as a settlement. A specific instance in which delay is alleged to have worked to the disadvantage of the union is the recent strike of the Canadian Pacific machinists. It was alleged that the company was given an opportunity of preparing for a strike, and the loss of the battle is ascribed to this fact. This is plainly erroneous. The defeat of the men was due to lack of public sympathy, and public sympathy was wanting because the company consented--

Very reluctantly, I may add.

—to accept the decision of the arbitrators notwithstanding that it had withdrawn its representative from the board, and that his place had been filled by an appointee of the Minister of Labour. The public objects to strikes which interfere with its convenience, and only tolerates them when it believes the men are in the right, and that no other method exists of securing fair treatment. The leaders of the machinists should have recognized this. They did not, and now seek to place the blame for their lack of common sense upon a factor that was not apparent until they had been offered their opportunity and refused it. Boiled down, the complaint of the labour leaders is really that they are not given a heads-we-win-tails-the-employer-loses standing. That is all this citation of the case of the C.P.R. machinists can mean. If the arbitrators had rendered a decision in favour of the men, and the company had refused to accept it, utilizing the delay for preparations which had finally resulted in the defeat of the men, and the ignoring of the award of the board, one could understand its use as an illustration of a grievance against the Act. The union leaders lose sight of the fact that the decision of the board is meant to reflect public opinion, that when an employer accepts such a position he bows to public opinion, and that when they seek an amendment to the law it is public opinion and not the employer they would place at a disadvantage. To grant such a request would be equivalent to destroying any little value the Act possesses.

Of course, this is from the Montreal 'Gazette,' and dealing with the case which my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) had in mind. In it the complaint which the labour leaders had expressed is well put. This is the only real grievance put before the Minister of Labour as regards the operation of the Act. Speaking for the department and for the government, I may say that we do not intend, after two years operation, and successful operation, of the Act, to amend it this year. It is better that the Act should be fully understood by the country, and should be allowed to operate during one or two years more, and then, if necessary, the House can make changes. For the present, I do not believe that it would be in the interests of either employers or employees to change the law. On the whole, I say again, the Act has worked well, and the country has benefited by it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Let me put the view of the men as I understand it, and as I have learned it from my communication with those in my own constituency where there are a large number of Canadian Pacific Railway employees. They say that if they are dissatisfied with their conditions, before they can strike they must ask for a board, and then, if they refuse to accept the decision of the board, they are charged with bad faith. But, as I say, they are compelled under the law to ask for a board before they can strike. When the decision is given, if they do not wish to accept it, they have the right to strike. It may have been their intention from the very first to strike, yet they are misrepresented by the public as men first asking for an arbitration and then refusing to abide by it. Some way must be found to better their position; for, while the minister says that the Act must be tried out and receive further consideration, I am convinced that the railway employees all over the country are dissatisfied with the Act in this respect of which I speak, and contend that it is unjust to them. Especially severe was the criticism by this same newspaper, the Montreal 'Gazette,' that they had asked for a board, and then refused to abide by its decision. It is hard to get the people to understand that the first thing the men must do, before going on strike, is to ask for a board. Then, if not satisfied with the board, they should still have the right to refuse to work, and inasmuch as the men are placed in an unfair position by having first to ask for a board, the minister should find some way to improve their position. The men also urge that if an employer proposes to change the rate of wages or the other conditions, he ought to be compelled to ask for a board also. That, perhaps, would be putting the boot on the other leg. The men have a substantial grievance and the minister has not heard the last of it. Some protection must be given them against the unfair insinuation, constantly made, that when they ask for a board, they are not willing to abide by its decision. They cannot help asking for a board, and they do not want their right to strike to be taken away by being compelled to do this.

Mr. RHODES. As this is a question which affects a very large and important element in my constituency, I would ask the minister to answer fully the question of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) as to what complaints have been received by him from the labour organizations in various parts of the country. As I understood him, the only complaint which so far has reached his ears is the one voiced in an editorial which appeared in the Montreal 'Gazette.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend will understand that we receive a large number of letters containing suggestions and observations of various kinds and some times complaints. But all the complaints we have received will be found boiled down in the article just alluded to. The other day the leaders of the labour unions met the Prime Minister and myself. These men were the spokesmen of the labour congress which met at Halifax, and they stated the only complaints they had to lay before the government.

Mr. RHODES. Did that application come from the Trade and Labour Congress which met in Halifax in September last?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, and the complaints were expressed by Mr. O'Donaghue, who is the legal representative of the labour unions. He came with my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) and Mr. Simpson, of Toronto. These gentlemen were special delegates and had several resolutions of the Trade and Labour Congress which they laid before us.

Mr. RHODES. The hon. minister appears to conclude that, boiled down, the grievances presented by the delegates of the Trade and Labour Congress are similar to those given in the Montreal 'Gazette.' Did the minister receive a communication from the grand council of the Provincial Workmen's Association of Nova Scotia, which met in convention in Halifax in April, 1908? If I remember rightly. There was passed a resolution at that meeting, composed of delegates representing all the mine organizations of Nova Scotia, to the effect that the council was unanimous in requesting a repeal of the Lemieux Act in so far as it affected the province of Nova Scotia. And I was advised by the secretary of the Provincial Workmen's Association for the county of Cumberland that such resolution had been forwarded to the department.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have some recollection of having received a remonstrance from that quarter. We had some complaints from that district, but I cannot remember their nature. Of course, we receive many letters and communications, but, speaking generally, the complaints of the labour unions may be reduced into the one I mentioned a moment ago and which was given expression in an article in the Montreal 'Gazette.' I might mention that when the Bill came before the House, the railway employees strongly opposed it. They said that their brotherhood was a very superior organization and had its own methods of settling disputes with the railway companies and they preferred these to the Board of Conciliation. But the spirit of the Act is to protect, not so much the employer or the employee as the public, and we believe that in the case of public utilities, such as transportation companies, the public should have the benefit of compulsory investigation.

Mr. RHODES. I quite understand that the Department of Labour must receive many letters from individuals and that many of these would come from perhaps irresponsible parties. But it would seem to me that a resolution, under the seal of the grand council of a labour organization, representing the whole province, calling for an absolute repeal of the Act in so far as it affects that province, is one that the minister should not ignore, inasmuch as it should indicate to the department that there was something radically wrong in the working of the Act. I am not prepared to speak off-hand with respect to the Act itself, but I do know that the miners of Nova Scotia consider they are labouring under a very serious disadvantage because of its operation. They say precisely what President Gompers of the American Federation of Labour says respecting injunctions, namely, that the injunctions take from organized labour the only implement they have for obtaining redress of their wrongs. The miners of Nova Scotia point to many defects in the Act. In the first place, if a board of conciliation is called for by the men, they choose one arbitrator and the management chooses another.

These two meet and if they cannot agree then a third arbitrator must, under the wording of the Act, be chosen by the Labour Department. The labour men in my county object very strongly to that provision of the Act because they say it leaves a string upon the arbitration board, one end of which is in the hands of the Labour Department, and they say that the Act would be very materially improved if this third man were to be chosen by a judge of the Supreme Court rather, than by the Labour Department. In this way they claim that the third arbitrator would be chosen absolutely free from any influence or connivance on the part of the Labour Department. They suggest that another amendment would improve the Act. There is no compulsory means of causing a board of conciliation to view the workings of a mine for instance. We know that very frequently boards of conciliation are composed of men who although they may be able lawyers, or professors of note, have no practical knowledge of the working of a mine, and in one or two instances, if I am correctly advised, the board has refused to go and view the workings. The union in my county suggests that a provision be inserted in the Act that either one party or the other can compel the board to go and view the workings.

A third amendment suggested and it seems to me most reasonable, is that if one party to the dispute fails to appear, as has happened in some cases, then the verdict shall go to the party who has called for the board and who appears, in precisely the same manner as does the verdict in a civil suit, if the defence does not appear there shall be a verdict by default.

A fourth amendment, and it is of vital importance to the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow, is a change in the fees allowed witnesses. Under the present Act the fees allowed for witnesses are about one-third of what the men would earn if they were enabled to do their day's work instead of having to appear before the board.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is the fee paid by the courts.

Mr. RHODES. Quite so but it is a grievance nevertheless. It is all very well to say that this is the fee paid in the courts and that would perhaps apply if this were under the provincial government. Nevertheless it is a grievance that these men receive only a dollar and a half a day when if working they would receive $4 or $5 a day.

I regret that I cannot now place the case of the miners before the minister as I hope to later on; I mention these matters simply to indicate to the minister that there is a feeling in my county and throughout Nova Scotia of resentment towards this Act and a feeling that it is a means of undue oppression.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am very glad to have the benefit of my hon. friend's views as he has summarized them.

Mr. RHODES. I am simply voicing the views of the miners in my constituency. I have offered no expression of my own opinion whatever.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am glad my hon. friend has summarized their views in the way he has. I have noted his remarks and now that he has summarized the suggested amendments it comes to my memory that the miners of Nova Scotia who were interested in three or four different boards which were constituted expressed those grievances. But my hon. friend will realize that later in the session the question of labour will be discussed more fully and then we will take up these objections. I must say that we can hardly have this Act in operation in all of the provinces except one.

Mr. RHODES. The request of the miners of Nova Scotia that this Act shall not apply to that province is not quite so bad as it appears because when the Act was first introduced in this House there was a clause which said that it should not apply to any province which had an Act similar in its tenor to this one, and there was some discussion at that time as to whether it should apply to Nova Scotia. In passing through committee that clause was struck out. We have a Conciliation Act there and I am inclined to think that the workmen regard it as the more workable Act and better adapted to their requirements than the Lemieux Act, so-called.

Mr. BURRELL. Whether the operations of this Act are satisfactory or not, I think the point raised by the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) is perfectly in order, namely that a large body of employees, those engaged on the railways, are by no means favourably impressed with the operations of the Act. In my province a large proportion of the railway employees are by no means satisfied with the way the Act works, and if I recall the facts aright I believe that this was brought to the attention of the government at the time the Act first came before the House. I think a resolution was offered by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) to the effect that the Railway Act which the men considered was sufficient to enable them to adjust their differences with their employers should be left to cover their case. I have heard that expression volunteered very freely throughout the west and would ask the minister if it is not true that the railway employees are by no means showering compliments upon the ministers but are rather registering complaints.

Some resolutions reported.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. F. D. MONK. When may the House expect the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries? There are many reasons why we would like to have the report as soon as possible. What is the cause of the delay and how soon will the report be ready?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I cannot answer as to that, but I understand the report is in the hands of the printer.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 8, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

LOAD-LINE ON SHIPS.

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 45) respecting a load line on ships sailing on the inland waters of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Explain.

Mr. LEWIS. This Bill has reference to an official load-line on ships sailing on the inland waters of Canada, and also to coasting vessels, but not including foreign ships. It is modelled after the sections of the English Act with reference to the load-line on ships. The purpose of the Bill is to lessen the liability to these very regrettable accidents which happen in the fall of the year, and which cause very great loss of life, as in the case of the 'Jones' two years ago, and the 'Asia' some years previously. The clause referring to the inland waters applies only after the 15th of September, and until the 15th of May in each year. There is also a clause with reference to the load-line of barges on the coasting waters of Canada, and that clause is modelled on a Bill brought in by Mr. Lawrence, formerly member for Colchester, but which was not passed into law. There is also a clause which obliges the captain who enters his ship outward from each port in Canada after the 15th day of September until the 15th day of May in each year to leave with the customs officers before he gets his clearance a list of every person leaving port on his ship, with names and addresses. There is also a clause with reference to the loading of ships. One of the chief causes of these accidents is that ships are loaded on deck in a hurry to get produce out in the rush in the fall of the year.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Might I ask the Prime Minister what is the reason of the delay in organizing the Public Accounts Committee? It is very important that this committee should be organized at the earliest possible moment, if we are to expedite the work of the session, and already a week has passed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand that all the committees have been called for organization to-morrow.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have not heard of that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand that is the arrangement.

REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When may we expect the report of the Department of Fisheries?

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I think it is ready; it will be brought down as soon as I get it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It will be distributed almost immediately?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved that Mr. Warburton be placed on the Public Accounts Committee in the place of the Hon. Charles Murphy.

Motion agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved that Mr. Harris be placed on the Committee of Agriculture in the place of Mr. Prowse.

Motion agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved that Mr. McCraney be added to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—BRANCH LINES.

Mr. EMMERSON. I desire to ask the Minister of Railways as to when we may expect a copy of the report of the commissioners authorized by him to inquire into the branch lines of the railway connecting with the Intercolonial, which information was promised in the speech from the Throne.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM. It is quite a large report, and is being copied as rapidly as possible. I asked my deputy about it to-day, and he said that we would have it in a very short time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Shall we have it printed ?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, for the purpose of correcting a statement made by the parliamentary correspondent of the Toronto 'News.' I may say that in my experience of thirty-four years in parliament I have never before thought it advisable to refer to an incorrect statement in regard to myself made in the press, even though I knew it to be erroneous; but this statement is one which I think I ought to contradict at once. The Ottawa correspondence of the Toronto 'News' a few days ago contained this statement:

A few weeks before the House opened Mr. Templeman wrote to Mr. Borden asking him if the version of the telegram published was correct. Investigation revealed the state of affairs set forth above, and Mr. Borden, meeting Mr. Templeman, expressly informed him that his telegram had been garbled, and told him what its real terms had been. Thus Mr. Templeman knew the facts and Sir Wilfrid used the garbled version. Two pieces of dirty fighting in one speech. We long have known Sir Wilfrid Laurier to be exceptionally dexterous in his way of stating a case; are we to be forced to use an uglier word than dexterous? Of coure, the garbling of the telegram in Victoria was dirty fighting. It is the sort of trick to which excited partisans resort only too often. Grant that. But what about the effort to represent Mr. Borden as sending the garbled, not the real, versions? And by the First Minister? It looks as if Mr. Borden is becoming so formidable that it is time to besmirch him.

With regard to this I have only to say that shortly after the elections Mr. Templeman spoke to me about the telegram in question, informing me that he had written to the hon. leader of the opposition to ask him if he had really sent it. At the time he spoke to me he informed me that he had not received any answer from the hon. leader of the opposition. That was the only time I spoke to him in regard to the matter. As to what passed between Mr. Templeman and the hon. leader of the opposition, I have nothing to say. As to the inference that I knew that the telegram was garbled, there is no proof of that, and I have now to quote to the House a letter which was sent to me by Mr. Templeman on January 22, the day the debate took place in this House. It is in those words :

Department of Inland Revenue,
Office of the Minister, Ottawa, Jan. 22.

My Dear Sir Wilfrid,—The version given me of the discussion in the House this afternoon of Borden's 'total exclusion' telegram was not very full and may not be accurate. But I was informed that Mr. Borden stated something to the effect that there was an error in the telegram or that he had advised me that there was an error.

Mr. Borden spoke to me in the club shortly after his return to the city and explained that he would send me an answer—that he had not overlooked it—and that he desired to obtain some information in regard to it. I inferred that his absence from the city and his desire to get 'some information' was the cause of the delay in answering my letter. He did not say there was an error. That is such an important admission that I would have noted it. That was the only time we spoke on the subject of my inquiry about the authenticity of his telegram and I have as yet no reply in writing.

Had he informed me there was an 'error' I would have advised you as that would seem to support my view that the telegram was a forgery. The point—as to whether Mr. Borden stated to me what he said he did—is of no great importance, perhaps, but his admission that there was an error is of importance.

I thought it just as well that you should know my version of the incident.

Yours truly,

(Signed) W. TEMPLEMAN.

This only confirms what I have already stated, and what I repeat that at the time I quoted the telegram I did not suppose it was a forgery; indeed, this is the last thing I would have supposed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So far as what took place between Mr. Templeman and myself is concerned, it is quite true that I did not send a written answer to him, but I spoke to him explaining the reason why I had not done so. And I certainly understood from what took place between us on that occasion, that he would gather that there was some mistake in the telegram. I had no doubt that that impression would be firmly imprinted on his mind from what took place, I understood that he required no further answer. In his letter to me he expressed his own conviction that I had not sent the telegram in the terms in which it was published; I have his letter to that effect which I can produce. While on this matter, I wish to refer to comment made in at least one Liberal journal, the Montreal 'Herald.' Notwithstanding my explanation made twice in this House, it repeated the statement a few days ago that I had known immediately after the publication, on the 26th day of October, that the telegram had been altered. For the third time I repeat in this House that I did not know anything about that until the middle of December after my return from the south. Therefore the statement of the Montreal 'Herald,' the inaccuracy of which I cannot account for on any principle of fair-play, is absolutely untrue. I make that announcement for the third time in this House; but I do not doubt that the misrepresentation will continue in certain quarters.

PRIVATE BILLS.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. TURRIFF moved the second reading of Bill (No. 30), respecting the subsidy from the Ontario Government to the Lake Superior branch of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

Mr. LENNOX. I would ask the hon. gentleman to explain the necessity for this Bill.

Mr. TURRIFF. I do not know that I can give very much of an explanation; but my understanding of the matter is that this Bill is to confirm an agreement made between the government of Ontario and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. LENNOX. I can see that much by the Bill itself and by the notice on the Order Paper ; but what I would like the hon. gentleman to explain is how the necessity for the Bill arises.

Mr. TURRIFF. I will explain all that before the Railway Committee.

Mr. LENNOX. That is not the time. This is the time.

Mr. CONMEE. I did not notice the Bill on the Order Paper, but I happen to know something of the matter. I think there are provisions in the Provincial Act granting the subsidy from which the company desires the relief. That perhaps is the secret of the Bill. If so, I would ask the hon. gentleman to let the Bill stand for a few days until we find out what it means.

Mr. BARR. I think we should know something about this Bill. The hon. gentleman thinks the explanations should be made before the Railway Committee; but all the members of this House do not belong to that committee. My hon. friend from Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) suggests that there may be secrecy about it and we ought to know whether that is the case or not.

Mr. TURRIFF. If the Bill does not commend itself to the good judgment of the Railway Committee, which is composed of practically every member of the House, we shall never hear any more about it. However I have no objection to its standing.

Motion withdrawn.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

A return showing all surveys made to date in the prosecution of the proposed Hudson Bay railway.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). The trouble is that there is nothing to bring down in reply to this motion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That makes it a very simple matter.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes. We have no reports from our surveyors yet.

NATION RIVER DRAINAGE.

Mr. ANDREW BRODER (Dundas) moved for:

Copy of all correspondence, orders in council, papers and other documents between the government or any member thereof, and any person or persons, referring in any way to the drainage of the Nation river running through the townships of Matilda and Winchester, in the county of Dundas.

He said:—The Nation river has had quite a history with regard to this matter of drainage. That history goes so far back as a considerable time before confederation, when there was a report made on the practicability of bringing the waters from the St. Lawrence river to the Nation river for power purposes. I do not wish to go so far back as that in asking for this correspondence, but I wish to state that previous to the defeat of the Conservative government in 1896, there was an arrangement come to between the people and the government, that if the people would put a dredge in the river the government would work the dredge. That arrangement was carried out for one or two seasons if I remember correctly. The Conservatives were defeated in 1896, and the incoming government carried out the understanding during the balance of that season and part of the following season. The Hon. Mr. Tarte was then Minister of Public Works, and he held the view that the Dominion government had no right to do this work, but he realized the responsibility for carrying out the contract entered into by the previous government, and he went so far as to offer the people a bulk sum as a quittance of the obligation of the government. I am not sure as to the amount mentioned by the Hon. Mr. Tarte of that time, but at all events it was not satisfactory to those who were dredging the river. In answer to the argument that the Dominion government has no right to undertake such work, I might say that the necessity now for draining the river is greater than it was at any time before, because as the country is being cleared the water gets so rapidly into the river that it overflows its banks and destroys the crops. This takes the question beyond the local standpoint. It has got to be a very serious matter for the people. I may say that the present government have seen fit, for local drainage purposes, to deal with rivers of a similar nature. They have in the county of Prescott, dealing virtually with the same river, laid out quite a large amount of money at a place called Pitchoff. On the Chateauguay river, in the province of Quebec, in the county of Chateauguay, in the vicinity of St. Chrysostom, the government have laid out, purely for drainage purposes, some $12,000 or $15,000 ; and I think there is an obligation resting on the government to carry out the contract between the previous government and the people with reference to the Nation river. There is no question as to that, because the dredge is there which was built by the people assisted by the Ontario government at that time, as a proof of the contract. The Ontario government assisted by giving $4,000 towards the cost of the dredge. There is no question as to the understanding that was arrived at. The people have expended between $70,000 and $80,000 on that river. The engineers at that time considered that, if the river were enlarged, that would to a very considerable extent relieve the people of the difficulty; but the conditions have so changed that the relief is a very nominal thing to-day. I simply bring the matter to the attention of the government in the hope that they will deal with it on its merits and in accordance with the obligations resting on the government.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). My hon. friend and myself, from force of circumstances, perhaps know more about the situation of this river than most of the other members of the House. This is a matter which has been before the public, and in which the public in that part of the country have been particularly interested, for, I suppose, twenty-five or thirty years. I had the honour of being a member of the counties' council of the united counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry when some of the practical work in connection with it was undertaken, and I realize what my hon. friend says about the interest taken in that part of the country in the matter. The more the country has been opened up and drained into the Nation river, the more need there has been to get the water away. It is a comparatively small stream at low water, but it contains ledges which high water cause rapids, and the object of the work done has been to remove these ledges and so improve the flow of the water. At certain times the Nation becomes a violent stream, with the water so high that at some places it forms a lake a mile wide, flooding the land in the vicinity, so that sometimes the people are obliged to transfer mails and passengers across the lake by boats. The harm done by the flooding of this river is very great. A great deal of work has been done on it, and just what ought to be done now is a question for consideration. The provincial government has granted some aid, the Dominion government has also granted aid in days gone by, and the people have taxed themselves very heavily. It is a matter not purely local, as it is quite wide in its scope. I support the resolution for bringing down the papers in order that the House may see in just what position the matter is.

Mr. BRODER. I would suggest that the return be made from the year 1894.

Motion, amended as suggested, agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON NATURAL RESOURCES.

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Borden, that in the opinion of this House it is advisable to appoint a select standing committee on natural resources, who shall have authority to inquire into and consider and report upon all matters appertaining to the conservation and development of the natural resources of Canada, including fisheries, forests, mines, minerals, waterways, and water-powers, and to whom may be referred from time to time any report, document or matter touching the subject which they are appointed to consider.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In accordance with the suggestion made by my hon. friend the other day and in line with the observations I then made, I would suggest, if it be agreeable to him, that instead of having one committee we should have a Committee on Fisheries, as agreed to by the House, a Committee on Mines and Minerals and a Committee on Forests and Waters. I think forests and waters should go together. This is so in European countries. In France, for instance, there is a 'Departement d'Eaux et Forests.' I would suggest that the order stand in the meantime for further consideration.

Order allowed to stand.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

Archives $28,000.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). This is the usual vote except that it has been reduced by the amount transferred to the civil government. The amount transferred is $32,000. The civil vote is increased to that extent and the vote for Archives reduced. The work in the branch is carried on the same as heretofore.

Mr. E. PAQUET (L'Islet). (Translation.) Who are the scholars engaged presently by the government in the archives at Paris?

Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) We have several clerks doing the transcription of the records in the Bibliothèque Nationale in France. These are not scholars, but young men entrusted with this work.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) What is the nature of the work done by the Abbé O'Leary, former professor of history?

Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) He does not work in Paris but in Canada, and he is busy making researches for collecting the historical documents scattered pretty near all over the province of Quebec, and having some bearing on our history. The work he does is under the supervision of Dr. Doughty, in order that we may be able to locate those historical documents.

Mr. J. D. REID. As I understand, in the archives department, the salaries at Ottawa last year amounted to $23,721.54. There were no others outside of the staff at Ottawa who were transferred so that if the vote has been decreased $32,000, that is more than the Auditor General's Report shows was paid altogether for salaries. The page in the Auditor General's Report is D—8.

Mr. FISHER. When I was going through the civil government items of the Agriculture Department, I gave the exact figures of the reduction in the Archives.

Mr. J. D. REID. I see, at the page I refer to, which says 'Salaries at Ottawa, $23,-721.54.'

Mr. FISHER. I have not with me at the moment the list of those transferred to civil government with their salaries. I had that when the committee was considering the civil government items the other day. But I stated that the salaries, as a matter of fact came to $28,212, which was the amount given me by my officers. We have reduced $32,000. What the other reduction is due to is not shown in the notes I have before me. My deputy will be here in a few minutes and I can get the information from him.

Mr. J. D. REID. Better let the item stand until we get the information.

Mr. E. PAQUET. (L'Islet.) (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, allow me to make a few remarks about our archives. It is with pleasure that I grant the amount of $28,000 here asked for by the Minister of Agriculture to keep up the work of our archives. The literate people stand in with the hon. Minister of Agriculture and encourage him in his patriotic and historical work. We are proud of the record of our country and we must make ourselves familiar with it. What has been done so far stimulates the writers on our history.

By order in council dated April 17, 1907, the Minister of Agriculture has instituted a commission on historical documents. He was most fortunate in his selection of such men as the reverend Abbé Gosselin and Mr. Edmond Roy for the pursuance of such work in our province. It is important that an intelligent classification of our written records should be made in order that they may be more easily got at by those desirous of studying them. I am pleased to quote among the students in that branch of our archives the reverend Abbé O'Leary, my old professor in history at the Seminary of Quebec. In the last fifty years, Mr. G. B. Faribault, the Abbé Tanguay, the Abbé Verreault and Mr. Joseph Marmette have been in Paris to make researches in the archives there and made very precious discoveries in the way of documents of the highest importance. Those who are working in the French archives under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture are performing a national work.

According to the report of the Minister of Agriculture, students in our history are also getting useful information in the archives in London. The last documents which have been added to the national collection give valuable knowledge on the maritime provinces. Let us keep up these historical searches. Let us be proud of our archives, they are the depository of our national traditions.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER. (Translation.) I am happy to hear the observations which the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) has just made. I feel proud over them and I want to thank him most heartily for the good words he spoke in favour of the work performed for our archives. He was quite right in saying that it is necessary that our Canadian records should be preserved. I am pleased to be able to tell him that we have lately erected in Ottawa a fireproof building, a most suitable building, in fact a fine building where they are now deposited. Considerable work was performed in the Bibliothèque Nationale of Paris in searching for and sorting documents relating to Canadian history. Messrs. Marmette, Richard and others have gathered such an amount of them that we have been so far unable to have them all copied over, but that part of the work is just now being pressed with all possible celerity.

We have engaged the services of Mr. Biggar, well known in Canada for his historical researches and studies. This gentleman is now engaged in pursuing this work in Europe, that is in Paris and London. He understands French as well as English. His researches are not confined to Paris alone, but are spread over Spain, Italy and Britain. He is superintending that part of the work in Paris. I should like very much to further press the copying over of those records, but it is not in our power to do so. It is somewhat difficult to get competent men to do this work. In England, we have clerks who are performing this task, and we are carrying on the work of transcription as fast as we possibly can. When I took up my department, Canada was providing $6,000 a year for the archives, but having found out that there was much more to do in that direction, I am pleased to say that parliament has always voted the increased appropriations which I asked from time to time for the archives. I may say at the same time that those increases were always voted without hesitation not only by the party in power but by the opposition as well. I hope that I shall have in the future the same encouragement that was shown me in the past for the work of the archives. I also hope that under the supervision of Dr. Doughty, a very competent and devoted official, I might say a most enthusiastic official in the pursuance of his duties, all this work will be pressed forward with vigour and to still more satisfactory results.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques-Cartier.) (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I want to say that we are very much satisfied indeed of the declarations which have just been made by the hon. minister in answer to the remarks offered by my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Paquet). My hon. friend from L'Islet has stated a point to which great importance is added in the province of Quebec, and I believe no other province in the Dominion is as anxious as ours that the national records should be carefully looked after and properly stored. All of us, my hon. friend from L'Islet, the hon. minister and myself have those records at heart. I am glad the hon. minister has seen fit to do justice to the opposition in acknowledging that we never refused to grant him the sums required for the proper keeping of our records. This seems to surprise him somewhat, but experience must have taught him of old that when the government wants money for legitimate purposes and for the benefit of the public, the opposition never refused its sanction.

We have in Mr. Doughty a gentleman of such consummate competency it would be almost impossible to get a better on than he, and I think we should carry out all the suggestions which might come from him.

Now to come down to practical business, I would like the minister to tell us how he intends spending the $28,000 here asked for. I see that $60,000 were spent in the fiscal year 1908-09. This item is reduced to $28,000 this year. It is not customary for us to complain of any diminution, especially in the present condition of affairs. I believe, on the contrary, that we may congratulate the government for the excursions it may attempt in the field of economy. But we are interested in knowing how such retrenchments are arrived at as compared with the sums expended last year. What does the department intend spending for the archives in France? What staff do we employ just now for the gathering of records ? I know Mr. Biggar by reputation ; I believe he deserves all the good that is said of him. Is he alone engaged in collecting archives in France? I heard the minister say awhile ago that it was hard to get clerical help in France. Are the copies which we intend obtaining for our archives to be made in the national libraries or from documents held by private families whose records are connected with the history of our country ? I believe we can gather at a very low cost in French, all the documents we require, provided we take the necessary precautions.

I would be thankful to the minister for telling us how he will proceed in the course of the coming year to collect copies of those immense books of records which are actually held in France? What proportion of the money which we vote annually will be devoted to this task in the coming year ? There is no doubt that we can secure large returns in employing for that work nobody but absolutely competent men. It is pretty much the same as this in immigration work, but not as much as in the archives. It is possible to employ in immigration work a whole lot of people as was done in the past, to recruit settlers and spend large sums of money worthlessly. I think the hon. minister ought to tell us what he purposes doing with this $28,000 both in France and England in the course of the coming year.

Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, nobody else but Mr. Biggar worked at the collection of those records in France. We already have a large number of documents selected and laid by in the Bibliothèque Nationale, in Paris. We want to have them copied before selecting more, not because it wouldn't be worth our while to press further our researches in that direction, but because we have sufficient records already awaiting transcription. In the meanwhile, Mr. Biggar keeps up his researches in different parts of France, in the private libraries of historical mansions and elsewhere from which he obtained lists of documents that are probably of some interest to Canada. Mr. Biggar takes these matters upon himself and when he comes across documents which bear upon our history, he has the power to have them copied, inasmuch as we cannot get them in Canada. I do not see that I can give more information upon the work that is being carried out in France.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Do the same remarks of the hon. gentleman apply to the work carried on in England? Did Mr. Biggar first made a selection of the documents that are to be copied in England? Do we employ clerical help there in doing the transcription?

Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) It is the same in England as in France.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Now, is the whole of these $28,000 to be affected to this work?

Mr. FI$HER. (Translation.) Oh, no.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) How then is this item applied?

Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) Besides Mr. Biggar's salary, $7,000 is provided for researches conducted in Europe under Mr. Biggar's care, then there is the messenger's salary, and certain office work at the archives here, $2,000. There is the salaries of the employees outside of Ottawa and who do not belong to the Civil Service, $2,000. Transcription to be made in Canada, $4,000. Purchase of books, newspapers, &c., $3,500. Printing, $5,000. Expenses by the commission on messengers, $500. And $1,000 for sundry expenses.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) The amount of $4,000 for transcription in Canada seems to me pretty high. What documents are there to copy? Are they documents belonging to private collections?

Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) Most of those historical documents, if not all, are held in the court houses at Montreal, Quebec and Three Rivers. Quite a number of them are also to be found at the provotship in Quebec. Others are to be found elsewhere. This sum provides for the transcription of these documents.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I do not want to keep up unduly the discussion upon an item which is not opposed, but it seems to me that the sum which we affect to transcription of documents held in Canada, is higher than should be in relation to the results obtained. It might be that the returns are commensurate to the amount of money spent, but I doubt it. I believe that for a young nation like us, whose records are so extensive and which desires to extend the lasting work of its national history, we appropriate a sum of money rather inadequate to the task.

In reviewing the budget, I could easily find a great number of items which are extremely high and which are devoted to purposes less interesting, less urgent than the keeping of our archives. On this subject I may say that we, on the opposition side, will ever be ready to grant all items asked by the government, even if the amount was higher than this one, provided that it would be clearly stated what use it is intended for. If they are deserving and free of all waste, if practically, they would increase the volume of our national archives, they will receive our cordial support.

There is presently, in England and in France as in Canada, number of papers which are in danger of being lossed, and it is necessary that we should have in the administration of this department—which is much more important than we believe—men in every way able to keep them. We will always be willing to vote the moneys necessary for this object. I must say before resuming, that the hon. minister has made since a few years most commendable efforts, for the preserving of our archives.

Mr. J. D. REID. I see that Professor Adam Shortt received $1,675. He received $1,500 for editing constitutional documents. Is Professor Shortt employed by the year to do that or was it simply a contract?

Mr. FISHER. Professor Shortt was not employed by the year. This is work of an exceptional character, requiring a man of exceptional attainments. There was no question about Professor Shortt's qualifications for the work, and an arrangement was made with him that he should do it and we should pay him accordingly.

Mr. J. D. REID. In what way?

Mr. FISHER. He sent in an account which on careful examination was considered to be fair and just and reasonable, and we paid it.

Mr. J. D. REID. Was it by the day or just a lump sum?

Mr. FISHER. Just a lump sum. He did this at odd times during almost three years.

Mr. J. D. REID. I see that during the same time Professor Shortt received $2,500 from the Labour Department for acting in connection with labour disputes.

Mr. FISHER. I think all of this work was performed before he acted in the labour disputes.

Mr. MONK. What is the salary paid to the archivist?

Mr. FISHER. $3,200 a year.

Mr. MONK. Has he an assistant?

Mr. FISHER. No, he has no assistant archivist. Mr. Edmor Roy is the next official in the archives branch, but he has not been called assistant archivist.

Mr. MONK. It seems to me that Mr. Doughty's position and qualifications are sufficiently important to place him upon the same footing as the deputy head of a department. His work requires very important qualifications and Dr. Doughty possesses them in an eminent degree. He has no assistant and is called upon to bring into life a new department. I think the House would be quite ready to vote him a larger salary than that.

Mr. FISHER. I am very glad to hear my hon. friend say that. Dr. Doughty is now in the Civil Service and is subject of course to the Civil Service rules, like the heads of other branches. I do not think a department ought to be created unless there is a considerable amount of administration and detail work which there is not in that case.

Mr. MONK. I did not advocate making a department; I submitted that the duties are sufficiently important and require high enough qualifications to justify Dr. Doughty being placed on about the same footing as the deputy head of a department.

Mr. J. D. REID. I asked the minister about the $32,000 reduction in salaries?

Mr. FISHER. In the first place I am informed that Mr. Roy's salary of $3,000 was not included in the Auditor General's Report. He was appointed since it was prepared, in March of last year.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is the whole Archives branch now subject to the new Civil Service Act?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So that in future persons who are employed in that department will be recommended by the Civil Service Commissioners?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am very glad of that, and I join in what my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has said with regard to Dr. Doughty's qualifications, which in my opinion are of a very eminent order; I feel that the country would be placed in a very unfortunate position if we should lose his services. As far as I am concerned I would be very glad indeed to support the government in placing his salary upon a better basis than it is at present, because I know how extremely assiduous he has been in the work in which he is engaged. It is more than a mere matter of duty with him, it is not only a duty but a pleasure, the work of his life, and from personal observation of the work which he is performing, I have formed a very high appreciation of the services he has rendered the country since he has been placed at the head of the Archives department.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think that anyone in or out of the government appreciates or understands Dr. Doughty's work more than I do. I take a good deal of credit to myself for having got Dr. Doughty to become the Archivist, and I understand and fully appreciate not only the quality of his work but his personal character and devotion to that work which is of a very peculiar character, and which there are not many men qualified to perform. I know of no one in Canada as well qualified as Dr. Doughty.

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister has not yet explained the $32,000.

Mr. FISHER. The Auditor General's Report does not show the salary of Mr. Roy of $3,000 and another of $1,000 or $1,200. That is in addition to the $28,000 of salaries which are transferred from payments from the Archives branch to the civil government. Dr. Doughty made out an estimate of what he required this year and the estimate came to less than $28,000. He asked for that $28,000 to carry on work outside of the work provided for by the salaries. $28,000 has been transferred to civil government and there is $28,000 of work to be done outside of this out of the vote to Archives.

Patent Record, $17,000.

Mr. J. D. REID. That is paid almost entirely to the King's Printer ?

Mr. FISHER. Altogether.

Census and statistics, $11,500.

Mr. J. D. REID. There is a decrease.

Mr. FISHER. There is a transfer of $28,850 of salaries to civil government, but I have asked for $5,000 more for other work of the census and statistics branch. If it had not been for asking for that $5,000 more the vote would have been reduced by $6,500. I have asked for $5,000 additional to be applied to the work of issuing monthly crop bulletins, which we undertook last summer, and hope to continue.

Mr. J. D. REID. That will be spent for salaries?

Mr. FISHER. No, that is outside work. None of this vote will be spent for salaries in Ottawa, but it will be required for printing, correspondence and the expense of getting out these crop statistics.

Mr. BLAIN. What is the total cost of the Census Department each year?

Mr. FISHER. The total cost for the coming year will be $28,450 in salaries under civil government, and $11,500, which brings the total to $40,000 in round figures.

Mr. BLAIN. Will that be an increase over last year?

Mr. FISHER. An increase of $5,000.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many civil servants are engaged in the department?

Mr. FISHER. Twenty-nine in Ottawa.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has there been a material increase in the last few years?

Mr. FISHER. No, not material. Of course in the census years there were many more, but since the compilation and completion of the last decennial census they have not been increased practically at all. I will not say there has not been one or two added at some time or other, but practically there has been no increase.

Mr. STAPLES. I would like to ask the minister to explain the system adopted in collecting these crop statistics.

Mr. FISHER. The system has been practically this: We have tried to find farmers throughout the country, who have shown by some correspondence or connection with the department with other work, that they are men of intelligence and take an interest in the agricultural work of their particular sections. These have been communicated with and asked to send in periodical reports, which they do by mail, and which are then made up into the estimates which these bulletins contain. We do not pay these correspondents anything. We expect them to do it, and we, in return, give them the advantage of sending bulletins to them and any other information from the department which they wish to have.

Mr. ROCHE. Is not that a duplication of the work carried on by the various provincial governments?

Mr. FISHER. Some of the provincial governments do that kind of work, but there is no such work done generally for the whole of Canada. We do make use of the bulletins and reports that the provinces issue for the purpose of checking these statistics, but that work, being done only by some provinces, does not give the results for the whole Dominion which we require to have.

Mr. STAPLES. Are these bulletins issued weekly or monthly?

Mr. FISHER. Monthly.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. May I ask the minister if it is not possible for him to gather together a greater volume of statistics in regard to the trade of foreign countries? During the past few years we have been urging upon the minister the necessity of enlarging the statistics in that regard and giving us some comparisons between Canada and other countries similarly situated, the Argentine Republic, for instance, or some other foreign countries. I know it would require some research, but I cannot help feeling that we are not in touch with the statistics regarding the trade and commerce of these countries to the extent that we should be. I know that the department have improved somewhat in that regard in the last few years, but I would like to urge upon the minister the necessity of making further investigation and trying to bring down a more complete statement with regard to the trade and commerce of different countries, especially with regard to the exports and imports of products such as we produce from our own farms, mines and timber areas.

Mr. FISHER. I can understand the value of such information and the convenience of having it. But, we would simply have to go to the same documents that are now available to any individual. We might, of course, compile them and work them up into different forms of comparative tables. But I may say to my hon. friend quite frankly, that we have so much more to do in regard to our own statistics than we have been able to do, that I have hesitated to turn the labours of my own staff, or the money which is voted by parliament for this purpose, to the compilation of statistics outside of Canada. I have in my mind much that we might do in Canada in the way of getting statistics which we have not yet done and which I would like to see done and that is one reason why, in this work, I am asking for $5,000 more than I did last year. It is to try and increase the amount of information to be given out and made available for our own people about our own work. I think it would be better to spend the money and devote our time and energies to our own work than to foreign work which is done in each country for itself and the results of which are largely available in the library for those who wish to study them.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I quite agree with the minister in regard to this information being available in the library and that is why I cannot understand why it would not be comparatively easy to gather these statistics together. If they can be gathered without a great deal of effort out of books in the library, the people in Canada who are desirous of getting in touch with these statistics not being able to come to Ottawa and investigate for themselves, would be put in possession of this information. It would be a source of interest to our people in general to have this information to a greater extent than they have at the present time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ascertain from the minister whether or not the annual statistics compiled with respect to some of our own matters should not be made a little more complete and should not be made to conform more to the information that is set forth in the decennial census returns. I have not made any careful examination of the yearly statistics that are produced in the Census Department as compared with the results of the decennial census of 1901 except in one respect, and that was to endeavour to obtain from the last statistical report respecting lumber such information as would enable me to ascertain whether or not the lumber cut in various particulars had increased and to what extent, since 1901. I found that they did not seem to run on the same lines. There was not the same division of production. Could not that be accomplished? For example, in the census of 1901 there are returns for so much sawn lumber, so many cubic feet of timber, so many cords of wood for fuel, so many railway ties, but when we come to 'Census and Statistics Bulletin No. 2, issued at Ottawa, 1907,' I do not get information of the same character as is contained in the census with reference to the lumber industry, and it is, therefore, impossible to make a comparison. I may add that upon application to the officers of the Census Department I received every possible assistance and all the information they had in their possession, and what I say is not by way of censuring them in any way, but for the purpose of ascertaining whether a better method cannot be devised. Possibly this particular information may appertain more properly to the Forestry Branch of the Department of the Interior when that is placed in good working order. From the yearly reports of the United States you can ascertain practically all the information about the production of lumber that you would obtain in the decennial census. In the Forestry Report of the United States for 1906 it is stated that they had obtained returns from about 12,000 mills in the United States with regard to sawn lumber. If the information published in our bulletins could be systematized a little better it would be much more valuable.

Mr. FISHER. I am informed that there is about the same difference between the information in the American decennial census and their yearly reports as there is in our publications. The blue book which the hon. gentleman refers to gives the return of manufactured lumber and not what might be called crude lumber cut in the forest. I quite agree that it is best to make the figures as nearly similar in character as possible in all our publications so as to enable comparison. I will discuss the matter with the chief statistician.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This bulletin gives the number of establishments, the capital, the number of employees, the wages for labour, and the value of the product, but it does not give the quantity of the product. I know that you can obtain from the forestry service of the United States all the information respecting the annual production that you get in their decennial census.

Mr. FISHER. I am very glad to have suggestions of that kind because they will all help to perfect the various bulletins which we issue.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have in my hand a bulletin entitled 'Census and Statistics, Monthly, No. 7, Vol. 2, January, 1907, published by authority of the Minister of Agriculture,' and I suppose this report is issued by Mr. Archibald Blue. I think sufficient care is not taken in the preparation of statistics with a view of their absolute correctness so as to make them of practical value. For instance, in this bulletin I find it stated that the average wage for farm help in Canada is $24.60 per month for males and $13.50 for females, but it is not stated whether that wage includes board and lodging. Perhaps the minister can say what the intention was.

Mr. FISHER. The statement ought to have been made in that table that those wages were in addition to board and lodging in these cases.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN.

Mr. HENDERSON. That certainly should be stated.

Mr. FISHER. I agree with you.

Mr. BARR. The idea conveyed by the bulletin is that the wages are paid to that extent during the whole twelve months of the year, whereas they are not paid for more than six or eight months. That is misleading to people wishing to come to this country.

Mr. FISHER. I cannot offhand answer the question; I shall have to look into the matter and see. Of course, wages do vary at different seasons of the year; but I took it that when they were put down in the bulletin as being so much a month, that meant the average of the year.

Mr. HENDERSON. The wages as given in this bulletin are both the monthly and the yearly wages for males for the whole of Canada, namely, $24.60 a month or by the year $209, which would practically be $17.50 a month. I apprehend that $24.60 would only apply to certain months of the year. The danger of this report is that no doubt some copies of it will go to the old country and people coming to this country and relying upon it will be surprised. If, as the minister says, the board and lodging are included, I think it is unfair to Canada to place in the hands of the people in the old country statements that do not convey the full information they might reasonably expect. I think the hon. member for Dufferin is correct, that the wages per month applies only to say six months of the year.

Mr. W. WRIGHT. The figures which purport to give the rates of wages for farm hands and female servants, leaving out of consideration board and lodging, are very misleading. It is well known that all over the country farm hands and domestic servants get their board and lodging, and these are always taken into consideration in fixing wages. In the future compilation of these figures, I think it would be well to give the wages for six months in summer and the wages for six months in winter. This would convey a more accurate idea to the general public and those interested, and the fact that board and lodging are taken into consideration should be distinctly stated in publications bearing the stamp of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. In the Auditor General's Report, page E 9, I find this item: 'Amounts paid secretary treasurers of municipalities for lists of farmers, $1,074.74.' Did the minister send for lists to the secretary treasurers of all the municipalities, or were some favoured above others?

Mr. FISHER. I am informed that when the lists of farmers were being made up, the secretary treasurers of municipalities were in many cases asked to supply lists. That was done only in Quebec and the maritime provinces, as we had the information for the other provinces.

Mr. BARR. How did you obtain that information for the other provinces ?

Mr. FISHER. We got it from the provincial governments.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Why could you not utilize the voters' lists in the different municipalities ?

Mr. FISHER. The voters' lists do not show who are farmers.

Mr. BARR. Why could you not get the lists for Quebec and the maritime provinces as well as Ontario ?

Mr. FISHER. The provincial governments in those provinces had no lists.

Mr. S. SHARPE. What would be the nature of the prosecutions in regard to the census ?

Mr. FISHER. I think they were for the refusal by some persons to give the information required by the Census Act.

Statistical Year Book, $6,000.

Mr. MONK. The subject of our Statistical Year-book is one which has been discussed every year for many years past. Ours is the most miserable Year-book published by any country, bar none. It is a wretched Year-book. Perhaps my hon. friend the minister will remember that several years ago we had a very long discussion in this House, in which the subject was threshed out completely. A member from Nova Scotia, Mr. Ross, who is now in the Senate, brought in all the year-books published by all the great British dependencies, and compared them, in regard to the printing, the forms, the manner in which they were prepared, with our own. In the year-books prepared in Australia and New Zealand, the information is carefully classified, and is given in a very pleasing form, which attracts the eye of the stranger. Our Year-book lacks all these elements It is as dry as the Public Accounts Blue-book

There is nothing grouped in it in such a manner as to attract attention. That is a defect which we ought to remove. $5,000 or $6,000 additional is nothing. We spend immense sums to attract immigrants. We make folders, we encourage newspapers, political friends of the government, to the tune of from $50,000 to $100,000 to publish absurd, useless information and we do not seem to be able, although this matter has been frequently discussed and criticised and protested against, to produce a good Year-book. Here is another point. Our Year-book is published very late. The one last published is that of 1907. We ought to have our Year-book of the last year published at the very beginning of the new year, and surely it is possible to have a staff sufficient and competent to collect all the information and have it published at the beginning of the year. Compare our Year-book with that of New Zealand. The latter has maps of the different parts of that country and photographs, and is a book which you could send to any one who desires information about that country. You cannot publish a proper book for $6,000—such a book as could be circulated in our schools and abroad. It is about time we made a new start in this matter, it is essential that a young growing country like ours, about which information is sought on all sides and by all classes of people, should publish a complete and interesting information on our possibilities and resources. Other countries take a pride in publishing Year-books infinitely superior to ours. What we are publishing is simply a waste of money.

Mr. BARR. If we go back four or five years, we find that the Year-book now published is not equal to what was then published. We then had the returns of other countries and a lot of other valuable information not given in the present publication. We either should publish a Year-book which we will not be ashamed to send out to those desiring information or not publish one at all. Would the Minister of Agriculture inform us how many were published in 1907 and when we may expect to get the Year-book of 1908?

Mr. FISHER. I am not at all convinced by my hon. friends of the advisability of doing what they suggest. Years ago our Year-book was increasing in bulk to such an extent as to contain a good deal of duplication of tables and a great deal of information about foreign countries not at all necessary for our purposes. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) says rightly that New Zealand published a very attractive pictorial volume, very much of the nature of a picture book, but I do not think that is what we ought to expect in a statistical year-book. And I know that the Commonwealth of Australia to-day has discarded that type of work and is now issuing a book of the same character as our own. The Year-books of European governments are of the same character as ours. They do not go into long descriptive accounts of the country, and voluminous dissertations on its industries. Such things are out of place in a statistical year-book. Such a book ought only to contain statistical information compiled so as to be available to the student who wants accurate information of that kind. That I think, we have accomplished. I do not think that the Canadian Year-book ought to be expected to contain information about other countries. That information can be found in the Year-books of these countries.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. Every one has not the opportunity of having access to the Year-book of other countries. A good deal of the information contained in former Year-books, which has been left out of the present edition, was of great convenience to students and others.

Mr. FISHER. If I were to adopt that suggestion. I would have to load down our Year-book to such an extent that it would be a volume no one would want to handle.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. That was not the case in the past.

Mr. FISHER. Our Year-book in 1896-1897 was a very bulky volume.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. A great deal better that the present one.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think so for the purpose for which it is printed. It may have had reading matter for people who want this class of reading, but it was not a useful and complete volume of statistical tables concerning our own country. I am sorry if hon. gentlemen do not agree with me in that. But my judgment in the matter was formed after a good deal of hesitation. And I find my opinion in accord with the practice of older countries in Europe and of the United States as well, for they issue year-books of the same character as ours. And, while Australia in days gone by, did as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has explained, it has come round to our view, and to-day the latest Year-book from Australia is compiled and printed exactly on the line of our own. New Zealand, I think, issues such a year-book as was formerly issued, but I think I am safe in saying that it is the only country that does so. This seems to be confirmation of our judgment and practice in making our Year-book what it is.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) May I request that the Minister will make every possible effort to let us have as soon as possible the French edition of the Year Book. I will take advantage of the opportunity to request that he will also hasten the publication of the French copy of the report on Co-operative Associations.

Hon. Mr. FISHER. (Translation.) The last mentioned volume is under the control of the Minister of Labour. I shall, however, take care that the request of the hon. member for L'Islet is duly transmitted to him.

As for the Canadian Statistical Year Book, I may say that I have endeavoured to have the English and French copies sent to the Printing Bureau on the same day. In my Department I have issued instructions that all bulletins and reports are to be translated without delay and the English and French copies forwarded to the printer at the same time. It was found impossible to do this immediately, but I will endeavour to have the order carried out in the future.

Mr. MONK. I asked my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) a question which, I think, he has not answered. How is it that our Year-book comes out so late? The last Year-book out, I think, is the one of 1907. That is a year behind. Why cannot we have the Year-book at the beginning of the year, giving the results of the year just closed? If the minister holds that the Year-book should only give statistics alone, with nothing to please the eye, no maps, nothing which we saw in the Year-books from other countries displayed on the table, why should it take a year to produce it? Why cannot we have it as promptly as other statistical compilations?

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) knows that the Year-book is compiled from the reports of the different departments and statistical reports. It takes a little time to compile the figures after these reports are out.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Some time ago I received a letter from one of my constituents asking me to ascertain the quantity of mica produced in Canada and the quantity exported. I sent the letter to the Department of Customs and received an answer from the commissioner giving me the quantity exported, but explaining that he could not give me the information as to the quantity produced in the country. I had a copy of the Year-book lying on my desk, and, opening it, I saw the heading: 'Mineral products by quantity and value.' So I sent my corespondent the Year-book. Meeting him on the street the other day I asked him if he had received it, and he said that he had, but that it gave him no information. He said it showed the quantity produced in 1901. But what is the use of publishing in 1908 the figures for 1901? Any other information that it had he had already received in the Trade and Commerce and other returns. If we are to have a Year-book, and if we are to have a bureau and a staff charged with the duty of compiling information for the use of the public, what is the good of republishing information from the census of 1901? We ought to have in the department information as to the products of mines right up to date and not only information eight years old. The gentleman who asked the information of me is a manufacturer in Gananoque, but he found that the Year-book gave him nothing but information which he already had.

Mr. FISHER. I speak subject to correction, but I think that if the gentleman had looked over other pages of the book he would have found information from the Mines branch giving later information. The last authentic returns are those of the census of 1901, and they are put into the Year-book for that reason. But the Mines branch makes estimates and has returns every year, and I think I am right in saying that my hon. friend would have found compilation of these figures in the Year-book as well as that which he did find.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would not the reports of the Mines Departments of the various provincial governments give the information pretty well up to date?

Mr. SEALEY. I had the pleasure of presenting the recently published Year-book to the representative of a large financial institution in London, and, after looking it over for a time, he said that in the course of his business he became somewhat familiar with the Year-books of many countries, and the Canadian Year-book furnished the greatest information in the shortest and most convenient shape of any that he had seen.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Civil Service Commission, salaries, $30,575.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Secretary of State). These estimates were before the House on a former occasion, and at the request of the Prime Minister were allowed to stand in order that certain corrections might be made. The salary of the secretary appears in the estimates as $3,050; this should be $2,900.

Mr. J. D. REID. In addition to admitting candidates to the Civil Service, does the Civil Service Commission control promotions in the different departments ?

Mr. MURPHY. There is a difference between appointment and promotion. The deputy head of a department recommends the promotion and the commission must grant their certificate approving of the promotion before it can be made.

Mr. J. D. REID. The commission must accept the deputy's recommendation ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, they are not bound to accept it.

Mr. J. D. REID. They examine the candidate before granting the certificate.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not think they are bound to examine.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the commission anything to do with the outside service ?

Mr. MURPHY. No.

Mr. MONK. Have the Civil Service Commissioners laid before the government a general scheme setting forth the method of holding the examinations and their scheme of procedure ?

Mr. MURPHY. The commissioners are preparing a set of regulations to be laid before the government which I understand will form part of the report to be laid before the House. The commissioners have been in conference with the heads of several leading universities and other institutions for the purpose of securing a uniform standard for examinations throughout the country. They have not yet absolutely decided on that standard and for that reason the regulations have not been laid before the government. They have held examinations along lines laid down by themselves and from the candidates successful at these examinations they have recommended several candidates for the Civil Service.

Mr. MONK. I suppose we will have these regulations before the estimates are all passed ?

Mr. MURPHY. If they are submitted to the government in time they will be laid before the House. They will be given to the House at the earliest possible date.

Mr. J. D. REID. Will the commission recognize the certificates of those who passed before the introduction of the new Civil Service Act as a qualification ?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes. The commission have recently notified persons who have passed the examinations in times past to send in their names, addresses and dates of passing so that they will have a list ready.

Mr. J. D. REID. Will successful candidates be qualified without further examination ?

Mr. MURPHY. I cannot answer that.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Have the places at which examinations will be held been announced?

Mr. MURPHY. That is a matter within the discretion of the commissioners; they may select different places in the Dominion to suit the convenience of the public.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. There seems to be an unusually large staff. The commission did not get under way, did it?

Mr. MURPHY. They are just getting under way.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Are they to be located in Ottawa?

Mr. MURPHY. The headquarters are to be in Ottawa.

Mr. MONK. I do not like to press my hon. friend unduly, but I think the committee will admit that it would be more satisfactory in voting these amounts for this new arrangement that is going into effect this year to have before us the regulations and plan upon which these commissioners intend to proceed. But we will take the assurance of my hon. friend on that point that we shall get them.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. MONK. Therefore, we are passing this vote of $19,000 pretty much on the assumption that everything will be all right. I will call my hon. friend's attention, however, to this: There are two commissioners at $5,000 and a secretary at $3,050.

Mr. MURPHY. $2,900.

Mr. MONK. I was going to observe that it seemed a little high, but we will leave that. Then, there is one examiner at $900, one at $600, and one, Mr. DeCelles, at $600. These, I understand, will assist the commissioners to superintend the competition for entry into the Civil Service. But, I do not understand this: In subdivision B we have three other examiners at $800.

Mr. MURPHY. They are clerks employed in the office.

Mr. MONK. I understood these were examiners, and I was wondering why we wanted examiners in the different subdivisions.

Mr. MURPHY. They are not examiners; they do clerical work in the office of the commissioners in Ottawa. I might explain further that there was an error in the item to which my hon. friend has just drawn attention. The proof was corrected and the item should have been printed in accordance with that correction. That item of $2,100 should have gone into the item below, the first item under 'contingencies,' and it should have read:

Amount required to pay temporary examiners and to meet the cost of holding the different examinations required by law, $10,000.

These items should not have been separated and the total will be $2,250 less than as it appears here. Then the other items under 'civil government' relate solely to the Ottawa staff required by the commission.

Mr. MONK. Who is the secretary of the commission?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. William Foran, formerly secretary of the Board of Civil Service Examiners.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Is it the purpose to examine candidates individually or in a body in a hall?

Mr. MURPHY. I understand that examination papers are set and that the competitors write as they do at a University examination.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Then why the necessity of three examiners?

Mr. MURPHY. Because examinations are held simultaneously at different places, and these examiners are required to conduct them.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Will the same number of examinations be held each year as formerly?

Mr. MURPHY. The dates at which the examinations are to be held and the number of examinations are two of the matters before the commission. I do not think they are restricted as to places or dates. My understanding is that they intend to hold examinations more frequently than formerly.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Will the permanent examiners be kept on during the whole year or just at the time the examinations are being held?

Mr. MURPHY. Just at the time the examinations are being held. It is not the intention to have any permanent examiners. That item is incorrectly printed. It should have given the total amount for these examinations as $10,000. The wording of the item as it appears here was applicable to the former Board of Civil Service Examiners. There were permanent examiners attached to the board and this is a relic of the former system.

Mr. BARNARD. Do I understand the minister to say that it has not yet been decided where the examinations will be held?

Mr. MURPHY. The Civil Service Commissioners have not yet decided upon the number of places where examinations will be held.

Mr. BARNARD. I would ask the minister to bear in mind that there are a number of people in British Columbia and the west who would like to enter into this competition and some provision should be made to hold examinations in those provinces.

Mr. MURPHY. These are the matters that are engaging the attention of the Board and that is the reason why the regulations that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) referred to are not yet complete. It is to meet such contingencies that the regulations are being framed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How have the appointments been made since the 1st of September? The Act came into force on that date and after that date it was necessary to appoint to the inside service by competitive examination. Have all persons appointed since that date been appointed by competitive examination?

Mr. MURPHY. So I understand.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How has that been accomplished?

Mr. MURPHY. There were examinations held a couple of months ago, and I do not know of any appointments having been made prior to that. I understand that any appointments that were made were appointments based upon the result of those examinations.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the hon. gentleman know whether or not the old examinations have been utilized for that purpose?

Mr. MURPHY. I do not know to what extent the results of the former examinations have been utilized, but I am informed that a number of temporary clerks have been brought on for temporary work who had passed the previous examinations. A few moments ago I explained to another hon. gentleman that the Commission had inserted notices in the papers asking those that had previously passed the Civil Service Examination under the old board to send in their names, addresses and the dates upon which they had passed the examination, so that they might have them for reference.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are there not records of these examinations in the department and in the hands of the present Civil Service Examiners?

Mr. MURPHY. There are.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So that I suppose they could have been resorted to for the purpose pending the holding of new examinations? I do not know whether it would be in strict compliance with the statute or not, but in default of anything better it would have been wise to have utilized them.

Mr. PATERSON. I have had one experience with reference to the new Act. An officer died in one of our branches and the vacancy had to be filled. In accordance with the wishes of the commissioners, the deputy of the department addressed a communication to them stating that we required another clerk in subdivision B, or whatever it was—I think in the class running from $800 to $1,000. He expressed a wish that they would give him a name of a clerk, stating that he would have to do accounting work and suggesting that he should be good at figures and have a retentive memory. They simply, from the records now before them, I suppose, selected a young man and sent him to us. We do not pass an outside clerk making the appointment. The commissioners decide on the person who is to be appointed, they notify the Auditor General, and he comes on without any outside clerk being passed. He must have three months' trial. The deputy cannot object to him until he has had three months' trial, then if he finds he cannot do the work, he must within six months notify the commissioners that he is incompetent for the work and they give us another person. But, if the deputy does not notify them within six months that the person they have sent is incompetent he becomes permanent.

Mr. J. D REID. Who are the other permanent examiners? I see there is one gentleman named.

Mr. MURPHY. These were the old examiners. The other two were Dr. J. C. Glashan, Inspector of Public Schools in Ottawa, and Dr. Thorburn.

Mr. J. D. REID. Do they act in a body or does each go to a different place and hold an examination?

Mr. MURPHY. They go as directed by the Board.

Mr. J. D. REID. They go individually to hold an examination

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. J. D. REID. And the papers are examined by these men and the result sent to the commissioners?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. GOODEVE. Do I understand that the $900 and the $600 respectively are paid to these men for holding an examination half-yearly?

Mr. MURPHY. I do not know that it is correct to say that these gentlemen will only hold semi-annual examinations. I understand the examinations are to be held more frequently than formerly and held in different provinces so as to give a larger number a chance to compete. I cannot speak with exactitude at the moment, but I understand these gentlemen do perform other duties than merely attending at the examinations.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. They perform other duties besides that?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, and it is not the intention to have these men permanent as was the case under the old system. They will be selected by the commissioners from time to time, and this vote is to provide funds to pay these gentlemen.

Mr. GOODEVE. Then am I to understand that no matter how many examinations are held the total salaries will be $600 and $900 respectively?

Mr. MURPHY. These were the salaries received by the examiners on the old board.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Did I understand that these examiners were to be sent from one province to another to hold examinations?

Mr. MURPHY. I understand that is the intention.

Mr. WARBURTON. The system formerly was that the examination papers were prepared in Ottawa and sent to the local examiners in different cities in the Dominion, where the examinations were held. The papers were sent in a sealed package, and the work of the local examiners was merely to watch the candidates. When the answers were written by the candidates they were sealed and returned to Ottawa where they were passed on by the examiners. The secretary of the school board in Charlottetown was the examiner under the former system, but he had nothing to do with preparing the papers or with passing on the candidates' answers after they were written. I understand that a similar system will be followed in future. I had a conversation with Professor Shortt the other day, and I gathered that the intention is, instead of having only one examination each November, to have an examination in November and another in May. I had occasion to see the commissioners to make inquiry in connection with a young man who was trying to get an appointment, and I found that in the case of a young man from my own province, a vacancy occurred in one of the departments in Ottawa, and that the young man, who had come out highest in the examination, was notified that he would get the appointment if he chose to take it. In this case the candidate who had received the highest number of marks did not accept the position, and I understand the appointment was given to the candidate who stood next highest in marks. That seems to be a very fair system. Hon. gentlemen will remember that formerly there used to be what was known as the Gilchrist Scholarship of £100 sterling under which from year to year a number of very eminent Canadian students —amongst others President Schurman of Cornell University—went to the University of London and many of these took very prominent positions in the educational world. In the case of the Gilchrist Scholarship the papers were sent out from London to the different examiners in the different provinces in Canada, and they were opened in the presence of the candidates and of one or two gentlemen who were called examiners but who were really present for the purpose of seeing that the examinations were properly conducted. The answers, were written by the students, and as in the case of the Civil Service examination. they were sealed up and returned to London, where the marks were awarded. I understand it is the intention of our Civil Service examiners to conduct the examinations in that way in future, but under the new system the man who gets the highest number of marks will be offered the position, while formerly if a candidate passed the examination he might be appointed irrespective of his standing, or indeed he might be appointed to a position and pass his examination afterwards.

Mr. J. D. REID. It is a pity the minister was not able to give us that explanation.

Mr. WARBURTON.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. If these permanent examiners are to be sent from place to place, what is the necessity for temporary examiners?

Mr. MURPHY. I understand there will be no permanent examiners in the sense that they were permanent under the old system. I shall, with the permission of the House, read the explanation that has been made to me:—

The scheme of competitive examination provided by the Civil Service Act will necessitate the employment of many outside examiners who will be entrusted with the preparation of questions and the marking of the candidates' papers, and the expenditure for this work alone will be considerable, especially as it is proposed to hold the general competitive examinations twice a year.

In addition to this there will be the remuneration to the presiding examiners and their assistants at some eighteen centres throughout the Dominion, as well as the rent to be paid for halls and the necessary furniture to equip them for examination purposes. Then again it is not improbable that a number of special technical examinations will be required during the year, for which the services of outside examiners will be utilized, and which will entail some expense. While the commission can only estimate approximately what the cost will be for the different services during the first year under the new system, it is fully expected that the amount asked for will be required.

It is hoped before the close of the next fiscal year to submit for the approval of the Governor in Council a regular tariff of charges for the different services required under the new Act.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I do not see what difference it makes whether you call them permanent examiners or what you call them. I want to know what these men do for the salaries of $900 and $600, and the distinction between them, and what are called temporary examiners?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is another thing that I would like the hon. gentleman to explain at the same time, that is, whether or not the scheme is the same as the hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island, has explained, or the one that he himself has explained, because they are entirely different. The scheme which has hitherto prevailed, as far as I understand the explanation which was given, is that the papers have all been marked by a central body of examiners at Ottawa. The scheme outlined in the memorandum which the Secretary of State has read refers to a system of marking at different places by examiners appointed for those places. That is a very different thing, and we would like to know definitely just how that is going to work out. If you have a system of competitive examinations, how will you work out the scheme of having papers marked by twelve or eighteen different examiners throughout the country? The system of marking cannot be precisely the same. Of course, I speak with a great deal of deference, so far as the proposal is concerned, because no doubt the Civil Service Examiners have bestowed a great deal of consideration upon it. That, however, would strike me as an initial difficulty. I do not understand at the present moment how the system will be worked out, and would be glad to have further explanations.

Mr. MURPHY. I do not know that the actual marking will be done at the outside places.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If I caught the memorandum correctly, it did say that.

Mr. MURPHY. It provides that the outside examiners shall be entrusted with putting the questions and marking the examination papers. Then it goes on to indicate that the presiding examiners may have assistance at these different centres. That is the only information I have on the subject.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I would like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. MURPHY. I do not observe that it is the intention of the commission to make any difference between permanent and temporary. As I have already explained, the term permanent examiners is a misprint, and should not have appeared.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Section 11 of the Civil Service Act contains this provision :

The present civil service examiners shall continue to hold office during pleasure and shall be under direction of the commission.

As I understand, under this provision, the three Civil Service Examiners continue in office during pleasure.

Mr. MURPHY. Messrs. DeCelles, Thorburn and Glashan are the three gentlemen who form that board, I do not understand that it is the intention to continue them for any length of time, but it is intended to select such gentlemen as may be available for the purposes of these examinations—not necessarily these three gentlemen.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This item refers to these three gentlemen, does it not ?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Up to the present time it has evidently been the pleasure of the government to continue these three men in office. My hon. friends on the treasury benches do not seem to be familiar with their own orders in council, because I find in a return brought down to-day an order in council of the 16th of October, which, after reciting that the Civil Service Commissioners are engaged in formulating a code of rules and regulations for competitive examinations, provides :

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, acting on the advice of the Civil Service Commissioners, is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered, in order that the interests of the public service may not suffer, and in order that everything may be done in compliance with the strict requirements of the law, that until such time as the rules and regulations above indicated are established by the Governor in Council, the ordinary entrance examinations or their equivalent, heretofore accepted for the inside service, and still required for the outside service, shall be the test for the employment of clerks in the third division of the inside service as prescribed by the said amending Act; it being nevertheless distinctly understood that, even in this interim arrangement, the competitive system shall prevail in such entrance examinations, that is to say, that those having the highest percentages in passing the entrance examinations in question shall be given the preference in appointments made as above set forth.

That is what I suggested a moment ago might very properly have been done. I am finding no fault with the order in council, but I think we might have had the explanation given a little more fully, so that we could have understood what the situation was.

Mr. MURPHY. I may say that I was not in office when that order in council was passed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I was not finding fault with the hon. gentleman any more than the other ministers.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the examiners just referred to have anything to do with examining applicants for positions in the permanent force; for I see at page 52 of the estimates an item of $700 to pay Civil Service Examiners for examining applicants for commission in the permanent force.

Mr. FISHER. I can give no explanation of that. It must be some arrangement in the Militia Department to employ the old Civil Service Examiners; but it is not under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Is this $700 appropriated for this service included in the salaries of the examiners ?

Mr. FISHER. It must be extra pay.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I fully agree with the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. S. Sharpe) that twelve men appear to be a very large number to examine persons for positions in the Civil Service. I should think that three or four at the outside could accomplish that work. Here is a staff of twelve men which is going to cost the country about $30,000 a year. It is simply an outrage.

Mr. PATERSON. They are the masters—the absolute masters now.

Mr. J. D. REID. What is the average number of new appointments made each year in the Civil Service.

Mr. MURPHY. I cannot give that information.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. How many in your own department?

Mr. MURPHY. There have not been any that I am aware of.

Mr. J. D. REID. According to the statements of some of the ministers the other evening, there were in the last year only five or six appointments in each of their departments. If there are, say ten or eleven departments, with an average of five or six appointments during the year in each, that would mean some 60 new appointments and it is going to cost $30,000 per year simply to examine applicants to fill that number of positions. Surely the Secretary of State must have an estimate of how many vacancies there are to fill each year on an average.

Mr. MURPHY. I can only answer for my own department, and there were none in it last year.

Mr. FISHER. I should say, speaking offhand, there are in the neighbourhood of 150 new appointments each year. I am simply making a statement from what I know from experience in the last ten years.

Mr. J. D. REID. Will the Secretary of State agree to give us, on some other estimate, a memorandum showing how many vacancies there were in each department during the year 1908, and the number of vacancies and new positions that were filled?

Mr. MURPHY. I shall try to get that at the earliest date posible.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Taking the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that there were probably 150 vacancies filled last year, along with the commission he engaged in making the selections.

Mr. FISHER. The commission have a year's work to do before they can get the lists from which to select those people. They have to hold examinations all over the country. They have to prepare the papers and organize the examinations and under the new Act they have to prepare special examinations for technical officers and others. So that they not only have to hold two large examinations once every six months, of the ordinary class of applicant, but also special examinations. I have myself three cases in which I shall have to apply to the commissioners in a very few days for examination for officers, and in each case there will have to be special papers drawn and opportunity will have to be given to every one in Canada to compete, just the same as if there were a hundred positions to be filled.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Are the examinations held in dierent provinces ?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, if one clerk has to be appointed, opportunity must be given everyone throughout the Dominion to compete.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Perhaps my hon. friend could explain a matter I inquired about some time ago. Is it proposed that there shall be certain papers sent and that the answers of the candidates shall be marked by the examiners in different cities and different parts of the country?

Mr. FISHER. I cannot give an absolute answer. The same examination papers will be used everywhere and will be prepared and sent to wherever the examinations are going to take place just as in the old examinations. I cannot say whether the answers are all sent in to the central body here to pass upon, but I think that will be the case.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I received a contrary impression from the memorandum given by the Secretary of State, and I thought that possibly the Minister of Agriculture would be able to speak definitely upon the subject.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is it the intention of the commission to apportion the appointments from the different provinces according to population? In the United States the appointments are made to the Civil Service from the different states in proportion to their population.

Mr. FISHER. There is no such provision in the Civil Service Act.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I would like a little better explanation in answer to the question I put. You can say that this item is wrong, if you like, but if you take the two items you will find they make a total of $10,000. If this item is wrong, why is one of these men put down at $900 and the other at $600?

Mr. MURPHY. This item was in continuance of the practice that prevailed under the old plan of Civil Service examination. The intention is, and should have been carried out, to strike out that item, a lump sum of $10,000 being asked for to hold these examinations here and in the eighteen centres referred to in the memorandum.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. But that does not explain why one man is given $900 and one man $600.

Mr. FISHER. One of these men is Dr. Glashan, inspector of schools for Ottawa. Not being a member of the Civil Service, he was given $600. The others are members of the Civil Service and they were given $600 for one and $900 for the other.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. What were his duties?

Mr. FISHER. Their duties were to prepare the papers for examinations, send them out and examine and mark them when they came back.

Mr. J. D. REID. It cost $2,100 before, and it will cost us $30,000 hereafter.

Mr. FISHER. Besides the examinations, we have the services of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Is it the intention to have the Civil Service examining body carry on examinations for the various branches of the service? For instance, there is a vote to be proposed of $11,000 for examination of masters and mates. I understand this does not now come under the Civil Service any more than the examinations for the permanent force, but I understand there has been a great deal of abuse in connection with this examination.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. A. Currie) is wandering from the item before us.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I simply ask whether this central body will carry on these various examinations.

Mr. FISHER. The Civil Service Commissioners, operating under the Act of last session, do not conduct examinations for the outside service.

Mr. MONK. I do not wish to delay the committee, but it seems to me that we are asked to vote this money pretty much in the dark. Many of the questions which we are compelled to ask would have been unnecessary if somebody had done the preparatory work showing why the money is asked for. We ought to have the regulations prepared by these commissioners. I do not wish to delay the Secretary of State unduly, but I would like to ask him when, as a matter of fact, we are to have these regulations, so that we may see exactly what the new commission intends doing. For instance, my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) asked a very pertinent question, whether any distribution was provided for as between the different provinces of those who were to enter the service, as had been provided in the United States when they began to do what we have undertaken—to give the preference to merit instead of to political patronage in Civil Service appointments. The minister says there is nothing provided in that regard. Is that absolutely so? It might happen that, for instance, Prince Edward Island would find within it so much talent that the 150 candidates necessary every year would come out of that province, and such large provinces as Quebec and Ontario would get nothing. Surely that is a point which the Civil Service Commissioners have considered. Or are we to understand that there is to be no apportionments as between the different provinces, merit being equal? We all know what the former Civil Service examination amounted to. The Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) knows it very well. Heaps of men were piled up in the Civil Service without examination, but with the understanding that they would submit to examination later on. The Civil Service examination has become practically a dead letter. Since we are now adopting a step forward, and making a reform, we would like to make sure that it is really going to be carried out as intended.

Mr. FISHER. If I may take it upon myself to answer : I said there was no provision in the Act such as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) speaks of. When the Act was going through parliament, the question was more or less discussed. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) was present, and I do not remember that he proposed to put such a provision in the Act.

Mr. MONK. No, certainly.

Mr. FISHER. Then, I suppose he did not wish it to be put in. In his remarks, it seems to me, he is thinking more of patronage than of the good of the service. It seems to me that it does not matter much whether one province or another gets a little more patronage under the Civil Service Act, but it does matter a great deal that the best men should go into the service, and that is the object of reform, that is the object of competitive examination. I think the Act will carry out the intention we had in passing it.

Mr. MONK. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I never had a more senseless answer to a reasonable question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) seems to have patronage on the brain. I never spoke of enforcing any special enactment as to that. Nobody knows better than my hon. friend that there are a great many administrative measures that are not introduced into Acts and it seems to me it is perfectly proper for us at this stage, when we are voting the money necessary to have this Act put into execution, to ask if those who are going to carry it out have given that particular feature of the case some consideration. My hon. friend will not say that when the American people started out to accomplish a reform far greater than any that we have accomplished here, they did not display some wisdom in finding that they had to attribute a certain number of civil servants to each state. That is not put in the statute but it is a matter for consideration.

Mr. FISHER. That is in the American statute.

Mr. MONK. I doubt it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It is.

Mr. MONK. We are spending a large sum for the reform of the Civil Service and it is fair to ask if the consideration has been given to the attribution of the civil servants to the provinces of the Dominion in a certain proportion. For instance if a man from Quebec disappears from the Civil Service, will his successor be nominated from that province or will merit only govern? I am not advocating one side or the other but ask whether that point has been considered by the government or the commissioners. The answer of the Minister of Agriculture is that there is nothing in the law. If the committee think that is a satisfactory answer I do not. Can the minister give an approximate date when we will have before the House the regulations that will govern the proceedings of the commission?

Mr. MURPHY. Since the hon. member made his inquiry I find that these regulations will be available within a week and I will have pleasure in presenting them to the House. I move that the item of $3,050, salary of the secretary, be reduced by $150, that the item of $2,100 for permanent examiners be struck out, and that the resolution be amended accordingly.

Mr. MONK. I would not consent to the adoption of the item unless assured by the minister that we shall have an opportunity of discussing the regulations.

Mr. MURPHY. Certainly.

Mr. J. D. REID. There is a difference of opinion between the Minister of Agriculture and the Secretary of State. As I understand the Secretary of State, the examinations will take place at eighteen different places, and whoever holds the examination will examine the papers, decide the number of marks of the candidates at these points, and on the number of marks sent in for each candidate, the commissioners will decide the special qualifications that he possesses. The Minister of Agriculture's statement is entirely the opposite. He states that the papers will be sealed up, sent in to Ottawa, and examined by the commissioners.

Mr. FISHER. I think my hon. friend misapprehended me. I said that they would be sealed up and passed on by the commissioners, but as to whether they would be passed upon by the examiners at different places I did not know.

Mr. J. D. REID. But the Secretary of State has a memorandum from the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MONK.

Mr. FISHER. If he has, that is all right.

Mr. J. D. REID. Then I understand that is to be final, and that what the Minister of Agriculture stated is not correct?

Mr. FISHER. I am not going to set up my opinion against the Board of Civil Service Examiners.

Mr. J. D. REID. Then that, I understand, is to be final?

Mr. HUGHES. Is there any provision for accepting the degree of a university or a teacher's certificate in lieu of an examination?

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. HUGHES. Why not?

Mr. FISHER. That was decided by parliament last session.

Mr. HUGHES. It is not too late to reform.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

Civil government—Post Office Department—Salaries, $488,944.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). This item last year amounted to $376,831.25. This year it is $488,944. The explanation for this increase is as follows:—Increases in the salaries of certain employees raised from the minimum of their respective classes under the Civil Service Act of last year, $57,836; 18 additional employees made permanent under the provisions of the amendment to the Civil Serivce Act of last year, $57,836; 18 additional clerkships and 6 additional messengers, packers and sorters, $24,800; 20 increases of $100 each, $2,000; 442 increases of $50 each, $22,100; 3 increases of $46 each, $138; increases in provisional allowance, $650. I will take each item separately. First, let us take the Post Office Department, 1st division, subdivision A. There is the deputy head, Dr. Coulter, raised from $4,000 to $5,000. I need not give any explanation as to that as it was fixed by statute last year. The officers in Class A are all heads of branches of the department and have a large staff under them.

Mr. TAYLOR. How does the superintendent of correspondence come to get a raise of $1,000 ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. He had a salary at $1,950 and besides he had an allowance of $600 as my private secretary making $2,250. He now loses the allowance of $600 and he becomes head of the correspondence branch so that the increase to Mr. Verret is only $350.

Mr. J. D. REID. Is this a new office ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes; it was recommended by Dr. Coulter.

Mr. J. D. REID. The fact remains that you have actually increased his salary $950.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the minister made any new appointments in connection with this great boon of free rural mail delivery which he has conferred on the people?

Mr. LEMIEUX. In the province of Quebec Mr. Bolduc the chief inspector and in Ontario Mr. Ross, superintendent of post offices in Toronto, have been appointed heads of this service. In each province the inspector will be in charge of that branch of the service.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. There have been no new appointments made in Ottawa in connection with that service ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. And there are not likely to be any.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. There would appear to be an increase of ten officials under this vote.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The business of the department has expanded considerably and we have had to appoint some new officials to cope with it. Mr. Moon has been promoted to be chief clerk; some fifteen years ago he was secretary to the then Postmaster General and I think he acted as secretary for Sir John Macdonald also. He is a very effieient officer and we thought he should be promoted. Mr. Martin an old and deserving official has also been appointed to a chief clerkship on the special recommendation of the deputy postmaster general.

Mr. GOODEVE. The superintendent of correspondence received last year $1,950 and he apparently found time to act as private secretary to the minister for which he received $600 in addition. This year he has dropped that additional duty. In other words, while he does less work than before, his salary is increased by $350.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If the facts were as stated, I would say that my hon. friend had made a very good case. But I must explain that last year Mr. Verret, my private secretary, was a chief clerk as well. My hon. friend knows that the Post Office Department is naturally a department of letters. Every morning we receive heaps of letters from every section of the country, some addressed to the Postmaster General officially, and some in my name. The sorting and distribution of all these letters has to be done by a man who knows the business of the department. Of course, we have some French settlements in the maritime provinces, we have the province of Quebec, and we have many French people in the west, and if my hon. friend will consult the Civil Service List, he will find that I have not one officer in the higher ranks of the department speaking and writing in French and capable of attending to and preparing answers to the correspondence in French. Mr. Verret, while acting as my private secretary, was assisted by four subsecretaries in attending to the correspondence. Now he will not have to do that work, but will be confined to the superintendence of correspondence in the department. I must have a first-class officer who is well versed in the two languages, and he is the only one out of twelve who is fully qualified for that work. He is a very competent and good officer, and I need him.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Will the minister explain to the House what his total salary was last year and what it is this year?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Last year is was $2,550; this year it is $2,900.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if it is the policy of the department to maintain the sale of stamps as a monopoly. In the city of Toronto stamps could formerly be purchased from licensed persons all over the city. Now the sale is confined to the various branch post offices, where stamps can only be obtained during office hours.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The sale of stamps is a public utility, and the government alone can sell them. As a matter of fact, we have not reduced the number of licenses in the city of Toronto. Whenever the members apply for licenses in their respective constituencies, I am only too pleased to grant them, provided the licensees are a certain distance from each other. If my hon. friend will assign any of these licenses in his constituency, I shall be only too glad to comply with his request.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the minister any officer whose duty it is to examine into the literature that is coming into our country? Last session I called his attention to a number of undesirable publications coming into Canada, and I understood that some of them are coming in still in large numbers, as well as many others. The minister, by reducing the rate of postage to Great Britain has opened the door to a class of literature that is anything but of an elevating nature, while at the same time he has shut the door to the very best kind of literature coming from the United States. Our people are compelled to pay at least 50 cents a year for each monthly or weekly coming in, and at the same time he has placed on the weekly papers of Canada a ban that practically prevents them from having in the United States the circulation which they had for a number of years. I notice that the minister has made arrangements whereby these papers can go in to the United States a little more conveniently than they could some time ago. I would like to ask him if he intends to continue the same arrangement that he had last year in regard to periodicals from the United States and in regard to Canadian weeklies going into the United States.

Mr. LEMIEUX. As regards undesirable literature coming from England, I may say that during my recent trip to England I had an interview with the Postmaster General of Great Britain, Mr. Buxton, and I had with me the Hansard of last session, wherein my hon. friend referred to certain very undesirable periodicals coming into this country. Mr. Buxton answered by showing me a leaflet published by the Post Office Department of Great Britain, giving the names of the only periodicals which were authorized to come under the arrangement arrived at between the Canadian Post Office Department and the British Post Office Department. I know that the British Postmaster General is not willing to give to the undesirable papers the privilege which the legitimate periodicals have received through that arrangement, and I am sure, from the assurances that I have received from our officers and from numbers of the clergy of all denominations, that these undesirable periodicals have ceased to come through the mails. However, it is impossible to prevent them filtering in, for though they do not come by the Post Office Department, they may slip in through the Customs Department. I do not wish to shield myself behind my hon friend the Minister of Customs. We all know that as far as moral and sound literature is concerned, he is immune against any attacks that can be made upon him. I am sure he takes all the necessary precautions to protect this country against such undesirable literature. At any rate he has assured me that he has done so in the past. As regards the other question, the rates between the United States and Canada, I think we had better postpone to another occasion the very interesting discussion which no doubt we shall have on that matter. I may say however, that the weekly press have practically ceased sending protests. We have established at several points on the frontier, with the consent of the Washington authorities, means of sending the weeklies at the old rate, and since a few months, I have not received any protests.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Has my hon. friend received a petition from the post office inspectors to be placed in the inside service? And is he disposed to regard it favourably?

Mr LEMIEUX. I have, but I would not like to speak for the government on this point. Last year, when my hon. colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, introduced the new Civil Service Act, he said it would first apply to the inside service at Ottawa, and that later on we would bring under the operation of the Act a number of officers. I would be quite willing to have the post office inspectors come under that Act, and have had applications to that effect, not only from the inspectors, but from the ordinary clerks and lower grades of the service as well. The outside service are quite willing to come under the operation of the Act, and also receive the bounty received by the inside service

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Is the hon. minister considering the advisability of raising the rate of interest in the post office savings banks?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is a question hardly proper to discuss under this item.

Mr. LEMIEUX. At all events we shall await the return of the Finance Minister.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. I give the hon. gentleman notice that I shall bring it up in another way.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When my hon. colleague (the Minister of Finance) returns, I presume that question would be discussed.

Mr. MONK. I would remind my hon. friend that the letter carriers of Montreal have petitioned his department for an increase in pay. I do not want to go into the merits of their demand just at present, but my hon. friend is aware that these men are getting very small pay for the work they do. Living in Montreal and having to pay the rent and taxes which prevail there and the schooling of their children, and the variety of expenses which only occur, or occur in a much larger degree in large cities like Toronto and Montreal compared with smaller places, their pay of $1.50 to $2 per day for the responsible work they have to do in all sorts of weather is very inadequate. They perform their duties faithfully and are well entitled to an increase, and I am sure that my hon. friend, who has made several improvements in the service in the city of Montreal, will consider favourably their petition.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I cannot say more at present than that the matter is under my very serious consideration just now.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Might I ask which official of the Post Office Department had to do with the extension of free delivery in the cities? We in New Westminster, encouraged by the statement of the Postmaster General a couple of years ago that he contemplated an extension of free delivery not only to the smaller cities, but to the tows as well, have been petitioning the department for an extension of that service to New Westminister. In the meantime we have seen the service extended to other places with lower standards of population and revenue—for instance Three Rivers and St. Hyacinthe.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is the population and what is the revenue of New Westminster ?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Our population is something over 12,000, and our revenue considerably over $20,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am very glad my hon. friend has brought to my attention the case of New Westminister. I did not know it had a population of 12,000 and a revenue of over $20,000. If such be the case, I invite my hon. friend to my office, and he will be given letter carriage in that city. The rule we have adopted is that wherever there is a population of 12,000 and a revenue of at least $20,000, that city will be entitled to free delivery.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I have a statement from the mayor of New Westminster, and I believe it was sent to the department, of an official census, showing the population of New Westminster to be 12,198, and that the revenue is over $20,000 is established by the official reports.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If you have the population and the revenues and your city will number the streets, it will not take fifteen days before it gets letter carrier delivery.

Post Office Department—Contingencies (including $50 a year to pay W. Cooch for inspecting letter carriers' boots) $65,755.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is an increase here of $14,000. It is made up of: Printing, $11,000; sundries, $3,200. The increase in the amount of printing is due to the increase of the business of the department. A part is the printing of the forms and pamphlet which I shall distribute in a few days to hon. members in explanation of, and for carrying on, the rural mail delivery service. Out of the item of sundries, we pay for newspapers, telegrams, telephones, washing towels, travelling expenses of officers on duty and various other items.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the Postmaster General intend to establish free mail delivery wherever it is petitioned for ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly—according to the principles of the Post Office Department. I will explain that in a few days. Of course, it will be on existing stage routes. It will be established as we receive requests,—we are not going to differentiate.

Mr. BARR. Will any particular number be required on the petition ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Of course, we cannot give free rural mail delivery for one individual. But, generally speaking, where twenty farmers——

Mr. BARR. And they must agree to take the boxes ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Of course, the letters could not be received otherwise.

Mr. BARR. And for a box $3 is to be paid?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. BARR. Any other expense ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No. The box becomes the property of the person who pays for it.

Mr. HUGHES. Why does the minister call this 'free mail delivery'?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is free.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is this printing of which the minister speaks done by tender ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Our printing is all done by the Government Printing Bureau, but, of course, we have to pay the Secretary of State. In other things, we buy nothing except by tender.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The Postmaster General of course, is aware that the American Bank Note Company do business with his department to the amount of $60,000 or $70,000 a year.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is a special contract which covers not only the printing of stamps but also the printing of the Dominion notes. That contract is with the Minister of Finance. It was made, I believe, in 1897, and has been renewed once or twice since then.

Arts, agriculture and statistics—Statistical Year-book, $6,000.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. We will have to have a lot of discussion on that. Why not take item 7, Department of Public Printing and Stationery?

Mr. FISHER. We were discussing this Year-book before dinner, and we had better dispose of the item, I think.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. We have the Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) here, and it would be better to take this item of Public Printing and Stationery and adjourn at a reasonable hour, especially seeing this is private members dav. There are a few of our friends investigating the Year-book, and they are not prepared to discuss it tonight.

Mr. FISHER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. George Taylor) to say that the gentlemen about him want further time to consider this and to look up the facts? If so, I would not prevent them. If they wish to study the Year-book, by all means let them do so. Let us take another item—the vote for exhibitions.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. That is worse; take something easy.

Arts, agriculture and statistics—Exhibitions $75,000.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Does this include the $50,000 given annually for the Dominion exhibition ?

Mr. FISHER. No, this is for foreign exhibitions.

Mr. BARR. How many exhibitions are provided for in this vote ?

Mr. FISHER. One—that at Seattle next summer.

Mr. BARR. Was there a grant to the exhibition in Scotland last year?

Mr. FISHER. We spent some money upon our own exhibit at an exhibition in Edinburgh; we do not give any grants to foreign exhibitions.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Would the minister give the names of the officers who were at the Dublin and Edinburgh exhibitions?

Mr. MONK. I would like to have also the list of those who represented Canada at the Anglo-French exhibition, with the salaries or allowances given to each one.

Mr. FISHER. The exhibition at Dublin was two years ago, so I have not the details of that here. The same staff, to a large extent, looked after our interests at the Anglo-French and the Edinburgh exhibitions. They were as follows:

Name.	Salary.	Per diem Allowance.
	$	$ cts.
William Hutchison, permanent Exhibition Commissioner	3,000	20 00
H. Hains, stenographer and secretary.	1,200	5 00
E. Girardot	1,200	5 00
W. D. Dalglish	1,200	3 50
A. W. Despard, Edinburgh	1,200	3 50
S. Anderson	1,200	3 50
J. O. Turcotte	1,080	3 00
H. B. Fitzsimon	1,080	3 00
Miss R. J. Barrett, superintendent needlework	$3 per day	3 00
T. H. Race, Edinburgh	$5 "	5 00
A. W. Tolmie, London	1,200	5 00

	Salary and Expenses.
S. C. Lacroix, London	$7 per day.
W. F. Barnes, London	$7 "
E. Poulin, London	$7 "
Robt. Dechesnes, London	$7 "
L. E. Annis, Edinburgh	$7 "
M. Turriff, Edinburgh	$7 "
J. M. Lapierre, London	$7 "

There was also the honorary commissioner to the Anglo-French exhibition, the Hon. Mr. G. TAYLOR.

Arthur Boyer, who was allowed $15 a day with no salary.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. For what exhibition is this amount intended next year ?

Mr. FISHER. The Yukon-Alaska exhibition at Seattle.

Mr. MONK. Would the minister give the details of the estimate?

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Hutchison, the chief commissioner, has gone to Seattle. He informed me before leaving that he expected the building would cost a little under $20,000 and that the present staff, with the exception of three or four, will be required, but I have not his definite report as to which should be continued and which left off.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. What is the nature of the exhibition, is it international or state or a county fair?

Mr. FISHER. It is intended to include the whole Pacific coast of America. The invitation to Canada to participate was accepted on very strong representations from British Columbia and the Yukon. Other countries bordering on the Pacific ocean are also invited to exhibit and I understand are accepting.

Mr. JAMESON. Does not the minister think that the allowance of $20 a day to Mr. Hutchison, who receives $3,000 salary, is rather liberal? During 275 days of the year Mr. Hutchison drew at the rate of $20 a day or $5,500, and then there appears to have been a term of abstinence or rigid economy, 90 days, during which he was allowed only $10 a day. What is the explanation of these two allowances?

Mr. FISHER. The $20 a day is allowed Mr. Hutchison during the period when he is actually on the ground of an exhibition. Of course, while representing Canada at the exhibition he has to take his share with commissioners from other countries and give entertainments and receive the guests of Canada at these exhibitions. As for the days when he is allowed $10, that is during the time that he was abroad working on an exhibition, but not having to do this entertaining, because the exhibition was not running and there were no other commissioners there and no people coming who would expect to be entertained by the representative of Canada.

Mr. JAMESON. Has there ever been any system whereby instead of guaranteeing a per diem allowance, Bills were sent in as representing the cost of entertaining visitors or distinguished persons with whom the commissioner might find it advisable to come into contact. Is there any basis upon which this $20 per diem allowance is fixed?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, years ago when Canada had exhibits at the Chicago Exhibition, and, later on, at the Paris Exhibition and some others, that was the system. It was found to be very unsatisfactory. There were all sorts of petty little details appearing which were made fun of and created debate in the House and in the country which was felt to be quite unnecessary and quite undignified. The feeling was that the system should be changed and in the case of a man like Mr. Hutchison, who is not known probably to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, but who is known well to the older members of this House, there is no suggestion of thought that he does not spend the money exactly in the way in which it is intended.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the minister what system is followed in dealing with the accounts of the exhibition commissioner, and how it happens that accounts for 1905 are only being dealt with in the volume of the Auditor General's Report now before us, three years after the expenditure has been incurred?

Mr. FISHER. I cannot give an explanation off-hand, but I suppose there were some accounts held over for discussion, or something of that kind or perhaps they did not send in proper vouchers and the accountant in the department refused to pass them.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I was prompted to ask that question by the minister's statement that we should take the fact that this money has been spent by Mr. Hutchison as a sufficient warranty for us to pass this vote without further inquiry, but on looking over this volume of the Auditor General's Report, I see the following:

Wm. Hutchison, commissioner, living allowance, March 27 to December 31, 1905, 279 days at $20.

That is his living alowance for 1905. It appears in the Auditor General's Report three years later, and it is not a reasonable supposition that Mr. Hutchison went without the money during these three years.

Mr. FISHER. Without the details of the accounts of 1907, I can only imagine that it was an open account which ran along and which eventually was settled by Mr. Hutchison?

Mr. J. D. REID. How is that if he was paid $20 a day?

Mr. FISHER. I need not say to my hon. friend that if he was over on the other side of the Atlantic he might not have drawn the full amount that was due to him, but that the matter was settled up finally and the accounts closed three years later. I have no other explanation to give of it at present.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. There must be some further explanation than has been given to the committee. This item on the face of it bears evidence of having been the subject of serious discussion in the department. But, to proceed, I read here:—

Less cost of banquet $670.05, paid in 1904-5.

I think there is something about this item which ought to be explained.

Mr. FISHER. I have an explanation to give my hon. friend which has just been given to me. Mr. Hutchison gave a large banquet to his fellow-commissioners at Liège, and it was such a large thing and so unusual that he thought the cost ought not to be taken out of his living allowance. He therefore sent in a special account for it. There was considerable correspondence with regard to it, but I refused to allow it to be paid except from his living allowance and eventually it was settled in that way, and he was required to pay the expenses of the banquet out of his usual $20 a day. Although paid in 1904-5 the correspondence did not occur until 1907, and therefore the account appears in the report of 1908.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. The next item appears to have been the cause of some complication too. It is a large bill for living allowance and travelling expenses.

Barry, Miss R., living allowance, 61 days at $5; transportation, Montreal to Liverpool and Havre to New York, $200; sundry travelling expenses, $157.25.

Here is the part of it that seems to show that there is something special about this item:—

Less paid in 1906-7, $450.

I think that there should be some explanation of why this account was paid piecemeal.

Mr. FISHER. This is exactly the same thing. Miss Barry made some charges and sent in bills for some things which we could not allow, but which she looked upon as being over and above her living allowance. There was a long correspondence, and the account was finally settled on the basis of the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. J. D. REID. Who is Miss Barry?

Mr. FISHER. Miss Barry is a lady who is well known in the city of Montreal. She is very much interested in the advancement of women's rights, she is a member of the Women's Council, and she was engaged to represent the ladies of Canada at one of these exhibitions.

Mr. BURRELL. Would the minister explain the method of exhibiting fruit at the Anglo-French exhibition?

Mr. FISHER. The representation of the fruit districts of Canada was made as general as possible. We have to get the fruit which will show to the best advantage and keep the best. I was not present at the Anglo-French exhibition, but I believe that most of it was shown in cold storage glass cases, and some was shown in the open. As soon as it began to deteriorate from contact with the air it was replaced by new fruit taken out of our cold storage which was not shown before it was taken out.

The fruit was gathered from all over the country and such fruit was shown chiefly as would keep the best. In the early days of the exhibition, starting in May and lasting till November, that season's fruit could not be shown, and we had to get fruit of the season before. We had to keep that in cold storage, take it out and show it at the exhibition from time to time as the exhibition proceeded. For the first three or four months of the exhibition that had to be done, but later on we got the earlier fruit and placed it on exhibition.

Mr. BURRELL. I am afraid the minister did not quite apprehend the drift of my remarks. I understand the government took the ground that it was better to exhibit fruit as Canadian fruit and not as special exhibits under the names of various provinces.

Mr. FISHER. Certainly.

Mr. BURRELL. Of course I understand it was desired to show fruit that was essentially Canadian, but this does seem to me to be a mistake. I am informed that a person who proposed to emigrate from the old country to the province of British Columbia went to the exhibition desirous of seeing British Columbia fruit. When he got there it was impossible for the commissioner to point out where the British Columbia fruit was, except—and I say this with all deference to our friends from Nova Scotia—except that of course it made its presence known by its superior excellence. Even though special advertisement was not given to the different provinces, it was in my opinion a great mistake to so mix up the whole fruit exhibit that intending immigrants could not ascertain which fruit came from a particular province. I am told that one man decided to emigrate to Manitoba, thinking that certain very excellent fruit was the product of that province, although I do not think our friends from Manitoba will be likely to admit that the growing of fruit is their long suit. I repeat that in my opinion it was a great mistake that there was not a clear line of demarcation between the fruits from the various provinces.

Mr. FISHER. We decided years ago that the exhibit by the Department of Agriculture should be a purely Canadian exhibit, and that we should not divide it on provincial lines. The latter was done in the earlier days and it was not a success. I have repeated and strong compliments from our rivals at these exhibitions directed to the fact that we made the one national exhibit. Australasia has exhibited over and over again in competition with us and she has shown her exhibit divided according to her states, and other countries have done the same. We have gone on the principle that the Canadian exhibit in one harmonious whole should represent the Dominion of Canada, and there is an almost unanimous opinion, if not quite unanimous, that this is the most effective and best way to represent our country. I sympathize with the view of my hon. friend (Mr. Burrell), but as a matter of fact while there may have been a collection of fruit shown as coming from Canada, yet individual exhibits bear the name of those from whom they have been procured with their post office addresses so that the province whence the fruit comes would be indicated in that way, Although I was not at the Anglo-French exhibit, I am pretty sure there were boxes of fruit and individual plates of fruit marked as coming from British Columbia. On the whole our exhibits have been national and not provincial, and that is one of the chief reasons why they have attracted a great deal more attention than the exhibits of other countries.

Mr. BURRELL. While I believe in the policy of not making any special advertisement of a particular province, yet I was distinctly informed that this man was told by one of the commissioners in charge that he would not and could not show him any special fruit grown in a particular province.

Mr. HUGHES. At page D—13 of the Auditor General's Report it appears that the pavilion cost us $39,643, and that it was disposed of for $1,460. Is not that a rather cheap sale?

Mr. FISHER. I must frankly say that we find it very difficult to dispose of those buildings. We had to erect this particular building in accordance with the regulations of the London County Council, which required a very expensive structure, and we either have to take the building down ourselves and dispose of the material or sell the building as it stands. We contract to take the building away and leave the land as it was before we commenced to build, and I have no doubt that Mr. Hutchison did the very best he could and he probably thought himself lucky to be able to get anything for the building.

Mr. HUGHES. I see in the Auditor General's Report that Mr. G. P. McHugh got salary and living allowance from May 8 to November 29. Might I ask if he is a son of Senator McHugh?

Mr. FISHER. I think so, but I am not quite certain.

Mr. HUGHES—Is it the custom of the department to employ the sons of liberal members of parliament and senators?

Mr. FISHER. Any good men we can get.

Mr. HUGHES. And there were none but good men?

Mr. FISHER. I hope not.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. At page D—11 of the Auditor General's report there is a deduction on account of the payments made in 1905-6 to Mr. James Brodie, secretary of the exhibitions. Was Mr. Brodie also given a banquet that year?

Mr. FISHER. No, but Mr. Brodie unfortunately was taking larger pay than he had been authorized to take and eventually I had to recall Mr. Brodie to settle up his accounts, after having tried for a long time ineffectually to get a statement of them. Mr. Brodie ceased to be an employee of the department afterwards.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. In 1908-9 there is a payment of $84.75 to Mr. Brodie.

Mr. FISHER. That was the final balance in closing the account and settling up the matter.

Mr. J. D. REID. Are these exhibits sold by the government?

Mr. FISHER. No, we use them from year to year when they are fit to be used, but when they are not fit for use of course we cannot sell them.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. In view of the fact that the estimates in all other departments are being cut down, and also in view of the fact that Seattle is a very strong trade competitor with our Northwest, and also because adding to the welfare of its exhibition would be rather a detriment to Canada than a benefit, I wish to enter a protest against voting this large sum of money for that exhibition.

Mr. FISHER. I think my hon. friend hardly realizes the amount of money that is spent in these large exhibitions. For instance, in the Franco-British exhibition, Australia spent $600,000. $70,000 is a very small amount to spend on an international exhibition.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The hon. gentleman overlooks the fact that this is purely a local or state exhibition.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend is altogether wrong, as he will find if he consults the representatives from British Columbia.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. I think the hon. minister should at least have given us the number of officials for whom this money is intended. He is asking for a large sum in bulk without giving details as to how he intends to spend the money.

Mr. FISHER. There will be something under $20,000 for a building, something under $20,000 for the whole staff, $8,000 or $10,000 for printing and literature for distribution, a heavy item for bringing the exhibits which were in London last summer all the way across the Atlantic and across the continent to Seattle, and a large item for packing and taking out the exhibits and setting them up.

Mr. S. SHARPE. How many officials do you expect to have ?

Mr. FISHER. Eight or nine altogether.

Mr. JAMESON. The minister has omitted a very important item, the item of entertainment.

Mr. FISHER. That is included in the $20 a day payment.

Mr. THOBURN. Will the minister explain how there was such a difference in the daily allowance of the different officials at the Dublin exhibition ? For instance, we find Mr. Turcotte receiving for 290 days $3 a day, while Mr. Quinn received for 228 days $8 a day.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Turcotte is one of the permanent men, with a salary besides the living allowance of $3 a day, while the $8 a day to Mr. Quinn, one of the temporary men, included both living allowance and salary.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The hon. minister stated a few moments ago, in reference to Mr. Brodie, that the $84.75 was a final settlement of the account. If he turns to page D—14, he will find the following: 'James Brodie, secretary, salary, 3 months to March 31, 1908, at $1,700 per year, $425.'

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend will notice that the salary is up to the 31st March, 1908, while the $84.75 was paid in 1908-9, just after that date, and was a final settlement.

Mr. MONK. Has the department dispensed with Mr. Brodie's services ?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. MONK. For what reason ?

Mr. FISHER. Because Mr. Brodie had been drawing a larger sum for his living allowance than he was entitled to draw.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The hon. minister in replying to my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. J. D. Taylor) gave particulars of a banquet of Mr. Hutchison which cost $670. But that was not the only banquet. There were two, as my hon. friend will see if he looks at page D—10. I find here in connection with this item at the Liège Exhibition pay to Wm. Hutchison ' less cost of banquet $670.05 paid in 1904-5 and $885.45 1905-6.'

Mr. FISHER. I am informed that that is the same banquet and the only item of that kind.

Mr. TAYLOR. The minister explained a few moments ago that there was a change in the system. Formerly when the government gave a banquet the details came in and were paid for at actual cost, but my hon. friend wanted to help Mr. Hutchison and so he gave him $20 per day living expenses, to be spent just as he liked. Being an advocate of temperance, the hon. gentleman didn't want any expenditure to appear for liquor so he gave this allowance of $20 a day, out of which Mr. Hutchison spent about $10, and, no doubt, put about $10 a day in his pocket. Here was an expenditure of the people's money which ought to go to the improvement of the farmers. Then there is Miss Barry, living allowance, 61 days at $5 a day besides transportation, Montreal to Liverpool and Havre to New York, $200, and sundry travelling expenses, $157.25. This is just throwing away the money of the country. Here we have $75,000 asked for to pay for an exhibition in Seattle, and no doubt we will have the minister coming back for another $300,000. There will be the same story as in the case of the pavilion erected in Dublin at a cost of $39,000 and which was sold for a few hundred. What earthly use is there in spending money in the United States on exhibitions? It is high time these foreign exhibitions should cease. It is money just thrown away for the benefit of a large staff of officials such as senator's sons at $5 a day and $6 a day living expenses without any benefit to the country.

Mr. HUGHES. What is shown at these exhibitions? I presume the minister shows himself at them occasionally?

Mr. FISHER. I have not been at one for five years except at Dublin.

Mr. HUGHES. I thought he must have been at Dublin judging by the large expenditure there. I notice some details of expenditure for a page or two, but surely there were other items besides what are found in these pages. I see that the Massey Harris Company are down for a binder complete at $150 and a plough at $50 and so on. Are there no other agricultural implement manufacturers recognized as well? Further down you will find an item for cheese purchased from one firm and another item 'pay to J. C. Sutherland for writing preparing and proofreading a pamphlet "The Twentieth Century in Canada," $250, and to the King's Printer for 20,000 copies of that pamphlet $723.93.' Were there any other exhibits than those recorded on these pages?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, any number of them. A great many are exhibits sent to all the exhibitions such as mineral exhibits and exhibits of a permanent character. We have found the greatest difficulty in getting our agricultural implement makers and other manufacturers to furnish us with exhibits.

Mr. HUGHES. I don't see why you sent binders to Dublin.

Mr. FISHER. Binders are used in Ireland.

Mr. HUGHES. Not very largely.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend is entirely mistaken. Lots of people from Scotland and England went to Dublin as well as the Irish and our agricultural implement manufacturers do a very large business in the old country and Europe generally. We have to get these exhibits as best we can. Our manufacturers are so busy supplying the Canadian demand that they will not look to the outside.

Mr. HUGHES. Are not the exports of these implements increasing?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, they are much larger than they were twelve years ago.

Mr. HUGHES. Does not an apple tree produce more fruit ten years after it was planted than the first year?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, but until it is planted it does not produce anything.

Mr. BURRELL. In connection with the Seattle exhibition, what kind of display is specially mentioned?

Mr. FISHER. We propose to make a general exhibit. We hope to get a lot of fruit from British Columbia and trust our hon. friends from that province will aid us in that work. Also from Eastern Canada to show that other parts of Canada produce excellent fruit as well as British Columbia. We hope also to send mineral exhibits from British Columbia and Eastern Canada. One of the officers of the Geological Survey has been arranging to get a mineral exhibit from British Columbia and hopes he will be able to succeed. A large proportion of the expenditure of these exhibitions is in connection with the general display which makes the Canadian pavilion the most attractive on the ground, such as agricultural decorations, ropes of grain heads and such things as that. These attract people into the pavilion and once there they examine the other exhibits and learn what Canada is producing.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. What happened to that binder? I do not see any reported sale?

Mr. FISHER. I am told we still have it. It was shown in London last year.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Is it intended to have, at the Seattle exhibition, any pamphlet corresponding to 'The Twentieth Century in Canada?' If so, under what auspices will it be prepared? I ask this because in pamphlets issued under the auspices of the Department of Agriculture I have observed that there was a tendency to ignore British Columbia and to convey the impression that agriculture is confined to the portion of Canada east of the Rockies. I can assure the minister that that is a mistake.

Mr. FISHER. I agree that that would be a mistake, but I do not think that it is the case. The literature we distribute is mainly that prepared under the auspices of the Immigration Department, although we have had some prepared by ourselves.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Who was 'The Twentieth Century in Canada,' prepared by?

Mr. FISHER. It was prepared under our auspices. It was a former pamphlet of our own which was brought down to date by Mr. J. C. Sutherland.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. He received $250, and travelling expenses $24. Is he one of the officers of the department ?

Mr. FISHER. No, he is a newspaper man who is well acquainted with the general resources of Canada.

Mr. HUGHES. Is the Department of Agriculture in the habit of sending copies of its pamphlets to members of parliament ?

Mr. FISHER. Not those sent to exhibitions.

Mr. HUGHES. It would be a courteous thing to do.

Mr. FISHER. It shall be done, if the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) wishes it.

Mr. BURRELL. I think the suggestion made by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. J. D. Taylor) is a very good one. The information in most of the literature issued by the Immigration Department has shown a peculiar tendency to stop at the Rocky Mountains, as if there were no province west of that. And, as I have come across the gentleman employed by the Dominion government, it has seemed to me that their knowledge was limited to that part of the country east of the Rockies. Of course we desire to see the Northwest and all eastern Canada thoroughly advertised, but we believe that British Columbia also should come in for its proper share. I trust that the Minister of Agriculture will bring pressure to bear on the Department of Immigration to have British Columbia given its proper space.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FISHER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. What business will be taken up to-morrow ?

Mr. FISHER. Minor Bills, first, then the Civil Service resolutions, and after that Supply.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 19) to amend the Post Office Act (Hon Rodolphe Lemieux) read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1—compensation for loss of registered letters—

Mr. SPROULE. What do you mean by 'registered domestic article?'

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will give the House a few explanations regarding this Bill. Section 9, subsection K of the Post Office Act reads as follows, in regard to the powers of the Postmaster General:

prescribe and enforce such regulations as to letters directed to be registered, as to him seem necessary, in respect to the registration of letters and other matter passing by mail, as well between places in Canada as between Canada and the United Kingdom, or any British possession, or any foreign country, and to the charge to be made for the same, not exceeding five cents per each letter or article.

As every member of the House knows, it costs five cents, besides the usual postage of two cents, to register a letter. We have two classes of registered letters, the international and the domestic. Under the terms of the Postal Union Convention held at Rome in 1906, the Canadian Post Office Department agreed to become a party to the following provision:

In case of the loss of a registered article, and except in cases beyond control, the sender or at the request of the sender, the addressee is entitled to an indemnity of 50 francs.

All nations which adhere to the Postal Union are now responsible to the extent of 50 francs for each registered article which is lost, that is to say, the proven value of the article. What we do for international registered letters which are lost we intend to do for domestic registered letters that are lost.

This regulation for indemnity for the loss of registered letters has been adopted by Great Britain and the United States of America. The regulation of the English Post Office Department for compensation for the loss of registered inland correspondence reads as follows:

Subject to the rule stated below, the Postmaster General pays compensation voluntarily and as an act of grace for registered correspondence, including parcels. The fee payable over and above the postage is the ordinary registration fee for two pence, the limit of compensation being five pounds sterling. Compensation in respect of money of any kind (coin, orders, notes, cheques, stamps, &c.) will only be given in those cases in which the money is inclosed in one of the registered letter envelopes sold by the post office and the packet is tendered for transmission by the registered letter post.

My hon. friend sees that in England they indemnify to the extent of £5. We intend to indemnify to the extent of $25, as is done in the United States' postal law. Let me read the text of the postal law dealing with this indemnity:

As a part of such system of registration he (the Postmaster General) may provide rules under which the sender or owners of first-class registered matter may be indemnified for loss thereof in the mails, the indemnity to be paid out of the postal revenues, but in no case to exceed $100 for any registered piece, or the actual value thereof when that is less than one hundred dollars, and for which no other compensation or reimbursement to the loser has been made; provided that the Post Office Department or its revenues shall not be liable for the loss of any other mail matter on account of its having been registered.

And the United States regulations based thereon read:

Indemnity shall be paid for the value of the lost domestic first-class matter not to exceed $25 in any one case in accordance with the law and the regulations of the Post Office Department.

What we do to indemnify the sender or in respect of the addressee, as the case may be, of an international registered letter, we should at least do in the case of our own domestic letters, and we shall follow the regulations in that respect adopted by two of the most progressive countries, England and the United States. Let me now give to the House a few statistics of interest in connection with this matter. The estimated number of registered letters (not including other registered articles) posted in Canada during the five fiscal years, is as follows:

1903-4	5,986,000
1904-5	6,594,500
1905-6	7,475,000
1906-7	8,338,667
1907-8	9,078,000

The number of registered letters posted to the department as lost through various causes during the course of post in Canada during the same five fiscal years is as follows:

1903-4	116
1904-5	115
1905-6	104
1906-7	100
1907-8	208

What would have been the liability of the department for the last two fiscal years if the powers I am now asking parliament for had been conferred on the Postmaster General? It would have been as follows:

1906-7	$ 381 33
1907-8	2,184 78

That is the proven value of the letters lost because we would not pay the $25 for each letter lost. We would pay according to the proven value of the loss. If a letter lost contained only ten dollars, we would only pay that amount. In certain countries I believe, however, they pay up the amount fixed by statute. Last year (1907-8) we would have been called on to pay $2,184.72, but $1,621.22 of this amount was due to the fact that a postal car was wrecked and totally consumed by fire near Moorhead on November 14, 1908.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. How much was claimed as having been lost?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The amount claimed is larger, but still it is remarkable how very little is claimed, if we take into consideration the vast amount of registered mail matter which passes through the mails. I have not the figures, but they are not large and of course fictitious claims have been made on the department.

Mr. SPROULE. The amount which a letter contained up to $25 is paid in full, and above $25, only that sum is paid?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes. This has worked very well in the United States and England, and really we have been a little backwards in this connection. We ought to have adopted that last year, but waited until we saw how it worked out in other countries.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the hon. minister give some idea of the amount to be set apart for this work?

Mr. LEMIEUX. We claim that under these regulations more care will be taken by the officials and the department to trace lost letters. In fact, it will be almost impossible to lose a registered letter. Of course a car or a steamer may be wrecked, but, taking the estimates of previous years, the amount will be very small. There will be more care taken and the department will make more money, because many more people will register their letters when they know the department is liable for each registered letter to the extent of $25.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Will there be any change in the form of receipt given for a registered letter? Will the amount the letter is said to contain be stated on the receipt?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes. At present we have only the five-cent stamp, which shows that a letter is registered and there is no declaration by the party that it contains money. In the future, under the regulations to be framed, the amount in the letter will have to be stated if it is feasible.

Mr. LENNOX. There is no provision in the Act for ascertaining the amount at the time of registration.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That will be part of the regulations. We need not amend the Act for that.

Mr. LENNOX. As a matter of practice, the Post Office official will not take any notice of the amount you are sending. Will there be a regulation by which the postmaster is bound to ascertain, at the time of registration, the amount being sent?

Mr. LEMIEUX. There will be under the new regulations.

Mr. LENNOX. I presume that this is not retroactive?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. LENNOX. Because, I have a very interesting case of loss in my own riding, and I have not been able to get any report that the matter has been properly investigated, though I have drawn the attention of the department to it several times.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has my attention been called to it in the House?

Mr. LENNOX. I do not know.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) will send me a note of it——

Mr. LENNOX. I have done the note part of it; I have written several letters and have been assured that the matter would be investigated. It will be a very interesting case if investigated.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would like to know the case.

Mr. LENNOX. I will give the Postmaster General the facts on another occasion. I would like to ask him also if he has considered the question of making compensation to the person who suffers loss—outside of this matter altogether—through the dishonesty of a government official? It seems to me that in such cases compensation should be made.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am glad the hon. member has called attention to this matter. Whenever an official of the post office appropriates money from the sender or from the addressee, the department, as a general rule, after full investigation makes good the amount. We have a special fund in the department for that very object. Of course, the instances in which we are called upon to make compensation are very few, but it does happen, perhaps two or three times in the course of a year, that dishonesty is practised in these matters by a government official. In that case, we make good the amount. The regulation under which this is done was passed several years ago by my predecessor, Sir William Mulock.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there a regulation, or does the minister intend to make a regulation, to provide for keeping the address of an individual who registers a letter?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. It is not usually enforced.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Under the new arrangement the department will be on the alert, as it will not wish to pay $25 for a lost registered letter. We intend to make the most stringent regulations for the protection of all the parties concerned. If there is not sufficient protection under the present regulations, we will have them framed in the proper way.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not sure that the Postmaster General understands my question. I asked if the address of the sender would be taken. I have never known the address of the sender of a registered letter to be asked for.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, the postmaster is obliged to have the address of the sender as well as the addressee. An invoice is sent from office to office following each registered letter. It is very difficult to draw a registered letter from its appointed route because of this invoice system, but with the provision that is here proposed we shall take even more care.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the regulation a very good one. Personally I could never understand why there should not be compensation to the loser of a registered letter when a registration fee has been paid. Many cases of loss have been brought to my attention, and some of these I have brought before the department. I have learned that registering simply means keeping trace of a letter, but without compensation in case of loss. It seems to me that a registration ought to be an insurance as well.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. As I understand it, if postmasters lose public money through the act of burglars, they have to bear the loss. I have known cases where postmasters have desired to give up the money order business in order to get out of the risk, the public money that they have in charge being, no doubt, an attraction to burglars.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If postmasters have taken the necessary precautions, for instance by keeping their postal notes, money, &c., in a safe approved by the department, and by using due diligence, the Post Office Department generally recoups them any loss they may sustain in the way referred to.

Mr. HUGHES. Is there to be any means of ascertaining whether the value is in the registered letter or not? Any one in business knows that sometimes a man will claim to have sent certain money by registered letter, but the receiver says that the money to the amount claimed was not enclosed.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Under the new regulation the sender will have to prove the amount before it is sent, because the department will be called upon to recoup him according to the proven value contained in the letter.

Mr. PORTER. I understand that there is a provision by which a person desiring to transmit money to a foreign country may go to a postmaster, make his deposit of money and get a receipt therefor, and that money will be paid to a person named in a foreign country. But in case the money is not delivered, what provision is there for the depositor getting it back?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The regulations concerning registered letters, as well as ordinary letters, passing between two countries, are framed by what we call the Postal Union——

Mr. PORTER. Pardon me. I do not speak of a registered letter. But suppose I deposit money with the postmaster to be paid to a certain person, say in Russia?

Mr. LEMIEUX. We have postal conventions with different countries by which we restrict our postal or money orders.

Mr. PORTER. Suppose I send $25 in that way and it is not delivered in the foreign country, how do I get my money back?

Mr. LEMIEUX. If it is lost in Canada and the Post Office Department is proven responsible, Canada pays the money. If, on the other hand, the loss is proven against the foreign country, the foreign country pays the money.

Mr. PORTER. Is there any limitation fixed? In the two cases I refer to, over a year has elapsed since the money was sent, and the party sending it seems to have no redress, although he has made application time and again. The only answer he gets is that inquiry is being made. Is there any limit to the time within which this is to be paid?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, there is no prescription.

Mr. CROTHERS. Is there any good reason why the sum should be limited to $25? It seems to me that if the whole people of Canada, through their government, undertake to perform a service for individuals and fail in the attempt and lose a sum of money, the whole people, through their government, ought to make good that loss to the individual. It may be considered advisable to limit the sum that the Postmaster General should undertake to convey from one part of the country to another; but if that sum is unlimited, if a man sends $100 through the government and it is lost, it seems to me that the government should sustain that loss and not the individual.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is some force in what my hon. friend says. But we must not take too many risks, we must remember human frailty in undertaking to carry money from one part of the country to another. The express companies and the banks do that work, and they take very good care to insure themselves against possible loss. My hon. friend should understand that the average citizen will not confide to His Majesty's post so large a sum as $100 in bills. He may venture to send $5, $10 and perhaps $20 or more, but he hesitates to send a large amount of money in that way. He prefers to go to a bank or an express company, who will send a large parcel of bills for him. But those companies have special insurance against loss. As regards limiting the amount to $25, in postal matters generally we follow the example of the two countries most advanced in postal matters, namely, Great Britain and the United States. In Great Britain the sum is limited to £5, in the United States to $25. The system has worked wonderfully well in those countries. I think we should adopt the same system or try it, at all events.

Mr. CROTHERS. I think if we changed the law and made the government responsible for the whole amount in case of loss, the people of Canada, so long as the present Postmaster General presides over the department, would have unbounded confidence in the department, and would be willing to confidde a much larger sum than $25 to the department for delivery. Why should the people be obliged to send these large sums of money through banks or express companies instead of through the government?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may mention in this connection that I have under consideration a plan of government insurance under which the Post Office Department will take charge of larger amounts, though that plan is not yet ripe for legislation. At present, large payments are sometimes made through the Post Office Department by banks and companies, showing the confidence they have in the service, and that confidence is justified by the very few losses that have occurred. Registered letters are so well traced that banks and large corporations are sending relatively large amounts of money through the Post Office Department. If we carried larger sums we would have to provide a special system of insurance, with a rate higher than the present rate of five cents. My officials are now studying very closely a plan in this direction and perhaps next year I may take the House into my confidence on that subject.

Mr. HUGHES. I need not remind the minister what came to his notice last year, of a very heavy loss that occurred between Lindsay and Dunsford. I think $500 disappeared mysteriously, and the loser could get no redress. I may also remind him of another case that the late member for Durham, Colonel Ward, brought frequently before the minister, where an officer of the department was proven to have received the money for the money order and never transmitted the money order. Is it the intention of the department to make this Bill retroactive, so that the loser in this case could get redress?

Mr. LEMIEUX. That will not come under this Bill. I recollect Colonel Ward's case, and I examined the papers very closely at the time. Has my hon. friend read the report on that case, issued by the department?

Mr HUGHES. I have not read the report, but I have read all the evidence except the final report.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have the evidence and at the close of last session I satisfied Col. Ward that he should not press the matter further, because it was a special case. I need not say anything more about it.

Mr. HUGHES. I could not let that pass, because that is a reflection either on the gentleman who paid the money, or it is a reflection on Colonel Ward. There is no doubt that the postmaster took the money, that is well established.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would not reflect at all either on Colonel Ward or on the postmaster. The best thing I can do is to send the report to my hon. friend, and he will see that the department is not at all liable in that case.

Mr. THOS. CHISHOLM. Does not the department keep a certain amount of money from the postmasters for the purpose of making up losses?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, in case of possible dishonesty on the part of the officials there is a special fund in the department called a guarantee fund; and wherever an official has been dishonest, and a claim is made on the department, an investigation takes place, and the money is paid by order in council if the department is liable.

Mr. THOS. CHISHOLM. Is that not a species of insurance for the transmission of money? I may say that I think it is a criminal offence to send a letter purporting to contain money, that does not contain money.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, but under the new regulations the evidence must be given and made clear to the officers in the department that there is money in the letter. That is how we intend to frame the regulations.

Mr. OSLER. Is the clause confined to money only or does it cover articles of value ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, all registered articles.

On the question shall the Bill be reported.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the Bill is reported, I desire again to present the amendment which I offered last year to the Postmaster General and which I then understood would be considered by him providing the revenue of the country would permit. We remember that last year a considerable reduction was made on drop letters in cities or larger places where letter carriers were employed. Formerly the postage on drop letters in cities where letter carriers were employed was two cents. By the legislation of last year that was reduced to one cent in this way. Section 58 of the Post Office Act reads as follows :

On letters not transmitted through the mails but posted and delivered at the same post office, commonly known as local or drop letters, the rate shall be one cent per ounce weight which shall in all cases be prepaid by postage stamps affixed to such letters.

The clause, as originally enacted has also the following words :

Except that in cases where there is a delivery by letter carriers the rate shall be two cents per ounce which shall also be prepaid by postage stamps.

By the enactment of last session these words commencing with 'except' were expunged from clause 48 which practically made the postage on drop letters, whether in cities, towns, villages, or rural districts, one cent. To my mind this was a decided discrimination in favour of the cities as they enjoy the free delivery while in the rural districts there is no free delivery. It would only be fair that the rural districts should receive some compensation now that the revenue of the postal department has increased to such a very large amount. I intimated when the Bill was up last year that I desired to move an amendment to give effect to the proposition which I then made and make now to have the postage on drop letters in all places where letter carriers are not employed reduced from one cent to one half cent per ounce. The reduction would be fifty per cent in both cases. Fifty per cent of the postage was removed from drop letters in cities where letter carriers were employed, and I proposed then that we reduce the postage on drop letters in all other parts of the country to the same extent. There is no question but that this would be quite a boon to the people. Merchants throughout the country would no doubt use the post office to a much greater extent in sending out their bills, circulars, and other material appertaining to their business; in fact, I think the post office would derive a revenue at half a cent an ounce which would very largely recoup what would be lost by the reduction owing to the very much larger use that might be made of the mails. No doubt many others besides merchants in rural districts, such as doctors and others sending out accounts for like purposes would use the mails to a greater extent, and I think it only fair that the rural sections of the country should be considered along with the cities in this reduction of postage. I take no exception—I took no exception a year ago—to the reduction on drop letters in cities; in fact, I believe I expressed my approval of it: I thought it was quite right and proper as the revenue of the country could afford it. But, whilst that was the case I claimed in the interest of the rural districts, one county of which I represent myself, that we should be put on a par with the cities and be given a corresponding reduction in postage. Hence, I have prepared an amendment which I will offer to the Postmaster General, and if he has found the revenue has been sustained that no material loss has accrued owing to the reduction of postage in cities, I hope that he will take this amendment into his favourable consideration and grant to the rural districts the same favour and consideration that he has been gracious enough to extend to the cities. The amendment I propose will be in the form of clause 2 to the Bill now before us and will read thus:

Section 48 of the Post Office Act, chap. 66 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, as amended by chap. 53 of the statutes of 1908, is amended by adding thereto the words following: Except that in cases where there is no delivery by letter carriers the rate shall be one half cent per ounce to be prepaid by postage stamps.

The effect of the amendment, if adopted by the House, as I trust it will be, will be exactly as I have stated, that drop letters in all places outside of cities where letter carriers are not employed, will be subject only to half a cent postage instead of one cent as now. That will be the entire difference, and I ask that the minister will favourably consider this amendment. I would like very much to have it submitted to the House. If it is not received by the minister this year I hope it will be another time, but I do not desire to do anything that will prevent its adoption at any future time.

Mr. SPROULE. What are you going to do provided this amendment passes, with those localities where rural free mail delivery is established ?

Mr. HENDERSON. Free mail delivery is yet in its infancy, and consequently I do not know that it will really be a factor in connection with this matter. Free mail delivery will be in the country and could not affect letters that are posted to be delivered in any village or town by the citizens of that village or town. I beg to submit this amendment, moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Chisholm).

Mr. LEMIEUX. There are obvious reasons why I should express the hope that my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) will not press his amendment. I do not receive the amendment in any bad spirit; on the contrary, it would possibly commend itself to me were I fully informed of the operation of the effect of reducing the drop letter rate in cities from two cents to one cent. It is quite true that last session I promised my hon. friend that if there were no loss in the revenue because of reducing the drop letter rate in cities I might perhaps extend the favour of the rural sections, but my hon. friend will remember that the promise was given not a year ago, but only a few months ago when the House was in session. From what statistics I have been able to gather I think it is fairly safe to assume that the reduction of the drop letter rate will not eventually result in a loss of revenue, but we must at least wait for one fiscal year to pass before we can pronounce on that with certainty. When we have that information complete I will look forward with hope to the possibility of granting the boon to the rural sections proposed by the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. HENDERSON. In view of the promise of the Postmaster General it is probable that with his assistance at the expiration of the fiscal year I will be better able to get this amendment adopted than were I to press it now In view of the argument advanced by the Postmaster General, I rather think it will be my wisest plan to accept his proposition, feeling assured that should we meet here at the expiration of the fiscal year I will have the assistance of the hon. gentleman to extend this boon to the rural districts as it has been extended to the cities. I may say that the Hansard will show that the promise of the Postmaster General was that he would make this applicable to the rural sections in one or two years, and as that promise was given only last July the Postmaster General cannot be held too strictly. I will accept the hon. minister's offer of material assistance, but I may tell him that next session he will not find me quite so pliable if he should raise any objections.

Amendment (Mr. Henderson) withdrawn.

Bill reported.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Might I ask the Postmaster General whether he has yet established a postal service in Gowganda and improved the service at Elk lake?

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend is just in time with his question. The hon. gentleman called on me the other day to ask for a post office at Gowganda and a service between Gowganda and the railway, and this morning we received word from Ontario, that objection would be taken to the grant or sale of any lot on which a building could be erected until at all events a few weeks hence. We have written the Hon. Mr. Cochrane this afternoon, asking him to consider our case before any other, as our desire is to serve the public. If my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) will press his friends of the Ontario government we will do our best on our side.

On the motion for the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. GERVAIS. Next sitting of the House.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) moved second reading of Bill (No. 18) to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does this Bill contemplate making any change in the law or is it merely to carry out the law as it is supposed to be at the present time?

Mr. FISHER. It effects a change. In the revision of the statutes a certain clause was transposed from one section to the other with the result that the amount which was to be paid in compensation was increased over the amount fixed by the statute which was being revised. This is an Act to amend the Revised Statutes so as to place the figures as they were before the revision. We want to revert to the original law. The present law has been changed from the original law.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was that done intentionally or unintentionally?

Mr. FISHER. Unintentionally, by the revisers.

Mr. SPROULE. As I remember the original law, it provided that the government should pay for the loss of animals slaughtered because affected by certain classes of contagious diseases, one of which was tuberculosis. I brought to the attention of the minister last year or the year before, a case in which a person applied for compensation but could not get it. What is the law with regard to that? Is the government responsible for the loss of animals which are slaughtered because affected by tuberculosis, or is it not?

Mr. FISHER. It is not. The law provides that the minister may cause to be slaughtered animals suffering from infectious or contagious diseases or suspected of being so infected, and that he may order a compensation to be paid to the owners of such animals.

Mr. SPROULE. If tuberculosis is included in the list of infectious or contagious diseases, one would naturally expect that the government would be responsible for some portion of the loss sustained by the owner of tuberculous animals slaughtered by order of the government.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1—compensation to owners of diseased animals.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How did this change occur? Was it through some transposition of language or through some omission?

Mr. FISHER. Section 12 of the old Act provides that the Governor in Council may pay compensation for animals slaughtered under the provisions of the Act. Subsection 2 provides that the compensation, if any, shall be two-thirds of the value of the slaughtered animal. Section 4 fixes the maximum of value. In the revision of the statute the same words and the same amounts are used, but the amount is applied to the compensation instead of the value. The consequence is that the compensation may be as high as the full value, which was not intended, and I am simply moving to restore the provision of the original Act.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I understand that since the revision of the statutes in 1906 until the present Bill has been introduced, the amount paid in respect of slaughtered animals has been unlimited.

Mr. FISHER. No, it has been limited.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I would like to ask if between the revision of the statutes and this date the minister has paid any greater amounts for cattle slaughtered than he did prior to 1906, under the old statute.

Mr. FISHER. No, because we have been fixing the values on the basis of the old Act, acting as if the old Act was in force. We had the power to fix the full value, but we preferred to have the law made correct, and to act within its limitations rather than upon our own will.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Since the outbreak of the foot and mouth disease in the United States, the frontier ports, as I understand, have been guarded by certain officials of the government. Gananoque being one of these points where people are crossing daily, I understand that two men are patrolling there, and in addition a veterinary surgeon has been sent there from some distance. I have received the following letter:

We have a veterinary surgeon here named Dr. Joint. The Department of Agriculture has sent a man here at a great expense to inspect or look after the hoof and mouth disease He is a veterinary surgeon. Can you find out from the minister why this is necessary when we have a fully qualified man here to do this work at a much less expense, and as we are anxious to have a veterinary surgeon here we think it very unfair on the part of the Agricultural Department to side-track it. The farmers of our district are anxious to have a veterinary surgeon here, but if there is anything that can help him to make a good fair living, this riding should be considered and not some outsider. Anything you can do will be appreciated by the farmers and the townsmen of Gananoque.

Yours truly,

E. R. CHAPMAN.

I think that puts the case fairly. We have a qualified veterinary surgeon in Gananoque, and yet the minister sends one in from outside point. The one he sent has been there for some time although there was no crossing until a few days ago when the ice took. Why was not the local vet. called upon? Where there is a local vet. at one of these points, no matter what his politics—and I do not know the politics of the one we have—he should have the patronage of the department. I hope the minister will recall the man he sent and instruct Dr. Joint to do the necessary work.

Mr. FISHER. I did not know of this case at all. I have not the slightest idea who have been employed except that as much as posible we utilize our own permanent staff on this work of guarding the frontier. They were not sufficient to do all the work, especially in the earlier days when the disease was very acute, and when we were making special examinations inside Canada as well as outside. We have utilized our permanent staff as much as possible so as to avoid the expense of employing others. The expense has been very great any way. Where we cannot use the men on our permanent staff, we have tried to utilize the men on the spot as much as possible. I shall make inquiry into the case, and if the complaint be well-founded, I shall see that the services of a qualified man on the spot are retained.

Mr. DANIEL. Is the embargo in connection with the foot and mouth disease removed or not?

Mr. FISHER. It still exists and is strictly enforced although we have been able to relieve it, so far as horses are concerned. But we have not considered it safe to relieve the embargo in the case of cattle and other live stock. We are only enforcing the embargo against those states of the Union in which the disease has occurred. The New England States have not been infected, and therefore we have not imposed any embargo on the State of Maine which adjoins my hon. friend's province.

Mr. DANIEL. What about the state of Kentucky?

Mr. FISHER. That state is a long way from our boundary and is not infected. We shut out any animal coming from any state infected and which is quarantined by the American authorities. We also shut out any animals which passed through those states. For instance if any animal from Kentucky passes through New York or Philadelphia, which are infected, it would be debarred from coming into Canada. But the places we are specially guarding are the frontiers of contiguous states. Wherever New York, Pennsylvania, or Michigan, which I think are the only three states infected, which touch our boundaries, we guard the frontier. In the case of a New England State, we only guard our frontier to the extent of preventing the entry of any animals which may have to come through Pennsylvania or New York, even if they originally came from an uninfected state. I may say to my hon. friend from St. John that we were obliged to make some regulation about the shipment of cattle from St. John to Europe. One of the great dangers was that if Canada were suspected of having the disease, the quarantine would be enforced against us on the other side and our trade in live animals cut off. The port of St. John does one of the largest export trades in winter of live cattle to Great Britain. I am not sure if there are not regular lines of steamers from Portland and Boston which touch at St. John on the way to Great Britain. The United States regulations permit animals from states not infected, to be shipped from Boston or Portland to Great Britain. We would not allow that in Canada, and therefore had to make a rule that ships from Boston or Portland containing American cattle should not be allowed to touch at St. John, even for the purpose of landing passengers. We did that in order to protect our stock yards and wharfs at St. John from any possible danger of infection, so that there would be no danger of our export of Canadian cattle from St. John to England being interfered with. Until there is a change in the American regulations, we would not be justified in relaxing our own. I was in Europe at the time the outbreak took place, and was fortunate enough to have in Rome, when I was there, a prominent member of the Department of Agriculture in England, and our chief veterinery, Dr. Rutherford. It was largely due to that fortunate circumstance that we were able to show just what we were doing and prove to the English authorities that there was no danger to their herds and flocks from any importation of Canadian cattle, and the result was that no restriction was placed on the landing of Canadian cattle in the mother country. Suspicion at first attached to Canada in the minds of the English people, because in the earlier reports of the outbreak of the disease in the United States, it was stated that the disease originated in Ontario and that animals sent from Ontario to Philadelphia were infected. We proved conclusively that if they were, they must have contracted the disease in American yards shown to have been infected, where they were unshipped, fed, and watered. When this was shown to the English authorities, Canada was relieved of all suspicion in their minds, and they did nothing to interfere with our trade.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I have heard drovers in Toronto say that it would be a good thing to prevent, by law, the export of our cattle in cases of that kind, especially such cattle as many of those that are shipped from Toronto to Buffalo.

Mr. FISHER. I do not understand.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. The cattle going from Toronto to Buffalo, of which I speak, are of a very inferior grade and sold at low prices for slaughter in Buffalo. Had the export been prohibited, there would have been no mention of Canadian cattle being affected over there. Certainly, some day, Canada will be quarantined by another country by reason of such conditions as these.

Mr. FISHER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. W. F. Maclean) mean to say that after the outbreak took place we should have prohibited the export of Canadian or that the export of cattle should be prohibited altogether?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. When there was an outbreak.

Mr. FISHER. Then, we would not have been saved the difficulty.

Mr. DANIEL. I am not quite clear about the answer which the minister gave with regard to horses. Has any embargo been placed on horses purchased in the State of Kentucky that may have to pass through Pennsylvania or New York in order to come into Canada? Are these horses debarred from Canada?

Mr. FISHER. I think not.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Listening to the reply of the minister to the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) I could not but think of the price paid for certain animals that were found diseased at the port of Point Edward. By the Auditor General's Report of 1906, page D—10, it appears that Mr. J. T. Brethour, of Burford, Ont., received compensation for eighteen hogs amounting to $1,533, and Messrs. Douglas & Son, of Mitchell, received $932 for twelve hogs, slaughtered on account of disease. As I understood the minister he was trying to lead the hon. member for North Grey to believe that compensation paid for hogs in years gone by had not been in excess of the limit he was placing in this Act. I could not but feel that he was trying to cover up some of his own wrongdoing in years gone by, for he evidently made a serious blunder in this case.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Armstrong) seems to have forgotten a very essential part of the transaction to which he refers. He ought to have remembered that this money was not paid under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, but was paid out of the exhibition vote for animals that had been sent for exhibition purposes. These animals were paid for at full value just as any other exhibits that may be lost or destroyed while in our charge are paid for.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Where does the minister get authority to take money set apart for exhibitions and pay it out in this manner?

Mr. FISHER. I have the authority, because the whole matter is in connection with an exhibition. These hogs were sent for exhibition, as we might send a reaper or a binder. If that reaper or binder were destroyed while in our charge, and with us responsible for the exhibit, we should be morally liable for the value. On different occasions we have paid for exhibits which we have been unable to return to the owners.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Then, there is no limit upon the amount of money the minister is privileged to pay under such circumstances. Why does not he place, even in this present Bill, a limit upon the amount that he may pay for animals that may have been sent out of Canada for exhibition, and that are found, while outside the country, to be diseased ?

Mr. FISHER. The payment for these animals has nothing to do with the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. They were dealt with as any other exhibit would have been dealt with.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister would lead the committee to believe that the government were exhibiting these animals, whereas the owners of the animals were sending the exhibit as a commercial enterprise.

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. BLAIN. I would direct the attention of the minister to the discussion of last year. It was shown that when the matter was brought to the minister's attention, he wrote a letter over his own signature stating that he did not see how compensation could be allowed. But when political influence was brought to bear, he had to turn about and pay the enormous prices mentioned. I rather think the amendments to the law that are now before us are made because this matter was discussed in this House last session.

Mr. FISHER. It has nothing to do with it, in any way, shape or form. The hon. member (Mr. Blain) may not know it. though I think he does—that Mr. Brethour, who was paid this amount, is a well known conservative. No political influence was brought to bear on myself, or, so far as I know on any hon. member on this side of the House.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. minister (Mr. Fisher) is now introducing politics into it—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BLAIN. Yes; this is an old story with the government—to get some liberal-conservative to unite their influence with that of the administration. I did not raise the point whether these gentlemen were liberals or conservative. I pointed out last year that the minister had paid for hogs $150 a piece in one case, $160 in another case, $65 in another case and $180 in another case, these hogs having been slaughtered because they were diseased. The correspondence in the case clearly showed that the government were not clear as to whether the hogs contracted the disease in quarantine or at the exhibition. The question whether the owners were liberal or conservative is not a matter in which the House is particularly interested.

Mr. FISHER. I am glad the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) disclaims any political element in this question. I understood him to say that in the first place, I declined to pay the money, but that when political pull was exercised——

Mr. BLAIN. I did.

Mr. FISHER. I simply answer that the gentleman to whom the money was paid is a conservative, and, so far as I know, never supported this government or the party that supports this government.

Mr. SPROULE. He may have got some good Liberal to intercede for him. I understood the minister to say a short time ago that animals coming from Kentucky would not be quarantined at the border, though they might come through a state in which contagious diseases existed. But I understood him to say previously that this would really ensure them being quarantined.

Mr. FISHER. I told my hon. friend that I thought there had been a relaxation in the case of horses. Speaking from memory, I think the Director General of the Veterinary Department told me that in regard to horses the disposition had been relaxed, and that they might come from any state now.

Mr. PORTER. As I understand the original Act, the provisions in regard to compensation are the same for horses and for cattle, and that it is a matter of discretion whether compensation should be paid or not. I would like to ask the minister whether, in case of horses killed for glanders, he knows of any case where compensation has been refused?

Mr. FISHER. I do not.

Mr. PORTER. I am told that it is the invariable practice of the department to grant compensation in cases of that kind.

Mr. FISHER. It has been for some years back, but it was not so years ago.

Mr. PORTER. Where cattle are slaughtered for tuberculosis, are there not many cases where compensation has been refused?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. PORTER. Then I would like to ask the reason for the discrimination. Why pay the owner of a horse which is slaughtered for disease and refuse to pay the owner of another animal which is slaughtered for another disease? If the principal is right in the one case, it appears to me it should be right in the other.

Mr. FISHER. At first sight my hon. friend would appear to be right. But we have to deal with these diseases in a practical way. In certain classes of contagious diseases, such as glanders and hog cholera we think we are within measurable reach of stamping them out. With that object in view we wish to slaughter, not only animals which are diseased and immediately dangerous, but animals which are sure to incur infection, and thus prevent them from spreading the disease. In regard to glanders we are in a position to do that. A few years ago we determined to try and stamp it out, and I am glad to say that we are progressing reasonably towards that end. I do not mean to say that we are likely ever to be able to stamp out glanders absolutely, and that there may not be occasionally a few sporadic cases in Canada. I think we can do with regard to glanders what we have practically done in regard to hog cholera. The situation is different with regard to cattle suffering from tuberculosis. Tuberculosis is a disease not easily recognizable. While we have a sure test of the existence of the disease in an animal, it does not prove to be a sure test to show whether the disease is communicable to other animals. As a matter of diagnosis, it is practically impossible for a veterinary to say whether, when he finds by the test tuberculosis in an animal, the disease has so far progressed a to become communicable and dangerous. I have no hesitation in saying that there are a large number of cattle which have responded to the tuberculine test and have been shown to be infected by the disease, but which were not in the slightest degree dangerous, either to other animals or to the human species. There is no test by which we can tell which animals are dangerous and which are not. But so far as the glanders are concerned, the veterinary experts inform me that in case of any animal that responds to the mallein test, the disease is sure to be present and within a short time, to be dangerous both to other animals and to men. Under these circumstances we feel it is our duty to try to stamp out the disease of glanders, and for that purpose to pay compensation, where necessary, for animals slaughtered in the interest of the public at large. The disease of tuberculosis has not reached that stage, according to the expert testimony of veterinaries and physicians. Under these circumstances I never felt myself able to undertake towards bovine tuberculosis the same action that we have taken in regard to hog cholera, where we have succeeded so well. In regard to glanders we have made long steps towards stamping it out, and I hope that within a couple of years it will have practically disappeared. I appreciate the difficulty of making people understand the difference. I would be glad if we could devise a system under which we could hope, even by expending a considerable sum of money, to stamp out bovine tuberculosis, but we have not yet been able to evolve any such system.

Mr. PORTER. In view of this explanation I suggest to the minister whether it would not be practicable or advisable, in case of certain diseases, to remove the provision of the former Act and to make payment compulsory, leaving a discretionary power, as at present, in case of other diseases. For instance, in case of a disease where the object is to stamp it out, and where a certain amount of success has attended the effort, as in the case of glanders, to make payment compulsory, while in other diseases where the same progress has not been made in stamping them out to leave them to be dealt with in the discretion of the department.

Mr. FISHER. Practically that is what we have done, only we have made the payment in the case of glanders and hog cholera compulsory by regulation and not by statute. The system is made uniform under the regulations which were passed according to the provisions of this statute.

Mr. PORTER. My reasons for suggesting that is this: It has been suggested to me by farmers that if they knew for a certainty that they were going to get a certain amount of compensation for animals slaughtered it would be an object for them to discover disease and have an animal destroyed, whereas, under the present regulation, it being a matter of discretion with the department whether they shall be paid or not, they hide it and keep it from being discovered. It seems to me that it would assist in stamping out the disease if the payment were made compulsory, so that they would know that they would get compensation for slaughtered animals.

Mr. FISHER. As a matter of fact, they do know. It is thoroughly advertised that, in cases of glanders and hog cholera, they do get compensation, and it is also thoroughly understood that in cases of tuberculosis they do not.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know whether I understood the minister correctly or not, but if I did his statement was to the effect that the reason tuberculosis is not included amongst the contagious and infectious diseases with respect to which farmers get paid if they have to slaughter animals that are affected, was because a veterinary surgeon could not determine at any stage whether there was serious danger of the animal affecting others.

Mr. FISHER. Hardly at any stage of the disease.

Mr. SPROULE. I hardly think that a veterinary surgeon would agree with the minister in the statement that they are unable to tell, when certain stages are reached whether an animal is dangerous to the surrounding herd. Take, for instance, an animal where emaciation is going on rapidly; accompanied with a cough; I do not suppose that the minister contends that a veterinary surgeon would not say that the animal was dangerous to others around it. If there is some stage at which the veterinary does know as a matter of professional knowledge that ought to be a strong reason why animals so affected should be included in the list, and I do not think that a veterinary would agree with the minister's contention that they are not included in the list because the veterinary cannot tell when they have become dangerous.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend is quite right. If I said that—I will not deny it positively, but I do not think I did—I did not in any way desire to convey the impression that there was not some stage of the disease when the veterinary could not diagnose it as dangerous. You could very well have a number of animals affected with tuberculosis in such an advanced stage that an ordinary diagnosis would be sufficient to determine the disease, and I have been considering and discussing with my veterinary authorities the advisability of treating such cases of tuberculosis in the same way as we do glanders or hog cholera. While I confess that I do think it might reduce the danger I can hardly hope by that means or any other means that have yet been devised or thought out to stamp out the disease in the same way that I think we will be able to stamp out hog cholera and glanders.

Mr. SPROULE. It might not be possible to stamp it out, but the danger from it might be minimized very much.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Do I understand the policy of my hon. friend's department to be of this character that if an individual has in his possession an animal which is necessarily dangerous both to other animals and to man, that animal is destroyed or may be destroyed and compensation results as a matter of course, but that if an individual has in his possession an animal which is not necessarily dangerous either to other animals or to man, which animal may be destroyed, the compensation is altogether discretionary?

Mr. FISHER. No, we take it as a matter of course that if we order destruction we will pay compensation.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Always?

Mr. FISHER. Always, whenever we order it, but we do not pay compensation if an individual kills the animal himself and comes afterwards to us and asks for compensation.

Mr. LENNOX. That is a phase of the matter that I want to mention to the minister. As I understand by the Act and from what the minister has just said, the only cases, no matter what the disease may be, in which he pays compensation, are those cases in which the destruction of the animal is ordered by the minister. Of course, I can understand that there may be good reasons for it, but I have had actual cases come to my knowledge, several of them, some of which I have communicated to the department, in which there seems to be a good deal of hardship arising out of the fact that the animal was necessarily destroyed, but not destroyed through the agency of the government. The people in the country do not know the law, but they do know that certain diseases are exceptionally dangerous. They know, for instance, that hog cholera and glanders are two diseases that are exceptionally dangerous, and that they require almost immediate attention. They call in an experienced and qualified veterinary and he directs—very often they think that they have a lawful right to so direct—that the animal should be slaughtered. I do submit to the minister that in a case of that kind, where it can be established beyond a doubt, that the matter was done in perfect good faith then in all honesty the government should pay. What does the minister think of that? I would say to the minister that if he likes he can separate the classes of cases. He can say that in these exceptionally dangerous cases immediate action should be taken and that in the less dangerous cases the present procedure should apply. But, I do submit to the minister it is a hardship, when a qualified practitioner comes in and orders the destruction of an animal, that, because, forsooth, the remedy was taken at the earliest possible stage, the owner of the animal should not have compensation, whereas, if he had allowed the animal to linger and communicate the disease to probably many others of the herd, and spread it throughout the neighbourhood, there should be compensation. Why should not a certificate by a duly qualified veterinary, whether there has been any action by the department or not, entitle to compensation when he has acted of necessity in order to prevent the spread of the disease? I have had several cases of that kind, three or four that I can recall at the present time. I have brought them to the attention of the minister, and I have one before him now. I have not lost faith that we will be able to succeed in this case. I think the law might be very much improved in that regard.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend, I am afraid, is an advocate, and perhaps he is interested because of having these particular cases, but I will recall to his memory the fact that when we raised the proportion of the value of the animal to be paid in compensation some years ago we threshed that question out here, and I myself was fully convinced of the danger. I had my attention very strongly drawn to the danger of exaggerated compensation. I remember my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) pointing out and urging upon me the danger of collusion between practitioners and the owners of animals. It was suggested that the fact that the owners were the clients of the practitioners would dispose the latter to perhaps slaughter a little bit hurriedly and value a little high. In the interests of the public treasury we have to guard against anything of that kind. While these diseases are dangerous, there is no great difficulty, if any, in a farmer isolating a case on his farm for a day or two until the government veterinary arrives. The law provides that any practitioner must notify the department at once when he finds in his ordinary practice a case of contagious disease, and we immediately order one of our permanent officers to go there and investigate. I venture to say there is hardly any part of Canada which one of the government veterinaries of wide experience, would not reach within a day of our receiving notice of the existence of the disease. There is a good deal in having experience in handling some of these diseases, because we find that a good many local practitioners who are quite good veterinarians have never seen a case of glanders. I hope the district of my hon. friend is not so affected——

Mr. LENNOX. It is the finest county in the province.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. FISHER. I venture to say that in the province of Ontario pretty nearly one-half the ordinary veterinary practitioners have never seen a case of glanders, and I say that with pride, and it is a source of great satisfaction to us. In the maritime provinces I do not believe there are half a dozen veterinary practitioners who ever saw a case of glanders. In some parts of the province of Quebec glanders was prevalent a few years ago and we had to spend a considerable amount of money and use a great deal of diligence to stamp it out; but we have succeeded and to-day there is not one case where there were ten a few years ago. I think in a short time we will be able to say that glanders is practically stamped out from the entire province of Ontario. I believe it would not be in the interest of the public treasury to depart from the rule, that where we pay compensation it shall only be done on the order of an officer of the department.

Mr. PORTER. When cattle are sent in from the country to the abbatoir at Toronto and slaughtered, and then found to be affected with tuberculosis, both the buyer and the seller of these cattle are absolutely in ignorance of the existence of the disease until the animal is killed. The flesh of that animal is then condemned by the officer of the department under the Inspection of Foods Act, and as I understand no compensation is paid. Why should not compensation be paid for an animal condemned by an officer of the department after it was killed, as well as for an animal condemned by an officer of the department before it was killed? If compensation is paid in the one case why should it not be paid in the other? It is worthy of consideration as to whether compensation should not in such a case be paid to the person who suffers the loss.

Mr. FISHER. The condemnation of an animal at the abbatoir as unfit for human food is entirely different from the condemnation of the live animal which is affected with a contagious disease. The principle of compensation under this Act is to prevent the spread of contagious disease among our live animals, while the condemnation of the carcass at the abbatoir is for the protection of the public health. The dead animal does not convey the disease to any other animal.

Mr. PORTER. It conveys the disease to man if its flesh is consumed.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, but that has nothing to do with the contagious disease spreading to other animals which the Act now under consideration is intended to prevent. When we order the slaughter of a live animal, we consider that the owner has suffered for the benefit of the owners of other herds and that in the public interest he ought to be compensated. As the animal is diseased and consequently not at its full value we only pay two-thirds of the value. The question raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Porter) is an interesting one, and I dare say it will come up for discussion on the estimates for enforcing the Canned Foods Act.

Mr. PORTER. While it is very important to prevent the spread of contagious diseases amongst animals, it is very much more important to prevent the communication of that disease to human beings, and in that light it seems to me that compensation should be granted in the case I have mentioned.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I wish to call attention to a provision of this Act which bears harshly on the farmers and horsemen of British Columbia, and which has been the cause of no little hardship in my own riding. I refer to the provision by which the government is nominally entitled to pay compensation to the extent of two-thirds of the value of an animal slaughtered. The value of the animal is limited to $150 in the case of horses other than thoroughbred. A couple of years ago we had reports of the prevalence of glanders in British Columbia, in consequence of which government officials were sent into the various sections of the province with authority to apply the mallein test and to slaughter any horses which reacted to that test. In British Columbia a horse of the value of $150 is a very ordinary animal indeed; that amount does not represent one-half the value of the average working horse in that province. It certainly did not represent the value of a large proportion of the horses which were condemned under the mallein test and slaughtered, and for which their owners were only offered $100 in compensation. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to consider whether, in fairness to us in British Columbia who have to pay so much more for our horses and our cattle than the farmers in eastern Canada have to pay, there should not be a provision in this Act stating specifically that this compensation should bear some relation to the real value of the animal, and if we should be so unfortunate as to again come under suspicion as we did a couple of years ago, that our farmers should not be so heavily mulcted as they were then. I know of case after case in which horses valued at between $300 and $400 were slaughtered, not because they had the glanders, but because there was a suspicion that they might develop glanders. They were slaughtered on suspicion only, and yet their owners received only $100 of compensation. The minister shakes his head, but I am speaking, not from hearsay, but of my personal knowledge of events that occurred in the city of New Westminster. The thing became such a scandal, the subject of such an outcry, that a meeting of horse owners was held, and a delegation was sent to the Minister of Inland Revenue, when he was on a visit to Victoria, with the result that the work of testing and inspecting horses was stopped, and from that day we heard nothing more about glanders in my riding. What I want to point out is that when dealing with British Columbia, in the matter of salaries, for instance, we make a difference as compared with other parts of the Dominion, and in most lines of business it is recognized that prices are higher in British Columbia than in other provinces. Therefore I contend that it is a hardship upon our people that this Act should continue as it is, particularly in the case of horses slaughtered, not because they have the disease, but because the mallein test seems to show a disposition on their part to contract it and that they might in time become dangerous to the community. The owners of these horses should receive fair compensation, instead of being put to the serious loss to which so many have been put by the application of that test.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend himself has shown that his statement of the case is not a fair one. I understand him to say that these horses did react to the mallein test. That being the case they had the disease, though it may not have been apparent in the animals' noses. The horses having once contracted the disease, the veterinarians tell us that it is liable to become bad at any time and without warning, so as to be communicable to other animals. In regard to the value of the horses and the payment of compensation, no doubt certain classes of horses in the west—in Saskatchewan and Alberta as well as in British Columbia—are a little higher in value than in Ontario or Quebec, although I do not think there is a very great difference. But it would be very difficult indeed to put in the Act a provision that in British Columbia the value should be allowed to go to say $100 higher than in Ontario, and that therefore the compensation should be somewhat higher. That would be a difficult thing to work out, and I am afraid that it would lead to demands in all parts of the country for discrimination. I would not like off-hand to agree with it, although I sympathize to a certain extent with my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to enter a protest against so light and airy a disposition as the minister has shown, in saying that I admitted that the horses had the disease because they reacted to the mallein test. I am not a veterinary surgeon, but I have sufficient acquaintance with the procedure in these cases to know that the department realizes that reaction to the mallein test is not a positive proof of glanders. So much is that the case that the department provides for no less than three tests at long periods apart. Though a horse may react to the test to-day, the veterinary surgeon does not say that it has glanders. He says: it may have glanders, and I will test it again. After a long time he applies the second test, and again says: I am not sure that the horse has glanders; I will test it the third time. All this is contingent on the owner of the horse paying the cost of quarantining it during the period it is under test, and also agreeing to absolve the department from all liability of payment of compensation if, on the last of this series of tests, the horse is found really to have glanders. If reaction to the mallein test were positive proof that a horse had glanders, the department would not make provision for a series of tests of this nature. I rise to make this explanation merely because I do not think it is a proper answer to ridicule my presentation of the case, and to say that I admitted that the horses had glanders. I said that a great majority of the horses were condemned on suspicion only. There are horses in British Columbia to-day which reacted to the mallein test, but their owners would not allow them to be shot, and these horses to-day show no suspicion of glanders.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that under certain circumstances the department has agreed to the position he states. The rule of the veterinarians is that reaction to the mallein test is conclusive evidence of the disease. My hon. friend says that some of these animals reacted once, and afterwards did not react, and were released. I think that possibly a few cases of that kind have occurred but very few indeed. We throw the onus on the owner because absolute quarantine is only granted as a rule where the owner has a very valuable horse and prefers to take the risk of not getting compensation rather than allow it to be slaughtered. He prefers to go to the expense of an absolute quarantine than have the animal slaughtered. All the veterinary authorities consider the mallein test as an absolute one, like the tuberculine or any other. That tuberculine test is practically absolute, yet cattle have been condemned and slaughtered, in which afterwards on examination no trace of tuberculosis was found. But the scientific world have taken the tuberculine test as being so absolutely sure that the number of cases in which it has not been accurate is almost infinitesimal. A similar experience may be found in connection with the mallein test, but that test is considered by the veterinary authorities as absolute.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I would ask the hon. minister if he will take steps to ascertain whether it is not really the case that horses in British Columbia are so much more valuable than the average elsewhere, that he should make some discrimination in their favour.

Mr. FISHER. I shall certainly look into the matter.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I notice, that under the law, the animal must be valuated by the minister or by a person appointed by him; and moreover, that the price to be paid must not exceed such figure, that is to say $150 for a grade horse and $300 for a thoroughbred.

It seems to me that the law could be made more simple, and thus prevent all the annoyances to which the minister is exposed. The way should be to pay an average and uniform price; two classes being made a certain price would be paid for a common horse, and so much for a thoroughbred, the price being fixed by the statute itself. There would then be no necessity of sending valuators on the ground and by that a saving of many costs, and the minister would not be exposed to the annoyance nor to the accusations of undue favour given to political friends, as has been insinuated a moment ago.

Nevertheless supposing that we would not be very particular as to the price to be fixed, it seems to me that there would not be much inconvenience, because a horse affected with the glanders or other contagious disease has no value, and the owner must expect to lose. The above remarks apply with greater force to other animals.

Hon. Mr. FISHER. It would be really more simple and easy for the minister to accept the suggestion of the honourable member ; but, unfortunately, I think this would give a sort of encouragement to owners of horses of no value; we would be paying too much for horses of no service and not enough for the good ones. We must encourage the betterment of the breed, and, I would rather pay a little more to obtain that end, even if it costs me more annoyance than to accept the way suggested by the hon. member, which would undoubtedly be more simple, but also far worse.

Mr. GUTHRIE. There is another class of cases, which comes within the meaning of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, for which no compensation is provided. I refer to cases in which the officials of the government do not order the slaughter of the animal but order it to be quarantined. Let me cite a serious instance which occurred in the county of Wellington last November. Cattle were purchased and sent forward for export, and at Black Rock or opposite on the Canadian side, they were stopped by the Dominion authorities on the suspicion that one of the animals had mange. The whole consignment of several carloads was stopped. They were returned via Toronto to Fergus in Wellington county at a cost of $297 freight. The shipper was Mr. John Black, one of the largest cattle exporters in Canada. When they were returned to him he had no premises in which to keep them. They were placed in quarantine, special barns had to be procured, where they were kept for some two weeks at a large expense for special attendance. It then turned out that the cattle did not have mange at all. The ox suspected was found quite free from any contagious disease whatever. During the interval permit was given the owner to slaughter his animals immediately, which meant he would have had to sell them to some Toronto packer and receive little or nothing, and they were a very fine class of export cattle. Ultimately he was given a clearance and allowed to sell his cattle or export them. His net loss on that transaction was between $1,800 and $2,000. True there was suspicion but there was no disease. Had the animals been slaughtered he could have received compensation; but I believe that under the circumstances he is not entitled by law to any. There should be some provision to meet cases of that kind. I can understand that very great care has to be exercised in inspecting cattle for export to Great Britain, but in cases where no disease actually exists the owner should be given compensation.

Mr. FISHER. The case cited by my hon. friend appears to be one of hardship, and it is unfortunate that the owner had to suffer this loss. The details will be looked into and I shall be glad to know exactly the facts.

Mr. BURRELL. In the crusade against glanders some two or three years ago, can the minister tell us whether that crusade ceased because the disease of glanders was wiped out or whether it was because of the indignation excited among the ranchers of British Columbia partly through the inefficiency of the test and partly because of the inadequate compensation? I quite agree with my hon. friend from New Westminister (Mr. Taylor) that the compensation is entirely inadequate in the case of horses slaughtered in British Columbia, owing to the greater value of these animals in that province as compared with other provinces. It is quite possible to suppose a case in which a horse could be five times the value of the compensation paid. And for that reason, the difference of value should be put on it. I imagine the intention is to place a fair value on the man's animals. In our portion of British Columbia, far removed from New Westminster, an ordinary team is worth about $600—certainly, you could not purchase them for less than $500. And to put a price of the sort outlined by the government and pay two-thirds of it would cause a rather indignant feeling on the part of the farmers, especially if he thinks the test is not infallible and that sometimes his animals are slaughtered on suspicion only. I know that the feeling through the Okanagan and down the Similkameen was very strong, and I think that it was the cause of the action of the department being changed in the way it was.

Mr. FISHER. I know that there was a good deal of excitement, but the department did not deliberately change what the hon. gentleman calls 'the crusade' in consequence of the protests made. We tried, as far as possible, to deal with the public in a conciliatory way, and to educate the public to an appreciation of an understanding of our motives and methods. Speaking from memory entirely, I urged upon my officers to proceed with greater caution, and to use—if I may say so—more conciliatory methods than they seemed to be exercising. As to change of policy, there is nothing of the kind; and that policy, I am glad to say, has practically brought about a cessation of the disease in British Columbia. I have no doubt that the condition to-day in regard to horses in British Columbia is enormously improved in consequence of what was done at that time. The difficulties in the way of making discrimination as to the value of animals in different parts of the country are very great, and I doubt very much if any such arrangement could be come to that would not work greatly to the detriment of the treasury, as well as bring about cases of injustice. I am willing to think about it, and see if anything of the kind can be worked out, but I confess that I cannot see any prospect of it.

Mr. MOLLOY. I, for one, would object to an increase in the compensation for glandered horses. The reason is that a glandered horse is not worth a single dollar. I have had some experience as an inspector and I would certainly object to any increase in compensation for a horse proven by the post-mortem to have been diseased. A glandered horse is not only valueless, but he is a source of danger and may cost the country an immense sum of money. I remember one band of bronchos brought into the county in which I live, and the result of their coming was that disease was spread over the whole county. Therefore, I object to pay over $100 for that which is not worth a ten cent piece, and is a source of danger to the country. Is it not a fact that the Canadian government is paying larger compensation for animals that are slaughtered in this way than any other country in the world? And why should horses be worth more in British Columbia than in Manitoba? The city of Winnipeg boasts, and justly, that it has the finest horses of any city in Canada. Why people in British Columbia should expect more for their glandered horses than people in other provinces, I cannot understand. Besides, such a thing would cause a great deal of dissatisfaction. This is the first time I have learned that the department is paying for horses that are destroyed on suspicion. Horses are not destroyed on suspicion. The very fact that the government allows the owner of the horse to reserve the animal to be subjected to the mallein test for the third time, I think, is a wise provision. I have tested horses for the third time and have found that they reacted, but the second and third time the reaction is not so marked as the first time. Besides, a horse whose entire system is permeated with disease might not react at all. That is one case where you have to go by the clinical symptoms. So far as increase in the compensation is concerned, I certainly object to any.

Mr. BURRELL. I would point out that section 3 of this Act says:

Section 32 of the said Act is amended by adding after the word 'disease' in the seventh line, the following words,—'or of the suspicion of such disease.'

If the hon. member for Provencher (Mr Molloy) is going to be logical, he should move an amendment providing that no compensation be paid, for he is evidently under the impression that the government are wasting the people's money by giving compensation. But I feel sure he is astray on the facts, for, so far as British Columbia is concerned, there is at least a very strong feeling that animals have been slaughtered on suspicion, without knowledge.

Mr. MOLLOY. I do not feel at all bound to move that compensation be done away with. I am proud that the Canadian people pay so large compensation as they do. But I honestly think that $100 for a horse that is not worth a dollar is enough. True, the owner suffers the misfortune of the loss of the horse, or even the loss of a part of his herd. A man not having enough horses to do his work may purchase a horse not knowing that he is introducing disease into his herd. I do not think the innocent buyer should suffer. But when the country helps to bear the loss to the extent it does, I do not think there is any reason for increasing the compensation.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer). It is astonishing how, in this world, circumstances alter cases and change the view we take of questions. I happen to be, not a veterinary surgeon, but a representative of western farmers. And I happen to have had a couple of horses destroyed by glanders. I found the compensation extremely useful as assisting me in contending with the conditions of a new country and the difficulties of the pioneer work in which I am engaged. From this point of view, I should be prepared to differ slightly from my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Molloy). The western farmer must face circumstances of very great difficulty. He tackles a life which is entirely new to him; and when he has the misfortune to get a pair of glandered horses, I can assure you from personal experience the compensation comes in very handy. From the point of view of the country, it is not always a loss to pay that compensation, for there are homesteaders in the west who if they had not that compensation in such a difficulty would be left for a considerable time without horses altogether, and the wealth that they would otherwise earn, not only for themselves, but for Canada, would be unearned. I think that, from that point of view, even a broad and sympathetic view of the case of the settler would commend itself to my friend from Provencher if he tried for a moment to forget that he is a veterinary surgeon and place himself in the position of the farmer. But from the public point of view, there is another argument to be urged. The man who knows that he is going to have the only horse which he has destroyed, with all the difficulties of his life to face, having to provide for his wife and family and needing something to tide him over the struggles that lie before him in the early years of his life as a settler, will be apt to hide for a long time the fact that his horses have the glanders. I think it is a wise policy to give every encouragement to the settler—up to a reasonable point, which, I think, is two-thirds of the value of the animal—to divulge at the earliest moment the fact that he has a glandered horse, and thus afford protection to the owners of animals with which the others might come in contact. On these grounds, both of sympathetic regard for the earlier settler in his struggles and of the public good, so far as that is concerned, I offer my hearty support to the attitude of the department and a modest demurrer to the view taken by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy).

Bill reported.

Mr. FISHER moved the third reading of said Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the Bill is read a third time, for the benefit of those who have asked the question, can the minister state briefly what are the quarantine regulations against stock going from Canada to the United States at the present time—as briefly as he likes.

Mr. FISHER. I would hardly like to give an answer off-hand to so important a question, for it involves, not only the regulations against one kind of stock, but against all kinds of stock, and those regulations vary in regard to different kinds of stock. If I were to attempt to give a brief explanation, I might leave something out.

Mr. SPROULE. Could not the minister instruct some one in his department to get the information and make it public—because the question is often asked us, and we cannot tell.

Mr. FISHER. I will do so.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT—AMENDMENT.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of the Bill (No. 20) to amend the Government Railways Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is it?

Mr. GRAHAM. Last year, it will be remembered, the Government Railways Act was amended to change the conditions under which those suffering loss by having animals killed, could recover compensation. An error was made in not putting in the exceptions that are in the general Railway Act. I am advised by the Justice Department that the way to obviate the difficulty is practically to repeal what we did last year and introduce the exact terms of the ordinary Railway Act, and make it apply to government railways. It repeals what we did last year, and introduces a clause found in subsection 4, chap. 37, of the Railway Act, section 294.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not quite understand how that will work out. It is intended that there should be a fiat granted, as in the ordinary procedure in the Exchequer Court? If not, how is it proposed that the Crown should be served?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is expected that the department, in all these cases, will allow the privilege of going to the Exchequer Court, where we settle a great many cases. There has been a good deal of discussion, not so much over the court process of recovering, but over the fact that our conditions were not the same. The people suffering losses under the old Government Railway Act had to prove more than we propose to require of them under this new Act. This is in identical terms with the ordinary Railway Act, except that we put 'His Majesty' where the word 'company' occurs.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not criticising the object of the Act. It seems to me that the Crown when it engages in the business of transportation ought to be subject to the same liability for the negligence of its officers as any private corporation. But I wished to know how it is to be worked out, because this measure provides that compensation can be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction. Now, as far as the Exchequer Court is concerned, we know that recovery can be had against the Crown there. There are rules of the court, and statutory provisions as well, providing that a petition should be presented. The Crown is not usually sued by its own writ; it is sued by a subject, by means of a petition, and a fiat on that petition. Then there is a procedure for service of a petition by depositing it in a certain department of the government. When you introduce a rough and ready provision like this, adapted, not to proceedings against the Crown but to proceedings by one subject against another, I was desirous of ascertaining in what way it will work out, according to the view of the government. I do not precisely understand that at the present time.

Mr. GRAHAM. Last year it was thoroughly threshed out and section 29 was inserted amending the Government Railway Act by providing practically what we are providing here.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am afraid my hon. friend does not understand me.

Mr. GRAHAM. There has been no objection taken to the granting of a fiat in every instance in which it has been asked for.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not criticising the object of the Act; I am endeavouring to see whether or not it would be effective in its present form. If I am satisfied it will be effective in its present form I have no word to say, but I am not satisfied of that at the present time nor can I say that the assurance of my hon. friend absolutely removes my difficulty. It would be contrary to all precedent that the Crown should issue a writ against itself; therefore, you must proceed by petition, I presume, and yet this statute does not seem to make any provision for such a procedure. It says that the subject may recover in any court of competent jurisdiction. I am not aware that in any court other than the Exchequer court there is procedure at the present time, nor do I know there is authority in the judges of the respective courts to authorize any procedure for the purposes of a section like this. I may be entirely wrong in this, but at all events I would like to have some information on the subject.

Mr. GRAHAM. Perhaps I misunderstood my hon. friend and did not catch the technical idea. This Bill does not provide in any way for the extension of jurisdiction to any court outside of the Exchequer court.

Mr. LENNOX. Then, it is badly worded.

Mr. GRAHAM. Any court of competent jurisdiction means the Exchequer court in this case.

Mr. EMMERSON. Where the Crown is a party that is the only court having jurisdiction.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is the only court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then I misunderstood the section. I thought it was the intention of the section to permit these proceedings to be had in the ordinary courts of the land and not confine them to the Exchequer court. Then may I ask why the draughtsman did not simply say: The Exchequer court? It would have removed a great deal of misapprehension on my part to have done that. If the expression 'in any court of competent jurisdiction' means, as the minister assures me it was intended to mean, the Exchequer court and the Exchequer court alone, it would seem to me to be a very much simpler mode of draughting simply to use that expression, and if it is intended to confine the remedy to the Exchequer court I would respectfully suggest that it would be better to say so.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is no objection to saying that. We have just followed the language of the Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think the difficulty has arisen from the fact that language applicable to suit between subject and subject has been applied to an entirely different thing, namely, to a petition by a subject against the Crown for compensation.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would move that where we have the words 'in any court of competent jurisdiction' we say in the Exchequer court.'

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If it can be fairly worked out it would be very much better to give jurisdiction to the courts throughout the country rather than to confine it to the Exchequer court. However, that is a very large question and I would not be prepared to urge it upon the minister at this stage.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is a question that I have been considering a good deal and possibly I may have something to say with regard to it before the session is over. In this Bill I am simply trying to remedy a mistake that we made last session.

Mr. PARDEE. Suppose jurisdiction were afterwards extended to the other courts would it not be well to leave the language as it stands in the Bill at the present time? It would save an amendment to this Act. By this Bill petitioners can only come to the Exchequer court and this would not have the effect of extending jurisdiction to other courts.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am inclined to think that actions will be attempted in other courts under the language as it is at the present time, and they will probably fail. However, if the minister proposes to extend to other courts the jurisdiction to entertain proceedings against the Crown for compensation of this kind or otherwise I would not have any special objection to allowing the language to remain as it is at present for that purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would not like to commit myself at the present time. Possibly we had better leave this at it is and if such a change should be made later on it would not require an amendment here, as this would meet the case. This question is a large one; it means giving up a prerogative of the Crown which prevents any subject from suing the Crown except permission is granted to him. Therefore, to say that a person could sue the Crown in any court of law would be to reverse the position which the Crown has always taken. I think it would be wise to leave this wording as it is at the present time as there is no other court that would have any jurisdiction except the Exchequer court.

Mr. LENNOX. If the matter is going to be considered and if this is going to have any general beneficial operation it would be necessary to give the parties the right to sue in local courts. It is not a suit for a large amount as a rule. It is an action for compensation for the loss of a few animals and unless the person injured can be given the right to sue in the local courts it is of very little advantage. If he has to come to the Exchequer court and prosecute his action he will not get much benefit. It may be that in that way the Crown frequently escapes but if the scope of the Act is extended in such a way as to apply to the courts generally, as it appears by the wording here, it will give the injured person a better opportunity to prosecute his claim. I might also call the minister's attention to the expression 'in any action' after the words 'His Majesty'. That does not seem to read very well. I think it is intended to be 'by action in any court.' I would like the minister to consider whether it can be worked out so as to extend the right of action to local courts. I do not know whether it can be but it would be beneficial to parties having claims against the Crown.

Mr. GRAHAM. The wording is from the Railway Act, chapter 37. We have followed it exactly.

Mr. LENNOX. It is bad wording.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friends should have got it right when they were putting it through. I was not here. This is what we get for following a bad example. It is nothing new that we are introducing here to-night; this is to remedy something that was passed last session and we are endeavouring to get this tribunal a little closer to the people. The Exchequer court is a perambulating court and goes to the people instead of the people coming to it. If we should extend jurisdiction to the courts generally we would relinquish a prerogative that the Crown has retained from time immemorial. Whether that ought to be done or not is a question that requires consideration. There is quite a demand for it, I will admit, and we are considering it, but at the same time that is not proposed here and I would like to amend this Act so as to make it workable.

Mr. HAGGART. The principal element of an amendment of this kind is to do away with the necessity of getting a fiat for an action.

Mr. GRAHAM. Unless the Intercolonial Railway runs through the hon. gentleman's constituency this clause does not apply. I am trying to bring the government railway under the General Railway Act in this respect.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Would not the same law apply to the railways in Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM. That which I am introducing now has been in the Railway Act for years, and I am simply applying it to the government railway.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I understand it has been held in the courts that if a railway runs through a man's farm and his cattle are killed the railway company is responsible, but if the cattle of a farmer through whose land the railway does not run are killed on the track the company is not responsible.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not amending the Railway Act at all; I am merely applying this provision to the Intercolonial Railway. Speaking from memory, I think it has been held that if a man's cattle get from his own farm to a place where they have no right to be and are killed, negligence may possibly be shown and he has not the same claim for damages as would the man whose cattle are killed having strayed directly from his farm to the railway.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I do not think that is right.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is the general law and we are not amending it in any way.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SALISBURY & HARVEY RAILROAD—PROTECTION OF LEVEL CROSSINGS.

Mr. CONMEE—for Mr. Emmerson—moved second reading of Bill (No. 35), to incorporate the Salisbury & Harvey Railroad Company.

Mr. H. LENNOX (South Simcoe). I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to this Bill, and to ask him to have it stand. We are face to face now with the very big question of the protection of level crossings. I believe the minister appreciates the importance of that question as much as anybody, and he has told us that he is investigating it; and I hope that we shall have at an early day a declaration of policy from him in reference to the whole question of railway crossings in Canada so far as they are governed by Dominion law. All legislatures which have had to deal with this matter, except in Great Britain, where they began right, have had to some extent to separate the different methods of dealing with it, according as the railway was an existing railway or a new enterprise. A more rigid rule has been applied to the new enterprises than to existing railways, and in Canada we shall probably have to be guided somewhat by the same principle. I think it would be unwise to go on incorporating railways at this session of parliament without having first laid down our policy upon this level crossing question. I appreciate that the matter as I present it is not without difficulty. We do not want to hold up these Bills; but at the same time, in view of the fact that the minister will very soon be able to declare to parliament, in a general way at all events, what he proposes in regard to level crossings, this Bill and other Bills of similar character ought to be allowed to stand. There is an alternative way of dealing with these Bills; that is, for the minister to state to the House that in allowing them to go to the Railway Committee, he will see to it that they are made subject to such legislation in reference to railway crossings as shall be enacted by parliament, which will probably get over the difficulty. But I feel it to be my duty as one member of the House to endeavour to prevent the incorporation of any new railways this session —or extensions, probably, as has been suggested to me—without some provision being made, having for its aim the elimination of grade crossings as far as possible, and, where that cannot be done, the affording of a reasonably adequate protection to the public using the highways. If the minister will say that he will see that proper amendments are made when the Bill goes to the Railway Committee, I would not be disposed to protest further; but I certainly urge on the minister not to allow it to go baldly before the committee until we have something more definite in regard to this question of railway crossings.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). I see that my hon. friend appreciates the difficulty. I am not now going to discuss the danger of level crossings, nor the remedy that we may apply to remove the dangers as far as possible. We will discuss that a little later on.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister appreciates that I do not expect him to do so.

Mr. GRAHAM. I appreciate the situation as much as anybody can, because it is brought to my notice perhaps more thoroughly than to that of any other member of the House. I have a strong personal opinion on the way this question ought to be dealt with, but I do not feel at liberty to express it now, as I have not discussed it at any length with my colleagues. I may say this, however, without announcing a policy, that I believe that railways which have already been constructed with our consent and approval, without any restrictions in their charters, are in a different position from those to which we hereafter may give charters; and whatever plan we are able to work out for the protection of the public will be made applicable to whatever charter is put through this session. I hope we shall be able to devise something that will meet with the approval of the entire House, and whatever conclusion we do arrive at will be made applicable to all the new charters.

Mr. SPROULE. This question has attained so much importance of late that it cannot be delayed very much longer. I agree with every word uttered by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), and I am glad that the Minister of Railways expresses himself along the line we hoped he would. I have always felt that there was something in the vested rights of railways which were chartered before any provision in regard to the protection of crossings was made, and that they should be dealt with differently from railways that may be chartered in the future. But we cannot commence too soon to deal with the question, and whatever legislation is enacted for that purpose should apply to every charter which passes this parliament hereafter.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). I agree a good deal with what the hon. gentlemen have just said, but I cannot for one moment concur in the idea that the Railway Act, the general law of this country in regard to railways, is not to apply to all railways. The spirit of the Act is that it applies to all railways to-day, and anything that may be passed by this House as a portion of the general Act should apply to railways already in existence as well as to new railways. That is the key-note of the Act, and I cannot agree with the idea that we are to have two laws on this subject, one for the new roads and one for the old roads. But, certainly, the question must be settled this session, and on a broad, progressive basis.

Mr. GRAHAM. It would not be exactly two laws. But there are two different conditions which we must recognize. The main idea is that we should try to attain the same objects in reference to both roads, but the machinery for the two may be a little different on account of the different conditions.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SOUTHERN CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WILBERT McINTYRE (Strathcona) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 36) respecting the Southern Central Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. J. D. REID. Where does this railway run?

Mr. WILBERT McINTYRE. This Bill simply provides for an extension of charter. The road originates in southern British Columbia and runs through the southern portion of Alberta and for a considerable distance north in that province.

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not want to object to this Bill, but the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) will see that this company was incorporated in 1903—six years ago—and I would like to know whether any work has been done on this railway?

Mr. WILBERT McINTYRE. Preliminary surveys have been carried on in the usual way. The Bill will be in committee, and at that time, I presume, the solicitor of the company will be ready to give full information.

Mr. BLAIN. I think the answer of the Minister of Railways and Canals to my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) was a very fair one, and a very frank one. I did not quite understand that he intended it to apply to extensions of charter or revivals of charter as well as to new legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would not like my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) to take advantage of the statement I make now, for I express my own opinion and on the spur of the moment. I believe that where a road is not constructed, the part not constructed ought to come under any legislation we pass, the same as a new line.

Mr. HUGHES. How can you bring in part without the whole? That would be one-sided legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM. That condition will probably not arise.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

WESTERN CANADIAN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. WILBERT McINTYRE (Strathcona) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 37) to incorporate the Western Canadian Life Assurance Company.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I understand that it is the intention of the government this session to bring down an Insurance Bill containing very drastic provisions, and involving, I understand, a great many amendments in the insurance law. It may be that the provisions of that general Bill will conflict, to a certain extent, with the provisions of this. That being the case, I would suggest that this Bill be allowed to stand until the government have declared their policy on the general Insurance Act as promised in the speech from the Throne, and I ask the minister in charge of these matters to allow the Bill to stand, or give us the same assurance as was given to the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) with reference to the Railway Bills. I would also suggest that the name proposed for this company is, perhaps, an encroachment, to a certain extent, on the rights of the Canada Life Assurance Company. The name very much resembles the name of that company, the principal difference being the prefixing of the name 'Western.' It seems to me that the Bill might be objectionable to that company.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not, perhaps, an authority on this particular Bill. My hon. friend (Mr. Knowles) who introduced the Bill seems to be absent. There can be no doubt in the world that whatsoever general legislation is brought in affecting insurance will be applicable to this company. No doubt the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who is in charge of the Bill, will see to it that this legislation is kept in harmony with the general Bill.

Mr. HUGHES. There is no hurry; the matter cannot be decided until the Minister of Finance returns.

Mr. GRAHAM. We might let this go to committee, and they will probably detain it there. In fact, I would advise them to do so.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. How are we to know whether this is in harmony with the general Bill before that Bill is submitted to us?

Mr. GRAHAM. This much is sure—the Minister of Finance will probably give the assurance when he comes—that if there is anything in this Bill out of harmony with the general Bill, the general Bill will govern.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 33) respecting the Niagara-Welland Power Company.—Mr. Guthrie.

Bill (No. 38) respecting he Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company.—Mr. Dubeau.

THE GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT.

House again went into committee on Bill (No. 20) to amend the Government Railways Act.—Mr. Graham.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO.

On section 1.—Gates not closed.

Mr. J. D. REID. This requires some consideration. According to it, a man might shut the gate on his farm all right and then some one, passing over the line, might open it and leave it open and the cattle might get out and be killed. The owner of the animals would not be in fault, yet according to this he would not be able to recover any loss.

Mr. GRAHAM. The burden of proof is on His Majesty. All these clauses are in the Railway Act and have been there for years and we are simply making them applicable to the Intercolonial Railway.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY NEW STOCK.

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs) moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Before we go into committee of Supply, Mr. Speaker, I would like to get on record the order in council which was brought down yesterday regarding the Canadian Pacific Railway increase of capitalization. The order in council is as follows:

On a report dated August 13, 1908, from the right honourable the president of the council submitting that the C.P.R., in a letter from Sir Thos. Shaughnessy, dated August 10. 1908, has applied for the approval of the Governor General in Council of a proposed increase in the capital stock of the company under the provisions of the Act 55-56 Vic., chap. 35, and has submitted a certified copy of the resolution passed by the directors that such increase is in the interests of the company, and that the president of the company be authorized to make application for the approval by the Governor General in Council of such increase.

The minister further submits that the ordinary authorized capital stock of the company stands at present at the sum of $150,000,000, divided into 1,500,000 shares of the par or face value of $100 each. The company represent that looking to the business activities and general development that are likely to follow a bountiful harvest, it is of the utmost importance that they should be in a position to secure from time to time the funds necessary for continuing the works of improvement and for providing the additional equipment and facilities that are sure to be required in order to keep pace with the progress of the country and the consequent expansion of traffic, and they ask for approval of an increase of $50,000,000 in the authorized capital, making the authorized issue $200,000,000.

The minister recommends that the application of the company be granted, and that the issue of further stock of the company be approved to the extent of $50,000,000 in shares of $100 each, making a total of ordinary capital of $200,000,000, provided that none of such new stock be issued at less than par, and that the issue be authorized by resolution of the shareholders of the company as provided by section 3 of the said Act 55-56 Victoria, chap. 35, and further that no part of such capital so to be raised shall be applied to the construction of any works outside of Canada.

'The Minister further recommends that the said $50,000,000 shall not, nor shall any part thereof, nor shall any moneys arising therefrom, no matter how disposed of, be deemed capital expended in the construction of the railway within the meaning of section 20 of the company's act of incorporation, and the power of the Parliament of Canada or the Governor General in Council to reduce the tolls upon the railway of the company shall in no wise be affected by any such increase of capital stock, in whole or in part, nor by the expenditure of any such moneys in the construction of the railways, or otherwise, but the same shall be excluded from consideration in determining the amount of capital actually expended in the construction of the railway.'

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

Montreal, August 10, 1908.

Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier, Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—Although a considerable portion of the proceeds of the last issue of ordinary capital stock is still available, the board of directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, looking to the business activities and general development that are likely to follow a bountiful harvest, consider it of the utmost importance that the company should be in a position to secure from time to time the necessary funds for continuing the works of improvement and for providing the additional equipment and facilities that are sure to be required in order to keep pace with the progress of the country and the consequent expansion of trafic.

To that end the directors proposed to recommend to the shareholders at the October meeting that the authorized ordinary capital stock of the company be increased from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 subject, as provided in statute 55-56 Victoria, chapter 35, to the approval of the Governor in Council. It will then be possible for the company to issue and sell this stock in such amounts from time to time as may be necessary or desirable for the purpose of the undertaking.

I beg to inclose herewith a certified copy of a resolution of the board of directors, adopted at a meeting to-day providing for such increase and authorizing this application.

I venture to respectfully request that this increase in the company's ordinary capital stock be sanctioned by an order in council containing the same conditions and restrictions as the order in council passed February 10, 1906, which authorized the increase from $110,000,000 to $150,000,000.

As I am informed that you and some other members of your cabinet will be leaving Ottawa in the near future for a short holiday, I also respectfully ask that this sanction be given at an early date, because in order that this matter may be dealt with at the October meeting the notices should be transmitted to the Old country before the end of the present month.

In this connection you may be interested in knowing what the company has done in the way of additions to its rolling stock equipment in recent years and I therefore beg to submit the following comparison of the various classes of rolling stock owned by the company in the years 1902 and 1908:

	1902.	1908.	Increase.
Locomotives..	745	1,404	659
Passenger cars	842	1,648	842
Freight cars..	22,535	47,725	25,190

This is equivalent to an addition to our equipment of one locomotive every three working days, one passenger car every two days and fourteen freight cars each day during the entire period of six years, at an aggregate cost of about $37,000,000, and unless we are all very much mistaken, this work must be continued without cessation.

I have the honour to be,
My dear Sir Wilfrid,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) T. G. SHAUGHNESSY,
President.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Extract from the minutes of a meeting of the board of directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, duly called and held at the principal office of the company, at Montreal, on Monday, August 10, 1908.

Whereas the authorized ordinary capital stock of this company at this date is $150,000,000 divided into 1,500,000 shares of the par or face value of $100 each;

And whereas pursuant to the provisions of section 3 of the Act 55-56, Victoria, chapter 35, Canada, the company being duly authorized in that behalf by its shareholders at a special general meeting duly called for the purpose, may from time to time increase its capital stock for any purpose for which the company requires new capital, to such amounts and at such times as the shareholders at any such meeting may determine, such issue being first approved by the Governor in Council;

And whereas the company requires from time to time new capital for the purposes of its undertaking, and it is desirable to increase the amount of the said authorized ordinary capital stock to $200,000,000, being an increase of $50,000,000:

Now therefore it is resolved as follows, that is to say:—

That it is in the interests of this company that the ordinary capital stock of the company be increased from $150,000,000 to an amount not exceeding $200,000,000 in shares of $100 each or its equivalent in sterling money of Great Britain, to be issued and sold for the purposes of its undertaking as may be determined by resolution of the shareholders of the company;

2. That the president of the company be, and he is hereby authorized to make an application in the name of the company to the Governor in Council to have the said proposed increase of stock duly approved of;

3. That the secretary of the company be and he is hereby authorized and directed to give notice in the manner and form provided by the statutes and by-laws relating thereto for the holding of a special general meeting of the shareholders of the company at the head office of the company immediately after the annual general meeting of the company to be held on Wednesday the 7th day of October next for the purpose of authorizing the said increase of capital stock, and of determining the manner and form in which the same shall be issued and disposed of.

(Sgd.) W. R. BAKER.

I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to what happened in this House in 1902 when the capital stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway was increased by $20,000,000, and I want to read a sentence or two from the speech of the Minister of Justice, now Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who introduced the Bill. In that speech, which will be found on page 2934 of the Hansard of 1902, and which is well worth reading, the then Minister of Justice said:

In the Bill I have the honour to lay before the House, the government has taken the precaution to make it a matter of state that the money is to be applied to the purposes which it is said to be necessary at the time the order in council was applied for.

In other words, while the Canadian Pacific Railway was given the right to increase its capital by $20,000,000, the minister made it his duty to put into an Act of parliament that the money so raised was to be devoted to special purposes. He then proceeded to say:

Now this regulation was necessary only with respect to two points, namely with respect to issuing any part of this amount of capital stock at less than par—for under their charter they would have had right to do so—and there is a restriction that the $200,000,000 shall not be issued at less than par.

—and then with respect to the tolls, it is made a matter of special stipulation that when you come to apply section 20 for the regulation of tolls this additional twenty millions should not be taken into account. And further, they have thought proper, at the suggestion of the Minister of the Interior, to provide that this money should be specifically applied for the purposes for which the company say they require to have it—that is, it should be applied in the improvement of the property of the company.

And that also was added to the Act of parliament that then went through. The then Minister of the Interior, now the member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton), in reply to some remarks I made after the Minister of Justice had spoken, said:

My honourable friend——

Meaning the then member for East York.

—will learn, I think, with great delight, that the first order in council provided that an immediate reference should be taken to the courts for the purpose of determining the amount of the capital actually expended in the construction of the road, so that we might know exactly where we are in respect to the control of rates on this railway. That was the first thing to take into consideration, and that arrangement was arrived at before the order in council was finally passed giving the company power to increase their capital stock.

Now, what I want to know to-night is, first of all, is it the intention of the government to introduce a Bill authorizing this increase of capital, and imposing the conditions that were imposed in the then Bill, namely, that the money shall be applied to a specific purpose, and that the stock shall not be sold for less than par. I also wish to ask the minister whether the promise made by the then Minister of the Interior was fulfilled, that an immediate reference was to be made to the courts to ascertain the actual cost of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am somewhat in doubt whether that work was ever done. I think it ought to be done; and my main object to-night is simply to get this order in council and the schedule that accompanies it, put upon the record to give the minister an opportunity of saying whether we are to have a Bill this session dealing with this increase of capital, and whether that reference which was outlined by the then Minister of the Interior has ever been made, namely, that we were to have a reference to the courts to find out what the actual cost of the investment of the Canadian Pacific Railway was. That is very important. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company to-day, I believe, claim that they are simply under that charter, and that the rates can only be interfered with by this parliament when their earnings exceed 10 per cent on the actual amount invested in the company. I ask the minister if it is so, whether that reference was ever made, and whether that amount has ever been ascertained. I also want to know whether he intends to introduce a special Act this session in reference to that matter, like that of seven years ago.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend definite information on this point. I do not know whether that reference was ever made to the courts or not. Perhaps I am wrong, but it strikes me that the Bill was necessary.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Well, why was it in the previous case?

Mr. GRAHAM. If it is necessary, undoubtedly one will be introduced; but if it is not necessary, I am not in a position to state that it will be. I think all the conditions mentioned in that legislation are guarded in the order in council.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. But the Minister of Justice held, not only that they should do it by order in council, but that it should be in an Act of parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not arguing that point. If it is necessary to have an Act of parliament, no doubt there will be an Act of parliament in order to bring into active operation the order in council, or to confirm it I think the conditions in the order in council cover everything that is covered by the conditions in the legislation referred to. I think the company cannot issue stock at less than par. A great many people think, my hon. friend perhaps does not think, that one way to protect the public would be to allow no company to issue its stock above par, either. I am not expressing an opinion, but that is the opinion of a great many men with whom I have talked, who think that would protect the public perhaps more than anything else against over-capitalization, principally against what we call wildcat schemes. However, after reading what my hon. friend has said in the 'Hansard' I will be able to answer him more definitely.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Another thing. The power to control the capital stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway was in parliament in 1892, but for some reason or other it was transferred to the jurisdiction of the Governor General in Council. I would also like to know why there is this distinction between the Canadian Pacific Railway and other roads. If other roads wish to increase their capital stock they come to parliament and get a special Act, and everybody has notice of that Act, and everybody can govern themselves accordingly. But the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company apparently can increase its capital stock by an order in council. Now when the road was first incorporated the control of its capital stock was altogether in the hands of parliament, but a strange thing has happened, and now the control of that road in regard to its stock, and it is the greatest road in the country, is a matter of order in council, and, as we saw in 1902, of an order in council that at that time was confirmed by an Act of parliament. I also wish the minister to look up that matter and be able to tell the people of this country how this change has taken place, and what there is to justify it.

Mr. SPROULE. In the matter of increasing the capital stock of a railway like this, I agree with the contention of my hon. friend from York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) that it ought to be a matter of legislation in parliament. I do not know what the provisions of the Act are, or whether it empowers the Governor in Council to do it or not. But if it does empower the Governor in Council to do it, it seems rather strange that the last time they increased the stock they did it by Act of parliament confirming an order in council. I would regard a railway corporation coming to this parliament for consideration just the same as I would a company that wanted to extend their line, or wanted to extend the time, or wanted to amend their charter in some particular. When it comes before parliament asking for consideration, parliament, in its wisdom, should amend that Act in any direction that is absolutely needed in the interest of the people, and it is then for the corporation either to accept the Act with the provisions tacked on, or not ask for the Act. I do not think that parliament, in its wisdom, would go so far as to do any great injustice, but I do not think it would be doing injustice to a railway corporation, when they come to parliament asking for favours, if parliament should in its wisdom ask for favours in return on behalf of the people.
