THE

SENATE DEBATES

THIRD SESSION—TWELFTH PARLIAMENT.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, January 15, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 2.30 p.m.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. William Henry Thorne, of the province of New Brunswick.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

His Royal Highness the Governor General being seated on the Throne.

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint the House that,—

It is His Royal Highness the Governor General's pleasure that they attend him immediately in the Senate.

Who being come, with their Speaker,

His Royal Highness the Governor General was then pleased to open the Session by a gracious Speech to both Houses:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I take this public opportunity of expressing to you all, my deep sense of gratitude for the comfort and support that were afforded us at the time of the serious illness of the Duchess of Connaught, by the numerous messages of sympathy that were received from Canada, and by the knowledge, that the hearts of so many Canadians were with us during those dark days. I can only regret that my enforced absence made it impossible for me to fully exercise the duties of my high office during a considerable portion of last year.

It gives me great pleasure to be able to congratulate you upon the remarkable expansion of Canada's trade with other countries in the past fiscal year, during which our total trade far exceeded that of any preceding year.

The bountiful crops with which the Dominion has fortunately been blessed during the past season have been harvested under unusually favourable condition .. have enabled the transportation companies to make full use of all the facilities at their disposal. Thus the difficulties, which sometimes arose in former years have not been manifest, and an unusually large proportion of the crops have been conveyed to the sea-board before the close of the season of inland navigation.

Canada has been favoured by a long series of prosperous years, and, although at the present moment business is slightly restricted by the financial stringency which prevails throughout the world, I feel convinced that this condition will be merely temporary, and that the boundless resources of this Dominion which are so fully and universally known and recognized, give us the fullest assurance of continued material prosperity and progress.

As a result of the recent decennial census the representation of the different provinces must be readjusted, as required by the British North America Act, and a Bill will be introduced for that purpose.

A Bill consolidating the Railway Act and its various amendments, as well as Bills relating to the Civil Service and to Trust and Loan Companies, will be submitted for your consideration.

Several other Bills will be submitted, including measures providing for increased representation of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, in the Senate.

The volume of immigration during the present fiscal year promises to be greater than that of any preceding year. It has come in greatest measure from the British Isles and from the United States, but a large stream of desirable immigration has also reached our shores from other countries.

You will be pleased to learn that satisfactory arrangements have been made with the various provinces under the Agricultural Instruction Act passed at the last session. My advisers are convinced that the co-operation between the Dominion and the provinces which is thus afforded, will accomplish excellent results, in assuring better agricultural instruction and needful improvement of existing methods of agriculture.

The work on the National Transcontinental railway has been rapidly advanced during the past year, and, notwithstanding the difficulties attending the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, and the provision of terminals, every possible progress has been made in bringing that important project nearer to completion.

In connection with the highly important subject of transportation of our products, the provision of adequate terminal facilities at our great national ports has received and is receiving the attention of my advisers.

You have doubtless learned with satisfaction that the new government terminal elevator at Port Arthur is completed, and that it has been in operation since October last. In conjunction with this, a system of interior terminal elevators has been begun, which will provide largely increased facilities for the farmers of the great grain producing provinces.

The International Conference on Safety of Life at Sea, which has been in session in London for several weeks, has had under consideration questions of the highest importance, and it is hoped that its deliberations may result in more effective measures for assuring the safety of the passengers and crews of ocean-going steamships. Representatives of Canada were appointed by Order in Council and have been in attendance at all sessions of the conference.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the last fiscal year will be laid before you. You will be pleased to know that the revenue has been ample to cover both ordinary and capital expenditure.

The estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted at an early date. They have been prepared with due regard to the necessary development of the resources of the Dominion, coupled with careful attention to economical administration.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In inviting your careful consideration of the subjects to which I have called your attention, I pray that the blessings of Divine Providence may attend your deliberations.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

After some time the Senate was resumed.

FIRST READING.

Bill, an Act relating to Railways.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, January 20, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved:

That pursuant to Rule 77, the following senators: the Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G., the Honourable Messieurs Gibson, Béique, Power, Watson, Casgrain, Ross (Moosejaw), Daniel, and the mover, be appointed a Committee of Selection to nominate senators to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session; and to report with all convenient speed the names of the senators so nominated.

The motion was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE — Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to bring to the attention of this House a letter which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on the 16th inst. The letter is signed 'Andrew Holland,' and refers to the question of procuring a supply of water for the city of Ottawa. In the course of his letter he says:

> It makes me tired to see the way the public are stampeded by the cry of doped water, and rounded up for an enormous expenditure of money on a municipal utility in a province entirely beyond our jurisdiction in which our civil rights are to be adjudicated on under a code entirely foreign to the people of Ontario, and where we shall be at the mercy of demagogues who know how to work on racial and religious weaknesses, to earn notoriety or pelf for their own miserable selves.

I wish to protest most emphatically against this expression, and the more so as I am told that the writer of this article is in the employ of the Senate. I hope it is not true, because if the Holland referred to is the gentleman who is sitting at the table to-day, I have the greatest esteem for him; nevertheless, if he is the writer of the letter I protest against this villainous article. We all know that a Bill was introduced in the Legislature of Quebec to provide a supply of pure water for the city of Ottawa. There are other pure articles which they will find in the province of Quebec besides the water. If the writer of this letter is the official reporter of the Senate, I hope he will withdraw this unkind remark as soon as possible.

AN ERROR IN THE MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I wish to call attention to an error which appears at page 6 of the Minutes. Last Thursday the Honourable, the Speaker of the House, informed the Senate that a copy of the Speech from the Throne had been left in his hands. Then the Minutes show that on motion of the Hon. Mr. Lougheed, seconded by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, it was ordered that the Speech be taken into consideration by the Senate on Tuesday next.

It will be within the recollection of all who were present last Thursday that the motion was seconded by the hon. gentleman from Russell. I even rose in my place to express my astonishment and to inquire whether an arrangement had been made for the hon. gentleman to second the motion made by the leader of the House. An alteration has been made in the minutes. I do not know at whose instance this change was made, whether the allegiance of the hon. gentleman from Russell only lasted that afternoon, but it is something we are all interested in knowing. I hope the hon. gentleman from Russell will explain how he happened to permit himself to second a motion which embodies a policy to which he is opposed here, and which he was opposed to in another place. Some explanation is due from the leader of the Government or from the hon. member from Russell.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—If I must explain, my common sense led me to believe there were no parties in this House. If it is claimed there are parties, then I can only say that my affection and esteem for the hon. leader of the House led me temporarily astray.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Will the error be corrected in the Journal?

Hon. Mr. POWER—You cannot correct it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may say I had nothing to do with the changing of it. I know not how it was made, but I was delighted to see the name of the hon. gentleman from Russell put from the Chair as the seconder of that motion, because it was a vindication of the principle he himself laid down that there were no parties in this House, and I am surprised that my hon. friend who brought this matter up should indicate that there were.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

The Orders of the Day being called.

Consideration of His Royal Highness the Governor General's speech on the opening of the third session of the twelfth Parliament.

Col. the Hon. Mr. MASON—It is a great honour to be invited to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, which I now have the privilege of doing. I appreciate the opportunity and also the difficulty of the occasion. As a new member, however, of this portion of the Parliament of Canada and as one who is not a practised speaker, political or otherwise, I ask for your consideration and am sure it will be granted.

The reference by His Royal Highness to the sympathy shown by Canadians during the serious illness of the Duchess last year is one which will be greatly appreciated. The Crown has rarely been represented in Canada, or it is safe to say anywhere in the Empire, by one who has so greatly interested himself in local affairs, so closely identified himself with Canadian interests, so warmly sympathized with Canadian ambitions, as has the Duke of Connaught. In this work and in the hearts of our people his gracious Consort has found a high place, and it was with a sense of deep sorrow that our people heard of the illness of Her Royal Highness—a sorrow only equalled by their pleasure and joy at realizing her recovery, and in hearing that she was coming to us once more. I cannot help expressing here an admiring appreciation of her courage and kindness of heart, in coming back again to our somewhat distant shores, and leaving the climate and environment which were no doubt better suited, at this time, to the condition of her health. We welcome Their Royal Highnesses and, need I say, the Princess Patricia, with sincere appreciation, and with a renewed sense of loyalty to the splendid monarchical institutions which they embody and to the King, whom His Royal Highness so ably represents. In this connection I would like to say that it must be very gratifying to Their Royal Highnesses to see, in this time of his young manhood, how successfully and with what popularity their son Prince Arthur of Connaught, is performing the important and arduous public duties assigned to him by His Majesty, the King.

In its reference to the development of Trade, the Speech is explicit and the terms employed do not over-estimate the importance of the progress made in this respect by Canada last year. The figures for December are not available but taking the past three calendar years in the twelve months ending November 30, I find that in 1911 the total imports were $515,649,198; in 1912, $638,497,874; in 1913, $672,402,808. During the same period the total exports were $301,601,871 in 1911; $367,302,482 in 1912; and $460,257,192 in 1913. These figures gave an aggregate trade for the Dominion of $817,251,069 in 1911; $1,005,700,356 in 1912; and $1,132,670,000 in 1913.

Upon such a result the Government has indeed much reason to congratulate itself. A great deal was said during the Administration of the party which still has a majority in the Senate, regarding the immense growth of trade under the late Government, and there was some reason to be satisfied with a record which jumped from $239,025,360 in the fiscal year 1896 to $769,443,905 in the fiscal year 1911. How much more reason is there to be proud of the two years' growth under the present administration; in view especially of the fact that a part of the latter period was one of financial stringency?

There is a feature in the increased trade which may not be altogether desirable—I refer to the importation of $140,000,000 worth of iron and steel in varied forms. We have the resources, the industrial plants, the capital, and the workmen, to produce a large portion of these manufactures in our own country, and to be absolutely independent of the steel trusts of the United States. An increased output from our coal and iron mines, our blast furnaces, &c., would be of the greatest benefit to this country and its skilled labour. I do not propose here to deal with the vexed question of the balance of trade. But it may be said that in a new country, of large government undertakings in railways, harbours and waterways, of important municipal and other public requirements, of miscellaneous public works of an immense and almost pioneer character, the balance of imports over exports is inevitable. So far, therefore, as this excess is due to such causes there is little to be said.

The reference made in the speech to our national prosperity is justified, and the statement that the financial stringency, which has affected our country during the past year, is temporary, would appear to be thoroughly accurate. The conditions which led up to the period of tight money, which I trust we are slowly passing out of, were such in the main as we could not control or modify. One exception there was, of course, in the real estate speculation of the past few years which during 1912 reached a stage where some check was bound to occur. When that check came, partly by the wise action of the banks, but still more from the aroused suspicions of outside investors, a temporary but necessary depression followed in that line of business. As to the general situation, such tightness of money as existed, such dullness of business as showed itself generally, were caused by world-wide conditions.

Great international prosperity, enormous expansion of trade, wide-spread development of industry, combined to form the first great cause in a check such as comes at certain periods in the world's progress and growth. In this situation Canada was only one, though an important one, of the countries which required and were demanding more and still more money from the greatest of lending nations, Britain. British investments in Canada have been steadily increasing for years. I find in an able address by Sir F. Williams-Taylor, now General Manager of the Bank of Montreal, that the total amount of British investments recorded at London as having been made in Canada was, in 1902, $1,027,025,500, and in 1912 had grown to $2,052,245,000. This doubling of British investments in our country during a single decade was sufficiently remarkable in itself, but we find that the process is being continued to a still greater degree. Mr E. R. Wood, a leading and well recognized Toronto financial authority, who has made a close study of this subject, puts the total invested by Great Britain in Canadian Government, municipal, railway and corporation bonds during 1913, at the very large figure of $255,084,114. This total was 72·6 per cent of the total amount invested in these securities by Great Britain, Canada, and the United States. Incidentally these figures show the enormous increase of British financial interests in this country. Between 1902 and 1912 the average was $200,000,000 a year; in 1913 it was, as already stated, $255,000,000.

In another aspect of the case it will be seen that during a year of monetary tightness in Canada, none of the great basic undertakings and projects of the country were allowed to suffer. The pinch may have been felt by individuals, or by the smaller business dealers of the Dominion, who had to go slow and curtail expenditure and expansion until the vital factors of the nation's growth were cared for. In this connection some unjust criticism has been occasionally levelled against the banks. There is no doubt that in 1907 the financial stringency of that year would have involved serious disaster in Canada, such as then came to the United States, had it not been for the care exercised by our banking institutions. So, in this past year, I believe much serious evil was avoided by the cautious action of the banks in warning and advising customers, in curtailing speculation and expansion, in furling the country's sails in face of a stringency storm. To quote Mr. R. S. Gourlay, president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, on September 17, last:

> Our banks are deserving of much credit for the successful manner in which they have handled a difficult situation; to say that they have refused to provide money for speculative ventures or for the financing of new enterprises is to acknowledge that they have chosen rather to reserve their resources so as to be better able to take care of legitimate business. And this I believe they have done and done well, for with one of two exceptions, where special considerations may have necessitated a curtailment of credit, I have yet to hear of a good business, manufacturing or otherwise, that has not been provided with what money it actually needed.

It appears also that the commercial loans of the chartered banks increased twenty-four millions during the first eight months of the year, while deposits decreased twenty-five millions. Between August 31 and November 30 conditions were reversed, so that commercial loans decreased $24,000,000, while deposits increased $43,000,000. The former situation showed the banks did their best for their customers; the latter figures indicated that the country was recovering from its monetary stringency.

Many things, of course, have made our people feel the depression of the past year, and one of the most discussed topics was the higher cost of living to which the Government is now having official inquiries made. I believe a chief reason for this condition to be an increased population, coupled with a falling off in the numbers and in the raising of food-producing animals, and accompanied by increased demands from a people who are widening the area of home comforts, luxuries and higher-class food requirements. The great cause of the stringency, however—greater than the local effects of real estate speculation or the increased cost of living or even the world-wide influences of a prosperity which strained the money markets—was to be found in the War troubles of the year. Financial estimates of the cost of the Balkan War, which I have no reason to doubt, have placed the figures at $1,229,000,000, while the cost of preparation in Russia, Roumania, and Austria for Wars which, fortunately, did not occur, totalled many millions more. The Mexican disturbances also caused a strain on certain Canadian, as well as British investments, in that country. At the close of the year, without taking into account the strenuous efforts of Great Britain to keep its control of the Sea in face of the rivalry of Germany, the demand for loans required in connection with these wars and preparations for war was estimated at $700,000,000. It was not much wonder that money became tight in 1913; the greater wonder is that Canada actually received more money from Great Britain during the year than in 1912.

One good thing this stringency has certainly done—it has shown Canadians how vital to their well-being is the money of the Motherland; how essential it is that they keep and improve their national and individual credit by good government and wise financing and honest business; how practical is the value of the sentimental and Imperial bond, which, as Sir George Paish of the London Statist so well pointed out, in his Toronto speech of December 4, 1913, makes for actual profit to the pockets of our people.

Sir George Paish spoke as follows:

> Canada is in a very privileged position. We in England greatly admire the Canadian people; we have a great sentiment of friendship for you; and the result of this sentimental attachment is the important material advantage to Canada that we have loaned this great sum of £500,000,000 sterling to Canada at a rate of interest only slightly over 4 per cent; we should have given it to any other country, at any rate, any foreign country, for 5 per cent. That means that although you owe us £500,000,000 sterling, yet this costs you not more than £400,000,000 sterling would cost any foreign country; in other words, you have got the advantage of borrowing an extra 100,000,000 pounds for nothing. On the capital you have borrowed from the United States you are paying a higher rate of interest because most of the capital has come in for industrial operations, giving relatively higher returns.

This, in my opinion, from such an authority is a most important utterance. It indicates, as no laboured argument could do, one of the great benefits accruing from our union with the Empire, and affords one more reason for doing our duty in a naval and military sense toward that great combination of British nations. It means a saving of nearly £5,000,000, or $25,000,000. The savings of two years would more than cover the cost of the three dreadnoughts which the Commons voted to contribute to the British navy but which the majority in the Senate rejected.

In this connection I am certainly an optimist as to the future of Canada—both near and distant. In a lesser degree than Great Britain other countries are now contributing to our development with both men and money. United States investments, in particular, are steadily increasing, and I note that according to the careful estimate of the Toronto Monetary Times these investments in Canadian industries have risen from $279,075 000 in 1909 to $636,903,952 in 1913. Legitimate business, also, in Canada is in a satisfactory condition and the slowing-down process will in a not very great length of time, again permit of considerable funds being available for further general expansion; the period of slight depression will have passed away and Canada be again busy in the development of her enormous resources. To quote the words of Mr. H. V. Meredith, president of the Bank of Montreal, in his address to shareholders on December 9 last.

Mr. Meredith said:

> The commercial condition of Canada is fundamentally sound. Business as a whole continues good; our vast natural resources have scarcely been scratched. Immigration is large, railway construction active, new territory and new sources of wealth are being steadily opened; the confidence of British and foreign capitalists in our country is unabated. A temporary halt can only refresh Canada for yet better achievements.

Another influence in Canadian prosperity to which reference has been most appropriately made in the speech, is that of agricultural production. The crop of 1912 in Canada was officially valued at $511,-951,000; that of 1913 is estimated at $552,-771,000. In prices, quality, harvesting facilities and conditions, and prompt shipment to market, this crop, I understand, was superior to preceding years. Such an outcome to agricultural production, in a year such as 1913, was largely responsible for the improvement in financial conditions noticed at its close. The sum of $100,000,000 has now probably gone into the west as a result of this crop and that total will be further increased by the disposal of grain still in storage and unsold. I have been interested in this connection in noting the tremendous figures to which Canadian natural production has now attained.

The following table gives an estimate for 1913 which is compiled from various authoritative sources:—

Agriculture	$ 550,000,000
Industries	1,500,000,000
Forest products	70,000,000
Fisheries	34,000,000
Minerals	140,000,00
Animals and products	300,000,000
Total	$2,594,000,000

These products, however, large as they appear, only touch the fringe of Canada's possibilities. Anything may occur in that development, though certain things are, even now, obvious. It is certain that British money must continue to be obtained in large quantities yearly; Canadian individual credit abroad must be improved in the more honest shipment of goods and products, and in the honest flotation of companies and industrial projects; mixed farming must be adopted in the west, and still more agricultural education developed in the east. Meanwhile, and in addition to the great production I have indicated for 1913, there were various evidences of assured progress —despite occasional pessimism and obvious depression. The bank clearings increased from $9,146,236,243 in 1912 to $9,262,606,864 in 1913—not a large increase but a very satisfactory one under the prevailing conditions. Bank deposits in Canada, which constitute a barometer of financial conditions, totalled $895,706,276 in December, 1910; $1,006,696,560 in December, 1911; $1,099,468,691 in December, 1912; and $1,117,612,205 in November, 1913—the figures for December not yet out—showing that our people, even in a year of depression, held their own.

It is eminently fitting that the Speech should refer to the matter of immigration. Nothing is more important than this to a new country, and the character or quality of the people coming in is of even greater importance than the numbers. The Government in this respect is to be congratulated upon the hand-picking of its immigrants; every year something like five new people come into the country for every one hundred already there. Sir Edmund Walker, President of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, recently amplified this proposition in another way, when he stated that this would mean in England two million new people in one year; in Germany three million, and in the United States about five million.

The assimilation of these new-comers is not easy, but I for one have a profound faith in the force of our institutions and believe that, if not the original immigrants in all cases, certainly their children will become good Canadian and loyal British subjects—always provided that proper school, and national training in loyalty, and in the history of our British liberties and institutions, is given to these children. A large number of immigrants to Canada are, of course, already British by birth, and I note that of the 2,440,359 immigrants arriving during the nine years, 1905 to 1913, 962,762 were British, 653,244 from the United States—many of them returning Canadians —with 824,353 coming from all other countries. The yearly total of all immigrants increased from 145,954 in the calendar year 1905 to 350,374 in 1911; and I am glad to note has increased still further, to a total of 418,870 in 1913. Of this latter total the official figures show that 156,984 were of British origin, 146,135 of Continental (Europe) and general origin, and 115,751 from the United States.

It is interesting to note in this connection that the British born in Canada, which of course, included native Canadians as well as incoming British, totalled in the 1911 Census figures 6,453,104, and the foreign-born only 752,732. As to the near future, many things point to an increase of British emigration to Canada. The intense competition in Britain, due to free agricultural imports, and the very heavy increases in taxation on land, are driving the agricultural class of that country into the cities or the colonies—and we seem to be getting the cream of the latter migration. The British Board of Trade recently reported at length upon the great inducements offered by Canada, and stated that these were having a noticeable and increasing effect upon the British rural population. The present Government's persistent presentation of Canada's attractions and resources, through many mediums and in many ways, was obviously having a cumulative effect of which we should continue to feel the benefit.

The references in the Speech to Transportation are of special interest. I suppose no project has been more discussed in the West of late years than the Hudson Bay railway, and the Government and the Minister of Railways and Canals are to be heartily congratulated upon the energetic way in which they have taken up and developed this proposal in accordance with Mr. Borden's well-known pre-election pledges. The total appropriation in 1913 was $4,500,000, of which, I understand, $1,000,000 was on account of the terminals it is proposed to construct at Port Nelson. By October 25th last, when ballasting operations were closed for the season, 79 miles of steel had been laid, and the grade completed for 135 miles. I am advised that as many as 1,200 men were employed at one time upon construction; that difficulties met with were very considerable, and that all supplies had to go around by way of Sydney, N.S., to Port Nelson. The Government proposes to cut a road, however, from the end of the present grade to Port Nelson for next year's work, and it is hoped to complete the railway in 1915.

It is gratifying to note that the National Transcontinental railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific are nearing completion. It was a great undertaking for a young country and without the support of British capital could not have been carried through. According to official figures, which have been already published, the total expenditure on the Government part of the line from Moncton to Winnipeg, and exclusive of the Quebec bridge, was as follows:

To November 30, 1911..	$107,906,184
Liabilities (approx)..	5,933,000
Total..	$113,839,184
Chief Engineer's estimate, dated Sept. 30, 1912, of cost of completed road, exclusive of interest.	$162,786,800

The last spike in connecting the main line track was driven on November 17th last, and the entire track is thus laid from Moncton to Winnipeg, excepting the Quebec bridge, which is part of another contract. There only remains, I am informed, some station buildings and divisional point buildings to complete; with a number of steel bridges which still have to be erected. The train ferry for Quebec is also under construction at Birkenhead, and should be delivered in May next and ready for operation before autumn. It is hoped that the whole Government road will be completed between the points mentioned by the beginning of 1915; the construction of the shops at Quebec will require some further time. According to the address of Mr. A. W. Smithers, chairman of the Grand Trunk Pacific, in London on October 23rd last, that part of the line is now laid 1,204 miles west of Winnipeg, and 305 miles east of Prince Rupert, leaving 230 miles to complete, which he expected would be done by June of this year.

Reverting again to the portion of the undertaking which was projected and controlled by the late Government, the country will be glad to know that it is approaching completion. It was a great burden and will still be one upon the country as a whole; but the line had to be constructed and completed when once commenced. The economy with which it has been handled under the new Government is most gratifying and stands in strong contrast to what happened before Mr. Borden came into power.

The Government has reason to be proud of the present transportation facilities of the West, and the railways are to be congratulated upon their handling of the 1913 crop. We all remember the deplorable conditions attaching to the shipment of the 1911 crop and the difficulties which remained over into the next year. The western press teemed with severe criticisms of every one concerned, though the trouble was largely due to causes which no Government or transportation agency could at that time meet. Now, the railway companies, acting apparently with the Railway Commission under Government direction, have brought about a condition of things where the current season brings hardly a complaint, although the crop is greater than ever.

The matter of storage accommodation in connection with the general question of transportation cannot be too strongly urged upon the Government and farmers alike. The Dominion Government in carrying out Mr. Borden's pre-election pledges as to the great terminal elevator at the head of the lakes, which is now completed, and as to the internal elevators, which are now under way in the western provinces, has done a great public service. This Government elevator at Port Arthur has a capacity of 3,250,000 bushels; it cost $1,227,755; and was opened on October 13th last. At the latest date of information received, it had in store 1,925,940 bushels of grain. I have received a letter this morning stating that in the neighbourhood of 6,500,000 bushels of grain have been handled up to date. There were a number of cars coming to these two ports, which graded 'rejected.' These cars were refused by the other terminal elevators but I am glad to say that the Government elevator took everything that was offered, and handled more than a fair share of the grain that required special treatment in the way of cleaning and separating.

That letter was sent by the secretary of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada at Fort William.

As the total of grain received at Port Arthur and Fort William in September, October and November, 1912, was 66,736,587 bushels, and in the same three months of 1913 had increased to 115,570,500 bushels, the tremendous importance of additional facilities is obvious. Two internal elevators, —one at Moosejaw and one at Saskatoon,— are now under construction at a total price of $2,163,741, and each of them is to have a capacity of 3,500,000 bushels. It may also be considered desirable, though I have not information on that point, to construct similar elevators in Alberta and on the Pacific coast.

Various efforts had been made in the past few years, through public and private ownership, to give this boon to the western farmer, and the Grain Growers' Associations have been unceasing in their exertions and pressure upon the Provincial Governments. The policy of the present Dominion administration will, therefore, be justly popular, and it certainly meets one of the most important demands and requirements of western agricultural interests. I cannot help saying, however, that the Government action should be further aided by individual farmers. The building of local storage accommodation for the farmer's own wheat would make transport congestion in the future impossible and improve the quality of the grain as a whole, while giving the farmer a better chance of getting a better market.

I desire at this point to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Burrell) upon his Agricultural Aid Act of 1912, and his Permanent Agricultural Instruction Act of 1913. The investigation carried on by Mr. C. C. James, under instructions from the Department, has been fruitful of good results. Upon it has been based the present law under which $10,000,000 will be expended upon agriculture in the provinces of Canada during this and the succeeding 9 years. This money will go toward the increase of efficiency and equipment in agricultural colleges and the teaching of agriculture in the public schools; encouragement to women's institutes in the rural districts; promotion of demonstrations and training in horticulture, sheep and poultry husbandry; instruction in domestic economy, bee-keeping and under-drainage; organizing of school gardens and instructions by travelling dairymen; demonstrations of the value and nature of alfalfa clover; promoting tobacco culture and the maple syrup industry; instruction in the marketing of farm products and the raising of vegetables; promotion of dairying in all its branches. The vital point in this important plan is the unifying of provincial action throughout the provinces; another point is the closer relationship of the Dominion and the Provinces gained through the promotion of a common end. The amount allotted to the different Provinces for the fiscal year 1913-14 is officially stated as follows:

Ontario.....	$195,733.32
Quebec....	159,482.40
Nova Scotia....	54,288.45
New Brunswick....	44,509.93
Prince Edward Island ..	26,529.85
British Columbia..	47,334.76
Manitoba....	51,730.05
Saskatchewan..	54,296.29
Alberta....	46,094.95
	$680,000.00
Veterinary Colleges.. ..	20,000.00
	$700,000.00

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Hazen) was well advised in appointing a delegate to the International Conference on Safety of Life at Sea. We are having ever increasing proof of a necessity of organized action in this respect and no where could better advice and opinion be found than from the experienced leaders of marine thought and action in London. I am glad to know that the policy of practically 'boats for all' on board steamships has been approved by this conference, and details such as size, equipment, and nature of the boats decided upon; that rules have been drawn up as to practice and action at sea in the use of these boats; that recommendations are being made as to safeguard against some, at least, of the causes of fire at sea—such for instance, as the carrying of explosives and combustibles; and that attention has been given to methods adopted in the extinguishment of fires; prevention is good policy and I trust the Government will find co-operation possible in this important matter, with those concerned in international marine transport.

The redistribution of seats in the House of Commons is compulsory under the British North America Act, as a result of increased population ascertained by the recent census. This also applies to an increase of western representation in the Senate. I look forward to seeing a just, honourable and equitable adjustment of this matter. It should not be a party question as to either House. In this Senate I do not suppose that any member will be found unwilling to enlarge the membership and the influence of his House or to render ample justice in representation to that splendid population in the West from which comes so much national vitality and progress.

As to other clauses in the Government's programme as stated in the speech, I can only say of the Railway Act legislation which is proposed, that consolidation of laws is always desirable, as increasing the clearness of enactments and cheapening and expediting the process of litigation. In case of complex railway enactments it is especially desirable. As to the civil service legislation, Sir George Murray's report upon the situation has been before Parliament and the people for some time. His recommendations were born of experience and knowledge and the Government's application of them to our conditions will, I am sure, be wise and popular. The Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. White) knows all about trust and loan companies and can be entrusted to make his Bill in that connection safe and sane in its changes, or in its adjustment to new conditions.

In this connection I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the conditions of revenue and expenditure. The receipts for the fiscal year 1911 were $117,780,409, of 1912 $136,108,217; of 1913 $168,689,903—a very marked increase. The expenditures on consolidated fund account were in the same years, respectively, $87,774,198; $98,161,440; and $112,059,537. The total surplus of 1911 was, therefore, $30,006,211; for 1912 $37,946,776; for 1913 $56,630,366. The great expansion was during the past two years of our present minister's administration, and I desire to emphasize the public appreciation of his management of our financial affairs during a period of some financial difficulties, and upon his having piled up in that period the largest surplus of Canadian history. Even in the latter part of 1913 the revenue was $127,571,762 for the last nine months of the calendar year, or an increase of $3,000,000 over the very large revenue of the same nine months in 1912. The expenditure upon important current public works was, of course, also increased but this was unavoidable and the objects all of great importance to our people. At Hamilton recently, in this connection, the Hon. Mr. White said:

'This year we shall pay all our current expenses, and we shall pay a substantial part of our capital charges. We shall have no hesitation in borrowing within reasonable bounds. Extravagance is always to be deprecated, parsimony should also be deprecated. The sensible, sound, moderate course is the one to adopt. We have our Atlantic and Pacific Coasts and inland harbours to develop and improve—it is part of the national plant of Canada. In giving you this plant, what we are doing is to make it easier for the people of Canada to transact business with other parts of the world.'

In conclusion, let me say that I am proud personally to have the honour of moving the Address upon this occasion, proud as a Canadian of the position which Canada is attaining in the eyes of the world, proud as a British subject of the place which the Dominion will some day hold with manly assurance, national confidence, and imperial loyalty in that great structure reared by our forefathers which we call the British Empire.

Hon. Mr. THORNE—I rise to speak this afternoon with considerable diffidence, and perhaps a greater amount of embarrassment. My first parliamentary experience was when I was introduced and sworn in as a member of this honourable body. I trust, however, that after this session's experience I shall be able to appreciate this body and feel more at home among the distinguished members of the Senate than I do at the present moment.

My predecessor who moved the Address has dealt very voluminously in statistics and figures which, they say, speak louder than words. It is therefore not my intention to deal with figures. Rather shall I speak, for a few moments, on what I have seen and the conclusion I have arrived at.

The first clause in the speech from the Throne alludes to the serious illness of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught. It touches, I think, the heart of every Canadian, and the sympathy and gratitude of every citizen goes out to Her Royal Highness in her recovery and return to this country, thus enabling His Royal Highness to resume his manifold duties in the high office which he occupies. It was my pleasure on one of their tours to meet their Royal Highnesses in the city of St. John. They have travelled from the Atlantic to the Pacific and I venture to say that every citizen who has had the pleasure of seeing and meeting them will, for many years to come, through the strong affection they have for the Royal family, remember with pleasure the kindly way in which they met the people of the different cities and places they visited, and the interest they took in the industries of the different localities they visited.

The other paragraphs of the Speech deal largely with transportation and the prosperity of Canada. I do not intend to take up these clauses, but in a general way to give you an idea of what I have observed, and to say a few words with regard to the condition of this country to-day, and with regard to what I believe will take place in the future. I think it was in 1901 that I first visited the Northwest. I left St. John with the idea of going over that vast country, left with a feeling of doubt as to the capabilities of that country and what its future might be, to the east, and to the people who lived in the east, and were largely brought into indebtedness for the opening up of that great country. The Canadian Pacific railway had been constructed and was running through from the Atlantic to the Pacific, for only a few years. The speeches that had been made by those in opposition upon the acquisition of the great Northwest, and during the proposition to build the great highway by the Government of Canada, were ringing in my ears, and naturally I had some doubts as to what might be the future of that country for which we were accumulating such a vast debt at that time. The first place I visited in the Northwest was Fort William. It was then simply a muddy village, I might say, with a few dredges working to make deep water for the steamers coming there, and having very few inhabitants. I visited Port Arthur, the adjoining town, which was in a more flourishing condition at that time. Then I visited Winnipeg which, at that time, was said to have about fifty or sixty thousand inhabitants. During my stay there I recollect we had a couple of days of rain which made it very difficult to cross some parts of the streets. I visited the town of Brandon, and had the pleasure of meeting the Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer, who was very kind. I viewed for the first time vast areas under cultivation in grain, and the flourishing little town, at that time, of Brandon. I visited other towns in crossing the great prairies, and saw at that season of the year the magnificent wheat fields that were just about being harvested.

The towns that we visited were going ahead and the inhabitants were optimistic. We at last landed in Calgary at that time a city of about 5,000 inhabitants. We then had the pleasure of a picturesque ride over the Rockies, and Selkirks, stopping at Banff and other places of note in that district. We visited Kootenay and other places. Everyone talked mining and the richness of the mines. We visited Vancouver, which had then twenty-five or thirty thousand inhabitants. What impressed me was the many vacant lots in that small town, and the stumps of trees which had been recently cut, some of them measuring five or six feet in diameter. We then visited Victoria and had the pleasure of seeing the surrounding country, which was then not in a very flourishing state.

It was my pleasure during this last summer, at the invitation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to visit the Northwest, and I was very glad to take the opportunity of joining him in one of the most instructive and pleasant trips that I have ever taken in my life. We visited many of the same cities that I had seen twelve years previously; but what a change. I found Port Arthur and Fort William with continuous rows of buildings, making the two places practically one and the same city, with paved streets and the population engaged to the fullest extent, buildings and elevators going up. Where twelve years before only two elevators existed, I found elevators with a capacity of over 50,000,000 bushels. We then visited Winnipeg, and found it had grown to a city containing upwards of 250,000 inhabitants, with paved streets brilliantly lighted; splendid buildings not only for the trade of the country, but magnificent residences throughout.

This change was marvellous and it had taken place in twelve years. We then visited the different towns along the line of railway. Where villages had existed twelve years prior to that time, I found flourishing towns containing ten, fifteen and twenty thousand inhabitants. We stopped at most of those places and saw many of the inhabitants, and all were optimistic and believed in the future great development of that part of the Dominion. We visited Calgary, and where a few years before we had found a town of five thousand inhabitants, we found now a city claiming 80,000 or more inhabitants. The same thing existed; magnificent buildings erected and streets put in the best possible condition that modern science can produce in the way of pavements, sidewalks, and so on.

We then travelled across the Rockies. The scenery did not vary from that we saw on the first trip, but I noticed an enlargement of hotels in that district. Wooden buildings were being replaced by fire-proof structures, with three or four times the accommodation which then existed. In Vancouver the same thing met our eyes. There was an enormous advance from 25,000 or 30,000 population to 200,000, and in the outlying district there was also an immense increase in the population and the industries. In Victoria the advance was of a similar character. The great improvement and the optimistic feeling which prevailed among the people in the West were not absent from that locality.

Then to my astonishment, when visiting as far north as Dawson City, taking in the different islands, visiting the tanneries and the different cities that were dependent upon mining and fishing, and visiting Prince Rupert, the terminal of the Grand Trunk Pacific, it was a revelation to me, to observe the progress of the country and the magnificent scenery from Prince Rupert to Skagway. The natural scenery is unsurpassed by anything I have seen, and I believe, so far as the natural scenery is concerned, that it surpasses the beauties of the Mediterranean trip. My ideas were that a trip to the Yukon would be attended with some little inconveniences, and that we might not have the luxurious life we had in the steamers that plied between Skagway and Prince Rupert, but I was mistaken in that, because we went with the greatest comfort, and we arrived at White Horse, and from there a comfortable steamer took us 483 miles down the Yukon, and I had another surprise. My idea was that the Yukon was a small river with perhaps a few little tributaries where a little gold was washed down, but I found it was a river navigable for eighteen hundred miles. I found a tremendous mining development in that country. I was astonished at the vastness and greatness of that district. I speak of what I have seen, and I give you this as an indication of the great prosperity and the great advance and progress in Canada within the last twelve years of which I have spoken.

Now I will speak of the prosperity of my own province, New Brunswick, which I represent in this House. We have not gone ahead in the same rapid way as they have in the West. We could not expect it. The opening of the great Northwest brought about conditions that had not existed before, and took many people from our farms, to become growers of wheat and grain in the Northwest. This resulted in a great many abandoned farms both in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and I believe, and know in fact, that Ontario has suffered in the same way. To-day, however, I am happy to say that we are replacing those who left by farmers from the other side of the water. Last year a large number of farmers settled on these abandoned farms. This year I think three or four hundred farmers will settle upon farms in New Brunswick, and those are largely people who come here with experience and have means to pay, in some cases, for those farms in full. Others are assisted by a company which is formed in St. John, and by the local government of the province. That applies, I think, to Nova Scotia. I do not know so much about Prince Edward Island, but I know that in Nova Scotia the same results are being obtained by the influx of population settling on farms which were practically abandoned.

There is one thing with regard to the lower provinces—we have not had any booms. We have not had any drawbacks of that description. While the business has not gone ahead as rapidly as we would wish for, at the same time when the depression occurred in 1907-8, I think the banner provinces of the Dominion of Canada with regard to the stability of trade were the lower provinces. The past year has been a banner season for all business men in the lower provinces. The general business throughout the country has been good. People have become more optimistic and the farmers are getting a better price for their products, and business generally has led to a greater prosperity throughout the whole country, than we have enjoyed for many years.

Every one knows of the financial stringency in the money market. What is that stringency due to? When a country goes ahead, as this country has for the last eight or ten years, at a rapid pace, what is the result? When we travel 'full speed ahead' the danger rocks become more dangerous, and that has been one of the drawbacks with regard to the present situation, that perhaps we have gone ahead a little too fast. Manufacturers have expanded more than was justified, perhaps. I do not know, however, that they were not justified in expanding, because their business was flourishing. Cities have expanded an enormous amount in what was absolutely necessary, especially in the building up of the new cities in the West. Every one has been in the same manner extending his business, and the pace at which we have been going must cause some little set back, naturally, or we do not know where we might land. I fail to see, however, that it is due to any cause in connection with agriculture, manufacturing, or any of the resources of the country. My observation in talking with the business people of the West was that the general business of the country was good. The crops, as we all know, were magnificent, and the moneys that have been received from them have paid off to a large extent the indebtedness which was incurred in the great Northwest. My idea is that the stringency was largely due to over speculation, and more especially the undue speculation in land, especially suburban and urban lots in the Northwest. Large profits have been made from those speculations, but I believe values have gone beyond all reason, and that the values of properties held in cities by speculators for speculative purposes are an absolute injury to that city, and must come down. Where these lands are utilized, and where they are used for residential, manufacturing and business purposes, it is a great advantage to any town or city, but I do not believe in land being held by speculators at a price that makes it impossible for one to get returns in any business. The high cost of living in residential districts is due in part to the cost of land and buildings. I do not believe it is in the interest of any city to encourage that sort of speculation.

I had one example in Prince Rupert which is a city under 3,000 inhabitants. I found that nearly all the lands in the city and surroundings were held by speculators. They had paid very large prices. Lots on the main street were held at from $800 to $1,000 a foot frontage. I saw a gentleman up there who was looking around for a place to establish a business. He came away feeling that the cost of acquiring a lot, and erecting a building such as would suit his purposes, was beyond his means, and he would not be able to do it effectually and make it pay. I say that is one of the great drawbacks under which Prince Rupert is suffering today. There is no doubt as to the future of that town. It will be a large and growing centre. The terminals of the Grand Trunk Pacific will be the means of placing it amongst the largest and best cities in the Northwest. But one of its great drawbacks is the fact that lands are held by speculators at such a price that they cannot be utilized by the ordinary individual who might wish to reside or to establish a business in that locality.

In the province of New Brunswick the system of assistance by the local government in bringing out immigrants and enabling them to buy lands has greatly added to the population, because a number of people are taking advantage of it, and I am happy to say that the action of the Dominion Government with regard to its grants for educational purposes is calculated in our province to give a greater interest to agriculture.. I hope that they will continue their policy and that it will promote a feeling amongst our own people to remain in our own province, and cultivate more scientifically the lands, of which we have an abundance able to produce a crop and give good returns.

I wish also to refer to the transportation question. The expansion of railways in the western provinces has been enormous. Without those railways, of course, the country could not be opened up for settlement. In going through the country you find that the lands are taken up in the vicinity of the railways first, and as the branches are built, in extending through the agricultural country, you find the land taken up there, and brought under cultivation. I had the pleasure of coming from Edmonton to Winnipeg on the new Grand Trunk Pacific trains. I was astonished to find that nearly all that land was occupied, and beautiful fields of grain were then being harvested as we passed through. That development must continue. The face of the country there is only scratched over, and in order to afford opportunities for settlers, railways will have to be built in the future as they have been in the past. I look for no diminution in the progress of railway building in the Northwest, nor in fact in our country to the east. The building of railways and the transportation question has received the assistance of the Dominion Government to a vast extent for very many years.

The building of the National Transcontinental railway has taken an enormous amount of money, but it has remained for the government of the day, only within the last two years, to turn its attention to the harbours and facilities which are absolutely necessary in the great expansion of the trade of our country in connection with our ports on the Atlantic and Pacific. Last year I visited nearly every port from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I find millions of money appropriated by the Government in the development of these ports: Halifax, Quebec, St. John, Montreal, Toronto, and then when we get to the great lakes, the principal ports are all being provided with extra facilities. When you get to Vancouver on the Pacific Coast you find the facilities are absolutely inadequate for the trade that is already there. This work has been undertaken rather late, but as fast as those facilities can be provided by the Government, I have no doubt they will be utilized to the fullest extent. In the city of St. John we have been developing and the government has appropriated a large sum of money, but there are not wharfs to accommodate the trade that is knocking at our doors at the present moment. And it appears to me it will be some years, before they will be able to overtake the trade. With the completion of the National Transcontinental railway and the completion of the Canadian Northern railway to the Maritime provinces, and the opening up of the country, I have no doubt that the ports in the Maritime provinces will be taxed to a great extent, and therefore we cannot have those facilities furnished too quickly, and they should be equipped with the most modern appliances, to meet the requirements of our import and export trade. With regard to the question of redistribution, I regret very much that in the redistribution which is about to take place, the Maritime provinces will again lose some representation. The province of New Brunswick will lose two, but I trust that the quality of our representation, will make up for the lack of quantity. Looking over the whole of this vast territory of ours, the great and unbroken resources, the mineral wealth of the Northwest yet unknown, the great country stretching thousands of miles, teeming with gold, silver, copper and coal, the fisheries of that great Pacific coast which are only in their infancy, the waters teeming with all kinds of fish, the vast timber limits, the fruit-growing industry and, going as far north as Dawson City, the valleys on the river banks, capable of producing all the vegetables necessary, potatoes and such things, for the sustenance of a very large population in this far north district, when you see the prairie section with only six or seven per cent I believe of agricultural ground yet broken, when you see the development of mines throughout this whole country, and the advance that has taken place in all sections, when you see the vast areas to the north yet untouched that have to be opened up by railway communication —you may well ask what about the future. It appears to me that we can look forward to the future, feeling that the development that will take place within the next ten years will be even greater than anything we have witnessed in the past. While we have gone ahead at such a rapid pace that we must put on the brakes to some extent, still, looking at the resources of this country, and the enormous areas yet to be developed, I think it will justify us in extending our rail and water communications as far as is prudent, to provide the necessary facilities for meeting all the expanding trade that we must have within the near future. Any one who lives for another ten years will, I believe, see this country with a population of fifteen to twenty million, will see our exports trebled or quadrupled as they have been in the past, and will note an expansion of trade, of which one can form a very slight idea at the present moment.

In conclusion, I should like to say one word of a personal nature in connection with the late occupant of the seat which I now occupy. I allude to the Hon. J. V. Ellis. While I did not see eye to eye with him in politics, there was an intimate relationship between himself and me, for very many years. He was known throughout this Dominion, and was highly respected by all classes of the community in which he lived. It was with the greatest regret that we followed him to his grave, and I can only wish to add my quota of respect for him—for his independent views, and strong convictions on every subject, and the courage of those convictions and readiness to give expression to them as every member of the Senate knew, whenever he deemed it proper to speak on any subject.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until three p.m. tomorrow.

THE SENATE

Ottawa, January 21, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON presented the report of the Committee of Selection.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I gave notice that when the report of this committee was presented, I would move that Rule 30 be suspended so far as relates to the adoption of this report.

Hon. Mr. THORNE.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of offering any strenuous opposition to the motion made by the hon. leader of the Opposition—

Hon. MEMBERS—Hon. leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, the hon. leader of the Government. Coming events cast their shadows before.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—A long time before.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the First Minister of England says: 'Wait and see.' This is a somewhat important report and members have not had an opportunity of perusing it, and inasmuch as I understand the House does not propose to proceed to-day with the general business, but to adjourn as a mark of their respect for the memory of the late High Commissioner, this report had better stand over until to-morrow, and it will be printed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It may stand.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—As notice has been given, it requires a majority of the House to have the motion stand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I placed the notice on the paper at the instance of some hon. gentleman, desiring to meet the convenience of the House. However, owing to the objection having been raised by my hon. friend, I am quite willing to let it stand until to-morrow.

The motion was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved that the report of the committee be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN introduced Bill (A) 'An Act to amend the Railway Act with respect to the Deposit of Plans.' He said: I may say the Bill passed this House unanimously last year, and as there is going to be a consolidation of the Railway Act, and as the minister virtually promised me to incorporate this measure in the Act, it is well that he should know that the Senate has not changed its mind.

The Bill was read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yesterday I read to the House from a letter written by Mr.

Andrew Holland, a paragraph which was very insulting to the people of Quebec. I had been informed that the writer was the Mr. Holland who is employed in the Senate. I was misinformed, because the gentleman referred to wrote me a letter stating that the letter in question was not written by him, nor had he any knowledge whatever of the communication until he read it in the Citizen. It is only fair to state that the writer of the letter is not employed in the Senate and has nothing to do with this body. Therefore I think it is not worth mentioning the name. A man writing such a letter does not deserve to be mentioned.

DEATH OF LORD STRATHCONA.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is my sad duty to make some few observations on the death of the Right Hon. Lord Strathcona, High Commissioner for Canada, who early this morning died at his residence in London. His career was probably the most varied, unique and successful that we in Canada know. It is doubtful whether any page in romance affords as interesting and as picturesque a career as that of the late Lord Strathcona.

Born in 1820, it is a far cry from the humble position which he occupied in a small town in Scotland to that which he occupied at his death, of being one of the most commanding figures in the heart of the Empire. Coming to Canada at a period when men were living who lived when Montcalm and Wolfe had fought on the plains of Abraham, he began to carve for himself that wonderful career with which we are to-day so familiar. Subjecting himself to all the hardships, the rigours and adventures common to the Hudson's Bay outposts along the northern fringe of Canada, he surmounted every difficulty until he reached the highest position in the gift of that most remarkable company known as the Honourable the Company of Adventurers trading into Hudson's Bay. It may be said that the association of Lord Strathcona with the Hudson's Bay Company has created for it that deep interest and admiration with which it has been regarded within the Dominion of Canada.

No man in Canada has been more identified with the opening up of our great systems of transportation than has Lord Strathcona. Canada is deeply indebted to him for his invaluable services in promoting the sale f Rupert's Land to the Government of Canada, and thus rounding out the great scheme of confederation which statesmen of that day had in view. Upon Canada entering into possession of that Western territory, Lord Strathcona at once enlisted his genius to opening it up by most modern means of communication. Joining forces with Mr. J. J. Hill, probably the greatest transportation pioneer of the United States, connection by land and water was opened up with the United States, giving access to Rupert's Land through the transportation systems of that great country. To Lord Strathcona, Canada is greatly indebted for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. No man in the courageous group who entered upon that herculean task assumed such a heavy burden as the late Lord Strathcona. His courage, his foresight, his invincible nerve and his unlimited faith in Canada were probably the greatest factors enlisted in building up that enterprise which may be said to-day to be the greatest transportation system in the world.

As a diplomat Canada is greatly indebted to Lord Strathcona. Probably no man in Canada has exercised the high office of diplomacy in behalf of so many troubled questions as did the late High Commissioner. During the first Riel rebellion his good offices were enlisted by the Government of Canada toward bringing into harmony with law and order the seditious elements which then proved so great an obstruction to the settlement of that Western country. Between that period and his occupancy of the office of High Commissioner, the diplomatic services rendered by Lord Strathcona to Canada were of inestimable value.

On his appointment to the office of High Commissioner, by Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, then Prime Minister, and which took place some years after he had passed the allotted span of life, he then entered upon the most commanding position occupied by any man representing the Over Seas Dominions in the heart of the Empire. His services to Canada in that capacity have probably been greater than those rendered by any other Canadian. Lord Strathcona's presence in London, as representing the Dominion of Canada, was an asset of inestimable value. His princely and lavish hospitality, his beneficence as a giver, his philanthrophy in assisting and endowing not only many great institutions in Canada but elsewhere, have placed him in the fore front of the great philanthropists of the age.

Thus in the death of Lord Strathcona Canada has lost its greatest pioneer and empire builder, a great diplomat, its most beneficent giver, its most picturesque figure, a man giving Canada more prominence than any other, and whose name for generations to come will occupy the largest space of any of its sons on the historic page.

As evidence of our esteem and regard and our regrets as a Senate I therefore move the adjourment of the House until tomorrow.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—In common with the leader of the Government, I regret sincerely the occasion that has led to the adjournment. Evidently one of Canada's greatest men has fallen by the way. In such cases we usually say that we stand in the shadow of a great career; today we do not stand in the shadow, but in the luminous light of the greatest career of any Canadian with which most of us have been acquainted. I fully concur in what the hon. leader has said as to the various qualities which distinguished Lord Strathcona. First in my mind stands pre-eminently the resolute purpose which he showed from his early history, down to his latest hour. It required a resolute will in a young man of eighteen years of age to leave the sweet home associations of his native land, and embark on a career not very full of promise, not very bright in its early stages, and spend in obscurity and in loneliness thirteen years amidst the wildest parts of this great Dominion. Then, when transferred to the western district, the prairies boundless and uninhabited, he still showed that resolute purpose in grappling with the difficulties which pertained to his position, and in dealing between those with whom he associated and the great company he represented, in a manner to advance the interests of both. He has passed through difficulties that would have, perhaps, benumbed the strongest purposes of ordinary men. The most notable was the Riel rebellion of 1869. Few can tell how much we owe to Lord Strathcona during that troublous period in our history. The whole West was aflame: the integrity of the Government of Canada was at stake; he was confronted with violent, uneducated half-breeds, the greater part of them, who knew not what law, or order, or good government, was after British methods. In the face of danger to his life, in the face of the greatest difficulty, he met those who were at variance with the British Government and hostile to the institutions which we are endeavouring to transplant to that distant country, and courageously fought his way through, in all instances, as far as was possible, defending the British flag; and in all instances, as far as it was practicable, endeavouring to reconcile those people to a condition of things which they know now, and which they have known long ago, was much better for them than the condition in which they existed prior to that time. To achieve what he has achieved in that respect would be enough to embalm his memory in the history of all Canadians.

I agree with what my hon. friend has said, that Lord Strathcona was a great diplomat. He was the Commissioner of the Dominion of Canada to negotiate terms of peace and amity. In that he succeeded, and to that we owe the peaceable condition, some forty years ago, in which that country was found after his administration of it. He was also a resolute man financially. As my hon. friend has said, he was associated with that great Canadian, J. J. Hill, in opening up that northern country to settlement and to civilization. He invested what money he had to spare in extending the Northern Pacific and later when the Canadian Pacific was passing through that trying crisis in its history, in 1883 and 1884, he, along with some other of his Canadian associates, stood facing what appeared to be absolute bankruptcy, financial ruin to all of them, and so guided and advised the Government of the day, that the road was enabled to accomplish the necessary financial arrangements. He had also the honour of driving the last spike which connected the east and west, and opened up the prairies from Winnipeg through to the Rocky Mountains.

A man less resolute than he perhaps would have succumbed to the difficulties of the occasion, greatly to the loss of Canada, and greatly to the retarding of its development. I might say, too, that I believe he was a resolute man politically. I had the honour of being in the House with him for a number of years. I first met him there at my first session, in 1873. He was, then, in accord with the party in power, and in sympathy with its members, I believe, in all their political aspirations and in their efforts to develop the country. He found it necessary, as he thought, to abandon his political associations and ally himself with the party then in opposition. Every hon. gentleman knows that it requires a great deal of political courage to sever oneself from his old associations. He did so. He did it openly and manfully in the House. I remember the speech in which he conveyed to us his final decision, and although he resumed his alliance with the party of his early days, in all his career as a politician he was courageous to follow his own convictions, and to do what he thought was best for the Dominion of Canada. That quality in his lordship is worthy of all admiration.

All the qualities which distinguished him in business, in politics, in the administration of a great trust, such as was committed to him by the Hudson Bay Company, are qualities which Canadians may well imitate. And now that he has passed away we cannot help but bestow upon him that admiration which every one must feel for a man of courage, a man of achievement, and a man of loyalty to the trust committed to his care. Lord Strathcona had a rich experience in life. Few men's experience is richer. From the humble home which he occupied on the coast of Labrador, how romantic it was, as the hon. leader has said, his trip down to the centre of Canada for a little while, then west to look out on the prairie covered with beautiful snow from Winnipeg to the Rocky mountains, at that time uncultivated and unsettled. It was a remarkable experience, extending from the time when he saw the very first dawn, shall I say, of civilization, to the latter days when he visited that country and found it peopled with teeming thousands; a wild prairie, formerly unproductive and practically valueless, had been turned into a blooming wheat field, where abundant harvests are obtained at the present time. He had a great experience in Canada, an experience of association with the greatest men that Canada has produced, with the founders of Confederation, with the men who laid the foundations of our great Dominion—to be associated with them, if nothing more, would be, in itself, a great experience. But his experience went further. He went to the heart of the Empire, as the hon. gentleman has said. He sat in Council with the leading statesmen of England. He had admission to the royal residences of Her Majesty, and afterwards his Majesty, the late King, and probably of the present King, and to all that was great in that centre of Empire; all that was literary, all that was profound, and all that was mighty and eloquent in administration he associated with in its stages. To pass by the circuit of the Hudson Bay outposts, around to the Parliament of Canada, and further to the Parliament of the Empire, is an experience which few men enjoy, and is an experience in which few men could have added the lustre which Lord Strathcona did to every part of his career. What shall I say? Speaking as a Canadian, what ought we to say, looking over his record here and abroad? He was in all essential respects a loyal Canadian. He showed that while he was in Canada. He showed that during the Boer war in organizing the Strathcona Horse. He showed that in representing us in the council of the nations, and in his philanthropy to Canadian institutions, when he was abroad. He showed that by his demeanour towards every Canadian with whom he came in contact. His house was always open to his friends. His friends were numerous here and numerous abroad as well. Generous hearted and philanthropic, he might be placed in the very first and highest rank, in the list of men of great distinction. To raise Canada in the estimation of the empire, is also a matter of great importance. Wherever he went, whether it was to meetings of council abroad, or whether it was to literary or educational gatherings, to have it said that the man who shines as an administrator is the man who represents Canada, is to give Canada a standing with those who may associate with him which it could not otherwise have obtained. If we have any heart at all, and if we have any love for men of the highest character, if we have any sympathy for those who have promoted our standing as Canadians, we cannot do otherwise than wear the badge of sorrow and regret. And no honour we can do to his memory, and no record of what he has achieved, will fully illustrate what is in the heart of every Canadian regarding him, for the people of Canada grieve over his departure, in the most regretful spirit that I can express. I second the motion for the adjournment of this House, and I hope that long, long years to come those who read of the men of our generation will not forget that among the great men of Canada, in its early history, was the man whose memory and whose passing away from us to-day is so much regretted.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I hope the House will pardon me on this occasion if I take the opportunity to offer also a tribute to the memory of the late lamented Lord Strathcona. I will not speak about him as the hon. leader of the Government, or the hon. leader of the Opposition, has done, but will speak of him from the two points of view in which I knew him very well. Some thirty-four years ago, Lord Strathcona, then plain Mr. Smith, was a resident of the city of Montreal. For several years he was president of the St. Andrew's Society, and, as such, Mr. Smith did more than any man that I know of to build up social life in the metropolis of Canada. He consulted the interests of the different races, and made himself known throughout Montreal, and afterwards throughout the empire, as a peace maker. Mr. Smith, at that time, as president of St. Andrew's Society, attended nearly every entertainment given by the different national societies of the metropolis—St. George's, Caledonia, St. Patrick, St. Jean Baptiste and all the others. I was at that time president of St. Patrick's Society, and one night, at the annual banquet of St. Andrew's Society, sitting next to Mr. Smith, I said: 'Mr. Smith, how can you, at your age, go around to all these entertainments, concerts, balls and banquets?' He was about sixty-three, and I was a young man, and I told him that I found it hard enough to go to these entertainments, and he said: 'My dear Cloran, take my advice when you go to these places, especially the banquets, be frugal and eat little. You see what I am doing—eating very little.' I took his advice, and I think it was good. Sir Donald Smith was at the head of all movements to promote unity and to consolidate all the nationalities which make up the population of Canada. In that work, I think he accomplished as much for Canada as in the building of the Canadian Pacific railway. He bound the hearts of the people by the threads of love, and that is a noble work. It is true he bound the extremities of Canada by a band of steel. That was also a courageous work, but Mr. Smith, before he became Lord Strathcona, was laying the foundation of a happy nationhood in this country. Before he started in this courageous work of building up Canada's industries and developing them, he was uniting the hearts of the people. When questions of race and creed arose in this country, Lord Strathcona showed himself to be a peacemaker. On the two points I have mentioned, I wish to add my tribute to his memory as a great social—I will not say reformer—but social uplifter and peacemaker. His name remains in the hearts of the people as such, as well as the builder of an empire and as the advance agent of a great nation.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned until three o'clock tomorrow.

THE SENATE.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Orders of the Day being called:

Further consideration of His Royal Highness the Governor General's speech on the occasion of the opening of the third session of the twelfth Parliament, and the motion of Colonel the hon. Mr. Mason, seconded by the hon. Mr. Thorne, that an humble address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General in answer thereto.—

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—In speaking of the question before the House, my first word must be one of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the motion, upon which we will express a final opinion later on. We had from the mover of this resolution just such a speech as I expected from an hon. gentleman of his experience in finance, in banking, and in the administration of affairs of large financial corporations. I congratulate him upon the moderate view, shall I say the well balanced view, which he appeared to take of the financial situation. I do not agree with those who say that the sky is cloudless. I think it is by no means cloudless, nor could I agree with those who say that we are on the verge of a very serious financial depression. I think our position is one midway between the two. There have been more prosperous times in Canada than we have to-day, and there have been times of greater depression. It may take a year or two, as my hon. friend has said, before we pass through our present condition, into more hopeful and more prosperous conditions. But with the exercise of due discrimination, on the part of our large banking corporations, and with the natural swing of the pendulum, which I trust will come to Canada, as it comes to other countries similarly situated, the time may soon arrive when the sky will be cleared, and when Canada can march on with her large giant-like strides towards a greater financial and commercial prosperity. Of course, if we followed our old practice—and my hon. friend from Hastings will remember what it was forty years ago—if there is anything wrong in financial circles, and if there is any depression, we blame the Government for it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS—I remember distinctly how loudly our political opponents blamed us about 1875-76-77 and 1878 for the depression which then existed. They sought a cure. Perhaps the cause was, to a certain extent, remediable, but I do not believe that governments can remedy every grievance. And yet, I am bound to say that where it lies within the range of a government to remove a grievance, they are bound to act. Now, what is the cause of the present depression? I do not know precisely. I do not know anybody who does know. I think it would require a man of the genius of Adam Smith to explain fully the situation. I am not going to blame the Government for the depression but, in looking around, if its members can find anything which would clarify the situation, and lift the cloud which is on the sky, then they should immediately apply themselves to enact such remedy. We complain of the high cost of living. What is the cause? It is a combination of a great many causes, and it will be the first duty of the Government—for it is universally admitted that the cost of living is high—to examine into those causes. Would it help the situation to remove the duty from foodstuffs? If on inquiry it would be found to be helpful for that purpose, then the Government should act. The Government of the United States revised its tariff last year for that purpose. In 1846 Sir Robert Peel removed the duty on corn in order to relieve the distressed condition abroad in Ireland, and which, in some respects, extended to England also. If it be found that there are trusts and combinations which stand between the producer and consumer, and exact an undue toll upon the produce that passes from the one to the other, the Government should exercise the power which it has under the statutes, and see that such trusts and combinations, if they do exist, should be at once abolished. In the same way, if transportation freights are too high, and the Government is empowered to regulate them through the Railway Commission, they should be immediately inquired into, and a just balance struck between the transportation companies' charges, and the producers, whose goods are by them carried into the markets of the world. I am not prescribing any specific; I could not do it, perhaps, with my knowledge of economics, even if I were to attempt it. I am simply indicating this; that there is a cause or combination of causes for the high cost of living, and the Government is responsible, so far as it lies within its power, to bring about a proper equilibrium between the producer and consumer, and see that the wrong, if wrong there be, is immediately redressed. I was glad to notice my hon. friend refer in the rosy terms which he did to the growth of our commerce and trade, and to the steady increase of exports and imports. It is very pleasing to know that for 20 years or more there has been a steady growth in the trade of Canada. That growth should be maintained, or at least promoted, by every means within the power of the Government of Canada. Trade will follow the flag; trade will follow sound commercial principles; trade will follow the enterprise of those engaged in it. All these are conditions which the Government controls more or less; and we hope that although under the late Government there was unbounded prosperity—such prosperity as Canada had never enjoyed—the advent to power of the present occupants of the treasury benches will not impair that prosperity. We hope too the present Government will not neglect the various opportunities at its disposal for increasing it, for the success of Canada depends upon the wise administration of commercial affairs. I may express the hope that my hon. friend from Toronto, who has made himself known to us from his place on the floor, will long continue to hold the moderate views which he now entertains, and give to us the benefit of his ripe experience in financial matters.

We heard from the hon. member from St. John (Hon. Mr. Thorne), whom we gladly welcome here, a very interesting story of two trips he took across the continent, the first one in 1901. It was a revelation to him, as it has been to every one of us who has crossed the Canadian part of this continent. He saw things that he had never dreamed of, so have we all. Little villages had grown into towns and become the nuclei of large cities, he saw the beginnings of large enterprises, and he came home pleased and delighted with what he had seen, and hopeful as to the future. Twelve years later he went over the same ground. The little villages had grown into towns, and the towns into cities. Stub lines of railway had been extended hundreds of miles, transportation companies had been organized, and railway tracks gridironed the country. Everything was booming. Even the Rocky mountains seemed brighter the second time he crossed the continent. I congratulate him on the pleasant tale he told—the story of an hon. gentleman who appreciated what prosperity was. And I do most sincerely trust that the prosperity which prevailed for those twelve years under the late Administration will be taken as an evidence of what that Administration has done in promoting transportation, immigration, and the settlement of the country, and that there will be no decline in the high standard achieved by the late Government.

Passing on to the first paragraph, I concur very heartily in the expressions of sympathy to which these two hon. gentlemen gave deliverance with regard to the recovery of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught. Their Royal Highnesses, during their short stay in Canada have endeared themselves to the people of the Dominion by their kindly manner, by their interest in everything pertaining to the social and public life of the country, and by the assiduity with which they put themselves at the disposal of corporations, organizations and educational institutions in endeavouring to add to their interest and usefulness. I do not know anything occurring in many years that has pleased Canadians more than when they learned that their Royal Highnesses had returned to Canada to resume the duties of their high offices, and that Her Royal Highness would be well enough and strong enough to take her full share in the duties she has so far discharged so acceptably to the people of Canada.

I must proceed to notice one or two things in the Address which I think deserve our attention. As a whole I do not think the Address contains matter of such interest and importance as some addresses I have heard from the Throne, and I have heard quite a number since I first entered Parliament about forty years ago. The bill of fare, to use a common expression, is not very large. I do not know whether it is very nutritious or not. We will know better by the time it is consumed, and I hope we will not spend an unreasonable time around the table in disposing of the materials placed before us.

I notice the Address reports progress on the National Transcontinental railway. I must say I am a little disappointed that the progress has not been as great as we expected a few years ago. I am a little disappointed at hearing a report, whether true or not, that the character of that road is not to be maintained to the standard prescribed originally. I do not think a greater mistake could be made with that vast scheme than to lower the standard originally intended. Such lowering of the standard means an addition to the cost of transportation which might be very serious. It means depriving us of the honour which I saw in sight, of having one of the greatest railway systems in the world, constructed on the most approved basis, and calculated to open up a very large extent of country, already waiting for settlement. I hope my fear is groundless. The hon. gentleman when he speaks can tell us whether it is so or not. I am also disappointed somewhat in the progress made on the Hudson Bay railway. We have, I understand, about ninety miles of it completed. The road will exceed four hundred miles in length. There are very ominous rumours as to the adequacy of the terminal on the Hudson Bay, as to it being by no means the best terminal that could be found. I think it is not too late, if proper inquiry were made, to change from Port Nelson to Port Churchill, if the latter is found to be the proper terminal. It would entirely destroy the purpose of building that road; if it were found, as is represented, that ships could not enter the harbour. If these ships have to stand out four or five miles, and be loaded and unloaded, the means of transportation which the road was intended to provide, for western grain, would be hampered by conditions such as these. My hon. friend can tell us whether there is any truth in the stories we have heard, and whether it is the intention of the government to place beyond all possible doubt, the adequacy of the terminal at Port Nelson, for the purpose for which such terminal was acquired.

I am glad to notice one or two things in the Address, of which I think we can all appreciate. First is the construction of the large elevator at Fort William. That has greatly facilitated in the transfer of the products of the West to the sea, and to the markets of the world. If other terminal elevators can be equally successful we can afford to have a few more. I am glad to notice that some provision has been made, or some inquiry made as to the necessary conditions for improving the safety of ships at sea. The terrible disasters such as occurred on the upper lakes last November, would be partially relieved, or their serious consequences would be materially reduced, if our upper lakes were properly lighted. That has not been done yet. It is one of the duties of the Department of Marine and Fisheries to see that it is done quickly. The loss of two or three hundred lives, and millions of property, is a serious matter. We had some time ago a great difficulty in navigating the St. Lawrence, from Montreal say to the Gulf, because of inadequate lighting of the route. Now it is said to be as safe to go by that route, either by day or night, as to sail in the open sea. If by the expenditure of a reasonable amount of money, or any money that would be proper under the circumstances, we would render sailing in autumn or at any season of the year less dangerous to life and property, I think the department should apply itself to that purpose. The matter is pressing, it is urgent, and should be attended to without delay.

I notice that the Bill provides a morsel which might require some time adequately to masticate, or perhaps ultimately to digest, namely the redistribution of the constituencies which I think will affect nearly every province of the Dominion. We have had no indication yet as to how the redistribution is to be accomplished. We have had several redistributions, one every decennial census since 1872. Some of them were very bad. Some of them were very good. The worst that I ever knew was in 1882. My hon. friend from Hastings will pardon me for referring to him, but as he and I were opponents in the House, and I was a material sufferer from that redistribution, he cannot blame me for saying a word about it. I do not think anything could be worse than the form of the Redistribution Bill. I am not going to attribute it to political motives, but nevertheless it was a curious piece of legislation. Some forty or fifty constituencies were disturbed in their boundaries in order to add four seats to the representation in the province of Ontario. If any map-maker, or any man designing to give four seats to the province of Ontario could work it out and apportion the four seats among forty or fifty constitutencies it would be one of the greatest achievements which I know of in legislation. It was done. What was its purpose? It did not equalize population to any great extent. It kept a number of men from being elected who, under different conditions, would have been elected. It strengthened the Conservative party to a considerable extent. I doubt if any man in this period of history will defend that Redistribution Bill in any of its aspects. The last redistribution we had in 1903 was accomplished by a Committee of the House, the report of which was acceptable practically to the House, when the question was considered in its final stages. In the old country they had a Redistribution Bill in 1884, prepared by Mr. Gladstone, and Lord Granville, on one side, and Lord Salisbury and Sir Stafford Northcote on the other side of the table, with some assistance from the government whips. They agreed upon the principle of redistribution and allowed a number of experts to work it out. No complaint was made as to the agreement between the leaders of the parties, nor as to the redistribution when it was made. There does seem some common sense in that method. There does seem some readiness to act upon principles of equity and justice. It seems a reasonable thing where the interests of both parties are equal, where the object to be attained is to get a fair reflection of public opinion, that the parties should agree to allow public opinion to express itself in as reasonable, and in as free a manner as possible; and that the power conferred upon the House of Commons should not be used to destroy the influence of one party or to magnify the importance of another. If this redistribution is accomplished as the last was in 1903, by a committee and reported to the House as such committees usually do, I think the Senate will have no trouble with that Bill. I would be exceedingly sorry if we had to revise it, which I do not think we would want to do, at all. It does not come within our purview. It is to a considerable extent a matter of domestic concern, and I should be exceedingly sorry if it were so badly done that our sense of justice would be shocked, that we would revolt at the idea of placing upon the statute book a Redistribution Bill that was not founded upon principles of equity and justice. There need be no fear of bringing any Bill, so founded, into this House. This Senate has rejected three Redistribution Bills in its history—actually rejected them. A Conservative Senate did so, and no Senate can be more moderate in its views or more equitable in its opinions, judging from what we hear nowadays, than a Senate in which the Conservative party has a majority.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir GEO. ROSS—The Bill of 1874—I do not know whether it was justifiable or not, I am not going to discuss it on the merits—was thrown out. Sufficient for my purpose to say what occurred; it would be taking up too much time to discuss it. Another Bill was thrown out in 1899, and another in 1900. These three Bills were wholly kicked out of the doors for reasons which the Senate thought sufficient. I am not going to blame the members of the Senate. If it were an open question now, the facts of the case might be presented, to justify their action. I do not propose to do that, but what I do propose to say is that, if those redistribution Bills were rejected in this Senate for some good reason, this Senate in later days would not be very much to blame in repeating that action, if it were justified by the facts. I hope the facts would not warrant us in taking that course.

Then I notice in the Address that there is to be an increase in the Senate. We welcome any increase to this body, of men elected on proper grounds, who would bring to the Senate the qualities necessary to add to its dignity and influence. Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan are entitled under existing laws to an increase of two members. British Columbia is not entitled by any law or any power within this Parliament, to an increase. That is no reason why it should not get such increase, if it were submitted in a proper and constitutional manner. We would raise no objections on this side of the House to any increase of the Senate that is made on a constitutional basis. These are features of the Bill of which we greatly approve.

I notice also that it is intended to keep up the pressure, shall I say, of public opinion with regard to the improvements necessary in agriculture. I think it is of first-class importance to Canada that all the moneys we have to spare, and all the energy that can be brought to bear upon the question, and all the scientific skill of the greatest experts in agriculture, should be utilized at the present moment to increase the productivity of our soil, and to increase the supplies that go on the market, from time to time, to the consumer. It is rather a curious thing, and it is not confined to Canada alone, that we have much fewer cattle in proportion to our population than we had ten years ago. Well, that means less competition; it means a more meagre supply of meat products; it necessarily means an increased price—and the same may be said of sheep and swine. We do not produce as much grain in Ontario as I think we should. Quebec does not yet grow enough wheat to feed it's own people, nor do any of the Maritime provinces, except Prince Edward Island, produce sufficient wheat for home consumption. Along all those lines intensive agriculture, the term commonly used, should be so applied that this wonderful country of ours, rich as the Garden of Eden if properly attended to agriculturally, ought to produce a much larger surplus of food products than it does now. Orchards would yield more abundantly than they do now, if properly treated. Waste lands that are unproductive should be made productive. It is not the fault of the soil or climate, nor of nature's bounty, that these conditions exist. I think it is the call from the cities and towns, the inconsiderate views impressed by farmers themselves upon their sons, the race for social distinction, and what else I cannot wait to say, that is increasing abnormally our urban population, and reducing in the same proportion the rural population. Some counties have fewer on their farms than they had last census, and little towns have grown largely at the expense of those rural districts. How is that education to be brought about? I think great good is being done by our present system, but the harvest is plentiful while the labourers are few. The cost of labour is too high for the farmer, he says. There ought to be some means of distributing the large number of immigrants who come to this country into the rural districts. How it is going to be done I do not know. The Government has its officials, and its experts, and can work that problem out themselves. Without discussing the causes of the present reduced productiveness of our soil, and our cattle markets, it is evident that something ought to be done, and done as quickly as possible. I am pleased, then, to commend the Government for what they have done in agriculture, in promoting safety at sea, and in the general administration of those departments.

Now, the Speech from the Throne is to me remarkable, not so much for what it contains, as for what it does not contain.

There are omissions which to my mind are very striking—inexcusable, I was going to say—and for which I can give no explanation whatever. For instance, why has the Highway Bill been withdrawn? It was one of the pet bills of the Government. It came here on its mission of usefulness, so it was alleged, twice. We are charged with having rejected the Highway Bill. We never rejected the Highway Bill, neither once nor twice. It was stated in the other Chamber a day or two ago that we rejected it. The Bill was amended; it was our privilege to amend it; it was much better constitutionally as we amended it than it was originally. And if it were brought in again, on a sound constitutional basis, I think the Senate would pass the Bill, if it thought it could do so constitutionally. Let me say that since the Bill was before us last session, I have changed my attitude towards it somewhat. I did not oppose it; the majority on this side of the House, in the amendments that we made to the Bill, did not oppose it; but I do not think the Bill has any right in this House. I do not think it is a Bill that can be constitutionally presented in this House. I think it is indirectly in violation of the principles of the British North America Act. That is my view in reference to the Highway Bills. I will give the reasons. We could have a Highways Bill in this House, with an amendment by the Imperial Government of section 91 of the British North America Act. The first question that arises: Has Parliament authority, without Imperial legislation, to grant a subsidy to a province to aid in the performance of duties for which the province is already receiving aid under the Federal pact? I do not think it has. When the British North America Act was passed by the Parliament of England, it divided the jurisdiction and the functions of government between the provinces and the House of Commons. We cannot transfer any function of government from one House to the other without Imperial legislation, that is clear. Otherwise we could pull down the whole fabric of Confederation. I do not think we have any such power. If we have no power to transfer the functions of the Senate and the House of Commons to the provincial legislature, then we have no power to appropriate money that belongs to the Federal Government to the uses of the provinces. That must be equally clear. Mr. Blake, in discussing the 'better terms' with Nova Scotia in 1869 or 1870, laid down this principle.

He said:

> That under the Union Act the public service of each Province shall be provided for out of the revenues thereof.

The public service of the province shall be provided for out of the revenue of the province. One of the public services of the province is to make highways. The cost of making and maintaining those highways is a charge on the province. He continues:

> —and not out of the revenues of Canada which were to be appropriated to the public service of Canada solely, and that thus the great grievance of the application of general funds to local services shall be removed for ever.

Now the Dominion Government started on its career with a certain source of revenue and a certain amount of revenue which were intended for its own use. Can the Dominion Government take the revenue which the provinces originally surrendered for its own exclusive use, and apply them to a different purpose? I do not think it can. I think that is quite clear. The compact between the provinces and the Dominion Government, in regard to the functions of the Government, as well as in regard to its financial considerations, was the product of an Act of the Dominion Parliament, practically a treaty, as Lord Carnarvon held, and as all authorities on the constitution hold to-day. As was stated in this House, and as stated in the other chamber by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick before he left that chamber, that is the foundation rule of the constitution, in regard to the matter. Now a Highways Bill contravenes that for the reasons I have given.

Secondly, I would say, granting that a subsidy may be given to a province for some special purpose, can the Federal Government enter upon the provincial domain, and expend such subsidy by its own officers, even with the consent of the provincial legislature or the order of the Lieutenant Governor in Council? I do not think it can. In the early clauses of that Bill such power was retained to the Dominion Government; it could build and maintain highways. The only rule of the constitution is that where a local undertaking is declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, then the Government of the Dominion can take that local undertaking over. It then ceases to be local; it becomes national. The attempt in this Bill to get around that clause of the constitution was rather ingenious. After saying 'that the highways were to be taken over for the general advantage of Canada,' it said 'we will pay this money on the condition that the provincial legislature and the Lieutenant Governor in Council will agree to our so doing.' Now, I hold they cannot agree to surrender their power over the highways any more than they can surrender their power over education, or hotel licenses, or anything else of a local nature. It is not in their jurisdiction to surrender any power given to them under the constitution, except with the consent of the Imperial Government. If they were allowed to surrender under an agreement with the Dominion Government, any power they possess, they could surrender every power they possess, and our Confederation would cease to be a confederation. It would be a legislative union, and you would pull down the whole fabric of Confederation. I have here a remark of Lord Watson of the Privy Council, on that question. He says that the Dominion cannot give jurisdiction, or leave jurisdiction, with the province. It cannot give jurisdiction, and it cannot leave jurisdiction with a province—that is it cannot give the province more than it possesses and it cannot leave with a province anything it does not possess. The provincial parliaments could not give jurisdiction to the Dominion Parliament to enter on the domain of a province. If they have that jurisdiction, they possess it by virtue by the Act of 1867. I think we must get rid of the idea that either one or the other can enlarge the jurisdiction of the other or surrender jurisdiction to the other. Thus the Highways Bill is, ab initio. a violation of the constitution, and I would say to my hon. friend on a question of such vast importance, that before he introduces another Highways Bill, he ought to get the advice of the Supreme Court, and carry the case as far as necessary, in order that we will not be asked to legislate in the dark, and under grave doubts on such a question as is involved in the Highways Bill. Do not let it be supposed for a moment that the Senate is not inclined to help the provinces. We did not object to the Bill to grant aid to agriculture, because the Dominion has concurrent jurisdiction with the provinces. We were glad to give the provinces that assistance. But, when you come to subsidize the provinces, if it is for work which is under the jurisdiction of the provinces, if it takes from the Dominion treasury money which does not belong to the province, and which the Dominion holds as a trustee for the people of Canada, then you are travelling on very dangerous ground, and I do hope that our rejection of this Bill, or rather our amendments to this Bill from time to time will be a warning to the Department of Justice, and to the distinguished leader of the Government to see that the Senate is not asked any more to dispose of a Bill which I believe is not—though I do not claim to be a high constitutional authority and simply give a warning—to be within the purview of the House of Commons.

Let me go on a little further. I noticed several other Bills are being treated as having been rejected by the Senate and are not to be re-introduced on that account. For instance, the Highways Bill is not going to be introduced. The Branch Lines Railway Bill is not going to be introduced. The Naval Bill is not going to be introduced. Why this shivering on the shore? Why this dread of the opposition of the Senate, if these Bills are right? Britain had a Home Rule Bill in 1886. The House of Lords did not want it. Gladstone did not stop there; he introduced another in 1893. The House of Lords did not want that one. Then in 1911 the Government of the day simply said to the Lords; this Bill is absolutely necessary we think, and we will see that it does pass! But this Government of Canada at the present moment thinks the Highways Bill and the Branch Lines Railway Bill are good; but good as they are they must stand over until Providence comes to their help. It is not the will of the people they are considering in this case; it is rather the ability of the under taker to do a certain amount of work. And when he does it, he is quite sure that dead men tell no tales. How could they offer any opposition to the members of the House of Commons? They may rise in their shrouds and haunt them, and very probably they would, haunt the government for being so timid in a matter of so great importance to the Dominion. But whatever the ghosts of these senators may do, living senators in this Chamber have a right to expect more from a Government with a majority of thirty or forty, yet we get no more.

Let me go on to consider the next Bill which is not to be brought down, the Branch Lines Bill. Why the hesitation to bring this bill down the second time? In 1910, a Branch Lines Bill, not in the same terms, but with the same objectionable features, was sent up by the House of Commons. Mr. Graham was then the Minister of Railways and Canals. We amended that Bill, but Mr. Graham refused to accept our amendments. He called for a conference. The conference was held and we agreed on a compromise Bill which both Houses accepted. That was, I think the Act of sensible men—but notice the political relation. We were a liberal senate, dealing with a Bill introduced by a liberal government, in a non-partisan way, as every one admitted. But when we deal with a Bill brought in by a Conservative Government on precisely the same grounds, and for similar reasons, then we are partisan. Now is not that unfair? Is it not absurd? I am surprised. I am not censorious and I do not mean to be discourteous—for we do not govern in this country by being censorious, and I hope we do not govern by being discourteous,—but we govern as Englishmen are said to govern by speaking out our mind. What right have we to be charged with partisanship? We dealt with a Bill from our own friends on precisely the same grounds that we dealt with the Bill brought in by the present Government, and for similar reasons. Why should that Bill not be brought in again? Have we got to that pass in Canada now; or has the Honse of Commons begun to be influenced by that high spirit of haughtiness, that they are not prepared to discuss with the Senate or allow the Senate to reconsider Bills that are amended? Is that the way to deal with the country. How is it in the United States when appropriation or revenue Bills are sent to the Senate, of which the Senate does not approve? Why, there is a confrence. On Wilson's tariff Bill the conferences were half as long as the discussions on the Bills originally, and resulted in a settlement. I am speaking to this side of the Senate and am prepared to say that if the Government has difficulty in accepting our amendments, we are prepared to go into conference. If we cannot agree, nothing happens. By the next session we may change our mind, or the House of Commons might change theirs. I would refer hon. gentlemen to the change which took place in Sir John Macdonald's mind, in regard to the union of Canada. He thought it should be a legislative union, and not a federal union. It was a sensible change; by no other form could the union have been achieved. Sir John Macdonald changed his mind in regard to the Franchise Bill introduced in 1885. The first Bill was brought into the House in 1883. It was not passed. The Bill that was finally passed, was very different from the first Bill. Every legislator knows that new conditions require new applications, of rules and principles, and to say that this Bill, if it is important to the country, should be withheld because the Government dread that the Senate might throw it out, is not the stand of high-class legislators, nor is it high-class statesmanship. There are sitting around the leader of the Government, in the other House, men who have changed their minds, men who have voted for the Naval Bill—and have thus acted the very opposite to the views they presented to their constituents. They have quite a right to change their minds, and perhaps others could change their minds on some of these measures if they thought it in the public interest that they should. There is no reason why the Bills should not be presented again.

Then we have the Naval Bill which is not to be brought down again. The reason given for that is rather peculiar. They thought the honour and dignity of the country could be better maintained by allowing the status quo to remain, rather than to face the effect of what they call the rejection of the Bill. Here is what the right hon. leader of the Government said in the other House a few days ago.

> It has been avowed and declared by leaders of the Opposition and by their organs that the Bill if introduced again under present conditions would again be rejected in the Senate. We have no reason to doubt that such is the determination of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Under these circumstances we do not regard it as desirable either in the interests of the empire or of Canada that the Opposition majority in the Senate should be given another opportunity of rejecting the Bill and of again bringing discredit to this Dominion and detriment to the empire. Nevertheless we are firm in our determination that these ships shall be provided, and we adhere to the declaration which I made on the last day of the past session, and which I take the liberty of repeating.

That is rather a grave statement to make. Last year there was an emergency. We all felt there was something in the air. We were troubled. I confess I was a good deal troubled. But as the session went on the emergency seemed to diminish.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Evaporate.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS—Evaporated, diminished in size and importance, and by the time we came to the discussion of the Bill in this House, nobody seemed to be afraid. The Government believing that emergency, as no doubt it did, and anxious for the protection of Canada and the Empire, brought in a Bill. Now there is no emergency, of course, or we would have the Bill. But is it sound policy, or is it statesmanship to have a Naval Bill only when there is an emergency? It would take three years to build the ships. Tremendous emergencies may arise within three years. And here the Government is sitting at rest, while the nations of the world are sharpening their swords, and laying the keels of great dreadnoughts from the Atlantic to the North Sea. And because the Senate of Canada rejected their Bill—amended or delayed their Bill rather—they will do nothing. We did not reject the Bill. We did not destroy one feature of it. We delayed it. But the Government is sitting, and letting the nations of Europe prepare against Great Britain. I do not call that statesmanship. Perhaps I do not know what statesmanship is. I would say that if the Empire were in danger last year, it is in danger this year. And I would say that it is always in danger, that no nation of the world is free from the menace of other nations. Did the United States begin to build a navy when there was an emergency? They began it twenty years before, in a period of perfect calm, not a cloud in the sky, not a menace from either side. With the foresight of a great people they said, 'The time may come when it will be necessary to have a navy. We will anticipate the future, and will build ships to protect our coasts and commerce.' They are still building them, and they are pretty nearly in the second rank of first-class nations in sea defences. There was no emergency when they commenced their navy. That was statesmanship. Was there any emergency when Japan began her great system of building battleships? The emergency came years after the keels of many ships for Japan were laid. They were wisely laid. They were anticipating danger, as you have to anticipate in every condition of national life, and when the emergency came they were ready, and Russia felt the shock of that tremendous blow which they administered on the sea of Japan, and the coast of Asia, in their defence of the institutions of their country. That was better statesmanship in Japan—that nation which marched fifty years ago from the ranks of barbarism—than we have in Canada to-day. We should not wait for a menace, or an emergency but we should lay the foundations deep and strong, and the time may come before the ships are built that an emergency may arise. The Government is losing time. They will be held responsible by the people of Canada, and the people of the Empire if an emergency should arise before the ships are gone to war, and before the strong arm of Canada is reached out to help the British Empire. They will be responsible for any injury or evil consequence that may arise, when we have to face the emergency in the North sea, or wherever we have to face it. That is my contention, and I do not think any public man in Canada, or anywhere else, would justify the manner in which the Naval Bill is being disposed of. The Bill is to stand over—I do not know for how long. There is no mention of that. We may begin to build battleships sooner than we expect, but in the meantime it is postponed. I think we should be prepared to face the evil day as soon as possible. When we delayed the last Bill in order that the people might be heard from, we did not delay the building of ships. Why within twenty-four hours of the defeat of the Bill in this House—shall I call it defeat?—the Government could, under the Act of 1910, proceed with the construction of these ships.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Hear, hear, as many as they liked.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—They could call for tenders, but they did not. No, and on what grounds? I do not believe in the high mightiness of the Czar of all the Russias or any Czar under a democratic or any form of government. If their motive was that they should not act because they did not get their own way, then it was no motive at all. We said; 'Let it be delayed until we hear from the people.' They could dissolve the House next day, they could hear from the people, and they might hear something that would not be very agreeable. I do not know what they would hear. But they did not want to hear from the people. In six weeks from the defeat of that Bill, the people could be heard from, and if the people said 'Well done good and faithful servants, go and build these three battleships, let us have them at once,' they would have been half, or a quarter built by this time. So that on both grounds their rejection of the Naval Bill is indefensible. First, it is indefensible, on the ground that they did not proceed under legislation they now have, and meet on the ground that they might have proceeded by reference to the people.

It is not too late to mend. It is never too late to mend. We objected to the Naval Bill last year on various grounds. If the House will excuse me, I will just repeat some of the objections we made. These objections can be easily removed without any injury to the feeling or to the amour propre of the government, and without any detriment to the country. These objections are stated seriatim in the address I had the honour to give at that time, and I will refresh the memory of hon. gentlemen by recapitulating them, if the House will permit me. My objection to the Bill was because it was unnecessary. Everybody admits that. That has never been contraverted by hon. gentlemen opposite. My second objection was that it established a line of cleavage in defence, between the two parties. That is a terrible and humiliating condition of things—two great parties at variance with each other on a matter of life and death, it never so happened in England, even in the dissensions that arose over the Crimean or the Boer wars. While the war was on, both parties locked arms and marched side by side, in parliament and out of it, for the defence of the honour of England. That is what we ought to do. The defence of Canada and the honour of Canada is not in the custody of one party more than the other. It is not a question of loyalty. It is a question of respect for the tremendous interests involved. I say there was no ground for the course taken last year. There should be no cleavage in defence. And if, in 1909, both parties were united—and the resolution which formed that union—that resolution which recognized the bonds that were established by parliament for the union of both parties on the line of defence—the resolution which bound the two parties was largely drafted or amended by the leader of the opposition to suit his purposes.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The present Premier.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS—The present Premier. And he wanted the thing speedily done. The word speedily is an expressive word, and was put into the resolution at his special request. In 1909 it was to be speedily done, and now it is 1914. Was there ever a ship that sailed so slowly as the three great dreadnoughts which the hon. gentlemen were to build? How long have they been in office? Since September 21, 1911. Over two years and not a keel laid, not a spike driven—nothing done. Is the ship rolling in the harbour? No, there is no ship to roll, and no harbour in which it is asked to roll. Let us unite without fear of what the consequences may be, upon some policies. This Senate is prepared to go so far as it can, constitutionally, and meet the views of gentlemen opposite if they will only give us the opportunity. I have said that the government has not provided for the defence of Canada, directly. Is it not very simple to frame a Bill that would provide for the defence of Canada directly—not a Bill in which we hire men to defend us, or in which we hire foreign labour to build ships, but a Bill to defend Canada directly? We have no evidence that the Bill meets with public approval, because it introduces a new practice in legislation not sanctioned by parliament: that is taking a vote in advance for three years' expenditure. Can a vote be taken for more than one year's expenditure? And again my objection was because it removed from the control of Canada, one of its elements of national defence, namely the three battleships proposed.

Now, can we get back to first principles, and in all these things find some ground of common defence? Last year I said we stood for the defence of Britain, from Australia to the pole. That was the position laid down by me in the Senate, and against which I have heard no protest from one side of the House or the other. Then I said, 'we stand for as many battleships of the most modern type as are required, at any rate to the limit of our resources.' That has never been objected to. I said: 'we stand, thirdly, for a permanent Canadian navy, to guard the coasts and trade routes of commerce, when Great Britain and all other nations are at peace.' Fourthly, I said: 'we stand for the construction of the navy and dockyards, using for that purpose the product of Canadian resources;' and so on, and so on.

That was our position last year. What is the position to-day of gentlemen on the opposite side of the House? It is not for me to say, nor is it for me to make a policy for them. I could not do it, if I tried, although I do think it would be much better than the one they have, though it might not be acceptable to them. It is their duty, however, to see if some modus vivendi could not be found whereby both parties could agree upon a question of such vast magnitude. Now let them come down with their proposal. I cannot indicate what would be acceptable, for that would be traversing far beyond my position, even as leader of the Opposition; but let us have some proposal, which I think we have a right to expect, and which might very properly be called for. Not only have we the judgment of the members of the Opposition and the majority of this House, that the Bill was not a wise Bill, but we can quote the opinion of some great statesmen on the subject. I shall just quote the opinion of one gentleman who was Governor General of Canada, and a very acceptable one, Lord Lansdowne, which shows that the principle in this Bill is a faulty one. In a speech which he delivered in Ottawa just shortly before he left Canada, after the close of his career as Governor General, he spoke as follows, illustrating more particularly that whatever is done in defence of the Empire, should be unconditional, and with the full consent of the Parliament of Canada, and should not be in breach of our constitution or at variance with the principles of responsible government. He said:

Let me say frankly that in my opinion public sentiment in the great possessions of the Crown would be exposed to a great strain if the self-governing colonies were ever to be required to part with any material portion of the freedom which they now enjoy in the management of their own affairs.

It will be noticed that under the Naval Bill the terms and conditions, and arrangements were to be agreed upon between the Government of Canada, and His Majesty's Government of Great Britain, and under those terms and conditions we would necessarily part with some of our freedom. Lord Lansdowne did not think that could be done. He further says:

I have the honour of a very close acquaintance with a considerable number of your legislators here, and I will venture to say that there is no feeling stronger in their minds, and in those of their constituents, than the feeling that in purely constitutional affairs the Canadian recognizes the absolute supremacy of the Canadian Parliament.

No division of authority between the Parliament of Canada, and any other Parliament in our own affairs; that is sound doctrine. In the case of the Naval Bill, there was to be a division in regard to the naval policy of the Government:

Now, I do not believe that public sentiment here would tolerate any change depriving it of that authority, or transferring any portion—let us say, to an Imperial chamber sitting at Westminster.

If Lord Lansdowne had been speaking from my place on the naval policy of the Government, he could not put our objections more strongly and clearly than he did, and yet he spoke about twenty years before that policy was brought down:

Take for example a great question which is now engaging the attention of the public and Her Majesty's Government at home—I mean the question of Imperial defence. There is, I think, room for a great improvement in the existing conditions of things. There is no reason why the Governments of the great colonies and the United Kingdom should not agree beforehand as to what measures are to be taken with the military and naval forces at their disposal for the protection of large portions of our Imperial possessions. The part to be taken by the British and colonial forces respectively in manning the different positions might with great advantage be determined, and there are many other steps of the same sort which will readily suggest themselves to you, but if we are to go further than this, and have a covenant binding this country to place a certain proportion of men at the absolute disposal of the Imperial Government—— —whenever it is called upon, I say frankly that I do not believe that such an arrangement would work.

—ships would be the same thing—

Now, there is the opinion of an hon. gentleman who was Secretary of Foreign Affairs under the Unionist Government of Great Britain, the government of Mr. Balfour, and who is leader of the Unionist party in the House of Lords at the present time. What the government proposed to do is what he said he did not believe would work. Are we to be blamed if we take the same view? I think the Government should at once, in the matter of the navy, proceed with the building of dockyards. I think they should extend three-fold, or four-fold, the system at present in force for the training of seamen. If you built your dockyards you might make them large enough for dreadnoughts to be built on this side, if you want to take that line—I am merely saying that in passing, because I do not say that that is the best way to go on—but if you built your dockyards you can go on; and build the smaller ships required for your navy. And if you go on training your men while those ships are being built you will have the men to man them. And if you think of building all the smaller sized vessels you will be able to have Canadian seamen to man the dreadnoughts built abroad. That is to say, you can begin building the smaller vessels in Canada at once, and by the time these are completed, you will perhaps have dreadnoughts on the stocks of a British navy yard. Or, take the other way, which does not seem to me so apt, build the dreadnoughts first, and then go on building the smaller vessels, under different conditions. Just now, to indulge in the vast expense of dreadnoughts in the present condition of public opinion in Great Britain, seems to be a little premature; but in that matter I would be guided by better advice than I have at the present time. If there is to be peace in Europe, we would not need those larger vessels, for England would have enough of her own to maintain her defence, but we might need the smaller vessels for coast defences, and these would be a small charge on the revenue. But these are matters of detail on which I do not absolutely bind myself.

Now for a few words in conclusion. I am somewhat distressed, I am bound to say, by the frequent references that are made in the other House to the partisan character of this Senate. I think they are in bad taste, and coming from the leader of the Government all the worse, because it is my contention that coming from his colleagues in that House, the charge is bad in proportion to the status of the colleague who makes the reference. If this is a partisan Senate it is a reflection upon hon gentlemen opposite just as much as it is upon those on this side of the House. We are not a divided Senate; we are one Senate. If the Senate is partisan on this side of the House, by concurring in measures approved by the Opposition and supported by us, what else is it, on the part of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who approve of, and support measures brought in by the Government—a government representing the party to which they belong. Any representations made as to partisanship on this side of the House, refers to one side of the House as much as the other.

Let us look at that question for a while. Mr. Borden made some remarks in the House the other day, some very strange remarks, as recorded on page 28 of the 'Hansard.' Speaking of the Senate in reference to the postponement of the Naval Bill he said:

> The partisan conditions and misguided influence which occasioned the perverse and maladroit action of the Senate were not realized or understood either within the Empire or throughout the world.

Now could there be anything more caustic or more offensive than the terms there used? —'Partisan conditions,' 'misguided influence,' 'perverse and maladroit action.' This Senate ought to be abolished, forthwith, if it is perverse, if it is partisan, if its action is maladroit. Then the hon. gentleman has a colleague, Hon. Mr. White, who was also of the opinion that we are very bad. He frequently refers to the partisan character of the Senate. I will quote from a speech of his delivered just at the closing hours of last session, when he was evidently very angry with the delay in the Naval Bill. Replying to Mr. Beland he says:

> My hon. friend says he has the people; that I deny. Providence is on our side, I say, and there will come a time when a majority will not throw out a measure of this kind.

There is an appeal to Providence, and an appeal to the undertaker. It reminds me of the words of Mercutio, I think it was, who said:

> Of comforts——

let us substitute the words 'Naval Bill'

> —let no man speak. Let's talk of graves and worms and epitaphs.

Naval Bills are going to be carried after this by graves, and worms, and epitaphs. Mr. White says again, speaking of the Senate:

> I feel that a measure designed for the benefit of the whole Empire has been thrown out and nullified for merely partisan considerations.

And he says again:

> Any man whose hand can wield a hammer can break a statue, no matter how finely that statue may be wrought; and so, the partisan majority in the Senate can destroy a measure such as this, a measure of the utmost consequence and necessarily promoting the strength, unity and solidarity of the Empire. This is precisely what has been done—a body blow has been struck at the unity of the Empire.

And so, I need not go further for illustrations. That observation occurs at different places in his speech. Well, now, is this Senate partisan or is it not? If hon. gentlemen will refer to the position the Senate was intended to take in the constitution of Canada they will quickly understand that the Senate was not intended to be a mere echo of the House. If the Senate is discharging the functions as originally intended, then it will do the duty which it was intended to do under our constitution. Now, if the Senate offers any opposition to the Bills of the House of Commons it is considered to be partisan. What was considered to be the duty of the Senate, with the founders of Confederation? I may be excused, Liberal as I am, if I accept the opinion of Sir John A. Macdonald, or Sir Alex. Campbell, or that of George Brown, but particularly of those two great Conservatives, and if I prefer their judgment as to what the Senate should be rather than the judgment of Mr. White or the right hon. Mr. Borden. Sir John Macdonald, speaking in the Legislative Assembly in 1865, when the Quebec resolutions were before the House, said:

There would be no use in an upper House if it did not exercise, when it thought proper, the right of opposing or amending or postponing the legislation of the Lower House.

That is what Sir John Macdonald thought of the Senate. It might delay, it might postpone, or amend.

It would be of no value whatever, if it were a mere chamber for registering the decrees of the lower House.

But what is wanted, now, is a Chamber that will register those decrees. Sir John Macdonald thought such a Chamber would be of no use. Whose opinion and judgment will hon. gentlemen accept? I stand, at this time, by the man called the 'Grand Old Man,' the 'Chieftain,' who seemed to have some appreciation of what was constitutional, and of what was constitutional practice. But in modern times men rise, come upon the stage, flit behind the footlights astonished at their own greatness, perhaps, who are disposed to legislate for us under modern conditions, and who have no appreciation of the functions of this Senate. Sir John went on to say of the Senate:—

—It must be an independent House, having a free action of its own, for it is only valuable as being a regulating body, calmly considering the legislation initiated by the popular branch, and preventing any hasty or ill-considered legislation which may have come from that body, but which will never set itself in opposition to the delibrate and understood wishes of the people.

We were to be independent, Sir John Macdonald thought. I am glad that he left that great legacy to this House. It is worth a great deal to the hon. members of this House to know that one of the Fathers of Confederation, and one whose right hand was ready and strong in drafting that constitution, thought the Senate should be independent. He says it should never set itself in opposition to the deliberate and understood wishes of the people. What are the understood wishes of the people on the Naval policy? We do not know. Hon. gentlemen are afraid to ask their opinion; or if not afraid, they do not do it anyway, and we must attribute their attitude to fear rather than to courage.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The majority was against it.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS—Then let us see what Sir Alexander Campbell said, and he was for a long time Leader of the Senate:—

He did not think that a legislative Upper Chamber should bow to every breeze and constantly yield to every demand, and be content merely to reflect the temper and sentiment of the other branch.

Not content to reflect the temper and sentiment of so great a man as the Minister of Finance?

On the contrary, he held that when it had evidence sufficient to satisfy itself that the proposed measure was unjust, it was bound to resist, and public opinion, which generally came out right in the end, would sustain it in such an attitude.

We are ready to let public opinion sustain us. So said Sir Alexander Campbell, one of the founders of Confederation, one to whom every member of the House of Commons may well take off his hat, as Minister of Justice, as a great lawyer, as Lieutenant Governor in the province of Ontario, and as one whom we all delighted to honour. And what did Hon. George Brown say?—not a bad authority in some quarters; he used these words:—

The desire was to render the upper House a thoroughly independent body.

He was not afraid of public opinion; he was a Liberal; he was not afraid, whether the Senate was Tory or Reform, if it were an independent body:—

One that would be in the best position to canvass dispassionately the measures of this House, and stand up for the public interest in opposition to hasty or partisan legislation.

I do not know whether the Naval Bill was hasty; in fact my chief complaint against it, so far, is that it is not hasty enough. Mr. Borden proposed that the thing should be done speedily. Perhaps Mr. Brown would have censured the Government of the day for not proceeding with greater activity. Now, Mr. Wilmot, who was a distinguished member of this House, very clearly says:—

The Senate should be in a position to check hasty legislation and mere popular clamour, and give time to allow some public opinion to assert itself. We are not a mere recording body to register the Acts of the popular branch.

These are some opinions which have been expressed by the founders of Confederation, and for which we should have some regard.

The Senate must be reformed. I think that is a very important question. In order to bring the Senate into harmony with the other branch, something must be done to reform the Senate. Here is what Mr. Borden said on that point; you remember he made a speech last year on the same subject to which I called the attention of the House, when I was criticising the situation. Here is what he said the other day:—

If friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, appointed during their tenure of office and before the will of the people was declared at the last election, are disposed to force upon us——

Force upon whom?—another branch of the legislature that has no more original jurisdiction than we have——the question of the constitution of the Senate and the nature of appointments thereto—well, speaking for myself, and I think speaking for the great majority of the people of this country——

And I think he is not speaking for anybody else—

—we are ready to accept that issue.

Well, so are we. We are in the hands of the people just the same as he is. If he wants the constitution of the Senate changed, I suppose he could take steps to do it.

Another gentleman who is a member of Parliament, also objected to the constitution of the Senate. Hon. Mr. White, Minister of Finance, said:

I say that the constitution of the Senate is not in keeping with the principles of British representative government——

That is a profoundly absurd statement—

And the time will come, if we are to have action such as this on the part of that body—

That is, with regard to the Naval Bill—

—that their constitution must be changed and brought into accord with the principles of constitutional government in the Empire.

It reminds me of Canute moving his chair to the seaside, and saying to the tide, 'You cannot pass Canute's chair.' Here comes this personage, sitting in his chair in the House of Commons, and saying that the constitution of the Senate must be changed; and he says that it is not in harmony with the principles of British representative government. Why the constitution of the Senate of Canada is the only constitution of any of the dominions beyond the seas that is in any degree in harmony with the British constitution. The constitution of Australia is elective; the constitution of South Africa is partly elective, and partly nominative. Our constitution is more in harmony with the British constitution than that of any dependency beyond the sea. Hon. Mr. White says that must be changed. Well, let it be changed, but let it be changed according to the constitution. How is that to be done? Can the House of Commons do it? They can no more lay hands on the constitution of this House, than we can lay our hands on the constitution of the House of Commons. They have no authority to do it; no authority under the British North America Act to do it. Any amount of ranting on the stage, any amount of denouncing, any amount of clamour on the part of partisanship, does not affect the situation one particle no more than the ominous 'Nevermore!' of Poe's Raven could affect the political condition of Great Britain. If the constitution of the Senate has to be changed, it can only be changed with the consent of all the provinces.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS—The British North America Act is a treaty between the provinces and this Dominion which was not then founded, but which was to be founded under that Act. Read what was said in the debates in the old legislative assembly on that point. Every man who was a leader of his party admitted it was a treaty. Sir John A. Macdonald, Hon. George Brown, D'Arcy McGee, Wm. McDougall; and in the conference which was held in London, Sir Leonard Tilley, and Sir Chas. Tupper; in fact, all the representatives believed it was a treaty that gave to us certain powers, at least that put the government of the country into the hands of two trustees. One trustee was to be the House of Commons; the other trustee was the Senate. One trustee had not power to oust the other. The House of Commons cannot kick us out; we cannot kick out the House of Commons. No matter how richly it may deserve such treatment we have no power to do it. The only power that can change either of the constituents, is the power that created them. And what was that power? The power of the provinces. Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island did not agree to it in the Quebec conference. They said, 'We shall have a Senate, and nobody is to over-ride us.' New Brunswick said: 'We are going to have a Senate.' So did Nova Scotia; so did Quebec; so did Ontario; and the condition of giving us a Senate was to protect our legal and territorial rights, to protect our peculiar institutions such as they may be. 'We will give you a House of Commons to look over the vast concerns of this Dominion and to make the laws for the future prosperity of the Dominion of Canada.' Now, do you mean to say that body, which was created by that Quebec conference, with the consent of the provinces—that body subservient to the provinces—can go and destroy its creator? The thing is absurd; it is not consistent with any principle of common sense. If you are going to reform the Senate, go back to the provinces and ask them: 'Do you want a change in the Senate? Do you want a Senate at all?' That was the most absurd project yet made in the House of Commons—to abolish the Senate—as if the moon could abolish the sun; and as if the people of Canada could abolish the British constitution. Why, the thing is preposterous and next in degree of preposterousness—if that word be not too large—was to change from the nominative character of a Senate to an elective. They cannot do it. Would Quebec adhere to an elective Senate, or to its abolition? Would Ontario agree to it? I do not know whether it would or not. We had it at least for ten years, and we dropped it for the sake of Confederation, and I think we did wisely. Now, if hon. gentlemen would proceed regularly, and the Senate is tried by a proper jury, and is condemned to be guillotined after a proper trial, why, of course governments may go and come, in form, but governments in substance must stand forever; and whether you have a nominative Senate, or elective Senate, or no Senate at all, probably the Government of Canada will go on. The hon. gentlemen who are opposed to it, upon its present basis, may think they follow the Constitution, and agree upon a mode in which it is to be carried on in the future.

As a proof that the Senate is not partisan, I will give figures which I have selected from a return that was brought down to the House some eight or nine years ago, and which, by the courtesy of the Assistant Clerk of the Senate, was continued down to 1913. This return shows a number of Bills that were rejected by the Senate, or amended, as sent up from the House of Commons, and the number that was amended or rejected by the House of Commons as sent down from the Senate. The Conservative party had the control of the Senate for 36 years out of the 46; we are now in the 47th year since Confederation. That was a long lease of office, and now there is overwhelming anxiety because that control does not continue to the present time. Is not that an aspiration far beyond the importance involved in it, far beyond what one would reasonably suppose any member of the House of Commons would aspire to—36 years' control of the Senate? Well, what happened? In the 24 years of Conservative majority in both Houses, the Senate amended 26 per cent of the Bills that came up before it, and rejected 1.7 per cent. That is, the Conservative Senate amended 26 per cent of the Bills sent up by the Conservative House of Commons, and the Conservative Senate rejected 1.7 per cent of the Bills sent up.

How had the Conservative Senate the audacity to amend so many Bills sent by its own friends? Because it was manly and independent, and the members felt they were doing their duty. See what happened again in the twelve years, when there was a Conservative majority in the Senate, and a Liberal majority in the House of Commons. The Senate amended 22 per cent of the Laurier Government Bills, and 26 per cent of the Bills introduced by Conservative leaders. The Senate amended fewer Bills sent by the Laurier Government, than it amended Bills sent by the Conservative Government, when the majority in the two houses were in accord. Is that proof of partisanship?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, it is a proof that the Laurier Government Bills were better.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—I am astonished at the record of the Conservative Senate. The members rejected 4 per cent more Bills, than they had rejected under the other administration, but amended fewer. Then in the eight years when there was a Liberal majority in the Senate, and a Liberal majority in the House of Commons, what happened? The Liberal Senators amended 36 per cent of the Laurier Government Bills. Never were so many Bills amended in the Senate, under any circumstances, as were amended when there was a Liberal majority in both Houses. Then what about the rejection of Bills? The Liberal Senate rejected 2 per cent of the Laurier Government Bills, as against 3 per cent of the Bills introduced by the Conservative Government, and 1 per cent when the two Houses were in accord, so it will be seen that we deal as freely and impartially with Bills sent by a Liberal House of Commons as we dealt with Bills sent by a Tory House of Commons. Is that partisanship? Last year we amended only 14 per cent of the Borden Government Bills, as against 36 per cent of Laurier's Bills and 23 per cent when the Conservatives were in control of the House of Commons. And we only rejected one Bill in those two years. If we had been half as busy doing mischief, as we were doing good, we would have rejected more than one Bill. The Bill we rejected was to grant a subsidy to the Toronto and Northern Ontario Railway of Ontario, and when it was brought in the second time we barely passed it. It was like the wound described by Shakespeare, 'not as wide as a barn door nor as deep as a well.' Is that a partisan record? Let me say I congratulate my hon. friends opposite that they were so fair with their own party, and with the Liberal Party when they were in power. Also I can congratulate the Liberal Party in the Senate in being so fair towards its own party in the House of Commons and, if any congratulations were at all in order, and I am a little doubtful, I would congratulate the present Senate on dealing so leniently and gently with the Bills of the present Government.

Now let us apply our energy to the solution of the great problems that lie before us. That is my politics whether I am here or elsewhere. Canada has to confront tremendous problems. We are on the margin of a future which no one can predict. We have a country as large as the continent of Europe. Lord Strathcona has predicted that we will have twenty or thirty millions of a population, within the next ten years. We are the forerunners of a tremendous destiny, which should weigh on the minds of everyone of use. If a navy is necessary for the defence of the empire let us make a Bill to which both parties will agree. And in whatever respect legislation is necessary, for strengthening the institutions of this country, for assimilating our foreign population, for furnishing suitable transportation, for deepening our harbours, for strengthening the ties between us and the empire, for extending our commerce on the seven seas, for standing as prominently as we ought to stand before the nations of the world as a great commercial people thoroughly independent—leaning on no arm for assistance, not even the arm of the empire—let us work out our destiny in our own way. Let us stop quarrelling about matters of party difference, and let us join hands. Let there be no bloody chasm between us, no waving of the bloody shirt of race or religious discord. The task is large enough to demand all the powers we possess. To that task this Senate, I hope, is as willing to address itself, as the House of Commons, or their representatives or any political body in the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks which has fallen from my hon. friend, and more particularly to what related to those who moved and seconded the Address. His congratulations to those hon. gentlemen were couched in such gracious language that I am only too happy to adopt those congratulations as my own. The Senate is to be congratulated upon having two such hon. gentlemen as members of this body. The hon. gentleman from Toronto for many years has occupied a very representative position in the banking institutions of Ontario, and is regarded, and very properly so, as a reliable authority on great financial questions. We are fortunate in this body—where we are called upon particularly in the deliberations of our committees to deal with questions of finance—that we have amongst our number those who come in practical contact with such questions and problems as are involved in this class of legislation. My hon. friend from St. John (Hon. Mr. Thorne) occupies a very representative position in the commercial world of New Brunswick. And I am sure that his ripe experience and judgment will be of inestimable value to the Senate, and particularly to the committee on which I hope he will prove to be an active member. We hope those gentlemen will be spared for long years to give the Senate the benefit of their experience, their knowledge and their services.

We all appreciate most deeply the very gracious expression which fell from the lips of His Royal Highness as to the sympathy shown by the people of Canada in the serious illness of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught while absent from Canada during the recess. Their Royal Highnesses have so endeared themselves to the people of Canada as to elicit from our entire people not only the deepest anxiety and sympathy, under such circumstances as those to which allusion has been made, but also a deeply abiding and most friendly interest in all that pertains to their happiness and prosperity, no matter whether it be in relation to their public or private life, and particularly will the people of Canada continue to exercise their sympathy and hope for the restoration to a full measure of health and strength of Her Royal Highness. I also feel assured in saying that it is the wish and the hope of the people of Canada that their Royal Highnesses will see their way clear to continue for a substantially extended period in their present high office, the duties of which they have discharged with peculiarly marked satisfaction to the people of the Dominion.

Reference has been made in the Address to the extension of Canada's trade, and gratification has been expressed that, notwithstanding the financial stringency and depression of trade which have been experienced all over the world, Canada has safely passed through the ordeal. It is gratifying to note that our external trade for the nine months ending December 31 last has exceeded by over eighty millions of dollars the corresponding nine months of 1912. It is gratifying that our exports have very considerably exceeded during those nine months the volume of exports in the corresponding period of 1912. I find upon making inquiry as to the volume of our imports for 1912, that for the nine months ending December 31, 1912, they had reached $307,525,765, whereas during the period ending December 31, 1913, they had reached the very substantial and increased volume of $388,707,375, an increase of nearly $82,000,000.

With reference to our exports, I might say this is a matter upon which we may felicitate ourselves, inasmuch as for many years we have heard grave apprehensions expressed at the fact that the volume of import so far exceeded the exports. Our imports during the nine months ending December 31, 1912, amounted to $516,619,986, whereas the figure was slighthly exceeded in the nine months ending December 31, 1913, and showed the enormous amount of $517,532,014. It is gratifying in this connection also to note, notwithstanding the anticipated decrease in revenue, owing to the financial stringency and depression of trade to which I have alluded, that during the nine months preceding the expiration of 1913 the revenue was about $3,000,000, substantially in excess of the nine months ending December 31, 1912. We therefore may congratulate ourselves not only as a government, but, I think, as a people, that notwithstanding the world-wide stringency which we have very considerably felt within the Dominion of Canada, our trade statistics afford such a very satisfactory showing as that which I have pointed out. It has also been a matter for congratulation that the crop of 1913 has been so satisfactory, and has permitted the financial condition of Canada being placed in the comparatively satisfactory position which we to-day occupy. It is satisfactory to note that the crop of 1913 has been the largest ever produced within the Dominion of Canada, representing some 702,244,000 bushels of grain, exceeding substantially the crop of 1912, which was regarded as an extraordinarily large crop. It has been customary in the past for governments to make some little claim for the success of the crops. It is not the desire of this Government to usurp the position of Providence with reference to our harvests, but it has been customary I know to read between the lines in the utterances of past governments—I will not draw any invidious distinctions as to the governments to which I make reference—as to their being largely responsible for the success of the harvest. The early rains and the later rains, the shining of the sun, the falling of the dew, the growing of the grass, the flourishing of the crop, and the prosperity flowing therefrom have been largely attributed in past years to the waving of the magic wand of the Government of the day. But there is a branch of this subject for which the Government of the day may claim some credit. I refer to the marketing of the crops. This Government undoubtedly has given closer and more practical attention to this important subject than any government of the past. The organization of the Grain Commission, the placing upon our Statute Books of statutory enactments dealing with the regulation of transportation, of terminal facilities, of terminal grain elevators; these and all other matters which enter into the marketing of a crop, have received the most practical attention at the hands of this Government. It has been a matter of very great satisfaction that the crop of 1913 was marketed fully four or five weeks earlier than in any previous year, and that congestion from which the country suffered for so many years in the past with reference to the transportation of the crop from the fields to the head of the Great Lakes and from there to the seaboard, was not repeated during the past year. It must be a matter of satisfaction to the agricultural community, and those having interests in the crops, that terminal elevators and facilities have been furnished to the extent that has been done by the Government. I think that I am justified in saying that the finest elevator in the world was last year constructed by the Government, and opened during October last for the storage of grain. Somewhat similar terminal elevators are being constructed now in Moosejaw, and at Saskatoon. Plans have been prepared for the erection of a somewhat similar elevator at Port Nelson. It is also, in contemplation, that similar elevators should be built in Alberta, and one upon the Pacific coast. The Government, I think, may felicitate itself, and the people of Canada, upon what is being done towards marketing the crops in a practical and expeditious manner.

Some attention has been given to the question of free food. My hon. friend touched upon that very lightly. He undoubtedly felt that he was on thin ice, and skated over the dangerous spots with a rapidity and adroitness which my hon. friend can do when he reaches a very dangerous question. I have been waiting for some time for my hon. friend's attitude to become known upon this question, although up to the present my hon. friends on the other side of the House, have not committed themselves very specifically to the remedy which should be furnished as to this particular difficulty. The remedy suggested by the leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons was the placing of food products on the free list. The tariff always affords a very convenient target for any attack that may be made with reference to any public difficulty. If the price of living is high, the tariff becomes responsible for it. If trade is depressed, the tariff of course is responsible. If money is tight the tariff should be looked into, and the remedy there found. I need not point out to hon. gentlemen that the tariff divides itself chiefly into two branches—the protection which is given to the farmer, and the protection which is given to the manufacturer. It is self-evident that the interest of manufacturers would be to have tariff walls as low as possible as to food. It is manifest that, if the manufacturer can secure cheap food for his artisans, it means lower wages, it means cheaper production. On the other hand if we are to have a properly balanced tariff, the agricultural interests must be fully considered along with the interests of the manufacturer. The agricultural interests are the greatest interests which we have in the Dominion of Canada, and no tariff could possibly survive, not only the criticisms of the public, but the practical results which must flow from a tariff, that did not give equal consideration to the protection of agriculture.

The question of cheap living is agitating the entire world at the present time, or, if I might put it, the question of the lessening or reduction of living expenses. The question arises: Would the lowering of the tariff on food products reduce the high cost of living? There is no evidence of this whatever, and yet such a statement is unhesitatingly made in the press, on the platform, and in almost all quarters where proper consideration is not given to the question. The Democratic party in the United States for many years have been pronouncing their denunciation of the high tariff of the United States. They made demands from time to time for the lowering of that tariff. Never, of course, have they been so successful as during the last year. The Democratic party in the United States undoubtedly reached power by appealing to the masses upon the effects of the reduction of the tariff on the high cost of living. Immediately they came into office, they proceeded to implement the promises which they had made to the public, and to carry out so far as they possibly could the promise that they made that the reduction of the tariff would produce the results, which had been anticipated. But what has been the result? We very well know that the agitation which for a year or more prevailed in the United States over the reduction of the tariff, produced to a very large extent a dislocation of the industries of that great country. And when the reduction of the tariff in that country was brought about, we had a consensus of opinion, the press in the United States, agreeing that the price of living, since the reduction in the tariff, has considerably exceeded previous rates. The price of living in the United States since the adoption of the new tariff has substantially increased. I might instance the case alone of cattle being shipped from the Dominion of Canada, and from other cattle producing countries into the United States, and with what result? Of course, we are fully aware that there formerly was a very high tariff against cattle. We find unusualy large shipments of cattle produced in Canada being shipped into the United States. We find the Argentine Republic, and most of the republics in South and Central America, shipping their cattle to the United States. Shipments are coming from New Zealand, and from Australia, and yet we find beef higher to-day in the United States than ever before. This can be demonstrated beyond all doubt. Furtheremore I might point out this: the price of living has been steadily climbing since 1896; the tariff has not changed. My hon. friends opposite when in office had the opportunity of applying to the tariff the remedy which is now suggested in many quarters, but during those fifteen years of office, although living has been climbing steadily and consistently since their accession to office down to the present time, yet the tariff has been the same during those fifteen years or, if anything, lower than it was upon their accession to office in 1896. I was interested the other day in reading a speech made by Sir John Simon, Attorney General of Great Britain, where he was, in fact, placed upon the defensive in establishing that the increased cost of living in Great Britain was not due to free trade, but was due to causes entirely external of tariff systems. I recall a very extended inquiry in England, made some four or five years ago, into the different systems of the different countries, in which it was established conclusively that the cost of living in other countries in Europe, under a high tariff system, was very much lower than the cost of living in Great Britain. We raise through the imposition of taxes upon our food-tariff about ten millions of dollars a year. The taxes levied upon those classes of food which enter into the general consumption of the masses would not exceed ten millions a year. This distributed on a per capita basis, would not represent more than $1.25 per head of the population of Canada. I have no hesitation in saying that no hon. gentleman would say that the remission of $1.25 per head, made up of tax imposed upon food products, would operate as a practical reduction in the high cost of living. And then, on the other hand, let us assume for a moment that there was a remission of this ten million dollars. The King's Government has to be maintained and the money would have to be made up in some other way. And no matter how the incidence of taxation may be established, that incidence is going to fall more or less upon the masses, so that no matter what system might be devised, it would be utterly impossible to relieve the masses of the people from taxation, whether it be direct or indirect. I was very much interested in reading sometime ago the work published by the late Mr. Collier entitled 'England and the English,' in which he dealt in particular with the cost of living in Great Britain, exploding, I think, to a very large extent the great error which exists in the public mind that food products in Great Britain are taxed less heavily than in other countries in the world. I read from page 101 as follows:

> One may note just here the curious fiction that England is the land of free food, a fiction, but firmly believed both at home and abroad by the uninformed. As a matter of fact the receipts from customs duties upon the things that the English eat, drink, and smoke, plus the excise taxation of them, make together much the largest item of the Imperial revenue of the United Kingdom. Let us look at the figures. For the ten years ending March 31, 1898-1907:

Net receipts from customs.
Tobacco and snuff	$608,500,000
Tea	289,000,000
Spirits	218,000,000
Sugar (last six years only)	175,500,000
Wine	69,500,000
Currents, &c.	21,000,000
Corn and grain (two years only)	12,000,000
Coffee	9,000,000
Total	$1,402,500,000
Net receipts from excise.
Spirits	$ 884,500,000
Beer	629,500,000
Total net receipts from customs and excise	$2,916,500,000

Hon. Mr. POWER—If my hon. friend will pardon me, those articles on which those immense sums are raised are not the articles which the Opposition proposes to class under free food. He speaks of tobacco, spirits, etc.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Deprive the masses of Great Britain of those articles, which I have mentioned, and you will have a revolution.

Hon. Mr. KERR—They are luxuries.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The article continues:

This works out at an average of $291,650,000 yearly, or at $5,605,000 weekly, or at the rate of $690 yearly per 100 of the population during the last ten years. When it becomes thus apparent that the English are taxed for what they eat, drink and smoke at the rate of over $5,000,000 a week, the fiction of free food is blown to the winds, and the land of compromises rejoices in the possession of yet another strange contradiction which troubles nobody, and which is still used, by politician and layman alike, as though this at least were one of the fundamental trades of their insular social economy.

In a word, I would venture to say with reference to any attack which may be made upon the tariff, as a proposed remedy for the high cost of living, that the people of Canada are in no temper to permit any further trifling with the tariff. The agriculturists of Canada must be protected as well as the manufacturer, and any attempt to revise the tariff downward would be productive of protest from the whole agricultural community.

My hon. friend opposite made an allusion to that clause in the address dealing with the National Transcontinental railway, and made, I regret to say, a very sweeping statement as to the Government having reduced the standardization on that great railway system. I was under the impression that, last session of Parliament, such error had been removed from the public mind by the Government, if not in the Senate in the House of Commons. I make the statement now, that it is entirely erroneous and found ationless. I recall, upon the statement being made by my hon. friend, a communication which I received last session, upon this particular subject, and while it is somewhat lengthy, I will take the opportunity of attempting to set this matter right, and particularly with my hon. friend opposite, by reading it. I suppose my hon friend has reference to the grade in the road.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hold in my hand a letter from a prominent engineer, one of the foremost engineers in the Dominion, Mr. W. F. Tye. He says:

Ottawa, November 26, 1912.

Honourable Frank Cochrane,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—As requested, I have examined the profiles of the changes recently made in grade on contracts Nos. 13, 14 and 15, districts 'C' and 'D' east and west of Cochrane.

These changes in grade will not decrease the haulage capacity of the locomotive, will not increase the running time of either freight or passenger trains and will not increase the operating or maintenance [illegible] e contrary, they will, by decreasing the cost of construction, reduce the interest charges.

The total cost of transportation is the sum of the operating expenses and the interest charges. A railway to handle a given traffic is the most effective commercially, or can handle the traffic at the least cost, when the sum of these two items is the least. Any change of alignment, or grades, which reduces the fixed charges without increasing the operating or maintenance expenses, is, therefore, an improvement in the effective standard of the road.

These changes will reduce the interest charges without increasing the operating or maintenance expenses, or decreasing the haulage capacity or speed of the locomotive, and are therefore an improvement in the effective standard of the road.

I consider the commissioner and engineers of the Transcontinental would have failed in their duty had they not made these changes.

Respectfully yours,
W. F. Tye,
Consulting Engineer.

Now here is a letter from the Commissioners on that same subject. It is as follows:

The Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway.
Ottawa, November 21, 1912.

Hon. F. Cochrane, P.C.,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Cochrane,—In reference to the charges made in the newspapers [illegible] the [illegible]dients on the Transcontinental railway have been injuriously altered, I beg to point out, that the only change in the gradients made by the commissioners since September, 1911, was to allow a few sags to remain, where there have been subsidences and across soft muskegs which it would be inadvisable, from an engineering point of view, to fill at present to be operated temporarily or permanently as velocity grades. The presence of such sags in the railway does not injuriously effect the economical operation of the road. The same trains, carrying the same loads, making the same time, with the same expense and the same degree of safety and comfort, can be handled over a road in which such sags or velocity grades exist as on a road of the same ruling gradient in which there are no such sags or velocity grades.

By introducing these sags, all of which are well within velocity grade limitations, the commisioners will:

1. Save a large amount of money in the construction of the railw[illegible]

2. Expedite the completion of the road;

3. Should it become advisable, for any unforeseen reason in the future [illegible] those sags, it can be done at one-half the cost that the present contract prices call for;

4. In one case it has been found necessary to raise the grade in a cutting, the material in which is so soft and wet that it is impracticable to construct a line on the original grades, and in this instance the grade has been kept well within the limits of velocity grade practise, and the gradient can be reduced at any time, if it should ever be found desirable, by filling in the lower portion with suitable material;

5. The consensus of opinion of the following engineers, who have been in the employ of the commissioner for years, in their sworn testimony before the Commission investigating the construction of the Transcontinental railway, is that velocity grades are not only unobjectionable, but might have been introduced permanently into the railway and would have greatly reduced the cost of the road:

Gordon Grant, chief engineer.

C. O. Floss, district engineer, district 'A'.

A. E. Doucet, district engineer, district 'B'.

A. G. Macfarlane, district engineer, district 'F'.

G. L. Mattice, assistant district engineer, district 'D'.

J. W. Porter, assistant district engineer, district 'B'.

A. N. Molesworth, late district engineer, district 'C' and 'D'.

H. L. Bucke, division engineer, district 'D' and 'F'.

I find that the gradients on which the original Quebec bridge was partially built were 1 per cent on either side, and the new bridge will necessarily be built to the same grades. I also find that the gradient approaching the Quebec bridge from the east side, including the Chaudière bridge, was of 1 per cent, which cannot be altered.

In New Brunswick I find in the middle of a division a grade 13 miles long of 1.10 per cent against east-bound traffic, and in Quebec in the middle of another division 11 miles of 1.10 per cent grade against westbound traffic, each of which will limit the hauling capacity of locomotives over these divisions to the same extent as if the whole division had been located on these grades.

I am sending, herewith, for your information, five Blue Print profiles, showing all the changes in gradients which have been effected since September, 1911.

Trusting this will be satisfactory, I remain,

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) R. W. Leonard.

Mr. Grant's evidence is not yet in type, but from conversation I have had with him, which is confirmed by Mr. Staunton, I know his views to be as above stated.

R. W. L.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That is what I asked for last session and could not get. They said there were only two sags last session.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not know what was in the return I brought down last session, but I brought down returns. These letters establish, beyond all question, that the Government of the day, notwithstanding the fact that they inherited a burdensome and unfortunate undertaking, both in regard to the policy of the road and in regard to the enormous expense—this Government has endeavoured, according to the pronouncement of the best engineers, to make it the best possible road within their ability. I hope my hon. friend in view of the evidence, which is sworn evidence, will feel satisfied that the Government of the day has been maintaining the standard of the road, notwithstanding the reports to the contrary.

My hon. friend has expressed disappointment that the Speech from the Throne did not meet with his expectations. The sins of omission and commission, for which every Government has been charged in the preparation of the Address, would fill a very large volume. I know my experience has been, since I have been a member of this body, that there never has been an Address, or a Speech from the Throne, that has met the expectations of both sides of the House. The Government preparing the Address always regard it as a model of expression for the purpose intended, while hon. gentlemen on the opposite side have always wept tears at its omissions and commissions. On this occasion I regret very much that the Address has not met the expectation of ny hon. friend, but it certainly has afforded him an opportunity to give us a very eloquent speech, on the subjects with which it had to do.

My hon. friend expressed disappointment also that the Hudson Bay railway was not showing the speed, in construction, which we had a right to expect. Considering that this Government has been in office, a little ver two years, and has almost completed the road; and taking further into consideration the fact that the hon. gentlemen opposite were in office fifteen years and scarcely had fairly commenced it—notwithstanding the fact that they were dealing with it the whole of that fifteen years—it is certainly strange that my hon. friend should think there is sufficient ground for criticising this Government, to the extent which he has done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the road was completed to Hudson Bay?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say it is rapidly approaching completion, and we expect to be there, in the early part of next session. I would remind my hon. friend that when the late Government came into office in 1896, they undertook the construction of this road.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend probably remembers that, at the time, when the hon. member from Hastings was leader of the Government, we were fighting that very same question out here.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I know my hon. friend has always been unfavourable to the construction of the road, but that did not stand in the way of the late Government assuming the responsibility of it and entering upon its construction—at least theoretically—because so far as actual construction is concerned they did very little. My hon. friend need not exercise any undue solicitude as to the question of harbours, and all the other questions pertaining to making this road as successful and practicable as such an undertaking can be made. The reputation not only of the Government, but of Canada itself, is at stake, in the carrying out of this great undertaking to a successful issue. I have no doubt that with the engineering skill and ability, which the Government has been able to secure for the carrying out of that undertaking, everything which science and experience can bring to bear to the successful conclusion of that enterprise will be done.

I shall not anticipate any of the difficulties arising out of redistribution which my hon. friend has outlined. I am satisfied his sense of fair play, and his sense of what this Senate owes to promoting legislation of this character, will be sufficient to warrant us in anticipating a satisfactory issue upon that measure.

My hon. friend had to return to the question of highways. I did think that, if there was any question that my hon. friend would not venture upon, it would be the question of highways. I certainly had not intended to touch upon this question, and I had not included it in my notes, but now that my hon. friend has made reference to it, I should like to make some two or three observations on the subject. He expresses the greatest regret that the Government has not seen its way to promise a Highways Bill during the present session. Well, for two sessions we vainly struggled with my hon. friend to accept the Bill which was passed by the House of Commons, and with which the House of Commons had particularly to do. But my hon. friend and his associates did not see their way clear to give the country this Highways Bill. The number of constitutional difficulties which hon. gentlemen built up, as an insurmountable barrier to the passage of this Bill, still remain before the vision of my hon. friend. When a farmer is transporting his products to the market and finds himself sunk in the mud to the hubs of his wheels—anathematizes my hon. friend opposite for defeating this Bill and preventing the expenditure of this amount of money in improving the highways—he will be quite satisfied when it is pointed out to him that, constitutionally this thing could not be done. I hope my hon. friend will issue an encouraging statement to the farming community, struggling against all the disadvantages of the worst roads to be found in any country, pointing out to them those constitutional difficulties which my hon. friend has built up, not only to-day but during the two preceding sessions, and but for which they would have excellent roads through the rural districts of Canada. This Bill was conceived with the idea of assisting the rural communities of Canada. My hon. friend points out that the Government of Canada could not constitutionally make this grant to the different provinces, could not constitutionally assist the provinces in improving their highways. We may throw many constitutional difficulties in the way of working out a practical question, but I say to my hon. friend, and to hon. gentlemen opposite, that notwithstanding these constitutional theories, there was nothing to prevent the passage of that Bill, and the acceptance by the different provinces of the money which was placed in the estimates, and which would have gone to every province, and have been distributed amongst the provinces pro rata. It was only through the generosity of the Government that this money was voted. True, the Government of Canada was not called upon to vote money for highways in the provinces, but the Government did recognize that the provinces of the Dominion were recreant to the duty which fell upon them, of building proper highways for the accommodation of their people, and for the transportation of their products to the centres of population. That fact stared the Government in the face, and it stares us in the face to-day There is nothing that impresses itself so much on the minds of the public to-day as the conditions of our highways, and the inability of the municipality and local Government to grapple with this question. The present Government came in and recognizing those great abuses, which seem not to be sufficiently recognized by the municipalities, and the local governments, said, we will set aside a sum with the consent of the provinces for the purpose of improving those highways. Was that unconstitutional? Is it unconstitutional for the Government of Canada to assist the provinces of the Dominion for the purpose of carrying out any enterprise? I am at a loss to appreciate the condition of mind, into which my hon. friends have worked themselves on this particular question. It is well known that some legislatures, legislatures in sympathy with the Liberal party, have been so violent on this question that they have deliberately sought to legislate upon it, in order to prevent the Dominion Government assisting their own provinces, from having better highways, through accepting the generosity shown by this Government. in the distribution of this fund. Is it unreasonable to say that this Government. having placed this money in the Estimates. and having said that it would be distributed, among the provinces of the Dominion pro rata—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In the Bill?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In the estimates —should not be permitted to carry out this legislation? When the House of Commons votes money of its own volition and motion it will do it on its own terms.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The amendments made in this House to that Bill would not prevent the Government from spending that money exactly as they said they would spend it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When the Government said they would give the money in that particular way, they were not going to accept different terms from the Senate as to how that money should be spent. The function above all functions of the House of Commons is to vote supplies. When that House votes supplies, then it is to be expected when that House pronounces how those supplies shall be expended the Senate shall not intervene. and say they shall be expended differently.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Then why introduce a Bill?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There was no necessity for introducing a Bill. The Government last session and the session before could have put the amount in the Estimates. But for the purpose of further assuring the provinces they were willing to put it in a Bill, and so give assurance as to how the money would be distributed.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—You could not attach conditions in the estimate unless you brought in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would say in answer to that, that if the Government desired to apply the fund in a questionable way, they would have put it in the Estimates, and not brought down a Bill. The very objection taken by my hon. friend establishes the good intentions of the Government—namely, that that money should be expended for the advantages of the provinces, and not for the advantage of the government.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—My hon. friend knows that if it went in the Estimates it must be spent by the local governments, but when put in the Bill it would have to be spent according to the wish of the government in power.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Was it unreasonable that the Government of the day in voting a substantial sum to the different provinces of Canada, a sum which the government was not called upon by the British North America Act to vote, a sum which the government voted out of their own generosity, should not exercise some supervision over the money and should not have the opportunity of preventing a province from attempting to destroy the government by the use of that fund? I am not casting a reflection upon the provincial powers, when I say that in the provinces of Canada, irrespective of the political complexion of the governments in power, questionable methods are resorted to in the expenditure of road funds. This Government didi not propose to expend that sum themselves: not a dollar of it could be expended without the co-operation of the provinces; not a dollar of it could be used without a mutual and co-operative scheme being arranged between the two governments.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—Upon conditions laid down in the Bill?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The condition was, generally, that it should be subject to the executive of the province as well as to this government.

Hon. Mr. KERR—There was no condition that it should be uniform in the various provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED:—One province might not appreciate the conditions of the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. KERR—They might refuse the money to one province, and give it to another.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In the two preceding sessions this money was voted by the House of Commons in the way indicated, and I thought it unreasonable that this Chamber should intervene and say; 'notwithstanding that you have assumed the full responsibility that you have, by voting this amount, yet you must spend it as the Senate of Canada says, and not as you the Government of Canada declares.' My hon. friend has alluded to the constitutional difficulties surrounding this question. Constitutional bogies will not be appreciated by the farmers of Canada. That is a question which arose many years ago in the United States. In the North American Review of September 13, my hon. friend will find a very interesting article on that subject. While in the United States, the states of the Union claim that a federal authority can exercise no jurisdiction over the roads of the country, there it was worked out mutually, and the states were only too glad to co-operate with the federal authorities in carrying out a scheme mutually arranged between that authority and the states. The constitutional appropriation was supported chiefly upon some or all of the following federal powers: to establish roads, to regulate commerce, to declare war, to provide for the common defence, and to promote the general welfare. If the federal authority of the United States could invoke its general powers under the headings which I have just mentioned, so might the Dominion of Canada in building roads throughout the Dominion. The Dominion of Canada is just as much interested, as the provinces, in the means of transportation, in questions affecting law and order, in questions affecting trade and commerce, with all of which the highways have to do. It seems to me, with all due deference to the criticisms which have fallen from my hon. friends opposite, that to throw constitutional difficulties in the way of voting an important grant, is not serving any good purpose.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—How can you as a Government, evade the constitution ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The constitution could not stand in the way of this. There is nothing to prevent the Dominion from voting an amount of money to the provinces, to be expended according to a scheme determined by themselves and the provinces. Who will say them nay ?

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—Will you get the judgment of the Supreme Court on that ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The courts could not intervene if the Dominion Government chose to vote a sum to be expended in any province, in accordance with a scheme arranged between the two Governments—the courts could not interfere.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—Any court can declare a law unconstitutional.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But could not prevent by their judgment such assistance being given.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—If my hon. friend is so confident that his judgment is right, let him refer the matter to the Supreme Court. We will not quarrel with the judgment of the court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If any province should be so reluctant to accept money for the building of highways, this Government is not going into litigation over the question.

Now my hon. friend has recited a number of Bills which should in his opinion have been brought down, but which have not been mentioned in the Address, and which were not received in a friendly spirit by the Senate in previous sessions. Among these Bills was the Branch Lines Bill. I think my hon. friend was right in much of the criticism which he made as to that Bill not being rejected on partisan grounds. Of course I would point out, as my hon. friend very properly did point out, that the Bill was originated when the late Government was in office, and likewise was rejected last year. So that I am unaware of the charge of partisanship having been made as to the rejection of that Bill being well grounded. I might say with reference to the Bill, that it was not an unreasonable power for the Government of the day to ask, that they should be entrusted with acquiring the branch railways in connection with the Intercolonial railway. It was in the interest of the country that this should be done. I have no hesitation in saying that the Government of the country is placed in a position of disadvantage, by reason of the legislation which last session was rejected touching the leasing of branch lines of the Intercolonial railway. If similar legislation were passed with reference to any of the other great transportation systems it would be impossible for those systems to do business with advantage. To enact that the Government of the day, operating a great system of railways, should be handicapped, hard and fast, by legislation of this kind, so that they cannot possibly acquire a small road, which, during the recess of Parliament, might be acquired cheaply and advantageously, is to place upon them fetters which will render it impossible to operate that great system advantageously. I say unhesitatingly that if the Government of the day can be entrusted with the administration of the great expenditures which we are called upon to make,—with the expenditures of the revenue of the country, which are closely approaching $200,000,000,—it is not unreasonable to suppose that the Government should be entrusted with acquiring the small branch roads in the Maritime Provinces, which at the most would not exceed the amount limited by our legislation of last session. I think therefore it would be manifestly to the advantage of the country, and particularly to the advantage of the Intercolonial railway, that the Government should be given those powers.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend from Middlesex made reference to the absence of mention in the Speech from the Throne, of the Naval Bill, and expressed his disappointment at no pronouncement being made by the Government, on that very important subject. It is almost needless for me to say that no matter how desirable the Government may have thought the reintroduction of the Bill would have been, any effort which might be made in that direction would go for naught. It seems to me that the attitude taken by the Government is the only reasonable one that could be taken by reasonable men. The antagonism which was shown to the Naval Bill, during the last session of Parliament, not only in this House but particularly in the House of Commons, indicated that there could be only one result with reference to that very important measure, and that would be a second rejection by this Chamber. Last session, or immediately after last session, Canada suffered sufficient humiliation, not only amongst its own people, but in the Empire and throughout the civilized world, at the inability of the Government to pass the measure which was submitted to Parliament, and which I venture to say, in the estimation of reasonable men, was the most commendable measure that could be conceived by our Parliament.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It was a measure which bore the stamp of approval of the imperial authorities, and it was a measure which I venture to say received the approval of the loyal people of this Dominion.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I can further say, with every degree of confidence, that never in the history of this Dominion has Canada suffered the humiliation which it did, when this body rejected that most important measure.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not only the Admiralty authorities, the Imperial Government, but the British public manifested the deepest anxiety on behalf of that measure. I suppose that never in the history of our Colonial Empire, did the Imperial Authorities manifest the same solicitude, and the same anxiety, never did the Imperial authorities place themselves in such a position of sympathetic accord with a Colonial Government as they did on that occasion, in appealing to the people of Canada that this measure should become law, not only on account of the practical assistance which such a measure would have given to the Imperial Government, but rather by reason of the moral forces and influence which it would have throughout all the Chancellories of Europe, in indicating that the Colonial Empire of Great Britain stood behind the Admiralty authorities of Great Britain as to a common system of naval defence.

Hon. MEMBERS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Government of the day, therefore, did not consider it advisable or statesmanlike, having suffered a defeat in this Chamber concerning that measure last session, that we should again be humiliated by a second rejection of the measure. It did not choose to place itself in the position of having the press and public of Germany, of having the unfriendly rivals of Great Britain throughout Europe, express their satisfaction that the government of Great Britain had received a second defeat in the greatest colony of the empire. If my hon. friend can for a moment conceive that we were prepared to place ourselves in that humiliating position, then I say that he cannot form a proper estimate of that proud sensitiveness which must and does characterize our own people, as to the expression of loyalty which they have a right to expect from the Parliament of Canada. My hon. friend took the ground that the absence of any mention being made in the speech from the Throne as to the Naval Bill was manifest evidence that there was no emergency, that the emergency of a session ago ceased to continue to be the emergency of the present moment. Last session this was the position taken by hon. gentlemen, that at the time there was no emergency and that there never had been an emergency. Hon. gentlemen on the Liberal side, in both Houses, assume to speak with greater authority upon that very important question than the Admiralty authorities of Great Britain. I would have thought that it should have appealed to every reasonably minded man, that there is no authority equal to the Admiralty themselves upon that very important question. Can we for a moment conceive that members of the Canadian Parliament, or, for that matter, members of the Imperial Parliament, would have the same information upon this very important question as the members of the Imperial Government of the day, who, of necessity, were closely in touch with all the facts of the national situation, and whose political destinies depended entirely upon their meeting the exigencies and emergencies which were then presenting themselves. If there is no emergency, why is it that every nation in Europe is to-day straining every nerve, straining its finances and burdening the backs of its people with heavy taxes, in the building of armaments, and for the purpose of what?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Fattening the armour trust.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I presume that is about the measure of my hon. friend's estimate of the events happening throughout Europe. That, I fancy, is about the measure which many hon. gentlemen have adopted in weighing this very important measure. What is the meaning to-day of that which we see transpiring in Great Britain itself, where we find the great Liberal party of Great Britain to-day almost rent asunder between those who are endeavouring to meet the emergency and those who view the situation like my hon. friend from Prince Albert? Dissensions have crept into the ranks of the party as to whether they shall maintain the ratio of armament building, or shall sit down and take the chance of attack from their enemies in Europe. So great is the emergency to-day, that it is beginning to weigh more heavily than ever upon the people of Great Britain. Germany, France, Austria and Italy are all taxing themselves to the straining point for the purpose of building up their armaments. Are they doing this for pleasure? Are they doing this unnecessarily? Are they doing this because it is easier for them to do it than not to do it? I say if there is any evidence concerning this great question, it is clear and irresistible that the national affairs of Europe are in such situation to-day as to demand from Great Britain that there shall be no cessation of building up the fleet to meet that Armageddon of the sea, which, they believe, must shortly come.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Will my hon. friend allow me one question?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Last November the authorities of the port of London advertised all through England, Scotland and Ireland for tenders for improving the port of London, which is the property of the English Government. It is a board appointed by the English Government, and by the 20th of December last a contract for an emergency expenditure entailing two millions of pounds was awarded to two German firms. Where is the emergency?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend lacks the comprehension to grasp the situation as it is to-day, and as it must appear to most intelligent men, then I cannot aid him further in grasping it. I can only say that I, as an individual, and I am satisfied a majority of reasonable men, will take the pronouncement of the British Admiralty on the question rather than that of the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Hon. Mr. Boyer) or my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Hon. Mr. Davis). My hon. friend, the leader of the opposite side, has expressed his disappointment that no permanent policy has been outlined by the Government, and consequently for that reason in his opinion, the government is censurable. I would like to ask my hon. friend wherein there can be any better evidence of permanency than that embodied in the Bill of last session. It provided for three of the most powerful dreadnoughts that can be constructed and these are calculated to form the nucleus of a navy with which by their recall Canada may enter either upon its own defence, or co-operate with the naval authorities of Great Britain. If my hon. friends were sincere in their attitude they must know that in any event, no matter whether or not they should come into office again, and proceed with the programme under the Naval Bill of 1910, those ships would be absolutely necessary for the very beginning of that programme. These gentlemen have never been sincere on this question. Their insincerity is to be found recorded in the resolution moved by the leader of their party last session, where it was proposed that Canada should enter upon a programme which admittedly would take ten or fifteen years at least to carry out. The Liberal party at that time proposed that Canada should build two units, one for the Atlantic and one for the Pacific, and furthermore, that those two units should be constructed in Canada. It was proven beyond peradventure, that to enter upon such a constructive programme as that outlined in the resolution would, in the first place, involve an expenditure of fifty or sixty million dollars for the purchase of the units, and an expenditure of $75,000,000 for building plants; even then a ship could not be built until at least ten or fifteen years had passed by.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Months.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Empire of Japan twenty years ago entered upon a somewhat similar programme, and they are not yet able to build all their ships. Most of their vessels are built in European waters and particularly in the dockyards of Great Britain. The very fact of placing that resolution on the records of Parliament, established that these hon. gentlemen are not sincere when they speak of coming to the assistance of Great Britain by the building of a navy.

I venture to say that my hon. friends are more anxious about the unity of the Liberal party than they are about the unity of the empire—

An hon. GENTLEMAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And for that reason they cannot agree upon a programme looking to the common defence of the empire. Do we never realize the humiliating position in which we as the chief colony of the empire are placed? When we consider that the shipping of Canada, that is our foreign shipping, represents approximately half a billion of dollars per annum, our tonnage closely approaching a million, that our ships are sailing over every trade route of the world, and that we are not contributing one dollar towards the defence of that enormous volume of Canadian interests, but that we are relying entirely upon the taxpayers of Great Britain to furnish us with the defence for our own shipping—I say, that if we had a throb of national manhood in our makeup we would hold our heads in shame and humiliation. We rely upon the taxpayers of Great Britain contributing some fifty million pounds per annum for the British Navy and this for Canada's protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And yet we sit by, and idly fold our hands; we talk of doing something in the future. We talk of constitutional difficulties appearing in the way. We build up walls of statutory enactments and constitutional quibbles, and we label them 'Insurmountable for Constitutional Reasons,' and yet look with equanimity at the weary Titan bearing this enormous burden, imposing fifty million pounds of taxes upon the masses of Great Britain, that we with the empire may rest in security. I venture to say that every hon. gentleman present knows that never was Canada placed in so humiliating a position as when this Bill was rejected at the last session of Parliament; when the cables from Canada and from the United States carried the news to Germany, and to the other countries of Europe that were opposed to Great Britain, that Canada had failed to stand by the empire in its hour of peril. That being the case, I venture to say that the Government of Canada will not again submit it until it has some assurance that there will be a more loyal response than has already been given to that very important measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend asked the question, and perhaps very properly so, why the Government of Canada did not enter upon a building programme under the Naval Act of 1910? I shall tell my hon. friends, with very great pleasure, why that was not done. Previous to the general elections of 1911, the Conservative party announced its policy, not only in the House of Commons but throughout the country. They expressed their disapproval of what is known as the Laurier Naval Act. The country supported the Conservative party in their condemnation of that Act. I venture to say, and I say it also with the greatest confidence, that the Liberal party had no sympathy with or confidence in that Act.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS—No, No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say that the Liberal Party previous to their defeat in 1911 had ample opportunity to show their faith by their works if they had chosen to enter upon a building programme under the Naval Act of 1910.

Some Hon. MEMBERS—Hear, Hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In the beginning of May 1911 they had received tenders for the building of those ships Those tenders lay in the Government offices. The month of May went by, the month of June went by, the Month of July went by, the month of August and the month of September went by, but those hon. gentlemen did nothing towards carrying out that programme—they who had expressed such anxiety and such solicitude for assisting Great Britain in the difficulties which were then looming up on the horizon. Did they show any anxiety? Not the slightest. The tenders were pigeon-holed. Inaction characterized the Government. All the passivity of indifference which could be exercised was done in absolutely ignoring the existence of those tenders. Was such evidence as this to be accepted that those gentlemen were sincere in carrying out such a programme as they had declared for? I say it most irresistibly established that those gentlemen had no intention of building the ships for which they had asked tenders. Then furthermore they had within their own grasp the information of their own experts, that if they had entered upon that building programme for which they had asked tenders, those ships would have been obsolete before they were built. And why was that? I say that the Government of the day outlined a building programme which they knew would not be carried out, and that they embodied terms into that programme which would necessarily warrant them in neglecting the carrying of it into operation. Hence, we find their experts declaring that the ships would be out of date, would be obsolete before they were constructed. That, I say, is one of the compelling reasons why the Government of the day did not proceed with the building thereof. Furthermore, in answer to what my hon. friend has said, I say there is no question, and I venture to say my hon. friend will not controvert the statement, that this Government had a mandate from the people to reject that Act.

Some Hon. GENTLEMEN—When?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—At the last general election Rt. Hon. Mr. Borden, the present Prime Minister, announced in 1910 what his policy would be; then again in 1911 he announced what that policy would be. If there was any plank in the platform of the Conservative party in the general elections of 1911 it was that particular plank which defined most clearly and beyond all doubt what the attitude of the Government would be upon that question. Mr. Borden in the House of Commons stated emphatically that his first act would be to make a substantial contribution, by ships or otherwise, to meet the emergency of the hour. He further stated that, after that, a permanent policy would be promulgated. We went to the country, and the country pronounced upon it. Hon gentlemen opposite know, my hon. friends from Quebec know, that the province of Quebec, to almost a man, was unanimously opposed to the Naval Act of 1910.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Why don't you repeal it if the country is opposed to it? You have not got the courage.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED — I therefore affirm that the present Government had a mandate to declare and to introduce into Parliament the measure of last session which they did. If there is anything which has marked the career of the Government since they came into office, it has been the implementing of every pledge which it has made to the electorate. I challenge any hon. gentleman to point out wherein this Government has not shown by its acts the intention to fulfil every pledge made to the electorate at that time. Well, what do we find? We find this, that, notwithstanding the mandate given by the electorate to the Government, this Senate, during the last session of Parliament, undertook to do what? Undertook to bring about a dissolution. This Senate did not pronounce itself upon any alternative measure. If hon. gentlemen in this Senate, who opposed that measure last session, were sincere in a desire to be of assistance to the Empire, they would have proposed an alternative scheme. But was there any alternative scheme proposed by my hon. friends opposite? No; their whole purpose was one of delay, one of destruction of the Bill. It was consequently moved that no action should be taken on the Bill until the matter was submitted to the electorate. Did hon. gentlemen think that a body appointed for life, irresponsible to the people so far as the popular will is expressed, would have constitutionally the right to bring about a dissolution of Parliament by sending the Government to the country, particularly after having come fresh from the people? This was the attitude taken by my hon. friends opposite. Hence we find ourselves in the position, of this measure having been rejected without any alternative measure being proposed, and without any declaration or pronouncement having been made by my hon. friends as to the assistance they were prepared to give to the Empire, at this time of stress and necessity. My hon. friend has expressed solicitude that something should be done; the next move is by my hon. friend. The Government has already moved in the matter. Its move has met with a distinct refusal on the part of this Senate to accept their measure, or to assist in formulating a measure which would be a credit to Canada, or of assistance to the Empire. I hope that after the expressions of solicitude made by my hon. friend, we may have some pronouncement, in the near future, as to where hon. gentlemen opposite do stand, as to whether they are willing to assist the Empire at all, or whether they purpose continuing the policy of delay—I might say of obstruction—which characterized the action of the Liberal party the last session of Parliament.

In conclusion, let me say to hon. gentlemen that while they talk of doing something, I would suggest that my hon. friends opposite should, on this question, show less anxiety for the unity of the Liberal party, and more for the unity of the Empire. I hope the work of the session will be satisfactory to all of us. I shall be only too glad to urge on the Governement to introduce any measures they may have, as far as practicable, in this Chamber. It has always been a matter of regret that we have found difficulty in introducing many measures which I think could be first brought down here with greater advantage than to the House of Commons. But, as I have said on former occasions, the desire has been natural on the part of ministers having portfolios in the Commons, to take charge of their own legislation, and therefore we have been handicapped in the matter of introducing such legislation in the Senate. I hope we may have a profitable and satisfactory session of Parliament, and make good progress with the business of the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I cordially concur in the sentiments which the Government leader in this House has expressed in resuming his seat. I hope we shall have a harmonious and pleasant session, and I hope the Senate will do good work that will redound to its credit. The hon. gentleman spoke of his discursive remarks. I must ask in advance the pardon of the House if my remarks are even more discursive than those of the hon. gentleman. It is a somewhat remarkable fact that the two subjects which have been most discussed today are subjects which really do not appear in the speech from the Throne. I wish to place myself on record as I really feel with respect to the Naval Bill. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman who leads the Liberal party in this House, in expressing the opinion that the Government would have been expected this session to introduce again the Bill which was introduced last year, and which we decided should be referred to the people. I really agree with the leader of the Government that such a course could hardly have been expected. Further, I do not myself feel that, at the present moment, it would be a desirable thing to enter upon any very heavy expenditure for naval purposes. But, while I agree with the leader of the Government so far, there are certain things which he said in connection with the Naval Bill, in which I cannot concur. The hon. gentleman said that the Naval Bill received the approval of all loyal people in Canada. The hon. gentleman could not realize the force of what he said when he made that statement, because the fact is that I believe that a majority of people in Canada have never approved of the Government Bill. I am satisfied a great majority of the people do not now approve of it at all. It is not because these people are disloyal, it is because they do not think the scheme proposed by the Government is the one most in the interests of the Empire and of Canada. After all, the interests of Canada should come first with us, and the interests of the Empire next. The hon. gentleman gave us to understand that this scheme for building three dreadnoughts was the scheme of the British Admiralty. One would imagine, listening to him, that the British Admiralty had disapproved of any other scheme, or certainly had not approved of any other scheme, and that if we did not endorse this scheme, we were flying in the face of the Imperial Government.

What is the fact? The fact is that the British Government and Admiralty approved of the Laurier scheme of 1910. Every one knows that the right hon. leader of the present Administration paid visits to Europe in order, apparently, to get the Admiralty to concur in his view. The Admiralty, naturally, were anxious to get help, and if they could not get what had been promised by the former Administration, they would be glad to take what was promised by their successors.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Admiralty approved of the course which the late Government adopted with regard to the navy?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Surely, and they designed the boats and sent out the blue prints.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—One at a time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is handy to have some one to answer for you.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman stated that the former Administration were not in earnest in dealing with this question, because they did not award the contracts before going out of power. Now, hon. gentlemen before it was time to let the contracts, there was a fight in the House of Commons and in the country which terminated in a general election, and the defeat of the late Government. I think it would have been an unseemly thing on the part of the Government, whose fate was hanging in the balance, to have awarded contracts for immense sums. If they had done that, then the hon. gentleman would have come in here and condemned them in the very strongest terms for having done what they had done. I think, as far as regards that particular question, the late Government did the decent thing; they left the Administration to whom the people had entrusted the power, the right to deal with this question. And if, as it turned out to be the case, the new Administration did not approve of the late Government's scheme, then they were able to set their own scheme before the country. The hon. gentleman stated that this question of the three dreadnoughts was that chiefly discussed during the election of 1911. No doubt there had been something said about it, but every hon. gentleman who travels through the country, or who reads the newspapers or listened to the speeches made during that campaign knows that outside the province of Quebec the three dreadnoughts cut a very small figure indeed. The great thing, the subject which was most discussed, was the Reciprocity Treaty. From one end of the country to the other, the patriotic feeling of Canadians was called upon, and they were asked to have no truck or trade with the Yankees.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. POWER—To-day apparently even the leader of the Government goes down to Washington or New York and is exceedingly friendly with those gentlemen across the line, with whom we were to have no truck or trade.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not a bit of it, it never was said.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then the hon. gentleman criticised the amendment moved by my right hon. friend to my right, to the Naval Bill. Had the hon. gentleman forgotten that that resolution was identical with the amendment he moved to the Bill of 1910?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Verbatim.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Almost verbatim et literatim.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Entirely different subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Naval Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—An entirely different Naval Bill. I would say to my hon. friend that I must have been justified in moving as I did, because they did submit it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Something depends upon whose ox it is. On this question of loyalty, and on the attitude of the British Admiralty, it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that Australia has adopted a policy which the former Administration adopted here, and that policy, I understand, has not met with any serious disapproval in England. More recently, or quite recently, the Dominion of New Zealand, which had, at first, adopted the plan of the hon. gentleman, has fallen back upon the plan of the former Administration. The people of England do not seem to think that Australia or New Zealand has done anything very disloyal, or improper, I think it is better not to use too strong language, in a case of this sort.

Perhaps I may be permitted, having said a word about this question with which my two hon. predecessors have dealt so fully, to deal with the Speech from the Throne as it has been submitted to us. I cordially endorse everything that has been said by the hon. gentlemen who preceded me with respect to the sympathy felt in Canada for their Royal Highnesses in connection with the serious illness of the Duchess of Connaught. His Royal Highness, in the Speech, said that during the serious illness of Her Royal Highness much comfort and support were afforded to him and the Duchess by the numerous messages of sympathy received from Canada. I wish here to assure Their Royal Highnesses that the sympathy was not confined to the people who sent messages. The people of this country universally sympathized with Their Royal Highnesses in their affliction, and rejoiced exceedingly at the providential recovery of the Duchess of Connaught. The whole people of this country unite in trusting that Her Royal Highness may shortly be restored to perfect health.

I do not propose to deal with all the clauses of the Speech, but there are two or three to which I think it well to refer. The fifth paragraph says:

> As a result of the recent decennial census the representation of the different provinces must be readjusted, as required by the British North America Act, and a Bill will be introduced for that purpose.

That is a right and proper thing to do. The only thing is that the redistribution measure should have come last year. The hon. gentleman told the House that the measure would be one that would commend itself, as I understood him, to our good judgment and sense of fair play. I hope that such may be the case. It would, perhaps, be wise for the Government to follow the example of their predecessors and allow the general scheme of redistribution, at any rate, to be referred to a committee containing representatives of both parties. That was the course adopted after the census of 1901, and it was the course followed by Mr. Gladstone in England in 1884. Speaking with respect to this redistribution measure, and speaking only for myself, I may say that if the measure is one involving a gerrymander, this House would be perfectly justified in declining to pass it without such amendments as would commend themselves to any fair minded man. My hon. friend to my right (Sir George Ross) referred to the fact that on previous occasions, when the Conservative party had a majority in this House, they did undertake to deal with measures which were, in a sense, redistribution measures.

The next paragraph says that a Bill relating to the Civil Service will be submitted for our consideration. I trust that the effect of this measure will be to put the Civil Service on a business basis, and also that provision will be made for retiring allowances to deserving civil servants, and to protect their dependents from beggary. I assume that to a certain extent the measure to be introduced by the Government will follow the lines set out in the report of Sir John Murray. The Government cannot go far wrong if they follow his recommendations.

The seventh paragraph says that among the Bills to be submitted will be measures providing for an increased representation of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia in the Senate. The gentlemen whom we have representing those provinces in the Senate at the present time are of such a character that we should hail with pleasure an addition to their number, and when the representation of the Western provinces in the popular House has been satisfactorily adjusted I have no doubt this House will be prepared to concur in any Bill to provide for a reasonable increase in the number of Senators from that portion of Canada.

The ninth paragraph of the Speech says:

> You will be pleased to learn that satisfactory arrangements have been made with the various provinces under the Agricultural Instruction Act passed at the last session. My advisers are convinced that the co-operation between the Dominion and the provinces which is thus afforded, will accomplish excellent results, in assuring better agricultural instruction and needful improvement of existing methods of agriculture.

We naturally are pleased at the good results which are to flow from the co-operation of the Dominion and the provinces with respect to agriculture. That leads one to express regret that the Government, by refusing to accept the amendments to the Highways Bill proposed by this House, and which would have put aid to roads on the same footing as that of agriculture, have prevented the good results which might have followed from the passage of that measure. While on the subject of roads I am sure that the remarks of the hon. gentleman to-day were not altogether in harmony with those he addressed to the House last session. Now the object of these roads is to enable the farmers to get their products to market readily and in such way that their carts and wagons will not be up to the hubs in mud. That was not the line that the hon. gentleman took last year. I shall just read the beginning of his speech:

It seems to me that hon. gentlemen who have been performing the role of critics of this Bill have a very great misconception of the policy, the nature and the origin of the Bill. Hon. gentlemen seem to be obsessed, if I may use that term, in its more courteous sense, with the idea that a great constitutional wrong has been done not only to the provinces, but to the Senate of Canada by the Government in the introduction of this Bill. Hon. gentlemen seem to be equally obsessed by the idea that a very great discourtesy has been extended by the Governement of Canada to the Senate on account of their failure to attach that importance which certain gentlemen think should be attached to this amendment which the Senate made to the Bill last year. If hon. gentlemen will look at the preamble of the Bill they should come to a different conclusion than that which they apparently have arrived at as the object of this Bill. If they will observe the language in the preamble of the Bill they will find that this is not a local undertaking. This has not for its object the improvement of roads in a particular municipality, or group of municipalities. It is not intended for a moment that this assistance should be given to the ordinary highway in a local sense.

But there is a larger object than that in view. The Government has the object in view set out in the preamble of the Bill. I maintain that while highways in their local sense are peculiarly provincial undertakings, that this is more than a provincial undertaking. This is a interprovincial and national undertaking and does not come within the class of cases referred to by my hon. friends, and particularly the hon. gentlemen from De Lorimier, who cited to us last night section 92 of the British North America Act, in which he sought to bring this undertaking under subsection 10 of section 92, and within the language 'local works and undertakings.' My hon. friend did not peruse the section or follow it up as he should have done. Had he done so he would have found that this class of undertaking does not come within the jurisdiction of the province properly speaking.

Instead of roads to enable the poor farmer to get his products to market, there was to be a highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and this was to be utilized it was understood chiefly by the owners of automobiles.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not say automobiles, I said main roads.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was the impression that would be naturally left on the minds of those who listened. The next paragraph is with respect to the National Transcontinental railway:

The work on the National Transcontinental railway has been rapidly advanced during the past year, and, notwithstanding the difficulties attending the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, and the provision of terminals, every possible progress has been made in bringing that important project nearer to completion.

I am satisfied that if that National Transcontinental railway had been left in the hands of the Commission, under whose management it was, up to October, 1911, the road would have been completed before this. It was so understood at the time, but the Government got rid of the old commission and appointed a gentleman named Leonard to fill the places of the four or five gentlemen who formed that commission. I do not myself know very much about Mr. Leonard, and I do not know very much about the way the work was being done, but there is a newspaper published in Winnipeg called the Telegram which, I understand, is in a sense the personal organ of the Minister of Public Works. Consequently any criticism which that paper offers on the policy of the present Government can be trusted as being deserved. The article opens with the statement that:

The growing dissatisfaction through the West over the slow progress being made in the construction of the National Transcontinental is being reflected in the animated comment of the press regardless of party affiliations.

And then it goes on:

The old commission, responsible for much of this trouble, was dismissed and new men appointed, but there was no improvement in action and efficiency. This is too clear. Mr. Borden's Government deserves the support of the people, and they have confidence in him, but there can be no question that a mistake was made in the selection of Major Leonard as chairman of the Transcontinental commission. This Mr. Borden's warmest supporters today freely admit. The only virtue the commission can claim is honesty. This is an excellent quality, but it does not tunnel mountains, bridge rivers, and construct railways. In the interest of the people, especially the people of western Canada, and with no desire to damage Major Leonard's reputation, the Telegram desires to affirm that his work as head of the commission has been a distinct failure. The Telegram believes a mistake was made in choosing Major Leonard for this responsible position. He is not a railway builder, however good he may be in locating mining propositions. It is a pity, therefore, to spoil an excellent 'prospector' at the expense of the National Transcontinental project.

It is not necessary to go into details to indicate Major Leonard's unfitness for the position he occupies. The impression is growing that more progress would be made on the work if the youngest engineer in the employ of the commission were in charge.

Hon. Frank Cochrane, the Minister of Railways, is a busy man. He is an overworked Minister, and he will continue to be overworked as long as he is burdened with incompetents like Major Leonard in control of great undertakings like the Transcontinental. The suggestion is freely made that either Mr. Cochrane should take over the important work or a commisioner be appointed with the ability and skill to expedite the work. The East as well as the West is vitally interested in an immediate improvement, and will be satisfied with nothing less.

Apparently after two years experience of Major Leonard, the Minister of Public Works does not see Mr. Leonard with just the same eyes that the Minister of Railways does.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman know that Mr. Leonard refuses to acquiesce in, or adopt the plans for the terminals in the city of Winnipeg, which brought forth the condemnation of that paper?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not know.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite sure my hon. friend did not or he would not have read it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And by the way, with respect to this Transcontinental, there was a Commission of Inquiry appointed to inquire into the maladministration of the old Transcontinental commission. Perhaps some other hon. gentleman may have the advantage of me, but I have not yet had the pleasure of seeing the report of that commission although it was appointed, I think, two years ago. I think the probabilities are that they have discovered a number of 'mares' nests.' I may be allowed to refer to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman in reference to two or three steep grades on the Transcontinental, one I think in the province of Quebec, and one or two in the province of New Brunswick. I cannot speak about the Quebec grade, but I do know, with respect to the New Brunswick grade, that there was practically a range of mountains to be got over which could not possibly be got over without adopting what they call a 'pusher' grade. These things, I understand, are not uncommon on railways, the mountains were too thick to be tunnelled through, and the engineers of the railway resorted to the expedient of using a pusher grade, and having a second engine put on to help the train over the grade.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Only a one per cent grade anyway.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then something has been said with respect to the Hudson Bay railway. I am free to admit that after reading the report of the engineer making the surveys for this road, I laboured under the impression that, on the whole, the Nelson river terminus was the better, that it was preferable to Churchill. But since that time—that is two years ago now—we have had practical experience, which teaches a different lesson. It is quite clear that no ship can come within, at any rate, less than about five miles of the shore at Port Nelson, and every cargo that is put aboard a ship, or landed from a ship, has to be transferred by lighters. That is a very serious inconvenience and involves a great deal of additional expense. The harbour of Fort Churchill is a good harbour. It is not a large harbour, but I fancy it is large enough to accommodate all the ships that would be there at any given time. It is a good harbour; it needs no large expense to enable ships to resort to it, and what may surprise a good many of the hon. gentlemen, there is less ice in the harbour of Fort Churchill than at the mouth of the Nelson river. So I asked the hon. leader of the Government, when speaking on this subject, whether the road was completed yet to the mouth of the Nelson river. I understand that the surveys of both the Nelson river line and the Churchill line would go over the same route from the Pas to Split Lake. If the road has not been constructed east of Split Lake, I think the Government would be wise in considering whether it would not be well to adopt the line running from Split Lake to Fort Churchill instead of the other. It is perfectly clear from the experience that we have had, that if we attempt to locate a terminus at the mouth of the Nelson river, in addition to the fact that ships cannot get to the shore, we will need to have dredging going on there continually. The river brings down a great deal of silt, and if you dredge to-day you will need to dredge again in a month. That means a continual heavy bill of expense. The hon. gentleman from Middleton, as well as most people in Halifax, are familiar with some experience we had with a number of vessels which went from Halifax during the latter part of last summer, to Fort Nelson with supplies and construction materials, etc., needed there for the purpose of the terminals, and of the railway. Not a single ship, I think, of the half dozen that went there succeeded in landing her cargo. One ship was lost, and the bulk of her cargo lost also. In the case of another vessel, the deck load was thrown overboard, some of it drifting ashore—the remainder went Lord knows where. There was the utmost want of landing facilities and other provision on the part of the employees of the Railway Department. There should have been a number of lighters there, and there was only one lighter for all the vessels, and the result was that some of the vessels came back to Nova Scotia, having on board the cargoes with which they started for Port Nelson. I think the hon. leader of the Government, who is a business man, must see that there is really a substantial reason for pausing before deciding that the terminal shall be located at Port Nelson.

There is another point to which I desire to call attention. There was a good deal of discussion on the subject of the tariff. I have never posed as an expert on tariffs: and a good deal has been said about the high cost of living. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the reduction of the tariff would have no effect in the cost of living, and he gave as substantial ground for that view the fact that while there has been a very considerable reduction in the tariff on food products in the United States, there has been no perceptible reduction in the cost of living. I am reminded of an amusing story, but it is hardly suitable for the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Go on, let us have it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As to the rapidity with which results can be obtained. It was only in the month of October last that the change took place in the United States tariff. We must remember, too, that at this time the dealers in the United States had very considerable stocks of food products on hand, and naturally if they could prevent it the prices would not fall immediately on the change in the tariff. Wait until next summer. I can point to one illustration of a contrary view to that which he has expressed. Some time ago Secretary Daniels, the Secretary of the United States Navy, had occasion to ask for tenders for supplies of beef for the United States navy. Tenders were presented by numbers of dealers in the United States, but Secretary Daniels did not award the contract to any of these tenderers. He gave it to a concern from Argentina, and saved, as has been pointed out, hundreds of thousands of dollars to the navy by so doing. That just shows that the removal of the tariff may have a very considerable effect. The hon. gentleman said that the farmers were anxious for protection, and that it would be an exceedingly unpopular thing with the agricultural class of this country to do anything towards reducing the duties on food products. As I understand it, the United States are in this position. They say to Canada: 'If you will remove the duties on American grain and flour, we shall remove the duties on Canadian grain and flour.' The hon. gentleman seems rather amused at that. This is rather a broad-minded thing on the part of the American Government to say. Is it the farmers who object to this line of action, the removal of duties on United States flour and wheat? Not at all. We have delegations from the West coming and urging the Government, beseeching the Government, to do that very thing. Now why does the Government not do it? The Citizen of Ottawa is a pretty staunch Conservative paper, and I find in yesterday's paper some information that may shed a little light on the attitude of the Government. This refers to the people who want to know about the farmers, and the reducing of the cost of living. The writer says:

> They may perhaps be able to find out the reason of the product of the Canadian prairies being sold cheaper in London and Liverpool than in Winnipeg or Montreal. Recent returns show that top grade flour, which costs $5 per barrel in Winnipeg, $5.10 in Montreal, $6.50 in Halifax, N.S., and $5.50 in St. John's, Newfoundland, sells at $4.18 in London; that patent which sells in Winnipeg at $4.80 per barrel and in Montreal at $4.90 sells in London at $4.06; baker's, which sells in Winnipeg at $4 per barrel and in Montreal at $4.10, sells in London at $3.60. It will be interesting to learn why flour produced in Canada and transported across a continent and an ocean can be sold much cheaper in London and Liverpool than in Canada. It must be sold at a profit over there, or the flour millers here must be philanthropists of a very high order, who, out of sympathy with our already overtaxed British brethren, adopt this delicate method of assisting them to bear their onerous burdens, in sustaining the vast fabric of empire, at a juncture which calls for the support of the overseas dominions. If such be the case, Canadians might grin and bear it, although that would have little effect in filling a void in the stomach.

There is, however, another aspect of the case to which no doubt the commission will give its attention, although it is obvious in this one particular that the finger can be put upon a contributory cause of the high cost of living, which has become so acute in our centres of industry, as to alarm the mass of the workers. I allude to the earning of the milling companies, as can be seen from the published reports of their annual meetings. Many people will be surprised to learn that companies like the Lake of the Woods, Ogilvies and others have been earning 30 per cent on the preferred stock and from 14 to 18 per cent on the ordinary stock, while no less than 60 per cent was earned on the common stock of the International Milling Company, which made last year $500,000, or ten times the amount of its bonded interest. These are interesting considerations. especially if they be taken in relation to the watered stock which marks the formation, operation and financial procedures.

After all, the millers may not be such philanthropists as we imagine, but we hope that the commission will be able to find out some, at least, of the causes contributing to this very peculiar condition of affairs.

Now, hon. gentlemen, we can form some idea as to why it is reported that the farm population is opposed to the removal of the duties on American wheat and flour.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does that article refer to the grade or quality of the flour that is sold cheaper in London?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, the different grades are given.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex): It is true of everything else. Everything is cheaper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice the hon. gentleman made some reference to the German tariff. I read in the newspapers that, owing to the high cost of living in Germany, it is proposed to cut down the duty on food products.

The hon. gentleman made some reference to the way in which the Senate treated the Bill for the acquisition of branch lines for the Intercolonial railway, but I do not think it is worth while fighting the battles of last session over again. I think the Senate did the right thing in that case, and further, I believe the Minister of Railways agreed with the Senate in that matter.

There is just one other paragraph to which I propose briefly to refer, paragraph 11, which reads as follows:

In connection with the highly important subject of transportation of our products, the provision of adequate terminal facilities at our great national ports has received and is receiving the attention of my advisers.

What I was going to say is not said, I assure hon. gentlemen, from any partisan standpoint. I think that we should try to conduct the business of the country as a private business would be conducted. You cannot do it altogether, but still I think we should try to get as near as possible to the businesslike way of doing things. It will be remembered that some two or three years ago—I think it was before the present Government came in—a contract was made with Vickers Sons and Maxim for the construction of a dry dock to be used in the port of Montreal. Now, any business man would not dream of such an undertaking as that. There are three places, three districts, where dry docks may be necessary. Although not absolutely necessary, still it would be desirable to have a dry dock somewhere about tne mouth of the St. Lawrence river so that steamships disabled in the gulf could resort to it and could be refitted there. Then there ought to be a dry dock on the Atlantic coast, so that lame ducks could drop in and have their wounds dressed. And there ought to be, I think also, a dry dock on the Pacific. I understand the Government are themselves about to construct a dry dock in British Columbia; but I understand that, although this dry dock in Montreal has been in operation, or at least fit for operation, for the transaction of business for several months, it has never had a ship in it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It has had a ship in it, but it never had any repairs made to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If there was one ship in it that is about all. Of course advice coming from this side of the House is not welcome by the hon. leader.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I tnink the sensible thing to do would be to tow the dock down to Quebec and utilize it there. There may be some use for it there. The presnt Government are not particularly responsible for the dry dock at Montreal, but they have begun the construction of a dry dock at St. John, N.B., and St. John is to a certain extent in the same position as Montreal. A ship which becomes disabled on the Atlantic ocean is not going around Sable Island and up through the difficult and dangerous navigation of the Bay of Fundy to get to a dry dock at St. John. Of course St. John has many good qualities, and there are ways in which, when the tide is full, the harbour of St. John is a very good harbour. But it is not the place for a dry dock. Yet here the Government is proposing, I understand, to guarantee the payment of the bonds on this dock to the extent of four or five millions for a work which will necessarily be a failure. I am not saying they should do anything for Halifax. We have a fairly good dry dock there, and it may, in the course of time, need to be added to. But Halifax, or St. John's, Newfoundland, or New York, is the place to which a ship disabled on the Atlantic will naturally make. I hope the Government will keep their eyes open at any rate with respect to the undertaking at St. John. There are terminal facilities being constructed at great expense at St. John. Of these I do not know anything, but I assume they are valuable and useful works. I can speak, however, with a certain amount of confidence with respect to the terminal facilities which are being provided at Halifax. I am not going into the question now; it is too late, and it is a local subject; but I may say this: that the view which I ventured to express in this House last session with reference to these terminal facilities has been borne out by the facts. The scheme now in course of construction in Halifax is exceedingly unpopular, and calculated to do the utmost possible damage to the city. It is a rather singular thing in connection with the facilities at Halifax that the Chief Engineer of the Government railways, the Chief Engineer of the Intercolonial railway, and all the other officers of the Railway Department and of the Intercolonial railway, were completely ignored by the Government when they undertook to devise a scheme for those facilities. A gentleman whose experience had been chiefly in dealing with dredging in the St. Lawrence river, was brought down or instructed to go down to Halifax, and make plans. When his plans were made they were apparently looked upon like the laws of the Medes and Persians—they could not be altered or amended. If any hon. gentleman interested in this subject refers to the Sessional papers of 1881 he will there find that Collingwood Schrieber, who at that time was Chief Engineer of the Government railways, and P. S. Archibald, who was Chief Engineer of the Intercolonial railway, recommended a method of getting to the shipping point which would have avoided all the objections to the scheme which the present Government has adopted. This method would have served the purposes much better, and would have saved at least seven miles in length, which is an important consideration.

There is just one further observation I should like to make if hon. gentlemen will permit me. When the Canadian Northern Railway Company began to run steamers across the Atlantic, they selected Halifax as their port of departure and arrival. For three years they continued to utilize that port.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In the winter time only.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the winter time, of course; in the summer they go to the St. Lawrence. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company during those years, up to last spring sent their ships to St. John. During the last fall the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made up their minds that they could not afford to send their ships by the Bay of Fundy to St. John, and they decided that they should sail from Halifax. That was a matter for the steamship company one would suppose, but the Government took Mackenzie and Mann by the throat, so to speak, and insisted that they should transfer their ships from Halifax to St. John. Now, that is a thing quite unprecedented. The only excuse they could give for doing this, they have not a right to do it, is that these ships carried the mails. Well, what is the duty of the Government of this country with respect to the mails? It is to see that the mails between England and, say Montreal, are transported in the shortest possible time consistent with safety. St. John is at least 250 miles further from Liverpool than Halifax is.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—How much nearer is it to Montreal than Halifax?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Two hundred miles.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—Just so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There have been various test cases. My hon. friend must bear in mind that an express train travels quicker than a steamer.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—Exactly; that is all the better.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There were test cases in former years, and there have been various tests during the present season, and in every case it has been found that the mails carried by Halifax got to Montreal in at least ten hours less time from Liverpool, than those which went via St. John. Now it seems to me that the Government are not doing the right thing by the people of this country. I leave Halifax and St. John out of the question, but the people of this country have a right to get their mails in the shortest possible time.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And they are not doing it, and the interference of the Government with the Canadian Northern railway has had the effect, at any rate with respect to a large proportion of the mails, of lengthening the time taken in transportation. I end as I began with the hope that the harmony and good feeling which have generally characterized our relations in this House will continue to characterize them in the future.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL- I had not intended to take any part in this debate, but a few statements have been made during the course of it which induce me to think that probably it would be advisable for me not to pass the debate over in absolute silence. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Will the hon. gentleman allow me. I may not be here to-morrow when the debate is continued, so if the hon. gentleman will allow me only a few minutes.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I wish to call attention to an argument used by the hon. gentleman who moved the adoption of the Address. I thought it was one which had been abandoned, and should not be taken seriously. Of course, he quoted a great authority, Sir George Paish, in support of it and tried to make out that the people of England like us so much that they are willing to lend us money at 4 per cent when they can get 5 per cent for it elsewhere. The hon. gentleman went on further to show that this difference in the rate of interest enables us to effect a saving which, in two years, would pay the cost of the dreadnoughts Canada was asked to contribute to the British fleet. For my part, I do not believe that the English people like us quite so much as that. I should like to have the name of one Englishman whose income from investments we will say is £500 a year and who would voluntarily, for love of the people of Canada that he never saw, would be willing to lend his money at a rate which would reduce his income to four hundred pounds a year, and perhaps when his wife asked for a new bonnet would have to say 'My dear, I cannot afford it this year, I love the people of Canada so much that I have given up one hundred pounds of my income in order that they may pay only four per cent on my investment.' I cannot believe that such an argument is made seriously. The hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Mason) is president of a bank, lives in the imperialist city of Toronto. What did that city do lately? It required to borrow money lately and where did it go? Not to England but to the awful Yankees, to the city of New York, and the Americans must have liked the people of Toronto better than the English do, because they loaned the city money on better terms than it could be borrowed for in England. What a debt of gratitude the imperialists of Toronto must owe the people of New York who are willing to lend them money at a lower rate than they could borrow it for in England. I do not think it is necessary to dwell further on that argument. Although it was the first speech the hon. gentleman delivered in this House, we must remember that his speech was written and he must have used that argument for a purpose.

As to the Branch Lines Bill, I do not want to dwell on the old story of the rejection of that measure. I was in favour of it, but the majority of the Senate rejected it. The rejection of that measure, far from proving partisanship on the part of the Senate, simply proved the independence of this Chamber. The Bill, which passed unanimously in the House of Commons, had been framed at the suggestion of the Hon. Mr. Graham, the Railway critic of the Opposition, because, as originally introduced, it was similar to a Bill of the same character that had been introduced by the former Administration, and Mr. Graham told the present Minister of Railways that it was no good because it did not go far enough. He said if you want to buy a branch railway you must have authority to do it even during the recess of Parliament. I stated that last year, but the majority of this House though aware of the fact, refused in its wisdom to pass the measure. I do not think, therefore, that the rejection of that Bill should be charged to partisanship on the part of the Senate.

The hon. member from Halifax has spoken about Port Nelson. How often have I been on my feet in this House to warn this Government and the former Government against going to Port Nelson. I say the adoption of Port Nelson as the terminus of the Hudson Bay railway is evidence of unpardonable neglect on the part of this Government at any rate. The late Government might not have had all the information, but a return for which I asked, when brought down the first session that the present Government was in power, showed the unsuitability of Port Nelson as a terminus for the Hudson Bay railway. I asked for a return showing the depth of water at Port Nelson one mile from the shore, two miles out, three miles out up to twenty miles. The information supplied was that at a distance of sixteen miles from shore there were only seventeen feet of water. I ask any one who has the slightest knowledge of navigation if any ship could live sixteen miles from shore with a sweep of a thousand miles of water. Why, with the large swell that rolls up there, the ship would not hold on its anchors. I always thought the present Minister of Railways, the Hon. Mr. Cochrane, though not gifted with eloquence, was a business man and had sound commonsense. I know he had large business interests in northern Ontario and had been successful as a business man and I thought he would manage his department in a business like way. But I have been disappointed. Gross mismanagement has been shown in the selection of Port Nelson. One ship was wrecked and another was thrown on the coast and is there to-day. The Government must have some good friends in Halifax. They bought a tug there—just one tug to lighter ten or twelve vessels. That tug has to run out ten or twelve miles to get a small load and could only go when it was calm. When there is wind the tug cannot go. The vessel was bought, I suppose, from a good friend of the Administration. It has a speed about equal to the current at the mouth of the Nelson river, so that she cannot ascend the river against the current with its tow, and has to wait for the incoming tide. It certainly was a scandal to buy such a boat for that service. One ship was chartered to take timber to the Hudson Bay. The Government gave a bonus of $35,000—so I learned from reports in the press—and then $200 a day for the use of the ship while she was there. That vessel passed through Hudson straits and entered Hudson bay and swung on her anchor all summer at $200 a day, because this incompetent Government had not even thought that when the ship arrived at destination they would have to unload her. Never before has there been such mismanagement and such a waste of public money. I hope we will be able to get in this House the information which will show the mismanagement which has taken place. Provisions were put on shore and covered with tarpaulin; other supplies were left out in the open, and the men who were employed there were glad to come back with the last ship that came out—those who could come back—some of them dissatisfied with the way they had been treated. No shelter had been provided for them. But what good would it be to erect shelter there? The banks of the Nelson river near its mouth are very low, at most five or six feet above high tide, and when the north wind blows the shore is often flooded. It is nothing but a swamp, and is no place for a harbour. The Government have, in the Department of the Interior, the Surveyor General, Capt. Deville, a man well posted on the geography of the country. Why did they not consult him? Last year I told the Government to ask their own surveyors if they wanted to know what sort of a harbour Port Nelson would make. Notwithstanding that, they chartered ships and sent them there, never making any provision for unloading them. Some very expensive lumber had to be thrown overboard to save one ship and the timber that was in the hold of the vessel came back and was unloaded at he wharf in Sydney. I intend to make an inquiry for information; I do not know if we can get it, because sometimes it takes a ong time to get returns in this House. I will ask how many vessels have been sent out and how much money has been squandered just because the Government would not take heed when they were warned. What I say now is within the hearing of the minister. I see him smile, but he knows I am only repeating what I said last year and the year before. To-day I am sorry to say I have the satisfaction of saying 'I told the Government so.'

The hon. leader of the Government reminded me to-day of the good old Tory Party when he made his speech. He was bubbling over with loyalty. I never heard him better on loyalty than he was to-day.

The party were going to do wonders. I defy him to point to one single thing that the Conservative Party ever did for the Empire. The first time we were asked for help was during the war in Egypt. The hon. member for Hastings (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) was, I think, in the Government at the time. What did they do? The British Government wanted some voyageurs to go up the Nile, and asked Sir John Macdonald if they would be allowed to recruit men here. The despatch went back 'Yes, you can, but at your own expense. Remember, not one dollar, not one man,' and that has been the policy of the Conservative Party. When we gave a preference to England did the Conservative Party approve of that? No, no preference. During the Boer War who sent the contingents? The Liberal Administration (laughter). Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but my own flesh and blood were out there. My brother was there in charge of the Intelligence Department, Sir Percy Girouard was there, and I had relations who were wounded there too. My people have fought for the Crown and Empire. We do not shout: we do things. Here is this Government bubbling over with loyalty, and what do you see them doing for the Empire? Nothing. They have been in office two years. The first year there was nothing to be done; they had to go and see what they could do. The following year they were told to submit their policy to the country, but they were unwilling to face the people. A great imperialist that I met in Montreal said to me 'You ought to be ashamed of yourself: you voted against a contribution of $35,000,000 to help in the defence of the Empire.' I said 'I did not vote against it; we simply wanted to submit the policy of the Government to the judgment of the country. Don't you think if the Government had been sincere they would have submitted it and then the policy would have been fixed and everything would have been satisfactory.' He said 'But is not that asking too much? They have been fifteen years in Opposition and you ask them to risk the sweets of power.' So then I said, 'You conclude that it is more important that the Conservative party should be in power than that the Empire should be saved.'

I observe a small discrepancy of 38 millions. The hon. leader of the House said that the National Transcontinental railway was going to cost two hundred million. They have been stating so right along. The mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne told us that it would cost $107,000,000, and, with the accesories, etc., $162,000,000. There is a slight discrepancy of $38,000,000. That is a small amount for them, but I think they should chord their violins, so that they should play the same tune.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN in the absence of Hon. Mr. Gibson, moved the adoption of the first report of the Committee of Selection appointed to name senators to serve on the Several Standing Committees during the present session.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Before the motion is put I desire to call the attention of the House to a motion which appears in the Minutes, after the names of members for the different committees are mentioned. It reads as follows:

That the Committe on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts when appointed be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary and, without special reference to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House.

The Striking Committee was appointed specially to nominate the members to serve during the session, and I do not think they have a right to pass this resolution. Two or three years ago a law was passed placing these appointments in the hands of a special committee, and I do not believe it will make any difference whether we shall adopt this motion or not. I do not think it has any value. It may have been framed to please somebody. We should not adopt it.

The SPEAKER—In reading the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate, I find that the report of the committee contains the names of the members who compose the different committees, and is signed by Mr. Gibson. Then follows the motion. Am I to understand that this motion forms part of the report, or is it a different motion?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It forms part of the report, but, through an error of the clerk of the committee, this resolution was not added to the report until after the chairman had signed it. It is altogether a mistake of the Clerk of the Committee. I may say, however, in order to relieve the mind of the hon. gentleman from Lauzon, that the object of the resolution was a very simple one. As it is now, the Committee on Standing Orders is authorized to take into consideration all the business that comes before it, even without any special reference from the House, and it was found exceedingly inconvenient that the Committee on Internal Economy, which has to deal with circumstances coming up day after day, should not have the right to deal with any little question, the conduct of a page or messenger, or putting a latch on a door without a special reference from the Senate. This resolution, if adopted, does not interfere with the right of His Honour the Speaker to make recommendations to the House. That right is based on the statute, and any regulations we might chose to make, or any report we might adopt could not override the statute, so that there is, really, no substantial objection to the thing at all.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—If the resolution has no value, it would be just as well to drop it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has value. It enables the committee to deal with small matters that come up every little while, and then the resolution provides that the committee shall report to the Senate, so that there is no fear that the rights of the Senate or of anybody will be interfered with.

The SPEAKER—In looking over the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate I find on page 14:

The Honourable Mr. Lougheed moved, seconded by the Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

That pursuant to Rule 77, the following Senators: The Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the Honourable Messeurs Gibson, Beique, Power, Watson, Casgrain, Ross (Moosejaw) Daniel and the mover be appointed a Committe of Selection to nominate Senators to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session; and to report with all convenient speed the names of the Senators so nominated.

The report now before us contains the work that is to be done by the different committees, and reports the names of members of the different committees, and the following is added:

That the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts when appointed be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary and, without special reference, to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House.

In my opinion, this is an addition to the report of the committee, outside of the reference given by this House. May, at page 546, says:

It is a clear and indisputable principle of Parliamentary law that a committe is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference.

Therefore, in my opinion, this part of the report of the committee is not in order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not raise any difficulty in the matter. It is not worth fighting about, but I give notice that, when the report is adopted without this paragraph, I shall move that this resolution be added at the next sitting.

The SPEAKER—Do I understand that that part is left out of it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE

Ottawa, Friday, January 23, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW POST OFFICE AT KAMLOOPS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired:

That he will inquire of the Government if a site has been decided upon for the new post office at Kamloops? If so, what is the location of the site?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There has been no decision as yet.

THE INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary and, without special reference, to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I explained yesterday briefly why this motion was proposed. It was adopted nem. con. by the Striking Committee and it is this: that there are numerous matters which are coming up from day to day, with which the committee should deal, and at present the committee cannot deal with these matters without special reference from the House. It will be observed that everything the committee does has to be reported to the Senate and has to receive the approval of the Senate. Further, this resolution cannot interfere with the right of His Honour the Speaker to submit nominations for appointment to the Senate service. That right of his honour the Speaker is provided for by statute, and any resolution that we can pass, or any rule that we can make, could not interfere with, or override his statutory power. So, as a matter of convenience, it is very desirable that the committee should be in a position to deal with matters touching the internal economy of the House, just as the Committee on Standing Orders is allowed to deal with matters that have not been specially referred to it.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—It is my intention to oppose the motion now made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, but as it seems to be the desire of this hon. House to adjourn as soon as possible, perhaps it would be just as well to let the motion stand, until after the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That may be the hon. gentleman's opinion, it is not mine.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—If not, I will have to oppose the motion. Does the hon. gentleman permit it to stand?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, certainly not.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—My reason for opposing that motion is that it is completely out of order. The motion asks that the committee be authorized to deal in any matter without special reference, so that the committee may decide to pass resolutions on any questions that they imagine in the interests of the Senate. No later than yesterday we adopted a resolution, which was proposed by the hon. leader of the Government in this House, and seconded by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, as follows:

That the Senators mentioned in the report of the Committee of Selection as having been chosen to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session, be and they are hereby appointed to form part of and constitute the several committees with which their respective names appear in said report, to inquire into and report upon such matters as may be referred to them from time to time; and the Committee on Standing Orders is authorized to send for persons, papers and records whenever required.

This is a very strong resolution, forbidding any committee to make any report on a question which has not been referred to it. After that resolution has been unanimously adopted, are we to pass another resolution authorizing the Special Standing Committee to do anything they please without reference from this body? I believe it is completely out of order, and before that motion is adopted I would like to have the opinion of the Speaker as to whether my views are correct or not.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—Is there an appeal to the Chair?

The SPEAKER—Yes, but I wish to have it discussed.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS—whatever resolution the committee adopts is not binding on the House until it is accepted by this Chamber. The general instructions to all committees are identical, except those to the Committee on Standing Orders. This case makes another exception. They can do more than the Committee on Standing Orders can. That committee can only act on what is referred to it. This committee can take up a subject of its own motion, if it affects the House, but no action is binding and nothing follows until that committee's report is adopted by the House. What harm can come from that? You might have a matter of trifling importance, or of considerable importance, that a member of the committee might not think it necessary to refer to the House, and it might be very important for the Internal Economy Committee, and for the Senate, that the matter should be discussed by the committee. We may first hear of it in a report from the committee, but we can make up our judgment just as well when we get the report from the committee as when the matter originates in this House. I see no constitutional objection, because it does not take out of the House any authority that does not belong to it. There are a great many things to be cared for. Perhaps the discipline of messengers, or the ventilation of the House, or a great many other questions might be taken up by the committee. My hon. friend to my left says this was the old practice of this House. I have no recollection of that, but it is no doubt correct, so that my hon. friend must see we are not violating any regulation of the House, nor any constitutional practice. I think this motion should be carried because it may be useful and helpful.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I could understand perfectly well that a motion is in order, for a special purpose, but when it is general, in view of the resolution unanimously adopted yesterday, I believe this motion is out of order. That is why I have asked for the opinion of the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The ground the hon. gentleman takes is that the motion is out of order inasmuch as a similar motion was passed yesterday?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—No, the ground I take is that yesterday in the resolution adopted unanimously, the committees have a right to report on any question which has been specially referred to them by this House, but not otherwise. If the hon. member from Halifax, by his motion, were asking for a special thing to be referred to the Contingent Accounts Committee, he would be all right, but when he comes to this House with a motion asking full leave to discuss a report on any question, without its having been referred to the committee by this House, I believe he is out of order.

The SPEAKER—The House yesterday adopted a motion moved by the Hon. Mr. Lougheed, which will be found at page 32 of the Minutes, and which is as follows:

> That the Senators mentioned in the report of the Committee of Selection as having been chosen to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session, be and they are hereby appointed to form part of and constitute the several committees with which their respective names appear in said report, to inquire into and report upon such matters as may be referred to them from time to time; and the Committee on Standing Orders is authorized to send for persons, papers and records whenever required.

I do not see in that motion, that the Committee on Standing Orders has more power than the other committees to report on any question, except that it is authorized to send for persons, papers, and records, when required. I do not give to that motion the broad construction that was put upon it by the hon. member from Halifax, when he discussed this question.

Now the motion proposed by the Hon. Mr. Power is—

> That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary and, without special reference, to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House.

In comparing these two motions I find that in the first place the Committee on Internal Economy, as all the other committees of the House, are prevented from making any report except on questions specially referred to them. In the second place by this motion I find that the Committee on Internal Economy, will be authorized to make any report they want to make, without the question being referred to them. So, in one place, the committee is barred from that power, and in the other case it is granted that power. I think the two motions are conflicting, and it is a Parliamentary rule that, in one and the same session, a thing which has been submitted to the House cannot come up a second time. Bourinot at page 451 says:

> When a motion has been stated by the Speaker to the House and proposes a question for its determination, it is then in the possession of the House to be decided or otherwise disposed of according to the established forms of proceeding.

> The old rule of Parliament reads that a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House. Unless such a rule were in [illegible] the time of the House would be constantly frittered away in the discussion of motions of the same nature, and the most contradictory decisions would be arrived at in the course of the same session.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If I understand the drift of his honour's argument rightly, it is that by passing this motion to-day it would be conflicting with one that was passed yesterday. The motion of yesterday commands the committees to deal with matters referred to them by the House, this committee as well as the others.

The SPEAKER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This motion does not cut that out, but it adds more power to this committee to deal with matters which come within the four corners of their usefulness. For instance, a charwoman has suddenly to be appointed, and the House has not recommended that appointment. If this motion should pass, the Committee on Internal Economy would take the matter up, and recommend it to the House.

The SPEAKER—Yes, if there were no other way.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If we adhere to the first resolution, we would have to refer it to them. I want to hear his honour's views on that phase of the question—that is, as to the two motions conflicting.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman says that this motion does not conflict with the first, but gives more power to this committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The decision of yesterday arose in this way: The substance of the resolution which I have just had the honour to move was embodied in the report of the Committee on Selection. His Honour, the Speaker, at the request of the hon. gentleman from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Bolduc), ruled that it was not parliamentary to embody that resolution in the report of the Committee of Selection—that it was a step outside the jurisdiction of the committee. His Honour will remember that I accepted his decision without hesitation. Now I understand that the hon. gentleman from Lauzon, and His Honour the Speaker, apparently concurs with him, takes the ground that because yesterday—

The SPEAKER—I have given no decision yet.

Hon. Mr. POWER—At all events the hon. gentleman from Lauzon takes the ground that that decision yesterday makes this motion out of order. Why, it has nothing whatever to do with it. This is an independent motion. His Honour, the Speaker, ruled the other one out of order because it was in a place where it had no right to be—it was in the report of the Committee of Selection—but does His Honour say that this House has no power to pass this resolution now?

The SPEAKER—I do not understand the contention of the hon. member from Lauzon that way. He does not raise the point of order because of the ruling of yesterday, but on another ground altogether—on account of the decision of the Senate on another motion moved by the leader of the House. I say that motion has been carried and it limits the powers of the committees, this committee included. The powers you are asking for to-day are more than the powers given by the Senate yesterday. In the face of the contention raised by the hon. member from Killarney, I ask to be allowed to defer my decision on that question. I shall go further into it and give my decision later on.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I suggest that the resolution should stand over until after the adjournment. Nothing will suffer by the postponement, and it seems only a reasonable proposition.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman from Halifax should withdraw his motion and let it stand as a notice of motion until the next sitting of the House.

The motion was withdrawn accordingly.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further consideration of His Royal Highness the Governor General's speech on the occasion of the opening of the third session of the twelfth Parliament, and the motion of Colonel the Hon. Mr. Mason, seconded by the Hon. M. Thorne, that an humble address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General in answer thereto.—(Hon. Mr. Daniel.)

Col. the Hon. Mr. MASON—Before the debate is resumed I should like to say a word regarding the statement made yesterday during the debate by the hon. member from De Lanaudière. I am sorry that he is absent, but he took occasion to draw attention to an apparent discrepancy between myself and the leader of the Government, as to the cost of the National Transcontinental railway—

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman who made the observation referred to is not in his place. I think that is a substantial reason for not dealing with the matter now. Practically the hon. gentleman has asked the House to suspend its order of business, to enable him to reply to a gentleman who is not here.

Col. the Hon. Mr. MASON—I am quite willing to wait until he is here.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—In continuing for a very few moments the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I wish to join, in the first place, with those who have already spoken in bearing testimony to the very high place Their Royal Highnesses hold in the esteem of Canadians generally. During the illness of Her Royal Highness in London and here, the thoughts and sympathies of the people of Canada went out to her, more especially in those dread moments when her life was in the balance. Canadians, without exception, will be glad to see Their Royal Highnesses hold their present position as long as it is possible so to do, and to wish them every present and future good, in the high position they occupy in the state, and in the hearts of the people.

I have listened during this debate, as I always do, and as I am sure every other member of the Senate does with much interest to the speech of the hon. member from Middlesex. He is always interesting, always eloquent, and he has the happy faculty of always clothing his ideas in the graceful and beautiful English of which he is a complete master. I am sure we all listened with a great deal of interest to his eloquence. On this occasion, while he was no more eloquent than on other occasions, he was certainly more interesting in some respects, and especially from the novelty of the views that he took the opportunity of expressing. Early in his remarks he spoke about the position which the Senate occupies in the legislation of this country. He spoke of this House as being a non-partisan body. I should be very glad to think it is. The Senate is suppose to copy to a large extent its rules and procedure from the House of Lords. How can it be possible that the Senate can be non-partisan, when we have here a gentleman who speaks of holding the position of leader of the Opposition—leader of the Opposition in a non-partisan body! The thing is utterly and absolutely absurd. Has anyone ever heard of any member of the House of Lords being addressed and spoken of as the leader of the Opposition? Opposition to whom? Opposition to the Government of the day. It cannot be anything else, yet here is this hon. gentleman surrounded by his friends of the same political party, acting as an opposition to the Government of the day and still assuming and claiming that this is a non-partisan body. I never heard of a more absurd statement, or a more absurd condition of things. It is a condition of things, which appears to me must be changed sooner or later if the Government of this country is to go on as it is. If the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, and those who think with him, are in this Chamber for the purpose of opposing the Bills and actions of the Government of the day, how is it possible for the country to be carried on as long as there is that majority of the Senate, which is opposed to the present Administration? I cannot see how it can be done. The thing is perfectly anomalous, and it appears to me that if hon. gentlemen opposite intend to carry out that view, it is utterly impossible for the Government of the country to go on as it ought to go on, so that those who come into the House of Commons, who receive the majority of the votes of the people of this country, and receive the support of the majority of the members of the House of Commons, should be able to carry on the government of this country in such a way as they have a right to carry it on, and as they were sent here by the majority of the people to carry it on. I quite agree with the remarks which the hon. gentleman made with regard to the independence of this body. I think it should be independent. I go further than the hon. gentleman. He thinks it should be independent of the Government. I think it should be independent of the Government, and of the Opposition as well. It should be independent of all parties, and unless it is independent of all parties it cannot be considered an independent body.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is now independent of the country.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—I do not know about that.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I think that is a thing we should not allow to be remedied from the outside. I think we should have sufficient interest in the public affairs of this country to remedy that from the inside. When I was a member of the House of Commons, and matters regarding the Senate came up, I always took the stand in support of this honourable body. In the remarks that I made I even supported the mode of selecting the members, who are appointed to this body. In thinking over the subject, in thinking over the mode, and inquiring into the methods by which members were appointed to the Senate in the United States and other places, I found that really they had more trouble often in the election of their members there than they could very well overcome. I found there were deadlocks—deadlocks even for years—so that a particular State was deprived for quite a while of the services of any gentlemen representing that State in the Senate of the United States. I should like to see this body, as we should all wish to see it, a body absolutely independent of one party or the other. I think the intention, when the Senate was originally constituted, was that when gentlemen were appointed to this body they should throw aside their party affiliations, just as much and in the same degree as the judge is supposed to throw aside his party affiliations when he is appointed to a seat on the bench. The only reason why an independent body like this should be appointed and constitute one-half the Parliament of Canada, can only be on some such idea as that. This is the view and the idea that ought to prevail.

The hon. gentleman, in speaking of the various Bills to which he had objected—Government Bills, which were so affected by the action of this Senate as to become of no effect—went very largely into the constitutional aspect, as being the reason why he objected to the passing of these Bills. The Highways Bill and the Naval Bill were amongst the others. I could not help noticing, and I am quite sure many members of this hon. body noticed, that the course of the hon. gentleman's speech yesterday in this connection appeared to be one long apology for the action which he had taken with regard to those Bills at the last session. He seemed to be troubled somewhat in his conscience over the acts which he had done. He had the opportunity of throwing out the Highways Bill twice, and I believe he suggested the Government should send up the Naval Aid Bill, I presume so that he could have the opportunity of throwing it out the second time. The Government showed good judgment and a great amount of common sense in determining that they were not coming to Parliament to play the game of battledore and shuttlecock as between the House of Commons and the Senate in this Parliament of Canada. Having had those two important Bills rejected by the Senate, one of them twice and the other once, they showed good judgment in not sending them up again to be defeated in a similar manner.

In speaking of naval matters, the hon. gentleman referred to the Naval resolution of 1909, which was unanimously passed by the House of Commons. I had the honour of being present, and was one of those who voted in favour of that resolution at that time . Hon. gentlemen will remember that the resolution, which was carried and voted on unanimously by the House of Commons, was not the resolution which was introduced by the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Sir Wilfrid introduced a resolution which did not appeal to the members of the Opposition, and, at the suggestion of the hon. Mr. Borden, the then leader of the Government, changed his resolution so that it read differently from the one which he introduced I am not going to read those resolutions, but I am just going to point out where they differ in one or two respects. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's original Motion stated in the first clause that:

Hon. Mr. DANIEL.

Under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self governing dominions the payment of any stated contribution to the Imperial treasury for naval or military purposes, would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be a satisfactory solution to the question of defence.

How is that section put in the resolution that was carried? They read very much alike, but there is a very important difference. The resolution was passed in the following form:

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing dominions the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, as far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

There is an important difference there. And there is also this other portion of the resolution to which I shall call attention later. I am speaking of the resolution unanimously passed, which reads as follows:

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promoted the speedy organization of a Canadian Naval Service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the views that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce and the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

The last Naval Conference was in 1909. As far as that resolution goes we were united in the other House. We would have been united to-day if the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in the Naval Bill which he brought in and passed through the House of Commons, and which was also passed by this Chamber, had carried out that resolution of 1909, which I have just read. Wherein does it differ? The resolution stated that any naval action taken under the Act should be the arrangement and institution of a Canadian Naval Service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy along the lines sugested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference. Now was that done? I say certainly it was not done and I will show you just exactly where and the particulars in which I think it was not done.

What was the suggestion of the Admiralty at that Conference? I do not refer to all the suggestions, but just to one or two. In the first place they stated that:

If the problem of Imperial naval defence were considered merely as a problem of naval strategy it would be found that the greatest output of strength for the given expenditure is obtained by the maintenance of a single navy with the concomitant unity of training and unity of command. In futherance then of the simple strategical ideal the maximum of power would be gained if all parts of the Empire contributed according to their needs and resources to the maintenance of the British Navy.

There was the first suggestion, provided the over seas dominions chose to adopt it. They said they could get the most for their money by adding their strength to the strength of the Royal Navy. Then the suggestion went on:

In the opinion of the Admiralty a Dominion Government creating a navy should aim at forming a distinct fleet unit, and the smallest unit is one which while manageable in time of peace is capable of being used in its component parts in time of war.

That became the second recommendation. They had given us what a fleet unit would consist of: one armoured cruiser, three unarmoured cruisers, and three submarines, with the necessary auxiliaries. I shall call the attention of the House to the next clause:

As the armoured cruiser is an essential part of the fleet, it is important that an indomitable of the Dreadnought type should be the first vessel to be built, in commencing the formation of a fleet unit.

That is plain. The memo continues:

) Should be officered and manned as far as possible by Colonial officers and men supplemented by the loan of Imperial officers and men who might volunteer for the service. While on the station the ship would be under the exclusive control of the Dominion Government as regards her movements and general administration. But officers and men would be governed by regulations similar to the King's regulations and be under naval discipline.

I wish to call your attention to the very last sentence, and, like the lady's postscript, it is perhaps the most important part of the memorandum.

Further, as it is a sine qua non that successful action in time of war depends upon unity of command and direction, the general discipline must be the same throughout the whole Imperial Service, and without this it would not be possible to arrange for that mutual co-operation and assistance which would be indispensible in the building up and establishing of a local naval force in close connection with the Royal Navy. It has been recognized by the Colonial governments that in time of war the local naval forces should come under the general directions of the Admiralty.

I wish to call attention to the fact that on those important points, to which I have called attention, as the recommendation of the Admiralty on the Naval Bill of 1910, the Government of the day did not carry out that advice, but on the contrary went against it. Take the important matter of the fleet unit, what was the first part to be supplied? The dreadnought, the mother ship, the big floating dock of which all the others were mere satellites, helpers, and aiders—the big fighting concern of the whole fleet. Was that done? Every hon. gentleman knows that it was not done. Clause 18 is the most important of all, and was the provision which made me vote against the Naval Bill. It was clause 23 in the Bill as passed and reads as follows:

In case of emergency—

And I wish to show that the interpretation clause shows that emergency means war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended—

In case of emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty for general service in the Royal Navy, the Naval Service or any part thereof, any ships, or vessels of the naval service, and the officers or seamen serving in such ships or vessels or any officers or seamen belonging to Naval Service.

In other words, the Parliament of Canada passed that Act which placed it in the hands of the Cabinet Ministers, thirteen or fourteen gentlemen, to say, in case of emergency, in case of war, in case of invasion, that if it did not appear to them that this country or this navy should take part, it gave them authority—not by a stroke of the pen, not even by going to that trouble, but by simply doing nothing at all, taking no action—to practically put this Dominion of Canada outside of the British Empire. That is what it did. That is the power which was given it. And since I have been a member of this hon. body I have heard hon. gentlemen complain of some of the Bills that have come from the Lower House, claiming these gave more power than they ought to the Council. Did anybody ever hear of more power being given to a Council than given in that Naval Service Act? I cannot conceive of any greater power being bestowed on any set of men than is bestowed in that clause. Did my hon. friend from Middlesex, and the Opposition, before allowing that clause to go through, not think it right that such an important clause as that should be voted on by the people of this country? He thought it necessary that the emergency contribution should be voted on by the people of this country, but he allows the permanent policy, giving this enormous power to the Cabinet of this country, to pass by without a protest at all, so far as I know. I do not think the hon. gentleman is consistent in the course which he has pursued in regard to these two Bills. I have heard him say that he did not act in a party spirit in the vote he gave, or in the course he advocated on those occasions. I can only be sorry that his views were not so consistently broad when the Naval Aid Bill was before this House last year as they were when the Naval Service Bill was before us in 1910.

However, I want to refer to a remark or two from my hon. friend from Halifax. On two occasions in this House, my hon. friend has had a fling at the city and the Port of St. John. I suppose it amuses him, or he would not do it. It reminds me of the story of a large, jolly-looking, good-hearted man, who had a very little wife, and this wife had a very sharp temper. She would at times get very angry with her husband, and would try to punch him. A friend came in one day and said, 'Why do you allow your wife to act like that?' and the husband answered: 'Oh, it amuses her and does not hurt me.' I suppose the hon. gentleman from Halifax has a sort of amusement in having his little fling at the Port of St. John. He starts out by decrying the importance of a drydock at the Port of St. John. Moreover, he appears to base his remarks on an entirely mistaken notion which he appears to have, that drydocks are simply for the purpose of repairing lame ducks that are towed in from collisions and accidents on the high seas. I do not believe the hon. gentleman from Halifax can put his hand on a single dry-dock, of all the hundreds of dry-docks in the world, that gets its whole business from repairing these lame ducks which come from collisions and wrecks at sea. The most of the work done by dry-docks is cleaning, and repairing the wear and tear that must necessarily go on year after year. The work consists of the cleaning and keeping clean of the bottoms of these ships, the painting, and everything of that kind. There is not a steamer that has not to go into dry-dock every year to get fixed up, and no Atlantic or Pacific port can be said to be a complete port, unless it has a dry-dock at its disposal—and more especially a dry-dock which has a good repair plant. That is important. And what is more, such dock should not be away out in the Atlantic ocean. It should be at those ports that are visited by vessels for the purpose of unloading and discharging their cargoes. They go there and discharge their cargoes, then go into dry-dock and get cleaned and fixed up. Then they get loaded up and go away on their business. In that way these ships cost less to operate and they pay more profits, and it is more satisfactory in every respect. Therefore, I say, no port is complete unless it has a good dry dock at its disposal, not necessarily for the accommodation of lame ducks. If a lame duck comes along, it is alright, but the larger part of the business is obtained in the way I speak of, and I, for one, am very glad to know that the dry-dock being built in St. John is getting along very well, and will be a first-class dry-dock when it is finished. He also referred to something about the mails, and he said:

> The Canadian Pacific Railway Company during those years, up to last November, sent their ships to St. John. During the last fall the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made up their minds that they could not afford to send their ships by the Bay of Fundy to St. John, and they decided that they would sail from Halifax.

Now, why did they do that? Sir Thomas Shaughnessy stated openly in the press that he did it by the grace of the Intercolonial railway. In other words the authorities of the Intercolonial railway made an arrangement with Sir Thomas Shaughnessy or the Canadian Pacific railway whereby they carried freight and passengers for those four steamers—the two Empresses and the two Allan line boats—at a special rate. That rate was evidently sufficient to make it cheaper for the Canadian Pacific railway people to keep their ships in Halifax, and haul the freight and passengers over two hundred and seventy-five miles extra; cheaper even than one hundred and fifty miles, or whatever the distance is that they would have to carry it by water. That matter will probably be settled by the Railway Commission as to whether the Intercolonial railway is making a reasonable change. The Canadian Pacific railway had already advertised their sailing from the winter port of St. John, but they made the arrangement with the Intercolonial railway, and the result is that they took advantage of the port of Halifax. But the hon. gentleman went further, referring to the Canadian Northern railway going to St. John, instead of to Halifax, and he said:

> The only excuse they could give for doing this, and they have not the right to do it, is that these ships carried the mails. Well, what is the duty of the Government of this country with respect to the mails?

I have yet to know that the Government of the day had anything to do with it at all. So far as I can learn the Canadian Northern and Royal George went to St. John instead of Halifax, because they found they could make more money by doing so. The hon. gentleman continues:

Well, what is the duty of the Government of this country with respect to the mails? It is to see that the mails from England and to, say, Montreal are transported in the shortest possible time consistent with safety. St. John is at least 250 miles further from Liverpool than Halifax is.

Hon. Mr. Daniel—How much nearer is it to Montreal than Halifax?

Hon. Mr. Casgrain—Two hundred miles.

The hon. gentleman is mistaken because it is a little more. I was not familiar with the exact distances, and I got the folder of the Intercolonial railway and the Canadian Pacific railway, and I found the difference between the distance from St. John to Montreal, and Halifax to Montreal, is considerably more than 200 miles. It is no less than 353 miles. The distance from Halifax to Montreal is 836·7; the distance from St. John to Montreal is 482·9. The distance in favour of St. John is 353·8. My hon. friend may say: 'But how about the distance from England to Montreal via Halifax and via St. John?' I will give him the information. He told me himself last night the distance from England to Halifax was 2,500 miles. Add to that the distance from Halifax to Montreal 836·7, and you have the distance from England to Montreal via Halifax, and it makes 3,336·7 miles. How is it by way of St. John? The log of the Royal George or the Royal Edward, I forget which it was, showed the number of miles to be 2,650, or only 150 miles more than the Halifax route. St. John to Montreal 482·9; England to Montreal via St. John, 3,132·9, or a distance in favour of St. John of 203·8 miles. But my hon. friend says that 150 miles is by sea, and a steamer cannot travel as fast as an express train. That is true, and I have taken the trouble to work that out. One hundred and fifty miles by sea at 18 knots an hour, would take eight hours and twenty minutes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is 250 miles.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—No. The log of the Royal George when it arrived at St. John showed it had travelled 2,650 miles and no more. The hon. gentleman himself told me the distance to Halifax was 2,500 miles, so that the difference is simply 150 miles and not 250. Of course, there is this about it, the Royal ships go from Bristol and not from Liverpool, but I doubt that there is very much difference between the distance from these ports.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, considerable.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—They have to go up the Bristol channel. Probably the distance from St. John to Bristol would be about the same as from St. John to Liverpool. There could not be much difference. But in addition to that the distance from London to Bristol would certainly be shorter than from London to Liverpool. And if the distance was taken, London to St. John, it would still favour St. John even more than the figures I have given. It would take twenty-four hours for the mail train to run from Halifax to Montreal, at a rate of 35 miles an hour, and a similar train from St. John to Montreal will take fourteen hours. In other words the time in favour of St. John is ten hours. Take ten hours gain by St. John on the shorter land route, and subtract the time lost or gained by Halifax by the longer St. John sea route, and you still have in coming from England, one hour and forty minutes in favour of St. John. The hon. gentleman was saying that there was a test made, and that the tests showed that the mails were delivered more quickly by the other way. I say after giving these figures—and they are absolutely accurate—that if there is any delay in the mails by which Halifax has an advantage over St. John in that respect, it must be due to the bad management of those who look after the mails.

There are several other matters to which I should like to refer, but I know there is a desire to adjourn, and I shall conclude by wishing, as the hon. leader of the Government did yesterday, and also as my hon. friend from Middlesex did, my hope that this will be a pleasant session as between all of us who are members here. There is no doubt that if we could all believe in the true independence of this body—an independence of both parties—we would not have much difficulty in criticising the Bills coming before us in such a way as would be an advantage to the legislation of this country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall not trouble the House with a long speech.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I rose to speak and I think it is usual that when a member speaks on the Government side, he is followed by one on the opposite side.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall not have an opportunity to speak at all unless I do so now. I deprecate the practice which has prevailed in the past of treating this body as a kind of debating society. It seems to be considered a rule that when a member speaks on one side he must be followed by one on the opposite side. I do not think it should be so at all. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on Fridays we always have a thin House. All the members who can, go home for the week end merely registering their names here and then hastening to the railway depot. There are here this afternoon only two or three who could possibly have got away.

I wish to refer to one or two remarks made by the hon. member from Halifax, and one by the leader of the Opposition. I regret to hear the statement made continually that those who opposed the reciprocity pact were influenced by a desire to have no trade with the Yankees. That was an invention on the part of those who supported the reciprocity treaty, and is not based on the utterances of those who took any leading part in opposing the reciprocity pact. A year and a half ago I had the honour of addressing the Canadian Club in Chicago. A large number of the members of that club were from the city where I live. On one side of me sat the Governor of Illinois who is a Republican, and on the other side of me a leading Democrat. I took occasion then to deny in the most positive terms that the people of Canada had been influenced in their rejection of the reciprocity agreement by any feeling of hostility to the people of the United States. I told them that, on the contrary, the Canadian people had done exactly what the people of the United States do when dealing with public questions affecting their interests. The majority of our people, I said, were opposed to the scheme submitted to them by the party in power, believing that it was not in the interest of Canada that it should be adopted. I went further and said that if I were a citizen of the United States I should be a Republican because I was in principle a protectionist. The Governor of the state applauded that remark. Then I said that if the Democratic party would adhere to the principles which they professed, and not follow the course usually pursued by the Liberal party in Canada, that is professing one thing in opposition, and taking the opposite course after obtaining power, they would, when returned to office, reduce the tariff. The Democrats were successful, and they lowered the tariff. The result was what was anticipated by both parties, that it has opened up a market for the agricultural products of this country. Why do we hear a continual condemnation of the exporting of our own farm products? That is what we have been seeking, and that is why we have been looking for a lowering of the United States tariff. Moreover it has been done without impairing any of the protection which agriculture enjoys in this country. We are told that the effect of the lowering of the United States tariff has been to raise the price of food in this country; but that has done no injury to any of our people, except those who have a fixed income. It has not injured the farmer, the mechanic, the merchant or the manufacturer. I have had some experience in this direction, more probably than most of those who are listening to me, and I have found that the country is more prosperous when the farmers get good prices for their products. What do we find to-day? Beef is 18 to 25 cents a pound, an increase of from ten to fifteen cents over a few years ago, but the mechanic gets $3 to $3.50 a day, where he formerly got $1.50 to $2.50, and so he is able to pay the higher price. My experience has been, the better the prices that farmers get for their products, the better off the whole country is.

I am sorry that the hon. gentleman from Halifax is not present because I wish to refer to one expression which he used, to which I take particular objection, that is the drawing of a distinction between the interests of Canada and the interests of the empire. He says that if a question affects Canada very seriously, it should be first in our consideration. I have always been living under the impression that Canada is an integral portion of the empire, and that what is in Canada's interest must be in the interest of the empire. Whatever is in the interest of the empire is in the interest of every outlying portion of the empire. Anything which injures the empire must injure us.

The hon. leader of the Opposition paid a very great compliment to the Senate when he told us that, after investigation, he found that during the period when the Conservative party were in the majority in the Senate, they had rejected or amended fewer Bills sent up by the Liberal Government than had been rejected or amended when the Liberals were in a majority in this Chamber. From that he argued that the Senate in the past as well as at present has always been non-partisan, and has acted on the principle which had been outlined at Confederation by Sir John Macdonald, Sir Alex. Campbell, and the Hon. George Brown. I was very much pleased to hear him say so, because the statement is such a contrast to the hon. gentleman's declarations when he was in the legislature of Ontario. At that time every province was asked by the Liberal Government of this country to pass resolutions condemning the Senate as a partisan body. I shall not take the time of the House reading the hon. gentleman's expressions when the motion was made in the legislature of Ontario, condemning the Senate, but it is interesting to contrast his views on that occasion with the views he expresses now. He has realized, at last, that a second Chamber is necessary, and that there is no ground for appealing to the Imperial Government to change our constitution.

I am quite sure the hon. gentleman did not intentionally mis-state the facts, but he left the impression on the minds of hon. gentlemen who did not know the facts, that the Bills affecting representation in the House of Commons, which the Senate had rejected, were the Redistribution Bills provided for by the constitution. Every case of the kind to which he referred had reference to Bills introduced in the Lower House by private members—Bills which were never contemplated by the constitution. The hon. gentleman connected my name with one of them. It is true that I moved the rejection of a Bill introduced in this House by the Hon. Mr. Mills, though I think he is mistaken as to the dates of the Bills that he mentioned. He made this remark:

> This Senate has rejected three Redistribution Bills in its history—actually rejected them. A Conservative Senate did so, and no Senate can be more moderate in its views or more equitable in its opinions, judging from what we hear nowadays, than a Senate in which the Conservative party has a majority.

I have taken some little trouble since the hon. gentleman delivered his speech to look up some of these cases. The Bill to which my hon. friend referred more particularly, and to which he called my attention, was a Bill introduced in the House of Commons tinkering with the different constituencies, particularly west of Toronto, and some in the province of Quebec, on the pretense that in the redistribution of 1882 an injustice had been done to these constituencies, and that the principle of representation by population had been disregarded. The hon. gentleman stated that the Redistribution Bill of 1882 had not been based upon population, and that in making the redistribution, we had changed some fifty constituencies. This he deprecated, at the same time contending that representation should be based upon population, and that the constituencies should be divided along county lines. If he will take the trouble to read my reply to the Hon. Edward Blake, upon a similar charge being made by that gentleman in the House of Commons, he will find the figures given of each constituency, showing that the principle of representation by population was followed as closely as possible. I contended then, and I contend now, that under our system it is not necessary to follow county lines. The great principles which govern the administration of Dominion affairs are not affected by the fact that a member lives on one side or the other of a county line. Where it was necessary to cross a county line, in order to equalize population it was done. It is another matter however, to do this in fixing the representation in the local legislature. In the legislature the local interest of each constituency is affected to a great extent by the county lines, and what will the House think of my hon. friend's position, when I state that in the redistribution which took place in Ontario, the very constituency which my hon. friend represents is composed of parts of not less than three counties, and that in making up the constituency county lines were abandoned. Yet he contends here that county lines should be followed in the redistributing of constituencies. However, he is following the old practice of his party, a practice which they have pursued ever since I have had any knowledge of parties in this country, of making great professions when in opposition for the purpose of catching votes, and pursuing an entirely different course when they get into power.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—Order, order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I could furnish many illustrations to prove the correctness of what I say. My hon. friend will remember that, at one time, we had before us in this House, a famous Bill known as the Tuckersmith Bill, the object of which was to take a particular township out of one riding and add it to another for the purpose of insuring the election of Mr. M. C. Cameron. The township of Tuckersmith had a very large majority of Liberals, and by taking it from the constituency in which it had been placed in the Redistribution Bill, following the principle of representation by population, it was intended to secure the election of Mr. Cameron. That Bill was introduced by a private individual. It had nothing whatever to do with the principle of the redistribution of seats after the decennial census. It was very properly thrown out in the Senate. The other Bill to which I have already referred, which was introduced by hon. Mr. Mills, was rejected by the Senate as not being in accord with the constitution under which we live. I moved the resolution to reject it, and though I did not at the time declare it unconstitutional, or claim that the Senate had not the power to change or amend it, I did contend that the constitution never contemplated any such measure. I contended that the constitution provided for the redistribution of seats after every decennial census, and that to attempt to interfere with the representation, on any other occasion, would be doing something never contemplated by those who framed and passed the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—When the Conservative party were passing the Confederation Act, why did they put the Maritime provinces in such a position that they are losing their representatives in the House of Commons?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend knows very well that the matter is governed by the constitution, and that representation in the House of Commons is based on the unit of the province of Quebec. If the hon. gentleman will tell me why the population of Quebec is increasing faster than the population of New Brunswick I might explain his question.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It is because we are raising very clever men in the Maritime provinces, and they are going West.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am sorry to say that in the redistribution which is to take place this year, Ontario loses four members. The Tuckersmith Bill was rejected because it was an interference, by a private member, with legislation which should emanate from the Government of the day. You might tinker with every constituency in the country if a thing of that kind were permitted.

On May 19, 1899, Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced (on behalf of Mr. Mulock who was absent) a Redistribution Bill, the avowed object being to correct certain 'injustices' caused by the Acts of 1882 and 1892. This Bill was read a third time in the Commons. On the second reading in the Senate Sir Mackenzie Bowell moved the following amendment:

That it be resolved that it is inexpedient to proceed further with the Bill now under consideration inasmuch as it is provided by section 51 of the British North America Act that the representations of the provinces in the House of Commons shall be readjusted upon the completion of each decennial census subject to and in accordance with the rules in the said Act set forth, and as the next decennial census will be under the provisions of the Confederation Act be taken in 1901, a readjustment of constituencies in the Dominion made previous to such census being taken would, in the opinion of this House, be a violation of the spirit of said Act.

The amendment was carried on a vote of 36 for to 14 against. The motion for the second reading of the Bill was lost on the same division reversed, and, therefore, the Redistribution Bill was defeated.

(July 20, 1899, Senate Hansard, column 897.)

Why this question is dragged in at the present moment I am at a loss to know, unless it is for the purpose of preparing the country and the Senate for the rejection of a Redistribution Bill, no matter what its character may be.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—No, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And according to the whim of those who would take objection to it, for the purpose of defeating the measure.

Hon. Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex)—The hon. gentleman must know I never suggested such a thing.

Hon. SIR MACKENZIE BOWELL—It would have been quite time enough for the hon. gentleman to discuss the question when the Bill is before us, but he predicated his remarks on the assumption that the Bill was to be so vicious in its character that he wanted a ground upon which to educate the people, if possible, on the propriety of rejecting a Bill of which they know nothing whatever, and cannot know until it comes before the House. I readily admit, from my experience—and every member of this House who thinks over the matter for a moment will agree—that there are difficulties surrounding any government in the redistribution of seats. Take the province of Ontario at the present moment—I speak of that province because I live there. We are to lose four seats. The first thing to be done is to decide what portion of the province is to be deprived of representation. The next question is whether there has not been a vast decrease in the population in some sections of the country. When you speak of representation by population, taking it as it exists, when you have to take the smaller constituencies and add them to others, I think it does not require much thought to form an opinion of the difficulty that surrounds any government in dealing with a matter of that kind. I do not require to go beyond my own county, where I have been living since 1833, for an illustration of this. I think my hon. friend, when he was Premier in the local House, had something to do with this matter. If you can imagine a more outrageous division you would require a more vivid imagination than I possess. Hastings is divided into three ridings for the local House. The north riding was properly divided. What do you suppose the hon. gentleman's Government did? They set to work and tacked on a large portion of the county of Renfrew—a district miles and miles away from the north riding of Hastings. And why? Because they thought under the circumstances it would secure the election of a Liberal, and the suggestion came from that very good Liberal, the gentleman who introduced into the constituency a bogus ballot box, by which the ballots of the Conservative voters could be shunted out, and the Liberal ballots put in. How do hon. gentlemen suppose a canvasser would get to a portion of that constituency in the north? He had to travel from Belleville to Ottawa, and up the Ottawa river some hundred miles, in order to reach that portion of the north riding of Hastings as amended.

That is one of the cases to which my hon. friend refers. If he wishes to come to a later case, the last redistribution of the county of Hastings is an example. That county runs from the Bay of Quinte back about one hundred miles north. It is three township wide. They took the city of Belleville and the townships running north of it for one hundred miles, and they took two townships on the east side of it, which gave it the appearance of two bay windows. Why did they take in those two townships? The reason was that in one there was a Conservative majority of one hundred and fifty and in the other a Conservative majority of two hundred and fifty, and that would give any Conservatives who got the nomination two or three thousand of a majority, and by taking those two townships out of the riding to which they properly belonged, it would give the Liberals in that riding a fighting chance. I do not say that they would have carried it. I think we could have beaten them even with the division which they made. So flagrant was the work, in this division, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself, when it was pointed out to him how the ridings were cut up, consented to have the two townships placed in the ridings where they belonged. So disgusted were the voters in both ridings that Mr. Northrup carried the east riding by thirteen or fourteen hundred majority. Honest Liberals—and there are some of them: they are not all of the same grade—did not approve of that redistribution. I could show the House a number of other cases of similar character. I deem it my duty, in the instances which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has pointed out, in reference to redistribution Bills and the action of the Senate, to show that these Bills were not of the character he would lead us to believe. Whether intentionally or not, he left the impression on the minds of those who heard him that the Senate, in these cases, was dealing with the Redistribution Bill introduced into the House of Commons under the constitution by which we are governed. I knew, at the time, it was not correct, but I did not wish to interrupt him, because an opportunity would present itself to set the House right on this question.

In reference to the Naval Bill, the hon. gentleman from Halifax said he was opposed to such a large expenditure. I may say that I am not. I would spend every dollar the country can afford to strengthen the navy of the empire. I do not propose to waste time in discussing the Laurier or the Borden scheme at the present moment. But I do say that to adopt a system by which there would be two units, one on the Pacific coast and one on the Atlantic, totally independent of the navy of the empire, would be throwing the money into the sea. The expenditure would be utterly useless. I appreciate the reasons given by the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) for not introducing the Naval Bill this year, but I do not agree with him. If I had any influence, or could induce the Government to act, I would introduce that Bill every session that I was in power, and compel the Liberal Senators to record their votes. And I know from my own experience, in the section of the country in which I live what the effect would be. I have heard one or two members make the statement that the naval question was not discussed during the last election. All I can say is that I took a very lively interest myself in this question, night after night until nearly daylight, during the last election. Through the county of Prince Edward this question of the navy was the principal topic we discussed. The result was we redeemed that county by two or three hundred majority over the Liberal candidate. In other sections of the country it was the principal question discussed. The probabilities are that those who say it was not discussed avoided it purposely so that the people should not know what proposition the Conservative Government advanced on this question, and what proposition the Liberal party offered. I can readily understand they would take this course, because I am convinced that the people, Canada being an integral part of the empire, are true to the Crown and the empire, and that there is no sacrifice they would not be willing to make to maintain that constitution and keep the reins of world power as well. The hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière spoke of what the Liberal Government had done in sending a contingent to South Africa. Does the hon. gentleman presume upon the ignorance of the people, and suppose that they do not know the circumstances connected with the sending of that contingent? If there is one man more than another responsible for having that contingent sent, it is Sir Charles Tupper. He wired from Amherst to Sir Wilfrid Laurier pledging himself and the Conservative party, which he knew was behind him, that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier would take steps to raise a contingent to send to South Africa, he and his party would stand at his back. Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not act upon that suggestion, and Sir Wilfrid sought an interview with a Globe correspondent and pointed out that they had no power to do as suggested, and that they would not do it until they got the consent of Parliament. Public opinion was so strong that he was compelled to consent to the raising of that contingent, and send it forward. When the contingent was being raised, the spirit of the people of this country was evidenced by the boast of Sir Frederick Borden that in less than three weeks he would have a contingent of one thousand men ready to send to the defence of the empire. When the Government of the day passed the Order-in-Council giving their first consent to the idea, they based it on the ground that they would get the approval of Parliament after having passed the Order-in-Council, and that it should not be considered as a precedent. Thereby they cut off for the future, as far as they could, any further aid towards the suppression of the rebellion in South Africa. Public opinion was again too strong for them, and the Government was obliged to consent to the raising of a second contingent. The principal men, and the most valuable men that were sent to the Nile under Lord Wolseley, were Canadians. I am surprised that men knowing anything of Canada for the last ten or fifteen years, should make erroneous statements before intelligent people—unless they presume upon an ignorance which does not exist.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Canada is too big a country to go into past history. She must be a country of the future, and must set aside the politics of Liberalism and Conservatism. I have no sympathy with these things at all. I view Canada as one nation, no French, no English, no Irish, no Scotch, but one nationality, the making of a great nation.

I cannot see for the life of me, why charges are brought against the Senate at the present time. First of all it is said that the Senate is an imbecile body, an irresponsible body, a moribund house, and a morgue. However, this morgue is now increasing. It has been increased by the present Government and is no longer a morgue, for we are all brothers, and working together. I object to this pettifogging policy of running down the Government or of running down the Opposition, because, in time, they will both pass away. The Speaker and I sat together in the House of Commons in 1872. We have seen many changes, and many leaders come and go. We have seen many eminent men pass away. And all that is left of their work is the good that redounds to Canada.

There has been much talk about the redistribution of the seats of the Commons. The hon. gentleman has talked some about Tuckersmith. When that matter came up Sir John Macdonald said: 'You want such-and-such a place altered?' and Mr. Blake said 'Yes.' Sir John said 'We will make it as you want it.' Mr. Blake it turned out wanted it done in some ridiculous way, and Sir John A. Macdonald said 'You say so, Mr. Blake,' and it was carried out.

But this has nothing to do with conditions as they are to-day. We have had a Speech from the Throne. Speeches do not amount to much, many of them simply throw bouquets around. We had, however, two good speeches from the mover and seconder of the Address.

But I am chiefly interested in the lower provinces. Down by the sea we want to know how the harbour of St. John, the terminal point of Canada's great western railways, is to be developed. We want to know why these terminals have not been developed to a greater extent than they have. I am not saying that the Government do not know what they are doing; I am not casting any reflections. But we have their apology for the Hudson Bay project and other matters. I have no doubt this Hudson Bay country is going to be a great one. It is now using up cement and steamers and everything else, and running them on the rocks. After the building up of Vancouver, and all the rest of the West to which we have contributed, some consideration and some justice should be given the port of St. John.

My hon. friend will acknowledge that I have been the last man to attack the Government here. Let us see what they are going to do, I say, and then hold them responsible. If they do not carry out their pledges, then it is time to go for them. But I would not condemn them unheard. I should like to know where Hastings is? And where is Belleville? I have heard of that place, but there are other places besides Belleville. There is the city of Calgary which had nothing in it a few years ago, but to-day has 150,000 people. Then we have Edmonton which a short time ago had 15,000 population. Today they have over 100,000. They have a great deal more to say than Belleville. Belleville will never be heard from. The town has had its growth. Then take Southampton, and such places on the English coast. They will never develop. They were first the homes of the buccaneers and pirates, who settled there. The warriors of the navy and army also settled in those places, living on the income they got from the Crown for their services. Liverpool and Manchester, of course, have a natural trade, and those places grew. Now I am not so narrow-minded as to say St. John should have all the trade. I think the hon. leader will remember, when they had the great discussion in St. John, and when they were marching up and down the streets and meeting delegations. The member for St. John said the distance from England via St. John to Montreal, and the distance from England via Halifax to Montreal, by water and land were co-equal if they were patched together. The Intercolonial railway should be put in shape to meet the emergency. You have also the mails, the passengers, and the express goods to be carried. There is no appreciable difference in the routes. I took the trouble to see Mr. Gutelius and I did not gather from him that he was trying to humbug St. John, nor can I, from my experience of him for twenty years, believe that he would sink his views of what was right simply on account of a train or two from St. John being late. I will try to hold the Government responsible for not declaring what is going to be done in St. John in the matter of the terminal of that great line, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and all the other roads. The development of the port has not been hastened, and has not been in keeping with what we have been led to expect. There is a fair argument. Nobody can find fault with it. I am here as a humble citizen, not to praise or abuse the Government, but to ask the Government to consider the development of the East, as well as of the West. I was in the House of Commons when Canada bought the Northwest. I think the Government of the day gave three hundred thousand pounds sterling for it. We had to give the Hudson Bay company one-twentieth of the land, and we gave the Canadian Pacific Railway Company every alternate block along its railway, besides making certain reservations for public schools. These properties are becoming very valuable. Now who paid for them? It was our money that bought those territories, and our capital that developed them. To-day the Maritime provinces are trying to manage their local affairs on very small incomes, and they are losing their representation, and we have a right to ask for a re-consideration of our position in the Dominion.

I should like to have heard some mention made of our late colleague, my friend J. V. Ellis. He was a worthy member of this House and esteemed by everybody. He was a man who held decided views on public questions, and never hesitated to give expression to them. He was a consistent Liberal and worked hard for the Liberal party, yet he manifested his independence, when the Naval Bill was before this House, by giving it his support.

This House has been charged with partisanship, and its enemies look for its practical reform through the death of its older members. There seems to be a desire in some quarters to lower the standing of this Senate before the country, and yet this Senate was the product of the Confederation of the provinces. Sir John Macdonald, one of the best men that Canada ever saw, worked out that great project, and he must have foreseen the difficulties which would arise when the majority in the Senate was in opposition to the Government of the day. It is not wise nor logical to foster in the minds of the people the idea that the Senate is useless, or obstructive. Such ideas can accomplish no good.

In speaking of the prosperity of the country reference has been made to our growing wealth. But where is the growing wealth of the ordinary man, the hewer of wood and drawer of water? Protection has not helped him. Long years ago we gave protection to the manufacturers, so as to enable them to get on their feet and put them in a position to compete with the manufacturers in other countries. That was class legislation, introduced by the Conservative party. I was afraid of the Conservative party. I was allied with the party as long as I could, but I had to leave it. And I shall only continue with the Liberal party so long as I consider its policy in the interest of the country. There are conditions in this country which must be met, and which will be met when another election takes place. The people will decide whether this country is to be run by titled gentlemen, and men of wealth. This country is democratic, and its people will not be satisfied with any party which does not look after their interests. With coal at $9 a ton how is the poor man to keep his house warm? How is he to supply the needs of his family under present conditions? The difficulty must be met in some way. Protection is, of course, largely in the interests of the bankers, for if the manufacturers go down the bankers lose their money. I noticed the other day that, notwithstanding the tightness of the money market in Canada, thirty-five millions in Canadian money had gone to New York. We should take a high stand in this country and have faith in the greatness of our destiny. There is no reason why Canada should not have one hundred million people by the end of the century.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE.

I doubt the expediency of borrowing money to build dreadnoughts. I cannot see the soundness of the financial side of the proposition. I can understand that the armour plate makers want us to build war ships, but I cannot see how capitalists generally can approve of lending us money for such purpose. I do not want to bring myself to the front, but I remember at one time I proposed to raise a regiment to go to the Soudan. The regiment was not to consist of Liberals or Conservatives, they were young men who were willing to go to the Soudan to fight for the empire. We got a steamer, and the British Government accepted us, but Sir Charles Tupper would not let us go. Instead of our regiment going, the Australians went. There was every evidence that Canada was willing to do her share, but there was also every evidence that Sir Charles Tupper would not let a Canadian contingent go. It is on record in the official reports of the House of Commons that the regiment I was raising was not permitted to go. I was going out to command it, and I suppose Sir Charles thought I would get too much credit. I suppose it was the result of jealousy. There were other Canadians who offered to raise men, and send them at their own expense. Canada was not asked to contribute anything, but the Government would not let the regiments go. I am not here to defend Sir Wilfrid Laurier because he can defend himself better than I could, but I have heard him accused in this House of being slow in sending contingents to South Africa. That sort of thing does not help the party that resorts to it.

As to the declining representation of the Maritime provinces in the House of Commons, I fear we cannot get around the situation. We went into Confederation, we made our bed, and we must lie on it. We have before us two things, the great West which is going to build up and make Canada great, and the East which will handle the traffic that comes from the country lying between British Columbia and Montreal.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved that the debate be adjourned.

The members were called in, and the Senate divided on the motion, which was adopted.

BRITISH COLUMBIA BETTER TERMS COMMISSION INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. Has the third commissioner been appointed to the commission to inquire into the question of better terms for British Columbia?
2. If so, has the commission held any sittings?
3. Has any evidence been taken?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Lougheed)—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

Answers to 1 and 2. No.
Answer to No. 3. No.
The case of British Columbia has been prepared and presented, and the case for Canada is in course of preparation.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further consideration of His Royal Highness the Governor General's speech on the occasion of the opening of the third session of the twelfth Parliament, and the motion of Colonel the Hon. Mr. Mason, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Thorne, that an humble address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General in answer thereto.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—In rising to make a few remarks on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I wish first of all cordially to endorse everything that has been said by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me with respect to the sympathy felt throughout this country for Their Royal Highnesses on account of the serious illness of Her Royal Highness, and the relief which was felt when all danger was passed, and the gratification of the people when it became known that Her Royal Highness was to return to Canada.

The discussion which has taken place so far on the Address has dealt very largely with the matter of the Naval Aid Bill, which was brought down last session, but of which really there was no mention made in the Address itself. The speech made by the hon. leader of the Government in this House reflected rather seriously, in my opinion, on the way that certain members of this House thought it right to act in regard to that matter. The hon. leader of the Government tried to show that members of this House, in not following the lead of the Government in that matter, brought a very serious situation about in regard to the affairs of this country and of the empire. I do not think the quotations that the hon. gentleman referred to, in reference to what was thought and what was said by papers in the countries of Europe, should have very much effect on the members of this Senate or the people of this country. In dealing with a question of this kind we have considered what is best for Canada, and what is best for the empire as a whole; and I certainly consider that in dealing with the matter in the way that the Government did, and the leaving out of all consideration the question as to the feelings of the people of Australia in regard to this matter of the navy was a serious mistake, and one that ought to be reconsidered. Hon. gentlemen will remember that this naval question in New Zealand and in Australia is possibly a matter of longer standing than in this country. The Dominions of New Zealand and Australia took this matter up as long ago as 1897, and at that time they came to an arrangement with the Home Government that they would supply money for the purpose of naval defence, on the Government of Great Britain undertaking to do certain things, and keeping certain ships in the waters of New Zealand and Australia.

That arrangement was made in 1897; it was amended in 1903, and the amount of the subsidy paid by Australia and New Zealand under that agreement was increased in that year. Then we come down to the year 1907 when Australia decided to adopt the policy of supplying her own fleet unit. To that extent the policy that was adopted in this country, under the late Government, was on all fours with the policy of Australia. Nobody at that time ever talked about the Australians being disloyal because they adopted a policy of that kind, and I do not think hon. gentlemen to-day would make such a statement. A great deal, however, has been said and much adverse criticism has been made of the action taken by the majority in this House in not agreeing to the passing of a measure that was brought down by the Government last session, and in saying that the country should be consulted about the change of policy that was made.. In 1909 the representatives of Canada, Australia, and Great Britain met together and discussed this whole question of naval policy, and the delegates came to the distinct understanding that Great Britain should do certain things and should supply certain ships on the Indian station and the China station. Australia on her part was to undertake to supply certain ships on the Australian station. New Zealand was to supply a dreadnought, and that dreadnought was to be made the flagship of the China squadron. Canada on her part undertook to supply certain ships, as was set forth in the Bill that was passed by the late Government. That arrangement was a sound one, and the arrangement was come to, after considerable discussion, and was made between these four parts of the British Empire. But owing to the change of Government in this country, the Conservtive Government, when they came into power, thought it was right to ignore all that had been done in the past. They did not pay any attention to the solemn agreement that had been made with Australia and New Zealand. They ignored altogether the part that Canada was to play in that matter. The consequence is that in the Bill brought before the House last session, there was no arrangement made for carrying out this agreement on the Pacific ocean with regard to Australia. For the last year we have had the Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce over in Australia, and I should think he would be able to tell his colleagues in the Government the feeling of the people of Australia with regard to the stand taken by Canada in this matter. I know that gentlemen whom I have met out on the Pacific coast, who have been to Australia and met the people there, have expressed to me surprise about the hard feeling that was apparently in existence amongst the people of Australia with regard to what they called the dereliction of duty of Canada, in not carrying out the arrangement made in 1909. They feel that it is a very serious question to them. It is not one of being defended against attack by a European power, so much as a possible attack from some country that has forces in the Pacific, to the north of them, and they know that they have a fine rich country there, one that other nations look at with very longing eyes, one that has taken a great deal of time and trouble to develop and open up. They are open to attack on the Pacific Ocean and they want to see vessels there, that may be able and ready to support them. They have expressed it in this way —that the United States to-day is doing more for them and doing more to help them in this matter than Canada or Great Britain. They feel very strongly about it. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he would give expression to the feeling that he found amongst the Australian people, could tell his colleagues in the Government that on account of this very feeling the Australian people were not so ready to enter into any trade arrangement at that time, as they otherwise would have been. The question as it affects Australia is a question which affects the Pacific Coast of Canada in the same way, to a very large extent, and from the fact that the business connection between Australia, New Zealand and Canada is being brought close together, shipping is being developed and more trade is being done between our Pacific Coast and Australia and New Zealand. That very fact is going to bring the people of those parts of the empire in closer touch with one another, and make them think more of this very question. I therefore think that the Government in dealing with this question —as they have not said anything definite about going on with this Naval Bill this session—ought to take this side of the case into consideration. They ought to realize that, in holding the empire together, they ought to consider not only what the people of Great Britain are thinking about, but also what the people of New Zealand and Australia and South Africa are thinking about. The time has come when further consultation should be held in regard to this matter, and it would be much better to come to some very clear understanding about it before any further steps are taken. This is possibly going over old ground that has been gone over very much before. I do not want to take up much time of the House with regard to the matter but I hope that the Government will pay some attention to this part of the question, and that we may reap some practical results from it later on. I certainly must say that, to me, the action of the Government in allowing the training of men on the Rainbow and Niobe to slacken off, in the way they have, is a very serious, and I think a very reprehensible way of doing things.

The training of men for naval service is a matter that has to be carried on a great many years. You cannot make a man into a good sailor in a short time. It takes a long time, and the Government most certainly should have gone on, and done their very best to get men to train in these ships. At the present time out on the Pacific coast, where we have a slackening in business of every kind, there is no doubt, to my mind, that men could have been much more readily recruited for training on the Rainbow now, than they could have been in the last two or three years. The Government is losing a great opportunity in this way in having allowed that training to get behind, and not paying the attention to it that should have been paid.

The hon. leader of the Government in speaking the other day on the Address referred to a matter that was, to myself, rather a surprise, because of the way in which he handled it. He was talking about the question of the cost of living, and he referred to the cost of living in England, and quoted from a well known book, 'England and the English.' The figures that he gave on that occasion were, to my mind, decidedly misleading. I happened to have read the book at one time, and I think those figures ought not to be quoted to show what the British Government does, in regard to the taxation of food stuffs. The list of things given in that particular table as quoted by the hon. leader of the Government, referred to two items which, alone of all the items he mentioned, could properly be called food stuffs—grain and sugar. Now if the hon. gentleman had taken the time and trouble to refer to past history and see what was the condition of things in England at the time those duties were applied, he would have found that the duty on sugar, for instance, was first imposed in the year 1902 by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and had to provide for the expenses of a war in China as well as the war in South Africa. At that time a large amount of money had to be provided, and he was faced with a deficit, and the fact that he would have to obtain a considerable loan in order to make the revenue and expenditure of Great Britain coincide at the end of the year. That was the first time that the duty on sugar was adopted by the British Government for a great many years—in fact since the country started on a policy of free trade. The duty was placed at four and two-pence per cwt. on refined sugar, and was gradually reduced down to two shillings per cwt. on raw sugar, polarizing at not more than seventy-six degrees. That duty on sugar has been kept up to the present time, but the rate of duty has been very considerably reduced, so that, at the present time, the sugar that was paying four and two pence per cwt. in 1902 was paying only one and five pence half-penny per cwt. in 1913. That duty on sugar, of course, produced a considerable revenue. The estimate that was made on the duty at the time the Chancellor of the Exchequer was making his Budget Speech, was that he would get a return of £5,100,000 from this duty on sugar. But the next year he was able to announce to the country that instead of £5,100,000 he had got £6,390,000. Then the amount obtained from the duty on corn was not satisfactory. The necessity for the duty on corn was due to the same causes as the duty on sugar, it was adopted a year later. The same Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, having to provide for a considerable portion of the cost of the South African war in 1902-03, placed a duty of three pence per cwt. on imported corn, and five pence per cwt. on imported flour, which he estimated would produce £2,650,000. That duty was placed on corn and flour for the one year, but Mr. Ritchie, who succeeded him as Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the following year when he came to his Budget Speech in 1904, gave as his reason for abolishing the duty on corn, that corn is a necessary of life in a greater degree than any other article of food. It is a raw material. It is the food of our people, it is the food of our horses and cattle. The tax has a certain disadvantage, namely that it is inelastic, and what is much worse, it lends itself very readily to misrepresentation. Therefore he abolished the duty on corn in that year, and it has not been adopted again. I mention this because the hon. gentleman in his speech left the impression that the duty on corn was in the nature of a protective duty, and that England was taxing food products, for the purpose possibly of affording some kind of protection to the farmers and people who are raising that food. The system that is pursued in England is very different to that. What duties there are, are imposed with the object of raising as much money as possible, and the items that are selected by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in making up his Budget are selected because they will produce the greatest amount of revenue, at the least inconvenience to the people of the country. This is a very different situation to the one we have in a country such as Canada, where the duties are placed, very largely, for the purpose of protecting the different interests of the country. This gives some reason why the cost of living in Canada to-day is going up, out of proportion to the cost of living elsewhere. There is no doubt that the cost of living has increased in all the countries of the world in the last few years, but the increase in the cost of living is greater in Canada than in other countries. A good deal of this can be attributed to the fact that, in Canada, we have not been going ahead and producing the food stuffs for the country in the way that we should. Too much attention has been given in late years to speculation, and things of that kind, without paying due attention to how much we can produce out of the land. The farmers of the country have got to realize that the first thing to do is to produce the stuff that we require in the country.

Another point that was made by the hon. leader of the Government in his speech, and one that was rather a surprise to myself, was that the agriculturists of Canada must be protected as well as the manufacturers, and that an attempt to revise the tariff downward would be followed by a protest from the whole agricultural community. Any hon. gentleman who has followed what has been going on in the country for the last few years must have been very much surprised at that statement. We have read in the papers that the legislatures of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba have passed resolutions asking the Government to reduce the duty on wheat coming into this country, and the farmers have also expressed their wish that something should be done to relieve them in this matter. As was pointed out the other day in a certain case, the Government could have saved the farmer, or put into the pockets of the farmers of the Northwest from five to six million dollars, had the Government done as the farmers asked them and reduced the duty on wheat coming into this country, in order to avail themselves of the offer that has been made by the United States Government. This is one of the things the Government should have done to help the position of the country at the present time. We find, however, that the Government of to-day is apparently not prepared to take steps to meet conditions as they exist in this country, but is sitting back and contending that it is not in its hands to deal with the present situation. The Minister of Finance appears to have satisfied himself that the condition of things throughout the country has got to its lowest point, and everything is going to improve. Therefore, according to his method of reasoning, there is no necessity for him to do anything. He will find it very hard, indeed, to persuade the people of the country that things are quite as well as he makes them out to be. I do not think that he will be able to persuade the farmer that he is to be benefited when the farmer is told that he is to be protected. The farmer may not, perhaps, be so desirous of being protected as hon. gentlemen and the leader of the Government seem to think, because the farmer at the present day does not find that this protection is keeping things out of the country in possibly the way he desired. I know that in the province from which I come there has been a considerable agitation on the part of the fruit growers because they claim that they are not getting the protection that they are entitled to. It is always understood that the present Minister of Agriculture, in the election of 1911, had promised his supporters that if the Conservatives returned to power he would be able to increase the duty on fruit coming into Canada, and help them in the way they wish. That is one of the arguments used in the campaign of 1911, and the fruit growers in that part of the country certainly thought that they were going to get some relief in this way. They have found that the growing of fruit has not been such a money-making business as a large number of gentlemen who went into that business in 1908 thought it was going to be. They have found there was great difficulty in getting their fruit to market and in competing with the fruit that comes into this country from other sources. Like a great many others, they believe that the only help in a case of that kind, is to have the duty raised. Personally I do not agree with that point of view at all, but I put it to the leader of the Government, that if he says the farmer must be protected, surely it is up to him, and up to the Government, to come forward and increase the duty on fruit, protect the farmer, and give him a protection that realy amounts to something. The same thing would apply to the case of a man raising cattle or sheep in British Columbia. In British Columbia to-day we do not produce enough cattle or sheep for the purpose of supplying the province, and the result is that a great deal of the beef that is eaten in British Columbia is brought from Australia in cold storage. This business is increasing every month, and only a short time ago it was increased by extra ships being put on for the purpose of bringing these products into the country, direct from Australia to Vancouver. The result of this is, of course, that the price of beef and mutton is practically fixed by the cost of bringing this beef and mutton to Vancouver, and the price at which it can be laid down there. If the farmers are to have protection, they would naturally ask that they should be protected from having the market interfered with in this way, but of course, the hon. gentleman may say that if you do such things, you are going to raise the cost of living. If the raising of the duty on beef and mutton coming into Vancouver would raise the cost of living, surely reducing the duty on beef and mutton coming into the country would have some effect in reducing the cost of living. That is the question that is affecting very seriously and materially people all over this country.

Another article of food that we are to-day importing into this country in large quantities, is butter from New Zealand. The figures show that this importation of butter from New Zealand into Vancouver—and of course from Vancouver it is distributed throughout a large part of the western country—is increasing very largely. I have been surprised to find the amount of butter that is sold in the province of British Columbia. Only the other day one ship alone coming from New Zealand to Vancouver brought over 17,500 cases of butter, and the point about it is that this New Zealand butter, apparently, is better butter than is made in the creameries of Canada, or on the farms of the province of British Columbia. On inquiry, I find, in the stores of the country, where the butter has to be brought from Vancouver by rail, and a very high freight rate has to be paid upon it, that a great deal more of the New Zealand butter is sold in these stores than butter manufacured in the country, and simply because the people who are buying it claim it is better butter, and they prefer to pay rather a higher price for New Zealand butter than they will pay for butter from the Alberta creameries, or for that made by the farmers locally. This is the case where the people are using the butter brought in from the outside. They are paying a duty to the Government before they use it, and therefore the price of butter is raised to the farmer and to the people who are using it, more than it would be if there were no duty on the butter. The curious part about it is that this butter from New Zealand, after travelling so many miles, and standing this long sea journey, should be preferred to butter made in our own country, which could be laid down in the stores in a very much quicker time, and should, therefore, be very much fresher than the butter brought all the way from New Zealand and then distributed all over the country. There must be something wrong when butter like that can be brought into this country, and can compete on favourable terms, and is asked for in these stores by the people who consume the butter in preference to the butter that is made in the creameries in this country.

There was another matter in the Speech from the Throne to which my attention was particularly drawn. One paragraph in the Speech from the Throne reads as follows:

> The volume of immigration during the present fiscal year promises to be greater than that of any preceding year. It has come in greatest measure from the British Isles and from the United States, but a large stream of desirable immigration has also reached our shores from other countries.

It must be a great satisfaction to everybody who has an interest in this country to know that this volume of immigration is keeping up in the way that it is. The people who come into the country are bringing their money with them; they are coming here to make a living. Every man who comes into the country is a source of wealth and of use to this country and helps to push forward its development. Some attention, however, should be paid to what has been said by various gentlemen throughout this country, and especially by prominent men in the financial world and captains of industry who know what is being done with regard to the large works now being carried on through this Dominion. Recently Sir Edmond Byron Walker—a gentleman who was held up to us when there was a discussion on the reciprocity question, and who pointed out to us what Canada should and should not do, and who is a great Imperialist, and a man who has a great deal to say on the affairs of this country—in talking to his shareholders at the annual meeting of the Canadian Bank of Commerce pointed out to them the condition of things in four of our leading cities with regard to the question of construction. He spoke as follows on the subject of building permits in those four cities:

The building permits of the four cities were:

	1911.	1912.	1913.
Montreal. ..	$14,580,000	$19,642,000	$27,032,000
Toronto.. ..	24,374,000	27,401,000	27,038,000
Winnipeg. ..	17,550,000	20,475,000	18,621,000
Vancouver. .	17,652,000	19,388,000	10,423,000

Sir Edmond Walker went on to say:

We have made the comparison for three years in view of the contraction which has begun in some cities. Toronto has just kept even and the decline in Winnipeg is trifling. The marked contraction is in Vancouver, and this no doubt represents conditions in many other western cities.

In Montreal, however, there is a great increase in value, although the number of permits is practically the same.

The figures for Montreal always exclude the large suburbs, the building in which last year is said to approximate $10,000,000 in value.

Here is a gentleman who is an authority on the financial and commercial condition of this country, and he had to point out to his shareholders that there was a marked contraction in operations in Vancouver. He then went on to state that this no doubt represented the condition of affairs in many western cities. That shows that, according to his view of things, the development in those cities is not as good and not as likely to be as good at present and for the coming year, as it has been in the past. They have also Sir Donald Mann who is in touch with the development of the country. The other day in an interview that he gave, when he returned from a trip to the Pacific coast, he told his interviewer that for the coming year the work of the railways would be confined very largely to completing what they had already undertaken, and that very little, if any, new work would be begun. We also have the statement of Mr. George Bury, the western manager of the Canadian Pacific railway, who, after he had been in Montreal and had an interview with Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, was reported in the Manitoba Free Press of January 9, 1914, under a Montreal date line, to have spoken as follows:

Discussions involving large expenditure in the west by the Canadian Pacific railway have been carried on in Montreal during the past few days between Sir T. Shaughnessy and Mr. George Bury, manager of western lines, with the result that appropriations have been passed. A statement issued by the Canadian Pacific railway to-night states that the position this year is somewhat different from that of former years. Last year large and comprehensive schemes for extensions, betterments and double tracking the company's system were pushed. These schemes cannot be completed in a day or two and must be carried to a certain point before extensions are undertaken, so that the expenditures estimated for the western appropriations of 1914 are almost entirely confined for the present to the completion of track laying, &c., on grades already built, on branch line extensions and double tracking, the latter of which will eventually connect Winnipeg with Vancouver, and to the building of Rogers' Pass tunnel, which will be pushed with vigour.

So far as grading is concerned, no less than six hundred miles are now ready for the rails, and there is extensive terminal work at Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver, the completion of which has been provided for.

The consideration of the expenditure on any new railway construction or other works will come up again later in the year, when further data has been secured, and there will be another conference with the president.

This statement of Mr. Bury's shows that the Canadian Pacific railway, on looking over the whole situation governing conditions in this country, have come to the conclusion that it is not the time to go ahead and enter upon further work. They started in and did a considerable amount in double tracking last year, and speaking from local knowledge, the idea prevailing among contractors and others connected with this work was that the Canadian Pacific railway would push the work of double tracking and spend as much if not more money this year, in this particular kind of work, than they had spent in 1913. It seems, however, on looking over this situation, that the heads of the company have come to the agreement that it is not advisable for them to go ahead and push this work as vigorously as they thought they were going to do. The result of all this together with the conclusion of work on the Grand Trunk Pacific, which is going to be completed some time in this present year, means that there will not be the amount of work going on in the country that there has been in the year past. I was therefore somewhat surprised in referring to this volume of immigration that the Government hopes to see come into this country during the present year, that there is no statement made as to what they think they can do towards finding suitable employment for those people. The Government's action to some extent, and the way they look at these matters, must be judged by an Order in Council that they passed a short time ago with regard to British Columbia. It was passed on the 8th December, 1913, and reads as follows:

His Royal Highness the Governor General in Council under and in virtue of the provisions of subsection 3 of section 38 of the Immigration Act, 9-10 Edward VII., and in view of the present overcrowded condition of the labour market in the province of British Columbia, is pleased to make the following order from and after the date hereof, and until after the thirty-first day of March, 1914, the landing at any port of entry in British Columbia hereinafter specified of any immigrant of any of the following classes of occupations, viz., artisans:

Labourers, skilled or unskilled, shall be, and the same is hereby prohibited.

The following ports of entry in British Columbia are hereby designated as the ports of entry at which this order shall apply:

Vancouver, Victoria, New Westminster, Nanaimo, Prince Rupert, Port Simpson, Anjox, Atlin, Bridesville, Chilliwack, Chopaka, Carson, Comox, Cascade Chemainus, Douglas, Gateway, Grand Forks, Huntingdon, Kamloops, Keremeos, Kingsgate, Ladner, Ladysmith, Myncaster, Midway, Mission Junction, Osoyoos, Port McNicoll, Ganges Harbour, Powell River, Paterson, Aldergrove, Rykerts, Rossland, Stewart, Union Bay, Upper Sumas, Pacific Highway, Waneta, White Rock, Steveston, Whales Island.

The very fact of the Government passing an Order in Council at that time last month, shows what they think of the condition of things in British Columbia to-day. Therefore, it is due to the country that the Government, if this statement in the Address is really as they say it is, should tell the people what they propose to do, and how they propose to provide for the employment, and to help these people who are coming to this country in greater numbers this year than they have come in the past. We do not want to see people coming to this country, sent out here by agents of the Government in other countries, or by other people who obtain from the Government a bonus of so much per head for bringing them here —we do not want to see them brought out to this country and left to drift down into the United States because they do not know where to go or where to look for work in Canada. The other day there was a quotation given from a book issued by the direction of the Hon. Mr. Roche, Minister of the Interior, entitled 'Immigration, Facts and Figures,' showing that in the year ending March 31, 1913, the immigration from the United States into Canada totalled 139,009, while the United States Immigration Commission at Montreal reports that in the year ending June 30, 1913, the number of persons leaving Canada to reside in the United States was 140,515. This is the first year since 1909 that the balance of immigration to and from the United States has been against Canada. I think that the Government should pay some attention to this condition of things and should see that if those people are coming to this country they have some means of making a livelihood, or of finding employment, when they arrive here.

I have taken up the time of the House in making these few remarks. I appreciate very much the kind way in which hon. gentlemen have listened. In regard to the question that was raised by the hon. leader of the Government with reference to the work of this House, I should like to make one suggestion to him. He referred to the fact that Ministers of the Lower House like to take charge of their own measures, and introduce these, themselves. I should like to suggest to the hon. leader of the Government that the question might be considered whether it is not possible to arrange with members of the Government, when they have legislation to bring down, that they may come here and introduce their measures in this Chamber in the same way that they do in the House of Commons. If the Government were to take this matter seriously into consideration, and discuss it with the members of this House, if necessary, I think that an arrangement could be made that would be a very great improvement and benefit to the work of this Chamber. It should result in bringing down for discussion legislation that could perhaps be discussed effectively in this Chamber, and do away with the difficulty we are under every session, of having nearly all the important legislation of the Government brought into this Chamber at the end of the session, when hon. gentlemen are more or less tired, and when they are thinking more perhaps of the winding up of the session than of the important work that is before them. I should like to state this here to the hon. leader of the Government, and I hope that the matter will be seriously taken into consideration by him and his colleagues.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—In rising to address this House on the Speech from the Throne, it is not my intention to tax the patience of hon. members by making long remarks. I wish, only, to refer, as briefly as possible, to a few paragraphs in the Address, and also offer a few remarks in answer to what has been said on two questions, which are not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, but which have been discussed in this debate. I wish to express my pleasure and the pleasure of all Canadians that Her Royal Highness was able to come back to Canada. Every Canadian thanked God that Her Royal Highness was spared, and will pray that Their Royal Highnesses will be spared for many years to come, and that Canada will have the honour to keep the present Governor General as long as possible.

I have listened very attentively to the speeches which have been made in this House on the Address, and particularly to the speech made by the hon. leader of the Opposition in this House. He spoke as usual with great eloquence and clearness, and in the finest English, but to my surprise he devoted at least half of his remarks, if not more, to two questions which were not even mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. This indicates to me that the hon. gentleman's conscience is not at rest yet because of the way he treated those Bills last session, and the work he did to have them defeated, one of them twice, and the other once. The hon. gentleman and his followers killed those two Bills, yet they do not seem satisfied that they acted in the best interest of this country. The hon. gentleman devoted fully twenty-five minutes to a discussion of the Naval Bill, and almost as much to a discussion of the Highways Bill, which was presented twice in this House, and was defeated by the Liberal majority of the Senate. It is not my intention to speak on the Naval Bill. Every member of the House knows my opinion on the subject. I stated last session what I believed was best for this country, and I gave my reasons for supporting the measure. I stated, and I still believe, that, in the interest of Canada, the Bill which was presented by the Right Hon. Mr. Borden was the best Bill which could be framed. During the last general elections, and prior to it, every one in Canada knew what was the policy of the hon. leader of the Government on that important measure. In all the speeches which he made in the House and outside of it, he stated that if the majority of the electors of this Dominion placed him at the head of the Government, his first act would be to go to England, and inquire from the Admiralty as to the best policy for Canada to adopt to come to the help of the navy of the Mother Country. What did the right hon. gentleman do? After the election in 1911 he went to inquire of the Admiralty if there was really an emergency—a fact which has been admitted by the hon. leader of the Opposition of this House only last week. That hon. gentleman stated from his seat in the Senate that there was still an emergency and a great demand from England to be helped by her most important colony, Canada. We know very well that our trade is increasing rapidly. Our trade on the high seas is over half a billion dollars per annum, and we have always been protected by England, without contributing one cent towards protection of the high seas. And now that we have eight millions of people and are able to help the mother country, are we to continue to refuse our support and refuse to help the empire in protecting our trade on the high seas? I do not believe that the great majority of the people of Canada will consent to this country taking that position, and that at the next general election the present Government will be returned to power, and instructed to force this House to obey their commands. It will be found after a next general election that it is not the Senate that will have the lead. It is not an irresponsible chamber that will have a right to oppose the will of the people. We know what the policy of the Government is and has been. The reason given by the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition in the Senate last year for opposing the Naval Bill was not on account of the expenditure it involved, but because we were sending three empty shells to England—because, as he said, we had not the courage to man those ships. We know very well that the Canadian people are as proud and courageous as any other population in the world, but we know at the same time that the offer of the present Government was accepted by the Imperial authorities, and that the three dreadnoughts were to be loaned to England and not presented as a gift—our Government reserving the right to re-call those three ships if at any time the people of Canada should decide to establish a navy of their own.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Was that in the Bill?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—It was stated openly in the House, and you have the word of the Prime Minister and the word of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But the Cabinet cannot ignore the law. When it is not in the Bill, there is no such provision.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—My hon. friend forgets one fact: with the late Government that might have been the case, but with the present Government you are safe when they make a promise.

Now about the Highways Bill: the hon. leader of the Opposition seemed satisfied that he was skating on very thin ice when he spoke on that question. In his opening remarks he said:

> Now, the Speech from the Throne is to me remarkable, not so much for what it contains as for what it does not contain. There are omissions which to my mind are very striking —inexcusable, I was going to say—and for which I can give no explanation whatever. For instance, why has the Highways Bill been withdrawn? It was one of the pet Bills of the Government. It came here on its mission of usefulness, so it was alleged, twice. We are charged with having rejected the Highways Bill..

After having heard those remarks, I thought the hon. leader of the Opposition regretted very much having rejected that Bill during two consecutive sessions, and that he was going to advise the present Government to reintroduce it. However, during the next fifteen minutes he presented an argument, giving the best evidence that in his own judgment it was impossible for the Government even to bring the Bill into the House of Commons. It was, he said, against the constitution, because the constitution was not clear enough in his mind to permit the Government offering any money to help in building the highways in the different provinces. Before doing anything of the kind, he said, it would be well for the Government to take the advice of the people. What does he care for the helping of the farmers of the country? Not at all. When the Government tried to help the farmers of the country, in voting large sums of money to help the making of roads, I believe that it was the duty of every member of this House to congratulate the Administration on so doing. I believe that the farmers have been neglected too long. I farmers have been neglected too long. The farming community, which is the backbone of this country, has not had the help it should have from the Federal authorities—

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—And I congratulate the present administration on the fact that already they are trying to help the farmers of the country by sending instructors to the different municipalities, and in distributing thoroughbred stock to improve the breeds of horses, cattle, etc. And if it had not been for the action of this Senate, large amounts of money would now be distributed in each province according to population, to make roads for the farming community. Speaking on the same question, the hon. gentleman from Halifax, who is one of the ablest members of this House, one of the hardest workers, and who takes a great interest in all questions which are debated in this House and in the committees, was so short of good arguments to support the action of the Senate in the last two years in rejecting this Bill, that he discovered that this money, voted to improve the highways in the different provinces, was only to link the provinces together. It was not to make cross-roads, he said, but only a road from the Atlantic to the Pacific, forgetting at the same time that the farmers who would use that highway would profit by it. There was no provision in that Bill to prevent the farmers, when that road was constructed, from taking advantage of it, to transport their goods to the railway stations, or to the nearest market. When I heard the hon. gentleman using such arguments in support of the action of the Senate during the last two sessions, I said to myself: 'Good arguments must be very scare amongst them when they resort to such a contention.' We have been so used to changes of policy on the part of the Liberal party, that we do not wonder at the change in this regard, although I must admit that the leader of the Opposition in this Chamber does not agree with the opinions expressed by the leader of his party in the other House. The hon. leader of the Oppossition in this House admitted that there may be a stringency, and that there may be depression, but he could not see how it was caused, and did not know anybody who could know. In the other branch of Parliament, during the present session, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier told how he had been touring through part of the country and had spoken at many meetings, and he discovered, at once, the cause of the depression and the high cost of living. That solitary reason was the tariff—protection. We must remember that the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was the head of the Government for very nearly sixteen years. During that time he had the right to reduce the tariff or increase it. He was supported by a substantial majority. His dictation was law. Everything he tried to do, he could succeed in doing completely. But instead of trying to change the tariff, he hugged it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—He did reduce it.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I beg pardon, he did not reduce it. The tariff made by Sir Leonard Tilley in 1878 is so similar to the Fielding tariff that they look exactly like twin brothers.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—A microscopical modification.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—As I said a little while ago, why did he not reduce the tariff, if he now discovers—

Hon. Mr. BOYER—There was no depression then.

Hon Mr. BOLDUC—He did not reduce the tariff when he was at the head of the Government, and, therefore, we must conclude that he thought it was the best tariff that could be provided for this country.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Did he not materially reduce the tariff by the introduction of Imperial preference?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—A few cents in each case.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—The hon. gentleman voted against it.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Twenty-five per cent preference.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Thirty-three and a third per cent.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—The hon. gentleman seems to have forgotten that the cost of living has been climbing during the last twenty years. He was satisfied that everything was well when he had the administration of the country, but as soon as he was defeated, in 1911, he discovered that Canada was a hard place to live in, that living was very expensive. A man falling from the moon and discovering the earth, would be no more surprised in discovering our planet than the hon. leader of the Opposition, in the other House, was to find how expensive it is to live in Canada. From the high position of the hon. gentleman, from his experience in politics, from his age, everybody expected he had studied the question so thoroughly that he would direct the people how to reduce the cost of living—at the same time he forgot to say that the wages of labourers and mechanics had increased at a more rapid pace than the cost of food. I remember perfectly some thirty years ago when I could hire a man to work on my farm for 60 cents a day. Now I have to pay $2 and $2.50 a day. I claim, and justly claim, that the labourer and mechanic are in a better position to-day, than before the protection policy was adopted. Before the tariff was placed on the statute book of this country, we had soup kitchens all over, in Toronto, Montreal, Quebec and all the important places in this country. But as soon as Sir Leonard Tilley placed the tariff on the statute book, this stringency disappeared. We had no more depression and all the people in this Dominion were so satisfied that the Liberal party never dared to amend that policy except in a very small way. I have stated that the Government is trying to help the agricultural community in this country. I have stated what it is doing. During the time that Sir Wilfrid was canvassing the country, clamouring for free food, and saying the tariff was responsible for the stringency and depression which has existed for a few months in this country, the present Government was working silently, trying to reduce the cost of living and prevent the increase. According to my idea, the first step to reduce the cost of living is to help the farming community. I have stated what the Government has done to educate the farmer. The Government tried also to help the farmer by constructing roads, but they were prevented from doing it. They are sending thoroughbred cattle all over the country to the farmer. The policy of the Postmaster General, in putting into force the parcel post system, will have a great influence in reducing the cost of living, because it will enable the farmer to mail to towns and cities goods up to eleven pounds. He can make arrangements with people in cities and towns to receive these goods weekly or monthly, and in that manner he will eliminate the middlemen. The trusts and combines are mostly responsible for the increase in the cost of living. I have seen a statement in the public press, not more than three weeks ago, that an inquiry has been made in the state of Massachusetts to ascertain what is the amount received by the producer when an article produced by him is sold in the market. The report is that the producer or farmer receives thirty-five cents on each dollar and the middle men, or the trusts and combines, receive sixty-five cents. I think that the Government is bound to take some action which will have the effect of eliminating, as much as possible, the middleman and the trust. Under the parcel post system, the farmer can make arrangements to transmit his goods cheaply to the consumer, and the farmer will undertake to supply first-class goods.

With regard to the Highways Bill, it has been said that if a round sum had been voted for each province, the Senate might have been induced to pass the measure, and the local legislature would have had sole control of the fund. Judging from the experience in the province of Quebec, I believe the Government acted wisely in not handing over to the local Government the amount to be expended in improving the road. Last year the local Government of Quebec decided to give $1,500 to have a sugar industry in the county of Beauce. We know that at least 60 or 70 per cent of the sugar produced in the whole Dominion is manufactured in Beauce. The local government was willing to have that industry aided to that extent, and I thought that they would locate the industry in a central place where the greater part of the sugar was made. But what has been done by the local Government? Instead of placing that model sugar school in a central place, where most of the sugar is made, they placed it in the oldest parish in the district, where they have only a few maple trees—second growth—where there are not over five or six thousand maples in the whole parish. And why? I do not believe that you can find any other reason than the fact that that parish gives the Liberals a majority exceeding 400. That is the only reason. Those who have experience in the sugar industry know very well that the farmers are so busy in sugar times in tapping the trees, collecting the sap, and boiling it into syrup and finally into sugar, that they have no time to travel thirty, forty or fifty miles to go and see what is being done at the sugar refinery. It is impossible for them to do it. They have sometimes one or two days at their disposal and that is all. If the industry had been located in the centre of the sugar producing townships it would have been much more convenient for the farmers. In these townships, public opinion was about evenly divided at election time, but at the place where the sugar industry was located the Liberals always had a majority exceeding 400.

If we have not suffered more during the few months of stringency and depression, we must thank Providence for the good harvest we have had. During last summer we had one of the best harvests ever produced in Canada. The immigration was infinitely better than that of some years ago. Men are coming now to settle in this country. Numerous public works have been undertaken by the present Administration, public works which had been neglected by the late Administration, even in Quebec, represented by Sir Wilfrid, electing Sir Wilfrid Laurier during the last thirty-seven years by a unanimous vote. or by a very large majority—a riding which received Sir Wilfrid when he had been defeated in his old constituency Arthabaska, after having been made a Minister of the Crown—the old government erected no public buildings. Such buildings were urgently needed there. The only thing Sir Wilfrid did for his constituency was to erect a post office. He paid a high price for the land on which the post office was situated, perhaps three or four times its value, and when he came to have the building constructed it looked no better than a soap box. What has this Government been doing since its advent to power in 1911? Works have been constructed in Quebec, which is the best port in the whole Dominion. It is the port where the high tonnage vessels will have to come, because by the increased volume of trade, one way or the other, and by the increase in the tonnage in building vessels, it is evident that before long it will be impossible for the larger vessels to go to Montreal. And further than that, the port of Montreal, though large, will not be sufficiently large to accommodate half of the vessels that will ply between Canada and England.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—The hon. gentleman has just stated that the vessels would be too large to come up to Montreal. There would be no use in enlarging the port if the vessels could not come up.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—They will have the smaller vessels at Montreal, and we will have the larger ones at Quebec. Nothing was done in Quebec to receive the large vessels. Notwithstanding the fact that the three members for Quebec city, and the member for the county of Levis, opposite Quebec, were Grits, the late Government never undertook the improvement of that great harbour. The present Government have given contracts to build a dry dock at Levis. They are constructing large works on the St. Charles river. They are building a fine station near Quebec, and constructing other works along the St. Lawrence. When all the works which have been given by contract by the present Government are completed, the port of Quebec will be one of the finest in the whole Dominion, if not in the whole world.

Hon. gentlemen having referred to the Redistribution Bill, I thought at first that this Bill was of a great deal more importance to the members of the House of Commons than to members of this Chamber. But we had a fair warning from the leader of the Opposition in this House, that if the Bill was not framed to suit him and his party we might expect it would receive the same treatment as was accorded to the Navy and Highways Bills. It may be that some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House propose to resign from their safe seats to run at the next general election. In that case I would advise these gentlemen to make the statement publicly, so that we will be able to carve some counties where they will surely be elected, in order that we may see them in Parliament—whether in this House or the other. I will not be surprised if there are many changes in the whole Dominion. In the province of Quebec the number of members cannot be increased or decreased. We cannot have more than sixty-five, and they cannot reduce the number. However, there is so much difference in the population of the different counties of the province, that I believe the Government will have to make a complete redistribution of seats in the province of Quebec. For instance, we have in Soulanges, Quebec West and Vaudreuil counties nine thousand souls. On the other hand we have a population of about 63,000 in St. John and about 52,000 in Rimouski, and the same number in the county of Beauce. Is it just that small counties of 9,000 people should have the same representation as a county of 63,000? The Government is trying to redistribute all the seats and make division of the counties, as evenly as possible. If I had anything to say in the redistribution of the seats in the province of Quebec, I would strongly urge the redistribution of seats according to population. We know very well that it is never possible to have exact equality in numbers. The number of people represented by one member in the province of Quebec should be about 30,000. I know it would be almost impossible to have that exact number in each riding, but I would advise the Government to do as much as possible to have the same number of people in each riding.

As to the increase in the number of Senators in this House, judging by the interest taken in the administration of the affairs of the country by all the western members of this House, I, for my part, shall welcome with pleasure the addition mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. However, we have had fair warning from the leader of the Opposition that the Government must be very careful in the preparation of that measure, and that if there should be anything in the Bill contrary to the constitution, it would surely be rejected in this House.

Before resuming my seat I wish to join the hon. members in expressing the wish that we may have a harmonious and pleasant session.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—The House having already been favoured with many very able speeches, I desire to say just a few words. First, I wish to congratulate the Government, which seems to be disposed to furnish the members of both Houses with an opportunity to discuss the affairs of this great Dominion as early as possible during this session. We all know that we have in Canada many questions of the highest order to deal with. There are many problems for us to solve. The emergency of which we heard so much during last session seems to have disappeared. Our friends on the Government side who were really uneasy for the safety of the empire, seem to be at rest now. During the last two or three sessions a considerable part of the time was devoted to discussion of this important question, and to devise some means for Canadians to come to the rescue of the mother country. The question was how this could be best done. The Prime Minister was anxious to give $35,000,000 of Canadian money to her, or to big warship construction companies. On the other hand the leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons was not satisfied. He was willing to give the brain and the heart of Canadians. Fortunately to-day, judging by the Speech from the Throne, the empire is safe, and members can mind their own business and the affairs of the country. I was somewhat surprised last week at the attempt made by the hon. leader of this House to explain why the Government does not contemplate the introduction of some contribution Bill, or the giving of some $35,000,000 for the building of three dreadnoughts. Why also has the Government done nothing so far to carry on the naval policy? That position taken by the House, was wise indeed. There was nothing else than to say to the Government:

Your proposal is a new departure. You have no mandate to impose it on the people. Before your policy becomes law go and ask the electors who will be called upon to bear such a heavy burden if they approve of it.

That is all. Was it not fair? Where is the harm in it? The Prime Minister of to-day himself made the same request. In the House of Commons a motion was moved, on February 3, 1910, asking exactly the same thing, and asking to have the whole question referred to the people by means of a plebiscite, and the whole Conservative party in the House of Commons voted with him. The same proposition was offered in this House by the present leader of the Government. This must be sufficient to prove that the Senate acted wisely in asking the Government to refer that question to the people.

To-day, from one end of the country to the other, the people are struggling and suffering from the high cost of living. There are thousands and thousands of workmen idle. Business is paralysed. The position is the most serious possible, and if the Government, instead of trying to share with the British Government the responsibility of running a part of the British Empire, had paid more attention to Canadian affairs that crisis would have been avoided, or at least partially avoided.

Now, looking at the present position of affairs, I say it is time to slow down on extravagant public expenditures, so that the duties on imports may be scaled down. That will mean cheaper prices on many commodities required for our daily domestic life. The question of the high cost of living, in comparison with all other questions, is the most important. In my opinion there are two causes contributing to create these high prices; namely high duties and the immigration of many thousand undesirable people. We have blindly brought these people into the country at great expense, and they are now a burden in our cities, and to the country. The Government should do something, and do it soon, to remedy the evil. These two questions are entirely in their hands, and if they see the situation as it is, they will act promptly to bring relief to the country. In doing so the Government will deserve the approbation of this House and of the people.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is rather late in the debate to enter on any extended remarks. Still I want to give expression to some ideas, even if it is late. I have listened with interest to some of the speeches delivered on the other side of the House. They have led me to the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite should organize a mutual admiration society. The hon. gentleman from Lauzon (Mr. Bolduc) had a great many nice things to say about the present Government, amongst others that they always carried out their promises.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Every one of them.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I will mention some that they have not carried out. Some of the promises made by the present Prime Minister before the last election, have not been fulfilled; one of them was that they intended to give the natural resources of the Western provinces to the local governments of those provinces. Has that been done?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—It will be done in good time.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The only supporter the present Government had in Alberta, the Hon. Mr. Bennett, got tired waiting for the Government to fulfill their promise, and has recently made a statement, at a public meeting in Calgary, that, if Mr. Borden delays any longer carrying out his promise to give the western provinces control of their natural resources, he will vote against the Government. Previous to being taken into the Cabinet, Mr. Arthur Meighen was up in arms against the duty on agricultural implements. He said the farmers were being robbed, and the duty on agricultural implements must be removed. Since then, he has been made Solicitor General with a good fat salary, and we do not hear anything from him now about the high duties on agricultural implements. He has forgotten all about the promises he made to the people. Another promise made by the present leader of the Government was that if his party were returned to power, they would purify the elections. What kind of pure elections have we had since the change of government? Is the 'gum-shoe' brigade, and the 'rubber boot' brigade that has been operating in the by-elections, evidence of it? Is what took place in Macdonald, Manitoba, further evidence that Mr. Borden is carrying out his promise to the people?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—The hon. gentleman must know that in Macdonald, Manitoba, there has been another election, and the successful candidate was returned by an increased majority.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It cost a good deal more money.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—The hon. gentleman does not seem to know much about it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I happened to be in the city of Winnipeg when the election took place, and I happen to know something about it. I know something about the operations of the Adanac club. The machine was out in full force in that riding, and the Liberals were not bothering themselves much about the election. My hon. friend has forgotten the fact that the member elected for that riding acknowledged the corn—admitted that he had been elected by corrupt methods. Why did he do that? He did it for fear that something worse would be found out.

It is a good thing that the rules of debate give us a right to go outside the Speech from the Throne to discuss public questions, because, really, there is very little in the Address to discuss. We are told that we are to have a Redistribution Bill; that is something called for by the constitution. We are told also that we are to have a Bill to give increased representation, in the Senate, to the western provinces. There is no Navy Bill, and no Highways Bill, but we have had a discussion on both subjects. With reference to the increased representation to the western provinces in the Senate, I should like to know if the Government has received petitions or requests from anybody, except people who are hunting for positions, for increased representation of the West in the Senate? We have an idea in the West that there should be a re-adjustment of the representation of the provinces in the Senate. The western people will not be long satisfied with having only the same representation for these four great provinces as either Ontario, or Quebec, or the Maritime provinces have in the Senate. There must be a redistribution all along the line. We have in the Prairie provinces remarkably fertile lands and we are entitled to proper representation.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—What is the population at the present time of the four western provinces?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It does not make any difference what the population is. The representation of the provinces in the Senate is not based upon population, but upon the interests to be represented. The western provinces are paying more money into the treasury of this country than Ontario or Quebec, and have a larger population than the lower provinces, which have twenty-four Senators to represent them. The time is approaching when the representation of the provinces in the Senate will have to be reconsidered and readjusted. We are told that the Naval Bill has been slaughtered. By whom? I thought it was understood, when the Senate declined to accept the Naval Bill, that Mr. Borden was to resign and go to the country, as the British Government did when the Home Rule Bill was rejected by the House of Lords. But Mr. Borden is wise in his day and generation. He knows that if he had gone to the country on his Naval policy he might not be elected himself; but if he were elected he would be sitting on the other side of the House. The Government has no right to introduce a Bill to increase the representation of the western provinces in the Senate until the whole matter of representation in the Senate is adjusted. Mr. Borden cannot adjust this matter, himself, but he can initiate the adjustment. He can call a meeting of representatives of the nine provinces in the Dominion and devise some scheme for reforming this House. He cannot change it without the consent of the provinces. Possibly the Premiers of the several provinces might decide to diminish the representation in this House, and if that were agreed upon we might put a Bill through the Imperial Parliament to give effect to whatever they agreed upon. However the leader of the Government is waiting for the hand of Providence to reform the Senate.

I was amazed the other day to hear the speech of the senior member for St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel). Amongst other things he said; 'How can the Government carry on the administration of this country, if the Senate is to interfere with legislation?' One would think, to hear the hon. gentleman, that any legislation proposed by the Government, no matter what its character, must be regarded as sacred, that the Senate has no right to amend or reject a Government measure, If that view were sound, of what use would the Senate be? The framers of Confederation must have had an idea that a second Chamber was necessary, otherwise it would not be in existence to-day. If the majority in this Chamber think a Bill should be amended, it is their duty to amend it, yet supporters of the Government hold up their hands in holy horror when the Senate does anything of the kind, and inquire why the Senate puts its ungodly hands on Government legislation. If the senators think proper to amend or reject a Government measure, they are exercising their functions as a second Chamber. Did not the leader of the Government say that if the Senate should throw out this Bill, he would appeal to the people?

Hon. Mr. Bolduc—No.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is reported in the press that he said so in Montreal, and other places. Has he carried out that promise?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—He promised that when the Government decided upon a permanent policy they would submit it to the people.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—He made a statement that if the Senate rejected the Naval Bill he would appeal to the people.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—He never made such a statement.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—That is how it appeared in the press. This matter of contributing $35,000,000 to the Imperial Government had never been brought before the country. All that the Senate said was: 'You have no mandate from the people to send $35,000,000 of the people's money out of the country. Before you do that we demand that you should consult the people. Was not the Senate right in taking that view? Who pay the taxes? The people; and when it is proposed to put a load on their shoulders without consulting them, it is the duty of the Senate to see that the matter is referred to the electors. I heard the leader of the House the other night talking about sincerity. If the Government had been sincere in this matter, what would they have done? The Senate did not tie them down to dissolving the House and going to the country, but the Government could have taken that course or submitted the question to the people by means of a plebiscite. A vote could have been taken on the question in August, and the House could have met in November. Then if they had a mandate from the people, they could have introduced their measure and the two Houses would have joined in passing it. The Government did not care to consult the people in a general election, but they did consult South Bruce, and there could not be a better constituency selected to test public opinion on the question. The electors are good, solid farmers, and those farmers gave expression to their view. The constituency was filled with the best speakers the Government could put forward, and yet, although the Government had been in power only two years, the Government candidate was defeated. The former member was wise enough to come to this House—he foresaw what was coming. Then take Middlesex; the same thing happened there, although there was no member elected, in support of the Liberal party, the majority for the successful candidate was cut down about one-half. There was an expression of opinion from Ontario, and my hon. friend from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Bolduc) must be aware that there would have been a similar expression of opinion in Quebec, if an appeal had been made to the people there. That is why the Government have not introduced a Naval Bill this session. They have laid their cards on the table, and the trump cards for the next election are the Naval Bill and the Highways Bill. Now what did the Senate do in the matter of the Highways Bill? They simply amended it so as to incorporate the promise made by the leader of the Government, that the money appropriated for highways should be handed over to the provinces to be expended on the roads. Mr. White, the Finance Minister said the same thing, and the Senate said, we will put that in the Bill. But the Government said, oh, no, we keep our promises, but we do not want to have it put in writing. I have here a clipping from the London Advertiser.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—What party does the London Advertiser represent?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is published in a good Conservative constituency. At a meeting of the Good Roads Commission, held in London on the 16th of last month, the following resolution was adopted:

> We approve of provincial and federal aid toward construction and maintenance of highways.
> We disapprove of federal or provincial management and control of highways, except under special conditions, believing that such aid or assistance as the Federal Government gives should be paid direct to the Provincial Government, and by them, together with their contributions, be paid in turn to the county or township councils for highway improvement, under regulations prepared by the Provincial Highway Department of Public Works, and that all works of road improvement should be under the direct management of commission or commissioners, appointed and directed by the county or township councils, supervised by the provincial engineers and inspectors.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—There is nothing wrong about that. It is only what the Bill provided.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The Bill only provided for that after it had been amended by this House. Then where was the Bill slaughtered? It was slaughtered in the House of Commons. Now I do not suppose there was a Liberal on that Good Roads Commission—if so he must have been there by accident. If the Bill was slaughtered, strangled or emasculated, it was done in the other House—they killed their own child. The Senate merely improved the Bill and sent it back to the Commons, and there it was killed. We passed five clauses of that Bill and amended one. That amendment was to incorporate in the Bill what the Government had promised to do. In a business transaction I am always careful how I deal with a man who is not ready to put in writing any promise he makes. I say the House of Commons slaughtered the Bill themselves, and they were mighty glad to do it, because it was merely a bluff.

Some hon. gentlemen have told us what wonderful work the Government has done in the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. That road had been started before the present Government came into power. The contract for its construction had been let, and the only thing the new Government did was to compel the contractor to take a Government supporter in as a partner. They also sent freight to Port Nelson without making any provision for unloading it, and the cargoes had to be taken back at the expense of the people. The Government are building a road—they do not know where they are going, but they are on the way. They have wasted a great deal of money, and so far only seventy miles of the road has been built. There is a muskeg at The Pas. There may be some good patches of land in it, but the greater part of it is unfit for cultivation. The Government sent surveyors there to lay it out in farm land, but, a short time before the survey, gentlemen from Winnipeg came there and squatted on the land. After the survey the rights of the squatters were recognized, and, in this connection, something was done which will be brought out later. Some of these squatters had their property surveyed into lots, and called the place the Pas Annex. They have sold about one million dollars worth of lots already. A notice was published in the papers that the Government were going to establish a terminal there. That is about all the present Government has done towards the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

Reference has been made to the high cost of living, and especially to the high cost of food. Now the high cost of living does not depend altogether on the price of food. The high prices which have to be paid for clothing add to the cost of living. The food used in a family does not amount to half as much as the expenditure for keeping up the home. Now if the Government want to do something for the people, why not give some relief in the way of tariff reform? I looked in the Speech from the Throne for some reference to tariff reform, but no mention was made of it. If you reduce the duty on woollens the people will get cheaper clothing; the same remark applies to cotton goods. If you want to help the people in our part of the country take the duty off agricultural implements, and that would reduce the cost of living to them. Reduce the duty on boots and shoes and other necessities.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—Is the hon. gentleman, in the remarks he has made about the cost of food, following in the line of policy that was announced at Hamilton by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, or is he announcing a new policy on his own account?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have no leader. I am speaking for myself. I am independent, not like my hon. friend who talks of independence on the other side of the House. Any one who is sincere in his desire to reduce the cost of living can accomplish that end by reducing the tariff on the commodities that people use.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—The hon. gentleman is talking about the high cost of living, and his leader announces that his policy to reduce the cost of living is to make imports of food absolutely free. That is his policy and that alone.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—That is his policy, but we want to go a little further. We want to get the duty taken off the commodities now manufactured by trusts and combines—articles which are sold at exorbitant prices because of the present tariff. We hear a good deal about getting the people to go back to the land. If you want to get people back to the soil, you must make the returns from agriculture larger. Everybody talks about the producer; no one seems to consider the consumer. It is time that the consumer had his innings in this country. Take agricultural implements as an example of how the people are taxed. A binder which sells for $160 to $180, does not cost to manufacture more than $38 to $40. A short time ago at Washington the Government wanted to buy typewriters. The price to the ordinary consumer is $120; the Government got them for $14 apiece, and at that price the manufacturer had $1 profit on each machine. If the Government want to do something for the people let them appoint a commission to look into the cost of production of manufactured goods. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that we have had too many commissions. And let me say here, that he has got to be quite a sailor. He has sailed so much that we might make him admiral of the fleet. Let the Government appoint a commission, and give it authority to go among the manufacturing industries of the country and figure out exactly what it costs to manufacture the commodities which they sell to the people, and let the public know exactly what these things cost, and you will be doing something towards reducing the high cost of living. We know that there is a combine that controls the manufacture and sale of farming implements, and we are told that if the duty were taken off these implements the sale would still be controlled, on both sides of the line, by the combine. But there is a way to get at the trust, and relieve the people. Let the Government find out what it costs to make a binder, what it costs to make a pair of boots, or anything else that the people have to purchase. Let the people know what it really costs to make all these different articles, and you will find that there will be such a tumble in prices of those articles, that the people will be able to live on a reasonable amount in a short time. It is all nonsense to talk about the soil, and the cry let us get back to the soil. The farmers are on the land in my part of the country, and we have the most fertile soil to be found in the world. For the purpose of raising wheats and cereals, you cannot get a better climate. Still the farmers are not making a cent. Why? Because they cannot get enough for the grain. They have to pay exorbitant rates for the transportation of the grain, and the door which should be open to them is shut in their faces. The farmers come down here and say: 'We are not asking you to raise the duty: but we are asking you to take the duty off, and we will work out our own salvation'. The Government say 'No, we will protect you against your own wishes', like the small boy and the castor oil, 'We will pour it down your throat'. The Government are taking the farmers of the West by the nose, and are pouring this medicine down their throat. And the manufacturers of agricultural implements and manufacturers of boots and shoes, are standing around while the dose is being administered. And now this wonderful Government, which my hon. friend is so much struck on, is doing nothing. The three prairie provinces produce an enormous quantity of grain per year, and when the farmers come and ask to have the tariff taken off, because it interferes with their getting to market, they are told it cannot be done. Is that reasonable or logical? There must be some reason why the Government refuses the demand of the people of the West.

The millers want to get cheap wheat. Those millers sell their flour in England a good deal cheaper than they sell it at the mill door at home. The grading of wheat in the United States is different from the grading here. Grade No. 3 in Canada is Grade No. 1 in the United States. Wheat is worth 10 cents more in the United States than in Canada. We can send the wheat over, have it ground there, bring the flour back and sell it for 50 cents less the sack. The farmers from the West are sent home about their business, and the Government say 'We cannot do anything for you.' But the miller gets the ear of the Government and says: 'No, you must not remove the duty. If you do the wheat goes into the States.' In that case the farmer would get more for it, but they say 'That does not make any odds, we want it kept here, we helped you to get into power, and if you want to stay in power you will require our assistance'. All the poor farmer has to look forward to is the buncomb speeches which will be made in the West by the supporters of the Government at the next election, to try and make them believe that this is the best Government on the face of the earth. The same Government is giving them a dose of tariff oil, and holding them by the nose while they are administering it. The farmers understand the situation exactly, they have been humbugged long enough, and do not propose to be humbugged in future. They are organized in the western provinces, and they will be organized in the eastern provinces. As far as the West is concerned, it does not matter what kind of a Redistribution Bill is prepared. They can cut the West up, all they like, but they will get very little support unless they change their tactics and give the farmers what they ask for. The farmers are simply asking to have the duty removed.

At present the people of eastern Canada dictate to the western farmer where he shall buy the commodities which he consumes. They force him to buy in a protected market. If you dictate to a man where he shall sell the article he produces, is it not impertinent? It is bad enough to make him pay you money, and buy in a protected market, but when you tell him he cannot sell except where you say, it is going too far. It is time he scratched his head, and asked: 'Are we hewers of wood and drawers of water for the people of this country'? They are not free men, if that kind of treatment can be given them.

I am sorry the Government did not reintroduce the Naval Bill. It is interesting to observe the different ways they have of dodging around, and trying to get out of a hole. Generally in our country when a gopher gets into a hole he has another hole by which to get out; but this political gopher has not provided a hole for his exit. Or if there is a hole somebody is at the hole with a pitchfork. The Government know perfectly well the people do not want that Bill. If they thought they had any chance of carrying the country they could have gone to the country on that measure. They could have got a plebiscite. But they come back humbly without a word to say. They simply announced that it would not be introduced again. I think the hon. leader of the Government in this House must have been sitting at the feet of the illustrious statesman, Sir Rodmond Palen Roblin when we hear him talk about disloyalty, and about loyal men. The leader of the Government in this House said that every loyal man in the country was behind that measure. He practically said, in so many words, that every other man in this House who did not agree with him was disloyal. Do hon. gentlemen think it is pretty nearly time to take a tumble? They ought to know what Dr. Johnson said about patriotism. He said it was the last refuge of a certain class of gentlemen. This sort of tin-horn, cheap, flag waving business is pretty nearly gone in this country. You can fool all the people some of the time, and you can fool some of the people all the time; but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time. The people are wise to this tupence ha'penny flag-waving business. It was an effort to make the people believe that the Liberal party was going to hand the country over to the United States. You cannot repeat that a second time. It is no wonder our honourable friends are getting into trouble; they do not know what to do to get out of the hole they are in. Look at the hon. gentleman from St. John. He read a lot of extracts from the resolution passed in the House of Commons in 1909. Both political parties were voting for that resolution. The Government met the Opposition more than half way because they accepted every proposition the Opposition leader of 1909 wanted inserted. That proposition, when it was brought down and voted on, was the resolution of the Hon. Mr. Borden of the Conservative party. We thought it was all settled and we were going to be unanimous in connection with it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—No emergency then.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, it had not been trotted out then. Everything was lovely until there was a certain election in Drummond-Arthabaska, and Hon. Mr. Monk went down there, and became a Nationalist. I do not know what he is now. However, they were able to defeat the Government candidate. The hon. member from St. John tried to justify his vote on that resolution in 1909, and then to justify himself for voting the other way. Is that not a spectacle for the gods? Those gentlemen are trying to get out of the hole. There is not one out of twenty-five who wants the money provided for in the Naval Bill sent out of this country. What about good old Toronto—a real old Tory town if ever there was one in this Dominion. There was a meeting there the other night, and they decided that if the Dominion had $35,000,000 to spare, it should be distributed among the unemployed. Why did the Government not carry out the requests of those people and assist the unemployed in some way? My hon. friend was telling us what a splendid Government this was; why then do they not do something? I was surprised to hear the speech of the hon. mover of the Address. He had studied the question before. He used a lot of figures. I used some of these same figures eighteen years ago. They were all right and correct enough. He told us what the country was doing, and he told us about the mutual admiration society, and of the wonderful things the Government had done. He congratulated the Finance Minister on the Budget and the large surplus. Did he expect, after this machine was well under way for fifteen years, and was going at sixty miles an hour, that they could put the brakes on it any quicker than they did, and that it could have stopped any more quickly? If a man takes care of himself for fifteen or sixteen years, he will be in good physical condition, and I defy him to kill himself in less than two years. And that is about what they have done. They have brought the country to a state of starvation in that time.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—Are Alberta and Saskatchewan in that condition?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They have a little better Government than most places, but the country as a whole has any number of unemployed. There is no use trying to dodge around the bush, the Government must face the difficulty. They have, themselves, by their action two years ago in shutting out all American capital, caused all the trouble. We had three good crops in the West: one was in the building of the railways, another was in the grain that was produced, and the third was the immigrants who came into the West and brought with them large sums of money. At that time: 'Everything was lovely and the goose hangs high.' After reciprocity was defeated these gentlemen said 'Well, we are not wanted in this country: we are going to be kicked out: we cannot do business here the same as we have done in other countries of the world: we will go home before we are kicked out'. They simply went home and took their money with them. When the supply of money was cut off in the West, the factories started to close down. Where does the Massey Harris Company sell their ploughs? In the West, of course. Where does the Massey Harris Company sell their manufactures? They sell them in the West. When the money was shut off in the West, times got very hard in the East. I was amused at my hon. friend who moved the Address, who read some article from a book to the effect that England had lent us all kinds of money for one per cent less than she could have got from other nations. Is the hon. gentleman serious in a statement of that kind? The Englishman is the same as any other business man. If he can get five per cent he will not lend to anybody at four per cent, it does not matter whether it is a Canadian or any other nationalitiy. For eighteen years my hon. friends on the other side were in power in this country. How much money did the people bring in this country, from England to invest? Hardly a dollar. Where did they take their money. To the republic on the other side of the line, building transcontinental lines to the Pacific coast. When any good feeling was established, it was the Liberal party accompished it by increasing the preference and showing the English people that we wished to get in closer connection with them. That is what started the ball rolling, and it has had the effect of bringing English capital into this country. The good feeling has not been created by anything these flag waving people have done. Their action will tend to drive it out again. The Englishman is a good business man, with good business instincts, and if he cannot make any money by loaning in Canada, if the security is not good, he will not lend it. Capitalists will only invest it where they will get a return. It was only after the inauguration of that preference, that they started to lend money in Canada. I would advise my hon. friends if they have any influence with the leaders in the other House, if they want to do something to carry out the pledges of loyalty which they have been expressing all over the country, then let them endeavour to increase the British preference to fifty per cent. Then we will get cheaper boots and shoes, cotton goods and earthenware, and everything we have to use. If I had my own way I would take the duty off altogether. I stand for the British connection. I want free trade between Canada and the mother country. Then they could extend it to the other colonies, and they would be doing something. With reference to the flag waving business, it reminds me of the story of the poor widow. People sympathized with the poor widow, but when asked how much they sympathized,—when it came to a matter of dollars and cents—they had no sympathy at all. The manufacturers sympathize with the idea of British connection, they are patriots. until it comes to affect their pockets. But at that moment they say: 'I think we had better consider it, we will wave the flag, but we will not give anything in the way of a reduction of duty.' I wish the Government would consider the facts that I have placed before them—that the proper commission to appoint is one that will look into the cost of the different articles which the people have to consume. Give the matter publicity. If it costs $48 to make a binder, let the people know it. If it costs $100, is it not just as well to dispel the idea the people have that it costs so little to manufacture? Do not appoint such a commission as the one which has been recently appointed—a lot of Government officials dependent for their bread upon the Government. Does anybody expect they will make a report against the wishes of the people who are paying their salaries? That is not the kind of commission we want. We want an independent commission.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR—I am very anxious to understand what policy the hon. gentleman advocates. I am not sure whether he is in favour of absolute free trade or a preferential tariff with England.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—As far as I am concerned I would have a tariff that would give relief to the people who need relief in this country. Or in other words as they say out West 'I would put the saddle on the right horse.' If we have to raise a revenue in this country, let the people who can afford to pay it, do so. I would tax the luxuries, but so far as the ordinary farmer in the country is concerned, I would put his implements, used in tilling the soil, on the free list.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR—The hon. gentleman has not made his policy clear. Is he in favour of absolute free trade, or a preferential tariff?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have not said anything about absolute free trade. I say that I would reduce the duty, as far as I could on cotton goods, woollen goods, boots, shoes, agricultural implements, and sewing machines, and in some cases remove it entirely. If we required to raise revenue, I would put the duty on wines, liquors, cigars, silk shirts, and the automobiles in which these gentlemen ride around the country. I would give the people relief in that way. That would be found to reduce the cost of living. You will make the soil productive and the homes attractive, and the people would go back to them. But when you make a man pay $160 for a binder which costs the manufacturer $38, and $120 for a plough which cost originally $30, and $70 for a sewing machine which was manufactured for $12, and $120 for a typewriter which was made for $14, it is not right. No doubt, it is the same with boots and shoes. Gentlemen were travelling around the country with a magic lantern, two or three years ago, and somebody was paying for that magic lantern. Those gentlemen do not get suddenly rich without some cause. No man can get rich in a week, unless he invents something. A man might find some gold in the ground, and become suddenly wealthy, but following ordinary trade, when you find a man getting rich in two or three years, and manipulating stock and forming mergers—selling bogus stocks that did not cost five cents—there is a nigger in the fence somewhere. We should ascertain where that nigger is. The people are paying too much for what they consume. Put the saddle on the right horse and take the duty off the poor man, and place it on the rich.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—The Premier of Saskatchewan has made the following statement:

> Saskatchewan reaches the end of the year with her farming population in better position and in better spirits than was the case a year ago.

That is the statement of the Hon. Walter Scott. Is it correct?

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—It ought to be.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If Premier Scott were to write down and tell the hon. gentleman the whole country was going to the dogs would the hon. gentleman—

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton): And the Hon. A. L. Sifton made the following statement:

> Judged by every standard of the economist, Alberta exhibits a condition of prosperity. Nineteen hundred and thirteen has been one of the best years in this period.

Is that statement correct? These are two great leaders of the hon. gentleman's party.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If my hon. friend was Prime Minister of Saskatchewan would he write down and say the whole country was in a bad state. Saskatchewan has nothing to complain of. Between the provinces, we have raised nearly half a billion bushels of grain. We are complaining, not that our soil will not produce, not that our climate is not right, but that we cannot get what our grain is worth. We believe that, while the price of flour is going up by leaps and bounds, the price of grain is going down. We have to pay six cents a bushel on all the oats we export, and we are sending millions of bushels to the United States where we sent none before. The same remark applies to barley. We have a right to trade across the line as far as selling our produce is concerned, but we are unfairly taxed. We are complaining that the trades and combines are charging twice as much as they should for commodities. This Government has been in power two years. Will any hon. gentleman tell tell me what they have done in that period? The Hudson Bay railway was being built before they came into power. The contract was let. The road to The Pas was being built. All they did was take up two or three hundred men to Port Nelson They did not know what they were doing. In addition to taking men up there, they loaded a lot of material on ships and transported it to Hudson Bay, but they had to take it all back again.

What have they done with the tariff? Have they done anything with it? My hon. friend says they have built public works all over the country. We have a Minister of Militia building an armoury at every cross-road. How much have they increased the money given for the assistance of live stock in this country? Two hundred thousand odd has been given for the promotion of the live stock industry. How much has been devoted to the militia: About $18,000,000. Moreover, here is our Minister of Militia travelling around in gold lace, in an automobile, and a special train, and an army of stenographers, going all over the country. He must have a lot of them. People on the other side, seeing him travel with his escort, will say to themselves, 'Those people must be some nabobs, over in that country.' Do my hon. friends not think that money could be better spent in the interest of Canada? He is asking for this expenditure expecting some people are going to profit by it. Did hon. gentlemen ever hear of a resolution passed by farmers asking that an armoury be constructed? No. Did they ever ask for a new battalion? No, they never did, but these things are being done. I venture to say that next year they will have hard work to make the ship go, because our revenue will be reduced, judging by the shape business is in to-day. They have got rid of the surplus in a very short time. The last Government left a full treasury but it will be empty soon. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier assumed the reins of power, the treasury was empty, but he filled it up. Now the other party have dissipated the whole thing. The result will be that we will have soup kitchens and all that kind of thing, and it may be that they will have to declare martial law to preserve order. Now is the time to build railways when labour is cheap and people need the work, rather than to wait until times are good and people do not want work. The Government could accomplish a great deal if they reduced the tariff on articles consumed by the poor people, but as long as my hon. friends pat them on the back and tell them every thing is lovely and the goose hangs high, nothing will be done. I have tried to show hon. gentlemen what the West thinks about the high cost of living. It is not so much the commodities we eat, because the farmers raise these commodities, but when we buy dress goods or calicoes and other commodities we have to pay a big price. In conclusion, let the Government consult the different provinces and reduce the number of senators in this House. Give Ontario and Quebec the same representation as the other provinces. Why should they have twenty-four each and the western provinces have only six each? It will never satisfy the western country. If the hon. gentlemen would stop talking about the Government carrying out their promises and do something for the country the people would be benefited, and it would be better for all classes of the community.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—I am delighted with the brilliant speeches which we have heard this afternoon. I feel inspired, and I propose to withdraw my motion to adjourn in order that we may have the benefit of a few more of these eloquent speeches.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, January 27, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

REPORT OF SALISBURY AND ALBERTA RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a copy of the annual report made by the Salisbury and Albert Railway Company to the Railway Department.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no objection to the motion.

Motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a copy of the annual report made in January, 1913, by the Central Railway Company to the Railway Department.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no objection to the motion.

Motion was agreed to.

HEROIC CONDUCT OF CREW OF STEAMER JOHN CONN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS inquired:

That he will ask the leader of the Government in the Senate what steps the Government propose to take in recognition of the heroic conduct of Captain Adelbert L. McKinnon and crew of the little steamer John Conn and of his brother Captain J. Edgar McKinnon and crew of the steamer Cook, both of Westport, in rescuing the passengers and crew of the Royal mail steamer Cobequid, wrecked on Trinity Ledges, while on her maiden voyage from the West Indian Islands to St. John, N.B.?

Hon Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Steps were taken some days ago to ascertain the exact nature of the services rendered in each case, and, on this information being obtained, the Government will take into consideration the most suitable form of rewarding the parties referred to.

AGRICULTURAL AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved:

That the rule regarding the number of members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and rules 29 to 30 be suspended for the present, and that the names of the Honourable Messrs. Power, Forget, Douglas and Ross (Middleton), be added as members of the said committee and that the committee be authorized to meet while this honourable House is adjourned.

Three years ago, when the committee on Agriculture and Forestry was organized the first time, we undertook a very important work for the country at large. The committee invited experts on different agricultural farms, and in the different agricultural colleges of this country, to prepare papers on given subjects of agriculture, and to present them before the committee, with a view of printing those papers, and ultimately forming a work which could be consulted on all branches of agriculture. Valuable work was done during the first session, and I think some work during the subsequent session, but owing to the frequent adjournments of this honourable House, and the other works which occupied the House when sitting during the last two sessions, very little progress was made. It occurred to me that the committee could meet during the adjournment of the Senate and do good work. I inquired yesterday what honourable members of this House were likely to remain in Ottawa during the adjournment, and I desire, with the consent of the House, to move that the names of those gentlemen be added to the committee. It will enable the committee to have a quorum at all times. The chairman of the committee, the hon. gentleman from Russell, is residing in Ottawa. He can easily call the committee together, and I think it would be very important for that committee to proceed with the important work during the adjournment of the House.

VACANCIES IN THE STAFF OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I desire to make a formal motion with respect to the business of the House. It will be remembered that when His Honour the Speaker laid communications on the Table with respect to vacancies in the staff of the Senate, I gave the verbal notice that after the Committee on Internal Economy had been decided upon, I would make a motion with regard to the matter. I am not now going to move —unless it is the wish of the House—that the communications should be referred to the committee, but under Rule 24, it is provided that no notice is necessary for the purpose of dealing, at a future date, with any matter that affects the business of the House. I have the honour to move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Bostock:

That the communications of His Honour, the Speaker, with respect to the vacancies in the staff of the Senate, be taken into consideration at the next meeting of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further consideration of His Royal Highness the Governor General's speech on the occasion of the opening of the third session of the twelfth Parliament, and the motion of Colonel the Hon. Mr. Mason, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Thorne, that an humble address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General in answer thereto.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—I crave the indulgence of this House for a short time to make a few remarks on the Address, suggested to me by the different speakers who have preceded me. It is a subject of congratulation to this House that we have, in the addition to its members of the mover and seconder of the Address, such able accessions to this honourable body. The hon. gentleman from Toronto (Col. the Hon. Mr. Mason) has shown, in his wide grasp of affairs in discussing the paragraphs of the Address, that he fully understands the measures which will be submitted to us. This comes through his large experience in the financial world. Speaking for the Maritime provinces, and the seconder of the Address, I can say without fear of contradiction, that he is fully representative of the provinces by the sea, being one of our merchant princes, and captains of industry. Without wishing to offend partisan feeling, I believe that if appointments of this kind are made in the future, we will have no reason to declaim against want of intellect in this Chamber. Men of this character will be a credit to the Senate of Canada.

I take the opportunity of giving full endorsation to the remarks of hon. gentlemen who have gone before me, in expressing heartfelt pleasure, not only of the legislative chambers of Canada but of the people of Canada without regard to class, creed or nationality, at the improvement in the health of Her Royal Highness, the Duchess of Connaught. We can also assure His Royal Highness and he has had that assurance before this, that when during the trying times of last summer the Duchess was under the surgeon's knife every heart went out to him in feelings of filial regret at the position he occupied. We are doubly glad that he is able to come back to us and fill out, we hope, the full term, and possibly a second term in the position which he has so ably occupied. We revere him not only because of his kingly birth, but also for his kindly attributes of head and heart, which has ever characterized those who rule over this empire, with so much justice at the present time.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. the leader of the Opposition—if we may refer to a member of this House as being in opposition. The hon. member from Middlesex is always ornate and eloquent, and his well turned periods are a treat to any one who is a student of the English language. The hon. gentleman has had vast and varied experience in legislative halls, and he is able to give expression to the feelings within him in a way that is well calculated to carry conviction, even though he may be sometimes inconsistent with himself, and his conclusions may be clouded in sophistry. The hon. gentleman has seen fit to go outside of the Address, and very far afield in discussing its paragraphs. He has seen fit to resurrect the corpses of last session—corpses that he made such by the action of his supporters in this hon. body. He could not see the splendid optimism that characterized this Address, an optimism fully justified by the condition of this country at a time of world-wide depression. He could not miss a chance to have a fling at the Government of the day. He must needs go back to the work of last session—the nefarious work I may call it of this hon. body—in the destruction of the Naval Bill and the emasculation of the Highways Bill to an extent that made it impossible of acceptance by its originators and by the House of Commons.

The hon. gentleman was somewhat inconsistent with himself, and I mean, for a moment, to give some attention to that aspect of the case. You will remember that he laboured seriously and laboured hard to prove to this hon. body the unconstitutionality of the Highways Bill. He based his argument of its being unconstitutional on the fact that roads and highways under the British North America Act are relegated to the authority of the provinces. Just for a moment think of the Bill that preceded the Highways Bill. I refer to the Agriculture Instruction Bill of 1913. You will admit that education is just as strongly and forcibly relegated to the authority of the provinces and given to the provinces by this same British North America Act. What do we find? The Agriculture Instruction Bill having a provision affecting education—the voting of money for instruction in veterinary medicine—came to this House, and we saw it go through this House with the approbation of the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, and the whole body of the Opposition on the other side, without a dissenting voice. I want to ask the hon. member from Middlesex—and I am sorry that he is not in his place to-day—but some of those who voted for him can probably answer for him, by what right had the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, who voted for the Agriculture Bill, to vote against the Highways Bill? That is something I do not think it is possible for hon. gentlemen opposite to answer, with authority, logic, or reason. Both Bills are on a par. The parity is so striking between them, that nobody can justify himself for voting in favour of the Agricultural Instruction Bill and voting against the Highways Bill. That is one of the inconsistencies I charge against the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, and against every member of the House who voted against the Highways Bill. The Highways Bill cannot be said to have passed without discussion. For several years it was a plank in the platform of the right hon. the Prime Minister. It was discussed on every platform during the last election, and the Highways Bill was justified by the return of the present Government with a large majority. This House claims to be the custodian of the rights of the people; it claims to be the safeguard of the people against improper legislation. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if it is not one of the duties of the House of Commons to be responsible for the revenues of the country. Is the House of Commons under any circumstances, allowed to have a second party come in and take charge of the disbursements of the revenues of the country, to the exclusion of that House of Commons? I think you will all admit that it is a fundamental basis of our constitution that the House of Commons, and the House of Commons alone, is the safeguard of the funds of the Dominion of Canada, and that no other legislative body has any right to interfere with the expenditure. In the amendment to the Highways Bill—a Bill most popular in the country, and I can speak for the Maritime provinces—a Bill about which a large number of people criticise the Senate for having interfered with; in that Bill we endeavoured by the authority of this House to tell the House of Commons how the public money should be expended. Could any self-respecting House accept such an amendment?

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have done the same thing the year before with the Agricultural Bill. Last year the Government did this thing, which my hon. friend thinks impossible—they accepted our view.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—That does not justify hon. gentlemen in acting unconstitutionally last year.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not justify the Government either.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—When you allowed the Agricultural Instruction Bill to pass you were acting unconstitutionally, yet you say you were not acting unconstitutionally when you rejected the Highways Bill. The hon. members from the Maritime provinces, and the hon. gentleman from Halifax knows very well the popularity of that Highways Bill in the Maritime provinces. You know also that the House of Commons could not allow a body, an irresponsible body like this, to control the expenditure of the public revenue. He knows the fundamental basis of the British constitution is that the House of Commons is the custodian, the safeguard, and sole one to say the conditions under which money shall be expended.

The hon. gentleman from Middlesex resurrected the Naval Bill also. It looks to me, as has been remarked by somebody before me, that those two Bills are troubling the conscience of my hon. friend. I am not surprised at that. Hon. gentlemen opposite have a stake in this country and have an interest in this country just as well as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. My hon. friends opposite are, I believe, just as loyal as ourselves, although they are misled. If hon. gentlemen opposite were not actuated—and I say it with all respect—by partisan motive, I verily believe that nine-tenths of this Chamber would have voted for that Naval Bill.

There is no doubt about it. The motives that actuated the hon. gentlemen on the other side are to be found in the other Chamber. The reason the Agriculture Bill went through, and the Highways Bill did not, is because in the other House the Highways Bill passed by a large majority, and the Agriculture Bill was defeated. Word was sent over to vote down the Highways Bill, and it was consequently voted down. When I was appointed to this body I was given to understand that we would act in a semi-judicial capacity; that we would be somewhat in the position of judges of the courts of the country; that we were supposed to divest ourselves of our political partisanship—that we were removed above the people, to sit in our place in this Chamber, and judge all Bills free from political bias. To my surprise when I was here a few months, I found the caucus as much at work in the precincts of this House as in the other Chamber. I saw political log rolling, which is supposed to be au fait in the House of Commons, just as prevalent here as in the other House. If a person comes here under the impression that we are to act in a semi-judicial capacity, the sooner that person becomes undeceived, the better. I have seen evidence of political partisanship in this House, just as strong as in the House of Commons. When the leader of the Government was speaking the other day I found staid, sober and elderly gentlemen interrupting him from start to finish. The other side of this House was more like a bear garden, than a branch of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Nonsense.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—Hon. gentlemen know that my hon. friend did not speak more than three or four sentences at a time before being interrupted by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, and the senior member for Toronto. Every movement in this House savours of partisan bias. I am sorry to see this, because it is a bad example for the younger members who have come in here, and who are liable to be affected by the example.

An hon. MEMBER—The hon. gentleman has caught the infection already.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—I may have caught the infection. It is contagious as well as infective.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand that under the rules of this honourable House it is not permitted to make any insinuation against the motives of hon. gentlemen. I would like to raise the point of order, as to whether it is proper to persist, as was done in this House last session, and the present session, to attribute motives to a large majority of members of this House. I ask the ruling of the Chair, as to whether the hon. member is in order in accusing a large number of members in this House of being guided by political motives in rejecting a Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And partisan bias.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—And instructed to do it.

The SPEAKER—There is a well known principle that no imputation is to be made by any member of this House against any co-member in the same Chamber.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That is not the point. I ask whether it is in order for any member of this House to accuse a majority of members of being actuated by unworthy motives and political bias in rejecting a Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED — Before His Honour makes any pronouncement on that question, I should like to ask my hon. friend to define more clearly what his point of order is. I am not prepared to say it is an unworthy motive for any member to be actuated by the views of his political party, if that is what my hon. friend means. If we have reached that point when the presumption is, because we see a member belonging to a political party, that in following or adhering to the views of that party, he is doing something unworthy, it certainly is taking an advance position which I have never before heard taken in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—Is it not the rule that every motion ought to be written, so that we may know exactly what has been said. Words spoken may be forgotten very soon. I think the hon. gentleman should put his motion in writing.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am raising a point of order. It is not so much because I object to the remarks which have been made, and not because these remarks are being repeated all the time, but because I think it is derogatory to the dignity of this House to be characterized all the time before the country as a partisan body. It is an unworthy reflection to be made on any member of this honourable House to say that he is actuated——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—By what?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—By political bias against his better judgment, not to vote on Bills on their merits, but to vote for the purpose of serving his own party. That is the accusation, and in my humble opinion it is not in order to make accusations of that kind. It is the point on which I desire to have a ruling.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I should like also to say that I think the hon. gentleman's remarks reflect on the dignity of the House, and on the dignity of His Honour the Speaker. Only a few moments ago the hon. member referred to the conduct of this House yesterday as a 'bear garden.' We have a record, we have a 'Hansard,' and I do not think it is well to advertise, Mr. Speaker, that you are not able to control this House and keep it within decent bounds, because the term bear garden as applied to the conduct of this House is not a fair characterization.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not deserved.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think the conduct of this House yesterday could be characterized as a bear garden. I think my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) was quite agreeable to have the interruptions made; the questions were asked and answered.

The SPEAKER—I think it is rather late to bring this matter up in the discussion to-day, when the hon. member let it pass yesterday.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No, that is not the point. The hon. gentleman has just made the statement that the conduct of this House represented a bear garden.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—I made no such statement. I said the way the hon. gentlemen acted was more like a bear garden than the Senate of Canada.

The SPEAKER—I think my position is rather difficult. The hon. gentleman says I have no control over this House. That may be, but it is not my fault.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I did not say that. I claim that you have been misrepresented by the hon. gentleman, that the House is not like a bear garden, and that he should not say that it was. Mr. Speaker, you had and have control of the House.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman says that I have been misrepresented. How is that?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—By the statement that you have allowed the House to become a bear garden.

The SPEAKER—I think the best thing the hon. gentleman can do is to observe the rules of debate, and impute no motives. There are some things we cannot prevent hon. gentlemen from saying. Is it making an imputation to say members are partisan in this House? I cannot find any fault with that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are all guilty.

The SPEAKER—If it is a partisan House, I am the first to suffer by it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—I think it is hardly fair for old members of this House to take advantage of a novice in this manner, and interrupt him in the middle of his speech. It is very apt to throw one, even to the manor born, a little off his nerve. Under the circumstances I do not think the hon. gentlemen should take advantage of the privilege to interrupt me, and as I believe, just for interruption's sake.

The hon. gentlemen who voted against the Navy Bill took a serious responsibility. The hon. member from Middlesex thought fit the other day, with his new found zeal, to exclaim for a navy, to show that an emergency not only existed last year, but exists all the time, and further, that it was not the part of statesmen to wait until the thunder of the guns was at their doors, before building ships. That is precisely the position we took last year, when an emergency was shown to exist. The First Lord of the Admiralty in his memorandum, which is now an old story with the whole of us, set forth in detail why the conditions that existed were a peril to the empire. If they were a peril to the empire—and who should know better than the First Lord of the Admiralty—what was our first duty? Was it not to 'supplement with our ships the British navy, as speedily as possible,' to use the words of the resolution. How long would it take us to lay down docks, and to build ships in Canada. Hon gentlemen know full well that we could not turn out dreadnoughts inside of seven or eight years. Even then we would have to import three-quarters of the parts from the mother country. We have not a man, at the present time, able to drive a rivet. We have none of the mechanics or architects who know how to build ships. We have not one man who is able to superintend the building of a dreadnought. The only way is not to wait until the emergency is there, so that you could put your finger on it, but to have ships built as speedily as possible, and put them in the firing line where they will remain as a nucleus for a Canadian navy when the Prime Minister brings down his permanent policy. This he will do before two years are past. Do not worry. The permanent policy will be brought down. The Prime Minister will see that his pledge to the people of Canada is kept, and that our ships will be in the firing line, at the time they will be required, notwithstanding the misguided action of this honourable House. A self-respecting colony as we are, a colony which has attained the dimensions in the world's trade which Canada has—having between one-sixth and one-seventh of the whole of the marine carrying trade of the world—a colony that is willing to hang by the apron strings of the mother country, that is willing to put a tax on the overtaxed artisan and labourer of England, is certainly not doing its duty to the empire. Hon. gentlemen who vote for a policy such as that are not exponents of the best views of the majority of the people of the country. The resurrection of the navy question by the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, was, I believe, ill-advised. If I were in his position I would feel like covering up, like scratching up the dust and hiding my head in the sand, so that I could not look at the face of the Canadian people.

The hon. gentleman from Prince Albert enunciated a new policy. I must admit that when questioned by the hon. gentleman from Antigonish, he said he was not responsible. He admitted he did not speak for his leader—in fact he said he had no leader. But I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, and ask this House, if the Liberal party to-day is pursuing the same course it did before 1896, one man expounding one policy in the Maritime provinces, another man advocating another policy in Quebec, and a third policy being advocated in Ontario—and the breezy westerner saying what he likes. The hon. gentleman said yesterday: 'give us free trade.' Cut the duty off foods, woollens, calicoes, boots, shoes, binders and what not. Then what would be left? Is it the policy of the Liberal party to pull up the national policy by the roots, that policy which they nurtured and cared for, for 15 years? Is it their policy to have absolute free trade in this country? If so we want to know it. We do not want a man to stand up in his place as the exponent of that policy in this Chamber, and when he is taken to book for it, to say that he is a free man, that he can only speak for himself, that he has no leader. The hon. member from Prince Albert can go on the platform and make a speech in a demagogic spirit, but he should be held responsible for his utterances—and the gentleman on whose shoulders lies the responsibility for the appointment of the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert should be held responsible for him—when he expounds such a policy. Free food is a very good catch cry, but why did not the leader of the Opposition have confidence in the free food proposition by embodying it in a motion, instead of making this colourless motion before the House of Commons? Why did he not state manfully, why did he not state unequivocally just what he meant by moving it as an amendment? Listen to the motion which he made. The right hon. leader made the following motion:

> We regret to represent to Your Royal Highness that in the gracious speech with which you have met Parliament, while it is admitted that business is in a depressed condition, yet there is no indication on the part of your advisers of determination to take any steps towards relieving such situation.

Business is in a depressed condition. We all admit that it is in a depressed condition, the world over. But is parliamentary interference, or interference with the tariff, or the trade of the country, going to cure the depression? Is there any country in the world that has stood the depression as well as Canada? Is there any country which has shown a pro rata increase in trade, such as Canada has? I think the answer must be emphatically no. And it would be very bad policy to alter trade conditions at the present time, when everything is in such an unsettled state. There is another thing I have to find fault with my hon. friends opposite, and I have to find fault, here, with many others also. I speak of the practice of preaching blue ruin, and destroying the credit of the country. I sat in the gallery of the House of Commons last year, and heard one member of the Opposition gloat over an exaggerated statement of the number of people out of employment in this country at the present time. I want hon. members in this House, and gentlemen in the other House, to refer back to 1907-8, when conditions, according to the Minister of Labour at that time in the trade reviews, were just about as they are now. I want to ask the hon. gentlemen in all sincerity, did they hear a gentleman in the Conservative opposition of that day preaching blue ruin, and advertising the country as they see it advertised to-day, by members on the opposite side of the House. I think I can state, without fear of contradiction, that there was not a word said then. Instead of advertising that our country was in a depressed state, our men stood side by side, and did not advertise the fact that people were out of employment, and that we were running behind. The Trade Review showed the conditions then were worse than they are now. The Government of the day had faith in the recuperative powers of the country. The Opposition had faith as well, and the Opposition—far from advertising the fact, and endeavouring to make political capital out of it—hushed the thing up. As patriotic citizens, the Opposition waited until the revival of trade conditions put us in the vanguard again. In the face of the so-called hard times, if there is one item of the many things promised by the Government of Canada, for which they should be canonized, it is the Agricultural Instruction Bill. We have a revival of interest in farming, we have the best of our citizens, young men and women, going up to Guelph to the agricultural colleges, taking an interest in scientific farming, and harkening to the cry of 'back to the land,' from which we may expect increased production and a relief from this high food cry. It is the only relief there can possibly be.

The Government is going further; it is giving rural mail delivery, and bringing men on the outskirts of civilization within reach of the newspapers, and of everyday life. They are giving us parcel post. That will bring the producer close to the consumer, cutting out the middleman, thereby reducing prices to the extent of the middleman's profit. Hon. gentlemen are well aware of this condition of affairs. The hon. gentleman from Prince Albert preaches blue ruin; coming from a place where there were many million bushels of wheat produced last year, he preaches the fact that the farmers are going behind. With reference to that statement, you heard the excerpt from the statement of the hon. leader of the Government in Alberta, and the hon. leade- of the Government in Saskatchewan. The hon. gentleman from Prince Albert said the Government had done nothing for the West. What about the terminal elevator at Port Arthur, which cost a million and a quarter? What about the elevator at Moosejaw which will cost just as much? What about the elevator at Saskatoon? What about the Hudson Bay railway, over which the Liberal party fooled for fifteen years, and had not even made a start when they went out of power?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The contract was let, and it is being built on the same contract to-day.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—Yes, on the eve of an election. They were not in power to see the contract fulfilled. It is only when the contract was taken over by the present Government that the work was commenced. A great deal has been said about the terminals at Port Nelson. It has been stated that schooners cannot get within fifteen miles of the port. That may or may not be true. I do not think the hon. gentleman from Halifax would like to vouch for that. He is not in a position to make that statement. I submit it is more reasonable to come to the conclusion that a man of the rugged honesty of purpose—whatever else may be said of him—of Frank Cochrane, Minister of Railways, backed by his engineers, would not build railway terminals at a place where vessels could not get within fifteen miles. I submit that it is unreasonable to believe anything else but that the port may easily be made available for the terminal of that railway. That is one of the things he has done for the West. It is a port which will be opened for four months of the year—I speak advisedly, because I have it from the lips of men who have been there—that they can take grain and land it in England at a cost away below the present rates. I understand that Hudson bay is teeming with fish, that Newfoundland vessels can go in there and load in two or three days. Think of the industries that can be worked up there, when a schooner can load up and come to the terminal at Port Nelson, and ship the fish to the Northwest, where you can hardly get a decent fish to-day. I think in the consideration of these questions nothing but harmony should prevail, unless we travel outside, and put up a straw man to knock him down.

One paragraph of the Address reads as follows:

> As a result of the recent decennial census the representation of the different provinces must be adjusted, as required by the British North America Act and a Bill will be introduced for that purpose.

That is something over which there should be no quarrel. We should be fair in this matter, and speaking for the Liberal-Conservative party, or for myself specially, I think it will be fair. I look for an honest, fair redistribution in so far as it can be done. Of course we all know it is a difficult matter, for there is so much bound up in the representation of Canada at the present time that there is a heavy burden resting on the shoulders of those responsible. As you are aware the Maritime provinces stand to lose a large portion of their representation. In the beginning we had forty members in a House, I think, of 186. If we are redistributed on the lines of the British North America Act and held to the letter of the Act, we will have thirty members in the House of 234, or instead of a quarter of what the Maritime provinces had in the beginning, we will have only an eighth in the new redistribution.

Now I contend that it never was the intention of the framers of the British North America Act that the representation of any province in Canada should fall below its original strength. At that time there was no thought of any reduction, at least in the representation of the four original provinces of Confederation. They were all such optimists that they looked forward to increases of population, but never to any reduction. They could not contemplate or foresee the remarkable growth of the West or even of the province of Quebec. Montreal, in the near future, will have a population as large as that which Quebec province has to-day. We are equal partners with the larger provinces, in the land which has been handed over to them. We were equal partners in the lands in the Northwest Territories purchased with the money of Canada, and given to the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The lands are not handed over to Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—For the purposes of representation they belong to those provinces. They will get their representation increased, if settlers go on those lands and settle there. We have no quarrel with that; we are willing to-day, as we were willing in the past, to pay our share for the purchase of the Northwest, and to build the Canadian Pacific railway in order to give the western territories the means of communication which made them what they are to-day. We are proud of having helped make the Northwest by our money, our blood, and our brawn. At the same time the handing over of those lands to the larger provinces destroys the unit on which our representation is based. A province whose area has been increased beyond what it was when Confederation took place, destroys the original unit of representation. Prince Edward Island was not in a position to get any of those lands, none of the lands being contiguous to us. We were necessarily circumscribed, and must always be circumscribed. I contend, in view of the disturbance caused by the handing over of those lands to the provinces west of us, that the original representation fixed at Confederation, should be continued to the Maritime provinces.

But Prince Edward Island has a special claim of its own. In 1864 the first conference was held in Charlottetown, the capital of Prince Edward Island—and I may here notify hon. gentlemen that the semi-centennial of the holding of that conference is to be celebrated this year in Charlottetown. On that occasion I hope to see as many of the members of this House present as can possibly attend. At that conference in 1864 our people absolutely refused to enter the Union unless they were allowed six members in the House of Commons. They said, unless we have an irreducible minimum we must necessarily be swallowed up by the larger provinces. Then the conference met at Quebec, the same year. When the resolutions of Union were adopted, the representatives of Prince Edward Island refused to enter the Union unless six representatives were conceded. I will read the following extracts from the speeches of the Island delegates at that conference to show, definitely, their reasons for standing out.

Mr. Haviland:

Prince Edward Island would rather be out of the Confederation than consent to this motion. We would have no status, only five members out of one hundred and ninety-four would give the island no position.

Mr. Palmer:

Representation by population is not applicable when a certain number of provinces are throwing up their self-government and individuality. When a Colony surrenders that right she would have something commensurate in the Confederation. Why give up so great certainties where we have only a feeble voice? I never understood that any proposition at Charlottetown was to be binding as to representation by population.

Colonel Grey:

I am instructed by my co-delegate to say that the provision of five members is unsatisfactory.

It was stated in the other House, and I can make the statement here, that one of the reasons why Newfoundland has refused to enter Confederation, is the treatment that Prince Edward Island has received both in representation, and in failure to fulfil the terms of Confederation.

The following extracts from speeches delivered in the Legislature of Prince Edward Island in 1865 represent the attitude of both political parties in the province at that time:

The Honourable J. C. Pope, Prime Minister, afterwards Minister of Marine, said:

If the relative circumstances of Canada and this island rendered a Union practicable, the evident injustice of the terms [illegible] the Quebec Conference would prevent their being ratified by the Legislature of this island. Without admitting the principle of representation according to population under all circumstances to be sound, it is, in the opinion of this House, particularly objectionable as applied to this island in connection with Canada, taking into consideration that the number of our inhabitants is and must continue comparatively small, owing to the fact that we have no Crown lands, mines, minerals, or other resources sufficient to induce immigrants to settle here, and that we never can expect to become to any extent a manufacturing people in consequence of our navigation being closed for nearly half the year, and all trade and communication with other countries stopped.

And later, in the same debate, Mr. Pope is reported thus:

Among these objections I may mention the principle of representation by population. A very simple calculation will show that the adoption of this as a standard would entitle the city of London to send to the British House of Commons no less than seventy representatives, and the city of Montreal in the Confederate Parliament would have a representation greater than that of this island. Its statistics warrant the belief that in a few years the population will be so increased by the influx of the tide of immigration that the island would lose in the halls of legislation even the small voice which she might raise at her entrance into the Union.

Honourable Mr. Hensley:

The terms of the report before us are, in my opinion, very unfavourable to this island. On the scale of representation proposed, we would be without the slighest influence in the United Parliament. It is true that, if we went into the proposed Union, we would have no right to expect as large a number of representatives as either of the lower provinces, but then why would we throw away the independence which we now enjoy?

Mr. Howlan, who was subsequently a member of this House, said:

Representation by population might be very well for Canada herself, but in a general Union of the Colonies, it would operate injuriously for the Maritime provinces as they could not expect to protect their interests when they would have to contend with one hundred of a clear majority over their own representation. This principle would give the city of Montreal with its one hundred thousand inhabitants one representative more than this island. Quite different is the representation of Great Britain, for while London has about the same population as Scotland, that city has only sixteen members in the House of Commons, while Scotland has fifty-three. But it may be argued that as our population increases our representation will increase. This is very doubtful. Indeed, under the operation of the 20th and 21st clauses of the report it seems probable that we might lose our representation altogether. Lower Canada is always to have sixty-five members, and the representation of the other colonies is to be arranged every ten years so as to give each the same ratio to population as she will then possess. Now should the population of lower Canada increase more rapidly than that of this island, which is almost certain to be the case, our representation would decrease, and we would be left perhaps without a member at all.

Mr. Duncan:

As to the General Legislature I consider the representation in it allowed to this island unfair and unjust. The five representatives allotted to us in the lower House would not give the colony much influence there; but as our population will not increase so rapidly as that of Canada, there is a prospect, through the operation of one clause in the report, that our five representatives would dwindle down to three. Taking all these points into consideration, therefore, it is clear to me that we have nothing to gain and much to lose by adopting the Quebec scheme. (Debates Prince Edward Island Legislature, 1865, p. 65, et seq.)

The above extracts represent the attitude of both political parties in the province at that time.

That is what stares us in the face now. When the Conference met in Quebec, the delegates from Prince Edward Island met the delegates from Canada, with the result that I have mentioned. The Canadian Government continued to be desirous of rounding off Confederation with the addition of Prince Edward Island, but no definite progress was made until the year 1873, when the Government at last conceded six members, as the following correspondence shows:

Telegram from Robert P. Haythorne to Lieutenant-Governor Robinson, dated February 26th, 1873:

Held two conferences. Increase of annual allowance. Probable yield six representatives.

Telegram from Robert P. Haythorne to Lieutenant-Governor Robinson, March 6th, 1873:

Highly probable get six representatives; try and send reply council as soon as possible.

Telegram from Lieutenant-Governor Robinson to Robert P. Haythorne:

Council will concur in advising dissolution. We hope six representatives will be conceded.

Telegram to the Hon. Edward Palmer from Robt. P. Haythorne, March 6th, 1873:

Except modifications stated and interest difference old debt, better terms allowed. Six members conceded.

Hon. gentlemen will see from this correspondence that it was evidently the intention of both parties to this contract, that Prince Edward Island should have an irreducible minimum of six members. We stood out from 1867 to 1873 on account of it, and, as you will see by the telegram of the Prime Minister to the governor of the province, we got the six. Unfortunately by some oversight or mistake, in writing out the memorandum embodying the terms, the document did not in clear and unequivocable language provide for the irreducible representation agreed upon. The word 'readjusted' was used instead of 'increased,' and that unfortunate word has put us in the position of being reduced from six to three representatives in the House of Commons. No one would like to see the autonomy of a province of the Dominion reduced to that extent, especially when it is due to an error that is admitted by both parties to the contract. We have no status in law: the written contract is there. The matter was before the Privy Council and we are obliged to submit to its decision, but the highest authority of the country, which made the mistake, should be in a position to correct it. I verily believe that there is not a member of this House, or of the House of Commons, that would not like to see Prince Edward Island given the six members which was promised at Confederation. There is another point, and that is this—that one of the terms of Confederation was that we should have continuous steam communication, winter and summer, with the mainland, and so link us with the railway system of Canada. I am sorry to say that this condition of the contract has never been fulfilled up to the present day. It is only now that an honest effort is being made to live up to the contract. Think of what that has meant to us in the forty years that we have been in the Union. How could we expect to keep our population, or to establish industries, without having continuous communication between the island and the mainland? How could we expect a normal development? How could we hope to keep up with the rapid strides being made by the other provinces of the Dominion? The Federal Government defaulted in their part of the contract, in a way that has caused us loss of population; it could not be otherwise. And now they turn around and want to penalize us because of their own default. Would that be just dealing as between man and man, not to speak of dealing between a great Dominion like this, and one of its weaker provinces? I think every one will admit the justice of giving proper representation to Prince Edward Island, and restoring its contemplated irreducible minimum. Then, when that is done, we will be able to take our place beside the best of the provinces, and you will have a contented people as one of the links of this Confederation, and an autonomous province which, now, is threatened with destruction. You will cease to hear the cry of distress which has been raised ever since we entered Confederation, both in the House of Commons and in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I am quite sure the sympathy of the House will be extended to Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman has recited to us the position in which the island is placed. He certainly will not charge the Opposition with being responsible for that condition. I am not quite sure that the admission of Prince Edward Island into Confederation has changed its geographical position; nor am I sure that when it gets its car ferry, and easier access to the mainland, he can keep people on the island. I know that the province is in a prosperous condition, but the sympathy of the House must go out to Prince Edward Island, after the manner in which its grievance has been placed before the Senate. I should like to say to the hon. gentleman that, if the representatives of the island at the Conference had acted somewhat in the same manner that the Senate had acted in dealing with the Highways Bill; if when they had this matter under consideration they had written into the Bill the rights of the people instead of being content with the understanding; if they had insisted that within the four corners of the contract, the understanding should be clearly stated, then the island would not have to encounter the difficulty which he has described.

I have not taken any part in the debate on the Address, and now I find that everybody is anxious to get away. I deprecate personally the unseemly desire of many hon. members to leave the capital almost as soon as they get here. Their desire is to be away from their duties, and yet, always to get their indemnity. If anything lessens the dignity of the Senate in the eyes of the people, it is because a seat in the Senate is regarded as practically a sinecure. There seems to be a desire to stay in Ottawa the shortest possible time, and then go off and attend to private business, and get the benefit of what we are entitled to as senators. In one respect it may be all right—when there is no business to be done—but people make their own comments when they learn that we come here and stay two or three days, and then take a long vacation. In that way we are doing much more harm to the reputation of the Senate than by the rejecting of Bills which originate in the lower House.

I have been charged here by no less important a member of the Senate than the leader of the House, with having done things as a member of the Senate which I absolutely deny. I want to put myself right before the Senate, and the country, in regard to the position I have taken on matters which have been brought to the attention of the House, and of which I stand accused.

In the first place I should compliment the mover and the seconder of the Address on the speeches they have delivered. I am quite in accord with all that has been said in relation to the illness of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught, and without dwelling further upon that matter, I may say that the loyalty of this country to the Crown of England and the uplifting of the empire is as great and we are as close to that interest, as is Buckingham Palace itself.

The Address as a whole contains little of importance. It is a kind of political kindergarten menu. While we are supposed to be debating the Address many matters extraneous to the Address have been discussed. The last speaker disliked to have his graveyard disturbed. He hated to have the corpses the Government failed to bury, the Emergency and the Highways Bills, exposed to view. He felt it was not proper that we should go into his cemetery and bring them here. There was in the Address a reference to tariff conditions and the existing depression, but not to any large extent. My hon. friends said that it would be wrong to 'unsettle unsettled conditions.' Whether it is wrong to disturb unsettled conditions or not, I am at a loss to understand the leader of the House when he says that if you reduce the tariff you cannot lessen the high cost of living. He referred to the experience of the United States since the tariff has been removed from imports of natural products, and told us that although they were buying cattle in Canada and the Argentine, the price of beef had gone up. But if they had not got the cattle from those countries, the question is how high would the price of beef have gone. Does the hon. gentleman imagine that prices have increased as the supply increased? Does he suppose that the law of supply and demand does not operate in such matters?

Reference has been made to the mandate given to the Government in the last election. I do not believe that a similar mandate would be given to-day if an appeal were made to the people. What was the cry of the Conservative party in 1911? It was to let well enough alone. After fifteen years of prosperity in this country they raised that cry and led the people to believe that they were well off under existing conditions, and that they should not make a change. Would they be told to-day to leave well enough alone? Times have changed since the last election. There would be a different condition of affairs in Canada today if reciprocity had been given to the people. New Brunswick supported reciprocity, and in Nova Scotia they voted for reciprocity. The Conservative party got no mandate from the people of those provinces in that respect. I claim that if the conditions which exist to-day had prevailed then, there would have been a very different mandate given by the people of all Canada.

Another matter which was brought up was in respect to our National Transcontinental railway. We are asked to believe that there has been no disposition on the part of the present Government to change the character of that road. They tell us that the velocity grades on the road will not harm it. I am not willing to accept that view until we learn by experience that velocity grades will not damage the railways. These same engineers put velocity grades into railways in our part of the country that ran the cost of construction to over three times the amount of the estimates placed before Parliament. These same engineers said it would cost only a small amount to run the lines through the centre of the province, and it turns out that it is costing three times as much as they estimated. I am unwilling, therefore, to accept the opinions of the engineers in respect to this road until we have had some experience of how the change will work out.

I want to bring to the notice of the House the question of the Highways Bill, which was said to be rejected by the Senate on two occasions.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Amended.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Amended. Amended on two occasions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman was right in the first instance.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—No, because I am going to explain why the action of the Senate was not a rejection of the Bill. We were told in the first place that we ought to accept the promises made by the Government because they were given in all sincerity. When the Bill came before this House it contained no clause recognizing the rights of the different provinces throughout the Dominion. It was thought best by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—not because they were Liberals, but because it is the duty of the Senate to stand for the people regardless of party—to see that the Bill was amended to carry out the understanding of the Government as stated in the House of Commons. The Senate stands here between the servant and the master and its duty is to exercise some judgment as to the character of the mandate that the Government of this country may receive from the people. The Senate stands between the people and the Government and interprets the mandate that the people give the Government in respect to the administration of public affairs. When that measure came to this House it was felt that there was no one thing which more closely affected the producers in this country than the roads, and when the Prime Minister announced that these moneys were to be divided between all the provinces in the Union, we all believed that the promise would be carried out by the Government. We found no fault with the aid given for the improvement of highways. The Minister of Railways who introduced the Bill in the House of Commons confirmed the statement made by the Premier and we all thought that we could accept the minister's word, but we felt it necessary to insert that promise in the Bill so that whoever might be in the Government of Canada these moneys would be divided among the provinces according to the population. I presume we have all read the Solicitor General's speech delivered in the other Chamber two or three days ago in respect to this Highways Bill. He made a close argument as to its constitutionality, and he said, 'I reject the amendment to clause 4 because it disables the Government from spending that money by any other rule than the hard and fast rule of expenditure in proportion to population.' Now that is just what we desired to have in that Bill and that is what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways said was the intention of the Government—to divide the appropriation among the provinces according to population. Yet we are told this year that the Bill was left in that form so that this Government would not be bound to divide the money according to population, but according to their own sweet will. Therefore, I think the Senate was acting in the interest of the people of Canada and I am perfectly willing to abide by the judgment of the people on the subject. The other night the leader of this House made an eloquent speech on that question. He travelled the by-roads and described their condition. He spoke of the mud holes and the difficulty the farmers had in getting their produce to market. Was that the way he spoke when he presented that Bill? Did he tell the House that the object of the Bill was to help the farmer by improving the by-roads in order that they might reach market more readily? Let me read what the hon. gentleman said to the Senate last year:

If they will observe the language of the preamble of the Bill, they will find that this is not a local undertaking. This has not for its object the improvement of roads in any particular municipality or group of municipalities. It is not intended for a moment that the assistance should be given to the ordinary highway in a local sense.

Now what does that say? Is there any reference to the farmer's cart sticking in mud holes on the highways? Is there any reference to the ordinary farmer going to market with potatoes and eggs and other produce in that language that I have quoted? The intention then was that we should build a great national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, such a road as would be used by people with automobiles and not by the farmer who wished to get to the market. I go further and say that it was not the intention, in my judgment to aid the provinces to meet their local needs, and in confirmation of that I will read further what the hon. gentleman says:

I maintain that while highways in their local sense are peculiarly provincial undertakings, that this is more than a provincial undertaking. This is a interprovincial and national undertaking and does not come within the class of cases referred to by my hon. friends.

Is there anything plainer than that, and yet the hon. leader of the House accused the Senate of being partisan and told us that the Senate has deprived the farmers of an opportunity to have their roads improved. It was not the intention of this Government that the people in the provinces should have the opportunity of spending the money appropriated. I do not hesitate to say that there was a nigger in the wood pile and the leader of the House has already opened up the cracks in the fence showing the nigger in the wood pile which led the Government to introduce this Bill.

They left it in the hands of these apostles of purity who know all about underground construction, and are able to make it more effective than ordinary campaign literature. When we come to the Bill, as it was brought to our notice this year by my hon. friend, he did not tell us about the national highway, or anything about these great roads from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but he said:—

This Bill was conceived with the idea of assisting the rural communities of Canada.

Last year it was not the rural communities. Now, however, he has no Bill at all.

It is in the graveyard. They have hidden it away. They had it to use in the country, to tell the people what they proposed to do. Last year it was not for the rural districts of Canada; this year my hon. friend accuses us of rejecting the Bill, and tells us that the Bill which he said was not for rural districts of Canada last year—

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The hon. gentleman said:

It is not intended for a moment that assistance should be given to the ordinary highway.

The ordinary highway to a man in our country is the ordinary highway you get to any part or place in the district throughout the province. That is just what the Bill was not designed to assist last year. This year they have run away from the Bill, and my hon. friend has a wonderful desire to serve the interests of the poor farmer whose cart is in the mud. He goes further and he says:

When a farmer is transporting his product to the market and he finds himself sunk in the mud to the hubs of the wheel.

What about the constitutional question raised by the leader of the Opposition in the House. The constitutional question does not trouble the leader of the Government. It troubled the Solicitor General in the other House when he said we had no right to touch the Bill at all. But my hon. friend says: 'Who can say anything to us on constitutional matters? How can they get at the Senate and Parliament? Why, through the Supreme Court. How can they get to the Supreme Court? They could not get there unless we let them.' Again he says: 'In an Act to vote a sum, which the Government voted out of their own generosity, should not the Government exercise some supervision over the money?'

Does that not show the Bill was for political purposes. It was not for the farmer. He says: 'Would you expect the Government to hand over money that was to go to the people of this country, by the Government generosity.' You would have thought they were putting their hands in their pockets, you would have imagined that, out of the salary the Government had, they were dealing out a lot of money and saying: 'Here we give you our money.' Where did this money come from? From the masters to the servant. That is all it is. My hon. friend says: 'Did you expect this Government to hand this money over to the Government that might not be in sympathy with the Conservative party of Canada, and might use it to the party's detriment?' I think the Senate amendments to that Bill were simply looking after the interests of the people. I feel that this Senate has a duty to perform, and I differ with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who seem to think that the business cannot be carried on unless the Senate becomes the donkey engine of the other House. The people of the country have a right to expect this Senate to assume certain responsibilities for the people of Canada, because we are responsible to the people. A referendum to the people would settle the question whether this Government was right or wrong. If the Government were anxious to settle the question, they have an opportunity of testing the feeling of the country. They could find out, in that way, whether the Senate was acting properly or not. The Solicitor General says the Agricultural Bill had a gold brick in it. We accepted that. We passed one Bill last year, and threw out the other, and he says the two Bills were exactly alike. The Agricultural Bill had a clause in it which permitted the Government to use the money without regard to the different provinces, and we did not touch it. If there was a gold brick in that, we did not see it. We were as alert in regard to this Bill, and asked them to insert a similar clause in the measure to make it right. We were willing to accept what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways said, but we wanted the names of other parties in it. I think our position in respect to the Bill is defensible, and I have no apology to make to the country or to the House for my connection with the matter.

The other question brought up was that of the emergency. We heard a good deal from some hon. members about the mandate. We had it from the hon. leader of the Government that the people had given a mandate for the passing of the Contribution Bill. The matter was not mentioned in New Brunswick; but let us inquire what kind of mandate they had to pass the Bill? In the elections of 1911 they started out for a mandate, and they say that in some part of Ontario this question of a contribution was discussed by the Prime Minister. If it was so, the discussion did not reach our province. It was never referred to on any election platform, or on the hustings in New Brunswick, as far as I can learn. The question of the naval contribution never came up. The hon. gentleman went to British Columbia. What mandate did he get there? A white man's country—that is the cry that moved British Columbia. It was talked of from the Pacific coast to Sydney, that what British Columbia wanted was to be a white man's country. Every Oriental and Japanese was going to be put into Puget Sound if Borden were elected. What have they done in respect to that? All they have done is to refuse the right of a British subject to come into British Columbia. The Japanese are there. There was no mandate in British Columbia for any contribution. Get down to the next two provinces, and do you see any cupidity in the western people? If you promise them their natural resources, their land, would it help out in obtaining a mandate in that respect? The Government got no mandate from Alberta nor Saskatchewan. They got a mandate from Manitoba. Manitoba gives a peculiar kind of mandate, and they got one there. Then in Ontario the question of contribution and the navy was not made an issue among the apostles of purity, but it was the French Premier, the Ne Temere decree, and the Eucharistic Congress.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—And contribution too.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—People were told in Ontario 'give us Borden, and we will give you a marriage law that will protect your homes.' We heard it away down in our country. 'We will protect your children and we will protect you from priests, popes, principalities, powers, man, angels, or the devil. Did they do it? There was no mandate from them on the labour question. Coming down to Quebec, they got a mandate there. They joined in with men who are in favour of pulling the flag down, and that combination to-day is the party who comes to this House in the matter of an emergency contribution.

What about the question of emergency? My hon. friend said it was an appeal from the British people to the Canadians for help. I deny that absolutely. How did the question of contribution get here? The Prime Minister and the Postmaster General started for England with a grip, and a little emergency in it, and like Saul of Tarsus they said, 'Tell us how we can be saved?' They went to the Admiralty and said, 'What must we do to be saved,' and the Admiralty said: 'Give us contributions, if you are in such a rush, give us a money contribution for three ships.' What did the Prime Minister say in Montreal? The Prime Minister had stated in Parliament that before enacting his permanent policy, he would go to the country for sanction, and he also said if his emergency contribution was refused by Parliament he would go to the people with it. That statement has been denied. I say that in public, in Montreal, the Prime Minister said that the proposals he would lay before Parliament, he would be unable to give details. But if he laid them before Parliament, and Parliament refused to grant them, he would refer it to the people. What did we refuse? Did we refuse to grant him anything? There was not a single word in the Senate expressing any opinion against the contribution, but there was a desire on the part of this Senate in the exercising of their duty, to say to the Government of Canada: 'You have said you are willing to have the voice of the people, and we desire to have the people consulted on this question.' This year we have got no contribution. The Government is not only afraid of the Senate, but they are afraid of the people of Canada, and the whole matter is now in cold storage. If hon. gentlemen read the Premier's speech they will see he expresses no opinion. Probably this great propaganda of peace, which is overshadowing everything, may lead to a revision of the contribution. They may not require any of it. However, if the people want to give a contribution, you will find no more obedient servant than the Senate of Canada. We are quite willing when the people themselves express an opinion on the subject, to obey their mandate. I think that little emergency just wants to be snuffed out. There never was an emergency, and there is not one at present. My hon. friend says, 'Why not get ready for an emergency?' We will be ready for an emergency. Canada has always been ready. My hon. friend referred to the fact that the nations of the world would know, when we refused to sanction that Bill, that we refused to help England. Let him think back. Let the mothers whose boys did not come back to Canada decide whether we helped England in the time of stress. Ask the men who went and fought for the old flag, and came back mostly in the steerage, whether Canada is not willing to stand up for the interests of the old flag and the interests of the mother land. I think it is time the emergency was snuffed out, I think it would be proper to kill it. I read a story in a newspaper about a man who had trouble with his liver; he went to Florida and discovered a wonderful spring, with marvellous healing properties. The man took the water and grew strong and healthy. He built an hotel, and invited people there, to show them the wonderful healing properties of the water. When the man died, his liver was so healthy that they had to take it out, and kill it with a club. You would not have to kill this emergency with a club. Some reference was made to the attitude of the Premier in respect to the South African war, as though it required the whole effort of the Conservative party to induce the Liberal Government to move in the interests of Canada. I have on my desk a work published, 'Canada's Sons on the Copje and the Veldt.' In July, 1899, Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved a resolution of sympathy with the Uitlanders in South Africa, seconded by Mr. Foster. The South African ultimatum was issued on the 9th, and they expected the declaration of war on the 11th or 12th. War was declared on the 12th, and on the 13th the offer of one thousand troops was sent to England by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. On the 30th day of that month, one day before the Admiralty asked that the shipment should be made, or in about two weeks from the declaration of war, a thousand men were embarked on a steamer from Quebec. Sir Wilfrid took action in the matter without waiting for Parliament to meet. If I wanted to find partisans in this Chamber, I would not look on this side of the House. Who was it criticised the Branch Lines Bill, and the proposed amendments? It was the independent judgment of the House, Conservatives and Liberals. I am not against the Conservative Government nor for them; I am not against the Liberals nor for them, but to the best of my judgment, in so far as I am able to determine the interests of the people of Canada, I am willing to stand up for them. I deprecate the political atmosphere of this country in a sense. What do we know about the political vortex of this country to-day? I say the most hellish conspiracies are hatched to do harm to a man's private character, from some source, it may be Liberal, or it may be Conservative, but our newspapers are teeming to-day with matters that concern the people of this country, without regard to men's standing. There is a hellish conspiracy in this country, from some source, to do an injury to a man's reputation, or to men's reputations. I have no brief for these men, and do not know them, but the man who originated that, in my judgment, is further down than the men he was able under those influences to affect. But we are out of that vortex. While I think we should be out of it, and should not be influenced by party, I admit we cannot entirely divest ourselves of conditions that exist on the outside, and, perhaps, at times may give some evidence, even on the floor of this House, but I think, in a general sense, the Senate is to be credited with an independent action, and an endeavour to treat all questions in the interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—As far as my experience goes, as a reader of Parliamentary history I always found that the most powerful instrument of any party in parliamentary affairs in Great Britain was the Speech from the Throne. That has always been, and is still in Great Britain, the instrument whereby the party in power makes known its policy to Parliament, and to the people of the empire. Measures which any party in England want to have passed are foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne. Their policy is plainly indicated in the Speech from the Throne. The House and the electorate of the nation are taken into the confidence of the Government. What do we find in the Speech from the Throne on the present occasion? We find that the Government of the day, led by the Right Hon. Mr. Borden, has no confidence in Parliament, and no respect for the people at large. The Speech from the Throne, as given by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught is as empty as a broken egg, and not a very newly laid one at that. The Speech from the Throne indicates no policy whatever, which would direct and govern the destinies of this country. It cannot be called a policy to say that a Redistribution Bill shall be brought down. That is a constitutional necessity which the present Government has neglected for the past two years. It is imposed upon the Government by the constitution and the Government of the present time has refused to do its duty in regard to the rights of the people of Canada. For the past three years, the returns of the population of this country have been in the hands of the Government as prepared by the census enumerators. The population has been increasing, naturally, for the past thirteen years, and there has been a great volume of immigration, but notwithstanding this tremendous increase of anywhere from one and a half to two millions, the Government has remained callous and indifferent to the rights of those new made voters and the electors of Canada. They have allowed the two and a half millions to remain unrepresented, both in the House of Commons and in this honourable House; but they are obliged to take courage, and they have promised to bring down a Redistribution Bill. There is no policy in that. I hope the Redistribution Bill which the Government will bring down, and put through this House of Commons, will be acceptable to the people of Canada, as represented by this Chamber. The speech also says that they will bring down a Bill to increase the representation in the Senate. That is no policy. That is another constitutional necessity. But, as far as I am concerned, I may tell them that they will not do it before the proper time comes. I am in accord with the leader of the Opposition when he said he welcomed the proposition of the Government in regard to the increased senatorial representation. There is not the slightest doubt that if the people of the West, and the people of the larger provinces, are entitled to increased representation in the House of Commons, they are also entitled concurrently to increased senatorial representation in this House. But what I dread, and what I foresee is this: that they will bring down their Bill for increased senatorial representation, have it passed in the House of Commons, and brought to this House. In that case I would say to this Government: 'This measure shall pass this House, but it cannot go into effect until the popular branch is fully represented through a Redistribution Bill—that senators shall not be appointed to this Chamber before the increased population of Canada get their representatives on the floor of the House of Commons.' That is the stand I am going to take in regard to that measure. If the Government intend to rush their Bill through, without taking into consideration the fact that the people of the country are at the same time entitled to their additional representatives on the floor of the House of Commons, I will oppose that measure until the Government say: 'We will be ready to increase the representation of both Houses at the same time.' We are not opposed to the Senatorial Bill, any more than to the Highways Bill, but the increase must be concurrent.

I have very little to add in regard to the Highways Bill, except that two years ago, when the Government introduced this Bill, neither the Liberal party in the House of Commons, nor in the Senate, had detected the nigger in the Bill referred to by the hon. gentleman from Fredericton. I did, however, and I gave a warning to the Senate, and even to my own party, that I would oppose that Bill until the Government accepted the amendment which was afterwards proposed, that the spending of that money devoted for highway purposes, should not be left in the hands of Rogers and Cochrane?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Are they the members?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes. I took that position on the Agricultural Bill and on other measures. My position is independent. One cannot be more independent than that. I have taken the position without consulting the members of the party, I was astonished to hear the young member from Prince Edward Island charge the House with being a partisan body of the most violent type.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR—Will the hon. gentleman deny that, during the discussion of the Highways Bill last year, he stated publicly in this House he would defeat that Bill, because it would injure the Liberal party in Canada?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I certainly made the statement, and I repeat it, that the object of the Bill was to hold the money in the hands of the federal ministers, for their own purpose, and not for the purposes of the Highways. I emphasize that statement and I know what I am talking about. I know some ministers holding high places in other provinces, who used the public lands, highways, and moneys of departments to defeat candidates for whom I worked. Does he want any more than that? Am I going to trust those men after being shoulder to shoulder with them, and seeing them use money, designed for public construction, to defeat Liberal candidates? Was I to trust them with the expenditure of money? I had my nose to the ground. I was bitten by the fox once, and he will not bite me twice. I do not retract anything I said in regard to that Bill. The hon. member from Prince Edward Island charged members with being partisan. I am a good Liberal, and hope to continue a good Liberal, but I will call attention to mistakes made by my leader and errors made by the party; and these mistakes will not drive me into the Tory ranks because I would be going from bad to worse. Had the hon. member from Prince Edward Island been here some time ago, he would have seen a Liberal majority emasculating Government Bills in the most cruel fashion. We amended their Railway Act extensively. Out of 250 clauses we made essential and very important amendments to the number of eighty-nine or ninety. We persisted in our amendments to such an extent that a conference had to be called between the House of Commons and the Senate. In the end the House of Commons and the Minister of Railways had to accept some seventy-seven of our amendments, and Mr. Blair was no easy man to handle. There was a conference on some twenty-four of the amendments and a compromise was effected: twelve were accepted and twelve were rejected. There was the most important measure, from an administrative point of view, that the Liberal party ever brought before Parliament. We killed their Branch Lines Bill, and made Hon. Mr. Graham, the Minister of Railways at that time, as mad as a hatter; yet we are told that we are partisan, and because we ask a question, or interrupt any one on the other side, he says we look like a bear garden.

The hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Murphy) threw down the gauntlet to our hon. leader, Sir George Ross, and wanted to know how he could justify his position in denouncing the Government's way of acting in regard to the Highways Bill, when he was willing to accept the Agricultural Aid Bill. The hon. gentleman ought to know that the question of Agriculture is divided between the federal and the provincial powers. We have a Minister of Agriculture in Ottawa; he has his experimental farms and can have agricultural colleges if he likes. What we objected to was that the Government of the day wanted to vote a large amount for agricultural purposes. But the money was to remain in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture to be expended. Now I objected to that from the word go. We fought it for two years and finally the Government accepted our amendments and said that the money would be handed over to the provinces. I went further than that: I said on the Highways Bill that I would be satisfied, if they did not want o give it to the provinces, to hand it over to the county councils, who know more about the roads within their county limits than anybody else.

Coming back to the Agricultural Aid Bill, I want to tell the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island that he is much mistaken in regard to the constitution. Education is altogether under provincial control, but although the leader of the Opposition accepted the Bill as it now reads, he did not violate the constitution in that respect, because the federal Government can donate money as it pleases for any purpose. It can grant money for church, educational or hospital purposes. Why, they gave Prince Edward Island only two years ago, $100,000 a year to maintain their hospitals and their insane and poor.

I may congratulate the Government on some things which are not mentioned in the speech. There is an omission of two or three points which were made against the Liberal party in the last election. One is the Ne Temere decree. Are you going to have any Ne Temere decree next election to help the Government in fifty or sixty constituencies in Ontario and seven in New Brunswick where it was used in the last election? That is dead and gone. How sore the people must feel now who were humbugged by that cry three years ago. How these good Grits in Ontario must feel ashamed of having taken fright when the Liberal party was charged with being under the heel of the Papacy and the Bishops! But they will come back to the fold contrite and penitent. I guess they are sorry now for their desertion to the Conservative Government, which has proved to be one of the most incompetent on the history of Canada. The present Government have done absolutely nothing in national affairs that is worth mentioning. The Ne Temere is dead. The Eucharistic Congress has evaporated, the waving of the flag—the disloyalty cry that they used with some effect in certain quarters— are three corpses that can go with the Highways Bill and the Naval Bill. Some were stillborn and some were born as monsters. The Government were ashamed of their progeny and did not mention them in the Speech from the Throne.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island with regard to the decreasing representation of Prince Edward Island, yet it seems strange that a population of 100,000 should have twice or three times the representation of counties containing a much larger population. Some of the constituencies of Montreal have a population of from seventy-five to ninety thousand. However,

I put that aside in view of the hon. gentleman's appeal, I will not say for fair play, but for necessary protection. The documents which he read here this afternoon are, to my mind, the most important that have been brought before the Senate. There is no doubt that the island came into Confederation under a contract giving them six members. I, as one, am prepared to let them retain the representation they have. Their representation has been reduced to four, and I think it would be wise, in spite of the clerical errors in the contract, to allow them to retain their four members. Of course, they have no ground for complaint in regard to Senatorial representation. They have four Senators. The Government can act only in accordance with the constitution in the matter, but if it is imperative under the constitution to reduce the representation of the island in the House of Commons as the population declines, why do not this Government reduce the Senatorial representation? They have not done so. They have as much right and power to do the one as the other, but they dare not attack the Senatorial representation, and my advice to the Government to-day is to let the Senate keep its four members in the House of Commons. The other provinces will have enough. In the next twenty-five years the little island will not worry the big provinces, and the appeal of Prince Edward Island ought to be listened to. We should be broad and big enough for that.

I hope when this Address is adopted and sent to his Excellency for his approval that all the speeches delivered in his House will be attached thereto.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Second reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Casgrain, moved the second reading of Bill (A) 'An Act to amend the Railway Act with respect to the Deposit of Plans.'

He said: This Bill is a measure which was fully considered in the Senate last year, as hon. gentlemen will probably remember, and was adopted I think unanimously. It seems a fair and reasonable measure. Plans in connection with railways proposed to be built by companies are to be deposited in the Railway Department for the purpose of giving further information to parties who may be interested. I understand from the hon. member from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) that the Minister of Railways himself has expressed a desire that this measure should be passed by the Senate so that when the Government put their measure amending the Railway Act through, they may utilize this Bill. I do not see that there is any objection to the measure, and it can do no harm as it is going to the hands of the Minister.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary and, without special reference, to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House and the Point of Order raised by the Hon. Mr. Bolduc thereto.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I suggest the advisability of letting this motion stand until we have a more representative House than we have here this afternoon?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The motion has stood a good while already, and it refers merely to a matter of the Internal Economy of the House. As I pointed out on a previous occasion, the resolution does not at all affect the powers of His Honour the Speaker with respect to proposed appointments. It simply gives the Committee on Internal Economy the same right that the Committee on Standing Orders has to deal with matters that come up day by day. The ground, as I understand, taken by the hon. member from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Bolduc) was that when the hon. leader of the House moved the other day the adoption of the report of the Committee on Selection, the door was closed to any attempt to confer further powers on any of these Committees. Hon. gentlemen will remember that after the report of the committee was adopted the hon. leader of the House moved that certain powers not then possessed by the Committee on Standing Orders should be conferred on them, and every hon. gentleman knows that it is quite a usual practice in this House to authorize a committee to do certain things which, without that authority, it has not the right to do. In the end, when you come back to the end of things, the House has the right to empower a committee to do almost anything. In connection with the Committee on Agriculture a change was made to-day. It would be a most extraordinary thing if this House could not authorize one of its committees to attend to any business that the House chose to delegate to it, either any special business or any general line of business. That is the view that I take. I am not sure whether the Minutes will show that the resolution is before the House or not, but if it is not, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I see no reason to repeat what I said the other day in raising the point of order against the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I still hold to that point of order. I have asked for the decision of the Speaker, and I suppose we shall have it before the motion is voted on. I do not believe that, in the face of the motion passed by the House, a motion of the leader of the Government in this House —that we can given to a Special Standing Committee a general power to do whatever they please. I heard a little while ago from the hon. gentleman that we had just passed a motion granting an increase in the membership of one Special Committee, but I see no parallel between the two cases, and I still raise the point of order and ask for the decision of the Speaker and, of course, am willing to abide by it.

The SPEAKER — When that point of order was taken on Friday last, at my request I was allowed to take the question en delibere. The Hon. Mr. Young said 'I suggest the resolution should stand over until after the adjournment.'

Hon. Mr. POWR—That was only a suggestion.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Stand.

The SPEAKER—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that nothing would suffer by the postponement, and that it seemed only a reasonable proposition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the Hon. the Speaker has not been able to make up his mind on a question of that kind in the last two or three days, I shall not press for a decision, but will let it stand until after the adjournment.

The Motion was allowed to stand.

THE LATE SENATORS ELLIS AND COX.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before we deal with the question of adjournment may I be permitted to say that owing to our having to deal with the Address, I had not until now an opportunity of directing the attention of the Senate to the loss by death of two members of this House since last session. During the recess of Parliament this Chamber suffered a great loss in the death of Senator Ellis. During the late Senator's lifetime the greater part of it was devoted to the public service. For a great number of years he gave his attention not only to the public interests of his native province, but in the Federal sphere he served the people of Canada with ability for some thirty years. Senator Ellis will probably be better known to the people of Canada as a journalist than in any other role that he played during his long active life. Public life has a peculiar attraction to journalists. It was some two years ago that there was celebrated in the city of St. John the fifty years of service as a journalist which the late Senator had given, not only to his province but to Canada. Senator Ellis was a man who peculiarly had the courage of his convictions. Although allied for all that long period of time with the Liberal party, there were times when he did not see eye to eye with his political friends. He had that peculiarly independent spirit which led him always to exercise his judgment and express his opinions notwithstanding the difference which that expression might have created between himself and his political allies. That made him an ideal member of the Senate. True, we cannot all boast of exercising that spirit of independence; it requires some courage to do it, and yet it seems there never was a period in the life of the late senator when the Liberal party with which he was allied did not look with pride upon him as a fearless exponent of public opinion and a worthy member of his party. Democratic measures peculiarly appealed to the late senator. He kept his hand upon the public pulse of Canada to a greater extent probably than any other journalist, and the great newspaper with which he was connected bespoke the deep thought he gave to all subjects with which he dealt. He was a man of great dignity, courtesy and kindness of heart, even to an extent which has seldom marked our public men. There was ever a kindly considerate and a human spirit manifested by him in his contact with his fellows, and I am sure that we can all join with the deepest sincerity in expressing our sense of the deep loss, not only to this Chamber but to the Dominion of Canada in the death of our distinguished colleague who has passed away, in the person of the late Senator Ellis.

The Senate has also suffered a great loss in the death of our late colleague Senator Cox, who died at his residence in the city of Toronto on the opening day of the present session. Senator Cox was not as actively engaged in the political activities of Canada as our late colleague Senator Ellis; yet, notwithstanding that, he was always interested in the public service of Canada. Few men of his day contributed to a larger extent in building up the great financial institutions of Canada, which are of as much necessity to our development and to our national life as our political institutions. He had peculiarly a constructive genius in finance, and I doubt if there is any man in Canada today to whose memory so many successful financial institutions bear tribute to great genius as those which bespeak the ability and industry of the man who laid their foundations. Men of this kind seldom receive the credit to which they are entitled. We are disposed to attach all the honours which our public men enjoy to those who establish themselves high in the political life of the Dominion, but the great foundation builders of Canada are really those who are not so active in political life as those engaged in laying the foundations of our great financial and commercial institutions, and which permit us to develop those great national resources of which we are the inheritors. There was one peculiar characteristic about Senator Cox which never marked any man more decidedly than it did him, and that was his splendid optimism in relation to the great resources of Canada. I doubt if there was a period in his long life, no matter what depression of trade, no matter what financial stringency there might be, but Senator Cox showed the greatest possible confidence both in the present and future of Canada, and continued, notwithstanding the discouragements which may have surrounded him, to build up those institutions to which I have alluded, and which as I have said are a magnificent tribute to his confidence in the country of which he was so distinguished a son. Senator Cox was peculiarly a courteous man. He was ever unaffected and kind in his contact with his fellow men. His ripe experience and mature judgment were always enlisted in the service of the Senate, particularly in the deliberations of our committees, where his wise counsels strongly appealed to the confidence of his fellow members. He was a man that was peculiarly philanthropic and generous in supporting the charitable, religious and benevolent institutions of his native province, and the gifts which he from time to time made to those institutions are a tribute to his generosity and his beneficence. This Senate will join with me in the expressions of esteem and appreciation which we entertained for him in life and our deepest regrets in his departure from amongst us through the hand of death being laid upon him.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. leader of the Government was good enough to ask me if I should not follow him with some remarks in connection with the death of the two senators of whom we have spoken. I have never regretted the absence of the hon. leader of the Opposition quite as much as I do now, because that hon. gentleman has a peculiar faculty of saying the right thing and saying it eloquently in a case of this kind; and I am satisfied that no other members of the Senate feel that same sense of regret more strongly than I do. But there is just this about it; that the hon. leader of the House has spoken with such good judgment and such good taste that really nothing further needs to be said. With respect to Senator Ellis, he was a man of marked ability; we all knew that, and he worked himself up from a comparatively humble position to be the owner of a great and influential newspaper, and his own character was really embodied in the newspaper. That paper was independent and clean, and in every respect of a high character, and so every one who knew Mr. Ellis knew him to be. He was a perfectly upright and independent man, and the hon. leader of the House very properly dwelt on his independence of character, and on his possessing that characteristic which should be peculiarly desirable in the case of a member of the Senate. We all know how the late hon. gentleman from St. John took his own line, the line his conscience and intelligence directed him to take, no matter what the party view of the question might be, and I thought his independence of character was reflected in his bearing. Every hon. gentleman remembers the alert and erect way he carried himself in the House. He lived a life time in the city of St. John, as nearly every one knows, although he was born in Halifax, and he was a life time in the public service as the hon. gentleman has said, but during all that time, from beginning to end, Hon. Mr. Ellis succeeded in gaining and holding the respect of all classes and conditions of men, and people of every creed, and of every shade of political opinion. Truly he wore through all his days the white flower of a blameless life.

As to the hon. gentleman from Toronto, who died on the opening day of Parliament, I do not feel that I am in a position to say very much. I did not know Mr. Ellis, but every one knows that Mr. Cox won really a very high position in various walks of life by intelligent and persevering effort. There was nothing narrow about the late senator. He was a very warm adherent of his own faith; he was most generous in his gifts for the purposes of his own denomination, but he was tolerant and friendly towards people of all denominations. There was nothing narrow about him in the matter of religion, nor was there in business or politics. Although, as the hon. leader of the House said, he did not perhaps take as open and active a part in public life as the late Senator from St. John, he took a more influential part than a great many people understood. He was, in a quiet way, a very active and efficient supporter of his party. For instance, I think that very few people are aware of the most important and influential part that Senator Cox took in securing the construction of the National Transcontinental railway. A characteristic of Hon. Mr. Cox which particularly struck me was the utter absence of anything like purse pride about him, he was a millionaire, but there was nothing about his manner, or general line of conduct, to indicate that he was better off than his neighbour. He was an exceedingly unassuming man. I think that was one of the great charms of his character. I close my remarks by repeating my expression of regret that the hon. gentleman who generally sits to my right is not present.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY—I have only the excuse for taking part in this debate that perhaps I am the oldest and most intimate acquaintance that Senator Cox had in the House. I have been very closely associated with him, and I only wish I had the eloquence and ability to do justice to the feeling I have with regard to the late Senator Cox, and what he was as a man, both as to his ability and character. He had reached a point of importance in Peterborough, but was little known outside of Peterborough, until he took upon himself the task of reorganizing the Midland railway. The road was in the unfortunate position of having neither cash nor credit, and generally it was in a very bad state. His position pointed to him as the man to take the position of president of the company, and he did so. To the astonishment of everybody he reorganized that railway and brought it into a good position. That was the first thing which brought him prominently before the public, and he well deserved it. I had opportunities of knowing the perseverance which the hon. gentleman exhibited in following up this great undertaking. Perhaps the principle means that helped him to be so successful was his personal character, the honesty and kindness of his nature, and the way he had of judging everybody with whom he came in contact, so that every man in his employment served him to the best of his ability. To-day we find nothing but the highest appreciation of his conduct and the way he treated those with whom he came in contact, and their readiness to perform any service in their power to gratify him and fulfil what he wanted to accomplish. His progress afterwards is well known to most of us, but the difficulties that he had to overcome, and the ability he showed in overcoming them, the amount of resource he exercised, are known only to those who were intimately acquainted with him. He did not start in a high position in life, and the one thing which is perhaps more to be admired than another in Senator Cox's character is that he never was ashamed of the lowness of the position in which he started. Before the best men of the city of Toronto I have heard him state that he was mending shoes with his father when he heard of a boy being wanted for the telegraph office, and he thought he would like to be that boy, and he paid a tribute of respect and admiration to Mr. Dwight for the kindliness with which he took him into the service, and for the excellent opportunity it gave him to develop what was in him. His best monument, and one that will be lasting to his memory, are the financial institutions which he controlled, many of which he really organized and brought to the front, and all of which were the better and strengthened and made more useful to the public through the ability which he applied to the development of them. I need say nothing of his personal character. Every one with whom he came in contact liked him. He had no enemies, and very many friends, and I heartily endorse what has been said by the hon. leader of the Government and the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I only wish I could better express the feeling I have with regard to the senator who has gone from among us. The Senate has lost an able and admirable man, and Canada has lost a gentleman who has done great service to his country. He was a thorough Canadian, loyal to Canada, and deserving of the highest tribute the country can pay him.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I wish to thank the hon. leader of the Government and the hon. gentleman from Halifax for the appreciative words they have spoken with regard to our late colleague in this House, Senator Ellis. Both of them have spoken more fully and eloquently than I could, of the late senator, but I can testify to the absolute truth of every word they have uttered. The late Senator Ellis, at the time of his death, occupied a peculiar position in the hearts of the people of St. John. I believe at that time he was really the most highly respected, and most affectionately esteemed public man in the city of St. John. He was, as has been mentioned, a man of independent views, and, at the same time, was always a man of strong party affiliations. I can remember very many years ago—I presume it must have been at the time the Mackenzie Government was in power—he was appointed postmaster of the city of St. John. At that time he was editor, and I think proprietor, of the St. John Globe, a strong Liberal paper. Notwithstanding his appointment as Postmaster, he continued in his paper to advocate the principles and doctrines of the Liberal party to which he had always been attached. That, of course, was not relished by the Government of the day, and Hon. Mr. Ellis had to take his choice as between the position of Postmaster, or altering the attitude of his newspaper; Hon. Mr. Ellis did not pause to make up his mind as to which he should do. He resigned the position of Postmaster and continued to edit his paper entirely in the interest of the Liberal party. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the very last vote that the Hon. Mr. Ellis gave in this House was in favour of a Government measure. It shows that, notwithstanding his strong party affiliations, and party feelings, he was still sufficiently independent to vote for things he thought were in the best interests of the country to which he belonged. Those are two instances of the independence of the views, and, at the same time, of the strong party affiliations, which always attached themselves to the character of the late Hon. Mr. Ellis. As an editor, I think there was not one in St. John, where he has lived so long, who would deny that the paper which Hon. Mr. Ellis edited with so much ability was probably the most important and influential paper published in that city among the people who took it and read it, and, as I said before, at the time of his death there is no one, and there never has been any one in the city of St. John who attained as high a position in the esteem, respect and affection of the people of that city.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until February 18, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (B), An Act respecting the Pollution of Navigable Waters.—Hon. Mr. Belcourt.

THE DRAINAGE OF LANDS IN SASKATCHEWAN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS inquired:

Is the Government aware that the following resolution was passed at the last meeting of the Saskatchewan legislature?

Whereas the development of the province has reached a stage which makes it necessary in the interests of the farmers affected to undertake the drainage of large areas of land under the provisions of the Drainage Act;

And whereas under the provisions of the said Act the cost of any such drainage scheme must be borne by the property owners in proportion to the benefits to their property;

And whereas there are included in many of the drainage districts proposed to be organized, Crown lands which are exempt from taxation, and which, if benefited, would not be liable to any share of the cost of the drainage works;

And whereas as a consequence of these conditions, the creation of drainage districts and the necessary drainage of lands is being delayed;

Therefore, be it resolved that in the opinion of this House. it is desirable that the attention of the Government of Canada be drawn to the conditions herein referred to in order that some immediate policy may be adopted whereby all lands included in drainage districts may pay their share of the cost of any drainage works constructed.

If so. does the Government intend to take any action to carry out the suggestion of the legislature?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The matter is at present under consideration.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I might draw the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that, sometimes, these things are too long under consideration. This is a very important matter, and I should like to get some information about it this session. I should just like to say that the Dominion Government, at present, owns and controls all the public lands in Saskatchewan. The local Government has to furnish the money to drain these lands, and the effect is to increase the value of the Government holdings. I think, therefore, that the Dominion Government should bear a portion of the expense of this drainage. It is not fair to ask the few people living in that province—they are few considering the size of the province—to spend money draining and improving lands that do not belong to them. Of course, if the Dominion Government would hand over the public lands to the province as they promised to do, it would be another matter; but if these lands are not to be handed over, most certainly the Dominion Government should bear their share of the expense of draining them.

APPEALS TO SUPREME COURT AND PRIVY COUNCIL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved:

That a committee be appointed to consider the advisability of limiting the right of appeal to the Supreme Court and to the Privy Council to certain classes of cases, and that the said committee be composed of the Honourable Messieurs Lougheed, Béique, Bostock, Belcourt, Ross (Middleton)), Power, Choquette, Kerr and the mover.

He said: Hon. gentlemen will remember that last session I asked for the appointment of a committee to deal with this subject. The committee was appointed and commenced its work, but as it was formed near the end of the session, very little could be done. The committee asked for information from the Attorneys' General of the different provinces, and I understand that some of that information has been received Since then, this important question has been discussed in the press and by the bar in different provinces, and the committee to be appointed will be able to take advantage of the views that have been expressed in favour of limiting the right of appeal to certain classes of cases. The committee should therefore be able before long to make a practical and useful report on that question. Naturally, if the hon. members think proper to enlarge the committee they may do so.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—I cannot very well act on this committee, being a member of the Government, and I would, therefore, suggest that the name of the hon. gentleman from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) be substituted for mine. I would also suggest that the hon. member ask the Hon. Mr. Girroir, from Nova Scotia, to act on that committee.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Then it would be proper to add another name.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am sorry that the hon. leader of the House does not see his way clear to serve on that committee, because this is a very important matter. We have very few lawyers in this House representing the West, and there should be a lawyer from that part of Canada on the committee.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Mr. Bostock is a lawyer.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I think not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, he is a lawyer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not a lawyer, but I have pretty strong views on the subject.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—There should be laymen on that committee. In fact, I think a good layman is better qualified than a lawyer to express an opinion on this subject. Lawyers find it to their interest to encourage appeals. I think it is better to curtail the operations of the lawyers, and I would, therefore, suggest that the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Sir Melvin Jones) would be a good member of the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes, he is in trouble often.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman amend his motion to make these changes and additions?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I think the mover of the resolution might explain what he intends the committee to do. He states that it is to arrange that appeals should be allowed only in certain classes of cases. He should tell the Chamber what classes of cases he has in view so that members of the Senate might have some idea of the probable outcome of this committee. They should know whether it is advisable to pass the resolution or not. I am no lawyer and I should like to know a little more about the meaning and intention of this resolution before being asked to vote upon it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Last year there was a discussion on this question and in that discussion I went as far as I could go. I am asking for the appointment of a committee because I think I have not all the wisdom necessary to say what is required. The committee will be in a better position than I am, after having discussed the question with additional information, to say exactly to what classes of cases the right of appeal should be limited. But as the hon. gentleman thinks discussion on that question would be proper, I ask that the motion be adjourned until to-morrow, so that I may, perhaps, repeat what I said last year, though it may not be very interesting.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—We should like to hear it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—As a layman, not as a lawyer, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, who has always been very strong for provincial autonomy and for all the civil rights pertaining to the provinces, to deal with that phase of the question when he discusses this subject, and take up the question how far the motion would affect civil rights, in the province of Quebec, for instance.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It has nothing to do with that.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Not being a lawyer I do not propose to discuss this from that standpoint, but there is a feeling abroad in the country that our Supreme Court should be empowered to settle matters between individuals, such as business transactions of all kinds, and that if any matters should be taken to the Privy Council they should be such as affects the rights of any of the provinces—constitutional questions, and all matters of that kind. Outside of those, other cases should be settled by our own courts.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I move, then, that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—No; go on; question.

The motion was amended and agreed to.

THE INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Orders of the Day being called:

Consideration of the motion of the Honourable Mr. Power:

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingents Accounts be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary and, without special reference, to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House and the point of order raised by the Honourable Mr. Bolduc thereto.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think this matter should stand until Friday.

The SPEAKER—I may say I have my decision ready.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In view of the possibility of discussion, I think it would be better to postpone the matter until Friday.

The SPEAKER—I not only heard that there would be discussion, but I heard also that members had been canvassed to vote down my decision if it should not be in their favour, and I think it is a very disgraceful thing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Speaking for myself, I had not heard that.

The SPEAKER—I heard it from the lips of men who had been canvassed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The general rule has been that if a member in charge of a motion which is upon the paper asks to have it stand, it stands as a matter of course.

The SPEAKER—Yes, but in this case the member who has the right to have it adjourned is the member who pointed out the objection.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps it would be better to let it stand until Tuesday next, and then we can finish it.

The SPEAKER—As the member who raised the objection is willing to have it stand until next Tuesday, and the House seems desirous that that should be done, I assent to that.

The House adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDIAN COMMISSION.

INQUIRY.

The notice of inquiry being called:

By the Honourable Mr. Bostock:—

That he will inquire of the Government:—

1. Hon. Mr. E. L. Wetmore, late Chief Justice of Saskatchewan, resigned his position as Chairman of the Commission appointed in 1913 to investigate the claims put forth by and on behalf of the Indians of British Columbia?

2. If so, what are the reasons given for the resignation?

3. Has any one else been appointed as Chairman of this Commission?

Has the Commission made any report?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman who placed these inquiries in the paper is absent, but I have the answers, which are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Physical inability to undertake the work of the Commission in remote districts of British Columbia during the approaching summer.

3. No.

4. The Commission has made an interim report.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (6), An Act to incorporate the Atlin Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION AND HEAD TAX.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General: praying that His Royal Highness will cause a return to be laid before the Senate showing:—

1. The number of Chinamen entering Canada during the years 1911, 1912 and 1913.

2. The amount of head-tax collected each year respectively?

3. How such head-tax was disposed of?

4. Were such Chinamen settled by provinces?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED: There is no objection to the motion. The papers will be brought down in due time.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (D), An Act to amend the Criminal Code.—Hon. Mr. Choquette.

WEEK END ADJOURNMENTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved:

That from this day on, and until the Senate orders differently, when the Senate adjourns on Friday, it shall stand adjourned until the following Tuesday, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved that the following words be added to the motion:

And that on this Friday it shall stand adjourned until Thursday, the 26th inst.

The House divided on the amendment, which was agreed to.

The motion, as amended, was then adopted.

POLLUTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill (B), An Act respecting the Pollution of Navigable Waters. He said: This Bill does not call for many comments from me. It is exactly the same Bill which was considered last year and the year before by a special committee of the Senate, and adopted. After it passed this House last year and when it reached the House of Commons the Prime Minister moved that a committee of that House inquire into this Bill, and also at the same time into a Bill which had been introduced by a member of that branch of Parliament. The committee sat towards the end of the session, heard considerable expert evidence, and provided means for collecting, during the recess, more evidence, which would be considered early this session. That committee has already met this session, and heard some evidence, and proposes to continue considering the whole subject until it is exhausted. Another event which has happened since, and which is of consequence in considering this measure, is that the International Joint Commission on Waterways has had the matter under very serious consideration. A great deal of evidence there also has been taken, and the members of the commission have given it serious attention. I believe that both branches of the commission have come to a conclusion as to the reports to be submitted to their respective Governments, with a view of dealing with those waters which form part of the International boundary between Canada and the United States. Probably this session will not be closed without the report of the Canadian commissioners being submitted to us for our consideration. The reasons which led me to introduce this Bill three years ago are to-day as potent and as cogent as they were then. I should say they are more so, because public opinion against the pollution of navigable rivers, and of waters generally, has made very great progress in the meantime. Legislation has been introduced in many countries in Europe and many of the states of the United States of America, with a view to preventing what I then termed, and I then properly termed, a crime against nature. I hope the Senate will see no reason whatever for changing its mind on this very grave subject, one which—if I may say so—is becoming graver every year and more difficult to deal with and solve as population increases and becomes denser. I need not take up further time, as the matter was very exhaustively gone into on previous occasions and received the deliberate and persistent consideration of the committee over which presides the hon. member for Lethbridge. In the House also it received very exhaustive consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman how this Bill compares with Bill (5), introduced by Mr. Bradbury in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I think all that appears in Mr. Bradbury's Bill appears in mine, but there are provisions in my Bill which are not in Mr. Bradbury's Bill.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, the 26th instant, at three o'clock.

IMPORTATION OF THOROUGHBRED MARES AND STALLIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN rose to:

Call the attention of the Government to some unsatisfactory features regarding the regulations for the importation, duty free, of thoroughbred mares and stallions, and inquire whether it is the intention of the Government to remedy these conditions should they exist?

He said: With the permission of the House I should like to bring before it some objections to present conditions regarding duty-free importation of thoroughbred mares and stallions. I may say that this is a question which is altogether free from any political significance, and no political party could take exception to it. If there is any grievance existing, or if there is anything amiss, both parties are equally responsible, because the conditions complained of have been in existence for a long time. The contentions are:

1. That the Government does not enforce the customs law as to the free import for breeding purposes.

2. That the Government delegates this enforcement to the National Record Committee—a body not responsible to the public or selected by it, and having interests not always the same as those of other importers.

3. This committee declines to use certain powers, thereby depriving importers of part of their rights. It being a private body under no legal duty to perform any function, there are no legal means to compel it to act. That is the reason why I am now presenting the subject.

4. Briefly, the customs law gives entry, duty free, for breeding stock, leaving the Governor in Council to make the necessary regulations. The Governor in Council allows free entry, if the animal is registered in the Canadian Register, or in a foreign record recognized as reliable by the National Record Committee. But here is the kernel of the whole thing. The National Record Committee will not declare that the English, the American, the Australian, or the French Stud Book are recognized as reliable. It will not pronounce as a public body that could be compelled to, that these books are, or are not, reliable. Animals entered in those books are, however, in practice ineligible for entry in the Canadian Register kept by the committee; in fact they are the foundation books for the committee's books.

5. The committee thus takes away from the importer of an animal registered in the English or American Stud Book, etc., one method of free entry. It imposes on him no alternative but to submit to entry in the Canadian Register as a condition precedent to free entry—a condition not authorized by the customs law nor by Order in Council. Also, it gets into its own hands a power to obstruct the importer, for it can make entry into the Canadian Register easy or hard, slow or otherwise, or refuse it altogether.

6. To have one's case considered by the committee one must be the owner of the animal tendered for free entry. That is to say, you must have parted with your money and have purchased the animal abroad and have so far committed yourself to difficulties before knowing whether the committee will allow you to get out of them.

7. Amongst the terms it imposes at present are the producing of written transfers of the animal from the original breeder through every owner down to the importer. Such documents are not usual in transactions relating to thoroughbred horses, are in many cases not procurable, and sometimes only procurable by paying for them. The mere demand for them in many cases would prevent the purchase of a desirable animal because foreign buyers do not need such documents and the seller never has them.

8. A Canadian buyer competing with foreign buyers, therefore, labours under several disadvantages:

(a) There is the certainty of delay while discussing with the committee;

(b) There is the possibility of being unable to procure the documents required;

(c) There is the possibility of being unable to satisfy the committee;

(d) Whilst the duty free entry question is thus held up the animal has to be bonded or duty paid under protest.

9. The result is that an animal undoubtedly registered in the English or the American Stud Book and perhaps perfectly well known on the race track as a performer, cannot always be imported duty free into the country. The trouble and annoyance are so great as to discourage individual importers. To those of limited means they are prohibitory. The story of those who have been through them tends to deter others from attempting to import. This, no doubt, is the underlying object.

10. The Canadian buyer with a limited sum to spend cannot buy as good an animal as his foreign competitor, because the foreign competitor has no doubts or difficulties before him and can pay out the whole sum, while the Canadian buyer has to hold back enough to pay the duty in case of need. Or, to put it another way, to get a particular animal the Canadian buyer has to have the same amount of available cash as the foreign buyer and in addition enough to pay the duty, if levied. Importation into Canada for a given capital, therefore must be of an inferior class. This applies whether you buy abroad or on the race track in Canada a foreign animal racing there in bond.

11. The National Record Committee claim that its system is necessary in order to identify the animals and to build up an ideal system of registration. The country is not sufficiently full of stock to adopt such a system. It is questionable whether theirs is such or is in any event desirable. Stud books are only records of breeding experiments. In countries where they have been most successful the use of them has been voluntary. Their value depends entirely on the reputation for carefulness and integrity of those who use them. The identification requirements are clearly futile for the ostensible purpose.

12. If the Record Committee's system is true in theory, those who follow it should in a few years by the superiority of the class of animals bred by them, demonstrate the advantages of that system. They evidently do not like to trust to this or they would not try to drive those who do not agree with them into their system. If, on the contrary, they believe as their opponents do, that the system means that those who follow it must end by having inferior stock, their anxiety to force it on their competitors is explainable.

13. Paper identification is not possible, even of animals bearing extraordinary marks. A chain of identification is always as weak as the weakest link. The animal's parentage depends (first) on the word of some one who saw the sire put to the dam, and (second) on the word of some one who saw her foal. These things in practice depend on the reliability of the people dealt with. The only result of requiring transfer documents is to form a basis upon which animals may be rejected and importers discouraged.

14. The following considerations show the worth of the identification system adopted:

(a) Those animals already in the country at the inception could not have the system applied to them;

(b) The offspring of animals brought in since upon which duty is paid are registered without identification of their parents.

(c) Obviously, in no event are the parents of the identical animals identified;

(d) A mare brought in in foal may be rejected and the owner forced to pay duty for lack of identification papers, but the foal is registered without any;

(e) The credibility of those who sign the papers can never be tested;

(f) The series of identification papers do not in themselves prove anything and would not make a prima facie case anywhere—because the animal referred to, if it had not some extraordinary marks, could not be shown to be the same as that mentioned in the papers.

15. We want as good a chance to get good stuff for the same investment as our foreign competitors.

16. We want the Government to take the responsibility of seeing that we get it.

17. We do not want to have our business in the hands or power of any group of dealers or breeders. We want to follow our own course and let them follow theirs.

18. The material in the country is poor. The system adopted tends to keep it that way. It tends to compel those provinces not already provided with breeding stock to buy the culls from existing establishments in the provinces that are so provided, or to buy abroad animals the breeder has not been able either to sell or to train. They being still in his hands he can give the complete transfer documents. Even then his word alone makes the only evidence of what the sire and the dam were.

More than forty years ago, the importation free of duty of live stock for breeding purposes was a plank in the Liberal platform. In his Reminiscences, page 44, Sir George Ross gives an interesting account of its effect on one of his elections.

I have just mentioned Sir Geo. Ross's name, and I am sure I am voicing the sentiments of every hon. gentleman in this Chamber when I express the ardent desire that he may soon recover his health, and resume the place which he so well and ably filled when attending the sessions of this House.

Ostensibly for many years past this question I have been discussing has become common ground to both parties.

That it should in the process of time remain so in appearance but have become in fact a disguised protective system for such stock, good or bad, as may be in the country, will at first be hardly credited, but that it is so will be seen after light has been thrown upon the practice as applied to the theory.

There are a certain number of stud books or herd books in foreign countries in which the breeders record the births of their animals. Of course it does not follow that animals there recorded are valuable for breeding purposes nor that many not so recorded are not valuable. To avoid entering on any ground possibly debatable, the discussion may be limited by assuming that an animal is not valuable for breeding purposes unless so recorded. Certain of these books are recognized by the United States Government as being reliable and a list of those so recognized is published by that government.

That is exactly what we would like the Government here to do—publish a list of stud books that they would admit. Surely there must be in the whole world some stud or herd book that is reliable. If the Government of the day would do as the government of any other country is doing, and publish the list, the Canadian buyers would be on the same footing as any other buyer in the world.

The Canadian Government not only does not publish such a list, but it does not itself decide whether any such foreign stud or herd books are reliable. That duty it delegates to the National Record Committee, a body of breeders or dealers no doubt well acquainted with breeding and dealing in the classes of animals in which they are interested, but perhaps for that very reason, not a body which should be selected to make decisions affecting the rights of others who may wish to breed or deal in horses or cattle. The salient point of difference between the American and the Canadian application of the principle of duty free entry for breeding stock therefore is that the one Government publishes a list of the books record in which carries with it duty free entry, while our own delegates this duty to what is essentially a private and non-responsible body.

Whether it be legal for the Government to leave to a committee of dealers in any particular trade the power to affect their competitors' imports may be doubted. The point to be noted at the moment is that by acts of omission rather than commission, firstly of the Government, and secondly of the National Record Committee, some importers suffer through the illegality, if there be one, and are so exposed without having any legal remedy short of interference by Parliament.

The article of the tariff dealing with duty free entry for breeding purposes leaves it to the Government by Order in Council to give effect to the provision. The Government purports to do this by saying that free entry shall be granted to animals owned by British subjects resident in Canada (a) if the animal is registered in the Canadian register for the breed, or (b) in any record kept abroad and recognized as reliable by the National Record Committee.

The provision sounds both fair and wise but falls short of what is desirable, first in that there is no authoritative publication of a list of foreign records recognized as reliable by the Government, second that the National Record Committee will not recognize any foreign record kept abroad as reliable if there is a Canadian record for the breed, and lastly in that being a private body there are no legal means of compelling them to pronounce publicly and definitely on the reliability or otherwise of any foreign record even in the case of one recognized by the United States Government and by every other government all over the world.

There are Canadian records for nearly all the more prominent breeds of cattle and horses. The foreign records recognized as reliable by the United States Government are broadly speaking the very books which form the foundation of the Canadian records, but by omitting and refusing to certify publicly that they are recognized as reliable by the National Record Committee, the Canadian importer is placed in a very different position from the American competitor.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one question. He is asking that the stud books of the United States be recognized in Canada. Will the United States or do the United States recognize Canadian stud books to the same amount and degree.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I am coming to that in a few minutes. The American can import duty free an animal registered in such reliable foreign record as of right. The Canadian can only do so after he has got it recorded in the Canadian register. This is the second salient difference between the method adopted in the two countries. Pedigreed stock, as we all know, is imported for two very different purposes and by two classes of persons interested in different ways. Those who care to inquire into the matter can judge for themselves which purpose the duty free entry provision was most intended to help and what interest is in fact most advantaged by the system in vogue. Better beef cattle, finer dairy cows and more enduring horses are wanted, not in the show rings, but on the farms. The show ring is the place where what the farmer wants is advertised. No one can conceive of the farmer knowingly supporting a system by which direct import by him of stock he needs to cross with and improve his half-bred herd is made hard to him and by which what stock is available through importation by others is likely to be either higher in price or poorer in quality than it need be if full effect were given to the law.

No one would grudge free import to those who breed pedigreed stock in the country nor object to Government keeping their stud and herd books for them, but probably most people would subscribe to the proposition that having these things they should by their produce show that they were breeding as good stock for the price as any one could import direct and duty free. If they cannot show this, surely no one would support a protective system for their benefit, for the effect would be that those who desired pedigreed stock to cross with half-bred herds —and they are the main support of the whole agricultural industry—would get worse animals for their purposes and pay a higher price.

Now, in the most important breeds, should an intending importer apply to know whether say the Percheron Stud Book or the Durham Herd Book is recognized as reliable by the Government, he will be told by the committee that it is not, and he will be invited to register in the Canadian book for these breeds, a record inaugurated and directed by a group of persons already engaged in breeding or importing that class of stock, a book kept by the National Record Committee under their directions and a body upon which they are represented.

Bearing in mind that the intending importer's free entry is thus made to depend (a) on his being a British subject resident in Canada, (b) on his owning the animal and (c) on his being able to get the National Record Committee to record it before he gets free entry, it obviously takes but little to delay, defeat or obstruct him in his endeavour to obtain it.

Amongst the first requirements of the National Record Committee is that transfers of the animal from the breeder up to the importing owner must be furnished, that is that a title from hand to hand must be obtained in writing. This requirement is alleged by the committee to be necessary for the purpose of identifying the animal. Now for the primary purpose of crossing on half-bred stock, if the animal can be proved to be entered on a foreign reliable record, the chain of title is a matter of indifference to the farmer if his legal title be good enough to prevent any one from taking the animal from him. That legal title is neither better nor worse because of the chain of documents. Moreover no such chain of documents covers the real points at which identity is most likely to be lost. The testimony of those who saw the dam bred to the sire or the animal born is not always available. In many breeds the young are taken from the mothers and raised by hand or placed with foster mothers. The identity can only be traced by the testimony of those who were on the spot and saw this done. No records or chain of documents effectively cover the risk of loss of identity at these points. Nor is it desirable that they should because stud and herd books are not books of title but are essentially records of breeding experiments. They have been of most use in those countries where recording in them has been left as a voluntary matter to the breeders. They are of value only as showing the results obtained through the union of one family with another and only of value in so far as they have been carefully carried out and recorded by people whose reputation is beyond question. The character of the breeder counts for everything. The failure as well as the success of the breeder of high character are equally valuable to other breeders. The entries recorded by breeders about whose character or diligence there is the slightest suspicion do not add in the slightest degree to the value of their stock. No matter by whom recorded there are probably in any herd book quite as many worthless animals as there are good ones.

The Canadian importer bidding at a sale, say in England, stands at a disadvantage as compared with his American competitor. The latter can safely buy an animal guaranteed to be recorded in one of the books recognized by his Government. The former cannot. He would like to add some limitations, as to say:

> I will outbid my American competitor if the seller will guarantee duty free entry into Canada or if he will guarantee to furnish all the documents required in Canada for duty free entry in excess of those required in the United States, or if he will sell conditionally on my obtaining free entry.

But these are points which he cannot effectively raise at an auction. He must be prepared to buy and take his chances of delay and of being refused free entry. This he may do if he has on hand funds sufficient. But if he has only the same sum available as his competitor bids, he must content himself with buying an inferior animal.

Suppose he buys, and he must do so before his case will be considered by the committee, he cannot get them to pronounce beforehand as to whether if he purchases such and such an animal, it would come in duty free. The seller not being a British subject resident in Canada, cannot deliver them duty free. Even if he could, he would not do so for the same price as he would take from an American buyer for a straight sale. In a word, the Canadian buyer must be irrevocably committed as owner before he can ascertain whether he is to get free entry or pay duty. Meantime his animal lands in Canada and he has to pay duty under protest, or is forced to become a public warehouseman under bond with sureties.

If he buy direct from the breeder in England and hold the animal there as owner until by correspondence he has made his course clear he may escape some of the risks, but even then if he cannot secure free entry he has certain dangers before him, and in any event is debarred from any of the chances to make advantageous purchases which are open to foreign buyers.

Take it all in all, a foreign buyer knows exactly where his government stands; knows that it means to help him to bring in stock duty free. The Canadian buyer knows that whatever the law may say, the practice leaves him in doubt and he must feel fairly sure that the National Record Committee's system leaves him at a disadvantage. Months may, and do, elapse while he is piecing together documents required by the committee. Meantime he cannot sell the animal and does not know what it is to cost him ultimately. The keep makes a big hole in his margin of profit. The American purchaser of a like animal at the same sale has his purchase through the customs without delay. His importation is not subject to registration in any books kept by his trade competitors. They cannot force him to record in books kept by them, and with good reason, for except where an animal is intended for use in a registered herd, recording in such books in his own country is of no use either to him or to his country, but the registration being a voluntary matter, he can apply for it when and as it seems to be of any use to him.

Enough has been said to show that free import as affecting pure breeds intended to be bred to half-bred herds is not given due effect to.

As to the result of the system on the pure bred herds already in the country and through them on the class of animal to be bought out of them by the farmer for cross-breeding, it may be pointed out that the only use to the country of such herds is to supply the farmer with as good an animal in price and quality as he could import direct from abroad. Such a class of animal local breeders only need to produce under the direct stimulus of competition. If that be removed, and it is in part removed by the difficulties in importing direct, then they will sell him something not quite so good as his American competitor may get abroad at the same cost.

The trend of the system, therefore, on the whole, is to discourage the individual importer and to make a semi-protective system for the benefit of stock already in the country. That is free import of the farmer's raw material is discouraged and inferior raw material already in the country protected, and this in the face of the declared policy of Parliament.

Thus, since the days when Sir George Ross stood for the House of Commons we have swung around to the opposite point of the compass as to the encouragement of free imports. Should we not swing back and not only say, but mean free imports of pedigreed stock, and see that the farmer gets what the law gives him. No matter is more for-reaching than this upon the material prosperity of the country.

A thousand Polled Angus or Durham bulls in the West bring down ten times their cost to the shipping points inside of three or four years merely through the increased weight and quality of their stock. Like improvements would follow free imports of dairy cattle and of horses. Those provinces most in need of better saleable stock suffer the most from existing conditions.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

That the law is not applied is clear. Why it should not be applied has to be explained. Why a private body exercises part of the functions of Government cannot be satisfactorily explained. No part of a subject's rights should be taken away from him by a body not answerable to the electors and which cannot through the courts be compelled to perform the duties assigned to it for the simple reason that it is a private body and cannot be compelled to perform any more of the duties than it chooses.

A brief review of the circumstances suggests certain modifications as being imperatively necessary.

1. The Government should publish a list of all foreign records which are generally recognized as reliable. Record in these should entitle an animal to free entry. There is no difficulty in making such a list. The National Record Committee have such a list which they use as the basis of entering in their own books although they will not certify that the books they so use are reliable within the meaning of the Order in Council when the individual importer wants to obtain free entry. Even if they had not such a list, the list published by the United States Government affords sufficient information.

2. No private body should have anything to say as to the application of the customs law to its competitors and free entry should not depend in any way on recording in any book kept in Canada.

3. The Canadian stud and herd books should be open to voluntary entry upon such terms as those who keep them see fit. Their present system is more exacting than is thought necessary by many foreign systems. Whether rightly or wrongly so, depends on whether the book is conceived to be a record of breeding experiments or a history of title.

As a voluntary matter there would be no objection to their following either theory, it is only when they seek to impose their system on others who do not need it that their theories interfere with the rights of others and thereby become of any public importance.

If as a result of the voluntary application of their present system of title and so called identification they produce a still better stock for the money than can be procured abroad, the country will have reason to congratulate itself. That they hope to do so or believe that they can do so is to say the least cast in doubt by their desire to force the system on others even to the point of refusing them free entry. If they believed as their opponents do that their system and practice tend to discourage the individual importer and to create a disguised protection for the benefit of herds already in the country, their anxiety to force the system on others would be explainable, because by getting every one into the same position the possibility of comparing the benefits of their system with what can be done under the system of free imports, would be gone. Until they have shown their value, it would seem that there is no particular reason why their ideas should be enforced at the expense of the country, contrary to law and to the detriment of their trade competitors.

I have done my best to make this matter as clear as possible. What would be desirable would be for the Government to publish a list of reliable stud books, and have animals registered say, in one of those stud books, either in Europe or the United States. Then the importer would be granted entry free, as in other countries. To-day if a Canadian buys an animal he has no guarantee that this animal will fulfill all the requirements. On the other hand those who compete at the auction can, in their own countries, bring in those animals just because of the mere fact that the stud books in those countries are admissible.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—This is a matter of very great importance, and it strikes a heavy blow at the whole record system of Canada, not only with regard to one line of stock, but with regard to the whole stock of the country. It is desirable that the question should be fully discussed, and from the nature of the document that has been read by the hon. gentleman, one can easily see that it is impossible for us, from simply hearing this paper read, to reach anything like a just conclusion as to what the Government should do. I call attention, by way of illustrating the importance to the general public of this question, to the fact that, at the present moment, there are 10,000 men who pay their fees regularly and are identified with this Live Stock Association of Canada. In addition to the 10,000 direct members, who are some of our most important breeders of stock of various kinds, there are also 35,000 individuals who are doing business with this association. I have gone into this question somewhat closely, and I am prepared to proceed at the present moment and discuss the matter; but there is a large number of gentlemen all over the country who are financially interested, and I therefore move that the debate be adjourned until Tuesday next. The matter will be published in the press and people will form some idea of its importance. Then again there are gentlemen who are personally interested in the question who are not present to-day and it would be taking an undue advantage of them to proceed now.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—I second the motion to adjourn the debate, and I think, instead of referring it to the full House on Tuesday next, it should be sent to the Agricultural Committee. A committee on agriculture was formed a few years ago and performed some very active work for a session or so, but that committee has since been dropped entirely. Now a question arises which affects the agriculturists of this country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But this is not a motion.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—We could adjourn the debate and refer the question to that committee afterwards.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It requires a substantive motion.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF THE GEOGRAPHIC BOARD OF CANADA.

INQUIRY.

The notice of inquiry being called:

By the Honourable Mr. Choquette:

Has the Geographic Board of Canada published every year a report of their deliberations? If so, was it published in French and English, if not, why?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. member is not present, but I have the reply to this question and we might as well dispose of it. The hon. member will find the reply in the Senate Debates. The answer follows:

1. Yes. The first six reports were published in French and English. The seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh and twelfth reports have been published in English but not in French.
2. No information in the Interior Department as to why not.

BOOKING AGENTS IN EUROPE.

INQUIRY.

The notice of inquiry being called:

By the Hon. Mr. Davis:—

1. How many booking agents does the Government employ in the British Isles and on the continent of Europe?

2. How much money has been paid out to them in the years 1911, 1912 and 1913, as bonuses and otherwise, giving details?

3. How much is allowed per head on emigrants forwarded to Canada?

4. What are the names of the corporations acting as booking agents in the British Isles, and what amount did they receive in the years 1911, 1912 and 1913, and how many emigrants did they forward to Canada, giving sex?

5. Are there any booking agents employed by the Government on the American continent?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman is not present, but I have the answer ready and it is as follows:

1. There are 1,890 booking agents in the British Isles who receive from the Government bonuses upon farmers, farm labourers and female domestic servants sent to Canada. There are 54 similar agencies on the continent of Europe.

2. Fiscal year.	Bonus Payments to Booking Agents in British Isles.	Bonus Payments to Booking Agents on Continent of Europe.
1912-1913.. ..	110,422 02	8,239 25

3. Bonus of £1 on adults and 10 shillings on those between one and eighteen years of age is paid to British booking agents on farmers, farm labourers and female domestic servants sent to Canada. Same amounts are paid to certain selected continental booking agents on farmers, farm labourers and female domestic servants sent from France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland.

4. This question refers to the agents mentioned in answer No. 1 and owing to amount of information required should be dealt with as a return.

5. Four agents in the United States are paid upon a commission basis.

ALDWYCH SITE IN LONDON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POWER rose to—

Call attention to the scheme proposed by Earl Grey for the establishment, on what is known as the Aldwych site in London, England, of a Dominion House for the purpose of concentrating the offices of the self governing dominions and their various provinces, now distributed in different parts of the capital of the Empire, and inquire if the Government of Canada is prepared to give favourable consideration to the said scheme?

He said: I rise for the purpose of calling attention to this scheme of Earl Grey's, with which I suppose most hon. members are fairly familiar. Earl Grey's interest in the dominions, generally, is very keen, and the interest that he has shown, since he has ceased to be Governor General here, in the welfare of Canada, is a special sort of interest which calls for the gratitude of Canadians. Hon. gentlemen have probably noticed in the vestibule of the parliament buildings, a number of drawings prepared by an architect--Mr. Marshall, I think—showing what the proposed building on the Aldwych site is to be like, if the scheme of Earl Grey's should be adopted. They are very handsome pictures, but I wish to state for the information of hon. gentlemen that I am not in any sense responsible for their being put there. I am very glad they are on exhibition, but I have nothing to do with putting them there. Further, in the few remarks I intend to make I do not wish to commit myself to the particular building delineated in these plans and drawings. I shall just read from No. 4 of the pamphlets which Earl Grey and his associates have caused to be distributed. This I do not so much for the purpose of informing hon. gentlemen, who have already probably informed themselves on this subject, but for that limited section of the public who may read the Debates of the Senate. The first quotation I shall make is from page 8 of this pamphlet:

A great municipal improvement, involving a huge demolition of old property, has left a vacant space of about 124,000 square feet, approximating three acres, at the central meeting point of east and west . . . Where the Strand broadens into a lake, of which the curving Aldwych is the further shore, room has been left for a building, whatever it may be, which will be unsurpassed in the whole Metropolis for its command of the public eye. If one had to define the centre of London, taking into account the currents of traffic and the balance of a capital's diverse interests, this is the spot where it might be most justly located. The newspaper world of Fleet street joins hands here with the region of theatres and hotels. The law courts and the historic Temple are linked by the official archives of Somerset House with the ancient 'Precinct of the Savoy.' It is fringed at the radius of a stone's throw by such landmarks as Temple Bar, Waterloo Bridge, Cleopatra's Needle, Covent Garden, Holborn and Drury Lane. Its nearest neighbours to the east are the statue of Gladstone and the church of St. Clement Danes, and to the west the Gaiety and Lyceum theatres. Its great northern frontage of over 600 feet faces the spacious and stately Kingsway, while to the south it looks across a broad thoroughfare to the busy Strand. The environing scene is one upon which the ancient and the modern builder alike have bestowed all the dignity of their noble art. But the edifice which occupies the centre will be the riveting object of an area through which every stream of the metropolitan life flows, and will proclaim itself urbi et orbi in a fashion to which St. Paul's and the Palace of Westminster offer the only parallels.

Such is the site, then, upon which a great organ and a brilliant symbol of Empire may be established. What is the design of those who have ventured to conceive the accomplishment of these aims? It is most succinctly stated in the following sentences from a letter which Lord Grey addressed last February to the Improvements Committee of the London County Council—

It would be possible . . . to concentrate on the Aldwych site the Dominion Government offices, now widely distributed in different parts of London. . .

It would also be possible to focus the attention of the home consumer more effectively on the quality of the products grown in our Oversea Dominions. . .

It would also be possible to include in the buildings to be erected on the Aldwych site, accommodation which would meet not only the official requirements of the Dominion Government, but the commercial and social needs of their respective peoples.

Taking these objects, seriatim, the concentration of Dominion offices in London upon one spot seems to commend itself for many reasons of practical convenience. At present the agencies of the various Dominions and their component states, or provinces are dotted all over the city proper, the Strand district and Westminster, with the result that business involving more than one of them has to be prosecuted with an irksome amount of travelling and a constant recourse to the directory. It may be added that in their sporadic state they fail to make any collective impression upon the mind of the community. There is not one Londoner in a thousand who would be able to name off-hand the location of a single Dominion's representative. This is a remarkable anomaly, considering how the personal and public ties between Great Britain and the outer empire have been multiplied of recent years.

The second purpose—that of a permanent exhibition of empire products—is of well-defined value, both for the extension of Dominion trade in the British market and for the guidance of emigration. Such displays upon special occasions have always attracted popular interest. In some cases they are regularly maintained upon a small scale, and undoubtedly attract attention, but the effect is altogether missed of a great central exhibition appealing by its range as well as by its quality, and presented under conditions which make it a matter of universal knowledge. The element of éclat is indispensable to the full effect of such efforts, and consideration of the present scheme will suggest the fundamental change in that respect which it would be the means of securing.

A further and most important object is to obtain a readier access for British manufacturers to the Dominion markets, and this would be effectively promoted by a permanent and continually revised exhibition of articles in use in the Dominions, along with an information bureau upon all those matters of traffic, transportation and trade facts, which so greatly affect the facilities of inter-Imperial commerce. Such an institution would be for the exclusive use of the members of approved Manufacturers' Associations, and its services would not be at the disposal of foreign competitors and their representatives.

That is the scheme, and the three substantial reasons why it should be adopted. Then this Foreword goes on, a little further down:

To some extent, at any rate, the aspirations of the promoters will be fulfilled, since the ground adjacent, on the eastward, to the vacant area, has been taken by the Government of the Australian Commonwealth, for the erection of its offices, at a total cost of between £600,000 and £700,000.

That suggests one consideration which I think should tend to dispose the Government to look favourably upon the scheme. One of our great rivals in England—of course the rivalry is of a friendly character—is Australia, which has secured a portion of this central site; and if Canada, South Africa and New Zealand lag behind and do not secure the remainder of the site they will be at a very considerable disadvantage in competing with Australia for immigrants from the old country, and for business with the old country. The business aspect, the financial terms, are spoken a little further on, as follows:

The London County Council, who are the owners of the soil, have agreed to grant a ninety-nine years' lease at a rental graduated up till the fifth year, when it will reach the permanent rate of £50,000, or the freehold may be purchased for £1,300,000, with interest on that sum calculated at 3½ per cent per annum from the 24th June, 1913. Meanwhile the option is vested in a syndicate with the title of 'The Dominion Site, Ltd.'

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—You did not mention the area.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes. 124,000 square feet, nearly three acres. That is the scheme; and what is the present condition of things? Take Canada and her provinces—I leave out South Africa and New Zealand—and Canada's principal office, the office of the High Commissioner of Canada, is at No. 17 Victoria street. Most of the hon. gentlemen here have been in London recently, and I think every one of them will bear testimony that the office is not, either in its character or in its locality, the kind of office that Canada should have.

It is in a comparatively remote situation, and requires a considerable time to reach; it does not catch the eye of the ordinary London citizen at all. The building is not conspicuous, the situation is not a desirable one, and the offices themselves are the reverse of attractive. Then Canada has another immigration building in Trafalgar Square. That is a fairly central locality; but, of course, every one can see that all the Canadian offices should be together. Then the province of New Brunswick has an office in Southampton Row on the Strand, and Nova Scotia has an office in Pall Mall, and that is an office one might almost fall over without realizing that there was such an office there. Prince Edward Island has an office at Ashley Gardens, Westminster. Quebec has an office at 36 King's Way; British Columbia has an office in Salisbury House; and the Ontario Immigration offices are at 163 Strand. It does not require any argument to show that it is a desirable thing, if practicable at all, that these offices should be consolidated. I do not propose to quote further at any length from this pamphlet, but I shall just give one quotation from the London Times as follows:

> Australia having already bespoken a part of the site, it lies now with Canada, South Africa and New Zealand to consider Lord Grey's scheme. The more they do so, the more we believe, will they appreciate the great advantages which it presents. The Dominions have surely nothing to gain and much to lose by setting up their Central London offices in different parts. They cannot separately, however much they spend, raise such an emblem of their vast resources and wealth as might be built if Lord Grey's vision is realized by altogether on this single central site. The aim of each in raising London offices is the aim of all. It can be carried out far more impressively by joint effort than in any other way. The difficulty besetting such ideas as Lord Grey's is always that they are called visionary and so left unconsidered until too late. But Lord Grey's enthusiasm is usually too strong for such treatment to depress. It carried him triumphantly to success in what seemed at first the very visionary idea of persuading British and French in Canada to hold a common festival and make a common possession of the fields of Abraham—an idea so striking that it was ultimately supported by generous subscriptions from New Zealand and other distant British communities. The present scheme is certainly not less worthy of attention, and, we believe, of support.

Now, this scheme, if carried into effect, apart altogether from the convenience to Canadians, and other Colonials who visit London—if I may use the expression Colonial,—would be a great advertisement to the Dominion. The site selected by Earl Grey is really, as the Foreword which I have read from states about as central a position as there is in the whole city of London. I do not suppose there is a single site in London where a larger proportion of the eight million inhabitants of that capital would be more likely, or as likely, to notice the Dominion buildings, as on this Aldwych site.

As every hon. gentleman must have noticed there are scores of extracts from the English and the Colonial newspapers cordially endorsing the scheme of Earl Grey. In addition hon. gentlemen probably noticed that yesterday in Toronto the Associated Boards of Trade of the province of Ontario adopted a resolution recommending this scheme to the favourable consideration of the Government. I have not seen anywhere, and I have not heard from any one, any objection to this scheme of Earl Grey's. I suppose the only real objection is the cost. Well, Canada of late has not been very much given to counting the cost of improvements. If any step is looked upon as an improvement, we take the step as a matter of course. No doubt £1,300,000 is a considerable sum to pay for a site, but I believe that, in the course of a very few years, Canada will be recouped for the expenditure in the increased business done with the old country and in the increased emigration directed towards Canada from these central offices. Hon. gentlemen know that I am not, as a rule, an advocate of what might be called extravagant expenditure, and I am not very much of a Jingo; but I think that the present condition of things with respect to the offices of the Dominion and its provinces in London, is the reverse of creditable to Canada. If we have to make a move; if we have to obtain a central site for our buildings, and consolidate all these offices, trade rooms, and so on in one place, we may never have a chance to get a site so admirably suited as this, for the purpose.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said, I think that Earl Grey deserves to be commended for the continued interest which he is giving to all that concerns Canada, and his opinion on the question now before this honourable House, would go a long way toward influencing me as to the proper course to be taken. With the limited knowledge I have of the city of London and the site to be acquired, I have no hesitation in saying that the present site of the Dominion's offices should be changed if possible, and I approve of the idea of grouping together all the offices of the different colonies, and locating them in a central place. The site which has been mentioned appears to me a proper place for the offices of the Dominion. As to whether the amount demanded for the site is reasonable or not, I am not qualified to express an opinion. I have no hesitation in adding however, that it seems the duty of the Government to take up the question in a vigorous way and decide whether that site should be secured; and if not what other site should be purchased. The Government should try to act in conjunction with all the other overseas dominions. I entirely agree with the expression of opinion which has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, except as to committing myself as to whether the price of the site is reasonable or not. I repeat I have not sufficient information as to that, but I hope the Government will see its way to giving attention to this very important question, with a view to solving it in the best interests of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—If I am correctly informed the proposed site is immediately in front of the Waldorf hotel where the hon. member from Belleville, Halifax, and myself stayed for two weeks, and had an opportunity of looking over this site. It seems to be in the very centre of London. The hon. gentleman from De Salaberry has raised the question of price: It seems to me that it is very cheap—cheaper than any corresponding site in the heart of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—How much?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—About £10 or $50 per square foot. Land on St. James St. in Montreal has sold for $75 per square foot, and one would naturally expect that land in the heart of London would be more expensive. Possibly a special price has been fixed as a favour by the county council of London. I think the country would benefit by grouping the offices of the overseas possessions in London. Instead of sending commissioners travelling to South Africa or Australia they would just have to go from one part of this central building to another to transact business with all their overseas dominions.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—I had occasion recently to visit the Dominion offices in London in company with a friend. The first thing I heard him say when walking into the building was 'Oh what dingy buildings.' We were referred by the Commissioner's office to the Emigration office in Whitehall, and from Whitehall to the Imperial institute in Kensington. Shortly afterwards, meeting an old friend of mine in London, Sir John Tavenor, High Commissioner for South Australia, he took me to their new buildings in the Strand. They were formerly neighbours of ours on Victoria street, but have lately opened what might, in commercial terms, be called a new shop. On the first floor were the commissioners' offices, reading rooms, and reception rooms; on the second and third floors were magnificent reception rooms, offices, and a museum. Sir John Tavenor told me himself that the rent they paid for the new offices, having bought the land from the London county council, amounted to a trifle more than the rent they used to pay at Victoria street. Everybody who has been to London will admit with me that the present Canadian commissioner's offices are not a good advertisement for Canada. If you go in there at two o'clock in the afternoon to look over a newspaper you have to do so either by electric light or gaslight.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Canada has come into the sunlight lately; why should we not try to get in our offices in London, as much sunlight and advertising as possible? We have spent enormous sums of money in exhibitions throughout the world, and are doing it yet, but a permanent exhibition under one roof in London would, I think, be an excellent thing for Canada.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—We owe a debt of gratitude to Earl Grey, of whom I must say I am a great admirer. He favoured Canada with a wise administration, and initiated, in the province of Quebec, a certain stimulus in national pride, having been the first to suggest a monument to the memory of Madeleine de Verchères on the shores of the St. Lawrence river. That idea has been successfully carried out, and to-day everybody navigating the St. Lawrence from Quebec to Montreal is bound to pass that monument and to study the history of the heroine whose statue Earl Grey suggested. We need new quarters in London and I think it would be a recognition of the debt of gratitude from Canada to Earl Grey to pick up his idea. This site, which is within a stonesthrow of all the great monuments of London, on the greatest thoroughfare of London, the Strand, would give Canada a very good advertisement, and, I should think, would not cost us any more than having an emigration office in one corner, and the commissioner's office in another. At present there are, in London, sixteen different offices belonging to the Dominions. If they were united in a friendly competition under the same roof, it would bring about a friendliness among them; and a comparison between the different products of the different countries, would not only be instructive to the Dominions themselves but would teach all the other nations a great lesson in regard to the productions of the different colonies. For these reasons I am strongly in favour of new offices in London, and of following Earl Grey's idea, because I think it would be paying him a tribute of gratitude for the wise government he has given us in the past.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think I am warranted in saying that the general opinion is that our offices should be removed from Victoria street to more commodious and central quarters. This is a matter that has received the attention of the Government for some time past. The late high commissioner was very much impressed with the necessity of Canada taking some steps in the direction of acquiring a property and erecting a building in the heart of London. He was very much attracted to another site; that is to a site other than the one which we are now discussing; and very considerable communication took place between Lord Strathcona and the Government of Canada respecting the site to which I allude. Some of the members of the Government, when in London last season, inspected that particular site. In the meantime Earl Grey suggested the scheme which my hon. friend from Halifax has submitted this afternoon, but it was not until recently—within the last few weeks—that this scheme was placed officially before the Government. At the instance of Earl Grey, Lord Chelmsford and Mr. Bond of London, came out to Canada a short time ago with those sketches which have been exhibited in the corridor and submitted the scheme to the Government, and explained the project which Lord Grey has in view. The matter is now before the Government. Nothing has yet been done respecting that scheme. I may say, however, that the Government is deeply impressed with the necessity of doing something. The scheme unquestionably is an attractive one, and one which would commend itself doubtless to a very large number of people in the Dominion of Canada, but up to the present time the Government is not committed to one scheme or the other, but is giving its best consideration to the advisability of seriously taking up the subject of securing, as I have stated, more central and commodious quarters in the city of London for Canadian offices.

THE CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the motion of the Honourable Mr. Power:—

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary and, without special reference, to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House and the point of Order raised by the Honourable Mr. Bolduc thereto.

The SPEAKER—If the House will permit me—

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not suppose His Honour the Speaker will object to my making a brief statement of what has taken place in connection with this matter, because it came up for only two or three minutes some considerable time ago, and hon. gentlemen have probably forgotten what the position is.

The SPEAKER—I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that he is taking up the matter in a very irregular way now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not so clear about that.

The SPEAKER—It has arrived at this point, that the discussion was closed, and my decision was to be given. If the hon. gentleman wants to re-open the debate, I have no objection, but it must be with the leave of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then, with the leave of the House. If we were speaking now, just after the question of Order had been raised, I should not attempt to say anything, but honestly it is so long since the question was raised—and I know there are some hon. gentlemen who do not know just what the question of Order is—I think it is just as well to bring the matter up again.

The SPEAKER—But that is not the question at all. The question is whether I am ready to give my decision. The debate has been closed and the principle the hon. gentleman invokes is not a parliamentary one at all. If the discussions which have been closed must be re-opened, because one or two members were absent, we would never be finished. I have no objection to re-opening the discussion, but I want it done with the consent of the Senate, and only as a matter of courtesy and not as a right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am under an obligation to His Honour for agreeing to waive the strict rule in the matter, and I have very little to say. I think perhaps some other hon. gentleman may have something to say. At page 32 of the Minutes I find the following motion:

The Honourable Mr. Lougheed, moved, seconded by the Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell,

That the senators mentioned in the report of the Committee of Selection as having been chosen to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session, be and they are hereby appointed to form part of and constitute the several Committees with which their respective names appear in said report, to inquire into and report upon such matters as may be referred to them from time to time; and the Committee on Standing Orders is authorized to send for persons, papers and records whenever required.

The question of concurrence being put thereon, the same was resolved in the affirmative, and Ordered accordingly.

That was on January 22. On the 23rd January, at page 44, the hon. leader of the House moved that a message be sent to the House of Commons with regard to the joint committees, and the various standing committees reported their chairman, and the reduction of the quorums. Then I made the following motion:

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary and, without special reference, to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House.

After debate.

A point of Order being raised by the Honourable Mr. Bolduc to the effect that this motion is in contradiction of a motion on the same subject which was adopted by the Senate yesterday.

His Honour the Speaker asked that he be permitted to take the matter en délibéré.

And that was accordingly done, and now this motion of mine appears on the Order Paper. I just wish to say that while there may be some question as to the power of the committee to deal with a matter that has not been referred to it, there can be no question as to the power of the Senate to deal with any matter affecting the administration of the business of this House. If the Senate chooses to authorize a committee to deal with any matter that comes within the purview of the Senate itself, the Senate has the power to do it. That is my contention in brief. The Senate had undoubtedly the power to deal with the matter referred to in my notice and resolution, and it has the power to give that authority to the committee. What is the substance of the resolution? It is that the committee be authorized to do certain things, which without a special authorization, it could not do under the strict rule. My contention is that the House has the power to instruct or authorize any committee to deal with any subject the House chooses to refer to it, and of course we must remember that a committee does not deal with a matter finally. The committee simply inquires and reports to this House, and whatever it reports has to be confirmed by the House. It will be seen that any other view of this matter would involve us in endless difficulty and inconvenience. I refer to May at page 383. This refers to a committee of the whole House, but like rules apply to other committees. The following is from May:

A committee can only consider those matters which have been committed to them by the House. If it be desirable that other matters should also be considered, an instruction is given by the House to empower the committee to entertain them. An instruction should always be moved as a distinct question.

And so on. Then at page 400 May says that the rules that apply to Select committees, apply generally to Standing committees:

The proceedings of every Select Committee are restricted to their own order of reference: that is to say, they are confined to the consideration of the matter referred or the Bill committed to the committee, but when it has been thought desirable to do so, the House has enlarged the order of reference. This has been done in the case of a Select Committee upon a public matter by means of an instruction, which may be made by an independent motion.

Mine was an independent motion. Then, Bourinot, at page 652, says:

Considerable misapprehension appears to exist as to the meaning of an instruction. An instruction is given to a committee to confer on it that power which, without such instruction, it would not have. If the subject-matter of an instruction is relevant to the subject-matter and within the scope and title of a bill, then such instruction is irregular since the committee has the power to make the acquired amendment.

Then on page 656.

According to the modern practice of Parliament an instruction to a committee is not mandatory, and it is therefore customary to state explicitly in the motion, as shown above, that the committee have power to make the provision required in the Bill. For, as stated by Mr. Speaker Denison, the intention of the instruction is to give a committee power to do a certain thing if they think proper, not to command them to do it.

I shall not trouble the House any further. I am very much obliged to the House generally and to His Honour the Speaker for having been given an opportunity to state the matter briefly. The point is just this, that the House must have the power to instruct a committee to attend to matters which are really, and which have been considered in the past to be, within the sphere of the Committee. I have been a Member of the Internal Economy Committee for a great many years, and that Committee has always dealt with matters affecting the Internal Economy of the House, without special reference to each case, and it would be, at least, a great inconvenience if we had to get authority for every little matter that we may wish to deal with. As I pointed out before, nothing that the House can do, can seriously affect the power of His Honour the Speaker to make nominations to appointments.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—On the 22nd of January last the following resolution, moved by the Hon. Mr. Lougheed and seconded by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, was adopted:

That the Senators mentioned in the report of the Committee of Selection as having been chosen to serve on the several Standing Committes during the present session, be and they are hereby appointed to form part of and constitute the several Committees with which their respective names appear in said report, to inquire into and report upon such matters as may be referred to them from time to time; and the Committee on Standing Orders is authorized to send for persons, papers and records whenever required.

If the hon. gentleman had pointed out a special case that he wanted to have referred to the Internal Economy Committee he would have been in perfect order, but he is not in order in making a general motion that anything may be taken up by the Committee and discussed, and reported upon to the House. Imagine what would happen if all the Committees had such powers. Any member of the Committee could bring up any question that he chose, and ask the committee to decide upon it and make a report to the Senate. We understand very well the difficulties which arise when a committee makes a recommendation, and the House refuses to accept the decision of the committee. I repeat that after having adopted unanimously the motion which I have quoted, it is out of order for any member to move a resolution like the one which has been presented by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. Any time a member of this House wishes to have a matter brought before the Committee on Contingent Accounts, he is at perfect liberty to do so. Without saying anything more I am willing to abide by the decision of the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I did not take any part in the discussion on the 23rd of January, of this question, but I followed the debate; and I understand that the objection now made to the motion of the hon. senator from Halifax, is that the adoption of the resolution moved by the hon. leader of the House on January 22 practically precludes this House from acting in respect of this resolution. First, let me say that the matters which are dealt with by the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts are nothing other than domestic affairs, having regard to the proper conduct of the whole business of the House. The work of that committee, which is composed of twenty-five members, is to inquire into and become possessed of facts and knowledge this House could not get in any other form, and present others for the consideration of the House. The character of the work they have to deal with is of such class that the House ought to be quite willing to place it in their hands, not for its absolute and final determination—because this resolution does not ask for that—but for the purpose of making inquiries in respect to it, and reporting back to this House for action, either by way of confirmation or, if not meeting their approval, for their special objection to it. That is the only ground on which the hon. senator from Lauzon made objection to the passage of this resolution. I would like to read this resolution, just as the hon. member from Halifax has presented it to the House:

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary.

Certainly there is nothing serious in that. We meet in a committee room. Surely this Senate would not object to our meeting. In going that far I should imagine there would be no such disposition, or in the resolution adopted on January 22, there would be nothing to prevent our committee meeting. Then the resolution proceeds:

—and, without special reference, to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House.

It could not be any more simple and less objectionable, that this committee, desirous of having these matters thoroughly ventilated and understood both as to the organization of the staff and the work of the staff, should ascertain all these facts and come back to this House:

After investigation and report we find such and such things, and we make certain recommendations.

and the House would have the power, to accept or reject the report.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Convenience and common sense.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—According to some quotations to be found in the Senate Debates, this course was objected to on the grounds that Bourinot said it would e improper for the House to deal with this question. References were made at the time at page 452, which reads as follows:

The old rule of Parliament reads that a question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the House.

The resolution that was adopted in this House on the motion of the leader of the House in no sense restricted the action of the Senate. However, just as a matter for argument, assuming that there was an element of restriction in that resolution—then the reference to Bourinot might in a sense carry out the view that having once established it cannot be questioned again. I am willing to admit that the hon. Speaker, when he drew attention to that view of Bourinot, was only desirous of presenting to the House the facts in relation to the government of this House by its rules and practice; but my hon. friend in quoting at the time from page 452 omitted a very important part of what Bourinot said. He left out the very essence that ought to have been presented to the House so that in forming their judgment they could know exactly Bourinot's opinion in respect to the powers of the Senate in dealing with this question. It says on page 452:

It is, however, an ancient rule of Parliament that no question or motion can regularly be offered if it is substantially the same with one on which the judgment of the House has already been expressed during the current session.

Now, by the arguments advanced to the Senate, it is a restrictive resolution that was adopted by this House on the motion of the hon. leader. Is this resolution a restrictive resolution? Is it substantially the same resolution? Why, it is diametrically the very reverse of that. We are extending and enlarging, not restricting, the scope of the committee; and in my judgment that feature of it is the important view that Bourinot entertains, to govern this House. We assert that that resolution now being considered is the reverse, and not substantially the same as the resolution adopted by Senate, January 22nd. Then, we have another authority here which governs parliamentary practice and which in a large measure informs this House as to what should be the practice here. May says on page 301.

Sometimes the House may not be prepared to rescind a resolution but may be willing to modify its judgment by considering and agreeing to another resolution relating to the same subject.

Now, there are both sides of the issue. Bourinot says it was questionable whether Parliament should have taken any action in respect of that resolution, if the resolution were substantially the same, and passed during the current session. But May believes that, even if that were the case, the House might change its opinion and in a measure modify its opinion in respect to that one question.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—That would be on a reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—On a reconsideration of that one subject. Apart from that, let me say that the House has already afirmed the very position covered by the motion of the hon. senator from Halifax. Only last year this House adopted a resolution which reads as follows:

That all positions in the lower grade of the staff of the Senate which is, in the opinion of the Justice Department above quoted, or exempted from the provisions of the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908 necessarily of a temporary character, the payment for such service being fixed on a per diem basis be made by the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts upon the requisition of the clerk of the Senate and based upon a report in writing of the housekeeper, in all cases where such appointments form part of the staff under his control.

The House last year affirmed more than is asked by this resolution of the hon.

senator from Halifax, which only asks that we shall have the privilege, without a reference from the House, of considering and determining questions that belong to the domestic and internal affairs of the Senate, and reporting back to the Senate through the Clerk of the Senate.

The SPEAKER—Is the quotation the hon. gentleman has just made a report from the Committee on Internal Economy ?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It is a report of the Committee on Internal Economy adopted by this House.

The SPEAKER—It was a report.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—These were resolutions.

The SPEAKER—The resolution was taken by this House upon a report of the committee ?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Yes, on the 31st day of January, 1913. Let me go further. There are two branches of Parliament—the House of Commons and the Senate. The Internal Economy Committee, House of Commons, is in possession of every question of a domestic character without reference to the House, and the House only gets in possession of what the members have deliberated upon, by their report. As reported in the 'Hansard,' only the other day, one gentleman called attention to the existence of an employee of the House for forty-seven years, yet no member took the responsibility of moving that the matter should be referred to the Internal Economy Committee of the House. They called it to the committee's attention, and this whole question of domestic policy or domestic affairs of the House is dealt with by the Committee on Internal Economy, and is then brought to the attention of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a commission, not a committee.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It is called the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts. The members are appointed by the Government, but have absolute control. Looking back over the practice of the House, from time immemorial this committee has been charged with the important trust and duty of looking after all matters of a domestic character of the Senate; and I cannot understand how this resolution, in itself, can at all interfere with the original practice of the House or with the rights of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I have not formed any opinion yet on this question, but in order to know exactly what to think on it, I would ask whether the Deputy Minister of Justice did not last year decide, or express the opinion, that as regards certain matters, the Committee on Internal Economy has the same right as it had before the law which was passed three years ago as to the Civil Service ? Then, if the committee has the same rights as it had before, what is the use of this motion? Could not the Committee on Internal Economy investigate a certain matter which it has a right to investigate, and report to the Senate without a resolution of this nature?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It is contended that we would not have this right, because of the resolution adopted, on the motion of the hon. leader of the House. To-day, it is objected that we are precluded by the terms of that resolution. In respect to the other matter, the Deputy Minister of Justice only affirmed certain features of the Civil Service Act, which left the Senate the original practice that had been exercised prior to the passing of that Act. The committee does not ask to interfere with the Speaker's rights so far as he possesses them under the Civil Service Act, or with the rights of any other officers of the House.

The SPEAKER: I must confess that in allowing this discussion to go on, I expected that new light would be thrown on the subject, but all I gather from the discussion that has taken place this afternoon is that we are considering the powers of the committee, and the power of the House to give instructions to the committee. I never denied that. The House has power to give any instruction to a committee, and the committee itself receives the references from the House. Any question that goes to a committee is sent to that committee by the House, and is not taken up by the committee itself. That is the case with all committees; they take up such questions as are sent to them by the House. I do not see, speaking in a general way, that there is any objection to the Internal Economy Committee taking up any matter that may be referred to it. As the hon. gentleman from Halifax has done himself, when he rose to speak to-day, I want to refresh the memory of the House as to past events. I have taken the trouble in the decision I am about to give, to relate all the events which have taken place, so that everybody may understand the point of order and my decision.

On the 22nd of January last, the Hon. Mr. Lougheed moved, seconded by the Hon. Sir MacKenzie Bowell:

> That the senators mentioned in the report of the Committee of Selection as having been chosen to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session, be and they are hereby appointed to form part of and constitute the several committees with which their respectives names appear in said report, to inquire into and report upon such matters as may be referred to them from time to time; and the Committee on Standing Orders is authorized to send for persons, papers and records whenever required.
> The question of concurrence being put thereon, the same was resolved in the affirmative, and. Ordered accordingly.

By this resolution the House has limited the powers of the different committees to inquire and report solely upon matters referred to them from time to time. A reference is consequently necessary. It is the House itself which sets the committees in motion by its references. The House, in that way, has affirmed that no committees can initiate by themselves the study of or the report upon matters which have not been specially referred to them. This is the general rule applicable to all committees, and, furthermore, the House, when dealing with the Committee on Standing Orders, has given, at the same time, to that special committee, the additional power to send for persons, papers and records whenever required.

It is the special duty of that committee to inquire into such papers and records precisely to ascertain if all the rules of this House have been complied with in the introduction of private Bills. This power is more essential than additional. At all events, it is given the same day and in the same motion, and in no way does it clash with the general instructions given to all the committees.

The motion alluded to constitutes a sessional order given every year by this House to all the select committees at the beginning of each session, and defines by itself the limited powers imposed upon them.

After that motion had been carried, the next day, the hon. senior member for Halifax gave notice of the following:

> That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts be authorized to meet when and as often as it may deem necessary and, without special reference, to inquire into and report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate as it may think in the interest of the House.

This proposition of the hon. senior member from Halifax is quite a departure from what has always been the practice of this House, and seeks to introduce a procedure fraught with the greatest dangers, inasmuch as at any particular time a mere quorum of the Committee on Internal Economy, having the power to report upon such matters connected with the internal economy of the Senate, may, without special reference, spring upon this House reports of the gravest and most dangerous character. But this is more a question of policy than a question of order.

Referring to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Lauzon on Friday, the 23rd of January last, point of order which sets forth the conflicting character of the hon. member for Halifax's motion, intending to give to the Committee on Internal Economy the power which was denied to it by the motion—adopted the previous day—of the leader of the Government, and which empowers all committees to report only upon questions specially referred to them, I have arrived at the following conclusion.

As I have already said, in comparing these two motions, I find that by the first one the Committee on Internal Economy is prevented from making any report except on questions specially referred to it. On the other hand, by the motion now before me, the Committee on Internal Economy would be authorized to make any report it chooses, on any question connected with Internal Economy as they may think in the interest of the House, without any previous reference of such questions by the Senate to the committee.

In other words, in one place the committee, in a general way, as all the other committees, is debarred from a certain power which is afterwards intended to be granted to it by this motion.

To put the whole thing in a nutshell: you cannot report, says one motion, on things which have not been specially referred to you; you can report, says the other motion, on things which have not been specially referred to you.

It has been said that the motion, pointed out as irregular, was not conflicting with the motion already adopted, but that it merely added new powers to those already granted.

I have no doubt that the new powers intended to be given are additional, but such an addition carries with it, in favour of the Committee of Internal Economy, the removal of the restriction imposed to all the committees in general, of which the Committee on Internal Economy forms part, and in removing such a restriction, it places the Senate in this peculiar position—that it would negative to-day what it asserted yesterday.

The reference made by the hon. member for Halifax to the additional powers subsequently granted by this House to the Committee on Standing Orders has nothing to do with the present case. The House certainly gave, as it had the right to do, more powers to one committee than to another; but such powers were merely additional, and in no way conflicted with the principle itself of the constitution of those committees. In this case, the principle approved of in the formation of all committees was that no committee could report on questions which had not been referred to it, and the proposed motion to which objection has been taken, edicts the contrary.

In other words the Senate is called upon to negative to-day what it asserted yesterday.

I have already quoted Bourinot who says, page 452:

> The old rule of Parliament reads that a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again, but must stand as the judgment of the House. Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the House would be constantly frittered away in the discussions of motions of the same nature, and the most contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

In my humble opinion, the point of order is well taken. As to the last reference made by the hon. gentleman from Fredericton he will see that the House has the power to do what it likes, but there is a way to do it, and it is not this way that it should be done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have the honour to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Young, that the decision of His Honour the Speaker, be not concurred in.

The SPEAKER—That is what I expected.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I should like—

The SPEAKER—The appeal from the decision of the Chair is made without any discussion. All the discussions took place previously, either here or in the lobbies.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The lobby or the Speaker's quarters.

The SPEAKER—I beg pardon, it is not the case for me.

The House divided on the motion, which was adopted. (Contents, 26. Non-contents, 11.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have the honour to move the resolution which is on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It appears to me perfectly plain that when we appointed the Internal Economy Committee we had the power to clothe it with all the authority we chose to give it. We could have given it the very authority which is now being given by this resolution, and if we had done so there would have been no question about the power of that committee to conduct the inquiry in that way, and to make its report as the resolution proposes.

The SPEAKER—I think the hon. gentleman is discussing my point of order in an indirect way.

Hon. Mr. KERR—No.

The SPEAKER—I think the hon. gentleman is not entitled to give his opinion on a point of order which has been decided. It was ruled that the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax was out of order.

Hon. Mr. KERR—But the House did not agree in the Speaker's ruling, and therefore the question is just as much at large as if the hon. Speaker had not given a ruling.

The SPEAKER—I beg pardon.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not think there is any question about that, and I say it with all deference to the Speaker's ruling, and I do not show any disrespect in that way. I am just giving my reasons, which may be good or bad. I say, therefore, that it was open to the Senate to have clothed this committee with the authority, which is proposed here, and not having done so, it is competent for the Senate to appoint some other committee witih this authority, or to confer this authority upon that particular committee. The members have chosen, by the motion before the House, to give the authority to that particular committee, and having done so, it seems to me it is quite open to us to say whether that is a proper or an unreasonable authority to give them.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—In regard to the motion which we have before us, I am no lawyer, and can only take my view of what may be considered right or wrong, as far as points of order are concerned, but the stand which has been taken by His Honour the Speaker appears to me to be correct, and under those circumstances, feeling that, although a member of the Internal Economy Committee, and one who would naturally have faith in the committee, and believe that that committee would do what is right, I would naturally like to vote for that resolution. But from the stand which has been taken by His Honour, which I believe personally to be the correct stand, as far as the point of Order is concerned, it appears to me we are pursuing the wrong course, if we wish to give the Internal Economy Committee the power which this resolution proposes to give them when passed. To my mind it would appear to be more natural to have this resolution withdrawn and a notice for the reconsideration of the resolution which was introduced by the leader of the Government, and passed on January 22. By reconsidering that we can give the Internal Economy Committee, if the House so rules, the power which the majority thinks they ought to have. That would be my view of it.

The motion was agreed to, on a division.

VACANCIES ON THE STAFF OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the communication of His Honour the Speaker with respect to vacancies on the staff of the Senate be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts. He said: My recollection now is that the hon. the Speaker made a recommendation as to one vacancy and made no recommendation as to the other vacancy. This is to refer the communication dealing with both vacancies to the Committee on Internal Economy and Congent Accounts for the purpose of reporting to the Senate.

The SPEAKER—There is only one communication.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was under the impression, although His Honour is more likely to be right about it, that the Speaker had in his communication referred to two vacancies, to one of which he made a recommendation, and to the other he did not.

The SPEAKER—Yes, there is only one communication and one recommendation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It speaks of only one communication—a communication with respect to vacancies on the staff of the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask what object there can be in referring this particular question to the Committee on Internal Economy. If I understand the provisions of the Civil Service Act which govern this particular matter, authority is given to the clerk to make a report, and the power rests with the Speaker of the Senate to make a recommendation to the Senate, which recommendation the Senate can adopt or reject. Unless the Internal Economy Committee desire to ascertain whether the gentleman recommended to fill the position mentioned is capable of performing his duties; I cannot understand what possible object there can be in referring the matter to the committee. Let me suppose for a moment that the committee disagrees with the recommendation made by the Speaker and so reports to the Senate, would that be in order or would the Senate have a right to adopt such a report unless it met the approval of the Speaker? The Senate is just as capable now to decide this question as though it had been referred to a dozen committees. Most of us know the gentleman who has been recommended by the Speaker. I doubt if there is a man in the whole Civil Service who is so well fitted for that position as Mr. Grosse. If the hon. gentleman can give any reason for referring this matter to the committee, I am prepared to consider it, but in the absence of any reason I can see no ground for it, unless the report of the Clerk is referred also. The Speaker in his wisdom, for what reason I do not know, recommends only one appointment. Whether he intends to come down with a second recommendation for the other, will be disclosed in the future.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

Bill (F), An Act to incorporate the United Empire Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Can the hon. leader of the House tell me when I may expect the return which I moved for on the 19th February, as follows:

That an humble Address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General; praying that His Royal Highness will cause a return to be laid before the Senate showing:

1. The number of Chinamen entering Canada during the years 1911, 1912 and 1913.
2. The amount of head-tax collected each year respectively.
3. How such head-tax was disposed of.
4. Where such Chinamen settled by provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I could not tell my hon. friend. I have taken the necessary steps to obtain it, and I expect it will be brought down at an early day.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

IMPORTATION OF THOROUGHBRED STOCK.

INQUIRY.

The notice of inquiry being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the inquiry of the Hon. Mr. Casgrain:

That he will call the attention of the Government to some unsatisfactory features regarding the regulations for the importation, duty free, of thoroughbred mares and stallions, and will inquire whether it is the intention of the Government to remedy these conditions should they exist.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—Since this subject was introduced in the Chamber last week it has caused me a great deal of labour to ascertain the far-reaching effect of the paper which was read to us. It embraces matters connected with the best interests of the live stock industry in the Dominion of Canada. It would be a foolish thing for me to recommend that this House should give enough time to fully consider and discuss the merits of this question, which embraces the interests of every branch of the live stock business. The facts told of in the memorandum submitted to the House appear to strike a very heavy blow against one of the greatest industries of the Dominion. We are greatly interested, nowadays, in the high cost of living; and where can we find a better method to reduce the cost of living than by the careful breeding of live stock in the Dominion of Canada? Therefore, I am anxious, as an individual, to have this matter receive every attention, and that an opportunity be given to inquire fully into this vast question, and if there is anything wrong, to try if possible to ascertain what it is, and provide a remedy. We have a conviction that we have done wonders along the line of the Live Stock Association Record, and to-day the Canadian system is regarded as one of the best systems in the world. The United States of America has recognized the Canadian system. No animal can be taken from Canada to the United States, without the importer being called upon, at Washington, to produce a Canadian certificate, and a certificate of identification. I do not wish to take up the time of the House now, but I wish to suggest a better method of investigating and looking into the merits of the whole question, and propose that it shall be given to the public. So, this afternoon, instead of taxing the patience of the House by dealing with these intricate questions which no man's memory can very well carry—and instead of reading this very lengthy paper which is based upon documents which are with the Government—I suggest that the matter should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Committee of the Live Stock Records Association is prepared to substantiate the principles which are laid down here, with genuine documents that are on file, and this House should allow me here simply to move that the consideration of the whole subject be handed over to the Standing Committee of this House on Agriculture and Forestry. The committee has plenty of time to give to it, with the power to call for persons or papers and to make a thorough investigation. It would be time well spent, and the work will be done more effectively than it would be by simply prolonging the discussion in this Chamber. I move, seconded by the hon. gentleman from Compton (Hon. Mr. Pope), that this House refer the consideration of this question to the Standing Committee of the House on Agriculture and Forestry, and that the committee be empowered to call for persons, papers and records.

The SPEAKER—I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should take another course to refer the matter to the committee. This is an inquiry of the Government, and the hon. leader will answer that question. If the hon. member desires to make a substantive motion, to refer the first part of the inquiry, and the answer of the Government, to a special committee, that might be more in order than the amendment he is now proposing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I quite agree that, in the usual course of affairs, the line indicated by His Honour the Speaker will be the preferable one, but it will be observed that the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan was prepared, as I understand, to make a speech of considerable length on the subject, and out of regard for the time of the House he concluded that as it was a matter that could be dealt with in a much more satisfactory way by the committee, he would move that the question be referred to a committee. I think he has the right to do that. This question deals with a certain matter, and the hon. gentleman moves that that matter be referred to the committee on Agriculture and Forestry to inquire into and report upon it. I think he deserves the support of the House just because he has taken a judicious and tolerant line.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I take quite an interest in the live stock industry of the country, and I have gone carefully over the statement made by the hon. gentleman who asked this question, and brought up this discussion in the House. For my part, I cannot agree with that hon. gentleman, but I would like to get all the information possible. Some points in the statement he made are worthy of consideration. Now, if we can refer this question to the Committee on Agriculture, with power to get witnesses, etc., we could get the views of those gentlemen interested on both sides, and thresh the matter out, and get a proper understanding. There is no doubt that the question is a very important one, and I think the time will be well spent. I would support my hon. friend in getting it before the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—As the hon. gentleman has pointed out, this is an inquiry, and the usual procedure is that, after a member has made his case, it is up to the Government to answer it. That answer is being cut off by the motion of my hon. friend from Saskatchewan. I think the procedure would be more in line with our rules if we awaited the answer of the Government, and then had the whole matter referred to the committee. There would be no delay; there is no desire on the part of this House not to send the question to the committee, so far as I can gather; it is only a matter of procedure.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is nothing just now to send before the committee, because there is no motion. I concur in the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Killarney that we should have the answer of the Government, and by the unanimous consent of the House my hon. friend could then move that the matter contained in the inquiry be referred to the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—With or without notice.

Hon. Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton)—May I ask the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan, who has taken a great deal of trouble to inquire into this matter, and who is an authority on live stock, to have the references now in his possession placed on 'Hansard'? Those references might be of very great benefit, and I would ask the hon. gentleman if he intends to place those references on 'Hansard.'

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He can do that when he makes the report from the committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am certainly at a loss to understand how this practice can be logically carried out. It would mean, if carried to its logical conclusion, that upon an hon. member making an inquiry from the Government upon a particular subject, a committee of this House should be delegated to practically act upon the question. Now, in what way will the Committee on Agriculture act? Will it prepare a report and submit it to this House, or in what way may the Government know what the views of the members of the House are upon the subject? The answer to these questions might very largely depend on what my hon. friend from Saskatchewan might say, or on what opinions my hon. friend from Prince Albert may hold upon this very important subject. I simply mention that by way of illustration. After it comes from the committee, what then? Can it be expected that the committee will supersede the Government upon this question?

Hon. GENTLEMEN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Or that the Government will be influenced by the report of the committee, without knowing what has taken place before that committee? You could scarcely expect the Government to be summoned before that committee and thus be made acquainted with the investigation conducted by the committee. It seems to me that we are departing from very well settled practice as to what has long been established, namely, the practice of making inquiry in this House as to what the Government intends to do upon a particular subject.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—But if the Government had a matured statement from this committee giving the facts in detail with all the evidence, would it not assist the Government in coming to a conclusion if the Government saw that this report was a proper report to the very point desired, and giving the very evidence which would enable the Government to make a decision? I think it would be a grand thing for the Government to have this advice from the committee that could make it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I do not quite agree with what has just been stated by the hon. leader. We are trying now to solve the question of procedure, and I should like to know whether it is quite permissible for a debate to take place on a mere inquiry.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

The SPEAKER—It is not permitted by the rules of this House upon inquiries that take the form of a mere question, but it is permitted when preceded by a motion or by a statement of facts.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—That is where my trouble arises, because the Order of the Day reads this way:

> That he will call the attention of the Government to some unsatisfactory features regarding the regulations for the importation, duty free, of thoroughbred mares and stallions, and will inquire whether it is the intention of the Government to remedy these conditions should they exist.

That is purely and simply a question, upon which, I think, there could be no debate. I do not rise to oppose this question; on the contrary, I am quite in sympathy with the reference to a committee, but I do not want that committee to say that there is nothing referred to them, when the members come to inquire into this matter. I want a notice of motion put on the record covering the whole field of inquiry referred to this committee. Otherwise the committee may say, 'We have nothing to inquire into.' As I understand the rules of the House, the Government is called upon on this inquiry, to give an answer purely and simply, and I do not think a debate is in order.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, a debate is in order.

Hon Mr. DANDURAND—When the question is prefaced by calling the attention of the Government to the matter inquired into, then it opens the door to a debate.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I received several communications from gentlemen interested in the matter of live stock, and I thoroughly agree with the suggestion that the matter should be referred either to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry or to some special committee. The matter is one of very great importance, and I know from the communication which I have in my hand that there are serious complaints made against the manner of registering live stock. I did not rise for the purpose of making obstruction, but on the contrary, I am in favour of making the reference to the committee as large and complete as possible.

The SPEAKER—Here are the rules:

39. No debate is in order on a mere inquiry; but explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the inquiry, and by the minister or other senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer are not allowed.

40. When it is intended to make a statement or raise a discussion on asking a question, the senator having such intention as part of the notice under Rule 21, gives notice that he will call attention to the matter inquired into.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Are we to understand that, in a matter of this sort, the debate is permissive.

The SPEAKER—The debate is permissive.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I do not think it is so in the rules.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, it is in rule 40. It has been the practice of the Senate to have discussions on a question in that form, since the year 1877. I know the late Sir David Macpherson introduced the practice then, and told us, at that time, that he found that that was the practice in the House of Lords. That practice is recognized in the rules His Honour the Speaker has just read.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—It does not seem to me that rule 39 justifies it at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But rule 40 does.

The SPEAKER—That is, if the Senate wants a discussion.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I submit with all deference that those two rules will not justify a debate on a mere inquiry. If a practice different from that has sprung up, and has been recognized, that is another thing.

The SPEAKER—If I had to give a decision I would give it in the sense I stated.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—On rule 40.

The SPEAKER—On rule 40; but I fear to give a decision lest it be reversed.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The member who brought up this question starts out using the very words of the rule, 'That he will call the attention of the Government to some unsatisfactory features regarding the regulations,' etc., as will be seen in the Minutes of Proceedings of February, 19, page 75.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—He may make an observation, but there is no general debate open under that rule.

The SPEAKER—According to procedure followed, it is for the Government to answer that inquiry. I do not think the motion of my hon. friend is in order. If he wants to refer the matter to a committee, there is a procedure to follow, and a very simple one; or he may get the unanimous consent of the House to dispense with the following of that procedure. The regular way is to put the question and to have the answer given.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Why could not the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan move that the Government be not asked now to answer the inquiry but that the answer be held over until the Committee on Agriculture has dealt with the matter? Would not that pave the way to a settlement of the question? I know that the leader of the Government is prepared to give his answer, but that would settle the matter, and it would have to be brought up again, and I doubt if the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan could very well do that. If the Government say they have the matter under consideration, then we cannot put it in the hands of the Committee on Agriculture. The leader of the Government was perfectly right in what he stated a moment ago. What is the Government to do? We all want to facilitate this inquiry. It deals with a matter of vast importance, and the suggestion which I respectfully make, I think if adopted, would pave the way to a settlement.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—When this question was brought before the Senate, the hon. gentleman who introduced it read a very long article reflecting very severely and I may say unfairly on the National Live Stock Record. He made suggestions which, if carried out, would entirely destroy the usefulness of the Record. That is why I seconded the motion of the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan to refer the matter to a committee, either the Committee on Agriculture or a special committee. The matter is of sufficient importance to be dealt with in that way. The charges that were brought against the National Live Stock Record, should not be allowed to pass. The question should be dealt with by a committee which could bring before it the author of that article, as well as the largest breeders of thoroughbred horses, and others interested in the matter. It is only fair to the National Live Stock Record Association that this matter should be dealt with either by a special committee or the Committee on Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I am sorry to have given rise to this additional discussion.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—No, no. It should be discussed.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I am prepared to go on and make my speech now, but taking a business view of the whole situation; from the fact that the country is not yet possessed of the question that has arisen—and arisen largely through one individual—and as we have to look at the general interest of the country where we have on one hand a thousand members identified with this association (and in another view, as far as business is concerned, thirty-five thousand of our best citizens) surely we cannot deal with the matter lightly. The most efficient way of dealing with the business and getting a thorough investigation is to refer the matter to the Standing Committee of the House with instructions to report upon it and the Government may then either receive or reject the report. I shall be prepared at any stage of the proceedings to speak at considerable length. This is no trifling matter which is to be pushed aside without serious consideration. It would be a great injury to the country should prevailing ideas become permanent in society. I am satisfied, from what I have learned in preparing a reply to the article which was read, that the author of that article is sadly in error, and the basis of my statement is a document to which certain persons have signed their names, and original documents which are with the Government. If the Government is not prepared to give an answer, why not give the Government time and wait till we have made our report.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Would the hon. gentleman allow me to suggest that this matter could be adjourned for forty-eight hours, in order to allow the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan to make a substantive motion; so that when the matter comes before the House we can act upon it and decide upon the request that this matter should be referred to a committee. If that motion is carried, then it disposes of the inquiry unless the Government would like, in the meantime, to give an answer to the inquiry on the Order Paper?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh no, the Government is not necessarily anxious to give an answer to the inquiry, unless the hon. gentlemen desire it, but I should like to be understood as not opposing in any sense the inquiry that my hon. friend from Saskatchewan desires to make. It is only in the interests of the procedure of the House that I made the suggestion which I did. I think when an inquiry is made on the floor of the House on a public subject, that the Government should have the advantage of the discussion which takes place, and which is duly recorded in 'Hansard.' That would not be obtainable if such a subject were referred to a Select Committee; and inasmuch as we have followed this procedure for years, I would prefer that we should adhere to that, rather than delegate it to a committee. My hon. friend can very well make a substantive motion, and have it referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and the matter may stand until that committee reports. I should suggest that the hon. gentleman make a substantive motion, to have the matter inquired into by the committee. Then the discussion could be resumed by the hon. gentleman who made the inquiry, and the Government might give its answer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that is the real businesslike way to deal with the matter. If the Government were to give their answer now, it would, as has been pointed out, preclude the matter going before the committee, or preclude any action on the part of the committee, but the course indicated by the hon. leader of the Government just meets the case. The hon. gentleman moves that this debate be adjourned until whatever date he thinks proper, and then he can give notice this afternoon for the reference of this subject to the committee. Then, after the report of the committee, the Government can answer the question. I think that is the best way to deal with the matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suggest that the hon. gentleman make the motion now. I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen will not raise any technical objection on account of the absence of notice.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I move that this debate be adjourned until this day two weeks.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I move that the matter be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with power to call for persons and papers; the committee to report to the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not know the composition of the Committee on Agriculture. Suppose the committee were given power to add to their number one, two or three expert members of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—They have power to call for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER—I think the best way is for the hon. gentleman to take time to frame his motion as he wants to have it, and submit it to the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I gather from the remarks of the hon. leader of the Senate that if the hon. gentleman submits his motion to-morrow, the House will not exact the usual notice but will allow it to pass.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I will put the motion in writing and submit it to-morrow.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (11), An Act respecting The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Bill (13), An Act to incorporate The Central Canada Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Taylor.

Bill (16), An Act respecting The Lachine, Jacques Cartier and Maisonneuve Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Young.

Bill (17), An Act respecting The Ottawa, Northern and Western Railway Company. —Hon. Mr. Young.

Bill (18), An Act respecting The Tillsonburg, Lake Erie and Pacific Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Young.

Bill (19), An Act respecting The West Ontario Pacific Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Young.

Bill (30), An Act respecting The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.

Bill (31), An Act respecting The National Transcontinental Railway.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Bill (43), An Act respecting Queen's University at Kingston.—Hon. Mr. Taylor.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the second reading of Bill (15), An Act respecting The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada:

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a Bill of some importance, and I think the hon. gentleman should explain its provisions before it is read a second time.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—This is a financial Bill, and it could be better explained before the committee than I could explain it before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not objecting to the Bill, but I think some explanation should be given to the House. The third clause reads as follows:

3. The company shall not be under any obligation to prepare or to submit to its shareholders, debenture stockholders or auditors statements of account or balance sheets or to hold ordinary general meetings more than once a year which meeting shall be held in the month of March or April and anything which under any Act affecting the company is authorized or required to be done at a general meeting of the company to be held at any specified time may be done at the annual general meeting of the company.

I am not saying this clause is wrong, but it involves a little change.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The officials of the company will appear before the committee, and give explanations respecting it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, March 4, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

PURCHASE OF KITSILANO INDIAN RESERVE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a copy of all correspondence, papers, reports, or documents in the Department of Indian Affairs, relating to the purchase of the Kitsilano Indian reserve from the Indians by the Government of the province of British Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

REGISTRATION OF THOROUGHBRED STOCK.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—With the leave of the House, I move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Pope, that the whole system of recording the registration of thoroughbred live stock be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with power to call for persons, papers and records, the report to be made to this House within two weeks from this day.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I brought this question, which is a live one, before the Senate. I heard then that if the members took cognizance of the speech or statement that I read to this House, there would be a great deal of debate with regard to this matter to prove wherein I was wrong. This is an open question for debate, and I do not think it is right or fair to have the matter shelved in this way.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not being shelved.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—If hon. gentlemen have anything to say against the points and arguments that I made before this House, there should be a full debate in this House. The matter should not be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, which does not meet very often. I do not know how often it met last session. If this motion is adopted, this will be the last we will hear of it. It will be strangled. I do not think it is fair, and I think that hon. gentlemen who hold different views from those which I have expressed, should have the courage to rise in this House and express them, instead of shelving the whole matter.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—With reference to the statement made by the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), I may say that I have read the address, or brief he read to the House with reference to this matter, and it struck me that there were some points in it worthy of consideration. I have some knowledge of the other side of the question, but I am not prepared to make a speech. I want more light and information. We have a Committee on Agriculture, and it is very easy to call that committee together. Then we can get the evidence of these gentlemen and furnish information to my hon. friend, and also the evidence of the officials of the department. If there is a great deal of truth in the statements made in the brief presented by my hon. friend, we will get the facts, and the matter will be put right. On the other hand, if there is none, we will have all the evidence we can collect, and the committee will make a report to the House. Then if it is necessary to have a debate upon it, we can debate it after the report of the committee; and I would suggest that the evidence also be submitted along with the report.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—They have to report in two weeks.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The motion says in two weeks. I suppose the chairman of that committee will take up the work the same as any other work in this House, and that the matter will not be shelved or strangled, but brought back to this House with such light on the subject that we can intelligently deal with it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think it is bad grace on the part of the hon. member for De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) to complain of the motion which has been presented to the House. The hon. member has merely inquired as to a condition of things which he believes is unsatisfactory. He has made his speech, and when the debate is finished the matter would fall to the ground and there would be nothing left except the inquiry which he had made. Instead of that, we have now the motion of the hon. member who attaches sufficient importance to the inquiry which has been made to ask that it be investigated, that it be referred to a special committee. Instead of complaining, I think the hon. member should commend the mover of this motion——

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—To strangle the child.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Because it is in the interest of the inquiry he has made, and is for the purpose of eliciting whether there are sufficient reasons in the complaint to justify this House in moving in the matter in a practical way. I think the very best course is being adopted by this motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I feel that the hon. gentleman who made the inquiry is labouring under a misapprehension. He is under the impression that the object of this motion is to shelve, and smother his view of the question. The hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan told the House that he was quite prepared to go on and make a speech of considerable length on the subject, but that he thought it would be more satisfactory to the House, and more in the interest of proper inquiry, if he should move to adjourn the debate for a fortnight, and that, meanwhile, the committee would inquire, so that when the debate was resumed, members of the House would be in possession of the information which it was desirable they should have in discussing the matter. There is thus no reflection at all on the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), and there is no desire to hinder the fullest discussion on the question which he has brought up.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to call the attention of the hon. leader of the Senate to a motion I moved on the 19th February, asking for a return, with reference to the number of Chinese who have come into Canada in the last three years and so forth. Probably the hon. gentleman can give me some information as to when I may expect that return.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I made inquiry yesterday and strongly urged the immediate return of those papers for my hon. friend. I shall follow it up, and hope at an early day to lay it before the Senate.

IMPROVEMENT ON LACHINE CANAL.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Before taking up the Orders of the Day, with the permission of the House, I should like to call the attention of the leader of the Government in the Senate to a few short paragraphs which appear in the Montreal Herald and Daily Telegraph of last night, March 3. This paper cannot be classed, I am sure, as one opposed to the Government, or one in favour of the Opposition either. The present standing of the paper is very much in doubt; it is hanging between heaven and earth. However, this is such an urgent matter that I trust this House will pardon me if I bring it to the attention of the Government, because it is within their power, within a few hours, to remedy what is complained of. The heading of these paragraphs is in very large letters, and reads as follows:

Forty Factories Affected as the Canal is Emptied—Most of Them are Robbed of Power to Operate their Plants—Some May Close Down Completely—Likely to be Dry Until Navigation Reopens, two Months From Now.

The Lachine canal has been emptied and forty factories along the bank in the city are in trouble. The ears of the Hon. Frank Cochrane, Minister of Railways and Canals, would burn if he could hear to-day the comments of the manufacturers whose places of business are situated on the Lachine canal.

Many of them are running with only part of their regular staffs, for the reduction of the water in the canal has robbed them of most of their power. In some of the factories auxiliary steam plants are in operation, but these are unable to meet the demands of the shops.

The gates were opened yesterday morning, and most of the water let out. Little inconvenience was experienced yesterday, as it was almost night before the power in the factories began to fail. The owners, however, watched the lowering stream with apprehension. This morning it was near the bottom and the extent of their troubles became apparent at once.

Some fear they will be forced to close down entirely; others hope to wriggle along with reduced staffs and at half capacity.

Request was Refused.

In January the department announced that it intended to let the water out of the canal by the first of April in order to erect a power plant near Côte St. Paul. A delegation went to Ottawa and asked that the work be postponed, saying that work was scarce in the city, and that it would be a great hardship to close the shops in the middle of the winter. Their request was acceded to, and the work delayed. Then another body of manufacturers visited the Capital and asked that the power plant should not be begun until the spring, but this was refused and the canal was drained yesterday.

Forty manufacturers and hundreds of men are affected by the action of the department, and thousands of dollars will be lost, it is alleged, by mill owners and employees before the water is turned into the canal again. It is likely to be dry or nearly so until the opening of navigation. That is nearly two months away, so the manufacturers along the bank are alarmed at the big losses that are probable.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman has given a Notice of Motion for to-morrow. Is he not anticipating a debate ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I would probably have been told, if I had brought this matter up in the Senate, that I should have given notice of a motion. However, I anticipated the wishes of the Chair and gave the Notice of Motion. If permitted, I would simply implore this Government to consider the very hard situation of the workingmen in the city of Montreal. Work has been scarce all winter. We have many people unemployed. Those who are at the head of charitable institutions—and I am one—have found more distress this winter than for many years. People have had a very hard time to pay their rents and supply their families with necessaries of life. It seems a great hardship for the Government to deprive men of work. Especially is this so toward the very end of the season, when men need work more than ever, when they have exhausted their credit, and it is absolutely necessary that they should have work. I do not believe the work of the Government is undertaking is so urgent that they should throw people out of employment at this particular juncture. In the name of humanity I ask the Government to do something to protect the interests of these people. It is only a matter of five or six hours to turn the water into the canal again and let the people have a few weeks more work. If the Government intends to build a power plant, as the paper states—and I do not know whether the Government does or not—let it wait. I am told that a coffer dam can be erected at small expense around the works, and the construction could be carried on while the water is in the canal. Taking these matters into consideration, I feel sure that the hon. leader of the House will intercede with the Government. I saw the deputations that came here, and they received encouragement from the Government.

This is not a new thing. While the former administration was in power, the officials of the canal always wanted to do some fussing with the canal. Even before the former administration, when the old Conservative administration was in power, and just before their downfall, they fussed with the canal and created what was called the 'Curran bridge scandal.' Now it is a bad thing for people to fuss with the Lachine canal, and the Government should take warning, and not deprive the workingmen of Montreal of work, unless such deprivation is absolutely necessary. I hope the questions I put will be answered to-morrow, and that the Government will reconsider the matter and let the water into the canal so that the people may have work for the balance of the winter.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved the second reading of Bill (D), An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend think it necessary to have the Bill printed and circulated?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It has been printed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have not seen it; it is not on the file.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have a copy here printed, which I obtained from the office, and they told me it was printed and distributed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has not been distributed.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I might perhaps just say a word or two about the meaning of the amendment, which I wish to move to the Criminal Code. It is very plain. It is to prevent newspapers from publishing the names of persons accused or condemned of criminal offences. We all know that privilege is abused, and it is the duty of the House to prevent the harm that has been occasioned by this course. The papers are now publishing 'yellow' editions in which they show pictures of every criminal, thieves, murderers or forgers—not only from this country, but from the other side of the line. I do not intend to make any long remarks on this—

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman should wait until the Bill has been printed and distributed. We would like to see the wording of the Bill before it is read a second time.

The Order of the Day was discharged, and placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (20) An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (F) An Act to incorporate the United Empire Life Insurance Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.)

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill No. 31, An Act respecting the National Transcontinental Railway.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is a Bill for the purpose of authorizing the Governor in Council to extend the time for the completion of the western division of the National Transcontinental railway for a period of twelve months from the 1st day of December last. We have passed legislation similar to this on previous occasions, last session and the session before, and it is proposed under this to give the necessary time, as mentioned in the Bill, for the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific section of the road.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Can the hon. leader of the Government give us any idea how far this work has gone and when it will be completed. From the preamble of the Bill it seems that we have extended the time for the construction of this railway on two or three occasions—1912, 1913, and I think also 1911.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It should be completed during the current year.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Were the former extensions of the railroad granted in the same way?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, precisely similar. It is done with the consent of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, March 5, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (J), An Act to amend the Inspection and Sale Act.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

IMPROVEMENT ON LACHINE CANAL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired:

1. Are the Government aware that by emptying the Lachine canal they have thrown thousands of workingmen out of employment in the city of Montreal for the rest of the winter?
2. Are the Government aware that forty factories are affected as the Lachine canal is emptied?
3. How long will these factories be deprived of power?
4. Are the Government aware that the public press, both English and French, has during the present winter published statements by the leaders of the charitable institutions that for thirty years there has not been so much misery in Montreal?
5. Does the Government consider this an opportune time to curtail employment by closing down factories?
6. Why is the Lachine canal being emptied now?
7. Have the Government received deputations and correspondence asking that the Lachine canal be not emptied at present?
8. Who were the members of those deputations and whom was this correspondence from?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I propose answering the eight questions that my hon. friend has placed upon the Order Paper in a general way. It will be observed from the way the questions have been framed, that my hon. friend apparently does not desire the Government to answer such questions intelligently. In fact they are irregularly prepared. My hon. friend assumes a certain condition of facts, and also assumes that certain consequences flow therefrom. That is clearly irregular in the making of an inquiry. I would like to say, speaking generally, that it has been customary for the Government to draw the water off all canals annually between the first of April and the first of May in each year, for the purpose of making improvements. In this particular case it was thought desirable that the water in the Lachine canal should be drawn off last fall, and representations were made by manufacturers and others that it was undesirable, at that particular time, to draw off the water. More than the usual repairs have to be made at this particular time upon the Lachine canal. A new power plant is necessary, a retaining wall is necessary, and also the building of weirs. I may say that manufacturers who secure power from the Lachine canal are perfectly well aware that annually they—for the time being—will be deprived of power during the period that repairs are being made, and there is a provision in the leases of those consuming power from that canal, that this shall be done. The leases are subject to this contingency, and I am informed that all the manufacturers who rely upon power from the Lachine canal have auxiliary plants to meet such an occasion as has been pointed out. It has been regarded as desirable that, instead of commencing those repairs on the 1st of April, as has been customary in the past, they should be started on the 1st of March so that they might be completed by the 1st of April and thus be ready for the opening of navigation. Those repairs are in the hands of very competent contractors who fully expect to have them completed within the time limit. I think that with this explanation hon. gentlemen will at once perceive that the running of the water out of the canal is absolutely unavoidable. Those repairs must be made; the canals must be maintained and incident to this is the making of proper repairs. The Lachine canal can only be operated by the making of those repairs, by the building of a new power plant, and by the other repairs to which I have referred. If any inconvenience has been suffered, of course, the Government is not in any sense responsible for that. What has been done is absolutely unavoidable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I think the hon. leader of the Government answered the question as to representations having been made on this subject, but he did not say by whom; who were the members of that deputation, or who were the correspondents, in case there was correspondence. I would like to put the hon. gentleman right in regard to the auxiliary plants. There are no auxiliary plants of sufficient size to run the factories during these repairs; some of the factories have none at all; others have in proportion to their needs very small auxiliary plants.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is their own fault.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I beg pardon of the leader of the Government; that is not a satisfactory way of answering pertinent questions. The Government does not seem to realize how important it is for these working people to get their daily wage. I do not consider these answers satisfactory at all, and I do not believe that the people who are living there, and are being deprived of their pay next Saturday, will be satisfied—

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend must take that answer. My hon. friend is not in order in discussing this matter further. He made several alarming statements yesterday which I might very well have taken objection to, but I did not do so.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Well, do so now; take objection to them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not propose that my hon. friend shall live further in the atmosphere of alarm, so far as this particular question is concerned if I can help it. The reports which were read here yesterday were read for political effect—I have no hesitation in saying that. They were of the most alarming character, but they were not founded upon fact. Nobody is more familiar with the fact that what is being done is absolutely unavoidable, than my hon. friend; and I certainly take exception to his more fully discussing this subject at this time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Might I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that he has not answered the seventh and eighth questions. I was not here yesterday to hear the remarks of my hon. friend, but if there have been representations, either verbal or in writing, and we were given a summary of them, we would then have the arguments set forth by the aggrieved parties. I was expecting that my hon. friend would answer those questions, because they are questions of fact. Have there been representations, verbal or written? If these have been made, and we had a summary of those representations and the answer of my hon. friend, perhaps the whole atmosphere would be cleared.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no hesitation in saying to my hon. friend that delegations did wait upon the Government when it was proposed to make the alterations last autumn, and desired that those alterations should stand until the month of March. It is not material to the discussion, as to who composed those delegations. Let us assume that every manufacturer interested waited upon the Government. The essential fact is that the water in the canal had to be emptied at some time before the opening of navigation for the purpose of making the repairs to which I have referred; if there is any other way of doing it, I should like a suggestion from my hon. friend. Now, so far as the manufacturers are concerned, who may have been temporarily inconvenienced, the leases provide that the water may be turned off to meet the very contingency which I pointed out; if they failed to provide auxiliary plants, then it is their own loss.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—May I correct again that statement? I have seen some of those leases——

The SPEAKER—The question has been put and the answer has been given.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No; no answer has been given; that is what I find fault with.

The SPEAKER—The gentleman is bound to take the answer that has been given.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—There is no answer.

Hon. Mr. KERR—He is not bound to take the answer.

The SPEAKER—He cannot force the minister to give another answer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend will point out to me wherein he wants a further answer that would be material to the inquiry, I should be obliged to him.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Where did the hon. gentleman get the answer that they are obliged to have auxiliary plants?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is provided for in the leases. The leases provide that the water shall be turned off at a particular time for the purpose of making repairs; and for the purpose of keeping those manufacturers going it is quite obvious that they will need an auxiliary plant or will have to suffer the inconvenience of closing down their plants while those repairs are being made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My hon. friend has declared that deputations called upon the Government last autumn.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But question 7 has reference to this month of March, and not to last autumn.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might say to my hon. friend that assuming that delegations asked the Government to do that, the Government could not comply with the wishes of such delegations, as the Government is charged with the responsibility of operating this canal, of maintaining it, and particularly of furnishing the power necessary to operate it. My hon. friend will readily see that the responsibility is upon the Government and not upon delegations who come here, or upon those who may be temporarily inconvenienced by reason of the emptying of the canal.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY SHOPS.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I wish to draw the attention of the Government to a most important matter, concerning which I should like to know if the Government reached a decision. We have heard a good deal of late about the report of the commission appointed to investigate the National Transcontinental railway, and about transactions involving a few thousand of dollars, and other little things, but I am surprised not to have heard anything from the ministerial papers or from the Government on what is reported by the two commissioners under the heading of the Transcona Shops. This is a matter of great importance, because it has a direct bearing on the construction of shops at Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend permit me? My impression is that that report has not been laid on the table of Parliament yet, and until it is in the possession of the House it is scarcely opportune to discuss it now.

Hon. Mr. KERR—This report has been laid on the table of the other House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no recollection of having placed it on the table of this Chamber, nor am I aware that it has been laid on the table of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If the opinion of the commissioners is correct, it is a matter of very great importance. I received a copy of the report this morning, and, looking over it, was astonished to see, under the heading 'Transcona Shops,' the opinion of the commissioners, which seems to have been supported by Mr. Leonard, to the effect that the shops at Winnipeg have been built without any legal authority. If that is true, the shops to be built at Quebec are in the same position. The commissioners put this question:

Are the shops at Transcona to be regarded as a portion of the Eastern division within the intent and meaning of the agreement of July 29, 1903, and of February 18, 1904, and Acts confirming same?

They go on to say that it is not within the meaning of those agreements. They say that those agreements do not require the Government to build shops at all—in fact that they have no right to do so, that these shops must be built by the company itself. Mr. George Lynch-Staunton, I am told, is a very clever lawyer of Hamilton, and Mr. F. P. Gutelius, the other commissioner, sided with him. Mr. Newcombe disagrees with these gentlemen, but he says that Mr. Leonard is also of the opinion that the work done at Winnipeg has been done without authority, and that therefore the work to be done at Quebec would also be illegal. At page 122 of the report the commissioners say:

In this case the 'line of railway' does not include terminals because they are spoken of as being apart from the railway. For example, in clause 15 'expenditure for the right of way and other lands required for the purposes of the railway and for terminal facilities' is spoken of, and it would not include telegraph and telephone lines, because they are also treated separately.

In other words, the Government is to supply the permanent way, that is the facilities for using the company's rolling stock, but it is not to supply the facilities for repairing, maintaining, or replacing that rolling stock or the permanent way, and clearly the shops and machinery are facilities for repairing or replacing rolling stock, and are of no use to the company in the operation of the rolling stock, if the rolling stock is in good repair, which is the condition which the company has agreed at its own cost to keep the rolling stock.

Shops are not part of a line of railway. There are many railways which have none. For example, lines which were built and leased like this is to be to other companies.

Machinery is certainly no part of a line of railway. It is not even equipment of the railway, as is the furniture of a railway station for example. It is the equipment of a building, which the railway company may or may not for economical reasons deem it good business to acquire or not to acquire, so that neither are necessary for the operation of the road.

Then at page 122 the commissioners assert:

(a) There are no words in the agreement imposing on the commission any liability to build shops or to furnish them with machinery, but, on the contrary, the company have agreed to equip the railway with rolling stock and to keep the railway and rolling stock in repair, and to make all renewals at its own expense; that agreement involves the supply, by the company, of shops and machinery for the building and repair of rolling stock unless the company contracts that work out to somebody else.

(b) The Government did not agree to build and fully equip this line of railway with everything required to operate it, excepting rolling stock.

(c) The company agreed to equip the railway with rolling stock and to keep it and the rolling stock in repair at its sole expense. Not only does this agreement impose no liability on the Government in this regard, but it can be gathered from the contracts with certainty that the company has undertaken this obligation.

Then on page 126 they say:

(d) There are words used in the agreement which clearly indicate that the company is to supply these shops and machinery. If it was intended that the Government should supply these shops and machinery, the agreement by the company to repair its rolling stock would have stated that the same was to be repaired with the machinery to be supplied by the Government.

Further on, at page 127, they say:

Shops and machinery may be equipment of the undertaking of a railway company, but are not equipment of a line of railway.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the point my hon. friend is taking?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The commissioners at the end of the report give the opinion of Mr. Newcombe which seems to differ a little from theirs, though he does not go very far in his differing opinion. The purport of it will be found at page 129 where he says:

As to the location of the shops that so far as the Winnipeg site is concerned appears to be settled beyond possibility of alteration, but as to the Quebec or any other site, I apprehend it is still open to the Commissioners to determine any and what shops are required at these places.

So we see it is the decided opinion of the two commissioners and Mr. Leonard that the shops at Winnipeg have been constructed without authority, and that the Government is not obliged to build shops for the company. Mr. Newcombe seems to differ as to the Winnipeg shops, but adds:

But as to the Quebec or any other site I apprehend it is still open to the commissioners to determine any and what shops are required at these places.

If that is correct—if the Government has built shops at Winnipeg without authority and could not compel the company to lease or buy them—we know our position. In Quebec it will be the same. I hope the Government have the right to build these shops, but it is very important that they should be built legally, that the Government will have a right to pay for them, and not do as has been asserted in some parts of the country, to make a contract in view of a future election and begin the work and then say they are compelled to stop it. By the construction at Quebec of these shops for which I congratulate the Government, hundreds of people will flock to that city and locate there, and it would be a serious matter if the Government had to suspend the work. I should therefore like to ask the Government, first if they have looked over this important report, and if so have they come to a conclusion as to how they are going to settle this question. We are likely to hear a little more about this report here or elsewhere. It is most important that we should know exactly, all the facts, and how the Government regard the legal opinions referred to in this report. I draw attention to this part of the report and ask the hon. leader of the House to let us know as soon as he can what position the Government take on this matter. If they think the legal opinion contained in the report is correct; if they intend to pass legislation legalizing the expenditure at Winnipeg and the building of shops at Quebec? If the Government is under no obligation to build them, the company should construct the shops. If the Government should build them, then they should be recouped by the company and the Government ought to take proper precautions to be legally entitled to draw rent from them. I am most anxious to hear the answer the Government will give to my inquiry on this important matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Government cannot possibly answer in any other way than that the legislation upon the subject including the contract between the parties concerned must necessarily govern the situation. If the late Government built shops not authorized by the contract, then this Government is certainly not responsible therefor. If this Government is not authorized to build shops such as my hon. friend referred to, then either additional legislation will be necessary, or some additional negotiations will have to be concluded in the shape of a contract between the parties concerned, before an undertaking of that kind can be entered upon.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I do not blame this Government or the other Government. I just wish to ask whether the Government has the right, according to the report of the commission, to do what it has done. I do not wish to blame any Government. On the other hand, if this report is correct, some legislation should be introduced in this House. I shall support any measure tending to remedy this difficulty, and to authorize the Government to proceed with the construction of the shops in question as soon as possible.

THIRD READING.

Bill (31) An Act respecting the National Transcontinental railway.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved the second reading of Bill (D) an Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to ask the hon. gentleman to explain his Bill.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—This measure does not require a long explanation, and I do not wish to make any because, so far, I have not seen any paper in opposition to the Bill, and I may say that I have been commended for it and have been asked to proceed with it and bring it into law as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What change does it make in the existing law?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Clause 207 of the Code reads as follows:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse, manufactures, sells or exposes for sale or to public view, or distributes or circulates, or causes to be distributed or circulated any obscene book, or other printed, typewritten or otherwise written matter, or any picture, photograph, model or other subject tending to corrupt morals.

This clause was replaced in 1909 by another clause which goes a little further, and which reads as follows:

Makes, manufactures or sells, or exposes for sale or to public view, or distributes or circulates, or causes to be distributed or circulated, or has in his possession for sale, distribution or circulation, or assists in such making, manufacture, sale, exposure, having in possession, distribution or circulation, any obscene book or other printed, typewritten or otherwise written matter, or any picture, photograph, model or other object, tending to corrupt morals.

I wish to replace this clause, as amended, by the following clause, which will be more complete.

(a) makes, manufactures, sells, exposes for sale or to public view, distributes, circulates, causes to be distributed or circulated, or has in his possession for sale, distribution or circulation—

(i) any obscene book, pamphlet, newspaper or other obscene printed, typewritten or otherwise written matter; or—

(ii) any picture, photograph, model or other object tending to corrupt morals; or—

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Down to the beginning of paragraph 3, the Bill is the same as the existing law.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So that we may confine ourselves to paragraphs 3 and 4.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yes, they are a little different. When they speak of pictures and photographs tending to corrupt morals, there may be some difficulty in finding out if the picture of the criminal is tending to corrupt morals. Therefore, I add the following:

(iii) without the authorization of a judge of a superior court or of the Attorney General of a province, any book, pamphlet, newspaper, or other printed, typewritten or otherwise written matter, containing any picture or photograph of a person accused of or condemned for any indictable offence or offence punishable upon summary conviction, or containing any picture or photograph of any assistant or accomplice of such person, or any picture or photograph of any instrument used by such person, assistant or accomplice; or—

(iv) any plate, film or other like device for the reproduction of any picture or photograph mentioned in sub-paragraphs (ii) and (iii) of this paragraph; or—

So that, really, the only amendment which I intend to make to the Criminal Code is to prevent the publication in the newspapers of any picture or photograph of the person accused of, or condemned of any crime. It is obvious that there are many good reasons for that. We all know unfortunately that yellow papers of a type common in the United States are becoming numerous in this country. If you open your newspaper you will find the picture of the leader of the Government, or the Prime Minister of this country, or the ex-Prime Minister, and in another column you will find the picture of a criminal going to the electric chair, or the picture of some woman accused of a crime. I have in my hands the Daily Star of Montreal, La Patrie, the Herald, and other papers giving all these pictures. I have always been opposed to that, I often thought of bringing this matter up, but I made up my mind especially during last summer, when the Thaw proceedings were occupying attention in Sherbrooke, to present this amendment to the Senate. We saw for days and days not only columns, but pages, with pictures of Thaw, of his divorced wife, Evelyn Thaw, and others, being shown in the papers as heroes or heroines, and I am ashamed to say, for the city of Sherbrooke, you will find pictures of ladies taken with Thaw as he was going into the court, and fighting at the door of the court house to see him. I have seen similar pictures in La Presse, etc. I do blame the newspaper proprietors, all of whom are doing the same thing. Not many months ago I met one of the proprietors of one of the largest papers in Montreal, and I told him I would bring in such a measure and he said: 'We will be very glad. I publish these pictures because my neighbour does it, and it will be cheaper for us if we do not publish them.' If Parliament passes a general law prohibiting this publication, the newspaper proprietors will be glad to comply. So I think there can only be one opinion that this thing must stop. You know that parents are obliged to take away papers from the children, who are naturally inclined to look at pictures, while older members of the family look at the important matters. I was expecting that there would be opposition from some papers to this Bill, and I was anxious to know their reason when I found this paragraph in the Montreal Gazette of the 23rd February last:

There will be violent opposition in some quarters to Senator Choquette's Bill to forbid the printing in Canadian newspapers of portraits of criminals, accused or convicted. Scme papers have readers who are held by the publishers to like the sort of mental enlightment that is gained by studying the linaments of a thug or a forger, and at times much of what is called enterprise is spent in catering thereto.

This was very sarcastic but I was surprised that a paper like the Montreal Gazette had not an article applauding the presentation of this Bill and saying squarely they would support it. So far I have not seen any violent opposition and I will wait for such opposition before answering it. But I do not think there can be any opposition to such a Bill. There is no good end served in this country by having papers publish, every day, pictures of criminals. The other day I saw a page of the Montreal Star on which was reproduced the pictures of the four gunmen of Becker going to the electric chair in New York. What is the use of Montreal papers publishing those things? Nobody knows those men; nobody here has anything to do with them. What purpose can be served in publishing those pictures except to impress a certain part of the public with the idea that they are heroes; that they are great men who deserve their pictures to be put in the papers, just as much as the Speaker of the Senate, the Prime Minister or any other public man. The other day I received a letter, not in a very serious vein I suppose, from a man saying I must not go on with this Bill because sometimes the publication of a portrait in a newspaper serves the end of justice. That man had not seen a copy of the Bill. I quite admit that in certain cases the ends of justice may be served by the publication of a picture, and that when a man is accused of a crime, and the courts of justice are looking for him it would sometimes be a good thing to offer a reward and publish his picture, but I have provided for that by this clause:

Without the authorization of a judge of a superior court or of the Attorney General of a province, any book, pamphlet, newspaper, or other printed, typewritten or otherwise written matter, containing any picture or photograph of a person accused of or condemned for any indictable offence or offence punishable upon summary conviction, or containing any picture or photograph of any assistant or accomplice of such person, or any picture or photograph of any instrument used by such person, assistant or accomplice; or—

So if the ends of justice are going to be served by the publication of such pictures, the proprietor of a paper or those in charge, may apply to the judge of the court of the province, or to the Attorney General and publish such picture with the authorization of those parties, if the necessity arises. I admit in some cases there would be necessity in order to find a criminal, to publish his picture—say in the case of a man who stole money from a bank—but I have provided for that in the clause cited, so that a man who had changed his place of residence might be apprehended, and thus the ends of justice served. Under all these circumstances, without further going into the moral point of view, or discussing the harm coming out of such publications, I submit that this is a good Bill.

I am not blaming newspapers for not doing more for men who deserve to have their pictures published, but I could mention a case of heroism in which the picture of the young hero ought to have been published all over the country, yet the newspapers did not do so. I refer to the case of a young man named Barbeau who gave his life to save a young girl. At Quebec, a boat was overturned and a young man and a young girl were thrown into the water. Without thinking one minute of himself, young Barbeau took off his coat and plunged into the water and rescued the young girl who had sunk to the bottom of the river, and brought her to the shore, and saved her. The young man himself was so much exhausted that he fell back into the water, and was drowned. The newspapers did not publish the picture of this young man of eighteen or twenty. They do not publish such acts of heroism, but they publish the dirty faces of criminals and scoundrels all over the country. And not satisfied with publishing the pictures of criminals of this country, they go to the other side of the line and publish those of all the dirty criminals in the United States. So I trust, that every hon. member of this House will heartily support this Bill, whose object is to prevent such publication.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I heartily concur in the remarks just made by the senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette). He is an old newspaper man himself, as I have been one in my day, but I know that in my day we would never attempt to do what has been the custom for the last twenty or twenty-five years. In the good old days of journalism, we would never think of placarding criminals on the front page of our newspapers, and sending them into the homes of our Canadian families. To-day the mother or father of a family, who have the welfare of their children at heart, and the guidance of their moral development, will take care that the most of our newspapers shall not be put in the hands of the children. That is a terrible state of things for a civilized community to live in to have to watch the daily newspapers in order to see that there is nothing in them that will nip the bud of virtue in the souls of the young. The word has gone forth, 'Woe be to him who gives scandal to the young.' Well, I wonder how much woe will attend those men who daily and hourly put scandal before the young of this country, as well as of other countries. If they are not able to hold themselves, then let the law take hold of them. The senator from Grandville is doing a wise and prudent thing in asking Parliament to arm the courts of justice with sufficient authority and power to surpress this growing evil, which in the first place is a disgrace and in the second place is a danger to the community. There is no need of entering into elaborate illustrations of what the newspapers are doing in other countries. They are bad in one, and worse in another. There are things published in the French press of France that would not be tolerated in any ordinary, common house throughout Canada. There are things published in the large daily papers, with wide circulation, that would not be tolerated in any Christian home; and we are stepping along the same line too rapidly. It is time to call a halt. We are asked to do so by this amendment to the Criminal Code, which is a very simple one, empowering our judges and our courts to put an end to this. When this law is passed, proprietors of those papers who are making their lucre—filthy lucre at that—out of these publications, will be wise and prudent enough to put an end to it. They will not wait to have the courts order these publications seized; they will end the practice themselves. As the hon. Senator pointed out, the proprietor of one of the largest daily newspapers in the Dominion of Canada was asked why he published these things, and what was his answer? His answer was: 'Well, I have got to do it because the others are doing it.' Now, think of that answer from a man who is making hundreds of thousands of dollars a year out of publications widely circulated throughout the Dominion and the Empire. He has not the courage to stand up and say, 'I will not do it.' There have been papers in Canada which had the courage of their convictions, such as the Montreal Daily Witness, which would have never descended to such depths as this; but the Montreal Witness has had to pay for its virtue; it had to go into bankruptcy. The Montreal Gazette is a clean newspaper that never publishes these things. The hon. Senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) read a short item from the Gazette of the 23rd of February, but he evidently did not fully appreciate the way the thing was put by the Gazette. To my mind that little item in the Gazette is worth more than if they had written a two-column editorial. It is full of irony and sarcasm; it is directed against those people who cater to the vile tastes of the people. What stronger language could the Gazette use? No, the Gazette has endorsed the position of the hon. Senator; and, moreover, the Gazette was really sarcastic in its article. 'You will have violent opposition,' it stated. From whom? Not from the social service reformers; not from the ministers, not from the bishops; but you will have violent opposition from this organization of filthy, dirty public opinion; that is the opposition you will get. Well, they have been afraid to express that opposition. Not one of the newspapers has dared to condemn the Bill, because they know they are in the wrong. And what makes their opposition the more lamentable is that, knowing they are in the wrong, they are still prepared to make their fortunes out of wrong-doing. That is a lamentable position for this country, and for the organs of public opinion to be in. I hold, with the highest authorities in the land, that the steps taken by the hon. senator from Grandville is a proper one. No later than two or three days ago one of the largest circulated papers in Canada, La Presse, received a communication from His Grace the Archbishop of Montreal, pleading that it should not discredit its columns and contaminate the country by such publications. Now, the proprietor of that paper is a Christian gentleman, and he yielded to this appeal, and from that day to this everything has been done to eliminate from the columns of that paper, at its own expense, all those placards of criminals, foul and evil. That proprietor has done this, but all newspaper proprietors have not done it yet, and this law is intended to make them do it whether they will or not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me very undesirable that the Senate should assume the responsibility of placing on the statute book legislation that cannot be enforced. Entirely apart from the moral aspect of this question—and I cannot say that I agree at all with the presentation of the case made by my hon. friend who has introduced this Bill—the practical consideration of such a provision must be taken into account. What will be the result of placing this amendment upon the statute book? It would mean that, except an agreement were entered into between all nations and Canada, you would preclude foreign newspapers from entering Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Let them stay out.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no such statute law recognized in any other country, as that proposed by my hon. friend; consequently it would be equivalent to placing an embargo upon all literature, published abroad, entering into Canada. Now it must be quite manifest to hon. gentlemen that it would be utterly impossible to enforce such law as that. If my hon. friends will look at the Bill they will see that it is sufficiently wide and is so framed as to contemplate prohibiting the circulation throughout the whole Dominion of any literature, domestic or foreign, containing pictures of the character designated by my hon. friend. That would be entirely out of the question. Are we to deliberately amend the Criminal Code by placing upon the pages of our statute book a law looking to the exclusion from Canada of newspapers, of magazines, of literature of all kinds, containing this class of photograph? It cannot be enforced as against foreign literature, then it would be idle to seek to enforce it as against Canadian publications. I think it is only necessary for me to mention how impracticable that is, to refute the alleged desirability of placing this legislation upon the statute book. There is the further consideration which I would point out to my hon. friend, that if the publication of photographs is derogatory to morals, the depiction in the press by description or otherwise of the crime would be equally undesirable.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am going to amend the Bill and put that in, too.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Consequently it would involve a prohibition being placed upon any attempted description of any individuals who might be charged with immorality or crime of any character whatsoever. This would be a 'blue' law of the most despotic character. It would be such a law as the press of Canada would not tolerate for a moment. Public opinion would not sanction our passing legislation of that character.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes it would.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I venture to say the moral tone of the Canadian press is equal, if not superior, to that of any other country.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And it would be a very great mistake to attempt to place upon our statute book any legislation reflecting upon the moral responsibility of Canadian journalism in the manner indicated. I believe there is enough sound sense in the Dominion of Canada, and particularly in that exercised by the journalists of Canada, to protect our good morals. No legislation of this kind should be passed that cannot be enforced; and this I say without hesitation could not possibly be enforced.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a rule I agree with the hon. leader of the House, and I regret to say that at the present time I feel obliged to differ from him. The hon. gentleman's objections to the censorship, if one may call it, of newspapers and magazines, is apparently based on the impracticability of excluding from Canada newspapers published abroad which may come under the purview of this Bill if it should become law. Now I wish to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the objection taken by the hon. leader of the House applies to the law as it stands today.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Sub paragraph (i) of paragraph (a) applies to the making, selling, circulating, etc., of—

(i) Any obscene book, pamphlet, newspaper, or other obscene printed, typewritten or otherwise written matter.

And also—

(ii) Any picture, photograph, model or other object tending to corrupt morals.

so that an order to carry out the law as it stands on the statute book to-day, we have to do just what the hon. leader of the House thinks is impracticable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No; will my hon. friend pardon me—

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is only when you come to the portraiture of criminals that it becomes impracticable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No; the distinction is this—that immorality is well recognized according to the Criminal Code as it is to-day, but my hon. friend has in view the creation by the statute of an act of immorality which to-day is moral. We propose to make immoral by this legislation what to-day is moral, what to-day is permissible.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Oh no. I take exception to that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is the distinction.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I really think that the object aimed at by the hon. gentleman from Grandville might be considered as covered by his paragraph (ii):

(ii) Any picture, photograph, model or other object tending to corrupt morals; or—

The hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill gave good reasons for supposing—and I think he is quite right in that—that the publication in newspapers of the portraits of great criminals is calculated to corrupt the morals of the young.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no doubt that at the present day there is amongst all classes of the population a great desire for publicity, and a lad who might have a criminal tendency might be encouraged to do something which would lead to the publication of his picture in the newspapers throughout the country. I honestly do not see the difficulty which suggests itself to the hon. leader of the House and I think on the whole the better way would be to let this go to committee, and then if it needs to be modified we can modify it; but I do not think it would be to the credit of this House to reject this Bill at the second reading.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman supporting this Bill in what way it is immoral to publish the photograph of a man accused of crime? If I understand it, the discussion is proceeding on the theory that we agree on everything with the exception of subsection 3. Now the only thing that I see in that is that there is a brand new substantive offence created, namely the publication of the photograph of a man accused or convicted of crime, or of a man who assisted him, or of an instrument that he used—the photograph of his gun. Well, I must say that I think—and I speak advisedly—that the publication of the photographs of criminals has served the public interests at times.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—In some ways.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes, in some ways, and lead to the conviction of crime; but it beats me to find out in what way you can say that the publication of the photograph of a man accused of crime or of one of his assistants, or the instrument that he used, is in any way immoral or tends to immorality. In regard to all the rest of the Bill—the publication of obscene pictures and literature—I think the whole House agree with the hon. gentleman on that; but I would like to hear from him an explanation of why he would have the House say that the publication of the photograph of a man accused, say of murder, or of intent to do grievous bodily harm—because it runs down to indictable offences or offences punishable upon summary conviction. Suppose a case of chicken stealing, or something of that kind, I do not see why the morals of the whole or any part of the community should be corrupted because the man's photograph appeared in a newspaper. I think that that is too wide? If the clause relating to this photograph publication were taken out and the rest of the Bill allowed to stand it might be rather a good Bill.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—After the debate is closed I will answer my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Is not this a Bill to repeal subsection 1 of section 207 of the statute of 1909? Is it not a repeal of a section which deals with the publication of pictures? Does subsection 3 in any way improve subsection A of the statute of 1909? Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain how it does.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I did not catch exactly what the hon. gentleman said, but I have explained that section 207 of the Criminal Code of 1906 was repealed in 1909 and a new section was inserted in the code under "A" to include pictures and photographs. That, however, applies to indecent or obscure pictures and photographs. By the Bill, section 207 of the code of 1909 is repealed and replaced by the clause in my Bill which includes the two sections and provides that the picture of a criminal shall not be published.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Is paragraph 3 the only paragraph which contains something new?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yes. I prepared this Bill and gave it to the Law Clerk, and we included everything in one clause. Practically the only thing added is a provision to prevent newspapers from publishing pictures of criminals. Very often the pictures of murderers are published, and sometimes these pictures are accompanied by pictures of the weapons with which the crimes were committed. I have added the provision that without the authorization of a judge of a superior court, or of the attorney general of a province, such pictures or photographs shall not be published. They can authorize publication for the purpose of helping to attain the ends of justice, and the objection of my hon. friend from Hamilton is answered by that. The hon. gentleman put another question. He asked how the publishing of a picture can affect the morals of a boy or girl. I am surprised that a man of his age and experience should put such a question. Take for example the picture of a young girl eloping with a man or stealing money. Its appearance in a newspaper might lead young girls to regard such a person as clever—that she was doing something heroic. It might not affect her morals, as we regard morals generally, but it would affect her view of life, and I am surprised that my hon. friend does not see reasons for objecting to the publication of such pictures in the press. The hon. gentleman from Halifax has answered the objection of the leader of the Government very completely. I see from the few objections that have been raised to the Bill that it meets public opinion. If the Bill is given the second reading now, I am prepared, when it goes to committee, to make any further explanation that may be desired. I am prepared also to consider any suggestions for the improvement of the measure. I have in view an amendment to provide that newspapers shall not publish detailed reports of crimes or trials of criminals. The facts of such cases might be published in a few lines; but I ask hon. gentlemen to help me to frame some clause to prevent the publication of objectionable details, which can have only a prejudicial effect on the morals of the community. Such publications demoralize boys and girls; they should not be allowed to read such stuff. I do not want to interfere too much with the press, I having been a newspaperman myself, and more or less connected with the press for nearly forty years. I was disgusted last summer to read the reports and see the pictures published in connection with this Thaw case, in Sherbrooke; I regret to say that young women and boys followed Thaw about in order to have themselves photographed with him, and in order to get their pictures published in the papers. Some young ladies went so far as to send flowers to Thaw. It was perhaps done without any evil intention, but it was a shame all the same.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a question which affects others besides publishers; but how the morals of the people are going to be affected by publishing the photograph of a horse thief, or of a man who steals a pig, I am at a loss to know. There is a great deal more danger to the morals of the people in publishing the evidence which is given in many of these cases. The publication of the details of crime in the newspapers may, by suggestion, lead others to follow the example of the perpetrators. We know how the law of suggestion operates in cases of suicide. When the details of a suicide are blazoned forth to the world, you find in a month or two somebody else will end his life in the same way. That was forcibly brought to my mind in a number of cases that occured in the city of Toronto. A very prominent merchant, desiring to commit suicide, threw himself over the High bridge which crosses the ravine at Rosedale in the northern part of Toronto. Less than a month afterwards somebody followed suit. A number of cases of that kind have occurred within a few years. Nothing was heard of suicides of that character until the details of the first one were published to the world. If my hon. friend could frame a clause that would prevent the publication of nauseous evidence, which is immoral in its character, he would confer a benefit upon the community.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I just said a moment ago that I intended to ask the House to help me to frame a clause which would prevent the publication of such matters.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To my mind this measure is utterly impracticable, and I cannot for the life of me see how it would have the effect my hon. friend desires upon the young generation of the community. The measure is so broad in its character, it would be utterly impossible to have it carried out for many reasons that I do not propose to enter into just now. One feature in connection with it is that publishers of newspapers might find it to their advantage, to be prevented from publishing the photographs of thieves and rascals of both sexes, because it would enable them to save money. The effect of this measure would be to relieve them of that expense. I am not so sure, however, that the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Montreal apply to newspapers of the character of the Montreal Gazette. Now that is an exemplary publication, and not the only one, I am glad to say in Canada. It does not indulge in those extremes that many publishers of newspapers do. If I might make a suggestion to the hon. gentleman, it would be that he allow this Bill to stand and see if he cannot frame a clause in the direction of the suggestions I have made. I do not think it would be advisable to push this measure to a vote in its present form. There are many in this Senate, I have no doubt who, like myself, would lend their aid to the accomplishment of the object the hon. gentleman has in view but it is monstrous to take a clause, such as the one we are asked to consider to-day, and pass it in its present shape. Any publisher who has anything to do with newspapers, knows that the clause as it reads is impracticable. In any trivial case tried in a court the publisher would have to ask the judge's consent before he could publish a likeness of the person on trial. The accused might be just as honest looking and as good looking as my hon. friend himself, and no one would suppose, to see his photograph, that he was such a bad character. Who is to draw the distinction? I have seen many photographs of criminals published in papers, and they have looked honest, and yet were thieves from head to heels. I throw out these suggestions, having had some little experience myself in the publication of a newspaper, I do not see that any good can possibly be obtained by the adoption of the clause which the hon. gentleman proposes to add to the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—The reflections which have been cast upon the press of this country by the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill are absolutely unwarranted. We have in Canada the cleanest press to be found in any country, unless I am fortunate enough to read only the papers which do not publish those obscene pictures. It may be that there are the other kind, and I should like the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill to favour me with a copy of some of the papers he has referred to which have published obscene pictures. I read most of the leading papers, as well as a great many of the minor country papers throughout the whole Dominion, and as yet have to see in the ordinary Canadian newspaper any obscene pictures.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not necessarily obscene.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I am not contradicting what my hon. friend has said just now, or saying anything about that: I am simply saying that the remarks which fell from the lips of the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill would lead one to believe that our papers were publishing obscene pictures. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to favour me with a copy of some of the papers with these pictures, I may withdraw some of my remarks.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Listening to this discussion, it seems to me the proper course is to allow the Bill to go to committee and see whether these clauses cannot be amended in such a way as to meet the objections that have been expressed. I have not heard any hon. gentleman who has been discussing this question object to the principle of the Bill, and I have heard a great many reasons given as to why we should try and do something to protect the young people of this country further than they are protected at the present time. There is no doubt that among a certain class of people the desire for notoriety plays a very important part in their makeup, and that the very fact of these criminals having their pictures and an account of their lives published in the public press as the hon. gentleman from Belleville said just now has the effect of making other people want to follow their example. That matter was brought to my attention some time ago very strongly in the case of the holdups that we had in British Columbia. The effect of those holdups and the prominence that was given to the history of those men, what they had done, and their pictures in the public press, I think had a decidedly bad effect on the young people of that particular part of the country, and the sympathy that unfortunately seems to arise amongst the public in some of these cases was on that particular occasion very noticeable. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen know that the population of Kamloops turned out very largely in order to say good bye to Bill Miner, when he was sentenced and sent down to New Westminster. It struck me at the time as a most extraordinary thing, and was to me at any rate a great surprise to find the sympathy of the people, or to see how people would look upon a matter of that kind, and I think we cannot do too much to try and prevent as far as possible the notoriety that is sometimes given to these people.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I would like to ask again if the hon. gentleman would favour me with some of those papers.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The hon. gentleman can find them in the library. I have here the Montreal Sunday Herald. Here are two pictures of Evelyn Thaw. She looks very well, but I am told she is not really as pretty as she is painted. Here is a Montreal Star, August 20, giving the picture of Evelyn Thaw, and then we have the picture of Thaw between two prisoners, and Thaw's mother, the doctors, and all the rest. I have here the Montreal Star giving the picture of the scene at Coaticook and the picture of another criminal named Campbell and the woman with him. Here is a picture of Thaw going out of the court house and a lot of ladies. I am willing to amend the Bill to meet the views of hon. gentlemen. Let it go to the committee next week, in the meantime the newspapers will make their objections and I will be willing to accept some compromise.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Might I suggest that the Bill stand over until another day in order that we may look into it more closely.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If we pass the second reading we affirm the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I move that this debate be adjourned until Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have no objection.

The Senate adjourned until 3 o'clock tomorrow.

THE SENATE.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (K), An Act respecting certain patents of Rudolph Goldschmidt.—Hon. Mr. DeVeber.

Bill (L), An Act respecting certain patents of Rudolph Goldsmith.—Hon. Mr. DeVeber.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (B) An Act respecting the Pollution of Navigable Waters.—(Hon. Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (30) An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

Bill (19) An Act respecting the West Ontario Pacific Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (18) An Act respecting the Tillsonburg, Lake Erie and Pacific Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (17) An Act respecting the Ottawa, Northern and Western Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (16) An Act respecting the Lachine, Jacques Cartier and Maisonneuve Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (15) An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

BURRARD INLET TUNNEL AND BRIDGE COMPANY BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE.

The Orders of the Day being called:

Third reading (Bill 11) An Act respecting the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company, as amended.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Monte Creek, in whose name this Bill stands, has asked me to move that it be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, for further consideration. It is found on careful inspection that the language of the Bill does not just meet the intentions of the committee. I, therefore, move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Dandurand, that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, for further consideration.

Motion was agreed to.

CALGARY AND EDMONTON RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the second reading of:

Bill (12) An Act respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—I desire to call attention to the fact that in this Bill there is a completely new departure with respect to the length of time which the company is given to begin operations. In all the statutes up to the present day, the present regulation has been that the time shall be two years, and I find that in the other House they have reduced the time to one year. Any one who knows anything about the difficulty of making financial arrangements, in order to float railway companies in the old country, must know that one year is altogether insufficient. I simply wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (14) An Act respecting the Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company, Limited, and to change its name to the Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middleton.)

Bill (24) An Act respecting the Canadian Railway Accident Insurance Company, and to change its name to the Globe Indemnity Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Dandurand.)

Bill (26) An Act to incorporate Pacific, Peace River and Athabasca Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (34) An Act respecting the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Roche.)

Bill (36) An Act respecting the Joliette and Lake Manuan Colonization Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (37) An Act respecting the Ottawa and Ungava Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Tessier.)

Bill (39) An Act respecting the Thessalon and Northern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Moosejaw.)

Bill (42) An Act respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (44) An Act respecting the Vancouver Life Insurance Company of Vancouver, B.C., and to change its name to the Vancouver Life Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (46) An Act respecting the Erie, London and Tillsonburg Railway Company.—(Hon. Sir Melvin Jones.)

Bill (49) An Act respecting the Saskatchewan Central Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

Bill (52) An Act respecting the Central Railway Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Pope.)

Bill (55) An Act respecting the Quinze and Blanche River Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (47) An Act respecting the Lake Erie and Northern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ratz.)

Bill (48) An Act to incorporate the Peace River Tramway and Navigation Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (60) An Act to incorporate the United Empire Loyalists' Association of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

Bill (G) An Act for the relief of Gertrude Carmen Birks.—(Hon. Mr. Pope.)

Bill (H) An Act for the relief of Rose Ethel Freedman.—(Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.)

Bill (I) An Act respecting the Montreal and Lake Victoria Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Béique.)

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, March 10, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE LATE SIR GEORGE ROSS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It has been suggested to me that any remarks with reference to the death of our late colleague Sir George Ross should be deferred until to-morrow. With that I agree. In the meantime I would suggest, out of respect for the memory of our late colleague, and as a small tribute of that regard which we entertained for him when in life, that the Senate should adjourn for this afternoon until to-morrow. I therefore have the honour to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Power, that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, March 11, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MAILS BETWEEN ASHCROFT AND FORT GEORGE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired:

1. What are the names of the contractors at present carrying the mail from Ashcroft to Fort George and other points North of Ashcroft?
2. When did they take over the contract?
3. What amount are they receiving per annum from the Post Office Department for this contract?
4. How much more are they receiving from the department than was paid to the former contractors per annum?
5. Are the present contractors to receive any additional subsidy on account of the establishment of Parcels Post Service throughout the Dominion?
6. If so, how much does it amount per annum?
7. Has any special arrangement been made about the carriage of seed grain over this route?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. James C. Shields.
2. October 1, 1913.
3. $125,000 per annum.
4. The difference between the price now paid and that under the former contract is $59,800 per annum, but as the British Columbia Express Company, former contractors, refused to perform the service after September 30, 1913, for less than $170,000 per annum, the department will save $45,000 per annum by the present arrangement.
5. There is to be no additional payment unless the weight of all classes of mail matter exceeds 1,000 pounds per day.
6. This will depend on the conditions as set forth in answer No. 5. The department is unable to give an estimate until it has been established whether the daily limit of weight is exceeded.
7. No. Seeds which must now be paid at parcel post rates will receive the same treatment as other classes of mail matter.

HYDROGRAPHIC SURVEY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired:

1. Has any report been issued by the Government of the work done by officials of the Interior Department in the measurement of the amount of water in the streams, rivers and lakes of the railway belt in British Columbia?
2. If so, when was this report issued?
3. Has the work of measuring the water in these streams, rivers and lakes been kept up continuously from the time it was established to date?
4. If so, can the names of the streams, rivers and lakes so measured be given and the results of the measurements?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1 and 2. A report, covering the stream measurement work of the British Columbia Hydrographic Survey of the Department of the Interior, is now in the hands of the printers, and will be published as soon as possible.

3. Yes.
4. Yes.

TRAIN SERVICE ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER rose to—Call the attention of the Government on the insufficiency of the train service on the Intercolonial, in certain respects, and ask if it is the intention of the Minister of Railways and Canals, to re-establish the train known as the Ocean Limited, between Montreal, on the one side, and St. John and Halifax on the other?

He said: If any hon. gentlemen have business in the Maritime provinces, and wish to go there quickly, they cannot do so at present—at least not from Ottawa. There is no direct connection at Montreal for passengers leaving Ottawa and wishing to go to Moncton, St. John, or Halifax. Leaving here in the afternoon, passengers are compelled to spend the whole night in Montreal and take the next day's train, unless they stay up all night and board the train from the West, which passes here at four or five in the morning. That is most unsatisfactory. There should be direct connection between Ottawa and the Maritime provinces via the Intercolonial railway, and we should not be forced to go by way of the United States, when in a hurry to reach our destination, as most of us usually are. I do not know whose fault it is, and I do not wish to lay the blame of this condition of affairs at the door of any one particularly, but there must be bungling somewhere. No doubt Mr. Gutelius, against whom I have not a word to say, is bent upon making the Intercolonial railway a paying institution, and showing some surplus on the right side of the balance sheet at the end of the year. That is all right, but that is not the purpose—the raison d'être—of the Intercolonial railway, as hon. gentlemen all know. At Confederation the Intercolonial railway was a condition, sine qua non, a link between the east and the west, intended to benefit equally the east and west, which it does.

Experience has shown that it is the west that is most benefited, for the reason that the freights for oceanic trade from Montreal to Halifax cost no more than freights from say Moncton, to Halifax or St. John. The west is benefited by the Intercolonial railway as much as the east. I state this in order to dispel the fiction which has existed all along, that we of the Maritime provinces are the only ones to benefit by the Intercolonial railway. The Intercolonial railway should be a service for the general benefit of the public, but I fail to see that it is, at least in respect of travellers; for going down to the Maritime provinces takes two days with a night's stay in Montreal. Formerly we could leave Halifax, St. John, Moncton, and other places, say to-day, and arrive at Ottawa the next day in time to vote. We cannot do this now; it takes two days unless we go by way of the United States. This is unfair, and it creates in the Maritime provinces an impression that I should like my hon. friends of the Cabinet to take heed of. I have brought the question up, not so much in the spirit of criticism primarily, as with the hope of having this cause of complaint removed. I also wish to call the attention of the Government to the fact that the present state of things is doing it enormous injury throughout the land, more especially throughout the Maritime provinces.

Now, hon. gentlemen of the other side, let me tell you that it is useless for you to go out of your way and reject such schemes as good roads and the farmer's help, etc., in order to be, as it were, an adjunct to the Liberal party in the other House.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—No, that is not correct. We never rejected the Bill; we amended the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—You amended it so much that, with its head cut off, it is without any practical existence.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—We amended it in the interest of the country.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Communications between Ontario and the Maritime provinces are now in a very queer state. We have three railways, for there is another railroad, the Transcontinental railroad. That road was conducted in such a way that the ties on one end of the line are rotting, while the other end is uncompleted. When the road is finished some time hence, that part from Moncton to Edmundston will have to be—I do not say rebuilt again, because certainly it has a splendid roadbed—but the ties will have to be renewed just as if the road had been in use five years, although it is not yet in operation. Therefore, with two Government roads as it were—because we may well call the Transcontinental a Government built road too—with two roads from Montreal and Ottawa direct to Moncton, we have not got the service that the Canadian Pacific railway gives with its round-about route. Now, is there any saving by that arrangement. I inquired, and from what I could get officially, I find that there is really no saving. The public, who are in a hurry—for this is a fast century and the country is inhabited by fast living people—take the other road, and I am told that there is no increase over what there was before of passengers on the regular old train, since the Maritime express has been cut off. People either take the other route, or do not travel. The freight, the express and the mail business is larger and heavier, however, which necessitates one of two things—either putting on an additional engine, or leaving the train to one engine with too many coaches to haul. The consequence is that the trains are almost invariably behind time, all of which adds to the present unsatisfactory service of the road. On my way up to Ottawa I met travellers at Campbellton, and their language was by no means of a mild or conciliatory nature. They vowed that the next time, rather than spend a whole night at Campbellton, they would go back by way of the St. John and Vanceboro to Montreal, and could do it in less time, though it doubled the distance to be travelled. The Sunday train is also cut off. Now I am an observer of the Sabbath—as much so, as any one in the House—but I do not see how observance of the Sabbath is promoted by an arrangement under which a train leaves Montreal Sunday morning, while none leave on Saturday morning through to Halifax and St. John. I hope that the Government will see its way either to restore the Ocean Limited, or have the time table of its one daily train so regulated that it may, and can, and will connect with the train West, or at least with the trains coming to Ottawa. This is a right we demand. If there be a surplus on the Intercolonial railway operation all the better, but the first object of the Intercolonial railway is to give a good service to the public, and satisfaction to the travelling public.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I had not observed that the notice of the hon. gentleman from Acadie was on the paper for to-day or I should have been prepared to say something on the subject to which he has called the attention of the House. It is a subject which is really a very important one. I just wish to say that I entirely concur in the observations that the hon. gentleman has made. It is a fact that we have gone back twenty years or more in the management of the Intercolonial railway. Formerly one could leave Halifax in the afternoon and get here the following day. The hon. gentleman says, and truly, that now you cannot do that. I know that formerly a train left Ottawa at half past eight in the morning and it connected at Montreal with the Maritime express, which left at noon, or a quarter after twelve, and got to Halifax the next afternoon about four o'clock. Now one cannot do that. If one proposes to go by the Intercolonial railway he has to go down in the afternoon, and spend the night in Montreal in order to catch the Intercolonial railway next morning. I think that is decidedly a retrograde step, and from some statements made by the minister, the Intercolonial railway at the present time, and for some time past, has not been making as good a showing as it made during the last few years. So that there is no doubt that the road is not being operated in such a way as to give the greatest accommodation to the travelling public, and that it has not been operated in such a way as to attract the largest share of business to itself. There is just one circumstance which may account for that. Since the change of Government the management of the Intercolonial railway has been put in the hands of a gentleman who had been in the service of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. All the head men working on the Intercolonial railway now are gentlemen who have been in the service of the Canadian Pacific railway, and I see it has been stated that the general manager, Mr. Gutelius, was really only loaned to the Government by the Canadian Pacific company for two years. All these gentlemen have been transferred from the Canadian Pacific railway to the Intercolonial railway. If they were doing their best to help out the Canadian Pacific railway in its competition with the Intercolonial railway, and to put the Intercolonial railway out of business, they could not pursue a course better calculated to carry out their object.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I did not expect to take part in a discussion of this kind, but the statements that have been made by both hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, are absolutely borne out by the facts. I think we have always found the Intercolonial railway a sort of bone of contention—especially by those people who do not live in the Maritime provinces. There is, unquestionably, a sort of discontent among the people in the other parts of the Dominion over the fact that the Intercolonial railway is not always paying a big surplus. But the Intercolonial railway, of course, as has been suggested, is on an entirely different basis from any other railway in the country; it was a bond which resulted in Confederation; without the Intercolonial railway there would have been no Confederation for a great many years. Of course the Intercolonial railway has always been denounced as being a political railway, run in the interests of the political party which happens to be in power at the time, and there may be something in that also. When this Government came in, as I understand it, they endeavoured to make the Intercolonial railway a non-political railway, and they put it in the hands of a commission, which was to run it on strictly business principles.

The result I think has been this: that while the former style of business satisfied one political party in the country, now the present style of doing business satisfies neither political party. The gentleman who runs the Intercolonial railway now, Mr. Gutelius, has been an employee of the Canadian Pacific railway, and the result of the change gives some truth to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax that the changes made are really redounding to the benefit of the Canadian Pacific railway. If I am travelling to Ottawa and am not pressed for time, I prefer to go by the Intercolonial railway, but the last two or three times I found it absolutely impossible to come by the Intercolonial railway. The fact is that in the city of St. John the Intercolonial railway has not, for years I think, catered to the business of that part of New Brunswick; the Intercolonial railway could have done in the past, and could now do a very much larger business with the city of St. John than it does. The Ocean Limited being taken off, has been the greatest possible drawback to the passenger traffic and the business of the Maritime provinces, and unless the Intercolonial caters to the business the same as any other first-class railway would do, the management cannot expect the road to expand. The statement of the case by the hon. senator from Acadia (Hon. Mr. Poirier) is absolutely true. Any one wishing to go to the Maritime provinces now from the city of Ottawa has to leave the day before, or get down there at a very early hour in the morning, leaving here in the middle of the night. This practically adds another day or half day to the time occupied in the journey to the Maritime provinces. I would be very glad if Mr. Gutelius could be in some way induced to see the error of his ways, in so far as his management of the Intercolonial railway is concerned. He has instituted a great many changes which have all been, as far as I know, in the direction of restricting the business of the road, and reducing the accommodation given to the patrons of the road. I hope the Government will keep in view the fact that the Intercolonial railway was not established simply for the purpose of earning a surplus or dividend, but was instituted for the accommodation of the passengers, and of business which may accrue, as between this part of Canada and the Maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This question came up in the House of Commons and was answered by the Minister of Railways as follows:

> In reference to the Ocean Limited, we have come to the conclusion to discontinue it between February and March. Last year we ran it for the first time in history throughout the winter and met with a considerable loss, a very great loss by doing so. The traffic is much less this year than last, and therefore we have come to the conclusion that it is not in the interest of the road to run the train. Another thing is that we are short of rolling stock on the Intercolonial railway, and if we continued the Ocean Limited we would not have an opportunity to clean and paint the cars, and put them in good condition for next year's traffic.

Hon. gentlemen will observe the Ocean Limited has only been taken off for two months. The intention is, I presume, to resume its operation on the 1st of April. If my memory serves me right, the Government has been sustaining a very serious loss in the operation of this particular train, estimated at about $1,600 per day. I may further say that it is regarded as good railway practice, well established in railway circles, to take off certain trains during the winter months. To my certain knowledge two or three, at least two, of the transcontinental trains of the Canadian Pacific railway are taken off during the winter months. Unfortunately the differences between the public and the railway management appear to be irreconcilable. I do not know whether the time will ever arrive when the public will view a railway system just the same as the management will, or whether it will ever be possible to reconcile the differences between the two. However, there is the situation, and the Government felt that under the facts mentioned in the statement of the Minister of Railways they were justified in taking off the train for the period mentioned, namely, two months.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to say that the complaint, as far as I am concerned, is not so much the taking off of the Ocean Limited, as the fact that the Maritime Express has not been put back to the condition in which it was under the former administration. The fact that the Ocean Limited has been taken off is no reason why the Maritime Express should leave Montreal at eight o'clock in the morning instead of at twelve. In one case it does not accommodate the passengers from the west and in the other case it would.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—It seems to me rather unfair to base an argument against the service on the Intercolonial railway just because a train does not leave Montreal at night.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No, at twelve o'clock.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—Because a train does not leave Montreal at noon. As I understand it, there is a train leaving Montreal for the Maritime provinces in the morning, and in order to go from here to Montreal to get that train, you have to stay in Montreal over night.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—That is basing the argument on the supposition that practically all the traffic goes from Ottawa. You can leave Toronto, you can leave mostly any town in Ontario and arrive in the morning in time to catch that train. Why would you not expect the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk railway, if that is such an important part of the business, to put a train on here and make connections with that train rather than with the other one?

Hon. Mr. POWER—And leave here at 4 o'clock in the morning.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—Yes, if you are anxious to get there at night. As the leader of the House has said, all the other railways, during the winter months, decrease their service and take several trains off. As an additional argument why other points should be considered in dealing with the travelling public which comes from Ottawa, I would say I believe the bulk of the travel between Ottawa and the Maritime provinces is composed mostly of what is known as 'deadheads,' whereas travel from other points is not.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (M), An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada and the Canada Atlantic Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Thompson.

THE LATE SIR GEORGE ROSS.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, it is my sad duty to direct the attention of the Senate to the death of our colleague, Sir George Ross, within the last few days. I may say that it has been my sorrowful duty since I have had the honour of occupying my present position, and within the last two years, to direct the attention of the Senate to the death of not less than three of the most distinguished members of this body who were successively leaders of the Liberal party in the Senate of Canada. I refer to the death of Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir Richard Scott and Sir George Ross, men who filled a very large space in the public eye in the history of Canada during their long lives, and who reflected very great lustre indeed upon the Senate, to which we have the honour to belong. The death of our late colleague, Sir George, was, in a sense, entirely unexpected. At the beginning of this session he gave promise of several long years of usefulness. His mental, and what physical strength he had, seemed in a large measure to be unimpaired. We found him interesting himself at the beginning of this session in the proceedings of the Chamber in as active a manner as at any time since he became a member of the Senate, and it was not until practically the end of January that we found his health had become so impaired that he had to leave for his home in Toronto. It was, therefore, entirely unexpected at the beginning of the session that we should have to mourn his death within so short a time.

To attempt to review the life of the late Sir George Ross—the public services which he rendered not only to his native province but to the Dominion of Canada,—would very largely comprise a review of the history of Canada, and more particularly that of his native province. Time will not permit me even to glance at the services which he rendered during his long public life. I doubt if there was any hon. gentleman engaged in the public life of Canada for the last generation, who more exclusively gave his services to the State. We find him entering the second parliament of Canada, shortly after Confederation, and becoming a very distinguished member of that body. He, at that time, came in close contact with the eminent Canadians who had laid deep and wide the foundations of Confederation, and who then and afterwards loomed up large on this page of our history. I have no doubt that the contact which our late colleague had at that time with those distinguished parliamentarians to whom I have referred, very strongly animated his intention to give his life very largely to the public service. We find him afterwards leaving the Federal field and devoting his entire services to the province to which he belonged. Few men in the province of Ontario occupied a more distinguished position than that which our late colleague filled. He was not only a prominent member of the Legislature of Ontario, but became a member of the Cabinet of that province and afterwards its Premier; and the legislative progress of that great province of the Dominion is undoubtedly very largely indebted to the very valuable contributions of public service rendered by the late Sir George. We find him particularly interesting himself in building up the educational institutions of that province. Few men were more closely identified with the erection of the educational fabric of the province of Ontario than the late Sir George Ross. As a public speaker he had few equals in the Dominion of Canada. His reputation I might say was national. There was not a Canadian within this broad Dominion but felt proud of his eloquence which from time to time he listened to on public occasions. He certainly gave a lustre to the reputation of this Dominion in parliamentary statement and discussion, and we in this Senate feel proud in saying that his contributions to public questions grace out 'Hansard' as models of parliamentary eloquence and discussion.

Hon. GENTLEMEN— Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not only was he possessed of eloquent speech but he had a facile pen; he wielded the pen of a ready writer, and there are few libraries, either public or private within the Dominion of Canada, which will not be found to contain some of the valuable works written by our late colleague. He was an author of culture, of wide and experienced knowledge, and the literary works which he has left behind him are a tribute to that marvellous industry and broad knowledge and experience which always characterized his public life. I might say of his personal qualities, honourable gentlemen, that few men possessed more charm than the late Sir George. His personality was one that peculiarly appealed to the affection of those who came in contact with him; and notwithstanding the fact that for many years he was a victim of physical affliction which would have overwhelmed most men, we always found him cheerful and optimistic and taking a particularly cheerful outlook upon life. As a senator since 1907, those of us who came in contact with him—and I think I may safely say that every member of this Senate came into close contact with him in that capacity—we have to bear tribute to the industry and the deep interest he took in all the proceedings of this Senate. He identified himself with all its activities, with the business transacted on the floor of parliament as well as the work done in committees. His ripe judgment, his long experience, his parliamentary knowledge, and that experience which he gained as a legislator, acting in that capacity for some forty years, were certainly valuable contributions to the work which devolves upon this Chamber. I have to say, honourable gentlemen, that the members of this Senate mourn his death; and although he has passed from amongst us, yet pleasant memories of his personality will live with us and will be cherished by the members of this body for many years to come. (Applause.)

Hon. Mr. KERR—As a member of the Senate who has been associated with Sir George Ross in this House, and as an old acquaintance and friend, I desire to thank my honourable friend who represents the Government in the Senate for the kind words he has spoken of our fallen leader.

I agree with what my hon. friend has said concerning Sir George Ross, whose death is a distinct loss to public life generally, and especially to those of us who have been in political sympathy with him and have enjoyed the benefit of his advice as well as his able and eloquent expression of the views of his associates in the Liberal party.

Born in 1841 in the county of Middlesex, in the province of Ontario, his life extended beyond the allotted span of three score years and ten, and during the whole of those years his life has been an active and useful one. He passed through stirring times in the political history of Canada.

He first entered public life in 1872, when 31 years of age, and was a member of the House of Commons, representing his native county. He took an active part in the proceedings and debates of that House for eleven years, when he joined the government of the province of Ontario as Minister of Education, under the leadership of Sir Oliver Mowat. He continued in the same important office in the Hardy administration until 1899. He became premier of the province of Ontario, and held that high office until 1905. He then stepped across the House and led the Opposition until called to the Senate in the year 1907. No man has done so much as Sir George Ross to promote the cause of education in the province of Ontario.

Shortly after his appointment to the Senate he was honoured by his sovereign, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood.

He held many positions of honour and trust by the favour of his fellow men.

He was a member of the Quebec Interprovincial Conference in 1897.

Sir George was a director of one of our important trust companies, and of the leading Liberal newspaper of Canada for many years.

He was vice-president of the British Empire League, and of the Dominion Lord's Day Alliance.

He was president of the Canadian Authors' Association, and of the Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company.

During some years he was editor or contributor to several leading newspapers of his native province.

He was prominent in the Temperance Organization and Alliance.

He edited and published many useful works, scholastic, biographical and historical. Amongst these he was joint editor of the 'Life and Times of the Honourable Alexander Mackenzie.' He wrote 'Formative Influences in Canadian History,' Canada a Dependency of the Empire,' 'The Historical Significance of the Plains of Abraham,' 'Titerary Factors in our Canadian Life,' 'Our National Outfit,' 'Citizenships and Higher Culture,' 'Preferential Trade,' 'Getting into Parliament and after,' and only a few days before the comemncement o fthis session of Parliament he published a most interesting and able work on 'The Canadian Senate.'

But it was not only as an author that he excelled—few men could rival him in the command of the English language, or in the faculty of moving, entertaining and convincing his audiences. He was an orator of high order.

His language was choice, his metaphors true, his logic sound, his eloquence captivating. He could carry conviction with any audience and sway it with the power of his words.

It has been well said of him that he was:

"A monarch of oratory."

"A faithful public man."

"A high authority on constitutional subjects."

"One exceeding dear to his friends."

"Alert, able and eloquent."

"A strenuous preacher of higher politics."

"No greater orator ever spoke in Ontario's Parliament."

"One of the most distinguished of Canada's citizens."

"A public man against whose integrity there has been no suggestion of reproach."

"A master of platform oratory."

"Without a superior in parliaments either of the Country or the Church."

"An enthusiastic Imperialist," and this perhaps he most appreciated.

Sir George Ross was beloved by his family and respected by an immense circle of associates and friends in every walk of life—in distant countries as well as throughout Canada, his native country, which he loved so well.

In later years he suffered much from the disease which in the final struggle for life proved fatal, but his genial temper and cheerful manner never forsook him even when in great suffering, so that only those who knew him best could appreciate the extent of his sufferings, or how dearly he paid for the effort he put forth in the delivery of the brilliant passages and periods with which his speeches abounded.

The recollection of his accomplishments, as well as his kind and genial manner will long remain in the memory of the members of this Chamber.

In his life he served his native country well. In his death he bequeathed to his fellow countrymen as an inspiration "Our best service to Canada and our truest loyalty to the empire."

In this sad affliction we will all unite in expressing our heartfelt, our sincerest sympathy with the family of Sir George and to Lady Ross, whose devotion to Sir George contributed so much to cheer, to brighten, and to make happy the later years of his life.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would not appear to me to be necessary that anything should be added to that which has been said with respect to the late leader of the Liberal side of this House. I cannot help, however, expressing my admiration for the speech made by the hon. leader of the Government. To undertake to add anything to what that hon. gentleman has said would, it seems to me, be like undertaking to gild refined gold. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat comes from the same province as our late leader, and if I venture to say anything it is because, coming from a remote portion of the Dominion, it is right that the sentiment of the lower provinces should be expressed on this sad occasion. While I was filled with admiration of the address delivered by the leader of the government, I almost felt that it would require the eloquence of Sir George Ross himself to do full justice to the occasion. I do not think that it is necessary to dwell on the biography of Sir George Ross. That has been fully dealt with by the leader of this House, and the hon. gentleman who has preceded me, and the details have appeared in the newspapers, and in the tributes that have been paid by both sides of the Ontario legislature. I venture to give one or two personal recollections of Sir George Ross. My earliest recollection of Mr. Ross goes back to the session of 1883. I happened to be in the gallery of the House of Commons; and there was a somewhat aggressive, and I may add, somewhat coarse member from Nova Scotia, who had been saying things he should not have said, and Mr. Ross got up and handled him in a most skilful way. I could not help feeling that it was a case of the bludgeon against rapier; Mr. Ross danced around that antagonist in a most skilful and amusing way, and hit him again and again with a sort of light and airy touch that was really very pleasant to use to look at, and listen to. At that time he was, as some of the older hon. gentlemen here know, a man light of foot, and very nimble in his physical movements. I have never forgotten that particular occasion. From that time until he became a member of the Senate in 1907, I have no remembrance of having seen him. That was nearly a quarter of a century and when he came in here one could not help being struck at the great change in his physical appearance and constitution. He came up to us almost a helpless man physically, but although he came that way, and was not the nimble footed man he had been he had not been here long before we found out that his brain had not suffered, that his brain was as nimble as it had ever been. I do not propose to go into the history of his experience in Ontario, but every hon. gentleman knows that an immense amount of arduous and valuable work was crowded into the twenty-four years during which he was absent from this sphere, and in a smaller sphere. He was a progressive politician, and while I do not propose to go into the details of his Administration, there is just one thing that I think Sir George felt particularly proud of, and that was that he originated the scheme for building a railway into northern Ontario—the Temiskaming and Northern railway. One would naturally expect that when Sir George Ross came into this Chamber, having done so much very hard work, and at a comparatively advanced age and in broken health, that he would have looked upon the Senate as a place in which one could rest and be thankful. A great many of us do that, but that was not the case with Sir George Ross. Instead of that he continued to be industrious and to work just as he had before. On nearly all important questions that came before the Senate, he spoke at some length, and spoke in such a way as to show not only his oratorical powers which everyone recognized, but also a great deal of thought and research. He was a wonderfully industrious man. Now this thing appealed to me very much, and I suppose it did to all other members of the House, that here was this frail looking man who was not able to stand up, and yet in a room which every hon. gentleman knows is rather hard to fill, he made himself heard by every member of this House, speaking from his chair. He spoke sometimes for more than a hour at a time, without any apparent fatigue or difficulty. I think that was a sight that must have struck every hon. gentleman who stopped to think. But the departed gentleman did not confine himself to work bearing directly on the business of the House. During the interval between the session of 1912, and last year's session he published a book, an autobiography, a very interesting and somewhat voluminous work, giving the history of his own life from his own point of view—and I may say that the work was characterized by remarkably good taste, and an absence of egotism. Then during the recess since last session, the hon. gentleman prepared a work to which the hon. gentleman from Toronto has made special reference. That is a work on the Senate of Canada, its constitution, powers, and duties, an admirable little work, which I hope every hon. gentleman of this House will have the pleasure of perusing. I do not think I am superstitious, but really it seems to me hon. gentlemen that it was a Providential thing that, before he was called away, he should have written these two books, his own life, and the work on the Senate of Canada. One can say, referring to the parable of the talents in the Bible, that our late colleague did not bury his talent; he made the utmost possible use of the talents which the Almighty had given him; and I trust that he has gone to receive the reward which has been promised to those who do use their talents.

Just one word as to the hon. gentleman's character as a leader. Every hon. gentleman knows how he led the party in this House, but that is not always the most important part of a leader's duty, and the relations of Sir George with his followers were of the most agreeable and satisfactory kind. He was by no means an autocrat. He consulted his political friends, and was always ready to listen to suggestions, and even to act upon them when those suggestions did not altogether harmonize with his own views.

In conclusion I have to say—although that has been said practically already—he was perhaps unrivalled as an orator at the present day in Canada, and his eloquence was equalled by his industry; but probably what struck one most was something which has been referred to by both hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, and that is his unconquerable cheerfulness under grievous afflictions. The circumstances to which the hon. leader of the Government has referred as to the departure of three leaders of the Liberal party in this House within such a comparatively short time only recalls to our minds the thought expressed by Burke—what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Our grief for the loss of the eminent Canadian, our colleague and friend, and our sympathy with his widow and his family and the people of this province and of the Dominion, and our sense of profound respect and admiration for his great and many virtues and for the long and so prolific and complex public career of Sir George Ross, could not have found a more fitting, more appropriate or more eloquent expression than that which it has been our privilege to listen to from those who have preceded me. What they have said—and they have said it well and truthfully—might well be left untouched, and remain as the full expression of our sympathy and appreciation. I am quite certain that I cannot add anything worth while to what has fallen from the lips of our hon. friends, and if I now crave your attention for a few moments it is not for that purpose, but merely and only in order that I may be permitted to accomplish what I conceive to be an obvious duty. When we are committing to the earth the remains of that once sterling and sturdy specimen of Scotch manhood, when the Canadian Parliament and Canadian press and the people of this province and the people of Canada are extolling the merits and achievements and the courage and great eloquence of our departed colleague, there is one portion of this community whose voice it seems to me ought to be especially heard in proclaiming those facts and in saying what a debt of gratitude it has contracted and will always owe to the late Sir George Ross. I refer to that community in the province of Ontario composed partly of Canadians of Irish origin and of Canadians of French origin who are united by the tie of a common religious faith; and I refer also to that other and smaller minority composed of French Canadians who on several occasions, and quite recently again have been obliged to strenuously defend the use of their mother tongue. While this community, this minority, joins heartily and fully in the praise and encomiums which are addressed to the memory of our late colleague, they claim the special privilege of saying now and always that they are under the greatest possible debt of gratitude to Sir George Ross because he on many occasions stood by and fought for those rights which are sacred to them, those rights which are near and dear to their hearts; those rights which they prize and value above everything else. At three different periods during his public career Sir George Ross became a valiant defender of those rights. About thirty years ago, when a large section of this province, whose motives this is neither the time nor the place to discuss, and the sincerity of whose misguided ideas and opinions I would not now even question, undertook to deprive the Roman Catholic minority of Ontario of its Separate schools, it was Mr. Ross, under the leadership of that other great Scotchman, Oliver Mowat, small in stature but of gigantic intellect, and of big, stout heart, who stood by the minority and successfully defended those rights which they held so dear.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—And they did that at the risk of imperiling their political careers, and they put up the fate of their party and government as the stake of their earnestness and good faith. To the broad, liberal spirit of Sir George Ross, to his love of fair play and justice, and to his respect of the constitution of his country, the Catholic minority in Ontario owes the preservation of its schools and the preservation of the right of having taught to their own children in their own schools the tenets of their ancestral faith. They chose the honourable, if the more difficult and thorny path. It would have been easy, it would have been much easier, for them to have followed the crowd and to have drifted with the current. But they did not chose to do so; they fought for rights which were sacred and should be maintained, and to them—to Mr. Ross especially—do they owe a debt of gratitude for having preserved to them that sacred right. Then later on, about ten years afterwards—when a vicious attack was made upon the use of the French language in the Parliament of Canada and elsewhere by D'Alton McCarthy and others—it was Mr. Ross, who was at that time Minister of Education and who afterwards, when he became Premier of this province, aided and assisted in the creation, the organization, the maintenance and support of the bilingual schools of this province. And quite recently again Sir George was heard from on this subject and with great force and convincing arguments defending these schools and the reasons for their maintenance. To Sir George Ross, the smaller minority to which I have referred also, owes a debt of gratitude for having preserved to them the right of having taught in their schools, the language of their forefathers. Sir George Ross realized and never forgot that this has been, this is, and this will continue to be a bi-lingual country, and instead of deploring the fact he rejoiced at it. Little share did he take in the mistaken idea that unity of language is essential to national unity in Canada, or anywhere else. Not only was Sir George Ross favourable to the maintenance of the French language but on many an occasion he expressed the hope that the use of the French language would be extended and perpetuated; because he realized, as men are beginning to realize, and as men will more and more realize in the future, that the preservation of the French language on this continent constitutes one of the best and surest guarantees of the continuance of the British tie.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—So it is, hon. gentlemen that on this occasion this minority to which I have referred, claims the special privilege of saying how grateful it is and how grateful it should and will be to the late Sir George Ross. With bowed heads, with our hearts filled with grief, with our minds pregnant with the sweet fragrance of the great virtues of Sir George Ross, with the echoes of his virile and captivating eloquence still ringing in our ears, to the ever good Christian citizen, to the true patriot and eminent statesman, we to-day offer the supreme homage of our esteem, our respect and our admiration; and speaking for this minority the sincere and cordial promise that we shall always lovingly cherish his very lovable memory. (Applause).

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Allow me to add a few words to the eloquent praise which honourable members of this House have just bestowed on our late colleague, whose death we all deplore. We all feel that the country has lost one of its most eminent citizens, one of its most cultivated and most luminous minds, one of its most brilliant orators; the province of Ontario one of its most glorious sons; the Senate a star of the first magnitude; the spirit of conciliation and tolerance, so essential to the peace and prosperity of this country, a powerful factor. It is a loss, a great loss for our political and intellectual life, where, during forty years, he ploughed a luminous furrow and sowed ideas and sentiments the fruits of which constitute a precious treasure. In addition to most varied gifts of the mind, he was endowed with most estimable qualities of the heart, with an unstinted kindness and with a spirit of justice and impartiality which characterizes the speeches and the books which he fortunately leaves to us. His eloquence was of the first order. There were electrical flashes in his great oratorical efforts and personal magnetism in the expression of his sentiments and of his thoughts. He is not entirely dead; his writings and his speeches have lighted fires, torches which will ever burn and continue to illuminate our political and literary life.

Death has for a long time with its dark wing cast a shadow on this valiant and courageous fighter, and it was only after a prolonged struggle that it succeeded in overpowering and defeating him. It must be proud of its victory for it had to deal with a hardy antagonist. It has been cruel towards us by removing from our midst a man who played such an important part in this House, by depriving us of an eloquence which imparted such a brilliancy to our deliberations.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I do not know that I can add anything to the eulogies and encomiums which has been passed upon our late colleague, and I may say frankly that my principal reason for rising is to pay my personal tribute to one with whom I have been associated for so many years. It was my good fortune to be in the House of Commons when our late colleague first entered it; and I call to mind many tilts—if I may use the expression—that passed between our late colleague and myself.

The many political fights we had never interferred with our personal relations and the good feeling which should always prevail between gentlemen occupying positions in Parliament, and who must necessarily differ on many of the questions which agitate the public from time to time. It was my good fortune to be in opposition to our late colleague during the many years we were thrown together in public life, and I repeat our personal relations were always friendly. Upon many occasions, as he himself states in his book, on entering Parliament he found that I was not very particular in the choice of the language I used when attacking a political opponent, but that never interferred with the kindly relations which prevailed between us. I deeply regret the loss to the country of our late colleague. The probabilities are that with a mind constituted as his was, and with a mind constituted as mine is, and with our early associations, had he continued to live and remain in public life, we would have kept apart on the great questions agitating the country, but I am quite sure the feeling of opposition would never have been carried any further than a difference of opinion. I deeply regret the loss which the country has sustained in the death of one of its most gifted citizens.

THE HAMILTON DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce to whom was referred the petition of Andrew Lorne Hamilton, together with the evidence taken before the said committee.—(Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to ask the Chairman of the committee with reference to this matter if he is in a position to give us information as to the manner in which the evidence in this case was taken, and if any fresh evidence has been offered. I understand that the committee has merely had the evidence taken last year reprinted, and that. it strikes me, is putting this House in a position of judging themselves. This case has been twice before the House. Some two years ago it was reported to the Senate and rejected by a large majority. Last year it was reported by the committee to the House again. There was some new evidence that time, and there was ground for the report which was submitted to the House. Last year they again rejected the report of the committee, and to-day we find the committee reporting this proposition to the House without any evidence whatever to back it up except the evidence that was taken a year ago. When this case was dismissed by this House a year ago, it was to all intents and purposes finished—it was dead. When the new case was entered into this year, to my mind it would be absolutely necessary to take evidence. Some hon. gentlemen may say, 'Well the evidence will be exactly the same as it was last year.' Is any member of this House in a position to say that any party who was giving evidence last year would give the same evidence this year. These gentlemen might speak for themselves, but I do not think they can speak for the witnesses. It is a strange proceeding that a lawyer will say to the committee, 'My witnesses will say exactly what they said before.' We do not know whether they would or would not. Rule 47 reads as follows:

> The petitioner and, if the respondent appears, the respondent, and all witnesses produced before the committee shall be examined upon oath or upon affirmation in cases where witnesses are allowed by the law of Canada to affirm: and the law of evidence shall, subject to the provisions in these rules, apply to proceedings before the committee, and shall be observed in all questions of fact.

I submit there was no evidence except what was taken last year. They assume the witnesses would say what they said before. The report looks like a slur on the intelligence of this House, and we are asked to stultify ourselves by going back on our action last year, when the report was rejected. On the very same evidence we are again asked to adopt the report. I do not think the House would be justified in accepting the report at the present time. I raise the point of order that the report is not in order under the rules of the House which say that the witnesses must be produced before the committee and examined on oath, which has not been done.

The SPEAKER—I am not prepared to give a ruling on this point because I do not know what the law of evidence is. I must make a study of the law to see if it has been followed in this case. If I were to give a decision at the present moment it would not be of any value.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The Order of the Day can stand until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not see why the Order should not be disposed of to-day.

The SPEAKER—The point of order is that no evidence was offered in support of the petition, or that the evidence which has been offered is in contravention of rule 47, which says that the law of evidence shall, subject to the provisions in these rules, apply to proceedings before the committee. I am not prepared to rule at present.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—According to the report, evidence was taken and the committee reported. I read the evidence myself. My hon. friend states that there was no evidence taken, and we have to choose between the word of my hon. friend and the report of the committee. I read the evidence which was sent to me. I do not think we can intelligently discuss the point of order unless there is some admission from the committee that the facts are as stated.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—The fact is that the report is available to members of the House, and if you inquire into the facts you will find that this is a contested case. Counsel appeared for the petitioner, and for the respondent, and counsel informed the committee that the evidence which was given last year was the evidence that they proposed to give this year if the witnesses were called and examined in detail. But counsel representing both the petitioner and respondent agreed that the evidence taken last year should be received by the committee, and it would be a mere idle form to have the witnesses examined again, and have counsel read to them their former evidence. So that it is exactly the same thing in substance, and, in fact, as if they have been sworn and examined.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But they were not sworn.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—They were there and agreed to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Prince Albert raised a question of order and His Honour the Speaker said he was not prepared to decide the question at present, but with the permission of the House he would inform himself further and would decide, as I presume, at the next meeting of the House. I think that in the meanwhile, after His Honour had stated his intention, which was apparently accepted, some other business was entered into, and another Order of the Day was read. It was only then that the hon. gentleman from Brandon undertook to bring up this question again. I do not think he can do that. I have not had the opportunity of looking over the evidence of this year. I do not mean to say that I propose to vote against the report, but I should like a chance to look over the evidence before the matter is considered, and I hope the hon. gentleman from Brandon will allow the matter to stand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman from Brandon was perfectly in order for this reason: no disposition was made of the Order of the Day. His Honour indicated that he was not prepared to pass on the question of order, but what became of the Order of the Day.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: It stands.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And what the hon. gentleman from Brandon proposed doing was to move that it should be placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Order of the Day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (G), An Act for the relief of Gertrude Carmen Birks.—Hon. Mr. Pope.

Bill (H), An Act for the relief of Rose Ethel Freedman.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

RUDOLPH GOLDSCHMIDT PATENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT moved the second reading of Bill (L), An Act respecting a certain patent of Rudolph Goldschmidt.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me that these Bills for the renewal of patents ought to be explained to the Senate before they are read the second time, because they involve a principle in which some of us do not concur. The Senate should know really what they are granting when they consent to the second reading of Bills such as this, seeing these Bills go before the committee, and we do not hear the evidence, and hence know nothing about them further than the report which is made by the committee concurring in the application of the patentee. We are legislating in the dark and have been continually doing so on this question of patents.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I think hon. gentlemen can quite safely deal with this Bill. It is not a question of the revival of a patent; it is a question of being permitted now to transfer it to another section, which is a section under which the public may use it, and become licensees of it; so I think the principle of the Bill may be fairly well understood in that way, and that the matter could go to the committee to be considered and to see whether the circumstances would warrant that being done.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 12, 1914.

HAMILTON DIVORCE BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce to whom was referred the petition of Andrew Lorne Hamilton, together with the evidence taken before the said committee.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to have a ruling on the point of order which I raised yesterday.

The SPEAKER—I confess to this House that I have not had much time to study the question. I shall be prepared to give a ruling to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—I move in amendment that this motion be placed on the Orders of the Day for Wednesday next. It is an important question, and His Honour will require considerable time to study it.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I agree to a postponement of the Order of the Day until Wednesday next.

The order was accordingly postponed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill D) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—As I understand it, this is a Bill to create a new crime in this country—to make a crime in Canada of what has heretofore been a perfectly proper, legitimate, harmless and daily matter of business. This Bill proposes to cover with odium the 1,200 newspaper publishers of Canada—and ten times the number of newsdealers and booksellers—for the manner in which they have conducted their business in the past; it proposes to make criminals of them, every man subject to two years in the penitentiary, if they presume hereafter to conduct their business according to their own ideas and along the same lines they have carried it on for a quarter of a century or more. It proposes to make it a crime to do in Canada what will be perfectly proper and legal in the motherland, in the United States, and in all the rest of the world.

With the modesty becoming a comparatively young member, I submit that the Senate is not yet so entrenched in the confidence and affection of the people, that it can afford to heap insult and opprobrium on the 1,200 newspaper publishers and many thousands of booksellers and newsdealers of Canada, and by a stroke of the pen transform what is now a legitimate line of business into a crime. God knows there are enough matters of vital interest to the physical, moral and material wellbeing of the people of this country, which should engage the most serious attention and action of this Parliament; some of such questions are, the cost of living; the adulteration of foods; the robberies perpetrated by the combines and trusts; and the housing problem for the masses, and especially the horrible conditions of life in the slums—the slums that exist right under the noses of hon. members here in Ottawa, in Montreal and Quebec, as well as in every city of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Not in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—The question of provision for dependent old age, is another of these questions. The horrors of the white slave traffic, not only as regards the bondage of enforced prostitution, but also the enslavery of children in industrial establishments, and the miseries of the sweatshops is another. Others of these questions are the raising of the age of consent from children of fourteen to mature girlhood of twenty; the burning question of political corruption, the demoralization and degradation of the electorate, and the millions of dollars that have been filched from the pockets of the public by a horde of grafters; the liquor and gambling problems; a living wage, the labour problem in all its various phases, and especially the employment of women and children; the more humane and enlightened treatment of criminals, insane and other defectives; the public health and sanitation in its multifarious phases and especially the drastic steps necessary for the extermination of the great white plagues of tuberculosis and typhoid, and other alarmingly prevalent diseases which are preventable. There are these questions, not to mention 101 other questions relating to our moral wellbeing and material progress, which I might enumerate. I say, there are more than enough of such vital subjects as some of those I have mentioned, to engage our serious consideration without the possibility of subjecting this Senate, from one end of the country to the other, to the jibe that we are frittering away our time on the consideration of what the Philistines may very properly describe as 'freak legislation.'

The Bill, the principle of which you are asked to affirm to-day, is an extraordinary and far-reaching one, and its passage through the House has been sought in an unusual and extraordinary manner. When asked by my hon. colleague from Halifax to explain his Bill, its father, the hon. member from Grandville made an astounding statement. He said:

> This measure does not require a long explanation; and I do not wish to make any, because so far, I have not seen any paper in opposition to this Bill; and I may say that I have been commended for it and asked to bring it into law as soon as possible.

Let me suggest that the reason the hon. member has 'not yet seen any paper in opposition to his Bill,' is that the newspapers as well as the public may have regarded it as a freak or a joke and treated it accordingly—never dreaming that this hon. House would carry the joke to any practical conclusion. But who, I should like to know, has asked for this measure; what public body? Has any one heard of any public agitation, or even seen a petition for it? A great social and moral reform congress recently gathered in this city comprising men and women foremost in every line of social and moral reform from all over the Dominion. They dealt with a score of vital problems, but there was no suggestion or even hint in favour of this Bill. There was not even a whisper in its behalf. That congress evidently never heard of it. I say there is absolutely no demand for such a law as is contemplated by this Bill, and what may be very generally regarded as a 'fad' ought not to be foisted on the public at the whim of any one man or any half dozen men.

The righteous soul of the member from Grandville seems to have been unduly vexed at the sight of pictures published in the Montreal papers of Harry Thaw and his silly wife, Evelyn, those two products of modern American life which, however undesirable and degenerate, have interested the English speaking world for some years. The hon. gentleman's sensibilities were still further shocked at the sight of pictures of Becker, the powerful New York police official, and the four gunmen alleged to be his tools in the murder of a man whose death was necessary to hush up one of the most startling threatened exposures of graft, corruption and scoundrelism that even New York could furnish, and who were properly sentenced to death for their cold blooded crime. These, as I understood his remarks, were his two principal, if not only, reasons for asking this Parliament to create a new crime in Canada. I am not going to emphasize the exceedingly important part played by the newspapers of the world, and the inestimable value of their co-operation with the officers of justice in the arrest of criminals through the medium of the publication of their pictures. That has already been touched upon by the hon. member for Middleton. But incidentally I call attention to the fact that one of the two reasons advanced by the hon. member for the passage of his Bill, viz., the publication of the pictures of Becker's four gunmen, is one of the very reasons why it should not pass. Does that hon. member not know that these men escaped arrest for weeks—three or four—and it was only after the very general publication of their pictures in the press that they were recognized, trailed to their lair, captured, and convicted.

Let me modestly suggest that no law has yet been placed on the statute book compelling the hon. gentleman to look at the 'dirty faces of criminals and scoundrels from all over the country,' portraits of whom, he alleges, are published in the Montreal Star, La Patrie, and the Montreal Herald; and, in addition to saving himself from a lot of worry and vexation, the quickest and surest way for that hon. gentleman, and for everyone else who shares his sensibilities, is to cease looking at the pictures in those papers and thus prevent the 'tendency to immorality' that a glimpse of the contents of those offending papers might impart to weaklings.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—That is a joke.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—In his advocacy of the Bill the hon. member from Victoria bewailed the fact that 'a terrible state of things' had developed during the past twenty or twenty-five years. Well, hon. gentlemen, I am bound to admit that 'several things' have happened since 'the good old days' when the hon. member from Grandville and Victoria were especially commissioned by Providence to guide aright the moral tendencies and destinies of the world through the columns of the newspapers on which they were employed. Indeed, the changes since then have been so rapid and so far reaching, that I am afraid that should they ever return to that vocation they would find themselves so completely out of touch with modern conditions, the demands of the people, and the requirements of the business, that they would not only not be able to carry on their self-imposed tasks, but would not even recognize the 'number of the volume'; and certainly the people of to-day would not appreciate, even if they recognized the 'back numbers.' But seriously, I strenuously object to their 'holier than thou' attitude, and resent their implication that since those two gentlemen ceased slinging ink as newspaper employees the morals of the people of Canada have gone to the devil. Such a suggestion by them is as insulting to the common sense of the people as it is ludicrously egotistical.

My hon. colleague from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) says he thinks that 'the publication of the portraits of criminals in newspapers is calculated to corrupt the morals of the young'; and the hon. member from Kamloops sees some connection between newspaper and magazine pictures and the popular ovation given by his Kamloops constituents to the notorious Bill Miner; though I fancy that Bill would have been given an equally enthusiatic ovation by the hon. member's Kamloops constituents even if his picture and exploits had not been featured in the enterprising British Columbia papers.

But while these hon. gentlemen are so solicitous about the effect of printing the pictures of people accused of petty or major offences, they appear to be entirely callous to the 'immoral tendencies' of the publication of the outrageous caricatures lampooning hon. members of this Senate, the general ridicule heaped upon, and the popular contempt of the people for this honourable House engendered thereby. If it is 'the morals of the people' they are so anxious about, I suggest as a subject for heroic legislation the suppression of these insulting caricatures. So, too, they appear unconcerned about the degrading and disgusting pictures of prize fights and the human brutes who engage in them, which decorate the pages of the daily press. What about "the morals of the young" in that case? Then there are the immodest and openly immoral and degrading plays which disgrace our theatres. And what shall I say of their apparent heartless indifference to the pictures not only 'tending to immorality,' but illustrations bordering on actual indecency—of the 'Tango,' the 'Bunny Hug,' the 'Turkey Trot,' and other suggestive if not positively lascivious dances and exhibitions, prohibited by some courageous prelates, I am glad to say, but which the hon. members in their zeal for public morality do not appear to have the courage to mention, much less condemn.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We are prepared to accept the suggestion, though.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—And talking about 'the tendency to corrupt morals,' I should like to ask the hon. members from Grandville and Victoria what comparison they think there is in 'the tendency to corrupt morals' between the publication of the picture of a person accused of some petty offence and the 'mad dance,' that 'outtangoed the tango,' given under the noses of hon. members this week in this capital city of Canada—described in the preliminary advertisements as

> The X-ray dance spectacularly produced for the purpose of revealing more than mere grace and agility, the most daring of an era in which the dance has crept and leapt further and further from the old methods, and in which the effect is as near the actual scientific X-ray as a theatrical producer could or would dare show for the purposes of entertainment.

I quote the description from the Ottawa Free Press, and only need add that this dance was given in Ottawa by a company headed by a woman whose admission to the United States was 'held up' for some time on the ground that she was an 'undesirable.'

Nor do the 'tendency to immorality' of the 'slit skirt,' the abolition of underwear, and other sensuous styles of the female fashions of the day, shock the sensibilities of those hon. senators. They only worry about the unesthetic pictures of Evelyn Thaw and Becker's gunmen published in the Montreal Star and La Patrie. Verily, some people who 'strain at gnats' can 'swallow camels' without blinking an eyelid.

I am not going to deal with the impracticability of this Bill—should it ever be enacted into law—and the impossibility of its general enforcement. That phase has already been dealt with in a convincing manner by the hon. leader of the Government. But I want to point out a few more of its preposterous and ludicrous absurdities. Under this law proposed by the hon. member from Grandville—unless a special order was previously obtained from a superior court judge or the attorney general of each of the nine provinces—the picture of Louis XV would have to be torn out of every volume of the tragic life and death of that grand and gay monarch before it could be again sold throughout Canada.

Joan d'Arc was recently canonized as one of the choicest and most heroic spirits of French history; but if I should publish the thrilling story of her unique history and death, accompanied by her picture—or alleged picture—the penalty would be two years in jail. The same condign punishment would follow if I should 'make, manufacture, sell or expose for sale, or to public view, distribute, circulate, cause to be distributed or circulated, or have in my possession for sale, distribution or circulation, any book, pamphlet, newspaper, or other printed, typewritten or otherwise written matter containing any picture or photograph of, say,—Papineau, the popular idol of the people of Quebec of a previous generation; or, of a later period, Louis Riel, the hero of a section of the people of that province—including the hon. member from Grandville himself, who, I understand, regards that misguided man not only as a hero but also as a martyr—or of one, Thomas McGreevy; or those certain members of the legislatures of Quebec and Ontario who still occupy such a large place in the limelight of very recent and current events. Any enthusiastic Ontario Liberal newspaperman or book-publisher who should tell the story of the life of the grandfather of Ontario liberalism—a man upon whose head a price was once set—with accompanying illustrations, would be liable to be thrust into jail as a felon.

If, for the instruction and edification of his fellow enthusiastic Irishmen, the hon. member for Victoria, in some uncontrolled outburst of his exuberant eloquence, were to paint a graphic word picture of the life, the sacrifice and the martyrdom of Robert Emmett, and some ill-advised Canadian newspaper were to publish it with accompanying illustrations; or if the illuminating story of Charles Gavan Duffy, the condemned felon who afterwards became such a commanding figure as an empire builder; or of the great Parnell himself, the man who swept aside the cobwebs of antique parliamentary procedure at Westminster, and to whom of all others Ireland will owe whatever of Home Rule she finally attains —I say that under the Bill before this House the newspaper man who has the audacious hardihood to hereafter publish pictures of these immortal figures of Irish history, can only do so with two years of penitentiary life staring him in the face for promoting 'a tendency to immorality.'

Apostolic times will recur to hon. gentlemen without my particularizing; but let me mention a couple of comparatively recent illustrations. Three years ago a delegation of members from this hon. House, consisting of the present hon. leader of the Government in this Chamber, the hon. member for De Lorimier, the hon. and venerated member for Belleville, the hon. member for De Lanaudière, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, and my hon. senior colleague from Halifax, were appointed to especially represent this hon. House at the coronation of the reigning sovereigns in Westminster Abbey. The portraits of these handsome and distinguished gentlemen, together with that of the Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, Lord Strathcona, and other very eminent personages, were published in the leading daily papers of the empire, and in such world-renowned pictorials as the Illustrated London News, the Graphic, the Sphere, the Mirror, Canada News, the Daily Mail, and a host of other papers and magazines too numerous to mention. But, under the eagle-eyed search for "a tendency to immorality" provided for in this Bill, every man who sold, exposed for sale, or even loaned to his next door neighbour (that would be "circulation" within the meaning of the Bill) any one of the papers containing the handsome pictures of the hon. members comprising that delegation, and of the Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, would be liable to spend two years of his life in jail.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—He is joking.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—Since this House prorogued—less than a year ago—John V. Ellis, one of the most highly respected and venerated members of the Senate, has joined the 'great majority.' Under this Bill no one could publish a picture of that old man's saintly face without the risk of becoming a felon. Can you imagine anything more repugnant to our common sense?

Bramwell Booth, the present head of the Salvation Army, son of that modern prophet of God, General William Booth, will shortly pay his first visit to Canada, and be acclaimed from the Atlantic to the Pacific as one of the most useful and successful captains of humanity. Yet under this proposed law, if a Canadian publisher dares to print his picture he will be guilty of 'tending to corrupt public morals' and be liable to twice as long in jail as General Booth himself served for his part in the publication of that 'Maiden Tribute to Modern Babylon,' a badge of honour which he was privileged to share with the greatest journalist of his age, W. T. Stead, a leader of men whose tragic death as one of the Titanic victims glorified the human race. Yet should this Bill of the hon. gentleman from Grandville become the law of the land the printing or sale of Booth's or Stead's picture in book, pamphlet, magazine or newspaper would be punishable by two years in jail!

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What about the suffragettes?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—You should know all about them; you are better acquainted with them than I am. Great things are happening all around us. A few days ago an event happened in northern Mexico that startled the English speaking diplomatic world. I refer to the murder of a British subject named Benton by the Mexican bandit Villa. All the world was interested in knowing what those men looked like—the bandit who defied the United States and the British Empire and his helpless victim. But without risking two years in prison neither of these two men could be pictured in a Canadian newspaper, and no American or British papers containing their pictures could come into Canada—because the one man was said to have been executed by court martial; while the other man is popularly 'accused' of being the actual murderer.

All the world is vitally interested in the unrest among the masses of the people. Such leaders as John Burns, Tom Mann, Keir Hardie, and Ben Tillett are of world-wide fame. A few months ago a new star came into the seething mass of labour unrest named Jim Larkin. Only a few days ago the action of the Government of South Africa in deporting half a dozen labour leaders without trial—they were only 'accused' of an offence—gave the foundations of the empire a jolt, the effects of which no man can at present foresee. But under this Bill of the hon. member from Grandville, supported by the hon. members from Victoria, Halifax and Kamloops, no man in this country from Halifax to Vancouver, under penalty of being a jail-bird for two years, can make the faces of these men familiar to the people of Canada in either book, pamphlet, newspaper, or in any other way—except by formal permission of a judge or an attorney general.

Of course, it will be said in reply that this Bill does not contemplate any such extreme cases as I have illustrated. But I answer that the statute law of the country can make no distinction or discrimination. It must be enforced just as it stands, and the Bill provides that:

Any person who makes, sells, exposes for sale, circulates, or has in his possession for circulation or distribution, any book, pamphlet or newspaper containing any picture of a person accused of or condemned for any indictable offense, or offense punishable upon summary conviction.

shall be liable to two years in jail. The accused may be entirely innocent and may be subsequently acquitted; or his trivial offense may be summarily punished by two days in jail, but the unfortunate devil who prints his picture, or the newsdealer or newsboy who sells it, shall be liable to two years in the penitentiary under the Bill now before the Senate.

But not only is the hon. member who introduced this Bill going to make a felon of every man who prints, and of every newsdealer and of every newsboy or girl who sells or exposes for sale, a book, pamphlet, or newspaper containing the pictures of any guilty wretch or innocent man accused, perhaps maliciously accused of crime, but he tells this House that he also proposes to insert further amendments in the Bill to absolutely prohibit all extended newspaper reports of the trial of offences, indictable or punishable by summary conviction. Well, I do not envy the hon. gentleman his job. He has undertaken a task which men would shrink from, who have much more nerve than he is supposed to possess. If that feature of his proposition means anything it means the establishment of a censorship of the press; that the press is to be gagged and throttled; and that the proceedings of the courts of justice are not to be faithfully mirrored for the public by trained and expert writers, but that the reports of the proceedings of Canadian courts are to be censored and subject to the dictation of some petty court official—perhaps the most narrow-minded, picayune, and fossilized to be found in the locality; perhaps a partisan of the most offensive, ignorant and arrogant type. This is 'liberalism' with a vengeance; but I have no fear that the people of Canada will for a moment stand for such fossilized Bourbonism as that.

It is purely a matter of opinion as to what creates 'a tendency to corrupt morals.' To the pure all things are pure. To the evil minded all things may appear evil. I say again there is no expressed demand for this legislation; there is no appreciable volume of public opinion in its favour. The hon. mover himself has not given us the name of a single organization, or sect, or society, or body of men or women, or of any man or woman asking for it. If he has such formal request I challenge him to produce it now. I assert that neither the press of Canada nor the people of Canada will stand for his proposal.

As the hon. leader of the House has pointed out, such a law will not and cannot be enforced. But supposing for the sake of argument that it could be enforced in Canada—as far as Canadian productions are concerned that you could succeed in making this feature of the Canadian newspaper, magazine and book-selling business a crime and jailed every publisher, bookseller and newsboy guilty of infringing its provisions — what is the hon. member going to do with the many tens of thousands of copies of books, magazines, newspapers and pamphlets containing these illustrations now being imported by Canadian booksellers and newsdealers in bulk from the United States, from Great Britain and from the continent? How is he going to enforce his law against this great volume of business? And supposing he jailed for two years every seller of books and magazines, newsdealer and newsboy in the Dominion who handle these hundreds of thousands of outside publications, does he imagine he can thereby prevent the people from getting them? Suppose instead of buying them from the book stores and news agents as now, that the people become direct individual subscribers, this Bill will tend to increase that foreign business ten-fold. Are you going to employ an army of men to open and examine every copy of the millions of books and newspapers that would then come through the mails, but which now come in bulk, and jail every subscriber or member of the family who casually shows his book or paper to a neighbour—thereby constituting the crime of circulation? The idea is too preposterous to think about, much less seriously discuss.

While, of course, it is our prerogative to make whatever laws we like for ourselves, no matter how fantastical and fanatical, let me impress upon hon. members the idea that a law that has not been even dreamed of for our 90,000,000 neighbours to the south, the 40,000,000 of our kith and kin of the motherland, and the other civilized peoples of the world, is not a burning necessity for our scattered population of 8,000,000. A feature of business that is not a crime in any other part of the world ought not to be made a crime in Canada.

The first Napoleon, in all his imperious arrogance, had neither the audacity nor the ability to successfully gag the press even of his day. I shall be much interested in seeing the men who will stand up in this Senate and be counted for the proposed establishment in this democratic young nation of the censorship and gag methods of the Dark Ages in Europe.

I ask hon. members not to approve of the principle of this Bill and send it to committee for further consideration, because it is an insult to the men of the newspaper profession of all Canada, as well as to thousands of other men engaged as book publishers, booksellers and newsdealers. It puts a stigma upon them—the stigma of having been engaged for 25 years—the period stated by the hon. member for Victoria—in 'corrupting the morals of the people,' and especially of the young people of Canada; and hereafter making it a crime, subject to two years in the penitentiary, for continuing a feature of their business which they have hitherto conducted without question. I oppose this Bill because it seeks to make a crime in Canada of what never was a crime, is not a crime, and is never likely to be a crime here, or in any other part of the globe. I further oppose it because it establishes a censorship of the press which means to submit the judgment, the enterprise, the good faith, and the honour of—to say the least—one of the most intelligent and influential professions in this country—the daily moulders of public sentiment—to the dictation of some petty official—perhaps as fossilized and malicious as he may be narrow minded and out of touch with modern life.

The logical conclusion of the enactment of this preposterous Bill into law would be the practical abolition of public trial and the substitution of trial by star chamber because it follows that if it 'tends to immorality' to merely see the inanimate picture in a newspaper or book of a man or woman merely accused of crime and to publish verbatim or extended reports of the trial in cold type, how much more immoral is it to look on the human form divine itself, and to listen to the blood-curdling story of the eye witnesses as told in the courts of justice!

Instead of that 'continental reciprocity' that some people were all so anxious for a few years ago, and 'increased British trade under an enlarged preferential tariff,' that the same people think they want now, this Bill enacted into law would practically prohibit the current newspapers, illustrated journals, and popular magazines of the day from coming into Canada, as well as classic literature and works of art, not only of the United States but also of the motherland and the rest of the world. It would thus involve a censorship of all foreign mails as well as of the press and the courts of Canada; and one would be just as grotesque and just as ridiculous as the other. Such a law would wrench Canada from the category of civilized nations and throw her back beyond the days of the bigoted and fanatical Puritans to the atmosphere of the still more bigoted and fanatical dark ages of the Inquisition. Let me conclude by suggesting that, if this hon. House undertakes to enact into law the likes and dislikes, the fancies and fads, the crochets and whims, imaginary and real, of its individual members, it will have its hands more than full. I am opposed to the principle of this Bill being affirmed or any further consideration being given it, because I am opposed to this Senate becoming the laughing stock of this country and the subject of derision in other civilized countries.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If it be that nobody is going to say anything more on the subject, I would like to move the adjournment of the debate, for the reason that I did not expect to have a lecture like the one we have just heard to-day, however, well prepared, and well read. Before answering it I would like to look over it, and take away the joking part of it, and see if there is anything serious in the matter. I should like to look it over in 'Hansard,' and for this reason I move the adjournment of the debate until Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER—I do not think it is in order for the hon. gentleman to move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I would like to say also that I wish to peruse that well-written document. I do not know where the hon. gentleman got it, whether it was during the midnight hours that he penned it, or in the cooler moments of the day at his desk in the House here, but it certainly deserves a little attention. I am with the senator from Grandville when he considers that quite a portion of that effusion can be, and probably after perusal must be, considered a joke.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—Not half as good a joke as the Bill itself.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Under these circumstances, as the senator from Grandville is precluded from moving the adjournment of the debate, I would do so, seconded by Hon. Mr. Boyer.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—In order to put myself properly before the House, as my hon. friend has challenged me to present something showing that this Bill has been asked for, fortunately I have a letter received this morning, from Mr. E. W. Trowern, secretary of the Dominion Board of the Retail Merchants Association of Canada, dated Toronto, March 10, 1914. Fortunately Providence has helped me in this matter, as the letter was received this morning. The first part of it is this:

I have just received a copy of the Bill introduced by you entitled Bill (D) 'An Act to amend the Criminal Code,' and I desire to on behalf of the 'Booksellers and Stationers' section of the 'Retail Merchants Association of Canada,' that this Bill meets with the hearty approval of all the honest and respectable booksellers and stationers throughout Canada.'

They may be jokes, too, like those of my hon. friend, but I would like to put this portion of the letter in.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—He is evidently one of the three Tooley street tailors.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He is one of the three, anyhow.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I would like to say that it is too bad that this Bill should be brought up again in the Senate, because I believe the majority of the members of the House know very well that it is nothing but a freak Bill; and, although perhaps unintentionally, it is simply calculated to defeat justice. The hon. gentleman from Grandville proceeds under the assumption that publicity is rather the friend than the enemy of crime and criminals. I really think it is too bad for a freak Bill of this description to meet with the consideration which it has already had from the House.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill No. 90, An Act to amend an Act relating to the establishment and expenses of the International Joint Commission under the Waterways Treaty of January 11, 1909.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 13, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (R), An Act respecting a patent of John Roger Arnoldi.—Hon. Mr. Kerr.

Bill (S), An Act for the relief of Eliza Jane McLaughlin.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY INVESTIGATING COMMISSION'S REPORT.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The notice of inquiry being called:

By the Honourable Mr. Casgrain:—

That he will inquire:—

1. How many copies of the Lynch-Staunton-Gutelius report have been printed?
2. Is the Government aware that no more copies can be had?
3. Will the Government kindly have more copies printed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. gentleman let that stand?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Yes. I have just been inquiring again about obtaining copies of the Lynch-Staunton-Gutelius report. I sent the page up a few minutes ago for a copy and I find there are no copies to be had. It would be very good of the Government if they would kindly have a few more copies prepared, because we consider it interesting literature.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So do we. We are attaching a good deal of importance to it.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on Bill (J), An Act to amend The Inspection and Sale Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This Bill may be said to be divided into two divisions; one deals with flour, meal and feed, and the other with vegetables. It is a Bill which necessarily involves a good deal of thought on the part of the department which is called upon to administer this branch of the public service. It is very largely technical and I shall be very glad to explain each section as we proceed with it, unless any general explanation is desired in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I trust the hon. gentleman will tell us just what the change is in each clause—give us the section as it stands now, and the change. It is to be presumed that we shall not need to make many changes in it. But still, Bills sometimes require changes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall explain each clause and hon. gentleman will understand the application of the amendment to the original.

On clause 1:

Section 2 of the Inspection and Sale Act, chapter 85 of the Revised statutes, 1906, is amended by striking out the fifth line thereof and substituting therefor the words 'Part III applies exclusively to flour, meal and feed.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This Bill proposes to add 'feed' to part 3, as that commodity is new covered by the Bill. Hon. gentlemen will observe that in the present Act, part 3 applies exclusively to flour and meal. We now say, 'flour, meal and feed.'

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—Would the hon. minister inform us at what point the inspection is made, of flour and meal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I cannot tell my hon. friend. I shall make inquiries, if it is material to the consideration of the Bill.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2:

The said Act is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 149:

149A In this part, 'feed' means and includes the feeds or mixed meals or other feeding products made from the entire grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat or flaxseed or other feeding stuffs, and the bran and middlings from wheat, rye, oats, peas, Indian corn, buckwheat, flax or sugar beet.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This clause is introduced to define the word feed, for which no definition now exists, and it is approved by several manufacturers of feed and by the Dominion Millers' Association.

I might say that that association took a very active interest in the revision of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Will the hon. gentleman give us an idea of what the object of this measure is? There must be some object.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—I could explain it. At the time the original Act was passed flour was the main product, but to-day feed is as important a product in connection with the milling industry, and they are making more money out of the feed they are selling to the farmers in the shape of offal in connection with the dairy business, than they make out of anything else. This is to have an inspection of feed, as well as of flour. That addition is proper and right and ought to go through.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It will be observed that the comprehensive meaning attached to the word 'feed,'—and the Inspection Act applies to that—insures the public of getting feed within the meaning of the Act.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—And not the floor sweepings.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes. It includes:

The feeds or mixed meals or other feeding products made from the entire grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, or flaxseed or other feeding stuffs, and the bran and middlings from wheat, rye, oats, peas, Indian corn, buckwheat, flax or sugar beet.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—That is it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Is it the intention of the department to label those different kinds of feed, according to what they are composed of.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No; they are subject to inspection, though.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If they are not labelled, what would be the object of the inspection?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Will they fix a standard for 'feed.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When feed is sold it must be stated, or must be brought within this particular section which I have read; that is, its contents must be the contents embraced within the section.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Will the contents be marked on the sack or barrel? It seems to be there is not much use of inspection unless a purchaser knows what he is buying.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would involve their being put in particular packages.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—'Feed' would include almost anything that an animal would eat.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—After an inspection is made as I understand it, whatever the inspector finds in what he inspects in the way of feed, as outlined in this portion of the Bill, he just passes it; if it does not contain that, he does not pass it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is to prevent adulteration of feed.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I understand that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You can always put in motion the machinery for inspection. I am not saying that that machinery is in motion all the time, and that any body buying feed is absolutely assured of getting this particular kind of feed; but we are making provision, as far as we can, that they shall get it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—As I understand it now, the object of this is that the public will be assured that they are going to get a certain class of feed; that there is no adulteration; that there is no stuff in it that should not be in it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—And the fact that that has passed inspection is evidence that there is not that adulteration in the feed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, and a purchaser can ask that it be inspected.

Hon. Mr. POWER—For answer to the question asked by the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie, I would refer him to section 6 of the Bill:

6. The said Act is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 164:—

164A. Every bag, sack or similar package of flour, meal, rolled oats, rolled wheat, or feed shall be plainly marked,—

(a) with the initials of the Christian names and the surname at full length of the packer or person for whom such bag or package is packed, and with the place of business of such packer or person; and

(b) with the gross weight of the bag, sack or package.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I would like to ask the leader of the Government whether the Bill would be taken to include linseed cake, which is a preparation of flaxseed. Of course linseed cake has in the past been open to a great deal of adulteration, and I know that in England they have special arrangements which guarantees the farmer that he is buying pure linseed cake, when he buys it stamped. Would that be covered by this interpretation or would anything be done in that matter? It does not mention it, but it says 'flaxseed.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If it does not mention it there; no. I should think that anybody buying flaxseed would have a right to demand from the seller, a feed of the character that is here mentioned. Of course if he chooses to take something else, I suppose the law cannot stand in the way of his doing it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The point is that it is very difficult to tell, when buying linseed cake in the ordinary way in the market, whether it is adulterated or not. Now if there is to be any inspection, a sample of the product could be sent to the chemist, to be analysed, and find out what it is. Without that the ordinary man buying it, is not really able to tell unless he buys it on the name of the seller, and knows he is buying it from a responsible man. If there is to be any inspection, would it not be well to stamp it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The question arises as to whether linseed cake is a feed.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—That is what I want to know. It is certainly a feed as far as cattle are concerned.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Read clause 2:

149A In this part, 'feed' means and includes the feeds or mixed means or other feeding products made from the entire grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, or flaxseed or other feeding stuffs, and the bran and middlings from wheat, rye, oats, peas, Indian corn, buckwheat, flax or sugar beet.

Therefore it matters not in what form your flaxseed is, whether oil cake, or meal. This is an interpretation clause, and they are bringing 'feed' into the interpretation Act for the first time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, we are giving an interpretation to 'feed.'

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There has never been any.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, never before.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—And this is simply defining what the word 'feed' shall mean, wherever used?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—And it means 'feeding products made from the entire grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn,' and so on.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Or 'other feeding stuffs.'

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Or other feeding stuffs. It is only an interpretation clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is very wide.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes, and 'feed' covers a wide range, too.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think the quality of the feed for the various purposes ought to be graded as 1, 2, 3, or whatever it may be, the same as flour or wheat is graded. It does not seem to me to be any advantage to the public to have an inspection, and to say that the package should have the name of a manufacturer on it. The Act goes on to mention those different articles, and then it goes on to say 'other feeding stuffs.' I presume anything that an animal would eat, would be a 'feeding stuff,' and yet might be of very little use so far as feed is concerned, to the animal, as compared with the different articles that were in the feed. I think it ought to be graded in some way in order to be a benefit to the public at all. This section 6 referred to by the hon. gentleman from Halifax does not refer to it at all; it simply means that the name of the person shall be on the package. As we know, all the refuse about a mill—screenings and everything else—is run into feed, and though it may be of very little use as a feed for fattening purposes, still it is feed. Any person with any knowledge of feeding knows that all screenings about an elevator are chopped up and sold with bran for twenty or twenty-five cents a ton, when otherwise they would be burned in the furnace; but when feed is high this poor stuff is run in as feed. I think it would be well if the hon. leader would give us some information. I make the suggestion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Of course this is largely experimental. We are making a start to place a definition on feed. As to whether we can carry it out to the extent that my hon. friend suggests will possibly be largely determined by the operation of the Act as amended. It is a considerable step in the right direction, in any event, to place an interpretation upon it. As to whether it is practicable to define the constituents of those particular elements which enter into feed, I am not prepared to pass an opinion.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Do you mean the mark on the package?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am quite prepared to let any clause stand and we can go back to it again. The next clause amends section 150 of the Act, to include feed imported into Canada, and is substituted for the existing section 150. It is a re-draft to meet the requirements of the trade.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think under existing conditions this will have any effect. It looks like anticipating free feed and flour.

Clause 3 was adopted.

On clause 4:

4. Section 163 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

163. Every barrel and half-barrel of any article mentioned in this section shall contain, respectively, that net weight of the article which is shown in this subsection opposite the name of such article, that is to say:

Description of Article.	Net weight in Dominion Standard pounds. Barrel.	Half-barrel.
Flour	196	98
Meal	196	98
Rolled Oats	180	90
Rolled wheat	100	50

2. When any such article is contained in a wooden package other than a barrel or a half-barrel, the net weight of the article contained in the package shall be taken to be the weight of the article.

3. When any such article is contained in a bag, sack or similar package, the gross weight of the bag, sack or package and of the article shall be taken to be the weight of the article.

4. A bag, sack or similar package of feed shall contain one hundred Dominion Standard pounds, gross weight, of feed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If hon. gentlemen will compare the clause with the existing section in the Act, they will find that this is more comprehensive and includes rolled oats and rolled peas. It embodies the recommendation of the Dominion Millers' Association.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It provides that a half-barrel of flour in wood shall weigh 98 pounds.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, that shall be the weight whenever flour is put up in any form. These standard weights shall apply in all cases.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In the West, flour is sold in sacks, and a flour sack has a weight of 98 pounds. Now it will have to weigh 100 pounds gross, which would give over 99 pounds of flour.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—When it is in wooden packages you have to deduct the weight of the package, and this gives 98 pounds of flour, but when it is in sacks the sack counts as part of the weight.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The idea is whether a person buys 98 pounds in wood or in sack, he should have 98 pounds of flour.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The clause before provides for the gross weight, and that of course includes the bag.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5:

5. Section 164 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

164. Every barrel or half-barrel of flour, meal, rolled oats or rolled wheat, packed for sale, shall, by painting or branding on one end thereof, be plainly marked:

(a) with the initials of the Christian name and the surname at full length of the packer or the person for whom such barrel or half-barrel is packed, and with the place of business of such packer or person; and

(b) with the quality and weight of the flour or meal therein contained; and

(c) with the tare of the barrel or half-barrel.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG — Practically, the Christian name and so on is never marked on a barrel of flour. Generally you have the name of the mill. Take for instance, some of our large concerns, the Oglivies or the Lake of the Woods—they paste a piece of paper on the barrel, describing the brand of the flour and giving the name of the company. That is all you will ever find on a barrel of flour. There is never any Christian name or anything of that kind, as far as I have seen.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose it would be the corporate name of the company. If a packer has a Christian name, then his initials are necessary to distinguish him from any others of the same name.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—You are not changing the law in that regard, but the provision has never been carried out.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It gives the department power to enforce it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—You do it already in section 164, the section you are amending, but nobody ever dreams of hoping to find a Christian name on a barrel of flour.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They have a trade mark, and that trade mark is always found there.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—And the name of the firm or individual, as the case may be.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Has the minister any idea whether those marks he is asking for comply with the custom in the United States? Because, I can quite appreciate that the gentlemen interested in the milling business, for instance, might ask legislation to be placed on our statute books, which would practically prohibit the importation of different articles through their inability to pass inspection regulations such as we are considering to-day. I know that a few years ago there were some articles shipped to Manitoba—I forget the particular articles—but they found according to the Inspection Act that they could not be shipped into the province because they did not comply with certain regulations. I think the articles included a case of fruit. We should be very careful not to place anything on the statute book which would bar the importation of the article referred to in the Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Act applies to goods imported into Canada.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I am satisfied of that, but we should be careful in passing an Inspection Act of this description that we do not prohibit the possibility of importing articles into Canada because they do not comply with this Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not know that that would be the case.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They can comply with the Act if they wish to.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—But a very small percentage would comply. Some very large institution in a foreign country might wish to import into Canada, but they could not do it at all if the packages had to be so marked, and you could not expect a large institution to change their system for the sake of shipping a few goods to Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The foreign importers of goods invariably acquaint themselves with the laws of the country into which they are exporting their goods. They do not export by accident or caprice. They make preparation for that particular market to which they ship their goods.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6:

6. The said Act is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 164:—

164a. Every bag, sack or similar package of flour, meal, rolled oats, rolled wheat, or feed shall be plainly marked,—

(a) with the initials of the Christian names and the surname at full length of the packer or person for whom such bag or package is packed, and with the place of business of such packer or person; and

(b) with the gross weight of the bag, sack or package.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This clause provides for the marking of sacks. The Dominion Millers' Association recommend that the weight for a bag or similar package shall be the gross weight.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The person who purchases it pays so much for the sack.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—The sack is worth as much as the bran.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It amounts to that.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think that is right. If a person buys half a barrel of flour he should get 98 pounds.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It only applies to the sack, not to the barrel. The sack would be very much lighter than the barrel. You could get more for the sack than for the same weight of the contents.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Do I understand that 98 pounds of flour will be in the sack, and that the gross weight will be marked on the sack, or simply 98 pounds sack and all?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The sack and contents would have to weigh the gross weight.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Would it be 98 pounds sack and all.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Sack and all.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think it should be 98 pounds of flour.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Would there be any objection to putting on the sack or packages the quality of the feed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is not proposed at the present time, to adopt grades of feed. The department is anxious to ascertain how the present legislation will work out, and I have no doubt that if it develops, the department will elaborate upon it and establish grades of feed hereafter, if it is at all possible to do so, but it is a step which will involve a good deal of care in putting the proposed amendment into operation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—That is done in the case of the inspection of fruit. The man who is selling his fruit has to put on the box the quality of the fruit he is selling, and it would not be a very hard thing to make the man selling feed do the same thing, for the protection of the purchaser.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It may take some time to build up grades of feed. We are now exacting that feed shall be possessed of certain constituents. To say at the present time that those constituents shall reach a certain grade or certain standard, would be very experimental indeed, and the Government or the department feels that it is going sufficiently far in establishing constituents, and allowing the grades to stand for the time being.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You are not referring to the grades?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are not establishing the grades yet.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You are not establishing the quality of the feed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When I spoke of grades I referred to quality.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You have the words 'and other stuff.'

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It would be very hard to establish a grade of feed. You might have ground barley in one sack and you might have ground oats or you might have a mixture of barley and other stuff. You would require a great many grades if you established grade for feed. People have to buy it on what their knowledge of feed is worth.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG--Subclause (b) of clause 6, dealing altogether with flour, meal and rolled oats, has to be read in connection with subclauses 3 and 4 of clause 4, which reads as follows:

3. When any such article is contained in a bag, sack or similar package, the gross weight of the bag, sack or package and of the article shall be taken to be the weight of the article.

4. A bag, sack or similar package of feed shall contain one hundred Dominion Standard pounds, gross weight, of feed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.

Subclause (b) of clause 6 reads as follows:

(b) With the gross weight of the bag, sack or package.

The gross weight of flour marked on a bag is a new departure entirely, and it will require the re-stencilling of all the bags that are at present stamped for the different firms—little and big. You find on all the bags 98 pounds of whatever grade the flour may be, and you are going to alter all that by having the additional figures put on, the gross weight. Subclause 4 of clause 4 provides that the bag or sack shall contain 100 pounds gross weight of feed. That is the trade custom.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is for feed?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is the first time there has been any legislation as to the weight of a bag of feed.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—But in the branding of a bag, by marking the gross weight on the outside of it, you include all packages of flour, meal, rolled oats and rolled wheat, and all these articles have been manufactured from time immemorial without this additional weight being put upon it; so that you will have a new departure which you may have to reckon with as inconveniencing dealers and adding great expense.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am informed the Dominion Millers' Association recommended this.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—They may have, but it does not alter the fact that you are making it necessary to add additional marks on every bag already branded. It is no trouble to give your order and stencil to a firm manufacturing sacks, all for the same money, but I am rather dealing with the stock-in-trade of bags in the various mills, which, when this Bill becomes law, will have to be restamped with these additional figures of the gross weight, whatever it may be.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is the only way you can enforce uniformity.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Why will you require the gross weight, when you say that inside of that bag there shall be the weight the law compels you to give the purchaser?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Dominion Millers' Association think it would work advantageously for the public and the trade that this should be done. I suppose all legislation grows out of the necessities or requirements of trade.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Would the hon. gentlemen tell me the grounds on which they form that opinion. I cannot conceive that the Dominion Millers' Association would urge an additional burden on themselves unless they had a strong reason.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The stamping of these bags would be a bagatelle.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman is right as far as the new bags are concerned, but how about the carloads of old bags in the country ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They would put them through a stamping machine.

Hon. Mr. CORBY—I think in Ontario it has always been usual to sell flour by the hundred-weight. I was in the flour business for a number of years, and when we put flour in barrels we put in 196 pounds, but when selling by the bag we sold by the ton, and we usually allowed a pound off each bag.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I understand that 98 pounds of flour would be contained in a sack. We always considered that weight, a sack of flour. The millers selling the flour sold 98 pounds for a sack of flour, and they had to throw the sack in. To-day by this legislation, the millers will get something for the sack, because they weigh the sack, and get so much a pound for it.

Hon. Mr. CORBY—In Ontario, they sell flour by the hundred-weight, but the millers take back their bags.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—That is the old style.

Hon. Mr. CORBY—No, they are doing it now in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Do you mean the large mills in the west, should take back their bags? They would not get a quarter of them.

Hon. Mr. CORBY—They sell flour by the ton in Ontario, and not by the bag.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think in our legislation we should not increase the cost of living. We hear a good deal about the high cost of living. The Millers' Association in Ontario has decided that, instead of selling to the consumer 98 pounds of flour for a half barrel, as they have done for a great many years, they will sell 97 pounds, and the consumer will get a pound less than in the past. I think we should not get away from the fact that the consumer should be given 98 pounds for a half barrel of flour. The Millers' Association has evidently come to the conclusion that they are going to cut off a pound of flour to the consumer and get the same price for a sack of flour. A barrel of flour is 196 pounds, and one half a barrel 98 pounds. The bag should not be included in the weight of the sack of flour. When a man buys flour he is not buying the sack. There may be a sack weighing a pound or two pounds.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will appreciate the difficulty; let us assume the purchaser is buying 98 pounds of flour. How is that determined.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If your inspection is any good, there will be 98 pounds in that sack.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You cannot inspect every bag of flour.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You are going to insist on the name and the brand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A man buying a sack will know whether he is getting 100 pounds, including the sack, but if he is asking for the net weight of the flour inside the bag, he cannot determine that without emptying the bag.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—A person buying bread in Ottawa knows the number of ounces he is getting. The inspector attends to that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is only occasionly inspected.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The baker has to see to that. He does not know when the inspector is going to examine the bread. But in this legislation it is suggested that the purchaser may get 96 pounds of flour instead of 98.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—That is not possible. If he buys a sack of flour it must weight 100 pounds, and the sack weighs a pound.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is the feed which must weigh 100 pounds, the flour weighs 98.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But my hon. friend asks 'How are you going to find out if the people put the right amount into the sack?' If flour is packed by a large company for sale to the public, we assume they are not going to break the law. The law says there must be 98 pounds in a sack, and we assume there will be that quantity there.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You can weigh it out yourself.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—You are getting the worst of it, because they are getting a certain amount for that sack. Previously they had to furnish a sack with 98 pounds in it. It is proposed now that the sack and the flour contained shall weigh 98 pounds.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The material of which the sack is made, so far as weight is concerned, is very much more expensive than the feed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—They have always had to furnish that.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not object to that clause at all.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It has been suggested that there is no way of procuring for the purchaser now, even the exact weight he is paying for. If hon. gentlemen will look at section 175 of chapter 85, they will find that there is a penalty for any one who offers for sale, knowingly, any barrel or half-barrel of flour or meal in which there is a less quantity of flour or meal than is branded thereon. There is a punishment for any one who says he has put 98 pounds of flour in a sack if it turns out there is less than that quantity in the sack.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE — This feed comes in carloads, done up in bags, and this feed is all marked, and then it is tested. You weigh five or six bags out of the car, and take the quality of it by that. You find that in the past there has been some deficiency, in the weight of some sacks, and also deficiency in quality; an agitation has taken place, and the Government has been urged that this Act be passed.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—You are letting them off in regard to marking the quality ?

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—No, we are not letting them off anything. By the protection we receive under this measure we would get the proper weight.

Hon. Mr. CORBY—This clause distinctly says they have to put the weight on the bag.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—What about the quality ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Paragraph (b) provides for that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I do not see that it does. It only applies to the marking of barrels. Section 5 of section 164 applies to the marking of the barrels, and when you put it in the barrel, you have to mark the quality and weight of the material it contains, but when you put it into a sack you only mark the weight and not the quality.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This section which is being repealed, only deals with barrels, or half-barrels, and not with bags or sacks.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—And the new clause of section 5 deals with barrels, and in section (b) it says 'with the quality and weight of the flour or meal therein contained.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But we are enlarging the section by including rolled oats and rolled wheat; that is the difference.

Hon Mr. BOSTOCK—But that does not explain why in one case, in (b) you say in section 5, which will be the new section 164, 'with the quality and weight of the flour and meal therein contained.' Then in clause 6, or 164-a, you say (b) 'with the gross weight of the bag, sack or package,' and you say nothing about the quality.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But we are now dealing with clause 5.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I understood we were discussing clause 6.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We have already dealt with 5.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that the hon. gentleman takes the objection made by the hon. gentleman from British Columbia. In the clause which we are now considering, while flour in a barrel or half barrel has to be branded with the quality, it is not so if the flour or meal is contained in a bag. I think that must be an oversight on the part of the department, and I suggest that it might be well to let this clause stand and let the officers of the department consider it. I think that what should be here is something like this: 'Every bag, sack or similar package of flour, meal, rolled oats, or rolled wheat shall be plainly marked with the quality;' and then that the feed shall be marked only with the initials and other things that you provide. Flour and meal should be protected as they are now, and there should be a different word for feed. I think that is worth considering.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Allow that to stand.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I also suggest that 'the gross weight of the bag, sack or package' should only apply to feed, because it really does not make much difference to feed which is only worth about a cent a pound. Flour is a different proposition entirely, because it has three cents or three and a half cents per pound, and it makes a considerable difference to a consumer if he has to lose a pound of flour on every sack that he buys.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A sack will represent a good deal more than that.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—But he is getting the sacks now; the person has to furnish the package at the present time; you are going to give the miller the advantage of probably at least a pound of flour on every sack and let him get the same price, as he is getting at the present time. I do not suppose they will lower the price because this Inspection Act is coming into force. The hon. gentleman must understand that this is not new, for millers are putting up their flour in sacks at present, and will continue to do so. Of course the sacks are worth something to those who purchase the flour. When I was in the milling business I used to advertise this fact, and very often I would see beautiful aprons made by the ladies, and printed on them the words, 'Manufactured by R. Watson, Miller, Portage la Prairie.' They were very pretty aprons too.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You should encourage art of that kind.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Sometimes they would be marked 'XXX.'

Hon. Mr. WATSON—X X X or 'Strong Bakers.' The hon. gentleman should let the clause stand, because the department has not taken into consideration that according to the provisions of this Act the consumer will not get as much flour as he has in the past.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Is it not the fact now that the package is weighed with the flour? I think the package is included in the weight.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—All weighed together.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I know that when I was in the milling business, I always put in 98 pounds of flour, and always made allowance for the sack.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Flour is not always packed in 98-pound sacks; it is packed in 50-pound and sometimes 10-pound packages.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—What was recognized in the past by law as a bag of flour was 98 pounds, and the smaller quantities would be half-bags and quarter-bags, and so on. When you come to the 10-pound packages, of course that speaks for itself; and those smaller quantities are usually put up in paper. It would be ridiculous to brand on a 10-pound package of flour the gross weight and net weight, for there would be only a hair's breadth between the two. To my mind, if the leader of the Government will take this matter into serious consideration, and consult the department, he will find that he is making changes that will be more annoying and aggravating than any good they will do. If the law requires strengthening so that a person buying 98 pounds would get 98 pounds, make it imperative, so that the purchaser cannot be deceived without a heavy penalty, but when you ask that the net weight and gross shall be marked on the bag—in some cases fine cotton is used which would not weigh more than an eighth of a pound—it will be seen what difficulty you are getting into without doing any earthly good to the trade or purchaser or anybody else. You are simply loading up your trade with some new-fangled ideas, that are not worth a button.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Are we going to let 164a stand?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, the leader of the House has said he would let that stand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am quite willing to let that stand.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Could the leader of the House inform the House as to what necessity there is for this legislation. Who has asked for it?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Dominion Millers' Association have interested themselves very much in this.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I thought so.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—They are concerned for the farmers.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Again I would say it looks like the Dominion Millers' Association. I do not think the consuming public have asked for it at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might say to my hon. friend that there have been numerous representations, from Halifax and St. John particularly, for the passage of this legislation.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—For what particular part of the Act ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Dealing with flour, meal and feed. I am told that there is a real necessity for the Bill as it now stands, and earnest endeavours are being made to ascertain the opinions of all parties concerned. (Hear, hear). As hon. gentlemen may possibly remember, this same legislation was brought up in 1912, and was discussed at very great length in the Commons, and it has been a subject of much communication between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the public ever since. May I be permitted to say in answer to what my hon. friend from Yale has asked in reference to the quality being stamped on the bags, that some years ago that was the practice, but of late years it has gone out of practice. Those purchasing flour, such for instance as dealers, rely upon the brands which are stamped on the bags. Every manufacturer has his brand or a name for a particular class of flour. As hon. gentlemen know, flour is now sold according to its brand. Its quality is determined by a particular brand or name given to that class of flour.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—But this deals with feed as well.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As to the quality of feed, we are not trying to establish a standard or grade.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I think it is important that something should be done in that direction.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—I have received a number of letters from farmers and local manufacturers protesting against the quality of feed imported into and sold in this country. They complain that it is adulterated and yet is sold as genuine.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Is there any feed imported into this country?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Where is it imported from?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—I know that a great deal is imported into Leeds and other parts of eastern Ontario, and there is complaint that this imported feed is adulterated. I do not know where it comes from, whether from the United States or the West.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If there is no object in having the quality stamped on a bag, why stamp it on the barrel? If a purchaser buys a bag containing 98 pounds of flour, he has a right to have the quality of that flour set out on the package just as much as if he had bought flour in a barrel. This ought to be considered.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The difficulty the leader of the Government finds himself in when dealing with this matter is the inclusion of feed in this clause. That tangles up the whole question. You cannot make provision for the whole of these products in one clause, because of the innumerable varieties of food on the market. It is the custom of the trade to brand on the outside of the package the grade of the article sold.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is that now branded on bags?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes. Each bag is branded either 'strong bakers,' 'pastry' or whatever it may be—some trade name adopted by the manufacturer—and through usage the brand becomes well known to the users.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is, the quality is not stamped but the brand is, and the trade recognize the brand as marking a particular kind of flour.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The ridiculous part of it is that when you come to make the gross weight and the net weight on a package, in some cases there will hardly be a hair's breadth between the two. A great deal of flour is put up in paper sacks, sometimes as much as 100 pounds. Fifty pounds is quite common, and quantities of 5 pounds are generally put up in paper. Now in that case, what difference can you make between the gross and net weight?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It does away with net weights. When you are buying a bag of flour you get the weight on the exterior of the package. Is not that more reasonable than to require that the interior of the package shall show the weight? As it is now, you can put the flour on the scales and determine whether it comes up to the weight marked.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The question is whether it is right or not to make the consumer pay for the weight of the package. The same thing occurs in buying groceries by retail; the package is put in with the article and forms part of the weight.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 7:

The said Act is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 164a:—

164b. The provisions of sections 164 and 164a of this Act shall not apply—

(a) when flour, meal, rolled oats, rolled wheat or feed is, in the presence of the purchaser, weighed and put into the barrel, half-barrel, bag, sack, or other package; nor—

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—What is the meaning of subclause (b)?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This provides for conditions to which clauses 164 and 164a do not apply. It was inserted at the instance of the late Senator Campbell, who stated that his firm shipped a great deal of flour which the purchasers required to sell outside of Canada. They only wanted some mark for identification.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Would not that have the effect of reducing the value of our products?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The purchasers create a new brand, and consequently our standards do not apply.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not go so far as the gentlemen did two and a half years ago, who did not wish to have any truck or trade with the people south of us, but I do not think that we should make our legislation worse than it is at present, for the purpose of meeting their convenience. Subclause (a) says that when flour, meal, etc., is weighed and put into the package in the presence of the purchaser, the provisions of sections 164 and 164a do not apply. Now, suppose the flour is put into the package at a mill in western Ontario, and the immediate purchaser is buying 100 or 500 barrels; he or his agent is there, but under this subclause the retailer who purchases from the wholesale dealer would have no protection at all. It is only the wholesale purchaser who happens to be present personally or by his agent who is satisfied. This is a change in the law which I think really objectionable. Then come to subclause (b). The same sections of the Act do not apply to articles sold for export out of Canada if the purchaser request that no marks be put on the package. It seems to me that if flour is being sent to England or Germany, there should be the same marks for the information of the purchaser as if the flour were to be sold in Canada. I do not think the fact that a purchaser in New York or Baltimore would sooner not have those marks on, is any reason why we should alter the law. The law as it stands is a great deal better than this.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Under this subclause any person might go to a mill and have flour put up in packages weighing ninety-two or ninety-four pounds and sell them for regular packages of ninety-eight pounds. How are you to stop him? I suppose the idea was to provide for farmers going in to purchase a sack or two of flour, but you open the door to fraud.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We might limit the quantity.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I fully agree with what has been said by the hon. member from Halifax with regard to subclause (b). We have been attempting for a number of years to keep up the standard of Canadian products, but this is throwing the door wide open for fraud in the sale of flour. We require those who put up apples and other products to do so in a certain way and to brand their packages, and we are particular to keep up the grades of our wheat, so that the importer in England will know the quality of the wheat he is buying. We surely ought not to allow our millers to degrade our flour and perpetrate a swindle on the public.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I do not see how you can prevent the purchaser, when he gets the article outside of this country putting it into other packages and branding it as he pleases.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That is a different matter.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—If there is no mark on the package, it is not known to be Canadian.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—We should see that it leaves here all right.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—How are you going to prevent a man selling flour as Canadian if he chooses to do so?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—He can do that if he likes. When it goes over the border and he gets it in his warehouse he can repack it, if he pleases. We cannot follow him into foreign country and enforce the provisions of our law.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If a man wishes to be crooked, there is no reason why we should assist him in perpetrating a fraud.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The late Senator Campbell, as a miller, said that there were people in the United States who wanted our flour to mix with theirs. They would not sell it as Canadian flour but under their own brands.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The United States have not been taking flour from Canada.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Very little. The consumers in the United States prefer the product of the Minneapolis mills to anything we have to offer.

Hon. Mr. CORBY—The United States millers are buying our grain and mixing it with theirs. I cannot see what control we can exercise over those who import our flour into the United States. They can take off any brand we may put on, and use their own brands. That is why I do not see how we can make any provision as to quality. How can we specify exactly the quantities and proportions so long as they blend our flour with their own.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I have no doubt the dealers in England and the United States look after their own interests, as we are looking after the interests of our people here. We make provisions which govern imported articles, and no doubt they do the same. We should not enact a provision in our law, which would go to encourage the deterioration of any Canadian product, natural or manufacturing.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—It does not seem to make much difference whether it is marked or not when it is going to a foreign country, where we have no standards for flour registered.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Absolute standards I mean.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think there are different brands of flour known in the markets—Ogilvies, and Lake of the Woods. I think they are copyrighted, and we have inspection.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Some one spoke about the branding of apples. There are standards of apples, but there is none for flour.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We have standards of flour and they are known in England and other parts of the world.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Subclause (a) provides for a sale when the person purchasing is there to see and measure it. Some one objected that the purchaser who had it put up in packages of 92 and 94 pounds could sell those packages afterwards as if they contained the full weight. The moment any one undertook to do so he would come under the provisions of the law which provide that a package shall contain 98 pounds.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—But he would not do that as a Canadian.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We are not exporting much flour to the United States; most of it goes to England, and our standards are known there. Now under this clause you would permit people to come and buy flour and put their own brand on it.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 19.

Section 356 of the said Act is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor :

Every person who sells or offers for sale by the bag any of the vegetables mentioned in subsection 2 of section 337 of this Act, shall, in case any bag of such vegetables sold or offered for sale by him does not contain at least the number of Dominion standard pounds required by the said subsection, be liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding twenty-five dollars for a first offence, and for each subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—You are just taking out the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And extending it to the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. CORBY—To make it uniform.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 20.

Chapter 15 of the statutes of 1911 is repealed.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—What is that chapter that you propose to repeal?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is the old law regarding potatoes. It is repealed so as to avoid repetition. They agree with the other provinces as to potatoes.

Hon. Mr. GORDON, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again on Tuesday next.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN INCORPORATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR moved the second reading of Bill E, 'An Act to incorporate The National Council of Women of Canada.'

Hon. Mr. KERR—This society has been carried on in an unincorporated condition for a number of years, and has attained a very considerable influence for the purposes which are stated in the Bill, the second clause of which provides:

2. The object of the council shall be to unite in a Dominion federation, for the betterment throughout Canada of conditions pertaining to the family and the State, all societies and associations of women interested in philanthropy, religion, education, literature, art or social reform.

The object, then, is the establishment, in any part of Canada, of branches, and the membership already existing is to be continued as the membership of the association as incorporated. There is no real reason why the principle of the Bill should not be accepted, as it has to go before the committee.

The Bill was read a second time, and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous and Private Bills.

The House adjourned until Tuesday, the 17th inst., at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, March 17, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY INVESTIGATING COMMISSIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired:

1. How many copies of the report Lynch-Staunton-Gutelius report have been printed?
2. Is the Government aware that no more copies can be had?
3. Will the Government kindly have more copies printed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A large number of copies of the report have been printed, and my hon. friend will be able to secure some copies in a few days.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—May I ask where they are being printed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand at the Government printing office.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That is not my information.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand that they are being printed there.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I am told that they are being printed at the Gazette printing office, in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have not heard of it, but if they are it is a very good place to print them, I should say. However, I shall get the information for the hon. gentleman.

DOMINION GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE SERVICE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

INQUIRIES.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired:

1. Who has been appointed to the vacancy in the Dominion Government telephone service, caused by the death of Mr. L. A. Palmer?
2. By whom was the new appointee recommended for the position?
3. What experience has he had of telephone work in the past?
4. What other qualifications has he for the position?
5. Is he related in any way to any member of the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The answers are the following:

1. Mr. W. H. Stevens.
2. Hon. Martin Burrell.
3. No information in the department.
4. The superintendent of the British Columbia lines states that he is qualified for the position.
5. No information in the department.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired:

1. Is the Government aware that there appeared in The Province, a newspaper published in the city of Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia, in its issue of the 10th of January, 1914?

Regimental Orders.

British Columbia Horse.

2. Regimental Order No. 2, by Lieut.-Col. C. L. Flick, Commanding 31st Regiment British Columbia Horse, Headquarters Merritt, B.C., January 2, 1914.
3. Telegrams.—In future it is requested that all telegrams for Merritt Headquarters be marked via Canadian Pacific railway. This applies also to telegrams for O. C. Regiment at Lower Nicola. The service over the Dominion Government line from Kamloops is faulty and generally unsatisfactory.

C. Tyner, Lieut.,
Acting Adjutant.

4. Has representation been made to the Government of the unsatisfactory condition of the Government telephone line and the service over it?

5. If so, what steps will they take to have the Government telephone service improved so that the service may be made satisfactory to the public?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To questions 1, 2 and 3, the answers are, no.

4. No representations have been received by the Militia Department from the officer commanding 31st Horse.

5. The superintendent of the line reports it to be in a satisfactory condition.

IMPROVEMENTS ON LACHINE CANAL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved:

That this House regrets that the Government has chosen this inopportune time to draw the water from the Lachine canal, thereby depriving factories of power, and employees of these factories of work.

He said: This question is one of very vital interest to the working people, the factory owners and employers of labour in Montreal. The withdrawing of the water from the Lachine canal since the 1st of March and up to the present time has been a great hardship to these people. As a rule, the water is drawn off for about four weeks in April, immediately before the opening of navigation, for the purpose of making the necessary yearly repairs, and scouring silt, &c., out of the canal. The canal officials are generally aware of the time when the work will have to be done, and are prepared in consequence, and the work is carried on at a time when it is least inconvenient to those who use the water-power. It is then not such a hardship as it is when the water is drawn off earlier. The Government had intended in the first place to withdraw the water from the canal last fall, and leave the people without water-power all winter. The effect of which would have been to close up the factories all winter. All those who are familiar with the industries along the Lachine canal know the large number of men employed there. The water-power from the Lachine canal is the cheapest power available; this water-power is necessary for the carrying on of certain works, for which steam or electricity, obtained from the electric companies, would be too expensive. The Government, this year of all years, when work has been so scarce, have thought fit to make some extraordinary repairs. The newspapers have published photographs of the immense works, the expenditure on which will amount to a quarter of a million dollars. I went to see the works myself, because I could not understand why such works were necessary at this time. At the present moment the work being carried on is the widening of the weir of lock No. 4, which is the first lock after leaving Lachine; the reach is about four or five miles between lock No. 4 and the entrance of the canal at Lachine, and there is a drop there of some 12 feet. Some factories are using that power. If those factories alone were deprived of the power it would be a small affair indeed. It appears to me it would have been possible to let out the water in the lower reach, which is 12 feet lower, and with a very small coffer dam this work might have been carried on without taking the water out of the canal entirely. I dissent very strongly from what the leader of the House said here the other day—that I was introducing this question in order to create political capital. I take exception to that; there is a well established rule of this House which says we are not to impute motives to one another. I am not seeking any office in the city of Montreal, and have no intention of doing so, or of currying favour; but I have been connected, this winter, with quite a number of charitable institutions—the St. Vincent de Paul Society, of which I am chairman for my parish, the Salvation Army and others. The workers in those organizations have told us that, going back for more than thirty years, they cannot remember so many unemployed in the city of Montreal as we have had this winter, and have at the present moment. Therefore it is most inopportune to deprive of work, those who were fortunate enough to have it, for honourable members must remember that in doing so not only those men themselves, but a large number of other people who are depending upon them, are also being deprived and being stinted. In the usual order of things those men would have had steady employment. The point I am trying to make is that there was no urgency in the matter. I know that hon. gentlemen on the other side were very strong at one time on emergency—but there is no emergency in this case at all—there is no intention of finishing this work until the opening of navigation, anyway. The idea is to do a certain part of the work, whilst among the works that are supposed to be an emergency is the erection of a building for a new power house. Only a few years ago a power house was erected at lock No. 4, Lachine canal, for the purpose of lighting the canal, and, if I am right, also to supply the necessary power to open and close the canal gates. The intention now is to tear down the old power house entirely, and build a new one. I claim there is no necessity for that at present, and that the time is inopportune. Besides that, the idea is also to straighten the canal beyond this point. The intention is to do this work after the water is let in the canal, during the course of the summer. I saw a large force of men working there but I do not know how many shifts are employed. I cannot resist calling the attention of the Senate to the fact which appeared in the public press, that the workmen are actually pulling down some of the foundations that were put there in 1826, a great number of years ago as hon. members of this House will see, and those foundations were discovered to be as good as they were on the day they were first laid. Indeed there is a doubt as to whether the foundations being put in now will stand as long as the old ones did. There are always, among the officials of the Government, a lot of busy-bodies who want to do a great deal of work which is sometimes uncalled for, and the Government should guard against these people. I do not know who suggested this work. The canal has been in perfect working order for many years, ever since the draught has been changed. At first the depth was only five or six feet. Then, after a great deal of time, it was changed to nine feet, and we had a nine foot navigation. For the last twenty or twenty-five years we have had a fourteen foot navigation clean through from Montreal to the head of lake Erie. I may say, en passant, that the Government were so long in making the fourteen foot navigation, that the size of the ships had outgrown that depth of water before the work was done; after we had the fourteen foot navigation no ship was ever built to accommodate that navigation Hon. gentlemen know that with a fourteen foot navigation you can bring down some eighty or eighty-five thousand bushels of grain in one ship. It was thought that was big enough, and those ships could ply on the Upper lakes. I beg pardon for the transgression, but it is only to explain what has taken place on the canal. The water at fourteen feet is working satisfactorily, and the canal has never been taxed to one-quarter of its capacity. It could pass four times as many ships as go through now. I do not wish to say anything about the Welland canal; it is not apropos to the present discussion. The Welland canal was able to cope also with all the traffic that was there. One could sit on the bank of that Welland canal and light his pipe, and could not see a ship for half an hour or an hour at a time; there is no necessity for increasing the capacity of that canal at present, especially when the other canals are only fourteen feet. However, be that as it may, why this year has been selected of all other years for making these extensive improvements is a mystery to me.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Is it not customary to make these repairs every year, or is it only this year, and never any other year?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The question of the hon. gentleman shows that my remarks have not been listened to carefully. I am trying to show that these are not ordinary, but extraordinary repairs, and that this is an extraordinary time to make them.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Are they not made every year?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The repairs are generally made during April—during three or four weeks every year.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—But made every year.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The complaint I am making is that the repairs at this time are taking nine weeks and depriving people during the month of March of work, the factories being closed down.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Does this extraordinary work not give employment to men?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I have seen a large gang of Italians working there, but the people employed in the factories—and there are thousands of them are out of work in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—These people know that this work goes on every year, and they make preparations for it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—This work is generally done in four weeks, and the work at the present time is taking two months.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—I am simply asking questions.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The usual repairs each year are expected, during the latter end of April, lasting perhaps four weeks at the outside. This year the work has started on the first of March, and if the Government had its way it would have started the work last fall, and let the water out of the canal for the whole winter.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—The hon. gentleman appears to have given this matter a great deal of consideration, and I have no doubt he can tell us exactly how many men have been thrown out of employment, and how many men are employed on the new work.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In the first place they are not the same men.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—But how many?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In the second place judging by those I saw there, I should say there would be a couple of hundred men on the work, making a rough estimate of the number—guessing at it—but if the hon. gentleman, who knows Montreal very likely as well as I do, would go down and see the mills of the Ogilvies and others, he would find that those factories along Mill street, cover nearly a mile of territory and employ thousands of men, not hundreds.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—Can the hon. gentleman not get any nearer it than that? The hon. gentleman has given this matter a lot of consideration. It is said in some quarters that there are not many men thrown out of employment.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Ask Bourassa for the information.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—If the hon. gentleman is very anxious I should suggest that he put an inquiry on the paper and ask the Government the exact number of people they have thrown out of employment through making extraordinary repairs this year.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR—Have all these factories the hon. gentleman speaks of closed down?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—All the factories which are getting their power from the canal are closed down for want of motive power. Those that I saw were absolutely closed down.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR—They have no other motive power?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—None that I know of.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—How many factories?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman will have a nice chance to make a speech when I get through. If he will put all his questions together, they would make quite a little speech. I give the Government some little warning in regard to this work, and especially that hon. gentleman from Nipissing, that his former political friends —because we are not supposed to have political friends in this House—were very unfortunate the last time they unwatered the Lachine canal for a considerable time in order to build the Curran bridge. For instance, we all remember about the Curran bridge in the year 1893. That was the last time extraordinary works were undertaken on the canal—and they were extraordinary works. I do not want to go into a discussion of this nature, but I would like, if I were invited to do so, to take just one small item to show all that was done at that time, and why the Government should be careful as to how the works are being done at the present time. The hon. leader of the Government told us, when he spoke on this question before, that contracts had been given for this work. I do not see the name of any contractor there, and I think that the work is being done, like the old Curran bridge, by day work. When that Curran bridge was built, the work was referred to as the Curran bridge scandal. The bridge was only 220 feet in length, and was built of iron and stone—all iron and stone. Still the Government paid at that time, according to sworn evidence taken before Judge Desnoyers, for 3,600,000 feet board measure of lumber to build that bridge. Now to grasp a thing like that a comparison must be made. In those days a car took about 10,000 feet of green lumber; therefore it would have taken 360 cars to carry the lumber to a bridge 200 feet long made of iron and stone; it would have made a train two miles and a quarter long, leaving no place for the locomotive. The lumber could not have been piled near the place. Just now we are talking about canals, and we hear talk about the Trent Valley canal. Well, if people want to talk about the Trent Valley canal, they can also, at the same time, talk about the Curran bridge and compare the two—whether they put 215 car loads of lumber in there, and paid for it, as has been done in this case. I could go on but I do not want to occupy the time. I think I have made it clear that this year, of all years, the Government should not have allowed this stoppage of work; when Canadian Pacific railway stock is selling at 204, whereas, in the good old days it used to sell at 280; when the Canadian Northern is in a position that we all deplore—and this Government does not know what to do with it; when the Dominion Iron and Steel Company are passing their dividends; when many settlers in the Northwest are leaving the country because they cannot sell their wheat at more than 65 cents a bushel, and when, according to the most reliable information, they do not make very much money even at that price. With all those things put together—when money is scarcer in Montreal than it has been for years and years, when real estate is at a standstill, when drafts are coming back unpaid not only from the Northwest, but from many parts of this country, and when work is so scarce, the Government would have been wise if they had left these people the balance of the month of March to work instead of starting operations for which there was no emergency, and for which there was no reason for doing right away. The Government did what I regret to say was an act uncalled for at the time. It is too late now to remedy it. When I made the motion, it would have been time then, perhaps to turn on the water, but the time has elapsed and it is too late now; but it is with sincere regret that I have to move this motion.

Hon. Mr. Young seconded the motion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hold in my hand a letter from the Chief Engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals, explaining why the canal has been unwatered, and I shall take the liberty of reading it:

Office of the Chief Engineer,
Ottawa, Ont., March 5, 1914.
Memorandum.

Owing to the increasing difficulty in maintaining the regulation elevation of the water in the lower reaches of the Lachine canal and more particularly the reach immediately below the Côte St. Paul lock, it has been found necessary to remodel the regulation works at these locks and provide a by-pass for the water from the upper to the lower reaches independent of power sluices. Advantages will be taken of the opportunity offered to put in the foundations of the new power house of the canal at this point.

It has been the practice for a great many years to unwater the Lachine canal for a month prior to the opening of navigation, for the purpose of making necessary repairs. This period is usually taken advantage of by the mills and many of the other industries along the canal to effect necessary alterations or repairs to their own works. It however frequently transpires that works in the lower reaches are seriously interrupted during this period by reason of backwater from the St. Lawrenec river, so that it seldom occurs that a full month is available for the work.

It is not possible to accurately estimate the time required for the proposed work at Côte St. Paul and it is realized that should these works not progress as rapidly as estimated, either on account of unforseen difficulties in themselves or from interruptions from without, serious interruption of navigation would result from deferring their commencement until too late in the season. It was at first proposed to unwater the canal during the month of December owing to the fact that at this season there would be freedom from ice troubles, and further, owing to an understanding that a number of industries along the canal purposed closing their works, either in whole or in part, for reasons of their own. A large delegation met the acting minister of this department and protested strongly against the closing of the canal at that season, and in deference to their representations the acting minister gave instructions for further consideration of the problem with a view to determine whether it were possible to devise a scheme for executing the necessary canal works without serious injury to the local interests. As a result of this further study, it has been determined that the canal works cannot be executed without unwatering the canal, and the date for the unwatering was fixed for March the first, with a view to the readmission of water to the canal at the earliest possible moment, by prosecuting the construction night and day continuously; the spring repairs being carried out during the month of March.

W. A. Bowden,
Chief Engineer.

Now, hon. gentlemen, the responsibility of properly maintaining and operating not only this canal but the public works of the Dominion rests upon the Government of the day. That Government, whether Liberal or Conservative, must necessarily be advised on subjects of this character by its staff of engineers. The Dominion Government, so far as it is possible, secures the best talent obtainable for the purpose of professionally advising the Government as to works of this particular character. The Enginnering Branch of the Department of Railways and Canals was advised that this work was absolutely necessary, not only for the purpose of changing the construction alluded to in this letter, so that the canal might be properly operated, but likewise that advantage might be taken at the same time for the purpose of laying the foundations and proceeding with the building of a new power house, necessary to the proper operation of the canal. My hon. friend seems to take issue with the Government as to what they have done in this particular case. It is a question as to whether the members of this Chamber are to rely upon the advice of my hon. friend upon such a matter of very great importance, and upon which the navigation of the St. Lawrence very largely depends, or whether they shall regard the advice of the corps of engineers attached to the Department of Railways and Canals. True, the Government of the day has not the advantage of the professional knowledge, standing and experience of my hon. friend. From time to time my hon. friend has informed this Chamber of his wide grasp and comprehensive knowledge on engineering questions of this character, but he is in the Senate and his services cannot well be taken advantage of by the Government, and therefore possibly the Government may be labouring under the disadvantage of taking, from professional men, advice which is inferior to that which my hon. friend would be able to give were he unattached. This of course is a matter of regret; it may be possibly a matter of public inconvenience, that the Government is thus so placed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You have received advice several times this session free of charge.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend has heard things on the street. He has strolled along the canal and with that inherent knowledge which he possesses, he immediately came to the conclusion that what the engineers of the department have been advising, was entirely wrong, and that they knew nothing about it. Now what are the facts of the case? This canal is unwatered every year. The facts are that the leases which have been granted from time to time to the various industries that use the power from the canal, make provision that this canal shall be unwatered during a certain length of time each year, and they are expected to provide for themselves auxiliary plants during that period. If that were not the case, the Government of the day would be remiss in its duty. It would permit this canal to remain without inspection or examination, though even the navigation of the St. Lawrence might be blocked. It only requires me to say to the hon. gentleman that it is quite manifest that an important public work of this kind must be closely examined, must be maintained and operated, and to do that it can only be inspected by unwatering the canal every year. Now it was proposed to do this work on the 1st of December, but in deference to representation to the Government, by the parties interested, the Government deferred making the improvements until the 1st of March. The contract has been given to a very reliable firm, and as large a staff of men as can be used has been employed, they are working day and night, and it is expected that the improvements to the canal will be completed by the 1st of April. From what my hon. friend has said, one would suppose that the Government takes delight in inconveniencing the industries of the city of Montreal, and subjecting to privation the unemployed and those who are desirous of earning their bread. Solicitous as my hon. friend may be, and active as he may be in charity and good works, the Government is more solicitous than he is that there shall be no inconvenience, no destitution, no privation such as my hon. friend has outlined. It is not a matter of politics: it is a matter of superintending and maintaining the public works of the Dominion. I think I am justified in saying the works will be completed by the 1st of April.

An hon. MEMBER—The 1st of May.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, the 1st of April. That is the contract which has been entered into between the Government and the parties who are employed on the canal. This will permit of navigation being unimpeded in the event of navigation opening early. I do not think it requires me to say anything further. If hon. gentlemen think the Government should be censured for doing its duty in properly inspecting and maintaining this canal, with a view to its proper operation, I have nothing more to say. Does my hon. friend press his motion?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Lost on a division.

The motion was declared lost on a division.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (T), an Act respecting the Sterling Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

Bill (U), an Act respecting the W. C. Edwards Company, Limited.—Hon. Mr. Beique.

THIRD READING.

Bill 11, An Act respecting the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Bill (C), An Act to incorporate the Atlin Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

IMPORTATION OF THOROUGHBRED STOCK.

DEBATE ADJOURNED.

The Order of the Day being called.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the inquiry of the Hon. Mr. Casgrain:

That he will call the attention of the Government to some unsatisfactory features regarding the regulations for the importation, duty free, of thoroughbred mares and stallions, and will inquire whether it is the intention of the Government to remedy these conditions should they exist.—(Hon. Mr. Douglas.)

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—In the absence of the hon. member from Tantallon (Hon. Mr. Douglas) I would ask that this stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This matter was referred to a committee which has had one meeting, and which proposes to have another within the next day or two, but the report will not be ready to-morrow. I have the honour to move, seconded by Senator Bostock that this Order of the Day be discharged, and the debate be resumed next Tuesday.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (O), An Act respecting the Pacific Trans-Canada and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

Bill (P), An Act for the relief of Ella Rose Morris.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (Q), An Act for the relief of Alicia Hill.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called.

Second reading Bill 90 An Act to amend an Act relating to the establishment and expenses of the International Joint Commission under the Waterways Treaty of January 11, 1909.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is proposed to make some minor changes in this Act. It is proposed to place the administration of the Act with the Secretary of State, substituting the Secretary of State for the Minister of Public Works. Section 2 deals with the question of the secretary's salary, section 3 deals with the maximum amount which may be expended in a certain branch of the commission.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. leader might have given the reasons which induced the Government to transfer this undertaking, if one may so call it, of the Joint High Commission, from the Minister of Public Works to the Secretary of State.

The commission really has to do chiefly with works which come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works, and we have not been given any sufficient reason why the change should be made. As to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I doubt, on the whole, the wisdom of making this change. The Secretary of State, properly so called, is supposed to be the head of the department, but an Act was passed some three or four years ago providing that cases of this kind, relating to external affairs, should be dealt with by a special department; and a gentleman very well known, a very prominent and important member of the Civil Service was appointed Under Secretary for External Affairs. But while this Under Secretary for External Affairs is supposed to be a confidential officer attached to the Department of the Prime Minister, unfortunately he has no office in the public buildings at all. If a stranger comes to Ottawa to look for the Department of External Affairs, he will have to be piloted to a building down on Bank Street, and there he will find the Under Secretary for External Affairs comfortably located over a barber's shop. Now, before we provide that the United States commissioners, who are joined with our commissioners in this International Joint Commission, shall be obliged to deal with the Under Secretary for External Affairs, that gentleman should have an office here in the public buildings. It is not the right thing that those distinguished gentlemen from Washington should have to be piloted down to this office over the barber's shop.

Hon. GENTLEMEN: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED: I would say, in answer to what my hon. friend has stated, that it is manifestly more convenient to have the International Joint Commission under the Secretary of State for External Affairs than under the Department of Public Works. Many of the departments are concerned in the business of the International Joint Commission, and therefore it is very desirable that its affairs should be vested in a department that can have communication with the various departments of the Government, as the Department of State has. I think that goes without saying. As to the environments of the rooms occupied by the Deputy Minister of External Affairs, I cannot at present give any opinion except to say that the business of this Dominion is growing so fast that the present departmental buildings are not sufficiently large to provide for all the officers of that department. I have no doubt that in due time, when the new departmental buildings are erected, the Deputy Minister of External Affairs will be surrounded with all the appointments that the most exacting of foreign officials or representatives may expect when they come to Ottawa to visit that department.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Whilst we are on this Bill, perhaps the leader of the Government could inform this House what is the exact nature of the work that is being performed by this commission. We see now and then in the papers that the Joint Commission on Waterways has met in Detroit. Perhaps this would be an opportune time to inform us what these gentlemen are doing; whether the commission is a permanent office, and what it is costing the Government, etc.; because I am sure it would be interesting to know what we are doing in amending an Act which I do not suppose many are very familiar with. The commission was formed by the late Government, which had made some appointments, but when the Government was changed—although there was a treaty to which the high contracting parties were the United States Government on one side and His Majesty on the other side—His Majesty's Government was a party to the dismissal of the former commissioners—a thing unheard of—and appointed in their stead men who, I dare say, were very creditable but no better than those who were there before. However, there was a change made on the commission when the change of Government occurred; and I suppose another change will be justified in case of another change of Government. I do not want to press the leader of the Government unduly, but perhaps he could tell the members of this House, on the third reading of the Bill, if not now, exactly what this joint commission have been doing. We see in the papers lately that they have been busy in Detroit, but we are in the dark as to the work that is being done, although the country is paying their share of the expense.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—All I can say is that they are engaged in adjusting international differences between the United States and Canada with reference to boundary streams and waters.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That is very vague.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED: That is about all I can say to my hon. friend. To enter into other particulars would be rather difficult just at the present moment.

The motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (J), An Act to amend the Inspection and Sale Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—My understanding was that after due consideration the officers of the department proposed to make some modifications in the Bill, as submitted the other day. And I think, on the whole, it would be better if we had those changes when we go into committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I can tell the committee what they are, and we can rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

On clause 4,

4. Section 163 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

163. Every barrel and half-barrel of any article mentioned in this section shall contain, respectively, that net weight of the article which is shown in this subsection opposite the name of such article, that to say:

Description of Article.	Net weight in Dominion Standard pounds. Barrel.	Half barrel
Flour	196	98
Meal	196	98
Rolled Oats	180	90
Rolled wheat	100	50

2. When any such article is contained in a wooden package other than a barrel or a half-barrel, the net weight of the article contained in the package shall be taken to be the weight of the article.

3. When any such article is contained in a bag, sack or similar package, the gross weight of the bag, sack or package and of the article shall be taken to be the weight of the article

4. A bag, sack or similar package of feed shall contain one hundred Dominion Standard pounds, gross weight, of feed.

I suggest that subsection 3 of section 163 should be changed to read as follows:

When any such article is contained in a bag or a similar package, the weight of the contents thereof shall be taken to be the weight of the article.

There was a great deal of discussion the last day we dealt with this Bill, as to what the weight should include—as to whether it should include the gross weight of the entire package, or the weight of the contents. This, I understand, is the way it was passed in the Commons in the session of 1912, but was dropped when it came up in the dying hours of the session to the Senate. Subsection 2 deals with barrels and wooden packages. There the net weight governs. We practically make the same provision applicable.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We practically make subclause 3 agree with subclause 2.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes. It is proposed to change subsection 4, dealing with feed, to read as follows:

The weight of the contents of a bag, sack or similar package of feed shall be one hundred Dominion Standard pounds.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Has the attention of the hon. leader been called to this phase of the matter, by this provision all feed shall be packed in bags of 100 pounds? It might, as a matter of convenience in trade, be 50 pound sacks. Why not have the feed clause to the effect that the weight marked on the bag shall be the weight of the contents? If it is a 50 pound sack, or an 80 or 100 pound, the weight marked on the bag shall be the weight of the contents, the same as in the case of flour.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Bran is put up in 200 pound sacks.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—You might have a light feed, which it might be inconvenient to put into an ordinary bag of the quality used for sacking feed, or you might have a very heavy feed and you might put in say 200 pounds.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think it should not be left to the vendors to sell by any weight at all. The weight should be provided for.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Unless they mark it on the bag.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, I think the weight should be specified by the Act.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Then the same argument applies with regard to flour?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Possibly.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Let us have uniformity in the matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I make a suggestion that we take out clause 4 and rely upon section 164a.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I draw the attention of the leader of the Government to the necessity of providing a special weight. I repeat, it would lead to a fraud if a dealer were permitted to sell any weight, in bags. A bag containing 97 or 98 pounds would unknowingly be accepted as containing 100 pounds. We should make the law more flexible—adopt any weight you please, but have a fixed weight in all cases. I would do that in the case of barrels, as well as in the case of boxes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have heretofore fixed the weight of a bag of potatoes, but I do not think we have provided for any smaller weight. There is no reason why a 50-pound bag should not be marked half a bag. You have fixed the weight of a bag by statute, and the weight of a half-bag is therefore fixed as a matter of course.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I think this is bad legislation. The law is better the way it is; to adopt the gross weight—the weight of the contents and the bag—is by far the best method. One can readily see the inconvenience of having to dump the contents of the package and weigh it and then weigh the package to find out if the weight is right. It is better to weigh the two together. The purchaser would not lose anything, because the price of a bag would generally be more than the corresponding weight of the contents. I bought some alfalfa seed the other day, and they charged me 25 cents a pound for the seed and so much for the bag. It would have been better for me if the seed and the bag had been weighed together. It is a question whether one would win or lose by it, but there is no question of the inconvenience of having to empty a package in order to ascertain if the weight is right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Middleton.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—A few years ago Sir Thomas Lipton was caught under a clause similar to this. A package of tea was found to be short of weight by a fraction of an ounce, and he had to pay hundreds of pounds in consequence of it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I understand that the object of the Bill is to protect the purchaser. The man who puts up the package is responsible, and must put in full weight. I think Sir Thomas Lipton was very properly fined, if a package of his tea was short in weight. If a man buys a ton of feed he does not want to buy one-tenth of the weight in sacks. The proper thing to put in the Act is the net weight of the article.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—How would you determine the weight? Weigh it?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes. We ought to protect the public by giving them the actual quantity of the article they are buying.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—Very many articles which are full weight when packed shrink when kept in a dry climate, and the packer might be caught in that way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—More or less evaporation must necessarily go on in all packages that are stored. The weight may fluctuate according to the humidity or the dryness of the place of storage, and the effect of this legislation under conditions of that character should be taken into consideration.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That would apply if the suggestion of the hon. member from Middleton were followed. It would not cover evaporation, and allowance should be made for that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The only advantage of the gross weight is that if a package is subjected to those conditions the weight is ascertained at once by weighing the package with its contents.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It might be as well not to legislate on the matter at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It has to be arbitrarily provided for.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—With regard to the point raised, the variation of weight, it would be very unfair in a case where a packer put in full weight and the package has been stored for say a year in a dry place and it is found after that time not to be full weight. The weight should be the weight of the package at the time it was put up. I fancy if it could be proved that the packer put the full weight in the package he should not be responsible for any shrinkage.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I should like to know what the custom is in the United States in regard to these packages, because I anticipate that we may have in the near future some considerable trade with the neighbouring country, and it would be well that our laws should be uniform with those of the neighbouring republic.

Hon. Mr. WATSON.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think I said the other day—and it will apply to the situation which my hon. friend has outlined—that where a foreign export business is done with a particular country that business is done invariably in anticipation, and in fact with a knowledge, of what the conditions and laws of that country may be, to which the article is exported. Take, for instance, the case of a United States manufacturer who proposes to do business in Canada. He will acquaint himself with the provisions of the Canadian law, and manufacture accordingly. Packages are made up with that fact in view.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—We will anticipate that we are going to trade with a foreign country and we will frame our law to suit that country?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We do; if Canadian manufacturers propose shipping goods to Australia, or to any foreign country, they acquaint themselves with the laws of that particular country and observe them accordingly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before we part for the time being with clause 4 I understand the point made by the hon. gentleman from Middleton is this; that in the case of flour or grain, or feed, the article which is contained in a package is really not, for its weight, more valuable than the material in a bag, and consequently there is nobody much hurt if the gross weight is put in. Are you going on to clause 5 now?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, then those proposed amendments shall stand.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand that ection 2 of the Bill is being preserved?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It seems to me that the words in line 3—'entire grain'—should be struck out, as liable to be abused by preparing feeds which would not be made altogether of the entire grain of the cereals mentioned. I think it should read, 'Made from wheat and barley, oats, Indian corn,' etc., whether made entirely of it or not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We will have that considered.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Clause 5 provides, in paragraph (a) that every barrel or half-barrel of flour, and so on, shall be plainly marked

(a) with the initials of the Christian name and the surname at full length of the packer or the person for whom such barrel or half-barrel is packed, and with the place of business of such packer or person; and

Now, as a rule, the packing is not done by individuals, but by incorporated companies or firms, which would not have any christian name or any surname. In order to emove the difficulty I would move this amendment:

After 'person' in line 20 insert the following words:—

'Or where such barrel or half-barrel is packed by or for a co-partnership or incorporated company with the firm name of such co-partnership or the corporate name of such company, and with the place of business of such co-partnership or company.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We will hand that to the chairman.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That stands as a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I propose in paragraph B striking out the word 'quality,' and inserting the word 'brand' in lieu thereof. The amendment would read as follows:

'With the brand and weight of the flour or meal contained therein.'

In the trade now brands are accepted as denoting quality. Then paragraph B of 164-a, clause 6, I propose to amend, in order to be consistent with what we proposed in the early amendments. I propose to substitute what now is in the draft Bill with the following:

'With the brand and weight of the contents of the bag, sack or package.'

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Would that be net or gross?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is the weight of the contents. Then that will be followed by two paragraphs reading as follows:

(c) The provisions of paragraph b, which is the paragraph we have just been discussing as to brand shall not apply to feed, but the composition of the feed in each containor shall be stated.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I can tell my hon. friend that he is making a contract that will take a Philadelphia lawyer to interpret when you come to the question of feed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Those are all suggestions and I do not ask that they be passed to-day. They have been placed in my hands. The other paragraph reads as follows:

The foregoing provisions of this Act shall not apply when the articles mentioned therein are in the presence of the purchaser weighed into the containor in quantities not to exceed 200 pounds at any one time.

That is to cover the difficulty we discussed.

Hon. Mr. GORDON, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again.

HAMILTON DIVORCE CASE.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce to whom was referred the petition of Andrew Lorne Hamilton, together with the evidence taken before the said committee.

The SPEAKER—A point of order has been raised which I am now prepared to decide. The motion now before the House came up in the usual course of our procedure, on the 11th day of this month. Objection was taken to it on the same day and a point of order was raised on the ground that its adoption would conflict with the rules of this House and especially with rule 147, which reads:

147. The petitioner and, if the respondent appears, the respondent and all the witnesses produced before the committee shall be examined upon oath.

It is alleged that, at this last trial before the committee, the respondent has not been examined under oath; and nothing in the evidence now before us, states that this formal obligation, imposed by our rules, has been complied with. Such being the case, would I be justified in ruling out of order the report of the Committee on Divorce in the Hamilton case? In other words, does the rule invoked in the present instance, apply to the report of the committee?

There is no doubt, in my mind, that the committee was obliged, in one way, at all events, to examine under oath, both the petitioner and the respondent, in order to ascertain, at least, if since last year, no collusion whatsoever had taken place between the litigant parties. That was not done and the case now comes before the Senate without that essential feature provided for by the rules which regulate the action of the committee in the hearing of the trial.

'Connivance at, or condonation of the adultery, or collusion in the proceedings for divorce, is always,' says rule 145, 'a sufficient ground for rejecting a Bill of divorce and shall be inquired into by the committee.'

Such is the obligation imposed upon the committee. But can the committee, for a reason or another, take the course which it has followed, and is its report now regularly before the House?

Rule 143 says:

After such hearing and inquiry, the committee shall report to the Senate, stating whether the requirements of these rules have been complied with in all material respects; and, if it shall have been then found that any such requirement has not been so complied with, stating in what respect there has been default, and also stating the conclusions arrived at and the action recommended by the committee.

In reading now the report made by the Committee on Divorce to the Senate on the Hamilton case, we find that the committee has precisely followed the course indicated by rule 143, just cited.

The report goes on to say:

'4. Upon your committee proceeding to hear and to inquire into the matters alleged in the present petition the petitioner and the respondent were respectively represented by counsel, who stated to your committee that they had no witnesses to examine other than those examined at the hearing and inquiry last session, and represented to your committee the desirability of avoiding the delay and expense of taking the evidence of those witnesses over again, and agreed that the matters alleged in the petition should be decided upon the evidence taken last session, as if taken this session.

'5. Your committee considered that such course was proper and expedient, and accordingly they submit herewith the evidence taken by the Committee on Divorce at the hearing and inquiry into the matters alleged in the petition presented at the last session of Parliament, with the exception of the paragraph numbered (7) of exhibit No. 7, which paragraph is not relevant to the present petition.'

In this part of the report we have the recital of all that took place before the committee and the candid admission stating what requirements have not been complied with on account of the agreement of the parties, and finally the formal declaration made by the committee that the course they followed was the proper and expedient one.

In all these particulars, the report complies strictly with the requirements of the rules which govern the committee. All those rules, from No. 143 to 152, both inclusive, have been framed by the Senate, and are imperative. If not followed by the committee, in any one respect, then it is the duty of the committee to report 'in what respect there has been default.' That is precisely what has been done in the present case, and the report now before this House presents itself just in the same way as any other report from any other committee, bringing to our attention the fact that certain rules have not been complied with and asking for the further action of the Senate.

Viewed in this light,—and many instances point out the correctness of such a procedure,—I am of the opinion that the report of the Committee on Divorce,—though stating that certain requirements have not been complied with,—is still in order because it leaves to the Senate itself the power to adopt any further action, namely, to accept or to reject the conclusions of the committee or to return such report to the committee with instructions to complete what may be deficient in the evidence as presented to this House.

In other words, the proceedings in committee might be opened to discussion, but the report comes to us in the form provided for by our rules, and for that reason I am bound to declare that the point of order is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to make a few remarks with reference to the unusual procedure we are asked to follow to-day. It is the first time I have known anything of the kind to be proposed in this House, and any one who will look up the records of the House of Lords, from which body we take our precedents in matters of this kind, he will fail to find any precedent for the course we are asked to pursue. We are placed in the position to-day of being called upon to judge ourselves. The year before last we rejected this petition. Last year we rejected it again. Some reason was furnished last year for bringing in such a report a second time; it was claimed that they had found some additional so-called evidence, which was submitted to the House. Notwithstanding that, after careful consideration, the report was rejected. This session no additional evidence was furnished. The committee, as I understand it, have not even gone to the trouble to publish the evidence again, but have used the old copies which were struck off last year; and without anything further they ask us to reverse our judgment of last year. I do not see how we can adopt this report, and retain our self-respect. If we did it would be, in my judgment, one of the strongest arguments that could be furnished for the establishment of divorce courts in this country. I have no doubt there has been a strong lobby put up in behalf of this report. Just imagine the jury being canvassed inside this Chamber and outside of it! Active members of the House of Commons have been walking through our corridors canvassing members on a proposition of this kind. If we are going to reverse the decision of last year simply because a canvass has been put up and without any good reason being shown why this House should change its mind, it appears to me that we are taking a course which we shall always regret. If any legitimate argument can be offered as a reason why we should reverse our judgment, I should like to hear it—but none has been offered. They simply hand us the evidence taken last year, on which the Senate gave its decision at that time, and ask us to reverse the judgment we rendered on that occasion. For my part I shall not do it, but shall vote against the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. BOYER — You said, Mr. Speaker, that rule 147 says that it is the duty of the Divorce Committee—for which I have a great deal of respect and admiration, particularly for the chairman, for it is about the only committee in the House that does a large amount of work every year, and for their work I must compliment them—to examine witnesses to find out whether any collusion has existed between the parties. Now, Sir, what evidence have we got? The committee say, 'By mutual consent.' Is that not collusion?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Sure.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—They have decided to eliminate from the evidence, paragraph No. 7. Well, what is paragraph No. 7? Can any of you hon. gentlemen tell me, without referring to last year's evidence, what was in paragraph No. 7? It had no more business to exist in last year's report than it has to be eliminated this year. Nobody knows what paragraph No. 7, eliminated by mutual consent, is, unless he refers to last year's evidence and finds out.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Then another reason for not acceding to the proposal of the chairman of the committee is the fact that here is a divorce that has been dragged before the Senate for the last three years, and by mutual consent the petitioner says: 'Here is this former wife of mine, that I have dragged before the courts of justice, not only in Quebec but throughout the country, and I have not since the offence—the pretended offence—was committed, one single piece of evidence to offer.'

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Here is a lady who has been thrown on her own resources, having had to emigrate to a foreign country to earn her daily bread.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—And her husband, with the consent of the committee, comes before the Senate and says: 'I have not one single particle of evidence to offer against this lady since the evidence taken three years ago.' Last year we voted that the divorce should not be granted. I see a further reason why the Senate should carry out its action of last year, namely, that after having dragged this lady before every court in Quebec, and through the Senate, no evidence is offered; on the contrary, evidence that was relied upon the first year the divorce was brought before the Senate is eliminated from the docket, and it is admitted that it is irrelevant to the case. I think for this reason that the Senate should not misjudge itself.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—We decided last year that we should not grant this divorce, and I see no reason why we should change our decision this year.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—To my mind, this document now placed in the hands of the Senate is an insult and a disgrace, because in any court of justice in this Dominion, or in any part of the British Empire, a lawyer who would delve out of the vaults of the courthouse a musty, dust covered record, and come before the court and say: 'Here, Your Honour, you passed judgment twice upon this case, a year ago and last year, but I want you to reverse your judgment without any further evidence,'—a lawyer of that kind would be committed for contempt of court. It would be regarded as an insult to the judge. That is what the Divorce Committee is asking us to do. Are we a pack of incompetent fools rather than competent judges? We pass judgment on two different occasions on the contents of this document, and now the petitioner asks us to reverse that judgment. The committee should have ejected the petitioner from the room when he made such a request. I admire the wisdom of the attorney for the respondent, for when the petitioner made the proposal to rest the case on the evidence taken last year, he assented. They offered no evidence and he offered none. He deserves to be on the bench, and I hope he will be some day. The High Court of Justice of the Dominion of Canada gave judgment on this case on two consecutive occasions, and the respondent's counsel realized this. Surely this High Court of Justice will not stultify itself by reversing its decision, without any reason. The petitioner's counsel was not wise enough to understand the position the Senate would be placed in. What will the people of Canada think of the Senate if ,after twice giving judgment on this case, on the third occasion, on account of persistent, and the most devilish lobbying, we reverse our finding? If necessary I could give names and facts in regard to the lobbying. A most henious offence against the independence of Parliament has been committed in the corridors of the Senate for the purpose of putting this Bill through. We hear occasionally about the small esteem in which the Senate is now held, on account of our few adjournments, but the entire sentiment of the country will be down on us, and rightly so, if we undertake to undo to-day what we did yesterday and the day before. On the strength of this musty document which has been delved out of the vaults of the Parliament buildings for the third time, in order to defame the character of a woman, I am asked to place upon the mother of a family the stigma of shame, and to tell her children—after having twice declared that she was not guilty of the charges—that she is now guilty, and is nothing but a prostitute. How can hon. gentlemen vote for a proposition like that? Would hon. senators dare place the stigma of infamy upon their daughters and wives, after they had twice been honourably acquitted? A vote for this Bill means that Mrs. Hamilton, instead of being a good mother is nothing but a prostitute. There is absolutely no proof of that. Two years ago we had the evidence of an unscrupulous servant kept by the husband. I shall not use the word the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick did, but we all know what it means, when this servant furnishes the only evidence against the honour of this woman. The respondent has been in the corridors on her knees asking us to protect her children and not to give them the reputation of being brought up by a woman who was untrue to her marriage vow. She does not wish to marry again. She has been for the last twelve years working in the United States for an honest living, and since the commencement of these proceedings there have been detectives on her track; she has been watched as a cat watches a mouse, and they have not been able to produce one word against her character or mode of living, while she was working as a trained nurse in the great metropolis of the United States, New York. She said to me the other day, 'Oh, I have daughters and sons, and I am proud of them. For God sake don't vote to make them dishonourable!' What more noble appeal could be made to men, and yet these hard-hearted lobbyings have been conducted even on the floor of the House. My vote has been sought by the most tremendous influences that could be brought against a man. I stand here as a protest against such interference with the independence of this judicial body. I ask hon. gentlemen in the name of all that is honest and just to vote against this motion. I dare any hon. gentleman to go in the corridors of the House and tell this woman she is a debauchee and not fit to be a mother. If hon. gentlemen have not the courage to do that, how can they do it here, where she cannot defend herself? Let hon. gentlemen vote according to the dictates of their consciences and their hearts, just the same as if the honour of their own daughters and wives were concerned. Alone, unprotected, she stands outside the bar of this House. Are we by our position under the constitution to throw this woman down, and to blacken the name of a mother who loves her children? No, we are not.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this question on its merits. The hon. members of this House who belong to the Roman Catholic church are agreed, on account of the rules of their church, not to take part in voting on questions of this kind, and I rise for the purpose of entreating my colleagues of the same faith to abstain from voting on this case.

(Laughter, and cries of Oh, oh.)

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They should resign then.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have a right to my own opinion, and just as much right to express it as hon. members who differ from me. In my judgment it is neither fair, nor proper that some members belonging to the Roman Catholic church should vote against this report unless we are allowed, on both sides, to take part in the division.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I object to that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not think it is fair to make it a practice to vote invariably against Bills of divorce. If we were to do a thing of that kind, it would be looked upon as unfair to this hon. House, and tantamount to revising the law and refusing to allow it to take its proper course. For that reason it is unfair for some hon. members of this House who may happen to see the evidence and appreciate it differently from other hon. members of this House to avail themselves of their absolute right to vote when they know that members belonging to their own faith are prevented by the rules of their church from voting the other way.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Will the hon. gentleman answer this question? For instance, suppose every judge in Canada held views similar to those expressed by my hon. friend, and supposing divorce cases were tried before them, how could they discharge their functions as judges in such case? How do Catholic judges act under such circumstances in the United States, where they try divorce cases every day?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is easy to answer the hon. member.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not so easy.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—A judge is bound to administer the law; if he cannot do so he resigns. He has no right to excuse himself from passing judgment upon any case presented to him. He could be impeached. We as senators do not occupy that position.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, we do; we are judges in divorce cases.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I should like to have order preserved.

The SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not interrupt other hon. members, and I deny the right of other hon. members to interrupt me. Every one should have an opportunity to express his opinion, and I intend to express mine freely, whether it pleases or displeases some hon. members of this House. As members of this House we do not occupy the same position as judges on the bench; we can be permitted to abstain from voting; there is no rule of Parliament which makes it incumbent on us to give a vote. As to whether the case has been properly adjudicated upon, I would draw attention to the fact that the same Bills are presented here from session to session. The hon. member from Victoria has himself presented a Bill on this very question of divorce, from session to session. After the Senate had rejected his first Bill and in the exercise of his rights he very properly presented it later because it is always open to any member of this House to try to persuade his colleague, whether on evidence or by reasoning, and to appeal to their better judgment from one session to another. During the same session a member cannot present a Bill for the second time, but from session to session he may present a Bill as many times as he pleases.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I did not intend to speak on this question but as the point raised by the member from De Salaberry is one on which there is a good deal of misgiving, it is quite right and proper that we should put ourselves on record. I may say that I agree with him on this point—that so far as divorces are concerned we are in the position of judges. It is a well recognized principle, upon which all judges act, that if a judge has formed or expressed an opinion upon a case or has any prejudice against either of the parties, he has not only the right, but it is his duty to excuse himself, and to decline to sit upon the case. Now, we who belong to the Roman Catholic faith have conscientious objections or prejudices against granting divorces—scruples, at all events, though some call it prejudice,—and for that reason we are not competent to sit on those cases, and it is only right, fair, and natural, and it is only logical that since we are not competent we decline to sit upon those cases. I confess I had great difficulty in making up my mind on this subject. When I first had the honour of sitting in the other Chamber I was much disturbed over this matter. On two occasions I voted for the granting of divorces on the principle that, the law being there,—and the people who had applied for divorce in those two cases having themselves no religious or conscientious scruples, and not infringing any tenet of their church,—they had a right to have that law set in motion. Sitting as a judge, as we do over here, I felt it my duty to grant those divorces, the evidence being very strong. I was taken to task severely for doing so; my position was attacked; my reasons in support of it were questioned; and I was then and have been since very much disturbed as to what was the legal, logical, and conscientious position for me to take in the matter. After a good deal of hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that the position taken by my hon. friend from De Salaberry is a sound one; that in matters of divorce, having a prejudice, having scruples,—call them what you like—not being competent to occupy the position of an impartial and unprejudiced judge—not being in a position to weigh the evidence with an open mind, and without any preconceived ideas, altogether impartially, I think we should not sit and give an opinion on those cases. If we have no opinion, we should not vote; if we are not voting we should not induce, or try to induce other hon. members of this House from taking any position. Since we are judges we should do what a judge must do under such circumstances—not only abstain from giving a judgment, but abstain from giving an opinion. I believe entirely and thoroughly in the position taken by my hon. friend from De Salaberry, and in future I am going to follow that rule.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I cannot very well cast a vote upon this matter without putting my position before the House. As a member of the committee I unfortunately was not present when this question was considered. It is a very bad precedent for this House to establish—the precedent that they will reconsider these questions. This matter has been up before the committee, and the House, on two occasions, and they have come to a decision. Although a Bill can be brought in one session after another, if an hon. member desire to do so, still it is a serious matter for this House to take that stand in regard to the question of divorce. (Hear, hear.) We should be establishing a very wrong precedent if we were to vote in favour of putting this through to-day. I have not had the opportunity of discussing this with the members of the committee, but I felt that I ought to make these remarks in order to put my position clear before the House.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The point raised by the hon. member from De Salaberry has opened the door to a question which will have to be settled sooner or later—whether we are appointed here as Catholics and Protestants; whether, in cases coming before us, we are to vote according to our religious convictions, or whether we are to vote, as judges on the bench, on the merits of the case. As a Catholic being against divorce, I would prefer to have a court for divorce established in the different provinces rather than to have the Senate deal with it. (Hear, hear.) See the position we are in now. Taking the ground of my hon. friend from Ottawa—which, as a Catholic, I would say is quite correct—suppose we all refused to vote, as Catholics (and I believe the Anglicans also are opposed to divorce)—if we all say we are not going to vote, what will be the position of those who, by the constitution, have a right to come before this Supreme Court of Canada and ask for divorces? The present case is a special one, in which a judge of the Superior Court of Quebec has declared that the plaintiff has proven his case and a judgment was given in his favour in that province, according to the law of Quebec, and it separates the plaintiff from his wife as to bed and board, and upon the same evidence we have before us. The point of order has been taken that as no new evidence has been given, according to rules 143 and following, and 147, we have not the right to accept this report. You have decided, Mr. Speaker, that the report is correctly before us, and it is for us to adopt or reject it. In my opinion this report is two-fold. Clause 4 says:

4. Upon your committee proceeding to hear and to inquire into the matters alleged in the present petition the petitioner and the respondent were respectively represented by counsel who stated to your committee that they had no witnesses to examine other than those examined at the hearing and inquiry last session, and represented to your committee the desirability of avoiding the delay and expense of taking the evidence of those witnesses over again, as before a court of justice in this country.

The lawyers of both parties were before the committee—the committee to which we delegate our powers, and representing us——and agreed that the matters alleged in the petition should be decided upon the evidence taken last session, as if taken this session.

The report concludes in this way:

Herewith is submitted a draft, approved by the committee, of a Bill to that effect.

Well, that Bill is not before us, but the draft Bill will be submitted to us in due course after the report is adopted. One may perhaps say, 'If you adopt the report you adopt the Bill.' In the same way they may go so far as to say that everything in the report you approve. But under the circumstances it is not correct. The report is twofold; we have to decide whether in admitting the evidence as produced we are going to establish a precedent or whether we are going to oblige the committee to take all the evidence anew here. Supposing we brought from Quebec the evidence taken there, and both lawyers agreed to accept the same evidence in order to save cost, time and expenses, are we going to decide that this committee has no right to do that? If we reject the report we are going to blame the committee and say that it has no right to accept evidence or documents by consent? This committee is supposed to represent us who are a court of justice; a judge may delegate his power to the prothonotary or the clerk to take evidence, and it is for him to accept or reject it. In this case we have delegated our powers to a committee; the committee has made a report on certain facts; it has accepted the evidence which has already been taken; it brings this report before us and says: 'We submit our report and a draft of a Bill which you may pass.' I am not ready now to pass on the Bill; I am not ready to accept that draft Bill. When the Bill comes before us, then on the merits of the case, we will be able to decide, but at present I have decided to vote for the report—especially for the paragraphs 4 and 5—for I have not the Bill before me now, but I accept the report because the committee have properly, and within their jurisdiction and right, accepted evidence, and have decided not to go to the expense of taking the same evidence over again.

When the Bill comes before us on its merits it will be for the Senate to say whether the evidence is sufficient to justify passing it. Those who voted against it last year will then be in a position to say if there is evidence to warrant them in changing their votes this year. As far as I am personally concerned, I am qualifying my vote. I shall vote on this motion just because I wish to create a precedent in this court of justice, that a committee of the House has a right to use evidence already taken. If there is no evidence establishing collusion, the committee has a right to report the same evidence with their recommendation.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS (in French)—I had no intention to say anything on the merits of the question, but I rise to express my surprise at the announcement made by the hon. member from De Salaberry, that members of this Chamber who belong to the Roman Catholic church should abstain from voting on this case, because their religious convictions and their prejudices lead them to oppose divorce under any circumstances. I am astonished at the position the hon. gentleman takes when he claims that our religious opinions prevent us from exercising an independent judgment. I do not see why, because the Church of Rome is opposed to divorce—as are many other churches—that every member of the Senate is not free to judge any divorce case that may be presented to us. I know that my hon. friend is a very able lawyer, but I did not know that he was entitled to lecture those in this House who belong to the Roman Catholic community. For my part, I do not think I have been called upon to be a member of this Senate to act exclusively as a Catholic, but rather to judge questions submitted to me as a legislator, to the best of my capacity and judgment. If my hon. friend believes that he is not in a position to vote impartially on a divorce matter, he should not vote. That is his personal affair. I do not know, however, that the Church of Rome claims the right to control our judgment as senators in dealing with the measures that come before us. I never heard of it. Coming to the case that is now before this Senate, I see no reason to change the views I held last year. At that time, without any religious prejudice, but simply on a careful examination of the evidence, I decided that the report should not be adopted. The same evidence is now submitted to us, and I believe that it is less acceptable now even than it was last year. I have read the evidence once more this year and I find nothing in it to justify the granting of a divorce. I do not say this now because I am influenced by religious feeling or prejudice, but because, as a legislator, I feel the obligation upon me to vote upon the merits of the question. With great regret I cannot agree with the hon. gentlemen from De Salaberry and from Ottawa, and to my mind this case is still less justified this year than it was last session.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE (in French)—I should like to say to the hon. gentleman that I was not speaking for him; I spoke only for those who share my own views.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I had intended not to say anything with regard to this question, but I regret that the speeches of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa seem to me to render it desirable that I should explain my position in the matter. I am disposed to agree with these hon. gentlemen in saying that in dealing with divorce cases, the members of this House are in the position of judges—or jurors if you please—and I can quite understand that if I, for instance were the judge of the court, say in my own province, which deals with divorce and matrimonial causes, if I were satisfied by the evidence that the applicant was entitled to a divorce, it would be my duty to decree that the petitioner was so entitled. I quite agree as to that point. In the past, however, senators who belong to the same church as I do, have as a rule refrained from voting or dividing the House in cases where there was no question as to the evidence and as to the claim, under our practice, of the applicant to obtain the divorce. But that is not so in the present case. This is the third time this case has come before us, and as has been pointed out by hon. gentlemen, this House as a whole on both previous occasions rejected the application of the petitioner. Even if my impression was that on the whole the petitioner was entitled to a divorce, these two previous decisions of the House would naturally shake my confidence in my own impression as to the merits. There is this other point which was raised to a certain extent by the decision of his Honour the Speaker. One of the very delicate questions that come before the Senate is the question of collusion. Every hon. gentleman feels that if there is any reason to suppose there is collusion, the divorce should not be granted. Now, what is the case before us? Two years ago the petitioner came before the House and his effort to obtain a divorce was strenuously resisted by the respondent. Last session it was the same way. He had the same evidence as now, but the respondent came before the committee and strenuously resisted the efforts of the petitioner to obtain a favourable report from the committee. Now, why has the change taken place this year? This session the respondent was represented by counsel, but there was no vigorous effort, apparently, to prevent a decision in favour of the petitioner.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Did the hon. gentleman hear the hon. senator from Victoria Division say that the respondent was here, and canvassing very strongly?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know what may have taken place about the corridors. The hon. gentleman from Victoria Division is not a member of the committee, and I am speaking of the evidence before us, and the report of the committee. I cannot allow myself to be influenced by something that may have been said in the corridor. In the present case it seems to me there is a distinct probability that there has been collusion. I am not voting in this matter as a member of the Catholic church. I am voting as either a judge or juror—whichever way you please to put it—and I feel as I felt last year, that the petitioner's case has not been established in such a way as to justify me in voting in favour of the report.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—The Senate is somewhat of a court, where people who seek divorces have to come from the greater part of Canada. This case was before this House twice. I admit that I do not generally take part in these matters of divorce, but the Chairman of the Divorce Committee is a very good authority on legal procedure, and I should like him to give us the information as to whether a court, after having twice decided upon the evidence taken, would grant a new trial, unless the person making the application for the new trial was able to state that he was going to introduce some new evidence? In this case we have nothing of that kind before us. Why should a new trial be granted without some intimation that there was some new evidence to be put in? We have nothing before us except the evidence which was turned down last year and the year before. I resent the insinuation that because senators are members of the Catholic Church they should throw out any report, where the evidence was clear. I feel strongly like giving my vote against this report now. I do not want to be bound, when these matters come up, by the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry, that those of my faith have no right to take part in these cases. Dealing with applications for divorce is part of our senatorial duties, just as much as anything else that comes before us. We may be satisfied to leave it in the hands of those who are not prejudiced, but in this matter I am not guided by any prejudice of that kind, and I am trying to follow a judicial line.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I feel myself in a very peculiar position on this question. I was conscientious when I voted against this Bill on the two occasions that it was submitted by the committee; I believed that I was doing my duty as a member of this court. How a report could now be presented by the same committee calling upon me to reverse my judgment, I am at a loss to understand. If I vote at all, I feel that I must vote as I did two years ago and last year. I do not stand here and say that I was a hypocrite last year, and had no opinion then. Hon. members of this House who know anything of me personally know that I act according to an honest sincerity, wherever I am placed; that is my ambition in all cases. I appreciate the difficulty the committee is placed in; I give the members credit for all sincerity, such as I claim in the exercise of my personal judgment, but I do not see how this court can reverse a past decision without further evidence. If the committee had come before us with additional evidence which had been overlooked, it would be a different matter. If I were asked to give a decision I would say that this report should not be received but that it should be referred back to the committee to be more fully considered. In all sincerity and good faith, not pinning my opinion to any individual ideas of what the committee ought to do and what it ought not to do, but as one who has been accustomed to look at what is truth, justice, honesty and right, I cannot at this moment entertain the report of the committee as now presented. If there were any possibility of this House giving an order to this committee to withdraw the report and consider it more fully and report again, it would be a great relief to the minds of many hon. gentlemen. It seems only right that the committee should have more time to consider it, and we should have more time and a further investigation before saying that we were not wise in our previous decision. No man will convince me that I was not perfectly honest and straightforward when I voted on the previous occasions, and I cannot do anything else on the same evidence, if the motion is put to the House. I ask the committee to reconsider, as far as it is possible, and endeavour to get new light. I move that the report be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—If I am not intruding my personal views unduly on the House, I should like to add one word to what I have said, and I am led to do so from what has fallen from the hon. gentlemen from Halifax and from Maskinonge. There has been, so far as I have been concerned, a clear confusion of cause and effect with reference to me. My reason for taking the position which I intend to follow in the future, of not taking any part in the divorce matters, is not because I am a Roman Catholic. It is because of the strong prejudice and objection which I have conceived against divorce. It is because, in my opinion, the evils which result from divorce are far greater than the evils which result from the non-granting of divorce. In other words I think it is far better for the community at large that unhappy marriages, however unhappy they may be, should not be dissolved, rather than that divorce should be granted on more or less serious grounds. That is the position in which I have placed myself. I take that position because I do not feel myself in a frame of mind free from all prejudice; because I do not feel I can approach the consideration of evidence in a divorce case with the impartiality which is absolutely essential to the judge who wishes to do what is right and proper. My mind is not free—I cannot view the matter in the same light as for instance the hon. leader of the Government; I am going to look at that evidence with my prejudice and strong disinclination to grant divorce in any case. Now, how could any judge be expected to properly perform his functions with a mind of that kind? It is because I feel myself incompetent to express an impartial opinion on the question of divorce, that I abstain from voting, and not because I am a Catholic, although that may have had something to do with it. My early teachings may have helped to create the prejudice and disinclination, which exist in my mind.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I wish to compliment the hon. gentleman from Maskinonge on the admirable address he gave in the French language. I am only sorry that so many hon. gentlemen do not understand that language. He put the dots on the i's every time and crossed the t's. He puts the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry and the hon. gentleman from Grandville, and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa in their places, as far as the attitude of the Government is concerned, with regard to these questions. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa has just made a declaration which paralyses me. He admits he is not a competent judge. Hon. gentlemen know that I am no friend of applicants for divorce. I have fought divorce cases in the Senate for years, but never as a Catholic, never because of religious prejudice, or religious scruples. And I may say, speaking of the word scruple, I repudiate the word. We have no religious scruples on the question of divorce, and the Catholic who uses the word does not know the church's real doctrine. We have religious convictions but not scruples, and we have no prejudice; we have a decided conviction based on Christ's gospel. When the hon. member from Maskinonge explained the position of Catholics, and said that the explanation given by the hon. member from De Salaberry did not commend itself to his judgment, he was right. It does not commend itself to my judgment and I believe I am as good a Catholic as either of them. When I read the report of the Divorce Committee, I do not read it from a Catholic, but from a legal or judicial point of view, and I have never opposed any divorce which in my judgment was founded on satisfactory evidence. The only cases which I have opposed in the last eight or ten years, have been those which have not been properly sustained by evidence. I have opposed cases when I found that the evidence on which they were based, would not be accepted in any court of justice. I have gone further than most hon. members, and further than my own church would allow, in submitting and agitating a Bill which would prevent the marriage of the respondent in a divorce case. I had it before this House on two occasions, and on the second occasion it was defeated by only one vote. It is a fair proposition, that Parliament should prevent the guilty party in a divorce case from contracting a second marriage. We have no right to permit this under Divine or natural law, but under the civil law we permit it, in spite of the Almighty, and in spite of Christ's teachings.

I have not discussed the merits of this case, or said one word against the petitioner. I am simply defending the honour of a mother. Let us refer back this report to the committee, and get more evidence. If they bring this half-breed witness again —the woman on whose evidence they want to cast a mother out of society—I shall be in a position to show that she is one of the worse creatures that ever left Winnipeg, or came to Quebec. I shall not forecast the evidence, but let the case be re-opened and we will have some evidence to show what sort of a woman this half-breed is. The petitioner has no new evidence against the mother of his children; if he had it would have been produced. If, when the report is referred back to the committee, new evidence is furnished establishing the guilt of the respondent, I shall be the first to stand up in this Chamber and denounce her, and have her put where she belongs. But in the absence of additional evidence I should not be asked, as an honest man, to reverse the judgment I gave last year and the year before, on this petition. What right have the lobbyists to come in here and ask this House to do a thing which we would be ashamed to do in our private homes, and in our private business? Let it be understood that when this Bill is referred back to committee full light will be thrown upon both sides of the case.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—I have listened with a great deal of interest to the declaration of principle that we, as Roman Catholics, have no business to interfere with divorce. Why this great declaration of principle should affect the evidence furnished in the case is something which I am at a loss to understand. I have been an hon. member of this House four sessions, and the hon. gentleman who has made the declaration has been a senator for ten years, yet never before has he had occasion to make this declaration. I must express my astonishment at the position he has taken. I met this same declaration on my way to Ottawa. On the train I was canvassed by a perfect stranger, who told me that as a Roman Catholic I had no business to vote for or against a divorce Bill, that I was prejudiced. And here to-day we get this same declaration from the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry. Who invented it I do not know. It was never necessary for me when I joined the Senate, to be told that as a Roman Catholic I should not intervene in a divorce case. If, as a Roman Catholic, I should not interfere in divorce, since we are in Lent, let us all resolve as Roman Catholics that the evidence in divorce cases shall not be sent to Catholics. If divorce is so shocking to Catholics, let us take that good resolve. We have heard this declaration, and I sincerely trust that it will not apply only to our votes, but to the evidence.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I never read it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is the reason why the hon. gentleman cannot judge.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—I never heard the declaration before, and I trust I shall never hear it in the future.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—As seconder of the amendment asking to have this matter referred back to the committee, I should like to say a few words. I always like to keep within the rules of the House, and I never like to speak a second time on the same motion; I am speaking now on the amendment.

Some of my friends made two long speeches on the matter, without any right to do it at all. While quite willing to bow to the ruling Mr. Speaker gave this afternoon, I am of my own opinion still, and I have an idea that we should have a little more light on this question. It is well known to myself, and to a number of hon. members of this House, that through the corridors and about the House it is reported that this year there has been some collusion between the two parties to this divorce. It is common talk outside that they have arrived at some arrangement. The lawyers, one on each side, have lined up the witnesses, and agreed that they will have the same evidence this year as last. What for? Because they may be obliged to put the petitioner in the box, and they fear the evidence may be drawn out of him, that there was some collusion. They do not want to do that; they want—to use a common expression—to slip one over on the Senate. According to the rules of this Senate, if there is anything like collusion, we cannot grant a divorce. Hence I am strongly of opinion that there may be something in this rumour of collusion, and the report should be referred back to the committee. The two parties being right here, it would not involve much expense to put the petitioner and the respondent into the box, and examine them to find out if it is true that they have arranged, between themselves and the lawyers in the case, that the case should go by the board at this meeting of the Senate. The vacant seats that we see here to-day while the Senate is discussing this question, may be taken as some evidence in this matter. There has been an enormous lot of canvassing; one hon. gentleman has told the House of being lobbied by a perfect stranger who told him that according to his conscience he could not vote. It is very strange that an hon. member should be stopped on a railway train between here and Montreal, and lobbied in that manner. We know that the corridors here are fairly alive with canvassers, and some gentlemen —who might very well have waited until the matter went into the other House before they started their lobbying—are going up and down the corridors of this House.

When every other system failed, they have been going around making pairs, of people who voted last year. We want to know why it is that there has been such a persistent lobbying in order to get this House to reverse its action of last year. I think we have a right to look into the matter, and that this should be referred back to the committee, and both parties to the divorce put in the box. We should find out then, whether there is something in this lobbying, and something in this attempt at collusion. It would be fairer to deal with it that way, than to pass on old musty evidence taken two years ago. In reference to the new arguments we heard to-day, I may say that since I have sat in this House for ten years, the divorce committee has been sitting every year, and we have been passing divorce Bills, yet the question of a Roman Catholic not voting never arose until on this occasion. Why is this? Why was this not discovered in the ten and in the twenty years before? There is something very strange about it. We know that the hon. member from De Salaberry is a great splitter of hairs; he can split a hair in two and then split them again, but this is the first time I ever heard him saying that because a man was a Roman Catholic he cannot take part in the affairs of the State; for that is what his argument means if it means anything. How would the business of the United States be carried on if that doctrine had any effect? In the United States they have divorce courts presided over by Roman Catholic judges. The hon. member for De Salaberry knew what the duties of the Senate were when he accepted his commission; he knew that we had a divorce committee, and that he might be called upon to serve on it; he knew that we had divorce cases coming before the Senate and that he would be called upon to decide, one way or the other, upon the reports—then why did he and the hon. member for Ottawa accept seats in this House? If they cannot perform the labours required of them they should hand in their resignations and not try to hold seats in this House. I find that my hon. friend from Ottawa voted against this Bill last year; his religious convictions apparently did not bother him at all at that time; he did not take to the woods then. But lo, something has come over the spirit of their dreams on this occasion! They have discovered that they have something called convictions that will preclude them from taking part in the affairs of this House. I do not wish to reflect on the committee at all, I acknowledge that it is not a pleasant duty that committee has to perform, I would not like a seat on it myself, nor would a number of other hon. members—but when hon. members are elected on that committee we expect them to bring in something of an intelligent character in the way of a report. They must have known, and they did know that their report was based on the same evidence that they submitted a year ago, and I shall go so far as to say that it is a reflection on this House by that committee. The Divorce Committee is a creation of this House, which passed on that measure last year, and now their own creation comes back and shoves up the same report that the House turned down last year. I am strongly inclined to believe that this act is a reflection by the committee on the intelligence of this House; it is practically saying that this House did not know what it was doing last year, and that they would put it up to us again. It has been pointed out by some hon. gentlemen here, that the respondent has, for the last three years or more, been earning her own living, and that she has been hunted from pillar to post by detectives. If she was not living a good life they would be able to produce some evidence against her. If all the energy, not to speak of other methods, that has been expended in lobbying on this case—on the trains, in this House, and everywhere else—had been spent in trying to get some new evidence, perhaps some evidence could have been produced. If, after all that energy, new evidence could not be produced, I say that the petitioner should not be granted a divorce. Last year I voted on the evidence submitted at that time. I held that up to a certain point there was a certain amount of evidence, but that there was an arrangement between the parties in Toronto which wiped it off the slate. There has not been one single thing that has been proven against this woman except by this half-breed witness, who is a servant girl swearing against her mistress. It may be asked what motive this girl would have for doing that; but I will point out, as was done last year, that evidently she was a little too familiar with the master of the House, and for that reason she wanted to blacken the character of her mistress. We have that in this so-called evidence that has been handed to this House; it has been proven in the evidence that the petitioner occupied the same stateroom with this star witness on the whole way from Portage la Prairie to Toronto. Surely that is motive enough for this woman to want to come forward and blacken the character of her mistress, because she, herself had a longing to possess this gentleman. He says that it was because he had his children there that he went into the stateroom with this woman; but it is well known that it was not a matter of economy, because the bank which employs him pays his moving expenses. If he had taken a berth in the body of the car he could have handed in the voucher to the bank, and the bank would have paid for it. He was not so anxious about his children when, according to his own evidence he spent a whole day in the smoking room, and did not go into the stateroom with his beautiful star witness until the evening. Then he comes and asks this Senate to believe that witness and to grant him a divorce from his wife on that evidence alone. Last year the Senate rightly refused to do so. The petitioner had an opportunity to go and look for more evidence, but apparently, although he has been looking for it, he cannot get any evidence, and his star witness is still here. I have an idea that if the star witness had been examined again this year, with a proper cross-examination, we would have got evidence out of her. The lawyers are not justified in saying that their evidence would be the same this year as last. How do they know what the witness is going to say on cross-examination? I think we ought to investigate this whole matter of collusion, and we certainly ought to have the evidence of both parties, as to what has been done.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I regret that the question of religion has been brought prominently before the House on this question. I regret also to hear hon. members of this House admitting that they have been canvassed. I cannot see how hon. members of this House can be canvassed. Nobody has approached me, or seen me, and I am free to give my own opinion as I wish, but really regret that people outside of this House had the audacity to come and speak to hon. members upon this question. I am acting as a judge to give justice according to the case as put before me. At the present moment we are face to face with the case which has been submitted to the court, we have to decide on it, and the sooner we decide and get rid of this case the better it will be for all concerned. There is an amendment to the report. When a case is, as we say in Quebec 'en délibéré' and the parties wish to reopen the case, the first thing they have to do is to make a petition, supported by affidavit, saying that they have some new evidence, and giving the names of witnesses they wish to be heard. In this case there is nothing of the kind. Both parties are satisfied with the case, both seem to be ready to submit the case to the judges; and I do not see why we should send it back to the committee without producing some evidence that there are some new witnesses to be heard. Hence I do not see why we are not ready to adopt this report and go on with the case. I have not, so far, discussed the merits of the case. In due time, when the Bill is produced we will decide on its merits, but for the present I am opposed to sending the report back to the committee; the committee will have nothing to do but to return the report saying that they have no names of new witnesses given to them and no new evidence to be produced.

The House divided on the amendment, which was rejected on the following vote:

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE (in French)—What is the motion before the House ?

The SPEAKER (in French)—To adopt the report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—What is the report ?

The SPEAKER—To grant the divorce.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I object. There are two questions in the report and as I said a moment ago I just voted to establish a precedent and not for the granting of a divorce. The Bill is not before us.

Farrell,	Boyer—18.

The CLERK—The vote is as follows: Contents, 19; non-contents, 18.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think the vote is 18 to 18. I checked them carefully, and I would like to have the names read.

The CLERK—The vote is 18 to 18. There is no number 10.

The SPEAKER—Then the motion is lost.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading Bill (d) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I understand the junior senator from Halifax is in deep affliction at the present moment, one of his daughters having died, and I do not think it would be proper to proceed with this discussion now, especially as the debate was adjourned in view of his speech delivered last week. With the leave of the House I move that the order be discharged and placed on the Orders for Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (R), An Act respecting a Patent of John Roger Arnoldi.—Hon. Mr. Kerr.

Bill (S), An Act for the relief of Eliza Jane McLaughlin.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY WATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on:

Bill (90) An Act to amend an Act relating to the establishment and expenses of the International Joint Commission under the Waterways Treaty of January 11, 1909.

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The hon. gentleman was asked, when the Bill was up for the second reading, to see what had been done by this commission.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They have been engaged in making an inquiry into the boundary waters between the United States and Canada, and adjusting what differences could be adjusted between the two countries. A Blue Book has been issued reporting what the commission has done and is doing. That book is available to any one who chooses to go through it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The suggestion I had the honour to make when we were dealing with this Bill before had some merit in it. I wish to direct the attention of the leader of the Government to the fact that after the change of Government in 1911, the present Government introduced a Bill which provided that the Under Secretary for External Affairs should be attached to the office of the Premier, and naturally his office should be somewhere where it would be easily accessible from the office of the leader of the Government. I venture to suggest now, that, as a matter of practical business, steps should be taken to bring about that desirable result. I am not speaking on behalf of any person, but in the interest of the transaction of public business. When distinguished gentlemen come here from abroad, they are supposed to be put in communication with the Under Secretary for External Affairs; further, he is supposed to have opportunities to be instructed by the First Minister. Located where his office is, down on Bank street, he cannot very well have ready communication with the leader of the Government, and it is not really consistent with the dignity of this country that distinguished strangers should be sent down to such a place as that for the purpose of transacting business. I shall not charge anything for these suggestions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We accept it at that price.

The clause was adopted.

On the second clause:

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is to permit increasing the salary of the secretary of the commission to $4,000 if considered desirable.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suppose he is a good Conservative.

The clause was adopted.

On the third clause:

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under the present Act the expenditure for clerical work is limited to $3,000. It has been found from the experience of the commission that this is not sufficiently large and it has been proposed that the maximum amount shall be fixed at $6,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is for general clerical assistance?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendments.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, March 19, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

A CORRECTION.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I observe that my name does not appear in the report of yesterday's debate in the vote taken on the Hamilton divorce case. I voted against the divorce.

The SPEAKER—I will see that the report of the Debates is corrected, and that the hon. gentleman's name is added; and I hope the votes and proceedings will also contain the names.

THE HAMILTON DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

By the Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER:

March 18.—That he will move that the proceeding had to-day, on the 4th report of the Standing Committtee on Divorce be reconsidered for the purpose of rescinding the same.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I move that this Order be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Will the hon. gentleman make it Wednesday?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—With the greatest pleasure.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman be able to give us any reason why he should ask for a reconsideration of this matter after the Senate has passed on it three times?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—He will give the reason next week.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That will be rather late. If we are to have persecution I suppose we must stand it.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (W), An Act for the relief of Walter James Liscombe.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (X), An Act for the relief of Ethel Cora Robinson.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (Y), An Act for the relief of George Fullerton Forsythe.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

Bill (Z), An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

MINISTER OF RAILWAYS IN ENGLAND.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I should like to call the attention of the Government to the following despatch, which appears under big headlines in the Daily Mail of yesterday:

Presented Sword to Sir E. Carson—Hon. Frank Cochrane present at Anti-Home Rule Gathering.

London, March 16.—The Honourable Frank Cochrane, Canadian Minister of Railways, was among a hundred hosts who paid a remarkable personal tribute to Sir Edward Carson as the Ulster leader at a demonstration dinner at the Ritz hotel last night.

There were no speeches and, but three toasts, namely, 'the King,' 'Sir Edward Carson,' and 'no Home Rule.'

The surprise of the evening was the presentation to Sir Edward Carson of an infantry fighting sword with a silver scabbard and a basket hilt, and a beautifully illuminated book emblazoned with the arms of Ulster and a red hand.

On the title page were the words: 'Presented to Edward by friends in Ulster in the sure confidence that God will defend the right.'

Though not an Irishman, as a Frenchman I have a strong feeling for the Irish people, particularly when they are fighting for Home Rule, and I am surprised to see one of the prominent ministers of this Government joining a demonstration against Home Rule—especially when the minister left his sick bed to go there. He is a sick man, or supposed to be a sick man, and he must have very strong feelings against Home Rule when he joins in such a demonstration. I should like to know if the minister in the course he has taken represents the Government, and if the Government is not only against Home Rule, but is willing to take a hand in the fight against the empire. We in Canada are not more loyal than necessary, and are not willing, without consulting the people, to contribute to the navy, but we respect the constitution; and I am surprised that one of our ministers should leave his work in this country, cross the ocean, and join the man who is ready to fight the empire, and against the soldiers of the King; the man who would disrupt the whole empire. What would the Government say if, to-morrow, some people from Quebec, or any other province of the Dominion, should not only vote against some measure, say the Naval Bill, but be prepared to disobey the law, and engage in——

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Open revolution.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Open revolution. We have seen what became of public men who, for the sake of truth, fought men who, for the sake of justice and liberty, fought for their own people and their rights; they have been exiled and hanged. It appears however that the law is not the same on the other side. I am especially sorry to see a minister of this Government, who left this country sick, go over there, and make us sick by his conduct. I should like to know what the Government thinks of the matter, and if it approves of the minister's action.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Government has no official knowledge of the movements of the Minister of Railways while in pursuit of health. As to the loyalty to the empire of the Minister of Railways—the Government have the fullest confidence that the loyalty of the Minister of Railways will be equal to that of the hon. gentleman from Grandville.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I hope it is.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not think the answer of the leader of the Government is up to the mark. The Government may have absolute confidence in the gentleman called Mr. Frank Cochrane, Minister of Railways, but we have not, and the country has not.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—That is too bad.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is not too bad, for the British Empire to-day has not the confidence in Frank Cochrane, who leaves this country seeking health and goes over and joins a rebellious gathering against the British Empire. What has the Government to say to that? He should get a message from the leader of this Government.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—I rise to a point of order. What question is before the Chair?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Nothing; there is the answer of the leader of the Government.

The SPEAKER—There is no question before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Owing to the importance of the subject, and bowing to the decision of the Chair, which is correct—there is no special motion before the House—I now move the adjournment of the House, seconded by the Hon.—by all the senators.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order; there is nothing before the Chair.

The SPEAKER—The hon. member is moving a motion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend cannot move the adjournment of the House, with the intention of resuming his speech, as he has spoken on the subject already.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, I have not—not on the adjournment; that is where you are mistaken.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order; the hon. gentleman has spoken on the subject, and he cannot now move the adjournment of the House and resume the discussion.

The SPEAKER—The attention of the Government has been called by the hon. member from Grandville to a question which was answered by the hon. the leader of this House. Then the hon. gentleman from Victoria Division rose and said a few words. He was distinctly out of order; there was nothing before the Chair. If the hon. member from Victoria Division wants to put himself in order he must make a motion for the adjournment of the House, but that motion, according to our rules, must be for an urgent question.

Hon. M. CLORAN—That was just what I was going to point out. If this is not a matter of urgency—to protect the empire against the attack of a Canadian minister—I would like to know what is urgent.

The SPEAKER—I shall not take on myself to define the word 'urgency'; I fear too much the results of a division on any definition I could give, especially in this House; but I leave it to the House to decide if the hon. member is within the rules.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—My motion is now before the House; I move that the House do adjourn, seconded by the Hon. Senator Boyer.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I understand the hon. gentleman has indicated the nature of the motion he intends to move. In order to keep himself within the rules, he has explained to this House that he is not out of order, because he intends to move a motion; then he explained what that motion was. A gentleman who proposes to move the adjournment of the House is entitled to speak to the motion, but after the motion is put to the House he may not.

The SPEAKER—Rule 25 says: 'that no notice is required for any of the following motions:

(g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purpose of bringing up a question of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the orders of the day.

I maintain that when the hon. gentleman rose the first time to speak he was not in order.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That is right.

The SPEAKER—If he wants to put himself in order he must make a motion, and the motion he must make is one for the adjournment of the Senate; but he must make the motion for adjournment for the purpose of bringing up a question of urgent public importance. This the mover must state on rising to speak. Now the hon. gentleman moves that the House do now adjourn, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Boyer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I call for the yeas and nays on the question whether the subject is one of urgent public importance.

The SPEAKER—I cannot ask the House to divide on that motion until the hon. gentleman has finished his speech. He has the floor; I cannot take away the floor from him now.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We have not got the gag here yet.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order; the hon. gentleman from Victoria Division, before he moved the adjournment of the House, had proceeded with his speech. He cannot in proceeding with the speech move the adjournment of the House and then resume the speech. I raised that point of order, which has not been passed upon.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I did not take my seat. Somebody on the other side raised a point of order, and I simply sat down to hear the point of order. When it was decided that there was nothing in it, I rose and made my motion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I ask the ruling of the Chair whether the hon. gentleman had not spoken on the subject before he moved the adjournment of the House, and whether he is in order in resuming his speech after making the motion.

The SPEAKER: When the hon. gentleman rose there was nothing before the Chair. He was not in order.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He had spoken on the question he is now discussing.

The SPEAKER—I want that point discussed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand the point of order raised by the hon. leader of the Government is that it is open to any hon. member to move the adjournment of the House, and to take the occasion of that motion to make a speech, but that he is to make his remarks before the motion.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand that is the point the hon. leader of the Government has raised.

The SPEAKER—In parliamentary procedure anybody may rise, when the Orders of the Day are called, and state that it is his intention to wind up his remarks with a motion. That is the parliamentary rule.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He has not done that though.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—The hon. member from Victoria Division, following the hon. member from Grandville, started to make a speech, and spoke for a couple of minutes forcibly. He was called to order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, I object. I was not called to order.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—The point raised by the leader of the Government was that the hon. member had spoken on this question, and that now he was out of order and could not make a motion.

The SPEAKER—In the parliamentary practice when a motion is put, and a man speaks on that motion, he is not obliged to move an amendment at the beginning of his remarks, but he may at the end of his speech. In this case there was no motion before the House. The hon. member from Grandville called the attention of the House to a certain subject. I cannot say that he was in order, but at all events he was following the practice which prevails in this House. He asked a question which the leader of the Government answered. Then the hon. gentleman from Victoria Division rose and referred to the remarks made by the leader of the Government. He was called to order: there was nothing before the Chair. That was the point of order taken, and, as there was nothing before the Chair, my duty was to tell the hon. gentleman so, and he took his seat. He rose afterwards and made a motion that the House do now adjourn.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am merely asking for information. I want to know how the point of order is raised. Is it not that after a motion has been put, the hon. gentleman is debarred from continuing his remarks?

The SPEAKER—The parliamentary practice is that he may make his motion either at the beginning or at the end of his remarks.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This discussion puts me in mind of what is now going on in Ulster against the British Empire. Right and justice will prevail there in the long run just as it has prevailed here. Our Minister of Railways left here ostensibly because he was sick—but he could not be very sick when he attended a banquet when a sword was given to a man, to fight the empire. That sword will never be drawn because I do not suppose the man to whom it has been given has the heart to draw it. He can entice others to hide in the hedges and shoot. If Mr. Cochrane had been in St. Lawrence Hall last Tuesday night and heard Mr. Redmond delivering his address on Home Rule, he would not have given his countenance to the presentation of a sword to Sir Edward Carson to fight the British Empire. Mr. Redmond told his audience that Ulster, for which Bonar Law and Carson are putting spokes in the imperial wheel, is not unanimous against Home Rule. On the contrary a majority of the people of Ulster favour Home Rule. Out of 33 constituencies in Ulster, 17 returned Nationalists and 16, by very small majorities, were elected to oppose the present Government in England. Now why all this fuss; why all these threats of disintegration? Why all these threats against one of the noblest Governments that has controlled the destinies of the British Empire, during the last 50 years? Why try to upset a government that is true to the King, true to the empire, and true to the Dominions over the seas? Why allow a Bonar Law and a Carson to be aided by a Minister of the Canadian Government in carrying out their designs? Mr. Cochrane left his office and his place in Parliament on the pretence that his health was poor, and that he was going to the Mediterranean to secure better health. Well he did not go as far as the Mediterranean; he stopped at London, and to secure what? To assist at a function where a sword was presented to Sir Edward Carson. Who is Carson, after all, and what does he represent in the empire? He simply represents a body of students at Trinity University, Dublin, and is not a representative of the people in any way. He is fighting the British Empire, and trying to keep Ulster at his back, but this he cannot do because Ulster is behind Redmond. It vexes the population of this country, all nationalities and creeds, to find a Canadian minister join hands with a man of that kind—and over a sword. The leader of the Government in this House innocently tells us the Government has no official information. The Government has as much information now as the entire press of the country. They had it yesterday in the House of Commons, and they have it here. I was going to say that the answer of the hon. leader to the question of the hon. gentleman from Grandville, that the Government had no information on the subject, was childish. There are seven or eight million people in this Dominion, and they want a more definite answer. They want a declaration that the Government is not in sympathy with the position assumed by Mr. Cochrane in London; that the action of Mr. Cochrane attending the sword gathering in London has not the approval of the Government; that his action is distinctly repudiated—or else we want to know whether the Government is in league with Mr. Cochrane in this movement. The Government cannot hide under a cloak of that description; the veil is not thick enough to cover a crime of that kind; and so I hold that the action of Mr. Cochrane, under the circumstances, is a crime.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Treason.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—A case of treason, as well said by the hon. senator.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—High treason.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If the Government has not the information, it is their duty to cable their representative in London and ascertain from the records if Mr. Cochrane attended that meeting; it is their duty to bring the answer back to Parliament, and to say that Mr. Cochrane attended that meeting against the wishes of the Government, against the best interests of Canada, and against the party interests. And if Mr. Cochrane does not apologize and give explanation, then it is the duty of the leader of the Government to call for his resignation. We cannot, as a Dominion, oppose the British Government and His Majesty in their endeavour to carry legislation through the British Parliament, and that is what the attitude of Mr. Cochrane actually means. This matter is more serious than the hon. leader of the Government seems to think. The people of this country will wake up later on, from concession to concession, county to county, province to province—all over the Dominion—and we of all nationalities and creeds will ask why the Government allows one of its foremost ministers to attend a rebellious gathering against the British Government. The Government must understand that that is the way we view the matter, and a flimsy answer will not satisfy us. We will find out later whether the Government has communicated with its agent in London, or other proper authorities, to ascertain if the facts narrated in the press are correct, and we will then have more to say. We cannot stand here, on the eve of the greatest achievement political history will record in the annals of the empire, and find one of the prominent ministers of Canada holding up a sword against it. This measure of home government is as dear to the French-Canadian and every British subject, with a loyal and tender heart in his breast, as to any Irishman. The Canadian Parliament in 1882 made a plea and put forth a prayer for Home Rule, and in 1886 this same Parliament of Canada upheld the efforts of that great, glorious, and illustrious statesman, William Ewart Gladstone. But now, thirty-two years after that expression of sympathy for the Irish cause by the people of Canada, through their representatives in Parliament assembled, we find one of the foremost ministers of the Government attending a rebellious banquet, and leaving his work in the Parliament of Canada to so attend, under the pretence that he was sick. The Government must understand that such procedure will not be tolerated in the year 1914, after this country has, on two distinct occasions, expressed itself otherwise. I am very sorry that we have only the hon. leader of the Government in this House to address on this matter. I know he does not feel as Mr. Cochrane does. I should like to be in front of Mr. Borden and his ministers, and tell them what the people of this country expect, and what they will not tolerate. I do not know whether Mr. Borden would be a party to the action of his minister; but the Government should demand an apology from Mr. Cochrane, and, if the apology is not forthcoming, to ask for his resignation, or be held responsible or jointly liable with Mr. Cochrane in regard to this rebellious attack on the British Government.

The motion was lost.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved that the name of Hon. Mr. Costigan be placed on the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

He said: My reason for making this motion is that there is a vacancy on the Banking and Commerce Committee, caused by the death of Sir George Ross.

The motion was agreed to.

MINISTER OF RAILWAYS IN ENGLAND.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I deeply regret to have to worry the honourable leader of the House—

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not at all; that is what he is here for.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am obliged to do so on account of his position as representative of the Government in this House, and when I address him it is not as leader of the Senate (because as such I respect him most profoundly) but as the representative of the Government in this Chamber, responsible to the people. I desire to ask him, has the Government up to the present moment taken any steps to ascertain if one of their ministers has sided with a rebel in London on the occasion of the presentation to him of a sword, to be drawn against the British Government and the British Empire? I know my hon. friend will give the same old answer, 'I have no official information'. Has the Government taken any measures to ascertain whether Hon. Mr. Frank Cochrane, Minister of Railways of the Dominion of Canada, was present at that demonstration, and shook hands over a sword, to break the British Government and Mr. Asquith, and help to destroy the empire?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to my hon. friend, if he wishes any information upon this question, that he should give notice in the usual way, so that the inquiry may appear upon the Order Paper. I shall be very happy to give attention to any such inquiry.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I will do that.

VOLUNTEER BOUNTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (98), An Act to amend The Volunteer Bounty Act, 1908, and amending Acts.

He said: This is a Bill proposing to extend the time for the surrender of rights of holders under the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1908, and amending Acts, to enable them to take advantage of the Government paying $500 for such surrender in the event of their making it. If any further explanation is desired, when we go into Committee I shall be very glad to make it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Does this allude to what we call South African scrip ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Government proposes to give $500 to each holder who exercised the option to surrender his rights ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes; it does not extend the time for filing the warrants on land. That time is exhausted, so it is now proposed to pay $500 to holders of the scrip in lieu of the rights which they enjoyed to file their warrants upon land.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (53), An Act respecting The Empire Life Assurance Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Tessier.

Bill (57), An Act respecting British Trust Company.—Hon. Mr. Tessier.

Bill (58), An Act to incorporate The Sudbury, Kepawa and Bell River Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Gordon.

Bill (66), An Act respecting the patent of The National Wood Distilling Company.—Hon. Mr. Tessier.

ST. JOHN'S GATE, QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE rose to—Call the attention of the Government to the correspondence exchanged between His Honour the Mayor of Quebec, and the right hon. the Prime Minister, and to inquire from the Government whether it is informed that the historical name of the 'Saint John's Gate,' which practically forms part of the fortifications of Quebec, is to be exchanged to that of 'Connaught Gate.' If so, is it the intention of the Government to allow the said change to be made?

He said: I did not intend to say much about the question I have put to the Government, but it is very important to know if, really, the name of St. John's Gate is to be changed. We in Quebec would all be very glad to have some monument which would carry the name of our present Governor General, but I am afraid it would be very hard to give the name of our present Governor General to St. John's Gate. It would take generations before we could make the people believe that St. John's Gate should be called by the name of Connaught Gate. I have been surprised at the correspondence exchanged between the mayor of Quebec and the Governor General; I am quite sure that the idea never originated in the head of our mayor of Quebec. According to my information this movement—an unfortunate movement—was started from Ottawa by some parties who would like to make their bow to the Governor General. I am sure, for many reasons, that the letter which has been signed by the mayor of Quebec was never written by him; he just put his name to the letter because he was asked to do so. It was not fair to accuse our mayor of doing what he did in order to have himself knighted; I think that is very far from his mind. Even if such accusations were true, it would make the situation still worse. At any rate I wish to say—and I say it on behalf of the citizens of Quebec—that they would be very sorry indeed if the old name of La Porte St. Jean were changed to the most respectable name of our Governor General. The old name is an historical one, and has been in use in Quebec for over two centuries.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Three centuries.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It would not be fair to the province of Quebec that the stroke of the pen should change the name. I would have been delighted to have some monument in Quebec baptised with the name of our Governor General. We have been informed by the Government—and I think it is true—that they are going to construct large works in that province. They are going to build a union station; to dam the St. Charles river; to construct the Transcontinental works at St. Malo; to build a dry-dock, and according to the Postmaster General, they are going to have a tunnel in order to reach the heart of the city of Quebec. I must suppose the Government is serious and is going to carry out its promises, and it will be fitting for the Government,—and the people of Quebec will be delighted—that one of these large works shall be baptised with the name of our Governor General. We might call the Connaught Dry Dock, the Connaught Tunnels or the Connaught Work Shops after the Governor General. I protest against the taking away of the historical name of La Porte St. Jean, which has been spoken of in every book and in every newspaper article written in regard to Quebec, and I am sure the Governor General himself would not be in favour of the elimination of that historical name. If he has accepted the change, erroneous representations must have been made to him, and I would not blame him for it. But, if the facts were put before him, he never would have consented to his name being attached to this gate. I hope the name of La Porte St. Jean will remain as long as Quebec stands.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I may say to the hon. gentleman that the Government has no information on the subject beyond that which is contained in the correspondence to which he alludes. The matter is one that would be left entirely to the civic authorities of Quebec. The mayor of Quebec in a letter written to the Prime Minister of Canada,—which is in the correspondence,—writes as follows:

> May I add the suggestion that it would be specially agreeable to the citizens of Quebec if the new gateway bore the name of our present distinguished Governor General.

Nothing has been done in the matter as yet, and the Government will be controlled entirely by the wishes of the civic authorities of that city.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS IN ENGLAND.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I desire to make a frank apology to the hon. leader of this House. I promised him at the last sitting that I would put my question on the Order Paper for to-day, in regard to the famous Carson-Cochrane Sword issue, and I apologize to him now for not having kept my word, I do so for two reasons. I am fairly well satisfied, and I think the country is also satisfied, that the Government of the day is utterly unable and incapable of controlling the actions of their ministers either at home or abroad. I am also convinced—and the country is with me—that the ignorance of the Government in regard to those large questions regarding imperial affairs is quite dense. Under these circumstances I think it would not avail anything to push the matter any further or to place the question on the Order Paper.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION ON WATERWAYS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of

> Bill (90), An Act to amend an Act relating to the establishment and expenses of the International Joint Commission under the Waterways Treaty of January 11, 1909.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Could the hon. gentleman give us some idea of the number of engineers employed by the commission, and the salaries they receive?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am sorry that I cannot give my hon. friend detailed information, such as he asks. If, however, he desires information of that character, if he will favour us with the usual notice of inquiry, I shall be very glad to obtain the information.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I shall put an inquiry on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I desire to thank the hon. leader of the House for allowing this matter to stand until to-day, because I wish to make a few remarks on this very important subject. I fear that many hon. members of this House do not fairly realize the importance of this International Joint Commission. This commission was established by a law passed by the Government of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and it was in line with many other measures, always looking to the autonomy of Canada —that is, allowing this country to handle as much as possible its own affairs. The proof of this statement is found in the operations of the present commission. Before this law was passed and this commission was established, I do not think there can be found any other instance in which the high contracting parties—that is the United States of America and Canada—were allowed to deal absolutely for themselves, without having one or more representatives of the Imperial Government on such commission. This International Joint Commission is composed of three gentlemen from the United States of America, and also three commissioners representing Canada, who are Canadians. There is no one appointed to represent the Imperial Parliament, which shows that the policy inaugurated by the late Government in trying to deal with our own affairs has been recognized. This has been a great step towards our obtaining absolute control of our affairs. On all the other commissions you will find there were always some representatives of the Imperial Parliament. Going back to 1871, to the time of the Fisheries Treaty, to when that question was submitted to arbitration in 1876, we find that there was one commissioner for Canada, Sir A. T. Galt, also a commissioner representing the United States, and a third who was a foreigner. He was not a Britisher, not a member of the empire. In that case Sir A. T. Galt, representing Canada, was ably assisted by a very famous lawyer in Montreal, Mr. Joseph Doutre, and also by Sir Louis Davies, now of the Supreme Court. They carried their point absolutely, and it was decided that that arbitration was an unqualified success as far as Canada was concerned. Later on, when the arbitration took place at The Hague on the North Atlantic fisheries question, Canada was represented by Mr. Aylesworth, now Sir Alan Aylesworth, and Mr. Ewart, well known for his 'Kingdom Papers.' The British Attorney General simply took part in some of the argument, but all the diplomacy of the case and all the argument were left to Canadians, and there, also, Canada was successful. It has been quite different when gentlemen have been appointed from the other side of the water. We all remember the arbitration that took place over those small islands in the Pacific ocean near Prince Rupert. Canada was represented on that commission. There were three Americans appointed, supposed to be jurists of great repute, and two Canadians, and one whom I shall call an Englishman—Lord Alverstone. The arbitration went on. The understanding was that if the commissioners divided equally—if the three representatives of the United States upheld the contentions of their country, and the three representing Canada upheld the contentions of their side—there would be no finding. If there was to be a finding it would have to be by a majority. In that case a majority was obtained, but how? It was obtained by our representatives, Sir Louis Jetté, at that time Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec, and Sir Alan Aylesworth, afterwards Minister of Justice, being left by Lord Alverstone, who sided with the representatives of the United States and decided in their favour. The consequence was that we lost territory on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is what they always do.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I think the Senate, which is free from the turmoil of politics, should give special attention to international questions. It might be well for us to be informed of the good work that has been done by this International Commission. The best evidence that the work is being carried on satisfactorily—and I do not wish to detract from the leader of the House when I say so—is that he admitted frankly that he was not very familiar with the operations of this commission. That speaks volumes for the manner in which this commission has managed many important questions, without the assistance of this Government. They have managed to settle very difficult questions, some of which I might mention. The commission assembled for the first time in January and February, 1912, at Washington, and it naturally took a couple of months to settle the rules of procedure, and the rules and regulations that were to govern the commission, and to have these rules approved by the two high contracting parties. Because—remember always—anything done by this commission is done as between the United States and the Empire; the commissioners on either side act under the provisions of a treaty.

Briefly stated, and leaving aside certain special powers given to the commission, as to Niagara river, Milk river, etc., the jurisdiction and powers of the commission are defined:

1. In articles III and IV of the treaty, which empower the commission to render final decisions in the cases of uses, obstructions and diversions of boundary waters on either side of the line and of the construction or maintenance of remedial or protective works, dams or other obstructions in waters flowing from boundary waters, etc.

2. In article IX of the treaty, under which questions or matters of difference arising between the high contracting parties involving the rights, obligations or interests of either in relation to the other or to the inhabitants of the other along the common frontier may be referred from time to time to the commission for examination and report, and

3. In article X of the treaty, under which any questions or matters of difference arising between the high contracting parties involving the rights, obligations or interests of the United States or Canada either in relation to each other or to their respective inhabitants may be referred for decision to the commission by the consent of the two parties.

It might appear from this that the sole purpose of the commission was to deal with the boundary waters between the United States and Canada, but you will find in article X of the treaty that any question or matter of difference arising between the high contracting parties, involving the rights, obligations, or interests of the United States or Canada, either in relation to each other or their respective inhabitants, may be referred for decision to the commission by the consent of the two parties. Then, according to another article of the treaty, other matters of difference may be and are referred, but not for final decision—matters affecting the inhabitants of either country along the common front may be referred from time to time to the commission for examination and report. The cases referred to the commission for report are not so serious, but in article IX, cases are referred to it for decision.

Now the first question that was submitted to this commission under article IX was one of very great importance to the people of Detroit, Windsor, and Amherstburg, and affected the Detroit river. The United States Government had improved, and in fact in some cases created, a channel on the south side of the river—called the Livingstone channel—about sixteen miles below Detroit. After having made this channel, the engineers—although the hon. leader of the Government would have us believe that Government engineers never err—the engineers of the United States Government erred, because in making the channel they did not take into consideration the cross-currents. The channel was constructed to allow vessels to go down the river. There is another channel on the Canadian side which is used by ships going up the Detroit river, and this system of navigation obtains almost all the way up to Sault Ste. Marie. Everybody knows what a tremendous trade is done on the Detroit river. After the Livingstone channel had been completed and in operation it was found to be very difficult for navigation by large steamers. Some of those vessels are 600 feet in length, and they could not keep in the channel. It was proposed then to erect a dyke in order to divert the current, and the proposition, for which a sum of $11,000,000 had been appropriated by the United States Government, was to build this dyke from the Livingstone channel to the foot of Bois Blanc island, on the Canadian side of the river, and Canadians made a serious protest. Now, if we had not had this commission to deal with the matter, probably the United States Government would have gone on with the work. We would have had to appeal to the imperial Government to get a commission appointed, because we must recognize the fact that we cannot in any way approach any Government in the world except through the regular channel, the Colonial Office. We do not exist as a nation. We are a colony, and until we change our status we will remain a colony, no matter what people may say on one side or the other of politics. If it had not been for this commission it would have taken a long time, perhaps, to prevent the erection of this dyke. The commission met in Detroit, had several sittings, heard witnesses and experts, heard counsel on both sides, and finally found that it was not absolutely necessary to build this dyke from the bottom of Livingstone channel to Bois Blanc island. Such construction would have caused pollution of the water on the Canadian shore, flooded wharves and properties, and every spring accumulated ice on the Canadian side. It was found possible afterwards to erect this dam entirely on United States territory. The first one would have been constructed almost absolutely on Canadian territory. All the parties consented, and the dyke will now be erected on the United States side, and there will be no interference with, or flooding, or pollution of the waters on the Canadian side. That is one of the questions which the commission has settled, and settled so peaceably and amicably that I do not think that even the Government of the day was aware of what was accomplished. I do not say this in the way of detracting from the Government, but to show the excellence of the work of this commission.

The next question referred to the commission was one of big importance. I see the hon. gentleman from Belleville is giving me an attentive hearing, and I thank him for it, because the question came up before his Government, when he was in power—I refer to the question of the level of Lake of the Woods. For years and years gone by we all remember that every time a dam or other improvement was made to develop power at the outlet of Lake of the Woods—thereby raising or keeping at spring level the height of the water in the lake—there were always protests from the inhabitants on the south shores of the lake—from people in Minnesota and from people on the west side of the lake. They claim that the construction of these works caused flooding of the low shores and destroyed the fishing industry. It appears that fishing is a very profitable occupation in that portion of the Lake of the Woods. It was decided to submit this question to the commission. In due course sittings were held at International Falls, Warroad and Kenora. A great deal of evidence was taken, counsel representing the two countries were heard, and at last it was decided to appoint two very eminent engineers, Mr. Arthur D. White, representing Canada, and Mr. Adolph F. Meyers, for the United States, to carry on surveys and gather data in order to find out and instruct the commission as to what would be the proper height to keep the waters of the Lake of the Woods.

These engineers went to work. Large parties of surveyors were at work all last summer, and if the time occupied might appear to be too long, hon. gentlemen must remember that the catchment area of the Lake of the Woods and the Rainy river is 21,000 square miles. Therefore, it was necessary to make very extensive surveys in order to ascertain the rainfall over that immense area, and to guard against any obstruction to the Kenora power. Hon. gentlemen must remember that at Kenora we have some very important industries; such as flour mills, lumbering operations, and other industrial establishments, and, in consequence, the work required a great deal of information. During last January these engineers made a preliminary report, and when all the documents are in the commission expect to be able to make a finding and to settle forever the future level of the Lake of the Woods. Another very important question has also been submitted to them, and I regret the hon. gentleman from Ottawa is not here, because he takes a special interest in this matter. There seems to be something of interest in this commission for every one in this House. I refer to the question of pollution of water. The question of the pollution of the boundary waters between the United States and Canada was also submitted to the commission. It began its work, first by hearing evidence on this question and by employing the very best bacteriological experts they could possibly get, and samples of the water were taken from all the tributaries of the Lake of the Woods, Shoal Lake, down the Rainy river, Lake Superior, Lake Michigan, Lake Huron, St. Clair river, Lake St. Clair, Detroit river and the Niagara river, Lake Erie, Lake Ontario and down the St. Lawrence as far as the St. Lawrence is the boundary between the United States and Canada. Besides that, samples of the water were also taken on the St. John's river, where it is the boundary between the state of Maine and Canada. Maps, plans, reports, and data are now being printed, and will be ready in a few days, and it appears that this work is the most comprehensive of its kind that has ever been done in the world. These maps will show the pollution and the sources of the pollution all down that immense water stretch. When all these data are before the commission, the second question which has been put before them will be taken up—the question as to the remedy, of how to render less harmful this pollution of the water. The investigation would not be of much use if there were no remedy proposed. Now I would call the attention of the House to the fact that those three men representing Canada, familiar with the territory with which they are dealing, knowing and being able to appreciate this study what has been the cause of the pollution of the streams, enlisted first the help of the Boards of Health of Ontario and of Quebec, and also those of Minnesota, Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New York state, and so on, and called experts from all those places to find out if possible the exact source of pollution. It is to be hoped that the remedy will follow in the near future, when all these data are available. I am asked by my hon. friend on my right (Hon. Mr. Edwards) what was the result. The result as far as it has gone, has been to locate the sources of pollution all the way from Rainy river, Lake of the Woods, down to the Atlantic coast; when this commission makes its finding it will be possible for the high contracting parties to take the necessary steps to remedy the evil. Here is another matter which might be of interest to the hon. member from Russell. It was in April, 1912, that the Watrous Island Boom Company made application to extend a boom for their lumbering operations for a distance of eleven miles on the Rainy river. This boom in that distance entered in many places on Canadian territory. Some objection was taken by the Canadians to those proceedings, and the commission deputed two of its members to visit the locus in quo—which means, in plain English, the site of the work. These two commissioners proceeded to visit the locus in quo, and they found that the boom was very objectionable. However, after hearing evidence again and having experts—expert lumbermen, I suppose—they decided that the booms would be placed in a certain way and maintained in a certain way, and the whole question was settled amicably. Hon. gentlemen will see that at all these points there could easily have been international friction; yet with a commission of that sort, and ever since they have been acting, everything has gone on very smoothly—so smoothly, in fact, that the Government of the country is not absolutely aware of all there is going on—without detracting from the hon. the leader of this House, of course. Now, the hon. members from Portage la Prairie and Winnipeg will be interested to learn that when the authorities of the greater Winnipeg water district were looking for water for that great city that will be——

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That is.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—On the banks of the Assiniboine and the Red river, Winnipeg, in their ambition they wanted to provide enough water for a city of a million people. Well, I hope they will have that population some day, when we have good times and a new Government. However, the question was where to find this water, and it was decided that the only place was Shoal Lake, which is a tributary of the Lake of the Woods, and consequently international water. Neither the United States of America nor Canada can take water from boundary waters, without the permission of the other, according to this treaty. A sitting was held in Washington, and this case was a harder one than usual, because once the water was taken from Shoal Lake or from Lake of the Woods, that water would drain down to Winnipeg, and in Winnipeg it would probably drain into the Red river and then into Lake Winnipeg, and so on to the Hudson bay. That water would never return to the Lake of the Woods—the situation was something like the one in which water extracted from near Chicago by the Chicago Drainage canal, which comes out of Lake Michigan and falls into Desplaines river, then into Illinois river and the Mississippi, down to New Orleans and is lost to the St Lawrence. After hearing the experts in Washington, the commission granted to the greater Winnipeg water district permission to take 100,000,000 gallons of water daily, which will easily provide for a city of a million people at least. That question was satisfactorily settled. Another question is now pending before them, that of the Michigan Northern Power Company at Sault Ste. Marie. To my personal knowledge that question was an active one in 1900 when I visited the Algoma steel works, then under the Supervision of Mr. F. H. Clergue. The Canadian company wanted to increase the head of water, which is about twenty-four feet, by making a wing dam into the St. Mary's river the outlet to the Lake Superior, and the same thing was wanted also on the American side, but the parties could not come together. After these fourteen years the question is up again and is about to be decided. It would take a great deal to affect the level of a large sheet of water like Lake Superior; yet hon. gentlemen in this House may be surprised to hear—and this information I have had since I was there fourteen years ago—that the erection of the small piers of the bridge of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company crossing the St. Mary's river just at the outlet of Lake Superior, have been sufficient within a year after their erection to raise the level of Lake Superior nearly one foot. I know that to be a fact because I happened to have had something to do with it professionally. Just below the rapids of Sault Ste. Marie the level of St. Mary river fell 22 inches, because the late Hon. J. Israel Tarte had had removed some boulders at the outlet of Lake Huron. This question will be decided in the near future by this commission. It is a very serious question in this way that if a dam were put at the outlet of Lake Superior, and raised the water ever so little, the city of Duluth, for instance, at the other end of the lake, and thousands of acres, I am informed near Fort William, would be flooded. Therefore regulating weirs must be established by which the level of the lake in springtime will be maintained all the year round, and these regulating weirs must be large enough, whenever there is an increase in the quantity of the water, to permit the extra water to flow away. Otherwise part of Fort William would be under water. Protests came in in regard to that. After the argument had been heard and the evidence all adduced, parties who were opposing asked for delay, in order to have the evidence considered, and prepare their answer; and this was granted. The riparian proprietors and the municipalities around Lake Superior have asked that the matter be adjourned, so as to give them time to prepare their case and be heard before a final decision should be rendered. This commission has held fifty-six sittings. They have given satisfaction to the high contracting parties they represent; and if ever a measure was passed by the late Administraton which redounds to its credit, which confirms our autonomy, and which proves that when we look after our own affairs we can look after them better without any help from the other side—this measure is the one. I think great credit is due to the late Administration, and I was very glad to get these notes together in order to show that so much good has been done by the late Administration. Like other measures that were passed by the old Administration, and that the present Government has left alone, they are giving good results.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Has all the work done by this commission been performed by the commission originally appointed, or has there been any change in the commission?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That is a very vexed question, whether the first commission were appointed or not. There were other names mentioned by this Government and sent over to the Imeprial Government for sanction. During that time there was a change of Government, as we all know, and I do not know whether this Government sent names to replace those who had been appointed by the former Administration. That is a question I will leave to the leader of the House to answer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have to express my acknowledgments of indebtedness to my hon. friend for the very lucid explanation he has made as to the work accomplished by this commission. He has relieved me by the very comprehensive review which he has entered upon, from the labour attached to making a study of the subject. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite particularly that any contribution of this kind in the future, looking to a division of labour, will be very acceptable to myself. Furthermore the tribute of praise which my hon. friend has paid to the present Government in reviewing the acts of this commission will be extremely encouraging for the Government to do equally well in the future. So far, as the appointment of the other commissioners is concerned, I might say to hon. gentlemen that the other commission was not appointed as provided by law. Certain names had been suggested by the late Government for the purpose of constituting the board. Those names had to be submitted to the imperial Government for sanction. That sanction had not been given when the late Government went out of office, consequently the responsibility fell upon this Government of recommending, for imperial sanction, other names, and the present Government accordingly suggested the names of the gentlemen who now constitute the board. My hon. friend has covered so well a general review of the subject that it is entirely unnecessary for me to repeat what he has so well said in moving the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Could the hon. gentleman tell me if there were any reasons given for the original appointments not being accepted by the British Government?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It happened when the late Government went out of office. The imperial sanction had not been given to the names that had been recommended by the late Government.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Does the hon. gentleman know why?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And, very naturally, the present Government did not feel inclined to insist upon imperial sanction being given to the names of those recommended by the previous Government. They felt that they were in a position to recommend equally good if not better names, and accordingly did so.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—They instructed the imperial Government to withhold their sanction until they suggested further names.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not recall what took place.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—They did not instruct them?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not aware as to that point. All I am aware of is that the sanction had not been given.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière has placed the House under a great obligation by taking the trouble he has done to put himself in a position to deliver so instructive an address as that which we have listened to; and there is this other circumstance about this address, that, except a few trifling expressions towards the close, it was an address that might have been made by either side of the House. He delivered it in a non-partisan character. I rise partly to supply an omission which the hon. gentleman made in speaking of the Fishery Commission which sat at Halifax in the year 1877. The hon. gentleman mentioned the name of two counsels, the late Joseph Doutre, and the present Sir Louis Davies. As a matter of fact, the gentleman who was looked upon as the leading counsel in that case was not mentioned by the hon. gentleman. It was Samuel Thompson, of New Brunswick. He was one of the greatest lawyers that we have ever had in Canada, and he was, I think, looked upon by people who listened to the discussions and those who read the reports of the discussions as really the leading counsel on the Canadian side.

Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the second reading of Bill (73), An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman should make some explanation over this Bill. It is not in the ordinary line.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The Bill is for the purpose of authorizing the signature of the president of the Canadian Northern railway to be attached to bonds and coupons by lithograph instead of by personal signature. That is the nature of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (96), An Act to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

He said: The proposed amendment has reference to the metric system. Under the law as it now stands this system of weights and measures is permissive. The object of the amendment is to provide for the substitution of the international metric standards in use throughout the world for the local standards in use under the present law. When the Bill goes into committee I shall be glad to give any further explanation that may be desired.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Is it intended to make the use of the metric system imperative?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, the amendment leaves the law as it is, so far as its permissibility is concerned, but it substitutes for the present standard, a standard adopted by the International Bureau.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—As the Bill is not made compulsory, what does my hon. friend propose to do to get the system adopted? I remember when Sir Henry Joly was in the Department of Inland Revenue, he took a very deep interest in this matter and had a large number of the different weights made up into cabinets and distributed to schools throughout the country. Afterwards, when he was appointed Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia, on several occasions he took a great deal of trouble in getting up lectures and speaking to people generally in that part of the country for the purpose of getting them educated to the use of this system of measurement; but since his death I have never heard of any action being taken by the Government or by any private individual to get the people educated to consider the adoption of the metric system. Is there any intention on the part of the Government to take this matter up?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While the use of the metric system is permissible, it is now used very largely. It is used, I understand, entirely in measuring electricity, and is applicable also in other directions. It is to be hoped that before very long public opinion may be educated up to this system of measurement. It is not considered desirable to make it compulsory at the present time, but as it is being adopted very largely by most of the other nations of the world, it is to be hoped that before very long we in Canada may see the advantage of adopting it as a system of measurement, and we can then get legislation to make it compulsory.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suppose until this system is adopted generally in the United States and England we are not likely to adopt it here.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The adoption of the system is being strongly urged on the Government by the universities and by scientific men in the Dominion. It is being used largely by schools of that kind and by scientific men for the measurement of whatever forces or matter they may be interested in. Of course we cannot force public opinion in its adoption.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Let me tell my hon. friend from Halifax that although in England and the United States the use of the international metre is not obligatory, still the international metre is adopted as the legal standard in both countries. This matter is of very great importance. It is a move toward universal fraternity, if I might say, bringing nations closer together by basing their transactions upon standard units. It is not, as some people imagine, a French institution merely. It is now an international affair. It is true that the metric system was first adopted by France, but hon. gentlemen will take notice that the commission was to be composed of French and English scientists. That was during the French revolution, and France being at war with England, the English scientists abstained from taking part. It was the French savants who established the metric unit, which is composed, as you all know, of a tenth millionth of the quadrant of the earth. La Place and other great astronomers of the time were employed in the work.

Now the superiority of the scheme was soon found out by scientists the world over, and one after the other the great countries fell into line. The Conference of Weights and Measures was established by a diplomatic convention signed in 1875 by plenipotentiaries representing nineteen governments, its object being to discuss and educe measures necessary for the propagation and perfection of the metric system, as well as to sanction any new fundamental meteorological discoveries which might be made in the interval between its meetings. By the terms of the convention the contracting parties agreed to establish and maintain at common cost an international bureau of weights and measures. The operations of this bureau are carried on under the exclusive direction and superintendence of an international committee, placed in its turn under the authority of the general conference, consisting of delegates from all the governments and meeting at least once every six years. Votes at the meetings of the general conference are taken by state, each state being entitled to one vote. That committee is composed of fourteen members all belonging to different states, and elected by ballot at the meetings of the conference; those members are the leading scientists of the world. The work done is one essential to civilization. In 1875, at the time of the first convention, there were only twelve countries where the metric system was compulsory, namely, Germany, Belgium, Russia, Colombia, Cuba, Spain, France, Holland Italy, Luxembourg, Peru, Portugal; now there are thirty-two countries where the metric system is compulsory; in fact it is compulsory in all the civilized nations of the world, excepting Turkey, England, the United States, and the colonies of England. I read the other day that Malta is adopting it, and by the first of July next it will be compulsory there also. The absence of participation in the metric system on the part of England and the United States is somewhat of a handicap, because the whole civilized world has now adopted it, making it compulsory; and England and the United States will eventually have to fall into line. The system is highly civilizing, as it brings together all the nations of the world, and simplifies international affairs. It is now exclusively adopted in the scientific world; in fact science could not make adequate measurements with the old measures, in the case of units of light and units of heat, for example. England, not very long since, has adopted the centimetre-gram, which is the second application of the system of units, introduced by the British association for the advancement of science. This is to-day used all over the world. As we know, the old systems are not clear, even the English system. For example, how many hon. gentlemen present know how many yards in a rod, or a pole, or in a perch? We are puzzled at every step. When it comes to units in matters of money we find the same difficulty. All matters which are now universal must be brought down to the same units. That is what the metric system is doing. It was first applied in France, and, in its secondary effects, the centimetre-gram, in England. This law, as has been explained by our leader, simply substitutes, for what we have now, the prototype, the original metre which all the nations of the world copy, and which is deposited in Paris. It is not the exclusive work of French savants; it has been made most accurately, with the utmost precision that human science and ingenuity can devise, by the fourteen men who composed the Bureau. It is made of platinum and iridium, and all the nations that belong to the conference go and make their metre from the standard metre which is deposited in Paris. Let me give you an instance of what happened before the adoption of the standard metre. There were geodesic work done in Germany and Austria according to the metric system; but local metres, such as we have here, were used. When it came to comparing notes, there were notable differences; though they both used the metric unit there happened to be some slight difference in the two local standard metres, and the work had to be done over again. With a system having one universal metre, recognized as the prototype metre, all the nations of the world will have exactly, scientifically, the same units, not only for measures, weights, and dimensions, but for everything else, with but a single basis from which all the other developments will come. In Canada, in spite of the old conservatism which obtains in all English-speaking countries, there is a class of people who are most anxious that this legislation should pass, and that this system should be followed. These are the universities of the Dominion. The question was brought up last year and the year before at the Royal Society, of which I am a member, and was discussed there, and it was proposed that we should urge upon the Legislatures the adoption of the metric system. Concerning this very Bill now before us, I have a resolution which was adopted by the Senate of the University of Toronto on November 12:

> That the Senate of the University of Toronto recommend that the Government of the Dominion of Canada be asked to take steps to supplement their action in giving their support to the International Committee on the establishment of the length of the metre and the weight of the kilogram, by confirming by Order in Council or Legislative Enactment the length of the metre and the weight of the kilogram as determined by the said committee.

Another resolution adopted by the Senate of Queens University on December 8, 1903, was as follows:

> Whereas the Government of Canada, through its accredited representative to the International Conference of Weights and Measures, has by treaty agreed with the other nations taking part in the conference, to accept the international metre and kilogram as fixed by the said conference, and
> Whereas the Government of Canada has not yet carried out its obligations in this connection,
> Be it resolved, that the Senate of Queen's University urge the Prime Minister, the right hon. R. L. Borden, to pass during the next session of Parliament, such legislation as will make the international metre and kilogram the metric standards of length and weight in Canada.

Another resolution passed by the Board of Government of McGill university was as follows:

> That the corporation of McGill University recommend that the Government of the Dominion of Canada be asked to take steps to supplement their action in giving their support to the International Committee on the establishment of the length of the metre and the weight of the kilogram, by confirming by Order in Council or Legislative Enactment, the length of the metre and the weight of the kilogram, as determined by said committee.

As hon. gentlemen know, all the civilized nations in matters like this take their cue generally from the universities and scientific bodies. Here we have the opinion of the universities of Canada, all in favour of the universality of the international meteric system. Coming back to the International Conference of Weights and Measures, I may say that its president is, to-day, Mr. Foster, of Berlin, Germany, and that the vice-president is an Italian, Señor Blazerna, of Rome; both great scientists. England, up to last year, had Sir David Gill, one of its very leading scientists, and to-day the representative of England on the International Committee is Major McMahon. Since 1907, I believe, Canada also belongs to the conference. We were represented at the first conference, but at the last convention we were not. It is to be hoped that to the next international conference Canada will send a representative, as it is to-day the only colony in the world on the international conference. As each country, large or small, has but one vote, Canada's vote to-day will be equal to that of powerful Germany, Russia or England. I hope our Government will not neglect to have a representative at the international conference four years hence. I for one, am glad to see that the Government has fallen in line with the other nations, and that our metre will soon be the standard metre now used the world over.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, how many pounds are in a kilogram?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I think it is two pounds and some ounces. Something like two pounds, two ounces. I could not give you precise figures.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—We are all agreed on the merits of the metric system. The only thing that bothers me is the fact that each and every one of us at our age will have to go back to school. We have been brought up on the good old Canadian foot and inch. When we are told it is fifty miles to a certain place, we have an idea of the distance, but if you are told it is seventy-five kilometres we will never know how far we are to travel, unless we go to school and learn the system. A great many of us are accustomed to ordering by the pint bottle or quart bottle. We know what we are ordering. Under the new system if we order a litre we do not know what we are bargaining for, and will not know what we have to get rid of. The scientific bodies the world over have adopted the metric system. It strikes me the universe has gone on very well under the old system. We never got astray on it, but the world keeps revolving. It we adopt this measure, why should we not adopt some other thermometer? We have been nearly frozen to death on our good old Farenheit, which tells us it freezes at 32. If we were to adopt some other system, the Centigrade, for instance, we might be warmer; and if the scientists will tell me that we will be warmer under that thermometer, I am willing to adopt it. Our late colleague Sir Geo. Drummond took the ground that it was very sad to bring up such measures at his time of life and compel him at his age to go back to school. Every day we are passing contracts either for building houses or buying lands. If some one were to tell you that your house was going to be six metres wide you would accept it because you would be ashamed to show how ignorant you were. When you got quietly into your studio you would simply figure out that one metre is thirty-nine inches and gradually reduce it, and next morning you would be satisfied with the house six metres wide. It is the very best system, but it will involve each one of us going back to school which, at our age, would be a rather severe task.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—At what point do you suggest we should adopt it?

Hon. Mr. BOYER—We have got along remarkably well under the old system. We have not lost any money by it. They have not put up any higher or lower buildings than we bargained for. We have not travelled an inch more to a mile than we should. It is simply a question of giving in to the learned body who say that the best system is the metric system. The difficulty is in getting accustomed to it.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—The serious part of this Bill is that it establishes two legal methods in the country of measuring capacity, and measuring distance. It appears to me that that is rather confusing. One man will sell a load of hay by the ton, and most of us would understand what a ton meant, and would know what we were getting; another man might come from some more enlightened part of the country such as the district from which the hon. gentleman from Acadia comes and he might want it in kilograms or something of that kind and I think it would be very difficult for the ordinary person to understand how much he was getting. It appears to me that if it is thought advisable to change the system of weights and measures in this country, the country should be prepared for it. I do not know which is the better of the two, and I am not in a position to present scientific arguments on one side or the other; but I know that any system, whether it is the best or second best whose adoption would be of use to us, must be a system in which we will be able to think. If we want the metric system, we must be able to think in metres and kilogrammes and all that sort of thing, instead of in pounds, shillings, and tons, and the other methods of measuring capacity and length that we have at the present time. I know that for some years there has been very strong effort made to introduce this system into the country, but I have read arguments against it, and I thought when I read them they were very strong arguments. The consequence of these arguments has been that England has never adopted a metric system. In my own profession there has been an attempt more or less to use the metric system in the matter of dealing with prescriptions and drugs, and that sort of thing, but neither in the United States nor in Canada has it up to the present time made very much headway.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Is my hon. friend aware that the Colonial Conference which met in London in 1902 recommended the adoption of the metric system for the whole empire.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—It has been recommended I believe by certain scientific bodies.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The Colonial Conference that met in London.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—But I say it has never been adopted and the reasons given for it not being adopted have to my mind been very good ones, although I am not in a position to give them now. The serious part of this legislation is that while it is a permissive Bill, I imagine it legalizes in Canada the use of the metric system. It would appear to me this is going further than we ought to go until the children of the rising generation are trained up to understand the metric system and to think in metres instead of yards and feet and that sort of thing. As far as scientific bodies are concerned, I know probably they prefer, and in fact use, the metric system, because scientists recognize no boundary—so far as international boundaries are concerned. Science is of the world, and as long as a number of nations whose scientific men are using some system of measurement, they will use the metric system. Scientific bodies in England will favour the metric system, but it appears to me that if it is the intention of Parliament to introduce a gradual change of this kind it must be done through the provinces, educating the children at the schools in the metric system, so that they will be able to think in metres, grammes, etc., instead of yards and pounds.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (J), An Act to amend the Inspection and Sale Act.

(In the Committee.)

On sub-clause 3 of clause 4.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I propose that this shall read as follows:

When any such article is contained in a bag, sack or similar package the weight of the contents thereof shall be taken to be the weight of the article.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—That ought to be right.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On sub-clause 4:

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I propose that this shall read:

The weight of the contents of a bag, sack, or similar package of feed shall be 100 Dominion standard pounds.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS: That is there will be 100 pounds of feed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The words 'gross weight of feed' come out?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 5:

Hon. Mr. POWER moved to amend the clause after the word 'person' in line 20 by adding the following words:

or, where such barrel or half-barrel is packed by or for a co-partnership or incorporated company, with the firm name of such co-partnership or the corporate name of such company and with the place of business of such co-partnership or company.

He said: As a matter of fact these articles as a general thing are more frequently put up by incorporated companies than by individuals, and this is simply removing any doubt as to the information which should be on the package.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are prepared to accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I asked the other day that the word 'person' included companies and I find by the Interpretation Act that it does—'Person includes any body, corporate or politic, etc.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is right in a way—and again I do not think he is.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is a good deal for me.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is quite true that the word 'person' will include an incorporated company, but the definition does not say that it shall include a firm. In the clause now under consideration the Bill speaks of the initials of the christian name and the surname of the packer. I do not mean to say that a corporation has a pagan name, but it has not a christian name, nor has a firm; so in order to remove any doubt, I move the amendment of which I give notice, which is quite unobjectionable.

The amendment was agreed to.

On clause 6:

Hon. Mr. POWER moved to amend the clause by inserting after the word 'person' the following words:

Or, where such bag, sack or package by or for a co-partnership or incorporated company with the firm name of such co-partnership or the corporate name of such company and with the place of business of such co-partnership or company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It was proposed the previous day that we should adopt another paragraph, that is 164A known as paragraph (C), reading as follows:

The provisions of paragraph (b) as to bran shall not apply to feed, but the composition of the feed in each container shall be stated

That is to give a reasonable assurance to the purchaser of a package of feed, that it contains a certain kind or kinds of grain. I do not think there can be any objection to that.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It will take a Philadelphia lawyer to describe some of those.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is to prevent adulterated feed or stuff that is not feed from being sold as feed. That is to say, if a dealer should put a quantity of sawdust in a bag of bran he will scarcely mark it on the bag. Of course you cannot get any positive assurance, but you are reasonably sure that fraud will not be perpetrated by stamping on the bag a false statement, in the event of its coming under the attention of the inspectors.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If it is not according to what is on the inside you can prosecute him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Simply the bald statement of what that feed is, whether it is oats, barley, wheat, or whatever it may be.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In the cases suggested by my hon. friend the leader of the Government it is quite easy to state on the package whether it contains chopped oats feed, barley or bran as the case may be, but when you come to the numerous combinations that are made of all kinds of stuff ground up into feed—such as you will find at such points as Fort William, and other large centres where a great deal of grain feeding is going on—I can assure my hon. friend that there will be some difficulty in carrying out the law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite appreciate that.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What I think the Government should provide for is heavier penalties for any one who will mark on a bag something that would deceive a purchaser in regard to the quality or ingredients of the contents of the bag.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think the penalty clauses of the Bill will be sufficiently wide to meet the conditions.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Once you have done that, I think you have gone a long distance, so long as a man does not deceive. If a man brands a bag as ground oats and it contained either cheaper material or material of less food value than oats, then he would be guilty of fraud, if he branded it 'Pure Oat Chop.' I am rather suggesting that the prevention of fraud is one of the first duties of the Government; that therefore having accomplished heavy penalties the likelihood of such a thing not being practised, we would be going a long way. Whereas having to define by actual description the ingredients of feed will take quite a space.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Everything goes under a foreign name.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I would suggest that if we have a penalty clause in this Bill, it would be quite unworkable to brand feed as suggested by the hon. leader. If you could frame a clause to brand feed in commercial grades, it would work better. The commercial grain is a good food, but when you come to say that you should brand it with the ingredients of the bag, there is bound to be a lot of obnoxious weed seed more or less, generally more than less, and with a penalty clause there would be trouble, but if you say feed should be composed of commercial grain you would eliminate noxious weed seed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What would you do with the grain that is not commercial grain?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I would not brand that at all. It would be known as stuff that would not brand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Even if there were some seeds of the kind my hon. friend states in the bag that would scarcely bring it within the penalty clause, if seeds of that kind did not make up any substantial portion.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Oh, yes. It is well known by any person engaged in the milling business that seeds of all descriptions are run into bran now, and it weighs heavy. Some of it is good seed, and some of it no use; but it makes weight, and is sold by the ton. During the past year there has been quite a large export of oats to the United States. They send feed oats to the United States. But in the United States they are not very particular about the quantity of noxious weed seeds there is in the oats, and I know some grain merchants of Winnipeg have made a business of putting seed in among the oats and sending it to the United States. When it comes to cheap food, it can be practised to a greater extent. Some of the men have made a lot of money by getting the screenings from elevators and selling it to the United States as feed oats.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not see the difficulty that presents itself to some members of the Committee. There are so many classes of oats; barley, wheat and all the rest of the stuff my hon. friend talks about will come under the heading of seeds. They grind up all the seed, and it is sold for chop, and some of it makes very good feed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Some of it is no good.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If you force the parties who manufacture that chop to put on the outside the brand saying 'This is a mixture of oats, etc.,' that will cover it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—What percentage?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—You might show what percentage it would be.

Hon. Mr. CURRY.—Would mill food not do it?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If you say 'food composed of commercial grain' it would answer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I point out, as has been pointed out to me by the hon. gentleman from Killarney, that that cannot possibly arise. Clause 149A reads as follows:

> 149A In this part, 'feed' means and includes the feeds or mixed means or other feeding products made from the entire grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, or flaxseed or other feeding stuffs, and the bran and middlings from wheat, rye, oats, peas, Indian corn, buckwheat, flax or sugar beet.

This clause gives the definition of food. All that we impose upon the dealer is that there shall be stamped upon the container which of these enter into the food, whether it be peas, wheat, rye, barley or oats, or a composition of them all. It is largely experimental. This is the first time we have had any legislation touching the question of feed of this character, and I have no doubt that after the law is set in motion experience may dictate possible improvements upon it. However, this session we thought that by the adoption of this law we might insure to the public getting a better class of feed than otherwise.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If you eliminate from clause 149A the word 'feeding stuff' it would make it all right. What is feeding stuff? Anything an animal may eat?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Do you propose not to allow them to sell anything taken from elevators as feed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If you cut out the word 'feeding stuff' you will then confine them to commercial grain. What are you going to do about this other stuff?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They will have to mark on the bag that they form part of the contents.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend suggested that they might put in there, one, or three per cent of oats, and forty or fifty per cent of tailings or seed, and by marking on the sacks that this contains wheat, oats and seeds, there would not be any protection to the public, because you would not force them to put on the bag what was in it. If you leave out feeding stuff, there would be no doubt about it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would it not preclude other feeds being sold?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If it were quite evident that something was being sold for food, which was not food, the vendor would be liable to a penalty.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You have a regular standard of grades of wheat, oats and barley, and your other food would be half-grade stuff and should be marked half-grade.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It might not be entirely half-grade.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You have all the other grades included in your first inspection. You have all those things separate, and they come under the Inspection Act, and printed as such.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—You have to make provision for seeds, because the largest portion of the feed that is sold in our country is the seeds that are grown up mixed with the half-grade grain, and if you did anything to prevent them selling that, it would be serious.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is it necessary to go into such particulars with respect to seed? As I understand, at the bottom of this page subclause (b) says that it shall be marked with the brand, weight and contents of the bag, sack or package. If you have to brand 'feed' on the bag, is it not sufficient?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—And there is more fraud in feed than any other article probably on the market. As our Chairman remarked the other day, feed was sold in his county that was practically worthless. Around a mill or elevator practically everything is run in as feed, all sorts of noxious weed seeds, some of it probably good feed for an animal, but others of no use at all, except for weight and sale. My learned friend from Killarney says that beans and peas are not mentioned here, but if you had commercial grading you would eliminate the noxious weed seeds, and they would be branded as half-grade stuff.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to the House the propriety of trying it for this coming year. It is a considerable stride in the right direction, and if it was found next year not to cover what we have in view, we will make further amendments.

The clause was adopted.

On 164-b:

164B The provisions of sections 164 and 164A of this Act shall not apply—

(a) when flour, meal, rolled oats, rolled wheat or feed is, in the presence of the purchaser, weighed and put into the barrel, half-barrel, bag, sack, or other package; nor—

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This clause was allowed to stand. It was pointed out it might be subject to abuse, but according to experience it is a valuable clause. I propose to add the word 'package' in subclause (a) the following:

In quantities not to exceed 200 pounds at any one time.

That permits a farmer to go into a mill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That is a small quantity.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will make it 500 pounds.

Hon. Mr. CURRY—I think it should be made a misdemeanour to sell seeds unless they are ground. We get so much seed in the land, and do not know until it comes up——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This Bill does not deal with that.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I suggest that 500 pounds is too small.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. leader is making a serious mistake by placing a limit to it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am willing to bring it up to the limit.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Hon. gentlemen will see the inconvenience of trying to arrive at a maximum. A farmer living at a distance from a mill this particular time of year, will go into a mill and get supplies for the whole of the spring work. That may be flour, feed and other things. Give him all the elbow room he requires.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is only a difference in the sack.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The man is standing right there alongside of the scales, and sees the whole transaction. He is satisfied before he leaves with what he has purchased. Do not go into details like that or you get into trouble from the very start. If there is going to be any crookedness a man is no safer under one plan than under the other.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Say a man wants to buy two or three sacks of feed; the only object is to allow him to use his own sacks. If he buys anything over a thousand pounds he takes the feed in sacks. It would not pay him to take the feed out of one sack and put it into another. It is only a matter of bringing sacks.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My hon. friend is endeavouring to impress us with the idea that if a man comes to a country mill to purchase feed he finds it stored in sacks. That is not the case. Feed is kept in bulk and when sold is put into the farmer's bags.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I do not see what objection there can be to the clause as it stands, and I do not see what fraud can be perpetrated. Any person purchasing feed at a mill can see it measured, but I do not see how it can be taken out and sold as bags outside, because under this Act the packages must be marked.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Will this clause prevent any person going in and buying and getting packed up whole lot of feed without having brands on the packages and taking it out and putting another label on it.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I do not see why anybody could not go to a mill and buy what amount he liked, but immediately he takes it out of the mill and offers it for sale he must have it stamped on the bag.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When this matter was up before the leader of the Government saw the objection to this paragraph (a) in its present shape, especially as it would lead, as the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert said, to the possibility of fraud. This article might be sent abroad even though the original purchaser was present if there were no marks or brands on the packages. Fraud might be perpetrated elsewhere—if the goods are exported, for instance. The suggestion of the leader of the House is a good one, that you fix a limit which is not likely to be exceeded by any ordinary farmer. I understand the leader to say that he would be willing to fix a limit of 2,000 lbs?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No farmer is likely to require to take away more than that at a time.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—A farmer never goes to get feed without bringing home more than a ton. Why should a man be restricted to buy new bags every time he buys feed for his stock? Many farmers in Ontario have enough cattle to use up a carload of feed, and if they have to get a new set of bags every time they buy a carload it would be a great hardship.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—In the majority of the little mills we have been discussing here, if a farmer takes a kind of gunny sack that holds four bushels of oats, they have not much value, and he can always trade them at the mill and get sacks already filled. But if you are going to allow any man to take a barrel and carry stuff out and put on the package some high flowing name with a stencil, it will give the country a black eye.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—If a man takes that out of a mill and attempts to put any high-faluting name on it, and not mark it as provided in this Act, he comes under the penalties of the Act. He cannot take it out of the mill and sell it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, the clause exempts him, 164 and 164(a):—that is to say they would not apply to such a case as that. It is for that reason we propose the restriction.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—That is quite right, it does not apply when a man goes in the mill; it does not apply when it is measured out in presence of the purchaser.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Clause 15 of the present Act reads thus:

15. The said Act is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 175:

175A. Every person who sells, offers for sale, or has in his possession for sale, any bag, sack or similar package of flour, meal, rolled oats, rolled wheat or feed, which is not marked in accordance with the requirements of section 164A of this Act, shall be liable, etc.

That is the suggestion my hon. friend makes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We except clause 164(a).

Hon. Mr. WATSON—To overcome the difficulties expressed by the hon. member from Prince Albert I suggest that we insert after the word 'purchaser' in line 6, the words 'and for his own use.' That would eliminate all the difficulties.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I would suggest 'In the presence of the purchaser or his agent.'

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The suggested amendment looks all right. How is a person to protect himself? He must have the affidavit or a bond from the man who buys that it is for his own use.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—No; if he is a liar we cannot help it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If there is a representation made to the miller, that removes any responsibility on his part.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I think that clause 15 protects you amply.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, I don't think it would, because we except the operation of 164(a) by this clause, and section 15 deals with 164(a).

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—You are dealing now with 164(a).

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, we are dealing with 164(b).

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Would you not make 164(a) apply as well as 164(b)?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, because clause 15 only deals with persons coming under 164(a). Such persons as come under 164(b) would not come under 164(a); we except them therefrom.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If clause 15 was made to apply—that is, that he should take the stuff home, and that if he would go to sell it he would come under clause 15—you would have the very object covered that these hon. gentlemen are suggesting.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think there is a more simple way of dealing with it; that is to say a farmer can go into a mill and buy for his own use all the feed he likes.

Clause adopted as amended.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Sub-clause (b) of 164B stands as it is.

The deputy minister says it is very essential that that should be left, for this reason, that where flour is sold for export to foreign countries, it would be unreasonable to say that that flour should be subjected to all the requirements of the Act respecting similar property sold in Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I must say that the hon. gentleman does not convince me. I think the thing really works just the other way. For the sake of the reputation of the flour and other products of grain, we should see that the articles which we export are as far as possible guaranteed. Now, why should you treat the products of the mills differently from the products of the fruit farms? You take the greatest care to provide that fruit shall be carefully inspected, that the barrels shall be branded with the exact quality of the fruit, and all that with the view of maintaining the reputation of Canadian fruit abroad. When it comes to Canadian flour or wheat why should we not take the same care?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—For this reason we do not mix fruit; we do not blend fruit.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We do not blend the grain; it is blended in the United States.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is the reason that it should be put up in packages without restrictions; without requiring that they should stamp upon the bag or package the quality or brand of the article. That is to say, there is an established practice among the millers, and especially of the United States, and also of other foreign countries, when flour reaches its point of destination it is blended with some of the softer products of other countries, and then that blend is exported to South America and elsewhere. This, for instance, was put in a Bill a couple of sessions ago at the instance of the late Senator Campbell, who pointed out that he and other Ontario millers shipped flour to New York merchants, and, after blending the same with their softer products, exported the same to South America and elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You do not blend flour.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why certainly you blend flour.

Hon. Mr. Young—I would like to ask what control you have over any brand the moment it leaves our own borders? They can do what they like with it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—You should force them to not use any Canadian brand on it.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—No, you can not.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If they brand them as Canadian flour and stuff it with all sorts of stuff, you are getting a bad reputation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I must say that I cannot understand the sympathy which the hon. gentleman shows for the people in the United States who blend flour and wheat. I do not think it is our duty to consider them particularly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We cannot enforce this law in a foreign country. Immediately a miller manufactures a product for exportation it goes beyond our jurisdiction and the purchasers do what they choose with it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is not that true also of fruit and other products? You insist that a barrel of apples shall be inspected and branded with the exact quantity of fruit in the barrel and that fruit is going outside of the country.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You cannot blend cheese, apples or anything of that kind. But here is an article out of which you make a blend.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But apples are blended. Inferior qualities of apples are mixed in a barrel with apples of a higher quality. The cases are on all fours. Only in this case the hon. gentleman seems to have considerable sympathy for people outside of the country.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—What is a blend of flour? It occurs after the flour is manufactured, and how do you blend it unless you reduce the quality of the flour. That is what they call blending—they want to reduce the quality of the flour.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not profess to be an expert in this kind of thing, but I understand we make in Canada a strong flour from our hard wheat. The flour manufactured in the United States is made from softer grain. By blending our flour with theirs they have a different product which may be very saleable in another country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Let the American who does the blending stamp the package in which the blended article is sold anyway he likes.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Suppose the barrels are branded with the name of the manufacturer, when it crosses the boundary line and gets into the hands of people there who wish to blend, I do not see how any law we can make can prevent them blending.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We cannot prevent it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Then what is the use of this legislation?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We do not want to handicap the Canadian manufacturer. The United States purchasers will use the flour as they please. The people of Canada get the advantage of manufacturing flour for a foreign consumer. Why not manufacture precisely what he wants? Now the branding of those packages with a particular brand, showing quality, etc., which we use for the protection of our own consumers, should not influence us in making provision for selling to a foreign consumer. If the foreign consumer does not want to be protected, why should we try to protect him?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. gentleman has not convinced me.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is one of the disappointing things in my life that I never can convince the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (E-2), An Act for the relief of Henry Elmer Bicknell.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

VESSELS TO PORT NELSON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired:

1. How many vessels were sent last year by the Government to Port Nelson?
2. What was the tonnage of each?
3. What were the names of these vessels?
4. Were they Canadian or American bottoms?
5. How many tons did each vessel land at Port Nelson?
6. What was the price per ton for such freight?
7. Were the vessels chartered by day or how?
8. Were bonuses paid besides per diem allowance?
9. What amount was paid to each vessel?
10. Were any of these vessels lost?
11. Is the Government responsible for the loss of these vessels, if any?
12. What is the total amount paid for the service of all these vessels to the 31st December, 1913?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. Six.

2. Cearense, tonnage 1,790 net register; Alcazar, tonnage 2,020 net register; Bonaventure, tonnage 467 net register; Bellaventure, tonnage 467 net register; Sindbad, tonnage 539 net register; Alette, tonnage 1,937 net register. Note: Besides the above, a small tug the Kathleen, of about 57 net tons, and an auxiliary schooner, the Neophyte of about 200 gross tons, were purchased last spring and taken in tow to Port Nelson in July last. These two craft did not carry any cargo and are used at Port Nelson for towing and lightering purposes. SS. Boethic, tonnage 1,140 registered.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. All the above vessels were British bottoms.

5. Alcazar, 275,050 feet hard pine; Bonaventure, 1,500 gross tons, two trips; Bellaventure, 1,000 gross tons, two trips; Sindbad, 1,100 gross tons, two trips; landed at Port Nelson 1,593¼ tons; delivered to C.G.S. Acadia 160 tons.

6. Bonaventure, chartered at a cost of $5,500 per month; Bellaventure, chartered at a cost of $5,500 per month; Sindbad, chartered at a cost of $4,500 per month; Cearense, chartered at a cost of $20 per M.F.B.M. lumber, $10 per ton for coal, $15 per ton for general cargo; Alcazar, chartered at a cost of $25 per M.F.B.M. lumber; Alette, chartered at a cost of $25 per M.F.B.M. lumber, $50 per cubic ton on two sectional steel scows.

7. Answered by No. 6.

8. No.

9. Cearense, $17,385.40; Bonaventure, $22,846.48; Alcazar, $22,437.50, freight charges, $9,000 demurrage; Bellaventure, $22,876.52; Sindbad, $13,390.90; Alette, $59,000.

10. Cearense grounded 14 miles from Port Nelson; Alette beached 3 miles from Port Nelson.

11. No.

12. $166,936.80.

HAMILTON DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION DROPPED.

The Order of the Day being called:

By the Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER:

March 18—That he will move that the proceeding had to-day, on the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce be considered for the purpose of rescinding the same.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I move that this Order of the Day be dropped.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. gentleman drop it for good ?

The SPEAKER—The hon. member drops the motion.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved:

That the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce be placed on the Orders of the Day for the consideration of the Senate to-morrow (Thursday).

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is my intention to move an amendment to this motion, but before doing so I desire to say a few words, and for once in my life I intend to compliment my hon. friend the chairman of this committee, because he has, in the last few days, reached a height which I do not think he himself ever thought he would attain. We know that in the centuries that have passed, wonderful progress has been made in science and art, and we know things have actually taken place that were looked upon in years gone by, as being the mere statements of dreamers. Hon. gentlemen who have read Jules Verne's 'Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea,' in which at that early day the author outlined the submarine vessels which we have to-day, will probably come to the conclusion that in Jules Verne's time that author would be considered a dreamer. It is the same thing all along the line with regard to other matters. Any one who would suggest such a thing as an automobile a hundred years ago would have been looked upon as a fit subject for an asylum. The same thing would apply to all modern inventions. Men have been employed for centuries on one wonderful invention which they have sought to bring to a successful issue. Many of these men so employed have ended their days in a madhouse, and others have dropped it, but it rests with the hon. gentleman who comes from that dear little island to which I claim my ancestors belonged——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Did they carry a game pouch ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—That dear little island which the hon. gentleman who makes this motion claims as the home of his ancestors, not only to bring fame to himself, but to that little island which gave his and my ancestors birth—I mean the little Emerald Isle. My hon. friend emigrated from Ireland and settled on the prairie in a city that sprung up like a mushroom, and not only is he going to bring fame to the country from which his people came, but he will also bring fame to that little town, growing on the prairie, called Brandon. My hon. friend has discovered what scientists and clever inventors for years and years have struggled to discover. I refer to that wonderful thing which is known as perpetual motion. My hon. friend has discovered perpetual motion, and he is trying to work it successfully in this House. He has kept this motion going for two or three years. I have read of the man who invented the glazing of crockery, and who was so anxious to bring the invention to a successful issue that he even took the furniture and bed from under himself and wife, and put it into a furnace in the course of his experiments. I do not know that my hon. friend the Chairman of the Divorce Committee has burned any furniture.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He is trying to.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—He is certainly trying to burn it; he is trying to bring this perpetual motion to a successful issue. He has kept this thing going, and I would point out that sometimes the wheel jogged a little bit; it jogged the other day. His friends, in supporting him are not very consistent at times. I thought the other day that I would like to have a little of the glory that is radiating about my hon. friend from Brandon, and I wanted to refer this matter back to the committee, but my hon. friend and the stalwarts that sit around him in this House said that it could not be done, that it could not be referred back, yet the very same day I find those hon. gentlemen moving to refer it back. My motion was to refer it back before the vote of this House should be taken; his motion ignores the vote of this House; he moves to refer it back whether this House has decided or not. I would not think of challenging the judgment of this House after it had once passed on a motion of that kind; when I made my motion the House had not decided at all, and I merely wanted to refer the question back in order to get some evidence. My hon. friend the Chairman of the committee, and the stalwarts around him, said 'No, it cannot be referred back;' and, lo, behold, we have a motion by this same consistent gentleman asking now to have it referred back. Does he tell the hon. members of this House that they were hypnotized; that they did not know what they were doing; that they were stupid, that there was any undue influence used on the vote of any gentleman of this House to cause him to vote the way he did the other day? He does not tell us that. Does he give a single reason why we should reverse the recent vote of the Senate? No; he simply says, 'I am the party who has carried perpetual motion to a successful issue, and I am going to make the wheel go round whether you like it or not.' That is the position he puts us in. Supposing that his resolution comes up for discussion to-morrow and carries, that he and his stalwarts behind him vote for it; it is within my right, if I am dissatisfied with that vote, to move a similar motion to his afterwards. I do not see why I should not to-morrow be dissatisfied with the vote of this House, if it goes against my convictions; my hon. friend is not satisfied when the vote of this House does not suit his. It all depends on whose ox is gored. Is this House to be made a play-toy, to satisfy the opinions of my hon. friend? I do not think it should be. I have just as good a right to challenge a vote taken in this House as has my hon. friend, and if I question the vote on his perpetual motion, and ask that it be reconsidered, I could give reasons why that vote might be challenged. Supposing I did that, in what position would that put my hon. friend, and his stalwart friends behind him? They would vote for this motion to-day, but they would vote against the same motion if it were moved by somebody else. That is consistency! Consistency, thou are a jewel! This matter has been decided upon three different occasions; surely on the third occasion my hon. friend ought to be satisfied.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The man on the street is commencing to wonder, and ask himself, 'Why has this hon. gentleman got such a wonderful interest in the case?' People are commencing to talk about it. He is bound to make you take your medicine. He says, 'I am going to force this through this House.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Well, he will have a good deal to do when he starts in with a proposition of that kind, and he will be mighty tired when he gets through with it. Two years ago this House voted this matter out; a year ago, on practically the same evidence, it voted it out, but there was some little new evidence and there was a shade of reason for bringing it before the House. This year there was no reason whatever. In its calm deliberation this House defeated that motion a year ago, and it was dead to all intents and purposes. The committee was dead after the House prorogued. There was no committee, and nothing else; but in defiance of the rules of this House my hon. friend brings the question in again and says, 'You people did not know what you were doing last year.' The House, on account of a ruling, to which I did not object, allowed my hon. friend to proceed this year without one title of evidence being taken before that committee. Any person had the right to go down there and cross-examine those witnesses this year, had they been summoned to appear before that committee—and I want to tell my hon. friend that if the committee had followed the proper procedure and had them examined according to law, according to the procedure of this House, I might have gone down and examined them, and I venture to say I would have got a different statement from some of those made last year. However, my hon. friend brought this matter before the House and it was decided here again the other day; all that was possible was done by those lobbyists, and by people who were frightening members from casting their votes by telling them they had no right to take part in this or that. In spite of all those things the vote of the House went against my hon. friend. Now surely he ought to have stopped; when does he intend to stop? If my hon. friend carried this motion to-morrow, I would be within my right in moving to reconsider it, and if he beat me it would be kicked back and forward like a football, until this House would be held up to ridicule from one end of this country to the other.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is pretty near time that this thing should stop, and I intend to move an amendment that the word 'Thursday' be eliminated, and that the words 'This day six months' be inserted in its place, so that the motion will read:

That the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce be placed on the Orders of the Day for the consideration of the Senate this day six months.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is seldom in the history of Parliament, very seldom, that such a pitiful spectacle has been presented over a broad expanse of territory like Canada as this which we have before us to-day. Hunting a wild beast to its lair is no comparison whatever to the action of the Divorce Committee and of the Chairman of the Divorce Committee hunting a poor mother, wounded, bleeding from every pore, to her lair at home with her children, hunting her for her lifeblood, for her honour which is more than her lifeblood. The Chairman of the Divorce Committee comes here unauthorized—I use the word deliberately—and for the fourth time calls on Parliament to reverse its decision, of three consecutive years, honourably acquitting a wife and mother. By what right did the Chairman of the Divorce Committee put that notice on the Order Paper? Where did he get his authority? Who authorized him? Was it the petitioner? No, he had not time to communicate. Was it the committee? No, he had no time to assemble the committee and gets its authorization. On his own responsibility he puts a notice of that kind on the Order Paper of Parliament. What does the hon. gentleman take the Senate for? Is he the attorney for the petitioner? Answer the question. If he is not, he is doing it gratis; he is doing it well, and probably better than a paid attorney. Does he act as a lawyer? Does he know that an attorney cannot act without instructions from his client? Does he know that the chairman of a committee of this hon. House cannot act without instructions from the committee of which he is chairman? Where did he get his instructions? From the petitioner? Impossible, because the motion was sneaked in at the last moment when the House was getting empty, after an adverse vote against his report, and put on the Order Paper. He got no sanction from the petitioner, no instruction; he got no sanction from the committee, and still he sits there complacently and brazens the situation out. It puts me in mind of what he told me one day here two years ago on a similar question, probably the same one —who was I that dare face the Chairman of the Divorce Committee? Did not the hon. senator from Victoria know that his grandfather carried his game pouch when he went hunting squirrels in the bogs of Ireland? I remember that very well, and I remember the hon. gentleman threw that in my teeth, thinking it was an insult. I do not take these insults as insults, coming from the quarters they do. According to his own dictation the hon. gentleman is a delightful Irish gentleman, the descendant of a Dutch officer, who came over to Ireland and stole our lands, our churches, our monastries, our abbeys, and the peasant's home; it would be no wonder if my poor grandfather did happen to carry his game pouch. I have tried to find out the real facts of the case, but in Ireland the records of these things are pretty well suppressed, and I have come to the conclusion that probably the statement of the hon. senator for Brandon, that my grandfather carried his game pouch, is correct. I have to admit it for want of evidence to the contrary. Thank God my ancestors left a descendant who is able to take the pouch from him and deliver the game where it belongs. He cannot hunt in Canada the same as he hunted squirrels in Ireland, and he cannot get my grandfather to carry his pouch any more, because he is dead. He cannot get me to carry his game pouch and put a woman in it, as the result of his hunt. There is the position of the Chairman of the Divorce Committee, as compared with my position; I leave it to the country to decide which is more noble or manly. I do not look for his vote nor for the vote of the 17 or 18 stalwarts behind him. I would like some of the 17 hon. members behind him to put a little heart into their judgment in deciding these questions. Think of these 18 stalwarts hunting this poor woman to death after she has been honourably acquitted, by the Parliament of her country, for three consecutive years. Let hon. gentlemen read the pagan history of ancient times, or modern history, and find a parallel case where a woman has been hunted to death by the Parliament of a country for three consecutive years. And here the Chairman of the Divorce Committee asks us to stab her while she is bleeding. Hon. members cannot find a parallel for this. Let hon. gentlemen apply it to themselves. Let us suppose I have a daughter, that she has been honourably acquitted by Parliament of the charges laid against her, and that for the fourth time an appeal is made to deface her character and blacken her life. How many of the stalwarts would vote against me if I asked them to save that daughter, especially after three acquittals? Put one of their own daughters in the dock and how many of the 18 would vote to destroy the fame, the name, and the honour of that daughter? Not one. Why should these 18 stalwarts trample on the heart of the bleeding woman who is living only for her children, who for the past five years has been earning her honest living in the metropolis of the continent in the United States. Look at it from nature's point of view, and not from a point of view of divorce—because it is no longer a question of divorce but of downright persecution. There have been martyrs in the past; girls and women have been thrown to the lions in the den of the amphitheatre; women have been burned to death at the stake. Joan of Arc was put on a funeral pyre and burned to death. I venture to say that these hon. gentlemen have done worse than the ancient barbarians—worse than the priests and the bishops of France who burned Joan of Arc—having that woman coming here on her knees praying for the protection of her children. If that is not martyrdom I should like to know what martyrdom is. When people are burned at the stake they only suffer a few minutes and life becomes extinct, but this poor woman is kept on the grill and turned over from side to side. Is there no heart in the eighteen stalwarts? Can hon. gentlemen not see her there grilling under their votes, and all for the sake of her beloved children. She has a daughter nineteen years old, and I am informed that she is one of the most beautiful girls on the continent of America; she is living for that daughter and her other children. Yet hon. members want to hand down to that girl the shame of being the daughter of a disreputable woman—and this after three honourable acquitals. It is hard to believe. The Chairman of the Divorce Committee asks us to vote on a report containing the evidence of last year, and the year before. The chairman is a lawyer. Does he fully appreciate the proposition he makes to Parliament and the country? If he does not, he should resign and return home. He asks the final court of appeal to reverse its judgment on the evidence given a year ago. Would the hon. gentleman dare go before the Privy Council of England and ask the Lords of the Privy Council to reverse a decision on a musty document? No. his place would be in the tower. We are opposed to this motion for reconsideration on the grounds so well pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert that there is no new evidence and no new investigation. The chairman dare not open the investigation afresh. There is only one witness against the honour of Mrs. Hamilton, the daughter of a leading citizen of Ottawa for fifty years, who was the personal medical attendant of Sir John Macdonald, belonging to one of the finest families in Canada. I shall take the word of Mrs. Hamilton every time in preference to that of a half-breed servant. That is the difference between the chairman of the committee and myself. They take the word of a half-breed, a squaw, against the word of a lady. There is no other evidence, except that of the attorney in the case, who made the most valuable document disappear, or allowed it to disappear, and who is now Solicitor General of Canada. The only evidence for the petitioner is given by the half-breed servant in that house, who refused to leave when she was ordered by Mrs. Hamilton, and who said: 'You cannot put me out, unless Mr. Hamilton tells me to leave.' That is the thing that the Divorce Committee believes in preference to a lady like Mrs. Hamilton, the daughter of a family honourably known in this Dominion. A gentleman said to me: 'They may thank their stars that Dr. Church is not alive. Why, he would shoot them. He would not allow his daughter's honour to be trailed in the dirt.' If the investigation is to be reopened, what will happen? I do not take shelter behind my parliamentary privilege—I am prepared to state outside of Parliament, on the street or in the press, that for two years this half-breed servant was kept by the petitioner in his house under the guise of a servant—not for the past six months, but for two years before that. My information is up to about six months ago. For two years this half-breed has harboured men in the petitioner's house. Does the chairman of the committee understand what I am saying? She is nothing but a strumpet of the worst kind, harbouring men until one, two, three and four o'clock in the morning at Mr. Hamilton's house in Quebec. What do you think of that—giving Mr. Hamilton's best wine, cake and chickens to drunkards, loafers and prostitutes? Does the chairman hear that? Remember I am making the statement without sheltering or shielding myself behind the privilege of Parliament. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to reopen the investigation? Is he prepared to accept the fact that this half-breed furnished money to men of that character, and kept them? Perhaps I am giving him too much information, but if he knows nothing, why does he act? I am acting because I know; because I feel; because I think—three reasons. What has he to say; what has the committee to say? Are they asking us to plunge the knife into the heart of a woman under these circumstances? Shame! Oh, you eighteen, over there, break up your ranks and give the poor woman, the mother of four children, a woman who has been hunted to her lair, a chance. If you do not give her a chance, give her children a chance. An adverse vote to hurl that woman down may come down on your families with tremendous force. Beware! It takes generations for the sins of the father to be visited on the children. It took three generations for me to vindicate my ancestor against the charge of the hon. gentleman from Brandon. Beware of a vote against a poor woman. Break up that solid eighteen. Be men. Our votes on this side are cast through the conscientious conviction that this woman is entitled to what Parliament has given her for three years consecutively.

Now I shall make a very serious statement. I thoroughly dissent from and repudiate the attitude assumed by the hon. member from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) in regard to this question of divorce. I repudiate the attitude of my hon. friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) who finds it easy to vote for the recommendation of the committee, and then reserves to himself the right to vote against this recommendation when the Bill comes up. I repudiate most distinctly the declaration made by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), and I do so on behalf of my faith and the church to which I belong—and I know whereof I speak. When the hon. gentleman from Ottawa declared that a Catholic was incompetent to judge evidence in a divorce case, he made a declaration that is derogatory to an honest citizen, and especially to a Catholic. I was cradled in the Catholic doctrine. I was cradled at the knees of cardinals, the most illustrious that France produced in a hundred or two hundred years—Cardinal Hebert, of Paris, and Cardinal Richard. I have been for three years their personal attendant, and know what the Catholic doctrine is. I have been trained at the foot of the Papal throne under Pope Pius IX., the most illustrious Pope that Christianity has ever had since the days of Peter. He is the only one that outlived the time of Peter on the Papal throne, so when I talk I know whereof I speak; and I learned this the Church of Rome does not interfere in any matters outside of the Ten Commandments and the Doctrine of Christ; all other subjects that come under or within the domain of the public representative bodies of the different nations of the world are left supreme within these bodies. Rome has nothing to do with them, because Rome has learned to put in practice Christ's declaration in regard to the administration of the affairs of this world—"Give unto Cæsar what belong to Cæsar, and give unto God what belongs to God." These are the principles which I imbibed at the feet of cardinals and the Pope. There is no man who can stand on the floor of this House or on the hustings of this country and tell me that I am subservient in matters of state, in matters of politics, in matters of public weal, to any other power than that of the popular will. I take my religion from Rome, but I take my politics from home. That is my stand, and I wish our good friends—they will be good friends in six years from this—will take heed of these things and not be sending the Pope to hell every time they have a chance to say so. I am in receipt of correspondence from a gentleman of high education and high culture, but unfortunately he did not have the courage to put his signature to the letter. That letter is well written, and could not be done by any ordinary mortal, and he winds up a very flattering letter in regard to Sir Edward Carson and such matters, with this declaration: 'To hell with the Pope and God save the King.' The letter is from Toronto. Now, I would like our Orange friends to understand once and for all—that we are under no dictation, as this gentleman put it, from the Papacy, from the Pope, or from any one. Why, your humble servant—notwithstanding being a staunch and loyal Catholic—has been denounced more than any man from the altars of his own church. I have been openly and by name denounced by the highest clergy in the Dominion of Canada because I was a Liberal. The poor Archbishop of Ottawa, now dead and gone, wrote a pastoral letter and sent it to thirteen parish priests in the county of Prescott declaring it would be a mortal sin were any elector in Prescott county to vote for me. Just imagine the effect of that on a densely Catholic population, and a thoroughly sincere one. I am not talking out of the record, because some of his own parish priests and among the canons, his advisers, declined to read the pastoral from their pulpits. I have been denounced by a parish priest whose name will charm the ear of the ex-Grand Master of the Orange Lodge, one of his dearest and best friends, one of the noblest and purest priests that ever stepped to the altar—but a Tory. Does Sir Mackenzie Bowell remember Father Dow? Was he not a good friend of his, and of Sir John Macdonald, and of the late Hon. J. J. Curran? Did he not control all the Irish Catholic vote? Ah, you do remember that! That was in 1886 and 1887, when I was a candidate in Montreal. He was a good friend of yours, Sir Mackenzie, and you never went to Montreal, without going and calling on Father Dow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh yes, I did.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Very seldom, without calling on him—you and Curran; three pillars of the State. You must admit that it is the fact, because I was there, I was an altar boy at the time, and I know all about it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, you don't.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I had to put up with denunciations by a most esteemed friend of mine, a gentleman, a parish priest of St. Joseph's, six feet four tall; he went out of his way to come to St. Anthony's parish and denounced me openly from the altar.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Sensible for once.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They are all dead; I am still alive; and the most of those who denounced me in the Senate, seven, eight, and ten years ago, are also dead. I am still alive; I am not bragging of it, but God help the man that hits me wrongfully, that is all I have got to say; I shall take care of myself whether it takes one, two, or three generations; and if I were not able to answer the senator from Brandon, Chairman of the Divorce Committee, Senator Kirchhoffer, I have boys left yet who will be able to answer him—if it takes four, or six, or seven generations. Now, gentlemen, there is the position of the divorce case, and my position. I am completely independent in regard to these matters. As I have already pointed out, I never took part in a divorce case except on the merits of the evidence; I judge it from a legal point of view. I am a competent witness—notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman from Ottawa has said—in all cases that come before this hon. House, and I feel myself able to weigh evidence. My life has been passed in weighing, examining and revising evidence in the greatest criminal trials that have taken place in this country, from murder down, and never have I as a Crown Prosecutor asked the jury to condemn a man simply because he was in the dock, as some prosecutors do, owing to zeal. If I had the least doubt in my mind as to a man's guilt, I was man enough, notwithstanding my position as officer of the Crown, to tell the jury that there was no case. That was my attitude when I was only a boy, when I was Crown Prosecutor of the city of Montreal thirty years ago, a district of nearly a million people. I stand here merely for justice. I stand here pleading for pity and mercy. Shall I be obliged to use another word before this hon. House? It is almost an insufferable position to be in; how humiliating it is to plead with one's own colleagues on the same plane, for pity and mercy on behalf of a suffering woman, and on behalf of children clinging to her. Where are the hearts of hon. gentlemen? Let their hearts bleed with hers, and let them cast their vote in the stain of that blood, and not according to the lobbying that has been going on here for the past few weeks.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was adopted:

The SPEAKER—The question is now on the motion, as amended.

Several hon. GENTLEMEN—The same division reversed.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—No, let us take the vote.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Take down the names.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—But the motion has been carried.

The SPEAKER—The question now is that the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration of this Senate this day six months.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—But the Senate has decided that the report is not to be taken into consideration until this day six months.

The SPEAKER—I am putting the motion as amended.

The motion was adopted by the following vote:

Gordon,

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I wish to state that I voted under protest. The amendment putting off the main motion for six months having been carried, in my opinion the main motion cannot be considered for six months. Therefore the vote on the main motion is irregular.

The SPEAKER.—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The amendment was not to strike out all the words in the main motion, but only the last part, and to insert certain words so that the main motion must now be put as amended.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (W), An Act for the relief of Walter James Liscombe.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (J), An Act to amend The Inspection and Sale Act.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Bill (L), An Act respecting a certain patent of Rudolph Goldschmidt.—Hon. Mr. Belcourt.

Bill (K), An Act respecting a certain patent of Thomas Leopold Willson.—Hon. Mr. Belcourt.

Bill (48), An Act to incorporate The Peace River Tramway and Navigation Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill D), An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—As the hon. senator from Grandville has brought this matter to the attention of Parliament, it is my intention at the present moment to leave it in his hands, to reply to the deliverance of our young hon. friend from Halifax, Senator Dennis. I moved the adjournment on two occasions out of sympathy with the hon. senator who has been so sorely afflicted in his family relations. It was my intention as I had promised, to take his scalp as well off his head as I could, but I do not feel under the circumstances that I should attempt the operation, as there would be very little of the scalp left to get off. It reads as a clever deliverance from a literary point of view, a schoolboy point of view; it was well written, well gotten up, well read; but its contents were something like the articles published in the Halifax Herald, of which he is the owner, and proprietor. They are always well written, but oh, the amount of villainy in the writing—what amount of slander, what amount of calumny, what vituperation, under the clever writing. I digested the speech, and in accordance and agreement with my hon. friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), I came to the conclusion that the deliverance in question was more or less of a joke. The more I heard it read to me—because I cannot see to read very well—the more I thought I was on the rocky shore of Nova Scotia. My daughter told me she was reading 'Hansard,' but I replied, 'No, my child, you are not reading 'Hansard'; that is the Halifax Herald you are reading.' And finally, when I woke up, I found truly it was the 'Hansard,' but I would have almost sworn, and I would swear, to-day, if I did not see it in the 'Hansard,' that it was a true editorial article from the Halifax Herald. I do not want to have the hon. senator think that I deride his ability—in fact I dread his ability—but he is putting it to such nauseous use. There is not a public man on this side of the House, or throughout the country, whom his paper has not villified, calumniated, and slandered—and always with morality. The hon. gentleman thinks that morality is bound up in the sixth commandment. Widen your knowledge senator! Morality consists in observing the whole ten commandments; don't slander, don't lie; don't steal, be obedient to your parents; keep the Sabbath; don't blaspheme, don't go for another man's wife—the same as you tried to give another man the right to go for another man's wife. That is morality. And does the Halifax Herald keep up the standard of the ten commandments? Not as far as I have read.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They have not a copy of the ten commandments in the office.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They keep the eleventh. What pays goes, and the junior member for Halifax has evidently profited by the sale of that kind of literature. But I have said that I do not intend to take his scalp off to-day. I shall leave that to my hon. friend the senator from Grandville, who has proposed the measure, and who has brought it in with the sanction of the best thinking people of the country. The whole bookselling association of the Dominion is behind him in this matter, so under the circumstances I shall reserve any further remarks I have to make until the third reading, and allow my hon. friend the senator from Grandville, the floor; I have no doubt he will do the question justice.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I was hoping that some of the hon. senators would have something to say on this measure before the second reading was proposed, and, I hope, adopted. I will now say a few words in reply to what has been said by the honourable the junior senator from Halifax. I do not intend to be as severe upon him as my hon. friend who preceded me has been, because his speech has gone abroad, and has been his worst punishment. We have not seen any endorsation of his remarks except by a few weekly papers which have been publishing the same class of literature at times, if not constantly. Naturally the Halifax Herald endorses him, but I am sure that when we heard the speech of the hon. gentleman it did not occur to anybody that it was a speech of the junior senator from Halifax so much as a speech of the editor and proprietor of the Halifax Herald. He made an astute address and put himself in the position of a defendant. I heard two or three hon. gentlemen applaud him as he sat down, but they applauded him not as the senator from Halifax, but as a rather clever lawyer who was defending a bad case. I shall discuss one or two points in his speech which struck me most, in order to show how mistaken he is, and how far he is from expressing the opinion of the people of this country, the majority of whom favor this amendment to the criminal law. It is always better to avoid exaggeration and adhere to common sense, and surely we all admit that my hon. friend is too intelligent not to understand that he has gone far beyond his purpose, and far beyond mine. He began his speech by saying:

> This Bill proposes to cover with odium the 1,200 newspaper publishers of Canada—and ten times the number of news dealers and booksellers for the manner in which they have conducted their business in the past. It proposes to make criminals of them:

Further he says:

> To heap insult and opprobrium on the 1,200 newspaper publishers and many thousands of booksellers and newsdealers of Canada.

And still further he asks:

> But who I should like to know who asked for this measure: what public body? Has any one heard of any public agitation or even seen the petition for it?

Beginning with the first point, I shall read over again what I read at the close of his speech, the letter I received from the secretary of the Dominion Board of the Retail Merchants Association of Canada—from these booksellers that my hon. friend thinks will be condemned as criminals if the Bill comes in force:

> I have just received a copy of the Bill introduced by you entitled Bill (D) an Act to amend the Criminal Code, and I desire on behalf of the booksellers and stationers section of the Retail Merchants Association of Canada that this Bill meets with the hearty approval of all the honest and respectable booksellers and stationers throughout Canada.

So these very men whom he undertakes to defend in this House, are the first to repudiate his statements, and to say that the Bill has the hearty approval of the association. From this we may judge of all the rest. Now he says, who asked for this Bill? I have received dozens, I might say hundreds, of letters from every part of this country, applauding the Bill, expressing the hope that it would become law, and condemning in terms which I should not like to read in this House, the speech of my hon. friend from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—Don't be afraid. Read them:

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—But I shall read one from a gentleman in Halifax, whom the hon. member knows very well, who has been on the bench of the Supreme Court of Halifax, N.S., for twenty-four years. He writes:

Halifax, March 18, 1914.

My Dear Senator,—I desire to thank you most cordially for the effort you made to check the publication of the pictures of those accused of serious crime, and I earnestly hope you will be successful during the passage of your proposed Bill.

He gives a lot of reasons, which are about the same as those found in an article in the Acadian Recorder, Halifax, and he concludes in this way:

I have had over eighteen years experience at the bar. I have been on the bench twenty-four years, and I feel that I am qualified to speak on this subject. May God speed you in this most necessary work is my most earnest wish.

There is a gentleman who has been on the bench for twenty-four years, and this is what he says about this Bill. Part of his letter is referring to my hon. friend, and I should not like to put before the House the expression that he uses, which is a little severe.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—The hon. gentleman does not know the man personally.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I shall also quote from a letter from Mr. Adam Ballantyne, Hamilton, condemning the yellow papers, and praying God that my Bill will become law. So much for the association and the prominent people who have asked for this Bill. Now I will deal with the press. In discussing this question I thought it better to present the view of disinterested par- this House clippings from most of the country, rather than to put forth my own views, but as my hon. friend has made a special point, that there was no demand for the Bill, it is important to put before this House clippings from most of the prominent papers, not only in this country but in the United States. Perhaps that will surprise the hon. gentleman from Halifax, who is praying for the liberty of the press, and who is praying that the booksellers will not become criminals; the clippings are all to the same effect. I shall quote first the Acadian Recorder, a paper published in his own province. I refer to the issue of Saturday, March 14, 1914. This article reads as follows:

A Worthy Move.

The Senate has once more justified its existence by paying serious attention to a practice among newspapers which has become an abuse serious to public morals. Senator Choquette a short time ago introduced a Bill to punish as a crime the publication of pictures of murderers and other criminals, together with their accomplices. Senator Dennis opposed the Bill, considering the practice as 'perfectly proper, legitimate and harmless.'

Senator Choquette showed both sound sense and sound morality in his defence of the Bill. The featuring, the illustrating and the sensationalizing of crimes and those who commit them no matter how repulsive and squalid their character, constitute an offence against morals and justice which only the unfortunate universality of the practice has hitherto prevented any full expression of condemnation. Very few capital crimes have anything whatever about them either heroic or romantic. Practically all of them are merely repulsive exhibitions of drunkenness, and crude beastiality, their common accompaniments being mental or emotional degeneracy. Yet, day after day, newspapers will print the pictures of the murderer, the robber, the fire bug or the assaulter, together with those of the victims, their relatives, and 'his cousins, and his uncles and his aunts.'

The sin of the criminal is between himself and his maker; his crime is between himself and the law. Neither is between him and the newspaper reporter. 'Butchered to make a Roman holiday' was an old Roman method of providing sensation. A whole family circle tortured, held up to obliquy and disgraced, to provide sensational gossip and excitement for the public; such is the modern method. Is it less brutal?

The evil is universal, and it would be to the abounding honour of Canada if the first steps in the correction thereof were taken by a Canadian legislature.

This article shows the spirit which prevailed there, and it proves that in the province of my hon. friend proprietors of papers are in favour of the Bill. I read also from the Republican, of Springfield, Mass., March 16, 1914, as follows:

The liberties of the press have been attacked from many quarters of late, but the most curious proposal has been made in the Canadian Senate by Senator Choquette, who would make it a penal offense for a newspaper to publish pictures of persons accused of crime or their accomplices.

I observe from this that the editor of this paper is between the two opinions, but the spirit of the article is rather in favour of the Bill. The article proceeds:

The immediate inspiration seems to have come from the multitudinous pictures of Thaw and persons concerned in the Thaw case, the exploitation of which is certainly cause for disgust. But as Senator Dennis observed, to eliminate the pictures would not help so long as the newspapers were free to publish sensational reports which appeal to the morbid even more than the mere portraits of the characters concerned. He went rather far in saying that 'such a law would wrench Canada from the category of civilized nations.' A nation can be thoroughly civilized without printing pictures of murderers in the public prints. But it would be a very absurd and footless law, useless so far as morals are concerned, and a handicap to justice in the occasional cases where the wide diffusion of the likeness of a fugitive makes his escape more difficult. And at times the publication of the portraits of offenders in high places is a powerful instrument for reform; such a law would have made a felon of Thomas Nast for his cartoons attacking Boss Tweed and his gang.

We see that this American paper is in favour of the Bill and of repressing the publication of pictures. I am willing to amend the Bill in committee and to have it prohibit also the publication of the details of crime as well. I sent to the editor of this paper copies of my Bill so that he can see that when it is necessary to publish the pictures of criminals in the interest of justice, he can apply to the court and obtain permission to do so. In that case it would be a lesson against crime. Those who see the picture will say, 'Here is the photograph of a criminal, there is a reward for his capture. The officers of justice are looking for him,' and they will have no sympathy for the man when they see his picture in the paper. Sometimes there is sympathy for a criminal, and people hide him in their houses, but when the pictures are published in the papers by the authority of justice it will be a condemnation of the man, and he will not be regarded as a hero.

We see by these papers, one from Halifax and one from the United States, that they are for the Bill. Now take La Patrie, of Montreal. On the 13th of this month La Patrie had an article entitled 'The Picture of Criminals'—a long article condemning the senator from Halifax for his speech, and condemning him very strongly. The article is as follows:

PORTRAIT OF CRIMINALS.

The Bill presented by the Honourable Senator Choquette, aiming at prohibiting the publication of the portraits of persons accused of a criminal offence, deserved a better fate than the remarks, replete with irony and inexactitude, made by his colleague, the Hon. Mr. Dennis. The latter commits an historical error in stating that, should the Choquette Bill become law, any newspaper proprietor mignt be sentenced to two years imprisonment for having published the portrait of Joan of Arc. The learned Senator forgets that Joan of Arc has been solemnly rehabilitated.

The Choquette Bill has but one fault, that of being of a delicate and difficult application; but its usefulness cannot be denied.

It does not in the least endanger the liberty of the press, liberty which should yield to questions of public interest, and be submitted to the exigencies of national and social defence.

The reporting of crimes, the publication of protraits of criminals, the fuss made about 'cases' have had the effect of inducing to crime many young men desirous of being talked about. There is no doubt about this fact, it has been established and verified, for a number of years, in the great centres of the American continent. Should the day come when, without reducing the publicity necessary to allow the accused all needed guarantees, justice will limit the reporting of criminal affairs, society will be more than it is at present, shielded from jobs put up by persons whom the exploits of Mandrin and Cartouche, and the morbid publicity given to them, has led out of the right path.

It is not an argument to say that the measure supported by Senator Choquette, is not applied in any other country. Methods of social purification never present themselves in the form of international legislation, and if Senator Dennis had studied his subject, without going as far back as Joan of Arc, and without searching into foreign codes, he would have found out that in Canada, in the province of Quebec, the French papers voluntarily, in the public interest, have suppressed the publication of portraits of criminals.

I shall now read an article from La Verité, of Quebec, published last week, under the heading of 'Muzzling the Yellow Papers,' applauding the Bill, and hoping it would become law. The article is as follows:

THE GAG ON YELLOW JOURNALISM.

Hon. Senator Choquette has presented in the Senate a Bill which has our hearty approval, together with all honest and Christian spirited persons.

It is proposed to suppress the publication and advertisement given in the papers to crimes and criminals.

It is known by experience that the newspapers, in publishing the portraits of criminals, in placing their names in evidence, and in laying before the public a detailed and illustrated report of their crimes, have developed an atmosphere tending to the glorification of murders and assassinations.

It is with the object of placing the gag on yellow journalism that Senator Choquette has presented his bill to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Now let us see the Ottawa Citizen.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—Before you come to Ottawa, you might mention the Montreal Gazette's headlines describing it as an idiotic Bill.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Perhaps the word 'idiotic' would rather apply to what you said against the Bill. The Ottawa Citizen had two articles, on the 17th and 19th insts., condemning most forcibly the speech of my hon. friend, hoping the Bill would become law. The Citizen takes my hon. friend to task for his championship of some kinds of freedom. Here is the first article:

Now Senator Dennis is a champion of some kinds of freedom. Not, of course, freedom of trade: that would be unpatriotic. But he believes the press should be free— to a certain extent. He would give a paper full liberty to entertain its readers with pictures of persons accused of crime. But the new champion of freedom is not so reckless as to advocate entire liberty. He would draw the line somewhere. In fact he is not too sure about some of the dangerous liberties taken in the press at the present time about the senators. Those scurrilous rascals called cartoonists, for instance, would not be over safe if Senator Dennis had his way.

But the Citizen of the 17th inst. published a most important article as follows:

Lionizing Criminals.

Senator Choquette's Bill regarding the pictures of persons accused of crime, or their accomplices, has been described as a gross interference with the liberty of the press. The measure before the Senate would forbid a practice already abandoned by some newspapers and periodicals: the featuring of crime pictures for the supposed edification or enlightenment of the general public. The spread of education must ultimately create a distaste and a pronounced objection to pictorial reminders of the morbid and gruesome in the world. The demand for such pictures now is largely catered to by a certain syndicate with headquarters in New York. To prohibit their publication might be seriously to interfere with vested interests. But there is much to be said in favour of Senator Choquette's Bill. To publish broadcast the pictures of people accused of crime may mean the infliction of untold misery upon many innocent people: torturing not only the accused person, who may be innocent, but giving pain to relative and friends, and tending to prejudice the chances of the accused. In Britain there is a decadent type of illustrated journal, largely filled with pictures taken in the vicinity of jails, law-courts, and crime scenes; and it is not uncommon to see a picture published showing some unhappy woman trying to shield herself from the camera, by placing her hand before her face. Such pictures are a blot on British journalism. Where the criminal is a moral pervert, a reversion back to remote and barbarous ancestry, there is no good purpose in glorifying him by publishing his picture: as well publish the picture of an imbecile. Lionizing the criminal is to deliberate incitement to other atavistic persons to commit crime. Senator Dennis is reported to have objected to the Bill because it might prohibit the publication of pictures of Joan of Arc, Papineau, Louis Riel, Parnell, General Villa, Keir Hardie, James Larkin, and other offenders against the law. There should be no question of the liberty of the press to publish pictures of heroes—and, to many people, revolutionary leaders may be heroes. But in so far as Senator Choquette's bill will save innocent or helpless people from painful publicity, or discourage morbid sensationalism, it will not interfere with the freedom of the enlightened press. Newspapers aiming to cater to the best in human nature have abandoned the practice voluntarily.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE.

I repeat that the Citizen, which I may consider the organ of the Government in Ottawa, champions the Bill and goes pretty strongly for my hon. friend. Now take L'Action Sociale from Quebec, an ultramontane paper, which had an article entitled 'Heads of Criminals,' a very strong article approving of the Bill, expecting that the Bill would become law. The article is as follows:

HEADS OF CRIMINALS.

One of the strong arguments used by the opponents of the bill presented to the Senate, to prevent yellow papers from making capital from the publication of pictures of criminals, was that such publications assisted the ends of justice in facilitating the arrest of the culprits.

Current events are now rapidly destroying this argument.

It is a well known fact that certain large newspapers, especially in Montreal, make use and abuse of the opportunity offered to them to boom their circulation by exciting the morbid curiosity of the masses. Every day, they are not content with publishing columns of rubbish on the probable adventures of criminals, but they very often give prominence to their photographs,—or what is supposed to be their photograph,—for these papers are not very particular about likenesses, and it is very often anybody's photograph, which is published on the first page of yellow papers, with the name of Mr. So and So or Mrs. So and So.

Have they assisted the ends of justice? Not in the least. But on the contrary, they have greatly embarassed it, and if the police is today out manoeuvred by criminals, it is due mostly to the supposed assistance of the yellow press.

In fact, in every part of the country, the good old gossips, who delight in the prose of ingenious and exaggerating reporters, have kept the pictures of criminals. If any individual passes along the road, they become suddenly suspicious, and with the help of their imaginations they become easily convinced that it is Bourret or his fugitive accomplice. Confusion is the easier, because if we refer to the pictures published, we find they look like almost anyone. And that is the reason why, at every hour of night and day, police stations are startled by mysterious communications, and by sudden and urgent calls; and that accounts for the constables being on the run night and day. . . . . to find the game has flown.

What happened, centuries ago, to the little boy, in the fable, who shouted: 'Wolf' will happen again. The culprits will have time to reach the frontier, while the police is answering the calls of subscribers to yellow papers. Such are the services rendered to the public by those papers, when they use pictures of criminals as an advertisement.—'Action Sociale', 21st March 1914.

My hon. friend will remark that this article not only condemns the publication of the pictures of criminals on moral grounds, but condemns it also because it is very often against the interests of justice. This has recently been shown in Montreal, where policemen were murdered, and though the picture of the murderers have been published nearly every day for ten days, they cannot be found, because, fearing to be recognized on the streets or the railways, they hide themselves. They cannot be found though a big reward is offered for their apprehension. This is another argument, and a good one, against the marked publication of pictures, except, as according to my Bill, with the assent of proper authorities.

My hon. friend a moment ago said, 'Take the Gazette.' I was just going to, because I have got the headings here. When the Bill was presented the Montreal Gazette put in a sarcastic article about the yellow papers.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—Very sarcastic.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Very sarcastic against those who publish yellow papers. The article, however, did not say a word for or against the Bill. When the Bill was presented there were speeches in the House, especially I think by the senior member from Halifax and the hon. member from Victoria Division, in which they paid compliments to the Gazette as not being a yellow paper. The Gazette naturally reproduced these compliments the next day, but it never condemned the Bill and never approved of it, the paper apparently not having the courage of its convictions. If the Bill is good why should not the Gazette approve of it? That paper is supposed to be a respectable paper, and I am willing to admit it is a respectable paper, a very good paper, well edited, well printed, but very doubtful on some questions. Even on the mayoralty question in Montreal just now it is very doubtful on which side the Gazette is. However, although the Gazette reproduced the compliments uttered in this House it did not pronounce itself either for or against the Bill. I repeat that if the Bill is good, it is the duty of every man and every respectable newspaper to pronounce in favour of it, and if it is bad to object to it; but the Gazette did neither. Perhaps they have some contracts to print yellow papers, or to print the pictures of criminals for these papers. However, this is their own affair. The Gazette of the 13th put big headlines over the utterances of my hon. friend, and that is a consolation to him. Well, are those headlines to be considered endorsements of the speech of my hon. friend? It just reproduced some of his words, some of his expressions, those referring to the tango dances of which my hon. friend spoke. I do not take these headings as a recommendation of my hon. friend's speech.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—I did not go nearly as far as the Gazette. I did not call the Bill an idiotic measure, although I might have done so with perfect propriety.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Everybody has liberty to pronounce his views, and he should condemn or approve of the Bill. My hon. friend said that to a pure heart everything was pure. That may be true, but on the other hand we have the motto, 'Make money; honestly if you can—but make the money all the same,' and I think that is the motto of my hon. friend, not as a member of this House, but as the publisher of a yellow paper.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—I have utterly failed so far.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Now I would not like to detain the House too long, but I shall just quote a few more facts. Before proceeding, I might say that far from being condemned by newspapers and booksellers I have just proven that all the respectable booksellers and proprietors of newspapers approve of the Bill. Far from having no demand for the Bill I have proven that there is a great demand. It has been said, when the matter was brought up for the first time, 'We never heard about it; there is no demand for the law.' Very often when a law is passed there seems no demand for it, but the bringing up of the question causes the demand to be revealed. So now that this proposed law has been brought before the House and the country, we see the demand and the necessity for it. My hon. friend spoke about half a column in regard to what this House can do—about prostitution, about grafters, about the age of consent. All these things are already on the statute book. Every item which he has mentioned is already a criminal offence, and has been passed upon by this Parliament; and if my hon. friend sees some of his friends, or some of his electors, doing what he has condemned here, he has only to get his lawyer to prepare a brief and prosecute those men. He has all the machinery for that. My hon. friend was also greatly exercised over the indecency of the tango, the bunny hug, the turkey trot, the X-Ray and other dances and exhibitions which he describes as suggestive, if not positively lascivious. Is my hon. friend speaking from personal experience? If so, I am ashamed for his gray hairs. Yet how could he bear such positive testimony to the dangerous impropriety of these terpsichorean freaks without arousing the suspicion that he has taken part in them in order to acquire such an intimate knowledge of their character? Of course, I do not wish to cast the slightest doubt upon his still juvenile agility. I am quite prepared to believe that he would do credit to any of them as a performer, though he probably prefers, when in dancing mood, to go for a jig, a reel, a hornpipe—or the more stately quadrille, which is more in keeping with the dignity of a member of this hon. House. I shall, however, say that I am of the same opinion as he is regarding these improper dances and exhibitions, and indeed, I am quite willing to include in my Bill a prohibition of the printing of all pictures of those dancing them.

My hon. friend has gone still further. He talks about some people straining at gnats and swallowing camels, because they do not fulminate against the immoral tendencies of the slit skirt, the abolition of certain kinds of underwear and other sensuous styles of the female fashions of the day. My hon. friend is no doubt a very brave man, but I do not think that his bravery will carry him so far as to inaugurate a crusade against the female fashions. In doing so, he would simply be butting his head against a stone wall. And surely what he would not do himself he should not expect any of his colleagues of this House to do? However, I am willing to second him in every effort he will make to prevent ladies from wearing slit skirts or any costume tending to immorality, or to prevent the publication of the pictures of ladies who may be so dressed. The hon. gentleman in the course of his remarks said that the press was not going to be 'gagged and throttled.' I do not think my hon. friend was serious in making that statement. Who is speaking of gagging the press? I repeat you have now on the statute book all that he advocated, and nobody said it was gagging the press. I just wish to add to the list the publication of pictures of criminals. On this point especially, I am going to refer for a moment to an article taken from a French newspaper. Every one who reads the French press knows Les Annales Politiques t Literaires. They received opinions from lifferent sources on the very delicate subject of what should not be published in he press, and they received opinions, especially, about the publication of pictures. Here is what the chief editor said speaking of the publication of pictures and morbid reports of crime. It is as follows, as reproduced in L'Action, of Montreal:

> The measure is a good one. The press may possibly end by acknowledging its responsibilities, and in the future give less advertisement to criminals. And this reform would be easily attained, if everybody, rising above commercial competition, and shop questions, would aim solely at public improvement.
> Let us promise to allow but a summary space to the reporting of crimes and misdemeanors, to give the names of murderers and criminals by initials only, not to refer to people unless they are honest, and not excite criminals morbid thirst for publicity, and to use in respect to them the only effectual weapon: silence.
> That is common sense talk. It is listened to, approved of, but nobody acts in accordance. It triumphs solely with the support of coercion.
> A new law, precise, imperative, and strictly applied, would have more effect than our protests and complaints. We hope that, with the experience of the past, Parliament will act according to the almost unanimous wish of public opinion.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—I did not catch the name of the newspaper from which the hon. gentleman is quoting.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Les Annales Politiques et Literaires.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—I am no more enlightened than I was before.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If the hon. gentleman does not understand French, he should do as we have to do, learn to speak both languages. I would prefer ten times over to speak in French, but I speak in English in order to be understood by those who are not familiar with French. Without wishing to affect anybody, it seems to me that every educated man here and elsewhere, especially in this country, should know both languages, so that every one can speak in his own language, as I should like to do when I am undertaking to refute the elucubrations of my hon. friend from Halifax. I wish to cite also the opinion of Mr. Henri Robert, one of the most eminent criminal lawyers in France at the present time. Speaking about criminality, he says that in his experience, as a criminal lawyer, he can trace all crime to newspapers published similar to the one published by my hon. friend from Halifax, and their illustrations. At the close of his article he cites as an example a young man walking on the street with a girl. The evening papers were just published and contained pictures of criminals, and the girl said to the young man: 'Well, friend, when is your picture going to be published like that in the newspaper?' Thus showing the danger of such publication. Mr. Robert is in favour of a Bill like this one. Here is what he said:

Local items haunt us, persecute us, impose themselves to our eyes, and insinuate themselves in our minds. Do you happen to buy the day's paper; you will find it full of glaring headings. Do you happen, after dinner, to go to the theatre or cinema, they are still watching for you there. You mostly, see a performance representing homicide, insanity or immorality. Do you happen to be walking on the street; you meet those whose hideous picture have been shown to you in thousand of forms,—suspicious prowlers, criminals still unknown, agents of blackmail and prostitution.

It is you, my colleagues who are corrupting them; are teaching them the last improvements in burglary and murder, the safest means to prepare the offence to be committed and the securest way to escape consequences. How can these unfortunates resist the contagion of example?

The considerable interest taken in criminals likes, increased by the combined efforts of illustrations and news report, awakens in them a desire for this odious glory, the only one they can hope for, if, on the other hand, they were not urged to make a bid for it by so many wants, desires and appetites. Oh: my colleagues how guilty you are! Please note that there exists, an old law, repressive of actions described as crimes which might, if magistrates were courageous enough be applied to you. I hear you; you are going to protest that you hate these crimes, and that you are in no way apologizing for them. You are unconsciously exalting them; you praise them by the mere fact that you give them undue importance. Bear in minds the words of the caricaturist; a vague youth of the Boulevard is chatting with a grisette. 'Well!' exclaims the grisette, 'when will your picture appear in the paper.' That is the basic spirit.

The vanity of apaches makes them rave to see their pictures published, their disclosures taken down, and the prose of their letters in print. The idea that they are what society is most interested in, awakens, spurs,—that is the word,—their energies.

Now I will read from a book my hon. friend from St. George (Hon. Mr. Gillmor) has just handed me, a book which I would advise my hon. friend from Halifax to read. It is entitled 'The ordinary man and the extraordinary thing.' The author is Harold Begbie, author of 'Broken Earthenware,' the man who wrote the life of Sir George Williams, the founder of the Young Men's Christian Association. Speaking of newspapers, he says:

When a boy runs through the street with the cry of horrible tragedy, he is exalted by something more than certainty of good fortune. Regard his excited eyes, the strain of the muscles around his mouth, the effort of the body to hurl itself ahead of the hurrying legs, the obvious awe and self-importance of a spirit charged with evil tidings.

Further on he says:

Humanity clearly is still in the barbarous stage where the drama of life without action, violent action is reckoned dull and tedious. The multitude must have murders, suicides, divorces, and political crises in the newspaper.

The trouble about this universal love of horror and calamity and violent action lies in its influence upon the journalists from whom so many take their ideas of life.

I call the attention of my hon. friend to this, as he will recognize himself in that, as to making money on the street by selling that kind of yellow newspapers like his own.

Because murder multiplies editions, and divorce or crisis sends up the sales to a zenith of prosperity, it is conceived that all bad news is profitable and all good news is dull. And from this reasoning proceed the pessiamism, the cynicism, the hysteria, and even the despair which characterizes the modern newspaper. If ones knowledge of life were obtained only from the newspaper, who would not conclude that mankind is staggering on the edge of a precipice, with ruin darkening over its head, and perdition yawning at its feet. Infamy has its tens, evil its hundreds, and vulgarity its thousands.

I suppose the hon. gentleman from Halifax must have the thousands. My hon. friend has also said that under this Bill the man who publishes the picture of Riel, Papineau and others will be a criminal and will be liable to penitentiary on the same footing as an ordinary criminal. I am obliged to state that I can not believe that the hon. gentleman was serious. When he undertakes to supply us with object lessons as to the effect of my Bill, if passed, he reveals himself as a great humorist. He gives free rein to his imagination, but the pictures which he draws are so distorted, so far-fetched, and so much in the nature of a joke that they only provoke laughter. I can make every allowance for the honourable gentleman's natural desire to spread himself on this question and oppose any and every restraint upon the tendencies of the 'yellow' press to sensationalism; but when he comes to seriously telling us that, under this Bill, publishers would be subject to a penalty of two years in jail for printing pictures of Joan d'Arc, Louis Papineau, Louis Riel, Charles Stewart Parnell, Bramwell Booth, etc., etc., he carries the joke much too far and simply makes himself suspiciously ridiculous, or he is laughing at this House and treating it with unbecoming levity, for none knows better than himself that this Bill has no such object and would have no such effect.

I go further and say that if he is really serious comparing criminals with these persons it is blasphemy if nothing else.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—The Bill provides that any person publishing the picture of any one who has ever been convicted of a crime is guilty. Were these people not all convicted of crimes?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Political crimes perhaps. I have about finished with my hon. friend's speech. I shall now add some important considerations. I maintain that the subject matter of this Bill, is deserving a very serious consideration. It should not be accepted and treated with flippancy, for it contains a moral of great importance in the interset of the public, and especially in the moulding of the youthful mind. For the sake of argument, and in order to simplify the moral depth which I wish to reach by the Bill, I shall take the liberty of discussing two classes of men, as they treat morality, from their separate points of view.

I shall divide the good and moral man, from one which I might call the modern man, if not the bad man. The good and moral man strives, in keeping with a healthy conscience, to live up to, and set the example of a moral life, to the youth and innocent of this country, and must see that this Bill is to purify and strengthen public morality, and must then support the measure. He, as a good man, filled with clean and noble purity of thought, feels it his duty as a Christian. and a worthy legislator, to safeguard the rising generation from having a corrupt mind, by contamination with obscene literature and suggestive pictures or photographs, and therefore must recognize that the reproducing of a picture of a murderer, in the columns of newspapers, is against the code of good morals. Such featuring by newspapers undoubtedly has evil effect. The story as it is recounted in the press, would be, in nine cases out of ten, passed over by the youthful reader, if the portrait of the individual it alludes to were not published to create a greater attraction to the subject—it causes the reader to devour the contents of the tragedy, or filthy story as the case may be, and thus creates in the mind a passion for unclean subjects that theretofore was foreign to his or her young mind. On the other hand, the careless, or properly speaking, the men of loose morals, the bad men view conditions differently. They say: Let the young read and learn, and realize as a lesson the moral and the immoral sides in all conditions of life; forgetting in their own morbid natures the impression that is calculated to remain, and by degrees awake, in a young mind, ideas that eventually lead to the development of a careless, and probably an undesirable member of society.

The moral men I designated are the ones who would hesitate to read a bad book, and should they be induced to peruse its pages in a spirit of curiosity or in an educational sense, would throw it away in disgust before they would finish. They cannot tolerate literary productions if they are immoral or suggestive of immorality. This class of men will enjoy attending a clean, educational drama or opera, where he feels it safe to escort his wife and family. but the bad men will do the very contrary, especially the yellow paper proprietors. I regret to say that the only real opposition to this Bill, so far, has come from an hon. member of this House who apparently has not given it proper consideration. He is evidently opposing it as if he were fighting for an existing business proposition in which he is vitally concerned, as a newspaper publisher, and the backer of a yellow newspaper, for the money yielded by its discourses of sensationalism, aided by the very pictures that this Bill aims to suppress. The returns may be profitable, but I contend, and every honest man with a family of children to educate and cultivate, must agree with me, that money so earned is not fair and honest gain, as it is gotten at the expense of the morals of the youth of the country. It is a striking glorification of the motto cited above: 'Make money honestly if you can, but make money.' It is speculation on the human mind and the soul of youth, and should not be tolerated.

The hon. member from Halifax has said that the Bill is an infringement on the liberty of the press, on the liberty of the proprietor of a newspaper as I have mentioned en passant, a moment ago, but I wish to add this and say again: if this contention be true, then every line contained in the Criminal Code is an infrigement of our liberties.

To forbid one to manufacture, expose for sale, or give in public view, or have in his possession any obscene book, newspaper, or any picture, or photograph, pertaining to corrupt morals, is an infringement on liberty, and it is already on the statute book. Thus it will be seen that I am not endeavouring, absolutely speaking, to add to the law, but to provide for its more severe enforcement and make it impossible for yellow journalism to prevail in this country, poisoning the morals of the people; and in my efforts I am backed—as proven above—by proprietors of respectable and reputable newspapers, and respectable book dealers of the country.

I do not hesitate to say that the owner of a newspaper, in attacking this Bill, manifests the commercial side of his character that outweighs any regard for a moral duty, and his arguments should not in the least prevail.

I wish now to put forward another line of argument which I think worthy of consideration. I refer to the hygienic laws framed to safeguard the public from contagious diseases. These laws point to the infected people; we must divide them from others to prevent by contact the circulation of sickness that is a menace to the public health and lives of the people; and in order to carry out hygienic laws, we have established isolation hospitals and quarantine stations, where the infected must be isolated and guarded against contact with the more healthy ones, by keeping the public away as a prevention against the spread of the disease. Are not these hygenic laws an infringement on the liberty of these people who are, in a sense, imprisoned during the pleasure of medical restraint? Are they not unduly deprived of their liberty, in line with the argument made by the honourable member for Halifax in his defence of the yellow journal? Therefore I claim, that the present Bill is justifiable and right to help to stop yellow journalism in its endeavour to propagate the devil's work by exciting the curiosity of young and innocent readers, that gradually leads to a degeneration of the present and future population of Canada. We make laws to punish the criminal class, and why should we not make laws to obviate the possibility of a criminal class, by preventing the circulation not only of obscene literature, and pictures, but also of undesirable photographs. This Bill does not aim to prevent publication of pictures of art, or photographs of worthy citizens and heroes. It does, however, aim to prevent the reproduction of the pictures of vice, figures in sensationalism, and photographs of the criminal class, that excites the curiosity of innocent people, and teach them a life of crime which it would be to their advantage to ignore.

We make laws to punish the guilty and imprison the malefactor. Our jails and penitentiaries are becoming alarmingly crowded, our hospitals fill with unclean men and women, and society is in danger of becoming impregnated with vile contact, unless we rise to the occasion and make more severe laws that will arrest and stamp out the evil. And who are responsible for the greater part; the proprietors of yellow papers, by the publication of pictures and photographs of criminals.

My hon. friend spoke of the commercial injury that this Bill was calculated to work against the interests of the newspapers of the country. This Bill is not promoted to injure or help in any way the liberties of respectable newspapers published in the Dominion of Canada. In no sense does it interfere with their rights. But I admit it will interfere with the proprietors of yellow journals which the general public wish to see penalized, should they continue in their work of lowering instead of elevating the morals of the country. Now let me say in conclusion:

I remember having read somewhere that souls are lyres which resound together—that fear, joy, unhappiness are communicable, and it is the same thing of malice, deception and crime. If you add to all that the unfortunate natural inclination which we all have, you will have the problem of seeing men, first good then turning bad, for all the above reasons, and this will lead them to the penitentiary or to the scaffold.

You see men, women, and especially children, taking pleasure in looking over pictures of criminals, in reading accounts of their misdeeds. It is because these pictures and misdeeds give them emotions, and these repeated emotions create passion. The emotions act on their system like waters that break dams, and passions are like torrents which are deepening more and more profoundly the beds of the river.

The conditions of a place where a man is living are favourable to the development of these morbid sicknesses, and imitation and suggestions are doing the rest; so we can judge what effect these divers influences must have on the minds of children who have an exaggerated sensibility or undisclosed sickness, when their exalted emotions or romantic mind sharpen their appetites and give them the ambition to be great men, even by becoming criminals.

A moralist has written that it does not depend on us not to have passions, but it seems to me that it depends on us legislators to reduce the occasions of passions. In France and here it is forbidden to the public to assist in the execution of criminals. Why? There is no harm to see a criminal pay the penalty of his crime; it ought to be a good thing, it may be a very important lesson. However, the nations have condemned it and declared that no good can come from these terrible spectacles; of course it is fortunately known by experience that these spectacles of execution, hanging or guillotine, with its lugubres decors, does not repulse the mind, but seems to attract and suggest. So it is with pictures of criminals. Though we have in our minds that we are looking at criminals, however far from repulsive, we are carried away with sympathy for them, and there are some who would enjoy the notoriety of their position, and be glad, I repeat, to be great men, even by becoming criminals, and so have their picture in the newspapers and be talked of.

If some of the facts and thoughts I have endeavoured to put before the House today had been presented when the Bill was first submitted to the Senate, I am sure they would have been appreciated even by my hon. friend from Halifax. I did not then think it necessary to give those thoughts and reasons in support of it, because it seemed to me that the Bill was so simple it would be really insulting the intelligence of the House to offer a detailed explanation of the purpose in view; but after the lecture delivered by the hon. gentleman from Halifax in defence of his own business and of his own paper, I thought I would try to convert him and bring him to a better frame of mind by showing him the evil he is doing; I hope now to convince him to support this Bill, or at least let it be read the second time and referred to a committee. Then after looking over these reasons and with the perusal of letters and clippings from newspapers that I have read to the House, I believe we will make the Bill still better than it is, and not only prevent the publication of pictures of criminals, but also the reports of criminal matters, and also put in the amendment my hon. friend will probably offer about indecent dances and dresses; then the Bill will be perfect, and every one of us will feel happy over the good work we have done.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (C-2), An Act for the relief of Johann Andreas Horn.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

Bill (D-2), An Act respecting the Western Life Assurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Ross, Moosejaw.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, March 26, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (F-2), An Act for the relief of Gracie Smith.—Hon. Mr. De Veber.

Bill (G-2), An Act for the relief of Harry Cracroft Pugh.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (H-2), An Act to incorporate the Prudential Life of Canada.

A CORRECTION.

Col. the Hon. Mr. MASON—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I desire to call attention to an error in the Minutes and Proceedings of yesterday, and ask that it be corrected. On the motion that the fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Divorce be placed on the Orders of the Day my name appears in both instances among the contents. I was not in the Chamber when the vote was taken, and consequently did not vote.

The SPEAKER—I presume that is sufficient notice to have it corrected.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (T), An Act respecting The Sterling Life Assurance Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

Bill (U), An Act respecting The W. C. Edwards Company, Limited.—Hon. Mr. Béique.

Bill (57), An Act respecting the British Trust Company.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (C-2), An Act for the relief of Johann Andreas Horn.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (96), An Act to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1:

1. Section 38 of The Weights and Measures Act, chapter 52 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

'38. The basic units of the metric system shall be the International Metre and the International Kilogramme confirmed in the year 1889 by the first International Conference of Weights and Measures and deposited at the International Bureau of Weights and Measures.

2. The minister shall obtain a copy of the metre and a copy of the kilogram certified by the International Bureau of Weights and Measures, and the said copies, when authorized by Order in Council shall be the legal standards of the metre and kilogram in Canada.

3. The minister may cause to be compared and verified with the said standards all the metric weights and measures which are submitted to him for that purpose, and which are of such shape and construction, as are, from time to time, directed under any Order in Council in that behalf, and which the minister is satisfied are intended to be used for the purpose of science or of manufacture, or for any lawful purpose within the meaning of this Act.'

On clause 2—the new schedule.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Are we adopting only the weights and not the distance? You have it here:

The basic units of the metric system shall be the international metre and the international kilogram.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes. I pointed out to my hon. friend that the measure heretofore adopted as the metric system, was not an international system. It is now to be superseded by the standard of the international metre and international kilogram confirmed in the year 1899 by the first International Conference of Weights and Measures, and deposited in the International Bureau in Paris. It does not change the law in any sense, except as to adopting a better standard for metric measures.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MASON, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

WHITE PHOSPHORUS MATCHES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved:

Bill (103), An Act to prohibit the manufacture and importation of matches made with white phosphorus.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

He said: The object of this Bill is to prohibit the use of white phosphorus in match-making establishments. It is proposed that the Bill shall not go into operation until 1916, so as to give ample time to industries in this particular line of business to make preparation to abolish the use of this particular article. It is in the interests of health and life that this be done.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—What is the difference between white phosphorus and the other kind now used?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I could not tell that to my hon. friend. I understand that white phosphorus has been generally used in the manufacture of matches. There is now a substance known as sesquisulphide of phosphorus which is replacing it in all civilized countries. This has practically been adopted in most civilized countries.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—It does not have the same offensive smell.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, it does not have the same bad effect on employees working upon the article such as white phosphorus does.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—What is the objection to the importation of this substance?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This matter came up a couple of sessions ago, and it was proposed simply to prohibit the manufacture and importation into Canada, but this Bill is of a more comprehensive character and prohibits the manufacture and importation and sale of that class of match.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Can matches already prepared be brought in?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not matches already prepared?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No; matches made of white phosphorus will be prohibited from importation into Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I know, but they will not endanger the health of the people here, once they are manufactured abroad.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, they will; that is one of the difficulties. It has been established in courts of law that this article has not only jeopardized the health of match employees, but has been used as a cheap poison.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That is right.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It has been used for suicidal and homicidal purposes, and the intention is to abolish its use in every conceivable way.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this Bill, but I should like to know why this has not been gone on with before. If my information is correct, a Bill almost identically the same as this Bill, was introduced by the late Government in 1911 and was objected to at that time by a member of the Conservative party in another place, because it was not constitutional. The result of that objection—if I am rightly informed—was that the Bill was held up for that session and nothing more could be done in connection with it. The measure is one that is most desirable in the interest of the health of the people of this country. As has been stated by the leader of the Government, it is desirable to prevent, not only the manufacture of this class of matches, but also the sale of the same on account of the cases that have occurred, in which people have used them as a cheap form of poison. I only regret that this legislation has not been on the statute book sooner, because I think at the present time Canada is behind the other countries of the world in this matter. All other countries have adopted similar legislation, which has proved very beneficial to the general health of the people. I have only one objection to this measure, and that is that it is not to come into force until the year 1916. Inasmuch as this legislation was introduced, first of all in the House of Commons in 1911, we may take it that the manufacturers of these matches and the public generally have had notice that it is desirable to place legislation of this kind on the statute book. Notice was given some three years ago and therefore the manufacturers should have had time to make the necessary preparations, and to adjust their business to this class of legislation. The leader of the Government should have introduced this Bill the first session of the present Parliament, when he was in a position to handle the legislation of the country. There might have been some excuse for deferring the time when this Bill should go into force; but as this question has been before the country now for so many years, I shall ask the leader of the Government to agree to an amendment allowing the Bill to go into effect at once, instead of deferring its action until 1916.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The 1st of January, 1915, would be better. We must make allowance for those who have stocks on hand.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—As the hon. member from Vancouver has stated, a similar measure was introduced in the House of Commons on the 9th of January, 1911, by the then Minister of Labour, the Hon. Mackenzie King. On that occasion, an inquiry was made by Mr. Daniel, then a member of that House, as to the necessity of such a Bill and how many people throughout the Dominion would be affected by it. The questions put then were: 'How many employees are there, and how many match factories are there throughout the Dominion.' The answer was: 'There are three match factories in the Dominion of Canada, one in Halifax called the Eureka Match Factory, one in Hampton, N.B., and the Eddy Match Factory in Ottawa.' The total number of employees was given as 278 by the census of 1900, but the labour census made the number of employees 230, making forty-eight less employed in all the match factories of the Dominion of Canada. There were 200 in the Eddy match factory, fourteen in the Eureka match factory of Halifax, and thirteen in the Hampton match factory of New Brunswick. The question then arose whether it was worth while having such legislation for so few. But the statistics given of the dire effects of the fumes, caused in the different factories by the use of white sulphur, were so appalling that the Government at the time thought it only right to introduce this measure. In 1906 a convention took place in Berne, composed of the different Governments of Europe, having for its object similar legislation to that introduced today by the Government. At this convention statistics were given proving throughout the world dire effects followed the use of phosphorus in the manufacture of matches. At that time England stood aloof; Sweden, which is to-day the largest match manufacturer in the world, also stood aloof; Japan also would not come into the convention. The reason assigned by England for not signing the convention of Berne was that they thought they had proper regulations that would effectually govern the manufacture of phosphorus matches in England. After having tried these regulations for two years, they were found so defective that in 1908 the British Government adhered to the Berne convention and decided to prohibit the manufacture of phosphorus matches in England. It was mentioned in the Berne conference that the mother countries had the right to invite the colonies to join this convention so as to prohibit the manufacture of these matches. A despatch was sent from the Foreign Office in London to the then Governor of Canada, Earl Grey, who drew the attention of the Government to this convention. The Government immediately caused inquiries to be made throughout the Dominion of Canada to find out whether such a law would have beneficial effects, or whether the manufacture of phosphorus matches affected a large part of the population of Canada. After a thorough inquiry it was found that from fifteen to twenty cases had been treated throughout the Dominion for phosphorus poisoning. We all know the dire effects of phosphorus poisoning. Particles of phosphorus in the manufacture of matches will fly into the mouths of employees, and if a tooth happens to be decayed, the phosphorus will immediately settle in there, and eventually cause the loss not only of the tooth, but even of the jaw bone. Several of such cases were mentioned in evidence throughout the Dominion of Canada, and acting on this evidence the Government in 1911 introduced a measure based on identically the same lines as the measure the British Government introduced. It appears that, whether purposely, or whether they thought the measure answered all points, it was mentioned in the Act that it was prohibited to manufacture matches made out of white phosphorus, but provisions as to the sale of it were entirely forgotten. The Canadian Government on the 19th day of January, 1911, introduced this measure. Information was given, as I have just stated, and one of the reasons given against the passage of this Bill was that the then Minister of Labour was in league with, or was a paid official of the Diamond Match Company. This was actually hinted at. It was stated in the press, and the next day, acting on this information, the Minister of Labour discussed the case of the Diamond Match Company, which had control of patents allowing the manufacture of matches other than with white phosphorus, and he read affidavits, deeds and convention, by which the Diamond Match Company allowed every company throughout the Dominion of Canada, throughout the British Empire, and throughout the world, to use its patents on the same terms as the company was using them itself. This settled the question of the Minister of Labour being in the service of the Diamond Match Company. Another objection was then raised to the passing of the Bill. Mr. Northrup, M.P., raised the question as to whether the Parliament of Canada had the right to pass such a measure, whether this measure which affected the health of the people did not pertain to local legislatures; and whether the federal authorities had a right to legislate on the question. The matter was thoroughly threshed out. It was merely what legal gentlemen call a legal squabble. Still the opposition was trying to make as strong a case as possible against the then Minister of Labour and Mr. Doherty, to-day Minister of Justice in the present Government, was not quite sure in his mind whether we were not trespassing on the local prerogative, because as he stated in his speech, the local Governments have factory inspectors, and surely they could pass laws and by-laws strong enough to protect the health of the people over whom they are appointed to watch. The point was considered, not only from a legal point of view, but as affecting the rights of the provinces. The Bill was allowed to be introduced, but never went any further; the Bill we are asked to consider to-day is identically the same Bill that was introduced in 1911, except that it goes a step further; it prohibits the sale of such matches. If we are not allowed to manufacture I do not see why we should be allowed to sell, so that is one improvement in to-day's Bill, as compared with the Bill of 1911. I would very much like that the question, which at the time was considered a great bugaboo, which was backed by legal opinion—I would like to know to-day if the legal opinion of the officers of those days is the same to-day. If we have a right to-day to pass this Bill, why was it opposed in 1911? Why have we allowed this dire disease, as they call it, to prevail amongst us, and to endanger the lives of 230 people who are employed in match factories throughout the Dominion? Why should we wait two years longer, so that a few more may be afflicted? That is what I am at a loss to understand. If such legislation is worth passing, if the life of a man employed in a factory is worth looking after, it strikes me it ought to be done immediately and not wait two years. The different match factories throughout the country have had, it strikes me, ample time to put their houses in order, if I may use the expression. They must have felt that the manufacture of such a dangerous match as the white sulphur match was eventually to be prohibited. I quite agree with my honoured leader that if such legislation is worth passing it should be passed and come into effect immediately. Nobody will suffer by it. There are three match factories throughout the Dominion, and the lives of the 230 people employed are daily threatened by engaging in the manufacture of white sulphur matches. Let us accept the amendment proposed, and let the law come into effect immediately. We have not any statistics since 1911 to see how many more have been affected by the disease. It would be very interesting if we could obtain such statistics, but I have been unable to get them. The question was worth talking over in 1911, and we now bring it up in 1914, and although we all regret the effects of this disease, still we give it two years more to still further encroach upon the health of the people. For these reasons I am strongly of the opinion that it would be a great improvement on the Act if it were made to become effective on the day of its sanction.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I sympathize with the views expressed by the leader of this House and by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat; but after all we have to have some consideration for the circumstances. The probabilities are that at the present time there are numbers of manufacturers and numbers of grocers and people of that kind who have laid in stocks of these matches, and if a Bill of this kind were to come into operation at once a certain amount of injustice would be done. I think that perhaps the hon. leader of the Government may see his way to provide that the Bill shall come into operation on the 1st day of January, 1915. That would be giving reasonable time to those who hold such stocks to get ready for the change. Then there is another point which I think my hon. friends have overlooked; as the business of the King's Printer's office is transacted at the present time, it is generally about four months after the prorogation of Parliament when the Acts passed during the session are distributed; if you make this Act come into operation immediately, you will be rendering a large number of people liable to severe penalties for violating an Act which they have never seen, and which they have had no opportunity to see. On the whole, the ends of justice and fair-play and of humanity would be met by having the Act come into operation on the 1st of January, 1915. As I am on my feet, I think I should direct attention to the sixth clause of the Bill so that the hon. minister who has it in charge will be prepared to give any information that may be required. Clause 6 says:

6. Any person who is manufacturing or proposing to manufacture matches by way of trade may present a petition to the Commissioner of Patents, praying for the grant of a compulsory license to use any process patented at the time of the passing of this Act for the manufacture of matches without white phosphorus.

Then the subclause provides that the Commissioner of Patents may do this. That is a rather sweeping and violent interference with the rights of the patentee. I only mention it so as to call the attention of the hon. leader to it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend followed the language a little further he would observe that a license would be issuable upon such terms as might be imposed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have seen that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The policy of the Bill is a good one. If the health of the public is jeopardized owing to the use of a certain article, and a certain wholesome substitute is patented, there is no reason why, in the public interest, that substitute should not be used to the advantage of the public on such terms as might be imposed. In the next place the reason for postponing the operation of the Act until the 1st of January, 1916, arose through a large delegation from the Royal Society waiting upon the Government. Among them was the ex-Postmaster General, Mr. Lemieux, who apparently made representations to the Government that in the event of this legislation coming into force it was undesirable that it should be brought into operation until a reasonable time was given to manufacturers and those interested in the handling of matches, to dispose of their stocks, and it was thought that the 1st of January, 1916, would be a reasonable date. However, I am not saying that reason could not be shown why it should not be brought into force earlier. It is a matter for the Senate to determine, and when the Bill goes into committee, I am satisfied the judgment of this House will express itself wisely, and in the public interest along those lines. I should like to say a word on the castigation which my hon. friend has given the present Government for delaying this legislation. May I ask why the late Government did not press this measure to a successful conclusion when they introduced it? The danger was then as great as it is to-day, but my hon. friend informs me that because Mr. Northrup the member for Hastings, and the present Minister of Justice made some criticism as to the constitutionality of the measure, the Government bowed its head and yielded to that criticism. It was most unusual for the late Government to extend such generous consideration to these criticisms, and to delay the bringing into force of such a necessary measure. The present Government is showing less timidity in regard to constitutional objections. They are quite prepared to assume the responsibility of any conflict that may arise between the provincial authorities and the federal authority, as to the power of this Government to pass such legislation.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—As to the late Government not proceeding, it is only lately that manufacturers have been able to dispense with white sulphur, and that a substitute has been found for commercial purposes. This substitute has been known for many years, but it is only now that it has come into general use, and has been made accessible to all manufacturers. That may have been the reason why the hands of the late Government were stayed. I was very much surprised to hear that there were only three Canadian factories making matches—one at St. John, N.B., one at Halifax, and one in Hull. I do not believe such statement is absolutely correct. I think there are more manufacturers of matches than that, because I personally know that in Drommondville there is one manufacturer doing business every day and employing 75 people.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Since when?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It has been going for a long time. I just left the House a few minutes ago to verify the statement by a member for that place, Mr. Mitchell, who tells me that the plant has been in operation for some years. There must be others. The hon. gentleman who made the statement as to this must have gone by the statements that were given to him, and by the census. I thought there were more of these plants, and I have named one anyway that I know of, because I saw it and passed by it, and I was told the extent of the business, and also how many people had become diseased in making matches in that very place. If the Government had not introduced this Bill this year, I have been asked to do so by some medical men in Montreal, amongst them Dr. Ruttan, who is at the head of that special branch of the medical faculty in the University of McGill. He has had to perform the operation of removing the jaws of employees working at this industry who contracted a disease which blackens their gums and the roof of their mouths, and eventually destroys the jaw absolutely; Dr. Ruttan offered to give me a tangible proof of the dire effects of this article, in the form of the jaw itself, which he had just removed from a patient. I believe it would be a good thing if this Bill could come into operation before 1916, and if we could bring it into operation in January, 1915, I think we would be acting in the cause of humanity.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—A return that was brought down in the House of Commons relating to this very matter, shows that there are in Canada five establishments for making matches.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—What year is that return?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—1911. This return was brought down, and will be found in the Commons 'Hansard' on the 17th March this year.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—That is this year, but I was quoting the answer that was given to you in 1911.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—Yes; this is information brought down this month by the hon. Minister of Labour, when he introduced this Bill in the House of Commons, and from that return we find that there are five establishments for making matches in Canada.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Where ?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—The return does not state where. It gives the capital employed as $484,475, exclusive of the Eddy Company capital, and the number of employees 460, exclusive of the Eddy Company. The wages paid are $93,551. These all have an asterisk after them, which means that the information is exclusive of the information relating to the Eddy Company. The value of the product which it manufactures is $1,072,527 per annum.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That would be all kinds of matches ?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—That would be the whole of the match-making of the Dominion. Of course there is no doubt that the disease which is produced by the use of phosphorus, especially when it gets into the mouth, and so on, is a very bad one, very disfiguring, and dangerous not only to health, but to life, producing as it does necrosis of the jaw. I do not think that this disease has been very prevalent in Canada. A return in regard to the factory in New Brunswick shows that there has never been a single case of 'phossy jaw' in that establishment. I think the same is true with regard to that of Halifax, though I would not be sure of that. There have been a few cases about this vicinity. With regard to the factory mentioned by the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière, I do not know the number that have been affected there, but of course the matter is a serious one to that extent, though the disease is not prevalent there now. I have hardly heard and have never seen any reference to any disease of the kind in the Ottawa hospitals, and I do not think it is very prevalent, so that as far as the urgency of the case is concerned I do not think that that should be taken too seriously. Here are establishments employing quite a number of labourers with a large amount of capital invested, and they are asked to change their methods, their machinery, and everything of that kind. If they are asked to do it suddenly it means that there will be a very large amount of financial loss incurred by that which perhaps would not occur to the same extent if the manuafcturers were allowed to make the change gradually. The hon. Minister of Labour, speaking about this very question the other day in the House of Commons, stated that he had been requested to make the time shorter; hon. gentlemen opposite have been suggesting here that the date should be 1915 instead of 1916. The reason that he gave on behalf of the manufacturers was this: 'The returns pointed out that it would require considerable time experimenting on different substitutes for white phosphorus, and owing to business contracts they have undertaken, it would be very injurious to them if the provisions became effective before January 1, 1916.' That is one of the reasons the minister gave; he also said: 'The length of time we are giving is usual in the United States and other countries in cases of this kind. Of course I am familiar with the argument: 'If this is so very injurious, why not stop it at once.' But we cannot act like that in matters of this kind, and I have come to the conclusion that we should leave the date as it is. That is, until 1916. I think that taking everything into consideration—taking the fact that in this country and around here the number of cases of this disease is very few, and also the fact that to make a sudden change in those large establishments with regard to the composition of whatever they are going to manufacture the new match out of—if the statement of the minister is correct, these manufacturers hardly know yet what substitutes they will be required to get for the use of white phosphorus. The ends of humanity, and health, as well as the interests of the manufacturers, would be served if suitable time was given them to make the change. I am quite sure that the disease is not very prevalent, for during all the years the factory in New Brunswick has been in existence there has never been a single case of phossy jaw in connection with that manufacture. I suppose it is more apt to occur in establishments where there is poor ventilation and where dust and that sort of thing accumulates; but where there are good hygienic conditions in the factories the disease is certainly not so apt to occur. If we allowed the times stated in the Bill at present to become law, we would be doing fairer by all interests than to make it very much shorter.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I did not understand that the question was in its experimental stage. From the remarks made I had thought that almost all other of the larger countries had already adopted the change, and that the match-makers in this country would not have to go into chemistry and work out a new substitute for what they are now using. They would not require, in all probability, any new machinery for the matter of dipping matches. It may be, of course, that as the institutions are running with methods already prevailing, the longer the time they get, the more it would be to their convenience if not actually to their interests; but from the discussion so far we have learned that in respect to this change we are lagging behind most of the other countries. I cannot thoroughly appreciate the argument which the hon. gentleman advanced that there should be a delay until 1916.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

MERCHANTS SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (21), An Act to amend the law relating to Merchant Shipping with a view to enable certain conventions to be carried into effect.

He said: the purpose of this Bill is to amend the law in reference to collisions and salvage at sea, so as to enable the Government to give adherance to the International Maritime Convention held in Brussels on September 23, 1910. There is an international committee made up of the shipping interests of the different countries which have adopted regulations looking to the uniform adjustment of questions of this character. It is in the interest of shipping, in the interest of safety of life at sea, that Canada should give its adherence to this convention. I therefore move its second reading.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I would like to know from the hon. leader of the Government if this Bill deals in any way with the shipping on the lakes? Is the United States a party to that convention? Does the Bill apply only as far as it affects the question of shipping on the high seas, or the reverse?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would be the high seas.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Because it seems to me that under clause 10 the lakes are especially excluded.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Has that question been taken into consideration at all by the Government, or is all inland water navigation especially excluded from that convention?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would scarcely be practicable, to have an international commission, or an international convention to deal with matters relating to the inland waters of Canada. Those are subjects coming peculiarly within our own jurisdiction, and upon which we can legislate to very much greater advantage than could any foreign or international tribunal. I have not made the inquiry which my hon. friend has suggested, but I would attribute the exception of the inland waters referred to in section 10 to that particular cause. However, I shall make inquiry as to whether that subject has received consideration.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Are there not some special regulations between the United States and Canada as to the navigation of the lakes?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh yes; for instance in boundary waters where both countries are equally interested; but this legislation looks to a very much wider scope. It deals with shipping on the high seas, which can only be regulated by a convention of all the nations interested.

The motion was agreed to, and Bill was read the second time.

HARBOUR OF NORTH SYDNEY, N. S., BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (104) an Act respecting the Harbour of North Sydney, N.S.

He said: This Bill proposes to abolish the harbour commission of North Sydney, and to vest its rights and assets in the Crown, and likewise that the Crown shall assume all its liabilities. This is being done at the instance of the Board of Trade, and of public opinion generally in that particular district. Hereafter it is proposed that the affairs of the commission shall be assumed by commissioners under the Harbour Commissioners Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Has the hon. gentleman any reasons why this is especially done. Lately we have been establishing Boards of Harbour Commissioners in the West, and if it is a good thing to establish these boards of harbour commissioners, it seems rather retroactive legislation to be doing away with existing boards of harbour commissioners in the East. It might be rather interesting to the country to know the reason of that.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I understand that the change is being made in the interest of harmony. There are two harbours there, the harbour of North Sydney and Sydney harbour, and the harbour fees are different in the two harbours. By passing this Bill the charges in both harbours will be made alike, and the fees which vessels will have to pay in North Sydney will be the same as will be paid in Sydney harbour. The object is to harmonize the harbour dues in both cases.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—One commission will have jurisdiction over the two harbours.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It would look as though they had got into some financial difficulties and the Government was coming to their relief.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (111), An Act to amend the Civil Service Insurance Act.

He said: There are two features to this amending Act, one of which is to permit the female members of the Civil Service to become eligible for insurance, and the other feature is increasing the maximum amount of insurance payable upon death from two thousand to five thousand.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Would the hon. leader not give the female members of the service the right to vote.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill D), 'An Act to amend The Criminal Code.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I feel somewhat timid about making a speech on this question, for the reason that I am at all times a great lover of order. It was understood, I believe, that the hon. senator from Grandville would close the debate, and it seemed like intrusion on my part to attempt to make a speech after that understanding. The hon. member from Grandville deserves credit for bringing this question of newspaper management before the country, because it gives opportunity for advancing some thoughts which may produce good fruit. Some of our publications, I regret to say, do not reach a desirable ideal. They are open to censure because of a lamentable want of good taste in the management. In almost every line of activity there is noticeable from year to year a sharp change in methods. The old is ever giving place to the new. When the right hon. member for Hastings and I were boys there prevailed a more reserved, may I say a more dignified mode of conducting a newspaper. The old methods might now be justly deemed too antiquated, while the new style inclines too much towards what we know as yellow journalism. Thirty years ago, if a paper were made up after the style now in vogue the man responsible for it would be adjudged guilty of violating the proprieties. Whilst people of refined taste deplore this excess, the great body of the public take the paper as they find it and pass no opinion. The public, however, is a peculiar quantity, and there is a good deal of truth in what John Ruskin said, that it is sometimes a big baby. Taking our Canadian papers in the mass, I believe that the men behind the fountain pens are, with some exceptions, honourable, straightforward men who give of their best to their country; and endeavour to plant in the minds of the people the practice of those high principles which tend to the honour and glory and prosperity and permanence of this country of ours, which is in every respect one of the most favoured under the sun. If there is any charge that may be made against us with some show of truth it is that we are almost irretrievably wedded to commercialism. Commerce and wealth and prosperity and general content are well enough in their way, but it would be well also if we would give some heed to the desirability of promoting a love for artistic taste in the minds of our people. Whilst many newspapers are lamentably wanting in this respect, we need not, after all, express wonderment because there is the same extravagance in almost every line of commercial activity. When travelling through the country in a railway car we are wont to feel and express admiration for the beautiful scenery which nature has given us in such abundance, but many a choice spot which invites the pencil of the artist is marred by the spirit of commercialism. Upon many a beautiful eminence decked out in nature's choicest apparel may be seen immense sign-boards depicting the virtues of the latest brand of tobacco, the finest creation in the way of soap, the virtues of a special brand of lager beer, and the exhilerating effects of the contents of a bottle labelled 'Whiskey,' the most expensive monument the world ever knew. But we are a young country, and perhaps with age will come the fine artistic temperament which calls for the suppression of everything that is offensive to public taste, and we will be more inclined to follow in the footsteps of those continental countries where its violation is dealt with by the legal authorities. But presently we are wedded to commerce, and the average man in quest of the latest design in cash registers will pass a Mona Lisa with a hand waive of disdain. It is of the utmost importance that we should guard with the greatest care the morals of the rising generation, and in this good work the press could be made a powerful auxiliary. I hope my confreres will do their part. We should take vigourous methods to prevent the importation into this country of literature which has a corrupting and debasing influence. The legal authorities should be more alert in protecting us from the inroads of the corrupt and corrupting press work of the large cities of the United States and England. Periodicals for boys and girls come through our mails by the ton from other countries which are abominably immoral. To guard against the inroads of this vicious literature our legal machinery is lamentably weak. True, we have adequate laws upon our statute books, but of what avail is the law when its enforcement is inefficient. We have had many complaints, well founded, that the provincial authorities are very negligent in this regard. Instead of providing machinery for the detection and prosecution of those who are guilty of offences against the Criminal Code the Attorney General and the County Crown Attorneys are waiting for the man on the street to make a complaint. This is what you will be told when you seek an interview with the provincial officials. It is well that the hon. member for Grandville brought up this question, because it may, and I hope it will, spur on the provincial officials to greater activity. We cannot be too careful in guarding the morals of our young, and it is shocking to contemplate the dire results if we permit the immoral literature of other countries to be spread broadcast among our youth. It is to be deplored that some of our papers supply us with illustrations of persons and happenings in the Republic which are not only coarse, but decidedly harmful in every way. They have a tendency to create a morbid appetite for that class of literature which produces the vacant mind, the coarse laughter, the vulgar speech and action, the disrespect for authority, both human and divine, the unhappiness of family life, the sundering of the marriage tie and the worship of the baser passions. We should not tolerate such papers in the family circle. They are degrading. The demand for such pictures is now largely catered to by a certain syndicate in New York. The Canadian papers which reproduce these objectionable features of journalism should not be patronized by our people, and the purpose of all Canadians should be to create a public sentiment as will make such ventures unprofitable. The Irish people some few years ago adopted a unique method of dealing with this question. There came to Dublin and other Irish cities from across the Channel what is known as the 'Penny Dreadful' literature, which proved to have a debasing influence on the boys and girls of Ireland. The legal authorities were appealed to but they were either indifferent or powerless to act. The people took the law in their own hands, and gave notice to all newsvendors and booksellers that they must stop the importation and sale of the penny dreadful, otherwise the people would be advised not to transact business with them. It had the desired effect. I trust there will be an awakening to the importance of taking action in this matter. It is not, as I have said, so much the literature of our own country, but that of foreign countries, which we have reason to dread. We must keep it out of our land if we expect that the boys and girls of our day will worthily take our places when we are gone; if we expect that the boys and girls of our day will becomingly fill their places in Christian homes, ever climbing upward to attain those ideals which will make our country rich in everything that brings true glory to a nation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Bill is impracticable.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would suggest that the second reading of the Bill might be allowed, with the understanding that the Bill will be dropped.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—That might be the right way to dispose of it, but the Bill requires more consideration. While we all admire the zeal of the promoter, and the address which has just been delivered by the hon. member from London (Hon. Mr. Coffey), still most of us must be conscious of the fact that the whole thing is mistaken zeal. The measure is one that it will be impossible to put in operation. We are not living in an age when such an idea as that can be carried out. My hon. friend's ideals are high, and we admire them, but to give them effect in legislation is a different matter. Apart from the objects which my hon. friend has in view in regard to those pictures at which the Bill is aimed, there is a greater and more important field which he has entirely failed to recognize, and that is the mental picture which we receive from reading the literature of the day. There may be room for a good deal of discussion along these lines, but as has already been stated in this debate, the law as it stands now is adequate to meet the case. Any one who wishes to enforce it can find machinery to carry out his purpose. We cannot confine ourselves to newspapers. What is my hon. friend going to do with magazines which come into this country, many of them our best magazines? If I understand this Bill, it would exclude such magazine. The hon. gentleman's ideas may be all right, but his zeal is all wrong

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I am inclined to this, that we should give this Bill a second reading. It contains some good features and I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton that it will have the effect of excluding any magazines that we should admit into this country. As I read the Bill, any magazine which would come within the scope of it ought to be excluded. There are some good features to this Bill which we should retain, and I would suggest that it receive its second reading, and be referred to a committee where it can be amended, if advisable. The hon. gentleman's idea is good and many people and newspapers in the country advocate such legislation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—The trouble is that if we adopt the second reading we thereby accept the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I am in favour of the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—After reading it the second time, all we could do is to amend it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—We are all in favour of the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—The idea the hon. gentleman has in submitting this Bill is good, and meets the sympathy of every member of the Senate, but it is one thing to introduce such a measure and another to adopt it. Legislation must be practical. This Bill, if put in force, would exclude almost every newspaper that is printed outside of Canada and many of the best pictorial and illustrated magazines. Now, to attempt such a thing would be an absurdity. We could not do it. If we pass the Bill, even restricting its operation to our own newspapers, the law would become a dead letter in less than six months. I quite approve of the idea that the hon. gentleman from Grandville has in his mind, in wishing to remove from the public press anything which might incite to crime. I understand and sympathize with that view, but I do not think he will accomplish his object by passing this Bill. It goes too far. The hon. gentleman having introduced his Bill and heard views of members for and against it, would be well advised if he withdrew it, and either late in the session, or next session, introduces a measure more practical in its form; he would probably meet with more success in the end. He must appreciate the fact that hon. members of this Chamber sympathize with him in his idea though they cannot vote for his Bill.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am glad to find that my Bill has the sympathy of everybody in this House, and I thank the House for that sympathy—but we do not make laws with sympathy alone. It is necessary not only to say that it is a good Bill, but we should pass it. If it is not a good Bill we should reject it. I am quite willing to let the Bill be read the second time now and referred to committee after Easter. In the meantime, after the debate we have had, and after the publicity that has been given the measure in the press, we will see how the public view the matter, and be in a better position to deal with the Bill after Easter. Perhaps I may deem it best to accept the suggestion of the hon. member from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) and withdraw the Bill and re-introduce it next session. I have not brought up this matter for mere pleasure; I am discharging a duty. The hon. member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Dennis) treated the Bill as a joke; but the joke is on the other side, it is a very serious matter. I have furnished proofs that it is so regarded by public men and by leading newspapers. If the Bill cannot be accepted in its entirety, we may be able to so amend it, when it goes to Committee of the Whole, as to remove the objections which have been raised. I must therefore insist upon the second reading of the Bill without regarding such as an indication that the Bill has been accepted by everybody in this Chamber. If my suggestion is not adopted, I am prepared to divide the House on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I think the hon. member for Grandville is very much mistaken when he claims the sympathy of every hon. member in this House for his Bill.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—Yesterday he put up an excellent argument against the publication of obscene pictures and yellow journalism, there is no doubt about that; but he did not put up any argument yesterday which would lead me to believe that there is anything in the amended Act which he proposes to put on the Statute Book any better than the Code as it now stands—none whatever. Will the hon. gentleman tell us what good purpose is to be served by prohibiting the picture of a petty criminal being published in a paper? I think he will admit, with me, that there are many petty crimes committed by people who are deterred from doing a wrongful act simply by knowing that in the event of such acts being committed by them, they will be exposed by the newspapers. Many petty criminals, I am sure, would rather go to prison for a short time than be exposed to their friends. The newspapers in this respect are carrying on a good campaign towards eliminating such crime as that; I have no doubt of that whatever. I sympathize very much with all the ideas the hon. member has with respect to this, but I submit that he has not, in this proposed Bill, covered the ground which he wants to cover.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—In committee we will do that.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I would ask if the mover of this Bill would agree to drop subsections 3 and 4? If he would I would vote for it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is there left?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Let us go into committee; we will discuss that, and if I can do it I shall do it with pleasure.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—If passing it now on the second reading does not affirm the principles of those two sections—

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—No; everybody may consent to it in committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does not the leader of the House think it better to let the Bill be read a second time and be disposed of in committee.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—If it is understood that we are not passing on the principle of subsection 3 and 4, I shall be willing to vote for the second reading.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—When you pass the second reading of the Bill you approve of the principle of the Bill as it now stands.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Not necessarily; not the whole Bill as it is.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I desire to say one word supporting the suggestion that I made. I am in favour of the principle of the Bill, but I think I would not be disposed to adopt the Bill in its present form, and it would have to be almost another Bill to receive my approval. I would not be disposed to make it a crime. I think that for the present all that should be done should be to make persons liable to a penalty on committing the offence which the hon. gentleman has in view.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—In committee we might accept that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Otherwise the Bill would have to be extended, and in other respects it would have to be restricted. I thought it would be wise to approve of the principle of the Bill, which is merely the general idea, and let public opinion assert itself between this and next session, and at that time the hon. member could present a Bill which I hope will receive the unanimous approval of the hon. House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The very fact of leaving the Bill to a committee to meet in three weeks, during which time the Bill will be before the public, will enable us to hear the discussion and we will know what the people want. Then we can accept the suggestion of my hon. friend, in committee. On the other hand, if we withdraw the Bill, or even if it were killed,—which I don't think it will be,—discussion would at once cease, and next session we would have to begin all over again. Hence I insist on the second reading which is just submitting the principle of the Bill as a whole without advocating any clause in particular. Three weeks from now the papers will have discussed the Bill, we will know exactly what they say about it, and will know just what position to take in that regard.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY—If this Bill were to come before me for a vote as it is, I would be obliged to vote against it; yet the object of the mover of this Bill is a good one, and deserves our best consideration. The proposal he has made—that it should be deferred until after the holidays and then taken up for consideration, giving time in the meantime for those amendments to be thought out and brought forward in the proper order—is what the House ought to do. I think the principle of the Bill has been generally accepted by every one who has spoken, and I think the proposal would give plenty of time for the Bill to be fairly considered. Then if there is anything objectionable it would be our business to throw it out.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not wish to be thought of as one giving any factious opposition to a measure contributing to good morals, but if this Senate has a reputation for any class of legislation it is that of well-considered legislation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that if we are to maintain our reputation for moderate thinking, and for well-prepared and wholesome legislation, no Bill should be placed upon the table of the Senate without being of a practicable character, one that can be enforced. There is nothing that so contributes to the non-observance of law as the placing upon the statute book of legislation that cannot be enforced. I ask any hon. gentleman in this Chamber if it would be possible to enforce sup-paragraph 3, of paragraph (a). It would be utterly impossible to do it. Are we going to assent to the impracticable proposals contained in that paragraph and have this Bill as such go out to the country? Do we not attach more value to our reputation than to permit this to go abroad to be considered by lawyers, by business men, by people of practical mind, and who will at once stamp it as visionary, and as something that can not be enforced. I am not dealing with the principle of it at all now.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Why can it not be enforced?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—For the very reason that you submit every paper published in Canada—having any pictorial representation which it may place in its paper, coming within the language of that section—to be censured by a judge. Are we going to convert the courts of Canada into courts of censorship over the press of Canada. It is absurd to think of it. Are you going to establish a tyranny, a despotism, to be exercised by the courts over a free press? No such law exists in any part of the world. My hon. friend cannot point to any country in the world having a free press, where there is anything analogous to this legislation, and to say that certain judges shall be entrusted to deciding whether this, that or the other photograph shall be published, in the press, appears to my mind as an enormity, as something that cannot be enforced. You cannot possibly enforce it as against foreign publications that come into Canada, and more numerous than our own domestic publications. Those publications come through the channels of the mail and express, and so on, not only to subscribers, but by the hundreds of thousands to dealers, and are distributed all over the Dominion. What are you going to do about those?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The hon. gentleman has nearly all that in the law already. Take clause 1, 'Any obscene document, pamphlet, newspaper, or other obscene printed typewritten or otherwise written matter,' just add to that pictures of criminals.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That comes within the law at present, but my hon. friend overlooks the fact that under clause 3 he creates an artificial crime, a new crime by statute. That is, we say to the people of Canada that we under this Bill have created a crime that never before under any moral decalogue existed as a crime. We not only say that to the people of Canada, but we say it to the people of the world that we in Canada have on this particular day created a new crime, and we are going to prevent Canadian publications from publishing photographs not approved of by the Bench. My hon. friend cannot say what machinery he can adopt that will prohibit the importation of foreign journals which are published within the law of foreign countries, from coming into Canada and being circulated, with the very class of photographs which this statute prohibits, so far as they relate to Canadian publications.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The same machinery as we have now against any obscene book, pamphlet, &c.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend not observe this—and I wonder that he cannot appreciate the point.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I see the point all right.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does he not observe that those foreign publications, newspapers, periodicals, and magazines, which by the hundreds of thousands, come into Canada, have those photographs already published? You cannot go to the judge and say: 'Here is an issue of a hundred thousand of a foreign paper with certain photographs. We want you to give us your authority, either to permit them to be sold or confiscated.' That cannot be done. It would mean tying up not only the press of Canada, but all the literature coming into Canada. My suggestion is this: If my hon. friend says that there is a principle embodied in this Bill, that is to say if there is published a certain class of photograph not contributing to good morals, and that should be surpressed, then let him mould his legislation so as to prevent the publication of those photographs in Canadian publications, and the prohibiting of their importation into Canada through foreign publications. Until my hon. friend can devise machinery which will have an equal bearing upon both classes of publication, namely domestic and foreign, then I am opposed to the Bill. I say it is futile to attempt to deal with the subject. The machinery, whatever it may be, must operate against domestic publications precisely in the same way as it would operate against foreign publications, or vice versa, because if we can flood the country with foreign publications and cannot suppress the publication of photographs in those foreign publications, then it is idle to talk of prohibiting that same thing in domestic publications. If my hon. friend will frame a Bill containing a principle contributing to good morals that can be enforced, and bring it here, I shall be glad to support it, but until he does that I shall certainly be opposed to the passage of such legislation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman expressed a doubt that any members could approve of this measure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In its present form.

Hon. Mr. POWER—All the gentlemen opposite who have spoken have said that they are in sympathy with the object of the mover of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—With the object he has in view.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Well, that is his object. One is reminded of the old saying: 'It is all very well to dissemble your love, but why did you kick me down stairs.' They all symathize with the object of the mover of the Bill, but declare that his measure should be kicked out. That is a sort of sympathy which I do not think the hon. gentleman from Grandville appreciates. The hon. leader apparently overlooked paragraph 2 (ii) which is in the existing law, which provides a penalty if one circulates or causes to be circulated any picture, photographs, model, or other object tending to corrupt morals, &c. My contention is that it would not be straining the existing law to say that it covered the case which is aimed at in paragraph 3.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the criminal law not provide for that already?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would not be an unreasonable construction of the law as it stands at present to say that it would cover the case contemplated by my hon. friend, but he wishes to remove doubt, and that is a wise thing to do. The contention of the hon. gentleman from Grandville is that the publication of the portraits of distinguished criminals tends to corrupt morals, and he produces opinions from leading newspaper men in Europe as well as America, to show that the tendency of the publication of the portraits of criminals is to induce others, particularly the young people, to imitate their example, so that they may become notorious and get into the limelight. I fail to see any substantial reason why this Bill should not be referred to the committee. The hon. gentleman says he is willing to let it go, not to be taken up in committee until this day three weeks. Meanwhile the hon. gentleman will be able to fortify himself with any evidence or opinions favouring the measure, or any suggestions to improve it, and the hon. gentlemen who are just now disposed to vote against the second reading will have an opportunity of thinking the matter over and supplying themselves with information and argument. I am sorry the rule was not observed. We should have closed the debate yesterday afternoon and we have spent the greater part of this afternoon. I am surprised at the hon. leader of the House who is generally disposed to be considerate and meet the views of gentlemen who do not agree with him, should object to this proposal which I think is an acceptable one.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I wish to say that down to subsection 2 I am in sympathy with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the law now.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—And this is embodied in the criminal law now, but I am not, and never have been in sympathy with subsections 3 and 4.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has told us that already.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—It is a new departure, and I am not willing to take another course, which will seem to indicate that I approve of the principles of those two subsections.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I am in sympathy with the remote objects of the Bill and to a certain extent with its immediate intention, but as I have to assume the responsibility of my vote on the matter, I desire to say that if we permit the second reading to go, we affirm the principle, and we place ourselves in an embarassing position: That is, we all agree to certain clauses of the Bill and disagree as to others. If the Bill passes its second reading and goes into the hands of the committee, it will come out of it so emasculated that what is left of it will be practically what exists now, actually or potentially in the criminal law. It is much to be desired that something should be done along the line suggested by my hon. friend, but I am opposed to the creation of artificial crime. I shall not got beyond the civil range now, but I say that those crimes that are so readily created, not only by the civil laws, but other laws, lead as a rule to the commission of them, and to an increase of crime, since they, being classified as moral crime, become, if the authority that enacts them is a proper one, real defects or possibly real faults. I am not in favour of augmenting those crimes. I would suggest to my hon. friend not to put us in a position either to reject his Bill at the second reading or have it come up in committee in such a form that he would hardly recognize it as a legitimate offspring, but to allow it to be dropped, and adopt the suggestion of the hon. leader, to bring in a measure next session, after mature deliberation, a Bill more to the point, which we could adopt and which would be practical.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The debate has been twice reopened. According to the rule I have a right to close it to-day. I have no objection to the discussion, because the more it is discussed the better for the country. I am sorry the hon. leader of the Government did not make his remarks before I spoke yesterday. I have the highest respects for his opinion, but if I had known his arguments yesterday I could have answered him very well. I think I have some correspondence which will show that there is a law already existing in some countries which prevents the publication of photographs of criminals. I think I have a letter or two on the subject. I should also have told the hon. gentleman that he is greatly mistaken when he says the judge will determine what kind of pictures may be published, and especially those in foreign newspapers and magazines. I can tell him that it is only necessary under the present law to complain that foreign magazines or newspapers are publishing obscene pictures, to have them excluded. We have only to apply to the court to have the law enforced, and I am only adding to the present law the provisions contained in this Bill. However, the details can be better discussed in committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As quite a number of members are opposed to the principle of the Bill contained in clauses 3 and 4, I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should strike out those two clauses now. let the Bill be read a second time and sent to a committee of the whole House, where my hon. friend can have these clauses redrafted, and possibly made acceptable to the House.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The balance of the Bill is in the present law. The only proposition I am willing to make is this: Let us have the second reading to-day, and move that the Bill be referred to a committee of the whole House, three weeks hence, when I will be ready to listen to any suggestion which may be made to render the Bill more practical—though I think myself that it is quite practicable now. I am willing to accept any suggestion which will improve the Bill, and I make this statement, that I shall not consider anybody is committed to the principle of the Bill by consenting to the second reading now. Any one can oppose the principle of the Bill, in committee or at the third reading. We are doing that every day with other Bills. In three weeks from now we will know exactly where we stand and it may be that I shall not only accept the amendment, but decide that it would be better to withdraw the Bill for the present, and introduce it in another form next session.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—The principle of the Bill is to create a new crime. We have to vote either for or against that. I want to put myself on record as against affirming that principle at the present time.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—It strikes me that it would be well to mention here an experience we had in Montreal. A year ago the archbishop of Montreal, seeing that the legislators were either unwilling or incapable of passing legislation to protect the morals of the people, called a section of the Montreal press to meet him at dinner, and there he made each and every one of them promise that in future they would not publish the portraits of criminals. He explained to them his reasons for making the request. The French-Canadian press of Montreal is almost free from this taint. When asked the reason why they insisted on publishing those pictures, the answer was: 'Well, since Mr. Brown does it, there is no reason why we should not. Competition is the life of trade.' The competition having ceased, the evil ceased. There is that improvement in our newspapers. I see no reason why we should not follow suit and devise some means whereby public morals will be protected. I am in favour of free journalism as much as possible. Let me illustrate a case in which a great deal of harm has been done. A correspondent of the Canadian press sent out the details of some divorce cases—selected material from the dung-heap of divorce—and mentioned half a dozen names of people who were either respondent or petitioners in such cases. Among them was the name of a young Canadian who had made his mark in the service of the empire, a young man that all Canada respects and admires. For some reason or other there was a misunderstanding between himself and his wife. His wife applied for restitution of conjugal rights. Whether she is right or wrong I cannot say. Here is a Canadian who has occupied a prominent position, who is branded forever as the respondent in a divorce case. We shall probably never hear the decision in the case, or know whether he was held to be in the right or the wrong.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—How are you going to prevent the publication of such incidents?

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Why publish it at all?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—That has nothing to do with this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—I dare say it has nothing to do, but it is an evil; it is a thing by which the public morals do not gain anything.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—If you are going to suppress the news, that is another story.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—The reputation of Canada is not increased by it, and after all, what is to be gained? Ten days ago a terrible murder was committed in Montreal by a gang of blackguards, who murdered one policeman, and so severely wounded another that he will very likely die. Next day a certain newspaper in Montreal published portraits of the supposed criminals, and the night after they had portraits of those supposed criminals which were altogether different from those published the first evening. They are all fictitious.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This law was not made for that case.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Simply because Brown does it, Smith follows suit, not wanting to be behind in yellow journalism; every night we are treated to these things. What is to be gained by it? The London Times does not publish portraits, and it is read the world over; you are not afraid to leave it on the table of your house where your youngest daughter can read it. This thing has gone too far. I quite admit that we should have a certain liberty; but there is such a thing as the restricting of liberty. I can cite a personal case. The daughter of a friend of mine was to be married. A lover's quarrel intervened between the two. I went there to sympathize with my friend, and when I was there the door bell rang and a newspaper reporter who had heard of the misfortune appeared. My friend said to me that he was not in a position to answer the door and asked me if I would be kind enough to take his place. I said I would do so with pleasure, and on receiving the gentleman I asked him where he got his information. He refused to state. I asked him: 'What is your object? How does a personal misfortune concern the public?' He replied that it would be quite an inducement for others to read his paper if he had a photograph of the young lady. I replied: 'I am very sorry; it is a slight misunderstanding; there is no photograph to be had, and there is no misunderstanding.' Two days afterwards the quarrel was made up, the marriage took place, and to-day the couple are perfectly happy. Now, if that picture and the details, which were childish, had been given to the press, what would have been the consequence?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The proposed Act would not cover that case or any of the cases you have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS—It has no connection with it at all.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Well, if I cannot be understood, I shall stop.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is the case.

The Senate divided on the motion for the second reading of the Bill, which was adopted by the following vote:

Bill (A-2), An Act respecting the Saskatoon and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

VOLUNTEER BOUNTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day being called:

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill 98), An Act to amend the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1908, and amending Acts.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Will the hon. leader permit this order to stand until Tuesday next. Some hon. members wish to say a few words with regard to it, and they are not present to-day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should be very glad to meet the wishes of my hon. friend, but this order has been adjourned on three different occasions to meet the convenience of the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert. Could we not put the measure through committee and on the third reading the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert could make any remarks which he may have to make.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—That would be agreeable.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1:

1. This Act may be cited as the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1914.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The minister might explain the meaning of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The object of this Bill is to extend the time for surrendering the certificates held by beneficiaries to the department, and thus receive the sum of $500. It does not extend the time for placing the bounty warrants upon land; that time has already expired. Some misconception seems to have arisen in the minds of those holding certificates as to the legislation of last year requiring them to deliver up their certificates and to get the $500 in lieu thereof. Now it is proposed to extend the time until the end of this year.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—How many bounty warrants does this affect ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think there are 48 outstanding.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Has the hon. gentleman any information as to how many people hold those forty-eight different certificates ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand that nearly half those certificates are held by the parties originally entitled to them, and I think the others have passed over to the assignees of the original parties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Sold to them, I suppose ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Are the holders of these certificates who would have been entitled to land in the first instance, now to receive this $500 in lieu of the land ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes. No longer can the holders take advantage of the warrants upon the land. That time has expired, so that those holding the certificates now, should only be entitled to receive $500.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—This only applies to South African bounty warrants ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It gives them one year longer to present their certificates.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To surrender their certificates and take the $500 from the department.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The other half of the certificates still out are held by speculators who are not able to sell them, and this legislation is helping the speculator out to the extent of $500.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It must not be overlooked that those warrants were transferable.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes, I know.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And the transferees are, of course, entitled to whatever rights the law may give them, viz.: the rights of the original holders, and while such a possibility might arise as that pointed out by my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, yet the law gave them that right.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes, they have the right. Of course it is too late now to suggest it, but the allowing of the transferring of the certificates was, in my opinion, a mistake. The moment those certificates were granted, speculation immediately started, and the scrip was held at about $1,000 if any one wanted to purchase a certificate and place it on the land. The land boom fell flat and the scrip was left on the hands of the speculators. In ordinary cases the speculators would have had to take the loss with the profit, but in this particular case the Government has seen fit—although I do not object to it very much—to redeem this scrip at $500.

On clause 3:

3. Section 6 of the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1913, is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

'6. Schedule B to the said Act is amended by striking out the figures '1912' in the twelfth line thereof, and substituting therefor the figures '1914.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain that clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The third clause makes provision for the extension until the 31st December, 1914. This is the clause dealing with the extension.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is an extension of two years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, it is only until the 31st December, 1914.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But the figures now are 1912.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, but we are repealing that date, and giving an extension of less than one year.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—From the present time?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes; the time expires on the 31st December, 1914.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—There must have been a time when this scrip was not worth anything at all; when it was not redeemable at all?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, because they had a right to file on the land. I think the right to file on the land expired then.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no land involved in this.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, but there is under the Bounty Act of 1908 and amending Acts.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Could the hon. leader tell us the exact amount of scrip held by the original scrip holders?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There are forty-eight certificates still outstanding. Of these twenty-eight are recorded in the names of duly appointed substitutes, who cannot assign the certificates or appoint other substitutes; the remaining twenty, with the exception of five, were not delivered, having been returned to the department because of insufficient addresses.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—But the twenty-eight are entirely in speculators' hands.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, in the names of substitutes. They would be transferees under this Act, entitled to the rights of the original holders.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The time is extended from 1912 to 1914. There must have been a period after 1912 when those certificates were practically worthless. There was no provision made under any statute to redeem them, or to apply them on land. I am rather afraid that a lot of scrip has been picked up by speculators for a very small sum of money, because they could represent to the original owners that they were worthless, as there was no provision made for their redemption. Now this Bill makes provision for redemption, but is $500 not too much? Speculators probably bought this scrip for $50 or $100. We should have some information as to the time that elapsed and the prices paid to the people who originally held them, for those certificates.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Last session an extension of time was granted until October 31, 1913, within which time those who held these certificates—they were then land certificates—might file upon the land or secure the $500. It was optional up to that time. This legislation no longer continues the right to file upon the land, but only gives the right to the $500.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—But there was no right to get a dollar for the scrip after October last year. It was worthless.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, upon the expiration of that time the right lapsed, but misapprehension existed in the minds of many who held script as to what their rights actually were. That is quite apparent from the correspondence which took place between the holders and the department. The impression was that they continued to possess the same force as formerly; of their being entitled to the $500 on surrender of certificates. I need not point out to hon. gentlemen the difficulty of impressing upon the public the contents of the statute. Those people seemed not to know what their rights were, but there is a finality about this, and it is not unreasonable that if those people were entitled up to 31st October last to file their warrants upon the land, or to accept $500, and not having the knowledge as to what their rights actually were, a further time should be given. It is needless to say that had they been aware that their rights would have lapsed on 31st of October last they would not have hesitated to come in. The fact of their not having come in speaks for itself.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Or their ability to get new legislation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I doubt if any of them would have waited for new legislation on account of the uncertainty of their getting new legislation, but I think this will give finality to the whole matter.

Hon. Mr. KERR—There is another view of the question which should not be lost sight of. If those who did not apply before the date named, have since applied, it does not seem unreasonable that those who have applied after the expiration of the time should get rights which others, equally entitled to them, will not receive simply because they did not make the application until it was too late. In other words, if the Government are going to open the door at all they should open it to all alike.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It gives the right to all holders of certificates to receive $500. It does not bar the right of any one holding a certificate to receive that amount for it, at any time before the 31st of December next.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Will the hon. gentleman obtain for the Senate a list of the holders of certificates, before we reach the third reading of the Bill ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Up to the 31st October last holders of certificates have the option either to file on land or get $500. Under this Bill their right is restricted to exchanging the certificate for $500. We are simply renewing part of the privilege which expired in October by saying that up to 31st December next holders of certificates may exchange them for $500. The right is confined to that.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You are making this scrip worth $500 whereas it was not worth anything after October last.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—As my hon. friend opposite has said, many people do not understand the statutes, but there are some people who do understand them; knowing that the time for using the certificates expired last October, they have been speculating in the scrip. Probably some of us, if an opportunity came, might be inclined to take advantage of such a chance to speculate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Ever since these certificates have been granted they have been the subject of speculation; many a poor fellow has sold his certificate for a very small sum. This was also the case when the Ontario Government granted 160 acres of land to those who had participated in the Fenian raid. Some obtained as high as $2,000 for the scrip; others who knew very little about its value, sold it for $40 or $50. Such has always been the case in connection with these bounty laws. People knowing the value of these certificates would go amongst the holders of them and buy them up. There may have been cases like that one mentioned by one hon. gentleman, of people who had died and the land obtained by the widows. Sometimes when their husbands died, after all the necessary papers were filed in Ontario, in such cases the widow was granted the right to locate the lands. I dare say there are many cases of that character in connection with the South African bounty. If it were at all practicable, I should take the view that has been expressed by those who desire to prevent speculators from getting those certificates, but if these speculators bought the scrip under the law, and hold it legally, I do not see very well how we can reach them.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—There is no parallel between the case of the Fenian raid scrip and the South African scrip. The Fenian raid scrip was not issued until some 55 years after the raids; consequently many entitled to the scrip were dead, and others did not know they were entitled to a share in the bounty. But in the case of the South African bounty, the scrip was granted immediately after the close of the war, and I venture to say very few of those entitled to scrip did not know their rights. Or if any were in ignorance of their rights, speculators would soon inform them. The scrip that has not been located is simply held up by speculators who knew that legislation such as this would likely be passed this session.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC, from the Committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at 3 o'clock.

VOLUNTEER BOUNTY ACT AMENDMENT.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill (98), An Act to amend the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1908, and amending Acts.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am very sorry that when this Bill came up for second reading I was unavoidably absent. I should have liked to have obtained some information from the hon. leader of the House in reference to the matter. As a matter of fact I cannot understand what object the Government has in giving a $500 bonus for this scrip; because that is practically what the thing amounts to. One of the objects in giving the scrip was to reward the volunteers who had gone to South Africa; they were rewarded by giving them a certain amount of land under settlement conditions. Such plan would be a benefit to the country because it would increase the settlement on the land; but to-day there is not one piece of scrip in the hands of the original holders. As soon as there was a rumour abroad that scrip was to be granted to the South African volunteers, speculators got busy; some scrip certificates were bought at $100, $200, and some for even less. These certificates are in the hands of a few speculators. This measure is not being passed for the benefit of the South African veterans. If it were being passed for their benefit nobody would agree to it quicker than I would. The men who risked their lives in South Africa should have some recognition, although the time is coming when we will have to stop giving these bonuses. We may have to send a contingent to Ireland some of these days; in that case will the Government give its members scrip, and redeem it later on in this way?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Which side would they fight on?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—These speculators held the certificates for high figures until the time limit was up, and something had to be done. They managed to bring influence to bear on the Government to have the time extended. Last year it was extended, but on account of the unfortunate collapse of certain speculations in western lands, the speculators find it almost impossible to sell these certificates.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Now they come to the Dominion Government and want to get their hands into the treasury and obtain $500 for each certificate of scrip.

Why should the Government of this country hand out $500 to a speculator? In buying this scrip he took his chances on it; it might have been worth a thousand dollars or it might not have been worth 1,000 cents. Like any other speculator, he bought it as a speculation. Now, when he finds that the time is up, and that he cannot sell it out in the West because the land boom is off, he comes down to the Government and says 'Open up the treasury and hand me out $500.' There is no justification for this; we cannot open up the treasury and hand out money to every speculator who gets into trouble. Every speculator in town lots out West might as well come to the Government and say, 'I bought some lots for a rise, but they didn't rise; now I can't dispose of them, and I would like you to open up the treasury, and let me get my hands into it.' Speculators in town lots have just as much right to come and ask for $500 or $1,000 on a lot, as these speculators have to ask for money on this scrip. This measure will not do any good to the volunteers who went to South Africa; it is merely intended to open up the treasury, and hand out this money to the speculators.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I thoroughly agree with the views just expressed by the Senator from Prince Albert. I appreciate the action of the Government in recognizing the duty it owes to those men who went out to South Africa to defend the interest of the empire; but why the Government should be called upon, by this legislation, to recognize the demands of speculators is more than the ordinary individual can understand. It would be a different matter if this Bill contained a provision that $500 should be paid to the original owner of the scrip—the veteran: in that case the country would approve of the action of the Government.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—To himself or his heirs.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—To the volunteer himself; or, if the volunteer has died in the meantime, to his wife, children, or legitimate heirs. These should be entitled to the recognition demanded under the provisions of this Bill. But to extend generosity to speculators, is more than the country will stand; the Government ought to be wise and prudent enough to understand that. We fully appreciate the action of any government, in recognizing the debt due to the old soldiers of the country, but we do not and will not appreciate or sanction, if we can help it, the passage of any legislation that will recognize the speculation of individuals who have rendered no service to the country, but who, on the contrary, have probably done a great wrong by buying up this scrip and depriving the volunteer of the full measure of his rights. The suggestion I have made is a fair proposition, and appeals to the honesty of people in this country. The people in the West do not want to see speculators enriched at their expense, out of the treasury of this country. The hon. leader of the Government ought to take this matter into very serious consideration. It is a matter of honesty between the Government and the people; between the Government and the soldiers of the country.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (F-2), An Act for the relief of George Gracie Smith.—Hon. Mr. De Veber.

WHITE PHOSPHOROUS MATCHES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (103), An Act to prohibit the manufacture and importation of matches made with white phosphorus.

(In the Committee.)

On the 3rd clause:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Can the hon. leader of the Government give us information as to what quantity of material for the manufacture of this class of matches the manufacturers have on hand, and what time they are likely to require to use up that material? The hon. gentleman was to have the information for us at this stage.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not understand that my hon. friend asked for information upon that point. I cannot give him the statement he desires. I do not know whether the Government possess the required information.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—My question has reference to the date at which the law will come into force. I want to know to what extent it might injure the manufacturers, if it were put in operation on the 1st of January next, instead of the 1st of January, 1916.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We might go through the Bill till we reach the last clause, which deals with this matter, and I shall make inquiry of the minister in charge of the Bill and ascertain if he has any information on the subject. We could go into committee again later on.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—What is the object in stopping the manufacture.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—People poison themselves eating the sulphur.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might instance a murder in Prince Edward Island in which a mother poisoned her three children through the use of white phosphorus. On one or two other occasions as related in court, this substance has been used as a cheap poison for the purpose of committing criminal acts; it is very desirable that white phosphorus should not be made available for any purpose.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—You might as well stop the importation of Rough on Rats, or Paris Green, which is used to kill potato bugs.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, because matches are accessible to everybody, but everybody cannot obtain Paris Green or Rough on Rats.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—People can buy any of these poisons. It is a weak argument to say that this Bill is desirable because of the fact that somebody poisoned a child in Prince Edward Island. I think we should stop the manufacture because it is injurious to the health of the people working in the factories, but I do not think we should be prohibited from importing them so long as other countries are manufacturing them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In almost every other country they have stopped the manufacture of white phosphorus. Why should Canada be prohibited from manufacturing it, if foreign countries manufactured it and shipped it into Canada? It is desirable that our legislation should place the manufacturer in Canada on as good a basis as the foreign manufacturer.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The idea of this legislation is to prohibit the manufacture of this substance because it is injurious to the health of the employees in these factories, but I cannot see any reason why we should say that these matches should not be imported into Canada.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not at all sympathize with the arguments advanced by the leader of the House. During a discussion in the House of Commons medical men testified that the fumes of these white sulphur matches were injurious to health, though in a lesser degree injurious than the harm suffered by those employed directly in the factories. If we stop the importation of everything which could be used as a poison, we would be going far afield.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the Bill go as far as to say that the material itself, white phosphorus, shall not be imported—I am not saying for the preparation of matches, but for any other purpose.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—So that white phosphorus can come into the country.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—White phosphorus comes into the country in its most dangerous state, but I do not see that the match itself, when it is prepared elsewhere, and so does not affect the health of the people of this country, should be prohibited. I am not in favour of one match more than another, but I dislike restrictions on trade except when such are absolutely necessary. Under the circumstances, the department and the leader of the Government have not shown that any benefit was to be derived from the prohibition of the importation of white phosphorus. This is a restriction on trade and Parliament ought to be very careful in putting restrictions on trade, even on matches, especially is this so when the Government allows the raw material, the dangerous substance itself, to come in. I fail to see that there is any degree of prudence in the legislation. If by the prohibition of the importation of the matches, any benefit would come to the health of the people of this country, then let it be done, but no proof has been adduced, no affirmation made that these imported matches would poison or endanger the health of the people. True, as pointed out by the leader of the Government, in a certain case this poison was taken off matches and used to destroy human life; but that is only an accident, only an incident in a lifetime, in the history of a country. What I find fault with is that restrictions of any kind should be placed on trade.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If these matches were not in ordinary use in the country, there would be no necessity of clause 4. Apparently the people of this country are using these matches and the business people of the country are selling them. That being so, while it is perfectly right to prohibit the manufacture because it is injurious to the health of some of the people who are forced to work in those factories, why should we go so far as to say that we prohibit the importation of these matches when it is not going to injure the health of the people of Canada any more than such things as Paris green or Rough on Rats. I cannot see the use of the legislation contained in this clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It may be a comfort to my hon. friend if I tell him that this legislation is practically similar to that which has passed, not only in the United States, but in almost every country in Europe. In 1906, at the International Conference held in Berne, Switzerland, the matter received consideration such as is outlined in this Bill, and an international convention was drawn up providing for prohibiting, in the countries concerned, the importation and manufacture of matches made with white phosphorus. The convention was accepted at the outset by Germany, France, Holland, Switzerland, Denmark, Luxemburg and Italy. Afterwards Great Britain came into it. In 1908 nearly all the British possessions entered into the convention; then also the United States, likewise all the colonial possessions of France; in fact there is scarcely a civilized country that has not given its adherence to this convention, the terms of which are along the lines of the Bill—prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend puts it in that way, that we are going to assist in trying to boycott or stamp out the manufacture of these matches in any part of the world—

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Made from white sulphur.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes; that is a horse of another colour; there might be some sense in that, but to say that we are going to prohibit the importation of matches of that kind, when they are used by the people here, for no other reason than that they assume that they are going to poison some children here and there, is to my mind a very foolish piece of legislation. I draw attention to my hon. friend's own statement and would like to ask why clause 4 is needed, if Canadian manufacturers are not manufacturing those matches? He says they are not manufactured in civilized countries; we must assume that they are not being manufactured in uncivilized countries, for I do not suppose any Indians are manufacturing these matches—so that, according to his own statement, none of these matches are manufactured. If so, what do we want of this clause?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In view of the statement by the hon. leader of the Government, that the manufacture and importation of these matches is prohibited in nearly every civilized country of the world, owing to the national convention, it would be curious and interesting to know what country on earth is manufacturing them. If Germany, Great Britain, the United States and nearly every civilized country in the world does not, where do they come from? Is the Government in a position to tell us where these matches are manufactured?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—By the wild men of Borneo.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—As a matter of interest, and to satisfy curiosity, the Government ought to be able to tell the country where these blooming matches are manufactured.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that it really makes any difference where they come from. I suppose my hon. friends are opposing this clause because they think it savours of protection; but, inasmuch as the Parliament of England, after due deliberation, entered this international agreement, we are quite safe in following their example.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6, providing for petition for compulsory license.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is not that a rather extraordinary step?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I pointed out the other day, the policy is an excellent one. It seems to me that no patentee should be permitted to enjoy his patent if he does it to the detriment of the community; there is no reason why the Government of the day should not reserve to itself the right of granting a license upon reasonable terms, that is upon terms as to the compensation of the patentee, to permit of manufacturers using whatever may be the subject matter of that patent. That is what this clause particularly has in view; if any one has a patent to prevent the manufacture of matches out of material other than white phosphorus, no injury is being done to that patentee if the Government should exercise discretion in issuing licenses subject to compensation being paid to him for the use of that particular material in the interests of the public.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Is that not a dangerous principle to introduce in legislation?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We will take chances on it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is just it, but as a matter of principle is it not dangerous? If I have a patent for a certain invention which may be a benefit to the human race, can anybody come and take my goods from me?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—He has to pay for it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No government can come into my house and take my goods without my consent, no matter how much profit they may yield me. Is it not a dangerous principle to introduce into legislation? May it not become oppressive on other occasions?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The public get the advantage of it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I know that, but will the Government say they are prepared to apply that principle to every patent? I am not raising any special objection, but I am pointing out the difficulty that may arise in the future. You are introducing dangerous legislation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me that this goes a long distance. The power is given apparently to the Commissioner of Patents, from whom there is no appeal; he may 'Order the patentee or other interested party to grant a license' on such terms as he 'may consider just.' There is a proviso:

Provided that the commissioner may, if he thinks fit, and shall on the request of any one of the parties to the proceedings, call in the aid of an assessor, specially qualified, and hear the case wholly or partially with his assistance.

Of course that does protect the interest of the patentee to some extent, but there should be an appeal to some court outside against the decision of the commissioner.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If, as I assume, this right is going to be granted because the Government practically takes away the business of those who have been using white phosphorus, and it is intended to provide that they can go on manufacturing with some other material, it is only fair. If the Government is going to interfere with a person's right in a patent in the public interest, then the Government should pay the man injured through the taking away of his patent rights. If a man has a patent which the Government should acquire in the public interest, he ought to be paid all it is worth.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 10:

10. Every person who refuses to admit, or who obstructs or impedes an inspector, and every person who aids and assists him therein, shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and costs.

Hon. Mr. WATSON.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Supposing he is fined $500 and does not pay it, what has the judge to do?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Criminal Code provides for that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The Criminal Code cannot make provision for a special law. All that a judge could do under this clause would be to fine the offender $500 and costs. He cannot impose a sentence of a term in jail if the fine is not paid. The criminal code cannot come to his aid. The hon. gentleman had better refer the Bill back to the department, and have it put in proper shape. He should point out the dangerous principle involved in this legislation. I wish to point out again that it is a dangerous principle to give any man the power to go into another man's place of business and take his goods without his consent, and without proper compensation. Here is a clause which is absolutely ineffective—not worth the paper it is printed on.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 11:

11. Every person who violates any provision of this Act, or of any regulation made thereunder, in respect of which no penalty is hereinbefore provided, shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and costs.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—How will the $500 be collected?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Criminal Code provides for that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Inasmuch as the hon. leader said he proposed to hold over clause 13, might we not hold this over as well? I think there is a good deal of force in the objection.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Criminal Code has the most elaborate provisions for the enforcement of penalties, and it is not necessary to repeat them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is not the slightest doubt the Criminal Code has all the necessary machinery to enforce the law, as far as the provisions of the Criminal Code are concerned, when they are violated, but a violation of this special Act is no violation of the Criminal Code as it exists to-day. Why the leader of the Government, who is a legal luminary, does not appreciate this fact, I do not know. I know whereof I speak. In certain special Acts passed by the province of Quebec, the legislature neglected to put in any provision for enforcing the penalties provided. Here is a penalty which may be ineffective.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I direct the attention of the leader of the House to the fact that it is not stated in any of the clauses that the person who does these things shall be guilty of a criminal offence. If you say that, then the Criminal Code will apply, but as the clauses stand it is possible the court might not be able to enforce the law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall look into it.

The clause was allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. GORDON from the committee reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again.

MERCHANT'S SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into:

Committee of the Whole House on Bill (21), An Act to amend the law relating to Merchant Shipping with a view to enable certain conventions to be carried into effect.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Can the hon. leader of the Government give us any idea what the present law in Canada is, with regard to these matters?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The main object of the legislation is to empower the Government of Canada to give effect to their adherence to the International Maritime Convention on the subjects mentioned in the Bill. This convention was signed at Brussels in September, 1910. As we go through the clauses, my hon. friend will see that that is chiefly the object of the Bill. The object of clause 2 and the following clauses is to bring into harmony the law in Canada, so as to permit the submission of the questions involved in those clauses to whatever tribunal may be provided for under the convention.

On clause 10.

10. This Act shall not apply to lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron (including Georgian bay), or Superior or to the river St. Lawrence above the harbour of Montreal or to vessels or rafts while navigating such waters.

2. This Act shall not apply in any case in which proceedings have been taken before the passing thereof and all such cases shall be determined as though this Act had not been passed.

3. The provisions of this Act shall be applied in all cases heard and determined in any court having jurisdiction to deal with the case.

4. This Act shall apply to any persons other than the owners responsible for the fault of the vessel as though the expression 'owners' included such persons, and in any case where, by virtue of any charter of demise, or for any other reason, the owners are not responsible for the navigation and management of the vessel, this Act shall be read as though for references to the owners there was substituted references to the charterers or other persons for the time being so responsible.

I move that sub-clause 1 of this clause be struck out and the following inserted:

This Act shall not apply to lakes Ontario, Erie, St. Clair, Huron, including Georgian bay or Superior, or to their connecting or tributary waters, or canals, or to the St. Lawrence as far east as the lower exit of the Lachine canal and the Victoria bridge at Montreal or to vessels or rafts while navigating such waters.

These are all inland waters in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—It means widening the exception to some extent. Instead of specifying the rivers and canals it rather widens the effects of that clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think it does. I have been asked by the Department of Marine and Fisheries that this should be inserted in substitution of the clause as it stands in the Bill.

The amendment was adopted.

The clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

NORTH SYDNEY HARBOUR BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into:

Committee of the Whole House on Bill (104), An Act respecting the Harbour of North Sydney in Nova Scotia.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The first clause of this Bill proposes to hand over certain property to the Government, and the second clause proposes that certain obligations shall be assumed by the Government. What is the relation of one clause to the other? Is the Government assuming larger obligations than it is receiving property?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—All those harbours are public works. The apparent ownership is simply a matter of administration. While some of those harbours are vested in trustees, others are vested in the Crown, and administered by the Crown. Whether administered under a commission or under the Crown, the Government invariably has to furnish the money for the improvement and upkeep of those harbours; whatever obligations there may be as to the North Sydney harbour, they will in all probability be represented by debentures. There may be some floating liabilities, but whatever these are, they have been subjected, I presume, to the inspection and supervision of the Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman might take the committee into his confidence and state the reason which has induced the Government to make this change. There are a number of harbours throughout the country that are taken care of by commissioners. Only last year we passed two Acts providing for the appointment of commissioners for harbours in British Columbia. I assume that there must be some substantial reason for taking the control of the North Sydney harbour out of the hands of the commissioners and placing it directly in the hands of the Government, or rather substituting—that is what it amounts to—a harbour master for a commission. The House ought to know the reason for this step. Is it the result of a request made by the people of North Sydney?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, the board of trade asked that this should be done. I may say further, as to the liabilities, I find that they are small—only nominal. They amount to $800. This step is being taken with the concurrence of all the parties interested.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a:

Committee of the Whole House on Bill (111), An Act to amend the Civil Service Insurance Act.

(In the Committee).

On clause 2:

2. Subsections 2 and 3 of section 9 of the said Act are repealed and the following subsections are substituted therefor:

2. In default of such declaration the shares of the persons so dying shall be for the benefit of the survivor, or survivors of the persons in whose favour the apportionment was so made, in equal shares if more than one.

3. If all the persons so entitled die in the lifetime of the insured, the insured may by an instrument in writing endorsed on or attached to the insurance contract, declare that the insurance money shall be for the benefit of his wife, if living, or of his surviving children, if any, or some one or more of them, or of his wife and children, or of his wife and some one or more of his children, in such proportions as he sees fit, and in default of such declaration, the insurance shall be for the benefit of his wife, if living, and of his children, if any, in equal shares.

4. If the insured survives his wife and all his children the insurance money shall fall into and become part of the estate of the insured.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Will the hon. leader of the Government explain exactly what is the alteration made in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The two features are these: Under the Civil Service Act, in 1893, female employees of the Civil Service were not permitted to take advantage of the clauses then embodied in the Act. This places them now upon the same equality as the male members of the Civil Service. In the next place, it is considered desirable to increase the amount from $2,000, which was the maximum under the old law, or under the present law, to a maximum of $5,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is right and proper.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Those are the two features of the Bill. All the clauses merely make provision for the carrying out of that change in the law.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I understand there is a committee of civil servants that deal with questions of that kind. I suppose they have given their consent to this arrangement.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is manifestly to their advantage, but I do not know whether they have given their consent to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I direct attention of the leader of the Government to a typographical error in line 24, and to another in line 9 on the second page. The proofreading at the Printing Bureau seems to be worse than usual this session; it is very unsatisfactory.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5:

5. The said Act is further amended by inserting immediately after paragraph (f) of section 15 thereof the following new paragraph:

(f 1) determining the cases, not otherwise provided for in this Act, in which a person not originally named as, but who is eligible under this Act to be a beneficiary, may be made a beneficiary; and in which an appointment of the insurance money once made may be varied.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am looking for information, and not rising to criticise; but I wish to direct attention to the fact that under the original Superannuation Act the reduction was 2 per cent, and there are still a considerable number of civil servants who came under the Act when that original Superannuation Act was in operation. As I understand this section 16, these civil servants cannot take advantage of the provisions of the Bill now before us, or of the Act it proposes to amend without paying this additional one per cent. Is not that just a little bit hard? They paid up to 1893 everything that the law required them to pay, and why should you make it a condition of their getting insurance that they should pay something more now?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The insurance is based upon actuarial tables, the same tables as are used by insurance companies with reference to the general insurance entered into by the public. It seems to me no hardship is imposed upon the employees if they secure an advantage along those lines. They are assisted by the Government in the matter, and get very much cheaper insurance under this system than they would under any plan of company insurance.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER, from the Committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (12), An Act to incorporate The North American Accident Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Pope.

Bill (82), An Act respecting the Kettle Valley Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

THE RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (B-2), an Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act.

He said: This Bill is a consolidation and revision of the existing statutes respecting railway law. The last consolidation was in 1906 (Revised Statutes, 1906, Chapter 37).

Prior consolidations and revisions were made in 1903, 1888, 1879, and 1868, the Act of 1868, however, being so far as the Dominion of Canada was concerned, a new Act.

Since 1906 twelve amending Acts have been passed. These are now consolidated with the main Act of 1906, and various alterations of different kinds have been made.

In addition to the Minister of Railways and Canals, the members of the Board of Railway Commissioners have been in close touch with, and largely in direction of, the work of revision. Very many suggestions have been received from municipal officers and other public bodies, and from railway and other solicitors, representatives of organizations of railway men and private persons, as well as from officials of the Board and Railway Department; also from a number of judges; an endeavour has been made to remedy defects which have been brought to light in matters before the courts. Much assistance has also been had from the leading works on Canadian Railway Law.

Now, it is unnecessary for me to detain the House by reviewing, or even making mention of the many sections of the Act which have been substantially or materially amended. I have before me a review of the consolidation and revision.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would facilitate the passing of the Bill, perhaps, if the reasons were given.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If hon. gentlemen desire me to point out the main changes which are being made in the law, I shall be very pleased to do so.

While it has not been the policy to meddle with the substance or phraseology of sections and clauses that have been found satisfactory, changes have been freely made in both where it was shown to be desirable, and various new provisions have been added. The arrangement of the Act, and the grouping of sections, while retaining as far as seemed consistent the same general order or sequence, has been almost entirely remodelled.

The Railway Act of Canada, or to distinguish it from Special Acts, the general Railway Act, has been a matter of growth. Its original predecessor may be deemed 'The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act' passed by the old province of Canada in 1851 (14-15 Vic. Chap. 51) founded on the English Act. Its original provisions, consisting of 22 sections, were amended and added to from time to time. There was a consolidation in 1859, a new enactment by the Dominion Parliament after Confederation in 1868, and consolidations and revisions in 1879, 1888, 1903 and 1906. From the original 22 sections in 1851, the Act had grown to 431 sections in 1906. The present Bill contains 461 sections.

The growth of the Act has consisted, not only in more complete regulation of railways and railway matters in the Act itself, and provisions for regulations by the Board of Commissioners (which was substituted in 1903 for the Railway Committee of the Privy Council), but also in the extension of the Act to a number of other than railway matters, including express business, telegraphs, telephones, power and electricity, and traffic by water between ports in Canada when carried by a railway company.

The growth in the way mentioned, and the numerous amendments of different parts of the Act, resulted in a great deal of confusion in the arrangement of the Act, and makes an entirely satisfactory and logical arrangement difficult, especially where various sections, as they often do, relate to different subject matters, and would therefore go appropriately under different headings. Much pains have been taken, however, to collect the various provisions relating to the same subject matter into one place as far as practicable, and to arrange and group the headings in such a way as to facilitate reference, and make the general arrangement as satisfactory as possible.

An examination of the table prefixed to the Bill will show the grouping of the sections, and will, it is hoped, assist in quickly locating any desired provision.

The references at the end of the sections show their source, and, show whether the section has been amended (in substance) or whether it is new. The table of corresponding sections at the back of the Bill show how the present statutes have been disposed of, and will make it easy to trace any existing provision into the new Act, or will show what has been done with any existing provision.

The chief changes and additions are.

Sections 2 (15).—Definition of lands amended so that railway companies can expropriate, and the owner can get compensation for, easements and other interests in lands as well as ordinary title. The matter was formerly in doubt.

Section 6 (c).—Paragraph (c) added to prevent evasion of board's control over traffic, rates, etc., where companies acquire lease or acquire control of, and operate, railways standing nominally in the name of Non-Dominion companies.

Section 33 (4).—Provision is made for applying the Act and the authority of the board to railways in insolvency or under mortgage or receivership, etc., as to which there was formerly difficulty.

Sections 43 and 52.—Questions of jurisdiction, and appeal from board. Power is expressly given to the board to submit questions of jurisdiction to the Supreme Court with a view to their more speedy determination and so as to avoid expense to litigants. Provision is also made for more readily and quickly dealing with appeals generally.

Section 146.—Regulation of stock and bond issues. It is provided that hereafter the issue of stock, bonds and other securities by railway companies shall be subject to control. Leave must be obtained from the board before any issue of stock, bonds or other securities payable more than a year after date or issued otherwise, than solely for money consideration can be made. The board is given power to impose terms and conditions respecting such issue, and may refuse leave or may limit the amount to what it is satisfied is reasonable and proper. The board is also given power to see that the proceeds of any such issue are properly applied and duly accounted for.

Section 152.—Agreement for sale, lease and amalgamation of railways. Subsection 6 has been added to secure more complete control by the board in such cases, with a view to preventing evasion of the Act.

Section 162. Limitation of time for construction of railways. The provisions for lapse of rights if the work is not proceeded with are made more complete.

Sections 168, 194.—Location of railway line, cutting up of cities, towns and highways. It is now provided that the board, which has much better means of examining into and ascertaining all the facts, shall hereafter pass upon the location of the railway instead of the minister; and wider powers of control are given to prevent unnecessary and injurious duplication of railways and railway rights of way. The board may, where it deems that public interest requires it refuse permission to build a new railway where it will not be useful to the public, or may compel different railways to run over one right of way, by putting down extra tracks or getting running rights over existing tracks all on the one right of way. This should prevent a great deal of nuisance in towns and cities, and should cut down the number of highway crossings and minimize the difficulty of the great problem of providing for protection and safety at such crossings.

Section 172.—Time for acquiring land by the company. Subsection 3 is added to prevent abuses complained of by reason of the company registering plans but delaying acquisition to the detriment of the land owners. The company must now acquire the land within one year, or such time as the board may fix, or lose its right.

Sections 187, 188. Use of industrial spurs. This is a new provision intended to enable the board in a proper case to provide that industries subsequently established may be served by existing spurs or branch lines. Provision is made, however, for proper protection of the existing lines. Provision is made, however, for proper protection of the existing rights of the senior owner. The forbidding of removal of spurs without the consent of the board is designed to make the control of the board in these matters more complete.

Section 189.—Establishing railway stations.—The powers of the board as to location of stations and affording of facilities are made more clear and complete.

Sections 198, 199.—New provisions added for compensation for interference by the railway with mining rights, and for examining mine workings near railways with a view to assuring safety of the railway.

Section 211.—Agreement for acquisition of land. The company is required now to register its agreement like any other person, if it desires to ensure priority.

Section 214.—Agreements between land owner and company. Express provision is made for agreements between the land owners and the company for easements and facilities in respect of the railway, such as under passes across the railway, etc., and for the granting of these at any time, either before or after construction, and for their enforcement. There were formerly legal difficulties as to these matters.

Section 216.—Notice of expropriation. The notice is now required to state the nature of the proceedings that are to be taken and the time within which the Act requires the owner to act, so that he may not be prejudiced by ignorance of the law and neglect in taking the proper steps.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Is that new matter or is it just an amendment?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not know that I have discriminated entirely in reading between absolutely new matter, and the amplification or elaboration of existing law.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—A great many of the clauses, like 146 and other clauses named in the Bill, are marked new, and the hon. leader has been reading subsections which I understand are new; but I do not understand why they are not so marked.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have not looked at the draft Bill, but all the sections to which I have referred are sections which are either new or have been amended in substance. Then we come to:

Section 219.—Company abandoning notice of expropriation. Provision is made for more simple and speedy settlement of damages.

Section 222.—It is provided that the land owner may be allowed interest on the compensation. It was held by the courts that this could not be legally done.

Section 223.—Easements and facilities to owner. It is now provided that these may be arranged (to the mutual benefit of both parties) even where the parties do not agree on the compensation and go to arbitration regarding it. This could not formerly be done, owing to technical difficulties and the lack of any discretion to the arbitrator to deal with the question of costs. There has been much difficulty and litigation over attempts to arrange these things formerly where there was not lawful authority for it, and there was difficulty in enforcing arrangements of the kind against the company where it chose to disregard them.

Sections 220, 233.—Arbitration proceedings generally. This part of the Act has been almost entirely remodelled and very materially altered. There has been much complaint both from the companies and owners about the unsatisfactoriness and delays and excessive cost of arbitration proceedings, and the unsatisfactoriness of the appeal and proceedings allowed to impeach awards.

The County Court judge, and in the province of Quebec a Superior Court judge, is now made arbitrator ex officio.

The costs of the arbitration are left in his discretion.

The absurd provision that if the award was not made within a time fixed the amount offered by the company should be taken to be the compensation, is abolished, but provision is made to prevent delay.

The number of expert witnesses is limited to three for any one party.

The unjust provision that the owner could not appeal unless the award was over $600, even though he might be entitled to ten times as much, is amended so that he may appeal when he claims more than $600. Wider powers are given the court in the appeal, and, except where more than $10,000 is involved, only one appeal is allowed, and no other proceedings can be taken to impeach the award.

Sections 240, 242.—Warrant for possession. It is expressly provided that this is not to issue till compensation is paid or security therefor paid into court; and it is provided part payment may be ordered to be made to the owner, who was in the position of having his property taken away from him and getting no money to buy other property till long after his property was taken.

Section 252.—Public passageway on railway bridge. Provision is made by which the board, in a suitable case, may order the company to construct such a passageway at the expense of the municipality or municipalities applying.

Section 256.—Provision is made for compensation to municipality where railway is allowed along a highway. Such a case will, of course, be a rare exception, as a steam railway is not permitted along a highway except where absolutely necessary.

Section 263.—Grade Crossing Fund. Provision is to be made for extending this for another five years but this will have to be first dealt with by the House of Commons.

Section 270.—Flumes and pipes across railway. This is extended to take in irrigation works.

Section 276.—Provision for replacing sliding or hurdle gates at farm crossings with swing gates; and better provision for protecting owners' enclosures when railway is being constructed.

Section 289.—Provision added giving board power to deal with hours of duty of railway employees and length and number of employees on sections, with a view to safety.

Sections 325, 335.—Coming into effect of tariffs, etc. Meaning made more clear, and express power given board to suspend tariffs pending inquiry, etc.; also references to old tariffs required to be given so that changes can be more readily seen and traced. Special freight tariffs required to be filed with board in time to be checked before they come into force.

Section 357.—Refund of Tolls. Provision is made giving board power to order the company to refund tolls illegally collected.

Section 358.—Water Traffic. Provision of Act respecting tolls and tariffs extended to all water traffic between ports or points in Canada. (It formerly only covered water traffic carried on by railway companies.)

Section 370.—Municipal control over streets and highways where new powers granted. What are usually known as the standard clauses are adopted with slight modification.

Section 373.—Lines and wires on highways-municipal control. No telegraph, telephone or power company under Dominion jurisdiction, no matter when incorporated or what its former powers were, shall hereafter put wires or poles on streets or highways without permission. If it cannot agree with the municipality the company may come to the board, which may give leave in a proper case and on such terms or conditions as it deems just. Lines already constructed are not interfered with, except that in cities and towns they may be ordered to be put underground, and more effective provision is made for putting them underground by providing for a joint board where one or more of the lines is under provincial jurisdiction.

Section 375.—Telegraph and Telephones. Provision is made for classification of telegraph and telephone messages and provision is made for a joint board to deal with long distance telephone connections when the applicant desires.

Section 386.—Damage where cattle and other animals get on railway. This has been a matter of much controversy, and the provisions regarding it have been very frequently altered. Endeavour has now been made to simplify the law and to make it more clear and explicit. What may and what may not be recovered for is distinctly stated. The burden of proof is put upon the company in respect of the exceptions to its liability and it is provided that no question of negligence or breach of duty is to affect the right to recover except as in the section explicitly stated. The effect is to make the company practically an insurer where the animals get on the railway lands and damage results, except in the excepted cases specifically stated, and as to these the burden of proof is on the company. The faulty wording of a number of the exceptions is also corrected. The general effect is to place a heavier burden on the company, but as it is the cause of the loss and is under obligation to fence its line and maintain efficient cattle guards, this is not considered unreasonable. Much fault had been found with the present law, especially in the western provinces.

Section 387.—Damage by fires from locomotives. This was also for many years a matter of a good deal of controversy. The present provision, however, seems to be regarded as fairly satisfactory, except that where the amount recoverable is limited to $5,000, and there are a number of claimants there was no provision for working the provisions out so that each would get what he was entitled to. Provisions are now added for this purpose. The section is also changed so that it is only in case where it has not been guilty of negligence that the company is entitled to the benefit of the owner's insurances.

Section 391.—Defence in actions for damages. The anomaly of allowing the railway company to plead not guilty by statute without giving particulars of its defence, like other litigants, is removed.

Section 379.—Water carriers are hereafter to be required to furnish statistics.

Section 444.—Railway constables must be British subjects.

Section 392.—Provisions are added for the purpose of making the control of the board more effective, e.g., 392.

Section 279.—Power is given the board (Section 279) to order a railway to be opened for traffic. Complaints had been made of companies sometimes delaying this improperly for their own purposes.

Section 289.—The board is given power to forbid the use of coal in any district and to order the use of electricity or such other kind of fuel or power as it deems proper.

Section 423.—Stricter penalty is provided for obstruction of highway crossings, and the company, and not the employees, is made liable where the fault is in the rules of the company.

This, I may say, hon. gentlemen, is a review of the new clauses and the amendments which it is proposed to make to the existing law.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Are not these amendments that are not marked 'new,' amendments to the Bill that have not been codified? They are marked at the bottom, 'amendments,' and where to be found; and the hon. gentleman has been reading them all the way through as though they are new elements put into the codification of the Railway Act. I did not presume they were new matter entirely in respect of that. Parts of the law that we are to regard as changes are marked 'new' at the bottom, but are really amendments that are not in the Railway Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In Committee that can be clearly explained. I therefore move the second reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I beg to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Gordon:

That this Bill be referred to a committee to be composed of members of both Houses, and that the members on the part of the Senate be: the Hon. Messieurs Béique, Bolduc, Bowell (Sir Mackenzie), Bostock, Gordon, Kerr, Power, Ross (Middleton), Thompson, Watson, Young, and the mover.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Would the hon. gentleman give us some explanation of what he proposes to do in this matter?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In moving that this be sent to a joint committee of both Houses, I do it at the instance of the Government. The Government has considered this question and has looked at it in this light; that investigation into the different subject matters that will come under our consideration in dealing with this Bill will necessarily involve a considerable length of time. The Bill is very largely the product of suggestions that have come from municipalities, boards of trade, the different courts of the different provinces, railways, the different branches of railway labour on the many railways in Canada, and from other bodies. The Government has many communications from all these parties, expressing a desire to appear before a committee of Parliament, so that the committee may have advantage of their views. It therefore may occupy a very considerable length of time in giving a proper consideration to the many principles involved and the many changes which it is proposed to make. It would be unwise to duplicate this work. It would be unwise to have this Bill sent to the Railway Committee and to have that body hear the various interests, and then to report the Bill and have it go down to the Commons, and to have the Railway Committee of the House of Commons, or to have a select committee of the House of Commons likewise hear the same people.

The Bill is peculiarly a Bill that, under normal conditions or under other circumstances, would be dealt with by the House of Commons. It is peculiarly a measure that would originate with the House of Commons more than with the Senate, for this reason: Members of the House of Commons are very much more closely in touch with the various interests involved and dealt with in the Bill than members of this Chamber. Many of the subjects dealt with are what might be termed popular measures, measures which have been obtruded, so to speak, upon the attention of the members of the House of Commons. Consequently it is only the popular Chamber that would, under ordinary conditions, deal with subjects of this kind; but it was pointed out that the difficulty might be overcome by both Houses sitting together as a joint committee, both Houses having the advantage of the interchange of thought and of ideas which would necessarily take place in a committee made up of representatives from both Chambers. In addition to that, the committee would have likewise the advantage of hearing the various parties interested upon all those subjects alluded to ventilate their views, and to make such representations as might convince the committee.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—How many members of the House of Commons would there be?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall come to that in a moment. This procedure is not novel. We have precedent for it. Many years ago the revision of the statutes was submitted to a joint committee of both Houses.

Sir John Thompson in 1892 referred the Bill to codify the Criminal Law and the Canada Evidence Bill to a Joint Committee of the two Houses, but he did not discuss the question of the Joint Committee when making the motion, 'Hansard' 1892, vol I. p. 1319 ib. 2008 with reference to Evidence Bill. The Evidence Bill was considered by this committee but was not passed until 1893. There were 24 members of the House appointed on the committee and what is now Rule 11 had to be suspended to enable so large a committee to be appointed. In the Senate the motion was made by the then Premier Sir John Abbott, but he did not discuss the matter at any length. He only said:

> It has occurred to us that it would be advantageous if a Select Committee of the Senate were joined with the Select Committee of the House of Commons in order that we might participate in the consideration of the details of the Bill and so be in a position to pass it through this House without delay, and it is not improbable that it may be late in the session before it gets through the other House. With that object in view I move for the appointment of this Select Committee of the House of Commons.—(Senate 'Hansard,' 1892, p. 156.)

In Bourinot's Procedure page 401 it is stated:—

> The practice of appointing joint committees of the Senate and House of Commons on various subjects on which united action is desirable has been found to work most advantageously. Such committees are now appointed every session with respect to the Library and Printing of Parliament. In 1885 a Joint Committee was appointed to examine and report upon the consolidation of the statutes. In 1892 the whole Criminal Law was considered and codified in the same way.
>
> No positive rule exists as to the exact number to be appointed from each House. But it is now generally equal. In the British Parliament the two Houses appoint an equal number.
> The House of Commons, however, will not consent to unite their committees with that of the Senate when the matter is one affecting the revenue or public expenditures.

In the case of the revision of the statutes in 1885 the motion was made in the Senate by the Government leader there, Sir Alexander Campbell, and twelve senators were appointed (Senate 'Hansard', 1885, p. 302). Twelve members of the House of Commons were also appointed but when Sir John A. Macdonald made the motion in the House of Commons it was opposed by Mr. Blake and carried only on a division. (Commons 'Hansard' 1885, p. 776.) Mr. Blake's main objection was that a consolidation of the statutes was not a proper thing to be dealt with in a Joint Committee.

The Criminal Code was submitted to a committee of both Houses. There are hon. gentlemen in this Chamber who will doubtless remember the time when the Criminal Code was submitted to a Joint Committee of both Houses, and although there was very great disparity in the number of the representation of this Chamber as compared with the Commons, yet one of the members of this Chamber, the late Senator Miller, was chairman of that committee. As between the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England, both strongly favour joint committees. I have before me a list of subjects dealt with by the House of Lords and the House of Commons under the system of joint committees, and I shall take the liberty of reading that list in a minute or two. I may say in passing that when this subject, many years ago, was being discussed in the House of Commons, the late Hon. Edward Blake, who then opposed the sending of the revision of the statutes of that day to a joint committee of both Houses, for reasons which were then apparent, set out what he considered should be done in the case of legislation that might be advantageously dealt with by joint committees of both Houses, and the following is an extract from his speech on that occasion:

Well, obviously, where the solution of the question is one dependent upon evidence, and evidence is to be taken twice over, unless there be some arrangement, that is a good reason for a joint committee to arrange in some way or other for the regulation of that class of business in such a manner as shall not necessitate the double taking of evidence. And so with regard to some customs of policy in relation to private Bills which are matters of permanent and business regulation more than of legislation, matters of private right more than of legislation: as for example, as to the system and plan of amalgamating railways, and the arrangement with reference to the Metropolitan railways, there have been joint committees.

In England there was no instance of the appointment of a joint committee from 1695 to 1864, as under the old rule now abolished the Commons had insisted upon having double the number of members on the committee that the House of Lords had.

According to May the modern practice of having equal members from the Lords and the Commons began in 1864 when at the instance of Mr. Milner Gibson a joint committee was appointed on the railway schemes of that session affecting London; and that since then joint committees have been repeatedly appointed.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Will there be the same number of commoners as of senators?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall come to that later.

The following is a list of such joint committees given in the foot notes to May:

ORIGINATED IN HOUSE OF LORDS.

Parliamentary deposits, 1867.
Despatch of public business, 1869.
Parliamentary Agents, 1876.
Stationery Office, 1881.
Government of India.
Private Bills (Memorandum of Association).
Statute Law Revision Bills.
Statute Law revision and consolidation .
Electrical Energy (generating stations and supply).
House of Lords and Commons permanent staff.
Railways, Ireland (amalgamation).
London Underground Railways.
Sunday Trading.

ORIGINATED IN HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Railway Companies amalgamation and Tramways (Metropolis).
Railway transfers and Amalgamation Bills.
Channel tunnel.
Debates in Parliament and Private Bills legislation.
Railway rates and charges Provisional Orders Bill.
Electric and Cable Railways (Metropolis).
Canal rates, tolls and charges, Provisional Order Bills.
Electric Powers (Protective clauses).
Dublin Corporation and Clontarf Urban district Council Bills.
Municipal Trading.
Queen Ann's Bounty Board.
Widows and Orphans of Soldiers and Sailors.
Presence of the Sovereign in Parliament.
Housing of the working classes.
London Water Bill.
Municipal Trading.
Port of London Bill.

These are some of the subjects with which the Parliament of Great Britain deals, under a system of joint committees. If this subject came up in the Parliament of Great Britain, it would come under one of the headings I read, and would be dealt with by a joint committee of both Houses. Now, permit me to say that I think it would be a distinct advantage to deal with this Bill in this particular way. There is no reason whatever why this Chamber should not approach the subject with the greatest possible confidence in the representation which would come from the House of Commons. That committee, whatever its number may be, will be selected from the House of Commons with due regard to the knowledge of its members upon such a subject, and to their standing in that Chamber. It seems a distinct advantage for this Chamber to join with the House of Commons in dealing with a Bill of such magnitude as the present Bill, and one necessarily involving the length of time which it must take in hearing the various bodies which will come and the representations which will be made before the committee. Some hon. gentlemen have asked as to the number of the Commons Committee. That I cannot say, for this reason: It will be for the House of Commons, when a message goes from this Chamber to that Chamber, to take action thereupon; and it is my intention to move, following the motion which I have made:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the formation of a joint committee of both Houses to examine and report on a Bill of the Senate entitled 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act,' and inform them that the Hon. Messieurs (giving names of the Senate Committee) will act on behalf of the Senate as members of such joint committee should the House of Commons agree to its creation.

We must leave it to the discretion of that House. That House will then send a message back to this Chamber, and if they should demand a larger representation than, in the judgment of this House, would appeal to its confidence, it is then for this Chamber to express its dissent therefrom. It would be very unwise for this Chamber to seek to dictate in any way to the House of Commons. I presume that after the discussion, which will now take place upon the motion which I have made—that it be sent to a joint committee—your judgment will be obtainable from the views which you will express as to what the representation of the Commons should be, and I, of course, shall not hesitate to represent to the Prime Minister, who will have charge of this Bill when it goes into the House of Commons, that the views of the Senate are in accordance with those which you may express respecting the number of Commoners who should be appointed on that committee.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of my hon. friend on his proposal for appointing a joint committee of both Houses to deal with this matter. I feel that it is very desirable that the business of the country should be facilitated as far as possible by hearing the evidence and any arguments that parties should desire to present before Parliament on the different clauses of this Bill, and that we should do away with any unnecessary repetition of any of the evidence or of the arguments that may be presented to us.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Had my hon. friend been able to see his way to proceed in this matter as was indicated by Mr. Blake on the occasion to which he refers on the consolidation of the statutes in 1885, it would have been quite satisfactory to my hon. friends on this side of the House and to myself. But I understand from the remarks of the hon. leader of the Government that he proposes to go further than that—that he is not willing to limit the terms of his joint committee to hearing the evidence and arguments, that those interested may wish to present to that committee. He proposes to go further and permit the committee to deal with the clauses of the Bill and report the Bill with amendments which the committee may suggest to the House. I cannot agree to that ,because a great deal of discussion might arise over matters brought before the committee which probably might result in a condition of things that instead of facilitating the passage of the measure through both Houses would rather interfere and possibly prevent its passage. If my hon. friend had looked back to the time that he has mentioned, in 1695, when these joint committees of both Houses in England were first adopted, he would find that a certain amount of friction arose on account of the number of members representing the Commons being greater than the number representing the House of Lords. Although there is no actual statement of that made in the authorities, we might almost say that the reason for allowing his system of dealing with Bills in joint committee to fall out of practice in 1695, was largely due to the fact that the number of members from the Commons was usually double the number from the Lords. In 1864, when the procedure was renewed in England, it was specially stipulated that an equal number of members should be appointed from each House on a joint committee. The result was that when those committees met, the chairman of the committee had simply a vote the same as any other members of the committee. He had no casting vote, and consequently any question that was brought before that committee on which the committee could not agree, was negatived. There was another system of procedure which was adopted, possibly as the outcome of the condition of things mentioned. I refer to a system that was proposed on the 19th and 20th May, 1794, when a question came up in the English Parliament as to a joint committee for the purpose of dealing with the question of the King's health. It was pointed out by some hon. members of the House of Lords at that time that they did not think on a question of that kind it was advisable to have a joint committee, because questions might be proposed which the members of the House of Lords might think were not advisable to deal with. Consequently a suggestion was then made that instead of appointing a joint committee in that way, a special committee should be appointed by the House of Lords, and a special committee by the House of Commons, and that those special committees should have power to communicate with one another from time to time. A procedure of that kind overcomes the difficulty that possibly might arise where you have a number of members of one committee larger than the number of the other. I therefore would move to amend the motion to read as follows:

That the said Bill be referred to a special committee of the Senate composed of the Hon. Messieurs Béique, Bolduc, Bowell (Sir Mackenzie), Bostock, Gordon, Kerr, Power, Ross (Middleton) Thompson, Watson, Young and Lougheed, with instructions to examine the said Bill and hear the parties interested therein, with further instructions to communicate from time to time with the special committee of the House of Commons if such committee be appointed for the purpose, and report upon the said Bill to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I have paid close attention to the remarks of the leader of the Opposition, but he has failed to convince me. He agrees with the leader of the Government in this House that it would save a great deal of time if we had a joint committee, but he seems to fear that if the House of Commons would take part in a joint committee with us, they will have more representation than the Senate would have in it, and that our views might not prevail. But supposing the House of Commons should have a larger number of members on that committee than we have, I do not see how it could do any harm. I do not believe it could be possible for the members of the House of Commons to force the members of the Senate to adopt the Bill, as it comes back from the committee. We all agree that it would save a great deal of time if we had a joint committee. Instead of a Senate committee receiving delegations, which would afterwards have to be received by committee of the other House, the delegations would be heard only once before a joint committee. Should the representatives of the Commons on the joint committee succeed in carrying amendments to which we would object, we will have the right later on, when the report comes before the House, to amend it and put our views on record. For these reasons I do not think it would be right to oppose the appointment of a joint committee. We shall have the same rights to put our views on record and to make necessary amendments to the Bill. Then, if the Commons is not satisfied, it will say so. I do not think it would be just to force numerous important delegations from railway corporations, boards of trade, and municipalities to come twice to Ottawa for the purpose of stating their views on this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—We all agree that with joint committees, time would be saved in hearing evidence, if any is to be submitted, and in hearing arguments if any may be offered, it will tend to facilitate business and save time. We are also agreed that it would be advisable to facilitate the exchange of ideas and opinions upon the Bill. But where we differ is on this point, whether this should be done by a joint committee, or by two separate committees, one of the House of Commons, and one appointed by this honourable House. A committee is appointed for what purpose? Either for the purpose of hearing evidence and reporting the evidence taken to the House, or, with instructions to report upon the Bill. Now this is the course which I understand is suggested by the hon. leader of the Government, that the joint committee which he proposes shall not only hear evidence and report it, whatever it may be, but that it shall be a joint committee for the purpose of amending and reporting upon the Bill. When a committee is entrusted with that important duty, it is because the House to which the report is made, may have the benefit of the opinions of the members of that committee. It is very important for the House to have the opinions of members of the committee who have had the opportunity and have taken the trouble to study thoroughly the measure referred to them. I call the attention of the Senate to the illogical position, suggested. If that course which has been suggested should be followed, what would be the result? The result would be that the report which would be made by that joint committee to this honourable House would not be the expression of the opinion of the members of the committee belonging to this House and nominated by this House, but it might be the opinion of a committee composed almost entirely, and at any rate overpowered, so to speak, by the committee of the House of Commons. Supposing the House of Commons would appoint thirty or forty members on that committee, when there would be ten or twelve from this House,—the report would then be the report of the forty members, and the report might be altogether adverse to the unanimous opinion of all the members of the committee belonging to this House. It seems to me it would be illogical, and that it is unreasonable to suggest that this House be placed in that position. This House would not obtain the opinion of the members of the committee appointed by this House, but they would have the opinion of members whose opinions might be adverse entirely to the opinions of the members of the committee belonging to this honourable House. The very reason which has been urged by the hon. leader of the Government, that this Bill belongs mainly to the House of Commons, that it is a measure which comes within the province of that House, is a reason which should strike the mind of all hon. members; which might make them fear a committee report adverse to the opinions of this House. Therefore, the logical and reasonable course is for both Houses to appoint their own committee. Let each House decide upon the number of members which will form its committee, and let each committee be instructed to communicate with one another for the purpose of hearing evidence if necessary, for the purpose of hearing arguments and for the purpose of exchanging views and ideas. This is necessary in order that our committee may report to its own House, and may be in a position, in reporting, to say that such and such clauses of the Bill meet with the approval of the majority of such committee; and that such other clauses of the Bill do not meet with the approval of the majority of such committee. It leaves to the committee appointed by this House the important duty of reporting their own opinions as to all the different clauses of the Bill, and not bringing before this House opinions which are not their own opinions. It is true that in 1885 a joint committee was appointed by the House of Commons and by the Senate, but it was for the purpose of considering the report of the commissioners appointed to consolidate and revise the statutes of Canada. It was quite a different thing. A commission was appointed for the purpose of revising the statutes, and that joint committee was appointed for the purpose of examining into the report. On that occasion there were 12 members of the committee appointed by each House. The number appointed from each House was equal. In 1902 it is true another committee was appointed for the purpose of considering the Criminal Code. There were seven members appointed by the Senate and some twenty-three appointed by the House of Commons, and there were three or four reports made by that joint committee, which was a committee of forty members. There were some four or five different reports made, and these were of course, the reports of the forty members. The Senate had not the benefit of a report on any of those occasions from the members of their own House.

For these reasons I would be disposed to support the amendment of the hon. member from British Columbia, and I would hope that the Government would see its way to accept of that course. For my part I am disposed in this case, as in every other, to give to the Government as much control as possible on legislation, but that control must be consistent with the autonomy and dignity of this House. I do not think it would be consistent either with the dignity of this House or the true interests of the country, that this House should appoint a committee and instruct it to act in such a way that the House would not get the benefit of the report of the committee belonging to and appointed by this House, and would, instead, have the report of another body entirely.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Neither the main motion or the amendment fully satisfies me. I wonder if the motion of the hon. leader of the Government could not be altered so as to invite the other House to appoint an equal number of members to be members of the committee. I think we have precedents for that; we have a joint committee for the Library, where there is an even number of members of both Houses. If that could be done it would at once relieve the situation.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Will the hon. gentleman pardon me, if I ask one question. Does he believe it would be proper for this House to dictate to the other House as to the number of men that they should appoint?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I am not talking about dictating. I know very well what is good usage. I am simply suggesting whether it is possible for the motion to invite the House of Commons to c -operate in the way outlined. My hon. friend understands the difference between inviting and dictating. I suggest inviting the House of Commons to appoint an equal number of members. That would be proceeding diplomatically and averting what may bring the whole machinery to a full stop. There will be nothing irrelevant, nothing at all in the nature of a dictation, in submitting that an even number be appointed. In that case, I believe that my hon. friends on the other side of the House would be agreeable to such a joint committee. I am afraid of this, that the members of the other House, acting upon our proposition which defines and limits the number of members on our side, may appoint, say twenty or thirty; then it would be very difficult for us to act jointly in such a disproportionate joint committee, and trouble will arise again. It is true that in the joint committee appointed for the examination of the Criminal Law there were two or three times the number of commoners to that of the senators, but having been on that committee I remember distinctly that it was stated that all the members of the bar of either House would be appointed. Thus there was no prejudice; the committee was composed of a special class of men, and the commoners having a larger number of members of the bar in their House than the Senate, they necessarily had more members on the committee. There was nothing in that to give dissatisfaction, while in this case I surmise there will be difficulties in the way. On the other hand, the proposition of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia postulates what the other House is going to do. We cannot do that; that would be dictation.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They can do what they like themselves.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The amendment assumes that the other House will appoint a special committee for the purpose. How are we to know that they will appoint a special committee ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It does not make any difference.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I presume if this were adopted it would be followed by a special message to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is premised that they will appoint a committee. I believe that before we act upon the proposition of the hon. leader of the Opposition—which in my view is more defective still than the one of my own leader here—it should be ascertained whether the other House will have a special committee before we make any such allusion, and leap, as it were, in the dark. I will therefore ask if it be not possible for the leader of the Government to move along the lines of a humble and deferential suggestion inviting the other House to limit the number of the members on the committee, so as to tally with ours.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the hon. the leader of the Government had limited his motion to the appointment of a joint committee for the purpose of hearing evidence and representations from parties interested, I for one, and I believe the majority in this Chamber, would have been disposed to say amen to such a proposition. But my hon. friend goes further. He asks that that joint committee once appointed, after hearing the evidence and hearing the parties interested, make a report to both Houses. That is, I think, where the line of cleavage appears. What is the effect of a delegation of the work of this Chamber to one of our standing committees? It is that that standing committee, after examining the Bill, reports the opinion of a majority of that committee; and when a committee is composed of say twenty, thirty or forty members of this Chamber and has studied minutely a Bill and makes a report, it means that the majority of the members of that committee have decided in favour of the Bill in a certain form. On the other hand, if the motion of my hon. friend were carried, what would it mean ? That this Chamber would delegate to a committee, composed of members of the Commons and of this Chamber, a Bill which would be reported to this Chamber and at the same time to the Commons, but reported to us by our colleagues, who would have to admit that on perhaps some of the most important clauses of the Bill they were unanimously against the Bill as framed. They would practically be reporting the work not of a committee of this Chamber, but of a committee of the other Chamber. It is true that this Chamber could then modify that Bill and refuse to acceed to the report of that committee, but we would not then be more advanced than we were before starting on this work. It seems to me that the amendment proposed fully safeguards the principle of the autonomy of this Chamber, and at the same time allows both committees to work in common, for our committee would have leave to communicate from time to time with the special committee of the House of Commons, if such committee be appointed for the purpose. What would follow if this amendment were carried, and if the House of Commons appointed a committee to deal with this Bill concurrently with the committee of the Senate? Those two committees would meet, would decide to hear the interested parties, and if it pleased those two committees, after deliberating, to meet again in the same chamber and run through the Bill to ascertain the various opinions held by those two bodies, possibly our committee might come back with a Bill which had been approved concurrently by the committee of the House of Commons and the committee of the Senate. But at all events, whatever position is taken by our committee, it will be the voice of a committee of the Senate which we will hear when the report is made, and not possibly the exclusive voice of the House of Commons. I believe that we are reaching the end which my hon. friend has in mind by agreeing to the appointment of a committee which will thus come in contact with a committee of the House of Commons; and we will save time by holding only one inquiry. On that point I simply repeat the words that have fallen from the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique).

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It has been my privilege very often to say in this House that as much as possible public Bills should be dealt with by the committee of the whole House, the Senate. It seems to me we are getting altogether outside the autonomy of the legislature when we propose to delegate a public Bill to a special committee. It has been the experience that private Bills are sent to special select committees; but public Bills should be dealt with by committees of the whole House. That has been the principle and the practice ever since there have been two Houses of Parliament. Of late it has become a habit to delegate public Bills, which involves coming back to the House and going over the whole work again. I do not believe such custom expedites matters at all, but that on the contrary we are very much worse off. We have well defined rules now, and legislation has been carried on satisfactorily without joint committees. I have to say, like the hon. gentleman from Moncton, that I do not think that either the motion of the leader of the Government, or of the leader of the Opposition in this matter exactly meets my views. I believe the idea embodies a bad principle. They talk about duplicating work; but there is no duplication of work if the evidence is taken down. On all the divorce Bills of the Senate that we pass, we simply send reports down to the Commons with the evidence. If this Bill originates in this House, and we find it necessary to call evidence on certain points, that evidence can be taken down and printed, and thus benefit of that evidence can be had. Hon. gentlemen seem to forget that this is a public Bill, and as a public Bill the House of Commons and the Senate should know enough about public matters to be able to deal with it. We are dealing for the whole public, not for any special interests; and we should be able to understand the public business well enough to get information where these interests can give briefs to any members, to any senators, so that their views can be put before the House or a committee of the House. We are not going to hear everybody; we will hear only a limited number of people, those who have some special object in view, but we are legislating for the whole country, and we should try to get along with the present lights of the House of Commons and the Senate without calling in all sorts of experts to occupy the time.

When the Insurance Bill was sent to the Committee we had one expert who alone occupied the attention of the committee for two whole days, and when he concluded the committee did not agree with anything he suggested. It was a pure waste of time.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The committee can shut them off any time they like.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—They are too polite to do that. I believe I am in a hopeless minority, but I really believe if the Senate would go through the Bill there would be very little on which we would have to consult other people or ask for expert evidence. After the Senate passed the Bill it would go down to the House of Commons, and I believe they could deal with it also, because hon. gentlemen must remember we will only hear from certain classes and we are legislating for the whole public. If we go on in the same way as we proceeded before, if any special evidence were taken it could be printed and used in either House afterwards.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no objection to the motion provided this measure is placed first on the Order Paper after third readings.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (O-2), An Act for the relief of Bertha Hetu.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

LONDON AND PORT STANLEY RAILWAY BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR moved the third reading of Bill (64), An Act respecting the London and Port Stanley Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I ask the hon. gentleman to let this Bill stand until next week. Some parties in London have asked me to make this request.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—I have no objection to allowing the Bill to stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is a House of Commons Bill and this is the third reading, so that there is nothing more to be done with it. It will be ample time if it is dealt with early next week. I do not want to delay this Bill, but it is desirable that these people in London should have an opportunity of making inquiry, and satisfying themselves as to the provisions of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—The Bill stands in my name, but I introduced it on behalf of the hon. member from Bruce, and perhaps he might wish to say a word on the subject.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY—I regret that the hon. member from London (Hon. Mr. Coffey) is not present, because it was at his request that I took charge of the Bill. He is familiar with the local conditions at London, and could explain the Bill better than I could. The object of the Bill is to give the necessary authority to the city of London to lease and operate the Port Stanley railway. This proposal was submitted to the electors of the city of London in October last, and received a substantial majority of votes. The Bill passed the House of Commons; it was introduced here, and sent to the Railway Committee. By request it was permitted to stand for a week, in order that the solicitor from London might be present and explain the Bill. The solicitor attended the meeting of the committee; no serious objection was offered, and the parties behind the Bill are anxious that it should be passed as soon as possible. This is a short line of railway, its bonds are practically all held by the city of London. The city is desirous of obtaining the necessary authority to lease and operate the road. The city is doing this to protect its investments, and also to get better railway facilities. If there is any valid reason why this Bill should stand I shall consent, but I should like to know the objection to it before I consent to postponing the third reading.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I live a long distance from the city of London, and I am not familiar with the local conditions; nor do I know what the objections to this measure may be. Under these circumstances all I can do is to voice the request that is made by these people, that the Bill be allowed to stand until they have an opportunity to inquire into the situation. It would be an unfortunate thing for us to pass a Bill which is on its face rather an extraordinary Bill, and then find we have made a mistake. It is not a usual thing for one municipality to be operating a road through half a dozen other municipalities.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR—There are municipal rights involved which may or may not have been considered. There is nothing, so far as I can see in this agreement, which takes any notice of that at all; on the contrary the city of London is authorized to lease this road and to operate it—a business entirely outside of its own jurisdiction. This road runs from London through the city of St. Thomas, where there are a whole cluster of ordinary railways grouped together and meeting. It passes through St. Thomas; and on its way from London to Port Stanley through a dozen other municipalities. One municipality is to be clothed with authority to operate a road, and to have railway powers and various things of that kind. Now there may or may not be rights to be protected, and there may or may not be objections to the proposal; all I can say is, it is a novel thing, it is the first time I have ever heard of one municipality being authorized in that way, to exercise all the powers of the Railway Act through other municipalities. I am not pretending for a moment to argue the question one way or another, but simply to say that on the surface it is something which ought not to be hastily passed until there is an opportunity to present objections—should any one have any—so that we may hear what they are. If there is no objection the Bill will go through without any bother. All I ask is that it may stand for a few days.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Have any of the municipalities along the road taken objection to the passing of this Bill? The only objection I have heard raised to it is that some parties were interested in another line. We know that the railway in question had really been in a state of bankruptcy until the city of London, by vote of the people, raised sufficient money to get control of it; the road has been an incubus on those who have been running it. What evidence is there, can the hon. gentleman tell us, of the objections which have been made to the passage of this Bill, and by whom? We heard nothing of these alleged objections in the Railway Committees of either the Commons or the Senate.

Hon. Mr. KERR—All I can say is that I cannot tell what the objections may be. Personally I know nothing about the local conditions of the matter except in the most general kind of way. I do know that this is the first time that the Parliament of Canada has ever attempted to authorize anything like this Act. There is no precedent for it in the books; there is no precedent for one municipality being clothed with all the authority, and all the powers of the Railway Act to pass through half a dozen other municipalities, and cross other lines of railway. I know of no cases of the kind, and if the hon. gentleman can show me any precedent I shall willingly admit that I have overlooked something. I am just as much of a stranger in the locality as the hon. senator from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell); but having been asked by people in London, who represent not only themselves but other people, to get the Bill to stand a couple of days until inquiry can be made about it, I make the request, and it is a most unreasonable thing to say that the Bill must go through.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.—Is it not strong presumptive evidence that there is no objection to the Bill, when objections were not taken to it either in the Commons or the Senate?

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY—The hon. senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr), wishes to let this Bill stand for a couple of days. This Bill has been before Parliament for a month or two, and there was ample opportunity to bring objection to it before the Railway Committee of the House of Commons or the Railway Committee of the Senate. However I am willing to let it stand until Friday. The hon. gentleman will thus have ample opportunity to get the information he wants by Friday, by telegraphing for it.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I want the hon. gentleman to understand that I am not going to get anything; I want an opportunity for people to look into the Bill, which, so far as I know, may be a blank letter to them, up to the present time. It is not in the interest of myself or anybody I know, but it is in the interest of the public that I make this request: a good many municipalities may be interested. We are at an early stage of the session. There is no hurry about it; there is no emergency urged for doing anything to-morrow or the day after. Under the circumstances all I would ask is that it should stand until those people could communicate. They may not communicate with me; they may communicate with the hon. gentleman from Bruce, or with other people here; that is a matter for themselves to decide, and they may not communicate with anybody; I do not know anything about it; but they want an opportunity of seeing the Bill and seeing what it is. Surely the Parliament is not going to refuse these people an opportunity of seeing it. I ask that the Bill stand until Tuesday of next week. It may be said that the House will not be in session on Tuesday next. That is not my fault or the fault of those unfortunate people who may want to make inquiry. Next Tuesday, if the House is in session, would answer every purpose that those people have asked.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—I move that the Order be discharged and that it be placed on the Order Paper for Friday. Then if the hon. gentleman has objections that he can offer, as coming from the people of London, and if the objections are substantial, we can leave the Bill until after the adjournment. I understand the House will adjourn on Friday until the 15th. As I understand this Bill, there is an old charter under which London has secured all the necessary rights from the different municipalities.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The question as to postponing the Bill has been settled now by the statement of the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill. The hon. gentleman from Toronto is mistaken in saying that there is no precedent for a Bill of this nature. Two or three years ago we had a somewhat similar Bill coming from the town of Guelph which we dealt with and on which we reported favourably. But whether there is a precedent or not, I fail to see why a municipal corporation should not be placed in as advantageous a position as a private company. This matter was considered in the Railway Committee the other day, and the Railway Committee were satisfied, apparently almost unanimously, that the Bill was one which should go through. I fancy the gentlemen who have been communicating with the hon. gentleman from Toronto knew that the Bill was before our Railway Committee. Indeed action was postponed on the Bill from one meeting of the Railway Committee to another. I wish to state that, after Friday, I shall not be in favour of any postponing.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The Bill was referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, and when it came up at the first meeting of the committee after it had been referred, it was found that objections were made by the law clerk to some of the provisions of the Bill. These objections seemed to be worthy of consideration, and the committee postponed taking action on the Bill until its next meeting. The parties interested were notified of the objection, and the solicitor of the city of London came before the committee, and clause by clause the Bill was threshed out. Two amendments were made, neither of them of a very important character. Neither this House nor the Committee on Railways, Telegraph and Harbours can be charged with undue haste. On top of that, this report was presented to the House last Thursday, and you can see again that there was no undue haste when its adoption was only moved yesterday. The House is always anxious to get new light on any legislation; we cannot be charged with railroading the Bill with undue haste. I am not rising for the purpose of objecting to the postponement of the Bill, but I wish to make clear the fact that the parties now objecting had a fair opportunity of being heard before the Bill was finally disposed of in the committee stage. It is for the purpose of clearing the committee of the charge that they acted with undue haste, and did not allow interested parties to be heard, that I have risen to speak on the Bill at this stage. I have no objection to postponing the third reading of the Bill, if new objections are to be presented. I am sure every hon. member would be glad to consider any objections that might be advanced, and try to make the legislation as complete as possible.

The motion to postpone the third reading of the Bill was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (F-2), An Act for the relief of George Gracie Smith.—Hon. Mr. De Veber.

Bill (No. 111), An Act to amend the Civil Service Insurance Act.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

THE RAILWAY BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Lougheed that (Bill B-2), An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, be referred to a Joint committee of both Houses and the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Mr. Bostock.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—We have before us two propositions, both of which embody a principle I am not willing to accept, relating to a public measure of such importance as this. These two propositions are practically to the same effect. The first, from the hon. leader of the Government, is to have a joint committee of both Houses appointed to examine and report on a Bill of the Senate. The amendment to that proposition provides that the Bill be referred to a special committee composed of so and so, and to examine the Bill and hear parties interested therein, with instructions to communicate from time to time with a special committee of the House of Commons—if such committee is appointed—and report upon the Bill to the Senate. The propositions are very much alike. As a matter of principle I do not agree with the proposition to have a joint committee specially appointed for the purpose of passing upon a public Bill of such importance as this one. It is very true that we have already some joint committees, as, for example, the Joint Committee on Printing, and the Joint Committee on the Library, but these are rather exceptions, and are matters on which there can be no difference of opinion, and in which both Houses are equally interested. On a question of this kind, I do not like to have joint committees, for the very reasons which have been given by the hon. member from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) and the hon. member from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand). I do not see any practical difference between the two propositions; the very reasons which have been urged against the first proposition may be urged against the amendment. I would not so strongly object to the main motion if it had been provided that the committee should be formed of seven members of each House—an equal number—and if the committee were formed to study the Bill, take evidence, amend the Bill, and report upon it, and that each committee should report to their respective Houses. Neither the main motion nor the amendment mentions the number of members to be appointed from the other House, and according to arguments of the hon. gentlemen from De Salaberry and De Lorimier, it would be very dangerous, because if the majority of the members of the committee were appointed from the other House, we would have a report from the other House. According to the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier, it is the voice of the other house we would hear, and if the Government is not prepared now to tell us what that number of members from the other House will be, then I do not think it will be any use to appoint the committee. The hon. leader of the Government and the hon. leader of the Opposition in this Chamber have given us the history of these joint committees, and the citation from Bourinot by the hon. leader of the Government shows that in the Imperial Parliament the representation of the two Houses on these committees is generally equal. The citation reads as follows:

> No positive rule exists as to the exact number to be appointed from each House, but it is now generally equal. In the British Parliament the two Houses appoint an equal number.

So, practically speaking, if the Government is not prepared now to say that an equal number of members will be appointed from each House, we cannot accept the joint committee. It has been urged that this course should be adopted on the grounds of economy, because otherwise evidence would be taken in both Houses, whereas by the appointment of a joint committee, there would be a saving of time. Neither proposition gives power to give evidence. Perhaps they will have to come back to the House to ask for authority to take evidence. Therefore, we see at once that this committee will be of no use. However, supposing the committee has a right to take evidence; if we call witnesses before a committee composed of seven members of this House, and thirty or forty of the other House, as probably will be the case, it will take three or four times as long to obtain the evidence as it would if the evidence were taken before a committee of this House, as has been done in the case of other Bills. Before a committee of this House, we will have no purpose other than to serve the public good, but we must admit, especially those who have been members of the other House, that even with a desire to serve the public good, the members there always have to serve their political interests, or their parties. Before a committee composed of both Houses, the members of the other House will lead in the matter. They will ask a lot of questions suggested to them by the representatives of the railways passing through their counties, and numerous questions to which we might object; but they will ask the questions, and take double the time necessary to make the inquiry, and to no purpose or benefit. Even if they had authority to make an investigation, and to hear argument, even with the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, the inquiry will serve no good purpose. For these reasons neither the main motion nor the amendment can be productive of good results; no good reason has been given for the appointment of a joint committee. The result would simply be that the members of this House would be superseded by the greater number of members from the other House. If that happened, according to what the hon. member from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) says:

They would practically be reporting the work not of a committee of this Chamber, but of a committee of the other Chamber.

That may happen, but if there were an equal number of members of each committee there would be at least a chance to hear the voice of this House. But if the committee were formed with a larger number of members of the other House, the report would be the voice of the other House, and then what would happen? This would happen, according to the hon. member who moved the amendment who said:

I cannot agree to that because a great deal of discussion might arise over matters brought before the committee which probably might result in a condition of things that instead of facilitating the passage of the measure through both Houses would rather interfere and possibly prevent its passage.

Though, as I said, the very reason given in support of the amendment, is still stronger when applied against the main motion, it is still a very strong argument as applied against the amendment itself, because if the amendment is carried we shall not know how the committee is formed. I do not see why either the amendment or the main motion did not provide that the House of Commons should name seven or eight members,—a number equal to the number of senators—to form a joint committee. It may be said, and was said yesterday, that we must not dictate to the other House, or ask them to appoint just so many members. I do not see what dictation there is in that. I do not see the difference between sending a message to the other House and asking them simply to appoint a committee, or in adding to that, 'Will you appoint a committee of seven or eight members, as we are doing in this House?' As a matter of principle I am not in favour, generally speaking, of joint committees; we had better paddle our own canoe here, discuss our Bills, prepare them, amend them, then send them to the other House, with the evidence and documents and arguments. Generally speaking, we ought to be absolutely free from any interference from the other House, but if we are going to join with them, let us do it on an equal footing, and ask the House of Commons committee to be appointed with the same number of members as this House. I would like to go further, and simply join with the other House for the purpose of taking evidence, examining the documents, studying the Bill, and then let each committee report to its own House respectively. In doing that perhaps we might take the report of the committee from the other House, and place it beside the report from this House, and each House would have a chance to make a report which would be of some value to the public, and as the hon. gentleman who spoke before me said, we would get the benefit. I would much prefer that some hon. gentleman should move an amendment that the Bill be referred to the Railway Committee as usual. I do not like, myself, to move a sub-amendment, but I would much prefer, and be prepared to support such an amendment. It is the tradition of this House either to refer Railway Bills, and especially important ones, to the Railway Committee or to a Committee of the Whole. But if we sent this Bill to the Railway Committee, they could hear witnesses, and call evidence from the railway companies and boards of trade. We cannot do that without an attendance of 12, 15 or perhaps 25 members of the House, who will certainly disagree, and we would not be in a position to discuss the Bill as well as if we were left alone here, where we could prepare a better Bill for the country, and for the public interest. I am in favour of calling together the parties most interested in railway matters, and making, with their aid, a good Bill. Then we can send such Bill to the other House with all the evidence, and ask them to do better if they can. When we shall have done that work, the other House, I am sure, will be absolutely satisfied. I differ from both the mover of the main motion, and the mover of the amendment, and I am going to vote against both of them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The House is under a debt of gratitude to the leader of the Government. He has succeeded, after long years of pleading with his colleagues in the Government, in securing from the Government of the day the introduction of a Government measure in this House in its original shape. He has succeeded in obtaining the consideration of a most important measure, and for that we owe him our thanks. I am sorry at the same time that the hon. gentleman was not left a free hand by the Government, and that he was obliged, because I do not suppose he would undertake it himself personally, acting on behalf of the Government, to have a string attached to the Bill. The hon. gentleman introduced the Bill and got it as far as the second reading, and his statement, which I believe was a collaborated one, that is himself and the members of the Railway Department staff and the Department of Justice staff, impressed me very much. I admit candidly that if a vote had been taken at that stage of the Bill, I would have voted with him. But, after giving his very lucid explanation of the Bill, instead of taking this House into his confidence, he asks the Senate to do what? To have the Bill withdrawn from the table by the string thereto attached, and referred to a joint committee of both Houses. That committee would then take charge of the Bill instead of this honourable House. To my mind that smacks of want of confidence in the capacity and intelligence of the Senate. What have the Government to be afraid of? Why not permit the Senate to consider the clauses of the Bill? The string attached to the Bill was pulled by the hon. leader of the Government in the shape of a motion to refer it, not to this House or a committee of the Senate—a course which would have commended itself to every member of this House who wants to maintain its independence, its dignity and its standard of intelligence. What motive underlies that move I am not called upon to say, but it is a crafty one; there may be a trap in it for all I know. What is the Government driving at? It honours us with the introduction of the Bill here but refuses us the consideration of the measure. Is not that a peculiar position in which the Government intends to place us. After all, what does your joint committee mean? It means that we would have ten or twelve representatives from the Senate to meet thirty or forty from the House of Commons. Up to the present no one knows what the number will be: but the number makes no difference to me. What I want to uphold here is our independence and our ability to judge the Bill on its merits. That is the principle at stake. The hon. leader of the Government thinks we should accept this proposition because it would save a little money, and the time of witnesses interested in the Bill. These are paltry considerations to offer for the sacrifice and surrender of senatorial rights and obligations. I am not prepared, and I know that many of my colleagues are not prepared to abdicate our right to consider the Bill, to supervise and amend it, to reject or adopt it as seems fit to us, according to our consciences, and acting in the public interest. We are not prepared to throw aside our obligations in regard to public legislation. It is true the hon. leader of the Government tried to inveigle us into accepting his motion by saying; 'you know this measure is one which would more properly pertain to the House of Commons.' What measure pertains to the House of Commons, that does not equally pertain to this House? The measure in itself is a popular measure and the Senate is here to see that popular rights are safe-guarded, so that the hon. gentleman's intimation does not appeal to me. He is destroying the very ground on which he is standing himself. I have asked myself what did he mean by intimating to us that this Bill pertains to the House of Commons more than to the Senate? Is it because members of the House of Commons would be interested in certain provisions of this Bill, that it would affect their constituencies, and that in a joint committee in which the Commons had more representatives than the Senate, the Commons would prevail? I am not prepared to say that that is what he meant, but I read between the lines. I am putting our friends on their guard; very often we have to read between the lines of what the hon. gentleman puts before us. He has the iron hand with the velvet glove —be careful, beware! Suppose this Bill did go before a joint committee of twelve senators and thirty or forty members of the House of Commons, what would it mean? I would be prepared to accept the motion if it simply referred the Bill to a joint committee for the purpose of hearing evidence, and reporting the same; but I am not prepared to give that committee the right to amend the Bill, to revise it to their own satisfaction, and then have it reported to the Senate where it would be almost impossible to change it. And suppose we did throw aside the amendments and provisions, new or old, introduced by that committee, what would happen? When the Bill would go back to the House of Commons the answer of that House would be—'Why the Senate has no right to re-amend this Bill; the Senate has no right to change its provisions or introduce new provisions. The Senate was a party to the compact in the joint committee.'

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Where would our independence be? That is the position we would be in if we had to deal with the report of a joint committee of Parliament, invested with power to take evidence and report on the Bill. If the object of the motion of the hon. leader of the Government is simply to give the joint committee of Parliament power to take evidence, then it is all right, but is new evidence required? The hon. leader of the Government told us yesterday in his very able speech that all evidence had been taken by the department, by the officers of state; that the railway companies had been heard, that the boards of trade of the country, the railway employees and the farmers of the country had been heard; that every interest bound up in railway transportation had been consulted. Upon these representations the Bill was drafted, and I must admit that the explanations given by the leader of the Government as to the amendments proposed to this Bill, struck me as fair and just. If all that evidence has been heard before the Government, and the Departments of Railways and Justice, why in Heaven's name should we go over the same thing again before a committee? Either the statement of the leader of the Government is adequate or it is not. If he says all these interests have been fairly heard, and justly considered, and that we have no need of any more evidence, all that is required now is to draft a Bill for the serious consideration of this House, clause by clause, to find if it coincides with the old Railway Act, as far as that Act goes. If there are any errors, typographical, clerical, or otherwise, or if there is something lacking in regard to the rights of the public, or in regard to the interests of the railway or navigation companies, surely this House has enough intelligence and common sense to remedy defects in the Bill without further evidence. The statement of the leader of the Government is to be accepted, and I accept it, that reports from all bodies in this Dominion were heard before the competent authorities in regard to the provisions of this Bill; and that the draft was prepared after these representations were made. Therefore, why should we take evidence before a joint committee? That brings me to the amendment which says that we will refer this Bill to a special committee, no names given, to take evidence in regard to the provisions of the Bill, but it does not say, 'With power to take evidence.'

Hon. Mr. FORGET—It does not even say that the committee is to take evidence.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then it is weaker than I thought. What right has this Chamber to delegate its powers on a matter of that kind? If the suggestion were to take evidence and report on it, I would be in favour of it, but only on the ground that fresh evidence was necessary. But that question will only arise on the assumption that the statement that the leader of the Government in this Chamber is not to be accepted. If the hon. leader makes it clear that all the evidence necessary to be obtained for the proper drafting of the Bill was not produced before the competent officers, then we would be in a position to demand that fresh evidence be taken, but not just now. The proposition made by the hon. leader of the Government is a contradiction of his original attitude in introducing the measure. As I stated in my opening remarks, he is to be congratulated on having secured from the Government the privilege of introducing this measure in the Senate. I have this to say, the proposition of the leader of the Government is a negation of his first act in introducing the Bill. I do not hold him personally responsible, as he has to voice the decisions of the Government on the floor of this House. I know very well that personally he would not introduce a Bill with a string attached thereto, in order that it might be taken from this House and thrown into the maws or the jaws of a House of Commons committee. Now we want to save ourselves from that position, and we are prepared, or at least a number of us are, to do so. So far as the amendment is concerned, I have practically the same objections to it as the hon. member from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette). It does not appeal to me, unless reasons are clearly given that it is necessary to send this Bill to a special committee. I shall not stand for any public Bill of this importance, or any public Bill whatever, being sent to a special committee, when the Committee of the Whole should deal with it, as its obligations impose. Why should a special committee have the power to revise a Bill of this importance and then report on it to this House? Where would the balance of the eighty-six members be, while the ten or twelve on the committee were supervising or revising or amending this Bill? They say: 'When the Bill comes back with the report from the committee, you will be able to discuss and amend it.' I have heard that so often during the past ten or eleven years since I have been in this House, that I am tired of hearing it. We all know how difficult it is—shall I say how impossible it is—for this House to reject the recommendations, or reverse the decisions of the special committee appointed by itself.

Who in this House can remember any distinct occasion when a special committee appointed by this House made a recommendation which was rejected—except the Divorce Committee, and that only once or twice in my experience? As a public man, wanting to see and hear what is going on, I am not prepared to refer a Bill of this importance to a special committee: a Committee of the Whole is quite capable of dealing with it. In 1904, when the Railway Act was introduced into this House—coming from the House of Commons with a large majority, recommended by the Minister of Railways of the time, the late Hon. Mr. Blair—was it sent to a special committee? Was it sent to the Committee on Railways? No; it was taken up by the Committee of the Whole; and what happened? That Government Bill, the most important measure introduced into Parliament for a number of years, was taken hold of by the Senate and dissected in every one of its provisions; so much so, that out of 257 or 260 clauses in that Bill the Senate amended 96 of its most important provisions. Out of those 96 amendments made in the Committee of the Whole, it is true there was a contest over 24. The Bill was sent back to the House of Commons with the 96 amendments, and the Government of the day, all-powerful as it was, with a most powerful minister behind the measure, had to accept 72 of them; he rejected only 24 of our amendments. We sent them back and said they would have to go; and, remember, all this was done by the Senate with a Liberal majority of at least forty, and against a Government measure of its own party—not against, but for its own party and its own Government. When it went back to the House of Commons for the second time there was a conference between the two Houses—that is what I call a joint committee. And what happened in that joint committee was that in the so-called conference 12 further amendments were admitted by the House of Commons, making 84 in all. The Senate, the conquerors in that joint committee, allowed the House of Commons to reject 12 of the Senate amendments. Now, that was done on a Government measure, on an important Bill, a more important Bill than this one, for this is only a consolidation, a revision of past Acts, while the Railway Act of 1904, under the Hon. Mr. Blair, was an original document. This present measure is important in itself, but not as important as the Railway Act of 1904; and we are asked by the leader of the Government not to undertake its consideration, not to undertake its revision; we are seriously asked by the Government of the day to practically transfer our rights, our powers and our independence to a number of gentlemen from the House of Commons. Surely the Government can see that that is not a fair ground upon which to place the Senate; surely they will see that, after asking us to take charge of one of its important Bills, it is not fair for the Government to withdraw it in the way it is trying to do, under a veil, under a cloak, the veil and the cloak being that it would facilitate matters, it would relieve the country of expense by having the evidence heard before the joint committee, that they would not have it heard over before the committee of the Senate and then before the committee of the House. Well, when they get down to an argument of that kind it is not one that can appeal either to the Senate or the country, in view of the fifty millions that are going to Mackenzie and Mann, in view of the thirty-five millions the Government was ready to spend in the building of Dreadnoughts, and in view of all the other millions that the Government is spending foolishly in various parts of the country. It looks as though the Government were trying to obtain the surrender of the rights of the Senate under false pretences. I am not looking at this matter from a party point of view; I do not consider this a party measure in any respect; there is no party politics in it, and there should not be any vote on it as a party measure; it is simply a question of administration. So far as I am concerned, I do not view the action of the hon. leader of the Government or of the hon. member for Monte Creek (Hon. Mr. Bostock) as a party move in any sense. I am viewing the question from the standpoint of principle, and endeavouring to safeguard the rights of the Senate, believing there should be no surrender of those rights under any circumstances, or for any consideration of paltry economy or want of time. If it were necessary I would suggest that both the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition withdraw the motion and the amendment and leave this Bill to go to the Committee of the Whole; and, if found necessary after it goes there, that evidence be required before a decision can be reached, that it will be in the power of this House to take it out of the hands of the Committee of the Whole and send it to the Railway Committee for further consideration. By taking that action we shall maintain our dignity, preserve our independence and safeguard our rights.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I do not agree with the speaker who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Cloran) that this Bill is of so little importance that it should pass through the Senate. by referring it to a Committee of the Whole. and that the Senate could do this subject justice. The subject is of vastly more importance than the hon. member thinks, and I shall be able to show the House that it requires a very great deal of study and an exhaustive consideration.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—Hear. hear.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—My opinion is that a Bill of this nature should have been presented to Parliament at the opening of the session, so that we could have had all the time we require to study its provisions. In respect to the committee, I, personally, have no strong objections to a joint committee, but I cannot think that one appointed as suggested would have any right to make a report to this House.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I question whether the Senate could accept a report from a committee that was appointed by the other branch of this Parliament. The committee that we appoint would be the only committee that could report to this House in matters that might have been referred to, or considered by the committee itself. I do not find any objection to a joint committee for the purpose of taking evidence. We have a committee of that kind in our Divorce Committee. The House of Commons send certain of its members to be present at the taking of evidence by that committee, but the Senate gets no report from a joint committee. The Senate has all the powers of a legislative body, and I am in favour of maintaining our autonomy in the fullest degree. The Bill before us ought to be considered by a Senate committee. I have no objection, with a view to saving time and expense, that a joint committee should listen to the evidence, but when the question of making a report to this House arises, those members representing the Senate should deliberate and consider and make a report on their judgment as to changes and amendments in respect to the Bill. The Senate and the House of Commons are clothed with all the necessary powers for legislation in themselves, and the Supreme Court of Canada and the High Court of Ontario might as well sit together in judgment on litigation, in respect to their findings, as that this House and the other Chamber should jointly consider questions and the result of their findings be reported to the Senate. This matter is of serious import. I listened to the leader of the Government when he introduced the Bill and the hon. gentleman said to the House these words:

> Since 1906 twelve amending Acts have been passed. These are now consolidated with the main Act of 1906 and various alterations of different kinds have been made.

I find that this present Bill in its consolidated form is the work of a professional gentleman from Ontario, who has been employed for nearly half a year in the compilation of this work. I find also that instead of being merely a consolidation of the Railway Act, that twenty-two new provisions are added and substantial amendments are made to 101 sections of the Railway Act, as it stands to-day. Talking with the gentleman who made this consolidation, with the assistance of the Railway Board, I found that some amendments were simply changes in the phraseology, but a good many of them amend the substance of the Act, making it an entirely different enactment. I, therefore, regard it as of greatest importance that this question should be thoroughly and fully considered, and this Bill should not become law this session—it is too important, too far-reaching in many of its new provisions. I do not agree with the hon. member who has just spoken, that the new provisions of the Bill meet with our approval. This question should be dealt with very carefully. We did handle a large quantity of legislation in the Insurance Bill; we devoted many weeks to that measure; and this Bill, likewise, requires a good deal of careful study, and a great deal of individual information, from people who are perhaps far better able to understand and advise us, in respect to some of its provisions, than we would be in a committee by ourselves. I say individually that this is no light question, and that this Senate should carefully consider, in all its phases, just how they shall deal with this problem. While the joint committee could meet, while we could consent to their meeting to hear evidence, in my opinion the Senate could not constitutionally receive a report from a joint committee so organized.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—In the regular course, this Bill might have been dealt with by a committee of the whole House, or referred to the Railway Committee, or to a special committee. That has not been done, but a somewhat novel proposition has been made by the leader of this side of the House to refer the Bill to a joint committee. There must be a reason for that. The reason assigned is that boards of trade all over Canada, municipalities, railway companies, and railway unions representing the men, have sent in, and are sending in applications asking to be heard on various provisions of the Bill. For that reason, instead of following the regular practice in dealing with Bills in this House, it is proposed to refer it to a joint committee. I do not understand that the object of this proposal is to save the time either of this House or of the other House. I do not see that you would save any time by that, because an hour on the joint committee, means just as much as an hour on the committee in the House of Commons. Where you gain is in allowing the boards of trade, municipalities, railways and railway unions to come here and kill two birds with one stone—you allow them to appear before a committee of both Houses at one time. The railways of this country have very extensive interests, and this is a very large country. The boards of trade that come here from Vancouver, Calgary, or Sydney; or the railway union people from those places, have to travel long distances. Therefore if we could do it without impairing either the independence or dignity of this Chamber, it would be a wise course to adopt—to have these hearings before a joint committee, although not necessarily to take evidence. I doubt very much if there is evidence to be taken at all under oath. The motion is simply to refer it to a joint committee. The committee for this House is named; the committee for the other House is not. We shall not know, I suppose, until we hear from them, whether they propose to appoint the same number as we appoint, or a larger number. We do not know what they will do. It is just possible they will follow the practice they have in England, and simply name an equal number. If that course is adopted, the objection of a number of hon. gentlemen to the joint committee will be removed. On the other hand the Commons may name twice as many. If they do it would be open to this House to do either of one or two things: if the Senate think it unfair, they can retreat from the position, or they can proceed, knowing that no matter what the report of the committee is, they are not bound to adopt it. We may assume that the whole twenty-four members of the House of Commons on the committee voted one way, and the twelve members from this House voted in another way, or there might be any combination of numbers; but I do not understand that this House is necessarily bound to adopt a single line of the report when it comes back. Therefore this House is not running any risk at all, whether the House of Commons names the same number of committee members we name, or a larger number. I do not think that the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition deals with the difficulty. I do not think he meets squarely in the face the reason assigned by the hon. leader on this side of the House for the appointment of the committee. He appoints a special committee to consult, or as he puts it, with instructions to communicate from time to time with the committee of the House of Commons. I do not see any object in that. There is no saving of the time of these bodies that I have mentioned, nor is there any saving of the time of the members either of this House or of the other House. There would not be a saving in the other case, as I have already pointed out. This is peculiarly a measure falling within the line of cases which are suitable for joint committees. I understand Mr. Blake's contention—the hon. gentleman in his remarks said that he thought, if the hon. gentleman had followed the lines indicated by Mr. Blake he would have agreed to it—but I understand the reason assigned for this is the very reason assigned by Mr. Blake as a justification for a joint committee. Nor does it fall within that class of cases that the hon. gentleman refers to as having been dealt with by the House of Lords, as being one of those subjects with which that House would not deal. As a matter of fact it is a question that this House deals with almost every day that it sits, and I am sorry that the amendment has been moved; I would much prefer if the hon. gentleman had made a motion on the lines of what the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier mentioned the other day, in which he argued that the right thing to do would be to discuss the entire measure in Committee of the Whole. In that way we could have raised the question squarely whether or not the Government is going to save the time of these bodies I have mentioned, by having one hearing, or force them to have two hearings, or more than two. For these reasons I do not see why we should not accept the motion of the hon. leader of the Government in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I listened to my hon. friend who has just spoken, but he has failed to throw any new light on the subject, that I can see. He has not given any good reason why we should have a joint committee to deal with this question. He says there would be just as much time taken by members of the House of Commons on that committee as there would be on a committee of their own House, and the same would apply to this House; the only difference is that the evidence would not have to be taken twice. There is no necessity for taking the evidence twice. We have dealt with measures of this kind before. We dealt with the Grain Bill and it took more time than this Bill will take. We examined witnesses on that measure and we had stenographers reporting the evidence. It was printed, day by day, and handed to members of the House. It was published in pamphlet form, so that when the discussion of the Bill came before the House, every hon. gentleman had the evidence before him, and could make up his mind on that evidence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And the Commons used the same evidence.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I quite agree that this is a very important measure. Transportation is the most important thing we have to deal with in this country. Canada is a country of magnificent distances; nothing affects the general welfare of the people, as much as transportation. For that reason a great deal of care should be taken in the discussion of this Bill. The hon. leader of the Government wishes to save time; why then did they not bring down this measure at the opening of Parliament? The Government incubated two years over it. I have gone over a great many clauses of the Bill, and I know something about it, and I find that one-half of the clauses are taken from a Bill which I have had before this House for two years. They have changed the phraseology some, and inserted the provisions in this Bill, and now they say, 'those are our ideas.' If the Government wanted to give all the attention they claim is needed to a matter of this kind, why did they not bring the measure down earlier in the session. I understood from my hon. friend—and we all thought there was not sufficient work to do in the Senate—that some Government legislation should emanate in the House; my hon. friend brings down this measure because we can give it more attention than the more busy House of Commons. I venture to say, notwithstanding the statement of my hon. friend yesterday with reference to this being a measure which should be handled by the other House, that we could deal with the Bill better than the Commons. I have acted on committees of both Houses, and I venture to say this House is quite as able, and a great deal abler, to deal with questions of this kind than the other Chamber. I shall give the reasons for this belief. Nearly every man in this House should be an expert on all kinds of legislation. In the other House you have an election every four years, and this brings in new men; many men sitting in the Commons do not know the liffer-ence between an anglebar and a crowbar —and yet they will tell us that they are more capable of dealing with a measure of this kind than we are. I venture to say this House can give such questions more time, thought, and experience, than they would receive in the other House. It all comes down to the question of not hearing the evidence twice. There is no necessity for that. If this measure goes to committee in the regular way it will receive all the attention there that is required, and the evidence will be printed, if the proper motion is made. The hon. leader of the Senate yesterday made the following motion:

> That this Bill be referred to a committee to be composed of members of both Houses, and that the members on the part of the Senate be: the Hon. Messieurs Béique, Bolduc, Bowell (Sir Mackenzie), Bostock, Gordon, Kerr, Power, Ross (Middleton), Thompson,, Watson, Young, and the mover.

To do what? I am responsible to a portion of this country, and I am not going to hand over my right to discuss this measure in committee, to any person. My hon. friend knows very well that if this Bill is referred to the Railway Committee of this House, or even to a special committee, when other members of the Senate wish to be heard the committee will grant them the right. They can take part in the proceeding, in the same way, as members of the committee, except that they cannot vote. The conclusion we arrive at must be the conclusion of the committee, but no person will object to members who are not on the committee asking questions. The witnesses can be examined, and the committee will arrive at a conclusion. I do not see any good reason why this measure should be dealt with in any other way than ordinary measures of this Senate are dealt with. This is not a political measure. The hon. leader said yesterday:

The Bill is particularly a Bill that, under normal conditions, or under other conditions would be dealt with by the House of Commons.

This House is quite competent and has a right to deal with a measure of this kind as well as the other House. The hon. leader of the Government says that this is peculiarly a measure that would originate in the House of Commons rather than in the Senate, for the reason that the members of the House of Commons are more in touch with the various popular interests. That might be a good reason why the question should be dealt with in the Senate. Political influence might come in if it were taken up in the House of Commons. This should not be a political measure; it is a peoples' measure, a bulwark of the people against encroachments of railway corporations. My hon. friend said:

Members of the House of Commons are more closely in touch with the various interests involved in this Bill than the members of the Senate.

I do not agree with my hon. friend. Then he says:

Many of the subjects dealt with are what might be termed popular measures.

Do we not deal with popular measures in this House? Every measure introduced in the Commons has to come to this House, whether it is a popular measure or otherwise; my hon. friend will have to give us some stronger reason for supporting his resolution. He wants to submit this Bill to a committee without furnishing any statement of what he proposes to do. He mentions the names of the experts of this House who are to be members of that committee, but he does not say who will be the members from the other House. The Senate will act wisely if it sends this Bill to a special committee—to a special committee of this Chamber or to the Railway Committee, where it can be carefully considered. When it passes here and goes to the other House, the Commons can deal with it as they see fit. This is the most important measure brought in by the present Government since they came into power. The Railway Commission was appointed for the purpose of protecting the public against corporations, and we should give the commission any power it requires for the proper discharge of its functions—the protecting the public. That is what this measure should do. My hon. friend says that time is pressing, but we must take that statement with a grain of salt. The session is young yet, and we can deal with this Bill in a short time, and send it to the House of Commons. If we had not this measure to deal with, we would have to adjourn for want of something to do.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—With the leave of the House I would suggest that this matter be deferred until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Why?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In order that the leaders on both sides might draft a resolution which would be satisfactory to the House. From an exchange of views that I have had with some members of the Senate, there is a consensus of opinion that the Senate should appoint its own committee, and that the committee should make an independent report to this House, but that this should not prevent the two committees meeting together, examining the Bill, and ascertaining if they are not in agreement upon certain clauses of the measure. That seems to be the feeling prevalent in this House, and if that course is taken, it will be merely a matter of wording the resolution. It would be worth while deferring the matter with the hope that we may arrive at an agreement.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Is the hon. gentleman authorized by the leader of the Government to make that suggestion?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am making the suggestion on my own authority. The leader of the Government is quite competent to speak for himself.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—Ever since I have been a member of this House we have had full power to revise and amend measures according to our judgment. It was so even in the case of that formidable document, the Bill for the construction and management of railways, and I cannot understand that we have reached a point where we require new machinery to do that kind of work. We have full power to-day to deal with the Bill, clause by clause, in the Committee of the Whole. Why, then, is it necessary to have a joint committee of the two Houses to deal with this Bill? We do not know how the House of Commons will be represented on a joint committee. Having confidence in this House as it is now constituted, the House where we sit to-day and do business, we do not require any additional consideration, any additional forces to be introduced into the Senate to deal with a question of this kind; it is altogether a novel thing if we are to have an addition made to our authority and force, to do work of this kind. It is for us, in the position in which we stand, and with the powers entrusted to us, as a supreme court—as we are in Canada—to do this very thing which we are empowered to do. Being independent, we exercise our independent judgment, and we should sit upon this question as a Committee of the Whole and give expression to our opinion. We do not want the opinion of a committee of a dozen, or two dozen, or three dozen, but we want the united convictions of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—Let every man have an opportunity of expressing his opinion as to what change ought to be made, or ought not to be made. A Bill of this kind, with so many clauses to be considered, talked over, and viewed from various standpoints, cannot be considered in a hurry. It cannot be done by half a dozen or a dozen of men. The measure will require a very great deal of time, to take it up clause by clause, if we are to come to a wise conclusion. We wish to do by this Bill the very best thing that can be done for the people of the country, generally. We wish to be careful not to allow the corporations of this country to make inroads upon our power, or upon our authority; and we can easily understand why there is a desire on the part of certain corporations to come together, in this round-about way, full of what might be called the cunning of the fox under the fence—that they may get what they want without it being properly presented, properly discussed, or properly argued, and that they may get what they want without the people being aroused to the dangers to which they are exposed. I certainly am adverse to making any change in our mode of procedure in revising any amendments that may be made to the Railway Act. I see no need for any change; circumstances do not require any; our present machinery is all that is required to do the work.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—I endorse most emphatically the suggestion of my hon. friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique), and I do not see why that suggestion should not meet the approval of the hon. members of this House. This Bill which has been introduced, 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act,' is very large and extensive, and it will be utterly impossible to deal with it this session, without submitting it to a special committee or a select committee. It does not matter whether the motion or the amendment prevails, we must have a special committee.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—My hon. friend from Victoria Division says no; but if this Bill is to be taken up, either under the motion or the amendment, it would require the evidence of experts to be taken.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Let us have them.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton): You will have to receive them here, from the railway departments, from all the transportation departments, from the men who use the railway lines, from all parties who have any connection or business whatsoever with the railway companies of this country, and you must have that evidence taken down and assembled in such a manner that you can use it intelligently for the proper revision and amendment of this Act. To do that, I submit, a considerable amount of time would be required, because in this Act we have an enormous amount of material which must be eliminated. How do my hon. friends who have opposed this method of procedure propose to eliminate all the mass of detail, which it will be necessary to eliminate?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Eliminate it in the committee.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—We cannot eliminate it in the Committee of the Whole, because we cannot take evidence before a Committee of the Whole.. We have to take evidence outside of this House.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—That is where I see the difficulty presenting itself, and that is where hon. gentlemen who have addressed this House fail to realize that the Committee of the Whole of this House is not in a position to proceed with this Bill. They cannot receive the evidence which will be necessary, in order to revise, amend, arrange and consolidate, in order to receive the approval of this Chamber and send the measure on to the other Chamber, unless we have evidence taken before a select committee.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is no question about that.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—Therefore I strongly endorse the suggestion made by my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Beique) that this matter be allowed to stand over to see if some modus vivendi cannot be reached whereby some arrangement may be made, so that this matter can be intelligently dealt with by this House. I am told, in fact, I have heard hon. members make the statement during this discussion, that the introducing a Bill of this magnitude and character to this House, is a new departure, and I have heard hon. members congratulating the leader of the Government in this House on having this Bill brought before this House. If such is the case, then it is due to ourselves that we proceed in the right way to deal with it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Move the adjournment of the debate, then.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging the discussion. I quite concur in the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) which has been endorsed by the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Hon. Mr. McKay). The hon. leader of the House should not expect this House to take a leap in the dark, and that is just what he is calling upon this House to do, when he asks us to appoint a certain number of gentlemen as a committee of twelve to meet an unknown number of gentlemen from the House of Commons. Before the leader of the House can expect this House to concur in his motion, he must ascertain that the other House is not going to have such a representation on the joint committee, as will swamp our representation.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear; that is right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Nearly every hon. gentleman in the House will agree on that proposition. I am not going to dwell on the seriousness of the business, for every one recognizes it. There is just one other point; my name was used with my concurrence as the seconder of the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I consented to have my name so used, not because I was in love with the amendment, but because I thought it was not quite as bad as the original motion; had I been acting on my own initiative, and doing the thing that I felt like doing myself, I should have moved an amendment somewhat in these words:

That the said Bill be referred to the Standing Committee of this House on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours for consideration and report, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, to examine withnesses under oath, to hear counsel, to employ shorthand writers, to have the evidence and addresses printed, and to report such evidence from time to time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We are all in favour of that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hon. gentlemen will see that if that course were followed—a course which has been adopted in former years with respect to other important measures—there would be no necessity for an additional hearing in the Commons, because all the parties who wished to be heard would come before our committee, the evidence would be reported at length and distributed amongst the members of the Commons as well as the members of this House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is my position With respect to the motion and amendment, I am somewhat like Mercutio. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Until to-morrow, to be the first order after the third readings.

The motion was agreed to.

WHITE PHOSPHOROUS MATCHES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (103), An Act to prohibit the manufacture and importation of matches made with white phosphorus.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 10:

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I informed the House yesterday that the Criminal Code makes provision for the clauses which we discussed, as to the collection of penalties.

Section 739 (b) is as follows:

That in default of payment of the said penalty, compensation or sum of money, and costs, if any, forthwith or within a limited time, the defendant be imprisoned in the manner and for the time mentioned in the said Act or law, or, for any period not exceeding three months, if the Act or law authorizing the conviction or order does not specify imprisonment, or does not specify any term of imprisonment, unless the same and the costs and charges of the distress and of the commitment and of the conveying of the defendant to jail are sooner paid.

The Criminal Code makes provision for all the machinery.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What is to be done, then, in that case ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—He can be given three months' imprisonment.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—What about the last one ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As to clause 13, I have made an inquiry of the Department of Labour as tc the reason assigned by those interested, for the postponement of the coming into force of the Act until the 1st day of January, 1916. I am informed that most of the industries involved or engaged in match-making—I shall not say all of them—as well as other parties, have pointed out that it would not be practicable to bring this Act into force until the expiration of that time without doing a gross injustice to those who are engaged in the business. Various experiments will have to be resorted to, for the purpose of determining what substance can be used to the best advantage for match making. I am informed that the Eddy people have been engaged for the last year in experimenting on this subject—as yet without satisfaction to themselves. I am further informed that such experiments can be best made in cold weather, and it is desirable that next winter should be allowed for those experiments, as establishing a finality as to the substances to be used. I am told there are about a dozen substances that can be used as substitutes for phosphorus. Furthermore, the Royal Society of Canada, which seems to take a very deep interest in this subject, waited upon the Minister of Labour, and I have here a memorandum from the department, of the recommendations which the Royal Society made:

Memo. re Phosphorous Bill and Date of Enforcement of Proposed Statute.

The president of the Royal Society of Canada, in the statement submitted on behalf of the deputation which waited on the Minister of Labour November 21, 1913, referred to this point as follows :

In Canada this dangerous industry is not even regulated by law. Absolute prohibition is necessary and will prove here, as elsewhere, to make for the best interests of the manufacturers as well as for the safety of employees and consumers. Finally legislation in harmony with this resolution should be asked for at the earliest possible date, as ample time must be allowed the manufacturers to adjust themselves to the new conditions, and the dealers to dispose of their stock. At least two years must elapse from the date of enactment before the prohibition can become fully effective.

The deputation from the council of the Royal Society of Canada was composed of the following : Dr. Frank D. Adams, Montreal, president; Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux, M.P., former Minister of Labour, Sir James Grant, Mr. Benjamin Sulte, Mr. W. D. LeSueur, and Dr. F. W. King, of Ottawa, former presidents of the Royal Society; Mr. D. C. Scott, Ottawa, honorary president; Mr. L. M. Lamb, Ottawa, honorary treasurer; Dr. Rattan and professor C. H. McLeod, of McGill University, Montreal, Dr. O. J. Klotz, Mr. R. W. Brock, director of the Geological Survey, Dr. D. B. Dowling, and Mr. Souvigny de Montigny, of Ottawa.

Correspondence with the Minister of Labour has also shown that while the manufacturers appear to be disposed to accept the necessities of the new legislation, some injustice may be worked them, especially in the case of the smaller concerns, if they are not given reasonable time to adjust themselves to the situation, in their experiments with new methods, etc. On this point it may be remarked that it has been urged that some of these experiments can be best carried on in cold weather. For this reason manufacturers had suggested that the Bill become effective on May 1 rather than January 1 of any year, and had passed on the minister the desirability of postponing until May 1, 1916, the date on which the new legislation shall be effective. The minister has not favoured postponement beyond January 1, 1916.

There is, of course, the additional point that the intervening period will enable the dealers in matches to dispose of stocks which had accumulated.

F. A. Acland, D.M.L.

These are the only reasons that I can give the committee for the fixing the date, as embodied in the Bill.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. GORDON, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved:

That when the Senate adjourns to-morrow, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 15th instant, at three o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

WHITE PHOSPHORUS MATCHES BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of

Bill (193), 'An Act to prohibit the manufacture and importation of matches made with white phosphorus.'—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I understand some information has been obtained on this subject by some of the manufacturers only recently, and they desire to present to the Government some features of the situation that may arise under this Bill. Would the hon. gentleman consent to have the Bill stand over, so that in the interval these gentlemen, if they so desire, may place their case before the Government? The Bill, through such postponement, is not jeopardized in any way, because it has already been passed by the Commons. The manufacturers feel that the consequences will be serious, if the Bill is passed in its present shape.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am quite willing to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend, and I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for the 15th April next.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day was discharged accordingly.

RAILWAY ACT CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT BILL.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Lougheed that (Bill B-2), 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act,' be referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses and the motion in amendment thereto of the Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suppose that every hon. gentleman has made up his mind on this question, and that any observations I might make would not change the opinion of any senator; I therefore do not propose to say anything on the subject.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have been very anxious to meet the views of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House with reference to this Bill. I am not necessarily wedded to any arbitrary procedure on the subject, but I hold strongly that it would not only be to the advantage of the Senate, but to the advantage of the Bill itself, that it should go before a joint committee. I do not share the views already expressed by several of the hon. gentlemen, that by accepting this proposal this Chamber is abdicating in any sense the rights and the privileges which belong to it in dealing with a measure of this character. Even should the Bill go to a joint committee, constituted as joint committees are, this Chamber would in no sense release any right which it has to deal with the Bill, once it leaves the joint committee. The Senate is not bound to accept a report of a joint committee any more than it is bound to accept the report of one of our own committees. Upon a report being made to this Chamber, it could be referred back again by this Chamber to our own Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours; it could be referred to any special committee, or it could be referred to a committee of the whole House; and every hon. gentleman would have quite as great freedom in moving amendments to the Bill as he would if it had not gone before the joint committee. It seems to me that if the practice of referring Bills of this kind to a joint committee is sufficiently good for the Mother of Parliaments, it should sufficiently recommend itself to the Parliament of Canada. Since 1861 the practice has not only been recognized, but has been carried out, most largely, in the British Parliament. Joint committees have dealt with Bills not only of this character, but of the widest range of subjects. There are no less than 50 or 60 subjects dealt with by joint committees in the British House of Parliament. We have recognized the principle in this Parliament, not only in dealing with routine matters, but in dealing with legislation of the character before us. As I previously said, we dealt with the Criminal Code by a joint committee; the Parliament of Canada dealt with the consolidation of the statutes under a joint committee; annually we appoint joint committees to deal with the Library of Parliament, and with the Printing of Parliament; and there has never been, to my knowledge, any friction between the two Chambers in the proceedings of a joint committee. Now it is quite manifest that the work of a Senate Committee, in dealing with this Bill, involving as it will the hearing of representations from most numerous bodies, will largely go for naught, except some co-operation takes place between the two Houses of Parliament. In the very nature of the Bill itself, it is most desirable that there should be some co-operation—I care not how it may be arrived at, so long as that co-operation is brought about between the two Houses. As I pointed out when introducing the Bill, the measure is one which is largely of a popular character, representing the views of the masses of the people, representing more democratic views than probably have been embodied in any such measure, hitherto. If this committee of the Senate hears all the representations which must necessarily be made on such a Bill—extending over probably several weeks of time—without the Commons having the opportunity of hearing the same representations, and without there being an interchange of views, of thought and of action between the two Houses—I say it renders it almost impracticable that we shall be able to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to what should be done upon the various controversial questions which must necessarily present themselves to the members, in dealing with this Bill. I am perfectly satisfied that this measure should go to the Railway Committee of the Senate, if this Chamber so desires. Although this is a Government measure, and although the Government has particular views as to how it should be dealt with, yet we are prepared to relinquish those views and permit the Bill to be dealt with by the Select Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours; but I point out to hon. gentlemen that even if that committee should deal with it, there is no assurance of finality, or agreement, between the two Houses on the many contentious subjects which must arise in dealing with the Bill. I have made proposals to hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, particularly to my hon. friend opposite, looking to some scheme being devised by which representatives of both Chambers may come together and jointly hear this evidence, and jointly act, reserving to each party the right to report to its own House. I would suggest that this House should appoint a special committee, that the Commons should appoint a special committee, and that those two committees should come together, should unite, should act together in hearing the arguments that may be presented and the representations that may be made by the different bodies desiring to be heard on the subject, and that each section shall report to its own House—that is, the section representing the Senate should report to the Senate, and the section representing the House of Commons should reserve to itself the right to report to the Commons, what the respective conclusions may be upon the Bill. In other words, each section should reserve to itself the right to report what it thinks should be reported to the House it represents.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Do I understand that each section would have a right to report its own findings without reference to the other section?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, that is what I suggest with a view to reaching a satisfactory conclusion of this difficulty. That would give each House the advantage of avoiding repetition of the representations which must be made before the committee. It will permit the House of Commons to thoroughly discuss and to ventilate the matter, and to arrive at any conclusion it may think fit upon any subject that arises for discussion in the consideration of the Bill. So much the better, if the section of the committee representing the Senate, can view the subject the same way as the section of the committee representing the Commons. I feel thoroughly satisfied that if a number of men gifted with common -sense, as all the hon. gentlemen in this Senate are, should come together with an equal number, or even a larger number of the members of the House of Commons, they can readily arrive at a common judgment, or conclusion, upon the subject with which we are called upon to deal. Why should there be any difference between both Houses ? It surely is a reflection upon the House of Commons to say that we should look with any apprehension or any doubt upon the conclusion which that section would arrive at upon so important a subject as may be involved in the Railway Bill. Surely there should be no fear felt that there would be a deadlock, or any disagreement, or any great divergence of view.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON--If I understand the hon. gentleman, he suggests that the joint committee should act in respect to this Bill, hear the evidence, listen to the statements of the different parties who may desire to be heard, and when they have done that, their duty as a joint committee, practically ceases. The members representing the Senate would, practically, go into session by themselves to make a report to the Senate, and the members of the House of Commons would be in session by themselves, making their report and findings on the evidence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would not be quite the method to be persued. My view would be that those two committees should unite and act together in hearing the evidence, that they should take up each section of the Bill, and hear representations upon that section. If they can agree upon the section, that disposes of it; if there is any divergence of views upon it as between the two divisions of the committee, the section is reserved. That is to say, if the Senate should have a pronounced view upon a section different from that of the Commons, they would make a report upon that; but it seems to me that it would be undesirable to desist in agreement on the Bill, and then perhaps after three or four weeks might elapse, take up the Bill item by item or clause by clause. It should be disposed of as we go along, but under this plan the identity of the special committees would be preserved, and would not be merged in any way with the united committee. They have a perfect right to reserve to themselves the right to report to this Chamber on the Bill, just as if they were not uniting, or acting with a committee of the Commons. The object is that there should not be a repetition of the representation which would be made by public bodies and others before the committee.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Will not the evidence be of a mixed character?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Would the two committees not be merged in their deliberation until they find a divergence of opinion?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And they would come back to the House and the House would have the right to override anything they had done.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is the work that is unnecessary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Select committees are sitting almost every day, and a Committee of the Whole has a right to upset the work of the Select Committee, with the instruction to do any and all things; but it never does it. It is a very rare occurrence for this Chamber to disagree with the report of a Select Committee.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is what I have always held.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is an absolute right.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What I would like to fully consider is, whether it is at all practicable for the Railway Committee of the Senate to deal with this subject at arm's length with the House of Commons? It is a very contentious Bill, and we may spend three or four weeks on the Bill hearing the many representations that will be made, and yet when it comes into the House of Commons, and those representations are made to a committee of the Commons, it may arrive at an entirely different conclusion. The question will then arise, how will we come together again to adjust those differences which may arise between the two Houses? Those differences can only be settled by a conference. I need not point out to you how cumbersome the machinery of a conference is, and how unsatisfactory it is in obtaining mutuality of views. It seems to me that the common sense of both Houses should prevail upon this subject and that a certain number from each House should get together and give their very best attention and ability to make this measure as perfect as possible. It is the requirement of the country that it should be done; and it is in the interests of both Houses that they should combine their abilities in framing legislation, especially on a Bill of this kind. I leave it entirely to the House. I am entirely in your hands as to how this Bill should be dealt with. If it is thought best to postpone it until to-morrow in order to arrive at some understanding I am willing to postpone it.

An hon. GENTLEMAN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—I suppose it is understood that we have a free discussion on this question. A number of hon. gentlemen are rising to speak, and some are going twice and thrice over the same ground.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is very little other business to be done to-day, so we might as well discuss this.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I appreciate very much the desire of the hon. leader of the Government to deal with this matter in a way that will facilitate the business of this country, and his desire to bring together the representatives of both Houses to hear the evidence, arguments and discussion that may arise over the different clauses of this Bill; but I have been unable to exactly agree with him as to the method in which this could be done. The idea that he suggests, of a joint committee, has not always resulted in harmonious relations, if my reading of the precedents is correct. I find that joint committees have not always been harmonious, with the result that they did not accomplish the work they were supposed to do. The most satisfactory and most reasonable way of dealing with this matter was the proposal that this House should appoint a special committee of its own, and that if a special committee was appointed in another place those two committees should have power to come together and arrange to hear the evidence, and carry on the business in connection with this Bill; and that each committee should make a report to that part of Parliament from which it originated. If the Senate should appoint a special committee, and a special committee is appointed from the other House, those two committees could be left to themselves to arrange the procedure as to hearing the evidence, and as to what they should do in regard to any future work, after they had heard the evidence on the Bill. Each committee could then report to the House from which it originated, and the work would be done with greater satisfaction, and with the greatest facility, and with the least loss of time that can be arranged. In the case mentioned by the hon. leader of the House which came up in 1861 in the British House of Commons, Lord Granville who suggested the procedure said:—

> Earl Granville in rising to move the appointment of a Select Committee on public business of the House said it would be in the recollection of the House that the noble opposite (the Earl of Derby), at the close of last session made some suggestions tending to secure a more legitimate despatch of their Lordship's parliamentary business since which on the last evening as their Lordships were aware, a debate had taken place on the same subject in another place. The question well deserved the attention of their Lordships no doubt. The position of the two Houses in respect to the business brought before them was not identical, but at any rate the charge of delay could not be urged against the proceedings of the House of Lords.
> The Noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) had suggested a Joint Committee of both Houses, but he thought himself that it would be most conformable to practices and most convenient to have two committees sitting concurrently and in constant communication with each other. Such a mode of procedure would give more force and character to their inquiries and recommendations. His Lordship then moved 'That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report how, by any alterations in the Forms and Proceedings of this House, the despatch of public business can be most effectually promoted.'

Then, after that debate was carried through there were other members of the House of Lords, who spoke in favour of that method of procedure rather than by means of a joint committee. The Lord Chancellor said:

> He thought that many of the matters which had been referred to had much better be postponed till the committee was appointed. There was a great deal of difficulty connected with the suggestion for a Joint Committee of both Houses; the Forms of the two Houses would hardly admit of such a proceeding, but with a good understanding between both branches of the Legislature the substantial advantages of such a committee might, nevertheless, be obtained for that purpose. He thought it most desirable that the two committees should proceed pari passu.

Then, after the first motion was agreed to, it was ordered:

That the committee have power to communicate from time to time with the Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed to consider how any alterations in the Forms and Proceedings of the House, the despatch of public business can be effectually promoted.

Now that is the procedure we should find most acceptable, and would work out to the best advantage in this particular case. Of course, as is stated there, the object of appointing those committees in that case was largely concerned with the public business of both branches of the Legislature, and it is possible that the amendment to the motion of the hon. leader of the Government the other day might be modified in some slight degree to make it clearer to the members of this House how the actual work of these two committees would be done. But I do not think that we can do as well with a joint committee as we can by following the procedure which I have tried to outline to the House. I therefore should be pleased to accept the offer made by the leader of the Government, that this matter should be deferred until we have time to discuss it and possibly arrive at a conclusion which will be acceptable to both sides of the House.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am glad to have proof that the voice of five or six progressive and independent members of this House affords the Government and the Opposition an opportunity to recede from the position taken a few days ago. That is something. The Government took one position; the Opposition took another, and I am glad to see that we have convinced both of the desirability of receding from the position they had assumed. But they have not told us what they are prepared to do. The leader of the Government says he is willing to leave the matter in the hands of the House. The leader of the Opposition says he is willing to meet the Government, and effect some compromise. I am quite willing to accept a compromise, but I might be allowed to make a suggestion: In order to preserve our complete autonomy to deal with this Bill ourselves, I should be inclined to think that it might be well to move that this Bill be referred either to a select committee of this House or to our Railway Committee as usual.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is the proper way.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Then, when the Bill is referred either to a special committee or to the Railway Committee, we could perhaps then send a message to the other House with the good will of the leader of the Government, and inform the other House that a committee of this House is going to consider this measure, and if they are willing to delegate an equal number of their members to that committee, we shall be delighted to receive them, to give them the liberty to put questions to witnesses, and to express their views.

And when the whole question has been discussed before the committee, then our committee will make a report to this House. We will have then the opinion of ten or twelve of the most prominent members of the House who have had experience in railway matters, and the whole matter will be brought before us. We will have preserved our autonomy. Then we can go on and pass the Bill and send it to the Commons with the evidence. I do not know if my suggestion is workable, but it seems to me that it is, and that it is the proper course to follow. Not knowing what has been decided between the two leaders, whose opinions I greatly respect, I merely give my view and express the belief that something might be done to expedite the passage of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—A new difficulty presented itself to my mind, and it is this: How can the House of Commons take cognizance of a Bill and take action thereon, when that Bill is not before it? Suppose any member of the House of Commons should rise this afternoon and propose the appointment of a committee to consider this Bill; the member next to him could rise to a point of order and say 'This hon. gentleman is moving for the appointment of a committee on a Bill that is not yet before us, a Bill of which we have absolutely no knowledge.' Has the leader of the Government thought of that matter? The House of Commons cannot take action on this Bill until it is before the House. Yesterday I gave my views on the question of sending an important Bill of this nature to a select committee. I said the reason I objected to this course was that when these special or select committees reported Bills back, either with or without evidence, it was very difficult for the House to override the conclusion arrived at. It had been stated a dozen times by other speakers that the Committee of the Whole will have the right to discuss the whole subject, to delve into all the provisions of the Bill, to alter, change, or put them aside. What does the leader of the House tell us to-day? Exactly what I said yesterday, that it would be almost impossible for this House to reject the conclusion of the select committee that would be appointed to examine into this Bill. These are his words: He said it would not be fair for this House or the Committee of the Whole, after appointing a select committee, to reject their recommendations and their conclusions. That is his position; and that position I oppose with all my might. I do not want the Senate of Canada to be controlled by the decisions of seven, eight or nine members of a select committee, and let that practice become established. Why? Because the seven, eight or nine members do not represent the feeling of this House, the interest of the country, or the wants or needs of the people. Take the 12 members proposed by the hon. leader of the Government in connection with this Bill, and whom do we find named? We find on that committee men well-known to be champions of corporate interests; there is no doubt about that. I do not blame these men. Everybody to his liking. Who have you on that committee who will represent the rights and interests of the farmers, the working classes, and railway employees, and the people who have to use the country's transportation. I have no objection to these men personally, but we all know their inclinations, associations, and tendencies. They are all laudable, as far as they go, but they have to be watched. Have you a Davis on that committee to look after the interests of the West; have you a Choquette or Douglas on that committee? I could mention a dozen others.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They have left Saskatchewan off entirely. Saskatchewan has no interests at all, apparently, in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then this committee, which is as respectable as could be named, will report back to the House, and we are told by the hon. leader of the Government that it would be scarcely fair for the House to reject their conclusions. The word 'fair' is not the word he used, but it amounts to that. He said it would not be reasonable to reject their recommendations. I hold now, and will always hold, that I shall take no conclusions of a select committee as binding and final.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—That fixes it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This Bill will be much better in the hands of our ordinary Railway Committee, which does not expect favours at the hands of the House, or at the hands of a committee of the whole. It makes its report, we take up the report and dissect it as we please. There is no necessity for this Bill to go to a committee, unless new evidence is required. My question of yesterday has not been answered. I put the question fairly and bluntly: 'Is any new evidence required by this hon. House to enable its members to judge as to the provisions of this Bill, and to pass carefully thereon?' My question has not been answered. I have assured the hon. leader of the Government that I have every faith in his statement, that before this Bill was finally drafted as now presented to us representations of all interest were made to the proper officers of the Government, to the staff of both departments—the Railways and the Justice Departments. Now, if such be the case, where is the need of calling in new evidence? If the need exists, I am willing, and will vote to have the Bill referred to the Railway Committee to take that new evidence, whatever it may be. But I hold that any new evidence you will get will be very slim. The hon. leader of the Government has already told this House that all the railway companies have put in their arguments, their claims, their representations, their wants and needs; that the municipalities have been heard; that the railway employees have been heard; that the farmers have been heard. Now, if that is the case, what is the use of duplicating this work? Will these same interests come back here before our committee, and spend days, weeks and months to give evidence on cross-examination? We would then learn what cross-examination means. When a witness is in the box for an hour or two, and is cross-examined by 10, 15, or 20 members of a committee, by the time he gets through he has not said anything; everything is mixed. The proper way, or one of the proper ways, to deal with a measure of this kind is to have from these various public or corporate bodies a factum. Let the railway companies of the country get together, examine the Bill, see what in it is against their interests, and put the statement in writing; it would not take very many pages to do so. We do not want any witnesses to give us information whether a cow ought to be paid for when it is killed, or anything of that kind; such evidence is useless. Let the railway companies and the municipalities put their views in the form of a factum. There is a central organization of municipalities throughout the Dominion; let them examine the Bill and see whether there is any provision which conflicts with the rights and privileges of municipalities. Probably there are not three clauses, not half a dozen, clauses in the Bill, that would conflict with, or endanger the interests or rights of those municipalities. Let them put in writing a statement about such clauses. If there is any lack in the Bill the railway companies will be able to set it out in a very short factum. Suppose clause 267 is against their rights, they might say: 'This is the way we would like to have it worded; this is the way we would like to have Parliament consider that clause.' Or, 'There is a lack in the Bill, we want a certain provision put in, to protect certain interests and rights.' That could be done with the railways, and also with the farmers, who are also an organized body. Then you have transportation interests in connection with the boards of trade. You do not want every board of trade from Vancouver to Halifax to come here and put their views before this House; they are an organized body and could put their representations in a very small factum and send them here, and we will examine them. That would be a much more practicable, serviceable and profitable method than to bring a hundred or two hundred witnesses here to be contradicting one another, and having one member of the committee pull an answer from a poor witness, while another would have him contradicting himself a little later. That kind of an inquiry, that kind of investigation is getting to be played out. The proposition I am making ought to appeal to the Government, and necessarily would appeal to any man of common sense. I am sorry to have been one of the five stalwarts yesterday who stalled both the Government train, and the Opposition train, and brought them to a standstill. They are still in conference to find where they are at, and what they are going to do. We five know what we want; we tell you very plainly what we want, and the country knows that we are right. Under the circumstances I fail to see that there is any necessity for this vast investigation, which we are told will last several weeks. I have no doubt it will last several months, if you want to keep it up. I hold it is absolutely unnecessary in view of the solemn declaration made here by the leader of the Government that all these various interests have been already heard by the proper and competent authorities of the Government of the day. I am prepared to take that statement, and I shall only decline to accept it when it is proved to me that the declaration of the leader of the Government in regard to this matter was not complete, that there were interests that were not heard from, or that the staff who drafted the Bill played into the hands of the corporate interests as against the interests of the people. If that could be proved to me, I would demand a re-opening of the investigation, in order that the proper witnesses might be called. I see no necessity for a lengthy investigation, keeping the committee in session for months. Let the House of Commons attend to their own business, and let the Senate conduct its business irrespective of the Commons. We have done so up to the present time. The quoting of precedents in the British Parliament does not appeal to me. We are here to exercise our hard, common sense, according to the needs of the day, and not according to views of centuries past and buried. I hold that this Senate should not be mixed up with the House of Commons in considering Bills of this kind, which may be controversial and contentious, and perhaps political. I hope there is nothing political in this measure. Let us deal with the measure on its merits, send it to the Commons and let them look after it for themselves. If we have a joint committee with the House of Commons, or a special committee of the Senate to be in communication with the Commons committee, we will have friction, quarrels, and all kinds of trouble. It will take less time to deal with this measure in the ordinary way than to appoint a joint committee. The Railway Committee, or the Committee of the Whole, could dispose of this inside of a week. Our Railway Committee would not sit for several weeks, calling in every Tom, Dick and Harry to give evidence regarding each clause of the Bill. The only clause necessary to be investigated are those where the corporate interest conflicts with the interest of the people. If evidence is required, the proper course is to refer the Bill to the Railway Committee. If no new evidence is required, then refer it to the Committee of the Whole, and there will be no standstill in the passing of the legislation.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—This is a very important Bill, and deals with the interest of the people, more particularly the producers in our part of the country. We ship a lot of grain, and diverse questions which affect the West arise in this Bill. How did the hon. leader come to the conclusion that Saskatchewan was not entitled to representation on the committee? Was there no one from that province capable of acting, or is it a political idea, or has the hon. gentleman his knife in Saskatchewan? There must be some reason for it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I felt assured that the presence of my hon. friend in this Chamber would be sufficient to protect Saskatchewan. With regard to the members mentioned for that committee, it is entirely within the judgment of the House to either accept the names which I have suggested, or to replace these names by others, or, in the alternative, to enlarge the committee. I should be very glad to see Saskatchewan represented on that committee. It never occurred to me that we were placing representatives of each province on the committee, but I am quite satisfied that the committee should be enlarged, so as to permit of representation of that kind.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend will find that he has given representation to every province except Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They give Manitoba twice as many as they are entitled to.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Saskatchewan should have a representative.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I would suggest that the Bill be allowed to stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We can remedy that.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton) moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Is the Bill to be proceeded with to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—A good many members will be away to-morrow, and there is no object in proceeding with it until after the Easter adjournment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When there is so important a matter before the House, I am sure the hon. member from Grandville will stay to attend to public business.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—This matter has been dragging for two or three days, and we might just as well decide it now or postpone further consideration of the Bill until after Easter.

The motion was agreed to.

FARNHAM AND GRANBY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

Bill (Q-2), An Act to incorporate the Farnham and Granby Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Lavergne.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES ON INDIAN RESERVE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS inquired:

Has the Government granted homestead entries on the south half of section seven and the whole of section six, township 46, range 20, west of the 2nd meridian? If so, in what way did the Government acquire this land?

Was this land not the property of the Indians of James Smith's reserve.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. All sec. 6 and S. ½-7-46-20-W. 2nd M. Area 960 acres.

2. The surrender of the above described land (situate at the southwest corner of the reserve) by the Cumberland band of Indians, to the Crown in exchange for portions of sections 7, 8, 17, 18, 19 and 20 of township 48, range 19, west of the 2nd Meridian of equal area (situate at the northeast corner of the reserve) was authorized by Order in Council of the 23rd of January, 1900, (file No. 502067).

Under the circumstances the Crown acquired the land of the Indians of James Smith's reserve, by surrender, and the department has since disposed of the same under homestead entry.

CONTRACTS FOR CARRIAGE OF TRANSATLANTIC MAILS.

MOTION

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a copy of the contract or agreement entered into between the Government of Canada and one or more of the steamship companies plying between Canadian and European ports for the carrying of Transatlantic mails and for all correspondence, papers, reports or documents relating thereto.

The motion was agreed to.

SIR LYMAN MELVIN JONES AND REBATES ON AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I have a very innocent question to put to the leader of the Government. I do not want to burden the Orders of the Day with the question in print; I am a babe in the woods, and I do not know where the bears are. Has the Government any official intimation of the fact that a stalwart Liberal of this House, this party, and the country, has transferred his allegiance from the Liberal party to the Government ranks? Who is the goat that has gone from one side to the other? He is the member from East York, and his name is Sir Lyman Melvin Jones, president of the Massey Harris Company. Another question I would ask: Is it because the Government only granted his company last year a rebate on its agricultural implements of $161,000, and because he is trying to get more, that he has gone over to the Government? This is a very innocent question, I submit—very innocent.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—They will let you know later.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Orders of the Day.

SUPPLY BILL No. 1.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons, with Bill (145), An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial years ending respectively the 31st of March, 1914, and the 31st March, 1915.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of the Bill.

He said: I may say for the information of hon. gentlemen that the main Estimates for 1914-15 submitted to Parliament provide for a total expenditure of $190,735,176.42. Of this amount $159,443,518.69 is required to be voted by Parliament and $31,291,657.73 is authorized by statute. Of the $159,443,518.69, $115,494,468.69 is on account of Consolidated Fund, and $43,949,050 Capital. The whole of the statutory expenditure is on account of Consolidated Fund. For the fiscal year just passed Supplementary Estimates have been submitted by Parliament to the amount of $3,257,036.05.

At this season of the year it is very necessary that the accounts of the fiscal year just passed should be closed as early as possible; hence it is desirable that Supplementary Estimates for that year should be dealt with by Parliament at an early date. In the Supply Bill now submitted schedule (C) represents a portion of the Supplementary Estimates for 1913-14 passed by the House of Commons and chargeable to—

Consolidated fund	$1,863,247.49
Capital	28,413.56
	$1,891,661.05

The balance of the Supplementary Estimates for 1913-14 amounting to $1,365,375 has been held over for further consideration by the House of Commons.

Schedule (A) represents the different services of the Main Estimates for 1914-15, passed by the Committee of Supply and adopted by the House of Commons, chargeable to—

Consolidated fund	$24,479,412.22
Capital	4,065,500.00
	$28,544,912.22

Schedule (B) represents one-sixth of the different services of the main Estimates for 1914-15, passed and adopted by the House of Commons, chargeable to—

Consolidated fund	$15,169,176.10
Capital	6,647,258.34
	$21,816,434.44

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages under a suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Would the hon. gentleman let us know the total amount of this vote ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is a sixth of the Estimates that has been voted.

Hon. Mr. KERR—There are some special votes in addition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, I think not; just a sixth of $190,735,176.42. The reason I have read this statement is that hon. gentlemen will observe from the 'Hansard' exactly the amount that has been voted.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend will admit that it is hardly treating the House fairly to bring down a statement of that kind, and a Bill of this nature, and ask us to vote $190,000,000 in three minutes, without having time to look into it, or even to read the statement which he has submitted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are following the precedents established in the past.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time.

THE RAILWAY BILL.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Lougheed that (Bill B-2), 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act,' be referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses and the motion in amendment thereto of the Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. senior member for Halifax made this motion for the purpose of permitting myself and my hon. friend who leads the opposite side of the House to confer with a view to our agreeing, if possible, upon a motion which would be acceptable to the House. I have conferred at some length with my hon. friend and have accepted the suggestions which he has made, and with the leave of the House I propose to move that my motion be withdrawn, and I shall move another in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER—The amendment should be withdrawn prior to the withdrawal of the main motion.

The amendment and the main motion having been withdrawn, Hon. Mr. Lougheed moved:

That Bill (B-2) entitled 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act' be referred to a special committee of the Senate, composed of Hon. Messieurs Beique, Bolduc, Bowell (Sir Mackenzie), Bostock, Gordon, Kerr, Power, Ross (Middleton), Thompson, Watson, Young and the mover, with instructions to examine the said Bill and to meet with a special committee of the House of Commons, if such a committee be appointed, take evidence, if necessary, hear parties, if necessary, and report upon the said Bill to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not like moving amendments, but I drew my hon. friend's attention yesterday to the fact that he had given no representation on this committee to Saskatchewan. I would suggest that he put my hon. friend Senator Douglas on that committee. We are entitled to that. It is a well-known fact that these measures after they pass a special committee and come back to this House, do not get very much attention or discussion in this House. You have practically cut out the whole of the province of Saskatchewan, so that we will have nothing to say as to the passing of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no objection to enlarging this committee by two, taking one from the side opposite, and one from this side. The hon. gentleman whose name has been mentioned should be on this committee, and the Hon. Mr. Taylor.

The SPEAKER—The names of Senators Douglas and Taylor are added to the names mentioned.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No; I have an important statement to make to the House, a statement probably more serious than important. In assuming the attitude I have done in regard to this Bill, and particularly in regard to the motion made by the leader of the Government, and to the amendment that was proposed to that motion, I did so on my own responsibility and on my own conviction that justice was not going to be done either to the public at large or the Senate itself. I frankly told the leader of the Government when he introduced the Bill and when it got its second reading, that I was prepared to accept his declarations. At the same time I intimated to him that if, at any stage of the proceedings I found that declaration incomplete,—I shall not say misleading, not at all—then I would have a right to change my attitude. The leader of the Government, speaking on behalf of the Cabinet, informed this House and the country that all interests had been consulted; that all interests in regard to this Bill had made their representations to the officers of the Government; that after all these representations had been made, the Departments of Justice and Railways put their heads together and drafted this Bill. That declaration was a solemn one, which I accepted frankly without any hesitation and on his explanation of the Bill, of the different revisions made of the clauses in the Bill compared with the Acts passed, I said: 'That is a pretty fair proposition.' At the moment, at the first blush, I would have accepted his Bill without any further consideration. But what do I find ?—and what I have to say, I wish to have it understood, must not reflect in any way or degree on the leader of the Government in this House. I find that the declaration made by the leader of the Government in this House is incomplete; that the declaration made by him to Parliament does not bear out his contention that the measure should pass as drafted.

The SPEAKER—Will the hon. gentleman permit me a remark—with his permission, because I have no right to interrupt him while he is speaking. It is asked that the hon. gentleman will allow the remainder of the Bills to be passed before the representative of the Governor comes in; after we resume the sitting, he may continue his speech.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Certainly, I am in the hands of the House; I have no objection.

The SPEAKER—No, the House cannot impose that; it is simply asked of you.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What I have to say can wait, but the Bills that are in the House probably cannot stand waiting, so I subside.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Before the next Order is called I should like to ask the leader of the Government for some information, why in the printing of this Railway Bill, has the usual custom been departed from? For instance, we had before us in the session of 1910-11, the Banking Act, and in italics was printed every change that was introduced into that Act. In the same session we had Bill (R), affecting Chinese Immigration, in which very useful information was given, and it contained notes minutely describing why the changes were made in the Immigration Act, as affecting Chinese Immigrants. For instance, the word 'Merchant' was fully described and a new meaning was given to it. Students coming through the country were newly described by a special note; then the different servants accompanying the Consuls were minutely described, as were all changes or amendments to the existing Immigration Act. Later on we had the Insurance Act—

The SPEAKER—I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that there is a kind of compact made with the hon. member for Victoria Division to allow the Orders of the Day to go through.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—I have just one word more.

The SPEAKER—But it is not a question of a word more, or two, it is a question of convenience and of fair play. The hon. gentleman from Victoria Division consented to waive his right to keep the floor so that the other Bills should go through before the representative of the Governor came in, but he did not waive his right in order to give the floor to another member.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Well, I can remember an occasion when the hon. senator from Lauzon did not waive any of his rights, and kept the Governor at the door.

The SPEAKER—That is not the question now.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I might say that after the Orders of the Day are discharged, and before I resume my remarks my friend Senator Boyer can have the floor.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—All right; that will make it good.

THE RAILWAY BILL.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called, the debate on the Railway Bill was resumed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I should like the hon. Speaker to state what motion is before the House.

The SPEAKER—The motion before the House reads as follows:

Moved by Hon. Mr. Lougheed, seconded by Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that Bill (B-2) entitled 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act' be referred to a special committee of the Senate, composed of Hon. Messieurs Béique, Bolduc, Bowell (Sir Mackenzie), Bostock, Gordon, Kerr, Power, Ross (Middleton), Thompson, Watson, Young and the mover, with instructions to examine the said Bill and to meet with a special committee of the House of Commons, if such a committee be appointed, take evidence if necessary, hear parties if necessary, and report upon the said Bill to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That simplifies the matter very much. The motion is to refer the Bill to a special committee composed of twelve members.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Fourteen members. Two have been added.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They have not been added officially. I do not know whether it is surprise or amusement which is uppermost in my mind at the present moment, but it is amusing to me that the hon. leader of the Government should send this Bill to a committee of fourteen; and it is also surprising. Who are the fourteen members? Do they represent the intelligence of the 86 senators in this House? Can they voice the feelings and ideas of the remaining senators? The constitution provides that a Bill of this importance and character shall go to a committee of the whole House. It is surprising that the leader of the Government should abandon his original request to have this Bill sent to a larger committee, composed of 12 or 14 members of the Senate, and of a number of members of the House of Commons, anywhere from 14 to 40, three times the number they would be entitled to proportionately. Why did the hon. leader abandon his attitude in that regard. He was most solemn and sincere, as far as the Government itself would allow him to be sincere, in recommending that this Bill be considered by a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, that committee to have power to examine witnesses and revise and amend the Bill in all its aspects. That was the proposition he laid before the Senate and the country three days ago. Why this change of attitude? Why is abandonment of the Government's demand that its Bill be so dealt with and not otherwise? And now we find that the Bill can be dealt with otherwise. The leader of the Government was not alone in making a false step. On our side of the House an amendment was moved which did not meet with our approval. The result has been a stand still for the past three days in regard to one of the most important measures introduced in this Parliament. Any student of Parliamentary history, and especially under the British regime, will fail to find a parallel for the present situation. We were but a few, four or five, who objected to the methods proposed by the Government in regard to this Bill, and at the same time opposed to the methods of the Opposition; and with what result? The result was that neither the Government nor the Opposition knew where they stood. As was well expressed by the hon. member for Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) yesterday, both trains were stalled. We knew where we stood; knew what the people wanted. We are still on the same ground. Neither the Government nor the Opposition have continued to occupy their ground; they have shifted. The proposition of the Government to-day is to refer the matter to a special committee. As far as I am concerned I have no objection personally to any member of that committee. They are fully intelligent to discuss this Bill, and to weigh its provisions, but that is not the point in question. I am going to admit later on that a committee is necessary, but what we want is men on that committee who are in sympathy with the vast interests of this country, and not with the smaller interests. We do not want that committee composed of men who are there in the interests of corporations as against the interest of the people; let that be well understood. As I said yesterday, I have no objection to any man being interestd in corporations; that is his business, that is how he makes his living, or his fortune. Here in Parliament, however, the people must have their voice heard; there must be those who will put before the Parliament their wants, and defend their rights and interests. To my mind, representatives of the labouring classes were not on the original committee. It is true that at the last moment, a few minutes ago, on the express demand of the senator from Prince Albert, the leader of the Government accepted two new names, —Senators Douglas and Taylor. Senator Douglas is a representative of the interest of the people; Senator Taylor is also, but is also closely allied with interests otherwise. So you have a committee now to hear evidence in regard to this Bill which will be directed solely by gentlemen in close sympathy and alliance with the corporate interests of the country, as against those of the people, and without a representative of the labouring interests, probably the most——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Vicious.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If they were vicious you would be dead long ago—representatives of the locomotive engineers that carry you safely every day of your life; representatives of the firemen, and the brakemen, and the telegraphers who guard your life every day you travel from Belleville to Ottawa—these are the men that are not represented on the committee, but on whose devotion to duty you owe your life every day you travel. Those men have informed me that their desires, their wants, their needs, have been put aside and neglected in the drafting of this Bill. Does the hon. senator from Belleville understand that—that those locomotive engineers, firemen, brakemen, and telegraphers and other employees on the railways have not been heard in regard to this Bill? At least if they were heard, their representations and prayers were set at naught by the departments. They ask this and this alone, that the hours of labour should not be made more than fourteen hours out of the twenty-four. Now, is that an extravagant demand? That is all they ask for; but their demand, their request, their prayer, is ignored, and to satisfy the railway corporations the matter is to be left to the control of the Railway Commission. These men do not want that. All they ask from Parliament is that their hours of labour shall not be made, more than fourteen hours a day, compulsory. They are prepared to submit to that. Will any sane man in the Senate say that they are extravagant in their demands? Our lives depend upon the devotion to duty of the engineers, brakemen, firemen, etc., and those men have been refused their request in that regard. This evidence came to me since yesterday, and I notified the hon. leader of the Government, when he made his declaration regarding the Bill, that if I found at any stage in the proceedings that his statement was incomplete I would then demand a re-opening of the inquiry, a re-opening the investigation of the condition of things, so far as that class is concerned. I am not prepared to speak for the other classes because I have not heard from them, but I say on my responsibility as a senator, and as a representative of the people, that the rights and the interests of one of the largest class of labour in Canada have been ignored. I make that strong statement on the authority of the representative of 40,000, 50,000 or 100,000 employees who compose no simple organization of labour, such as brickmakers, shoemakers, or any other labour organization, but upon the organization of railway employees, upon whose work depend the lives of the people of this Dominion. We should have the courage to protect their interests; the representative who discussed the matter with me affirmed the fact that men on great railway systems in this country have been obliged to work thirty-five hours on a stretch. Just imagine a locomotive engineer on a train running his engine for thirty-five hours, or a fireman or brakesman or telegrapher in his office for thirty-five hours at a stretch—and that no later than last February, a month ago. God knows, these people are not asking much. Their interests are ours, and we should come to their relief. If I knew an engineer on the locomotive of the train by which I was travelling had been working continuously for thirty-five hours, I would rather step off at any old station—

Hon. Mr. WATSON—And walk.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, and walk. This is what is happening in this civilized country of Canada. Now why the railroad men demand that this be made a matter of statute instead of yielding to the recommendation of the board is this, that when it goes to the board, a complaint must be made, and God help the employee who makes the complaint. Under the circumstances, in view of the new facts that have to come to light, an inquiry should be made. The leader of the Government, under stress, has suggested his committee. I have this to say, in the history of Parliament and making of laws it is said that a motion of this kind should be made under the circumstances. It is awfully sad. The Senate is depleted—there is scarcely a quorum in the House, yet the Senate is asked, under these circumstances, to appoint a committee which will have power to make or unmake the happiness of many homes. We know that in committees of this kind the strongest legal talent in the Dominion, or outside of it, is employed to put forward the demands of the corporate interests. The poor man, the labour organization, the municipality will be handicapped. It is true they will be told, but you have a right to come here. Yes, they have a right to come here. If they were wealthy, rolling in the millions accorded to corporations by the Dominion of Canada, they could well afford to come here. These people are poor; they have to live on their own resources. The corporate interests live on the fat of the land and on the subsidies granted to them out of the public treasury. Just the same, our manufacturers of agricultural implements though living on the fat of the land, and out of rebates, are not satisfied; they turn. As I understand the motion which has been read, it simply says that a committee composed of so-and-so shall consider the Bill, but I want to know before I vote what does that word 'consider' mean? Does it mean that they will have a right to take evidence and simply report the evidence? Would that be the case? Then I care not whether it is Tom or Tim, Jim or Jack, that is on that committee, because one can take the evidence as well as 15, and then the evidence will come to this House, and we shall dissect the evidence, we shall sift it, we shall weigh it. If that is the object of the committee, the leader of the Government can have his committee as far as I am concerned; but if, the object of his motion is to appoint a committee to take evidence, to revise the Bill, to amend the Bill in all its aspects, to put in new provisions, and so on, and then report to the House with the remark, 'It would not be fair, it would not be reasonable, to reject the conclusions and the recommendations of that committee?' then I want to tell the hon. leader of the Government that he is entirely mistaken as to the obligations of members of this Senate. We are not going, fairly or unfairly, reasonably or unreasonably, to accept the conclusions, decisions, or recommendations of any such committee. If the leader of the Senate accepts that position, then I shall accept his committee, although such in effect, is going over the work twice. If the decisions and recommendations of his committee are not to be final, are not to be binding, if a Committee of the Whole has a right to dissect, and put aside, and introduce new elements in the Bill, then the committee is absolutely of no use, because all the work could be done at once by a Committee of the Whole. Under the circumstances, having no explanations from the Government as to what they want, I fail to see what I can do. I am prepared to have the committee consider the Bill and take new evidence and to report that evidence to this House.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Before the motion is adopted I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that there should be an amendment of phraseology so as to make clear exactly what is intended, and what I would suggest would be to change the latter part of the clause so as to read:—

'If such a committee be appointed, take evidence if necessary, hear parties interested, and that the said special committee of the Senate report upon the said Bill to the Senate.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no objection to that change, and it may be regarded as of the original motion.

The SPEAKER—The motion, then, will read as follows:—

That Bill (B-2) entitled 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act' be referred to a special committee of the Senate, composed of Hon. Messieurs Beique, Bolduc, Bowell (Sir Mackenzie), Bostock, Douglas, Gordon, Kerr, Power, Ross (Middleton), Taylor, Thompson, Watson, Young and the mover, with instructions to examine the said Bill, meet with a special committee of the House of Commons if such a committee be appointed, take evidence if necessary, hear parties interested, and that the said special committee of the Senate report upon the Bill to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I beg to move, seconded by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting the House to appoint a special committee to meet with the special committee of the Senate in considering Senate Bill (B-2) entitled 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, to take evidence if necessary, hear parties interested, and report to their respective Houses; and informing that House that the Hon. Messieurs Beique, Bolduc, Bowell (Sir Mackenzie), Bostock, Douglas, Gordon, Kerr, Power, Ross (Middleton), Taylor, Thompson, Watson, Young and the mover will act as members of the Senate Committee, should the House of Commons agree to appoint a committee from that House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Will it be necessary to change that motion, in order to make it comply with the other motion?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, because it says each committee is to report to its respective House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The suggestion was whether it would not be better to make it read—

And that each such committee shall report to the House appointing it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—'To its respective House' means the same thing

Hon. Mr. KERR—These words might mislead the Commons as to what our resolution was. The motion reads, 'To take evidence if necessary, hear parties if necessary, and report to its respective House.' I suggest that it should read as follows:

And that each such special committee shall report to the House appointing it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I accept that.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—Is it not presumptuous on our part to direct the House of Commons committee as to what they are going to do? We can give our committee instructions, but I do not think we can direct the Commons committee in any way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If they do not accept it, it will be duly communicated by messenger to this House.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I have a good deal of sympathy with what has been said by the hon. leader. I do not know whether we should request them to appoint a committee. I think we should notify them that we are prepared to take evidence, and that we are prepared to meet a committee of their House. The hearing of the evidence is for the accommodation of people who want to be heard.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Would it make any difference if the instructions about reporting to the respective Houses were omitted? The committees are not obliged to report in all events, and I do not see the necessity of inserting that instruction in the motion. It is surplusage, to say the least, and if it is not dictating, it is directing in matters over which we have no authority.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We are asking the House of Commons to take action on a matter which is not before them, and a point of order may be raised in the House of Commons on this. No committee can be formed unless there is something before the House. That is the constitutional principle, and hon. gentlemen will find that I am right.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Boyer), who has left the Chamber, wished to bring before the House the question of the printing, and in his absence I call attention to it. There are no distinguishing marks as to the changes in the Act, or the new portion. It would facilitate the work of the committee very much if we had a reprint of that Bill. It would not be much trouble to the gentleman who prepared the Bill to mark in italics all the new matter in the Bill, and to insert notes such as were given by the House of Lords the other day as to the changes in the Bill and the reason of the changes. I venture to say it would cut the work of that committee in half, and it would be very desirable that the Bill should be reprinted for the use of the committee. The expense would not be very much.

Hon. Mr. KERR—If that suggestion were adopted, it would certainly save members a lot of trouble. Someone might be instructed to interline the changes in red.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall direct the attention of the department responsible for the Bill to this matter. There is no doubt the statements made by hon. gentlemen in this respect are not without reason. The difficulty is owing to the lack of uniformity in our system in the preparation of Bills. Unfortunately each department apparently is a law to itself as to how it shall prepare Bills for the consideration of Parliament. I think it is unfortunate that this Bill does not contain the explanatory notes which my hon. friend has mentioned. However, I very much doubt whether the difficulty can be overcome at the present time, because the reprinting of such a Bill would necessarily occupy a great deal of time. I shall suggest, however, that the officers in charge of it prepare some explanatory statement of its clauses, which will facilitate the consideration of the measure.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Try to get it printed.

REVIVAL OF GEOGRAPHIC SOCIETY OF QUEBEC.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired of the Government:

Has the Geographic Society of Quebec, founded in 1877, applied to the Government to revive, in its favour, the previous subsidy granted to it in 1882 and subsequent years?

What answer has been given to such an application or what answer is proposed to be given?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

THIRD READING.

Bill (O-2), An Act for the relief of Bertha Hétu.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (P-2), An Act for the relief of Frederick Joseph Campbell.—Hon. Mr. Pope.

Bill (R-2), An Act for the relief of Elizabeth Chausse.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

Bill (S-2), An Act for the relief of Beatrice Mae Stinson Fotheringham.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (T-2), An Act for the relief of Eva Jane Bateman.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (U-2), An Act for the relief of Florence Relf.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

IMPORTATION OF THOROUGHBRED STOCK.

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—Will the hon. member from Saskatchewan, who obtained a committee to consider the regulations regarding the importation of thoroughbred stallions and mares, inform the House whether his committee has met and whether it has taken any evidence.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—We have had two meetings, and some work has been done, but it seems that the chairman is backward in calling the committee. We are prepared to go on at any time.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I saw a gentleman who lives in this city who expected to be called as an expert by that committee, and he has been prepared for a long time to give evidence, but he has not been asked to do so. It appears that if the committee is not going to do anything they had better say so and be discharged.

The SPEAKER.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—The committee has received its instructions from this House, and I do not see why the chairman of the committee does not call a meeting. I am prepared and have been prepared to go on with the work at any moment.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I thought you were the chairman.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—No, I am not chairman.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have acted as chairman of the committee; with the suggestion of members of the committee I have been gathering all the data, and I believe I have all the facts. The committee has had two sittings, and has been intending to call Mr. C. S. Campbell who, apparently made the complaints, and after hearing Mr. Campbell, the committee intends to hear other parties interested. Mr. Campbell was in the south, and was to return on the fifth of this month. at the time that the House adjourned. I expected that the committee would be called together this week, but the further adjournment will delay the next meeting until next week, when I expect Mr. Campbell will be heard, as well as other persons. In the meantime I have instructed the secretary to write a number of importers of animals asking their appreciation for criticism for the present regulation in order that we may have as much information as possible when the committee meets again. I know that the secretary has done so. I do not think that any time was wasted; I think all action was taken that was necessary.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Nothing lost.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I think that everything possible has been done.

REBATES TO AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT MANUFACTURERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY inquired:

The total amount paid to the agricultural implement manufacturers on account of drawback on export goods for the year 1913?

2. The names and amounts of each company?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman who placed this notice of inquiry on the Order Paper is not present, but I shall give the answers now. They are as follows:

1. The total amount paid to manufacturers of agricultural implements on account of drawback on goods exported for the fiscal year 1912-13 was $186,832.05.

2. The names and amounts are as follows:

Name.	Amount.
Bailey Underwood Co..	$ 42 85
Cockshutt Plough Co..	22,394 74
Peter Hamilton Co..	14 51
International Harvester Co. ..	11,419 38
Massey-Harris Co..	131,649 82

Total..	$186,832 05

FORTHCOMIING LEGISLATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Is the hon. leader of the Government in a position to inform the House as to what legislation we may hope to have brought before us by the Government in the near future? We have been here for some time, and so far we have not had very much legislation brought down to this House by the Government. There have been rumours and a good deal of discussion in the press with regard to a considerable amount of legislation which has yet to come before us; as to the nature of that legislation we have, so far, not been given much information. Hon. gentlemen realize, of course, that my hon. friends on this side of the House have placed me in a very responsible position, and I have not had the experience which my predecessors in this position have had in public life. I am, therefore, very anxious that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House should have all the information it is possible to obtain with regard to the legislation which is to be presented to us. I regret to say that on former occasions not only this Government but former Governments have seen fit to leave a large amount of important legislation to be brought down in the very last hours of the session. I do not think it is in the interest of the country that we, as an important branch of Parliament, should be called upon to deal with important legislation when we are not in a position really to give it the consideration it deserves. I do not want to appear to be dealing with this matter in any contentious way, but I suggest to the hon. leader of the Government that we should have the very fullest information, and plenty of time to consider the legislation to be submitted to us, in order that we may give it the attention it deserves at the hands of this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I need scarcely say that my hon. friend should not feel it necessary to apologize for his want of experience in fulfilling the duties of the office which he fills, inasmuch as he has already given evidence of being a parliamentarian of experience and resource. My hon. friend has fallen in very rapidly into making the annual inquiry which has come to be known as a 'hardy annual' not only in this Chamber but in the other Chamber, as to what the programme of the Government business is to be. My hon. friend is perfectly right in making that inquiry. When I had the honour of occupying the same position which my hon. friend does, or at least occupying the desk which he does, it was one of the articles of my political faith that annually I should ask the leader of the Government what the business before us would be, and at the same time would criticise the Government for not bringing down its important business earlier. I might say an explanation has been made annually, since I have been a member of this Chamber, why the Government of the day had not been able to bring down its legislation at an earlier moment than is usually done. I can say with a good deal of truth that this Chamber has the faculty of disposing of Government business with such rapidity that the volume of business put through does not seem large, and yet, when we compare the length of time taken by the Commons in transacting the same business, which we do in much less time, we scarcely get that credit to which we are entitled, for the amount of business we really do. I need not make any explanation either, as to the difficulty of introducing, at an earlier period of the session, the more important questions that from time to time come up during a session. It is the most natural thing in the world for people having important questions, to leave those questions until the eleventh hour, when there usually is very much more hope of their being less analysed and less criticised, than at an earlier period in the session. Consequently we find that the public having business to do with Parliament invariably postpone important business of the character to which I allude, until the eleventh hour, or dying hours of the session.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Is that a wise and proper procedure?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not approve of this at all, and if my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House know of any remedy by which this could be obviated, I should most heartily join in co-operating with them in compelling that class of business to be introduced at an earlier hour of the session. Now I can say to my hon. friend that so far as Government measures are concerned there are some two or three measures which we shall have to consider before the end of the session. The Government has been employed most industriously in endeavouring to expedite the progress of those measures but, up to the present time, without that success which they would hope to meet. We have already dealt with several important Bills. I hope we shall have before us next week, through the procedure which we adopted last week, the consideration of the Railway Bill, which I need not say is one of the most important measures that have been brought down to Parliament since Confederation. It is most comprehensive, and includes within its four corners, probably, the most important interests we have in Canada. I hope to have before us very shortly a consolidation of the Shipping Acts; it is at the present time before the House of Commons; whether it will reach us in time to give proper consideration to it, I really cannot say. We have upon our Order Paper a consolidation of the Fisheries Act. That Bill will be before us tomorrow for second reading, and will probably reach its committee stage towards the end of this week. I cannot, just at the moment, say what legislation will be before us other than that which hon. gentlemen will have seen outlined in the public press. I can assure my hon. friend and hon. gentlemen opposite that none of them are more anxious than I to see important legislation brought into this Chamber, whether it originates here or in the House of Commons. And my own inclination would be to secure for this Chamber all the legislation we possibly can. I am satisfied that when such legislation will be brought down, whether early or late, it will receive the best consideration possible at the hands of the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman says there is important legislation foreshadowed in the press. Is there anything in that statement? Does he mean that the legislation regarding the Canadian Northern and Mackenzie and Mann's deal with the Government, will be brought down? That is foreshadowed in the press. Then the Redistribution Bill is foreshadowed in the press, and there is another measure foreshadowed not only in the press but in the Speech from the Throne—increased senatorial representation. There are several measures in the control of the Government which are not here, apart from those foreshadowed in the press, but the one which tickles the imagination of the public is whether Mackenzie and Mann are going to get what the press foreshadows.

WHITE PHOSPHOROUS MATCH BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill (103), An Act to prohibit the manufacture and importation of matches made with white phosphorus.

He said: My hon. friend opposite (Hon. Mr. Boyer) has given notice of an amendment to the Bill. I shall be pleased to accept the amendment which he proposes, providing he makes the prohibition against manufacturing take effect on the 1st July, 1915, leaving the Bill as it is in the matter of prohibition of sales, January 1, 1916. My hon. friend will thus see that it would practically give a year to prohibit the manufacture—that is to say, it would be illegal to manufacture after the 1st of July, 1915, thus giving six months after that period to permit of the disposal of all such products, so that the total prohibition would come into force on the 1st January, 1916.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—I understood from the promoters of the amendment that all the companies had agreed that they would stop manufacturing on the 1st January, 1915, provided that they were given two years to sell the matches. They wanted to increase the time of disposing of their products, and to shorten the time for manufacturing.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand my right hon. friend to say that it was to be extended for two years?

Hon. Mr. BOYER—They were willing to shorten the time for manufacturing by one year provided they were given another extra year for getting rid of their products.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would fix the manufacturing date the first of January, 1915. I have not been informed that all the manufacturers have agreed to that.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—During the adjournment I took the opportunity of going to the Eddy factory to look through it, and inquire as to how this legislation would affect the manufacturers, and the public, and the information I obtained from Mr. Rowley, the secretary treasurer, was to the effect that they were willing to stop the manufacture on the 1st of January, 1915, provided another year was given to enable them to get rid of the product; and that would be in accordance with the amendment of which my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Boyer) has given notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In view of that statement, I accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—I move :

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended as follows:

Page 3, line 25, for 'sixteen' substitute 'fifteen' and that the following words be added thereto:

'except as to clause 5 of the said Bill, which shall not come into force until the first day of January, 1916.'

The amendment was adopted.

The Bill was then read the third time as amended, and passed.

Bill (X-2), An Act respecting the Grand Council of the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Coffey.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN MANITOBA.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to call the attention of the hon. leader of the Government of this House to an article that appears in The Pas Herald, published in The Pas, Manitoba, and I would like to ask the Government what they propose to do about it. This Pas Herald is not a partisan paper by any means; I understand it gives its support to the Government of the day, and thus its statements will probably have all the more effect in Parliament. This editorial is headed 'Another Victim,' and says:

There is a dungeon in Venice over the doorway of which is found this inscription:

Abandon all hope ye who enter in.

British justice revolts at such an idea and rightly so. We believe that every one is innocent until proven guilty, and that the accused should be given every opportunity to defend himself. In the police court last week Oscar Schueller asked for counsel and witnesses; this was refused, Inspector French very kindly telling him he should have done so before. Lying in a locked steel cage, with no idea what charge was against him seems to be no detriment to any one securing his proper defense. Schueller unfortunately has been made the mark of police attention more particularly since he had the audacity to appeal against the decision of a $200 fine for giving a drink to a companion. That the liquor fines should go to the police is against all ideas of British justice. The privates scoop up the information, the sergeants lay the charge and prosecute. The inspector either sits on the case or gives advice to his boon companion now out of office.

He alludes, I suppose, to another gentleman out there.

It would be interesting to search the records of the Attorney-General's Department to ascertain the amount received by the various members of the force from local fines.

The traffic in liquor here is illegal and those who break the law deserve punishment, but the accused should be accorded a fair and impartial trial, and given every opportunity to make defense. The stunts pulled off at the barracks during the past year are a disgrace to British rule, and the town would be much better off if everything was thrown open, and the Royal Northwest Mounted Police put back into Saskatchewan and Alberta where they belong. Manitoba can do without them very nicely.

Since the white-washing process which took place under the name of an investigation, the people have little confidence in the mounted police here. That any person should be allowed to administer justice after what was clearly proven before Major Wood is beyond our comprehension, and for unadulterated nerve, hats off to the heroes of the play, for they come back stronger than ever and think their political pull is stronger than any public sentiment. Only last week the inspector refused to make out a warrant when requested by a prominent citizen. The reason was that his friend Johnathan might be inconvenienced thereby. Will the police explain also why some people in our town can carry on any rowdyism they like and be escorted to safety, while others are thrown into iron cages on the least provocation? If the Royal Northwest Mounted Police wish to hold the respect of the community a general clean-up is in order, and the force put in charge of some one whose career does not need the process of the white-wash brush.

I should like to know if my hon. friend's attention has been called to that article. As a matter of fact to my knowledge this thing has been going on for a year. There is a general rumour, which is backed up by this editorial, that men working on the Hudson Bay road after five or six months, when they are known to have accumulated five hundred dollars or so, are set on by an organized bunch of people, pulled and fined, and not allowed to get witnesses, counsel, or anything else; and the men responsible for this are waxing fat over it. It is pretty nearly time that the Government should take some action. The idea of the Mounted Police being prosecutors, the officer being the judge, and at the same time the whole lot of them being beneficiaries, is an outrage which should not be tolerated in any part of the British Empire; and I should like if the Government would take some action in this matter and say if they know anything about it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Government has no information, to my knowledge, on the subject. If my hon. friend desires information, there are proper channels through which information may come if he will make the usual inquiry on notice.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You gave notice to day, did you not?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend will make whatever inquiry he thinks fitting, I shall be very glad to obtain whatever information is possible.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have asked for a return; but in the meantime a paper published in the place makes such charges in an editorial that it is up to the Government to investigate and find out what should be done. That is what they should do anyway. It is not for me to ask for papers and everything else. There is an open charge made by a respectable newspaper, and one that leans to the party in power; in the face of such a serious charge it is the duty of the Government to take some action to investigate it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend knows very well that it would be impossible for the Government to give serious attention to every charge made in every newspaper throughout the length and breadth of Canada. The Royal Northwest Mounted Police have a reputation so good throughout the whole of Canada, that constitutes the best refutation that can be given of a charge of the kind to which my hon. friend has read from the press. I suppose no police body ever has enjoyed a better reputation than the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. The force has been in existence for forty years, and I venture to say that no organized police body has ever enjoyed a more enviable reputation in the maintenance of law and order and in promoting the administration of justice. If my hon. friend finds that there is any foundation for these rumours, as a public man it is his duty to set in motion an inquiry as to matters of this kind. I shall be very glad to facilitate the obtaining of information in every way possible.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Could the hon. leader explain to this Chamber how it is that, since the boundaries of Manitoba have been extended northward, taking in the Le Pas, justice is still administered by the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and not by the regular officers appointed by Manitoba, under the control of the Attorney General?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police have been acting in their capacity as police in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, the unorganized territory and in the Yukon territory for years. As to whether the acts alleged have happened along the line of the Hudson Bay road—which possibly may come under the Public Works Act—I can not say. My hon. friend has not intimated where those acts have happened.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is on a public work.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the police can readily be set in motion by a department of the Government, or the Police Commission on Public Works.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman says about the Royal Northwest Mounted Police as a general body, but I do not think a body like that should be allowed to be besmirched by one individual. If there is one individual doing this sort of thing he should receive his deserts and not be whitewashed, as mentioned in that paper.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The practice in England in regard to these matters is one more calculated to do justice than the practice propounded by the leader of the Government here to-day. When a member in the British House of Commons calls the attention of the Prime Minister or the acting Prime Minister on the floor of the House to any outrage against justice, the Prime Minister does not turn around and say, 'you go and get a policeman and find out the facts and bring him here.' The matter is immediately brought to the attention of the Home Secretary, who puts all the machinery of justice in working order. When a private member calls attention to such a state of things as depicted here, it is up to the Government to take action, and the Government of the day should call upon whatever department has jurisdiction of the matter, and have it attended to. In this case it would probably be the Justice Department. That is one of the English practices we should follow, rather than some of the other English practices we follow at present.

THIRD READING.

Bill (R-2), An Act for the relief of Elizabeth Chausse.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

WITHDRAWN.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (D), An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend if it is his intention to proceed to a final stage with this Bill? The House has already assented to the principle of the Bill, and at its last reading my hon. friend conceded the fact that the contention was well founded that greater attention would have to be given to the working out of the details of the measure, in order to make it more effective than it can be in its present form. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should not proceed with the Bill at present, but should give consideration to the suggestions which have been made, so that the Bill can be made more effective in carrying out what he has in view; and possibly next session my hon. friend may be able to produce a Bill that will appeal to the approval of the House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill has attained his object, which must have been to draw the attention of the Government, and especially of the Department of Justice, to the matter, and also to show that public opinion favoured the principle of the measure. Therefore the suggestion which has been made by the leader of the Government is one which should be adopted. Moreover, it pertains to the Department of Justice to take the initiative in matters of this kind. Therefore an opportunity should be given to the Department of Justice to introduce a measure to deal with this matter. If nothing is done by the department, then the hon. gentleman or any other member of the Senate may present a Bill to cover the point.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—In view of what has been said by the hon. leader of the Government and my hon. friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique), I would ask the hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill to accede to the request which has been made of him. He has succeeded in placing before this House and the country his views on the matter, and bringing them to the attention of the Government. No doubt the Government is now impressed with the desirability of taking some action next session in regard to the matter.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry, when he says that in dealing with such matters as this the Department of Justice and the Government should take the initiative. All precedents of the British Empire are against that. Most of the great reforms have been started by the efforts of private individuals; these have lead to such legislation as the Plimsoll Act, by which the lives of hundreds of thousands of seamen have been saved in the last forty or fifty years. Nearly all reforms are due to private initiation, and I contend that any private member has a right, irrespective of the Department of Justice or any other department of the Government, to introduce legislation affecting the welfare of this country, whether it be its material, its moral, its intellectual or its social welfare. It would be very unwise for this House to endorse the statement that private members should not undertake to advance legislation of this kind.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—On this question, as on all others, I am open to conviction; I am always ready to take advice, especially from men of experience. I am satisfied with the progress that has been made in this matter. The principle of the Bill has been adopted by this House, and the principle has been adopted throughout the country by a larger majority than was secured in the Senate. In view of the differences of opinion in this House, I might not succeed in having the Bill passed, but I have succeeded, as the hon. leader of the Government has stated, in bringing the question before the public. I am very anxious that the Bill should become law, but I do not wish to impose my views on the House. I prefer to leave the responsibility to the House and to the Government. Between now and next session the public will have an opportunity to discuss the principle of the Bill, and I am, therefore, prepared to accept the suggestion which has been made by the leaders on both sides, and by the hon. member from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique); I wish to give the Department of Justice an opportunity to deal with the matter next session. I quite admit, so far as this country is concerned, that although we have proper machinery to enforce the law, on the other hand we would have difficulty in preventing foreign papers from coming into the country, though they may contain the pictures of criminals; we would have difficulty in preventing such papers from circulating throughout the Dominion. Under all the circumstances, though I feel very strongly on this question, though I am in earnest in my desire to pass the Bill, in view of what has been said, I am willing to concede the point and withdraw this Bill until next session, under the conviction that between now and next session the Department of Justice will see its way clear to take charge of the Bill and put it on the statutes. Therefore, under the circumstances, I move that the order be discharged.

The SPEAKER—With the permission of this House, the motion made is withdrawn, and permission is given to the hon. member to withdraw his Bill.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON moved concurrence in

The second report of the Standing Committee on the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

He said: The report of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts was presented to the House on April 3 and has been before the members of the Senate, who, I presume, are all familiar with its contents. It is my duty as chairman of this committee to present the findings of the committee. The committee is composed of twenty-five representative gentlemen of this Senate, whose desire and object is to conserve the best interests of the Senate in all domestic affairs. The committee at this time, in addition to making a report on the financial statement, have thought it advisable to make certain recommendations in the reorganization of the official staff of the Senate and assign certain work to the different officials. Your committee think they understand the work to be done by the staff quite as fully as the Senate, if not better, as it properly comes to your Committee on Internal Economy and Accounts to deal with, and make recommendations thereon. The members of our committee are members of all the standing committees; that is all the members are on different committees and understand the nature of the work that we are expected to get from the staff in respect of legislation and other important matters. I may say that the recommendation that is now brought to the attention of the Senate, has the unanimous approval—I think I can say that—of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts. We have with us on that committee the leader of the House, who is familiar with the contents of this report, and who I may say now, was identified with these recommendations to as large an extent as any member of our committee. While there may be in one section—that in respect of Mr.

Hinds—a recommendation which involves a change in the division in which he at present is, I may say that I brought this matter to the attention of the Auditor General, to know whether it was quite within the right and the constitutional practice of this Senate in dealing with a question of this kind, to present it to the House in this form. The Auditor General said without any hesitation that any adoption by resolution of the Senate in respect of any matters appertaining to the domestic affairs of the Senate, would be recognized by him as authoritative. Therefore, in moving this resolution now I think it will present itself to your mind, so far as the matters contained in it are concerned, as being a very wise recommendation, and I anticipate that it will meet no opposition.

Hon. Mr. POWER seconded the motion.

The SPEAKER—This House, I feel convinced, will admit, with me, that it is not permissible for any branch of Parliament to ignore laws enacted by Parliament itself, still less to violate them.

Or, the Parliament of Canada, in 1908, placed on the statute book, legislation which decides, with undeniable and supreme authority, one of the questions which is to-day pronounced upon by the Committee of Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

This legislation, chap. 15, 7-8 Edward VII, in dealing with the organization of departments, and with subsequent alterations which may be made thereto, assigns, —formally and without any possible error, —to the minister in charge of a department, and to the Speaker of the Senate,—in so far as the Senate is concerned,—the work of organization and reorganization of the staff under his control.

'The head of each department,' says section 8 of the above cited Act, 'shall cause the organization of his department to be determined and defined by Order in Council.'

This organization, once it is determined on the initiative of the head of a department, and confirmed by Order in Council, remains intangible, until another Order in Council, obtained in the same manner, brings into operation, in this first organization, the alterations necessitated by the exigencies of the service. This is what is enacted by the statute, in the 3rd paragraph, of said section 8, when it adds:

After being so determined and defined, the organisation of a department, shall not be changed, except by Order in Council.

It must be borne in mind that it is the head of the department who, alone, in the eyes of the law, has the power to put the machinery in motion: 'The head of each department shall cause the organization of his department to be determined and defined by Order in Council.'

And besides, all appointments,—those provided for in sections 21, 22 and 23 of the Civil Service Act, 1908, as well as promotions permissible under section 24,—are made on the report of the deputy head of each department, concurred in by the head thereof and approved by Order in Council.

That is the real economy of the Civil Service Act.

Needless to add that the Act, in this connection, assimilates the Speakers of both Houses—(section 2, subsection c.) to the heads of departments, and the decisions of both Houses, to Orders in Council (section 45.)

Notwithstanding the enactments of a statute, adopted by this House on its own behalf, the Committee of Internal Economy takes upon itself to ignore the prerogatives of the Speaker of the Senate who, in this instance, has all the powers of the head of a department.

To the recommendation of the Speaker, the recommendation of the committee is substituted, and the committee, contrary to law, usurps the right to organize the staff of this House, and to suggest to the latter the promotions to be made. What becomes then,—and I mention but this last case,—of the section in the statute which enacts:

24. Promotions, other than from the third to the second division, shall be made for merit by the Governor in Council (i.e the Senate) upon the recommendation of the head of the department (i.e. the Speaker) based upon the report in writing of the deputy head.

As long as the present law shall determine the organization and reorganization of the staff of the Senate, as well as the promotion of certain employees—as long as it has not been amended in the sense desired by the committee—I shall uphold the prerogative granted to me by statute, of recommending myself, at the exclusion of anybody else, the proposed appointment or promotion, and any suggestion in that line, if it is lacking this necessary condition of the presidential recommendation, cannot, after all, but be declared illegal.

Or, anything illegal cannot be in order.

I therefore declare out of order all that part of the report of the Committee of Contingent Accounts which relates to the organization of the staff and the promotion of certain of its employees.

My decision can be appealed from and reversed.

What then?

A conflict will have been created, a regrettable conflict, more regrettable for the Senate than for myself; for, having no intention whatever of disarming, when I am perfectly sure of being in accord with the law, I shall continue to invoke the law—as well as the manner of interpreting it, by the persons themselves who have the charge of enforcing it, and from whom the following letters will show what should or should not be done under the circumstances.

In answer to questions put to him in a letter dated December 6, 1912, the text of which can be found in the Journals of the Senate of the 23rd January, 1913, the following is what the Deputy Minister of Justice said, respecting my contention that the appointment of certain employees of the Senate should be preceded by the recommendation of the Speaker:

This would appear to be the prescribed method of appointment, having regard to sections 2, 3 (sub. sec. 2,) 22 and 45, of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908. The recommendation of the Speaker appears to be a condition to the making of any such appointment.

(Sgd) E. L. Newcombe,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

The Auditor General is not less explicit, and if I cite his opinion, it is not so much to show that it is in accordance with my own, than to establish that, if the Senate wishes to place itself above the law, the intervention of the Auditor General may be exercised in a manner disastrous to the employes which the Senate may have appointed, ignoring the provisions of the statute.

The Auditor General states in fact, what his duty would be under such circumstances:

In answer to the third paragraph of your letter, I beg to state that I do not see how the Clerk of the House, the Chairman or Secretary of any committee or even the Senate, could proceed to make an appointment without having their action preceded by your recommendation, based upon the report in writing of the Clerk of the Senate.

With reference to the last paragraph, I cannot conceive such a thing as the Senate ignoring the law which they assisted in enacting, but should such a thing occur, it would be the duty of the Clerk to decline to issue a cheque for the payment of the salary, and the duty of the Auditor General to refuse to allow such payment to be made.

(Sgd) J. Fraser,
Auditor General.

The SPEAKER.

This House, in accepting the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, and in contributing to make it the law of the land, has deliberately consented to the abandonment and sacrifice of the privileges of the past, and it does not possess any longer—either for its committee or for itself—the right of substituting its recommendation to that of the Speaker, nor the right of making any appointment which has not been previously ecommended by the Speaker.

Should it go beyond that, it commits an llegal act, and clashes into the impassable barrier set up by the Auditor General.

I certainly cannot become an accomlice to such an infraction, and, considerng it is my imperative duty to ensure to he law its undeniable supremacy over any ule, resolution or report of the Senate or f its committee, I declare out of order hat part of the report of the Committee of Internal Economy and Contingent Acounts of the Senate relating to the organization of the staff of this House and to he promotion of its employees.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I regret exceedingly that in the exercise of the authority of the Internal Economy Committee we should always find that it is about as difficult—

The SPEAKER—I shall ask the hon. gentleman—

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Oh, I propose to appeal from the Speaker's decision.

The SPEAKER—Then the hon. member can appeal without any discussion; that is the law. The hon. gentleman has a right to appeal, which I cannot deny him, but he had no right to discuss a decision which I have rendered.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Then I bow to the decision of the Chair, and I move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Power, that the Speaker's decision be not concurred in.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I suppose I may be allowed one word.

The SPEAKER—No.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It is not fair to ask us to vote on this question without having an opportunity to look into it and have the decision printed. I do not know that I could vote either way just now. This is an important point, and I should like to read the statement by His Honour the Speaker; I hope that with the consent of the House it will be printed, and that the matter be adjourned until to-morrow. Some respect should be shown for the members of this House, and the members should have been informed that the point was going to be raised. The decision read by the Speaker quoted documents and letters from the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General and so forth. How can we vote yes or no at the present time? I know it is unusual to postpone such a matter till to-morrow, but we can create the precedent.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I feel very much as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I would have expected that the point of order would have been raised by somebody, in order that the question might have been discussed before the ruling was made from the Chair. It takes me a little by surprise; I have a strong impression from hearing the ruling read as to what is the proper course, but I do not feel quite at liberty at present to cast a vote. However, since the Speaker gave his ruling before the point was discussed I do not see any other course but the one suggested. The appeal to the House has to be made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—May I be allowed to make a suggestion?

The SPEAKER—All this is done by permission of the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—With the consent of the House I should like to suggest that His Honour the Speaker, by consent of the House, might postpone the reading of his opinion to a later date in order that we may not be drawn fatally into a vote on a question which has just been sprung upon the House, and which is of considerable moment. He might adjourn it until a later date to give us an opportunity to decide the matter after mature consideration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that suggestion be accepted, then the decision as read by the Speaker should appear in the proceedings so that every one would be able to read it carefully. My own impression is that there is a great deal of force in the view expressed by the hon. member from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) that the House should not be called upon to give a decision without being able to study the reasons advanced by the Speaker for his decision.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is an objection to the course proposed by the hon member from DeLorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand). His principal reason for suggesting adjournment is that the members of this House may have an opportunity to peruse and consider the paper which has just been read by the Speaker. If the reading of that decision is to be postponed until to-morrow, the decision will not appear in our minutes and we shall not have an opportunity to read it. The better way is perhaps, by consent, to let the matter stand over, after the reading of His Honour's decision. We can do that by unanimous consent—let it stand over until to-morrow and make it the first order after the third readings.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—There can be no discussion of the ruling of the Speaker, but there is no objection to discussing a motion. I therefore move that the vote on this appeal be taken to-morrow, and that in the meantime the documents be printed in the Minutes of Proceedings. There is nothing to prevent that.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—With the consent of the House, I should like to have it understood that we are to have an opportunity, when this comes up again, to make such remarks as we please on the subject; because the Speaker thought proper to stop me this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I would suggest, with the concurrence of His Honour the Speaker, that this might be dealt with by a motion that the consideration of the report of His Honour the Speaker be deferred until to-morrow. I make a motion to that effect.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There is one phase of this matter to which I wish to direct attention. The decision read by His Honour the Speaker just now, is a paper dealing with a question of law, not of order; if you will search the authorities you will find that there is a distinction between a Speaker's opinion on a point of law, and a ruling on a point of order.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman will find also in such authorities, that he has no right to discuss the decision of the Speaker; That is what he is doing now.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I wish to point out the position we will occupy if the matter is deferred until to-morrow. We can defer an opinion on a point of law quite readily, and can discuss it to-morrow. I am heartily in accord with the motion to let the matter stand over until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hope the good judgment of the House will support the postponement of this question until to-morrow. If I may be permitted to make an explanation, it seems unfortunate that there should be this misunderstanding, or friction, between His Honour the Speaker and the House. Now there is not a very great divergence of opinion upon this report between His Honour and the Internal Economy Committee. I used my best efforts for the purpose of bringing about mutual action in this matter, but apparently without avail. I did not think that this question would reach the acute stage which it has done to-day—and I quite recognize that it is only with the permission of the House that I can make this statement; that His Honour the Speaker would have accepted the recommendations which have been submitted here to-day had the recommendation of His Honour as to the appointment of an accountant been coupled with the report which my hon. friend the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee has submitted. I think I am free to say that His Honour would have accepted the entire report, but there seems to be a division in the committee as to who the accountant shall be. Now it seems to me but reasonable to suppose that if the Speaker is prepared to make certain concessions, the Internal Economy Committee, or the sub-committee, should not hold out for its pound of flesh. It is only by a process of giving and taking, of compromise or concession, that a Chamber of this kind, made up of divergent elements, not only political but otherwise, can possibly maintain its decorum and dignity. It is by agreeing in a commonsense way upon a recognition of rights by the various parties within the Chamber. We cannot ignore the fact that the Speaker of the House has certain rights, and the dignity of that position certainly should be recognized to the extent of this Chamber recognizing those rights. They are not only rights which have been long associated with the office of Speaker; they are not only privileges which surround and invest a Speaker; but they are crystallized into statutory law, and we cannot ignore an Act of Parliament. But while we may relate back to the practice which obtained in this House previous to the passing of the Civil Service Act, we must concede, even though it be distasteful to us, that there is a changed condition of affairs, that we are to do our business, recognizing the wisdom of mutuality and the rights which belong to all; we should be prepared to make some little concession for the purpose of maintaining the dignity of this Chamber. I would suggest that we should not continue this unfortunate condition of affairs, of countenancing friction between the presiding officer of this Chamber and the Chamber itself, and that we should see if the better sense and judgment of this House cannot settle this difference of opinion. The matter seems to have reached a very acute stage to-day, and for this there is no good ground. I venture to suggest that my hon. friend should permit his motion to stand until to-morrow or some subsequent day.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I am perfectly willing; I am quite agreeable to consent to the appeal standing until to-morrow before the question of voting. I assume that the suggestions made by the hon. leader of the House along the lines of compromising is not the way that public business should be done. I do not think this is a matter that invites the Senate to consider it as a question for compromise, as between the committee and the House. We either have or have not the right as a Senate to discharge the functions of our office, and the question of compromising those rights to reach a decision as to the application of the Act does not strike me as being a wise one. I am entirely agreeable, however, that the vote on the appeal, the expression of the House on the question of appeal that I made as against the ruling of the Speaker, shall stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I may be allowed to make this other suggestion. My impression—and I may say my very strong impression—is that there is a great deal in what has been stated from the Chair. Although I did not know the report, before it was read to-day, it looked to me the moment I heard it read that the matter mentioned in the report should be referred to the President of the Senate for his report on the matter, and I had intended to make a motion to that effect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Then when his report came, the dignity and rights of the Chairman would be saved, and then the matter would be properly before this hon. House. This would settle the difficulty if His Honour was willing, with the unanimous consent of the House, to withdraw his ruling for the time being, in order that a motion of that kind might be made. His Honour would then have the opportunity of making his recommendation on all the matters mentioned in the report of the Internal Economy Committee, and then the House would be at liberty to deal with the matter as if it had originated from the Chair itself. Of course, the initiative belongs to the Chair—that is understood. But if the Chair were unwilling to take the initiative, it would be open to the House to ask the Speaker for a report on such a question, and then the House would be seized with the question and would be at liberty to deal entirely with it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—And suppose it had been requested to take action upon the report of the Clerk, and the Speaker refused to do so, what next?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Then I suppose the House would be entirely at liberty to deal with the matter as it saw fit. The House would not be bound to adopt the recommendation of the Speaker. The House would be at liberty to substitute other names for the names he might recommend. It is only the initiative which rests with the Speaker. The intention of the law is that opportunity should be given to His Honour the Speaker to make his recommendation before the House passes upon a question of that kind.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—As the matter now stands it is not a question of compromise, and there can be no question of compromise, as the matter is before the House. The House has been asked to accept a report from the committee. His Honour the Speaker has ruled it out of order. There is an appeal from that decision. We have no right to discuss the decision. We have to vote for it, or against it, and we cannot do that intelligently without having an opportunity to look at the decision.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We are all agreed upon that.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Then the only thing to do is to accept the motion as made, and I move that the vote on this appeal be taken to-morrow, and that in the meantime the decision of the Speaker be printed in the Votes and Proceedings, in order that hon. members may inform themselves upon it. In the meantime, if His Honour the Speaker, the leader of the Government, the leader of the Opposition and the Chairman of the Committee can come to some decision and effect a compromise, we might accept that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Since the question has been discussed in the fair spirited way in which it has been put by the hon. leader of the House, I should like to add a few words on the same lines. Would it not have been better had this discussion taken place with closed doors, as it is practically a domestic matter of the Senate? We find that the Civil Service Act was passed to deal with the departments of the country. At the last moment the House of Commons and the Senate were asked to come under it, and the Speaker of the Senate was made the head of the department, and the Clerk a deputy minister, in order to bring those two bodies, having a service to fill, and having employees and officers to appoint, to fall under the Act. Under the Act the deputy minister brings to the notice of his chief the fact that there is a vacancy in the department, or a promotion to be made. The minister makes the report to Council, of which he is a member, and the Council acts upon it. The error which exists and which brings friction, is that the head of our department fails to harmonize his views with that of the Council, which is the Senate. As a matter of fact, a minister may bring a report to Council, but if that report is rejected, what else is he to do? To accept an amendment to his report or to bring another report? He has not, surely, the power to sulk and to refuse to administer his department, and let it be disorganized for months and years—I am taking an extreme case—because Council would not ratify his choice? If he did so there would be a remedy in the Council, because the leader of the Council, the Prime Minister, could ask him to leave. The Council in our case is the Senate. The Senate should certainly have the last say, and the desire of the Senate, however constituted to-day or to-morrow, should prevail in a matter which concerns its own economy. His Honour the Speaker should not stick to the letter of the law, which seems to give him the same powers and initiative as the head of the department, but he should remember that he has to bring his reports to the Senate, and he should try and harmonize his views with those of the Senate on all questions. For that purpose I feel that there should be, with His Honour the Speaker, and with the leaders of this House and the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, conferences over matters concerning our administration, so that there should be no friction. I adhere to the view, and most strongly, of the hon. leader of the House, that these matters should be settled beforehand by the powers that be, the leaders on both sides, before they are brought to this House.

Hon. Mr. KERR—My motion is that consideration of the statement of His Honour the Speaker should be postponed until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The only thing to be postponed is the vote on the appeal from the Speaker's decision. We have nothing to do with the report of the committee, and nothing directly to do with the Speaker's decision. The question before the House is the appeal taken by my hon. friend on my left, and on that he has expressed, at the suggestion of various hon. gentlemen, his entire willingness that the vote shall be postponed unutil to-morrow, after the motion now is that the vote on the appeal be postponed until to-morrow, after the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER—It is moved by Hon. Mr. Choquette, seconded by Hon. Mr. Watson, that the vote to be taken on the decision given by the Speaker, be postponed until to-morrow, and be the first order after the third readings. Is that the motion the hon. gentleman wants to make?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. KERR—If that motion is agreed to, there will be no room left for a discussion of the decision.

The SPEAKER—There is no discussion on the appeal.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (128), an Act to Amend an Act to incorporate the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I should like to have an explanation of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is proposed to amend the Act which we passed last session incorporating the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners. Experience in the meantime has indicated the desirability of making a change, and re-vesting in the Crown the administration of the harbour lands. The Act of last session made provision to vest the lands of the harbour in the Harbour Commission, to be disposed of under twenty-one year leases. It has been found unsatisfactory to absolutely confine the lands to the tenure of leases, and it has been pointed out that it is in the interest of the harbour that certain lands should be sold instead of leased, with a view to making more permanent improvements on them than would be made on leased lands. It is therefore proposed that instead of the commissioners dealing with those lands, the Crown shall deal with them, and determine how the lands shall be disposed of.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Are the lands the property of the Crown?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Are there any particular cases in connection with this matter that have led to this legislation, or is it only dealing with a general principle? Before the Act of last session, these lands were dealt with by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Up to that time, certain lands were sold, and in certain cases leases were granted. There may be some good reason for making this change, but I do not think that what we have heard to-day has given us any very definite or clear understanding of the situation. I suppose this legislation does not in any way conflict with the provincial laws, but only deals with the lands around Vancouver harbour, and would not in any way conflict with the laws of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not in the slightest, because the lands of the harbour are owned by the Crown. Under the legislation of last session it was proposed that we should permit the harbour commission to administer those lands by way of lease, but experience establishes the fact that it is in the interest of the harbour to sell certain lands instead of leasing them. It is obvious that it would be unwise to give the harbour commission authority as against the Crown to sell those lands and deal with them in their discretion, not that it would indicate want of confidence, but the Crown itself should act as the vendor of its own lands. It will be obvious also that more permanent improvements may be carried out on the harbour by selling lands in order that bonds and securities of that character may be issued for the purpose of making permanent improvements.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Are we to understand that it is the opinion of the hon. gentleman that under the Act as it now exists the commissioners could dispose of those lands?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I understand it, under the existing Act the commissioners are not authorized to sell the lands. Their authority to deal with the lands is limited to leasing, up to twenty-one years. It is proposed to revest the lands in the Crown, so that the Crown may either sell, or lease, or make other disposition of them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I do not understand the necessity of the Bill. If the Act now in force had merely the effect of vesting the lands in the commissioners for administrative purposes and leasing them, why is it necessary to legislate to allow the Crown to convey land?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Because all the lands were vested in the commissioners.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—For certain purposes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Certainly for a limited disposition of them, namely, leasing them for a period not exceeding twenty-one years. If any other disposition is to be made, it is desirable to revest the lands in the Crown and repeal the power which the commissioners had to make leases of that character.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I cannot understand that the Act of last session took away the right of the Crown to convey lands in fee. Why they should be revested in the Crown I cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have not the Act of last session before me now, but tomorrow we can look into it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (71), An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting Fisheries and Fishing.

He said: This is a consolidation of the Fisheries Act. It contains no drastic changes or amendments, although it contains many amendments dealing with details of administration and changes of that character. The Act has not been revised since 1867, and the chief object in view is to have a revision of the Act in a convenient form, and an amendment of the old law which experience has indicated could be better carried out by placing the Act in the shape we now propose to place it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Does the Act extend to anything but tidal waters. Is it intended to cover inland streams as well?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So far as the authority of the Dominion is concerned it does. For instance, a question arises as to the passing of regulations in inland and non-tidal waters. A decision of the Privy Council has established the proprietory rights of the provinces in fish in non-tidal waters, and the inland waters of the provinces; but, peculiarly, the right to make regulations is yet vested in the Dominion Government, that is, to make regulations with reference to the fish, which is the property of the province. Consequently this Bill will have to deal with all those phases of the subject.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—My reason for asking that question is because on looking at section 44, which deals with a matter in which I have displayed some interest, I find it is limited to tidal waters. I do not see the philosophy of this because it seems to me that the subject matter of that section is one that should be applied to non-tidal waters, that is, to inland streams, as well.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If my hon. friend will look at clauses 74, 75, 76 and 77 of the Bill he will find that it applies to inland waters as well.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—There is all the more reason then, for the observation which I want my hon. friend to consider. In dealing with the matter of pollution in section 44, the prohibition is limited to 'Any tidal estuary, or within two hundred yards of the mouth of any salmon river,' and so on. Now, if the purpose of the Bill is to cover inland streams I would like my hon. friend to consider whether it would not be wise to change the wording of section 44 so as to make it applicable, in that instance—which to my mind is one of the very serious objections of the Act—to inland streams as well as to tidal waters. This is limited to tidal waters or to salmon rivers, nearly all of which are tidal waters. To my mind it is one of the important objects of this Bill, and if it is intended that the Bill should have a general application to all waters, whether tidal or inland, under the control of this Government, that provision in section 44, it seems to me, should be made applicable to all of them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Would the hon. gentleman indicate the articles which are new or modified? Has he a memorandum given him which would allow him to run through the Bill and give us the modifications that are made to the old Act?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, I regret to say that I have not, but there are no really drastic changes from the existing Act in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With reference to the difficulty raised by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, I wish to call his attention to the wording of clause 44, which states without any qualification:

44. No one shall throw overboard ballast, coal ashes, stones, or other prejudicial or deleterious substances in any river, harbour or roadstead or any water where fishing is carried on,—

That applies to a river as well as to tidal water.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Will my hon. friend go on—'or throw overboard,' etc.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is another offence——or throw overboard or let fall upon any fishing bank or ground, or leave or deposit or cause to be thrown, left or deposited, upon the shore, beach or bank of any water or upon the beach between high and low water mark, inside of any tidal estuary,—

Tidal estuary covers only a very small portion of it. It continues:

—or within two hundred yards of the mouth of any salmon river, remains or offal of fish, or of marine animals, or leave decayed or decaying fish in any net or other fishing apparatus; provided that such remains or offal may be buried ashore, above high water mark, and that at establishments situated inside the mouths of rivers for carrying on deep-sea fisheries, the same may be dropped into perforated boxes or inclosures built upon the beach, or under stage-heads, in such manner as to prevent the same from being floated or drifted into the stream, or may be disposed of in such manner as any fishery officer prescribes. R.S., s. 53.

Sub-clause 2 reads as follows:—

2. No person shall cause or knowingly permit to pass into, or put or knowingly permit to be put, lime, chemical substances or drugs, poisonous matter, dead or decaying fish, or remnants thereof, mill rubbish or sawdust or any other deleterious substances, in any water frequented by fish. R.S., s. 52.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am thankful to my hon. friend. My first impression was a wrong one. The provision is much wider than I thought.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think whenever a Bill of this nature is presented, consolidating an Act, that it would be much better if the department would furnish a list of the clauses which it is intended to change. It would facilitate the examination of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite agree with what my hon. friend says. It is extremely difficult to have the department adopt a uniform system in printing their Bills, in order to point out the changes which are made to existing law.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The point I made would be covered if the department were to furnish a short summary saying that such and such sections are modified in such and such respects, in a general way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suggest that we take the committee stage to-morrow, and if there should be any paucity of information, it can stand until I furnish the Senate with the fullest information on the subject.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, April 23, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN MANITOBA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return of all papers, evidence, reports, letters and other documents, in connection with and relating in any way to the investigation held on Sergeant Grenan of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police at Le Pas, Manitoba, in 1913, by Superintendent Rutledge, and Assistant Commissioner Wood, of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police.

The motion was agreed to.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE STAFF.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to direct the attention of the hon. leader of the House to a strange condition of things which prevails in the Senate. Two of our most important officers passed away some months ago. The Senate has been in session since the middle of January last, yet these two important offices still remain vacant. I do not think it is any tribute to the dead that these offices should remain vacant. If they can be dispensed with for four months, they can be dispensed with for six months, or a year, or done away with altogether. Somebody has been derelict in his duty in regard to the domestic economy of this House. I am not prepared at the present moment to place the responsibility for this on any shoulders. Where does the fault lie? The position of Assistant Clerk of the Senate has been vacant through the death of probably one of the best, most conscientious and painstaking servants that Canada has ever had. Then in another branch of the Senate's affairs we have lost an accountant who was relied on as gold, and his position is still vacant. Who is responsible for this state of affairs? I undertake to put this question to the Government now because, when the time comes to discuss it, we will have no right to speak on the appeal according to the decision of the Speaker yesterday. I want to know the facts before I am called on to vote. I admit, according to the reading of the law given to us yesterday, in a most masterly way I must say, the Speaker has a right to recommend the officials to be appointed. Admitting that, what follows?

The SPEAKER—Will the hon. gentleman allow me a moment. I think it is not in accordance with the rules of the House to permit dicussion at a time when there is nothing before the Chair; but if the House allows it, I am willing to take the advice of hon. gentlemen on that subject.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am calling the attention of the Government to a condition of things that should not exist, that I should like to have remedied, and I am within my rights. Any member of the British Parliament has a right to take the Government to task on any question. What are they doing to-day against Asquith on the Home Rule question? Any member on the floor of the House has a right to demand an explanation on any public question; yet here in this small Parliament of Canada we are supposed not to have the same rights. Of course if the hon. Speaker rules me out of order, I shall subside, but I do not think he has any right or power to rule me out of order when I ask for explanations from the Government in regard to a public matter. I am asking why these two important positions in this House have not been filled, and when I was interrupted I was saying that under the ruling of the Speaker yesterday, he has a right to recommend anybody to fill either of these vacant positions. Does that end the matter? He places his recommendation in the hands of the clerk and the Senate takes action on it. Suppose the man he recommends is rejected, what happens? Who is going to fill the position? Has the Senate power to substitute any other name? The law says that His Honour the Speaker has a right to make recommendations, but the law does not give him or anybody else power to say that his recommendation shall be adopted. The supreme power is in the hands of the Senate to amend or reject the recommendation of the Speaker, just the same as the Governor in Council has power to reject or amend the recommendation of a deputy minister; the Governor in Council may throw aside the recommendation of the deputy minister, and appoint another man. Now, there is the position. Have we been given to understand that that will be the case here? I say no. The Speaker has the right to make the recommendation, but the supreme body has the privilege and the right to reject that recommendation and to substitute any other name that will suit the Senate. I am not the slave of anybody, and if the name recommended by the Speaker is not agreeable to me, it is my duty to vote against it, and to substitute some other name. Before proceeding I wish to know from the hon. leader of the Senate, has the recommendation of the Speaker in regard to these two vacancies, the assistant clerk of the Senate and the accountant, been placed before this hon. body?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—No.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The leader of the Government said no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The leader of the Government never said a word.

The SPEAKER—I think it is time that the rules of this House should be observed. The hon. gentleman has no right at all to speak. If he wants to speak he must put a motion before the Chair, and there is nothing before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I beg to differ with the Speaker. I bow to the Chair, but I say I am within my rights in calling the attention of the Government to a condition of things, which requires no motion.

The SPEAKER—I shall call attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that the hon. member is not in order. He cannot put himself in order simply by saying that he is in order, and I declare he is out of order altogether.

PROTECTION OF CANADIANS IN MEXICO.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I may also be out of order, but I crave permission of the hon. House to put a question of momentous importance to the leader of the Government. We are all aware that our neighbours to the south are at war at the present time with the Mexican republic. We are also unfortunately aware that many of our Canadian citizens are in Mexico to-day, and that their lives and property are threatened. We are interested to see that every Canadian citizen, just as of yore, every civis Romanus, be protected, whatever distance away he may be from the country. The same question was put by Mr. Cockshutt in the House of Commons, and the answer was given by Premier Borden yesterday that the Canadian Government will take steps to insure the safety of lives and property of Canadians in Mexico. How is that to be done? We cannot surely appeal to the mother country,—

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Send Sam Hughes.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—and ask her to send ships there to protect our compatriots.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What right has the hon. gentleman to talk about this question. He is away down in Mexico and I was right here at home. I want the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman has a perfect right to raise the point of order, but the hon. gentleman, when he rose, asked the permission of the House to make an inquiry of the Government, and he was permitted.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. member can talk about Mexico, but I cannot talk about home.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It would come with bad grace for us to ask the mother country to send some of her squadrons there. I do not, at all, suppose that such was the purport of the reply given by the Premier of Canada. That not being the case, I should like to know, in this case of emergency, if this Government has sent to the Caribbean sea, or proposes to send, the nucleus of our Canadian Navy, the Niobe and the Rainbow; also which of the two ships is going to blockade Vera Cruz, and which will encompass Tampico? It is important for us to know, because this is a question of emergency.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We will send Col. Hughes over.

WESTERN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw) moved the third reading of Bill (D-2), An Act respecting the Western Life Assurance Company.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I move, in amendment, that this Bill be referred back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce for the purpose of seeing if the promoters of this Bill would not agree to a change of name. It seems to me it is a very unfortunate thing that this name should be chosen. We have a company doing business which is called the Great West Life Insurance Company. Hon. gentlemen will see that there might easily be a confusion of names which might be very disastrous to people who might insure. We all hope that this will turn out to be a very successful and profitable company, but at the same time there is a chance of a conflict of names, and there is a chance of people insuring in this company, thinking they are insuring in the other.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It would be a mistake to refer the Bill back to the committee, for the committee has decided on the name. The Bill has been reported. It is a Senate Bill, and has to go to the Commons. I decidedly dissent from the proposition that because a company is incorporated, and doing business in Canada, some other company cannot be started under almost a similar name. That proposition has been discussed recently; a Bill passed a few days ago by the Senate was held up in the House of Commons, the Prudential Company Bill, simply because a United States company had a similar name. A Canadian company doing business in seven provinces is held up because it uses the name Prudential.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Great West is not a United States Company.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No, but there should be no confusion in the names. This present company's name does not seem to conflict with the Great West Life in Canada, which is a Canadian company. The Western Life of Canada is surely a distinct enough name, and as far as the insurance is concerned, the main thing is that no fraud should be committed on the public. With our insurance branch of the Finance Department, we have sufficient guarantee that any company authorized to do business in Canada is a solvent company and a safe company to do business with.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—That is not the point.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No. The main thing is to protect the public and the public guarantee of life insurance by the Finance Department of Canada and their officials is sure and safe. That is the principal thing to guard against. There is no danger of a fraud being perpetrated on the public because the names are similar. I do not think we should recognize the proposition that because a company has a right to do business in a certain name that some other company coming along wanting to use a name that might conflict should be debarred from getting incorporation.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—That question was brought to the attention of the committee but the representative of the insurance department was there and did not think at the time that there would be much confusion in using this name. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) that we should not be absolutely careful to prevent confusion in the names of corporations. A corporation may have earned a reputation, and done a large business successfully, may have grown into the public confidence, and another company adapting a name somewhat similar may start business, and the ordinary man would think that, possibly, it was the original and larger successful company, such company might perhaps be able, using the name of the successful company, to obtain an amount of business to which they were not entitled.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Who would suffer?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The insurance companies cannot always protect them.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Who would suffer?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The man who asked for the older company, might unknowingly do business with a company that had assumed the name of the large, more active and more successful company, he might get into that younger insurance company, and, until it had grown, its insurance to the individual patron would not be equal to the insurance of the larger company. I think we should be careful about the name. But the department was represented there, and the officials did not think there would be any confusion in using the name, and the committee agreed that the Bill should go as it stands.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—There will be an opportunity in the House of Commons when the Bill is there to make the suggestion; as the session is well advanced no time should be lost in passing the Bill through the House. I further call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that his motion is not in order. He cannot move an amendment without giving notice.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The Great West Life is one of the largest companies doing business in the West. Its name is a household word; every one knows all about it. It is the most active and up to date company in the western country, and does not only a large life insurance business, but a large loaning business. I should like to ask why the promoters of this Bill want the word Western. It is easy to get any number of names for an insurance company. There must be some object. What can it be except to get under the shadow of a larger institution. There is bound to be confusion in these names. When life insurance agents get out in the country they are not always too particular; they might not tell people that this was the Great West, but they might not tell them it was not. I can not see any object in this company wishing to use the word 'western' unless they wish to get some advantage and obtain some of the business of the other company.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—To ease the mind of the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie, I would just say that the only thought I had was for the protection of the people to whom these agents sell policies; I was not thinking of the protection of the company at all. To-day in every province of the Dominion charters are being issued indiscriminately to companies whose names conflict with those of other companies. Take for instance a locality near here which most of you know; a company obtains a charter and develops a good mine. When that mine has a reputation, other men obtain a charter with a name slightly changed from that of the successful company, and impose on the public by selling stock bearing a somewhat similar name. People buy that stock thinking they are purchasing stock in the original mine. The same applies to insurance companies. There is no reason why this company should not be able to do business by some other name just as well as under the name the incorporators are seeking to get.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The company is already engaged in doing business under a provincial charter.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—If it is doing that I withdraw my objection.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—This company was incorporated in Manitoba in 1910, and has been doing business since that time. Winnipeg is the home of the Great West Life, and if there had been any objection to this name being adopted in Manitoba, surely the Great West Company would have raised an objection there, and they would have succeeded there and succeeded here. The Great West Life have not objected, I understand; this company has the name already.

The motion in amendment was withdrawn, and the Bill was read the third time and pased.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the motion of the Hon. Mr. Thompson, appealing against the ruling of His Honour the Speaker, on the motion for the adoption of the second report of the Committee on the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend have any objection to allowing this matter to stand until Tuesday or Wednesday next? It will give an opportunity to members of this Chamber to see if we cannot have a better understanding.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The reports of this committee seem to have a very strenuous time in being dealt with, but on the suggestion of the leader of the Senate, and with the consent of the House, I move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and placed on the Orders for Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (128), an Act to amend an Act to incorporate the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—When this Bill was under consideration before, I asked if the hon. leader of the House was aware that the powers taken under this Bill might conflict with conditions existing in British Columbia. I want to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the only report I have of the condition of things existing in Vancouver, which appears in the Sun, a newspaper published in Vancouver, in its issue of the 9th of April. The statement is made that a judgment has been given by Mr. Justice Macdonald regarding what is known as the Spanish Banks property. The Spanish Banks exist in what is known as English Bay, which, under the Act of last session, I think, is included in the limits of the harbour of Vancouver. Section 4 of the original Act of last session is as follows:

For the purpose of this Act, the harbour shall include Burrard Inlet, with the North Arm and Port Moody, False Creek, and English Bay and all other tidal waters lying east of a line drawn from the Point Atkinson lighthouse southerly to the most westerly point of Point Grey.

This judgment of Mr. Justice Macdonald was published on the 9th of April, and in summing up he is reported as saying: 'I find that English Bay was not within the limits, within the meaning of the British North America Act, of a public harbour in 1871.' Of course, this is only a newspaper report; I have not been able to get the exact judgment, but I ask my hon. friend if he has had this drawn to his attention, and whether he does not consider that this whole question should be carefully looked into before this matter is dealt with. The decision given by the judge apparently makes out that the rights of the commissioners only dealt with navigation in this harbour; therefore, what is the purpose of dealing with this matter of land at all? If the judgment is correct, the land belongs to the province and not to the Dominion. We ought to have some particulars as to that before we go on with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Bill before us in no way disturbs the existing condition of things so far as the titles or the interests of third parties are concerned in the harbour lands of Vancouver. That is peculiarly a matter for the courts to deal with. This legislation could not possibly be applied in solving the question which has been raised. I fancy there has long been a contentious question as to the title of certain lands in the vicinity of Vancouver. Some of these lands are claimed by the provincial Government and some by the Crown through the Federal Government. All that this Bill proposes to do is to revest whatever title passed, under the Act of last session, in the Crown; that is to say, during last session of Parliament we vested in the Harbour Commissioners of Vancouver, for specific purposes, the lands in that harbour. It is now proposed to take back those lands, to revest them in the Crown so that the Crown may make disposition of them, instead of the Harbour Commission. It would be unwise in any sense whatever to interfere with the judgment of the court. If matters of that kind are in litigation they simply have to proceed to the court of final resort for a final judgment, and the Government would not be justified in any event in seeking to interfere in a question of title as between the parties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As I read the statement that appeared in the newspapers, I thought that the judgment referred exclusively to the shore lands on English bay. Does English bay or Point Grey form part or parcel of the harbour of Vancouver?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—That was included in the limits of the harbour in the Act of last session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the way I understood it, but the court says under the terms of admission of British Columbia into the Dominion certain rights were reserved to the province of British Columbia at that time. That is the point, as I understand it, that was under dispute as I read the statement that appeared in the newspaper. It seems strange that a portion of English bay, which is simply an inlet of the Pacific ocean, should belong to a province and be taken out of the jurisdiction of the Dominion. However, if that were one of the terms of the agreement, of course the courts will decide it that way. Might I ask the leader of the Government whether that judgment has been finally disposed of, or whether it is to go to the Privy Council?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I cannot say. We are not interested in that so far as this legislation is concerned. If my hon. friend will look at section 14 of the Act of last session, he will there observe that the Parliament of Canada has only dealt with lands and interests in lands within the limits of the harbour and heretofore vested in His Majesty in the right of Canada, so that there has been no pronouncement whatever as to what lands we are the owners of.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The Minister of Justice, I understand, was a party to this action.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the lands belong to the province they continue to belong to the province.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Will there not be a conflict between section 12 of the Act and these clauses which are being enacted? Section 12 reads as follows:

> The corporation may acquire, expropriate, hold, sell, lease, and otherwise dispose of such real estate or personal property as it deems necessary or desirable for the development, improvement, maintenance and protection of the harbour, or for the management, development, and control of the property vested in the corporation, etc., etc.

Might there not be a conflict between that section of the Act and clauses 14 and 15 of this Bill?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not prepared to say that there would be. All this Bill does is to undo what was done last session—that is to say, we vested last session certain lands in the Harbour Commission.

Now such of those lands as they have not disposed of and are yet vested in them we propose to revest in the Crown.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am dealing with another point.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Section 12 anticipates the corporation acquiring, expropriating, holding, selling, and leasing such real or personal property as it may deem necessary for the development and improvement of the harbour. I should say that would be an entirely different class of land.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—You mean outside of the Crown lands?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, outside of the Crown lands. A power of that kind, it seems to me, would be necessary to be exercised by the Harbour Commission in the performance of their duties under the statutes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And the corporation might acquire the land from the Crown.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Then a conflict would arise in that case. If they acquire lands from private persons or from the Crown under section 12, then those lands would be under the control of the corporation, and conflict would surely arise.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Section 14 of the Act of last session vests all the lands and interests in lands within the limits of the harbour, and heretofore vested in His Majesty in the right of Canada, in the corporation for the purposes of the Act. The Bill before us proposes to revest those lands in the Crown in the right of the Dominion of Canada. If the corporation happened to require, under section 12, any of the lands which are vested in the Dominion, then they can acquire them by agreement or otherwise from the Dominion, so that I do not think there is any serious difficulty.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The trouble would arise in this way: the corporation, after the passing of the Act of 1913, might acquire certain lands which had been vested in the Crown. The moment the corporation took those lands over, the corporation obtained absolute control over those lands. What are we doing by clauses 14 and 15 of this Bill? We are revesting those lands in the Crown, so that surely then there would be a conflict between section 12 of the Act and clauses 14 and 15 of the Bill. There is another thing as to which conflict may arise; if lands have been sold or leased by the corporation in the meantime, what about those lands?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Those would be subject to whatever tenure they were leased upon. The Bill only provides that such lands as are now vested in the commission may be revested in His Majesty.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Take the case of lands vested in the Crown.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is practically a question of changing the trustee. My hon. friend will observe from the Bill that it all enures to the advantage of the Harbour Commission. That is to say, the revenue derived from all grants and leases shall be retained and form part of the revenue of the corporation. This legislation is sought because it is inconvenient or impracticable to make leases of much of these lands, the owner of the riparian having certain rights in the foreshore, and therefore he might better deal with the Government for the acquisition of those foreshore rights, and it would be very much more advantageous to convey or sell him whatever the foreshore rights may be than to make a lease for a particular length of time. Furthermore, it will contribute to the making of more permanent improvements in the harbour. It would be a difficult matter to lease to a stranger the foreshore rights which attach to the riparian rights, for the simple reason the owner of the riparian rights would object to his being blocked from his enjoyment of the foreshore rights. This question can be very much more readily administered by the Crown than by the Harbour Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I think there is a difficulty there, and a very serious difficulty. I am dealing now with lands which were formerly vested in the Crown, but which may, in the meantime, since the passage of the Act of last session, have been acquired by the corporation and subsequently leased by the corporation to private individuals. That land, notwithstanding the lease, is being revested in the Crown.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes; so you will be wiping out any leases granted in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not say that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Clause 1 says:

1. Section 14 and section 15 of chapter 54 of the statutes of 1913, an Act to incorporate the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners, are hereby repealed and the lands and interest in lands within the limits of the harbour as therein described are hereby declared to be revested in His Majesty in the right of Canada from and after the date of the passing of this Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is right.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—So if the corporation has dealt with any of those lands after acquiring them from the Crown by lease, you are wiping them out and destroying their title.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would not so construe it. Whatever equity is vested in the Harbour Commission passes to the Crown. The Crown takes the place of the Harbour Commission. It does not cancel the transactions in that land. The Crown steps into the place of the Harbour Commission. The commission only had the right to lease the lands, and as a matter of law, if the commission made a lease of those lands that lease certainly would be good as against the Crown even though there be a revesting of the fee in the Crown.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The trouble would be the lease was not issued by the Crown. The corporation took the lands for harbour purposes, and finding that it did not require them, leased them to a private individual, so the Crown would not be bound by that. I am not representing any interest; I am only speaking in the interest of good legislation, and it seems to me that that ought to be looked into.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I assume that none of those lands have been parted with and that no action has been taken with respect to these lands during the past year, but after all that is only an assumption. It seems to me the reasonable thing now would be to let this Bill remain in committee, so that the hon. gentleman may be able to assure the committee that he learns from the department that no disposition has been made of these lands by the corporation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should be very glad to take up the subject with the department.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—There might be a serious difficulty there.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

FISHERIES ACTS CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (71), An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting Fisheries and Fishing.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have been asked by my hon. friend from De Salaberry to allow this Bill to stand until Wednesday next. I have no objection to doing that, but in the meantime, in answer to a request made from the opposite side of the House yesterday, for more detailed information touching the various amendments, I would take the liberty of pointing out to the House what the amendments are.

The present Fisheries Act, Chapter 45 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, has been amended from time to time. Also, under section 54 of the existing Act, the Governor in Council has power to make regulations which may extend, vary or alter its provisions in certain respects. This has been done in many instances, so that there are now several clauses of the Fisheries Act respecting close seasons for fish, meshes of nets, etc., which have been superceded by regulations. The Act, therefore, in its present form, is confusing and urgently needs revision and consolidation. It has never been revised since it was first enacted in 1867.

The new Act is considerably shorter than the old one, owing to leaving out sections that have been superceded by regulations. The following are the only amendments of importance:

In section 2 of the Bill, 'fishery' is defined. This is necessary, as section 53 of the Bill gives Fishery Officers the power to prescribe the distance between every 'fishery.'

Subsection 3 of section 5 is new. It gives the minister authority to appoint fishery guardians without going to council. Such was the practice for many years, though under the Act it was not legal. Last year all fishery guardians were employed under the authority of an Order in Council.

The next change of any importance is in section 26. This is a new section. The object is to enable the minister to send anyone from headquarters, or anyone else other than a fishery officer, to investigate operations at lobster canneries, which person can require the manager or proprietor to produce his license.

The next change, and probably the most important one, is section 29. This replaces section 44 of the existing Act. As the law now stands, before the department can secure a conviction it is necessary for it to establish as a preliminary fact that the fish were caught at a time or in a manner prohibited by law, thus rendering it necessary for the department to adduce the evidence of some person who has actually seen the fish being caught illegally before the person possessing them can be called upon to show lawful excuse for having them. If during the close season for lobster fishing, a fisherman comes ashore with a boat-load of lobsters, unless we can produce the evidence of some one who saw him illegally take the lobsters, we cannot proceed against him.

The new section makes possession of fish during the close season, in itself, an offense, unless the possessor can show lawful excuse for having the fish. While this may seem drastic, it is a condition of different game laws, and it is absolutely necessary to enable the department to control difficult situations arising, particularly in the lobster fishery, and it must be taken for granted in administering the law, such will not be done with undue harshness.

The next change is in section 31. The change is that where a canal around a dam is more feasible than building a fish-way through it, such is made regular.

Subsection 6 of section 31 is new. The object is to give the department power to remove old dams or obstructions to the ascent of fish without being liable to trespass. Instances sometimes arise where it is difficult to find the owners of such obstructions or where they have left the country.

Section 35 amends the existing law to the extent of enabling the minister to grant authority for the erection of barriers not only for retaining fish for fish breeding purposes, but for commercial purposes. Recently quite an industry has sprung up in Ontario, in the retaining of carp in enclosures. They are fed corn, etc., while there, and are placed on the markets at remunerative prices when the demand for them is best.

Section 37 is the same as subsection 7 of section 47 of the existing Act, excepting that it leaves out the words 'other than salmon' after the word 'fish,' in the second line. While the existing Act prohibits the use of bag-nets, trap-nets, etc., for the capture of salmon, the fact is that for many years past such nets have been in use in different parts of Canada. Subsection 2 of section 44 should be amended by the Senate.

The reason for the amendment is that since the Bill was framed, an instance of pollution has come to the attention of the department to which there is doubt if the clause as now drafted, would apply. The instance is in the case of the tailings from an iron mine being deposited in a salmon river. The iron oxide from these tailings causes not only serious pollution of the water , but is liable to ruin the spawning grounds. It is doubtful if the ejusdem generis rule could not be applied to the section as it now stands. Hence the desirability of amending it in accordance with the proposal in the above mentioned letter.

Section 45 is the same as section 54 of the existing Act, with the exception of the addition of paragraph (g), making it competent for the Governor in Council to prohibit the export or sale of fish. This should also be amended.

A great deal of what the department regards as needless apprehension has arisen, particularly in Ontario, on account of the wording of this section. There seems to be an apprehension that it might be extended to prohibit the export of whitefish, etc. This apprehension would, it is found, be allayed if it were provided that any regulation made under this clause would not come into effect until six months after its publication in the Canada Gazette. There is no objection to such an amendment.

For several years past the regulations have prohibited the export of certain fish, such as black bass, maskinonge and speckled trout, also sockeye salmon in a fresh or uncanned condition, though there has really been no authority in the Fisheries Act for such regulations.

Section 47 is amended by authorizing a fishery officer or justice of the peace to break open and search any house, etc., in which he has reason to believe there is illegal fish. At present it is essential for the officer to procure a warrant. While he is doing so, all traces of illegalities would likely be removed.

Section 48 is new. Officers sometimes find masked men fishing or preparing to fish, as well as persons they do not know. They have at present no authority to arrest them. Hence they usually escape.

Section 50 is new. It is necessary by the fact that fishery officers are sometimes interfered with in the discharge of their duties, and there is no remedy in the existing law.

A subsection, a draft of which was enclosed to me in the minister's letter to Hon. Senator Lougheed, of the 4th instant, should be addressed to the Senate to section 63 of the Bill. This is to enable the enforcement of the requirements of section 63. This is a very important clause; but while it existed under the old Act, nothing has been done to enforce compliance with it, and there is nothing in the Act which will enable the department to do so. After consideration of the matter, the proposed amendment seems to be the most feasible way of providing the necessary means. This should be made in the Senate.

A subsection should be added in the Senate to section 79 of the Bill, a draft of which was enclosed to me. This is merely to provide a penalty for an infraction of the subsection added to section 63 of the Bill.

Section 84 of the Bill is new. It provides that any fishery officer or fishery guardian who violates the law himself, or who aids, abets or connives at such, is guilty of an offense, and shall be liable to a penalty therefor.

Section 90 of the Bill amends the existing law, providing that a conviction shall not be quashed by certiorari. It frequently happens that owing to want of legal knowledge, errors are made in forms of conviction which would enable them to be superceded by certiorari.

Sections 91 and 92 of the Act should be replaced in the Senate by a new section 91, a draft of which I will submit.

The object of the change is to enable moities of penalties, or the whole of the amounts, as the case may be, to be paid to the provincial governments when effected at the instance of officers maintained by such governments. In the inland waters of Quebec and in Ontario, the fisheries are being administered by the provinces. Such has been the case since the Privy Council decision of 1898, which gave to the provinces such property interests in the fisheries as they held prior to Confederation. Under the new section, an Order in Council can be procured which will satisfactorily arrange the matter.

Section 93 is amended by giving a person convicted under the Act the power to appeal to the higher courts if he so desires. At the present time the only appeal is to the minister.

With these explanations, which will appear in the Debates, and may be an assistance to hon. gentlemen, I move that the committee rise, and report progress, and ask leave to sit again on Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. POWER—These provisions obliging fishing schooners to put compasses, water and bread aboard the dories that are sent out from the schooners for the purpose of fishing, have been on the Statute Books for some time, but have not been enforced. I wish to suggest that there should be some provision compelling the owner of a schooner to satisfy the customs authorities that he has complied with this law. I do not suggest that it should be put in the Bill, but there should be some provision for it.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again on Wednesday next.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

Friday, April 24, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (Y-2), An Act respecting the Canadian Northern and Ontario Railway Company, and to ratify and confirm its purchase of a portion of the property of the Carillon and Grenville Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. McHugh.

Bill (12), An Act to incorporate The North American Accident Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Bolduc.

UNIVERSITY OF SASKATCHEWAN BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY, in absence of Hon. Mr. Davis, moved the second reading of Bill (89), An Act respecting The University of Saskatchewan, and to change its name to 'The University of Emmanuel College.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the second reading of the Bill, but to call the attention of the Committee, to which the Bill would be referred, to what seems an inconsistency in the wording of the Bill. There is now an institution known as the University of Saskatchewan. That is the title by which the institution has been incorporated; it is an institution with all the privileges, as I understand, of a university. It is proposed now to change the name from 'The University of Saskatchewan,' to 'The University of Emmanuel College.' I have no particular objection to their changing the 'University of Saskatchewan' to 'Emmanuel College,' but to speak of an institution as a university of a college is hardly accurate, and I trust the committee may find some way of getting over the difficulty. They might call it 'Emmanuel College' or they might call it the 'University' of some other place, but to describe this institution as a university of a college seems to me to be an abuse of terms. There may be many colleges in a university, but I do not think one college constitutes a university in itself.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—I might remind the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that McGill University is practically named in the same way; it is the 'University of McGill College' as I understand it. We ought to have some explanation as to whether this institution is really a university or not; what is a university?

Hon. Mr. POWER—They might call it 'Emmanuel University' if they please, but not 'The University of Emmanuel College.'

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—It is the University of Emmanuel College. A university, as I understand it, is an institution that is incorporated by proper legal authority, and has the requisite power to grant degrees in the various sciences; that is what I understand by a university. Now, I think we ought to have some explanation as to whether this college has the power, the opportunities, and the facilities for teaching these various sciences, and if it has the power to grant degrees in them; otherwise it should not be called a university. I understand, from the explanation made just now by the hon. member from Halifax, that this is not the 'Provincial Saskatchewan University,' that there is another University of Saskatchewan, which is the Provincial University, and that this is an independent institution which they propose to call 'The University of Emmanuel College.' 'Emmanuel College' is all right, but if it is going to be incorporated as a university, Parliament ought to know whether it has the powers of conferring degrees in the various sciences, and whether it has the proper facilities for teaching. Otherwise it is an entire misnomer, and the institution is not entitled to the name at all.

The SPEAKER—I do not know if the hon. gentleman thinks it is within our province here, to pass a Bill in reference to education—in reference to a university.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—It might be better to discharge the Order for this afternoon, until the hon. gentleman in whose name the Bill stands, is present, and then he can give the explanation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He could appear before the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If the hon. gentleman will permit the Bill to go before the committee, the attention of the committee will be directed to the name and to any other feature that may arise in connection with it. I fancy that those who are supporting the Bill will be able to show some reason why this name should be changed; if not it will be in the province of the committee to make some suggestion or amendment which will meet the views of the majority of the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (W-2), An Act respecting The Toronto Terminals Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

CATHOLIC MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY moved the second reading of Bill (X-2), An Act respecting the Grand Council of the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association of Canada.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY moved that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—We should have some explanation regarding this Bill. I find that it proposes to put certain members of this organization, who are insured in it, in a very embarrassing position. We give this grand council power to assess certain members of the association for larger amounts than their contracts hitherto have called for. We have already had, in the case of the Independent Order of Foresters, a good deal of trouble with similar legislation, though not so drastic as this. With regard to the Independent Order of Foresters, though the Supreme Court was given certain powers, those powers could only be used after the matter had been considered and adopted by the various courts throughout the Dominion. In this Bill the grand council is authorized to assess certain members, who came into the organization before 1907, to any extent the council pleases. The powers asked for, without any sort of restriction, and without having any measure that may be taken by the grand council properly adopted by the organization, are larger than this Parliament ought to bestow, because it puts these people who entered the organization before a certain date in the position that, if they do not pay the increased assessment which their contracts hitherto have not called for, they will forfeit all they have paid and receive no benefit for the amount of money which they have paid to the association. The matter might be threshed out before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, but the hon. gentleman in whose name the Bill stands might explain why the Bill calls for such unusual powers.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—The hon. gentleman is quite right in drawing attention to this matter, and there is much force in what he has stated. The Catholic Mutual Benefit Association has had pretty much the same experience as nearly all other benefit societies which were organized in Canada thirty or forty years ago—they began doing business at less than cost. Now experience has taught them that some change must take place. I have been a member of this association almost from its very inception, perhaps 38 years ago, and I am intimately acquainted with everything connected with it—at least I was more intimately connected with it ten years ago than I am at present—but it is pretty much the same institution still. When we began first we assessed the members $1.10 a month for an insurance of $2,000. This was all very well so long as the membership consisted for the most part of young people, but unfortunately we began to get old, we began to drop off, and it was necessary to make some change. Then, instead of issuing monthly assesments of $1.10, we sometimes doubled them up and issued assessments of $2.20 per month. The officers of the association have lately been going over its affairs with actuaries, and they have come to the conclusion that, unless some change is made, the whole organization will tumble about our heads some of these days. We are doing business at less than cost; that is the argument of the officers. It is only fair, also, to present the case of the old members, many of them consisting of workingmen earning perhaps a dollar and a half or two dollars a day. How will this increased assessment affect them? I might say that only to-day I received a telegram from the branch to which I belong in London, Ontario, asking me to oppose the passage of this Bill. This places me in a very ugly position, as having presented the Bill I could not very well oppose its passage. However, I think the better way would be to let this go before the committee, and then we can thresh out the whole matter in a more satisfactory manner, for there are a great many arguments to advance on both sides. I want to be perfectly fair; I want to have the society continue doing business; it has done excellent work in its time. So far as I know it has been very carefully managed, and millions of dollars have been paid out in beneficiary money to widows and orphans. I am solicitous for its future, and I would like to have something done to insure its permanence without, at the same time, unduly pressing upon the poorer members of the society, who have now all they can do to meet the present payments. Let the Bill go to a committee, and we can talk the matter over in a more satisfactory way. If there is any opposition to the Bill, let those who are oppposed to it come forward, and let the officers of the society, Mr. Hackett and others, come and present their side of the case, and we will try and arrive at an equitable adjustment of the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the regulations of this society, have they the power, in the case of the death of any of the members—the funds at their disposal not being sufficient—to make an assessment in order to supply the deficiency? Some of these mutual societies, in the case of the death of one or two members, make a larger call than had been anticipated as necessary upon the funds of the society; they make an assessment upon the mutual principle, the same as they do in the mutual companies. Does that principle not prevail in this society?

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—No, that is not the way it is done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This company finds itself in the same position as the Independent Order of Foresters. The Independent Order of Foresters found their monthly assessments were not sufficient to cover the demands of the society, and consequently asked for certain powers from Parliament. If my recollection serves me right, they obtained power to increase the assessment. There is a law-suit now pending in the United States against the increased assessment which the Independent Order of Foresters has imposed upon the older members. It comes hard on the older members who have been paying for a great number of years. Possibly a provision could be made to increase the assessment upon all the younger members joining the society, and leave the original assessment, imposed on the older members of the association, as it was previously. I throw out the hint. I do not know whether it is practicable or not, but it is a point worthy of consideration. That will protect the older member who, like my hon. friend, has been paying for years, against an assessment in the future of double, perhaps, what he has been paying, in order that his heirs may secure the $2,000 in case he should die.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Inasmuch as the second reading affirms the principle of the Bill, I find that I cannot vote for it. There is something in the clause which is repugnant to me, and I cannot by my vote, without further explanation, sanction the principle of this Bill. Let us read the clause carefully. It is as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in the contract, the grand trustees may increase the amount of the assessments payable by the members admitted to the association before the 1st November, 1907, to any amount which the trustees may deem necessary in order to make the association actually solvent.

Supposing a similar power were given to a bank, or to an ordinary company, would it not strike hon. gentlemen that something is involved in that power which is repugnant to usage? You give the grand council the right to tax members to any extent they may desire, without consulting these members. We are giving the grand council the power to alter a contract entered into by two parties, without one party being called upon or permitted to give assent to the change. This is highly objectionable in my view. But there is another power given by this clause to the grand council which, to my mind, is equally repugnant That is the power of discrimination. That deficiency is to be made up, if the grand council so desires, by increasing the assessments of certain insured members, and leaving the actual premiums of the others as they stand. Prima facie, that is discrimination. I cannot possibly, until I have read some satisfactory explanation, sanction such a precedent by my vote. I say it is a proceeding absolutely out of the ordinary. If such proposition had emanated from a recommendation made by a general meeting of the association, we would stand before a proposition that had been propounded according to ordinary usage wherein the interested parties had been consulted. In the case of an emergency—which is not the case of this company—recourse might be had to extraordinary measures. But here we have no evidence of that; the only thing we have here is a brutal enactment, as we might say, giving to the grand council powers which no grand council, no council of administration, no board would dare to demand; and which no shareholders in any company would for a moment think of giving. I therefore would ask my hon. friend not to press the second reading of this Bill before he has something definite to give us, by which our consciences may be appeased.

The SPEAKER—The motion is to refer it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I got up as soon as you did to expound my views, and it is not my fault if you got ahead of me.

The SPEAKER—I think it is your fault that you got behind me.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We could adjust the situation by moving an amendment; instead of having the Bill referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, let us have it referred to the grand council and see if they cannot present to Parliament a Bill that contains some measure of justice, and not a measure of tyranny and arbitrary methods of collecting money. I fully endorse what the hon. senator from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) has said in regard to this matter; the hon. senator who presented the Bill is apparently not of an adverse opinion. I have had some experience in regard to mutual benefit societies—the Independent Order of Foresters, the Canadian Order of Foresters, and others—and I found myself frozen out, that is I froze myself out in time. They were continually increasing the assessments; where they got the authority I do not know. Here is a point blank demand from an organization on Parliament to give the most arbitrary and tyrannical powers that can be accorded to any association, to levy taxes on the poor man—and after all it is only the poor man that is interested, for the rich man does not go into those mutual societies. There is no doubt that during the past thirty or forty years this organization has done a great deal of good; and although the second reading of the Bill has been passed, I hope that will not be taken as an endorsation of the clause in the Bill granting to that body, or any other body, such arbitrary and tyrannical powers. I do not know whether I would be in order in offering an amendment, that the Bill be not referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee in its present condition, but that it be referred back to its originators, to have them offer Parliament a presentable Bill, and one that we can vote for on a second reading without contravening any principle of justice. However, after these explanations, when this Bill reaches the Banking and Commerce Committee its members will see to it that the rights of the poor man will be protected in this matter; I have every confidence that the committee will do that. I feel, with the senator from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) that I would not vote for the second reading of this Bill, to consecrate any such principle, but the second reading is passed —which is an illustration of how business is railroaded through Parliament; we do not know where we are at; most important measures are fired at us, and passed over our heads and railroaded through without our knowing anything about it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Whose fault is that?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Your fault and my fault.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You were here when the second reading was proposed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Your fault, and my fault, as far as that is concerned. Now in regard to the mutual benefit associations, I have this to say, that much of this assessment on the poor man is levied, not for the orphan and not for the widow, but for the purpose of paying big fat salaries to the officials. Take the Independent Order of Foresters, to which I belonged and from which I withdrew after ten or twelve years of excessive payments of money—money which was largely going to pay fat salaries, to put up luxurious offices, and to furnish fine apartments for the use of the officials. That sort of thing ought to be put a stop to by Parliament, if necessary. These mutual benefit associations are all charity organizations and they have no need of luxurious offices, and yearly salaries to officials of $14,000 and $15,000, and $6,000 and $8,000 and $10,000, &c. In a charitable organization that sort of thing ought to be sat upon, and impeded by every parliamentary method possible. And this applies not only to mutual organizations; the same thing ought to be done in the case of every financial institution where enormous salaries are paid; and paid out of what? Out of the hard earnings of the working man, who puts his $10, $20, or $50 a year into the bank.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—Does the hon. gentleman know if the organization of the society will not allow the members themselves to correct that abuse?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is the fault of the Bill. It gives tyrannical power to the grand trustees to do as they please.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—That is, to levy assessments? Would not the organization of the society enable this democratic institution to regulate the salaries of its officials?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am not asking Parliament to regulate their salaries.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—That is what the hon. gentleman is complaining about.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is only an incident in the whole discussion. The hon. gentleman will find that what I stated is this: I have the most absolute objection to granting to any body of men arbitrary power to levy on the poor man against his will.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I understand that, but the hon. gentleman is complaining of the large salaries paid. I am asking, simply for information, whether the hon. gentleman knows if the organization of this society will not allow the members to correct the abuse of big offices, and large salaries, without coming to Parliament.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The members have a right to regulate these matters, but they have mighty little power to do it. Does the hon. gentleman understand the difference?

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—In the organization of the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association, we have no officers getting big salaries, I can assure you the salaries are very moderate. I do not think you can get competent men to do the work for less. We have no luxurious offices, and we have a comfortable sum, half a million dollars, in the reserve fund. We want to put the business on a permanent basis, so as to insure against bankruptcy. In connection with this I feel really more in the position of a judge than an advocate for one side or the other. I want to see what is fair done to the membership and I want to ensure the safety of the society.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This question of salary is only an incidental matter. In mentioning it I was not alluding to the Catholic Mutual Benefit Society. They cannot pay $14,000; I know the Catholic Order of Foresters cannot pay $14,000, or build luxurious offices for themselves; but I know other institutions which do so, and which have forced members out of the order owing to the extravagance of their trustees. That is something I object to, but it is only an incidental matter which can be regulated within the four walls of the councils of those associations. I stand here protesting against the principle introduced in this Bill of giving to the trustees of any corporation such arbitrary and tyrannical power to take money from the poor man and use it as they please.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier), need not be disturbed in his conscience with respect to voting for the second reading of the Bill. It is an understood rule that in voting for the second reading of a private Bill, a member practically commits himself to nothing. The Bill goes, as a matter of course, to a standing committee, and any one who is opposed to the measure has an opportunity to appear before that committee, and the committee generally is quite prepared to listen patiently to anything that is said. Then, when the report of the committee comes up to this House every member has a right to object to the report. That is as to the question of the second reading. The truth is that the whole time of the Senate would be taken up dealing with matters that they really cannot deal with properly, if we were to discuss the merits of every private Bill at its second reading. I appeal to the general sentiment of the House, that we should not be able to adjourn half as often as we do if every private Bill had to be fought out on its second reading. I wish also to say a word as to the point made by the hon. gentleman from Victoria Division (Hon. Mr. Cloran), as to the tyranny and injustice likely to be perpetrated upon poor people, by giving such power as this Bill proposes to confer on the grand council of this association. In the first place, the association is a democratic one; the members elect their own representatives to the grand council, and consequently there does not seem to be any very good chance for tyranny. In the next place the reason why this Bill is before the House is that after an examination by actuaries it has been found that this institution is practically almost insolvent, and that if it continues to do business on its present basis no one will get anything. Now, hon. gentlemen will see that the poor men will lose just as well as the better-off men. The only question is this—and it is a question that the committee can decide—whether the remedy for the present condition of things proposed in this Bill, is the best and most judicious remedy. That is a matter we cannot deal with in the House, but which the committee can deal with, and the hon. gentleman from Victoria Division (Hon. Mr. Cloran), or any other hon. gentleman, who has a plan which he thinks will be as effective as that proposed in the Bill, and which is not as objectionable, will have an opportunity of inducing the committee to adopt his plan; but I do not think any reason has been shown why the Bill should not be read the second time.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—For my part I think the Bill should go before the Banking and Commerce Committee, with instructions to make such amendments to the measure as will safeguard the rights of these people. I do not mean to say that the organization should not be given power to make increased assessment, if such increases are necessary; but the hon. member from Victoria Division, for instance, has said that possibly a number of these people may be too poor to pay increased assessments. In that event, under this Bill they drop out and lose all they have paid in. Now, in many of the regular life insurance companies, in some states of the Union at all events, they have a law that if a person pays in as many as three premiums into the company—supposing he pays no more—he retains a credit in that company to the extent of the amount of money he has paid in.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The same provision is in the law regulating life insurance companies in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—That law does not apply to fraternal insurance companies. In order to safeguard the old members, some of whom may not be able to pay the increased assessment, the committee might introduce a clause providing that any one who is forced out of the organization by inability to pay the increased rates, should still hold a lien on the amount of insurance already paid for. That is the point I had in view, rather than any proposal to restrict the power of the association to increase its assessments, if such increase should be found to be absolutely necessary, to save the organization from bankruptcy. Perhaps we had better let the Bill go to the Banking and Commerce Committee and we can thresh it out there.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—My venerable, not to say reverend, friend from Halifax, having appeased my conscience and becalmed it greatly, I bow to the inevitable but not without a protest against taxation without representation.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned till Tuesday next at 8 p.m.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (B-3), An Act to amend the Civil Service Act, 1908, as respects the Senate of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Thompson.

Bill (C-3), An Act respecting certain patents of Frederick Sinclair Corrigan.—Hon. Mr. Kerr.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (78), An Act respecting the Patent of Auto Wheels, Limited—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Bill (81), An Act to incorporate The Canadian Press Association.—Hon. Mr. Jaffray.

Bill (23), An Act respecting British American Nickel Corporation, Limited.—Hon. Mr. Taylor.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (128), An Act to amend an Act to incorporate the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. leader of the House undertook to give us some definite information as to whether or not any disposition had been made of any portion of the property transferred by the Act of last year to the Commission.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am sorry to say that I am not able to inform the House of that fact, having entirely overlooked the question that was asked me on the subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would it not be better to let the Bill stand until to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, April 29, 1914.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING BUREAU

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER rose to move:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return showing:

1. The titles of all books, pamphlets and other printed papers issued by the King's Printer during the year ending on the thirty-first of March, 1914;
2. The number of each of such books, pamphlets and papers printed during such year and the number distributed, with the dates of distribution;
3. The number of pages in each;
4. The cost of each;
5. The authority for the printing and issuing of each of such books, pamphlets and papers.

He said: The matter to which I venture to call the attention of the House is a somewhat important one, although perhaps not as important to-day as it might have been four or five years ago. We spend, and have been spending for a long time, a very considerable sum of money for public printing. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not making any attack upon the present Administration, or upon the Administration which preceded it; I am simply dealing with the manner in which the business of the King's Printer's Department has been conducted. For a great many years there was a great deal of extravagance and incapacity shown in connection with the department, and also, as hon. gentlemen are aware, on at any rate two occasions, it was made known to the public that there had been very considerable dishonesty on the part of some employees of the department. But on looking at the records I find that during the past three or four years, since about 1908, when two of the most important officers of the department ceased to be officers, the business of the department has been conducted in a more efficient and honest way. Hon. gentlemen perhaps do not realize how great the expenditure in this department is. If they will turn to the report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1913, they will find that the amount of stationery, etc., supplied to the departments and Parliament was increased during the year by $157,300. The figures are:

1912-13	$931,861
1911-12	774,561
Increase	$157,300

That is as to the stationery supplied to the departments; the stationery purchased during the year was increased by $163,947. The total expenditure for wages, printing, material, binding supplies, and so on, for the last year amounted to $1,275,770; and for 1911-12 $1,164,939, being an increase of $110,831, and bringing the expenses of the printing branch over the one and a quarter million mark. At page three of this same report hon. gentlemen will find the total expenditure for the last year, ending March 31, 1913, was $4,817,388—almost five million dollars for the public printing and stationery alone. I do not enlarge on that. It is an immense sum to pay for the work; and the question is whether the country gets value for this money, and is it spent in the best way. I am not going into the history of the department, but I just wish to call attention to page 22 of the report of inquiry into the affairs of the department in 1910. There were two gentlemen appointed to inquire and report and their report is to be found in this volume. It is very interesting and shows a great deal of business ability. These gentlemen were Mr. John Hyde, a fellow of the Chartered Accountants' Association, and Mr. E. G. O'Connor. They begin with giving a history of the office of Queen's Printer. It was created in 1869, and the duties of Queen's Printer are set out in section 2 of chapter 7, of the Acts of that year, substantially as follows:

To print and publish, or cause to be printed and published for the Government under his superintendence the Official Gazette of the Dominion, the statutes of Canada, and all such official and departmental and other reports, forms, documents and other papers as he may be required to print or publish, or cause to be printed and published by or under the authority of the Governor in Council.

It will be seen that the primary duty of the King's Printer was to see that the Canada Gazette and the Statutes of Canada were issued in the proper way. What has been the fact? The statutes, which are, after all, the most important of all the matter that is printed for Canada, should be, as hon. gentlemen must feel, made known to the public at the earliest possible date after prorogation. The general rule is that a statute goes into operation from the date at which it is assented to. All the people of this country are governed by those laws from the date of prorogation. There are some exceptional cases where it is provided that an Act shall not go into operation until some later date, but the general rule is that the Acts govern the people of this country from the dates at which they are assented to. Now, does it not strike every hon. gentleman as a matter of business that every Canadian should have an opportunity, at the earliest practicable date, of knowing what the laws are which govern him; every one must admit that. Yet what is the fact. As a rule statutes, though generally passed not later than the month of May, are not distributed for about four months after they have been assented to.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is a lot more.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish to over-state the case; we have taken about four months as a rule. Hon. gentlemen will see that that is a very serious matter, and a very objectionable condition of things, and every hon. gentleman must feel that it is a condition of things which should be remedied. For some time there was a practice adopted by the Government of the day of publishing the statutes which were supposed to be somewhat urgent in their nature, in a sort of supplement to the Canada Gazette; but even that small favour has ceased of late, and now these statutes are not distributed until probably four months after prorogation. This is evidence that, for the large sum of money which we pay, we fail to get the one thing which we have the best possible right to get, and which it is most necessary that we should get. The same thing is true of the journals of the Houses, though perhaps not quite to the same extent; but it is true that the department is continually pouring forth printed matter for which there is absolutely no necessity whatever.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I know the House is not very anxious to have me say very much about this thing.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Go on, you are all right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am quoting from the report of the inquiry into the affairs of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery. Messrs. Hyde and O'Connor quote from a report made by the Civil Service Commission, of February 1908, composed of Messrs. Courtney, Fyshe and Bazin. This is the quotation:

> In the preparation of the blue-books presented to Parliament there seems to be a certain amount of over-lapping and duplication. It is difficult, for instance, to know in what respect the blue-books emanating from the Customs and Trade and Commerce Departments differ. The gist of the blue-books are finally put together by the Director of Census and Statistics, in the Statistical Year-book of Canada, and it would seem to the commissioners desirable to ascertain whether the blue-books issued by the several departments could not be reviewed by some authoritative body with a view to their simplification and co-ordination, thereby increasing their value without increasing the cost. Your commissioners believe that this might be done by, possibly, a joint committee of the two Houses of Parliament entrusted with the printing of Parliamentary documents.

Well, we have this joint committee of the two Houses, and my hon. friend from Brockville is chairman of that committee, and I have no doubt that his attention having been called to the matter he will see, or do his best to see that this duplication does not take place to the same extent in the future as it has in the past.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear; we know all about it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall in a very hasty way refer to some of the duplications. There are the public accounts, and the Auditor General's report, the latter practically duplicates his observations with the former. There ought to be some means found of dispensing with one or the other of these.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then the Trade and Commerce and the Customs Department reports duplicate one another to a very considerable extent. There is one set of reports which I think deserves special attention. Every month there is published a volume nearly as large as this which I hold in my hand, headed

'Unrevised Statements of Exports and Imports.' I do not mean to say that it is not a desirable thing that the public should have a chance of learning about these things, but it seems to me that while the statutes of the country are not brought before the public, and the journals of Parliament are not before the public, it is a mistake to print these volumes, the material of which is interesting to a very limited number of persons. Some means might be adopted to publish in the Gazette summaries of these monthly reports, as is done in the case of the banks. If one takes up the last report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery one finds, beginning at page 22, numbers of reports which, to a certain extent, are duplicates of other reports. There are special reports of the Trade and Commerce Department and the Customs Department, Public Accounts, Returns of By-Elections, Geographic Board reports, Return of General Elections, 1911, Influence of Icebergs on the Temperature of the Sea, Railway Statistics, Telephone Statistics, Farmers Bank—well, just now perhaps that is rather an important report—and the Trade and Commerce Monthly Bulletin. That is a very considerable item; it is published every month. In addition to that, there is a weekly report published by the same department, and then the Customs Department publishes monthly statements. That I have already referred to. Then there are the publications of the International Agricultural Institute—True and False Wild Oats, Research at Harrow Experimental Station, Experimental Tobacco Stations, Crop Rotation, Soil Cultivation, Corn for Ensilage, and Hardy Roses. I do not say that these are not interesting and valuable publications, but they are not in any sense essential or necessary for the carrying on of our business. With respect to the statutes, there are one or two points that the attention of the Government might be devoted to. If one goes to the Printing Bureau or to the King's Printer's Department, he will be told, 'Well, the reason why the statutes are not ready earlier is that there is delay in Parliament. The officers of Parliament do not furnish the department with the copy promptly.' That is one of the statements made on behalf of the King's Printer's Department. On the other hand I have been informed—and I presume correctly informed—that such is not the case. This is a point about which the leader of the House should satisfy himself. It is stated on the other hand that the copy is furnished to the Printing Bureau promptly by the officers of Parliament. If that is the case, there is nothing to be said against the officers of Parliament, and the Government should satisfy itself that that is the case. Now, whoever may be responsible, primarily, for this very objectionable delay in the publication of the statutes, there is no doubt that the Government in the end is responsible. I am not speaking of this Government in particular, because this is a grievance of long standing; but the Government are charged with the administration of the affairs of the country and it is their duty to see that their subordinates attend to their duty, and in an especial manner that the people of the country are afforded the earliest opportunity of knowing what the laws are, if they are to obey them. I trust that the hon. leader of the House, who is a thorough going business man, and keeps his mind open to suggestions, will try and see that this business of the publication and distribution of the statutes is put on a more satisfactory basis. In Nova Scotia we have a legislature which generally does not sit quite as long as this Parliament does, but a legislature which passes a number of statutes, probably on the whole about as many as are passed by the Parliament of Canada. They have a system there under which, beginning with the first of the statutes, the statutes are published from week to week. They use the form in which the statutes appear in a volume and they are distributed in the Royal Gazette of the province; and within about a month of the prorogation of the legislature, the public and general Acts of the province are published in pamphlet form and distributed, and that costs very little. I do not see why we should not be able to do the same thing here, and why a month or six weeks after prorogation the public and general statutes should not be distributed in that way, leaving the final distribution of the volumes to a later date. There is just one other point which deserves to have attention called to it, and that is the amount of work that is done outside of the Bureau. We have seen that the Bureau does a great deal of work which does not properly come within its jurisdiction, or does not come necessarily within its scope, but I find on page nine of this report, for the last year, that there is an immense amount of printing done outside the Printing Bureau. I take the statement set out on page nine. In 1908-9 there was done, outside the Printing Bureau, printing to the amount of $987,814. In 1909-10 there was done $988,929. In 1910-11 there was done $1,130,610, in 1911-12 $1,165,455. In 1912-13 there was done $1,274,870.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Would that printing not be advertising Government business, or is it simply printing documents?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, chiefly printing documents.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It includes the advertising.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall read some of the items for the last year so as to answer the question of my hon. friend from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain). In agriculture there was spent for outside work $97,384—that is evidently not all advertising—Customs, $45,887; House of Commons, $281,764; and Immigration, $78,181. I am just reading the big items, Interior, $83,507; Miscellaneous Printing, $100,586; Post Office $159,476, Trade and Commerce $33,389. I have not very much more to say about it, only I feel that we are printing a great deal of matter not absolutely necessary to be printed, and we are failing to print, in due time at any rate, matter the printing of which is essential. As I have already intimated, we do the things that we ought not to do, and we leave undone the things we ought to do. I am satisfied that the leader of the Government in this House will agree with me that it is the duty of the Government in the future to see that the necessary work is done, and done in the most inexpensive way possible; and that the things which are not necessary shall not be done in a hurry. There is just one other point. Perhaps the hon. leader of the Government may say that they propose to issue a commission to inquire into this thing. As far as my humble opinion goes, there is not the slightest necessity for a commission. In this report on the Public Printing and Stationery issued in 1910, you have summaries of inquiries made and conclusions reached by three parliamentary commissions, one appointed in England, one appointed at Washington, and our own commission. All the information that any hon. gentleman or any member of the Government can require is at hand, and it is really the duty of the Government to do some work themselves, and not to leave in the hands of outside commissions all work that involves thought or inquiry. I move the motion that stands in my name, seconded by the hon. Mr. Thompson.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman from Halifax has mentioned the large amounts which are yearly paid for printing. He has not specified the parts of that printing matter which could be dispensed with.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did; I mentioned some of them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Perhaps some of them; I do not know to what extent that would reduce the cost. I do not intend to dilate on the merits of the printing of these divers documents, which are distributed to the members of Parliament and to some of the people; I simply want to draw the attention of this Chamber to the possibility of reducing the cost of distribution. This printing is done by order; the reports of the divers departments must be printed; a number of documents are printed by the order of the Joint Committee on Printing of both Houses. It has struck me for a number of years that the Joint Committee could perhaps seize the opportunity of distributing a list of the documents that are printed for distribution to the parties who are on the list, and among whom stand the 300 legislators of both Houses, and of asking them what are the documents which they would like to receive from that list.

Several hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A good idea.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It seems to me that whatever the talents and the industry of the members, no one member of Parliament can interest himself in all those questions emanating from the several departments and from Parliament; every one specializes himself to a certain extent. Should not this list of printed matter be distributed to the members of Parliament and to those other parties who are on the list, journalists and others? I have never seen that list, and I do not know how large it is; but the list of documents I suggest might be distributed with the request that by a certain date the recipient should declare what documents he wishes to receive. I am convinced that by this means two-thirds of the printing of those documents would thereby be saved, and at the same time an economy would be effected in connection with the mails, which are now obliged to carry to our homes those documents, half of which, as we all know, are thrown aside when they reach our homes, because few of us have houses sufficiently large to retain and tabulate those documents, and put them on our shelves. Therefore I would ask the members of this Chamber who are on the joint committee to consider the question of limiting the distribution of the immense number of documents sent out every year.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—There is not a meeting of the Printing Committee at which we do not cut out possibly two-thirds of the documents which we are pressed to print. Possibly not over a third of the documents whose printing is demanded by the several committees are ordered by our committee to be printed. Every possible diligence is being put forward to eliminate, as far as possible, the useless stuff that they want printed. It is wonderful to see the persistency of some of those committees that want printing done. They think that because they have prepared some little document that affects them and their interests, it ought to be printed at the public expense and distributed for their benefit. We cut that out. Anything that is not for the public interest, to help to build up an industry which the printing of the report is calculated to promote, we cut out, and in that way we have eliminated at least two-thirds of the printing that was ordered last year.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The committee have put the pruning knife in the wrong direction. It appears to me that about two-thirds of the blue books that are published in this country, if they reach the hands of the public at all, go into the furnace. The suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Montreal is the proper one; none of those books should be published except as asked for by those interested in having them. There is only one blue-book that is read by most of the people, and that is the Experimental farm reports; still you find members loading up the farmers with Trade and Commerce reports and other blue-books that are never read. All that is money wasted. The committee reports of this House would be much more valuable than these blue-books. There are committees of the Senate, such as the Committee on Agriculture, which elicit valuable information which might be furnished to the public, and would be read by the people generally. Another source of expense is the number of bound books which are sent to members of both Houses. At home I have about two wagon loads of such publications. I never look at them; they are no use to anybody, yet they cost an enormous sum of money. Anybody in either House who wants the information contained in those books could get it in the library. If some step were taken to cut off that extravagance it would be much better than applying the pruning knife to the reports which my hon. friend has mentioned.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall be very glad to obtain for my hon. friend the information for which he has asked. We are indebted to him for directing the attention of the Senate to this very important subject. It has been one that has long been under consideration, and notwithstanding the attention directed to the abuses which are said to have attended the public printing, it seems to be very difficult indeed to limit those abuses. The public printing is in an anomalous position in its relation to public expenditure. The responsibility largely rests on Parliament, and not upon any department of the Government. Session after session Parliament will give authority through its various committees, and particularly the Printing Committee, to have an enormous amount of printing done, very frequently irrespective of the public necessity for having it done. It would largely rest with that committee, to place some restriction upon, not only the public printing, but the distribution to which my hon. friend from Montreal referred a few moments ago. The Printing Bureau is very largely, if not altogether, subject to the will of Parliament, rather than of the head of the department. This, of course, is rather a peculiar anomaly. It in no way limits responsibility, consequently expenditure very frequently runs riot without the head of the department being able to check it. The Joint Committee on Printing, which represents both Houses of Parliament, could very advantageously discuss this matter, take evidence, obtain data, and come to a conclusion as to how expenditure could be limited in this particular branch. I shall be very glad to direct the attention of the Secretary of State, under whom the public printing is done, to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How about the Statutes?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was about to say that much could be said about the suggestion made by my hon. friend as to the printing of the public statutes. The statutes have always been belated in their distribution. I quite appreciate what he has said as to the necessity of printing the statutes at an early date; and furthermore I cannot understand why the more important statutes, particularly the public Acts, should not appear in the Gazette in the manner suggested by my hon. friend. I shall be very glad to direct the attention of the Secretary of State to what my hon. friend has said on this subject, as well as to the subject generally, and to furnish the information called for.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—When the hon. gentleman brings down this information I should like if he could add a statement as to how much is spent for advertising as well as for printing.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The motion might be amended to include that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I should like to have the figures given separately.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall make an inquiry about that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a question I have brought under the notice of the Senate a number of times, but not in so elaborate a manner as it has been brought up to-day by the hon. member from Halifax. The Printing Bureau was established by the Government with the intention of having all the public printing done by its own employees in its own establishment in order to prevent what was regarded as an abuse of the distribution of printing among the different offices of the country. We know, however, that since the establishment of the Bureau a large proportion of the work that it was contemplated should be performed there has been done by outsiders. I should like to see the motion before the House extended to include information as to patronage which has been distributed throughout the country for a few years past. There is this difficulty I know in connection with the increasing volume of printing to which reference has been made; the duty of the Printing Committee is to examine—at least it was years ago when I was a member of the committee—the different reports presented to Parliament and decide which of them should be printed. Many of the returns called for in both Houses have been for information relating to certain localities, or information for political purposes. These returns are generally referred to the Printing Committee for investigation, and they decide which of them shall be printed. I have had occasion to complain that certain documents which I thought contained important information for the people were surpressed, while others of less general importance were recommended for publication. The suggestion made by the hon. member from De Lanaudière would involve the printing of all the documents that are printed now, but a large stock would have to be kept on hand to meet the demands made by members for copies. For instance an importer might require a copy of the trade and navigation returns containing statistics for the year. In order to meet such demand, the reports would have to be printed as they are now. The only saving that could possibly be affected under the circumstances would be the reduced number of copies issued and distributed. For instance, each member now gets two copies of every departmental report. Now to carry out the hon. gentleman's suggestion, as the expense of printing has to be incurred, the only saving over the present system would be in the distribution. Suppose only fifty copies were asked for, the balance of the issue, say 200 or 300' would have to be stored away, or sent to the papermakers to be made into paper again.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My idea would be to save the printing of those copies that the hon. gentleman speaks of as being kept in stock. Instead of printing 600 as is done now, if only 200 were asked for, the printing could be limited to 200.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The great expense is in the composition and not in the press work and paper. The only saving would be the cost of the paper and press work for the additional copies. The suggestion of the hon. gentleman would be quite right if you confined the printing and distribution to one copy, instead of two or three, of every document that is printed. The question of how far each department is responsible for this large expense is another point which requires further consideration. Some attribute the great expense to the Printing Bureau; but the Printing Bureau prints only such documents as are sent to it by the heads of the different departments. For instance, take the reports of the Department of Agriculture, a very large number of copies of which are required. They issue reports setting forth the advantages of the Northwest and other parts of Canada to immigrants. The order goes from the Department of Agriculture to the Printing Bureau for the printing of such reports and the Printing Bureau is not responsible if excessive printing is done. The increase, as has been explained by the hon. member from Halifax, in the expense of printing, is that a great many documents are printed that are not necessary. There are other points to which the attention of the minister might be directed where a saving could be made. In the report of the commission appointed to investigate the Printing Bureau in Washington, the recommendations contained in their report were acted upon by the United States Government, and brought about a saving of over a million dollars a year in the cost of printing alone, by suppressing the printing of documents which were considered unnecessary, and in other branches of printing, advertising, etc., which are not needed in the public interest. Advertising patronage may be abused by any department. I am not saying that it has or has not been abused in this country, but any one who reflects for a moment on the power that is given to advertise can see how abuses might creep in. In some departments advertisements in connection with a matter relating, for instance to Montreal, have been published in newspapers in the Northwest territory, and when the accounts were sent in they had to be paid. I am only giving that as an illustration of how some newspapers abuse what they consider their right for a share of patronage. I do not wish to be considered egotistical, but while I was at the head of the Customs Department, any newspaper which published an advertisement affecting my department, unless it had authority for publishing it, never had its account paid. Precaution has been taken of late years by the recent, as well as by the present Government, to put a small notice at the end of each advertisement that this will only be paid for when ordered by the department. That has put a stop to a very great extent to the practice of which I have been speaking. My own impression is that with proper investigation and caution very much might have been saved in the way of printing, not only last year but in previous years. I should like to see the Order for the return go back for a few years, and not be confined to the year ending 31st March, 1914. Every politician knows how that can be used. Unless a thorough investigation is made and the practice that has been followed in years past is considered also, very little will be accomplished.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the motion of the Hon. Mr. Thompson, appealing against the ruling of His Honour the Speaker, on the motion for the adoption of the second report of the Committee on the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend have any objection to permitting this Order to stand until to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Personally I would prefer to have the matter dealt with to-day, but out of deference to the leader of the House, I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into

Committee of the Whole on Bill (71), An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting Fisheries and Fishing.

(In the Committee.)

On Clause 2.

2. In this Act, and in any regulations made thereunder, unless the context otherwise requires,—

'Minister' means the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, R.S., s. 2.

'fish' includes shell fish, crustaceans and marine animals.

'fishery' means and includes the area, locality, place or station in or on which a pound, seine, net, weir or other fishing appliance is used, set, placed or located, and the area, tract or stretch of water in or from which fish may be taken by the said pound, seine, net, weir or other fishing appliance, and also the pound, seine, net, weir, or other fishing appliance used in connection therewith.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call the attention of the committee to the definition of the term fishery. This clause reads:

Fishery means and includes the area, locality, place, or station in, or, on which a pound, seine, net, weir or other fishing appliance is used, set, placed or located, and so on.

That is all right enough. That is what a fishery is understood to mean, but then the definition goes on to say in the last two lines:

And also the pound, seine, net, weir or other fishing appliance used in connection therewith.

That is not a correct description. For instance, the fishing appliance used in connection with this fishery might be a hook and line, and you could not describe it as a fishery. I think the last two lines should be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Because a seine, net or weir or a fishing hook and line are not fisheries. They are fishing instruments but not fisheries.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—It says the locality or place where these are used.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is all right; that is the first part of it; I refer to only the last two lines.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suggest that this should stand until we go through the Bill, and then we will see its application. I do not know at the moment wherein is its application.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5, relating to appointment of fishery officers exercising the powers of a justice of the peace.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a rather extensive power, and it is doubtful whether it should be the law that every fishery officer should be authorized by the Government to exercise such powers. There is some question as to the wisdom of that.

Clause 5 was adopted.

On clause 5, subclause 3, as to appointment of fishery guardians.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Those are new officers?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—Those are not new.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are new in the law; they may not be new in practice.

The subclause was adopted.

On clause 21:

Hon. Mr. BOYER—What is the idea of paying for a lobster license at the rate of $5 for the first 4,800 lb.? What is the idea of the 800 lb.?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I could not tell you that, except that you pay for practically what you get.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—The idea is to make up the even number of cases: 48 lbs. of lobsters to a case, so that gives 480 cases. Practically one cent a case is what you have to pay for license to pack them. That is where the 800 lbs. come in.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 27:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—There seems to me considerable objection to this clause. I do not see why the owner of a lobster factory should be compelled to gather eggs for the Dominion of Canada without compensation. Besides, this clause is absolutely impossible to enforce. The law now forbids the taking of the spawn or seed lobsters, and this would seem to imply that you can take the spawn off the lobster, and can the lobsters. It seems to me that there is an ellipsis somewhere between that clause and the clause that is left out, or has the Government, by Order in Council, the right to direct the taking of spawn lobsters? I do not see any clause in the present Bill forbidding the taking of spawn lobsters; the only point is that the owner of the factory shall gather the seed lobsters and save them on the order of a person appointed by the minister, and he is supposed to do that without any recompense. It is going a considerable distance to expect the owner of a lobster factory to act as general philanthropist for the people of Canada; the clause is absolutely impossible of enforcement unless you put a man standing at the lobster factory.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is the old law; we go back to 58 and 59 Victoria, chap. 58. My hon. friend will find this enacted also word for word in the revised statutes, section 42. I fancy it is one of those powers vested in the minister which may be invoked, but which is never invoked without good reason. If my hon. friend knows of its having been subject to any abuses I would be very glad to direct the attention of the department to it, but it has been in force for many years.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—There is only this, that it will be foolish to enact a statute that is impossible of enforcement; it is only bringing the law into contempt. That clause has never been enforced. Where they have hatcheries they gather up the spawn and give compensation for the gathering of it. The fact is that that clause as it stands never was enforced and never will be enforced, because it is impossible.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—There is nothing in this clause that requires that the lobster seed shall be handed over to the minister without compensation. I have not the slightest doubt that, if at any time the fishery authorities or the minister wishes to obtain lobster eggs from seed in this way, they will be very glad to pay the factory people who help them by getting those eggs, and that the fishermen will be very glad to dispose of them in that way. When I was a member of the Fishery Committee in the House of Commons some years ago, this matter was discussed there, and the method of gaining the seed in this way was quite approved of by all those who were interested, and appeared to have a knowledge of the business. I do not think the clause compels those people to do anything that they would not be quite willing and probably glad to do, because the action of the Government in carrying on these hatcheries, benefits the fishermen as much as it benefits the public; they have an opportunity of catching and therefore of selling more fish. It is all to the advantage of both the public communities and those engaged in the fisheries.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—We quite understand that. Of course, this clause only takes the authority for the minister to order that those eggs be preserved, but I fail to see where they are going to get the eggs. However, as the clause is an old one it will do no harm to perpetuate it.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 29.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Was any change made in this clause?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, it replaces or rather enlarges upon section 44 of the old Act. As the law now stands, before the department can secure a conviction it is necessary for it to establish, as a preliminary fact, that the fish were caught at a time or in a manner prohibited by law, thus rendering it necessary for the department to produce some person who has really seen the fish caught illegally, before the person holding the fish can be convicted. In regard to the conviction for illegally taking lobsters, unless the Government can produce some one who saw the illegal taking of the lobsters, we cannot convict the offender. The new law makes the possession of lobsters in the close season, itself, an offence. This is a condition of different game laws, and it is absolutely necessary in order to enable the Government to control the fishing season, particularly in the lobster fishing. I think the provision is a very desirable one.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—The necessity of this provision was very much in evidence last year. It was almost impossible to obtain a conviction. You could see these people coming from the fishing grounds; you could catch them on the shores with the lobsters in their fishing boats, and as the law stood it was impossible to convict them. You would have to see them taking the lobsters out of the water into the boat before you could convict them. That clause is necessary for the enforcement of the law.

(The clause was adopted.)

On clause 31.

31. Every slide, dam or other obstruction across or in any stream where the minister determines it to be necessary for the public interest that a fish-pass should exist, shall be provided by the owner or occupier with a durable and efficient fish-way, or canal around the slide, dam or other obstruction, which shall be maintained in a good and effective condition by said owner or occupier, in such place and of such form and capacity as will in the opinion of the minister satisfactorily permit the free passage of fish through the same. R.S., s. 46.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is a change in this clause. Provision is made for making a canal around the dam through which fish may pass instead of building a fish-way through the dam. The former course was found the best, depending on local conditions.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Does that mean the Government officers can go and make the canal?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It should be done under Government supervision.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 31, sub-clause 6.

6. Where unused slides, dams, obstructions, or anything detrimental to fish exist, and the owner or occupier thereof does not after notice given by the minister, remove the same or the owner is not resident in Canada, or his exact place of residence is unknown to the minister, the minister may, without being liable for damages, or in any way to indemnify the said owner or occupier cause said slide, dam, obstruction, or thing detrimental to fish life to be removed or destroyed, and in cases where notice has been given to the owner or occupier, may recover from said owner or occupier the expense of so removing or destroying the same.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is a change in this sub-clause, giving the minister power to remove old dams without the Government being liable for damages. It sometimes happens a dam is deserted, and it is not open, and under the Act as it stands at present, if the Government removes the dam it would be liable for damages.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a most necessary provision.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 42.

12. In the provinces of British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, every ditch, channel or canal constructed or adapted for conducting water from any lake, river or stream, for irrigating, manufacturing, domestic or other purposes, shall be provided at its entrance or intake with a fish guard or a metal or wire grating, covering or netting, so fixed as to prevent the passage of fish from any lake, river or stream into such ditch, channel or canal. 9-10 Ed. VII., c. 20, s. 9.

2. Such fish guards shall have meshes or holes not more than three-eighths of an inch in diameter, and shall be built and maintained by the owner of such ditch, channel or canal, subject to the approval of the minister or of such officer as he may appoint to examine it. 9-10 Ed. VII., c. 20, s. 9, ss. 2.

3. The owner of such ditch, channel or canal shall maintain such fish guard in a good and efficient state of repair, and shall not permit its removal except for renewal or repair, and during the time such renewal or repair is being effected the sluice or gate at the intake or entrance shall be closed, and the passage of fish into the ditch, channel or canal prevented. 9-10 Ed. VII., c. 20, c. 9, ss. 3.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I observe by this clause that when you come to the question of penalties they do not seem to apply to British Columbia. Is there any other arrangement about enforcing the law in British Columbia? If the hon. gentleman looks at clause 74, as to penalties, the word British Columbia is left out.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is probably a good reason for that, because in those provinces there is distinction drawn from the other provinces. I shall get the information for my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Is there any provision under the provincial law for the penalties?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Really, I could not say that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—This deals with the fish guards, the protecting of the fish at the entrance of a river. Has the department come to any decision as to what is a practical time to have fish guards placed at the head of the irrigation ditches or dams; because I know from practical experience that there has been a great deal of trouble in regard to fish guards. The fishery officers appear to have no special time of year they can recommend, and they put in an irrigation net, and the result was that the fish were washed up against the net, and it killed more fish than if they were carried down the irrigation ditch.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no information about that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The water rushing down against the nets puts them into it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—It should be twine. If you use twine for the mesh it would obviate the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I do not understand how the fish would be any better off, if the nets were made of twine. It is the force of the water rushing against the obstruction that holds them against it, and they cannot get away from it, and are killed. It does not matter whether the net is made of twine or any other material.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—If they were not killed at the first impact they would very soon get away. The water would not be so strong that they could not swim against it.

The cause was adopted.

On clause 43.

43. No one shall catch, fish for, take, buy, sell, possess or export any fish for the purpose of converting it into manure, guano, or fertilizer, or for the manufacture or conversion of such fish into oil or manure or other fertilizing product, except under authority of the minister; but the minister may by notice published in the Canada Gazette, except any kind or kinds of fish from the operation of this section or any part of this section, and may at any time by a notice similarly published, withdraw such exception.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is new. It does not seem to me a proper thing that even a minister should allow a fish to be caught for the purpose of being used for manure. The time of day for that has passed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I fancy that power is given to the minister to correct some of the abuses which have arisen in British Columbia in connection with the rejected fish from the canneries. Probably the hon. gentleman from Yale will know.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause is merely authorizing parties to use fish for manure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, it prohibits such being done except by the authority of the minister. There may be such a catch of fish or something akin thereto as to render it desirable that they should be used for that purpose, and yet at the same time it would not be desirable to give the parties authority to bring about such a condition. It might result in a very serious abuse, so it simply allows it to be regulated by the minister.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—I understand why that provision should be there. Down with us, a large amount of herring is caught and used for bait purposes. They are salted lightly, and sometimes a large quantity is left over, which is unfit for human food. If that clause were put in there, without giving the minister authority to permit of this being used as manure, I do not know what would be done with it. Where there is a large catch of herring at the end of the fishing season, a certain amount is held over and spread on the land for manure.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Under the conditions the hon. gentleman has referred to, I do not think that they would apply to the minister before using fish of that kind for the purpose of manure.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—No, but he would wink at it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—There was a factory started in British Columbia for the purpose of catching dog fish for making into manure, and I presume under the old Act there was a regulation that people could catch dog fish without permission from anybody. It may have been under the working of that practice that some abuse arose, and it was considered advisable that the matter should be brought under the control of the minister.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It could do no harm to leave it there.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 44.

44. No one shall throw overboard ballast, coal ashes, stones, or other prejudicial or deleterious substances in any river, harbour or roadstead or any water where fishing is carried on, or throw overboard or let fall upon any fishing bank or ground, or leave or deposit or cause to be thrown, left or deposited, upon the shore, beach or bank of any water or upon the beach between high and low water mark, inside of any tidal estuary, or within two hundred yards of the mouth of any salmon river, remains or offal of fish, or of marine animals, or leave decayed or decaying fish in any net or other fishing apparatus; provided that such remains or offal may be buried ashore, above high water mark, and that at establishments situated inside the mouths of rivers for carrying on deep-sea fisheries, the same may be dropped into perforated boxes or inclosures built upon the beach, or under stage-heads, in such manner as to prevent the same from being floated or drifted into the stream, or may be disposed of in such manner as any fishery officer prescribes. R.S., s. 53.

2. No person shall cause or knowingly permit to pass into or put or knowingly permit to be put, lime, chemical substances or drugs, poisonous matter, dead or decaying fish, or remnants thereof, mill rubbish or sawdust or any other deleterious substances, in any water frequented by fish. R.S., s. 52.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I propose to move an amendment to subclause 2 of this clause, after the words 'deleterious' as follows:—

Substance or thing, whether the same is of a like character to the substances named in this section or not.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 48.

48. Any fishery officer, fishery guardian or peace officer may arrest without warrant a person whom he on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to have committed an offence against this Act, or any regulation made thereunder or whom he finds committing or preparing to commit an offence against this Act or any such regulation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is new. It has been found that officers often find masked men and others who are unknown to them fishing, and having no warrant to arrest them, the offenders escape.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—This will give the officers very wide powers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As my hon. friend says, this clause proposes to give very wide powers to the officers mentioned. I do not so much object to the fishery officer or the peace officer having such power. The fishery officer is supposed to be a more or less responsible and intelligent officer, and the peace officer is supposed to have some experience in such cases, but to authorize a fishery guardian, who will be naturally not very much of a man, as a rule, to arrest without warrant a person he believes to have committed an offence against this Act is going too far altogether. I do not think a fishery guardian should be allowed to arrest a man without a warrant.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—He has to do it on reasonable or probable grounds.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—And then he cannot do anything after he has arrested the man, unless he can prove something.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 50.

50. Every one who resists or wilfully obstructs any fishery officer or fishery guardian in the execution of his duty, or any person acting in aid of such officer or guardian, is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction, and liable if convicted on indictment to a term not exceeding two years imprisonment, and on summary conviction to a term not exceeding six months imprisonment with hard labour or to a fine of one hundred dollars.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause is connected with clause 48, which authorizes a fishery guardian to arrest, without warrant, a man whom he supposes or believes he has reasonable or probable grounds for arresting. This clause provides that every one who resists or wilfully obstructs a guardian, under such circumstances, is guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for a term of three years or to a fine of $100. That is an excessive penalty for the offence. Suppose that a man really has not been guilty of any offence of the law, and an ignorant fishery guardian attempts, to arrest him without warrant, and this man does what a man naturally would do —hits from the shoulder—he is liable to three years imprisonment, or a fine of $100.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think it is anything more drastic than the municipal laws which protect policemen in the discharge of their duties. It is practically the same law; that is to say, there must be a resistance and a wilful obstruction of an officer in the performance of his duty. There must be some overt act before the clause comes into operation.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 56, giving certain officers powers of a justice of the peace without property qualification.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause does not seem to apply to an officer in the Canadian navy. The term 'His Majesty's Navy' is generally supposed to apply to the Royal Navy.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend overlooks the fact that we have vessels which are designated His Majesty's Navy.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—They are all His Majesty's ships.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Does not the Navy Act specially give the title to our navy of the Royal Canadian Navy? Until that Act is repealed it is in force.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is the only defence we have yet. I shall look into the matter before the third reading.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 63, providing that boats must be furnished with necessaries for their own crews when on fishing cruises.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—Last year I called attention to the manner in which the steam trawlers are depleting our fisheries. There is some protection against them on the shore of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia, but there is none on our coasts, and they will deplete our waters as they depleted the North Sea. There were two of these steam trawlers around our shores last year. During the day they kept outside of the three-mile limit, but at night they came inside, raked the whole bottom, and cleaned out the fish. We have no protection from them, and so far as our province is concerned we cannot be protected unless we have an international agreement to that effect. They can keep outside the three-mile limit and fish anywhere in the gulf of St. Lawrence, destroying our fisheries. Some steps should be taken to prevent the depletion of our fisheries. A three-mile limit is no protection against them. We go six miles out with our lobster boats. You can not enforce the Act relating to lobster fishing beyond the three-mile limit; strangers may fish outside the limit when our own fishermen are precluded. Some effort should be made by the Government of Canada to have these steam trawlers regulated in some way, because they are markedly destructive in their methods. They take in all kinds of fish, select those that they want, and throw the rest into the sea. I am told by the member from Antigonish that last year they did the same thing off the coast of Cape Breton that they are doing with us. I have brought this matter to the attention of the leader of the Government in this House; I would request him to bring it before the Government; I shall this year endeavour to bring it to the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Is this a reproduction of the old Act?

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—Yes, I propose to move a subclause to be known as section 3 of section 63.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It seems to be permitting something that should be prohibited.

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—This clause was taken from section 70 of revised statutes chap. 45, but I propose moving that there be a subclause reading as follows:

No collector or other customs officer shall grant a clearance to such vessel or allow her to go to sea unless the master thereof has a certificate from the fishery officer or some other person authorized by the minister to give such certificates; that the vessel is properly equipped with a mariner's compass, suitable utensils for holding water for each boat carried by her, and with a serviceable fog-horn or trumpet.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A good thing.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Are we to understand that provided they carry the instruments, they are allowed to really do what is mentioned in the first part of clause 63?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—How is this kind of fishing regulated in this Bill?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is regulated under Government regulations. Those boats shall not go out unless they are provided as in subclauses 2 and 3. It is for the protection of life and property that this is done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause is taken out of a Bill which was passed by this House some years ago. Hon. gentlemen particularly from Prince Edward Island know that nearly every year we have a melancholy tale of fishermen who put out from those cod fisheries on the banks, and get lost in the fog, and in a great many cases perish from just the want of the things that are mentioned in this clause.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—Hear, hear, it is a good clause.

Clause 63 with subclause 2, and the new subclause 3 was adopted.

On clause 74.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Can the hon. leader of the Government give me any explanation why there is nothing said about British Columbia in this penalty clause?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We shall allow that to stand over.

On clause 76.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does not the minister propose to insert those words 'other substances' in this clause as in one of the earlier ones? In clause 44 we inserted the words 'other substances.' This clause deals with the penalty for committing the offence mentioned in clause 44, so those words should be inserted here also.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes; it would have been better if it had simply mentioned the clause instead of repeating the language.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The point is this, that in subclause 2 of clause 44, at the instance of the hon. gentleman we inserted certain words, after 'deleterious.' Now we are providing the penalty for this offence, and seems to me that we should use the same language as is used in describing the offence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We should let clause 76 stand.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would invite the leader of the House to see what was the wording added to section 44. I appreciate the object; but the subclause is altogether too wide, it seems to me, to be covering everything.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall have that attended to.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 79:

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is to be an amendment to this clause. I propose moving the following, to be known as subsection 3:—

The owner and master of such vessel which goes to sea or attempts to go to sea without first obtaining and exhibiting to the collector or other proper customs officer a certificate from the fishing officer or other officers authorized by the minister to grant such certificate, that the vessel is properly equipped with a mariners' compass and suitable utensils for holding water for each boat carried by her, and with a serviceable fog-horn or trumpet, shall each be liable and shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable therefor to a penalty not less than $100 and costs, or more than $200 and costs, or to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months.

Clause 79 with subclause 2 and the new subclause 3 was adopted.

On clause 88:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Can my hon. friend say what has been done about those regulations? Has any action been taken under them up to the present time?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—At the instance of the United States Government this treaty has been held in abeyance from time to time, extending over a period of years in fact. My hon. friend will observe that the commission was appointed under the treaty signed at Washington on the 11th April, 1908, and shortly thereafter the commissioners representing the United States and Canada came together and adopted regulations, in fact a treaty. The Government of Canada accepted that treaty by virtue of an Act of Parliament, but the United States up to the present time has not ratified the treaty.

There have been communications of late looking to the United States accepting the treaty as defined or as agreed upon by the commissioners of the two Governments, but the Congress of the United States has been so influenced by the different fishing industries, particularly in the state of Michigan, that up to the present time that Government has failed to agree to the treaty, and the probabilities are that the treaty will not be assented to.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 89:

89. Except in so far as in this Act is otherwise specially provided all penalties and forfeitures incurred under this Act or under any regulation made thereunder shall be recoverable and enforceable by summary proceedings taken under the provisions of part XV of the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—Clause 89 works in with the latter part of clause 93. Clause 89 says these penalties may be recoverable by summary proceeding taken under the provisions of part 15 of the Criminal Code. Part XV of the Criminal Code was meant as a standard form of collecting fines and penalties, and contains full provisions for it, and so on. It says that you may recover the penalty and enforce it under Part XV, but when you come to clause 93 it says:

Nothing in this section contained shall prevent any person who thinks himself aggrieved by any such conviction or order or dismissal, the prosecutor or complainant as well as the defendant, from any right of appeal that he may have under the provisions of Part XV of the Criminal Code.

We should add to clause 89 the words 'all the provisions of which will apply thereto,' in order to give the man the benefit of the appeal, as well as the liability of being subject to a fine. Clause 93 says nothing will take it away from him if he has it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let that clause stand with the suggested amendment.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clauses 91 and 92:

91. A moiety of every pecuniary penalty levied by virtue of this Act shall belong to His Majesty, and the other moiety shall be paid to the prosecutor, other than a fishery officer or fishery guardian, together with the costs taxed to him in respect thereof. R.S., s. 101.

92. His Majesty's share of each penalty and all proceeds derived from the sale of confiscated articles under this Act, shall be paid to the Minister of Finance, and be applied towards the expenses incurred for the protection of the fisheries. R.S., s. 102.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I propose to strike out these two clauses and insert the following:

The Governor in Council may prescribe the manner in which the proceeds of the penalty and the proceeds of the sale of confiscated articles shall be distributed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What is the reason for the change? Clause 91 is a very judicious clause, and it is in the present law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It might not be desirable that the moiety should go to the informer, as indicated in clause 91. The prosecutor may be an officer of the Government, and probably will be an officer of the Government. It may be very questionable as to whether it is desirable that that officer should be entitled to half of the fine.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This provides that a moiety of every pecuniary penalty shall belong to His Majesty, and the other moiety shall be paid to the prosecutor, other that the fishery officer or fishery guardian. That has been the law for a great many years.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—And a very good law too.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me this policy of leaving everything to the Governor in Council is a doubtful one, in a case of this sort.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is absolutely necessary that the provision as to the distribution of the fines and penalties should be made so clear that every one will understand it, and it is an incentive to the officer to see that the law is enforced. We found it a great advantage in the customs law. An attempt was made to change the system of moiety, and the result was the non-enforcement of the law respecting the customs in the liquor trade. I would suggest to my hon. friend not to change that. It would be much better that the penalty system should be distinct and clear. I have had long experience in these matters in Canada; in the enforcement of the laws of the United States they found it necessary to revert back to the old system.

The clauses were allowed to stand.

On clause 63.

63. No dory, flat, whaler or other boat whatsoever shall set out from any vessel engaged in deep-sea or bank fishing or be launched therefrom for the purpose of fishing with hooks and lines, trawls or other similar appliances, or with intent that the same shall be used in so fishing, or for the purpose of examining trawls, set lines or other similar appliances for fishing, unless there is placed in such boat, to be retained therein during absence from such vessel, a mariner's compass, nor unless there is placed in such boat at least two quarts of drinking water and two pounds of solid food for each man of the crew of such boat.

(2) The owner of such vessel shall supply her at the commencement of her voyage with as many serviceable mariner's compasses, as she carries boats, in addition to the vessel's compass and also with the necessary utensils for holding water and with a serviceable fog-horn or trumpet.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Turning back to clause 63, may I ask what kind of fish is intended to be caught, or may be caught, on the bank mentioned in that section, with the trawl?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—Codfish.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No salmon?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY—Salmon are never caught on trawlers, but codfish, halibut and deep sea fish are.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Going back to clause 56 my hon. friend from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) has looked up an expression used in the Act and he finds that 'His Majesty's Navy' is the correct designation.

On clause 2.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—Referring to the wording of this clause you described the location; if it is a stream or pond, and if you put the net or seine in the stream or pond, then the particular locality plus the seine or net, would constitute your fishery.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My objection to the use of the expression is this. It is the rule in statutes that words are used in the ordinary meaning because ordinary common people read the statutes, and words should not be used in an unusual sense. Now no one in ordinary conversation would speak of a net, fishing line or hook as a fishery. The fishery is the place where these things are used, and it is a great mistake to employ the term as it is used there.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—That is why you have the statute—the statute says it is a fishery, otherwise it would not be.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My contention is that to use a word in the statute in a sense in which it is not used outside of the statute, is likely to cause confusion.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—(Middleton)—But you would not need a statute at all if it was so used.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A hook and line is a fishing appliance, and to describe any of these things as a fishery is an abuse of the term.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman is omitting the last four words:—'Used in connection therewith'.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (Y-2), An Act respecting The Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company, and to ratify and confirm its purchase of a portion of the property of the Carillon and Grenville Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. McHugh.

Bill (Z-2), An Act to incorporate the Title Insurance Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Taylor.

Bill (A-3), An Act respecting certain patents of the F. N. Burt Company, Limited. —Hon. Mr. Kerr.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (128), An Act to incorporate the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In answer to a question asked by the hon. member from Halifax I am informed that there has been no disposition of the lands that were vested in the Commissioners. They have not dealt with any of them.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—From the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

VOUCHERS FOR SENATE ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER submitted the correspondence between the Auditor General and the Clerk of the Senate relating to vouchers for Senate accounts.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the correspondence be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out to the House and particularly to my hon. friend from Halifax, that a recommendation has been made by His Honour the Speaker as to the appointment of an accountant. That nomination is before the House at the present time. I am unaware of the Internal Economy Committee, to which I believe it was referred, having reported upon it; and it seems to me that this should be done. If that recommendation has been referred to the Internal Economy Committee, that committee, it seems to me, should report to the House upon that particular appointment. That would relieve the necessity of considering the letter of the Clerk of the Senate, and would remove the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is true that the question of the appointment of an accountant has been referred to the Committee on Internal Economy and that committee appointed a sub-committee—I suppose it is not a breach of privilege to mention that fact—who are preparing a report to submit to the General Committee, and I understand that the Chairman of the Committee on Internal Economy proposes to summon it, probably the day after to-morrow. I think that it is better that this communication should be before the committee along with the Speaker's recommendation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not opposing that, but simply suggesting that some action be taken upon the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (70), An Act respecting Trust Companies.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Bill (83), An Act respecting Loan Companies.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Bill (93), An Act respecting the Prince Edward Island and Hastings Railway Company.—Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Bill (109), An Act to amend the Inspection and Sale Act.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

Bill (D-3), An Act to incorporate the General Council of the Canadian Branch of the St. John Ambulance Association.—Col. the Hon. Mr. Mason.

BANK FAILURES SINCE CONFEDERATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. What are the names of the chartered banks that have failed since Confederation, and the dates in each case?
2. What was the amount of the authorized capital in each case?
3. How much of this was subscribed?
4. How much of this was paid up?
5. How many branches had each of them?
6. Where were they located?
7. What percentage under the double liability clause of the Bank Act were the shareholders called upon to pay in each case?
8. What steps if any were taken, and with what result, by the liquidator to enforce the payment of the double liability in each case?
9. What was the loss to the depositors, the note holders, and the stockholders, in each case?
10. Has the Government on any of these occasions come to the relief of the sufferers?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The statement furnished by the Department is as follows:

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for the production of all proposals submitted to the Government for the construction of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal, and all the correspondence relating thereto.

He said: I spoke at very considerable length on this question some time ago in this House. This is simply a motion for papers, and it is not now necessary for me to make a speech. I may, however, take occasion to say that there does not seem to be much desire at the present time on the part of the Administration to go on with this work. They seem to dodge the question by appointing a commission. One of the commissioners is now away in Europe and it is certain that we will skip this session before we have their report on the question. When it was a question of going on with the construction of the Welland canal, there was no hesitation about that, and no question of appointing a commission. The Administration has undertaken the work of building a very expensive canal supplementing and nearly parallel to the Welland. What will be the effect of it when the work is completed? It will facilitate the carrying of freight to Oswego, and I know as a fact that there are people in the United States to-day who are prepared to give contracts for the construction of elevators at Oswego. A contractor that I know was asked if he would not tender for wharfs and elevators at Oswego, in order that the freight passing through the larger Welland canal might be taken to New York by that route, and away from the St. Lawrence route. That seems to be the primary object of constructing this new Welland canal. As for deepening the St. Lawrence canals to Montreal, it is not merely a case of making larger and deeper canals, but a case of making the whole river deeper in order to get a channel of twenty-five feet for considerable distances. However, the Government did not hesitate when they undertook the Welland canal. They wanted to please their supporters. They are getting a large support from western Ontario, but why try to deceive the people of this country by appointing a commission on the Georgian Bay canal? There have been commissions on the Georgian Bay canal from time to time for sixty years. There was one fifty years ago. To-day the idea is to appoint a Commission to find out, not if the project is feasible, not if it is the most direct route, not if it is a good project, but whether it will pay. One is Mr. Evans, a newspaper man, who has been mayor of Winnipeg, another is Colonel Meighan, an estimable young man in Montreal, a military man; I do not know if he understands much about transportation. He would be more useful assisting Colonel the Hon. Sam Hughes organizing the militia of the country, than investigating this question. Unless he is required to plan how the militia could be taken to the upper lakes via the canal, I do not see that he can be of much service on a commission of this kind. Then we have Mr. Gohier, a very good man. He was an unsuccessful Conservative candidate in the county of Jacques Cartier which, by the way, is vacant again: perhaps he might have a try there once more. He will not help himself if he reports against the Georgian Bay canal. I am informed that proposals have been made to the Government to build this canal without asking the people of this country to put up one cent. I am informed that there are reliable parties who command large capital willing to go into this enterprise and build the canal themselves, expecting to find a good return from their money by the development of the magnificent water-powers at various points along the route. Therefore it would be well if the Government would accede to this motion, and bring down the proposals which have been made to the Government; and I think it would be shown that there are people who are willing to carry on this enterprise without in any way burdening the taxpayers of this country.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—What about the flying machine that has been talked of which is to be a competitor of this route for the carrying trade?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—It is unnecessary to take up the time of this House with what, as my hon. friend says, has been a live question for a great many years, but as an Ottawa river man, being familiar with the conditions, I sincerely hope, in the best interests of Canada. that the commission which has been appointed will keep in session for the next fifty years, because, next to the Hudson Bay railway, of all the fake schemes Canada has had before it the construction of the Georgian Bay canal would, in my opinion, be the worst. The St. Lawrence route is the natural route to the sea, and the Government have done wisely to further improve that route rather than to undertake the construction of an impossible route. The Ottawa is relatively a small river, a great river it is true, but nothing to compare with the St. Lawrence. In measured miles it is the shortest route from the upper lakes to the sea, but in time and cost the Welland canal route is by all means the cheaper and shorter route. I have studied this question thoroughly, and I say there is only one class of people in Canada to whom the Georgian Bay canal would be useful—the lumbermen and the contractors engaged to build the canal. If there are any financial people in Great Britain or Canada who are disposed to take up with this fake scheme, I recommend the Government to preserve them from the loss of their money, because that is all that would occur from the construction of this canal. Now I will explain in a few words why this canal would benefit the lumbermen. The coming great industry of the Ottawa river is pulpwood and paper. It is not economical to bring down the material out of which pulp and paper are made by floating the pulpwood down the river, but larger vessels than are now used on the Ottawa could be used profitably to bring down the pulpwood to be manufactured. The idea of grain going from the West by that route is a simple absurdity; shipments of grain and all similar commodities will follow the line of least resistance, and that line is down the St. Lawrence river or by railway. Now, this country has been committed to an enormous expenditure in the building of railways. The amount of money that would be required for the construction of this canal, if spent in the improvement of railway conditions, would be worth a hundred times more to the people of Canada than the canal. The construction of the canal would serve my interests as a lumberman, but as long as I hold a seat in Parliament I shall advocate that which is in the interests of the people of Canada, and there could be no more wild, unjustifiable scheme than the building of the Georgian Bay canal.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have been during my short lifetime a resident of the Ottawa valley, and have the honour of being a representative of a very large municipality in that valley. I have been waiting twenty-five years to say what I am going to say now. Some twenty or twenty-five years ago, in company with an ex-member of Parliament and one of the most prominent contractors in the Dominion to-day, a friend of both parties—

An hon. GENTLEMAN—Mr. Jacques Barbeau?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, a man too honest and upright to be with any party in power—I am speaking of W. J. Poupore. There were also connected with that scheme ex-Mayor McLeod-Stewart, of Ottawa, and his father before him. They devoted their time and money, as long as it lasted, to the work, and the suckers did not take the money from them to advance the building of the Georgian Bay canal. The hon. member from Russell did not go far enough back when he said that for the past 60 years reports had been made on this scheme. If he knows anything of the history of his country, he will know that the originator of the scheme was who?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Champlain.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Champlain. The member from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) knows his history; the senator from Russell does not. When Champlain entered the St. Lawrence and built the citadel on Cape Diamond, he did it in the interests of France. When he ascended to Montreal with Maisonneuve, and fixed on the site of the metropolis of Canada, he did noble work for France. When he ascended as far as where Lachine stands to-day and beheld the expanse of waters before him, he said that he had reached China, and therefore called the place Lachine. The fearless explorer was not yet satisfied. He ascended the Ottawa, long before the senator from Russell established his mill on its banks—before any of our multi-millionaire lumbermen, who got limits at a very small cost and charged a lot for the lumber they produced. Champlain explored the entire Ottawa as far as the lakes, and when he came back he reported to his Government that this was the natural route for the trade of the new country. He did not denounce it as a fake scheme, like my hon. friend from Russell, nor did he denounce it as a silly enterprise. From Champlain's time down to the McLeod Stewarts—and I believe one or two of the engineers of the Grenville and Rideau canals—little was said of that route. It was left to the lumbermen to be used for floating logs down to their mills.

But for the last seventy-five or eighty years the most prominent men in Ottawa and throughout the Ottawa valley have been urging each succeeding Government to construct the Georgian Bay canal. Were they advocating a fake? Is not the hon. gentleman from Russell ashamed of that word, in the face of that immense delegation that appealed to the Government last week to begin the construction of the canal? No room was large enough to receive that delegation, except the House of Commons itself. The House of Commons was packed from wall to wall, and the galleries from the wall to the railing; the corridors were filled with men practically on their knees to the Government, asking the Government, in the interest of the trade and development of Canada, to open up the Georgian Bay route. Yet in the face of that the hon. gentleman from Russell tells us that the whole thing is a fake. The blood of any man who is a Canadian must boil in his veins when he hears a project which has been commended by the early explorers of Canada, the business men, the farmers, and all having interests in the country, described as a fake; that the great delegations of citizens from all over the country were here on a mission to propagate a fake.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Fakirs?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There are fakirs in the country but not in that delegation. The Minister of Public Works admitted that the project was one which would be of incalculable benefit to Canada, and if he had his way it would be undertaken at once. But he said Canada has other projects to carry through before that canal can be touched. We have had Mr. Gerald White, M.P., declare that no matter what government was in power, he would give his support to that scheme, and Mr. Gerald White has been a life-long resident of this Ottawa valley, and connected with its trade and commerce. That sentiment is rebuked by the hon. member from Russell who calls the project a fake, who says that the Hon. Minister of Public Works is endorsing a fake endorsed by hundreds of delegates from all over the Dominion. I can tell the hon. leader of the Government here to-day that if instead of giving $45,000,000 to the two fakirs, Mackenzie and Mann, the Government would put that money into the Georgian Bay canal, his Government would remain in power the next fifteen years. I venture to say that there is no power in Canada that would shake them out of the ministerial benches, if they endorse this policy—and I am a good Grit.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Pretty expensive.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is also expensive to give it to two fakirs; it would be cheap money to give it to an enterprise to facilitate trade and transportation. When I heard the hon. member from Russell state that the Georgian Bay canal was a silly enterprise I could not believe my senses. The term Georgian Bay canal is a misnomer; it is not a canal, it is an open river for seven months of the year. It is simply a series of locks from French river down to the Chaudière Falls, and if you want to get from here to Montreal you have rapids at Grenville, Hawkesbury, and Carillon. Then you go down through the Lake of Two Mountains and you have two outlets, one by what is known as the Back river, on which there would have to be a series of locks built. The other is on the south shore where the Lachine canal is already in operation, and the river is open. The Georgian Bay canal route is composed of a series of lakes, and on that stretch of several hundred miles from the Great Lakes to the port of Montreal fewer locks would be required than on the St. Lawrence route, including the Welland, the Cornwall, the Soulanges, and the Lachine canals. I am not against the St. Lawrence water route; it is necessary for the transportation requirements of the country. I am no more opposed to that route than I was opposed to the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific or of the Canadian Northern, as feeders from the west to the east. There is traffic enough to-day for both routes, despite the little jealousies and suspicions of the Welland canal people and the country surrounding, and of the Trent valley mud pool, and so on. If there is traffic enough for the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern, there is enough for two navigation routes. That is as plain as a,b,c, to me; it is no silly enterprise whatever. The Georgian Bay route has the advantage of having little canal to go through, and having free open water from the first or fifteenth of April—more than we have around Ottawa—so that ships will simply have to take from 27 to 29 locks. That is what the Georgian Bay canal means. It does not mean a boat running along the canal for 8 or 10 or 12 miles; it simply means that the boat shall be jumped into the lake from a higher level of water to a lower level. The number of locks needed is less than on the St. Lawrence route. On this broad expanse of water—Nipissing lake, French river, the Ottawa river, through Hawkesbury, right down to the Lake of Two Mountains—you have beautiful scenery, and fine air; the finest water reach that could be established in Canada. We are told by the hon. senator from Russell that this is a silly enterprise and a fake. He may say this now when he is a senator, but would not dare to say that when he was a member of the House of Commons for Russell. I defy him to get ten men in the Ottawa valley or in the country to endorse the opinion which he has expressed—I mean ten men of standing with a stake in the country, and with large transportation interests. As I understand, the heart of the Minister of Public Works is in this project, he knows it would be a benefit to Canada, if the Government did not have so many projects on hand on which to spend their millions, they would order the immediate commencement of this work. I am very sorry the Government should have instituted the commission, because if anything is a fake it is that commission of three men. Who are they?—a man named Gohier, a military man down in Montreal, and a newspaper man; to find out what? To find if the Georgian Bay canal would be a paying institution. Now, in God's name, how can you find that out until the results are in the hands of the statisticians of the Department of Trade and Commerce? Intelligent people of the country will come to the conclusion that the commission is a fake; I would be awfully sorry to believe that they would also conclude that the men who named them were fakirs too. I regret that the Government has taken this step, for it is intended simply to delay the question. The Government should not stoop to things of that kind, in the administration of the public affairs of a nation; it is too petty, too picayune to try and get out of responsibilities by putting them on the shoulders of a paltry commission of three men, no matter if they were the best men in the land. We here are powerless; I am powerless; all I can do is to voice the sentiments of myself and the people around me, which are the sentiments of the people of the future. These people will curse the Governments who neglected to build this route, just as some now curse the day when the men of the past did not undertake this work. All our great men have had their say in this matter; Sir Alexander Mackenzie was in favour of the scheme but had no money to carry it; Sir John Macdonald was in favour of it but he had the Canadian Pacific railway octopus in mind: our recent Prime Minister, Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had the scheme put before him, but he had his Transcontinental and naval schemes, and now we have Mr. Borden, and he has had his thirty-five millions for dreadnoughts; and not being able to give that money for dreadnoughts he gives it to two of the worst dreadnoughts of all, Mackenzie and Mann. There is the position; instead of the Government facing the situation like men, they cower, they put the responsibility off on a poor little commission that is paid ten, twenty-five, fifty, or one hundred dollars a day, and make the commission last as long as possible. As the hon. senator from Russell said 'he hoped to God it would last fifty years.' That is a very nice wish for a man having as large interests in the country and in the Ottawa valley as the hon. senator has. I say no, and I would ask the leader of the Government to urge his minister to have that commission report as soon as possible. The commission cannot learn what the future is going to give us; they can have no reliable information to offer Parliament, but simply surmises and suppositions—no actual information. I say the appointment of that commission is simply a hold-up of the scheme, and I hope before the next meeting of Parliament the Government will come down with a concrete plan for the construction of that canal; it would be the best plank they ever put in their platform. I have visited the villages and towns up the Ottawa river with my friend Ralph Stewart in years gone by, before the Boards of Trade in Montreal and Ottawa endorsed this scheme, and the people there were all willing and anxious to have this route built. I am sorry that my party did not have the courage when in power to tackle the scheme, but I am frank enough to say that if this Government comes down next session with a fair plan for the construction of this canal it will not lose any votes in the Ottawa valley or throughout the country.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—This is a question of very great importance. I have always been opposed to the Georgian Bay canal because when built, it will be frozen up for seven months of the year and will produce no revenue.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Why, it is open now, and the St. Lawrence is closed.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—I am only talking of what it will be, not what it is now. It is estimated that this canal will cost somewhere around $200,000,000, but no one knows what it will cost; we have had experience of that in building the Panama canal. The cost depends on the soil and conditions of the country through which it is built. If it were solid rock the engineers could make a very careful estimate of the cost. As I say it will be frozen up about seven months of the year.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Five months. That is the report of the Government.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Let him make his statement, seven.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—I have been in this country about as long as the hon. gentleman, I have worked out the whole thing, and I have some idea how long the time will be. I have said seven months, and I stand by it.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Stick right to it.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—I do not believe a great many of the members of this House have ever considered what evaporation is doing in this country. Any man who has travelled through the woods as much as I have, or who has been out engineering or fishing, will readily see that all over this country, where forty years ago I built catamarans and floated them down the stream, to-day there is not a drop of water running. This is taking place all over the surface of this country, and any other country that is covered by forests. The forests are being depleted so fast by fire and by the lumbermen, that we ought to take this matter very seriously into consideration. Engineers from the upper lakes who come down here for their annual meeting every year, have told me that there are places along the lakes where fifty years ago they used to stand on their bare feet and fish, but which are entirely dry now the year round. What effect will this have upon the canal after it is built? To my mind, twenty years after the canal is built there will be from five to ten feet less water in that canal. When you get the canal built down to Montreal, you go into a shallow river.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What about the Welland canal?

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Well, I would include the Welland canal, of course. That work is going on, and we must build it, but this is a new matter, therefore let us deal with it in its inception.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Would not the water in the Welland canal be lowered as well as the water in the Georgian bay?

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Yes. I was saying that at Montreal you get into a very shallow river, which must necessarily be dredged to a great extent for all time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It is dredged.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—To my mind Quebec is the natural seaport of this country. I can speak of this independently; the men who live in Montreal say that Montreal is a natural seaport, and there is no other sufficient, but from my knowledge of Quebec harbour I say that it is the natural seaport, and as evidence of that we see all the larger vessels going to Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Evaporation is playing a very important part in lowering the waters of this country, and with the large amount of money that we have expended in building the Transcontinental railway the time has arrived to call a halt in the very large expenditure we are making. This country has transportation facilities sufficient to serve it for the next twenty-five years; the time has come when we should cease to initiate large expenditure of money.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—I suppose hon. gentlemen would like to hear about Mackenzie and Mann. The hon. gentleman's party started them, and got us in trouble, and we have to finish the work.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Do not throw good money after bad.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Take the Hudson Bay project; that is now settled, but it is a wild cat scheme.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Both parties are responsible for that, but no ship owner will ever venture any large vessel in the Hudson bay. The insurance companies will not be anxious to give insurance on vessels going to the Hudson bay, and when the fact is patent that the wheat that grows this year will not get out until next year, people will ask what is the good of it? However, we cannot help it now, because the matter seems to be settled. I wish to enter my protest against the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. It is not required in the country, as hon. gentlemen will see when they come to consider some of the facts I have mentioned. I wish to put myself on record at this early date as saying that we had better not undertake to build that canal until, at least, we want it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—This is hardly an opportune time to enter into a discussion of this important question, but I cannot allow the statement which has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards) to remain unanswered. There is no member in this House for whom I have a greater respect or higher regard than that hon. gentleman, but it seems to me that it would not be doing justice to his position, to the country at large, or to this House if he were to limit himself to the opinions that he has expressed in a very emphatic manner, without implementing them with arguments and data to justify them. I am a strong believer in the Georgian Bay canal, but I am open to conviction. It is a question of such importance that I agree with the hon. gentleman to this extent, if there is time yet to retrace our steps, although both parties have committed themselves to the scheme, we should do so if his opinion is really well founded. But it will be necessary for him, not merely to express his bare opinion, but to support it by data and reasons which can be accepted by this hon. House and by the country at large. It came to my knowledge three or four years ago that there was a meeting in the city of Buffalo of a large number of gentlemen on the other side of the line, interested in the transportation question, and especially in the widening of the Erie canal. It was a very large meeting, and was attended by eminent engineers of the United States, and by men of very large experience in transportation, and I understand there was but one opinion, that if the Georgian Bay canal were built, it would nullify the Erie canal and divert the trade from the United States to he Georgian Bay canal. My authority is an American, who happens to be a client of mine, and who told me that we Canadians would be astounded if we had heard the unanimity of opinion that was expressed on that occasion. I am not an expert in the matter, but I have had the advantage of hearing opinions expressed on the subject by a large number of men of experience such as the late Robert Keefer, Mr. Gear, of Montreal, Sir Hugh Allan and Sir William Van Horne. Very many men of large experience in transportation matters, agree not only as to the feasibility, but as to the practicability of the scheme. If the hon. gentleman has arguments and data—and I have no doubt he has, because I know he is not a man to express an opinion lightly—it will be his duty in the near future to present the matter in such a way that it may be weighed by this honourable House, and by the country at large. But until I hear arguments which are of a nature to change my mind, I must say that for my part I am very strongly impressed with the fact that the deepening of the Welland canal, and the deepening of our present canals on the St. Lawrence, will be the means of helping to divert trade from this country to the United States. If that be so, it is worth our while to undertake the building of the Georgian Bay canal, though it will necessarily incur a large expenditure. One hundred or one hundred and twenty-five millions is no doubt a large amount for this or any other country, but it will look a much smaller amount in days to come. The country is able to afford it if the canal has the merit which is claimed for it. We see that the city of New York is actually expending on an aqueduct, for the purpose of increasing the water supply to New York city, a sum of one hundred and sixty million dollars; that amount has already been almost entirely expended. I have enough faith in this Dominion to believe that we are able to face the expenditure on this canal if the project is such an enterprise as it is claimed to be. But I agree with the hon. gentleman that the country should not go into the matter lightly, that we should wait, and if the hon. gentleman has any data to present to the country, he should produce it at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—In making the short statement which I made to the House, I said I was not going to deal largely with the question, but just to express my opinion upon it. I certainly do not entertain the views which I expressed without having very solid reasons for them. I am an Ottawa river man; all my interests are here. If the Georgian Bay canal were a benefit to Canada, no one would be a stronger supporter of the scheme than myself. After having heard the arguments pro and con, and having investigated the matter thoroughly for myself, so decidedly was I opposed to this project that, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier, late Premier of Canada, was entertaining the idea of beginning the construction of the canal, I wrote to him the strongest letter I was able to write, giving my views upon it and the reasons why I opposed it. I will take occasion later to speak fully upon the question, but I would tell my hon. friend who has just spoken that I am not surprised that a lot of gentlemen meeting in Buffalo, who knew nothing of the conditions of the Ottawa river at all, expressed their views on it as he states. The fact that it is some four hundred miles shorter to the ocean gives the idea that it would be a competitor with the St. Lawrence route—that goes without saying. But in the matter of water transportation, not only is depth required, but sea room is also necessary for the navigation of large vessels. The idea is to build a large canal with a depth of twenty-one feet or thereabouts. My hon. friend from New Brunswick, who spoke a short time ago, referred to Quebec being the natural seaport of the St. Lawrence, because of the width of the river below Quebec and the greater depth of water. I entertain his views exactly, for the reason that no matter how much you deepen the St. Lawrence river between Montreal and Quebec, navigation in a narrow channel will still be dangerous. I am a Montreal man more than I am a Quebec man; all we in eastern Ontario regard Montreal as our city. You can deepen the St. Lawrence just as much as you like, but unless you make larger sea room between Montreal and Quebec it will always be a dangerous stream for the navigation of large vessels. I do not know whether it will come in a year, or two years, or when, but there will be a great disaster in that river one of these days when a vessel gets turned crossways in that channel. There is no sea room for the large vessels coming to Montreal, and they must necessarily stop at Quebec. This same idea applies to the Ottawa river as against the St. Lawrence river. I made a short statement when I spoke before, that in measured miles it was four hundred miles shorter by the Ottawa river than by the St. Lawrence route, but from that very difficulty of large vessels navigating a small river like the Ottawa, not only would the St. Lawrence be the shorter route but it would be the cheaper route, because vessels would make quicker time. Six miles an hour would be the average speed of a vessel on the Ottawa river, while in lake Ontario, and lake Erie, the vessels could make from ten to fifteen miles an hour.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Ten miles.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Put it thirteen if you like, it is the shorter route. As to the danger of the diversion of traffic to the United States in consequence of enlarging the Welland canal, I dissent absolutely from that view. In dealing with the transportation of grain from the west to Europe, you have to consider all the conditions, and grain will always go by the cheapest route. The reason why a great deal of western wheat finds its way to Liverpool by New York is not because of the conditions in Canada or in the United States so far as transportation is concerned, but because almost the entire grain crop exported from Canada goes across the ocean in passenger vessels. The great bulk of it is carried on those vessels for little or nothing—in fact they sometimes pay to get it, for ballast. The fact that there is a large number of passenger vessels plying between New York and Liverpool is the reason why wheat goes that way instead of going by Montreal. The small saving in the cost of carrying the wheat from the west to the seaboard cuts no figure at all; it is the cost from the original point of shipment to Liverpool. There was a time when eighty per cent of the grain of the west went to Liverpool through United States ports. This year sixty per cent went that way. New York gets the trade because it offers greater facilities for the shipment of the grain. Just a word on the subject of the Hudson bay route: passenger vessels will never use that route, nor can tramp ships go there to carry grain. It would be better to scrap that road immediately in the interests of Canada. It would not be fair to take up the time of the House any longer, but I have a greater regard for the opinion of my hon. friend who has just spoken, than he can possibly have for mine. I look upon him as a capable man, and his opinions are valuable. He is a gentleman who is amenable to reason, and I hope to convince him that he is entirely wrong so far as the Georgian Bay canal is concerned.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—This discussion has been sprung on the House this afternoon very unexpectedly, so far as I am concerned at least, but imagining as I do that possibly I am the only member of the Senate who has been over the proposed route of the Georgian Bay canal from one end to the other, I am perhaps in a position to say a little on the subject. The Ottawa river, in my opinion, is a natural channel for a canal. I shall say nothing about the river below Pembroke, as a great many members of this House must be familiar with that portion of the route. From Pembroke to Mattawa, one hundred miles, the river varies in width from half a mile to two and a half miles. Above Des Joachims, which is forty-five miles from Pembroke, and as far as Mattawa, the river runs between two ranges of mountains. There is no property on that part of the route to be damaged by flooding, and the cheapest and best way to make a canal there would be to construct dams and flood the shores. That can be done, in fact, for a great part of the way. The portion of the route between Mattawa and Nipissing is the most difficult, not being as naturally adapted for a canal as the Ottawa river. The distance is about twenty-five miles. A great deal of money was spent by the late Government investigating this project—nearly a million dollars—and the result of the investigation was to make plain the fact that not only the part between Montreal and Mattawa is feasible, but the most difficult part, between Mattawa and Nipissing, is also practicable. That was the only part of the whole scheme which appeared to me doubtful. From the time you get into lake Nipissing, to the head of French river, a distance of thirty miles, you have a large lake, which can be made available for boats of heavy draft by the construction of dams. Between lake Nipissing and Georgian bay I believe only three locks are required.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—There is sixty-four feet of a lift, and three locks will be needed.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—The Government has acted wisely in appointing this commission to ascertain if the project will be a commercial success.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Does the hon. gentleman think that the three commissioners who have been appointed are gentlemen qualified to deal with the subject?

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I have no doubt of it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—A big proposition of that kind?

Hon. Mr. GORDON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Do they know anything more about it than any one else?

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I do not think they know anything more about it to-day than I do, but they have been appointed for the purpose of finding out.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I suppose we can not find out.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—No, and I can not find out. That has been the trouble with the proposition for years past. Many of us have been going around the country shouting about the Georgian Bay canal, but we can not give facts and figures to prove that, if constructed, it would be a commercial success. I would suggest to my hon. friend, who favours the project, that he should get to work and collect all the information he can and place it before the commission.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I have done so already; I have given them my speeches, made in this House.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I do not know what information they may convey because I have not read them, but I know of persons who are collecting information which will be of very great service to this commission, and this should be done by every one who can assist in placing information before the commission, showing the quantity of freight that may be exported by the new route.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In the near future there may be ten thousand farmers, where there are only two thousand to-day. How can these commissioners foretell what the population will be ten years hence? Are the commission going to bring before them only men of the stamp of the hon. member from Russell, who is deadly opposed to the scheme? Will the hon. gentleman state here on his responsibility as a public man that he is against the scheme?

Hon. Mr. GORDON—Against what scheme?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Against the Georgian Bay route.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—Not at all. The hon. gentleman does not seem to know where his friends are. I have said nothing here to-day that would lead to such an opinion. Only a few days ago I had the pleasure of looking over some information that is being collected by a gentleman to be furnished to the commission, and was amazed and gratified that any one should take such a deep interest in the subject as he did. I should like to reply to a statement which has been made about the length of time navigation would be open on this route. I know as much, and possibly more, about that than any one present here to-day. My experience tells me that the route will be open from May until the end of November every year, and sometimes into December. It will be open as long every year, practically, as the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec, and surely that is all that is required. I repeat I believe that the Government have acted wisely in appointing this commission, because right here in Ottawa we see the difference of opinion that exists between men who should know a good deal on the subject. I am prepared for that reason, if for no other, to support the appointment of the commission which is investigating the commercial side of this enterprise.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But the commission is not appointed for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If they go on appointing commissioners they will never construct the canal.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I believe the Government are favourable to this project. If the canal is not built within our time it will be simply for the reason that the Government consider the obligations on their hands at the present time are as much as they can carry.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That has been the story right along.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—If the canal is not constructed within a short time and by the present Government the fault will lie at the door of the late Administration, for this reason, Right Hon. Mr. Borden advocated, not so very long ago, that instead of building the National Transcontinental railway, east of Cochrane, the Grand Trunk railway should be allowed to build from North Bay to the Pacific coast, for the ususal subsidy. If that had been done, as the Grand Trunk Railway Company wanted to do, we would not have to-day the line from Cochrane down to Moncton. The money spent on that portion of the National Transcontinental railway project would have been nearly enough to construct the Georgian Bay canal through to Montreal. Therefore, if this canal gets a setback for some time to come, the fault will rest with the late Administration which saddled the country with such an overwhelming debt that it cannot undertake this great project.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman contradicts the hon. member from New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. Baird) as to the length of time the canal will be open annually. The hon. gentleman from New Brunswick would have us believe that the water of lake Nipissing would evaporate; what is the opinion on that?

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—I did not say the water of lake Nipissing. I said the water from the surrounding country, spread over that country would evaporate.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Lake Nipissing would have to be reduced to a low level before the canal would be dry.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—The water of lake Nipissing evaporates very much every summer.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I want to draw attention to a report which was made about 1901 by an engineer of high repute from London, who came to investigate the feasibility of the construction of this canal and its commercial value. That engineer was Mr. Sawyer. I have had occasion to study his report. From the moment I read it I became an advocate of the Georgian Bay canal route. He showed to my satisfaction, and I have not seen any argument to destroy the value of his report, that this canal would be a most important route, commercially speaking, and I shall await with considerable interest the data which the hon. member from Russell promises to furnish this House at some later date to see if he can shake to any degree the figures and conclusions of Mr. Sawyer. My Hon. friend from Nipissing has spoken of the responsibility of the late Government for perhaps delaying this work, because of the heavy obligations which the country has had to shoulder in the construction of the National Transcontinental Railway. He says that if the Grand Trunk Railway Company had been allowed to go on with its scheme as originally projected, we would not have had the line from Cochrane eastward. I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that when the scheme was first brought down to Parliament, undoubtedly the Grand Trunk Railway Company had in mind the building of the road from Cochrane westward and the notices published at the time spoke of connecting that point with their old system at North Bay giving a through route to Toronto, but if the hon. gentleman will look at the map he will find that the line from Winnipeg to Cochrane, if extended from Cochrane to Quebec, would be no longer than a line from Cochrane to Toronto, and so I would naturally think that when the country was being asked to endorse such a heavy proposition, the question of the advantage of making the straight trip to Quebec should be considered in order to have a second transcontinental. This was done. I believe that it was a sound principle to lay down—that since the road from the Pacific was being built as far as the point now called Cochrane or thereabouts, instead of deflecting that road down to North Bay, the Government should push it straight on to the sea. I do not suppose that this point needs to be discussed. It has been approved by the people. The Maritime provinces claimed that if such an effort were made, they should have the advantage of that road being extended to St. Johns and Halifax. The country has twice endorsed that policy; I do not believe that it will to any extent delay the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, if it is found to be a good and a safe scheme. The hon. gentleman from New Brunswick said that we should first give the new transcontinentals, to be finished this year or next year, the chance of carrying the trade from the West before thinking of embarking on an expenditure of one or two hundred millions on the Georgian Bay canal. I draw his attention to the fact that if this Georgian Bay scheme is not started now, and we wait five or ten years, our successors may think that we were quite slow in catching on to the necessity of preparing to handle the freight of the West, for we all must recognize that the Georgian Bay scheme will take ten or fifteen years to build. Now, suppose it will cost from 100 to 200 millions—the estimate a couple of years ago was that 100 millions must be spent—with the buoyant revenue we have we could saddle the federal Budget with ten millions a year. I stick to that opinion until I hear from my hon. friend from Russell. It seems to me that this country should not delay in starting on that expenditure. It will not be a very heavy one. We can face the obligation for ten or fifteen years to come of an expenditure of ten millions a year in order to open up that big water route.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—I did not expect that this discussion would come up to-day. If I had I might possibly have had something to say in regard to this proposition, from the Maritime provinces standpoint. I have listened with considerable interest to the statements made by the several hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and in the main I can agree with the most of them, though with some of them I take issue. In the first place, I believe the appointment of this commission was a wise undertaking, for the reason that the question now is not one of engineering, or of whether you can have water enough, or distance, but is a commercial question. In that respect I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat; the commission will be able to elicit facts in connection with the commercial aspect of this question which have not yet been brought out. I do not think that the inquiries hitherto made have gone far enough afield to bring fully before the eyes of the public and of those interested in the construction of this canal the most important facts in regard to its commercial value. It will have several commercial values. In the first place, I want to say that no country can be great without a great merchant marine. You have already commenced the deepening of the Welland canal: and although you do build a good and efficient route via the Welland canal, you have still a great proposition as far as Canada is concerned in building the Georgian Bay canal. You have three great transcontinental lines pouring traffic into the head of the lakes. It is a fact that at Port Arthur and Fort William combined we have to-day the fourth largest ports of entry on the American continent. The amount of tonnage arriving and leaving those ports at the head of the lake can only be surpassed by New York, Chicago and Boston on this continent. What are we going to do 25 years hence, in view of that fact, and of the other facts that there has really been only one transcontinental line in operation, that the other two transcontinental lines are only beginning to feed in their great traffic from the West, that the West has only fairly started to grow, and that there is now such an enormous traffic pouring in at the head of those lakes with the present facilities and the present population of the West? Will hon. gentlemen tell me that there is not going to be enough traffic and commerce pouring out from the West to supply, not only the Welland canal and the railways, but also the great Georgian Bay canal?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—I venture to go further and say that I believe there is not an hon. gentleman in this House who is not convinced that we are going to have such a traffic from the West. If so, it is important in the first place that we should divert as much as possible of that traffic through our own channels and our own seaports. It is a very important matter that we should bring that trade down by the St. Lawrence route, and that that trade should be routed to the old country through our own ports. But in order to do that we must look a little further ahead and realize the fact—and it is not too soon for us to open our eyes to the fact—that we have not done what we should in building up a great merchant marine. There was a time in the history of this country, not so very long ago, when the Canadian merchant marine stood fifth among the great nations of the world; to-day it stands eleventh. This is a lamentable fact, but it is not too late, if our people will set themselves to work, to build a great merchant marine, in order to be able to handle the enormous traffic that is coming from the West by our own trade routes, in order to carry it down to the St. Lawrence, and send it across to the other side in our own bottoms. Then our merchant marine will become, not the eleventh, but the second, the third, or possibly the first as time goes on.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—How will the hon. gentleman build up a merchant marine?

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton)—I would build up a merchant marine in the same way that the merchant marine of this country was built up in years gone by. There was a time in the history of Canada when it had a very small and insignificant merchant marine. At that time the carrying trade of the world was done in wooden bottoms, and I am glad to say that the province from which I come at one time sent our ships, manned by our own crews and our own masters, over the seven seas, and took her share and part in the great commerce of the world. I am glad to say the sister province of New Brunswick took a very important and very prominent part on the same lines; I am glad to say that during those years the merchant marine, which was built up in that way, and increased as necessity required, or the opportunity presented itself, became at last—although in wooden bottoms—an important portion of the great merchant carrying trade of the world. The age of wooden walls has passed away, and we have entered into a new era, and it is up to us; as Canadians we are fully as well able to start in and build our own ships as were those who preceded us in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, to build up wooden walls and carry the trade not only of our own country, but of all countries over the seven seas. But apart from that, as coming from the Maritime provinces I would like to impress upon the members of this hon. House, that we have a great and growing trade in the east which we would like to carry to the west. We have immense fields of coal, and you require coal in the west. At the present time the coal supply in the west is almost entirely drawn from the United States' mines. The coal comes in from various points on the lakes, and it is carried in American bottoms to the head of the lakes, and is sent west from there as required. You are allowing the American miner and the United States coal companies to reap the benefit of the operation in coal at the expense of the people of Canada. My idea would be that, with our own bottoms, we should carry our own coal through our own channels, and distribute it at the head of the lakes. I am sure such could be successfully done; that is one of those questions which I had reference to, when I said this commission should go further afield, and obtain information that had not yet been produced in that regard. If the commission will inquire into that phase of the matter they will find an enormous amount of coal can be conveyed west, because we have unlimited quantities at the seaboard. Strange to say our coal is situated at the point on the seaboard where the great stream of ocean traffic will diverge, one going down the United States coast, and the other up the gulf of St.

Lawrence. At this dividing point of ocean travel is placed the only deposit of coal on the Atlantic seaboard between Cape Farewell in Greenland and Cape Horn. We can thus realize what an immense heritage we have in that enormous deposit of coal on the Atlantic seaboard. That coal is seeking an outlet to the West and can be conveyed in our own vessels by the St. Lawrence route; if this Georgian Bay canal is a success, if there is a sufficient quantity of water, which my hon. friend from New Brunswick rather doubts, if the Welland canal is sufficiently deep, then the stream of ocean travel from the East as it comes up the St. Lawrence, can diverge; one portion can go up through the Welland canal and the other through the Georgian Bay canal, and we can supply you all with coal to run your factories and your industries as far as they will require coal. I therefore say this question may possibly be opened up by this commission, and if so they will not only find coal as a product which can be brought up here, but they will find unlimited quantities of fish, because, just at that particular point, nature has placed us in the centre of the greatest fishing locality on this round earth. With the banks of Georges to the south of us, the Magdalen Islands to the north of us, and the great banks of Newfoundland to the east of us, we are placed in the centre of the greatest fishing grounds in the world. If you will open up channels of trade and traffic for us to the great West, you will put us in a position to develop the wonderful heritage that is given to us by Providence; we can give you all the fish, and better fish than you have been eating for a long time, and you can carry it, not only to Montreal but to the West. We will supply plenty of halibut, codfish and haddock. I regret that I have not facts and figures to present to the House to-day, but I can assure hon. gentlemen that it is not only the people of the Ottawa valley that are interested in this matter, but the Maritime provinces, because it is of great importance to them, particularly to those in the extreme East of the Maritime provinces. We are watching with eager eyes the outcome of this proposition, realizing fully what it is going to mean in the next twenty or thirty years.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (C-3) An Act respecting the North Shore Power and Navigation Co.—Hon. Mr. Boyer.

Bill (122) An Act to amend the Government Railway Small Claims Act.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (92), An Act respecting The Premier Life Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. De Veber.

Bill (128), An Act to amend An Act to incorporate the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the motion of the Hon. Mr. Thompson, appealing against the Ruling of His Honour the Speaker, on the motion for the adoption of the second report of the Committee on the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend permit that to stand over again. I received a notice that the Internal Economy Committee is being called to-morrow, and in the multitude of counsel there may be some wisdom expressed as to what disposition should be made of this matter. I should suggest the hon. gentleman to permit it to stand.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—This report was presented to the House on April 3, and there has been some criticism of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, because of the delay in having the domestic affairs of the Senate attended to. It is important that the organization of the staff should be completed at the earliest possible date. However, out of deference to the hon. leader of the House, and feeling that the House will entirely exonerate the committee from any delay that has occurred, I consent to the Order of the Day being discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next.

The Order of the Day was postponed accordingly.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration Bill (71), An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting Fisheries and Fishing.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2:

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might say to my hon. friend from Halifax, who took exception to this clause, that the explanation given by my hon. friend from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) is the proper explanation of the clause. It is intended that a fishery shall include not only the area and the locality, but also the appliances used.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not look as carefully at the wording as I should. I thought it was 'or,' and I see now that it is 'and' I therefore withdraw my objection.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 74.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Bostock) pointed out the omission of British Columbia from this clause. That is a typographical error, and I move that the words British Columbia be inserted after the word 'of' in the first line.

The clause was amended accordingly, and adopted.

On clause 76:

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend from Halifax pointed out that the amendment we made to clause 44 should be repeated in this clause. That is correct. This clause will be amended by adding the following:

Substance or thing, whether the same is of a like character to the substances named in this section or not.

The clause was amended and adopted.

On clause 91.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I proposed last night that clause 91 should be superseded by the following clause:

The Governor in Council may prescribe the manner in which the proceeds of penalties and the proceeds of the sale of confiscated articles shall be distributed.

The reason for the departure from the clauses that were adopted in the Commons is this: Under a decision of the Privy Council it has been held that the property in the fish in non-tidal and inland waters in the provinces of Canada, is in the province, but the right of passing regulations is in the federal Government. The consequence is that the provinces in many cases are administering their own fisheries, subject to the regulations which may be passed by this Government. Therefore we cannot prescribe as to how these penalties shall be applied. That is to say, those penalties may be recovered by provincial officers, and not by officers of the Dominion; consequently the conditions are such that the clause will have to be of sufficiently elastic character to permit of the Governor General passing regulations, so that the fines, which go to the province, may be disposed of as the province may desire. It will be observed that we arbitrarily dispose of those fines under clauses 91 and 92. We would not have a right to do that, in view of the fact that provincial officers would not come within our jurisdiction, consequently it must be dealt with by regulation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—My hon. friend takes the ground that this is to be paid over to the province and cannot be paid over to the people who give the information?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not go that far; inasmuch as the provinces are administering their own fisheries they consequently appoint officers who are provincial officers. It is for the provinces to determine, in such cases, the application of penalties. It therefore would be manifestly wrong for us to say how the penalties should be applied. It is therefore thought that the Governor in Council can deal with this matter by regulation, by Order in Council, because there are some cases in which Federal officers may be employed to administer the fisheries. Both Governments being interested, we require something more elastic than we have.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—In regard to section 56, what was the explanation in regard to the phrase 'commissioned officer of His Majesty's Navy?'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is right; in fact that language has been employed ever since Confederation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The explanation made by the minister seems to complicate this whole matter much more than it ever was before. It appears that the lands and property belong to the provinces, but the regulations affecting the fisheries are to be framed by the Dominion Government. Under these circumstances, has not the Dominion Government the power to declare what the penalties shall be for the violations of those laws? If the Dominion Government has the power to impose the penalties, those penalties would have to go to the provinces, to form part of the revenue of the provinces, on the ground that the land belongs to the provinces, those penalties do not go to the Dominion which is enforcing them. That question of joint authority is one that has troubled the Government for a great many years. I remember when it was decided some years ago that Dominion officers should enforce these regulations, a representative of the province demanded that the proceeds of any penalties should be turned over to them. At that time in the Commons, strong ground was taken by members that if the Dominion had to pay for the enforcement of the regulations the provinces has no equitable right to receive the penality. I am not prepared to say whether the decisions of the Privy Council upon these questions have changed the respective authorities of the Dominion and the provinces, as regards the enforcement of the protection of the fisheries. My hon. friend has put it clearly enough, but it does seem to me that we had better try to change the constitution, so as to give authority definitely either to the Dominion or the provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is a difficult thing to change the constitution.

Clauses 91 and 92 of the Bill were stricken out, and clause 91 as substituted therefor, was read.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 93:

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I move that the last part of this clause be changed so as to read:

Nothing in this section contained shall prevent any person who thinks himself aggrieved by any such conviction or order or dismissal, the prosecutor or complainant, as well as the defendant, from the right of appeal that he has under the provisions of Part XV of The Criminal Code.

The clause, as amended, was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE RAILWAY BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the special committee to which was referred Bill (B-2), An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, presented their first report recommending that leave be given to the committee to hold meetings while the House was in session, and that they be permitted to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—While there may be objection to the report, I do not see any reason for setting aside the ordinary practice of the House and putting it through now. It can be considered on Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This is simply a recommendation for permission of the House to hold meetings while the Senate is in session, and also to sit during the adjournments. Parties come here in the forenoon who might be able to finish their evidence in the afternoon and get away the same day, and we thought it wise to ask that the committee be given the power to continue the hearing of the evidence while the House was in session, and also that the committee sit during adjournments of the House. However I have no objection to the matter standing until Tuesday. My only object in putting it through to-day is that we might fix our procedure. The Commons committee could apply for similar powers so that we would have a uniform rule governing both committees.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman did not make a formal motion, but I took it upon myself to make it, as I understood the proposal was to ask permission for the committee to sit during the recess and during the sittings of the House. I thought possibly the committee might desire to sit on Monday or Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I move that the report be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (F-3), An Act to amend the Secret Commissions Act, 1909.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

Bill (G-3), An Act to incorporate the Canadian General Council of the Boy Scouts Association.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

AID TO FARMERS' BANK DEPOSITORS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired:

1. If there is any foundation in fact for the current report that the Prime Minister does not approve of the scheme of his Finance Minister to recoup the depositors of the Farmers' bank, for their private losses out of the public moneys of the Dominion?
2. If there is any foundation in fact for the current report that the Prime Minister will allow the Finance Minister's measure to be presented to and adopted by the House of Commons in the hope and expectation that the Senate will reject it?

He said: In putting these two questions on the Order Paper I may be permitted to say that I do not expect any elaborate answers to either one of them, nor do I expect from the leader of the House any disclosure of Cabinet secrets in regard to the matter. I simply put the question on the Order Paper in order to put an end to the talk of evil gossips, or ill-informed persons, regarding the attitude of the Prime Minister towards his Finance Minister over this Farmers' Bank business—the scheme to recoup depositors for their private losses out of the public funds—and also to give the Prime Minister an opportunity of denying flatly and fairly, which I suppose he will do, that he does not count on any concurrence of the Senate with himself, in regard to this matter.

I put this question for that purpose—to enable the Government to declare that their solidarity is complete in regard to this scheme to recoup the depositors of the Farmers' Bank, and in the next place to give the Prime Minister an opportunity to deny the statements of gossipers or ill-informed persons that the Prime Minister will allow the Bill to be presented to Parliament with the expectation that it will afterwards be rejected by the Senate. I should like to have from the leader to-day two negatives to this question.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend is too well acquainted with parliamentary usage to believe that such a condition can arise as a disagreement between the Finance Minister and the Prime Minister. I should like to point out that the inquiries are entirely out of order—that in constitutional practice there can be no disagreement—that the ministry must be in accord.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I did not say disagreement; I said disapproval.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When any measure is brought before Parliament touching this matter there can be no disagreement between the Finance Minister and the Premier.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I did not use the word disagreement; I said disapproval.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—All right; I shall have a chance to speak again when the Farmers' Bank Bill is brought before the Senate.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (87), An Act to incorporate The Erie and Ontario Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Taylor.

Bill (W-2), An Act respecting the Toronto Terminals Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Bill (71), An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting Fisheries and Fishing.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

TRUST COMPANIES' BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (70) An Act respecting Trust Companies.

He said: The object of this Bill is to make provision for uniformity, and for the better regulation of Trust companies—uniformity in incorporation, and regulations looking to the business of the companies when incorporated. At the present time trust companies have been incorporated in two ways, one by letters patent and the other by an Act of Parliament. We now propose that hereafter no trust companies shall be incorporated by letter patent, and that such trust companies as desire incorporation shall be by parliamentary sanction and under the model Bill for which provision is made in this Bill. They shall be subject uniformly to the regulations and provisions of this Bill when it becomes law. We are very much in need of legislation of this character. There has been a great deal of divergence between the various charters granted from time to time in Parliament. We have never sought to incorporate uniformity into these various companies to which we give charters from time to time. Inasmuch as they bear a very important relation to the business of the country, owing to the fiduciary capacity in which they act, it has been considered desirable that the strictest regulations shall be applied to those companies; also that systems of audit and inspection should likewise be made applicable to them. It is my intention, after the Bill is read the second time, to move that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, so as to give an opportunity to those interests which may be affected to appear before the committee, and make such representations as they may desire. It would be in the public interest that this should be done.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—What are the new features of the Bill?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In the first place, uniformity; and in the second place, greater restrictions than have heretofore been adopted.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—As to what?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As to incorporation and in the transaction of their business.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Why? Can the hon. gentleman tell me what the objection is to incorporating these companies by letters patent, and why the Government wishes to load up the House with a lot of unnecessary work?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—For this reason, largely, that it is destructive to uniformity in the first place; and in the second place, the most extraordinary powers have been given under letters patent to applicants for incorporation as trust companies. My hon. friend will be astonished when, before that committee, the extraordinary powers which have been given to those companies are pointed out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And how they have been abused.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There are powers which should in no way be given to a trust company, powers which are unrelated to the objects which a trust company may have in view. Owing to the very important functions discharged by trust companies, particularly in relation to the administration of trust estates, Parliament cannot be too careful in insisting that the business done by those companies should be done with a view to protecting the public interest in which they are engaged.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—And that all companies shall have the same powers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will likewise recognize the desirability of all those companies being uniform, so far as the powers granted them by Act of Parliament are concerned.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend's reply does not, to my mind, give any good reason why letters patent could not be granted for the incorporation of loan companies. The fact that this has been done in a loose manner heretofore, is no reason why it should be done in that way in the future. Supposing the Parliament of Canada passed an Act giving power to the Secretary of State to incorporate loan companies under certain conditions, all the conditions with which they would have to comply would be in that Act, and the Secretary of State could not go outside of that Act. When such an Act is on the statute book Parliament would not be bothered with it any more, and the Secretary of State goes on; all the letters patent are alike—you have uniformity right there. That is what should be done; not that every individual loan company should be able to come to this House to get a charter in order to do business, for that course affords opportunity of lobbying, and getting Bills passed granting powers that should not be given. If the Secretary of State is given power to grant charters you remove this practice of lobbying, and also relieve Parliament of a great deal of work. Moreover, that is the up-to-date manner of doing this work. To my mind, the proposed step is a retrograde one.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am in sympathy with the objects of the Bill so far as they have been outlined to us by the hon. leader of the Government. Uniformity in the powers granted to these corporations is very desirable, also the transactions of trust companies should be restricted and subject to audit and inspection. The only doubt in my mind is as to whether the first object to be attained, that of uniformity, can be best accomplished by this method. I doubt very much if uniformity is to be attained by leaving the matter in the hands of Parliament exclusively. We all know how difficult it is to secure uniformity in such matters as railway legislation, for instance. Almost every year we have somebody working for some power which another company did not receive. I am inclined to think that uniformity would be secured more surely and in a better way by leaving the incorporation to be granted by the Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask whether there is any good reason why uniformity should not be accomplished as successfully in relation to trust companies as to banks? We incorporate banks under a model Bill, and very seldom, if ever, is there a departure from that model Bill. If my hon. friend will look at the Bill before us he will find on the last page, schedule A, a model Bill, somewhat similar to those under which we incorporate banks. I see no good reason why Parliament should depart to the slightest extent from this model Bill, which is part of the present Bill.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I understood the leader of the House to say that in many respects the Bill was restrictive.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Is there not in some parts of the legislation relating to share-warrants and enlargement of powers to trust companies in respect of capital that is not found in the other?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would not touch a vital interest in the administration of trust companies; that is very largely a matter of domestic concern, as to the evidence they shall issue of the interests of the shareholders in the company. It seems to me that the public would not be very largely interested, if to any extent at all, as to whether a shareholder should hold his share under a stock certificate or under a share-warrant, or in what form the certificate of his holding should be.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I think that this legislation is on the right lines and that the explanation given by the hon. leader of the Government is satisfactory up to a certain point; but in view of this question of uniformity, that the leader of the Government has dealt with, I should like to know something with regard to the jurisdiction of the Dominion and the provinces on this question of trust company loans. As I understand, all the provinces have legislated on the question of trust companies, and are at the present time incorporating such companies. If we are to have uniformity, the question as to the right of the provinces to legislate is also a very serious one. I understand that at the present time there is a case before the courts involving the question as to the concurrent rights of the provinces and the Dominion to legislate on this subject. I do not know whether my hon. friend can give us any information as to the position of that suit, or whether any final decision has been arrived at as to whether both the provinces and the Dominion have the right to legislate on a question of this kind. Many trust companies have been incorporated under provincial charters and are doing business all over the Dominion. It is very hard for any one who wants to find out about the position of a trust company if he has to hunt up the statutes of different provinces of the Dominion to get the information. A trust company occupies a different position from that of other companies, because the public have to put a great deal more reliance on the business capacity of their managers, and these companies are in the position, as their name suggests, of a trustee for their clients. I should like to know, therefore, what their position is as regards Dominion and provincial legislation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is a very difficult question to answer. Whatever powers or authority may be vested in the provinces of Canada under the British North America Act, of course they have a right, and will continue to exercise those powers. The question of conflict in the exercise of powers between the federal Government and the provincial Governments goes back to Confederation. As to trust companies, the provinces, notwithstanding this Act, will scarcely be expected to in any way restrict the exercise of their powers. I presume they will exercise those powers just as freely as they have in the past. The question of conflict between the federal and provincial authority has been before the Supreme Court. It came before that court upon a stated case agreed upon between the governments affected, and there has been a judgment of the Supreme Court favouring largely the contentions advanced by the provinces. That judgment has not yet been appealed. As to whether it will go to the Privy Council I am not in the position at the present moment to say. Some consideration has been given to the desirability of securing finality upon that very important question. Notwithstanding the judgment of the Supreme Court upon the question, it does not necessarily follow that the question is settled. The question may be raised at any time, as to whether certain of those powers are vested in the provinces; One is safe in saying that finality will not be reached until that question is determined before the Privy Council, but I cannot say at present to my hon. friend whether there will be an appeal to the Privy Council.

Col. the Hon. Mr. MASON—The provisions of this proposed Bill are well worthy of the best consideration of this hon. House. Trust companies are given large powers; they take deposits, they administer estates of deceased persons and in many ways they are custodians of money and funds which are more or less of a sacred character, because they belong to widows and orphans. The tendency of legislation nowadays seems to be to protect the public. Flaws have been detected in past legislation. In my humble opinion, the authority to give such powers should be vested in the Dominion Parliament, and I should be very glad indeed to see this Bill go through.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But that cannot be done. Under the British North America Act the provinces have a right to charter trust companies, and the only effect this will have, if this legislation is passed, will be to send these people to the local legislatures to get their powers, and they will not come here at all.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—That is not the point. If you get a Dominion charter you can do business in every province of the Dominion, which is a valuable asset for any company to hold, but if a company has only a provincial charter, they can do business only in the province from which they get the charter. That is a small matter. It is important for a company to obtain a Dominion charter because they can do business all over the Dominion. There is no doubt the provincial companies have a right to do business in their own provinces, but if they wish to do business in an outside province, the provincial charter is no use,—they have to come to this Parliament in order to obtain the power to do business outside their own province.

Hon. Mr. KERR—That statement should not go unchallenged because my hon. friend apparently forgot, at the time he was speaking, that a company cannot do business without a license from the province. If companies want to do business all over the Dominion, they have to take out a license in each province to do it; the same applies to a provincial trust company, or an English or American trust company, provided the license is issued. So that the hon. gentleman's observation as to the preservation of protection in that respect is entirely unsound. This is a serious question and I would like if the Government would take it into consideration, whether it is desirable that there should be any change made with reference to the method of incorporation. At the same time it would be a very great advantage if the Government would come to some understanding with the provinces by which Dominion companies could be allowed to carry on business in the provinces without getting a license to do business in that province. The expense involved in that is great, but greater than that is the annoyance of annual renewals and returns, as to which in some cases the province is most exacting, and it is asserted that it is done, not in the public interest, but to compel companies to take subsidiary letters of incorporation in those provinces. This has led to a good deal of disturbance, and the sooner the question is grappled with by the Government and some arrangement arrived at the better. The province has only an interest in the shape of fees, and the paltry revenue they get out of them for the filing of records and licenses annually, but it becomes a burden on the companies and is misleading to the public, and it is in many ways a very great disadvantage in the transaction of business. Instead of presenting a Bill like this, the Government should take the matter up and deal with it. If the way were clear then the form of legislation should take, whether under the Joint Stock Companies Act, or by a measure of this kind, should be dealt with. It may be observed, also, that there is some objection to this form of incorporating a trust company, or any company of that character. It arises in this way: the character of a company incorporated, as it were under this Bill, has restrictive claims in some respects beyond what the letters patent impose, and extensive powers now beyond what ordinary companies are given, as, for instance, the question about the issue of share-warrants, which has been referred to. Under the Joint Stock Companies' Act, a company cannot be incorporated with power to issue share-warrants. Is that the object really in view in this legislation? Under the name of a general Act, is it intended by those who desire this legislation that trust companies who wish to issue share-warrants can obtain certain powers which at present, under the Joint Stock Companies' Act, they could not get, and which the department would not give if they could? That is altogether a separate condition of things.

There is a distinction between a trust company and an ordinary trading company with reference to the issue of share-warrants. I can understand that a share-warrant differs from a certificate in this respect: That a share-warrant may be issued for a fraction of a share. In other words, the holder of a share may split his share into ten or twenty fractions, and issue a share-warrant for each one of the fractions, whether it is a tenth or a twentieth of a share, and it is not necessary that the share-warrant should be recorded. Take the case of a trust company guaranteeing its investments, one can easily see how a shareholder might shield himself by having his shares issued not in the form of scrip, but in the form of share-warrants which need not be, and which are not, in fact, recorded. They are usually held, at all events, in foreign companies, where a foreign banker having investments of small sums holds the share, and against it issues share-warrants. The result is that small sums of money can find investment in that way at remunerative rates, compared with what they would bring if they were merely sums on deposit. I really think there is a good deal to be said on the subject, and I should like the hon. leader of the House to consider the propriety of applying the share warrant restriction to trust companies. If there is one class of company which should not be authorized to do what I have been describing, it is trust companies, even more than banks. You would never think of bank shares being divided into share-warrants, and having an undisclosed body of share-warrant holders not liable as shareholders. Those are matters which will require consideration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They will come before the committee.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Will the Bill go through Committee of the Whole ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no good reason why afterwards it should not, if the House desires that it be submitted to a Committee of the Whole, I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (83) An Act respecting Loan Companies. He said: The explanation which I made as to the Trust Companies Bill is equally applicable to this measure. The objects are practically the same, and it is proposed to send this Bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee, to be dealt with in the same way as the preceding Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Does my hon. friend not distinguish between Trust Companies and Loan Companies, to a considerable extent? The position is not the same because these loan companies, acting as a trustee of other peoples' estates will be simply loaning money for the purpose of making money out of their business, and to that extent I do not know that it is so necessary that they should be looked after as strictly as a trust company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Their relation to the public may be said to be quite as important as the relation of trust companies, and the question of uniformity, also of regulation, and the application of restrictions, such for instance as to investments, audit, inspection and all that kind of thing, can be made applicable to loan companies quite as advantageously and as much in the public interest as the same would apply to trust companies. Loan companies, as my hon. friend doubtless knows, take deposits very largely, and conduct, in a measure, that class of business which banks do, so far as that business seriously affects the public in the acceptance of deposits, and certainly those principles which are applicable to trust companies are equally applicable to loan companies.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Is it proposed in both cases to make the Bills applicable to existing companies, so that companies which have been heretofore incorporated, either by special Act or by letters patent, shall be subject to whatever conditions and restrictions are imposed under this legislation on companies to be hereafter incorporated?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It does not propose to abridge any of the powers heretofore given to companies, but it proposes to apply to those companies such regulations and restrictions, so far as auditing, inspection, investment and that kind of thing is concerned, as would apply to loan companies which may hereafter be incorporated under this legislation.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Does not that manifestly draw a line of distinction between companies, either as to the proportion of capital to loan or otherwise, and trust companies heretofore incorporated? Does it not place new companies at a disadvantage in that respect, and does it not draw a line of distinction between the companies to which this Act must apply, and companies already existing? The result may be to give quite a premium to existing companies which possess and exercise greater powers than will be conferred under this Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It will certainly place companies hereafter incorporated at a disadvantage, wherein they cannot secure powers equal to the extraordinary powers given under past legislation to existing companies; but it may be very well said that because an abuse has arisen in the past, it therefore should not be continued in the future. It is felt by the Government that the powers which may be given to loan or trust companies under this legislation will be sufficiently wide to permit of those companies doing a business legitimately within the bounds of either a loan or a trust company, as the case may be.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

INSPECTION AND SALE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READINGS.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (71), An Act to amend the Inspection and Sale Act.

He said: The object of the amendments to the inspection Act is to relieve binder twine, manufactured for export, from being marked or stamped, as is now required by the existing law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is thought that if binder twine is being manufactured for export it is therefore unnecessary that it should be charged with all the restrictions, so far as stamping and labelling, that apply to binder twine that is used within the country. My hon. friend asks why. The policy of protecting the public within the country is manifestly desirable and good policy, but we are not called upon to protect the outside public as to the manufactures of this class of goods made for export.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Does this Bill require that twine for the home market shall be stamped?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Should any of this twine be used within the country, then it becomes subject to the existing regulations applying to twine that is manufactured for consumption within the country.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Does not my hon. friend think it is just as necessary to keep up our reputation outside of the country as inside the country? Should we not be as honest in dealing with people outside the country as we are required to be in dealing with our own people?

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—In a matter of this kind it does not follow that it is a case of our reputation, because under the conditions of the law as it exists in Canada, it is, in many cases impossible to export the goods. Different countries have different rules in reference to conditions imposed upon a dealer in that particular country. The case in point which brought this legislation before this House—and it is probably an illustration that explains to the House the condition as well, or better than trying to do it otherwise—was this, of which I happen to have personal knowledge; tenders for a large quantity of binder twine were asked by a company in Russia importing goods from America. Prices were asked from different companies, and a tender was offered by a Canadian company. On the tender being accepted, it was found that under the law, as it existed the Canadian company was unable to manufacture binder twine or sell it in Canada unless they put their name and the number of feet per pound on a tag attached to each bale of twine. That is an excellent idea, and it has been in force for some time, and it protects the purchaser in Canada.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—That is why it was put there.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—That is why it was put there. The change in the law does not affect the business in Canada, but this change says that in case the Canadian manufacturer has an opportunity to export twine, such as the case as I speak of, he may put such a tag on that exported twine as the purchaser desires to have upon it. That is the exact condition. In this particular case the purchasers necessarily made the request that they must have on it the manufacturer's signature, and a certain trade mark in Russian characters or letters, which made a very elaborate tag, and was a necessity to the selling of the binder twine in Russia. A Canadian manufacturer of binder twine, under the law, without this change, cannot make and sell that twine in Russia, because the law says he could not make it even though he is exporting it. It will appeal to every member of the House, that while it is extremely desirable to protect the purchaser in Canada and to have on every ball of twine the number of feet and the name. If the manufacturer is going to compete in Russia—is going to bring business to Canada, in fact—we need not restrict him by such conditions. If a manufacturer can get that order, so much for the benefit of Canada. It is not a disadvantage, it is all an advantage, and it is an advantage to the user where it is going, because he would not know what our condition of manufacture meant, if he saw it on a tag; not one in ten thousand would be capable of reading it. Thus it is an absolute necessity to that kind of export business that the manufacturers should be allowed to put out a tag different from what the law has required heretofore in Canada.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—It is not up to us to look after the interests of the Russian farmer, but I would like to say that I would be sorry for them, if they are in the condition that Canadian farmers were before the law compelling the manufacturers to stamp their goods, was passed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Let them deal with that.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (93), An Act respecting the Prince Edward and Hastings Railway Company.—Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

SASKATCHEWAN CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the message from the House of Commons disagreeing to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (49), an Act respecting the Saskatchewan Central Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We have been discussing the question of uniformity all the afternoon with respect to a certain Bill. I would like to point out how that has been carried out with reference to railway legislation during this session. Here is a company that is incorporated to do business in the district which I represent in this House, the Prince Albert district. It was incorporated only in 1910. This company has put up $75,000, but on account of the stringency of the money market they were unable to go on with the construction, and they came back here and asked for the ordinary terms of extension, from two to five years. The company was organized only three years, yet this extension was refused, although Acts have been passed in the House of Commons embodying this clause in the case of the following Bills:—Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19, 34, 36, 37, 39, 42, 46, 55, 88, 91, 93, 95. I would point out to the House further that some of those Bills have been renewed from year to year for a great many years. In the case of No. 16, an Act respecting the Ottawa and Northwestern Railway Company. that company was incorporated as far back as 1901. Number 17 is also an old Bill; 18 is also old; and so on all down the line; but when it comes to this special Bill, the sheep have been separated from the goats, for what reason I do not know. Why the House of Commons has rejected this special Bill, ignoring the fact that the promoters have put up $75,000 in the way of organization, and passed other Bills in which extensions and renewals have been asked time and time again, I cannot understand. I do not think it is fair to the people who are promoting this enterprise. I know some of them, and they have some money, whereas the promoters of a great many of those other Bills could not show much in the way of a bona fide investment. The people interested in this Saskatchewan Central Railway Company are entitled to the same courtesy as the others to whom I have alluded in the Bills mentioned. I understand that there are certain reformers who have got into the Railway Committee in the other House, and I suppose that when those reformers are present on special occasions something has to be knifed; when there is something they do not want to knife the reformers are not on the ground. We object to the Bill being treated in this way. We would rather not have the Bill at all if we are going to be singled out in this way. I would therefore move:

That this House adheres to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 49) An Act respecting the Saskatchewan Central Railway Company, for the following reasons:

1. Bill No. 12 (present session) the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company, incorporated in 1890, initiated in the Commons, amended by the Senate, granting extensions for two and five years respectively instead of one and three years, said amendments concurred in by the Commons.

2. In Bills Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19, 34, 36, 37, 39, 42, 46, 55, 88, 93 and 95 of the present session, extensions for two and five years respectively have been granted. The original incorporations of said Bills bearing date beginning from 1884 down to 1912.

3. The usual opportunities should be given the Saskatchewan Central Railway Company, incorporated by chapter 160, of the Statutes of Canada, 1910, and time first extended in 1912, to finance to build its lines of railway and develop the country to be traversed, as the parties interested in the company under the powers of its Act of incorporation and the Railway Act, have shown their faith in the enterprise by duly organizing and securing the amount of money required for said organization purposes, namely, $75,000 and because owing to unforeseen delays and stringency in the money market, the company has up to the present date been unable to obtain the necessary funds, namely, $450,000 required under its Act of incorporation, and by section 150 of the Railway Act, to be spent within two years as commencement of construction, or otherwise the powers of construction granted in the Act of incorporation cease and be null and void and because those interested in the company are of the opinion that if the usual extension of time for the periods of two and five years respectively is granted to the company, to commence and complete the construction of its railways, they will be prepared within said periods to make substantial and material progress in the work of construction.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (97), An Act to incorporate the Labrador, Quebec and Southern Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Belcourt.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the House do now adjourn until Tuesday next at 3 p.m.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE moved in amendment that the hour be 8 p.m. instead of 3 p.m.

The SPEAKER—That amendment can only be moved with the leave of the House. The question now is that the House adjourn until Tuesday next at 3 o'clock. With the consent of the House I will put the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, no consent.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at 3 p.m.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (H-3), An Act for the relief of Georgina Beatrice Boyd.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

THE LATE HON. WILLIAM GIBSON.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with it is my melancholy duty to direct the attention of the Senate to the loss of our late colleague Senator Gibson, who died yesterday at his residence in Beamsville.

During the earlier part of the session he had been present with us, interesting himself as he had done for years in the business of this Chamber. The news of his death has, therefore, come to us somewhat unexpectedly. Death is invariably sad but its sadness becomes more deeply impressed upon our minds when to-day we find our colleagues engaged in the ordinary duties of life and to-morrow we learn of their having departed to the great unknown. Public life to our late colleague was to him very largely the breath of life. He had for a great number of years devoted the best part of his time and energy to the discharge of his public duties. Few public men took a deeper interest in the discharge of their public duties than did the late Senator Gibson. To such an extent did he interest himself in what I might call the domestic affairs of the Senate during his term of office, he seemed to come more closely in touch with the members in the discharge of those duties than did other members of this Chamber.

Although he represented many large and varied business interests yet the public service which he rendered was as if it were his chief interest in life. He brought into the public sphere in which he moved a large and practical experience of business affairs. His was a judgment which commanded the attention of those with whom he was associated. Particularly in the work of this Chamber his opinion and his judgment carried weight and respect. Although he had always been a strong party man and for a generation had fought the battles of his party, yet his personal and social qualities appealed most strongly to those who differed with him politically, and his friendly relations were never marred by any appearance of partisanship. He had for many years been a leading figure in the public affairs of the great province to which he belonged and was an outstanding figure in the commercial and financial interests of that province.

Those who knew him best will most deeply feel his loss and to-day the members of this Senate will join in the many expressions of sympathy which will be tendered to his sorrowing family in the loss of one for whom many will mourn.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—In rising to express the feelings of the members on this side of the House on the death of our late colleague Senator Gibson, I feel that it might have fallen into better hands than mine to express our regret on this occasion. As was well said by the leader of the Government, the late senator was one with whom we were all closely in touch, who brought to his work in this Chamber the ripe experience of a man who had from his early days been trained to do his duty to his country and to take his part in the life of the country in which he was living. Born in Scotland and trained there till he was about the age of twenty-one, he came to this country at a time when he was in the first vigor of his youth, and was able to use, to the greatest advantage, the training and education he had received in his native home, Scotland. For many years he was engaged in public business connected with prominent works, both in Ontario and Quebec, such as the St. Clair tunnel, and the building of the Victoria bridge, Montreal. He was a prominent man in the contracting work of this country, and he took tremendous interest in all subjects that dealt with the future work of the development of Canada. To all who knew him his energy and his business ability were of great assistance; we felt that he took great interest in everything that was before him. Those who have been in contact with him as Chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate, realize what his ability was in connection with all financial and banking matters that came before that committee. As has been said of him before, he was a genial, loyal and kindly-hearted Scot who was beloved by those who came in contact with him, and we feel that the most sincere sympathy goes forth to the widow and family of one who was always a good father and a good husband.

Hon. Mr. FROST—As a friend of the late Hon. Wm. Gibson, I desire to make a few remarks in memory of our late colleague, and to confirm as well all the kind things said about him by the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition. It is not my intention to go over the ground taken by them, but rather to speak in a spirit of praise and commendation of his course in the affairs of life generally. Coming to Canada at an early age, he soon rose in the esteem of his neighbours and friends, and by their help he found himself shortly a member of the House of Commons. Later he was called to the Senate of Canada, where he soon became Chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee, and which position was his when, on yesterday, he passed to the Great Beyond. As a man he stood for honesty of purpose; everything to which he set his hand he did as one imbued with a determination to have the right at all cost. His word was as good as his bond, and if wealth came as the result, it came honestly, and no one begrudged it to him. He lived by good principles, because he had those in him which always guided him right—he could do nothing else. In later years it was his pleasure to become identified with many enterprises, putting his money in companies, by way of assistance to the country as much as gain. When at home, as president of one of our strong banks, he was always found at his post, and his presence now will be greatly missed by his colleagues. By those of us who knew his worth he was always regarded with esteem and affection. He had his faults, for he was only human, like the rest of us; and we can well throw over them the mantle of charity. To his sorrowing wife and family our heartfelt sympathy is given in full measure, and to the friends in this Senate of Canada who look upon a vacant chair to-day, we can only say with the poet:

'What shadows we are and what shadows we pursue.'

THIRD READING.

Bill (89) An Act respecting The University of Saskatchewan, and to change its name to "The University of Emmanuel College."—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the motion of the Hon. Mr. Thompson, appealing against the Ruling of His Honour the Speaker, on the motion for the adoption of the second report of the Committee on the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have contracted the habit of asking that this motion shall stand until to-morrow—

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is the last time of asking.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall ask my hon. friend to-day to allow it to stand until to-morrow, and by that time I will try to break myself of this habit, and not again ask to postpone the motion.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It seems to me it is proper to pay deference to the hon. leader of the House. Where he is going to lead us I do not know, but as the hon. leader assumes the responsibility, with the consent of the House, I move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day postponed accordingly.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (D-3), An Act to incorporate The General Council of The Canadian Branch of the St. John Ambulance Association.—Hon. Mr. Mason.

Bill (E-3), An Act respecting the North Shore Power Railway and Navigation Company, and to change the name thereof to "Gulf Pulp and Paper Company."—Hon. Mr. Boyer.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS SMALL CLAIMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (122) An Act to amend The Government Railways Small Claims Act.

He said: This Bill is not an important measure. It is intended to correct a difficulty which was brought about by the amendment of the Act last session. Previous to the general manager of Government railways being appointed, the railway was managed by the Government Railways Managing Board, and in the legislation which this amends, it was provided that all proceedings should be taken against that particular body. Since the appointment of a general manager of the Government railways, it will be quite obvious that an amendment of this character is necessary, so that hereafter any suit brought, in the class mentioned in the legislation of 1910 and 1913, will be brought against the general manager of Government railways.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the Bill is referred to Committee of the Whole House. I wish to direct attention of the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill to what I look upon as an omission in the third column, line 19, which reads as follows:

> All actions, suits and other proceedings now pending which have been instituted against the Government railways managing board may be continued.

Should the language not be 'by or against,' because you provide before for actions by the managing board, and if any action has been taken by the managing board, the general manager should be substituted?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes. My hon. friend will be good enough to suggest an amendment in committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I call attention to it to see whether it is not desirable to make the change.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON moved concurrence in the third report of the Standing Committee on the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is just one point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Senate. I understand that the committee, when they made this recommendation, were under the impression that Mr. Gross should be appointed at the present salary, but I have reason to know that recently, a few months ago, arrangements were made that Mr. Gross should be promoted from sub-division A of the second division to sub-division B of the first division, so that his salary would run from $2,900 to $4,000 per annum.

The SPEAKER—Where is the evidence of such an arrangement? This report is based on a recommendation that I made to the House, and the recommendation says that he will enter our service at the same salary that he has been receiving in the Auditor General's Department.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If it is a fact that Mr. Gross has been promoted, then of course he is entitled to the salary to which the step entitles him. I am not quarrelling with the decision; I am simply indicating what the effect of it may be.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The report of the committee that is now under consideration will be found at page 518 of the Minutes of Proceedings. It says that Mr. Gross, of the Auditor General's office, is to be appointed 'Accountant of the Senate at the same salary as he is now receiving in his present position.'

Hon. Mr. WATSON—What is the salary of his present position?

The SPEAKER—It is the salary fixed for a class lower than the one he has been appointed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If the hon. gentleman refers to the Speaker's report he will find that Mr. Gross is to be appointed at the same salary he is now receiving in his present position. That is, if the report of the Speaker is adopted, the salary that Mr. Gross was receiving at the date of that report is the salary on which he will enter upon his duties here.

The motion was agreed to.

THE RAILWAY BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved concurrence in the first report of the Special Committee to whom was referred (B-2) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—As I read this report, it recommends that leave be given the committee to hold sittings while the House is in session and during adjournments of the House. I do not think it would be wise that the committee should sit while the House is in session, because this is a very important public Bill. It may possibly go to a Committee of the Whole House after it is reported from the committee; if so, members who are not in a position to attend the meetings of the committee will have an opportunity of discussing the Bill when it comes before the House in Committee of the Whole. On the other hand, it will facilitate matters if the committee will meet at the regular hours so that every member may have an opportunity of being present and hearing the evidence submitted to the committee. In that way the Bill is likely to go through the House with less opposition and delay than might otherwise occur. I understand from gentlemen who are interested in the Railway Act—transportation corporations, municipalities, etc.—that they expect to be heard, and it is nothing but right that the evidence should be taken and printed so that every member would be in a position to read it and understand the question.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is the intention.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—There is nothing in the report about reporting the evidence. Is it the intention of the Government to have this Bill submitted to a Committee of the Whole House as a public measure?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Every Bill is in the hands of the House and could be referred to a Committee of the Whole with the approval of the House. I see no good reason why my hon. friend should not have this Bill referred to a Committee of the Whole if the House so desires.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—At this late date of the session, when it is not only the hope, but the expectation of members of both Chambers that we will get through our business by the 1st of June—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—July.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I understand it is expected that the business will be completed by the 1st of June. If so, it is ridiculous to suppose that a Bill like this could pass this session, because it will take a lot of time in the committee and a lot of time in the House. In the committee, evidence will have to be taken of people coming from various places all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific and I do not see any sense in attempting to rush the Bill at this time. The Railway Committee has practically completed its business for this session, and I should think this Special Committee would practically take its place in dealing with this measure. If they hold their meetings from half past ten or eleven and sit till one every day and take evidence, every member who wishes to be present and ask questions can do so. It would facilitate the progress of the Bill; otherwise there will be as much work to be done here in this Chamber afterwards as in the committee. I see no advantage to be gained by the proposition to hold sittings simultaneously with the House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The object in view is to accommodate parties who are anxious to give their evidence and leave the same day. In case a witness is heard in the forenoon and his evidence is incomplete when the committee rises, it might be a convenience to him if the committee could sit in the afternoon and complete his evidence in order that he might be able to leave the city the same day. There is no desire on the part of the committee, I take it, to sit during the time the House is sitting, because no doubt the members of the committee in both Houses will be just as anxious as my hon. friend to be in attendance in their places in the House. As to the meetings of the committee, in a private conference I had to-day with the chairman of the Committee in the other House we discussed that situation—the question will be brought up at the next meeting of the joint committee. The meetings will be held as conveniently as possible, not only for both Houses, but also for the public who will be in attendance to give evidence, and argue for and against the various clauses of the Bill. My hon. friend will see the difficulties we have in weaving in the time of a special committee between the various other committees. Even although, as he says, some of them have very little to do, that little may interfere with the meetings of this special committee, when there are set days for the meetings. However, we are going to arrange that the meetings shall be as frequent as possible, and interfere as little as possible with meetings of committees and of the House. I can speak with confidence in that regard, and say that my hon. friend need have no fears.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There will be expenses incurred in taking this evidence and having it published. I would ask against what fund that expense would be charged, whether the House of Commons fund or the Senate fund? It would be wise that the leader of the Government should see to that, for the expense will be enormous before the work is finished of taking all this evidence, and the very fact of having it printed will lead to more evidence being given than is actually required, and if it is going to be charged up against the Senate funds we will be doing an act of charity to the House of Commons that they do not need.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Do I understand that witnesses who will come and give evidence before this committee, are to be taken charge of and paid by the Government?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I would not think so. I should think any one who gives his evidence there would give it gratis.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I suppose the spending House, which is the other House, can afford to take the lead in this matter and vote the necessary supply to cover the expenses.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We can, I think, get the Commons section to report to the House of Commons that the expenses be paid.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

SHORT MEASURE BINDER TWINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT inquired of the Government:

1. What manufacturers of binder twine in Canada have been fined since 1896 for selling twine of short measure or weight?
2. The year of the offence?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The answers are as follows:

1. The M. J. Wilson Cordage Company, of Chatham.
2. 1903.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

The SPEAKER laid on the Table the following recommendation:

Clerk's office,
Ottawa, May 6, 1914.

The Hon. P. Landry,
Speaker of the Senate.

Sir,—I have the honour to invoke your attention to the fact that the present session of Parliament has now reached that stage when the greatest quantity of legislative work is done, and that owing to certain vacancies which have occurred in the staff of the Senate since last session, it is suggested, in order to promote its efficiency, that a reassignment of duty among its members is advisable. I would therefore suggest:

1. That Mr. J. C. Young be appointed deputy clerk and first clerk assistant, in addition to his present duties of clerk of Routine and Proceedings and clerk of stationery.
2. That Mr. Byron Nicholson be appointed clerk of English Journals.
3. That Mr. A. R. Soutter be appointed clerk of Minutes of Proceedings.

4. That Mr. A. H. Hinds be appointed chief clerk of Committees at the minimum salary of sub-division 'B' of the first division.

5. That Mr. C. H. Jones be appointed clerk of Petitions and assistant clerk of Committees.

6. That Mr. Alphonse Roy be appointed a clerk in the Law Department at the minimum salary of sub-division 'B' of the second division.

While this reassignment of duties would appear, by the promotion of Mr. Hinds, and the appointment of Mr. Roy, to increase the annual expenditure on account of salaries by $1200, the reverse is the case, as the salary of $3,300 heretofore paid to the late first clerk assistant, Mr. Stephen, is done away with.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Saml E. St. O. Chapleau,
Clerk of the Senate.

Recommended
P. Landry,
Speaker of the Senate,
May 6, 1914.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The recommendations, now laid on the table by the Speaker, cover entirely the recommendations that were presented to the House by the report of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts. As I am particularly favourable to the principle of peace on earth and good will towards men, and as we have found common ground under a flag of truce in respect to this matter, I move the adoption of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

The SPEAKER submitted a message from the House of Commons acquainting the Senate that they had concurred in the recommendation of the Speaker of the House of Commons in the matter of the proposed appointment of Mr. Herbert D. Throop, as permanent messenger in the Library of Parliament, laid on the table of the House with other papers in connection therewith on the 20th instant.

The message was read to the House.

The SPEAKER—I wish to call the attention of the House to the following facts which are very important to the Senate on account of the position which this House occupies concurrently with the House of Commons in the appointment of officers on the library staff. The librarians, who are considered as deputy heads, under the jurisdiction of the two Houses, made a report to the House of Commons, which report reaches us to-day, sent by message from the House of Commons a few days ago. I did not bring the matter before the House until I had seen the librarians and asked them to send the same report to the Senate, because the Senate has an equal right with the House of Commons to have a report of those nominations made to this House. It is the joint concurrence of the two Houses that confirms the appointment. The message of the Commons stated what had been done in that House, i.e. that the report of the librarians had been approved by the House of Commons, but I did not want to lay that message before the Senate until I had the real duplicated report dated the same day and supposed to have been sent to the Senate on the same date as the one was sent to the Commons, so that this House could not be influenced by any decision taken by the House of Commons. In consequence I have the honour to lay before you the following report:

Library of Parliament,
Ottawa, April 17, 1914.

Sir,—The librarians have the honour to recommend the appointment of Herbert D. Throop, aged 24, to fill the place of one of the permanent messengers recently deceased; and that the salary of the said Herbert D. Throop be $600 per annum, beginning on March 25 the day of which he entered provisionally on his duties. The said Throop has duly qualified himself by passing the C. S. examination.

We have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servants,
A. D. DeCelles,
General Librarian,
Martin J. Griffin,
Parliamentary Librarian.

To the Hon. the Speaker,
The Senate.

I recommend that nomination as Speaker of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the recommendation be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (102), An Act to regulate the manufacture and Sale of Dairy Products and to prohibit the manufacture or sale of butter substitutes.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

ORDER DROPPED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the motion of the Hon. Mr. Thompson, appealing against the ruling of His Honour the Speaker, on the motion for the adoption of the second report of the Committee on the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I move that this order be dropped.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The question, in respect to the second report of the Committee on Internal Economy, covers a sort of formal report, in respect to an audit on the accounts, and it can be dealt with at the next meeting of the committee. In view of our having found common ground in respect to the other references that were made in the report, I move that the order be dropped, together with a report of the committee on the whole matter.

The SPEAKER—I may suggest to the hon. member that the first part of the report may be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—We can deal with that at another meeting.

The motion was agreed to.

RENEWAL OF PATENTS.

MOTION POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN, in the absence of the Hon. Mr. Kerr, moved the second reading of Bill (C-3), An Act respecting a certain Patent of Frederick Sinclair Corrigan.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The hon. gentleman had better give us an explanation. We are resolving ourselves into a patent office here the last two years, for issuing patents.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—At any time a matter of this kind is brought before the House we ought to be put in possession of some of the facts, which are considered of sufficient importance to revive or regalvanize a patent into life again that is practically out of court.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In the absence of the Hon. Mr. Kerr I may say that this is a private Bill and will be referred, in due course, to the committee, where any objection can be made and parties can be heard. This House will be in a very poor position to-day to discuss this motion before we have a report of the committee thereon.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—On the second reading of any measure we are adopting a principle. The hon. member from Fredericton (Hon. Mr. Thompson) objects to the principle of turning this House into a patent office; therefore, the promoter of this Bill, or whoever is in charge of it, ought to be in a position to give this House some information before he asks for the second reading; whoever is acting for him should ask for the discharge of the order, until the hon. gentleman returns.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I am sorry I cannot accede to that request. This is a most unusual proceeding. I told the Hon. Mr. Kerr that I would move the second reading. Moreover, this is a private Bill, and such Bills are always referred to the committee. I do not know of any instance, in many sessions back, where any objection was made to send a Bill to the proper committee. The hon. gentleman will not, I hope, insist under the circumstances. The session is very far advanced. The Hon. Mr. Kerr moved and the House agreed to suspend some rules in reference to this very Bill, in order that it might be considered by the committee and sent to the House of Commons, so that it could be passed in time this session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Hon. gentleman is in error when he says that these Bills have always been passed on the second reading without discussion. Over and over again I have objected to the passing of Bills of this description until an explanation has been given to the Senate. True, the practice has been the passing of the second reading of such Bills without any objection whatever; that has been so common that I have found I was standing alone in objecting. I am very glad to see my hon. friend raise the same objection that I have made over and over again. True this is a private Bill, but the House has to affirm the principle of the Bill. It is well known that when a Bill passes the second reading in this House, though it be a private Bill, we affirm a principle. But no one knows the reasons that the party promoting this Bill has for seeking the renewal of the patent. In very many cases I have found, on examination, that parties obtained a patent from the proper authorities, and allowed it to stand from year to year until they found that somebody was going to take advantage of it and commence the construction or manufacture of the article patented; then, in order to cut out this competition, the owners of the patent ask for a renewal, and we have been in the habit of acting for the department that grants the patents, just as indicated by my hon. friend from Fredericton (Hon. Mr. Thompson). The better way will be to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member from Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Davis) in order that the gentleman from Toronto who has this Bill in charge may make some explanation as to the reason for asking the second reading of this Bill; therefore I move that the order be discharged and set down for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I second that motion. I agree with the remarks of the previous speakers as to the inconvenience of passing a Bill through its second reading, without one word of explanation; it is not fair to the great body of the members. There are only a few members on the committee to which this Bill will go, and it is just possible a Bill may pass through this House, after its reference to a committee, without a member having a chance of seeing what it really is. With regard to Bills of this kind, we all know why the application is made—because a mistake was made—and I can understand if a man made a mistake about the date when he ought to pay fees, or something of that kind, his application might be a meritorious one—but a man who deliberately allows his patent to run out for six months or a year, and then comes to this House to have it renewed, has no claim at all; we ought to know the facts before we are asked to vote.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—As a member of the Miscellaneous and Private Bills Committee I may say, in looking over this Bill, that the application is made owing to the fact that the fees were not paid in time. The committee has laid down a rule, which has been accepted by the department, to renew a patent on sufficient evidence being given as to the cause of neglect, if it be not through any fault of the patentee, but through the fault, perhaps, of a solicitor or some of his clerks. The committee will not recommend a renewal except on statutory declaration as to the cause of the non-payment of fees. This Bill might safely be left in the hands of the committee to deal with, and then, if the House wants the evidence received by the committee, it can be produced before them. The renewal of the patent will not be granted by the committee unless declarations are received which they consider satisfactorily explain the non-payment of dues; the House can have the benefit of these afterwards.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I ask the hon. gentleman, who I think is chairman of that committee, if the committee has ever refused a patent application?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Though I was for some years, chairman of that committee, Hon. Mr. Bostock is at present Chairman. During my time as Chairman, or since then, I do not think the committee ever refused an application where they thought the evidence of neglect of payment of dues was sufficient to warrant them in renewing the patent.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—For the last year or more the committee can pride themselves that they have taken great pains to ascertain the facts in reference to these patent Bills, owing very largely to the remarks that my hon. friend from Hastings has made on former occasions in the House about these Bills. We have insisted always on receiving an affidavit from the people who came before us, setting forth the reasons why they required to come before this House to ask for an extension of time to get these privileges. In view of the procedure of the committee, we should allow this Bill to go through in the ordinary course; the committee will see that it is very carefully looked into.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It has been pointed out that this is a private Bill. Under our rules, private Bills do not go through the Committee of the whole House; as has been pointed out, very few members of this House are on that committee. When that Bill comes back here, it goes through the House without any discussion, and I am bound to say that a great number of the members of this House may know nothing about it. I do not think it is an outrageous proposition that, when somebody introduces a measure of that kind, this House should ask for an explanation. There are members here who are not members of the Private Bills Committee, and while the suggested reference to the committee may be satisfactory to members of the committee, it is not satisfactory to me, as a member of this House, because I am not on that committee and will probably not hear anything of that discussion. The amendment of the hon. member from Hastings is reasonable, that this matter be put off until the hon. gentleman who has charge of the measure can come here and make an explanation to this House. We would like to hear his explanation, rather than that of the committee, which is only a creation of this House.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL—No interest will suffer by allowing this Bill to be taken off the Order Paper to-day, and put on again for to-morrow or some other day when the hon. gentleman who has charge of it is present and able to give some explanation of the Bill. It is very unusual indeed for this House to pass the second reading of a Bill without the slightest explanation of any kind. The remarks just made by the hon. gentleman who sat down are quite to the point—that while the committee may get some explanation in regard to this Bill, this Chamber, a large majority of whom have no connection with the committee, will know nothing whatever about the measure. It is not asking very much to request that this Bill shall stand over until the hon. gentleman who has charge of it can explain its provisions; the House is entitled to that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I suggest that exception might be made for this Bill, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman who has charge of it has gone on a semi-public function; he is attending the funeral of the late Hon. Mr. Gibson, and he did not intend to return here this week. As this is a Bill which is initiated in this Chamber, it has to pass through the remaining stages, and go to the House of Commons. Now we have the explanation from the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. McHugh) that the measure is based on the error or neglect of somebody to pay the fees in proper time. These demands for private Bills on patents are based on a certain number of facts that are recited in the petition. They can be tested in committee, and in this House we have to be content with the declarations which the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill may make. The verification of those facts can only take place in committee, and it seems to me that this Chamber will be fully made aware of the facts on a report from the committee, and may decide then if the reasons given in support of this demand are sufficient to justify the House in passing this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No explanation is ever made to this House when a Bill is reported.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But I do not know of such a Bill having ever been stopped on the second reading. When the member in charge of a Bill such as this did give some kind of explanation as to why the Bill was promoted by him, the Bill was allowed to go to the committee in order that not only the facts would be verified, but the sufficiency of the reasons advanced could be weighed and decided upon. We will not be very much more advanced if we postponed the Bill for a week, since we are told by the member from Victoria, Ont. (Hon. Mr. McHugh) the reason as is given in the petition.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has quite misunderstood Senator McHugh's remarks. He made no remarks in reference to this particular Bill at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I understood him to state that he had read the petition.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—No; what he said was with reference to the question generally, not with reference to this Bill. This particular Bill, like most of the Bills which come before this House, is asking that a patent be renewed. From the Bill itself it is evident that the first payment—that is, the first third of the eighteen years, the first six years payment—was made, and that, then, through carelessness or otherwise—whatever the cause may be, I have not heard—about a year and three months passed after the time the second payment should have been made: now they ask for a renewal. Well, I admit that this particular renewal is being asked for earlier, after the patent has elapsed, than many that come before this House. This House and the Private Bills Committee of this House have been passing, and recommending the Senate to reinstate patents that have been void for years. There has been no bona fide reason given, within my knowledge, why a patent should be renewed in such case. A man takes out a patent which gives him certain rights; through carelessness of himself or others, he loses those rights. In many cases the application for the renewal is made after the development of some other individual's idea, or after finding that, because of conditions or circumstances, the patent if revived would be valuable, and would give control to the original holder, so that out of it he would likely make some money. Now what ground is that for the Parliament of Canada to decide that we shall vest that right in him? If he got a payment of $100 for some specific reason and had it in his pocket, and through some circumstance lost it six months after, would the House vote him another $100 to reimburse him? There would be far more reason for doing that than to vest in him a patent which at one time he controlled, but which, through reasons known to himself and not known generally to this House, he had lost. No matter whether the reasons are good or bad, I have always taken the ground that this House has no right to vest in an individual something that he has lost, unless it is shown that the loss was because of conditions absolutely beyond his control, and in spite of the best effort he could make to retain that right. If he has lost the right through some technical reason—the fault of the department through which the patents are cared for—that would be a reason, and we would have a right under such circumstances to consider renewing it; but no such case has come before this House since I have been in it. Further, in the ten years, more or less, that I have been here, at least seven-tenths of all the patents that have been renewed here, were patents that had been taken out in Canada by foreigners. There appeared to be no particular value in their Canadian patent and they allowed it to lapse. Later on, for some reason or other, they found that the patent would probably be valuable, and they came back to Canada and asked us to renew the patent, and time and time again we have done so. Can any hon. gentleman in this House give a single instance in which a Canadian has ever got a patent renewed in any other country in the world?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—No.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—No; such a thing has never been done; such a thing is an absolute impossibility in any country I know of outside of Canada. The United States, Great Britain, France, Germany and the principal countries of the world have what is called the 'Convention (Patent System).' I have frequently suggested to this House that Canada should also be within that convention of legislation, which makes the laws with reference to patents similar. The joining of such would be an advantage to the people of Canada, but for some reason the Government of Canada have not acted on the suggestion, and Canadians have been placed at a very considerable disadvantage for years. For instance, if you are going to take out a patent in Canada, and you desire that that patent should also be taken out in the United States, if you are a Canadian you must first go to the United States and make your application. If you make the first application in your own country, the laws of the other nations are such, within the arrangement referred to, that you would be unable to take the patent out there, because you had first applied in your own country, seeing Canada is not a member of the Federation. There are various conditions in connection with this, which are a disadvantage to the people of Canada. There is this fact, that it is an absolute impossibility to get before the Congress of the United States, or the Parliament of Great Britain, France, or Germany or any of the principal nations which are interested in patents in Canada, a request even to renew a patent which you had allowed to lapse. Yet I am within the limit in saying that, within the last ten years, eight-tenths of all the patents that have tied up in some cases very important devices which would be to the general interest of Canada if they were open to our people, have been in the hands of foreigners, who found they could make some money. These men came to Canada and got what they would be unable to even ask for in any other country. Hence this House of Parliament continues from time to time to get requests for the renewal of patents that have been dead for five, six, seven or even eight years. It is an outrage on the people of Canada to give these renewals, and it ought not to be done unless evidence is placed before this House showing that it is necessary to do justice to the man by renewing his patent. Under no other conditions should this House renew a patent for anybody, either Canadian or otherwise.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I know nothing about this particular Bill more than that I took it up and looked at it, when the Orders of the Day were called. This Bill is being treated very differently from that of any similar Bill that has come before this House. I do not mind, personally, whether this matter is put off for a few days, but I would like to ask those who find objection to giving this Bill second reading, what information the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill can give more than the House now has? These affidavits and declarations as to the cause of neglect of payment are submitted to the committee; I do not think there is any rule that would prevent any hon. member of the House from asking to see those, before concurring in the report of the committee in case they recommend the passing of the Bill. As to what the hon. senator from Toronto (Hon. Sir Lyman Melvin Jones) has said about foreigners taking out patents in Canada, his remarks have no application to this Bill, because on looking over it I see that the applicant, in this case, is a citizen of the city of Toronto, and consequently a resident of the Dominion of Canada. I may add that there is always a saving clause put in to protect the rights of any one who has done anything under this patent during the time that it has elapsed, so that any one who has taken advantage of the lapse is protected.

Hon. Mr. RATZ—I do not wish to delay this discussion in any way, but I am a member of that committee, and while I agree with what the hon. member from Victoria, Ontario (Hon. Mr. McHugh), has said, and will vote that this Bill be granted, at the same time I agree with the hon. member from Toronto (Hon. Sir Lyman Melvin Jones) that our patent laws are very lenient. The charges made by the Canadian Government are so moderate that any person wanting to take out a patent could make the second payment before six years expired. They can pay the fee and make the patent good at any time if they so desire. At the same time I should like to see the law changed so that no person hereafter, who has allowed his patent to lapse, shall have it reinstated. That would be a good law and the proper thing to do, unless in a case where the error was committed by the department. If a patent right lapses through the fault of the Government officials, that is a different thing. I do not see why this Bill could not be laid over until to-morrow. If any hon. member wants to get information he should be given an opportunity to find it. I do not believe that he could, but at the same time he should be given that chance. We have lost more time here to-day discussing this matter than if the order had been discharged and allowed to stand until to-morrow. If there is any information to be got overnight why not postpone the second reading until to-morrow?

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH.

SECRET COMMISSIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved the second reading of Bill (F-3), An Act to amend the Secret Commissions Act, 1909.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Explain.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—As I have objected myself to the second reading of a private Bill without some explanation, I should not ask for the second reading of this public measure without giving the reasons why I have brought it before the House. This is rather an important Bill as hon. gentlemen can see for themselves if they look at the details. I have said it is rather important: I should say it is a very important Bill to the people of this country. Its object is to put a stop to a system of graft and petty bribery that has grown up, not only in this country, but all over the world. I refer to the tipping evil. Where and how it originated I am not prepared to say, except that, going back to the early history of England, I find that the Roman magnates, after the conquest, when they went abroad sent a man ahead of them distributing pennies from a sack to the crowd. How it has grown to its present proportions I cannot say. However, the evil is here and and it is high time that something was done to put a stop to it. I venture to say that 90 per cent of the people of Canada are opposed to the prevailing system of petty graft. Any one travelling who does not meet the demands of these highwaymen, who hold them up, is subjected to very unpleasant consequences, and would rather pay than be subjected to the sneers of those who look for tips. The purpose of this Bill is to put a stop to all that. The system in itself has a demoralizing effect on the people who accept tips, because it is simply pauperizing them. If waiters in hotels and cafes, and porters on railway trains, are not paid adequately for their services, their employers should increase their wages. Any one who patronizes a hotel, or a restaurant, or a pullman car pays all that the service he gets is worth. Travelling on a pullman car costs one about $4 a day and why should any one be expected to pay extra to make up the wages of the company's employees. When we go into a grocery store to buy groceries we never expect to tip the grocer's clerk. It is the same when we make purchases in a drug store or a shoe store. Then why should employees in cafes, or on trains be granted this special privilege of collecting tips? The thing is illogical, and nonsensical to all but those who receive the tips. The evil has grown to such proportions that it is time to put a stop to it. Other countries are grappling with the problem, notably some of the neighbouring states and Switzerland. I am assured on good authority that the amount of money paid in tips every year in the United States is about $80,000,000, or about eighty cents per head of the population. The proportion paid in this country in the same way amounts to as much as would provide the subsidy of one of our provinces. Any one who travels a great deal must spend not less than $500 a year in tips. This money comes out of the pockets of men who cannot afford to spend it in that way. They are robbing their families to the extent that they give tips. With the money exacted from them in that way they might take their families on pleasure trips or buy them luxuries. Before introducing this Bill, I thought it would be well to get some idea of public opinion on this question. I knew that such legislation was very popular wherever it had been adopted. I gave copies of my Bill to newspapers and others in order to find out how they viewed it, and the question has been taken up by the press from one end of the country to the other. I have read scores of articles on the subject all favourable to this legislation. From a large number of clippings I shall read a few. The Toronto Telegram sent out a reporter to interview residents of the city and find out what they thought of it, and here are some of the expressions of opinion:

'Away with all Tipping, an Inhuman, Insulting Evil'—Toronto Business Men give their Opinion on the Advisability of Criminal Prosecution to stop Time-honoured Practice—Travellers would do away with it.

'Why, if I had my way I'd send them all to jail or hang them. Probably I wouldn't do that either, but I'd do something,' laughingly remarked Superintendent Beck of the Union station this morning when the Telegram spoke to him with regard to the proposed legislation making it a criminal offence to give or receive a tip. 'Personally,' continued Mr. Beck, 'I think it nothing but a nuisance and certainly something should be done.'

The Telegram pointed out to Mr. Beck that a lot of tipping was going on right 'under his nose,' particularly where the 'red caps' were concerned. The superintendent did not know of any remedy unless an Act were passed making it unlawful.

Senator T. O. Davis, of Prince Albert, is the man who has started the trouble. He will introduce a motion in the Senate at Ottawa providing for an amendment to the Criminal Code making it illegal to give a tip or to receive one in Canada. He aims the Act at the hotel proprietors and railway companies and expects that when employees are deprived of their tips that fair wages will be given them. In this manner the senator intimates that many attendants, whom one meets on a journey, are underpaid and dependent on tips to gain a proper livelihood.

Thinks Bill splendid.

'I think that the Bill is a splendid one and that it deserves hearty support,' said a prominent commercial traveller when interviewed at one of the hotels. 'Not that I believe in being stingy,' he added. 'But just look at the number of people who use the trains and have only moderate means. Why they can get no service from the attendant because the moment a train comes in the employees rush for the baggage of the people who show signs of frequently giving tips. The person who is not so fortunate as to be able to afford tips is left to potter about as best he can. I certainly think that it should at least be enforced on railways, in hotels and also in restaurants. Employees should get enough money to sustain themselves in a proper manner without tips. Why should their wages be paid by another poor beggar who is struggling to keep up a good appearance himself?' concluded the traveler as he stamped away to buy a cigar.

Away with Tipping.

'Down with tipping, the most inhuman, most embarrassing and insulting evil that we have to-day,' was the scathing comment handed out by a local business man. 'Don't you mention my name,' he added. 'The Lord knows suffragettes are bad enough but what would happen to me if these waitresses ever discovered that I was opposed to tipping! Spare me their withering glances.'

Practically everybody interviewed by the Telegram was in favour of doing away with the system of tipping. All were careful that their names should be kept out of print and that no waitresses or hungry attendants were near.

One man was just issuing from the Union station when he bumped into the scribe. The latter took the opportunity of asking him what he thought about giving tips. And there, right on the Union station steps, that traveller delivered such a speech on the question of tips that the reporter felt assured he must have been tendered the key of the city. At any rate he seemed to have the key to the tipping problem.

He'd tip them.

'Why, just think of it. There's a little rascal that I meet at my home station and within the past month I've tipped him a dozen times. The other morning I had no change and when I came along this morning he grasped the baggage of another man and allowed me to carry my own. In future I'm going to tip them but it won't be with money,' said the traveller.

City barbers who work on commission and many employees who come in contact with the general public feel alarmed over the introduction of the Bill in the Senate and they fear that their main source of revenue will slip away.

The Telegram found but one place where the system was approved of:

The reason of tipping.

'Why tipping is all right; we have always allowed our girls to take tips,' replied the manager of a well-known Yonge street café to the reporter's query. 'Oh! we like it,' added two of the waitresses who were standing near the cashier's desk. One girl told the Telegram that she got about $5 a week in tips besides her salary. 'Why, I couldn't live on salary alone,' said she. 'I only get eight dollars a week.'

The following is an editorial article in the Markdale Standard of February 4:

Tipping the torment of travel.

Tipping is one of the nuisances of travel. One seems to be almost perpetually plunging down into his trousers' pocket to soothe the itching palm of somebody on train or in hotels or city barber shops. In the United States they are fighting the evil thing. Some time ago a senator slapped a waiter bang in the face. He was arrested, of course, and humiliated by being sent to the cells. But the judge who tried the case, while imposing a fine, complimented the senator as a noble pioneer in the art of self-defence. The porters in the Pullmans will awaken you at night to search for your shoes, to develop a pretext for the tip. They begin to lay seige just before the terminal, when they produce their tormenting little whisks and brush your dust off on your neighbour, you probably all smiles with your heart in hot rebellion. It does not seem so very bad to see a coloured man take a tip, but the other day we got a shock like the one that almost killed father, when seeing a white Pullman conductor on the tipping line. After the shock subsided we thought he wasn't all white. At Hamilton a porter grabbed two grips and hastened to the railway platform. One owner came along and handed over a quarter. The second drew up a moment latter, and it was another. This was reaping a harvest. When one pays from fifty cents to a dollar a meal, and that for several days, as many travellers do, and has to pay a surtax of twenty-five cents each sitting in order to get proper attention, the disturbance ensuing is not very conducive to delightful digestion. On the other hand, there are many students who take this method of raising funds. Knowing this, your heart relaxes. But to be held up by bandit smiles, knowing your money is likely later to contribute to the gaiety of a 'craps' session, you feel it is an imposition from which companies ought to preserve their patrons.

I have also received letters from prominent gentlemen in various parts of Canada congratulating me on having brought up this question. Here are some of them:

Kingston, March 3, 1914.

The Hon. T. O. Davis,
Ottawa.

Dear sir,—While I do not know you personally, I cannot help just sending you a line offering my heartiest congratulations and also of all my friends for the very clever and able Bill you are introducing, making it a criminal offence for giving or accepting tips. This is one of the best Bills ever going on record and is also, I believe, one of the most popular, and I only pray from the bottom of my heart that you will be successful and push it through to a successful issue. I am one who knows the very great annoyance of tips, as I have to do so much travelling, and every one travelling will appreciate you in this Act. I think with the travelling public you are about the most popular member in the Senate.

Make it strong so that people will be afraid to evade it in any way, and if you do it will only be a short time until the whole rotten system is entirely wiped out. Wishing you every success and apologizing for the few remarks.

I remain yours very truly,

Dear Senator,—I was delighted to read in last night's paper your opinion on that universal nuisance of tipping and sincerely hope you will be successful in passing such as to do away with it. I would gladly gather petitions to help you if necessary to accomplish in passing that law.

Why! it has actually become unbearable, a lot of us would not like to live up to that so-called ethic, but one is looked upon by that tipping fraternity' as a 'cheap skate' if he does not come through with his two 'bits' or a dime at least according to the occasion, and believe me many of us can't afford it, but it's the 'style' and habit and of course we poor devils have to live up to it.

Wishing you success in your efforts,
I beg to remain,
Yours for a 'tipless people,'

Dear Sir,—As one who uses the railways and hotels a great deal, may I say that you will have a very large number of well-wishers to the Bill that you intend to introduce this week.

Not only is the tipping custom an abomination to the traveller, but the recipient must always be unmanned. The open palm is altogether too common, and in many cases I have known those who could ill afford to be tipping constantly who have suffered a good deal in regard to the kind of service they should receive.

Yours with all good wishes,

Dear sir,—I have not the honour of your acquaintance, but I just want to congratulate you on having sufficient nerve to introduce a Bill as per enclosed clipping. This tipping business appears to me as the starting point of all boodling and crooked business. It is almost impossible for the small person, who cannot afford to hand out money freely for nothing, to get along, and I think, Mr. Senator, if you can put a measure through that will make it a criminal offence for any one to receive or offer any consideration to the servant or servants of other people, you certainly will deserve the thanks of the people of Canada.

Yours very truly,

Senator T. O. Davis,

My dear Senator:

I think you deserve to be congratulated on bringing up the Bill we read so much of in the papers. You know that I do a great deal of travelling and the tipping nuisance is becoming worse all the time and there is no disguising the fact that we practically one and all dislike being held up for services not rendered. It is bad enough when we actually receive some services for the gratuity, but most of us know that nine times out of ten there is no service at all rendered and the tip is really a hold up as the non-tipper is almost invariably made to feel very keenly his position. I was present with a party at the Alexandra Hotel in Winnipeg when the bill came to something like $6.50, the change was 50 cents which was left for the waiter. The waiter hurried after the guest (and by the way it was not myself, though I was one of the party) and said the change had been forgotten. Of course this was said in such a manner that it made all the party feel rather small. It so happened that this guest was indirectly connected with the hotel and he reported the waiter with the result that he made ample apologies next day, but this is one of the exceptional cases and it is very seldom that there is any redress in the matter.

I believe you will have the heartfelt sympathy of the whole community if you succeed in putting through this Bill, and as I understand such Acts have been passed in other places, I suppose such is possible here. At any rate I wish you every success.

Yours truly,
A. O. White.

It appears to be the general opinion all over Canada that this tipping nuisance should be stopped. There was a time when a tip of five or ten cents was considered reasonable, but now it costs one about seventy-five cents to even get inside a hotel. A gentleman of my acquaintance travelled to Winnipeg in a chair car. When he got near his destination the porter made a rush at him with his whisk. On the journey the porter had not paid the slightest attention to him or done anything for his comfort, but as soon as the journey was coming to an end he made an effort to extract a twenty-five cent tip from him. At the station he handed his grip to one of the red caps and had to pay him twenty-five cents to carry it into the station, and from there he had to carry it himself to the hotel. When he got there he had to pay the bellboy twenty-five cents to take it to his room. Then he asked the boy for a pitcher of water. The bellboy disappeared—they have the system organized—and took very good care that another boy brought up the water. That necessitated the payment of another tip. After drinking the water he went downstairs to get a newspaper and when he returned to his room and wanted another drink he found that the chambermaid had emptied the pitcher. He had to send for another and pay another twenty-five cent tip. It is simply organized graft. You find it everywhere. You go to a place on Bank street to get your boots cleaned, and you find there are two registers, one to record the regular charges for the service and the other to record the tips. The boy who cleans your boots does not get your tip. The thing is farmed out. There are people paying for the right to fleece the public in some of the larger hotels. They carry on their operations in the cloak rooms and other places. Instead of paying their employees proper wages these hotels look to the public to furnish enough in tips to make up their wages. Somebody may attempt to defend the system by arguing that this Bill tends to interfere with the freedom of the people. and that any man who wants to tip should be at liberty to do so, as nobody is compelled to pay a tip. But no man should be allowed to do what is bad for his fellow men; he should give up his right for the good of the many. The evil is this: It may be all right for a millionaire to hand out tips, but how does it affect the poor man? He cannot get any service whatever although he is paying for it, unless he hands out tips; and if he does not tip it is because he has not the money and cannot afford it. I have seen a porter on a railway at Toronto station making a rush to take a little grip from a man, while two old women with big grips were allowed to carry them out themselves. He never paid the slightest attention to them at all. I took these fellows who are looking for tips. Those who have done a lot of travelling can confirm what I say. No one need tell me that business cannot be carried on without tipping. In London there is a tipless hotel and it is well patronized.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Does the hon. gentleman say there is no tipping in England?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—There is, but as I have said there is one hotel where it is not allowed, and that hotel is doing a very prosperous business.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—My experience has been to the contrary.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Here is a newspaper editorial from which I quote the following:

Oh, for a tipless world.

Senator Tom Davis, of Prince Albert, will have many with him in principle, in his proposal for legislation in Canada to abolish tipping. It is when he comes to putting his proposal into concrete form that the difficulties will arise. His idea is that an amendment to the Criminal Code should be adopted prescribing punishment for tips, and making both the tipper and the tipped equally guilty. How such an amendment is to be enforced, and who are to enforce it, he does not even indicate.

In the United States those energetic and cheery travellers who used to be known as the 'knights of the grip' recently met in national conclave and condemned the gratuity with all the force of formal resolutions and a blood-sealed oath, and as a result there is on record the case of one commercial traveller who made a tour of 6,000 miles without giving a tip and without the slightest inconvenience thereby. His case must be exceptional, for such is the condition of affairs on this continent, whether it be in the United States or Canada, that it requires moral courage of truly heroic proportions to omit the sacred rite of greasing the waiter's palm, and things get worse instead of better.

Not so in London, where the tipless hotel flourishes and where the movement has gained such an impetus that there are now some 500 eating places that announce 'No gratuities.' The proprietor of the largest of London's tipless hotels plans to erect another of a thousand rooms in the heart of the visitors' quarter—and for an obvious reason. Holidays do not diminish the takings of this tipless hotel, and hard times do not diminish its dividends. It is the only hotel in London that is full the year round. Accommodation has often to be booked a month in advance. The tipless hotel is a convenience to the travelling public, and consequently an excellent business venture. When hotel managers on this side realize that they may increase their custom by offering a tipless service for which there is a steady and dependable demand, then the travelling public may get relief from promiscuous alms-giving. Meanwhile we are afraid there is little to hope from the well-meaning efforts of Senator Tom Davis and other legislators.

The largest hotel in the city of St. Louis is a tipless hotel, which was just started recently. They have put signs up 'No tips allowed.' People say 'You may put this on the statute book, but it will not have any effect.' True, there are some people who will evade the law, but at the same time such notice will ensure courteous treatment to every person travelling on the railway, because employees will be afraid of being punished. It would not be a bad thing to provide in the Railway Act that the railway companies should put notices in the cars 'No tipping allowed.' The matter should be taken up by the provinces, and when a hotel license is granted, there should be a provision embodied in the license that no tipping should be allowed in the hotel. It should also be carried down to the municipalities, and in granting a license for a café they introduce something in their by-laws to provide against this very thing. We have to make a start, and this is as good a time as any other. Tipping has grown to enormous proportions, and it is hard to say where it will stop. The ordinary man will soon not be able to travel, unless he has a pocketful of money. I am satisfied that ninety per cent of the people of this country are in favour of this measure, from the Atlantic to the Pacific; it is time such a provision should be placed on the statute book.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—While I have much sympathy with the object my hon. friend has in view, because I believe it will tend to reduce the high cost of living, at the same time he is endeavouring to build a fence around the lambs, which will turn out to be worse than a barbed wire fence, and which will have the effect of jailing or penalizing these lambs to the extent of $200 for very little. Take for instance the case of the poor man, for whom my hon. friend expressed sympathy. The poor farmer's hired man driving a wagon to the city gives my hon. friend a lift; my hon. friend may not know that he is a hired man; when he reaches the end of his journey my hon. friend, who is a generous man, would likely give him a quarter or fifty cents.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is far-fetched, and does not apply.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—Under this Bill both my hon. friend and the man who accepted the bribe are liable to this punishment.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Guess again.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We will thresh out the framework of the Bill in committee. We are not trying to get at that class of men at all.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—While I have a certain amount of sympathy with the object my hon. friend has in view, the Bill he has prepared is so wide that it is going to affect people who are in employment and in places which he does not need to touch; until the Bill can be got down to the places which he himself only means to have affected, it surely should not be passed.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I am entirely in sympathy with the object the hon. gentleman has in view with this Bill. Every man should pay once, but there is no law of God or man that he should pay twice. When you are served in a restaurant or hotel, you first pay for what you get, and then pay the man who gives it to you The real cause of the whole system of tipping is brought about by the selfishness of the rich man who goes into the hotel and thinks it is nothing for him to pay a dollar bill and have servants dance attendance upon him. People who cannot afford to pay the dollar bill have to wait until their turn comes. If you analyse the whole thing, that is what it comes to. It is perfectly sound legislation to curb that practice wherever you can, but I have some doubt as to whether this Bill embodies a complete way of dealing with the matter. I am prepared to make the suggestion later on that an alternative be given to the people who give a public service, hotel, restaurant, barber shop, and so on, that if tips are allowed they publish the scale of tips they wlil allow to be collected.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They will not do that.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton)—I venture to say you will not find many of those scales of tips put up. Take the Ocean Steamship Company; If a man dare to leave a steamer without paying $5 for this and for the other thing they would chase him up the wharf and hold on till they got it. These men receive very small salaries from companies like the White Star Line, which has never paid less than 100 per cent dividend, and in the meantime the companies pay their employees starvation salaries, leaving them to get their wages out of the public. The same conditions are found in the hotels. I was in a hotel in the United States, and there was a sort of indignation meeting there about the treatment of the hotel as to the maids, who were supposed to be paid $5 a week, and to get all they could of the guests of the hotel; so that after paying well for your hotel accommodation you would find you had to settle up with the servants. If it is possible to check that evil, I would be glad to accept suggestions as to the means.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I wish to compliment my hon. friend from the far West upon this Bill. It is a truly democratic measure. In a country where manhood suffrage exists, all men should be on a level, and one class should not be subservient to another. Begging publicly, surreptitiously or any other way, is degrading to the class that resorts to it. It is moral degradation. In this country all men should stand on an equal footing; nobody should be permitted to go begging alms or showing an inferiority which might have existed, which did exist when there were castes in this country, when there were servants, slaves and masters. Such a thing does not obtain in true democracy, especially in a country like ours where all men are equal before the law. This Bill does not propose any revolution but merely a modification in a serious matter of education, which is certainly hard to bring about, as all reforms of abuses are. But it is worth making an attempt. I would not endorse the Bill as it is at present framed, but when it comes to committee we will be able to devise some means by which initiative may be taken. The result of this should be to diminish, and possibly to do away with an evil practice—I call it a social plague—and benefit will follow, if it is only prohibited in public places, say on government railways, where it has become a nuisance of enormous gravity. At hotels and on railways and steamships we have to pay about ten per cent above the legitimate cost for anything we get, the effect of which is to degrade manhood and womanhood. The cause of the suffragette is progressing, and womanhood will be affected in the same way. I greatly sympathize with my hon. friend on account of the predicament he was in and which he narrated to us, where, for a drink of water he had to undergo the ordeal he described. This recalls an incident which happened in the other House, modifying the saying 'wine, women and graft.' In this case it is graft, accompanied by the degradation of manhood and womanhood. Our legislation should tend towards the elevation of all classes, but more especially the class which happens to be at the service of others—not because, in many instances, it is morally or intellectually inferior—but because that class is poorer. The hotelkeepers, the government railway managers, and people who conduct public institutions, should help the Parliament of Canada in putting an end to this most deplorable habit, the effect of which is to lower the standard of a very large and important portion of the community.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second reading Bill (B-3) 'An Act to amend the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, as respects the Senate of Canada.'

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It was brought to my attention that a question might be raised when the motion for the second reading of the Bill was made, as to whether this House had the power to deal with the Civil Service Act, on the ground that it involved a question of finance. That being brought to my attention, I decided in the meantime, to postpone the motion for the second reading. I have looked into the matter, and have consulted legal authorities and been advised that an objection to the Bill on that ground ought not to be entertained. I would like hon. members of the House to look into the question, so that when the point of order is raised, they will be in a position to discuss it. I move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that it be placed on the Order Paper for Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day was postponed accordingly.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE RAILWAY BILL.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE moved that when the Senate adjourns on Friday, 8th inst., it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock p.m.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I have no desire to oppose the motion, but I wish to consult the House on another matter which the adjournment to the evening need not affect if the members will co-operate with me. In consultation with the Chairman of the Joint Committee that is considering Bill (B-2) with reference to the Railway Act, we decided to call a meeting of the Joint Committee on Tuesday at 12 o'clock. He wished to call it earlier, but consented to make it 12 o'clock so that our friends on that committee, who will be coming in on the forenoon train, would have an opportunity of being present at the first meeting of the Joint Committee. I would, therefore, ask that the members of the committee who may go home on Friday evening would make an effort to be here for that first meeting. One of the matters that we will have to consider is the quorum to be fixed by the Senate Committee for the Senate side; the quorum for the Commons side has been already fixed by that part of the committee. We will also have to fix the quorum of the Joint Committee. There may, also, be other business, such as fixing days of meeting, possibly a mode of procedure, and possibly place of meeting, and so on. I am asking that whether this motion be agreed to or not, the members of this special committee will kindly endeavour to be present for that first meeting, even though it may be a little inconvenient.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how many members of the House of Commons are on the committee?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Speaking from memory I think it is some 28.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And how many from the Senate?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Fourteen.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—How are you going to make a quorum?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Each separate committee makes its own quorum. The Commons members have put their quorum down very small, down to 9 I think; that is my information. We on the Senate side, would fix our quorum in proportion to our number, and then the quorum of the Joint Committee would likely have to be fixed as well.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not understand the hon. member when he speaks of a Joint Committee. There is no Joint Committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Well, the Concurrent Committee. It may be that technically I am wrong.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Then there would be no occasion to name a quorum of a Joint Committee when there is no Joint Committee; there would be a quorum of each committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is a matter that the Concurrent Committee would have to deal with.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—If that is all the business to be brought before that committee at its meeting on Tuesday next, we could carry it over, because all this work will have to be done over again next session.

The motion was agreed to.

Bill (H-2), An Act for the relief of Georgina Beatrice Boyd.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (C-3), An Act respecting a certain Patent of Frederick Sinclair Corrigan.—Hon. Mr. Kerr.

INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL (BINDER TWINE).

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (109), An Act to amend The Inspection and Sale Act.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1.

1. The Inspection and Sale Act, chapter 85 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, is amended by repealing section 347 and substituting the following therefor:

347. Upon or attached to every ball of binder twine or offered for sale in Canada there shall be a label with the name of the dealer and the number of feet of twine per pound in the ball marked or stamped thereon.

2. Binder twine manufactured for export only and not to be used in Canada need not be so labelled. The onus of proof that any unlabelled binder twine is manufactured for export only shall rest upon the manufacturer, dealer, carrier or other person in whose possession the binder twine is found.

3. The Minister of Trade and Commerce for the time being may make such regulations as he deems necessary to prevent the sale or use in Canada of unlabelled binder twine manufactured for export only and any person violating any such regulation shall be liable upon summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, and for each subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This clause repeals section 347 of the original Act, and is substituted for it. It is now proposed to remove the restrictions as to binder twine manufactured for export.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—The difference between the two, I suppose, is that the tag, which at the present time has to be put on showing the number of feet to the pound, may now be left off.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—I should like to know the object of that provision.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The object is this: we have recognized this policy with reference to other manufacturers, that when an article is manufactured for consumption in Canada, it is very desirable that the interests of the consumer should be protected in every possible way but when manufactured for export, it is being manufactured for a market the demands of which we must leave to the foreign consumer. Those who may ask for the manufacture in our country of a product for export, desire to deal with that article without being subject to any of the restrictions which we may impose on home consumption. Moreover it seems to me it is a matter about which we should not concern ourselves, for the simple reason that we have no information in regard to what a foreign market may require as to the product which we manufacture. Furthermore, every encouragement should be given to the Canadian manufacturer in manufacturing for export; there should not be imposed upon the manufacturers restrictions such as we have imposed heretofore on export binder twine.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—When this restriction is not in force in regard to other countries competing for the same market, our manufacturers should be placed on the same footing, in the sale of their goods, as those countries. They should not be compelled to mark the pounds or yards.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—I had an idea this Parliament was very particular about our exported goods. We have had a lot of trouble and we passed laws in this Parliament compelling growers of apples to enter their fruit properly and have it graded and stamped, and we have had similar provisions with reference to the export of butter and cheese.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And hay.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—The farmers of western Canada have had to suffer immense losses through Parliament placing the standard of our wheat at least three notches above that of our competitors in the United States. Our wheat grade No. 1 is away higher than that of the United States; in fact our grade No. 3 is equivalent to grade No. 1 of United States. We have been very careful about this sort of thing. Now, I have an idea that the object of the manufacturers is to compete with American manufacturers who have been cheating. Somebody has been cheating. I asked a question of the leader of the Government, and he replied yesterday that only one manufacturer of binder twine had been fined for violating the law with respect to the length of twine in a pound. I remember very well, in 1905 or 1906, reading reports to the effect that large sums of money had been collected as fines from some persons; perhaps it was from the dealers, perhaps this twine was imported by those dealers into Canada from the United States. There is no doubt that those American manufacturers were selling us 400 feet of twine where they said there were 500 feet, and the farmers of Canada suffered large losses for years and years, and they are now sending that sort of stuff over to the Russian farmers, and our Canadian manufacturers want to meet them on their own ground. I believe that is the true reason of the offering of this Bill, and I believe our Canadian manufacturers are making a mistake if they do it. I believe if they send a genuine article, have it properly tagged, and state what it is, telling the truth about it, they will in the long run benefit by it instead of losing.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—No set of farmers in the world are shrewder than the farmers of Russia, at least if we have a fair sample of them in our western country. I know some of those farmers in the province of Alberta who go to the trouble of unwinding a ball of this twine and measuring it foot by foot to see if they get the correct measure. If these men are a fair sample of the farmers of Russia, Canadian manufacturers will lose in the long run by having this law passed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The declaration made by the leader of the Government on this question is, to my mind, an extraordinary one. He is prepared, on behalf of his Government, on behalf of Parliament, to pass a law whereby the Canadian consumer shall be protected— that is what he said—but the foreign consumer was not to have any particular attention paid to him. That is practically what he said. Well, if that statement goes out to the world at large, they will begin to inquire what kind of legislation and legislators we have in Canada. A minister of the Dominion of Canada tells Parliament that provisions are made for the protection of the Canadian consumer of a certain article, but, when the same article is placed on the market for export for foreign consumption, the Government has no particular attention to pay to those foreign consumers—let them look after themselves. I say that this proposition must not go to the country unchallenged; I say that declaration must be kept where it belongs. As the hon. senator from Alberta (Hon. Mr. Talbot) has just said, the Parliament of Canada has taken every precaution to protect the foreign consumer against fraud on the part of the apple grower, the cheesemaker and hay grower, and in the case of all other large products of the farm for export; everything has to be branded and numbered for foreign export. At home the farmer can give us poor hay, a poor barrel of apples and poor cheese; but for foreign export the laws of this country demand that the farmer shall put the best on the market. The question I have to ask is this: Why not place upon the manufacturer the same obligations that are placed upon the shoulders of the farmer? I am not opposed to the obligation placed upon the shoulder of the farmer to put the best on the foreign market; on the contrary, it keeps up the reputation and name of Canada. Why not do the same in regard to the manufacturer, who is protected? Parliament acts against the farmer who is unprotected, and after protecting the manufacturer it allows him to do as he pleases in the foreign market. That condition of things must not be introduced into legislation; it is not fair to the country, or to its name as a commercial trader with the world. I hold that the views expressed by the western members in regard to this matter are such as appeal to the common honesty of the Canadian people. We have done enough for the manufacturers without encouraging a cheating trade abroad. We have given them drawbacks and rebates. They will sell to the Canadian farmer a plough or a machine for $10 or $15 or $20 under protection, yet, they can sell the same machine in Japan or China or Australia at ten, fifteen, or twenty-five per cent less. Is there any sense in legislating in that fashion for the advancement of this country and the protection of its best interests? It has always struck me, not as a matter of surprise, but as a matter of incomprehensibility, that the farmers will vote for people who are ready now and always and in the future to place shackles on them, that are ready to place a load on their shoulders in addition to the load they have to bear in developing the interests of this country. However, they do it, they have done it, and they will do it again; but it is up to the representatives of the people to teach them to do otherwise. I hope this Parliament will see that when the Government brings down legislation, it will not be such as will hurt the trade of Canada or diminish its prestige in the foreign market.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I have had a great deal to do one way and another with discussions on the binder twine question. It was a burning question in the Northwest for many years. Binder twine is a cash article, and I am sorry to say that its use is but brief and then it goes into the flames; but it costs the farmers, of the great West especially, a large amount of money. Much effort has been put forth to find a cheaper material than sisal for the manufacture of binder twine. On investigation it was found that not only were the farmers charged excessive prices for their twine, but they were being robbed, the rolls of twine being defective in the length to the pound. The late Government, I am glad to be able to say, took the matter in hand and appointed an inspector whose business it was to travel through the Northwest, visit the dealers and investigate their stock, making a calculation as to whether it was up to market value or not, and he was empowered by the late Government to seize everything that was short in weight or length. The result has been that in the past few years we have been free from anything like a discussion on the binder twine question. I am glad to know that our faithful friend from the Northwest has not forgotten the fight through which the people passed in former years, and that he is still looking after the interests of those who are not able to protect themselves in this respect. It cannot be supposed that foreigners who are engaged in farming in our Northwest are in a position, either through their defective education or their ignorance of the country and of the sharp practices that prevail in this matter, will be protected by taking this question out of the hands of the inspector. I should like to know from the leader of the Government what has become of the inspector. Where has he gone? We have had no reports from him for two years. He may be dead and gone, but the work is still there, and inspection is still needed. It is a wrong inflicted on the people of the West if we have not somebody in office to carry out the views that have been entertained by the people generally during the last twelve or fourteen years. I should be very much pleased to think that before any change is made in this matter, that it is not the interest of the manufacturer that is to be considered, but the interests of the people throughout the country. We want to see that no injustice is done. We can get plenty of binder twine from the United States, but when it is investigated it is found to be short in weight and in the length per pound. Under the late Administration the inspector was empowered to seize everything under the standard weight and length, and confiscate it and make his report at the end of the year where his work was sustained. That was a great boon to the people all over the West and if anything is done to tamper with it, and drift back again into the same old path and sharp practices that prevailed years ago, you may depend upon it that it will be heard of when the next election comes round. There may be more said about it than is anticipated, because these people know something about this question; we cannot give them information upon it. They appreciate what was done in the past and they say let well enough alone. That is what we have to say this afternoon to the members of this House—let the people enjoy the privilege of having justice done between man and man without our introducing changes in connection with the manufacture and sale of this article. Binder twine is a very expensive part of the farming business. The farmer must pay cash for his binder twine before he can cut a sheaf in the field, and the people feel keenly on this question. If we wish to see the country prosper and the foreigners that are within our borders treated justly, we must not deprive them of the protection which they have been enjoying. It is not the middleman or the manufacturer either in the United States or Canada, that should cause us any concern; what we should do is to see that the whole business is conducted on principle of equity and justice and that we do not allow the poor and unsuspecting to be trampled under the feet of men who have No. 1 always in their eye.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—This binder twine question is a matter of very considerable interest to the people who are in touch with farming interests, and I am quite in sympathy with the farmers in respect to their needs and the right they have, under the law, to get what they pay for. I cannot say that the inspection to which the hon. gentleman referred is absolutely necessary to the interest of the farmer, because I should judge, under this Act, that in the case of every ball of binder twine a man bought, and unwound and found not in accordance with the Act, the purchaser would become an inspector himself as against the manufacturer of that particular binder twine. The penalty provided in this Bill would be enforced against the manufacturers who gave short measure. We must have a country full of inspectors; all people who use the twine have a right to invoke the law if a manufacturer fails to carry out what the law requires.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—It is not the farmers who become inspectors. It is the Government inspector who does the work, and he is the only one, as far as I know, to undertake it.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—If I had a ball of binder twine with the label on it of Senator Douglas as the manufacturer, and it had a certain length or weight marked on the ball, and I unwound it and found that the label was not right, that the ball of twine did not contain what the label said it did, I should have a cause of action against him.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—How many men are going to do that? Not one in a thousand.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I do not know how many, but the protection is in the law in regard to the farmers of Canada. With reference to the change this Bill suggests, I do not just know how the binder twine may be sold on the market in foreign countries. It would be entirely proper if I were making binder twine, and somebody agreed to buy it from me in a reel, say a thousand balls of binder twine on a big reel, I do not know that the manufacturer of binder twine should be required to put it into balls of binder twine such as he sells on the market. If I were in a foreign market, I would probably go to the manufacturer and say: 'Give me your reel with two tons of twine on it. I will take it to my country and put it in such form as will command the attention of the buyer and I will label it,' and the responsibility would be with him. I do not understand that there will be anything very serious in this measure, although the section which has been repealed was not very onerous. It did not require the man's name on it, but it did require that a label giving the contents should be placed on it. In other countries they may not put the twine up in the same form. The middleman wants to buy five tons of binder twine and have it shipped on a large reel which he could unreel and put in such form as the market might demand, or in such form as it could be sold to the best advantage.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Is this twine exported to any country except those countries in which Canadian binders are used?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I have no idea about that. I would not think that was a strong argument.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—There is only one way in which Canadian binder twine can be used in a Canadian binder, and that comes in a certain sized ball. The Canadian twine is used entirely in the countries to which Canadian binders are exported.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Could they not use half a ball?

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—They would have to unwind the other half first.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—There must be so many pounds in it. Supposing I took it over in a large reel, and there were Canadian binders in that country; instead of having the number of pounds usually put in a ball by the manufacturer in Canada, supposing I made one of two pounds less, would it work in the Canadian binder?

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—If I could do that, and my trade would demand that I should put it in that form to the better satisfaction of myself and the man who used it, I do not see why I should not be allowed to do it.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—I am somewhat surprised at the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran). I thought he posed as the friend of the labour man. This is a Bill purely in the interest of the labour man. The provision that has been referred to in reference to the produce of the farmers is purely in the interest of the farmers themselves, because these goods are inspected and put on a foreign market, and branded as Canadian products.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Why not have this the same?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—This is a different question. The manufacturer of binder twine should not be placed on any different footing from the manufacturers of other goods.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Why not?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—They should not be placed on any different footing from the manufacturers of other countries.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—You cannot see the interior of a ball of twine but you can see a shovel.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR—I am a manufacturer of goods for the Canadian market and for export, in the matter of carriage wheels. In Canada we are not obliged by law, but we are by practice, to brand all our wheels A, B, C, D and E. I receive orders from a foreign country for wheels of a special grade. They do not want them branded. They want to put on a brand of their own. I make them without those letters and ship them to the foreign country. If Russia or some foreign country wanted binder twine they might simply say 'We want binder twine, but we will label it ourselves.' They might ask to have it put on a reel, and they will put it up themselves and put their own label oit it. In this way manufacturers, if they were able to secure orders for export may be able to keep their factories running the year around, otherwise they may have to close down for 2 or 3 months every year and let their men go idle. So it is with the manufacturers of binder twine; if they cannot manufacture for export it would be a great injury to their employees. I say this Bill is purely in the interest of the working man, so long as we manufacture goods that will suit the trade of foreign countries, I think the Bill should meet with the hearty approval of every member of the House.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—It appears to me that any one who would oppose this clause has never had any experience whatever in the export trade. Why should not the foreigner be permitted to buy binder twine or anything else by the yard or foot, or ton, or in any other way in which he may buy it? The whole proposition is to get him to buy it. One hon. gentleman intimated that this was something whereby the Canadian manufacturer could cheat the importer—

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—The Canadian manufacturer can do the same as his competitors can—that must be the object of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—I think that statement to which I have referred, is pretty far-fetched.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—I can see no other object.

Hon. Mr. GORDON—Take the case of lumber, which is being sent to a foreign market, if you happen to place marks upon this lumber other than the marks which the importer demands, it will get you into an endless amount of trouble, and it will do the importer harm. I am at a loss to know why in the world any manufacturer should not be allowed to send goods of this description to a foreign country, where the importer could put his label or mark upon it as he pleased. In regard to the remarks made by the member from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran), he seeems to be under the impression that the manufacturer is going around this country seeking to devour the farmer; and as my hon. friend from Leeds (Hon. Mr. Taylor) has just said, if what he is seeking to have carried out were done, it would no doubt re-act on the manufacturer. Anything which re-acts on the manufacturer hits the labouring man, and the farmer also. In my opinion it is most absurd for any person to oppose a proposition of this nature.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—A much higher question has been presented than that one by my hon. friend from Leeds and others who have argued on this question; it is a moral question as to whether the Government and Parliament of Canada, particularly at this time, are to connive at fraud.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear; that is the point.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—To my mind it is evident that the purpose of the Bill is to enable the manufacturers to send an article of an inferior description in quantity and quality and impose it on the unfortunate moujik, who will afterwards regard every production of Canada as being stamped with fraud. I know these men and the way in which they argue, and the Canadian article will be under a disadvantage that will spread to other Canadian articles. I listened to the very specious argument of my hon. friend from Leeds (Hon. Mr. Taylor), that the labouring man is going to profit by it, but I do not agree with that view. Why, there was a manufacturer in Connecticut who some years ago sent out to the negroes in the West Indies wooden hams and wooden nutmegs, and it soon was generally stated that other goods from that country would not be received; United States goods were tabooed in the market. Such a reputation will spread over all our productions; everything Canadian will be under the ban and the condemnation of foreign nations. This sort of thing spreads from one nation to another, from one grade of society to another, from the moujik to the Greek merchant, and by-and-by Canadian products will be considered on a par and level with the productions of fraudulent United States firms. Shall we here take the responsibility for this Bill? Will my hon. friend the leader of the Government bear the responsibility of conniving at the introduction of a measure like this?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, I will take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—Will the Parliament of Canada consent to the passage of a Bill like that? We have discussed in this House the adjustment of Canadian weights and measures to an infinitesimal quantity. I heard the learned remarks offered by the hon. gentleman from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) describing that the measure of quantity in the metric system was a certain infinitesimal proportion of a radius of the earth, on a meridian of the earth, and that the length of this meridian had been ascertained by the eminent astronomer La Lande. We are anxious, in Canada, to have our measures adjusted to an infinitesimal quantity. Then again the other day, on the subject of potatoes, how we laboured over that, to get the bag to contain a certain exact quantity, and the bag to have a certain weight—all this, to eliminate the loss of an infinitesimal amount of money on the purchase of a cheap article like potatoes. The effects on the reputation of Canada, through legislation of this kind, in a great country like Russia, in Roumania, and in other countries which receive and consume these articles which we can produce—and may in future produce to excess, of even the needs of the Northwest—will be serious indeed. Therefore, we should very carefully guard this article, which is a sample of the rest of our productions, and by our votes and also our sentiments uphold the fair name of Canada in all the foreign markets of the world.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I cannot very well appreciate the importance which seems to be attached to this Bill. I know the necessity of this legislation. The law as it stands our statutes provides that all binder twine must be labelled and that the label must state the quantity contained in the ball. That law can only be enforced in this country, and the moment the twine is exported, of course, the manufacturer or the purchaser of the article is at perfect liberty to remove the label and sell the twine without any representation at all. Therefore, I fail to see the importance of having binder twine intended for export labelled, because the label would not be of any consequence the moment that the twine passes across the Canadian frontier. Then the law concerning it would cease to be enforceable, and the tags may be easily removed. It has been argued that it is incumbent upon us to protect the citizens of this country, and that we are doing so by this legislation, as we have done it in other cases. This distinction, however, must be made—that when we are dealing with such articles as cheese or butter, a very large number of people may suffer by the sale of an inferior article; hence the necessity of our protecting the purchasers at large in this country in order that the article may maintain its merits and may command a better price. I understand there is very little binder twine manufactured in this country; in any case the manufacture is within the hands of a very few people. If it is to their interest to get rid of the necessity of labelling binder twine manufactured for export, nobody in this country is interested to the contrary. For my part I can see no objection to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—The discussion so far deals more particularly with sub-clause two, but in sub-clause one there is one matter I would like to have explained, and to see if it could not be changed for the benefit of the farmers generally. It says:

347. Upon or attached to every ball of binder twine sold or offered for sale in Canada there shall be a label with the name of the dealer and the number of feet of twine per pound in the ball marked or stamped thereon.

Now what should be required is the name of the manufacturer. I do not see why it is not the name of the manufacturer. A manufacturer will send twine out to only a very few dealers, apparently. A merchant in a small town where the farmers of the locality would buy perhaps two or three tons of twine is not going to have his name and a label affixed. The tendency is to make more middlemen; if those smaller merchants could buy directly from the manufacturer it would be much better. One of the causes of the high cost of living about which we hear, is the increased number of middlemen. The word 'manufacturer' instead of the word 'dealer' if inserted here would save some middlemen.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Move to amend the Bill.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—No, I want to have it explained.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—The object of the law, when it was originally made some years ago, was to get beyond the manufacturer, because a large proportion of the twine used in Canada is not manufactured in Canada. It must be very evident to every member of the House that, if the law were changed to cover only the manufacturer, you would have to go out of Canada to make the law operative, which would be impossible.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—What percentage of the binder twine used in Canada is manufactured in Canada?

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—I should think eighty per cent of all the binder twine sold in Canada is manufactured outside of Canada at the present time. Some years ago a very large percentage of the binder twine used in Canada was made in Canada.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Then would it not do to say, 'manufacturer or importer?'

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—I shall come to that in a minute. Binder twine, as almost everybody knows, is on the free list, and any one who makes it in Canada makes it to compete equally with any maker in the world. Because of that, the Government of Canada when they decided to put it on the free list, enacted that every kind of material going into buildings for its manufacture erected in Canada, should be on the free list, and also that all kinds of machinery used in its manufacture, and everything in connection with binder twine making in Canada should be free. Thus, so far as it is possible, it has been made cheap by the Government, when they put it on the free list. As every one will recognize, the object was that, as this was an important article to the most important industry in Canada, it should be made as cheap as it was possible to make it. When you come to consider the question of the dealer, the object of the law was to bring the dealer directly responsible to his customer, if he sold him an article that was not up to the standard; therefore the farmer living in Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba buying his twine assuredly, or almost assuredly, from the dealer in one of the provinces, doubtless in one of the villages near him, would have a right of action against a man that was near without trouble and cost. Therefore the clause gives to the user of the twine the best possible protection he could have.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What about the dealer?

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—If you will allow me to state the case as I understand it, I shall answer any question put to me; there is no object in interrupting, unless you say something. The dealer who purchases from the maker or from the wholesaler, has the right to go back for his protection to the man from whom he bought. Therefore the dealer was the proper man for the farmer to look to, if he found he did not get what he was promised. That was the most convenient way for him to get his protection, and it will appeal to every one that that was desirable. Then I want to point out this difference further, that the dealer covers the manufacturer:

when the manufacturer makes a sale he becomes a dealer.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Are the names of those different dealers on the twine ?

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—No, but the farmer will know the name of the dealer from whom he purchases his twine.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—But that dealer's name is very seldom on it.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—No doubt the jobber's name will not be on it, but it is almost impossible to consider that there would be a case where the farmer, the user of the twine, would make his purchase from a dealer whose name he did not know. I do not think it would be possible to get closer than that. If you undertake to make the manufacturer put the dealer's name on, you will defeat the object of the Bill in this way—the manufacturer cannot make 150 pounds for Tom Jones and 200 pounds for Dick Smith, and so on, because he does not know who the dealer will be. Take the binder twine business in western Canada, and gentlemen in western Canada know that a very large proportion of it centres in two people in Winnipeg, and that many dealers get, from Winnipeg, binder twine for customers in their vicinity. That is just as common as it is to buy sugar or nails; that is the way the country is supplied. In the earlier years binder twine was sold largely —almost exclusively—by dealers in agricultural implements. To-day that is not so except in the case of manufacturers of implements as well as of binder twine—and that only refers to one foreign company doing business in Canada, the International Harvester Company. Many hon. gentlemen know that that company is the largest maker of twine in the world. It almost as much as all the other makers in the world. Its only important competitor, if indeed it is not the only competitor in the United States, is the Plymouth Cordage Company. These two companies largely control the purchase of sisal in the countries in which it is grown, and those who have followed this question will know that whenever either of these two companies name a price for binder twine in the United States, the other company names a similar price, and that price is maintained throughout the season in the United States. Now in Canada we have, at present, I think, only one binder twine mill running. We had three, but two are closed—the Peterborough mill and one of the two at Brantford—because the competition of these two companies controlling the sisal market and controlling the price of binder twine in the United States and largely influencing and controlling it in the world, places the binder-twine manufacturers in Canada in a very awkward position. They are unable, as a rule, to go into the market with their comparatively limited capital and make purchases of material large enough to carry them through the year; they fear that conditions may arise which would put the price where it would squeeze them to buy raw material. Some hon. gentlemen know, I am sure, that in former years some purchases were made by the binder twine companies from which they had large returns. I have in mind one company in Canada that one year paid a dividend of 80 per cent on the total paid-up capital. The company paid that dividend because it was fortunate in making a large purchase at a time when the price of the raw material was low. The price rose and they made a very large profit and paid the eighty per cent dividend I have mentioned, yet within three years they were bankrupt, because the conditions were adverse for two years in succession.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—May I ask whether that condition did not arise from the fact that, in the Philippine island, they put an embargo on exportations of sisal to other countries than the United States?

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—When the United States Government got control of the Philippine islands they put an embargo on all hemps. Hemps, of course, are not exclusively grown in the Philippines. They are grown in some of the South American states, and to some considerable extent in the south of Europe states. In Egypt, the British Government, for the protection of the people of Great Britain desiring to use this class of fibre, has spent large sums of money to encourage the cultivation and growth of fibres of that nature, and it is being grown there successfully. Therefore the difficulty that countries, other than the United States laboured under, after the United States became interested in the Philippine islands have disappeared, and the situation is levelling itself up because of the possibility of growing fibrous material largely in other countries than the Philippines. The difficulty in Canada, and the difficulty that this Bill is intended to overcome, is simply this: in Canada a man may make his binder twine but under the law he is not permitted to offer it for sale and deliver it to a foreigner. If he could make it and export it and then sell it, he could get from under the law, but that is an impossibility. As I understand the Bill, it is only intended that if a manufacturer finds it necessary or possible to keep his mill running by exporting twine, that he shall be enabled to export it under those conditions necessary for exportation. I think the House generally will agree that free trade in binder twine is a desirable thing. The gentlemen who are opposed to this Bill would be largely free traders I take it—at least this is so of the gentlemen who have spoken against this Bill. Now, if that is the case why, and upon what possible grounds do they say that a man shall not make twine and export it unless he puts some specific brand upon it which will in effect prevent him exporting it? You may just as well put a clause in this Bill saying that the makers of binder twine in Canada shall not export it, as to ask them to export it as the law stands.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—If the only mark on it is that each ball contains so many feet, is it wrong to have the manufacturer compelled to place that mark on twine exported?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—I do not say it is a crime, if you mean it in that sense, but it is wrong in this sense, that he could not sell it. What would it mean to a farmer in France who is going to buy 100 lb. of twine if he found it marked 550 feet? There would not be one farmer in ten, if in fifty, or even in five hundred, who would know what 550 feet meant; if we put it in pounds he would not know what that meant because there are no pounds in France. He would expect to find the ball marked so many kilos.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—There would be no objection to the manufacturer putting it in the language of the country to which he is exporting it.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—But when he is making it he does not know to what country he is exporting it.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—The same argument might be used in connection with any article produced in Canada.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—It would be just as reasonable from a business standpoint to say that you shall not export potatoes from Canada unless they weigh one pound each, as to say that you shall not export binder twine unless it is marked as possessing such a weight. If we were sending it to Germany what would kilos, or pounds, or feet mean? And if we were sending it to Russia, still more so; they would have no possible conception of what it meant. The hon. gentleman who spoke a little while ago said that Canadian twine is only being sold in countries where Canadian machines are being used, and it is being sold for that reason. It may only be sold in countries where Canadian machines are in use, but that means a good many countries, because Canadian binders are more or less in use in almost every grain growing country in the world. The Canadian machines in use in those countries are not very numerous, but Canadians have sold, and I hope it is to the credit of Canada, hundreds of thousands of machines to various countries in the world with the words 'Made in Canada' marked on them.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—The same words should be marked on the twine.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—Thousands and hundreds of thousands of immigrants have been brought to Canada because of their attention having been called to the country through the export of Canadian manufactures of many kinds. Every one should consider it desirable that Canadians should be helped to export their manufactures, because it brings labour to the country and profit to the manufacturers, and because it brings prominence to Canada. A better reason still is that the larger the amount of goods that can be turned out of a factory the cheaper these goods can be produced and the cheaper they will be sold in the country in which they are made. That may be laid down as something incontrovertible, that only by manufacturing in large quantities can we compete to-day with the conditions which exist generally in the world. As I understand this Bill it is not the intention, nor will it be possible or practicable for a maker of binder twine to sell his output to a person for use in Canada without having a brand upon it, as in the past, stating exactly what it contains. I agree entirely with that principle. It is an excellent idea and has been a great benefit to the people of this country, but it does not apply to exports.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Why?

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—Surely this House does not want to put an embargo on the possibility of exporting what can be exported to advantage by a maker in any line of business in Canada. And if the Bill goes no further than that I am sure there is no member in this House who desires to prevent the exportation. No member of this House will put an embargo on a manufacturer, for the sake of saying he ought not to send to a foreign country anything of a lower standard than we produce here. We produce much higher standards in Canada than in other countries in many lines of business, and it is sufficient for us to leave to the individual who has the energy to go into foreign countries and get business, the same opportunity to get it that the people in all the other countries have of getting the same business in Canada. If the people in other countries are not getting as high a standard as we get in Canada, they will be getting a higher standard than they are getting in the United States.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—That is the secret of the whole Bill, and why don't they say it?

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—Why not leave it to themselves to decide whether they will purchase from the Canadian manufacturer? This measure, no doubt, is the result of a condition that arose this year in reference to a very considerable export order from Canada in which the maker found himself under the law practically committing a crime, although he was not selling the goods for Canadian use at all, and it is to enable him, if he gets another opportunity to export goods, as he doubtless will, because his goods have been reported on favourably, to go to France, Germany or Russia; and there is this peculiar condition, that in some countries in Europe where the Government is desirous of helping, as the Government of this country is desirous of helping the greatest of all industries, the farming industry, the importer in Russia—using Russia again as an illustration—who imports from a foreign country one hundred or two hundred or a thousand binders, is permitted to bring in a certain number of pounds of twine, or kilos of twine, or poods of binder twine free of duty. You will see at once if there are Canadians doing business in that country in binders, and they can ship with the same shipment binder twine from Canada, it will go into Russia free. Canadian manufacturers who have been shipping to Russia, particularly where that law applies, have in the past years been purchasing binder twine in the United States, hundreds and thousands of tons, to send with their shipments of binders via New York to Russia. If the Canadian exporter of the binders could purchase suitable twine in Canada surely that would be to the advantage of this country. Many times they are forced to purchase it in the United States, or elsewhere, and it has been purchased exclusively in the United States this year, because it goes into Russia free of duty to the extent of fifty or one hundred poods per binder. Exporters in the United States are doing a very large business in Russia shipping their twine with their binders. There is no difficulty arising in that case. Canadians who are competing with them for machinery meet the difficulty that I have mentioned, which would be overcome by this Bill, provided the prices in Canada were such as to enable the shipper to take the home twine instead of going to another country and buying it, and binder twine is not always balled the same for foreign countries as it is balled here. In some countries it is balled in smaller reels and in some countries larger, and these are conditions which have to be provided for.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—There must be some object in this legislation or some request for it, and from what I know about it, the request does not come from the users of binder twine. Sub-clause 3 of the Bill reads as follows:

3. The Minister of Trade and Commerce for the time being may make such regulations as he deems necessary to prevent the sale or use in Canada of unlabelled binder twine.

Hon Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—Read three words further—'manufactured for export only.'

Hon. Mr. WATSON—What is the object in making the change? The present Act starts?

Upon or attached to every ball of binder twine sold in Canada there shall be a label with the name of the dealer and the number of feet of twine per pound in the ball marked or stamped thereon. Provided that binder twine manufactured in Canada for export need not be labelled with the name of the dealer, but there shall be attached to every ball so manufactured a label with the number of feet of twine per pound in the ball marked or stamped thereon in the same manner as when for sale in Canada.

They do not ask for the dealer's name on the twine for export. They ask the number of feet. It is possible some of those dealers expect to be able to pawn off some of that binder twine, supposed to be for export, on the Canadian farmer, because you are making a provision that the Minister of Trade and Commerce may make such regulations in regard to the binder twine? Why give authority to make any such provision at all?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is a fine of $1,000 in the event of such manufacturer or dealer selling this twine for Canadian consumption. If the hon. gentleman will look at section 350 of the Act he will find the provision for the penalty, which remains undisturbed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—But if the twine is made in Canada there is no need to sell it in Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If it is sold in Canada he leaves himself liable to a fine of $1,000.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The manufacturer or dealer?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The manufacturer or dealer. The section reads as follows:

Every manufacturer or dealer who falsely represents any binder twine found in his possession as manufactured for export, or who sells or offers for sale for consumption in Canada any such twine shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Clause 3 says he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $50, and for each subsequent offense to a penalty not exceeding $100.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—With that penalty clause attached, what is the object of the Minister of Trade and Commerce being able to make regulations in connection with the matter at all? You fix the quantity of twine, the number of feet per pound, which is the same thing. So far as the export twine is concerned it makes no difference whether a ball of twine is short two, three, four or five feet or six feet; what you require to give is the number of feet per pound in the ball of twine, whatever it may be.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend does not appreciate this point; so long as the twine has to be labelled, it is subject to all the inspection regulations of the Act, and therefore the twine cannot be manufactured for export without being subject to inspection. I should like to point out this consideration; inasmuch as this product is for export, and as foreign nations do not impose regulations calling for a label upon binder twine for export, it can be readily seen that the Canadian manufacturer is handicapped when competing with foreign manufacturers who are producing the article for foreign export.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—I do not understand why the Canadian manufacturer would be at a disadvantage if he guaranteed his twine.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend is not serious in thinking the consumer in southern Europe, Russia, Germany or France will take into consideration the solicitude of the Canadian Parliament to protect him. He will pay no attention to it whatever. You will have to give the Canadian manufacturer the greatest possible liberty in competing with the foreign manufacturer for export purposes, and to the extent that you place restrictions on the Canadian manufacturer in manufacturing a product for the foreign market, to that extent you handicap him as against the foreign competitor.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Why is the Minister of Trade and Commerce called in to make regulations?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That does not touch the regulation for which the Act has already made provision in the way of a penalty of $1,000. There are many minor regulations which have to be passed; that is, regulations not of the character already provided for in the statutes. I think the statute is abundant in the measure of restriction which it has imposed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think so too.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But it is desirable, in order to meet all the contingencies which may arise, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should have authority to make regulations, but those regulations would not supersede the provisions embodied in the statute.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a little remarkable that this proposed change in the law should come to the front just, as the hon. gentleman from Toronto informed the House, when we were beginning to do a little more business in the way of making binder twine. For a number of years there was very little binder twine manufactured in Canada, and there was no objection to the present regulation.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—I did not make that statement. I did not say that we were getting into a larger industry in making binder twine. As a matter of fact, it is not a quarter of what it was when there was a duty on it. The industry in Canada has shrunken tremendously since binder twine was put on the free list.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps I misapprehended the hon. gentleman, but I understood him to say that up to the present year or last year, there had been a very small production in Canada. That was correct, was it not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It has shrunk since it was put on the free list.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It shrunk after binder twine was put on the free list. It is now growing again.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—Eighty per cent of the binder twine used in Canada was imported and only about twenty per cent manufactured in Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The explanation of the hon. gentleman from Toronto was interesting and instructive, and the hon. gentleman made it perfectly clear that the use of the word 'dealer' is more proper and better adapted to meet the case than that of the word 'manufacturer.' I think the hon. gentleman from Alberta was wrong in suggesting that we should substitute the word 'manufacturer' for 'dealer,' but the general principle and the original statements made by the hon. gentleman from Alberta were perfectly sound and they have not been controverted by any hon. gentleman who has spoken since. The hon. gentleman from Calgary pointed out that in the case of a great many manufactured articles, in the case of nearly all our farm products, goods intended for export must be marked not only with the quantity, but with the quality, and with the name of the maker or producer. As the law stands at present it is not required that the name of the maker of binder twine shall be affixed to the twine. It is only provided that the number of feet per pound shall be placed on the label of the twine. I fail altogether to see that any gentleman has shown how that is going seriously to interfere with the interest of the Canadian manufacturer. The label is not an expensive thing, and that each ball shall be labelled with the number of feet per pound does not seem to me to be a grievance to any one. There is this about it, as the hon. gentleman from Calgary put it, we should have regard to the reputation of our goods in other countries. When an importer in Russia, France or other country imports a quantity of binder twine from Canada it is only reasonable he should have a guarantee that he is getting the quantity which he is supposed to be getting; if this is desirable in the case of other manufacturers, in order that the reputation of the country should be kept up, it applies just as well to binder twine as to the other things. The hon. gentleman made one objection to retaining the label which struck me as being rather insignificant, coming from a gentleman of his business experience; the hon. gentleman wanted to know what object there was in saying that the binder twine measured 550 feet to the pound, because in France they would not know what feet meant. I think the hon. gentleman is giving the importers in France credit for an ignorance they do not possess. The importer in any French port knows what an English foot means.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—I did not say the importers of France, I said the consumer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I took down the hon. gentleman's language, and his contention was that in France they would not know what 550 feet meant. I am surprised the hon. gentleman should make a statement of that kind, because he went on a little later to talk about the number of pounds in Russia. It is perfectly absurd, if I may be pardoned for using that word, to say that the importer—that is the man who deals directly with Canada—does not know what 550 feet means. Then again the hon. gentleman said the consumer would not care for the label. Perhaps he will not, but a foreign importer will, and the foreign importer is after all the man who is directly connected with Canada. I regret myself that the Government has seen fit to introduce this measure, which is calculated to encourage fraud and to damage the reputation of Canadian goods in foreign markets.

Hon. Mr. DANDUDAND—I follew the remarks of the hon. leader of the Government and the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Sir Lyman Melvin Jones) very closely, because I confess I am not very familiar with this subject—the manufacture and sale of binder twine. I am free to admit that I have not ascertained just what injury the Canadian manufacturer would suffer, if he exported his goods under the present Act. What is the dealer or the manufacturer obliged to do? He is obliged to put his name on the article he manufactures, and to give the number of feet of twine per pound in the ball, in order to obey this law. Would the hon. gentleman from Toronto, who has had considerable practical experience, give us an illustration of the injury which this would work to the manufacturer who receives an order for export? I should like to be satisfied and understand clearly that he is in an inferior position to that of the American manufacturer who is not working under such a law. To put his name upon the ball seems to me to give greater satisfaction to the ultimate consumer, to the farmer in Europe, because there is a certain satisfaction in knowing where the article you use comes from. There is, therefore, an apparent guarantee of honesty, when the name is stamped on the article. Secondly, the manufacturer is obliged to mark the number of feet of twine per pound on the ball. The obligation of the manufacturer is to put that label on the article. I would like the hon. gentleman from Toronto to give me an illustration showing why and how the Canadian manufacturer will be placed in a position of inferiority to his competitor in the foreign land, if he obeys this law.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—I can give the hon. gentleman a specific case, which will cover exactly what he is asking. Helfrich and Sadet, of Southern Russia, are amongst the largest importers of harvesters and binder twine in all European Russia. Helfrich and Sadet, within the past year, asked for tenders for a large quantity of binder twine. They stipulated that it must have their name on the tag and contain other Russian characters that meant something to them and to their Russian customers. They refused to take binder twine branded with either an American or Canadian name of maker, or with number of feet. They gave as a reason that they had made their reputation in their own country, in their own business with their customers, and what their customers are interested in was having the name of a binder twine of some person that they knew of, and that would give them confidence to make the purchase.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That would be selling goods under false pretences.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—It might, if you had a bad reputation. These men had a good reputation, because they were two young Scotchmen who went there forty or fifty years ago and became one of the largest importing houses in Russia, and they had made a name for themselves and for the goods that they handled, and they desired and required a specific tag of a certain size, which would make about six such tags as we put on, and their own name in Russian characters, and so on.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—'Made in Russia."

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—There was no 'Made in Russia' on it, there was nothing untrue on it; their own trade mark and conditions had to be placed on that tag. That is not peculiar to binder twine. Some men import thousands and tens of thousands of machines yearly from the United States and Canada, and upon every such implement, their name in Russian characters is put on. All the machines that they take are taken with specific characters put upon them, in place of the name of the maker or the name of the place where they are made.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Does the hon. gentleman mean that Canadian machinery exported, we will say, to Russia, does not contain the name of the Canadian manufacturers?

Hon Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—I mean to say this that so far as I know, in the case of every machine that the Canadian manufacturers ship to Russia, there is the name, address, etc., of the Russian purchaser. I shall only answer for myself as an exporter; in our own case our machines are called 'Massey-Harris'; we have that trade mark; it is not only the actual name of the company, if you will put the name of the company and 'Ltd.' to it—and I am sorry to have to make a personal explanation in order to answer your question—but our machinery carries the trade mark 'Massey-Harris' in every kind of implement, and that always appears on the implement in a smaller letter; but beyond that there is whatever Russian characters they desire to have, to enable you to give them what they say is a necessity if they are to buy and handle our implements.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—And you will paint them red or blue just as they want?

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—They are painted differently to suit them; there are the various conditions that apply to their country, and those are the conditions that, up to a limited extent, you must either accept or be out of the exporting business. Canada has not yet attained that position in the world of commerce which enables her, in manufacturing, to set a standard so high as to exceed the standards set by the various countries, and which standards, dealers say, are necessary to business in their country. Now I want to answer one objection that the hon. senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) made to a remark of mine, in reference to the quantity of binder twine made in Canada, which he misunderstood, or else I made the wrong answer, because the quantity made in Canada is not more than one-fifth the quantity imported. The quantity imported into Canada for 1912 and 1913 was between two and three million dollars annually for those two years, which shows that the amount imported is very large.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—About 30,000,000 pounds.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—The senator from Halifax said surely it was neither practicable nor possible that a dealer, who would be the importer into France, would not understand the characters or the number of pounds.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Feet.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—Well, in my experience there is no importer into France, because the company that is exporting from Canada to France has its own company in France to handle its own business directly with the farmers, just as in Canada, so there are no importers. The same applies to Germany, and the same applies to the Balkan States; it is the same in Great Britain, and the other countries; the company handles its own business within the country, and therefore I am brought very close to the conditions that are necessary to enable us to do business directly with the farmer. The business is probably a peculiar one, because in a manufacture of that kind you cannot go into wholesale business: you are obliged to look after the customer and see what he requires, after he has made the purchase. It is not like buying sugar, etc. The business that Canada has got has been obtained largely by the building up and the looking after on the spot of customers who have been good enough to give you their confidence and buy your goods. So the thought that I had in mind then, and the practice as it is now, is that there is no importer, there is no large wholesaler who would understand feet and pounds. You are dealing directly with the habitant in France, and you are dealing in other countries with the farmer only, and you are passing by those who would probably understand feet and pounds and other brands that might be found practicable in their case, but these would not protect in the case of the user. Now I need hardly say I have no possible interest in the binder twine industry, never had in my life, and never expect to have, but I know it will be of considerable advantage to the one or two mills running in Canada if they had an opportunity to send their products out with the other products that are going out to the world. It is rather hard lines for a good Canadian to have to buy goods in the United States and to export them to France and sell them through his agencies there, in Russia and other places, I take it that this House, feeling assured that this Bill only deals with the question of export and the conditions attached thereto, will have no objection to leaving the dealer in those countries in the hands of Canadians who otherwise would be in the hands of Americans or of the manufacturers of some other country.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—That is right.

Hon. Sir LYMAN MELVIN JONES—They are surely as safe in our hands as they would be in anybody else's, and there is that business integrity in Canada that will hold its own and more, as I know from experience, as against many of the importers or exporters from other countries. There will be an advantage to Canada in this exportation; it may be small, but it will grow. Everything has to have a beginning. We have an opportunity to make a beginning, and I hope the House will not prevent the exporter, or possible exporter from Canada, from sending his goods to foreign markets, as the Bill has no effect on the Canadian end of the business, which I have no desire it should have.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I have listened with a good deal of interest to this subject which was entirely foreign to me before, and I can well conceive a Canadian being very zealous in the protection of the rights of the Canadian farmer in this respect, but I am not able to understand gentlemen contending against those who have a large knowledge of foreign conditions which we here generally know nothing about. I, for instance, know nothing about this question, but I can only say this, that in our own exporting business we have to respond to the whims and desires of those who buy our goods, and a great deal of our product which is exported is stencilled as the buyers in Great Britain and the other countries desire. Our name counts for nothing; the name of the importer is responsible in the transaction.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I have taken a great deal of interest in the discussion as it has gone along on this question. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the subject have been making a comparison with the branding of applies and butter and cheese along side of that of binder twine. Now those dairy products and fruit products that are sold by an honour brand, are in altogether a different position from binder twine. I remember some years ago the Government brought in a Seed Bill which I thought was going to be very injurious to the farmers of this country if allowed to pass, because they wanted a particular brand put upon screenings; this was intended to protect the farmers against fraud, while as a matter of fact that seed was not sold on standard at all, but on sample sent to the purchaser in Belgium, Germany, Scotland, or elsewhere. When the purchaser saw the sample he ordered so many pounds or bushels of the seeds according to that sample, and if the shipment did not come up to the sample it was returned, and the buyer fell back on the man who sent it to him. It is the same with binder twine. The factory having binder twine to sell makes up small parcels of different brands of the twine, and sends it to the purchaser in the foreign country, who returns his order for certain quantities of one brand or another. Now this Parliament is quite within its prerogative when legislating to protect the farmers and consumers of this country against fraud by the manufacturer, and in protecting foreigners against wrong-doing n the part of the manufacturers of the country; but when this Parliament sees that the manufacturers of the country carry out the conditions of the laws of the foreign country to which they are sending their goods, the duty of Parliament in that respect ceases. I am fully aware of the injustice it would be to the manufacturer of binder twine, if he had to put certain labels on it which the foreign purchaser does not want put on.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Which he will not have on.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Which he does not want, or will not have on. There is no law in the United States compelling manufacturers there to put on tags telling the number of feet, but I have known purchasers of binder twine who asked for it to be tagged in a certain way, just for the retail dealer who tried to build up a reputation for that particular brand. One hon. gentleman said that he knew a binder twine factory here to make some 80 per cent dividend in one year. They declared a dividend of 80 per cent, true enough, but that was not upon the twine that they manufactured; it was on a large purchase of the raw material which was sold to Americans when the embargo went on; not a pound of it was manufactured in Canada, but the 80 per cent was made by selling the raw material that they had purchased.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—It strikes me that in this discussion there is a great deal of foreign mission zeal. The hon. senator from Toronto (Hon. Sir Lyman Melvin Jones) has told us that eighty per cent of the binder twine consumed in Canada is imported. Now, is not this Canadian market worth catering to? Cannot the manufacturers of binder twine supply the Canadian market and exclude foreign competitions?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—They do it to the tune of 20 per cent; do they find it pays better to supply Russia than to supply the home market to the tune of 80 per cent? But there is another phase of this Bill; if the manufacturers are satisfied that the Canadian public should be protected against whatever dishonesty may happen, and to let it go abroad that the Canadian Government, doubting the honesty of the Canadian manufacturers, imposes certain restrictions when they serve the Canadian public but that when they go outside of Canada they can do as they please—then if the factories are satisfied I am.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I would like to ask the leader of the Government if he will give us a further explanation of sub-clause 3 of this clause. I cannot exactly understand the object of putting that in. Under the present law we have in section 350 of chapter 85 a penalty fixed for 'every manufacturer or dealer who falsely represents any binder twine found in his possession as manufactured for export.' Now, if I understand this binder twine business at all, the manufacturer who manufactures binder twine for export will only make it for export when he receives a definite order for so many tons or pounds or feet, or whatever it is, of binder twine; therefore, if he fills that order he should have very little, if any, left over. If he is doing his business properly, he should see that the amount ordered was sufficient to fill the order and no more. I cannot, therefore, see the necessity for the third subsection, putting it in the power of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make regulations to deal with this question, which apparently assumes that the manufacturer will have a great deal of twine on his hands that he has manufactured for use in Canada and wants to export.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—All he would have to do to make it exportable would be to take off the label.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I have said, the Act seems to make ample provision for any attempted sale of export goods within Canada, but subsection 3 simply provides for regulations which, I presume, might not be reached by the other provisions of the Act. Many unforseen conditions arise, and it seems to me it only makes more secure the proper enforcement of the Act to vest in the minister power to make regulations to prevent any violation of the law in such a case for which the Act may not have made provision.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Would it have the effect in any way of over-riding section 350?

Hon. Mr. BOYER.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No regulation could over-ride a statute except the express language of the statute made it so.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY, from the Committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Something has happened in a far distant part of this Dominion which I have no doubt has attracted the attention of the Government as well as the attention of the people of the Dominion. A legislature of this Dominion, under its powers and privileges, sentenced a newspaper writer on the Halifax Herald, named McCurdy, to the common jail. That act was within the jurisdiction of the legislature. He was conveyed to jail under the direction of British law, and with the sanction of the British Crown. But we find that, after a few hours incarceration in the common jail in Halifax, a part of the militia of Canada is drafted into an act of insurgency and marched down to the common jail under the British flag, for what purpose? To sustain and maintain the law of the land? No; to glorify the prisoner and play music to him. I wonder if they played 'God Save the King.' That would be God save the King on one side, and God damn the King on the other side. These facts are known throughout the Dominion of Canada, and are under the consideration of the Minister of Militia, or they ought to be. I desire to have the attention of the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell)—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We know what the hon. gentleman is going to say.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then why did not the hon. gentleman prevent it? If he is a loyal man why did he not advise the Minister of Militia to prevent the militia engaging in an act of insurgency against the British Crown. Why did he not stand up for the Crown as a loyal Orangeman?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He is ready to stand up for men who are ready to kick the Crown and the King into the Boyne; ready to stand with the Carsons and Bonar-Laws, but we Irish are not prepared to do that. All we are asking for is justice, and the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), the Past Grand Master of the Orange Lodge, knows well what I mean.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think they will ask the hon. gentleman for his character.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They need not ask me, nor any sensible or loyal man for his character.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I question that very much.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am asking the Government that my good money and the good money of the people of this country be not spent to pay men who are engaged in acts of insurrection against the British Crown.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They are loyal when it suits them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I hold that, if the Government has not taken action, it is derelict in its duty towards the people of Canada and British connection. Are we going to have enacted in Canada such scenes as are occurring in Ulster—a few people in a state of insurrection against the Crown because the British Parliament wants justice to be done to all parts of the Empire. Here in Canada are we to stand silent and dumb while the militia parades in front of a jail glorifying a prisoner sentenced thereto by the highest authority of the land? Is that what you want to inculcate into the Canadians of this country; is that what you want to teach the foreigners coming here every day—that so long as you belong to a certain sect, or a certain party, you can defy the law? I demand here that the hon. leader of the Government in the Senate—who is not directly responsible—communicate to the Government what the demands of this country are; that the officers in charge of that part of the militia who brought out that militia band be reprimanded. Fortunately the band consisted only of trombones and cornets. God knows what would have happened if they had brought out the militia, with their bayonets and their guns. But they brought out music, which is the first step towards insurrection; it is against the law of the land, and against justice as expressed by the legislature of the province. What a nice spectacle we present to the world, that a legislature can make its order and have it reviled in that fashion.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Carried.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Are you one of those that were in the band? Are you the trombone of the band? You are probably the bass drum. Now this matter is serious, and it will be taken seriously. If the Royal band in Quebec turned out in the same fashion, the member from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), would be up in his lodge demanding the decapitation of the whole of the people of the province, and all the Orange leaders throughout Ontario would be urging people to go for the French, just the same as they did when the poor 65th regiment turned out for the Eucharistic Congress. That is one of the cries they had with which to beat the Liberals in the last campaign. Poor Orangemen! they are prepared to do everything for themselves and allow no person else to do anything.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Carried.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is the trombone again; he goes according to the band master. Now we have had experience, right here, of a part of the militia turning out, not against the interests of the Crown, not against the orders of justice from a legislature, but turning out in a religious procession without arms; the Militia Department was denounced, and the province of Quebec was denounced from one end of the land to the other because of this. Are we going to stand here with silent tongues and unworked arms, in the face of these facts. I say no, and it is the duty of the Government to force its Minister of Militia, Colonel Sam. Hughes, who is an Orangeman—but one who is an Orangeman for what there is in it—to act at once, and to reprimand the officers who brought out the Royal Canadian Band in Halifax, as an act of insurrection, and as an act of anarchy against the laws of this country.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Hurrah.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The trombone is getting weak; he does not like it, and I know they do not like it; Carson does not like it, Bonar-Law does not like it. They got some encouragement a few weeks ago, as I understand, from one of my colleagues in this House, from the fact that a petition was sent over to the British Government from some member of this Senate calling on the Government not to grant Home Rule to Ireland. Now, Bonar-Law and Carson are the worst enemies that the British Empire have had in the past hundred years. They are worse than the old dynamiters of forty or fifty years ago; they are dynamiting the constitution; they are dynamiting the parliamentary laws of Great Britain; they are compelling the British people to ignore one of the oldest institutions in the history of England, the House of Lords. However, they are going to be ignored and the Home Rule Bill will go through in spite of them. Now, all that is due to the same spirit as animated the Royal Band—I shall not say the members of the Royal Band, but the men who are responsible. I suppose Senator Dennis had nothing to do with it. His nose was tweaked, and he has probably had sense enough to remain quiet, but I hold that this incident is one that should not be tolerated by our Government. When these militia men went out to play music in front of the common jail, in honour of a prisoner confined there, they were doing so at the expense of the people of this country. On that ground I stand and insist that an answer must be given—not to me personally, because I have got it beforehand,—but to the people of this country, as to why such a thing was done, and also if the Government approves of the action tatken.

DAIRY INDUSTRY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (112) 'An Act to Regulate the Manufacture and Sale of Dairy Products and to Prohibit the Manufacture or Sale of Butter Substitutes.'

He said: This Bill, to a very large extent, is a revision of part 8 of the Inspection and Sale Act, which was a consolidation of the various Acts passed between 1886 and 1896, but it proposes to take out of the Inspection and Sale Act the clauses dealing with the inspection of dairy products, and to create an Act to be known as the Dairy Industry Act of 1914, dealing entirely with the manufacture and sale of dairy products, and likewise the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of butter substitute. The Bill has in view the suppression of adulteration, so far as the Government can possibly carry out such an object, and the imposition of penalties which have not been provided for, under the present Act. There is nothing particularly new in the Act outside of that concerning which we have already legislation, unless it be that we bring the Act, so to speak, up to date, in modernizing the regulation of dairy products. When we go into committee I shall be very glad to give hon. gentlemen all the information possible as to the various matters with which we deal, and the reasons which have led to their adoption by the Government.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—This Act seems rather stringent in regard to this question of butter substitutes. The hon. leader of the Government has not given us any particular reason why that should be absolutely prohibited. I can quite understand it is very necessary that anything in the way of a substitute for butter should be clearly marked and placed before the public in such a way that they may know what they are buying, but I think that in certain cases it may be a good thing for the public to be able to buy butter substitutes, if they know it is not butter, but a substitute for it, and if the person selling it explains that it is a substitute and does not perpetrate a fraud on the public. Probably it is a good idea to put all this legislation in one Act, rather than in the Inspection and Sale Act, where it stands at present. I wish to bring one point to the attention of the hon. leader of the Government in regard to the question of this butter situation out in the West, especially British Columbia. To-day we are importing a very large amount of butter from New Zealand and Australia, and it was a surprise to me last summer to find the amount of New Zealand butter that was being sold through the West in competition with, and I thought rather to the detriment of, our own Canadian butter. I made some inquiries about this, and I found in some retail stores in the country, that this New Zealand butter was being bought by the people in preference to Alberta, Ontario or Eastern Townships butter. I found in most cases that the men working along the line of the Canadian Pacific railway, whom I did not expect to be very particular about the kind of butter they used, insisted on getting New Zealand butter. Very often I was told by store keepers that, if they could not get New Zealand butter, they would go without, rather than buy the other. I further made some inquiries, on one occasion, from men dealing in butter and their travellers, and they informed me that they had found that New Zealand and Australian butter, after it was taken out of cold storage, would keep for a very much longer time than the butter from any of the creameries from any part of Canada. The consequence was that men like surveyors and contractors in railway and lumber camps, and other businesses of that kind who buy a considerable amount of butter, nearly always stipulated that it should be either New Zealand or Australian butter; they were prepared to pay a rather increased price because they knew it would keep longer than what they could get in Canada. I think that is a matter that the Minister of Agriculture should take up and look into, because Canada is certainly an agricultural country, and I understand a great deal of money has been spent, from time to time by the Government, in promoting the creamery industry and the manufacture of butter throughout the country. If there is anything that can be done to improve the keeping qualities of Canadian butter, so that it can be put on an equal basis with that which is brought in from Australia, money spent in finding out the cause of the difference between the Canadian butter and the New Zealand butter would be well spent in the interest of the country. I ask the leader of the Government to bring that matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, and see if something of that kind could not be done.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is largely the object of this Act—to improve the making of butter in Canada. When it is put in operation it will contribute, in a very large degree, to overcome the difficulty of which my hon. friend has spoken.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

OBSTRUCTIONS OF THE FRASER RIVER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. Bostock inquired of the Government:

1. Were tenders called for the removal of the obstruction in the Fraser river caused by the sliding of the Canadian Northern Pacific road bed into the river?

2. If so, how many tenders were received?

3. What are the names of the persons who tendered?

4. Was the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer?

5. What is the amount of the contract?

6. Have the contractors any connection financially or otherwise with the Canadian Northern Railway Company or the Canadian Northern Pacific Railway Company?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. Answered by No. 1.
5. Answered by No. 1.
6. The department has no information as to this.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Could my hon. friend tell me who is doing the work in that case?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I really could not give my hon. friend any answer. The question seems to be based on the assumption that tenders had been called for, and that the contract had been given, based on the tenders. If my hon. friend desires to ask any further questions on the subject, I should be very happy to obtain the information for him.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (178) An Act to amend the Prisons and Reformatory Act.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Bill (175) An Act to amend the Supreme Court Act.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Bill (M-3) An Act for the relief of Gustav Oscar Lindquist.—Hon. Mr. Gordon.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to bring the attention of the leader of the Government to an article which appeared in the Manitoba Free Press of Saturday, May 9, which reads as follows:

British Columbia and Canadian Northern Railway Agreement—Fear Safeguards for Province on Canadian Northern Railway Agreement will be lost in Ottawa Proposals.

Vancouver, B.C., May 8.—The wires between Victoria and Ottawa were kept warm to-day while political leaders were trying to make some arrangement between the provincial and the federal governments to avoid a very unpleasant crisis that is facing the administration in British Columbia. Yesterday the Board of Trade of Vancouver passed a resolution calling on the British Columbia Government to do something with Ottawa to see that the deal between Mackenzie and Mann and this province was not repudiated. To-day Sir Richard McBride and Hon. W. J. Bowser, attorney general, have taken up the question with Premier Borden. If any result has been attained it is not yet known here.

'Here is the situation in a nutshell,' said a Vancouver business man and a Conservative, to the Free Press in an interview here to-day. 'British Columbia has guaranteed more than forty-five million dollars to Mackenzie and Mann for construction in this province. In return British Columbia was guaranteed the right to control rates, but if the proposed Canadian Northern Railway Bill becomes law this control, which was the chief quid pro quo for the enormous railway guarantee, utterly vanishes and becomes a dead letter. It is really a repudiation by the Conservative Government at Ottawa of a sacred contract entered into by the Conservative Government of British Columbia. The whole basis of the provincial Canadian Northern Railway guarantee was put up to the people, "give us the subsidy and you control the rates."'

In section 15 of the new Bill at Ottawa, it is provided that the Canadian Northern Pacific becomes 'an undertaking for the general advantage of Canada.' Which means that it falls automatically under the control of the Railway Commission.

No fault with commission.

'No one, of course, finds fault with the Railway Commisison,' said this business man to-day, as he pursued the subject. 'But by its special agreement with Mackenzie and Mann the Government of British Columbia had a valuable control and a double check on the rate question. For instance, if a shipper wished to send cattle from Kamloops to Vancouver the rate on the Canadian Northern is fixed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council at Victoria. The Canadian Pacific as a competing line would either be forced to meet this rate or appeal to the Railway Commission of Canada. The Canadian Northern Railway agreement with British Columbia specially provided that in such an eventuality the Canadian Northern railway itself was forced to appear before the Railway Commisison and uphold the provincial Government in the lower rate which it had fixed. By the agreement the Canadian Northern Pacific was stopped from ever appealing to the Railway Commission. All this arrangement is admittedly lost if the proposed enactment at Ottawa becomes law. To me it looks like the repudiation of an agreement which should be respected. I don't know how people in the East will view it, but it means a lot in British Columbia.'

That apparently is the opinion of the business people in Vancouver, and I would like to ask the leader of the Government what information he can give us as to the telegrams that have apparently been passing between the two Governments, and what steps, if any, have been taken to compel the provincial Government to recede from the position which they have taken and which they held out to the people of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is somewhat premature to discuss this measure. It is expected that, in a very short time, the measure will be brought down to this Chamber, and my hon. friend, as well as other hon. gentlemen in the House will have the opportunity of discussing it at length. I shall strongly advise my hon. friend not to place too much confidence in the rumors and reports he may read—in some of the papers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (97) intituled: 'An Act to incorporate The Labrador, Quebec and Southern Railway Company.'—Hon. Mr. Belcourt.

Bill (G-3) 'An Act to incorporate The Canadian General Council of Boy Scouts Association.'—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

VINEBERG DIVORCE CASE.

The Orders of the Day being called:

Consideration of the thirty-fourth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the petition of Helen Vineberg, together with the evidence taken before the said committee.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middleton) in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer moved that the order be discharged and put on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Those who received this evidence will notice that it is a very voluminous document. A number of the senators are not here to-night, and will not have an opportunity of reading the evidence before to-morrow. As this is a contested case, I would move that it be put off until this day week.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN (in French)—Hon. gentlemen, this is an interesting question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman can not discuss the merits of the Bill on this motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN (In French)—I propose this evening to discuss this delicate question, and to express my opinion as to the manner in which divorce is dealt with by the Senate. Here is a Bill asking the Parliament of Canada to sanction the separation—

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman is undertaking, on a motion to postpone this Order of the Day until Thursday, to discuss the merits of the case. Now that is clearly out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN (In French)—Does the hon. gentleman from Halifax understand what I am saying?

Hon. Mr. POWER (In French)—Yes, but perhaps the hon. gentleman does not understand what he is saying, himself.

The SPEAKER (In French)—The hon. gentleman has no right to discuss the merits of the Bill on a question of adjournment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN (In French)—I ask His Honour the Speaker, and the hon. member from Halifax, if they will kindly show in what respect I have been discussing the merits of the Bill?

The SPEAKER (In French)—The hon. gentleman from Halifax has raised the point of order that the hon. member was proposing to discuss the merits of the Bill, and my statement was that he had no right to do so on a question to adjourn the consideration of the report.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN (In French)—My intention is not to discuss the merits of the Bill on this occasion. I am simply asking that this report, which is now before the Senate, be not considered until some time next week.

The SPEAKER (In French)—Then the hon. gentleman should propose an amendment to the main motion, which is to postpone the consideration of the report until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Bill (J-3) An Act for the relief of George Andrew Crooks.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

DAIRY INDUSTRY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on Bill (112) An Act to Regulate the Manufacture and Sale of Dairy Products and to Prohibit the Manufacture or Sale of Butter Substitutes.

(In the Committee.)

On subclause A of clause 5:

5. No person shall:—

(a) manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell or have in his possession for sale, any oleo-margarine, margarine, butterine, or other substitute for butter, manufactured wholly or in part from any fat other than that of milk or cream.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause, or sub-clause, is a very objectionable one. As every hon. gentleman knows, butter nowadays in Canada is a very expensive material. In fact, sometimes, during the past twelve months, butter has been almost worth its weight in silver, and the result is that poor people have not been able to use butter, simply because they have not been able to pay for it. Oleomargarine and butterine are substitutes for butter, and while, of course, they are not as good as the real thing, they do make fairly good substitutes. People who cannot afford to pay forty cents a pound for New Zealand butter are glad to have oleomargarine or butterine for less than half the money. This legislation is altogether unusual and exceptional. In England there is no prohibition of the sale of oleomargarine or butterine. As long as there is no attempt to defraud or mislead, there is no reason on earth, that I can see, why this article should not be sold. If people choose, with their eyes open, to buy this article, knowing just what they are getting, I know of no reason why they should not be allowed to do so. I move that paragraph A of this clause be stricken out. There is no necessity for it; the striking it out does not in any way impair the quality of the butter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This has been the law in Canada since 1886.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That does not make it any better.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It has always been approved of by the dairy interests and commercial interests, so far as the handling of dairy products is concerned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That goes without saying; they do not like anything in the way of public competition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So far as the experience of the administration of the Department of Agriculture can determine, it is felt that there should be a prohibition of both the manufacture and sale of this commodity in Canada. It costs the consumer as much as butter would cost him. In Canada, before the prohibition was imposed, and since also, it has been the subject of fraud; it has almost invariably been sought to impose it upon the consuming public as butter.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is in the interests of the consumer that no ground should be afforded those who desire to go into a spurious manufacture of this kind, and that they should not be able to palm off on the consuming public, as butter, a commodity which is but a spurious article, and which according to our present experience will cost quite as much as butter. If my hon. friend can show us any good reason why the public should be subjected to having this imposed upon them instead of butter, then the ground which he has taken would be tenable; but the experience of the Department of Agriculture has established this beyond question—that this product is of no advantage whatever to the consuming public, and costs quite as much, and affords one of the most prolific materials which can be supplied for the perpetration of fraud.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The proposition of the leader of the Government is a fair one. If the Government is going to allow fraud to be perpetrated, then the law is advisable. But why not direct your efforts against fraud? If I want to buy, at 18 or 20 or 16 cents, a pound of butterine—which to my taste is just as good as butter at 45 cents—why should the Government step in and say I cannot get it? The leader of the Government says, 'but there may be fraud.' Then let the action of the Government be directed against the fraud. I have the right to buy in the cheapest market, and I think with the senator from Halifax that the poor man should be allowed to buy in the cheapest market. If there is fraud at all in the transaction, in the selling or making of it, then it is up to the Government to provide against that fraud, but not against the manufacture and selling of it.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—For a great many years the Dairy Associations of Ontoria and Quebec and the other provinces have taken up this matter in order to eliminate the manufacture of anything of a fraudulent character. They have endeavoured to encourage the making of nothing but a fancy quality of good butter from healthy animals, and to see that this is placed on the market in the best condition. Now this Bill does not interfere with anything that has been the law since 1886. We passed a law prohibiting the manufacture, sale or importation of butterine or any other substitute in the shape of butter. The consequence is that we have never been bothered with this kind of thing. This Bill consolidates those Bills, and allows the milk to be manufactured into all the different articles in connection with the dairy business. We used to have milk for butter and cheese—which are the two principal articles for which milk was used—but to-day the milk goes to the cities in large quantities, and we want to have the cities understand that the animals which produce this milk are healthy, that the food that those animals consume is wholesome, and that those goods, in every possible way, are made in the very latest and best possible manner, so that nothing but wholesome substances can go to the market in Canada as Canadian goods. In that way we have established our name, and got a reputation for the finest goods that have been shipped to the old country. We have sent to the old country from Canada 87 per cent of all the cheese that is imported there. We have not been able to manufacture as much butter as has been consumed in our own country but with the West importing cows, as it is at the present time, and with the establishment of creameries in Alberta especially, the West will to able to manufacture all the butter they want for their own use; we hope in Canada in the near future to produce all the dairy products we require. We ought to do not only that, but manufacture also a large quantity for export. The only way we can do that and hold the market is to manufacture only wholesome products and stop all fraudulent processes. Last year there was an establishment in Montreal that we suppressed. It produced what they called 'process' butter. They got the rolls from the farmers, washed the butter, melted it and recast it, and it contained 40 per cent water in some cases, whereas 16 per cent of water is all that ought to be in wholesome butter. They turned that product out and marketed it the morning it was moulded. If it had been held for two or three days it would have been unfit for food. We put a stop to that kind of work, and only the genuine article is allowed to be sold. This measure is for the purpose of having our dairy products kept up to a high standard—to have the milk that is sold to the cheese factories, dairies and other institutions absolutely pure. In that way we shall make only good products in Canada and establish a good reputation, and our people will know that any dairy products they get shall be wholesome and of the best quality. This Bill is all right and should go through as it is to-day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I hope the hon. gentleman from Halifax will not insist on his amendment. I remember there was considerable discussion when this prohibition was first incorporated in the law, and it was received with almost unanimous approval throughout the country. I do not see that we have any interest in helping the manufacturer of a spurious article. The country is better without anything of the kind. My hon. friend speaks of butter being very dear at certain seasons of the year. That is true, if he refers to the best butter, but though one has to pay 40 or 45 cents per pound for the best article, he can get butter not quite so good for less.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is something much worse than margarine.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, it is wholesome, but not equal in quality to the high-priced article. While we are not sure that margarine and other substitutes for butter are wholesome, we know that the latter is, and for the that reason I stand by the law as it is.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What about the poor man who cannot afford to pay 45 cents a pound for his butter?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He can get an article that is wholesome, though not quite as fine in quality, for 25 cents a pound.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I gather the impression that the hon. gentleman from Brockville (Hon. Mr. Derbyshire) must have been consulted by the minister from the enthusiastic way in which he supports this measure. The hon. gentleman left two or three facts out of sight. In 1886 we were building up an export trade in butter and cheese, and it was very desirable that the reputation of our products, not only butter and cheese, should stand as high as possible. Nowadays Canada does not export butter; Canada imports butter, and the hon. gentleman in setting his face against the manufacture or importation of perfectly harmless articles, which do not pretend to be what they are not, is really helping out the farmers of New Zealand and Australia. The Canadian farmer does not need to be protected against these things now. If he needs any protection, I should say it would be against the butter from New Zealand and Australia. The law is an improper infringement upon the liberty of the subject. If I choose to buy oleomargarine or butterine, I do not see why I should not be allowed to do so. I do it with my eyes open. In England the sale of these products is permitted, but there are penalties for representing them to be anything but what they are. I think this clause is a highly objectionable enactment.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—If my hon. friend were down in Chicago, where the cholera hogs have been brought in and boiled up and made into butterine and sold for eighteen cents, I think he would be satisfied with the law, because the product so obtained is not a wholesome thing. These blessed things do not die; they are not killed, but they kind of peter out, and are then melted up and made into butter, and sold as oleomargarine. We do not want that kind of stuff made in Canada, and do not want any one to sell it. If I had my way we would never allow manufacturers in Canada to boil up hogs that die of cholera, and every other blessed thing that dies. We should stay by the good sound article in Canada, and not permit such mixtures as they have in the United States, and so spoil our reputation.
