L. Macauley and J. E. Lawson Decry King's "5-Cent Speech"

Federal Member Tells West York Conservatives Party Will Not Stand For Pandering to Any Class or Group

Leo Macauley, M.P.P. for South York, and J. Earl Lawson, M.P. for West York, at the annual convention of West York Conservatives in Rawlinson School Saturday afternoon took occasion to decry Premier King's attitude toward Tory provinces as manifested in his recent "five-cent speech."

"Any government should be big enough to give relief to a distressed people regardless of party," declared Mr. Lawson. "Premier King's refusal to give a five-cent piece to any Conservative Government indicates that the bread line and the wives and families behind it could not be seen."

Mr. Macauley said: "It did not hesitate to saddle the province with a substantial number of old age pensions, but would not grant a nickel to any Tory provincial government for unemployment.

WILL OPPOSE IMPORTATION.

Speaking of the Conservative platform in the next Federal elections, Mr. Lawson stated that one of its main planks would be a policy combatting the importation of "two dollars worth of goods from any country to which Canada is exporting only a dollar's worth."

Continuing he said: "Furthermore, the Conservative party will not permit any foreign power to obtain economic control of this country. There will be no pandering to any class or group which would sever ties between component parts of the Empire."

SHOULD GET BENEFIT OF DOUBT..

Touching on the proposed amendments to the Pension Act, the Federal member expressed the opinion that disabled returned men who had been regarded as physically fit upon enlistment should be given the benefit of any doubt to the extent that their ailments be conceded as caused by service.

Intimation of a broadening of the Provincial Government's program of social legislation were made by Mr. Macauley.

He also mentioned the increased consciousness of responsibility to the citizens of Ontario on the part of members of Parliament because of the large majority in the House. "We feel that it is necessary to keep in close touch with the people who are the life and root of the political tree."

J. R. MacNicol spoke on the force and power held by politicians in the Dominion, adding that the politicians and the citizens should be "one" and rule in unison.

WILL SUPPORT LAWSON.

Capt. W. W. Parry said he would lend his enthusiastic support to Mr. Lawson at next Saturday's convention of West York Federals at Weston. For this he was duly thanked by Mr. Lawson.

The annual election of officers resulted in returns by acclamation for W. K. Shannon, president; Ralph Russell, 1st vice-president; Mrs. William Jarvis, 2nd vice-president; Joseph Turner, 3rd vice-president; Kenneth V. Stratton, secretary; J. Bachelor, treasurer; A. H. Keith Russell and W. T. Roberts, auditors.

Mrs. F. Roberts and Mrs. W. Ball were selected as representatives on the executive until such time as a constitutional amendment can be made admitting more women.

THE "NICKEL" POLICY ADOPTED BY JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER.

Dr. Kaiser, the member of the House of Commons for Ontario County, notes in his humorous way the fact that John D. Rockefeller changed from dimes to nickels the gauge of his Easter giving to the multitude. The patriarch's bounty lost nothing of its lustre, though it graded but fifty per cent. of its former exchange value. The glittering nickels were fresh from the mint. It struck Dr. Kaiser that Mr. Rockefeller may have read the "five-cent" speech delivered in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister of Canada who, in the war-time, was employed by the Rockefeller Foundation. Not unnaturally the billionaire might be inclined to scale his giving more nearly in accordance with the ideas of the former economist of the Foundation which bears the Rockefeller name. In fairness to John D., however, it must be said that he did give five-cent pieces in his Easter largess, whereas Mr. King declared that he would not give so much as one of these coins to help any Tory provincial Government to relieve unemployment within its jurisdiction.

Scotch On Nickels Limit On Millions

Premier King's Words Had No Idle Meaning Declares Member.

Canadian Press by Direct Wire.

TORONTO, April 23.—"Premier King is not using many idle words. Those seemingly idle words shot out the other day have a lot of meaning in them," said T. M. Cayley, M.P., South Oxford, addressing the final session of the annual meeting of the Ontario Women's Liberal Association here today. "Although he may be Scotch when it comes to nickels, when it comes to millions he stops at nothing," he added.

The speaker paid great tribute to Premier King for his treatment of the Maritimes and the many millions granted that part of the Dominion to help re-establish prosperity and the welfare of the people on the eastern seaboard.

Harry Sifton, prominent Ontario Liberal, spoke on the St. Lawrence Waterway. He deplored the stand of cities which opposed the development of that waterway from selfish motives. He charged Premier G. Howard Ferguson had changed his mind on the scheme from favoring it at the start to opposing it and hampering Premier King in the latter's efforts to get the scheme underway.

In the speaker's opinion, Premier Taschereau of Quebec, is making a great mistake opposing the plan. With the development of the waterway, power would be available at $13.24 per horsepower and free navigation as against the present price of $15 and no navigation, Mr. Sifton declared.

If Mr. King is returned with a mandate for the making of a treaty, Mr. Sifton predicted that there would be $650,000,000 spent in the next 10 years and the 4,000,000 horsepower made available would provide 1,500,000 new jobs—10 times the number of unemployed in Canada today.

THAT "FIVE CENT PIECE" STATEMENT

Tory propagandists are busily engaged manufacturing election material out of a statement of Premier King in the House of Commons recently to the effect that he would not give a five cent piece to any Conservative provincial administration for spending purposes. The Prime Minister made the statement, made it deliberately, and he was right. For making it he has been congratulated by leading Liberals all over Canada and for days was deluged with telegrams commending him for his frank and courageous pronouncement. Placed in their context—the Tories are quoting the bald statement out of its context to give a false impression—the three penetrating words bothering our High Protectionist friends so much possess a real significance. The more the matter is discussed the more will the people be convinced that the time had arrived when it was the bounden duty of Premier King to tell local Conservative Governments where they were at with regard to the Dominion exchequer. One interesting admission by the Tory press since the discussion commenced is that in their estimation the Co-operative Government at Regina is a Conservative administration. After arguing the opposite for months they now, to make Prime Minister King's remarks applicable to this province, tell us Saskatchewan is governed by a group of Tories—not Co-operators. The truth has at last come out and again the people are being told that they have been treated to one more dose of "gold-bricking" pottage.

Premier King's words make plain the financial policy of the Liberal Government. They indicate that there is a provincial area within which Provincial Governments must finance that is mind their own business and look after their affairs resolutely and economically. The Dominion Government according to Premier King has likewise its own financial and business domain. Within each of these domains the particular Government in power provincially and Federally is supreme and constitutionally should know enough to embark on policies financially sound and aggressive. The Dominion Liberal party has followed this course for eight years and saved millions and cut taxation more millions. Moreover, the Federal Government is shouldering almost one hundred per cent of the cost of the war—the average provincial government getting off practically scott free. Every dollar handed over by Premier King to a Tory Provincial Government—and this is Prime Minister King's clear conception of the case—means a dollar lost towards paying pensions and allowances to the disabled and unemployable veterans of Canada.

exploitation of the natural resources should result in the development of pulpwood, ceramic, and hydro-electric possibilities of the north. Emphasis should now be placed on Saskatchewan's growth industrially, stated Mr. Sheldrake.

Commissioner Neff concurred in the witness' suggestion that industrial development would enlarge the scope and might even create the need for skilled artizans from the Old Country.

R. Bloomfield, supervisor of the local labor exchange, declared that this spring had seen the heaviest labor surplus he had experienced since 1919. This he attributed to an unusually early spring which enabled the farmer to put the crop in without extra help, and also the general financial condition of the country, and to the extensive use of modern ma-

MANY IMPROVEMENTS

Still operating under the old name of Empress Theatre, North Battleford's only playhouse will in the next few weeks undergo many alterations, bringing it up to the standard of the city theatres operated by the famous Players Canadian Corporation Limited, under whose direction the theatre is now being conducted. Mr. H. M. Thomas, western district

Again, every dollar mulcted from the Federal treasury for Technical Education, Unemployment, a trans-Canada Highway, etc.—all purely provincial questions constitutionally speaking in their essence—can only leave one dollar less at the disposal of the Federal Government with which to meet obligations totalling millions upon millions for War Principal, War Interest, Pensions and Allowances to widows, dependents and children, and scores of other legitimate developments intimately concerned with the upbuilding of the Dominion. It is time enough for the Dominion Government to contribute to entirely provincial undertakings when a financial survey of the financial resources of any province proves beyond a doubt constructive action ought to be taken. And when this fact is proved any help should be given by way increased subsidies—not free-for-all grants to every Tom, Dick and Harry proposition imaginable.

If Tory Governments provincially are to be allowed to resolute and propagandize continually for the purpose of drawing upon the Liberal financial reserves at Ottawa, instead of financing for their own needs, where would such a policy ultimately lead to? It would disorganize the finances of the nation and bankrupt the Federal Parliament. The thing is preposterous and one wonders how apparently people of gumption can be misled by any such moonshine. If any provincial Government is incompetent enough to not know how to finance its own purely provincial projects it ought to be kicked out of office without ceremony. And that is about the position any advocate of constantly digging into the Federal funds for provincial measures takes when he argues for a continuation of any such policy—simply interceding financially for a few partisan buccaneers who are in the last analysis spendthrifts governmentally with regard to their own monies and anxious to do the same thing with the money saved by wise administration and a policy of moderation and common sense federally. When the people of Canada understand the pith and truth back of Premier King's words, political opponents who have been and are trying to manufacture election material out of them will find they have been indulging in a boomerang—every explosion of sound and fury but sufficing to blow up their hastily constructed fortifications and to hurl all kinds of badly digested protectionist debris against their election citadel already shaking mid the storm.

ITS HEART HARDENED AGAINST THE VICTIMS OF ITS TARIFF POLICY.

The MacDonald Government refuses to help the British unemployed by protecting British industry against foreign competition in the home market. But it willingly raises money on the national credit to keep up the disbursements on the dole account. The Mackenzie King Government does nothing for the Canadian unemployed. It has given our workers' home market to strangers, and when direct financial assistance to the unemployed is asked, the premier's non-pertinent and impertinent answer is: "Not a "five-cent piece to any Tory Government." The problem presented by our unemployed is a national one. It is largely the creation of the national Government, which has exclusive jurisdiction over legislation that pertains to trade and commerce. Many a Canadian family has been brought to want by the King Government's tariff-tinkering in favor of the United States. And now that Government has not a five-cent piece for the unemployed who live in provinces under Conservative Government.

L. Macauley and J. E. Lawson Decry King's "5-Cent Speech"

Federal Member Tells West York Conservatives Party Will Not Stand For Pandering to Any Class or Group

Leo Macauley, M.P.P. for South York, and J. Earl Lawson, M.P. for West York, at the annual convention of West York Conservatives in Rawlinson School Saturday afternoon took occasion to decry Premier King's attitude toward Tory provinces as manifested in his recent "five-cent speech."

"Any government should be big enough to give relief to a distressed people regardless of party," declared Mr. Lawson. "Premier King's refusal to give a five-cent piece to any Conservative Government indicates that the bread line and the wives and families behind it could not be seen."

Mr. Macauley said: "It did not hesitate to saddle the province with a substantial number of old age pensions, but would not grant a nickel to any Tory provincial government for unemployment.

WILL OPPOSE IMPORTATION.

Speaking of the Conservative platform in the next Federal elections, Mr. Lawson stated that one of its main planks would be a policy combatting the importation of "two dollars worth of goods from any country to which Canada is exporting only a dollar's worth."

Continuing he said: "Furthermore, the Conservative party will not permit any foreign power to obtain economic control of this country. There will be no pandering to any class or group which would sever ties between component parts of the Empire."

.SHOULD GET BENEFIT OF DOUBT..

Touching on the proposed amendments to the Pension Act, the Federal member expressed the opinion that disabled returned men who had been regarded as physically fit upon enlistment should be given the benefit of any doubt to the extent that their ailments be conceded as caused by service.

Intimation of a broadening of the Provincial Government's program of social legislation were made by Mr. Macauley.

He also mentioned the increased consciousness of responsibility to the citizens of Ontario on the part of members of Parliament because of the large majority in the House. "We feel that it is necessary to keep in close touch with the people who are the life and root of the political tree."

J. R. MacNicol spoke on the force and power held by politicians in the Dominion, adding that the politicians and the citizens should be "one" and rule in unison.

WILL SUPPORT LAWSON.

Capt. W. W. Parry said he would lend his enthusiastic support to Mr. Lawson at next Saturday's convention of West York Federals at Weston. For this he was duly thanked by Mr. Lawson.

The annual election of officers resulted in returns by acclamation for W. K. Shannon, president; Ralph Russell, 1st vice-president; Mrs. William Jarvis, 2nd vice-president; Joseph Turner, 3rd vice-president; Kenneth V. Stratton, secretary; J. Bachelor, treasurer; A. H. Keith Russell and W. T. Roberts, auditors.

Mrs. F. Roberts and Mrs. W. Ball were selected as representatives on the executive until such time as a constitutional amendment can be made admitting more women.

THE "NICKEL" POLICY ADOPTED BY JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER.

Dr. Kaiser, the member of the House of Commons for Ontario County, notes in his humorous way the fact that John D. Rockefeller changed from dimes to nickels the gauge of his Easter giving to the multitude. The patriarch's bounty lost nothing of its lustre, though it graded but fifty per cent. of its former exchange value. The glittering nickels were fresh from the mint. It struck Dr. Kaiser that Mr. Rockefeller may have read the "five-cent" speech delivered in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister of Canada who, in the war-time, was employed by the Rockefeller Foundation. Not unnaturally the billionaire might be inclined to scale his giving more nearly in accordance with the ideas of the former economist of the Foundation which bears the Rockefeller name. In fairness to John D., however, it must be said that he did give five-cent pieces in his Easter largess, whereas Mr. King declared that he would not give so much as one of these coins to help any Tory provincial Government to relieve unemployment within its jurisdiction.

Scotch On Nickels Limit On Millions

Premier King's Words Had No Idle Meaning Declares Member.

Canadian Press by Direct Wire.

TORONTO, April 23.—"Premier King is not using many idle words. Those seemingly idle words shot out the other day have a lot of meaning in them," said T. M. Cayley, M.P., South Oxford, addressing the final session of the annual meeting of the Ontario Women's Liberal Association here today. "Although he may be Scotch when it comes to nickels, when it comes to millions he stops at nothing," he added.

The speaker paid great tribute to Premier King for his treatment of the Maritimes and the many millions granted that part of the Dominion to help re-establish prosperity and the welfare of the people on the eastern seaboard.

Harry Sifton, prominent Ontario Liberal, spoke on the St. Lawrence Waterway. He deplored the stand of cities which opposed the development of that waterway from selfish motives. He charged Premier G. Howard Ferguson had changed his mind on the scheme from favoring it at the start to opposing it and hampering Premier King in the latter's efforts to get the scheme underway.

In the speaker's opinion, Premier Taschereau of Quebec, is making a great mistake opposing the plan. With the development of the waterway, power would be available at $13.24 per horsepower and free navigation as against the present price of $15 and no navigation, Mr. Sifton declared.

If Mr. King is returned with a mandate for the making of a treaty, Mr. Sifton predicted that there would be $650,000,000 spent in the next 10 years and the 4,000,000 horsepower made available would provide 1,500,000 new jobs—10 times the number of unemployed in Canada today.

THAT "FIVE CENT PIECE" STATEMENT

Tory propagandists are busily engaged manufacturing election material out of a statement of Premier King in the House of Commons recently to the effect that he would not give a five cent piece to any Conservative provincial administration for spending purposes. The Prime Minister made the statement, made it deliberately, and he was right. For making it he has been congratulated by leading Liberals all over Canada and for days was deluged with telegrams commending him for his frank and courageous pronouncement. Placed in their context—the Tories are quoting the bald statement out of its context to give a false impression—the three penetrating words bothering our High Protectionist friends so much possess a real significance. The more the matter is discussed the more will the people be convinced that the time had arrived when it was the bounden duty of Premier King to tell local Conservative Governments where they were at with regard to the Dominion exchequer. One interesting admission by the Tory press since the discussion commenced is that in their estimation the Co-operative Government at Regina is a Conservative administration. After arguing the opposite for months they now, to make Prime Minister King's remarks applicable to this province, tell us Saskatchewan is governed by a group of Tories—not Co-operators. The truth has at last come out and again the people are being told that they have been treated to one more dose of "gold-bricking" pottage.

Premier King's words make plain the financial policy of the Liberal Government. They indicate that there is a provincial area within which Provincial Governments must finance that is mind their own business and look after their affairs resolutely and economically. The Dominion Government according to Premier King has likewise its own financial and business domain. Within each of these domains the particular Government in power provincially and Federally is supreme and constitutionally should know enough to embark on policies financially sound and aggressive. The Dominion Liberal party has followed this course for eight years and saved millions and cut taxation more millions. Moreover, the Federal Government is shouldering almost one hundred per cent of the cost of the war—the average provincial government getting off practically scott free. Every dollar handed over by Premier King to a Tory Provincial Government—and this is Prime Minister King's clear conception of the case—means a dollar lost towards paying pensions and allowances to the disabled and unemployable veterans of Canada.

exploitation of the natural resources should result in the development of pulpwood, ceramic, and hydro-electric possibilities of the north. Emphasis should now be placed on Saskatchewan's growth industrially, stated Mr. Sheldrake.

Commissioner Neff concurred in the witness' suggestion that industrial development would enlarge the scope and might even create the need for skilled artizans from the Old Country.

R. Bloomfield, supervisor of the local labor exchange, declared that this spring had seen the heaviest labor surplus he had experienced since 1919. This he attributed to an unusually early spring which enabled the farmer to put the crop in without extra help, and also the general financial condition of the country, and to the extensive use of modern ma-

Again, every dollar mulcted from the Federal treasury for Technical Education, Unemployment, a trans-Canada Highway, etc.—all purely provincial questions constitutionally speaking in their essence—can only leave one dollar less at the disposal of the Federal Government with which to meet obligations totalling millions upon millions for War Principal, War Interest, Pensions and Allowances to widows, dependents and children, and scores of other legitimate developments intimately concerned with the upbuilding of the Dominion. It is time enough for the Dominion Government to contribute to entirely provincial undertakings when a financial survey of the financial resources of any province proves beyond a doubt constructive action ought to be taken. And when this fact is proved any help should be given by way increased subsidies—not free-for-all grants to every Tom, Dick and Harry proposition imaginable.

If Tory Governments provincially are to be allowed to resolute and propagandize continually for the purpose of drawing upon the Liberal financial reserves at Ottawa, instead of financing for their own needs, where would such a policy ultimately lead to? It would disorganize the finances of the nation and bankrupt the Federal Parliament. The thing is preposterous and one wonders how apparently people of gumption can be misled by any such moonshine. If any provincial Government is incompetent enough to not know how to finance its own purely provincial projects it ought to be kicked out of office without ceremony. And that is about the position any advocate of constantly digging into the Federal funds for provincial measures takes when he argues for a continuation of any such policy—simply interceding financially for a few partisan buccaneers who are in the last analysis spendthrifts governmentally with regard to their own monies and anxious to do the same thing with the money saved by wise administration and a policy of moderation and common sense federally. When the people of Canada understand the pith and truth back of Premier King's words, political opponents who have been and are trying to manufacture election material out of them will find they have been indulging in a boomerang—every explosion of sound and fury but sufficing to blow up their hastily constructed fortifications and to hurl all kinds of badly digested protectionist debris against their election citadel already shaking mid the storm.

ITS HEART HARDENED AGAINST THE VICTIMS OF ITS TARIFF POLICY.

The MacDonald Government refuses to help the British unemployed by protecting British industry against foreign competition in the home market. But it willingly raises money on the national credit to keep up the disbursements on the dole account. The Mackenzie King Government does nothing for the Canadian unemployed. It has given our workers' home market to strangers, and when direct financial assistance to the unemployed is asked, the premier's non-pertinent and impertinent answer is: "Not a "five-cent piece to any Tory Government." The problem presented by our unemployed is a national one. It is largely the creation of the national Government, which has exclusive jurisdiction over legislation that pertains to trade and commerce. Many a Canadian family has been brought to want by the King Government's tariff-tinkering in favor of the United States. And now that Government has not a five-cent piece for the unemployed who live in provinces under Conservative Government.

Premier's Tribute to Late Speaker

Premier King issued the following statement yesterday in reference to the deatn of Senator Bostock:

"I was greatly shocked to read this morning of the death of Mr. Speaker Bostock. When the present administration was formed in 1921, Mr. Bostock entered the cabinet as the representative of the province of British Columbia, this office he resigned to accept the position of Speaker of the Senate. We had been close friends for many years up to that time, and our association since has been of the most intimate character. He was at all times the most loyal and helpful of friends and a wise and trusted counsellor."

"The tragic suddenness of Speaker Bostock's death has cast a gloom over Parliament and over the Capital. The announcement has come as a painful shock to all who knew him. For many years the late Speaker was active in the politics of our country. He held an honored place in the public life of the Dominion. His association with Parliament as far back as 1896 made him a link between the generation of Laurier and those who are most active in public affairs today. He was a man of unimpeachable character and of scholarly attainments and was possessed of fine executive ability. Essentially modest and retiring, kindly and generous in disposition, and ready at all times actively to cooperate in philanthropic and patriotic movements, the late Mr. Bostock won for himself many friends, and was held in universal esteem. As Speaker of the Senate, he upheld with impartiality and dignity the best traditions of that high and honorable office. His death occasions a distinct loss to the public life of Canada and will be felt in all parts of our country.

Five Cent Piece Again Figures In Breezy Incident

Repartee Between Premier King and Hon. R. B. Bennett When Alta. Resources Bill Is Under Discussion.

A brief but breezy interlude on the subject of donating five-cent pieces to the provinces, featured debate on the Alberta natural resources bill, in the House of Commons yesterday. Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader, was discussing the matter. In the course of his speech, he asserted that Sir Robert Borden, when endeavoring to solve the natural resources problem in 1913, met with some difficulty because two of the Western Provinces had Liberal governments.

"He would not give them a five-cent piece," interjected Premier Mackenzie King from across the aisle.

"I am bound to say that his conception of his position was somewhat higher than that," warmly responded Mr. Bennett. "He did not look upon the office of Prime Minister as being one which permitted him to speak to the people in terms of five-cent pieces."

"I would point out to my friend that under these acts we are giving these Western Provinces millions of dollars," was the retort of Mr. King.

"I would point out," countered Mr. Bennett, "that this government is giving them nothing; that is a difference. When legislation is enacted which confers rights upon the people, the right honorable gentleman seems to think that he is the god bountiful. When he said the other day, 'I would not give a five-cent piece,' one realized that after all, power has its disadvantages because it sometimes causes those, who for a few brief moments in this great world of ours find themselves in a position of power and authority, to believe that they have that which they do not possess, or that they have authority which they cannot exercise."

Mr. King did not respond to this, and discussion turned to another phase of the matter.

Leadership

The Canadian Premier has announced an early general election. It is not necessary this year, but Mr. Mackenzie King, who is one of the most astute of party leaders, has surveyed the field and is convinced of the favourable conditions now prevailing for his side. The decision to appeal to the electorate is undoubtedly Mr. King's and his alone. The Conservatives have been without an effective head ever since the retirement of Sir Robert Borden. Mr. Bennett, their present leader, is inexperienced and is no match for Mr. Mackenzie King, who has contrived to annex for the Liberals the strategic value of the fierce Canadian resentment against the United States tariff now going through, as well as—by a stroke of grotesque irony—the sequelæ of Mr. J. H. Thomas's visit of last summer and the humours of our Empire Crusaders at home. To those Canadian Conservatives whose memories go back to the Reciprocity election of 1911 and the encounters between Laurier and Borden, the coming Mackenzie King campaign must seem like a nightmare. It is possible, of course, that the prospects of the Liberals may not be so satisfactory later in the summer as they appear to-day. But Mr. King has made certain of a general election which will turn largely upon hostility to the commercial policy of the United States and closer trade relations with the mother country.

Finance Scheme Of Province Bad Says N. Waterloo Member

S. C. Tweed Host To 200 Party Workers; Confidence Voiced In Premier King And Leader Sinclair

Two hundred North Waterloo workers in the campaign of last October in which S. C. Tweed, member for the riding in the provincial house, was elected, last evening gathered at a unique event at the Walper House as guests of the member. The occasion as the program progressed assumed a dual nature, first an expression of gratitude by Mr. Tweed for the assistance rendered the Liberal party and its candidate and second complimentary references to Mr. Tweed and his agressiveness in the legislature where he has taken a prominent part in the debates on the opposition side.

The gathering at the same time went on record with resolutions endorsing Premier King and W. E. N. Sinclair, Liberal leader in the provincial house. References were made by President Hilliard of the North Waterloo Liberal Association, H. J. Sims, K.C., and J. C. Haight, K.C., to the facts that North Waterloo claims Premier King as its native son and that the constituency in addition has sent Hon. W. D. Euler, minister of national revenue, to Ottawa to whom tribute was paid for his ability and efficiency in the administration of his department. Following the addresses by these wellknown members of the Liberal party of the riding Findlay Sim, a member of the local branch of the Twentieth Century Liberal Club, delivered an eloquent address in which he touched on the accomplishments of the Liberal party and its leaders and he made an appeal to young men to interest themselves in their country, taking up the Liberal cause and joining the young Liberal men's organization.

The principal address of the evening was delivered by Mr. Tweed. The member was preceded by Dr. McQuibbon, Alma, member for North East Wellington, who touched on the assistance that the member for North Waterloo has been to the party in regard to the criticism of the Ferguson government's financial policies. The member in addition struck an optimistic note with respect to the future of the Liberal party adding that with men in its ranks of the calibre of Mr. Tweed it's future was assured.

During the proceedings prior to the addresses Lang's orchestra rendered selections. The meeting concluded with the singing of "O Canada" and the audience giving three cheers for Mr. Tweed.

Confidence In Premier King

The following resolution of confidence in Premier King submitted by H. J. Sims, K.C., and J. C. Haight, K.C., was carried on an unanimous and standing vote:

"That this meeting of Liberals of North Waterloo desires to express, at the outset of the campaign for the approaching general election for the house of commons, its utmost confidence in the Liberal leader and Premier of Canada, Right Honorable W. L. MacKenzie King. During the past ten years his wise statesmanship, his broad knowledge of public affairs, both domestic and international, and his judicious direction of the business of the government have united to promote greater unity of feeling among the people of the provinces of the Dominion, and to enhance the prosperity of the Canadian people. Under his premiership the position of Canada among the nations of the world has also been notably advanced, and its leadership among the Dominions of the British Commonwealth has been maintained and strengthened. Firmly believing that a continuance of his policies and leadership are indispensable to the continued welfare and prosperity of the Canadian people, we pledge him our hearty support in the coming election, with the fullest confidence that the Canadian people, will by an emphatic majority, call him and his government to a further term of service."

Leader Sinclair Endorsed

The following was the resolution endorsing Mr. Sinclair as the Liberal leader in the provincial field, the spokesman being E. E. Ratz and V. H. Hattin:

"That this gathering of Liberals of North Waterloo unite in declaring their unwavering confidence in their leader in the Ontario field, W. E. N. Sinclair, K.C. His leadership of his party in the provincial legislature, and in the recent provincial general election, has been marked by a display of those qualities of direct thinking, clear expression, stroug convictions of the soundness of his views, and moderation combined with firmness in supporting them, which go far to make leadership effective and successful; and tho not yet able to make his views and policies prevail with the majority of the voters of his province, he has laid well the foundations of future success. We assure him of our continued support of his leadership of the Liberal party in provincial affairs, with every confidence that his services to the party and his province will at no distant date be recognized as it has deserved."

Member Reviews Measures

Mr. Tweed the member for North Waterloo gave an interesting account of the proceedings in the legislature in the last session the feature of which was the scrutiny thru which the government measures and program was put by the handful of opposition members under the leadership of Mr. Sinclair. Incidentally he alluded to signs that Premier Ferguson's government conscious of its numerical strength was placing itself in a position and in an attitude that was not conducive to good government. Referring to the Liberal party and its leader, Mr. Sinclair, he remarked:

"The Liberal party is the party o reform and progress, or if you like the party of 'uplift'. When the Liberal party ceases to be the party o reform it will pass out of existence. The defeat of the Liberal party on October 30 last may prove a good thing for the provincial Liberal party. All the disloyal elements were eliminated. The 12 members are a unit in supporting Mr. Sinclair. There has been a good deal of criticism of the Liberal leader, Mr. Sinclair. If you will look back over political history, you will find that all leaders have been criticized when they do not win. At the present time we find that the great Conservative party is not sure that their present leader, Mr. Bennett, will lead them out of the wilderness. If the people of Ontario knew Mr. Sinclair and appreciated him as the 12 members in the legislature do, he would be Premier of Ontario.

"With one or two exceptions, every member of the Opposition took part in the debate on the speech from the throne and the debate on the budget, in fact, many of the opposition members took part in both debates. On the government side, at least 70 members, including several members of the cabinet, were not heard during the session. The government of Ontario has been referred to many times as a "one-man government" but during the past session, we had the experience of hearing one of the new members from Toronto refer to this and say that the Conservative party was proud of the fact that they had a man at the head of the government who was strong enough to be called a "one-man government."

The North Waterloo member then criticized the Ferguson government for not acting sooner than it had in prosecutions of brokers who were breaking the law. He stated that it was significant that Hon. Mr. Price, treasurer, had said that they were not going to allow "them to get ahead of themselves" and had taken action only several hours before the Waterloo meeting at which Mr. Sinclair outlined the brokerage situation to the electors of North Waterloo. It was also important to note that the government's security frauds prevention act was along the very lines suggested by Mr. Sinclair a year previously.

Taxation Will Be Next Issue

Mr. Tweed expressed the view that the next election in provincial circles would be fought on taxation stating that the taxes were growing from year to year and that the time had arrived when there must be a halt.

Capitalization Scheme Criticised

The member referring to the financial administration of the treasury department remarked:

"In the budget addresses of the past seven years the provincial treasurer has had a great deal to say about better bookkeeping and accounting methods that have been adopted by the Ferguson government. As an illustration of the accounting practice of the present Ontario government, I would refer you to the balance sheet on page six of the public accounts, October 31, 1929. Under the head of capital assets, we find that the annual subsidy and grant under the B. N. A. Act has been capitalized at five percent and two items of $4,800,000 and $45,203,944, totalling $50,003,944 placed in the statement as an asset. These items are not realizable nor are they income producing assets but merely represent the capitalization of income. The first is derived from the fixed allowance of $240,000 per year and the second from the allowance of 60 cents and 80 cents per head of population. Large but fictitious assets could be shown by capitalizing the succession duty or corporation tax receipts in a similar way. These items were introduced into the balance sheet by the present government in the accounts of October 31, 1923. Alberta and British Columbia are the only other provinces which resort to this practice. In the case of British Columbia, the provincial auditor has recommended to the present government that these items be taken out of their statement of capital assets. The Dominion government properly does not consider any capital liability of this kind."

Principle Not Perfect

Another illustration of wrong principle, the member said, was in regard to the gasoline tax to which he referred as follows:

"The Ontario laws, also the laws of some other provinces, limit the tax to gasoline and other fuels (excepting only kerosense) which are derived from petroleum or natural gas. The laws of Quebec, Nova Scotia and perhaps some others, extend the tax to other liquids used as motor fuel. Thus liquid fuels which are derived from coal tar cannot be taxed under the Ontario law, but from the wording of the acts of Quebec and Nova Scotia I suppose they can be taxed there. Coal tar is obtained when bituminous coal is converted into coke, and it is broken up or refined into a great number of chemicals, some of which have a value as fuel as well as for other purposes. One of these is benzol. Benzol is used extensively for fuel in Nova Scotia, likely for ships and stationary engines. I believe it is also used in various parts of Canada for motor cars.

"The point is, that thru the limited wording of the Ontario law it is now possible to run a vehicle on the roads without paying gas tax, or by paying only in proportion to the gasoline in the fuel. I do not know of any of the oil companies using coal tar liquid such as benzol in their fuels, but in these days when so many mixtures are being sold it might be done, and there is a loop-hole in the Ontario law at present."

West Optimistic

Mr. Tweed then touched briefly on the federal situation which he said was bright. He urged the workers who had supported him to get behind Hon. Mr. Euler, minister of national revenue, and return him in the coming election by the biggest majority he has yet received. He informed the workers he had returned from a trip thru the Canadian west and he had to report an enthusiasm over the present federal administration and an optimism over crops and general trade conditions which was significant. Reading between the lines of financial journals one could note the fact is taken for granted that the present federal government would be returned to office in the coming election.

ACTIONS BETTER THAN WORDS

In some Conservative papers Premier King is reported to have said something with regard to the amount of money he would, or would not, be willing to give for the relief of unemployment to be administered by Conservative provincial governments.

The comments are indeed amusing, and the puny pygmean agitation suggests the desperate straights to which the Conservative party must be driven in an effort to find some fault with the Government.

It is unnecessary to go outside of Yukon to prove conclusively that the attitude and action of the King Government is the very antithesis of the alleged words of the Premier.

Since first coming into office in 1921 up to the present time, it has been repeatedly asserted by Liberals, not a single government employee of Conservative leanings has been removed from office because of political affiliations. Prior to the election of 1926 the claim was made that under a Liberal government there was only one Liberal employee in the Territory susceptible to patronage influences. Whether or not this was actually true we do not know, but it is a matter of record that during the few weeks the Conservatives were in power in 1926 this particular individual was removed from office,

The magnanimity shown by the King Government has not perhaps been to the liking of some of the Liberals in Yukon, but a little unbiased consideration leads to the conclusion that it has been a good thing for Yukon and it is going to be better. The King Government has been faithfully trying to assist in the development of Yukon and has repeatedly refused to play politics. This is refreshing and encouraging for people who have interests at stake be they large or small.

A splendid proof of this is given elswhere in this issue in the recognition given Hon. Chas. Stewart, Minister of the Interior, by the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, for making the most notable contribution to the advancement of the mining industry of Canada during the past year. Again and again Mr. Stewart has expressed his desire to co-operate in any movement for the development of the mineral resources of Yukon. Development of the mineral resources is the outstanding need of the Territory. Certainly in so far as Yukon is concerned the King Government has tried to serve the people rather than advance the interests of the Liberal party.

And Yukoners see in this policy the dawning of a better day, and the cry for a return to the days of political manipulation is becoming more feeble every hour.

Whatever the words of Premier King his actions in Yukon are just what Yukon needs. And it is with actions that Yukoners are concerned.

The Conciliation Method

An outstanding characteristic of Premier King has always been a belief in the wisdom and the possibilities of conciliation. The latest evidence of this is the announcement that a conciliation council will be appointed to consider all grievances of Dominion civil servants. It will include representatives of the civil servants and of the Government.

It was to labor disputes that Mr. King first applied the principle of conciliation when, as Deputy Minister of Labor, he framed the Industrial Disputes Conciliation Act, commonly known as the Lemieux Act, after Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux who was Minister of Labor at that time.

Since he became head of the Government, he has used the same method in removing the grievances of different sections of the country.

When discontent was becoming very serious in the Maritime Provinces from a feeling that they were receiving less than just treatment from the Dominion, he appointed a commission to hear and give sympathetic consideration to a statement of these grievances by public authorities and private interests in the Maritimes. As a result of that inquiry and the action taken upon the commission's recommendations, the discontent has been removed, great appreciation is felt for the measures taken by the Dominion, and the Maritimes have been working with a new heart towards economic prosperity.

The long-standing resources dispute between the Prairie Provinces and the Dominion has been settled by the same method. By negotiation, an agreement was reached on the basic principle of the settlement in connection with the trans fer of the resources to the provinces. Then a commission was appointed to work out, in an equitable way, the details of the settlement. Where, before, there had been nothing but difference that could not be reconciled, there has been found, as the result of a deliberate effort, a means of removing that difference and reaching a final settlement which is accepted everywhere as satisfactory.

When there was a hitch in the reference to the Supreme Court of the legal dispute between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, on the one hand, and the Dominion on the other, regarding power rights on navigable rivers, Mr. King suggested withdrawing the dispute from the courts and seeing what could be done by a definite effort to get together by negotiation. Two conferences were held at Ottawa for this purpose, at which the three premiers were present, and very satisfactory progress seems to have been made towards an agreement.

The conciliation council to be appointed to consider grievances of the civil servants should perform a useful service. The council will have the means of securing all the facts, every complainant will receive a fair hearing, and when a complaint is fully examined and discussed there should be a good prospect of securing the proper settlement and of removing any feeling that the civil servants cannot obtain redress for real grievances. The Government may not be bound by every recommendation of the council; but it will, no doubt, be guided by it very largely. The step is undertaken by the Government in the right spirit, and if it results in an improvement in the relations between the Government and its thousands of employees it will be well worth while.

PREMIER FERGUSON AND GOVERNMENT IN DOMINION FIGHT

To Oppose Mackenzie King Because of "Five Cent" Speech

SPEAKS AT CONVENTION

Bennett Assails Hypocrisy of Liberals on Tariff Question—Manion Also Present

By THOMAS GREEN,
(Canadian Press Staff Correspondent.)

London, Ont., May 16.—The Ontario Government will throw its whole weight into the Dominion election campaign in protest against the utterance of Premier W. L. Mackenzie King in the House of Commons that he would not "give a five cent piece" for unemployment relief to a province governed by a Conservative provincial administration. In making this announcement before the Western Ontario Conservative Convention today, Premier G. Howard Ferguson stated that his administration had been "driven into" the election by reason of the statement of the Prime Minister who he charged had "degraded" his office.

"The Prime Minister of Canada," Premier Ferguson declared, "said to the public on the floor of the House of Commons that 'unless you vote as I say, you are not entitled to any advantage that may come from the Dominion treasury.' When a Prime Minister so degrades the position he occupies as to stoop to a lower level of public morality than I have ever heard in this country or any other country, particularly Anglo-Saxon, as to say he will not give a five cent piece unless you support him and his party, that is a lowering of public morality that the Canadian people will resent more than they will the tariff issue. I believe that issue is much more important today than any problem for the country.

"Just think of it," he exclaimed. "When I heard of it I could not believe it. When the Leader of the Government at Ottawa made the statement on the floor of the House of Commons some one called 'shame', and then he repeated it—that he would not give a five cent piece to the province of British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Ontario and the old provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia by the seas." The Prime Minister of Canada, Premier Ferguson continued, told the people of these provinces that they would not get a five cent piece from the public treasury because a Conservative provincial Government was in office.

AN INSULT TO CANADA.

"Can any one conceive of such a prostitution of the high position of Prime Minister of Canada?" the premier demanded. "Can you imagine such an endeavor to coerce people to come to his heels on the part of a Prime Minister?" The statment, he proceeded was an "insult to the public intelligence of this country.. That is a bigger issue than anything else, as a matter of fact Mackenzie King is the issue—not the tariff."

Premier Ferguson mentioned the high office occupied by the Prime Minister. If the statement, he said, had been made in heat or on impulse it might possibly be forgotten. "But," the Premier reiterated, "he made it not once, but twice. And he takes an attitude that because one has voted against his party he is going to punish him."

Vigorously assailing the "hypocrisy" of the Liberal Government on the tariff, Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader condemned the "preaching of certain principles and the departure from them to get votes."

Mr. Bennett referred to the vote of certain Liberal members on the budget. "They marched to the penitent bench,' he exclaimed, "and confessed to their sins and now ask the people to vote for them because they have been wrong for nine years. Can you run a country that way?"

The Conservative leader went on: "Is there no such thing as public honor? Is the public honor to be flaunted and laughed at? Is all sense of national honesty to be dragged in the dust for the purposes of a party?" Canadians, he observed, would "strike a blow for the national honor of this country" when the time came.

There would be such a flood of indignation, Mr. Bennett went on, from the people of Canada that it will "sweep this Government from power." He criticized as "deception" provisions in the budget in respect to the British preference proposals.

In a severe castigation of the budget of the Liberal Government, Hon. R. J. Manion (Conservative, Fort William), charged that it was an attempt to "bamboozle the Canadian people once more, and detract attention from the weakness of the King administration in the hope of getting back to power."

"The budget," he declared, "is a strange mixture of free trade and protection, of British preference and American preference, of tariff instability and imbecility." In reality, Dr. Manion continued, it was a "pure political election budget."

Dr. Manion proceeded: "The budget is an insult to tens of thousands of Canadians who look upon Canada as a Dominion and not an annex of the United States." It was a "two-sided political shield," he continued, and the object was "to obtain the support of protectionists and free traders, deceiving one and betraying the other."

Prime Minister Issues Reply To Attack By Ontario Premier

Summarizes His Attitude and That of Federal Govt. Towards Provinces as One of Honest Endeavor to Avoid and Remove All Sources of Controversy and, In Financial Matters, to Be Scrupulously Fair.

In a statement issued last night, Prime Minister Mackenzie King sets forth his own attitude and that of his government toward the provinces. The Prime Minister's statement came in reply to declarations by Premier G. H. Ferguson, of Ontario, from the platform of the Western Ontario Conservative convention, at London. Mr. Ferguson was reported as saying that the Ontario government proposed to throw its weight into the election campaign against the federal government forces, because of Mr. King's "five-cent piece" statement in Parliament.

The Prime Minister summarizes his attitude and that of the federal government towards the provinces, in his final paragraph, as follows:

"In order that there may be no further misrepresentation of my attitude or that of the present administration towards the governments of any of the provinces, whether they be Conservative, Progressive or Liberal, may I say that so long as I continue to occupy the position which I now hold, my own attitude and that of the administration, towards the provinces of our Dominion will continue to be in the future what it has been right along, namely, one of an honest endeavor to avoid and to remove all possible sources of controversy between the provincial and federal governments, and in financial matters to be scrupulously fair, and in so far as the public interest may permit, generous, in the treatment alike of one and all, wholly regardless of the political complexion of the particular administration in office in any of the provinces."

Mr. Kings asserts that he cannot give his attention to Parliament, which is still in session, and conduct a campaign outside, or he would be glad to reply to Mr. Ferguson from the public platform.

The Prime Minister declares that his statements in the House of Commons had relation exclusively to "a then existing situation, and was not to be understood or interpreted as having any other possible application."

The statement of the Prime Minister, in full, follows:

Text of Statement.

"In the Canadian Press report of the Western Ontario Conservative convention, dated London, Ontario, May 16th, which appeared in the press throughout Canada, on the day following it is stated that Premier G. Howard Ferguson of Ontario said that the Ontario government intended to throw its whole weight into the Dominion election campaign in protest against an utterance by myself in the House of Commons to the effect that I would not give a five cent piece for unemployment relief to a province governed by a Conservative provincial administration. The press despatch contains the following in direct quotation from Premier Ferguson's speech:

"'The Prime Minister of Canada said to the public on the floor of the House of Commons that "unless you vote as I say, you are not entitled to any advantage that may come from the Dominion treasury" and again—after referring to the provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Ontario, and the old provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, "The Prime Minister of Canada told the people of these provinces that they would not get a five cent piece from the public treasury because a Conservative provincial government was in office."'

"I am not in a position at the moment to give my attention to the business of Parliament, which is still in session, and at the same time to conduct a campaign outside of Parliament, or I should be pleased to reply to Mr. Ferguson from the public platform. In case, however, silence on my part, even for the present, might be mistaken as acquiescence in the statements made by Mr. Ferguson, I feel called upon immediately to say that the words attributed to me by Mr. Ferguson, or their equivalent, were never used by me at any time or in any place; further that no words of mine spoken in the House of Commons or elsewhere, with respect to unemployment or any other subject, are capable of an interpretation such as the Premier of Ontario has sought to place upon them.

In Debate Aprill 3.

"In the debate on unemployment in the House of Commons on April 3rd, with respect to a situation alleged to be then existing, I pointed out that requests for assistance to meet an emergent condition respecting unemployment had not been received from any provincial government, and I referred in particular to a statement made by Premier Ferguson at Toronto on January 25, at a time when conditions were supposed to be at their worst, to the effect that Ontario was handling its own unemployment problem, which statement I had quoted on February 24th in the debate on the address, and I said that in these circumstances with respect to the then existing situation, federal assistance would not be given to any government, but I made no statement which was capable of being interpreted as applicable to conditions respecting unemployment generally, or as they might arise in the future; or applicable at all to assistance to provincial governments from the federal treasury for any other purpose, or at any other time.

To Existing Situation.

"That I was particularly careful to make it clear that anything I was saying, or had said, had relation exclusively to a then existing situation, and was not to be understood or interpreted as having any other possible application, will be apparent from the statement which appears in Hansard record of debates in the House of Commons, at page 1281, which is the page of Hansard which contains one or two remarks made as a consequence of interruptions in the course of debate, and upon which, and quite apart from the context as a whole, Premier Ferguson has sought to place an entirely false interpretation. The statement is as follows:

"'May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that having regard to the situation as we know it in this country at the present time, we have had no representations from any of the provinces expressing the need for assistance from the federal treasury to meet an unemployment situation, because of an emergency too great to be dealt with by the province itself, and in the absence of that I submit that hon. gentlemen who suggest that anything should be given out of the federal treasury have in support of their position not a leg left to stand on.

Emergent Conditions.

"'There have been times when there have been emergent conditions, and where there have been emergent conditions this government has been quick to recognize them. When we came into power we found in this country a considerable amount of unemployment, a lot of unemployment arising in large part out of circumstances connected with the war. Men were returning from overseas and seeking to get back into civil employment, and there was no opportunity to secure employment for them. We recognized that provincial governments had a problem there with which they could not cope, and when they made representations to us, we met those representations, and here I may tell my hon. friends that we made at that time no difference between Liberal and Conservative. We gave our money just as freely to the Tory governments then as we gave it to the Liberal governments, because there was a necessity to meet and a very different situation prevailing from what there is at the present time in this country.'

Statement Surprising.

"May I say that the statement of Premier Ferguson is the more surprising, made as it is in the light of the agreements recently negotiated by the present administration with the province of British Columbia and the Prairie Provinces, and the treatment accorded the Maritime Provinces in the matter of increased subsidies, under which the financial position of all these provinces has been materially improved. It is particularly surprising, in view of what Mr. Ferguson himself knows of the endeavors of the present administration to remove from the arena of controversy all outstanding matters of difference between the federal and provincial governments. I think I can leave my own record and that of the administration to speak for itself as to the treatment the provinces have received from the federal government since we came into office.

"In order that there may be no further misrepresentation of my attitude or that of the present administration toward the governments of any of the provinces, whether they be Conservative, Progressive or Liberal, may I say that so long as I continue to occupy the position which I now hold, my own attitude and that of the administration towards the provinces of our Dominion will continue to be in the future what it has been right along, namely, one of an honest endeavor to avoid and remove all possible sources of controversy between the provincial and federal governments, and in financial matters to be scrupulously fair, and in so far as the public interest may permit, generous in the treatment alike of one and all, wholly regardless of the political complexion of the particular administration in office in any of the provinces."

PREMIER KING MAKES REPLY TO FERGUSON

Charges Speech in House Was Misrepresented

Famous "Five-Cent Piece" Statement Referred to One Particular Situation

NEVER USED.

I am not in a position at the moment to give any attention to the business of Parliament, which is still in session, and at the same time to conduct a campaign outside of Parliament or I should be pleased to reply to Mr. Ferguson from the public platform. In case, however, silence on my part, even for the present, might be mistaken as acquiescence in the statements made by Mr. Ferguson, I feel called upon immediately to say that the words attributed to me by Mr. Ferguson, or their equivalent, were never used by me at any time or in any place; further, that no words of mine spoken in the House of Commons or elsewhere, with respect to unemployment or any other subject, are capable of an interpretation such as the Premier of Ontario has sought to place upon them.

In the debate on unemployment in the House of Commons on April 3, with respect to a situation alleged to be then existing, I pointed out that requests for assistance to meet an emergent condition respecting unemployment had not been received from any Provincial Government, and I referred in particular to a statement made by Premier Ferguson at Toronto on January 25, at a time when conditions were supposed to be at their worst, to the effect that Ontario was handling its own unemployment problem, which statement I had quoted on February 24 in the debate on the address, and I said that in these circumstances, with respect to the then existing situation, Federal assistance would not be given to any Government, but I made no statement which was capable of being interpreted as applicable to conditions respecting unemployment generally, or as they might arise in the future; or applicable at all to assistance to the Provincial Governments from the Federal Treasury for any other purpose, or at any other time. That I was particularly careful to make it clear that anything I was saying, or had said, had relation exclusively to a then existing situation, and was not to be understood or interpreted as having any other possible application, will be apparent from the statement which appears in Hansard record of debates in the House of Commons at page 1,281, which is the page of Hansard which contains one or two remarks made as a consequence of interruptions in the course of debate, and upon which, and quite apart from the context as a whole, Premier Ferguson has sought to place an entirely false interpretation.

EXCLUSIVE RELATION.

Reference to other portions of the debate, and in particular to the interruptions which occasioned specific reference to Tory Governments, make it abundantly clear that my remarks throughout were in relation exclusively to a situation then existing or as it was alleged to exist, and are not rightly capable of being given any other interpretation.

May I say that the statement of Premier Ferguson is the more surprising, made as it is in the light of the agreements recently negotiated by the present administration with the province of British Columbia and the Prairie provinces, and the treatment accorded the Maritime provinces in the matter of increased subsidies, under which the financial position of all these provinces has been materially improved. It is particularly surprising, in view of what Mr. Ferguson himself knows of the endeavor of the present administration to remove from the arena of controversy all outstanding matters of difference between the Federal and Provincial Governments. I think I can leave my own record and that of the administration to speak for itself as to the treatment the provinces have received from the Federal Government since we came into office.

Mr. King asserts that he cannot give his attention to Parliament, which is still in session, and conduct a campaign outside, or he would be glad to reply to Mr. Ferguson from the public platform.

"THEN EXISTING."

The Prime Minister declares that his statements in the House of Commons had relation exclusively to "a then existing situation, and was not to be understood or interpreted as having any other possible application."

The statement of the Prime Minister follows:

In the Canadian Press report of the Western Ontario Conservative convention, dated London, Ontario, May 16, which appeared in the press throughout Canada, on the day following, it is stated that Premier G. Howard Ferguson of Ontario said that the Ontario Government intended to throw its whole weight into the Dominion election campaign in protest against an utterance by myself in the House of Commons to the effect that I would not give a five-cent piece for unemployment relief to a province governed by a Conservative provincial administration. The press despatch contains the following in direct quotation from Premier Ferguson's speech:

KING'S ANSWER TO FERGUSON'S LONDON SPEECH

Scrupulously Fair To Provinces In Financial Matters.

HONEST ENDEAVOR AVOID CONTROVERSY

Says False Interpretation of His Statement In House.

In a statement issued last night, Prime Minister Mackenzie King set forth his own attitude and that of his Government toward the provinces. The Prime Minister's statement came in reply to declarations by Premier G. Howard Ferguson, of Ontario, from the platform of the Western Ontario Conservative convention, at London. Mr. Ferguson was reported as saying that the Ontario Government proposed to throw its weight into the election campaign against the Federal Government forces, because of Mr. King's "five-cent piece" statement in Parliament.

The Prime Minister summarizes his attitude and that of the Federal Government towards the provinces, in his final paragraph, as follows:

To Avoid Controversy.

"In order that there may be no further misrepresentation of my attitude or that of the present administration towards the governments of any of the provinces, whether they be Conservative, Progressive or Liberal, may I say that so long as I continue to occupy the position which I now hold, my own attitude and that of the administration, towards the provinces of our Dominion will continue to be in the future what it has been right along, namely, one of an honest endeavor to avoid and to remove all possible sources of controversy between the Provincial and Federal Governments, and in financial matters to be scrupulously fair, and in so far as the public interest may permit, generous, in the treatment alike of one and all, wholly regardless of the political complexion of the particular administration in office in any of the provinces."

Mr. King asserts he cannot give his attention to Parliament, which is still in session, and conduct a campaign outside, or he would be glad to reply to Mr. Ferguson from the public platform.

The Prime Minister declares his statements in the House of Commons had relation exclusively to "a then existing situation, and was not to be understood or interpreted as having any other possible application."

The statement of the Prime Minister in full, follows:

King's Statement.

In the Canadian Press report of the Western Ontario Conservative convention, dated London, Ontario, May 16th, which appeared in the press throughout Canada, on the day following, it is stated that Premier G. Howard Ferguson of Ontario said that the Ontario Government intended to throw its whole weight into the Dominion election campaign in protest against an utterance by myself in the House of Commons to the effect that I would not give a five-cent piece for unemployment relief to a province governed by a Conservative provincial administration. The press despatch contains the following, in direct quotation, from Premier Ferguson's speech:

"The Prime Minister of Canada said to the public on the floor of the House of Commons that 'unless you vote as I say, you are not entitled to any advantage that may come from the Dominion treasury' and again—after referbia, Saskatchewan, Ontario, and the old provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, 'The Prime Minister of Canada told the people of these provinces that they would not get a five-cent piece from the public treasury because a Conservative provincial government was in office'."

I am not in a position at the moment to give any attention to the business of Parliament, which is still in session, and at the same time to conduct a campaign outside of Parliament or I should be pleased to reply to Mr. Ferguson from the public platform. In case, however, silence on my part, even for the present, might be mistaken as acquiescence in the statements made by Mr. Ferguson I feel called upon immediately to say that the words attributed to me by Mr. Ferguson, or their equivalent, were never used by me at any time or in any place; further that no words of mine spoken in the House of Commons or elsewhere, with respect to unemployment or any other subject, are capable of an interpretation such as the Premier of Ontario has sought to place upon them.

Says Interpretation False.

In the debate on unemployment in the House of Commons on April 3, with respect to a situation alleged to be then existing, I pointed out that requests for assistance to meet an emergent condition respecting unemployment had not been received from any Provincial Government, and I referred in particular to a statement made by Premier Ferguson at Toronto on January 25, at a time when conditions were supposed to be at their worst, to the effect that Ontario was handling its own unemployment problem, which statement I had quoted on February 24 in the debate on the address, and I said that in these circumstances, with respect to the then existing situation, Federal assistance would not be given to any Government, but I made no statement which was capable of being interpreted as applicable to conditions respecting unemployment generally, or as they might arise in the future; or applicable at all to assistance to Provincial Governments from the Federal treasury for any other purpose, or at any other time. That I was particularly careful to make it clear that anything I was saying, or had said, had relation exclusively to a then existing situation, and was not to be understood or interpreted as having any other possible application, will be apparent from the statement which appears in Hansard record of debates in the House of Commons at page 1281, which is the page of Hansard which contains one or two remarks made as a consequence of interruptions in the course of debate, and upon which, and quite apart from the context as a whole, Premier Ferguson has sought to place an entirely false interpretation. The statement is as follows:

"May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that, having regard to the situation as we know it in this country at the present time, we have had no representations from any of the provinces expressing the need for assistance from the Federal treasury to meet an unemployment situation, because of an emergency too great to be dealt with by the province itself, and in the absence of that I submit that hon. gentlemen who suggest that anything should be given out of the Federal treasury have in support of their position not a leg left to stand on. There have been times when there have been emergent conditions, and where there have meen emergent conditions this Government has been quick to recognize them. When we came into power we found in this country a considerable amount of unemployment, a lot of unemployment arising in large part out of circumstances connected with the war. Men were returning from overseas and seeking to get back into civil employment, and there was no opportunity to secure employment for them. We recognized that provincial governments had a problem there with which they could not cope, and when they made representations to us, we met those representations, and here may I tell my hon. friends that we made at that time no difference between Liberal and Conservative. We gave our money just as freely to the Tory governments then as we gave it to the Liberal governments, because there was a necessity to meet and a very different situation prevailing from what there is at the present time in this country."

Surprising Statement.

Reference to other portions of the debate, and in particular to the interruptions which occasioned specific reference to Tory governments, made it abundantly clear that my remarks throughout were in relation exclusively to a situation then existing or as it was alleged to exist, and are not rightly capable of being given any other interpretation.

May I say that the statement of Premier Ferguson is the more surprising, made as it is in the light of the agreements recently negotiated by the present administration with the Province of British Columbia and the Prairie Provinces, and the treatment accorded the Maritime Provinces in the matter of increased subsidies, under which the financial position of all these provinces has been materially improved. The Prime Minister's Reply.

The Prime Minister of Canada accuses Mr. Ferguson of misrepresenting his attitude toward the unemployment question. Mr. King in making this reproach exercised a good deal of self-restraint. Mr. Ferguson's public record is so vulnerable that it requires an extraordinary mixture of bravado and hypocrisy to stand on the platform, as he did in this city, and deliver a homily on political morality. Mr. King made no reference to the Godfrey incident, the Case affair, the Northern Development fund, or the abuse of patronage in the provincial arena, but restricted himself to two specific assertions of Mr. Ferguson in his London speech: 1, That Mr. King had said in the House that "unless you vote as I say you are not entitled to any advantage that may come from the Dominion treasury"; 2, "The Prime Minister of Canada told the people of these provinces—British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia— that they would not get a five-cent piece from the public treasury because a Conservative provincial Government was in office." These sentences were not uttered by Mr. King, nor did his words at any time justify the interpretation which Mr. Ferguson has sought to put upon them.

The Prime Minister invites a reading of the Hansard report of his speech to make his position clear and to confute Mr. Ferguson. He was speaking of a particular situation existing at the moment. No requests for aid for the unemployed had been received at the time from any provincial Government, and Premier Ferguson had declared on January 25 last, when conditions were supposed to be at their worst, that Ontario was handling its own unemployment problem. It was in these circumstances that Mr. King, who was being badgered by his party opponents, said no federal aid would be given to any of these Governments, but his remarks had no application to the future nor to unemployment generally. The Hansard report of his speech on April 3 bears out the Prime Minister:

May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that, having regard to the situation as we know it in this country at the present time, we have had no representations from any of the provinces expressing the need for assistance from the federal treasury to meet an unemployment situation, because of an emergency too great to be dealt with by the province itself, and in the absence of that I submit that honorable gentlemen who suggest that anything should be given out of the federal treasury have in support of their position not a leg left to stand on. There have been times when there have been emergent conditions, and where there have been emergent conditions this Government has been quick to recognize them. When we came into power we found in this country a considerable amount of unemployment, a lot of unemployment arising in large part out of circumstances connected with the war. Men were returning from overseas and seeking to get back into civil employment, and there was no opportunity to secure employment for them. We recognized that provincial governments had a problem there with which they could not cope, and when they made representations to us we met those representations, and here may I tell my honorable friends that we made at that time no difference between Liberal and Conservative. We gave our money just as freely to the Tory Governments as we gave it to the Liberal Governments, because there was a necessity to meet, and a very different situation prevailing from what there is at the present time in this country.

Any impartial reader will say these words bear out the construction put upon them by Mr. King today. No federal Prime Minister has tried more earnestly to treat the provinces generously and remove any elements of friction in the federal system. His Government has transferred to British Columbia and the Prairie Provinces their natural resources; it has settled Maritime grievances and placed the Maritime Provinces in a stronger financial position by means of larger subsidies; it has acknowledged the right of Ontario and Quebec to the water powers of the St. Lawrence. The Prime Minister pledges himself to continue his endeavors to remove all sources of controversy between federal and provincial authorities and to be scrupulously fair and in the treatment of one and all regardless of their political complexion. His whole record attests his sincerity, and Mr. Ferguson knows it from personal experience.

PREMIER KING'S WORD AGAINST THE RECORD.

When the offensive words of a politician, "flown with insolence," recoil upon himself, what should he do? Is he to take the defiant attitude and declare that he stands by his provocative speech? That would only aggravate the offence. Is he to come forward and humbly confess that he spoke foolishly and beg the country's pardon? There are public men who could bring themselves to this contrite behavior. But they are not politicians of the shifty order. They do not put their personal ambitions above everything else. The refuge of the power-clutching politician whose tongue has got him into trouble is denial.

In the House of Commons on Monday, Premier King referred to the protest made by Premier Ferguson against the former's declaration to the effect that not a five-cent piece would he give in aid of the unemployed to any Tory Government. Mr. King would have the public believe that his words in that connection were misrepresented by Mr. Ferguson. As a matter of fact, there is no possibility of escape from the logical conclusion drawn from Premier King's words by the Premier of Ontario. It is quite useless for Mr. King to fight that logic. Premier Ferguson did not put on Premier King's words any strained construction. Mr. King beat about the bush and tried to fix the attention of the House on other parts of the speech he made on April 3 rather than on the offensive words. Those words occur in the following passages from Hansard of April 3: "So far as giving money "from this Federal Treasury to provincial gov-"ernments is concerned, in relation to this ques-"tion of unemployment as it exists to-day, I might "be prepared to go to a certain length possibly "in meeting one or two of the western provinces "that have Progressive Premiers at the head of "their Governments——

"Some honorable members—Oh!

"Mr. Mackenzie King—But I would not give "a single cent to any Tory Government.

"Mr. Bennett—Shame!

"Mr. Stevens—Shame!

"Mr. Mackenzie King—Do my honorable "friends say 'Shame'?

"Mr. Bennett—Yes, shame!

"Mr. Mackenzie King—What is there to be "ashamed of?

"Mr. Stevens—You ought to be ashamed of "that.

"Mr. Mackenzie King—My honorable friend "is getting very indignant. Something evidently "has got under his skin. May I repeat what I "have said? With respect to giving moneys out "of the Federal Treasury to any Tory Govern-"ment in this country for these alleged unem-"ployment purposes, with these Governments "constituted as they are to-day, with policies "diametrically opposed to those of this Govern-"ment, I would not give them a five-cent piece."

This record in the official debates of the House stands, and is not affected by Mr. King's denial. In that denial he keeps on speaking of the "then situation," which to-day is exactly what it was at that time. Any reader can judge for himself if Premier Ferguson had not very solid ground for his championing not only provinces under Conservative Government, but also the right of the people of Canada to choose whom they will for the administration of their provincial affairs.

Premier King's position will not be strengthened before the public by this attempt to wriggle out of the declaration he made on the 3rd of April. Facts stand, no matter how vehemently they may be denied. They will not vanish at the bidding of the man they haunt. Premier King's anxiety to separate himself from this incident will only impress the public with his own present feeling of the extreme seriousness of it. "Thou canst not say I did it," exclaimed the guilty Macbeth.

By denial Mr. King also sought to detach himself from another utterance that will not be shaken off. That is, "I have come to the con-"clusion that it is a thoroughly vicious prin-"ciple," meaning by that the giving of Federal money in payment of old-age pensions. Similarly, after he had subscribed to the tariff resolution of the National Liberal Convention of 1919, he afterwards explained that he did not consider that resolution as binding upon him in the sense of its words, but that he regarded it as a chart. The word of a Prime Minister ought to be beyond question. If the people find they cannot build upon it, they will give their trust to another.

WHEN THE REAL PREMIER KING SPOKE.

Premier King has made a belated discovery. He now knows that his "five-cent" speech was a mistake. Master of platitudes that he is, no one is more expert at so surrounding an idea with words that almost any meaning can be taken from it. But when in a moment of irritation he blurted out what he really thinks the real man stood revealed.

And when Premier King tries to explain his statement he simply makes his famous "not a five-cent piece" utterance a major issue in the coming campaign.

Mr. King was rattled when he made his famous statement. Mr. King must be still more rattled when he tries to explain the unexplainable.

"Not a five-cent piece" would Premier King give to a Tory province. And the Tory provinces are in a position to retort that not a seat will they give to Premier King.

MR. FERGUSON URGED TO STIR UP OTTAWA.

Carlton Street United Church in Toronto, which was formerly the somewhat famous Carlton Street Methodist Church, occupied by great preachers like JAMES HENDERSON, has of late years devoted much attention to "down-town" work. It has been holding an all-year-round clinic on the far-from-well-to-do. It has been finding out how the other half of the world lives. It has discovered some deplorable conditions and it wants action. Therefore it has got up a petition signed by the pastor and five hundred officials, members and adherents. The pastor is Rev. J. E. CROSSLEY HUNTER, whose name recalls the celebrated evangelists of former days, one of whom was his father. The petition calls attention to the need not only for immediate relief of unemployment but also for permanent measures to prevent the continuance and perpetuation of unemployment. A lasting cure is called for.

In that portion of Toronto served by this particular church the petitioners find (1) penury of the most acute kind, even amounting to privation of the necessities of life; (2) defective nourishment of children often serious and sometimes with fatal results; (3) the reduction of housing accommodation for many families to such an extent that separation of the sexes is impossible, thus creating deplorable moral conditions; (4) the widespread breaking down of morale through constant fear, such as unfits men for work.

Anxiety is expressed lest the present conditions may last for several years. Some radical, remedial departure is requested. Lastly the petition is addressed to Hon. G. HOWARD FERGUSON and it begs:

> "That, as Prime Minister of this province, you press for the speedy meeting of an Interprovincial Conference, which would include representatives of the Federal Government, to meet the situation, and possibly the appointment of a Dominion Commission to survey the situation in Canada and devise a permanent policy regarding employment."

This makes interesting reading for both Premier FERGUSON and Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING. Coming when it does the petition almost looks like a political move in support of the Ontario Premier's London attack on the Federal Premier's Five-Cent Piece speech. But of course it is nothing of the sort. It grows out of current industrial conditions, and it reflects very severely upon an Ottawa administration which refuses assistance to the needy in Ontario or any other province having a Conservative tendency in politics. Although Mr. MACKENZIE KING may give relief only to the Liberal or Progressive provinces, he should know that employment and unemployment are largely the result of Federal fiscal policy. Even under present adverse world conditions Canadians would undoubtedly be better off if the country enjoyed a stable Canadian tariff built with an idea to more intensive Canadian development, instead of a tariff forever manipulated with an eye to the capture of this group of voters or that class of electors.

Suggestions for Re Marjorie Forke's Wedding
Mr. King's Speech

Marjorie Forke has not been in Ottawa during the whole of this session. It is reported that she was at home working very hard cooking meals and taking care of "the boys" at Pipestone. This work she found rather strenuous, and arranged to have it done by a housekeeper, whom she installed before leaving and coming to Ottawa. She had been back in Ottawa only a short time when she received an S.O.S. from "the boys" to the effect that the housekeeper had "up and left", and asking her to come back as soon as possible. It would seem that this is an excellent testimonial of Miss Forke's proficiency in household science.

+ The "boys" are men on her father's farm

The bridegroom's assistants on the day of the wedding are all professional men. I understand four are lawyers, and two are doctors. One of the "lawyers" is Tom Green, of the Canadian Press, who I believe studied law for a time. The preponderance of lawyers might be construed as an anxiety on the part of the bridegroom that the contract shall be well made and remain undisturbed. Others are Clarence Jackson, a lawyer, secretary to Mr. Crerar, & Dr. Wallace McKay.

It is understood that Marjorie is her father's favourite daughter. During his membership in the House of Commons, Marjorie worked in his office at Ottawa. She also devoted herself to work in her father's behalf amongst the women of the constituency. She has been of the utmost assistance to her father in his political career, and it is said that he will miss Marjorie very much. Her characteristics seem to be devotion to her father, industry, perseverance, humility & tact. The bridegroom is fortunate in securing a girl of such sterling character and qualities. The assistance which she has been to her father, will be given now to her husband, and to the development of his career and interests. He, of course, has qualities of his own; but with Marjorie should achieve a success in life which he has not thus far contemplated.

Mr. Berg

He was born in Canada, of Norwegian parents. He put himself through an arts course and a law course, and was in the Great War. His mother is living, but his father is dead. He is an honorary A.D.C. at Government House, Winnipeg.

Mr. Berg distinguished himself two years ago, when he led a delegation which waited upon the government at Ottawa seeking a grant for the Norwegian celebration in Winnipeg.

He is a practising lawyer.

Mr. Berg is quite short in stature, but is of more than ordinary stature in mental capacity. As his career has already signified, he makes up in courage and self-assurance what he lacks in height.

The bride and groom make an ideal couple, both in appearance and in character.

Mention should perhaps be made of the long and honourable career of the bride's father; e.g. his loyal and valuable support of the Prime Minister in the "marriage" of the two political parties - Progs. and Libs. After years of watchful & tender care this union may now be said to constitute a triumphant and happy success in the gentle art of matchmaking.

The bride's mother was a MacGregor; d.of David MacGregor of South Gower, a few miles from Ottawa.

FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

Ottawa, May 16, 1930

My share of the contribution of material for your speech at the wedding on Saturday has not involved a draft of possible remarks, but is merely a collection of a few miscellaneous details.

Reverend John W. Woodside of Chalmers Church will officiate at the service. The bride, Miss Marjorie Isobel Forke, will be attended by her sister Miss Mary. The bridegroom, Mr. James Cattermole Berg, by Mr. Herbert Beall of Ottawa. Dr. Wallace McKay, Dr. Roy McDougall, Mr. Clarence Jackson and Mr. Thomas Green will be the ushers. After the wedding, the bride and groom will motor through the Maritime provinces.

Mr. Berg was born in Portage la Prairie. His mother is English and his father Norwegian. The latter is supposed to be the first Norwegian to have settled in western Canada. His grandfather was born in Bergen, a town which enjoyed, throughout the middle ages a flourishing position in the trade of Europe as one of the members of the Hanseatic League. The family name Berg is supposed to be derived from the name of the town. Mr. Berg was graduated from the University of Manitoba with the degree of LL.B. in 1917 and from the Manitoba Law School in the same year. Mr. Berg is aide-de-camp to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba.

I happened to learn prevately that Mrs. Forke has recently spoken of the fact that Mr. Berg knew the Forke family when Miss Marjorie was a girl, that they visited each others' houses in Pipestone, and that it has all along been a tradition to "tease" the young couple with innuendoes and references which generally arise when two people have shown a marked interest in each other from early life. Friends of Miss Forke give a very interesting account of how the affair received added impetus while Miss Forke and Mr. Berg happened to be returning from Europe together last summer. This story, which, I understand, has been repeated in Miss Forke's presence without the slightest denial, might, perhaps, afford an opportunity of a pleasant touch upon an "ocean voyage romance".

It has always seemed to me that speeches at wedding receptions are a bit more difficult to get under way than speeches on other occasions, principally because of the fact that a speech seems very formal indeed in the midst of so much festivity. I do recall, however, one introduction which seemed to me to overcome this difficulty. As much as I can piece it together, it was along the following lines: "Fashion has decreed that the wedding speeches be subordinated to the other aspects of the celebration, but admirable as the rule is, and willingly as we observe it, we must honour it in the breach rather than in the observance so far as the bride and bridegroom are concerned. It is a pretty custom this drinking of healths, the conjuring up of visions of days when, as we believe, there was a greater glamour of romance around the events of everyday life than there seems to be now. I think it is especially appropriate that the old custom should be observed on occasions such as this for, however dull and commonplace we imagine life to seem now-a-days compared with the more picturesque life of our ancestors, weddings, at any rate, remind us that romance is not dead, and that love is as young and as beautiful as ever."

The following extract from an essay by Lucie A. Zimmern was intended to refer to woman's place in society in general, but its thoughts certainly could be applied to the place of woman in the home: "We must find room in our hearts for the distinctive gifts of women, their sense of the shades and nuances, the priceless details and delicacies of life, for their power of harmonizing and adjusting the big rough blocks which masculine energy is forever rolling pell-mell on the stage, and leaving there in bewildering disarray. We must allow woman to play, on equal terms, her part as wife and mother, as the talker and letter-writer, as artist and intellectual, as a lover of ideas and truth, and above all as a lover of that outward and inward beauty, which man in his love for wealth and power, for size and statistics, has well-nigh exiled from this poor and man-handled world.

I do not know whether you would care to have the few stories at all related to weddings which my rather scanty store-house contains, but I am placing these here more in the hope of reminding you of some of your own which might be more appropriate.

"Cuptacathesia" a sixth sense that enables the possessor to intuitatively perceive the truth has been discovered by a French scientist. He asserts that this sixth sense is especially developed in woman. Many young husbands will wonder why this is haled as a recent discovery. - Q news comment in a recent paper.

An archbishop was visiting a small parish for the purpose of administering confirmation, and asked a nervous little girl what matrimony was. "It is a state of terrible torment which those who enter are compelled to undergo for a time to prepare them for a better and a brighter world" was her answer. "No! no!" remonstrated her rector, "that is not matrimony, that is the definition of purgatory". "Leave her alone" said the archbishop, "may be she is right, what do we know about it any way."

Notes re Forke - Berg Wedding

1. It is a privilege to have a part in the ceremonies of this eventful day in the lives of these two young people - to propose the 'health' of the Bride and to wish her and her husband joy and happiness in the days to come.

2. It is a particular pleasure to do so in this instance when the Bride is the daughter of an esteemed former colleague.

3. The bride has shown much wisdom in her choice of a life partner: he is, I understand, of Norwegian origin and tradition tells us that Norway and Scotland were closely associated in days gone by, indeed some of the Scottish Clans of the Highlands and the Islands claim Norwegian ancestry. Here, today, we see, if the tradition be true, history repeating itself in the union of these representatives of two ancient peoples — the Norwegian and the Scottish.

4. The bride has further shown her Scottish shrewdness in selecting the year 1930 for her wedding, for it must not be forgotten that but a few days ago the finance minister introduced a budget which reduced the cost of living by eliminating duties on crockeryware, washing machines, sewing machines and baby carriages.

5. Budget secrets are always well kept— I have never stated this before, but this happy event of today was kept in mind when the budget was being framed!

6. In more serious vein to the Bride:

The lessons and aspirations of your girlhood will now find their proper sphere of enlargement in the responsible place into which you are stepping, and the high value of true womanliness will outline itself in your sacred experiences.

May I say that with Divine guidance every human attachment will find its appointed place and setting in your life. I do not for a moment doubt that your home will be flooded with the radiance of a pure and unselfish love from which there will radiate peace and joy. as Ruskin has so well said:

"This is the true nature of the home — it is a place of Peace; the shelter, not only from all injury but from all terror, doubt and division. In so far as it is not-this, it is not home ..... it is only a part of the outer world which you have roofed over, and lighted a fire in. But so far as it is a sacred place, a vestal temple, a temple of the hearth watched over by Household Gods, before whose faces none may come but those whom they can receive with love ..... so far it vindicates the name, and fulfils the praise, of Home."

May every good thing fall to your portion and may all who are brought into touch with you in your new sphere in life catch the inspiration which radiates from a happy home.

SENATOR, THE HONOURABLE W. L. McDOUGALD, M.D.

The opening of this structure for public service marks the realization of hopes that had their origin many years ago and were widely held throughout the community. It also marks the culmination of over seven years activity during which time the structure gradually emerged from first nebulous, then definite plans into the tangible thing that it is today.

For many years prior to the War the eventual necessity of a second bridge over the St. Lawrence River was realized and accepted as an integral factor in the development of the port facilities at Montreal.

Shortly after the War the question of the new bridge again became of active interest, a number of new and important factors now having a vital bearing on the project. The growth of the motor traffic increasingly overtaxed the limited facilities of the Victoria bridge. Furthermore the rapid growth of the City itself pointed to the need for opening up the adjacent South shore district to industrial and residential development and to the need for adequate access facilities to St. Helen's Island in order that its value as a city park and recreation centre might be made full use of.

In 1922 the Minister of Marine and Fisheries requested the Harbour Board to make an investigation of the whole situation, especially having regard to the relation of the bridge question to the interests of the Harbour and to make surveys, soundings and borings in order that preliminary or suggestive designs and plans might be prepared for the information and guidance of the Commissioners and of the Federal Government. On August 14th, 1922 a Committee of the Privy Council of the Dominion of Canada concurred in the appropriation of the sum of $50,000 of funds of the Harbour Board to be expended for these purposes. In 1924 the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the Honourable P. J. A. Cardin, proposed to Parliament legislation for enabling the undertaking to be proceeded with as soon as practicable. An Act was passed by the unanimous consent of the Commons and Senate and assented to on July 19th, 1924 by His Excellency Baron Bing of Vimy, enabling the Harbour Commission as the appropriate authority, since the bridge would become an appertenance of the Harbour, to determine its site and to proceed with the designing and erecting thereof, subject to the approval of site and of all plans by the Governor-in-Council; with necessary power of expropriation, of operating and managing and fixing tolls; with provision for mortgaging and pledging and for creating hypothecs; of issuing bonds which might be guaranteed by His Majesty the King, etc.

EDITOR'S NOTE

While many have worked hard for the attainment of the Bridge it was Senator McDougald who co-ordinated their efforts and who for the Harbour Commissioners enlisted the support of the Federal Government, the Provincial Government and the City of Montreal, without which the project could not have been started; and it was he, who by his untiring advocacy of the Bridge, created a practically unanimous popular demand for it. Moreover it was through his individual tact and organization ability that the various schemes for the Bridge and the many contending interests represented therein were organized and the support of all was enlisted. Indeed it is felt by many that had Senator McDougald not put his shoulder to the wheel, the Bridge would probably still be in the nebulous condition it had been in before he applied himself to it.

THE PORT OF MONTREAL

L. C. Coombs, M.A.

The unique geographic position of Montreal and the penetrating access afforded by the St. Lawrence to the heart of the Continent, gave to Montreal a peculiar importance scarcely surpassed on the Continent of America.

It has been a fond hope or at least a cherished dream of many patriotic citizens of this City that modern science might yet find a way to remove the barrier that blocks the port in winter and to maintain throughout the year an open passage to the sea.

But even without this dream the reality of the situation is good enough. Montreal since 1921 has been the principle grain port of the world surpassing its next largest competitor, New York. It is the second port of North America in point of freight tonnage. Moreover the port of Montreal is capable of much greater expansion.

A feature of interest is the question of the water of the channel to the sea and the danger to the port of Montreal represented by the diversion of the water from the open basin of the St. Lawrence. The present channel has a minimum depth of thirty feet. The conditions of modern seaborne traffic urgently demand that this depth of water be maintained. There is not an inch to spare and no further deepening of the channel as an offset to the lowering of the level can be made without hopelessly disproportionate expenditure of capital. The whole fate and fortune of the Metropolitan Sea Port of Canada is intimately bound up with the question of the diversion of the St. Lawrence. (Prof. Leacock)

HISTORICAL SKETCH

From time immemorial the river St. Lawrence has been the natural gateway of North America. Nearly four hundred years ago Jacques Cartier sailed up the St. Lawrence until he reached Hochelaga, one thousand miles from the sea. A century passed and the deserted Hochelaga lying at the foot of the Royal Mountain became Maisonneuve's Montreal. Montreal owed its conception and birth to religious zeal. However perilous an outport to the attacks of the Indians, it was admirably situated as a Mission at the junction of two great rivers, the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa, the key to a vast network of inland waterways. "Villemarie de Montreal" was founded by Paul de Chomedey, Sieur de Maisonneuve on May 17, 1642, thirty-one years before, Champlain had chosen the site as one fit for settlement.

The foundation of Montreal has been described thus; (Parkman, the Jesuits in North America) "Maisonneuve sprang ashore and fell on his knees. His followers imitated his example and all joined with their voices in enthusiastic songs of thanksgiving. Tents, baggage, arms and stores were landed. An altar was raised on a pleasant spot near at hand. They knelt in reverent silence as the Host was raised aloft; and when the rite was over the Priest turned and addressed them: 'You are a grain of mustard seed that shall rise and grow till its branches overshadow the earth. You are few but your work is the work of God. His smile is on you and your children shall fill the land'. The afternoon waned; the sun sank beneath the western forest and twilight came on, fireflies were twinkling over the darkened meadow..... Then they pitched their tents, lighted their bivouac fires, stationed their guards and laid down to rest. Such was the birth night of Montreal".

To Montreal came Indians bartering furs for the novel wares of the French. From Montreal missionaries, explorers and "coureurs de bois" blazed their difficult paths up the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa to the Great Lakes and beyond and down the Ohio and the Mississippi to New Orleans, a sister French settlement, and the Gulf of Mexico. After one hundred and twenty years the "ancien régime" gave way to the British. The bilingual character of Montreal had begun.

Vigorous Scotsmen inspired the fur trade to new and widespread enterprises in the Northwest. Banks, warehouses, ships and railways were the creation of these industrious men of penetration and foresight. The names

HISTORY OF THE PORT OF MONTREAL

In 1824, two stone windmills marked the progress of industrial development to the West of what is now McGill street, being situated at the top of the open basin. "Sloping roadways down to the water where the river was so low as to permit of rock showing above the current, a long stretch of beach where the children of those days romped and played and the poorer women washed their linen using the big stones as washboards, a long unbroken line of trees and shrubberies past Maisonneuve, where now the Harbour Commission's powerful locomotives transport merchandise from vessels of sixteen thousand tons registered to the various railway terminals, - these were the features of the Port of Montreal long before Confederation had even been dreamed of". (Atherton, History of Montreal)

Agitation for a St. Lawrence ship channel was initiated in February, 1826, when a petition was read before the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada urging the necessity of improving the means of communication between the Canadas and Europe. No action was taken by the Legislature and in 1836 the merchants of Montreal again presented a petition praying for a grant of money to carry out an accurate survey of Lake St. Peter and the River as far as the Port of Montreal. On May the 8, 1830, the Honourable George Moffatt, Jules Quesnel and Captain R. S. Piper, R.E., were appointed commissioners to carry into effect an Act called "an Act to provide for the improvement and enlargement of the Harbour of Montreal". This was the first attempt to improve the Harbour of Montreal by Commission.

In 1850 the Honourable John Young proposed a plan for the deepening of the St. Lawrence which was briefly as follows;- The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal should be authorized to undertake the work and to borrow money for the purpose, the interest on which was to be provided by a tonnage duty of not exceeding one shilling per ton on all vessels drawing ten feet and upwards, and by the surplus revenues of the Harbour of Montreal, in case the tonnage duty should prove insufficient for the purpose, etc.

The plan was approved and adopted by the Government, Mr. Young being appointed a Harbour Commissioner to enable him to carry out his plan. In August, 1850, the St. Lawrence Ship Channel was placed under the jurisdiction of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. Mr. C. S. (later Sir Casimir) Gzowsky was one of the engineers appointed by the Commissioners to report on the construction of the Ship Channel. By 1865 a channel of a depth of twenty feet and a width of three hundred feet had been obtained and the completion of this channel marked an important era in the history of the St. Lawrence route. It had been demonstrated that the St. Lawrence could be made available up to Montreal for navigation by large ships and the marked increase of Canadian commerce showed how imperatively it was required.

The vision and driving force of the Honourable John Young had inaugurated this broad and coherent navigation policy which cleared the way for the present development of the Port of Montreal. He had succeeded in obtaining an acknowledgment of the Provincial Government that the necessary work to secure the channel should be considered as Provincial Public Works. His description in 1859 of transportation and port facilities presents an extraordinary contrast with the Canada of 1930. "It should be borne in mind that it is only ten years since the restrictive laws of Great Britain allowed foreign ships to enter the St. Lawrence; that the entire absence of lights in some parts of the St. Lawrence only tended to increase the bad name of the navigation; that our railway communication with the interior has only been open for three years; that our Canadian canals have never been completed. Nor are there any means of receiving and delivering produce at our inland and shipping ports capable of the least comparison with what exists in American ports; and unless we, as Canadians, are prepared to provide these means, we cannot expect to obtain a share of that trade which it is in our power to command."

The extensive program of canals from Lachine to Sault Ste Marie undertaken in 1840, the construction of the St. Lawrence Ship Channel in the fifties and the first Victoria bridge at Montreal in 1860 are striking evidence of the courage, resource and foresight of the Canadas, in years of acute commercial depression before Confederation when the population was small and scattered.

The corporate body, the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, is the only authority having jurisdiction within the limits of the Harbour of Montreal. In 1907 it was enacted that the corporation should consist of three commissioners (one of whom should be appointed President) appointed by the Governor-in-Council upon the recommendation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and that they should hold office during pleasure.

The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal do not now issue any debentures to the public. The funds for the necessarily great expenditures which any program of Harbour extension entails are obtained from the public purse of Canada.

The Harbour of Montreal represents in round figures an eminently modest and justifiable expenditure of $48,000,000. (1926).

In 1809 the Honourable John Molson launched the "Accommodation" a steam vessel eighty-five feet in length, the first steamer on the St. Lawrence River and the second steam vessel in North American. (Compare the new Empress of Britain soon to be launched)

Yet the greatness of the bridge is really the greatness of its builders, of the engineers who designed it and supervised its building, of the technical board representing the various interests concerned, whose members collaborated with the chief engineers, and of the staffs of draftsmen, clerks, mill workers and erectors whose skill and energy went into the fashioning of the steel giant which stands today and will stand throughout the years with a foot on either shore. Back of the completed bridge there is a fascinating story in which the work of designing and construction is traced step by step from the selection of the site until the last unit was placed in position and the last rivet driven.

The cost of the bridge it is learned will come to $18,000,000 whereas the estimated cost in 1926 when the Province decided to bear one-third of the cost and provision was made for the City to bear the second third, the Harbour Commission caring for the balance, was $10,000,000.

Extract of a speech by Mr. Mackenzie King when he opened the Montreal Harbour Bridge on May the 24th, 1930, by pressing button in Prime Minister's Office, Parliament Buildings.

Bridges are not merely arteries of commerce. They serve also as links of social intercourse and bonds of neighbourhood. To my mind there is no more striking symbol of unity than a bridge. Rivers and mountain ranges often make for separation and misunderstanding. Bridges and tunnels make for unity and friendship.

From my office window, I look down upon the Inter-Provincial Bridge which spans the Ottawa River and unites the Province of Ontario with the Province of Quebec at the capital of the Dominion. What better symbol could there be of the union of races and creeds which has created the Canadian nation.

Three years ago at Fort Erie I had the pleasure of being present when His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales opened the bridge which provides a new bond of friendly intercourse between the people of this country and those of the United States. Is not this an enduring symbol of international peace and understanding? The magnificent bridge which is being opened today unites the great metropolis of Montreal with the rich and fertile countryside from which it draws its daily sustenance, and enables the dwellers of the city to share in the restful beauty of the rural districts of Quebec. Herein we find the suggestion of union between the city and the country, between those who work in our factories and those who cultivate our farms.

Brilliant Gathering Of Citizens Attended The Harbor Bridge Opening

An epoch in the history of the Port of Montreal was today suitably celebrated when in the presence of a vast crowd of members of Federal and Provincial Parliament, officials and citizens of Montreal, the great new Harbor Bridge was formally opened to the public.

Beautiful weather favored the historic event, and although disappointment was expressed at the absence of the person of the Prime Minister owing to the pressure of Parliamentary duties, the event proved a highly dignified celebration, commensurate with the importance of the occasion.

From early in the morning crowds approached the St. Helen's Island section and pavilion from both entrances, arriving by both auto and on foot.

By high noon the great structure spanning the mighty St. Lawrence was covered by humanity eager to take part in a great occasion.

The careful preparations for handling the big crowd were strictly carried out, and there was no unseemly crowding. The weather proved beautiful; plenty of sunshine with a strong breeze blowing steadily through the huge girders.

The ceremonies on the bridge were carried out by Hon. Dr. McDougald, Chairman of the Harbor Commission, and he was assisted by Commissioners: Dr. Milton Hersey and Mr. Lambert.

An Imposing Ceremony

In many respects the ceremony carried out so successfully and in such a dignified manner today was one of the most imposing in the history of the city.

The setting was on a huge scale with the enormous stretches of the bridge reaching out for a mile to the right and to the left.

There were the gorgeous robes of the clergy and the bright summer toilettes of the ladies; there was the dull booming of whistles on the river; the music of the bands and the drone of aeroplanes overhead.

The climax was reached when the flags dropped from the plaques on the pressure of a button by the Prime Minister in Ottawa.

This took place exactly at high noon and immediately an enormous volume of sound swelled out up and down the river.

Whistles boomed; sirens shrieked, bells rang, bands played, while the citizens waved their hats and canes and cheered with wild delight.

It was the climax of seven years of toil and planning.

The bridge was at last officially open to the public.

Blessing the Bridge

Not the least solemn and inspiring portion of the ceremony was the blessing of the bridge by His Grace the Archbishop of Montreal. He was followed by His Lordship, Bishop Farthing; then came addresses by Hon. Fernand Rinfret, Secretary of State, representing the Prime Minister, and Hon. Honore Mercier representing Premier Taschereau, Ald. Weldon spoke for the City of Montreal and represented His Worship Mayor Houde.

The chairman of the Commission Hon. Dr. W. L. McDougald, who was warmly congratulated by the Prime Minister, presided with marked charm and dignity and in his concluding remarks paid a delicate tribute to his wife which was loudly cheered by all present.

This huge structure, costing a score of millions, with its 4,000,000 rivets; 475,000 bags of cement; its 32,469 tons of steel, connects the Island and City of Montreal with the mainland to the south, thus providing a duplicate route to relieve congestion on the existing Victoria Bridge.

The approaches to the New Bridge are most imposing, and on an enormous scale. Cars can run across the bridge from either side, two abreast, while there is moreover, space on either side for tram cars and pedestrians. This huge structure, which will play an enormous part as a tourist artery with the country to the south, impresses one with its immensity and the view from the centre is grand and inspiring.

The Bridge is 2½ miles long, half a mile longer, indeed, than the Victoria Bridge, which looms up in the distance.

View Today Magnificent.

The view today from this giant structure was entrancing, commanding, as the Bridge does, the most historic sections of Canada's Metropolis. Jacques Cartier, with his little pointed beard, and Maisonneuve, with his enormous flapping knee boots seemed to be present directing the business of the day, while honest John Young, pioneer of Harbor Commissioners, gazed from his pedestal in Custom House Square in wonder and awe at the inspiring sight.

Premier Presses Button.

Sharp on the hour of noon the Premier pressed an electric button in his offices at Ottawa. This released the Union Jack and uncovered the bronze inaugural plaques.

The inaugural speech by the Premier then came in over a network of telephone connections giving a broadcast of his address by means of loud speakers on the Bridge Pavilion.

After the dedication ceremonies were completed guests who received luncheon invitations attended a special gathering in the Ritz-Carlton Hotel at 1:30 to commemorate the centenary of the organization of the Harbor of Montreal.

Two Miles of Bridge.

Two miles of steel, constituting the new Harbor Bridge now span the St. Lawrence River between the two shores. In the centre, a branch roadway running off the bridge brings St. Helen's Island, Montreal's largest playground, into closer touch with the city and opens a traffic route hitherto available only by water.

Marvel of Engineering Skill.

The Harbor of Montreal which today received its greatest adornment has been described as "a marvel of modern engineering skill"; as "the best example of modern seaport organization"; and as "one of the most daring and sportsmanlike pieces of commercial enterprise."

In a space of territory some sixteen miles long by the width of the river St. Lawrence, may now be found a compact, highly perfected and super-efficient organization for the expeditious, and economical, shipping and receiving, trans-shipping and storing of merchandise.

With this new bridge completed the Harbor of Montreal today comprises a deep water, tideless and safe harbor, equipped with modern concrete floors and piers, with two-storey transit shed, with massive grain elevators, with an immense cold storage warehouse, with an electrified railway system, with paved roadways and well-lighted thoroughfares, with open and accessible storage spaces, with tugs, pilots, dredges, scows, fresh water service, signal service and all the other accommodations which the world's shipping finds necessary.

1,000 Miles From the Sea.

The guests today saw, from the Bridge, shipping functioning one thousand miles from the ocean. They saw the marvel of bringing the sea-faring vessels of all nations into the very heart of the continent.

King Louis XV, of France, in the middle of the seventeenth century, when granting Montreal to his "Company of New France" reserved to the public for all time the shore of the St. Lawrence at Montreal. The "towpath" bordering the river and the new bridge has since then grown into the publicly-owned Harbor of Montreal as we know it today.

Worked Hard for the Port.

During the centuries and the years since 1640, there have never been lacking public spirited and far-sighted men who whole-heartedly for the Harbor of Montreal. The culmination of their combined efforts has been realized since 1921, in which year Montreal attained a position of pre-eminence in the world grain trade, and took rank with the greatest harbors of the world.

Since 1921 each year has seen new expansions.

Loading and Unloading.

Below the bridge and along the piers are the sights, the noise and the bustle of the loading and unloading of the great ocean carriers. There are the long corrugated-roofed sheds, with the imposing big-lettered signs perched upon the top of them. There are the lumber piles, the barrels, the puncheons, the rails, the tarpaulin-covered bags, the cranes, the gangways, the freight cars, and the heavily laden dray horses.

Then the sharp conflict of noises. The rattling of carters along Commissioners street, the clanging of rails thrown about on the dock below, the perpetual soft puffing of the drill as it continues in the harbor its tedious, laborious task, the sharp tooting of tugboats rushing hither and thither, the rattling of steamers' winches, the creaking of cranes, the slow whirling grind of the grain elevators, mingle softened by distance, with the harsh shouting of drivers.

Al lthis blurred by an immense haze and height and distance!

The Dominating Atmosphere.

The dominating atmosphere of the Bridge today was immensity; huge travel avenues; magnificent panoramic effects; Montreal skyscrapers enveloped and softened in the istance by huge banks of smoke and mist, and this immensity atmosphere is heightened by the romantic environment.

For just below the spot where the brilliant ceremonies took place today nestles on the Island one of the oddest buildings in the city — the little French fort with its stockades still surrounding it, in which a famous French General presented the capitulation of the city.

The small wooden structure stands at the corner of the brick and stone barracks erected by the British in 1808. Just at this spot was a favorite nook much frequented and beloved by the Duke of Connaught. The wooden little fort is squat, worn and weather-beaten by a thousand storms, but in its quaint little room world history was made. They had previously burned their flags at the highest point in the Island, and afterwards capitulated, and all around this old fort there were scores of song birds today singing lustily and taking part merrily in the celebration.

Beneath the bridge a heavy tide tears at channel obstructions, and white-capped swirls and eddies mark the course of the fierce current as the mighty St. Lawrence rolls on its way to the sea.

Prime Minister King Made Speech, Pressed Button, Opened Bridge

Ottawa, May 24.—(Special to The Standard.)—The Prime Minister of Canada opened the Montreal Harbor bridge at noon today.

Into the mouthpiece of a telephone in his private office, in the House of Commons, he spoke the inaugural words, and at the end of his brief speech, pressed a button that threw the multi-million dollar project open.

Cameramen, scribes, and properly accredited on-lookers crammed into the confines of Room 401, where over an ordinary bell telephone, William Lyon Mackenzie King metaphorically cracked the champagne about the rust-protected girders of the giant structure.

A few minutes before he made the speech he was in the House of Commons; a few minutes afterwards, he was back there again.

The 120-mile hook up of radio and telephone was another tribute to this happy combination of wire and wireless.

Local Bell Telephone officials cooperated with Commander Edwards, head of the Radio branch, Department of Marine and Fisheries, and from the Ottawa end things went off without a hitch.

Premier King said: "Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: For some time past I have been looking forward to the pleasure of being present with you in the city of Montreal today, in response to the invitation so generously extended by the Chairman and members of the Board of Harbor Commissioners of Montreal formally to open in their name and in that of our country, the Montreal harbor bridge, which from now on will stand in the eyes of the world as one of the greatest engineering achievements of our age, and a monument to the genius and skill of the Canadian people.

"You have learnt of the circumstances which, within the past few days have rendered it necessary for me to remain at the seat of Government.

"Every effort is being put forth by members of Parliament to bring the proceedings of Parliament to a close in order that a general election may be held with the least possible delay.

"I am sure you will agree that at a time when the ship of State is being piloted through the turbulent waters of the concluding days of a Parliamentary session and into the open, and possibly, not less turbulent waters of a general election, the place of the captain is on his own bridge.

"The call of duty has alone prevented me from addressing you in person. However, it is an ill wind that does not blow some good, even at a time like this.

"While I have been prevented from addressing my remarks to the immediate gathering assembled, through one of the miracles of the age in which we are living, it is now my great privilege to address you from the office of the Prime Minister in the Parliament Buildings of the capital of our Dominion and by the mere pressure of a button at the right moment to release on this Empire day, the flags which cover the plaques which commemorate, in French and English, the event we are celebrating so appropriately today.

"From where you are assembled you can see in the distance the Victoria bridge.

"It is interesting to recall that that bridge was opened seventy years ago by the late King Edward VII, at that time H. R. H. the Prince of Wales.

"How little at that time the citizens of our country dreamed that in the span of years which were to unite that day with Victoria Day, 1930, there woud be witnessed in our young country, the gigantic industrial and commercial development of which the climax is so fittingly expressed in the monumental bridge being opened in the largest metropolis of Canada today.

"I am very proud to be able to say that it has been under the present administration that the entire work of erecting this vast structure has taken place.

"In our first year of office on August 14, 1922, a committee of the Privy Council concurred in the appropriation of the sum of $50,000 of funds of the harbor board to be expended for the purpose of making surveys, soundings and borings in order that the preliminary or suggested designs and plans for a suitable structure might be prepared for the information and the guidance of the Commissioners and of the Federal Parliament. In 1924 my colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Hon. P. J. A. Cardin proposed to Parliament legislation for enabling the undertaking to be proceeded with as soon as possible.

"Within the course of the next few weeks this measure was unanimously passed by the Commons and the Senate, and on July 19 of that year, was assented to by the representative in Canada of His Majesty the King. In January, 1925, the site of the bridge was selected; in the month of May the contract for the piers was entered into, and in October, 1925, the contract for the super-structure was awarded.

Premier Praises Harbor President.

"Within the next four years the erection of the super-structure was completed; completed, I may say half a year before the date of completion required by the contract.

"On behalf of the Government, I should like to extend heartiest congratulations to the president and members of the Board of Harbor Commissioners, to the members of the Advisory Board of Engineering, and, indeed, to all who have combined their efforts to bring into being and successfully to complete this magnificent structure.

"In so doing, I feel sure you will agree that some word of special mention is due on this occasion to the President of the Board.

"I think I may well repeat what has already been so appropriately said elsewhere that 'while many have worked hard for the attainment of the bridge, it was Senator McDougald who co-ordinated their efforts and who, for the Harbor Commissioners enlisted the support of the Federal government, the Provincial government and the City of Montreal, without which the project could not have been started.'

"Moreover, 'it was through his individual tact and organization ability that the various scheme for the bridge and the many contending interests represented therein were organized and the support of all was enlisted.'

"I feel, ladies and gentlemen, that I am only giving expression to the feelings of all his fellow-citizens, when I say to the president of the Montreal Harbor Commission that we are indeed pleased to have this opportunity of publicity tendering to him at this time, the expression of our united thanks for his splendid service.

"The building of the Montreal Harbor bridge across the wide waters of the St. Lawrence has called for the highest qualities which have gone into the development of the Canadian National.

"There was, first of all, the splendid vision and the bold imagination which conceived the project.

"Then there was the patient perseverance of the few which overcame the doubts and fears of the many who were inclined to accept the handicaps of nature as insuperable.

"This was followed by careful planning and calculations of engineers and construction experts to whose accuracy of mind, the fate of uncounted thousands is to be committed in future years.

"After these had done their work there remained the courageous task of converting the vision and the plan into the immense reality of iron and steel which is presented to your eyes today.

"In paying tribute to the vision of those who conceived and to the skill of those who planned this bridge, let us not forget the faithful workmanship of thousands of our Canadian citizens whose oftimes dangerous and tiresome toil is worthy of our special rememberance and gratitude as we celebrate today the completion of one of the greatest triumphs of Canadian engineering.

"Bridges are not merely arteries of commerce.

"They serve also as links of serial intercourse and bonds of neighborhood.

"To my mind there is no more striking symbol of unity than a bridge.

"Rivers and mountain ranges often make for separation and misunderstanding. Bridges and tunnels make for unity and friendship.

"From my office window, I look down upon the Inter-Provincial bridge which spans the Ottawa River and unites the province of Ontario with the province of Quebec at the capital of the Dominion. What better symbol could there be of the union of races and creeds which has created the Canadian nation.

"Three years ago at Fort Erie I had the pleasure of being presented when His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales opened the bridge which provides a new bond of friendly intercourse between the people of this country and those of the United States.

"Is not this an enduring symbol of international peace and understanding? The magnificent bridge which is being opened today unites the great metropolis of Montreal with the rich and fertile countryside from which it draws its daily sustenance, and enables the dwellers of the city to share in the restful beauty of the rural districts of Quebec.

"Herein we find the suggestion of union between the city and country, between those who work in our factories and those who cultivate our farms.

"In a few days Montreal will witness yet another symbol of friendship in the arrival of the R-100, the great airship which has been constructed by the infinite genius of man, and which will break down the separation not merely of a river or stream, but the vast stretches of ocean which lie between us and Great Britain.

"Have we not here an example of a wider unity through the bridging of the old world and the new?

"Is it not conspicuous evidence of the place which Canada holds in the world progress that two events of such profound significance should occur in the city of Montreal in the brief space of a few days? Behind each we may discern the great ultimate urge towards unity, the determination of the human mind and spirit to break down every barrier which thwarts progress or lies in the path of friendship and goodwill.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I regret that the time at my disposal will not permit me to attempt to repeat in French what I have just said to you in my mother tongue.

"I have, however, asked my colleague, the Honorable Fernand Rinfret, Secretary of State, if he would kindly address the assembled gathering in French on my behalf.

"This he has kindly consented to do, as soon as the ceremony of the unveiling of the plaques is completed.

"In order that, without further delay, this ceremony may be concluded, I am now about to press the button which will release the flags and reveal to you the plaques commemorative of this occasion. With this act, performed from office of the Prime Minister in the Houses of Parliament at the Capital of our Dominion, I now declare the Montreal Harbor Bridge to be open to the public of our country and to all who may come to visit us from other lands."

Blessing of the Bridge.

The weatherman graciously smiled down on a scene of splendor for the opening of the new Montreal Harbor bridge. Traffic regulations at both ends of the structure were perfectly organized with the local police co-operating with the Harbor Police in seeing that the needs of the public were well catered to.

As early as ten this morning, crowds of spectators gathered at the Montreal end of the bridge, and all those who were carrying special passes issued by the Harbor Commissioners were allowed to pass. At the entrance to the bridge proper, large motor busses were awaiting to transport them to the pavilion leading to St. Helens Island, where the ceremony of the opening took place.

Private cars containing the specially invited guests and members of Parliament, aldermen and other officials began to arrive shortly before 10:30 a.m. They were driven to the ramp, where uniformed police courteously attended to the disembarkation of the passengers in formal dress. The chauffeurs then drove away to the far end of the bridge, where they awaited with their cars until the ceremony was over. This was done in order to prevent any unnecessary traffic delays, and all the arrangements worked perfectly.

By eleven o'clock, His Grace the Archbishop of Montreal Mgr. Gauthier, arrived with his attendants in full robes of office, his attire contrasting strikingly with the more formal attire of the assembled guests. His Lordship, Bishop Farthing, also was present, and Senator W. L. McDougald, President of the Harbor Commissioners, accompanied him.

At the opening of the proceedings Senator McDougald spoke a few words and asked His Grace to open the ceremonies by blessing the new bridge.

Monsignor Gauthier then stepped to the centre of the platform and pronounced the benediction in Latin blessing the bridge. This ceremony took only a few minutes, and while the solemn benediction was being pronounced hats were doffed until the final words of the blessing were pronounced.

After the ceremony of blessing the new undertaking, he delivered a short talk in French to the gathered guests and was followed by Bishop Farthing, who spoke in English.

Both church dignitaries were presented with life-long passes over the new structure after the preliminary ceremony, by Senator McDougald.

Hon. F. Rinfret.

Hon. F. Rinfret, Secretary of State, spoke on behalf of the Federal Government, as follows:

"It is for me a great pleasure to be present at the dedication of this bridge on behalf of the Federal Government.

"This great project, which the population of Montreal and the surroundings had hoped for, in many years, is now realized and we can view with our own eyes the imposing structure which unites our City to the South Shore.

"This accomplishment will remain as an historic date in the story of our Metropolis and the coming generations will remember with pride this twenty-fourth day of May of the present year.

"I must convey to you the deep regrets of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honorable Mackenzie King, who would have considered it a great honor to be present at this ceremony, but has been prevented by the exceptional pressure of the work of the session.

"I am happy, in his name and that of the Federal Government, to thank the Government of the Province of Quebec and the civil authorities of Montreal, which have contributed in a large measure to the success of this project.

"I also desire to congratulate most particularly the members of the Harbour Commission of Montreal, under whose direction this very important work has been conducted.

"The Federal Government is proud of the completion of this enterprise to which that Government had granted the support of all its authority and credit.

"One wonders what is to be most admired of this bridge, whether its amazing proportions, the triumph of civil engineering it represents, or the very elegance of its structure, gracefully bending over the majestic river.

"It is a magnificent addition to our harbour, which will enhance greatly the facilities of access to our City.

"I need not insist on the urgency for Montreal of this new mode of communication with the South Shore.

"Our city is now priding itself of a population of more than a million people and it must be accessible from all sides to those who desire to visit it.

"The new bridge will be of great utility to the populations of the surrounding municipalities.

"But it becomes also the main link in the great highways which unite the Canadian Metropolis to the United States. Through this bridge will come daily during the summer season a considerable number of guests to whom Montreal affords the most cordial welcome and whose visit from all viewpoints is most desirable.

"I desire to reiterate towards all the public powers which have contributed to the accomplishment of this enterprise the very best thanks of the Federal Government.

"I wish especially to congratulate the population of our great City and the surroundings which, by its industry, its spirit of work and progress, have created in this territory a state of prosperity which has permitted to attempt and accomplish this development.

"May this bridge remain for future generations as an immovable testimony of our determination and of our faith in the future of our City and our Country."

Hon. Mr. Mercier.

Hon. Mr. Mercier, representing the Quebec Government, said, "Permit me to say that as representative of the Provincial Government, I attach to this inauguration ceremony and dedication of this new bridge a tremendous importance.

"It gives me all the pleasure of having at last seen the realization of a project so dear to the population of our metropolis.

"What citizen of Montreal is not proud of this magnificent piece of architecture which will do so much to embellish the Harbour of Montreal.

"The citizens of this great city derive great satisfaction from having another artery of traffic to the South Shore.

"Thus, there is opened a new world of possibilities.

"Montreal, the ideal centre of concentration both of commerce and finance, owing to its topographical character and excellent situation as a maritime city, is therefore the centre ramification of a prosperous region.

"This great metropolis, in effect, will not be developed until it helps the growth of the surrounding municipalities.

"The metropolis should absorb these little centres into a single unity, which is the logical path of clear vision or, if you prefer, the logical history of all major developments."

Sidelights on Bridge Opening

As Bishop Farthing of Montreal spoke a large yellow-colored plane loomed overhead and circled over St. Helen's Island. The Bishop's voice rang out loud and clear with the aid of twelve specially installed loud speakers erected for the occasion.

The photographers were present en masse, and the visitors had an opportunity of seeing how the new talking pictures operated when Senator McDougald graciously posed for them near the newly unveiled tablets and spoke a few words of welcome for the consumption of movie fans. The specially constructed car which brought the apparatus had come up specially from New York for the opening ceremonies.

The Island of Montreal as seen from the ramp of the new bridge at St. Helen's island where the ceremonies took place seemed remarkably new. Its ever-changing skyline was dotted here and there with the skeleton structures of new buildings being erected, a reminder to all of the rapid strides the city is making in building progress.

A moment prior to the opening speech of the Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King, the Duchess of Richmond, sailed under the centre span of the new bridge and gave a long blast of salute. This was the signal for all the craft in the harbor, and they took up the signal with a deep-throated roar which extended the whole length of the harbor and continued for several minutes. The fog sirens were brought into play on the larger vessels and could be heard above the din of the ordinary whistles.

The invited guests were the centre of attraction as they passed on to the bridge in their large motor cars. Large crowds of pedestrians kept in control by the efficient police conditions watched the cars with great interest as they whizzed by.

Exactly at twelve o'clock, Premier King made the concluding remarks and pressed the button which unveiled the two bronze tablets at each side of the platform.

Alderman Weldon's humorous remarks concerning his boyhood days on the Island of Montreal and the St. Helen's Island, the spot where the new bridge is located were greatly appreciated by the guests.

Senator McDougald in his remarks made a touching reference to the help his wife had been to him during many trying moments while the new bridge was under construction. Mrs. McDougald was presented with a magnificent bouquet as a momento of the occasion.

FIRST VESSELS TO PASS UNDER NEW MONTREAL HARBOR BRIDGE

The Sin-Mac harbor tug Pierre Racine was the first vessel to pass upstream under the new Montreal Harbor Bridge after its official inauguration today by the Prime Minister of Canada.

The Harbor Commissioners' tug Sir Hugh Allan was the first vessel to pass down stream under the Bridge. It also was the first vessel carrying passengers to pass under the Bridge in both directions after the official opening.

PREMIER KING'S SPEECH

Broadcast From Ottawa Heard Clearly

Before Premier King spoke from Ottawa, Senator McDougald reviewed the history of the bridge and thanked all those who played a part in its development and crowning completion.

Through the loud speakers, Premier King's voice came loud and clear; he might have been standing on the platform. An airplane zoomed overhead as he spoke, an occasional whistle sounded from a ship in the river, but these served only to heighten the applause and were not considered as unwanted interruptions.

Premier King spoke as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: For some time past I have been looking forward to the pleasure of being present with you in the city of Montreal today, in response to the invitation so generously extended by the chairman and members of the Board of Harbor Commissioners of Montreal formally to open in their name and in that of our country, the Montreal harbor bridge, which from now on will stand in the eyes of the world as one of the greatest engineering achievements of our age, and a monument to the genius and skill of the Canadian people.

Harbor Bridge Officially Opened by Premier King

Notable Gathering on Pavilion as Prime Minister in Ottawa Presses Button to Unveil Plaques—Luncheon Follows Ceremony—Speakers Stress Unity

PREMIER MACKENZIE KING sat at his desk in the Parliament Buildings at Ottawa on Saturday and pressing an electric button, officially opened the new $20,000,000 Montreal Harbor Bridge. A distinguished gathering of senators, church dignitaries, judges, diplomatic representatives and members of the Federal and Provincial Legislatures gathered on the bridge pavilion to witness the dedication ceremonies and hear the Prime Minister's inaugural address by telephone from Ottawa. The pavilion and surrounding countryside was bathed in sunshine. Under a clear early summer sun, whose shafts of light fell everywhere on the heads of the brilliant assemblage, the procession of notables made its way to the pavilion platform.

Archbishop Gauthier walked in front, at his side Bishop Farthing of Montreal and Dean Arthur Carlisle in clerical robes. Then came Senator and Mrs. W. L. McDougald, members of the Harbor Commission, Hon. R. Rinfret, Secretary of State; Hon. Honore Mercier, representing the Province of Quebec, and hundreds of other notable visitors.

TRIPLE EVENT.

Everywhere flags waved. They fluttered in clusters and hung bravely in the wind, paying silent homage to the observance of Victoria Day and the 100th anniversary of the administrationtion of the Port of Montreal.

Senator McDougald mounted the dias. In his introductory remarks he called upon Archbishop Gauthier to perform the ceremony of blessing the bridge. His Grace spoke in Latin, pronouncing the solemn blessing, then continued his address in French, proclaiming the new bridge a "magificent structure of the intelligence and imagination, and one of the greatest accomplishments in the history of Canada; one which will add material prosperity to the Dominion."

Senator McDougald introduced Bishop Farthing. "The Harbor Commissioners and the City of Montreal are to be congratulated on this accomplishment," the bishop said. "One realizes that in every community there is a particular spirit. A family spirit that unites the whole body together.

"In Montreal we have that spirit of community, of unity, of generosity, and a sense of responsibility which has manifested itself in the benevolent works with which the City has been endowed. We are the centre from which proceed great transportation companies, the centre for the distribution of finance and of works of beneficence. As the centre of education, we have two wonderful universities and wonderful resources which are so abundant in this Dominion of Canada."

SPIRIT OF LIFE

Bishop Farthing said that man must learn to subdue himself before learning to subdue the earth, and must keep in mind that the spirit of life must inspire, direct and govern the great resources that are provided in this country.

Just before 12 o'clock, Senator McDougald again took over the microphone, which carried the voices of the speakers to the farthest end of the bridge. He introduced the Prime Minister of Canada.

A slight rattling came from the loud speakers, then the voice of Premier King was heard. He spoke distinctly, while an occasional ship's siren shrieked out the celebration of Victoria Day.

Premier King said: "For some time past I have been looking forward to the pleasure of being present with you in the City of Montreal today, in response to the invitation so generously extended by the chairman and members of the Board of Harbor Commissioners of Montreal formally to open in their name and in that of our country, the Montreal harbor bridge, which from now on will stand in the eyes of the world as one of the greatest engineering achievements of our age, and a monument to the genius and skill of the Canadian people.

"On behalf of the Government, I should like to extend heartiest congratulations to the president and members of the Board of Harbor Commissioners, to the members of the Advisory Board of Engineering, and, indeed, to all who have combined their efforts to bring into being and successfully to complete this mognificent structure.

"In so doing, I feel sure you will agree that some word of special mention is due on this occasion to the President of the Board.

"I think I may well repeat what has already been so appropriately said elsewhere that 'while many have worked hard for the attainment of the bridge, it was Senator McDougald who co-ordinated their efforts and who, for the Harbor Commissioners enlisted the support of the Federal Government, the Provincial Government and the City of Montreal, without which the project could not have been started.'

TACT AND ABILITY.

"Moreover, 'it was through his individual tact and organization ability that the various schemes for the bridge and the many contending interests represented therein were organized and the support of all was enlisted.'

"I feel, ladies and gentlemen, that I am only giving expression to the feelings of all his fellow-citizens, when I say to the president of the Montreal Harbor Commission that we are indeed pleased to have this opportunity of publicly tendering to him at this time, the expression of our united thanks for his splendid service.

"The building of the Montreal Harbor bridge across the wide waters of the St. Lawrence has called for the highest qualities which have gone into the development of the Canadian National.

There was, first of all, the splendid vision and the bold imagination which conceived the project.

"Then there was the patient perseverance of the few which overcame the doubts and fears of the many who were inclined to accept the handicaps of nature as insuperable.

CAREFUL PLANNING.

"This was followed by careful planning and calculations of engineers and construction experts to whose accuracy of mind, the fate of uncounted thousands is to be committed in future years.

"After these had done their work there remained the courageous task of converting the vision and the plan into the immense reality of iron and steel which is presented to your eyes today.

In paying tribute to the vision of those who conceived and to the skill of those who planned this bridge, let us not forget the faithful workmanship of thousands of our Canadian citizens whose oftimes dangerous and tiresome toil is worthy of our special remembrance and gratitude as we celebrate today the completion of one of the greatest triumphs of Canadian engineering.

"Bridges are not merely arteries of commerce.

BONDS OF NEIGHBORHOOD.

"They serve also as links of serial intercourse and bonds of neighborhood.

"To my mind there is no more striking symbol of unity than a bridge.

"Rivers and mountain ranges often make for separation and misunderstanding. Bridges and tunnels make for unity and friendship.

"From my office window, I look down upon the Inter-Provincial bridge which spans the Ottawa River and unites the Province of Ontario with the Province of Quebec at the capital of the Dominion. What better symbol could there be of the union of races and creeds which has created the Canadian nation.

"Three years ago at Fort Erie I had the pleasure of being present when His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales opened the bridge which provides a new bond of friendly intercourse between the people of this country and those of the United States.

ENDURING SYMBOL.

"Is not this an enduring symbol of international peace and understanding? The magnificent bridge which is being opened today unites the great metropolis of Montreal with the rich and fertile countryside from which it draws its daily sustenance, and enables the dwellers of the city to share in the restful beauty of the rural districts of Quebec.

"Herein we find the suggestion of union between the city and country, between those who work in our factories and those who cultivate our farms.

"In a few days Montreal will witness yet another symbol of friendship in the arrival of the R-100, the great airship which has been constructed by the infinite genius of man, and which will break down the separation not merely of a river or stream, but the vast stretches of ocean which lie between us and Great Britain.

"Have we not here an example of a wider unity through the bridging of the old world and the new?

PLACE OF CANADA.

"Is it not conspicuous evidence of the place which Canada holds in the world progress that two events of such profound significance should occur in the City of Montreal in the brief space of a few days? Behind each we may discern the great ultimate urge towards unity, the determination of the human mind and spirit to break down every barrier which thwarts progress or lies in the path of friendship and goodwill.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I regret that the time at my disposal will not permit me to attempt to repeat in French what I have just said to you in my mother tongue.

"I have, however, asked my colleague, Hon. Fernand Rinfret, Secretary of State, if he would kindly address the assembled gathering in French on my behalf.

"This he has kindly consented to do, as soon as the ceremony of the unveiling of the plaques is completed.

"In order that, without further delay, this ceremony may be concluded, I am now about to press the button which will release the flags and reveal to you the plaques commemorative of this occasion. With this act, performed from office of the Prime Minister in the Houses of Parliament at the Capital of our Dominion, I now declare the Montreal Harbor Bridge to be open to the public of our country and to all who may come to visit us from other lands."

PLAQUES UNVEILED.

As the last words of the Prime Minister died away, two Union Jacks dropped sharply from the face of two bronze plaques, and the Montreal Harbor Bridge was officially open. The plaques were set at the left and right sides of the platform, containing the names of those who played an important part in the work of the bridge.

Hon. R. Rinfret, Secretary of State spoke on behalf of the Federal Government; saying in part as follows:

"This great project, which the population of Montreal and the surroundings had hoped for, in many years, is now realized and we can view with our own eyes the imposing structure which unites our City to the South Shore.

"I must convey to you the deep regrets of the Prime Minister of Canada, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, who would have considered it a great honor to be present at this ceremony, but has been prevented by the exceptional pressure of the work of the session.

"I am happy, in his name and that of the Federal Government, to thank the Government of the Province of Quebec and the civil authorities of Montreal, which have contributed in a large measure to the success of this project.

"I also desire to congratulate most particularly the members of the Harbour Commission of Montreal, under whose direction this very important work has been conducted.

PROUD OF ENTERPRISE

"The Federal Government is proud of the completion of this enterprise to which that Government had granted the support of all its authority and credit.

"One wonders what is to be most admired of this bridge, whether its amazing proportions, the triumph of civil engineering it represents, or the very elegance of its structure, gracefully bending over the majestic river.

"It is magnificent addition to our harbour, which will enhance greatly the facilities of access to our City.

"I need not insist on the urgency for Montreal of this new mode of communication with the South Shore.

"Our city is now priding itself of a population of more than 1,000,000 people and it must be accessible from all sides to those who desire to visit it.

"The new bridge will be of great utility to the populations of the surrounding municipalities.

"But it becomes also the main link in the great highways which unite the Canadian Metropolis to the United States. Through this bridge will come daily during the summer season a considerable number of guests to whom Montreal affords the most cordial welcome and whose visit from all viewpoints is most desirable.

"I desire to reiterate towards all the public powers which have contributed to the accomplishment of this enterprise the very best thanks of the Federal Government.

"I wish especially to congratulate the population of our great City and the surroundings which, by its industry, its spirit of work and progress, have created in this territory a state of prosperity which has permitted to attempt and accomplish this development.

"May this bridge remain for future generations as an immovable testimony of our determination and of our faith in the future of our City and our Country."

L'hon. M. King

Voici le texte du discours adressé d'Ottawa à la population de Montréal, par le très honorable Mackenzie-King:

Monsieur le président, mesdames et messieurs,

J'escomptais depuis quelque temps le plaisir d'être avec vous aujourd'hui à Montréal pour me rendre à la gracieuse invitation que les commissaires du port de Montréal m'avaient faite d'inaugurer, en leur nom et au nom du pays, le pont du port de Montréal, l'une des plus grandes manifestations de l'art de l'ingénieur, témoignage du génie et du caractère du peuple canadien.

Vous avez appris les circonstances qui, depuis quelques jours, me forcent à ne pas quitter la capitale. Les membres du Parlement font tous leurs efforts pour terminer la session afin que les élections générales aient lieu aussitôt que possible. Vous reconnaîtrez qu'au moment où le navire de l'Etat navigue sur les eaux turbulentes d'une fin de session et sur celles peut-être non moins agitées d'une campagne électorale, la place du capitaine est sur le pont. Le souci de mon devoir m'a seul empêché de me rendre auprès de vous pour vous parler. Mais à quelque chose malheur est bon. Tout en me trouvant empêché de m'adresser directement à l'immense foule assemblée là-bas, le grand privilège m'est en ce moment donné, grâce à l'un des miracles du siècle où nous sommes, de vous parler de mon cabinet de premier ministre dans l'édifice du Parlement de la capitale du Canada et, en pressant simplement un bouton au moment voulu, de laisser tomber les drapeaux qui recouvrent les plaquettes commémorant, en français et en anglais, l'événement que nous sommes si heureux de célébrer aujourd'hui, jour de la fête de l'Empire.

De l'endroit où vous êtes assemblés, vous pouvez voir au loin le pont Victoria. Il est intéressant de rappeler que ce pont a été inauguré il y a soixante-dix ans, par le roi Edouard VII, alors prince de Galles. Ah! que les Canadiens de cette époque étaient loin de penser que la période qui les séparait du jour de la fête de Victoria de 1930 verrait le gigantesque développement industriel et commercial qui aboutit aujourd'hui à ce pont monumental élevé dans la grande métropole du Canada.

Je suis bien fier de dire que c'est sous le gouvernement actuel que se sont faits tous les travaux de cette vaste entreprise. La première année de notre administration, le 14 août 1922, un comité du Conseil du Conseil privé a autorisé une dépense de $50,000 prise sur les fonds de la Commission du port, pour des travaux d'examen et de sondage nécessaires à la préparation de plans et de devis destinés à guider les commissaires du port et le gouvernement fédéral. En 1924, mon collègue le ministre de la Marine et les Pêcheries, l'honorable P.J.-A. Cardin, présenta au Parlement un projet de loi en vue de faire commencer aussitôt que possible l'exécution de ce projet. Quelques semaines après, les Communes et le Sénat adoptaient unanimement cette loi qui, le 19 juillet de la même année, était sanctionnée par le représentant de Sa Majesté le roi en Canada. L'emplacement du pont fut choisi en janvier 1925; les contrats furent signés en mai pour les piliers et en octobre pour la superstructure. Quatre ans après, six mois avant la date prévue dans le contrat, la superstructure était terminée.

Au nom du gouvernement, je veux féliciter cordialement le président et les membres de la Commission du port, les membres de la commission consultative des ingéniers ainsi que tous ceux qui ont contribué à réaliser cette oeuvre magnifique. Vous reconnaîtrez, j'en suis sûr, que je dois mentionner ici spécialement le président de la Commission.

Je crois pouvoir répéter ce qui a été dit ailleurs avec raison: c'est que, "bien que plusieurs personnes aient travaillé ferme pour réaliser ce projet, c'est le sénateur McDougald qui a coordonné leurs efforts et qui a procuré à la Commission du port l'appui du gouvernement fédéral, celui du gouvernement provincial et celui de la cité de Montréal, sans lesquels l'entreprise n'aurait pu être réalisée." Bien plus, "c'est grâce à son tact et à son talent d'organisation que les divers projets relatifs à ce pont et les nombreux intérêts divergents qui s'y présentaient ont pu être conciliés et que l'entreprise a reçu l'appui de tous."

Je crois, mesdames et messieurs, exprimer les sentiments de tous ses concitoyens en disant au président de la Commission du port de Montréal que nous sommes vraiment heureux de saisir cette occasion de lui adresser aujourd'hui nos remerciements unanimes pour l'oeuvre magnifique qu'il a accomplie.

La construction du pont du port de Montréal sur le grand fleuve Saint-Laurent a nécessité la mise en oeuvre des plus hautes qualités qui ont contribué au développement de la nation canadienne. Il faut tout d'abord rendre hommage à ceux qui ont su voir de loin en imaginant cet audacieux projet. Puis il y a la patiente persévérance de ceux qui ont dissipé les doutes et les craintes de tant de gens portés à céder devant les obstacles de la nature. Reconnaissons aussi la sûreté avec laquelle ont été conçus les plans et les calculs dont doit dépendre dans l'avenir le sort d'innombrables êtres. Une fois ces plans faits, restait la tâche gigantesque de les réaliser dans cette immense structure de fer et d'acier qui s'offre aujourd'hui à vos regards. En rendant hommage à l'initiative de ceux qui ont conçu ce projet et à l'habileté de ceux qui ont préparé les plans de ce pont, n'oublions pas les milliers de nos concitoyens canadiens dont l'excellent travail, parfois dangereux et ennuyeux, mérite tout particulièrement notre souvenir et notre gratitude au moment où nous célébrons la réalisation de l'un des plus grands triomphes du génie canadien.

Les ponts ne sont pas seulement aussi des liens pour les relations sociales et de bon voisinage. Il n'est pas pour moi de symbole plus frappant d'unité qu'un pont. Les rivières et les chaînes de montagnes sont souvent des causes de division et de malentendu. Les ponts et les tunnels engendrent l'unité et l'amitié.

De ma fenêtre, je vois le pont Interprovincial qui traverse la rivière Ottawa, unissant la province d'Ontario à la province de Québec dans la capitale du Dominion. Quel plus beau symbole de l'union des races et des croyances qui ont créé la nation canadienne!

Il y a trois ans, à Fort Erié, j'avais le plaisir de voir Son Altesse Royale le prince de Galles inaugurer le pont qui sert à améliorer les relations sociales entre le peuple de notre pays et celui des Etats-Unis. N'est-ce pas là un symbole durable de paix internationale et d'entente? Le pont splendide que nous inaugurons aujourd'hui unit la grande métropole de Montréal à la riche et fertile région d'où elle tire sa subsistance quotidienne et permet à ses citadins d'aller jouir de la beauté reposante des paysages de la campagne québécoise. Voilà qui inspire l'union entre la ville et la campagne, entre ceux qui travaillent dans nos manufactures et ceux qui cultivent la terre.

Dans quelques jours, Montréal va être témoin d'un autre symbole d'amitié quand arrivera le R-100, le grand dirigeable dû au génie infini de l'homme et qui fera oublier la distance qui nous sépare de la Grande-Bretagne, non pas par un fleuve ou par un cours d'eau, mais par l'immensité de l'océan. Ce nouveau lien unissant l'ancien monde au nouveau ne nous donne-t-il pas l'exemple d'une unité plus solide? Ces deux événements si gros de conséquences, survenant dans l'espace de quelques jours à Montréal, ne prouvent-ils pas d'une façon manifeste l'importance que tient le Canada dans le progrès universel? Tous deux doivent nous inviter à l'unité, tous deux nous montrent la tendance de l'esprit humain et de la conscience humaine à abattre toutes les barrières qui s'opposent au progrès ou qui bloquent le chemin de l'amitié et de la bonne entente.

Mesdames et messieurs, je regrette que le temps que j'ai à ma disposition ne me permette pas de répéter en français ce que je viens de dire dans ma langue maternelle. J'ai cependant prié mon collègue, l'honorable Fernand Rinfret, secrétaire d'Etat, de se faire mon interprète en vous adressant la parole, et il a bien voulu y consentir. Il vous parlera aussitôt après le dévoilement des plaquettes.

Afin de ne pas retarder davantage la fin de cette cérémonie, je vais presser le bouton qui va laisser tomber les drapeaux et vous laisser voir les plaquettes commémorant cet événement... Maintenant que j'ai fait ce geste dans mon bureau de premier ministre, dans le Parlement de la capitale de notre Dominion, je déclare maintenant le pont du port de Montréal ouvert au public de notre pays et à tous les étrangers qui viendront nous voir.

Au moment où l'honorable Lyon-Mackenzie King déclarait le pont inauguré les fanfares réunies des "Grenadiers Guards" et des "Black Watch" jouèrent l'hymne national "O Canada".

A l'unisson, les cloches des églises de Montréal et de la rive sud, les sirènes des navires et paquebots dans le port, les sifflets des usines et les coups de canons à l'occasion de la fête de l'empire saluèrent cet événement, marquant un double anniversaire, celui de l'inauguration du pont et du centenaire de la première commission administrative du port.

C'est au milieu d'un sentiment religieux et patriotique que les personnes présentes, chapeaux bas, gardèrent une minute de silence. Le pont était alors inauguré officiellement et marquait l'un des plus grands événements dans l'histoire du génie civil au Canada.

L'hon. Fernand Rinfret

Dans son discours d'inauguration, l'honorable M. King avait dit à la population du Canada qu'il avait chargé l'honorable Fernand Rinfret, secrétaire d'Etat, de représenter le gouvernement fédéral à cette occasion et l'honorable M. McDougald l'invita ensuite à adresser la parole:

"C'est pour moi dit l'honorable Fernand Rinfret, un grand privilège que d'assister à l'inauguration de ce pont et d'y représenter officiellement le gouvernement fédéral. Ce grand projet, tant désiré par la population de Montréal et des environs, est maintenant réalisé et nous avons sous les yeux l'imposante armature qui relie notre ville à la rive sud. L'accomplissement de ce projet marque une date dans l'histoire de notre métropole et, pour les générations à venir, ce vingt-quatre mai aura une signification toute historique. Je vous apporte les regrets du premier ministre du Canada, le Très Honorable Mackenzie King, qui aurait tenu à assister lui-même à cette fête et qui en est empêché par les travaux exceptionnels de la session.

Fier de cette oeuvre

"Je suis heureux, en son nom et au nom du gouvernement fédéral de remercier le gouvernement de la province de Québec et les autorités de la ville de Montréal, lesquels ont contribué pour une large part à la réussite de cette entreprise. Je félicite tout particulièrement les membres de la commission du port de Montréal, sous la direction desquels ces importants travaux ont été conduits. Le gouvernement fédéral est fier de cette oeuvre à laquelle il avait accordé toute son autorité et tout l'appui de son crédit. Par la coopération de tous ces éléments, nous avons maintenant dans notre port l'un des ponts les plus extraordinaires du monde.

"On ne sait ce qu'il faut le plus admirer de cette structure, ou de la force gigantesque qu'elle représente ou des triomphes du génie civil qu'elle a résolus, ou de l'élégance avec laquelle elle s'élance d'une rive à l'autre. A la fois un ornement et un apport indispensable aux facilités d'accès de notre ville, cette entreprise s'élève aujourd'hui dans son achèvement définitif et nous en sommes tous fiers.

Je n'ai pas besoin d'insister sur la nécessité pour Montréal de cette nouvelle voie de communication avec la terre ferme. Située sur une île, notre ville qui grandit sans cesse et qui a maintenant plus d'un million de population, doit être accessible de tous côtés à ceux qui nous viennent du dehors.

Non seulement le nouveau pont permettra aux populations des différentes municipalités de la rive sud d'atteindre Montréal facilement, mais il devient le principal tronçon des grandes routes qui relient la métropole canadienne à la frontière. C'est par ce pont que nous arriveront chaque jour, durant la belle saison, une affluence considérable de visiteurs auxquels le Canada est heureux d'offrir la plus large hospitalité, qui viennent voir les beautés de notre territoire et dont la visite parmi nous peut être fructueuse à tous les points de vue.

Je salue donc, au nom du gouvernement que je représente, l'accomplissement de ce grand projet. Je suis heureux de réitérer, vis-à-vis des pouvoirs publics qui y ont contribué, les remerciements et les félicitations officielles du gouvernement fédéral. Mais je veux surtout féliciter la bonne population de notre grande ville et des centres environnants qui, par son industrie, son travail, son esprit de progrès, a créé dans cette région un état de prospérité et de développement qui ont permis de tenter et de réussir une entreprise comme celle-ci.

Depuis quelques jours déjà le pont était ouvert à la circulation. Aujourd'hui, nous en faisons l'inauguration solennelle. Puisse-t-il, pendant de très nombreuses années et qui dépasseront de beaucoup l'existence de ceux qui sont réunis en cette circonstance, exprimer l'esprit d'entreprise et de détermination de la génération présente! Puisse-t-il demeurer comme un témoignage solide et inébranlable de notre foi en l'avenir, en les progrès constants de notre ville et de notre grand pays.

L'honorable Honoré Mercier, ministre des terres et forêts, représentant l'honorable L.-A. Taschereau, premier ministre de la province de Québec, s'exprima en ces termes.

L'hon. Honoré Mercier

Permettez-moi tout d'abord de vous dire le prix que j'attache, dit l'hon. M. Mercier, comme représentant du gouvernement de ma province, à cette belle cérémonie de bénédiction de notre nouveau pont; de vous exprimer toute la satisfaction que je ressens de voir enfin réalisé un des projets les plus chers à la population de notre métropole, un sentiment légitime de fierté devant ce monument, témoin du progrès constant de mon pays.

Quel citoyen de Montréal, en effet, ne s'enorgueillirait pas de ce chef-d'oeuvre magnifique d'architecture et de génie dont s'embellit notre grand port, dont s'enrichit notre région.

Montréal, comme idéal de concentration commerciale et financière, à cause de son caractère topographique et de sa situation exceptionnelle comme port maritime, doit être logiquement le centre de ramifications de toute une région prospère. Cette grande métropole, en efeft, ne se développera en autant qu'elle fera croître les municipalités satellites qui dépendent d'elle. Des industriels, des hommes d'affaires dont on ne saurait mettre en doute le sens de prévoyance, assimilent déjà dans leur pensée Montréal et les localités environnantes, même de la Rive-Sud en une même grande cité, en un vaste arrondissement. La métropole est appelée pour eux à absorber ces petits centres pour en faire un tout bien homogène. L'avenir dira qu'ils ne pêchent pas par excès d'optimisme. C'est la suite logique des événements, ou si vous voulez, l'histoire logique des choses.

Le Canada tout entier traverse son siècle d'histoire économique. Déjà il devient pour ainsi dire un centre d'attraction universelle. Et comment pourrait-il en être autrement? Les pays d'Europe développés à outrance par des activités excessives, dans des conditions subordonnées à leur topographie, leur situation, leur richesse en capital et surtout aux caractères dominants de leurs populations, ont tous traversé et traversent encore une forte crise économique. C'est ce ralentissement inévitable qui permet aux jeunes pays, particulièrement ceux d'Amérique, comme le Canada, de prendre conscience de leur valeur.

Au point de vue richesses naturelles, la comparaison nous apparaît nettement avantageuse. Ces ressources naturelles une fois bien connues, bien inventoriées, leur exploitation devient un problème national ; l'on espère y trouver l'affranchissement économique. Le pays riche en ressources vit même de son développement: il y puise son élément d'intensité industrielle, l'impulsion nécessaire à son commerce, la consolidation de son crédit.

Si la majorité de ses habitants, dans la recherche d'un meilleur "standard of life" travaille, pour ainsi dire, inconsciemment à son progrès, il y a indiscutablement une classe d'individus à qui échoit la responsabilité de la prévoyance, de la coordination.

On l'a souvent répété: "Gouverner, c'est prévoir". En temps de paix, on ne saurait dire plus vrai: les gouvernements doivent prévoir, c'est-à-dire envisager autant que possible l'objet ultime des développements proposés. Ils doivent aussi, et c'est peut-être là le plus délicat de leur tâche, proportionner l'effort collectif au coefficient rationnel de développement.

Pour faire grandir une ville, il faut nécessairement la relier à tout ce qui l'entoure, créer, multiplier les voies de communications, perfectionner et rendre plus efficaces ses réseaux de routes, accélérer les échanges en donnant à toutes ces ramifications un caractère de permanence et de modernisme. Développer une métropole de l'importance de Montréal, c'est donc la tâche collective et concertée: d'un conseil municipal, des chambres de commerce, de la province, du pays tout entier.

Tout cela demande une connaissance profonde des ressources du pays, du surplus de leur rendement, de la richesse financière qui en découle pour les groupements individuels, c'est-à-dire des petits gouvernements.

C'est un fait apparemment extraordinaire que les peuples heureux sont ceux qui travaillent. S'il m'était permis d'appliquer ce grand principe à un cadre d'activité plus petit qu'un pays tout entier, je dirais que le peuple de notre province est heureux parce qu'il est au travail. Si le vingtième siècle, suivant la formule d'un grand politique, qui fut aussi un grand prévoyant, "est le siècle du Canada", c'est aussi le siècle de la province de Québec. L'érection de ce magnifique pont est un solide pilier dans son armature économique, parce qu'elle ouvre à notre métropole, noyau de la province, un canal d'expansion extérieure, et un nouveau domaine de possibilités.

On a déjà énuméré les nombreux avantages qui résulteront de ce grand pont. La population de Montréal ne tardera pas d'en apprécier toute la valeur. C'est un nouveau débouché sur la rive-sud, une voie de communication plus directe avec les cantons de l'Est, l'ouverture d'un marché plus accessible aux agriculteurs de la région-sud de Montréal. C'est l'exode sur des terrains plus vastes, et le décongestionnement de nos quartiers surpeuplés. C'est une partie du Montréal résidentiel qui se décentralisera pour le plus grand bienfait de la population. C'est encore une impulsion commerciale et industrielle pour les municipalités et petites villes de la rive-sud. C'est au point de vue affaire un placement avantageux pour l'avenir. C'est un élément de prospérité pour la métropole et la province entière.

Le pays, la province et la cité de Montréal sont appelés à en bénéficier au même titre. Voilà pourquoi le gouvernement fédéral, celui de la province et la cité de Montréal ont contribué à parts égales dans cette nouvelle acquisition. Il convient peut-être ici de souligner le caractère logique de ces contributions, parce qu'il consacre un principe de coopération mutuelle pour le développement des grands centres.

Le gouvernement de la province s'est efforcé, depuis nombre d'années, de collaborer largement dans cette oeuvre de développement. Il a doté la région de Montréal d'un excellent réseau de routes permanentes, et à l'heure présente il consacre à ce réseau la majeure partie de son budget annuel pour les routes. Il a tenu aussi à créer sur la rive-sud d'excellentes voies de communications internationales, urbaines et rurales. Il s'est chargé de relier les approches des ponts à ces tronçons de routes afin d'activer la circulation et d'en multiplier les moyens d'accès.

Ai-je besoin de souligner la diligence et la rapidité qui ont caractérisé l'érection de ce pont? Rarement a-t-on vu travail s'accomplir avec plus de coopération, de méthode et d'ensemble. L'on concevra que les promoteurs et les constructeurs en ont compris toute l'urgente nécessité. Tout s'est fait dans un ordre parfait, sous un contrôle efficace qui n'a pas souffert de ralentissement ni d'arrêt. A vue d'oeil on a pu voir s'élever les solides piliers, s'y poser d'énormes masses, poussant chacune ses bras, qu'on aurait dit fragiles. Pièce par pièce ces solides appuis se sont avancés l'un vers l'autre. Puis un jour ils se sont joints: dès lors nous est apparu terminé, surplombant notre beau fleuve, ce magnifique chef-d'oeuvre de génie et d'architecture.

La Commission du port de Montréal, chargée de ce travail, a fait preuve de méthode et d'esprit de suite. Elle a fait de ce pont son travail à elle, et elle a tenu à le faire exécuter sans retards. Sa décision avait été comprise par les bureaux de contrôle et les compagnies de construction. C'était là une tâche concertée dont l'accomplissement devait symboliser la marche rapide et accélérée du progrès de notre grande cité.

Comme citoyen de cette ville et de cette province, je dirai à ses membres toute la satisfaction que j'en éprouve. Ils se sont bien acquittés de leur mandat. Tous ceux qui ont contribué de quelque façon à cette oeuvre d'utilité publique ont fait preuve de zèle et de véritable patriotisme, et je tiens à les en féliciter cordialement.

L'échevin W.-S. Weldon

En l'absence de Son Honneur le maire Camillien Houde, ce fut l'échevin W.-S.Weldon, membre du comité exécutif qui parla au nom de la ville de Montréal. Il s'exprima en ces termes:

"C'est un grand honneur que m'a fait le maire Houde en me demandant de le remplacer ici. Comme par le passé c'est l'intention de la ville de coopérer dans tout ce qui peut intéresser le développement de notre ville.

"C'est le désir de mes collègues, particulièrement de l'échevin Fortin, de rendre cette île Sainte-Hélène encore plus belle. Nous voulons en faire un réel lieu d'amusements pour tous les enfants de la ville. Nous allons conserver son cachet particulier à l'île et nous y protégerons l'enfant". L'échevin Weldon dit également quelques mots en français.

Le sénateur McDougald termina la cérémonie en déclarant comment il regrettait l'absence forcée des honorables MacKenzie King, Bennett et Taschereau, ainsi que celle du maire de Montréal.

Au Ritz-Carlton

L'inauguration du pont fut suivie d'un grand banquet au Ritz-Carlton pour marquer le centenaire de la première commission administrative qui tombait exactement le 8 mai du courant. Les commissaires décidèrent de célébrer cet événement conjointement avec l'inauguration du pont.

Ce banquet a réuni les sommités du monde financier, industriel, commercial et professionnel.

Les orateurs au programme furent les mêmes qu'à l'inauguration du pont, sauf M. Grant Hall, 1er vice-président du Pacifique Canadien, dont voici le texte du discours:

M. Grant Hall

Je désire, dit M. Grant Hall, vice-président du Pacifique Canadien, autant personnellement qu'officiellement, remercier le sénateur McDougald et les membres de la commission du port de Montréal pour l'honneur qu'ils m'ont fait en m'invitant à ce lunch et en me procurant l'occasion de faire quelques remarques au sujet du port de Montréal et de son importance dans le développement du Canada.

Le pont qui vient d'être inauguré est une structure imposante qui aidera considérablement à établir de meilleures communications entre cette ville et le territoire qui s'étend au sud. Son utilité et son importance deviendront encore plus évidentes à mesure que s'écouleront les années et bien que le coût de l'entreprise soit plutôt élevé, il ne fait pas de doute que le développement de Montréal sera encore accrû du fait de la construction de ce pont.

Il n'y a pas, que je sache, de compagnie canadienne dont le sort soit plus étroitement lié avec la ville de Montréal, son port et la route du Saint-Laurent que le Pacifique Canadien. Il y a déjà près de cinquante ans que Montréal fut choisie comme le siège social de la compagnie et depuis plus de vingt-cinq ans, celle-ci possède une flotte de paquebots qui visitent régulièrement les ports de Québec et de Montréal durant la saison de navigation.

Nous ne saurions trop apprécier la valeur et l'importance de ce port et de la route du Saint-Laurent pour les opérations maritimes du Pacifique Canadien et autres compagnies. C'est à cause de cette importance que dans l'espace de dix ans, nous avons dépensé $70,000,000 dans la construction de nouveaux et plus luxueux paquebots pour le service transatlantique.

L'an dernier, le nombre total de passagers que nous avons transportés par cette route canadienne s'est élevé à 109,770, dont 52,081 sont passés par Montréal. Ce sont là des chiffres à la fois éloquents et intéressants.

C'est à cause de l'importance que nous attachons à la route du Saint-Laurent que nous avons secondé de tout coeur l'initiative du gouvernement, annoncée récemment par le ministre de la marine, de hâter les travaux de creusage et d'élargissement du chenal entre Montréal et Québec. Nous considérons comme sage et clairvoyante cette politique de rendre encore plus important l'un des principaux actifs du Canada, et bien que les frais en soient très élevés, quiconque a confiance dans l'avenir de la route du Saint-Laurent ne doit pas hésiter à approuver la politique de M. Cardin. Je n'ai pas besoin de vous rappeler, messieurs, que la concurrence est grande sur l'Atlantique nord et que les revenus des compagnies de navigation, au cours des quelques dernières années, ont été plutôt insuffisants.

L'"Empress of Britain"

La politique des directeurs du Pacifique Canadien a été de maintenir sa flotte à un niveau supérieur aux besoins immédiats et ils ont certainement pris une décision marquée au coin d'une grande initiative, en ordonnant la construction de l'"Empress of Britain", paquebot qui jaugera 40,000 tonnes, développera une vitesse de 24 noeuds à l'heure et qui sera le plus spacieux, le plus beau et le plus rapide de tous les navires jamais construits pour une compagnie canadienne ou mis en service au Canada.

Les voyageurs, tant canadiens qu'américains, apprécient de plus en plus les avantages de la route du Saint-Laurent et, pour cette raison, par suite de l'importance du port de Montréal et de la ville proprement dite, nous saluons avec plaisir l'apport de ce nouveau moyen de communication.

Nous avons donc devant nous une autre preuve de l'esprit d'initiative des commissaires du Port et de leur désir de marcher de pair avec le développement du Canada, dont Montréal en est la clef de voûte et c'est pourquoi, je suis heureux de vous prier de lever vos verres à la santé du port de Montréal.

Parlèrent aussi l'honorable Geo.-P. Graham et M. S.-H. Duggan.

La Patrie, 26 Mai 1930.

LE PREMIER MINISTRE KING

"Depuis quelque temps déjà je goûtais le plaisir d'être parmi vous, dans la ville de Montréal, aujourd'hui, en réponse à la gracieuse invitation du président et des membres de la Commission du Port de Montréal d'ouvrir en leur nom et celui de tout le pays le nouveau pont du port de Montréal qui, à partir d'aujourd'hui, sera considéré dans le monde entier comme l'une des plus grandes oeuvres du génie de notre époque et un monument au génie et de l'habileté de notre peuple canadien.

"Vous avez sans doute appris les raisons qui, depuis quelques jours, m'ont forcé de rester au siège du gouvernement.

"Tous les efforts des membres du Parlement sont groupés dans le but de finir la session afin de pouvoir faire les élections générales dans le plus court délai possible.

"Je suis sûr que vous admettrez que lorsque le navire de l'Etat est piloté à travers les eaux mouvementées des derniers jours d'une session parlementaire pour passer ensuite dans les eaux non moins agitées d'une élection générale, le pilote doit rester sur son navire.

"L'appel du devoir seul m'a empêché d'être présents à Montréal.

"Alors qu'il m'était impossible de m'adresser directement à la foule énorme de spectateurs qui se trouvent actuellement sur le pont pour la cérémonie, grâce à un miracle de notre époque, j'ai le plaisir actuellement de vous parler de mon bureau même de Premier Ministre dans la bâtisse du parlement de la capitale de notre dominion, et en temps voulu, avoir le plaisir aussi de dévoiler les deux plaques bilingues qui vont commémorer l'événement que nous célébrons aujourd'hui, par la simple pression d'un bouton.

"De l'endroit où vous êtes, vous pouvez apercevoir le pont Victoria.

"Il est intéressant de vous rappeler que ce pont fut inauguré il y a 70 ans par le défunt Roi Edouard VII, à cette époque Prince de Galles.

"Très peu de personnes à cette époque songeaient au jour où l'on pourrait contempler un autre pont, d'une structure comme celle que vous inaugurez aujourd'hui, qui offrirait un autre moyen de communication avec la métropole du Canada.

"Je suis fier de dire que c'est sous l'administration actuelle que ce travail admirable a été fait.

"Pendant notre première année d'office, le 14 août 1929, un comité du Conseil Privé a convenu l'octroi de $50,000 à la Commission du Port de Montréal pour travaux d'études, de sondages en vue de commencer la préparation de plans convenables à la construction projetée de la Commission du Port et du parlement. En 1924, un de mes collègues, l'honorable M. P. J. A. Cardin, proposait une législation au parlement afin de permettre que l'on procède le plus tôt possible à l'entreprise.

"Dans l'espace de quelques semaines, cette mesure fut adoptée par le Parlement et le Sénat, et le 19 juillet de la même année cette législation recevait l'assentiment du représentant du Roi au Canada. En janvier 1925, on choisissait le site du pont; au mois de mai, l'on donnait le contrat pour les piliers, et en octobre 1925, le contrat de la superstructure était accordé.

"Dans l'espace de quatre ans on a pu finir la superstructure du pont, soit un an avant le temps stipulé dans le contrat.

"De la part du gouvernement, je suis heureux d'offrir mes plus cordiales félicitations au Président et aux Membres de la Commission du Port de Montréal, aux membres du bureau d'aviseur du génie, et en vérité à tous ceux qui ont coopéré à cette construction, pour le succès merveilleux obtenu.

"Je suis sûr que vous ne m'en voudrez pas si je me permets d'adresser des félicitations toutes spéciales au président de la Commission du Port.

"Je crois que je puis répéter ici ce qui a déjà été dit d'une façon si appropriée par d'autres, à savoir que si plusieurs ont prêté leur concours et fourni leurs efforts dans la construction du nouveau pont, c'est le sénateur McDougald qui a coordonné ces efforts et cette coopération et qui, pour la Commission, s'est assuré le support des gouvernements fédéral et provincial et de la cité de Montréal, support sans lequel cette euvre n'aurait pu être réalisée.

"De plus, c'est grâce au tact et à l'habileté du sénateur McDougald que les différents plans du pont et les différents intérêts représentés dans cette construction ont pu marcher de concert et avec tout le support nécessaire.

"Je prétends, mesdames et messieurs, que je ne fais qu'exprimer les sentiments de ses concitoyens, lorsque je déclare au président de la Commission du port de Montréal que nous sommes fiers d'avoir cette occasion de lui exprimer publiquement nos remerciements à tous pour les services splendides qu'il a rendus.

"La construction du pont de Montréal, au-dessus des eaux du Saint-Laurent, a provoqué une manifestation des qualités les plus grandes.

"Il y eût d'abord "la vision" splendide de l'avenir et l'imagination nécessaire pour concevoir le projet.

"Il y a eu alors la patiente persévérance de ceux qui mirent les doutes et les craintes de côté.

"Cela fut suivi de calculs et de plans précis par les ingénieurs et les experts en construction qui avaient la responsabilité de la vie des centaines de milles personnes qui passeraient sur le pont dans l'avenir.

"En rendant hommage à ceux qui ont imaginé ce pont et à l'habileté de deux qui en ont tracé les plans. n'oublions pas l'ouvrage consciencieux accompli par des milliers de nos ouvriers canadiens dont le travail dangereux et la tâche lourde, parfois, sont dignes de notre reconnaissance, aujourd'hui, alors que nous célébrons le plus grand triomphe de génie civil canadien.

"Les ponts ne sont pas simplement des artères de commerce.

"Ils servent aussi bien entre les différentes classes de la société.

"A mon avis, il n'y a pas de plus beau symbole d'unité qu'un pont. "Les rivières et les montagnes sont souvent la cause de séparation et de malentendus entre les peuples. Les ponts et les tunnels sont faits pour l'unité et l'amitié.

"De la fenêtre de mon bureau, je regarde le pont interprovincial qui relie la province d'Ontario et la province de Québec. Quel plus beau symbole de l'union des races et des croyances qui ont fait la nation canadienne.

"Il y a trois ans, à Fort Erie, j'avais le plaisir d'être présent lorsque Son Altesse Royale le Prince de Galles a ouvert le pont qui établit un nouveau lien d'amitié entre le peuple de ce pays et celui des Etats-Unis.

"N'est-ce pas là un symbole durable de paix internationale. Le pont magnifique qui est inauguré aujourd'hui, unit la grande métropole de Montréal à la rive riche et fertile. Il permettra aux résidents de la ville de jouir du spectacle reposant de la beauté du district rural de Québec.

"Nous trouvons, ici le symbole de l'union entre la ville et la campagne, entre ceux qui travaillent dans les usines et ceux qui travaillent sur la terre.

"Dans quelques jours, Montréal sera témoin d'un autre symbole d'amitié lors de l'arrivée du R-100, le grand dirigeable qui a été construit, oeuvre d'un génie.

"N'est-ce pas la preuve évidente de la place que tient le Canada dans le progrès du monde que ces deux évènements de profonde signification surviennent à Montréal, à quelques jours de distance? Nous pouvons voir là un pas de plus vers l'unité, la détermination de l'esprit humain à briser toutes les barrières qui empêchent le progrès ou qui relient l'amitié à la bonne volonté.

"Mesdames et messieurs, je regrette que le temps que j'aie à ma disposition ne me permettra pas de répéter en français ce que j'ai dit dans ma langue maternelle.

"J'ai cependant, demandé à mon collègue, l'honorable M. Fernand Rinfret, secrétaire d'état, de parler en français à l'assemblée.

WONDERFUL ACHIEVEMENT

It is a notable fact that the King Government in its approaching appeal to the electorate will come before the people with a remarkable clean record. During the four years since the last election there has been no charges of mal-administration, no shady tranactions to be investigated, no scandal even hinted at. This is almost unprecedented and the government will no doubt be given due credit for such a satisfactory condition. There is always a certain amount of criticism on items of expenditure but what the people are concerned about is the results achieved and every Province can point to the benefit derived from a Liberal government. Not only has taxation been materially reduced, such for instance as reductions in Income Tax, Sales Tax, Postage rates, and decreased Tariff duties but in addition every year has ended with a large surplus, in fact the Robb Budgets were famous for their generous gifts to the people. The King government is worthy of all support on its financial administration but it has also handled successfully many knotty problems that came up for settlement such as the return of the Natural Resources to British Columbia and the Prairie Provinces, the settlement of grievances that had for years existed in the Maritime Provinces, the re-building of the Canadian National Railways, the West Indies Treaty, increased subsidies to the Provinces and the settling of the status of Canada as a free and independent nation within and as part of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

All these achievements, great as they have been, are now climaxed by the greatest achievement of all, namely, the policy embraced in the Dunning Budget which has been described as "a step forward in the right direction." It extends the British preference, and will promote intra Empire trade. It will cut out two hundred millions of imports from the United States. It will place the steel and iron industries of Canada on a solid foundation. It will give a renewed impetus to every portion of the Dominion and what do the Conservatives offer as an alternative? Can our local opposition organ enlighten us? Mr. Bennett and his followers may deal in criticisms and generalities but they canont dispute the value of the Dunning Budget. A rather sensational endorsement of the Budget was wired Hon. Mr. Ralston on behalf of 3,000 steel workers at Sydney. Three Tory members voted for it in the House. Prime Minister Ramsay McDonald says:—"Canada's Budget is an example of how the Dominion's can and will help." Lord Melchett in addressing the Empire Chamber of Commerce this week said: "We in the Old Country appreciate it." "The family first, outsiders next" is the slogan he gives. Lord Elibank in the House of Lords described it as "Canada's glorious example" and Lord Beauchamp, the Liberal Leader said, "We are profoundly grateful to the Dominion for what she has done." Contrast these unsolicited tributes with the message which comes from the United States as follows, "The Administration is known to take the new Canadian regulations with great seriousness," and also contrast the eulogies which come from the seat of Empire with Mr. Bennett's remarks 'That a dollar spent in England is no better than a dollar spent in the United States" and that from a party which would have no truck or trade with the Yankees.

Record of Liberal administration

At Brantford, on June the 16th, 1930, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in opening the General Election campaign, dealt with the record of the government during eight and a half years from December, 1921:

> "In that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history. As a people and as a government we have been far too modest with respect to the achievements of the years we have been in office. We have been so modest, in fact, that the record is but partially known even to the people of our own country. The growth and development of Canada under the present Administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation".

When the Liberal administration came into office:

> "depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contracted; agriculture was depressed".

But:

> "the Liberal administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known".

The tasks:

1. To balance the Budget.
2. To produce a surplus in the National accounts.

The methods adopted:

1. Curtailment of expenditure.
2. Increased revenues by additional taxation. "The second of these methods is traditionally un popular".

"Not only did our predecessors meet the total cost of the war and of demobilization out of borrowed money, money raised by loans, a very considerable part of which were made totally exempt from taxation, but they actually failed to raise during the four years of the war and two years of demobilization sufficient revenues to meet the expenditures of government, apart altogether from the war."

"The result was that the present administration was faced, on coming into office, not only with the task of meeting all expenditures in connection with the regular business of government, business which had vastly increased, due to fresh obligations to which the war had given rise, but was also faced with the task of continuing to finance the total cost of war and demobilization".

"Within two years our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our Budget but to give us on the 31st March, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000. From that time forward, we began to pay off annually without intermission, an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

The Policy of Reconciliation, the Traditional Liberal Policy

In his Budget speech in the House of Commons, June 12, 1922, Mr. Fielding said:

> "All political matters are essentially matters of compromise, in some degree and so long as the compromise is not one of principle, there is no reason why men should not compromise, because it is only by a policy of that nature that governments can ever be carried on. We are apt each of us in our own part of the country to look at things from a sectional point of view and that is unavoidable.....As we meet we discover that we are able to take broader views."

The Genesis of the Budget

Speaking on the introduction of his budget in the House of Commons on March 1, 1929, the late Mr. Robb said:

> "This Dominion continues to be one of the world leaders in the volume of its external trade; therefore, problems arising in connection with our foreign trade can never be ignored. As the years go by an increasing quantity of our domestic production must necessarily be marketed abroad. It is our desire to trade freely with any and all who are willing to trade with us. What may, or may not, be possible in this particular necessarily depends in some measure on the purchasing power and the fiscal policies of other countries. The policy of this Administration is not a high tariff policy; it is a low tariff policy. Its policy is to encourage production at home and the marketing of our excess of production abroad. In applying this policy both domestic and international factors must of necessity be considered.
> In accordance with the fiscal policy of the Government, the tariff changes to be submitted today are designed to reduce taxation and to lessen the costs of production. The changes to be submitted arise out of references which the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation has investigated, and are based on its fact-findings. The Board is continuing its inquiries, on which substantial progress has already been made, into several larger problems which involve the consideration of whole tariff schedules and the inter-relation of many important Canadian industries. While these inquiries are being pursued, opportunity will be afforded for considering the possible effect on trade of changes being proposed in the tariff schedules of other countries, should they be implemented by legislation."

Present Budget Forecast in Winnipeg Speech,
November 1, 1929

"Red-blooded" attitude vs. "cool- headed" attitude

Speaking of the position taken by our opponents in Parliament I said:

> "We are told that we should retaliate; but what we are to retaliate against, they cannot so much as tell us, for up to the present, no changes in the American tariff have been made."

I added, with regard to our own position:

> "I am not denying that changes by Congress in the United States' tariff which may adversely affect our trade may call for action on the part of the Canadian Parliament to secure elsewhere markets for our exports which it is in the public interest to maintain."

In answer to objection re formal protest to the United States, I said:

> "Let it, however, never be assumed that because we have not been threatening, because we have not been expounding vociferously with regard to a situation that has not yet arisen, that in any particular we have been indifferent to possibilities; that we have not been making all proper and necessary representations, or that we have not been reflecting upon, studying, and determining the course of action that it may be best to adopt in the event of any changes which may adversely affect our trade being made now or later on in the tariff of the United States or of any other country. This it was obviously our duty to do, and this we have been doing through the agency of more departments of government than one."

More direct & specific re trade with U.S., also inter-imperial trade.

Read following & then ask whether "premature", "unreasoned action" or "hysterically inspired by party exigencies" : -

Speaking specifically of the possible changes in the American tariff, I said:

> The mere fact that a revision of the United States' tariff is possible, a fact which has received emphasis from the present discussions, has rendered it imperative that we should consider all probable and possible effects of a revision, and that we should explore in each and every direction the courses which it may be wisest to take in meeting whatever situation may ultimately develop. I wish to make it very clear that this is precisely what the Government has been doing, and doing through agencies especially designed and adapted for the purpose."

> "I spoke a moment ago of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation. This Board has been in existence now for three years. During the whole of that period it has been making a most searching and careful study of the tariff. It has been considering its schedules as a whole, and, one by one, in relation to special applications made for changes in the tariff which have been referred to it for consideration, and in relation to modifications of the tariff generally in accordance with the Liberal policy of watching the interest of consumers as well as of producers and manufacturers. The Board's personnel is composed of able representative men from different parts of Canada. It has associated with it permanently, and is free to call in from time to time, persons in a position to give expert opinion."

> "When the revision of the United States' tariff was first mooted, the Chairman of the Board, Mr. W.H.Moore, was called into conference by the Minister of Finance on bahalf of the Government, and was told that it was the wish of the Government to have, in case it should be required, as much information as might be possible with respect to changes in our own tariff which it might be deemed advisable to make in the interests of our own people, as a consequence of, or as an offset to, changes which might come in the United States' tariff. Much of this information we already have, and the Board's work is proceeding from day to day."//

I then referred to the absurdity of any thought of changing a tariff over night, as implied in the attitude of our opponents and said:

"The old method of threatened retaliation may have had its day, but the new method looks not to threats for what is best, but to close and accurate scientific study. It bases its conclusions on acquired information and knowledge."

Specific Refernece to Inter-Imperial Trade.

Then speaking of the development of inter-imperial trade, I said:

//"Finally there is the movement of effecting more in the way of inter-imperial trade, which from voluntary as well as government agencies, has gathered momentum almost daily since the revision of the United States' tariff began to be discussed. Here we already see the extent to which even the possibility of a revision of their tariff by the United States has served to bring home to component parts of the British Empire the wisdom of securing, within the Empire itself, with regard to any and every eventuality, as large a measure of inter-imperial trade as may be possible. There seems little doubt that Empire producers can supply vast quantities of

PUBLIC ARCHIVES
ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES

goods now produced in the United States. What proportions this movement may assume, should actual changes adversely affecting different parts of the Empire ever come into effect, it is, of course, impossible to foretell. To this aspect, as far as Canada is concerned, we have been giving the closest possible attention.

"There should be in Canada the heartiest co-operation on the part of all parties to seek within the Empire new markets to replace any that may be lost elsewhere, and to place within the Empire, at home and abroad, as many of the purchases now given to any country that penalizes our trade and can be transferred without penalizing Canadians.//

The whole position very clearly stated -

"What then is the present position with respect to possible changes in the tariff of the United States which may adversely affect our trade? The position is well known. It has not changed since the controversy commended. It was stated in parliament in the clearest possible terms by both the Minister of Finance and myself in the course of the debate on the Budget in April last. The significance of what was then said is, I believe, as fully understood by the people of the United States as by our own people.

"We have made it clear that, in so far as we have a fiscal problem, our task would appear to be that of furthering the utilization of domestic resources, of encouraging greater and more economical production of quality products, of removing inequalities where inquiry proves such to exist, and of re-adjusting as necessity arises, our customs tariff schedules to meet new conditions. In applying these principles the availability of supples, the proximity of markets and transportation costs are all factors that must be considered. Other things being equal, we would wish to favour those countries which favour our products. It is our desire to trade freely with any or all who are willing to trade with us; to buy from those who buy from us; and in so far as we may be able so to do, to secure markets for our products and marchandise on which we can rely. What may or may not be possible in this particular necessarily depends in some measure on the purchasing power and the fiscal policies of other countries. The policy of the present Administration is not a high tariff policy, it is one of promoting greater freedom in the matter of trade, in a manner which will encoursge production at home and the marketing of our excess of production abroad.

"Our position as respects the United States is perfectly clear, and, I may add, equally strong, come what may. In nothing have we been provocative. We have recognized that the United States is free to legislate as it pleases as respects its own tariff. We have been exemplary in our attitude in not attempting to interfere by threat or formal protest with respect to a matter which we recognize as one of domestic concern. As a neighbour with whom the United States is doing business, as its nearest neighbour, and in some respects its best sustomer, we have made known wherein certain tariff changes may adversely affest our interests. We have expressed the hope that our relations being neighbourly, neighbourly considerations would govern, by them, as by us, in respect to the tariff, as in all else. We have made it clear that only in an atmosphere of confidence and goodwill is it going to be possible to adjust with the greatest mutual advantage many of the problems which in their nature are bound to be international. If, in the face of all this, the tariff of the United States should be so altered as adversely to affect to any appreciable degree any interest in this country, the United States will surely be the first to recognize our right with respect to our tariff so to legislate as to have regard for Canadian interests, and in particular, Canadian interest as they may be affected, or as we may have reason to feel they are ever likely to be affected, by tariff revisions in the United States.

"The people of Canada may rely upon the present Administration taking care of Canadian trade in future, as we have taken care of it in the past. They may rely upon the Canadian tariff being made to serve Canadian interests. No situation has arisen during the past nine years which has not been satisfactorily met. The Government is fully prepared in the interests of Canada to readjust its fiscal policy from time to time to meet any changes in existing fiscal structures which may affect our markets. If the United States or any other country does not want to trade with Canada except on unequal terms, then surely we can look as never before to the rest of the world, and particularly to the rest of the British Empire. We will continue to shape our fiscal policies on a national basis in the interests of all sections in Canada. We will continue to legislate, not for one class but for all classes; not for a favoured few but for the greatest good for the greatest number. Whatever the United States or any other country may do in tariff matters, we believe that out country has reached a stage in its development where it will be able to look after itself. Canada will make its own tariffs and will find its own markets."

THE ISSUES OF THE PRESENT CAMPAIGN

On July 28th of this year the people of Canada will be asked to decide the policies and administration which are to guide the destinies of the Dominion during the next five years. It is not a question to be lightly answered. It is the privilege, and indeed the duty, of Canadian citizens to examine carefully the views presented by those who seek their confidence, and to record their votes freely and honestly in support of those policies which they believe are designed to serve the best interests of our country.

There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign. The first is the record of the Government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the Budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third is the direct issue of a choice between the Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year. This last issue is necessarily related to the question of the personnel of the Ministry which is to manage the affairs of our country during the ensuing term of Parliament. The Liberal Ministry is known; its record is clear; its qualifications have been determined by administrative experience. It is for Mr.Bennett to advise the country of the names of those whom he intends to take into his Cabinet, should his Party be successful at the Polls. The representation of Canada at the forthcoming Conferences in London should not be left to undertainty or conjecture.

The record of the present Liberal Administration is an open book, which he who runs may read. It is required in good stewards that they be found faithful. The financial record of the last Conservative Administration was such that the Canadian people demanded new stewards of the national estate. When the Liberal Government assumed office in December,1921, the Dominion was staggering under a load of debt, which was increasing by leaps and bounds, through the wasteful extravagance of the Conservative Administration of that day. The net debt of Canada at March 31,1922, was $2,427,296,798. During the last two years of the Conservative Government there was added to the debt of Canada the vast sum of $174,000,000. This was not during the war, nor during the active period of demobilization, but in the years 1920 and 1921, before the first Liberal Budget was brought down. It became the first duty of the Liberal Administration to check the growing deficits, cut down wasteful extravagance, and through economical management to reduce, if possible, the tremendous national mortgage which was a joint legacy of the war and of the extravagance of the Government which was in power until 1921.

The present Government has not forgotten the trust reposed in it by the Canadian people. Wasteful administration has been cut down. Extravagance has been replaced by economy. A record of financial stewardship has been inaugurated which has converted deficits into surpluses, has reduced the net debt out of surplus revenues by the enormous sum of $273,000,000, and in recent years has made possible a progressive reduction of taxes. On March 31,1923, the average family of five persons owed, as its share of the net debt of the Dominion, the sum of $1,358.95. On March 31,1930, this amount had been reduced to $1,097.55. This is a record of debt reduction unequalled by any country which participated in the war from its commencement.

Not only has the National Debt been steadily reduced, but expenditures have been kept down to the minimum, consistent with efficient administration. ~~Depsite~~ Despite a period of unparralleled prosperity during the past five years, the Government has kept national expenditures within prudent limits and has thus set an example of thrift and economy for the country at large. If the test of efficient government is to be found in the manner in which public money has been expended, the present Government is prepared to meet such a test with the utmost confidence. In 1914, when the Conservatives were in office, prior to the war, the total expenditures were $186,241,048. In the fiscal year ending March 31,1930, the estimated expenditures were $376,929,000, or slightly more than double the 1914 figures. Account must be taken, however, of the expenditures attributable to the war, and these, as furnished by the Minister of Finance, amounted during the last fiscal year to $158,803,000. In other words, almost 40 per cent of the total expenditures of the Government in the last fiscal year were directly attributable to the war. When this amount is deducted from the total, it will be found that the total expenditures of Canada today are very little more than in 1914, and this notwithstanding the great increase in the population of the country from 1914 to the present time, and not withstanding the fact that the value of the dollar today is only two-thirds of what it was in 1914. If any further evidence were needed of the economical expenditures of the Government under Liberal Administration, it is afforded by a comparison between the expenditures of the provincial governments and the Dominion government during the same period. From 1914 to 1928 the ordinary expenditures of the provincial governments of Canada increased by 186 per cent.

This increase took place in spite of the fact that the Dominion Government has borne the whole of the direct obligations arising out of the war. During the same period, if the war obligations are included in the Dominion expenditures, the increase of the Dominion Government was only 96 per cent. So much for the financial record of the Government.

In the normal course of events a country pays off its national debt by increasing taxation. The present Government did not shrink from this necessity when it first assumed office, for it was determined, above all else, to convert the deficits into surpluses with the leas possible delay. Within a short time, however, it succeeded in its object, and with the growing prosperity of the country in subsequent years, it has been able to carry out a programme of progressive reduction of taxes. There is not space to deal in detail with the main important reductions which have been made since 1924. It must suffice to say that with regard to the Income Tax a reduction from 4% to 2% was effected in 1926; and at the same time the exemption limit was raised from $2000 to $3000, in the case of ~~maried~~ married persons or those with dependents, and from $1000 to $1500 in the case of other persons. This was followed by a further reduction of 10% of the 1926 rates in 1927 and again in 1928. In the latter year the corporation Income tax was also reduced to 8% on incomes in excessive of $2000, and in the last budget provision was made for the exemption from income tax of bone fide companies and associations, while the exemption in the case of those supporting dependents was enlarged to include dependent parents, grandparents, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters incapable of self-support owing to mental or physical infirmity. At the same time a generous provision was made with respect to exemption on account of donations to charitable institutions.

The Sales Tax has also been progressively reduced, from the time that the Government was able to show a surplus instead of a deficit in the national accounts, until it is now 1%, compared with 3% when ~~they~~ we assumed office. Moreover it is now no longer pyramided as was formerly the case, and a considerable class of commodities has been removed from its operation.

~~Our~~ Letter postage in Canada has been reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents and Penny Postage has been re-established from Canada to the other parts of the British Empire.

As a result of the reduction of taxes by the present Government since it assumed office, it is estimated that the remission of revenue which would otherwise have been collected, now amounts to the total of approximately $116,000,000 a year.

One further word must be added in dealing with the record of the Government. Under the guidance of policies initiated and administered under the Liberal Regime, Canada has enjoyed a period of unprecedented prosperity which is so generally acknowledged by competent observers that it no longer stands in need of statistical confirmation. To quote Sir Charles Gordon, President of the Bank of Montreal, at the Annual Meeting of the Shareholders, in December, 1929: "It should be kept in mind that there have been five years of almost uninterrupted expansion. In that brief period Canada has achieved a degree of development quite unprecedented; not in one or two directions, but practically in all, remarkable progress has occurred - in agriculture, in mining, in many lines of manufacturing, forestry, water power, production, and building construction."

It is now about a month and a half since I announced in Parliament the intention of the Government to hold a general election this year, and since that time public discussion both in and out of parliament has centred more or less upon the issues of the campaign now in progress.

On July 28th ~~of this year~~ the people of Canada will be asked to decide the policies and administration which are to guide the destinies of the Dominion during the next five years. ~~It is not a question to be lightly answered.~~ It is the privilege, and indeed the duty, of Canadian citizens to examine carefully the views presented by those who seek their confidence, and to record their votes freely and honestly in support of the administration and of the policies which they believe are designed to serve best the interests of our country.

There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign. The first is the record of the Government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the Budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third, is the direct issue of a choice between the Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year. This last issue is necessarily related to the question of the personnel of the Ministry which is to manage the affairs of our country during the ensuing term of Parliament.

It is not easy to say which of the three issues is the most important. All are of the greatest importance. They relate to the past, to the present and to the future. Perhaps I had better discuss them in this order.

The record of the Government. ~~The country lifted from depression to prosperity.~~

Let me deal first of all with the record of the government; not only our record since we were returned to office in September 1926, but our record from the time we first came into office in December 1921. Were there no other issue before the people, I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances, we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years. For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression ~~have~~ it has been brought it into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history. As a people and as a government we have been far too modest with respect to the achievements of the years we have been in office. We have been so modest, in fact, that the record is but partially known even to the people of our own country. The growth and development of Canada under the present Administration stands without parallel in the history of this or any other nation. It is right that these facts should be known and I propose to make the record of ~~this~~ the Administration an open book from one end of the country to the other.

Standing on a record of sound progressive accomplishment we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The "whispers of death", the fear of returning depression, the complaints of an exodus which has ~~disappeared~~ ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party whose last tenure of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apparently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days.

The Financial Record

On March 31, 1914, the net debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000.

On March 31, 1922, as a result of the war and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debt had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000. In the last two years of the Conservative administration no less than $174,000,000 had been added to the public debt. In addition not less than $355,000,000 had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years 1919-1922. Depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contracted; agriculture was depressed. Against this dark background, which is still a vivid memory to many of us today, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal Administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of ~~prosperity~~ progress it has ever known.

~~Country rapidly heading towards bankruptcy -~~
to Legacy of the war and Extravagance

It is required in good stewards that they be found faithful. Our first task, our primary obligation, was to end these additions to the national debt, to balance the Budget, and then, if possible, to produce a surplus in the national accounts. We approached the problem from two directions; first by the curtailment of expenditures, the second with the raising of increased revenues by the necessary additional taxes. The second of these methods is traditionally unpopular. The previous Administration had avoided it, at a time when the patriotism of the people might well have been counted on to support increased taxation to meet the tremendous cost of the war.

Not only did our predecessors meet the total cost of the war and of demobilization out of borrowed money, money raised by loans, a very considerable part of which were made totally exempt from taxation, but they actually failed to raise during the four years of the war and two years of demobilization sufficient ~~taxes~~ revenues to meet the expenditures of government, apart altogether from the war. I know

That this statement has been challenged, but it is nevertheless true. Sir Thomas White has said that we should not include in the expenditures for the six years mentioned those made on capital account and on account of railway subsides, which amounted ~~only~~ in the 6 years to $8,500,000, ~~and~~ also what appears in the Public Accounts as "Other Charges", being in fact largely the costs involved in raising loans. The only other possible figures that Sir Thomas might wish to ~~in~~clude were non-active advances to the then bankrupt railways in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920, aggregating $45,780,000. My reply to this is, that in our expenditures for the eight and a half years we have been in office, we have included all expenditures made on account of capital outlay, all subsidies, or non-active advances to railways, and expenditures incurred in the negotiation of loans. So long as a like method of accounting is carried out with respect to both periods, and so long as what is meant is fully understood by all, no exception can be taken. The fact of the matter is that the capital expenditure which we have made on such large enterprises as the Hudson's Bay Railway and the Welland Ship Canal has all bee-n made out of current revenue.

The result ~~was~~ that the present Administration was faced, on coming into office, not only with the task of meeting all expenditures in connection with the regular business of ~~the country~~ Government expenditures, ~~business~~ business which had vastly increased, due to fresh obligations to which the ~~war~~ had given rise, but was also faced with the task of continuing to finance the total cost of war and demobilization. This meant, apart altogether from what might be effected in the way of reducing the public debt, meeting an annual interest ~~demand~~ on war debt, pensions and other war charges well over $140,000,000., a sum much greater than the total cost of Government in Canada at the time Sir ~~Wilfrid Laurier~~ Robert Borden came into ~~left~~ office.

I might add that of our total expenditures today, it is estimated that forty per cent is immediately attributable to the war, and had there been no war, would not appear in the public accounts. The additional provision made for war veterans by this year's legislation will still further increase this percentage due to expenditures arising out of the war.

Where the previous Administration avoided their responsibilities we met ours courageously and without regard to political consequences. We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national Budget. To have continued the ~~Any~~ other course would have brought the country into a condition of bankruptcy. Within two years our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our Budget but to give us on the 31st March, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000. From that time forward, we began to pay off annually without intermission an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous Administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

~~Reductions in the Public Debt~~

Surpluses under Liberal Administration

May I say here that in all the years from Confederation down to the time that we came into office there ~~have been~~ were only eight years in which there ~~has been~~ was a surplus, four of which were under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In other words there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of sixty-three years, ~~only~~ four of ~~which~~ were in the ~~other~~ period of a Conservative administration, ~~and~~ seven ~~of which~~ have been during the eight and a half years that the present administration has held office. The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts ~~is three hundred and fifteen millions~~ $315.000.000 ~~dollars~~ $273.000.000 of which two hundred ~~and seventy three millions~~ represents the ~~reduction made~~ surpluses realized since we came into office. This is a record of accomplishment which is unequalled by any country or any government which participated in the late war from its commencement. But in addition, we have transferred to non-active assets, in other words ~~we have~~ written off, sums amounting to over ~~thirty million~~ $30.000.000 dollars on account of Soldier's Land Settlement Board Loans, seed grain and relief advances, and one or two other accounts. At the rate at which we have been reducing debt during the past four years, the total public ~~debt~~ debt of Canada would be paid off entirely in the course of the next

Expenditures Kept Down

Not only has the National Debt been steadily reduced, but expenditures have been kept down to the minimum, consistent with efficient administration. Despite a period of unparalleled prosperity during the past five years, the Government has kept national expenditures within prudent limits, and has thus set an example of thrift and economy for the country at large. If the test of efficient government is to be found in the manner in which public money has been expended, the present Government is prepared to meet such a test with the utmost confidence.

In 1914, when the Conservatives were in office, prior to the war, the total expenditures were $186,~~241,048~~. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1930, the estimated expenditures were $377,~~000,000~~,000, or slightly more than double the 1914 figures. Account must be taken, however, of the expenditures attributable to the war, and these, as furnished by the Minister of Finance, amounted during the last fiscal year to $15~~8,000,000~~. In other words, ~~almost~~ as already mentioned 40 per cent of the total expenditures of the Government in the last fiscal year were directly attributable to the war. When this amount is deducted from the total, it will be found that the total expenditures of Canada today are very little more than in 1914, and this notwithstanding the great increase in the population of the country from 1914 to the present time, and notwithstanding the fact that the value of the dollar today is only two-thirds of what it wasin 1914.

Reductions in Taxes

Not only have we greatly reduced debt, but we have also reduced taxes. With the increasing prosperity of the country as reflected in more buoyant revenues, we decided to relieve the business community of some of the taxes which we had imposed in order to meet the grave situation which confronted us on taking office. Since 1924 our policy of tax reduction has paralleled our policy of paying off a large portion of the public debt. Normally a national debt is paid off by increasing taxes. We have reduced our national debt and at the same time have reduced taxes. Once more let me say that the explanation lies in the remarkable prosperity which has come to Canada under Liberal policies since 1922.

Reductions in Income Tax

Let me enumerate some only of the reductions that have been made. It would take much too long to give in detail all of the reductions in taxes which have been made. I shall speak first ~~of the~~ of the Income Tax. In 1926 the income tax was reduced from 4 per cent to 2 per cent for those whose incomes were $5000. ~~dollars~~ or less. The Corporation Income Tax was reduced from 10% to 9%. In 1927 there was a further 10% reduction made in the 1926 rates. In 1928

ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES

there was an additional 10% reduction made in the 1926 rates, and the Corporation Income Tax was reduced to 8% on incomes in excess of $2000. All this was in addition to important exemptions which from time to time have been made. In 1922, for example, the exemption for each child was raised from $200. to $300. In 1924 an additional exemption for each child was raised from $300. to $500. In 1926 the exemption limit was raised from $2000. to $3000. in the case of married persons or persons with dependents; and $1000. to $1500. in the case of other persons. This year the Government has exempted Government or other like annuities to the extent of $5000. An exemption of $500. each, (the same as for dependent children,) has been granted for parents, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters who are not capable of self-support, owing to mental or physical infirmity. Finally, also, under the legislation of this year, donations to any Church, University, College, School, Hospital, or Charitable Organization in Canada are to be treated as reductions on income, up to a maximum of 10% of the tax-payer's income.

Reductions in the Sales Tax

Let me speak next of the Sales Tax. In 1923 the Sales Tax was fixed at a flat 6%. This, it is true, was higher than the rate as imposed by our predecessors, but the raise was necessary for purposes of revenue. A considerable number ~~class~~ of commodities were ~~were~~, however, subsequently removed from its operation, or ~~paid~~ rates on them were considerably reduced, and the tax was no longer pyramided as was formerly the case. In 1924 this flat rate was reduced to 5%. In 1927 the rate ~~5 per cent~~ was reduced to 4 per cent. In 1928 it ~~the rate~~ was reduced to 3 per cent. In 1929 it was reduced to 2 per cent, and this year, as promised it would be in the course of the public addresses which I delivered last Fall, it was reduced to 1 percent. With this gradual elimination of the Sales Tax, I need not ask you, Ladies and Gentlemen, what will happen to that 1 per cent if the present Administration is returned to office!

Gradual abolition of all Nuisance Taxes

I need not stop to speak of another frequently known as "Nuisance taxes", most of which were initiated by the previous administration. Taxes on cheques ~~Let me pass to another class of taxes, a~~ class of taxes not so generally applicable, perhaps, but nevertheless far-reaching ~~in its application~~. ~~First, there is what~~ is known as the cheque tax ~~stamps~~. ~~That tax was~~ first imposed in 1921, ~~the rate~~ being then what it is today. In 1922 the cheque tax of 2 cents was imposed on every $50, with a maximum of $2.00 on cheques of $5,000 or over. This maximum was reduced to $1.00 in 1923. In 1925 on cheques not exceeding $5. the tax was abolished. In 1928 the tax was further abolished on cheques under $10. and reduced to a flat rate of 2 cents on all cheques over that amount.

1926 this receipt tax was abolished altogether.

In 1929 what was known as the Transportation tax, levy on railway and steamship tickets imposed in 1915, during the war, was removed. Also the tax imposed by our predecessor, in 1915, of 1 per cent on insurance premiums other than life and marine, and a tax imposed on telegrams and cablegrams.

Reduction in Postage

These taxes, as I have said, were less general in their application than others I have mentioned. I now come to a further reduction which has affected all classes in the Dominion. I mean, the reduction in the rate of postage. In 1926 letter postage in Canada was reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents, and in 1928 penny postage was re-established from Canada to other parts of the British Empire.

Remission of Taxation exceeds $116,000,000 in five years.

Leaving out of account the degree to which the postal revenues may have been affected by these reductions, it is estimated there has been saved to the Canadian taxpayer, of taxation which would otherwise have been collected, the following sums:

Amount estimated on reductions			for the year	1926...$25,000,000
do	do	do		1927... 27,000,000
do	do	do		1928... 19,000,000

The $22,000,000 for 1930, is the estimated remission solely on account of sales tax, it takes no account of what has been remitted in the further exemptions on Income Tax account as provided for in this year's budget.

Thus in five years there has been an estimated remission of taxation revenue which would otherwise have been collected ~~solely from the sources indicated a remission of taxation to an amount considerably exceeding one hundred and sixteen million dollars~~ from the sources indicated to an amount of $116,000,000. The remissions indicated have been cumulative. Assuming conditions similar to those of the last five years, from now on the amount of taxation ~~collected~~ imposed each year will be $116,000,000 less per annum than it was prior to 1926, ~~even supposing no further reduction in taxes were made~~. May I add that all this takes no account of the further ~~remissions~~ remissions of taxation effected by the reductions of duties under the several revisions of the tariff which have taken place since we came into office, and which as the country well knows have been ~~considerable~~ substantial.

I have dealt at some length with the financial record and policies of the Administration, inasmuch as other policies of the Government are so largely bound up with and dependent upon the financial position. May I say at once that the success which has attended the Government's policies in other spheres of national activity is the more remarkable when our record on debt and tax reduction is kept in mind.

Time does not permit me to more than mention outstanding features of other of the Government's policies. I shall attempt the merest outline leaving it to subsequent meetings and to other speakers to deal with these matters more in detail.

Achievement in Railway Policy

First of all, let me say a word on transportation. When we came into office, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the railways of Canada in a completely disorganized and bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in the hands of a Receiver. The Grand Trunk Railway System had been acquired under arbitration, but it, too, was bankrupt, and the Government which took over the road had studiously refrained from giving so much as an indication ~~of~~ as to whether or not it was to be operated as a Government owned system or whether the intention, in its acquisition, was to have the road subsequently re-transferred to private ownership.

The Acquisition of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern

I notice that Mr. Bennett is saying that the records of parliament show that the Liberal Party, when in opposition, opposed the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway as a Government owned system. The Liberal Party did nothing of the kind. What we did object to was the refusal of the Government of the day to submit to parliament for approval the terms and conditionsof the contract under which the system was to be acquired. We contended that, as the people were being made responsible for the purchase of the system, by terms arranged by agreement, the people's representatives in parliament were entitled to know what those terms were and to approve of them, before final acquisition of the system was made. This, however, the Government of the day refused to allow, though at a subsequent session of parliament, having failed to include some essential features of the transaction in the agreement, they were obliged to submit the whole measure to parliament and, in order to permit of the additional terms being inserted, to secure its approval which they were of course able to do in virtue of their majority.

A year or two before the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway, the Government of the day had acquired the Canadian Northern Railway, for the common stock of which some ~~ten millions of dollars~~ $10,000,000 were paid, though it was stated by the Government's own Commission, of which Sir Henry Drayton was a member, that the stock was worthless.

Consolidation and Unification of the Canadian National Railways

We found the Canadian Northern system thus acquired operating under one management, the Grand Trunk Railway under another management, the Intercolonial railway under the management of a Department of the Government and the Grand Trunk Pacific in the hands of a Receiver. It was the present Liberal Administration which effected the necessary consolidation and brought these roads into a unified national system. It was the present Administration which made the necessary provision for the President and the Board of Directors of the system, and it was the present Administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as President and Chairman of the Board.

It was the present Administration that laid down the policy that there should be no political interference with the management or operation of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton has publicly testified, on more occasions than one, that the Government has lived up to this policy, alike in letter and in spirit. It was the present Administration which laid down as a further policy of railway management and operation in this country that Government ownership was to be given a fair trial, and that, as between the Government owned National Railways and the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway, there should be neither fear nor favour in the respective treatment to be accorded these roads. I venture to say that the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his Board of Directors will be the first to say that, in the fulfillment of this policy, the Government has sought to be scrupulously fair.

Far reaching reductions in railway rates

How the Canadian National Railways have been brought to the present position as a Government owned railway system, unequalled in any part of the world, is a story too long to narrate, but one, fortunately, with which every Canadian household is more or less familiar. What is not so generally known is that, while operating deficits have been changed into operating revenues, - just as national deficits have been changed into national surpluses, - this has been accompanied by far-reaching reductions in railway rates in all parts of Canada, ~~and~~ affecting especially the Western Provinces and the Maritimes, - reductions which have been made applicable to both great railway systems.

Perhaps I should not be too severe on our opponents for seeking to-day to claim ~~a measure of~~ paternity of the Canadian National Railways. Their action in this regard is more or less characteristic of human nature. When the Tory Party, as we came into office, left this neglected and famished foundling on our doorstep, suffering from many forms of malnutrition, there was not one member of the whole Party who was prepared to allow his name to have any association with it, but now that the infant has been revived and has grown into vigorous and powerful proportions, resembling those of Sir Henry Thornton himself, ~~they all~~ wish to ~~call~~ it, their ~~own~~ name; They say that on no account will they part with it, and Mr. Bennett heroically says that he will ~~go out of~~ sacrifice an office, rather than see it pass out of the hands of the State.

Advances in Other Transportation Facilities

But organization of the Canadian National Railways has not been our only achievement in the realm of transportation. We have brought the Hudson's Bay Railway to completion, though the rails on a part of this road had been taken up by our opponents while in office, and the partially constructed roadbed allowed to fall into disrepair and decay. We have acquired and, by making them a part of the Canadian National system, have revitalized not a few of the smaller privately owned railways in different parts of the Dominion; and we have, on more than one occasion, made provision through parliament for extensive branch line construction in other parts of the country. We have completed the Welland Canal, and we have effected other developments with respect to the St. Lawrence Waterways, ~~with respect to~~ on which I shall have opportunity to say something on ~~some future~~ another occasion. The improvement in the financial conditions of the railways has aided the financial condition of the country just as the improvement in our country's finances and credit has been the major factor in the improvement of the railways.

Achievement in Immigration Policy

May I now say a word with respect to immigration. You have heard a great deal about our boys and girls leaving for the United States. You have heard a great deal about foreign immigration being encouraged to the relative disadvantage of immigration

~~of immigration~~ from the British Isles. During part of the time you have been told that we were not bringing in a sifficient number of immigrants; at another time the complaint has been that the number was excessive. The policy of the Conservative Party, as outlined by General McRae was that of a huge colonization and land settlement scheme involving an expenditure of some ~~three hundred million of dollars~~ $300.000.000 and the transfer of 7 300.000 ~~British~~ immigrants. Perhaps Mr Bennett will tell the House.

The Truth About the Exodus to the United States.

Now what are the facts with respect to our ~~own~~ management of ~~this difficult~~ the immigration problem. It is quite true that, during the years immediately following our coming into office the trend of migration ~~was~~ continued from Canada to the States. The reasons for that were very obvious. The United States had prospered while we had suffered through the war. During the period of re-establishment of our citizen-soldiery in Canada, preferences in the matter of employment were being given where possible to those who had served overseas. There were not the opportunities for employment here that there were in the country to the south for many of our boys and girls, and ~~many~~ a number of our grown-ups as well, left on that account. Moreover, the springs of immigration had, during the war, and the period immediately following the war, been permitted to dry up at the source. It takes time for a movement of immigration to get under way, whatever its direction may be. People had not the wherewithal to migrate in numbers from the British Isles or from other countries after the war, that they had had before, and Canada had not the free homesteads to offer, nor was she able to advertise ~~thus~~ as to give the low ocean and railway rates which were so important an inducement to British immigration in former years. It was not very long, however, before the fruits of our effort became apparent. Little by little the migration of Canadians to the United States began to lessen. In increasing numbers Canadians began to return from the United States to Canada, until to-day while conditions of employment in Canada may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States or for that matter in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals to-day the migration from Canada to the United States. These are the facts and, far from affording grounds of criticism, they are in the nature of a real achievement.

The Truth About British as Compared with Foreign Immigration

With regard to the allegation that the Government was ~~preparing~~ preferring foreign to British immigration, it did not take very long to establish the facts. When, in 1928, the Leader of the Opposition hinted in parliament that an enquiry might be desirable, I told him that an enquiry could not take place too soon and a committee of the House of Commons was forthwith appointed, on which all parties were represented. The findings of the parliamentary committee were to the effect that while Canada was spending ~~eleven~~ 11 cents per capita on continental immigrants she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on immigrants from the British Isles. Reference to the statistics of the British Empire shows that of citizens of the British Isles emigrating to other Dominions and other parts of the world, Canada has been receiving by a very long way the largest proportion. of recent years

Closer Co-Operation with the Provinces.

The most recent development in our immigration policy has been to link more closely the governments of the provinces and our own government, in the determination of the classes and numbers of immigrants to be brought to Canada. With the return to the Western Provinces of their natural resources, we have felt that more in the way of provincial control of immigration was desirable, more particularly as the provinces themselves are the first to feel any adverse effects of an inadequate or an excessive immigration.

Restriction of Oriental Immigration.

I should not leave the subject of immigration without reminding you that, as respects Oriental immigration, which in our own as in other countries constitutes a most perplexing problem, we have in our term of office, without offence to the Orient, brought about complete exclusion of immigration from China, and, by diplomatic arrangement, a restriction of immigration from Japan so effective as to relieve both countries of further embarrassment on that score.

Achievement in the Development of the Basic Industries

Let me now come to the basic industries of our country, agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, on the development of which our transportation and immigration policies, as well as most other policies of the Government have had so important a bearing. I need not remind you that we have regarded the ~~development~~ national development of these great basic industries as fundamental in our national ~~development~~ progress. We have recognized from the start that our manufacturing industries and our trade, both domestic and foreign, were dependent upon the ~~development~~ utilization of our great natural resources, more than on aught else. We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in ~~mind~~ the essentials in the development ~~of trade and~~ of manufacturing and trade, would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries. We have recognized that, if our trade ~~and~~ manufacturing ~~was~~ were to expand that world markets as well as home markets were an essential, and we have recognized, further, that what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent in no inconsiderable measure upon the costs of production and the cost of living in our own land. So, we have striven in our tariff revisions, consistently, to take those steps which, without injury to any legitimate business in the country, would at the same time tend to make possible more in the way of production in our basic industries, through reduction of duties on the instruments of production required in those industries, and on the necessaries of life of those employed therein and in the manufactures and other businesses of our country. I have not time to go into the revisions of the tariff effected by the present Administrion since it took office in 1921. You recall the reductions made in our first year of office on some of the instruments of production, on boots and shoes, on sugar and textiles, the increase in the British Preference on some commodities and in the following year the 10% additional discount in the preference rate made where goods were brought in through Canadian ports. I need not remind you of the Budget of 1924 with its far-reaching reductions in duties on the instruments of production ~~and employment generally~~, nor of the Budget of 1926, with its reductions on motor cars, motor trucks and other motor vehicles. There was enough of commotion at the time to cause you to remember how considerable the reductions in duties were alleged to be; enough also to remember what was said on behalf of the Government at the time, that the lessened cost of production and the larger sales through lowered prices would more than ensure to those industries wider markets for their products than they had had before. Such indeed, as everyone knows, has proven to be the case. Nor need I remind you of ~~the~~ reductions made ~~in textiles~~ a year ago; nor of the extensive increases in the British Preference made in the Budget of the present year, with its complete removal of all duties on tea, on procelain and china, household utensils and many other commodities affecting the homes of the people throughout the land. To the extent to which producers and consumers have benefitted by these changes in the tariff which have lessened the cost of production and lessened the cost of living, not only have we materially benefitted the great industries of agriculture, lumber, mining and fishing, but we have also benefitted the manufacturing industries and extensively furthered Canada's trade, both at home and abroad.

Growth in manufactures and trade

~~Manufacturers~~

The confidence which the people of Canada have given to the present Administration has enabled us to serve and to further the interests of this country until to-day Canada stands as the sixth on the list of the great trading countries of the world. You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials; that we are parting with our birthright~~, in disposing, in however so small a way, with our illimitable natural resources.~~ Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of ~~our~~ raw materials which Canada imports from the United States for her manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, ~~wool~~, rubber and the like, exceed~~ing~~ in value the total value of ~~our~~ the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that the per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world ~~and~~ with the exception of Great Britain. Let me ~~just~~ add that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. ~~Rising, as~~ It has risen from a total of $740 ~~million dollars~~ 000,000 at the time the present government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000. at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29. In other words there has been a doubling of our total domestic export trade in a period of ~~six~~ seven years.

This spectacular increase of trade is no mere chance. It is the result of wise policies effectively administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

~~A statement in~~ Liberal Policies for Labour

I shall have, I fear, to reserve for another time what I would like to have told you to-night of our policies with respect to labour and with respect to war veterans. May I just remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country. May I remind you that it was a Liberal administration which created the Canadian Department of Labour, which introduced its "Fair Wages" policy, and which this year has given statutory effect to the payment of Fair Wages and to an eight-hour day on all public works carried out under contract ~~of~~ for the Dominion Government, and with respect to all labour in the Government's own employ. May I remind you that the Industrial Disputes Act and the Combines Investigation Act are both Liberal measures; that it was a Liberal administration ~~that~~ which restored to the employees, ~~or their estates,~~ or to families of those who had died in the interim, of the Grand Trunk railway system ~~pension rights~~ payments due on pension account of which they had been arbitrarily deprived some 12 years before, gave to Labour a place on the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway system; that it was a Liberal administration that placed upon the statutes of this country the Old Age Pension Act, ~~and~~ and which under the provisions of which ~~has conferred~~ a large measure of comfort and independence in their old age, ~~the sum~~ has been assured ~~of $50~~ to some 50,000 of the aged people of our Dominion.

~~13b~~ 27 Liberal policies for war veterans D 16690

The success ~~that~~ which has attended our efforts to see that the provision made by the State for our war veterans and their dependents was both fair and generous, is well known, I think. It is, I believe, absolutely true that Canada's war pension legislation is the most advanced in the world and that no other nation has made provision for its ex-service men and their dependents on a scale of ~~which~~ such open-handed justice as this country. The War Veterans Allowances Act, the revised machinery for dealing with pension claims, the decision to give to men who have served overseas the benefit of the doubt as to the cause of disability where application is made for pension; these and other measures, while supported by members of all parties in the House of Commons, are nevertheless a part of the record of Liberal policy and achievement, and may I say, a part of the record ~~for~~ to which I ~~am glad to assume the fullest measure of responsibility~~ have felt it a privilege to give a special measure of personal attention and a part of the record of which I feel particularly proud.

Achievement in National Conciliation

If, however, there is one other portion of the record ~~in~~ to which I ~~feel an equal pride, but for which perhaps I may claim an ever larger measure of personal responsibility,~~ have given much in the way of personal attention, and which I feel has involved much in the way of time and effort, it is ~~that which pertains to~~ the policy is of the Government in its relations with other governments both within and without ~~internal and external relations in dealing with, on the one hand, the Governments of the British Empire and the Governments of foreign lands.~~ Canada ~~and within and without~~ For thirty years in Canada ~~the~~ governments of the day have been wrestling with the problem of the return to the Western Provinces of their natural resources. It remained for the present government to solve that great problem. For an almost equal length of time, the Province of British Columbia has been seeking to have restored to it lands in what is known as the "railway belt" and the "Peace River block" which passed out of its possession at the time that Province came into confederation. It remained for the present Administration to restore these lands. Ever since their entry into confederation, the Maritime Provinces have felt that they have not had a square deal. Here and there, in patchwork fashion, some adjustments have been made in dealing with particular grievances as they arose. It remained for the present Administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesmanlike fashion. This we have done with respect to their transportation problems; to the problems of their industries; with respect to their subsidies ~~from the Dominion government~~; with respect to their harbour and trade facilities, and to all other matters having a bearing upon the economic welfare of the Maritimes as an integral part of our Dominion. In the case of all, ~~alike~~ a like method was followed. Matters were not left to vain disputation, or to ~~the relative strength of~~ political pressure; they were investigated; they were made the subject, in the first instance, of impartial fact-finding inquiries conducted by in each case under Royal Commission, the personnel of which in every instance commanded the confidence of all parties concerned. In the case of the four Western Provinces, the agreements were not only submitted to our Parliament for approval, but received the approval of their respective legislatures as well, and may I add, so fairly were they drawn and so completely did they accord with what in the case of the provinces as well as the Dominion was believed to be the equity and justice of the situation, that ~~neither~~ in the provinces themselves and ~~nor~~ in ~~either~~ both Houses of our Parliament, they passed without a single division. I have not time to go into the provisions of these several agreements, but I do not hesitate to say that an examination of these provisions reveal ~~this~~ a generosity in the manner of the treatment of those provinces such as has never characterized similar negotiations in the history of our Dominion. And here may I point out something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the Premier of this province and his government in this ~~particular contest~~ General Election, namely, that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present Administration at Ottawa. It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments or, as ~~it~~ happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative governments, our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavour merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long standing grievances should for once and for all, be ~~ir~~radicated and ~~ir~~radicated in a way which ~~could~~ would leave no vistage of distrust or illwill.

By our action in ~~this regard~~ these particulars we have made over and strengthened the super structure of confederation. We have, at the same time, in the increased financial provisions which we have made for those provinces, reinforced its foundations. I say without fear of contradiction, that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several provinces and the Federal Government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

Equality - good-will and co-operation in inter-empire relations

But if we have ~~strengthened and reinforced~~ improved relations within the Dominion between the governments of the provinces and the Federal government, if we have removed sectional antagonisms and helped to develop a truer national spirit what ~~has to be~~ may not be said of our achievements in inter-imperial and international relations? Here I come to the work of the Imperial Conference and the Economic Conference of 1923; the work of the Imperial Conference of 1926, the work of the subsidiary conference on the operation of ~~Canadian~~ Dominion legislation which concluded its sittings in London ~~less than a year ago~~ last autumn. Out of these conferences has come, for the first time in the history of the relations of Great Britain and the Dominions, a statement of their relative positions, which has removed from the realm of possible controversy all further talk of colonial subordination, and which ~~as regards national status~~ in has ~~come~~ exceeded to ~~this~~ Canada and to the other self-governing Dominions a ~~position of~~ equal~~ity with~~ that of Great Britain herself. ~~Here, too,~~ May I remind my fellow countrymen that within the period of office of the present Administration, Canada has welcomed for the first time in ~~the~~ history ~~of the British Empire~~, the leaders of all the political parties in Britain, two of them in the office of Prime Minister, ~~and all with one accord~~ have born witness to the cordiality of the relations which ~~have~~ existed between the Government at Ottawa and the Government at Westminster ~~and the note of helpful co-operation there has been in all our relations~~. I may add that within our term of office we have also welcomed to this Dominion Prime Ministers or ex-Prime Ministers from each of the other self governing Dominions; from Australia, from New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State and from Newfoundland ~~and all have joined in the chorus of neighbourly goodwill.~~

~~But~~ Let me invite you to look beyond the Empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds to-day? Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking, there has been ~~a~~ the sudden steep ascent of war in which there were common heroisms and common sacrifices, and there has been the long gradual constitutional endeavour for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer.

Responsible self government, not in internal affairs alone, but also in external affairs, as well is the corner stone of our Empire as it exists today. ~~That~~ The struggle for responsible self-government in ~~the~~ internal affairs ~~of Canada~~ began in this country. It was marked out successfully, and Canada came in time to be an example. To win a like measure of self-government with respect to the country's external affairs is has been one of the supreme achievements of the present Administration. In our progress towards that achievement ~~and for that achievement~~ we have been opposed by the Conservative party every step of the way. When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties, we were told that we were seeking separation because, forsooth, we asked His Majesty in regard to an international negotiation on a matter of Canadian concern to give full powers to a Canadian Minister of the Crown instead of to the British Ambassador at Washington. When a little later we opened a legation at Washington and subsequently at Paris and Tokio, we were again told that we were ~~pursuing~~ pursuing the path of separation. Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about "Canada First." Just what does his "Canada First" mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the establishment of Canadian legations in other lands, and on Canada's status of co-equality with the Motherland. I am not sure where he stands to-day, but I know where he stood in the session of Parliament just closed.

Ladies and Gentlemen: In this brief summary of the Government's record, I have not had opportunity to make so much as mention of the position Canada has taken within the past few years at international conferences and at the League of Nations, a position not merely of helpful co-operation but of leadership as well. Not only has Canada had a place on the Council of the League of Nations, and played an important role at its assemblies, but a member of the present Government has held the high office of President of the Assembly of the League. We were ~~among~~ one of the first countries of the world to signify our approval of the Briand-Kellogg Pact, and were among its original signatories in Paris. We were the first of the British countries to urge the acceptance of the Optional Clause for the ~~compulsory~~ settlement of international disputes by arbitration. We were represented with distinction in London at the recent conference on the Limitation of Naval Armaments. In Washington, Paris and Tokio our representation abroad has won for our country added and worthy recognition alike in America, Europe and the Orient.

Neither have I had time to make mention of many reforms ~~and other measures~~ which are of national and international significance. I might have referred to ~~our~~ the policy for which we secured the approval of parliament of requiring submission to parliament of all treaties likely to involve this country in foreign wars, ~~or~~ and approval in advance of any commitment involving Canada's participation in war; of our efforts to suppress rumrunning and smuggling and to prevent the use or co-operation of government agencies in the violation of the laws of another country. I might also have spoken of the reform of our electoral laws and of the representation given to women in the Senate of Canada. These are but a few of many other measures of the significance of which I should have been glad to say a word had time permitted. They all constitute an important part of the record of the present administration.

The Budget of 1930

I come now to the second great issue of the campaign, namely, the Budget introduced into Parliament by the Minister of Finance of the fisr of May, and the important questions of fiscal and trade policy which it embodies. Here, first of all may I emphasize a certain point of view from which all policies and in particular issues such as those arising out of the Budget ought to be approached and considered.

Policies framed to meet existing conditions

Political philosophers of ancient times very wisely made a distinction between laws and constitutions which were ideally the best, and those which were the best as applied to particular circumstances of time and place. In other words, it is the privilege of philosophers to propose abstract laws for the mythical inhabitants of an Utopian state. It is the business of government to deal with the realities of a given situation.

Keeping this central fact in mind, it should be pointed out in the second place that the economic situation of a country is not static but dynamic. It changes from year to year and from decade to decade.

"The world advances, and in time outgrows
The laws that in our fathers' time seemed best."

National Policy of half a century ago not suited to to-day

Since the beginning of the present century we have witnessed a transformation of the Dominion which has called not only for a new outlook on world affairs, but for new economic policies to meet the requirements of a nation which resembles in few respects the Canada which adopted the National Policy of 1878. The appeal to past conditions and policies is a legitimate course of proceedure for the Leader of a Conservative party. We are being told that the old National Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald days is what Canada needs most to-day, that it is the remedy for all ills, the one guarantee of progress. Let us pause for a moment and examine this appeal.

The National Policy, so-dalled, had its birth in 1878; this is the year 1930. In other words what Canada needs today, according to the Leader of the Opposition, is even more in the way of protection than what she needed fifty years ago for the infant and struggling industries of that day. That does not say much for the growth and progress of Canada in the last half century.

Fifty years ago Canada consisted of the two old provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and what are today known as the Maritime Provinces. The provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia were also in Confederation but were still largely isolated. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were unknown. The agencies of transportation and communication within the country were wholly inadequate, and, altogether negligible as a factor in world commerce. Canadian were still colonial-minded, though many there were who has aspirations of nationhood. A policy designed to bring the trade of these provinces into closer touch with each other, to make the rural and the urban areas more and more interdependent had much to commend it, much that could be supported by those who were desirous of making the national appeal. But is that the Canada we know to-day? We have ceased to be a Dominion of scattered provinces. We are a compact nation There is no break in the chain from coast to coast. Our agencies of transportation and communication are world agencies. We have ceased to be colonials, and are proud of possessing an Empire citizenship; of being citizens of a nation in the British Commonwealth of Nations, a nation also in the League of Nations. The country year by year is being more closely knit together in all its parts, and in the inter-dependence of its varied interests, and more and more these interests are becoming a part of the wider interests of the world at large.

Not true that so-called National Policy has always served to meet conditions.

But is it true that the so-called National Policy is a cure for all our industrial ills. The worst period of depression Canada has ever known was in the years prior to the General Election of 1896, when those who had helped to create the National Policy, and to administer it, were in control of the affairs of the country. As a matter of fact, it was not until the Liberal administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office and the Laurier-Fielding tariff modified in a considerable measure the existing tariff structure of the day, and that Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced the system of British Preference, and trade treaties with other countries which served further to modify the old tariff structure, that in any true sense of the word Canada began to prosper as a nation.

But let me not go back to the period of a former Liberal administration. Let me come to the years which immediately proceeded those of the present administration. At that time the advocates of the old National Policy were again in control. Did the tariff as they then found it and left it save this country from another period of depression? Did we not find when we came into office unparalled depression, out of which it remained for Liberal policies to bring the country?

When we increased the British Preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reduced duties on the implements of production, when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the National Policy and that we would ruin the country.

I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedom of trade is the more deserving of being called a National Policy as we approach the third decade of the Twentieth Century. A National Policy to-day in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world. It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets. It is essentially a policy of world markets.

Sectional Interests must yield to a United Canada

With the rapid development of Western Canadam and the emergence of a great agricultural population engaged in the production of a commodity which must seek its markets throughout the world, high protection, or an all-round increase in the tariff can no longer be called a national policy. According to figures given in the Canada Year Book of 1929, over 80 per cent of Canadian manufacturing is concentrated in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This per centage is based on figures of production, capital employed, and number of employees. While it is true that manufacturing has developed to a considerable extent in Western Canada, these manufactures are based largely upon thenprimary industries of agriculture and mining and do not require a tariff protection to any considerable extent. It is, therefore, true to say that a general increase in the tariff in 1930 is essentially a sectional policy so far as the distribution of its benefits is concerned. It has forfeited every right to the name - National Policy - given to it by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878, and by Mr. Bennett in 1930.

But if high protection is a sectional policy in the distribution of its benefits, it is equally true that having regard to the present industrial development of Central Canada a free trade policy would be detremental in its immediate effects to one section of the Dominion, even though it conferred benefits on those of our citizens who are obliged to seek markets abroad for their agricultural produce and who derive little or no advantage from a protective tariff.

It is apparent, therefore, that both a high tariff and free trade are sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada. What then is the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interests arising out of the tariff is the same as it is with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions. To the greatest possible extent sectional interests must be reconciled in the light of the larger interests of the whole. This can be effected only by moderation and compromise. Fact the facts of our situation. Take Canada as it is, with its changing needs and its conflicting interests. Acknowledge the facts of geography and of divergent industrial development in east, and centre, and west. And having examined the realities of the situation, and having considered the demands of different sections for policies suited to their needs, so mould our social transportation and fiscal policies as to hold the scales evenly between class and creed and section thus weld a far-flung country into a united Canadian nation.

The Policy of Reconciliation, the Traditional Liberal Policy

Such a policy and such an attitude are not new to the Liberal Party. It was the ever present motive of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in his efforts to heal the discord of race and creed. It was the motive of the Rt. Hon. Mr. Fielding in his long series of budgets, beginning in 1897. I find it expressed in one of his last speeches in the House of Commons on June 12, 1922:

> "All political matters are essentially matters of compromise, in some degree and so long as the compromise is not one of principle, there is no reason why men should not compromise, because it is only by a policy of that nature that governments can ever be carried on. We are apt each of us in our own part of the country to look at things from a sectional point of view and that is unavoidable.....As we meet together in the contact of mind and mind we discover that we are able to take broader views."

This then is the issue presented by the Liberal Party.

of the Commission on Maritime Claims, the transfer of the natural resources to Western Canada, the return of the railway lands and Peace River block to British Columbia, the Hudson Bay Railway, the West Indies Treaty for the eastern provinces, and the Australian Treaty for British Columbia, each and all of these represent an attempt to meet the realities of the political and economic situation which confronts Canada today. Time does not permit a discussion of each policy in its relation to the interests of a particular section of our country. I shall content myself with setting out briefly the essential features of the Budget which was announced by Mr. Dunning in the House of Commons on May 1st, and which will doubtless be the outstanding issue of the present campaign.

The Underlying Purpose of the Budget of 1930

The Budget of 1930 was framed first of all to meet a situation in Canada arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes for policies suited to their needs. But because of the place which Canada has come to occupy in international trade, it was influenced also and in a special degree by our relation with two countries with which we are most closely associated in matters of commerce. The one is Great Britain. The other is the United States.

When Mr. Hoover assumed office as President of the United States on March 4, 1929, the United States Congress began carrying out a far-reaching revision of the tariff in conformity with the pledges given by the Republican Party during the presidential campaign of the previous year. As that revision proceeded, it became increasingly apparent that the duties against Canadian agricultural products would be raised to such an extent as to cut off a considerable proportion of the existing Canadian exports to that country. In these circumstances, and in accordance with its policy of using every endeavour to find wider markets for Canadian products, the Government gave insutrctions to the Tariff Advisory Board to make a careful survey of the tariff schedules then applying against American imports, with a view to determining to what extent these imports could be purchased from Great Britain or from other parts of the British Empire.

While this enquiry was proceeding, it was decided that an Imperial Economic Conference would be held in London in September of 1930, to consider the subject of closer co-operation in matters of trade between the various parts of the Empire and to discuss the various policies which would contribute towards that end. Efforts had previously been made by the present administration to have this Conference held in Canada. Subsequently, a condition developed in Great Britain which led to a marked curtailment of purchases of Canadian wheat and resulted in a serious tie-up of our wheat in elevators, with consequent loss not only to Canadian growers, but to our transportation systems, and to many branches of our industry and commerce. Prior to this development, Great Britain had purchased far more from Canada, largely because of our wheat exports, than Canada had purchased from Great Britain. It became apparent that if Canada was to maintain a British market for Canadian wheat, it was desirable that measures should be taken by diverting to Great Britain, many of the purchases being made at present in the United States and in other ways, to increase British imports to Canada and thus create an economic and psychological condition in Great Britain more favorable to the importation of Canadian wheat. These circumstances must be kept clearly in mind when examining the proposals in the Budget presented to the House of Commons on May 1st.

The Main Proposals of the Budget

The Budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present Government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four main proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1. The iron and steel tariff revision.
2. Countervailing duties.
3. The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4. Extension of the British Preference.

The Revision of the Iron and Steel duties.

The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the Tariff Advisory Board which have been conducted over a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an inquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great nasic industries. The purpose kept in kind by the Government in prosecuting this inquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel ~~industr~~ industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain. This in turn was in conformity with the announced intention of the Government to facilitate trade with those countries which are willing to trade with Canada on equal terms.

The Countervailing Duties on Agricultural and other Commodities.

The next feature of the Budget, namely, the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present Administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wiadom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through t he countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us. For the present we raise the duties on these selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by other countries, but at the same time we tell our neighbour frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis. On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be one-sided.

In revising the Customs Tariff on fruits and vegetables, the Government has had before it the evidence presented to the Tariff Advisory Board on several occasions by those who were primarily interested in this important branch of our agricultural production. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and begetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of other countries. It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and negetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers. We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates, which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set our explicitly in the new schedules. In this manner we have endeavoured to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which these specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of the consumers of these commodities. In past year, moreover, a large proportion of our early fruits and negetables has been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business. Under the existing trade agreement these Islands have assured us of a preference in their market. In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruits and vegetables under the British Preference. Already we have seen what the response of other parts of the British Empire is likely to be to this attitude and policy. Bermuda has given to us since our budget was introduced additional preference or free entry on some of our agricultural manufactured products and this very week there is assembling at Trinidad representatives of all the British West Indies for the purpose of considering closer trade relations with our country.

The British Preference Feature of the Budget

This brings me to the last feature of the Budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness, Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British Crown which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries to-day do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

The present Budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal Party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them today. They have said that we must have preference for preference and that no favours should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forego the policy of free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British Preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present Administration can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on a basis of reciprocal preference./ But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal Party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers and to inter-imperial tradewwith its beneficial effects to the British Empire as a whole, but a policy which is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country, in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country. In the far-reaching extension of the British Preference under the Budget of 1930 this has been our purpose and our objective. We have studied the situation with the utmost care and have revised the tariff schedules with the definite aim of diverting a considerable portion of trade from the United States and other countries to Great Britain. We firmly believe that this policy will receive the wholehearted approval of the Canadian people.

Tory Criticisms of the Fiscal and Trade Policies of the Budget

Against the fiscal and trade policies of the Budget what are the ciriticism of the Conservative Party as enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition? They may be summed up in a very few words. The first is that the Budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a General Election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objective if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have "stolen the clothes" of the Conservative Party, If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that Party. The third is that our policy is a Washington made policy. If that is ture, which it is not, what becomes of the argument that we have stolen the clothes of our opponents? Finally we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences there should be no trade, even with the Mother Country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference. In the Reciprocity Campaign of 1911 the cry of the Tory Party was "No truck nor trade with the Yankees." This year it has come dangerously near being ""No truck nor trade with Britain."

THE GENERAL ELECTIONS OF 1930

It is now about a month and a half since I announced in Parliament the intention of the Government to hold a general election this year, and since that time public discussion both in and out of parliament has centred more or less upon the issues of the Campaign now in progress.

On July 28th the people of Canada will be asked to decide the policies and administration which are to guide the destinies of the Dominion during the next five years. It is the privilege, and indeed the duty, of Canadian citizens to examine carefully the views presented by those who seek their confidence, and to record their votes freely and honestly in support of the administration and of the policies which they believe are designed to serve best the interests of our country.

The issues of the present campaign

There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign. The first is the record of the Government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the Budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third, is the direct issue of a choice between the Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year. This last issue is necessarily related to the question of the personnel of the Ministry which is to manage the affairs of our country during the ensuing term of Parliament.

It is not easy to say which of the issues is the most important. All are of the greatest importance. They relate to the past, to the present and to the future. Perhaps I had better discuss them in this order.

The record of the Government

Let me deal first of all with the record of the government; not only our record since we were returned to office in September, 1926, but our record from the time we first came into office in December, 1921. Were there no other issues before the people, I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances, we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years. For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history. As a people and as a government we have been far too modest with respect to the achievements of the years we have been in office. We have been so modest, in fact, that the record is but partially known even to the people of our own country. The growth and development of Canada under the present Administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation. It is right that these facts should be known and I propose to make the record of the Administration an open book from one end of the country to the other.

Standing on a record of sound progressive accomplishment we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The "whispers of death," the fear of returning depression, the complaints of an exodus which has ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party whose last tenure of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apparently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days.

The Financial Record

On March 31, 1932, as a result of the war, and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debt had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000. In the last two years of the Conservative administration no less than $174,000,000. had been added to the public debt. In addition not less than $355,000,000. had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years 1919-1922. Depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contracted; agriculture was depressed. Against this dark background, which is still a vivid memory to many of us to-day, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal Administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known.

Legacies of the War and Extravagance

It is required in good stewards that they be found faithful. Our first task, our primary obligation, was to end these additions to the national debt, the balance the Budget, and then, if possible, to prpduce a surplus in the national accounts. We approached the problem from two directions; first, by the curtailment of expenditures, the second, with the raising of increased revenues by the necessary additional taxes. The second of these methods is traditionally unpopular. The previous Administration had avoided it, at a time when the patriotism of the people might well have been counted on to support increased taxation to meet the tremendous cost of the war.

Not only did our predecessors meet the total cost of the war and of demobilization out of borrowed money, money raised by loans, a very considerable part of which were made totally exempt from taxation, but they actually failed to raise during the four years of the war and two years of demobilization sufficient revenues to meet the expenditures of government, apart altogether from the war. I know that this statement has been challenged, but it is nevertheless true. Sir Thomas White has said that we should not include in the expenditures for the six years mentioned those made on capital account and on account of railway subsidies, which amounted in the 6 years to $8,500,000, also what appears in the Public Accounts as "Other Charges", being in fact largely the costs involved in raising loans. The only other possible figures that Sir Thomas might wish to exclude were non-active advances to the then bankrupt railways in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920, aggregating $45,780,000. My reply to this is, that in our expenditures for the eight-and-a-half years we have been in office, we have included all expenditures made on account of capital outlay, all subsidies, or non-active advances to railways, and expenditures incurred in the negotiation of loans. So long as a like method of accounting is carried out with respect to both periods, and so long as what is meant is fully understood by all, no exception can be taken. The fact of the matter is that the capital expenditure which we have made on such large enterprises as the Hudson's Bay railway and the Welland Ship Canal has all been made out of current revenue.

The result was that the present Administration was faced, on coming into office, not only with the task of meeting all expenditures in connection with the regular business of government, business which had vastly increased, due to fresh obligations to which the war had given rise, but was also faced with the task of continuing to finance the total cost of war and demobilization. This meant, apart altogether from what might be effected in the way of reducing the public debt meeting an annual interest on war debt, pensions and other war charges of well over $140,000,000, a sum much greater than the total cost of Government in Canada at the time Sir Robert Borden came into office.

I might add that of our total expenditures to-day, it is estimated that forty per cent is immediately attributable to the war, and had there been no war, would not appear in the Public Accounts. The additional provision made for war veterans by this year's legislation will still further increase the per centage due to expenditures arising out of the war.

National Debt reduced - Deficitis turned into surpluses

Where the previous Administration avoided their responsibilities we met our courageously and without regard to political consequences. We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national Budget. To have continued the other course would have brought the country into a condition of bankruptcy. Within two years our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance ourBudget but to give us on the 31st March, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000. From that time forward, we began to pay off annually without intermission, an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous Administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

Surpluses under Liberal Administration

May I say here that in all the years from Confederation down to the time that we came into office there were only eight years in which there was a surplus, four of which were under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of sixty-three years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present Administration has held office. The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000. represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office. This is a record of accomplishment which is unequalled by any country or any government which participated in the late war from its commencement. But, in addition, we have transferred to non-active assets, in other words written off, sums amounting to over $30,000,000 on account of Soldier Land Settlement Board Loans, seed grain and relief advances, and one or two other accounts. At the rate at which we have been reducing debt during the past four years, the total public debt of Canada would be paid off entirely in the course of the next forty years.

Expenditures Kept Down

Not only has the National Debt been steadily reduced, but expenditures have been kept down to the minimum, consistent with efficient administration. Despite a period of unparalleled prosperity during the past five years, the Government has kept national expenditures within prudent limits, and has thus set an example of thrift and economy for the country at large. If the test of efficient government is to be found in the manner in which public money has been expended, the present Government is prepared to meet such a test with the utmost confidence.

In 1914, when the Conservatives were in office, prior to the war, the total expenditures were $186,000,000. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1930, the estimated expenditures were $377,000,000, or slightly more than double the 1914 figures. Account must be taken, however, of the expenditures attributable to the war, and these, as furnished by the Minister of Finance, amounted during the last fiscal year to $159,000,000. In other words, as already mentioned 40 per cent of the total expenditures of the Government in the last fiscal year were directly attributable to the war. When this amount is deducted from the total, it will be found that the total expenditures of Canada today are very little more than in 1914, and this notwithstanding the great increase in the population of the country from 1914 to the present time, and notwithstanding the fact that the value of the dollar today is only two-thirds of what it was in 1914.

Reductions in Taxes

Not only have we greatly reduced debt, but we have also reduced taxes. With the increasing prosperity of the country as reflected in more buoyant revenues, we decided to relieve the business community of some of the taxes which we had imposed in order to meet the grave situation which confronted us on taking office. Since 1924 our policy of tax reduction has paralleled our policy of paying off a large portion of the public debt. Normally a national debt is paid off by increasing taxes. We have reduced our national debt and at the same time have reduced taxes. Once more let me say that the explanation lies in the remarkable prosperity which has come to Canada under Liberal policies since 1922.

Let me enumerate only some of the reductions that have been made. It would take much too long to give in detail all of the reductions in taxes which have been made. I shall speak first of the Income tax. In 1926 the income tax was reduced from 4 percent to 2 percent for those whose incomes were $5000. or less. The Corporation Income Tax was reduced from 10% to 9%. In 1927 there was a further 10% reduction made in the 1926 rates. In 1928

there was an additional 10% reduction made in the 1926 rates, and the Corporation Income Tax was reduced to 8% on incomes in excess of $2000. All this was in addition to important exemptions which from time to time have been made. In 1922, for example, the exemption for each child was raised from $200. to $300. In 1924 an additional exemption for each child was raised from $300. to $500. in 1926 the exemption limit was raised from $2000. to $3000, in the case of married persons or persons with dependents; and $1000. to $1500. in the case of other persons. This year the Government has exempted Government or other like annuities to the extent of $5000. An exemption of $500. each (the same as for dependent children) has been granted for parents, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters who are not capable of self-support, owing to mental or physical infirmity. Finally, also, under the legislation of this year, donations to any Church, University, College, School, Hospital, or Charitable Organization in Canada are to be treated as reductions on income, up to a maximum of 10% of the tax-payer's income.

Let me speak next of the Sales Tax. In 1923 the Sales Tax was fixed at a flat 6%. This, it is true, was higher than the rate as imposed by our predecessors, but the raise was necessary for purposes of revenue. A considerable number of commodities were, however, subsequently removed from its operation, or rates on them were considerably reduced, and the tax was no longer pyramided as was formerly the case. In 1924 this flat rate was reduced to 5%. In 1927 the rate was reduced to 4 per cent. In 1928 it was reduced to 3 per cent. In 1929 it was reduced to 2 per cent, and this year, as promised it would be in the course of the public addresses which I delivered last Fall, it was reduced to 1 per cent. With this gradual elimination of the Sales Tax, I need not ask you, Ladies and Gentlemen, what will happen to that 1 per cent if the present Administration is returned to office!

Gradual abolition of all Nuisance Taxes

I need not stop to speak of another class of taxes frequently known as "nuisance taxes" most of which not so generally applicable, perhaps, but nevertheless far-reaching, were initiated by the previous Administration. Taxes on cheques, taxes on receipts, taxes on railway and steamship tackets, on insurance premiums and taxes on telegrams and cablegrams, all of these except a flat rate of 2 cents on cheques above $10. have been abolished.

Reduction in Postage

These taxes, as I have said, were less general in their application than others I have mentioned. I now come to a further reduction which has affected all classes in the Dominion. I mean the reduction in the rate of postage. In 1926 letter postage in Canada was reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents, and in 1928 penny postage was re-established from Canada to other parts of the British Empire.

Remission of Taxation exceeds
$~~115~~ 118,000,000 in five years

Leaving out of account the degree to which the postal revenues may have been affected by these reductions, it is estimated there has been saved to the Canadian taxpayer, of taxation which would otherwise have been collected, the following sums:

For the year 1926	...	$ 25,000,000
1927	...	27,000,000
1928	...	19,000,000
1929	...	25,000,000

The $22,000,000 for 1930, the estimated remission solely on account of sales tax, takes no account of what has been remitted in the further exemptions on Income Tax account as provided for in this year's budget.

Thus in five years there has been an estimated remission of taxation which would otherwise have been collected solely from the sources indicated, of an amount exceeding $118,000,000. The remissions indicated have been cumulative. Assuming conditions similar to those of the last five years, from now on the amount of taxation imposed each year will be $118,000,000 less per annum than it was prior to 1926. May I add that all this takes no account of the further remissions of taxation affected by the reductions of duties under the several revisions of the tariff which have taken place since we came into office, and which as the country well knows have been substantial.

I have dealt at some length with the financial record and policies of the Administration, inasmuch as other policies of the Government are so largely bound up with and dependent upon the financial position. May I say at once that the success which has attended the Government's policies in other spheres of national activity is the more remarkable when our record on debt and tax reduction is kept in mind.

Time does not permit me to more than mention outstanding features of other of the Government's policies. I shall attempt the merest outline leaving it to subsequent meetings and to other speakers to deal with these matters more in detail.

Achievement in Railway Policy

First of all, let me say a word on transportation. When we came into office, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the railways of Canada in a completely disorganized and bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in the hands of a Receiver. The Grand Trunk Railway System had been acquired under arbitration, but it, too, was bankrupt, and the Government which took over the road had studiously refrained from giving so much as an indication as to whether or not it was to be operated as a Government owned system or whether the intention, in its acquisition, was to have the road subsequently re-transferred to private ownership.

The Acquisition of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern.

I notice that Mr. Bennett is saying that the records of parliament show that the Liberal Party, when in opposition, opposed the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway as a Government owned system. The Liberal Party did nothing of the kind. What we did object to was the refusal of the Government of the day to submit to parliament for approval the terms and conditions of the contract under which the system was to be acquired. We contended that, as the people were being made responsible for the purchase of the system, by terms arranged by agreement, the people's representatives in parliament were entitled to know what those terms were and to approve of them, before final acquisition of the system was made. This, however, the Government of the day refused to allow, though at a subsequent session of parliament, having failed to include some essential features of the transaction in the agreement, they were obliged to submit the whole measure to parliament and, in order to permit of the additional terms being inserted, to secure its approval which they were of course able to do in virtue of their majority.

A year or two before the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway, the Government of the day had acquired the Canadian Northern Railway, for the common stock of which some $10,000,000 were paid, though it was stated by the Government's own Commission, of which Sir Henry Drayton was a member, that the stock was worthless.

Consolidation and Unification of the Canadian National Railways

We found the Canadian Northern system thus acquired operating under one management, the Grand Trunk Railway under another management, the Intercolonial railway under the management of a Department of the Government and Grand Trunk Pacific in the hands of a Receiver. It was the present Liberal Administration which effected the necessary consolidation and brought these roads into a unified national system. It was the present Administration which made the necessary provision for the President and the Board of Directors of the system, and it was the present Administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as President and Chairman of the Board.

It was the present Administration that laid down the policy that there should be no political interference with the management or operation of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton has publicly testitied, on more occasions than one, that the Government has lived up to this policy, alike in letter and in spirit. It was the present Administration which laid down as a further policy of railway management and operation in this country that Government ownership was to be given a fair trial, and that, as between the Government owned National Railways and the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway, there should be neither fear nor favour in the respective treatment to be accorded these roads. I venture to say that the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his Board of Directors will be the first to say that, in the fulfillment of this policy, the Government has sought to be scrupulously fair.

Far reaching reductions in railway rates.

How the Canadian National Railways have been brought to the present position as a Government owned railway system, unequalled in any part of the world, is a story too long to narrate, but one, fortunately, with which every Canadian household is more or less familiar. What is not so generally known is that, while operating deficits have been changed into operating revenues, - just as national deficits have been changed into national surpluses, - this has been accompanied by far-reaching reductions in railway rates in all parts of Canada, affecting especially the Western Provinces and the Maritimes, - reductions which have been made applicable to both great railway systems.

Perhaps I should not be too severe on our opponents for seeking to-day to claim paternity of the Canadian National Railways. Their action in this regard is more or less characteristic of human nature. When the Tory Party, as we came into office, left this neglected and famished foundling on our doorstep, suffering from many forms of malnutrition, there was not one member of the whole Party who was prepared to allow his name to have any association with it, but now that the infant has been revived and has grown into vigorous and powerful proportions, resembling those of Sir Henry Thornton himslef, not a few of them wish to give it their name. They say that on no account will they part with it, and Mr. Bennett heroically says that he will sacrifice an office which he does not hold rather than see it pass out of the hands of the State.

Advance in Other Transportation Facilities

But organization of the Canadian National Railways has not been our only achievement in the realm of transportation. We have brought the Hudson's Bay Railway to completion, though the rails on a part of this road had been taken up by our opponents while in office, and the partially constructed road-bed allowed to fall into disrepair and decay. We have acquired, and, by making them a part of the Canadian National system, have revitalized not a few of the smaller privately owned railways in different parts of the Dominion; and we have, on more than one occasion, made provision through parliament for extensive branch line construction in other parts of the country. We have completed the Welland Canal, and we have effected other developments with respect to the St. Lawrence Waterways, on which I shall have opportunity to say something on another occasion. I wish that time permitted me to say something of the developments in aviation, which the Government has steadily sought to initiate and advance. This development has been encouraged through the widespread use of airplanes in surveys and forest protection work, through the development of air mail routes, and through the construction of the St. Hubert Airdrome, at which we expect shortly to welcome the R100. In this as in every field of national activity the Government has sought to further and will continue to further Canadian enterprise and achievement.

Achievement in Immigration Policy

May I now say a word with respect to immigration. You have heard a great deal about our boys and girls leaving for the United States. You have heard a great deal about foreign immigration being encouraged to the relative disadvantage of immigration from the British Isles. During part of the time you have been told that we were not bringing in a sufficient number of immigrants; at another time the complaint has been that the number was excessive. The policy of the Conservative Party, as outlined by General McRae was that of a huge colonization and land settlement scheme involving an expenditure of some $300.000.000 and the bringing in of 300.000 fresh immigrants. Perhaps Mr. Bennett will tell the west how this policy which he supported would have helped to lessen the present unemployment of which he has had much to say during the present campaign.

The Truth About the Exodus to the United States.

Now what are the facts with respect to our management of the immigration problem. It is quite true that, during the years immediately following our coming into office the trend of migration continued to be from Canada to the States. The reasons for that were very obvious. The United States had prospered while we had suffered through the war. During the period of re-establishment of our citizen-soldiery in Canada, preferences in the matter of employment were being given where possible to those who had served overseas. There were not the opportunities for employment here that there were in the country to the south for many of our boys and girls not a few of them and of our grown-ups as well left on that account. Moreover, the springs of immigration had, during the war, and the period immediately following the war, been permitted to dry up at the source. It takes time for a movement of immigration to get under way, whatever its direction may be. People had not the wherewithal to migrate in numbers from the British Isles or from other countries after the war, that they had had before, and Canada had not the free homesteads to offer, nor was she able to advertise these or to give the low ocean and railway rates which were so important an inducement to British immigration in former years. It was not very long, however, before the fruits of our effort became apparent. Little by little the migration of Canadians to the United States began to lessen. In increasing numbers Canadians began to return from the United States to Canada, until to-day while conditions of employment in Canada many not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States or for that matter in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals to-day the migration from Canada to the United States. These are the facts and, far from affording grounds of criticism, they are in the nature of a real achievement.

The Truth About British as Compared with Foreign Immigration

With regard to the allegation that the Government was preferring foreign to British immigration, it did not take very long to establish the facts. When, in 1928, the Leader of the Opposition hinted in parliament that an enquiry might be desirable, I told him

PUBLIC ARCHIVES
ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES

that an enquiry could not take place too soon and a committee of the House of Commons was forthwith appointed, on which all parties were represented. The findings of the parliamentary committee were to the effect that, while Canada was spending 11 cents per capita on continental immigrants she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on immigrants from the British Isles. Reference to the statistics of the British Empire shows that of citizens of the British Isles emigrating of recent years to other Dominions and other parts of the world, Canada has been receiving by a very long way the largest proportion.

Closer Co-operation with the Provinces

The most recent development in our immigration policy has been to link more closely the governments of the provinces and our own government, in the determination of the classes and numbers of immigrants to be brought to Canada. With the return to the Western Provinces of their natural resources, we have felt that more in the way of provincial control of immigration was desirable, more particularly as the provinces themselves are the first to feel any adverse effects of an inadequate or an excessive immigration.

Restriction of Oriental Immigration

I should not leave the subject of immigration without reminding you that, as respects Oriental immigration, which in our own as in other countries constitutes a most perplexing problem, we have in our term of office, without offence to the Orient, brought about complete exclusion of immigration from China, and, by diplomatic arrangement, a restriction of immigration from Japan so effective as to relieve both countries of further embarrassment on that score.

Achievement in the Development of the Basic Industries

Let me now come to the basic industries of our country, agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, on the development of which our transportation and immigration policies, as well as most other policies of the Government have had so important a bearing. I need not remind you that we have regarded the development of these great basic industries as fundamental in our national progress. We have recognized from the start that our manufacturing industries and our trade, both domestic and foreign, were dependent more than on/aught else upon the utilization of our great natural resources.

Principles underlying tariff policies

We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries. We have recognized that, if our manufacturing and trade were to expand that world markets as well as home markets were an essential, and we have recognized, further, that what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent in no inconsiderable measure upon the costs of production and the cost of living in our own land. So, we have striven in our tariff revisions, consistently, to take those steps which, without injury to any legitimate business in the country, would at the same time tend to make possible more in the way of production in our basic industries, through reduction of duties on the instruments of production required in those industries, and on the necessaries of life of those employed therein and in the manufactures and other businesses of our country.

I have not time to go into the revisions of the tariff affected by the present Administration since it took office in 1921. You recall the reductions made in our first year of office on some of the instruments of production, on boots and shoes, on sugar and textiles, the increase in the British Preference on some commodities and in the following year the 10% additional discount in the preference rate made where goods were brought in through Canadian ports. I need not remind you of the Budget of 1924 with its far-reaching reductions in duties on the instruments of production, nor of the Budget of 1926, with its reductions on motor cars, motor trucks and other motor vehicles. There was enough of commotion at the time to cause you to remember how considerable the reductions in duties were alleged to be; enough also to remember what was said on behalf of the Government at the time, that the lessened cost of production and the larger sales through lowered prices would more than ensure to those industries wider markets for their products than they had had before. Such indeed, as everyone knows, was proven to be the case. Nor need I remind you of reductions made a year ago; nor of the extensive increases in the British Preference made in the Budget of the present year, with its complete removal of all duties on tea, on procelain and china household utensils and many other commodities affecting the homes of the people throughout the land. To the extent to which producers and consumers have benefitted by these changes in the tariff which have lessened the cost of production and lessened the cost of living, not only have we materially benefitted the great industries of agriculture, lumber, mining and fishing, but we have also benefitted the manufacturing industries and extensively furthered Canada's trade, both at home and abroad.

The confidence which the people of Canada have given to the present Administration has enabled us to serve and to further the interests of this country until to-day Canada stands as the sixth on the list of the great trading countries of the world. You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials; that we are parting with our birthright. Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of raw materials which Canada imports from the United States for her manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceed in value the total value of the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that the per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain.

Let me add that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000. at the time the present government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000. at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29. In other words there has boen a doubling of our total domestic export trade in a period of seven years.

This spectacular increase of trade is no mere chance. It is the result of wise policies effectively administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Liberal Policies for Labour

I shall have, I fear, to reserve for another time what I would like to have told you to-night of our policies with respect to labour and with respect to war veterans. May I just remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country. May I remind you that it was a Liberal administration which created the Canadian Department of Labour, which introduced its "Fair Wages" policy, and which this year has given statutory effect to the payment of Fair Wages and to an eight-hour day on all public works carried out under contract for the Dominion Government, and with respect to all labour in the Government's own employ. May I remind you that the Industrial Disputes Act and the Combines Investigation Act are both Liberal measures; that it was a Liberal administration which restored to the employees of the Grand Trunk Railway System, or to the familes of those who had died in the interval, payments due on pension account of which they had been arbitrarily deprived some twelve years before. That it was a Liberal Administration that gave to Labour a place on the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway system, and which placed upon the statutes of this country the Old Age Pension Act, under the provisions of which a large measure of comfort and independence in their old age has been assured to some 50,000 of the aged people of our Dominion.

Liberal Policies for War Veterans

The success which has attended our efforts to see that the provisions made by the State for our war veterans and their dependents was both fair and generous, is, I think, well known. It is, I believe, absolutely true that Canada's war pension legislation is the most advanced in the world and that no other nation has made provision for its ex-service men and their dependents on a scale of such open-handed justice as this country. The War Veterans' Allowances Act, the revised machinery for dealing with pension claims, the decision to give to men who have served overseas the benefit of the doubt as to the cause of disability where application is made for pension; these and other measures, while supported by members of all parties in the House of Commons, are nevertheless a part of the record of Liberal policy and achievement, and may I say, a part of the record to which I have felt it a privilege to give a special measure of personal attention and a part of the record of which I feel particularly proud.

Achievement in National Conciliation

If, however, there is one other portion of the record to which I have given much in the way of personal attention, and which had involved much in the way of time and effort, it is the policies of the Government in its relations with other governments, both within and without Canada.

For thirty years in Canada Governments of the day have been wrestling with the problem of the return to the Western Provinces of their natural resources. It remained for the present government to solve that great problem. For an almost equal length of time, the Province of British Columbia has been seeking to have restored to it lands in what is known as the "railway belt" and the "Peace River block" which passed out of its possession at the time that Province came into confederation. It remained for the present Administration to restore these lands. Ever since their entry into confederation, the Maritime Provinces have felt that they have not had a square deal. Here and there, in patchwork fashion, some adjustments have been made in dealing with particular grievances as they arose. It remained for the present Administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesmanlike fashion. This we have done with respect to their transportation problems; with respect to the problems of their industries; with respect to their subsidies; with respect to their harbour and trade facilities, and to all other matters having a bearing upon the economic welfare of the Maritimes as an integral part of our Dominion.

In the case of all, a like method was followed. Matters were not left to vain disputation, or to political pressure; they were investigated; they were made the subject, in the first instance, of impartial fact-finding inquiries conducted in each case under Royal Commission, the personnel of which in every instance commanded the confidence of all parties concerned. In the case of the four Western Provinces, the agreements were not only submitted to our Parliament for approval, but received the approval of their respective legislatures as well, and may I add, so fairly were they drawn and so completely did they accord with what in the case of the provinces as well as of the Dominion was believed to be the equity and justice of the situation, that in the provinces themselves and in both Houses of Our Parliament, they passed without a single division.

I have not time to go into the provisions of these several agreements, but I do not hesitate to say that an examination of their provisions reveal a generosity in the manner of the treatment of those provinces such as has never characterized similar negotiations in the history of our Dominion. And here may I point out that something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the Premier of this province and his government in this general election, namely that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present Administration at Ottawa. It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative governments, our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavour merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or illwill.

By our action in these particulars we have made over and strengthened the superstructure of Confederation. We have, at the same time, in the increased financial provisions which we have made for those provinces, reinforced its foundations. I say without fear of contradiction, that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several provinces and the Federal Government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

Equality - Good-will and Co-operation in inter-empire relations

But if we have improved relations within the Dominion between the governments of the provinces and the Federal government, if we have removed sectional antagonisms and helped to develop a truly national spirit, what may not also be said of our achievements in inter-imperial and international relations? Here I come to the work of the Imperial Conference and the Economic Conference of 1923; the work of the Imperial Conference of 1926, the work of the subsidiary conference on the operation of Dominion legislation, which concluded its sittings in London last Autumn. Out of these conferences has come, for the first time in the history of their relations of Great Britain and the Dominions, a statement of their relative positions, which has removed from the realm of possible controversy all further talk of colonial subordination, and which has accorded to Canada and to the other self-governing Dominions a national status equal to that of Great Britain herself. With this clear recognition of nationhood there has come a corresponding development in free and effective co-operation, not only with the Mother Country but with the sister nations of the Commonwealth.

May I remind my fellow-countrymen that within the period of office of the present Administration, Canada has welcomed, for the first time in her history, the leaders of all the political parties in Britain, two of them in the office of Prime Minister. They have all borne witness to the cordiality of the relations which exist between the Government at Ottawa, and the Government at Westminster. I may add that within our term of office we have also welcomed to this Dominion Prime Ministers or ex-Prime Ministers from each of the other self-governing Dominions; from Australia, from New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State and from Newfoundland.

A New Position in World Affairs

Let me invite you to look beyond the Empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds to-day? Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking, there has been the sudden steep ascent of war in which there were common heroisms and common sacrifices, and there has been the long, gradual, constitutional endeavour for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer.

Responsible self government, not in internal affairs alone but also in external affairs as well is the corner stone of our Empire as it exists today. The struggle for responsible self-government in internal affairs so far as the Dominions are concerned began in this country. It was worked out successfully here. Canada blazed the trail which the others have followed. To win a like measure of self-government with respect to the country's external affairs has been one of the supreme achievements of the present Administration. In our progress towards that achievement we have been opposed by the Conservative party every step of the way.

When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties, we were told that we were seeking separation because, forsooth, we asked His Majesty, in regard to an international negotiation on a matter of Canadian concern, to give full powers to a Canadian Minister of the Crown instead of to the British Ambassador at Washington. When a little later we opened a legation at Washington and subsequently at Paris and Tokio, we were again told that we were pursuing the path of separation. Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about "Canada First". Just what does his "Canada First" mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the esta blishment of Canadian legations in other lands, and on Canada's status of co-equality with the Motherland. I am not sure where he stands to-day, but I know where he stood in the session of Parliament just closed.

Ladies and Gentlemen: In this brief summary of the Government's record, I have not had opportunity to make so much as mention of the position Canada has taken within the past few years at international conferences and at the League of Nations, a position not merely of helpful co-operation, but of leadership as well. Not only has Canada had a place on the Council of the League of Nations, and played an important role at its assemblies, but a member of the present Government has held the high office of President of the Assembly of the League. We were one of the first countries of the world to signify our approval of the Briand-Kellogg Pact, and were among its original signatories in Paris. We were the first of the British countries to urge the acceptance of the Optional Clause for the settlement of international disputes by arbitration. We were represented with distinction in London at the recent conference on the Limitation of Naval Armaments. In Washington, Paris and Tokio our representation abroad has won for our country added and worthy recognition alike in America, Europe and the Orient.

Neither have I had time to make mention of many reforms which are of national and international significance.

I might have referred to the policy for which we secured the approval of parliamentof requiring submission to parliament of all treaties likely to involve this country in foreign wars, and approval in advance of any commitment involving Canada's participation in war; of our efforts to suppress rum-running and smuggling and to prevent the use or co-operation of government agencies in the violation of the laws of another country. I might also have spoken of the reform of our electoral laws, and of the representation given to women in the Senate of Canada. These are but a few of many other measures of the significance of which I should have been glad to say a word had time permitted. They all constitute an important part of the record of the present administration.

The Budget of 1930.

I come now to the second great issue of the campaign, namely, the Budget introduced into Parliament by the Minister of Finance of the first of May, and the important questions of fiscal and trade policy which it embodies. Here, first of all may I emphasize a certain point of view from which all policies and in particular issues such as those arising out of the Budget ought to be approached and considered.

Policies framed to meet existing conditions.

Political philosophers of ancient times very wisely made a distinction between laws and constitutions which were idially the best, and those which were the best as applied to particular circumstances of time and place. In other words, it is the privilege of philosophers to propose abstract laws for the mythical inhabitants of an Utopian state. It is the business of government to deal with the realities of a given situation.

Keeping this central fact in mind, it should be pointed out in the second place that the economic situation of a country is not static but dynamic. It changes from year to year and from decade to decade.

The laws that in our fathers' time seemed best."

National Policy of half a century ago not suited to to-day

Since the beginning of the present century we have witnessed a transformation of the Dominion which has called not only for a new outlook on world affairs, but for new economic policies to meet the requirements of a nation which resembles in few respects the Canada which adopted the National Policy of 1878. The appeal to past conditions and policies is a legitimate course of proceedure for the leader of a Conservative party. We are being told that the old National Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald days is what Canada needs most to-day, that it is the remedy for all ills, the one guarantee of progress. Let us pause for a moment and examine this appeal.

The National Policy, so-called, had its birth in 1878; this is the year 1930. In other words what Canada needs today, according to the Leader of the Opposition, is even more in the way of protection than what she needed fifty years ago for the infant and struggling industries of that day. That does not say much for the growth and progress of Canada in the last half century.

Fifty years ago Canada consisted of the two old provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and what are today known as the Maritime Provinces. The provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia were also in Confederation but were still largely isolated. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were unknown. The agencies of transportation and communication within the country were wholly inadequate, and, altogether negligable as a factor in world commerce. Canadians were still colonial-minded, though many there were who had aspirations of nationhood. A policy designed to bring the trade of these provinces into closer touch with each other, to make the rural and the urban areas more amd more interdependent had much to commend it, much that could be supported by those who were desirous of making the national appeal. But is that the Canada we know to-day? We have ceased to be a Dominion of scattered provinces. We are a compact nation. There is no break in the chain from coast to coast. Our agencies of transportation and communication are world agencies. We have ceased to be colonials, and are proud of possessing an Empire citizenship; of being citizens of a nation in the British Commonwealth of Nations, a nation also in the League of Nations. The country year by year is being more closely knit together in all its parts, and in the inter-dependence of its varied interests, and more and more these interests are becoming a part of the wider interests of the world at large.

Not true that so-called National Policy has always served to meet conditions.

But is it true that the so-called National Policy is a cure for all our industrial ills. The worst period of depression Canada has ever known was in the years prior to the General Election of 1896, when those who had helped to create the National Policy, and to administer it, were in control of the affairs of the country. As a matter of fact, it was not until the Liberal administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office and the Laurier-Fielding tariff modified in a considerable measure the existing tariff structure of the day, and that Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced the system of British Preference, and trade treaties with other countries which served further to modify the old tariff structure, that in any true sense of the word Canada began to prosper as a nation.

But let me not go back to the period of a former Liberal administration. Let me come to the years which immediately preceeded those of the present administration. At that time the advocates of the old National Policy were again in control. Did the tariff as they then found it and left it save this country from another period of depression? Did we not find when we came into office unparalled depression, out of which it remained for Liberal policies to bring the country?

When we increased the British Preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reudced duties on the implements of production, when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the National Policy and that we would ruin the country.

I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedon of trade is the more deserving of being called a National Policy as we approach the third decade of the Twentieth Century. A National Policy to-day in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world. It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets. It is essentially a policy of world markets.

Sectional Interests must yield to a United Canada

With the rapid development of Western Canada and the emergence of a great agricultural population engaged in the production of a commodity which must seek its markets throughout the world, high protection, or an all-round increase in the tariff can no longer be called a national policy. According to figures given in the Canada Year Book of 1929, over 80 per cent of Canadian manufacturing is concentrated in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This per centage is based on figures of production, capital employed, and number of employees. While it is true that manufacturing has developed to a considerable extent in Western Canada, these manufactures are based largely upon the primary industries of agriculture and mining and do not require a tariff protection to any considerable extent. It is, therefore, true to say that a general increase in the tariff in 1930 is essentially a sectional policy so far as the distribution of its benefits is concerned. It has forfeited every right to the name - National Policy - given to it by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878, and by Mr. Bennett in 1930.

But if high protection is a sectional policy in the distribution of its benefits, it is equally true that having regard to the present industrial development of Central Canada a free trade policy would be detremental in its immediate effects to one section of the Dominion, even though it conferred benefits on those of our citizens who are obliged to seek markets abroad for their agricultural produce and who derive little or no advantage from a protective tariff.

It is apparent, therefore, that both a high tariff and free trade are sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada. What then is the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interests arising out of the tariff is the same as it is with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions. To the greatest possible extent sectional interests must be reconciled in the light of the larger interests of the whole. This can be effected only by moderation and compromise. Face the facts of our situation. Take Canada as it is, with its changing needs and its conflicting interests. Acknowledge the facts of feography and of divergent industrial development in east, and centre, and west. And having examined the realities of the situation, and having considered the demands of different sections for policies suited to their needs, so mould our social transportation and fiscal policies as to hold the scales evenly between class and creed and section thus weld a far-flung country into a united Canadian nation.

The Policy of Reconciliation, the Traditional Liberal Policy

Such a policy and such an attitude are not new to the Liberal Party. It was the ever present motive of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in his efforts to heal the discord of race and creed. It was the motive of the Rt. Hon. Mr. Fielding in his long series of budgets, beginning in 1897. I find it expressed in one of his last speeches in the House of Commons on June 12, 1922:

> "All political matters are essentially matters of compromise, in some degree and so long as the compromise is not one of principle, there is no reason why men should not compromise, because it is only by a policy of that nature that governments can ever be carried on. We are apt each of us in our own part of the country to look at things from a sectional point of view and that is unavoidable.....As we meet together in the contact of mind and mind we discover that we are able to take broader views."

This then is the issue presented by the Liberal Party. The Budget of 1930, the legislation implementing the recommendations of the Commission on Maritime Claims, the transfer of the natural resources to Western Canada, the return of the railway lands and Peace River block to British Columbia, the Hudson Bay Railway, the West Indies Treaty for the eastern provinces, and the Australian Treaty for British Columbia, each and all of these represent an attempt to meet the realities of the political and economic situation which confronts Canada today. Time does not permit a discussion of each policy in its relation to the interests of a particular section of our country. I shall content myself with setting out briefly the essential features of the Budget which was announced by Mr. Dunning in the House of Commons on May 1st, and which will doubtless be the outstanding issue of the present campaign.

The Underlying Purpose of the Budget of 1930

The Budget of 1930 was framed first of all to meet a situation in Canada arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes for policies suited to their needs. But because of the place which Canada has come to occupy in international trade, it was influenced also and in a special degree by our relation with two countries with which we are most closely associated in matters of commerce. The one is Great Britain. The other is the United States.

When Mr. Hoover assumed office as President of the United States on March 11, 1929, the United States Congress began carrying out a far-reaching revision of the tariff in conformity with the pledges given by the Republican Party during the presidential campaign of the previous year. As that revision proceeded, it became increasingly apparent that the duties against Canadian agricultural products would be raised to such an extent as to cut off a considerable proportion of the existing Canadian exports to that country. In these circumstances, and in accordance with its policy of using every endeavour to find wider markets for Canadian products, the Government gave instructions to the Tariff Advisory Board to make a careful survey of the tariff schedules then applying against American imports, with a view to determining to what extent these imports could be purchased from Great Britain or from other parts of the British Empire.

While this enquiry was proceeding, it was decided that an Imperial Economic Conference would be held in London in September of 1930, to consider the subject of closer co-operation in matters of trade between the various parts of the Empire and to discuss the various policies which would contribute towards that end. Efforts had previously been made by the present administration to have this Conference held in Canada. Subsequently, a condition developed in Great Britain which led to a marked curtailment of purchases of Canadian wheat and resulted in a serious tie-up of our wheat in elevators, with consequent loss not only to Canadian growers, but to our transportation systems, and to many branches of our industry and commerce. Prior to this development, Great Britain had purchased far more from Canada, largely becuase of our wheat exports, than Canada had purchased from Great Britain. It became apparent that if Canada was to maintain a British market for Canadian wheat, if was desirable that measures should be taken by diverting to Great Britain, many of the purchases being made at present in the United States and in other ways, to increase British imports to Canada and thus create an economic and psychological condition in Great Britain more favorable to the importation of Canadian wheat. These circumstances must be kept clearly in mind when examining the proposals in the Budget presented to the House of Commons on May 1st.

The Main Proposals of the Budget

The Budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present Government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four main proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1. The iron and steel tariff revision.
2. Countervailing duties.
3. The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4. Extension of the British Preference.

The Revision of the Iron and Steel duties.

The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the Tariff Advisory Board which have been conducted pver a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an inquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great basic industries. The purpose kept in mind by the Government in prosecuting this inquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain. This in turn was in conformity with the announced intention of the Government to facilitate trade with those countries which are willing to trade with Canada on equal terms.

The Countervailing Duties on Agricultural and other Commodities.

The next feature of the Budget, namely, the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us. For the present we raise the duties on these selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by other countries, but at the same time we tell our neighbour frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis. On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighbourly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be one-sided.

In revising the Customs Tariff on fruits and vegetables, the Government has had before it the evidence presented to the Tariff Advisory Board on several occasions by those who were primarily interested in this important branch of our agricultural production. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and vegetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of other countries. It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers. We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates, which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules. In this manner we have endeavoured to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which these specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of the consumers of these commodities. In past year, moreover, a large proportion of our early fruits and vegetables has been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business. Under the existing trade agreement these Islands have assured us of a preference in their market. In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruits and vegetables under the British Preference. Already we have seen what the response of other parts of the British Empire is likely to be to this attitude and policy. Bermuda has given to us since our budget was introduced additional preference or free entry on some of our agricultural manufactured products and this very week there is assembling at Trinidad representatives of all the British West Indies for the purpose of considering closer trade relations with our country.

The British Preference Feature of the Budget

This brings me to the last feature of the Budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British Crown which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Breat Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries to-day do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

The present Budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal Party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them to-day. They have said that we must have preference for preference and that no favours should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forego the policy of free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British Preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britainindicates its desire to do so, the present Administration can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on a basis of reciprocal preference.

But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal Party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers and to inter-imperial trade with its beneficial effects to the British Empire as a whole, but a policy which is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country, in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country. In the far-reaching extension of the British Preference under the Budget of 1930, this has been our purpose and our objective. We have studied the situation with the utmost care and have revised the tariff schedules with the definite aim of diverting a considerable portion of trade from the United States and other countries to Great Britain. We firmly believe that this policy will receive the wholehearted approval of the Canadian people.

Tory Criticisms of the Fiscal and Trade Policies of the Budget

Against the fiscal and trade policies of the Budget what are the criticisms of the Conservative Party as enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition? They may be summed up in a very few words. The first is that the Budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a General Election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objective, if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have "stolen the clothes" of the Conservative Party. If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that Party. The third is that our policy is a Washington made policy. If that is true, hich it is not, what becomes of the argument that we have stolen the clothes of our opponents? Finally, we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences there should be no trade, even with the Mother Country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference. In the Reciprocity Campaign of 1911, the cry of the Tory Party was "No truck nor trade with the Yankees." This year it has come dangerously near being "No truck nor trade with Britain."

The Budget the outcome of the most mature deliberation

Let me examine their criticism a little more in detail, and first of all the allegation that the Budget was conceived in haste, and that it is an invention for the purposes of a General Election.

In his address at Winnipeg, sounding the keynote of the Conservative campaign, Mr. Bennett characterized the tariff changes of the Budget as "this premature, unreasoned action." Elsewhere in the same speech he referred to the Budget proposals as a movement "hysterically inspired by party exigencies." Far from being "premature" or "unreasoned" or "hysterically inspired," I venture to say there never was presented to any Parliament a Budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well.

The Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation

This is perhaps the most appropriate place for me to recall to your mind an all-important and far-reaching reform, inaugurated by the present Administration, in the method of dealing with revisions of the tariff. Prior to the time we came into office, the tariff changes proposed in the Budgets of Finance Ministers were in no inconsiderable part the outcome of decisions taken solely by the government of the day, unaided by any expert advice or opinion. Sometimes they were taken after hearings conducted by Ministers themselves, but not infrequently they were the outcome of the pressure of special interests. Too often they were made without that degree of careful examination into the probable effects of the changes proposed which was obviously in the public interest.

The result was that, not infrequently, the changes made in the tariff did not produce the results it was hoped they might; in fact they produced, on occasions, results quite the opposite to those which had been anticipated. The present government, while recognizing that the tariff is a matter with which parliament in the last analysis must deal, and over which parliament at all times should exercise supreme control, nevertheless felt that it was in the interests alike of the ministry and of parliament that some agency should be estalished which would be in a position carefully to weigh and examine in advance the probable effects of all contemplated changes and be in a position to advise the ministry and parliament with respect thereto. Accordingly, in 1926, the government, having obtained provision for the same from parliament, established what is known as an Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation. It gave to the Board the most ample powersto investigate any and every tariff proposal or phase of tariff policy which might be referred to it, for consideration, by the Ministry. The Board, in other words, was constituted as a fact-finding body to deal with such questions as might be referred to it for scientific investigation. Its personnel was composed of individuals possessing special qualifications for the class of work with which the Board was expected to deal, and representative alike of the interests of producers and consumers, of industrialists and agriculturists. It was given power to employ experts and to examine witnesses under oath; to hold its investigations in public or in private. Very wisely the Board has decided that its hearings should be held in public. More than that, the government decided that such of the evidence as was taken before the Board as it might be thought it would be in the public interest to have made available at all times, should be printed at the public expense. To the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, there was assigned by the present government the broad task of reviewing the tariff schedules generally, with a view to their systematization, and the removal of anomalies, and also the special task of investigating the particular matters which, from time to time, might be referred to it for special enquiry.

The government was particularly fortunate in securing as Chairman of the Board, the services of Mr. W. H. Moore, a trained economist, a man of wide experience in knowledge of financial and industrial problems, and a man of judicial mind and temperament. Recognizing the confidence which Mr. Moore's impartial conduct of the Board's affairs has established in the public mind, some of our opponents, and the Leader of the Opposition in particular, have, on this occasion, sought to belittle the services of the Board has rendered, and in particular to raise a doubt concerning the disinterested character of the services of its Chairman. The services of the Chairman of the Board fortunately speak for themselves. The government is more than satisfied to have them estimated solely on their merits. With the exception of an occasional jibe at the Chairman by the Leader of the Opposition, the fairness and impartiality of the Board's methods of proceeding have never been seriously challenged in parliament. I believe it is true that throughout the country each year has served to enhance public confidence in the board itself.

All that is given in evidence at the hearings of the Board is taken down in shorthand and is printed. The Board's proceedings are communicated to parliament for its guidance, and may be had by the public on payment of a nominal printing charge. Tariff making requires technical knowledge. The tariff board is a body of investigation, collecting information and submitting it to the government and parliament. The government has the advice of the tariff board, but it must assume responsibility for what it recommends to parliament. It may accept or reject the advice tendered, but if it is true that the Board's advice has been largely accepted, it is simply because it has been good advice.

With the establishment of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation the day has gone for the making of tariffs on impulse, or because of momentary resentments.

No longer are tariffs to be made by clamour of self-interest, nor by the rhetoric of politicians. The business of the country deserves the cool, calm, reasoning that is devoted to the successful business of the individual and the corporation, and under present conditions through the tariff board the business of Canada as far as it is reflected in the customs schedule has been receiving that consideration.

The Genesis of the Budget

Having explained the functions and duties of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, may I now revert to the course taken by the Government in dealing with the revisions of the United States tariff in so far as they threatened adversely to affect our trade.

No sooner was the probability of a revision of the American tariff announced than the Chairman of the Board was advised by the then Minister of Finance, the late Mr. Robb and myself to have the Board study with the utmost care the probable effect of any changes in the United States tariff upon our trade. At the same time through the proper diplomatic channels and in accordance with approved diplomatic methods, the most complete representations were made to the Government of the United States through the Canadian Legation at Washington and through the Legation of the United States at Ottawa as to the affect upon Canadian trade, and also the affect upon Canadian sentiment and the probable consequences of both, which the proposed changes, if put into effect, were likely to bring about.

When it became apparent that notwithstanding these representations, changes inimical to our country, and to its agricultural interests in particular, were likely to be made, and that our immediate neighbours were not prepared to continue to trade with us except upon unequal terms, a further important step was taken, Both the Minister of Finance and myself, speaking in Parliament, gave our own people to understand, that the government was fully alive to the possible consequences of the action contemplated by the United States, that we were watching Canadian interests to the fullest possible extent. Public intimation was given, in words the significance of which the United States could not do other than fully comprehend, that in the event of tariff changes taking place which might adversely affect our interests, it would be found that Canada was well able to take care of herself; that all countries might expect to see that we proposed in matters of trade to extend our favours as far as might be possible to those countries most ready to favour us, and that where trade could not be expected except on unequal terms, use would be made of the tariff to divert the course of trade, first of all so as to deepen the channels of trade within the British Empire, and secondly to cause the trade of Canada hereafter more and more to flow in these channels which reciprocal treatment in matters of trade might help to develop between this country and other lands.

Statement in House of Commons by the late James Robb, on March 1, 1929.

Speaking on the introduction of his budget in the House of Commons on March 1, 1929, the late Mr. Robb said:

"This Dominion continues to be one of the world leaders in the volume of its external trade; therefore, problems arising in connection with our foreign trade can never be ignored. As the years go by an increasing quantity of our domestic production must necessarily be marketed abroad. It is our desire to trade freely with any and all who are willing to trade with us. What may, or may not, be possible in this particular necessarily depends in some measure on the purchasing power and the fiscal policies of other countries. The policy of this Administration is not a high tariff policy; it is a low tariff policy. Its policy is to encourage production at home and the marketing of our excess of production abroad. In applying this policy both domestic and international factors must of necessity be considered.

In accordance with the fiscal policy of the Government, the tariff changes to be submitted to-day are designed to reduce taxation and to lessen the costs of production. The changes to be submitted arise out of references which the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation has investigated, and are based on its fact-findings. The Board is continuing its inquiries, on which substantial progress has already been made, into several larger problems which involve the consideration of whole tariff schedules and the interrelation of many important Canadian industries. While these inquiries are being pursued, opportunity will be afforded for considering the possible affect on trade of changes being proposed in the tariff schedules of other countries, should they be implemented by legislation."

May I now quote an extract or two from a speech of my own to which much publicity was given at the time and to which frequent reference has since been made. It is the speech which I delivered at Winnipeg on November 1st of last year. That speech was devoted almost wholly to the question of the tariff and to the then existing situation. I pointed out wherein the Government had been urged by its opponents to adopt a "red-blooded" attitude towards the United States, to keep Parliament in session up to the moment of the final revision of their tariff by the United States. I said that any change of the American tariff, prior to the re-assembling of our Parliament was wholly improbable, and that having before us more in the way of exact information and knowledge, we would at the forth-coming session be in a much better position to deal with the tariff as circumstances might require, that we could possibly be at any other time: I stated that what was needed meanwhile was not so much a "red-blooded" as a "cool-headed" attitude.

Speaking of the position taken by our opponents in Parliament I said: "We are told that we should retaliate; but what we are to retaliate against, they cannot so much as tell us, for up to the present, no changes in the American tariff have been made." I added, with regard to our own position, "I am not denying that changes by Congress in the United States' tariff which may adversely affect our trade may call for action on the part of the Canadian Parliament to secure elsewhere markets for our exports which it is in the public interest to maintain."

I then outlined the method of the Liberal Administration in dealing with tariff matters and spoke particularly of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation. I then proceeded to outline the course the Government had been pursuing, and to answer the objection of those who thought that more in the way of formal protest to the United States' Government should have been made by our Government. In this connection I said:

"Let it, however, never be assumed that because we have not been threatening, because we have not been expounding vociferously with regard to a situation that has not yet arisen, that in any particular we have been indifferent to possibilities; that we have not been making all proper and necessary representations, or that we have not been reflecting upon, studying, and determining the course of action that it may be best to adopt in the event of any changes which may adversely affect our trade being made now or later on in the tariff of the United States or of any other country. This it was obviously our duty to do, and this we have been doing through the agency of more departments of government than one."

Specific references to the United States' Tariff Revision

This let me remind you was said publicly last year. It had reference to the course the Government had been pursuing prior to that date. It was, I think, fairly pointed as to what the Government's course would be as a consequence of changes in the tariff of the United States, but I was more direct and specific than even this - not only as regards trade with the United States but also as regards the development of inter-imperial trade. Let me read what I said, and then ask whether there is reason to regard the present Budget as in any sense the outcome of "premature", "unreasoned" "action", or as hysterically inspired" by party exigencies.

Here are my words: They will be found in the very full reports of the speech which were made by most of the leading papers throughout the Dominion. Speaking specifically of the possible changes in the American tariff, I said:

"The mere fact that a revision of the United States' tariff is possible, a fact which has received emphasis from the present discussions, has rendered it imperative that we should consider all probably and possible effects of a revision, and that we should explore in each and every direction the courses which it may be wisest to take in meeting whatever situation may ultimately develop. I wish to make it very clear that this is precisely what the Government has been doing, and doing through agencies especially designed and adapted for the purpose."

"I spoke a moment ago of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation. This Board has been in existence now for three years. During the whole of that period it has been making a most searching and careful study of the tariff. It has been considering its chedules as a whole, and, one by one, in relation to special applications made for changes in the tariff which have been referred to it for consideration, and in relation to modifications of the tariff generally in accordance with the Liberal policy of watching the interest of consumers as well as of producers and manufacturers. The Board's personnel is composed of able representative men from different parts of Canada. It has associated with it permanently, and is free to call in from time to time, persons in a position to give expert opinion.

"When the revision of the United States' tariff was first mooted, the Chairman of the Board, Mr. W. H. Moore, was called into conference by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the Government, and was told that it was the wish of the Government to have, in case it should be required, as much information as might be possible with respect to changes in our own tariff which it might be deemed advisable to make in the interests of our own people, as a consequence of, or as an offset to, changes which might come in the United States' tariff. Much of this information we already have, and the Board's work is proceeding from day to day."

I then referred to the absurdity of any thought of changing a tariff over night, as implied in the attitude of our opponents and said: "The old method of threatened retaliation may have had its day, but the new method looks not to threats for what is best, but to close and accurate scientific study. It bases its conclusions on acquired information and knowledge."

Specific Reference to Inter-Imperial Trade

Then speaking of the development of inter-imperial trade, I said: "Finally there is the movement of effecting more in the way of inter-imperial trade, which from voluntary as well as government agencies, has gathered momentum almost daily since the revision of the United States' tariff began to be discussed. Here we already see the extent to which even the possibility of a revision of their tariff by the United States has served to bring home to component parts of the British Empire the wisdon of securing, within the Empire itself, with regard to any and every eventuality, as large a measure of inter-imperial trade as may be possible. There seems little doubt that Empire producers can supply vast quantities of goods now produced in the United States. What proportions this movement may assume, should actual changes adversely affecting different parts of the Empire ever come into effect, it is, of course, impossible to foretell. To this aspect, as far as Canada is concerned, we have been giving the closest possible attention.

"There should be in Canada the heartiest co-operation on the part of all parties to seek within the Empire new markets to replace any that may be lost elsewhere, and to place within the Empire, at home and abroad, as many of the purchases now given to any country that penalizes our trade and can be transferred without penalizing Canadians.

The Whole position very clearly stated

"What then is the present position with respect to possible changes in the tariff of the United States which may adversely affect our trade? That position is well known. It has not changed since the controversy commenced. It was stated in parliament in the clearest possible terms by both the Minister of Finance and myself in the course of the debate on the Budget in April last. The significance of what was then said is, I believe, as fully understood by the people of the United States as by our own people.

"We have made it clear that, in so far as we have a fiscal problem, our task would appear to be that of furthering the utilization of domestic resources, of encouraging greater and more economical production of quality products, of removing inequalities where inquiry proves such to exist, and of readjusting as necessity arises, our customs tariff schedules to meet new conditions. In applying these principles the availability of supplies, the proximity of markets and transportation costs are all factors that must be considered. Other things being equal, we would wish to favour those countries which favour our products. It is our desire to trade freely with any or all who are willing to trade with us; to buy from those who buy from us; and in so far as we may be able so to do, to secure markets for our products and merchandise on which we can rely. What may or may not be possible in this particular necessarily depends in some measure on the purchasing power and the fiscal policies of other countries. The policy of the present Administration is not a high tariff policy, it is one of promoting greater freedom in the matter of trade, in a manner which will encourage production at home and the marketing of our excess of production abroad.

"Our position as respects the United States is perfectly clear, and, I may add, equally strong, come what may. In nothing have we been provocative. We have recognized that the United States is free to legislate as it pleases as respects its own tariff. We have been exemplary in our attitude in not attempting to interfere by threat or formal protest with respect to a matter which we recognized as one of domestic concern. As a neighbour with whom the United States is doing business, as its nearest neighbour, and in some respects its best customer, we have made known wherein certain tariff changes may adversely affect our interests. We have expressed the hope that our relations being neighbourly, neighbourly considerations would govern, by them, as by us, in respect to the tariff, as in all else. We have made it clear that only in an atmosphere of confidence and goodwill is it going to be possible to adjust with the greatest mutual advantage many of the problems which in their nature are bound to be international. If, in the face of all this, the tariff of the United States should be so altered as adversely to affect to any appreciable degree any interests in this country, the United States will surely be the first to recognize our right with respect to our tariff so to legislate as to have regard for Canadian interests, and in particular, Canadian interests as they may be affected, or as we may have reason to feel they are ever likely to be affected, by tariff revisions in the United States.

"The people of Canada may rely upon the present Administration taking care of Canadian trade in future, as we have taken care of it in the past. They may rely upon the Canadian tariff being made to serve Canadian interests. No situation has arisen during the past nine years which has not been satisfactorily met. The Government is fully prepared in the interests of Canada to readjust its fiscal policy from time to time to meet any changes in existing fiscal structures which may affect our markets. If the United States or any other country does not want to trade with Canada except on unequal terms, then surely we can look as never before to the rest of the world, and particularly to the rest of the British Empire. We will continue to shape our fiscal policies on a national basis in the interests of all sections in Canada. We will continue to legislate, not for one class but for all classes; not for a favoured few but for the greatest good for the greatest number. Whatever the United States or any other country may do in tariff matters, we believe that our country has reached a stage in its development where it will be able to look after itself. Canada will make its own tariffs and will find its own markets".

The Clearest Possible Forecast of The Budget Proposals

I ask, ladies and gentlemen, could anything be plainer than that? How, in the face of so clear and emphatic a declaration of the Government's position can any one claim that we have taken the country by surprise in the budget brought down this year. The intention of the Government, the statement of policy as outlined in this public address, and the substance of which was repeated time and again in the course of the journey which I made to and from the Pacific Coast, was made a half a year before our budget was introduced, and as I have already said, I was but repeating in Winnipeg what both the Late Minister of Finance and myself had said in parliament another half a year before that time. So that the Government's intention with regard to the present budget was publicly known at least a year in advance of the time that the budget itself was introduced.

But there are none so blind as those who will not see, and perhaps there are none so prejudiced and readily deceived as those who seek to prejudice and deceive the minds of others. The Tory Party had gone so far in its efforts to misrepresent the position of myself and others in our attitude towards the United States and in our attitude towards

Britain and other nations of the British Commonwealth that they had come to believe that what they had been repeating over and over again had in it some element of truth, and that any change in the tariff which might not accord with their own predictions was something quite impossible. Now they know that the Government meant every word of what it said, and they have before them in the form of legislature enactments, acts which speak very much louder than words.

The Significance of a Provocative attitude in International Affairs.

I have been taken to task because I ventured to say that I did not believe in a course of conduct which might only serve to arouse international antagonisms and to defeat the very ends which we had in view, in other words that a provocative attitude is not the best one to take in international affairs. May I say that this applies no more to the United States than to any other country. Its application is as true of the relations between individuals as it is between nations, though the consequences of a wrong course of action may be much more serious where it relates to nations in their dealings with each other. The course of conduct that deliberately seeks to aroune prejudice and hatred, whatever other purpose it may be made to serve at the moment, never succeeds in doing good in the long run. Knowing the course which the government was taking, and proposed to take, how far-reaching that course was certain to be, I felt my responsibility all the greater to see that, on the part of those countries which might be affected, not for today only but possibly for years to come, no cause should be given which might enable them to say that their adverse action toward Canada was the result of some offensive attitude on our part, rather than something which was wholly of their own creation.

Work of Tariff Board.

When the Honourable Mr. Dunning came to prepare the budget for presentation to parliament this year, he had before him and was able to present to the Cabinet the fruits of the extensive study made by the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation and its body of experts. Moreover he knew the limits within which the revision of the United States tariff must necessarily be effected, and he knew substantially what the changes were likely to be. He had in addition much in the way of information collected by officers of his own department and by Trade Commissioners and the Commercial Intelligence Service of the Department of Trade and Commerce. With all this material in his possession he was able to place before his colleagues in the Government practically all essential considerations with respect to the changes to be made in the tariff and as a government we were able deliberately so to place those changes as to take full account alike of the interests of producers and consumers and so to shape the probable channels of trade, that it would flow in increasing volume between our own country and countries prepared to trade on terms favourable to us, and, in particular to increase in volume between this nation and the other nations of the British Commonwealth. This is what has now been effected.

The "Stolen Clothes" and "Made in Washington" Cry.

I do not think I need devote any time to exposing the weakness of the "stolen clothes" and "made in Washington" cries. As I have already said, if both are true the Tory party stands self-condemned. The Liberal party has never had occasion to steal political clothes from any party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Tory party. The Liberal party has its own consistent policy, a policy of moderation, a policy which has developed from time to time to meet the changing conditions in the world and in Canada itself. If it had been so ill-advised as to seek Conservative garments, where would it have found them? At the Winnipeg convention, where it will be recalled that the whole Tory party was painfully careful to make sure that the word "protection" appeared in not a line of its platform? Or from the Winnipeg address of Mr. Bennett last week, when protection returned in full and resoudning force, not so much as a political garment, as a political umbrella, or political omnibus. You may have noticed how at Winnipeg Mr. Bennett declared there was to be protection for labour and agriculturists, for producers and consumers, as well as for manufacturers and others. Just how that protection is to be brought about he did not say. He has been studiously vague and indefinite, and he has not mentioned a single specific change that he would propose.

The British Preference

But whatever Mr. Bennett and his followers may say of "stolen clothes" and of "made in Washington" policies, they will scarcely be able to say that either epithet applies to the increases made in the British Preference and which, after all, constitute the central feature of the Budget.

I need not remind the people of Canada that the policy of British Preference is a Liberal policy. Many here present will still recall Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee in 1896. They will recall the Imperial Conference held in London in that year, the very year Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office. They will recall too that next to Queen Victoria herself there was no more impressive or distinguished figure at that great gathering than Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself. When the Parliament of Canada assembled at its next session there was introduced the Laurier-Fielding tariff, the outstanding feature of which was the British Preference. Therefore Canada had had one tariff applicable to all countries, Great Britain and the British self-governing Dominions included.

The tariff of 1897 provided that thereafter goods coming to Canada from the British Isles should be permitted to enter at a rate of duty 25 per cent lower than the duty on goods coming to Canada from other countries. This rate was subsequently increased to 33 1/3 per cent. In some instances the increase has been even greater, and on a vast number of commodities entry has been made free under the British Preference. Whenever there has been a Liberal Government in office, further increases have been made in the British Preference. I think, however, I am right in saying that never once under a Conservative administration has any British Preference or increase of British Preference been given. In the first session the present Administration was in office there were as respects several commodities further increases in the British Preference. To aid in the development of Canadian ports and Canadian trade routes an additional discount of 10 per cent on the existing rate of duty was granted in 1923 to goods entering Canada under the British Preference through Canadian ports. When subsequently an enactment was passed making it conditional in order to entitle goods to the British Preference that they should be entered through Canadian ports, it was discovered that under the 10 per cent discount something like 99 were already coming in that way. The policy of the British Preference and its gradual extension is, therefore, nothing new. It is a Liberal policy. Though it has not been changed under Conservative rule, in no sense can it be said to have been Conservative policy. Indeed, more and more the Conservative Party has taken the position that it is not in favour of the granting of British Preferences, save where they are the outcome of some bargain driven between Canada and the Motherland or between Canada and other parts of the British Empire.

Fundamental differencos between Liberals and Conservatives on nature of trade.

Perhaps I should here say that there appears to be a fundamental difference between the Liberal party and the Conservative under its present leaders as to the nature of trade, and a difference which has existed all along as to the grounds on which preferences should be granted. Both arise, I believe, from an essentially different conception of the nature of trade and its benefits. I doubt if that difference of view can better be expressed than it was in an exchange between the Hon. Dr. Manion and myself in the recent session of parliament. In the course of one of his many speeches, the Doctor enlarged somewhat on his views upon trade. He epitomized what he had to say in the words: "trade is war". I replied that I thought trade was in the nature of exchange. Perhaps I should give you the exact quotation from Hansard's report of proceedings in the House of Commons of March 24th, of this year:

> MR. MANION: Does not the right hon. gentleman think we could have negotiated a treaty with a little more effect if we had kept our weapons until the negotiations were completed.
> MR. MACKENZIE KING: What weapons? This is not a case of war.
> MR. MANION: The right hon. gentleman talked of war the other day. But trade is war so far as that goes.
> MR. MACKENZIE KING: That is the language of my hon friend - trade is war.
> MR. MANION: So it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I always thought trade was exchange.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but we have tariff wars.

Oddly enough, or perhaps I should say, naturally enough, you will notice Mr. Bennett returns to the same theme in his speech at Winnipeg, which was to give to his followers the keynote of the campaign:

> "Tell me where did free trade ever fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make a fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you."

In other words, to the Tory mind it would appear that trade is not something as the result of which each of the parties concerned may gain, but is in the nature of conflict, where as an outcome there must be gain to one and loss to another. So, Mr. Bennett goes on to say that he will have nothing to do with the giving of preferences save where something of a corresponding nature is given in return. He fails to see that people trade only because they wish to, and only because each of the parties concerned has reason to believe that he is benefitting by the exchange. Where a commodity is being bought or sold the buyer or seller believes that what he is getting in exchange is more to his advantage to him than that which is being given in exchange. In other words, both parties stand to gain or there would be no trade. The Liberal Party has consistently taken the view that where it has given a preference it has made possible an increasing measure of trade between the countries concerned.

Blasting a way to Trade

Even more important than tariffs and policies to a country is the spirit which animates the administration of domestic and foreign affairs. What is to be said of the spirit of the Conservative Party as revealed by the utterances of its leader.

Mr. Bennett at Winnipeg asks "When did free trade ever fight for you?" Free trade is not an issue in this campaign and Mr. Bennett knows it. But there is a country which has maintained a free trade policy for almost one hundred years. Does Mr. Bennett suggest that Great Britain is guilty of economic cowardice because it has not followed the high tariff policies of the United States? "We will make our tariffs fight for you," he declared in ringing tones. "We will blast a way to trade." Let me ask you frankly, did you ever hear of any one blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade! There are business men, salesmen and commercial travellers in this audience. Let me ask you this question. Did you ever secure an order by force? Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle of business that trade is secured not by ill-will but by good-will? Not by awakening antagonism, but by developing friendliness and co-operation? To Mr. Bennett all countries are competitors. He forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone.

Through his entire speech one could detect an admiration of the tariff policy of the United States. It was a striking coincidence that on the same page of an Ottawa newspaper which carried a report of his Winnipeg speech there was a despatch from Washington referring to the consternation of business men of that country over the shrinkage in foreign trade which had taken place as a result of the effort of that country to blast their way to trade by shutting out the goods of other countries.

In the first quarter of the present year the foreign trade of the United States decreased by 20 per cent. Only a few days ago motor car manufacturers of the Middle West delcared that they would be obliged to cut production 40 per cent if the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Bill came into operation. If this is the harvest of using the tariff to blast a way to trade, Canada may well pray to be delivered from those priests of high protection who profess to be its friends.

May I ask you to ponder this question both now and until your votes are cast. Should the government of this country be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British Preference excepting on a basis of hard bargaining, and who would destroy the foundations of good-will upon which our tromendous foreign trade is surely founded today?

The Doctrine of Mutual Preferences.

Mr. Bennett and his party insist that we should give absolutely no preference to the Mother Country unless as the result of a bargain, unless in return for an equivalent tariff preference from Great Britain. Is it true that we have received no advantage in Britain's market? It is true that Britain has not, except in a limited measure, established protective tariffs and given us a preferential reduction, but if she has not given us a preference over the foreigner she has given us equality with her own producers. An eminent Canadian recently reminded us that since Confederation Britain has bought from Canada five billions more than Canada has bought from Britain. We have not fared so badly in that great market.

We all wish to preserve and extend the British market. It has been our greatest outlet in the past. Whatever changes may come, it will remain a great and indispensable market. Looking at it as practical men, which is the better way of securing a favourable position in that market, to offer as the Liberal party has done, from the days of Laurier and Fielding to the present, a free-will preference to the Mother Country, or to insist that we will grant no preference whatever and will cancel the existing proference unless Britain reverses its fiscal system for the purpose of granting us a preference? Put yourself in the other's place. Would you prefer to deal with a country which has held out to you the hand of friendship and good will, or with a country which held nothing in its hands but a club? We have not far to go for our answer. Look at the position today. What has been the result of the Dunning budget, a budget which gave the British producer the opportunity for a great expansion of trade in Canada, a trade in large measure diverted from foreign countries without any injury to Canadian industry? The result has been an immediate and warm response from every party and every part of Britain, a deep feeling which will inevitably be reflected in the action of individuals, in the action of parties, in the action of the community, in whatever form their good will may most appropriately find expression. We do not propose to blast our way into the markets of Britain, but we have secured and we will hold the most favourable position any country enjoys today for the expansion of trade in the British Isles.

If Great Britain comes to the point where she is prepared to adopt a policy of protection and is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British Preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present Administration can be trusted to carry forward any proposal for reciprocal trade to a successful conclusion. But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal Party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers but is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The Conservative policy would deny the preference except on a basis unacceptable to Great Britain. It would cut down our imports from Great Britain at a time when Great Britain must sell us an increasing quantity of goods in exchange for our wheat. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country.

In short, whatever fiscal policy may be adopted by Great Britain, Canada, under the guidance of the Liberal policy, and the Liberal policy alone, is in the fortunate position of being able to secure the utmost advantage in the British market.

Advantages of the Liberal attitude in inter-imperial relations.

One of the real advantages of the Liberal method is that it avoids this very feature of bargaining which all too frequently creates difficult situations instead of relieving them. The ready manner in which the Island Colony of Bermuda within less than a month of the time in which our Budget was introduced granted increased preference to Canadian bran, hay, middlings, shorts, wheat flour and fish, is evidence of the kind of response which is likely to be accorded a right, fair and generous attitude. Another great advantage of our method of proceeding is that we avoid altogether interfering in any way with the existing fiscal policies of other parts of the British Empire. The recognition of the fullest autonomy of all the self-governing parts of the British Empire by all the others is of the very essence of the maintenance of the whole structure. There is nothing that we in Canada would more resent than an effort on the part of Britain or any of the other Dominions to compel us to alter our fiscal system as a means of further co-operation in trade or in other matters between themselves and us. Most of all, is this true with respect to Great Britain. It is for the people of Britain to decide for themselves what fiscal policy they wish to maintain. It is for us in our endeavours to further co-operation between the different parts of the Empire, to accept fiscal policies and conditions as we find them. To seek, either directly or indirectly, to alter the fiscal policies of other parts of the Empire, is, I believe, only to invite discord where unity at all times should be the supreme aim. Whether it be a Conservative Government, led by Mr. Stanley Baldwin, as was the case at the last two Imperial Conferences, or a Liberal Government led by Mr. Lloyd George, or a Labour Government led by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the attitude assumed by the Liberal Party towards Britain in the Budget as introduced into and passed by Parliament cannot do other than win for it the best possible means of approach towards further co-operation on the part of Britain. Our policy, while of benefit to ourselves, is also beneficial to Britain, regardless of which political party may be in office or power there, and has, as we well know, been so recognized by all.

Representation of Canada at Imperial and Imperial Economic Conferences.

I come now to the third of the issues, and with what I have to say in this connection, to the conclusion of my address. You are being called upon to decide which party - the Liberal or the Conservative - is to represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences to be held in London this year. To this issue, as I have said, is necessarily related the question of the personnel of the Ministry which is to manage the affairs of Canada during the next Parliament.

Leader of Opposition seeks to avoid the issue

Let me remind the country that the question of Canada's representation at the forthcoming conferences was stated by Mr. Bennett as so all important as to necessitate a mandate from the people. It was so important in fact as to be the one real issue of an electoral campaign. Mr. Bennett made his declaration for a general election on the issue of the forthcoming conferences in his speech on the Address at the opening of the recent session. He said that in his opinion and in that of the Party which he represented so important were the conferences of this year in London that Canada should be represented only by a government which had, in the interval, received a direct mandate from the people. When it came to the debate on the Budget, Mr. Bennett repeated this expression of view, albeit, I confess, with something less in the way of emphasis. Ever since, however, he has been doing his utmost to get away from this issue, to create new issues, to say or to do anything which may help to obscure this all-important question as a real issue of the election, even to the calling of a special session of parliament immediately after the election.

When Mr. Bennett first stated that a mandate from the people should be obtained before any government ventured to represent Canada at the Imperial and Imperial Economic Conferences, there was every reason why the present Administration, in view of its approved record at previous conferences, might well have claimed this right as coming within the natural course of the time allotted to the late parliament, irrespective altogether of any special mandate. So far as the Imperial Conferences are concerned, the country has before it the record of the present Administration in its representation of Canada at the conferences of 1923 and 1926. In the light of the general satisfaction which was felt throughout Canada with respect to Canadian representation in London on these previous occasions, we might well have assumed that the people of the Dominion would be prepared to continue to trust the representation of Canada to those who had previously represented her so well.

We might, had we wished, have taken the position that there was no need for a special mandate, that the Administration was entitled to remain in office until November of next year; that it could be held to account at a subsequent session of parliament for the character of its representation; that that session would necessarily be followed by a general election at which the people, as well as their representatives in parliament, would hold the ministry to account.

A Mandate imperative in view of fiscal policies of Budget

The situation became somewhat different, however, once the Minister of Finance had introduced his budget in the House, and it was apparent that the budget was likely to become a matter of political controversy. The fiscal policies embodied in the Budget had been framed, amonst other things, in the light and in the knowledge of the conferences to be held in London this Fall. Those policies, as I have indicated, were deliberately shaped so as to make possible a wider measure of trade between this country and other portions of the British Empire, Great Britain in particular. The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets, the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was framed with a view to holding for Western Canada the market for her wheat which for so many years she has had in Great Britain and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere. To secure from the people of Canada approval of these policies before the Imperial Conferences take place, is, therefore, in our opinion, an all-important consideration if the Conferences are to do for the further development of our trade what, with all confidence, we believe they will. To have a mandate based upon the policies which are now before the people is, therefore, in our opinion, imperative. It is for this reason that we have not hesitated to dissolve parliament over fourteen months before the time at which dissolution becomes necessary. When we go to the Conference of 1930 we want to go, as we went to the Conferences of 1923, and 1926, with the voice of Canada behind us, and with all the influence and power which comes from the voice of the nation as a whole.

Importance of Liberal Representation at the Imperial Conference

Let me remind the people of our country that there are two conferences at which Canada is to be represented in London, the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference. At each of these conferences will be assembled representatives of the Government of Great Britain and of the Governments of each of the Dominions and India. The Imperial Conference will deal more particularly with constitutional and political problems such as those of inter-imperial relations and foreign affairs. The Imperial Economic Conference will deal more particularly with questions which are primarily economic such as matters of co-operation in inter-empire trade and communication.

The Imperial Conference will give the seal of its approval to the far-reaching changes in constitutional status which have been brought about during the past seven years. In the task of creating a British Commonwealth of Nations on the basis of the national autonomy of its members, Canada, As I have already said, has played a pioneer role. At every step in our progress to the fulness of national stature the Liberal Administration has encountered the opposition of the Conservative Party. It opposed the separate signature of treaties. It opposed the establishment of Canadian Legations abroad. It attempted to throw derision on the profoundly significant declaration of the Imperial Conference of 1926. Each of these events is recognized in Great Britain and throughout the Empire as an essential feature of the great co-operative community which we call the British Commonwealth. The people of Canada must decide which party shall represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial Conference. Shall it be the party which laboured and achieved, or shall it be the party that obstructed and opposed?

Importance of Liberal Representation at the Economic Conference

The Economic Conference will be concerned in the discussion of ways and means of enlarging the field of co-operation within the British Commonwealth. The Liberal Party inaugurated the British Preference and has made it a central feature of the fiscal structure of our country. In the Budget brought down by Mr. Dunning on May 1st a Liberal Government announced the greatest extension of British Preference since 1907. We have declared that it is in this spirit of co-operation that we shall approach the Economic Conference in September. Which Party shall represent Canada at this Conference? Shall it be the Party that established and extended the British Preference and negotiated the Australian Treaty and the West Indies Trade Agreement, or shall it be the Party which has opposed or criticized each of these great policies designed to enlarge the boundaries of Empire trade and co-operation?

The personell of the Ministry.

Ladies and Gentlemen: The representation of Canada at the forthcoming conferences is, as I have said, necessarily bound up with the personnel as well as with the policies of the government which is to administer the affairs of the country during the next parliament. Wore it not that the Leader of the Opposition has gone out of his way to say a great deal about the constructive leadership which Canada requires, and to use the most uncalled-for language in speaking of the present Administration, I might spare him the questions to which I think the people of Canada have the right to demand an answer, namely first, what in the way of constructive leadership has he himself to offer? And second, who are the men who are to comprise the Cabinet which, were he to be returned to power, he would have immediately to form?

Up to the present time, pretty much all that Mr. Bennett has said has been in the nature of platitudes or declamation. He has not put forward a single constructive idea, nor has he indicated a single policy with any clearness or definiteness of aim. In his speach at Winnipeg, he referred to the members of the present Government as: "This group of mercenaries, holding office by shame and subterfuge", and as, "forgetful, in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages". He said: "Look upon them, treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation". And at a meeting at Regina on the following day he spoke of "nine years of wasted effort before the great betrayal" and added "It did not take Judas that long." May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled-for, and adds nothing to his stature in the position of leadership. Already I have heard it strongly resented by men of his own party. A government securely established which voluntarily appeals to a people on a great issue nearly a year and a half in advance of the completion of its term, is not "a group of mercenaries holding office by shame and subterfuge," nor are they persons "forgetful in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages."

Who are to be the Ministers to go abroad?

May I say that I believe it is the general opinion that Canada at no time has had a government composed of abler men, of men more genuinely disinterested or of higher purpose than the men I am proud to have as my colleagues in the present Administration. I believe it is true that no government has ever given a better account of itself both at home and abroad. May I ask Mr. Bennet who, in the Administration that he has in mind, are to take the place of the Ministers in the present Government from the Province of Quebec, from the Province of Ontario, from the Maritime Provinces, and west of the Great Lakes. Who are the gentlemen he has in mind as those who are to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference? I will tell him who of the government will be among the number to represent Canada, if the present Administration is returned: At the Imperial Conference, the present Minister of Justice, Honourable Ernest Lapointe, who represented Canada with such ability and distinction at the Imperial Conference of 1926 and who represented Canada at the Subsidiary Conference on the Operation of Dominion Legislation which met in London last fall, will be one of the representatives. Another of the representatives at the Imperial Conference will be the present Minister of National Defence, Colonel the Honourable J. L. Ralston, who during the present year represented Canada with such credit to himself and to our country at the conference on the Limitation of Naval Armaments. At the Economic Conference Canada will be represented by the present Minister of Finance, Honourable Charles A. Dunning, the author of the Budget of 1930, a budget which has stirred and warmed the heart of the whole British Empire. Another representative will be the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, Honourable James Malcolm, under whose auspices the trade of Canada has expanded as never before to all quarters of the Globe.

I ask Mr. Bennett to tell the Canadian people before the 28th of July who, from the Province of Quebec, he intends, if given the opportunity, to substitute for Mr. Lapointe? Who from the Maritime Provinces he intends to substitute for Colonel Ralston? Who from Ontario he intends to substitute for Mr. Malcolm? And who from the Canadian West he intends to substitue for Mr. Dunning? The Canadian people have a right to know who are to be their representatives at these two great Conferences. The people have a right to know, in addition, who for the next five years, the other members of the government of Canada are likely to be.

"The meeting of the ways".

In the general elections of 1911, when the Liberal Party in Canada, under its great leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appealed to the country on a trade issue in the nature of reciprocity in natural products between Canada and the United States, a measure of greater freedom in trade so far as this continent was concerned and of wider markets for the producers in the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, the forces that were opposed to the tariff changes then proposed, allied under the cry of 'we are at the parting of the ways'. I do not intend to go the length of saying that, having regard to the measure of increased trade assured by the budget of 1930 between Canada and Great Britain, and indeed between Canada and all other parts of the British Empire, we are "at the parting of the ways", or that the rejection of the budget, for such would be the significance of the defeat of the present government at this general election, would mean an end to all endeavour further to promote inter-empire trade. I do, however, say, what in very truth I believe to be the fact, that so far as inter-empire trade is concerned, "we are, at last, at the meeting of the ways" and that the acceptance of this budget by the people on July 28th will do more than all else to ensure for Canada's representatives at the Economic Conference in London that favourable response to our attitude and action which we believe will be given by the Government of Great Britain and by the Governments of all the sister Dominions of the Empire. It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may help to determine whether the highways of Empire are to become, as we hope they may increasingly become, the avenues of a British commerce expanding ever more widely, o'er land and sea, or, whether in so far as the component parts of the Empire are concerned, its highways are to remain indistinguishable from the other trade routes of the world.

Premier King Names Three Outstanding Issues in Appeal to Electors at Brantford Insists Dunning Budget Is Main Election Issue

Lists Record of Government and Mandate for Coming Imperial Conference as Other Important Factors in Opening Campaign in Speech at Brantford.

Special to The Mail and Empire.

Brantford, June 15.—Opening his campaign here to-night, Premier King declared that there were three issues at stake in the coming contest—the record of the Government, the budget and the choice between Liberals or Conservatives as Canada's representatives at the Imperial Conference in September.

The Premier confined his address to discussing the three issues he had outlined. He warmly answered the Conservative charge that the Liberal party in the budget had stolen political clothes belonging to the Conservatives and he took a vigorous rap at the National Policy.

The full text of his speech follows:

Text of Speech.

It is now about a month and a half since I announced in Parliament the intention of the Government to hold a general election this year, and since that time public discussion both in and out of Parliament has centred more or less upon the issues of the campaign now in progress.

On July 28th the people of Canada will be asked to decide the policies and administration which are to guide the destinies of the Dominion during the next five years. It is the privilege, and indeed the duty, of Canadian citizens to examine carefully the views presented by those who seek their confidence, and to record their votes freely and honestly in support of the administration and of the policies which they believe are designed to serve best the interests of our country.

There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign. The first is the record of the Government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the Budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third, is the direct issue of a choice between the Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year. This last issue is necessarily related to the question of the personnel of the Ministry which is to manage the affairs of our country during the ensuing term of Parliament.

It is not easy to say which of the issues is the most important. All are of the greatest importance. They relate to the past, to the present and to the future. Perhaps I had better discuss them in this order.

Government's Record.

Let me deal first of all with the record of the government; not only our record since we were returned to office in September, 1926, but our record from the time we first came into office in December, 1921. Were there no other issue before the people, I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances, we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years. For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history. As a people and as a government we have been far too modest with respect to the achievements of the years we have been in office. We have been so modest, in fact, that the record is but partially known even to the people of our own country. The growth and development of Canada under the present Administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation. It is right that these facts should be known and I propose to make the record of the Administration an open book from one end of the country to the other.

Standing on a record of sound progressive accomplishment we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The "whispers of death", the fear of returning depression, the complaints of an exodus which has ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party whose last tenure of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apparently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days.

On March 31, 1914, the net debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000.

On March 31, 1922, as a result of the war, and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debt had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000. In the last two years of the Conservative administration no less than $174,000,000 had been added to the public debt. In addition not less than $355,000,000 had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years 1919-1922. Depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contracted; agriculture was depressed. Against this dark background, which is still a vivid memory to many of us to-day, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal Administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known.

Legacies of the War.

It is required in good stewards that they be found faithful. Our first task, our primary obligation, was to end these additions to the national debt, the balance of the Budget, and then, if possible, to produce a surplus in the national accounts. We approached the problem from two directions; first, by the curtailment of expenditures, the second, with the raising of increased revenues by the necessary additional taxes. The second of these methods is traditionally unpopular. The previous Administration had avoided it, at a time when the patriotism of the people might well have been counted on to support increased taxation to meet the tremendous cost of the war.

Not only did our predecessors meet the total cost of the war and of demobilization out of borrowed money, money raised by loans, a very considerable part of which were made totally exempt from taxation, but they actually failed to raise during the four years of the war and two years of demobilization sufficient revenues to meet the expenditures of government, apart altogether from the war. I know that this statement has been challenged, but it is nevertheless true. Sir Thomas White has said that we should not include in the expenditures for the six years mentioned those made on capital account and on account of railway subsidies, which amounted in the 6 years to $8,500,000, also what appears in the Public Accounts as "Other Charges", being in fact largely the costs involved in raising loans. The only other possible figures that Sir Thomas might wish to exclude were non-active advances to the then bankrupt railways in fiscal year ending March 31, 1920, aggregating $45,780,000. My reply to this is, that in our expenditures for the eight-and-a-half years we have been in office, we have included all expenditures made on account of capital outlay, all subsidies, or non-active advances to railways, and expenditures incurred in the negotiation of loans. So long as a like method of accounting is carried out with respect to both periods, and so long as what is meant is fully understood by all, no exception can be taken. The fact of the matter is that the capital expenditure which we have made on such large enterprises as the Hudson's Bay railway and the Welland Ship Canal has all been made out of current revenue.

The result was that the present Administration was faced on coming into office, not only with the task of meeting all expenditures in connection with the regular business of government, business which had vastly increased, due to fresh obligations to which the war had given rise, but was also faced with the task of continuing to finance the total cost of war and demobilization. This meant, apart altogether from what might be effected in the way of reducing the public debt meeting an annual interest on war debt, pensions and other war charges of well over $140,000,000, a sum much greater than the total cost of government in Canada at the time Sir Robert Borden came into office.

I might add that of our total expenditures to-day, it is estimated that forty per cent. is immediately attributable to the war, and had there been no war, would not appear in the Public Accounts. The additional provision made for war veterans by this year's legislation will still further increase the percentage due to expenditures arising out of the war.

National Debt Reduced.

Where the previous Administration avoided their responsibilities we met ours courageously and without regard to political consequences. We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national Budget. To have continued the other course would have brought the country into a condition of bankruptcy. Within two years our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our Budget but to give us on the 31st March, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000. From that time forward, we began to pay off annually without intermission, an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous Administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

May I say here that in all the years from Confederation down to the time that we came into office there were only eight years in which there was a surplus, four of which were under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier? In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of sixty-three years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present Administration has held office. The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office. This is a record of accomplishment which is unequalled by any country or any government which participated in the late war from its commencement. But, in addition, we have transferred to non-active assets, in other words written off, sums amounting to over $30,000,000 on account of Soldier Land Settlement Board Loans, seed grain and relief advances, and one or two other accounts. At the rate at which we have been reducing debt during the past four years, the total public debt of Canada would be paid off entirely in the course of the next forty years.

Matter of Expenditures.

Not only has the National Debt been steadily reduced, but expenditures have been kept down to the minimum, consistent with efficient administration. Despite a period of unparalleled prosperity during the past five years, the Government has kept national expenditures within prudent limits, and has thus set an example of thrift and economy for the country at large. If the test of efficient government is to be found in the manner in which public money has been expended, the present Government is prepared to meet such a test with the utmost confidence.

In 1914, when the Conservatives were in office, prior to the war, the total expenditures were $186,000,000. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1930, the estimated expenditures were $377,000,000, or slightly more than double the 1914 figures. Account must be taken however, of the expenditures attributable to the war, and these, as furnished by the Minister of Finance, amounted during the last fiscal year to $159,000,000. In other words, as already mentioned 40 per cent. of the total expenditures of the Government in the last fiscal year were directly attributable to the war. When this amount is deducted from the total, it will be found that the total expenditures of Canada to-day are very little more than in 1914, and this notwithstanding the great increase in the population of the country from 1914 to the present time, and notwithstanding the fact that the value of the dollar to-day is only two-thirds of what it was in 1914.

Not only have we greatly reduced debt, but we have also reduced taxes. With the increasing prosperity of the country as reflected in more buoyant revenues, we decided to relieve the business community of some of the taxes which we had imposed in order to meet the grave situation which confronted us on taking office. Since 1924 our policy of tax reduction has paralleled our policy of paying off a large portion of the public debt. Normally a national debt is paid off by increasing taxes. We have reduced our national debt and at the same time have reduced taxes. Once more let me say that the explanation lies in the remarkable prosperity which has come to Canada under Liberal policies since 1922.

Reductions in Income Tax.

Let me enumerate only some of the reductions that have been made. It would take much too long to give in detail all of the reductions in taxes which have been made. I shall speak first of the Income tax. In 1926 the income tax was reduced from 4 per cent. to 2 per cent. for those whose incomes were $5,000 or less. The Corporation Income Tax was reduced from 10% to 9%. In 1927 there was a further 10% reduction made in the 1926 rates. In 1928 there was an additional 10% reduction made in the 1926 rates, and the Corporation Income Tax was reduced to 8% on incomes in excess of $2,000. All this was in addition to important exemptions which from time to time have been made. In 1922, for example, the exemption for each child was raised from $200 to $300. In 1924 an additional exemption for each child was raised from $300 to $500, in 1926 the exemption limit was raised from $2,000 to $3,000, in the case of married persons or persons with dependents; and $1,000 to $1,500 in the case of other persons. This year the Government has exempted Government or other like annuities to the extent of $5,000. An exemption of $500 each (the same as for dependent children) has been granted for parents, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters who are not capable of self-support, owing to mental or physical infirmity. Finally, also, under the legislation of this year, donations to any Church, University, College, School, Hospital, or Charitable Organization in Canada are to be treated as reductions on income, up to a maximum of 10% of the tax-payer's income.

The Sales Tax.

Let me speak next of the Sales Tax. In 1923 the Sales Tax was fixed at a flat 6%. This, it is true, was higher than the rate as imposed by our predecessors, but the raise was necessary for purposes of revenue. A considerable number of commodities were, however, subsequently removed from its operation, or rates on them were considerably reduced, and the tax was no longer pyramided as was formerly the case. In 1924 this flat rate was reduced to 5%. In 1927 the rate was reduced to 4 per cent. In 1928 it was reduced to 3 per cent. In 1929 it was reduced to 2 per cent, and this year, as promised it would be in the course of the public addresses which I delivered last Fall, it was reduced to 1 per cent. With this gradual elimination of the Sales Tax, I need not ask you, Ladies and Gentlemen, what will happen to that 1 per cent. if the present Administration is returned to office.

Abolition of Nuisance Taxes.

I need not stop to speak of another class of taxes frequently known as "nuisance taxes" most of which not so generally applicable, perhaps, but nevertheless far-reaching, were initiated by the previous Administration. Taxes on cheques, taxes on receipts, taxes on railway and steamship tickets, on insurance premiums and taxes on telegrams and cablegrams, all of these except a flat rate of 2 cents on cheques above $10 have been abolished.

These taxes, as I have said, were less general in their application than others I have mentioned. I now come to a further reduction which has affected all classes in the Dominion. I mean the reduction in the rate of postage. In 1926 letter postage in Canada was reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents, and in 1928 penny postage was re-established from Canada to other parts of the British Empire.

Remission of Taxation Exceeds $118,000,000 in Five Years.

Leaving out of account the degree to which the postal revenues may have been affected by these reductions, it is estimated there has been saved to the Canadian taxpayer, of taxation which would otherwise have been collected, the following sums:—

For the year

1927	27,000,000
1928	19,000,000
1929	25,000,000
1930	22,000,000

The $22,000,000 for 1930, the estimated remission solely on account of sales tax, takes no account of what has been remitted in the further exemptions on income tax account as provided for in this year's budget.

Thus in five years there has been an estimated remission of taxation which would otherwise have been collected solely from the sources indicated, of an amount exceeding $118,000,000. The remissions indicated have been cumulative. Assuming conditions similar to those of the last five years, from now on the amount of taxation imposed each year will be $118,000,000 less per annum than it was prior to 1926. May I add that all this takes no account of the further remissions of taxation affected by the reductions of duties under the several revisions of the tariff which have taken place since we came into office, and which as the country well knows have been substantial.

I have dealt at some length with the financial record and policies of the administration, inasmuch as other policies of the Government are so largely bound up with and dependent upon the financial position. May I say at once that the success which has attended the Government's policies in other spheres of national activity is the more remarkable when our record on debt and tax reduction is kept in mind.

Time does not permit me to more than mention outstanding features of other of the Government's policies. I shall attempt the merest outline leaving it to subsequent meetings and to other speakers to deal with these matters more in detail.

Railway Policy.

First of all, let me say a word on transportation. When we came into office, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the railways of Canada in a completely disorganized and bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in the hands of a receiver. The Grand Trunk Railway system had been acquired under arbitration, but it, too, was bankrupt, and the Government which took over the road had studiously refrained from giving so much as an indication as to whether or not it was to be operated as a Government owned system or whether the intention, in its acquisition, was to have the road subsequently re-transferred to private ownership.

I notice that Mr. Bennett is saying that the records of parliament show that the Liberal party, when in opposition, opposed the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway as a Government owned system. The Liberal party did nothing of the kind. What we did object to was the refusal of the Government of the day to submit to parliament for approval the terms and conditions of the contract under which the system was to be acquired. We contended that, as the people were being made responsible for the purchase of the system, by terms arranged by agreement, the people's representatives in parliament were entitled to know what those terms were and to approve of them, before final acquisition of the system was made. This, however, the Government of the day refused to allow, though at a subsequent session of parliament, having failed to include some essential features of the transaction in the agreement, they were obliged to submit the whole measure to parliament, and, in order to permit of the additional terms being inserted, to secure its approval which they were, of course, able to do in virtue of their majority.

A year or two before the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway, the Government of the day had acquired the Canadian Northern Railway, for the common stock of which some $10,000,000 were paid, though it was stated by the Government's own commission, of which Sir Henry Drayton was a member, that the stock was worthless.

We found the Canadian Northern system thus acquired operating under one management, the Grand Trunk Railway under another management, the Intercolonial Railway under the management of a department of the Government and Grand Trunk Pacific in the hands of a receiver. It was the present Liberal Administration which effected the necessary consolidation, and brought these roads into a unified national system. It was the present administration which made the necessary provision for the president and the board of directors of the system, and it was the present administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as president and chairman of the board.

It was the present administration that laid down the policy that there should be no political interference with the management or operation of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton has publicly testified, on more occasions than one, that the Government has lived up to this policy, alike in letter and in spirit. It was the present administration which laid down as a further policy of railway management and operation in this country that Government ownership was to be given a fair trial, and that, as between the Government owned National Railways and the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway, there should be neither fear nor favor in the respective treatment to be accorded these roads. I venture to say that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his board of directors will be the first to say that, in the fulfilment of this policy, the Government has sought to be scrupulously fair.

Reductions in Railway Rates.

How the Canadian National Railways have been brought to the present position as a Government-owned railway system, unequalled in any part of the world, is a story too long to narrate, but one, fortunately, with which every Canadian household is more or less familiar. What is not so generally known is that, while operating deficits have been changed into operating revenues—just as national deficits have been changed into national surpluses—this has been accompanied by far-reaching reductions in railway rates in all parts of Canada, affecting especially the western provinces and the maritimes — reductions which have been made applicable to both great railway systems.

Perhaps I should not be too severe on our opponents for seeking to-day to claim paternity of the Canadian National Railways. Their action in this regard is more or less characteristic of human nature. When the Tory party, as we came into office, left this neglected and famished foundling on our doorstep, suffering from many forms of malnutrition, there was not one member of the whole party who was prepared to allow his name to have any association with it, but now that the infant has been revived and has grown into vigorous and powerful proportions, resembling those of Sir Henry Thornton himself, not a few of them wish to give it their name. They say that on no account will they part with it, and Mr. Bennett heroically says that he will sacrifice an office which he does not hold rather than see it pass out of the hands of the State.

But organization of the Canadian National Railways has not been our only achievement in the realm of transportation. We have brought the Hudson's Bay Railway to completion, though the rails on a part of this road had been taken up by our opponents while in office, and the partially constructed roadbed allowed to fall into disrepair and decay. We have acquired, and, by making them a part of the Canadian National system, have revitalized not a few of the smaller privately owned railways in different parts of the Dominion; and we have, on more than one occasion, made provision through parliament for extensive branch line construction in other parts of the country. We have completed the Welland Canal, and we have effected other developments with respect to the St. Lawrence waterways, on which I shall have opportunity to say something on another occasion. I wish that time permitted me to say something of the developments in aviation, which the Government has steadily sought to initiate and advance. This development has been encouraged through the widespread use of airplanes in surveys and forest protection work, through the development of air mail routes, and through the construction of the St. Hubert Airdrome, at which we expect shortly to welcome the R100. In this as in every field of national activity the Government has sought to further and will continue to further Canadian enterprise and achievement.

Immigration Policy.

May I now say a word with respect to immigration? You have heard a great deal about our boys and girls leaving for the United States. You have heard a great deal about foreign immigration being encouraged to the relative disadvantage of immigration from the British Isles. During part of the time you have been told that we were not bringing in a sufficient number of immigrants; at another time the complaint has been that the number was excessive. The policy of the Conservative party, as outlined by General McRae, was that of a huge colonization and land settlement scheme involving an expenditure of some $300,000,000 and the bringing in of 300,000 fresh immigrants. Perhaps Mr. Bennett will tell the west how this policy which he supported would have helped to lessen the present unemployment of which he has had much to say during the present campaign.

Facts About the Exodus.

Now, what are the facts with respect to our management of the immigration problem? It is quite true that, during the years immediately following our coming into office the trend of migration continued to be from Canada to the States. The reasons for that were very obvious. The United States had prospered while we had suffered through the war. During the period of re-establishment of our citizen-soldiery in Canada preferences in the matter of employment were being given where possible to those who had served overseas. There were not the opportunities for employment here that there were in the country to the south for many of our boys and girls, not a few of them and of our grown-ups as well left on that account. Moreover, the springs of immigration had, during the war, and the period immediately following the war, been permitted to dry up at the source. It takes time for a movement of immigration to get under way, whatever its direction may be. People had not the wherewithal to migrate in numbers from the British Isles or from other countries after the war, that they had had before, and Canada had not the free homesteads to offer, nor was she able to advertise these or to give the low ocean and railway rates which were so important an inducement to British immigration in former years. It was not very long, however, before the fruits of our effort became apparent. Little by little the migration of Canadians to the United States began to lessen. In increasing numbers Canadians began to return from the United States to Canada, until to-day while conditions of employment in Canada may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States or for that matter in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals to-day the migration from Canada to the United States. These are the facts, and, far from affording grounds of criticism, they are in the nature of a real achievement.

With regard to the allegation that the Government was preferring foreign to British immigration, it did not take very long to establish the facts. When, in 1928, the Leader of the Opposition hinted in parliament that an inquiry might be desirable, I told him that an inquiry could not take place too soon, and a committee of the House of Commons was forthwith appointed, on which all parties were represented. The findings of the parliamentary committee were to the effect that, while Canada was spending 11 cents per capita on continental immigrants she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on immigrants from the British Isles. Reference to the statistics of the British Empire shows that of citizens of the British Isles emigrating of recent years to other Dominions and other parts of the world, Canada has been receiving by a very long way the largest proportion.

Co-operation With Provinces.

The most recent development in our immigration policy has been to link more closely the governments of the provinces and our own Government, in the determination of the classes and numbers of immigrants to be brought to Canada. With the return to the western provinces of their natural resources, we have felt that more in the way of provincial control of immigration was desirable, more particularly as the provinces themselves are the first to feel any adverse effects of an inadequate or an excessive immigration.

Oriental Immigration.

I should not leave the subject of immigration without reminding you that, as respects Oriental immigration, which in our own as in other countries constitutes a most perplexing problem, we have in our term of office, without offence to the Orient, brought about complete exclusion of immigration from China, and, by diplomatic arrangement, a restriction of immigration from Japan so effective as to relieve both countries of further embarrassment on that score.

Let me now come to the basic industries of our country, agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, on the development of which our transportation and immigration policies, as well as most other policies of the Government have had so important a bearing. I need not remind you that we have regarded the development of these great basic industries as fundamental in our national progress. We have recognized from the start that our manufacturing industries and our trade, both domestic and foreign, were dependent more than on aught else upon the utilization of our great natural resources.

Tariff Policies.

We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries. We have recognized that, if our manufacturing and trade were to expand that world markets as well as home markets were an essential, and we have recognized, further, that what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent in no inconsiderable measure upon the costs of production and the cost of living in our own land. So, we have striven in our tariff revisions, consistently, to take those steps which, without injury to any ligitimate business in the country, would at the same time tend to make possible more in the way of production in our basic industries, through reduction of duties on the instruments of production required in those industries, and on the necessaries of life of those employed therein and in the manufactures and other businesses of our country.

I have not time to go into the revisions of the tariff affected by the present Administration since it took office in 1921. You recall the reductions made in our first year of office on some of the instruments of production, on boots and shoes, on sugar and textiles, the increase in the British preference on some commodities and in the following year the 10% additional discount in the preference rate made where goods were brought in through Canadian ports. I need not remind you of the budget of 1924 with its far-reaching reductions in duties on the instruments of production, nor of the budget of 1926, with its reductions on motor cars, motor trucks and other motor vehicles. There was enough of commotion at the time to cause you to remember how considerable the reductions in duties were alleged to be; enough also to remember what was said on behalf of the Government at the time, that the lessened cost of production and the larger sales through lowered prices would more than ensure to those industries wider markets for their products than they had had before. Such indeed, as everyone knows, was proven to be the case. Nor need I remind you of reductions made a year ago; nor of the extensive increases in the British preference made in the budget of the present year, with its complete removal of all duties on tea, on porcelain and china household utensils and many other commodities affecting the homes of the people throughout the land. To the extent to which producers and consumers have benefitted by these changes in the tariff which have lessened the cost of production and lessened the cost of living, not only have we materially benefitted the great industries of agriculture, lumber, mining and fishing, but we have also benefitted the manufacturing industries and extensively furthered Canada's trade, both at home and abroad.

Manufactures and Trade.

The confidence which the people of Canada have given to the present Administration has enabled us to serve and to further the interests of this country until to-day Canada stands as the sixth on the list of the great trading countries of the world. You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials; that we are parting with our birthright. Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of raw materials which Canada imports from the United States for her manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceed in value the total value of the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that the per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain.

Let me add that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29. In other words there has been a doubling of our total domestic export trade in a period of seven years. This spectacular increase of trade is no mere chance. It is the result of wise policies effectively administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Attitude Towards Labor.

I shall have, I fear, to reserve for another time what I would like to have told you to-night of our policies with respect to labor and with respect to war veterans. May I just remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country. May I remind you that it was a Liberal administration which created the Canadian Department of Labor, which introduced its "Fair Wages" policy, and which this year has given statutory effect to the payment of Fair Wages and to an eight-hour day on all public works carried out under contract for the Dominion Government, and with respect to all labor in the Government's own employ. May I remind you that the Industrial Disputes Act and the Combines Investigation Act are both Liberal measures; that it was a Liberal administration which restored to the employes of the Grand Trunk Railway System, or to the families of those who had died in the interval, payments due on pension account of which they had been arbitrarily deprived some twelve years before. That it was a Liberal Administration that gave to Labor a place on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway system, and which placed upon the statutes of this country the Old Age Pension Act, under the provisions of which a large measure of comfort and independence in their old age has been assured to some 50,000 of the aged people of our Dominion.

The success which has attended our efforts to see that the provision made by the State for our war veterans and their dependents was both fair and generous, is, I think, well known. It is, I believe, absolutely true that Canada's war pension legislation is the most advanced in the world and that no other nation has made provision for its ex-service men and their dependents on a scale of such open-handed justice as this country. The War Veterans' Allowances Act, the revised machinery for dealing with pension claims, the decision to give to men who have served overseas the benefit of the doubt as to the cause of disability where application is made for pension; these and other measures, while supported by members of all parties in the House of Commons, are nevertheless a part of the record of Liberal policy and achievement, and may I say, a part of the record to which I have felt it a privilege to give a special measure of personal attention and a part of the record of which I feel particularly proud.

National Conciliation.

If, however, there is one other portion of the record to which I have given much in the way of personal attention, and which has involved much in the way of time and effort, it is the policies of the Government in its relations with other governments, both within and without Canada.

For thirty years in Canada Governments of the day have been wrestling with the problem of the return to the Western Provinces of their natural resources. It remained for the present government to solve that great problem. For an almost equal length of time, the Province of British Columbia has been seeking to have restored to it lands in what is known as the "railway belt" and the "Peace River block" which passed out of its possession at the time that Province came into confederation. It remained for the present Administration to restore these lands. Ever since their entry into confederation, the Maritime Provinces have felt that they have not had a square deal. Here and there, in patchwork fashion, some adjustments have been made in dealing with particular grievances as they arose. It remained for the present Administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesmanlike fashion. This we have done with respect to their transportation problems; with respect to the problems of their industries; with respect to their subsidies; with respect to their harbor and trade facilities, and to all other matters having a bearing upon the economic welfare of the Maritimes as an integral part of our Dominion.

In the case of all, a like method was followed. Matters were not lef to vain disputation, or to political pressure; they were investigated; they were made the subject, in the first instance, of impartial fact-finding inquiries conducted in each case under Royal Commission, the personnel of which in every instance commanded the confidence of all parties concerned. In the case of the four Western Provinces, the agreements were not only submitted to our Parliament for approval, but received the approval of their respective legislatures as well, and may I add, so fairly were they drawn and so completely did they accord with what in the case of the provinces as well as of the Dominion was believed to be the equity and justice of the situation, that in the provinces themselves and in both Houses of our Parliament, they passed without a single division?

I have not time to go into the provisions of these several agreements, but I do not hesitate to say that an examination of their provisions reveal a generosity in the manner of the treatment of those provinces such as has never characterized similar negotiations in the history of our Dominion. And here may I point out that something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the Premier of this province and his government in this general election, namely that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present Administration at Ottawa. It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative governments, our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or illwill.

By our action in these particulars we have made over and strengthened the superstructure of Confederation. We have, at the same time, in the increased financial provisions which we have made for those provinces, reinforced its foundations. I say without fear of contradiction, that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several provinces and the Federal Government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

Inter-Empire Relations.

But if we have improved relations within the Dominion between the governments of the provinces and the Federal government, if we have removed sectional antagonisms and helped to develop a truly national spirit, what may not also be said of our achievements in inter-imperial and international relations? Here I come to the work of the Imperial Conference and the Economic Conference of 1923; the work of the Imperial Conference of 1926, the work of the subsidiary conference on the operation of Dominion legislation, which concluded its sittings in London last Autumn. Out of these conferences has come, for the first time in the history of the relations of Great Britain and the Dominions, a statement of their relative positions, which has removed from the realm of possible controversy all further talk of colonial subordination, and which has accorded to Canada and to the other self-governing Dominions a national status equal to that of Great Britain herself. With this clear recognition of nationhood there has come a corresponding development in free and effective co-operation, not only with the Mother Country but with the sister nations of the Commonwealth.

May I remind my fellow-countrymen that within the period of office of the present Administration, Canada has welcomed, for the first time in her history, the leaders of all the political parties in Britain, two of them in the office of Prime Minister? They have all borne witness to the cordiality of the relations which exist between the Government at Ottawa, and the Government at Westminster. I may add that within our term of office we have also welcomed to this Dominion Prime Ministers or ex-Prime Ministers from each of the other self-governing Dominions; from Australia, from New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State and from Newfoundland.

Let me invite you to look beyond the Empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds to-day? Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking, there has been the sudden steep ascent of war in which there were common heroisms and common sacrifices, and there has been the long, gradual, constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer.

Responsible Government.

Responsible self-government, not in internal affairs alone but also in external affairs as well is the corner-stone of our Empire as it exists to-day. The struggle for responsible self-government in internal affairs so far as the Dominions are concerned began in this country. It was worked out successfully here. Canada blazed the trail which the others have followed. To win a like measure of self-government with respect to the country's external affairs has been one of the supreme achievements of the present Administration. In our progress towards that achievement we have been opposed by the Conservative party every step of the way.

When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties, we were told that we were seeking separation because, forsooth, we asked His Majesty, in regard to an international negotiation on a matter of Canadian concern, to give full powers to a Canadian minister of the Crown instead of to the British ambassador at Washington. When a little later we opened a legation at Washington and subsequently at Paris and Tokio, we were again told that we were pursuing the path of separation. Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about "Canada First." Just what does his "Canada First" mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the establishment of Canadian legations in other lands and on Canada's status of co-equality with the Motherland. I am not sure where he stands to-day, but I know where he stood in the session of Parliament just closed.

Ladies and Gentlemen: In this brief summary of the Government's record, I have not had opportunity to make so much as mention of the position Canada has taken within the past few years at international conferences and at the League of Nations, a position not merely of helpful co-operation, but of leadership as well. Not only has Canada had a place on the council of the League of Nations and played an important role at its assemblies, but a member of the present Government has held the high office of president of the assembly of the league. We were one of the first countries of the world to signify our approval of the Briand-

Kellogg Pact and were among its original signatories in Paris. We were the first of the British countries to urge the acceptance of the optional clause for the settlement of international disputes by arbitration. We were represented with distinction in London at the recent conference on the Limitation of Naval Armaments. In Washington, Paris and Tokio our representation abroad has won for our country added and worthy recognition alike in America, Europe and the Orient.

Neither have I had time to make mention of many reforms which are of national and international significance. I might have referred to the policy for which we secured the approval of Parliament of requiring submission to Parliament of all treaties likely to involve this country in foreign wars, and approval in advance of any commitment involving Canada's participation in war; of our efforts to suppress rum-running and smuggling and to prevent the use or co-operation of Government agencies in the violation of the laws of another country. I might also have spoken of the reform of our electoral laws and of the representation given to women in the Senate of Canada. These are but a few of many other measures of the significance of which I should have been glad to say a word had time permitted. They all constitute an important part of the record of the present Administration.

Budget of 1930.

I come now to the second great issue of the campaign, namely, the budget introduced into Parliament by the Minister of Finance of the first of May and the important questions of fiscal and trade policy which it embodies. Here, first of all may I emphasize a certain point of view from which all policies and in particular issues such as those arising out of the budget ought to be approached and considered.

Political philosophers of ancient times very wisely made a distinction between laws and constitutions which were ideally the best and those which were the best as applied to particular circumstances of time and place. In other words, it is the privilege of philosophers to propose abstract laws for the mythical inhabitants of an Utopian state. It is the business of government to deal with the realities of a given situation.

Keeping this central fact in mind, it should be pointed out in the second place that the economic situation of a country is not static but dynamic. It changes from year to year and from decade to decade.

"The world advances, and in time outgrows
The laws that in our fathers' time seemed best."

Since the beginning of the present century we have witnessed a transformation of the Dominion which has called not only for a new outlook on world affairs, but for new economic policies to meet the requirements of a nation which resembles in few respects the Canada which adopted the National Policy of 1878. The appeal to past conditions and policies is a legitimate course of procedure for the leader of a Conservative party. We are being told that the old National Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald days is what Canada needs most to-day, that it is the remedy for all ills, the one guarantee of progress. Let us pause for a moment and examine this appeal.

The National Policy, so-called, had its birth in 1878; this is the year 1930. In other words what Canada needs to-day, according to the leader of the Opposition, is even more in the way of protection than what she needed fifty years ago for the infant and struggling industries of that day. That does not say much for the growth and progress of Canada in the last half century.

Fifty years ago Canada consisted of the two old provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and what are to-day known as the Maritime Provinces. The provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia were also in Confederation but were still largely isolated. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were unknown. The agencies of transportation and communication within the country were wholly inadequate, and, altogether negligible as a factor in world commerce. Canadians were still colonial-minded, though many there were who had aspirations of nationhood. A policy designed to bring the trade of these provinces into closer touch with each other, to make the rural and the urban areas more and more interdependent had much to commend it, much that could be supported by those who were desirous of making the national appeal. But is that the Canada we know to-day? We have ceased to be a Dominion of scattered provinces. We are a compact nation. There is no break in the chain from coast to coast. Our agencies of transportation and communication are world agencies. We have ceased to be colonials, and are proud of possessing an Empire citizenship; of being citizens of a nation in the British Commonwealth of Nations, a nation also in the League of Nations. The country year by year is being more closely knit together in all its parts, and in the interdependence of its varied interests, and more and more these interests are becoming a part of the wider interests of the world at large.

Attacks National Policy

But is it true that the so-called national policy is a cure for all our industrial ills. The worst period of depression Canada has ever known was in the years prior to the general election of 1896, when those who had helped to create the national policy, and to administer it, were in control of the affairs of the country. As a matter of fact, it was not until the Liberal administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office and the Laurier-Fielding tariff modified in a considerable measure the existing tariff structure of the day, and that Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced the system of British preference, and trade treaties with other countries which served further to modify the old tariff structure, that in any true sense of the word Canada began to prosper as a nation.

But let me not go back to the period of a former Liberal administration. Let me come to the years which immediately preceded those of the present administration. At that time the advocates of the old national policy were again in control. Did the tariff as they then found it and left it save this country from another period of depression? Did we not find when we came into office unparalleled depression, out of which it remained for Liberal policies to bring the country?

When we increased the British preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reduced duties on the implements of production, when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the national policy and that we would ruin the country.

I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedom of trade is the more deserving of being called a national policy as we approach the third decade of the twentieth century. A national policy to-day in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world. It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets. It is essentially a policy of world markets.

For a United Canada.

With the rapid development of Western Canada and the emergence of a great agricultural population engaged in the production of a commodity which must seek its markets throughout the world, high protection, or an all-round increase in the tariff can no longer be called a national policy. According to figures given in the Canada Year Book of 1929, over 80 per cent. of Canadian manufacturing is concentrated in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This percentage is based on figures of production, capital employed, and number of employes. While it is true that manufacturing has developed to a considerable extent in Western Canada, these manufactures are based largely upon the primary industries of agriculture and mining and do not require a tariff protection to any considerable extent. It is, therefore, true to say that a general increase in the tariff in 1930 is essentially a sectional policy so far as the distribution of its benefits is concerned. It has forfeited every right to the name—national policy—given to it by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878, and by Mr. Bennett in 1930.

But if high protection is a sectional policy in the distribution of its benefits, it is equally true that having regard to the present industrial development of Central Canada a free trade policy would be detrimental in its immediate effects to one section of the Dominion, even though it conferred benefits on those of our citizens who are obliged to seek markets abroad for their agricultural produce and who derive little or no advantage from a protective tariff.

It is apparent, therefore, that both a high tariff and free trade are sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada. What then is the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interests arising out of the tariff is the same as it is with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions. To the greatest possible extent sectional interests must be reconciled in the light of the larger interests of the whole. This can be effected only by moderation and compromise. Face the facts of our situation. Take Canada as it is, with its changing needs and its conflicting interests. Acknowledge the facts of geography and of divergent industrial development in east and centre and west. And having examined the realities of the situation, and having considered the demands of different sections for policies suited to their needs, so mould our social transportation and fiscal policies as to hold the scales evenly between class and creed and section, thus welding a far-flung country into a united Canadian nation.

Policy of Reconciliation.

Such a policy and such an attitude are not new to the Liberal party. It was the ever present motive of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in his efforts to heal the discord of race and creed. It was the motive of the Rt. Hon. Mr Fielding in his long series of budgets, beginning in 1897. I find it expressed in one of his last speeches in the House of Commons on June 12, 1922:

"All political matters are essentially matters of compromise, in some degree and so long as the compromise is not one of principle, there is no reason why men should not compromise, because it is only by a policy of that nature that governments can ever be carried on. We are apt each of us in our own part of the country to look at things from a sectional point of view and that is unavoidable. . . . As we meet together in the contact of mind and mind we discover that we are able to take broader views."

This then is the issue presented by the Liberal patry. The budget of 1930, the legislation implementing the recommendations of the Commission on Maritime Claims, the transfer of the natural resources to Western Canada, the return of the railway lands and Peace River block to British Columbia, the Hudson Bay Railway, the West Indies treaty for the eastern provinces, and the Australian treaty for British Columbia, each and all of these represent an attempt to meet the realities of the political and economic situation which confronts Canada to-day. Time does not permit a discussion of each policy in its relation to the interests of a particular section of our country. I shall content myself with setting out briefly the essential features of the budget which was announced by Mr. Dunning in the House of Commons on May 1st, and which will doubtless be the outstanding issue of the present campaign.

The budget of 1930 was framed first of all to meet a situation in Canada arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes for policies suited to their needs. But because of the place which Canada has come to occupy in international trade, it was influenced also and in a special degree by our relation with two countries with which we are most closely associated in matters of commerce. The one is Great Britain. The other is the United States.

U.S. Tariff Revision.

When Mr. Hoover assumed office as President of the United States on March 11, 1929, the United States Congress began carrying out a far-reaching revision of the tariff in conformity with the pledges given by the Republican party during the presidential campaign of the previous year. As that revision proceeded, it became increasingly apparent that the duties against Canadian agricultural products would be raised to such an extent as to cut off a considerable proportion of the existing Canadian exports to that country. In these circumstances, and in accordance with its policy of using every endeavor to find wider markets for Canadian products, the Government gave instructions to the Tariff Advisory Board to make a careful survey of the tariff schedules then applying against American imports, with a view to determining to what extent these imports could be purchased from Great Britain or from other parts of the British Empire.

While this enquiry was proceeding, it was decided that an Imperial economic conference would be held in London in September of 1930, to consider the subject of closer co-operation in matters of trade between the various parts of the Empire and to discuss the various policies which would contribute towards that end. Efforts had previously been made by the present administration to have this conference held in Canada. Subsequently, a condition developed in Great Britain which led to a marked curtailment of purchases of Canadian wheat and resulted in a serious tie-up of our wheat in elevators, with consequent loss not only to Canadian growers, but to our transportation systems, and to many branches of our industry and commerce. Prior to this development, Great Britain had purchased far more from Canada, largely because of our wheat exports, than Canada had purchased from Great Britain. It became apparent that if Canada was to maintain a British market for Canadian wheat, it was desirable that measures should be taken by diverting to Great Britain, many of the purchases being made at present in the United States and in other ways, to increase British imports to Canada and thus create an economic and psychological condition in Great Britain more favorable to the importation of Canadian wheat. These circumstances must be kept clearly in mind when examining the proposals in the budget presented to the House of Commons on May 1.

Proposals of the Budget.

The budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present Government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four main proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1—The iron and steel tariff revision.
2—Countervailing duties.
3—The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4—Extension of the British preference.

The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the Tariff Advisory Board which have been conducted over a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an inquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great basic industries. The purpose kept in mind by the Government in prosecuting this inquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain. This, in turn, was in conformity with the announced intention of the Government to facilitate trade with those countries which are willing to trade with Canada on equal terms.

Countervailing Duties.

The next feature of the budget, namely, the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us. For the present we raise the duties on these selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by other countries, but at the same time, we tell our neighbor frankly and sincerely, that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis. On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be one-sided.

In revising the Customs tariff on fruits and vegetables, the Government has had before it the evidence presented to the Tariff Advisory Board on several occasions by those who were primarily interested in this important branch of our agricultural production. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and vegetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of other countries. It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers. We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates, which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules. In this manner we have endeavored to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which these specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of the consumers of these commodities. In past years, moreover, a large proportion of our early fruits and vegetables has been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business. Under the existing trade agreement these Islands have assured us of a preference in their market. In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruit and vegetables under the British preference. Already we have seen what the response of other parts of the British Empire is likely to be to this attitude and policy. Bermuda has given to us since our budget was introduced additional preference or free entry on some of our agricultural manufactured products, and this very week there is assembling at Trinidad representatives of all the British West Indies for the purpose of considering closer trade relations with our country.

British Preference.

This brings me to the last feature of the budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British Crown, which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic cooperation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries to-day do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them to-day. They have said that we must have preference for preference, and that no favors should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forgo the policy of free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the Government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on a basis of reciprocal preference. But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain the Liberal party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers and to inter-imperial trade with its beneficial effects to the British Empire as a whole, but a policy which is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country, in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country. In the far-reaching extension of the British preference under the budget of 1930, this has been our purpose and our objective. We have studied the situation with the utmost care, and have revised the tariff schedules with the definite aim of diverting a considerable portion of trade from the United States and other countries to Great Britain. We firmly believe that this policy will receive the wholehearted approval of the Canadian people.

Opposition Criticism.

Against the fiscal and trade policies of the budget what are the criticisms of the Conservative party as enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition? They may be summed up in a very few words. The first is that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objective, if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have "stolen the clothes" of the Conservative party. If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that party. The third is that our policy is a Washington made policy. If that is true, which it is not, what becames of the argument that we have stolen the clothes of our opponents? Finally, we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences there should be no trade, even with the Mother Country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference. In the Reciprocity campaign of 1911, the cry of the Tory party was "No truck nor trade with the Yankees." This year it has come dangerously near being "No truck nor trade with Britain."

Let me examine their criticism a little more in detail, and first of all the allegation that the budget was conceived in haste, and that it is an invention for the purposes of a general election.

In his address at Winnipeg, sounding the keynote of the Conservative campaign, Mr. Bennett characterized the tariff changes of the budget as "this premature, unreasoned action." Elsewhere in the same speech he referred to the budget proposals as a movement "hysterically inspired by party exigencies." Far from being "premature" or "unreasoned" or "hysterically inspired," I venture to say there never was presented to any parliament a budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well.

Advisory Board on Tariff.

This is perhaps the most appropriate place for me to recall to your mind an all-important and far-reaching reform, inaugurated by the present administration, in the method of dealing with revisions of the tariff. Prior to the time we came into office, the tariff changes proposed in the budgets of finance ministers were in no inconsiderable part the outcome of decisions taken solely by the government of the day, unaided by any expert advice or opinion. Sometimes they were taken after hearings conducted by ministers themselves, but not infrequently they were the outcome of the pressure of special interests. Too often they were made without that degree of careful examination into the probable effects of the changes proposed which was obviously in the public interest.

The result was that, not infrequently, the changes made in the tariff did not produce the results it was hoped they might; in fact, they produced, on occasions, results quite the opposite to those which had been anticipated. The present government, while recognizing that the tariff is a matter with which parliament in the last analysis must deal, and over which parliament at all times should exercise supreme control, nevertheless felt that it was in the interests alike of the ministry and of parliament that some agency should be established which would be in a position carefully to weigh and examine in advance the probable effects of all contemplated changes and be in a position to advise the ministry and parliament with respect thereto. Accordingly, in 1926, the government, having obtained provision for the same from parliament, established what is known as an Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation. It gave to the Board the most ample powers to investigate any and every tariff proposal or phase of tariff policy which might be referred to it, for consideration, by the Ministry. The Board, in other words, was constituted as a fact-finding body to deal with such questions as might be referred to it for scientific investigation. Its personnel was composed of individuals possessing special qualifications for the class of work with which the Board was expected to deal, and representative alike of the interests of producers and consumers, of industrialists and agriculturists. It was given power to employ experts and to examine witnesses under oath; to hold its investigations in public or in private. Very wisely the Board has decided that its hearings should be held in public. More than that, the government decided that such of the evidence as was taken before the Board as it might be thought it would be in the public interest to have made available at all times, should be printed at the public expense. To the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, there was assigned by the present government the broad task of reviewing the tariff schedules generally, with a view to their systematization, and the removal of anomalies, and also the special task of investigating the particular matters which, from time to time, might be referred to it for special enquiry.

Tribute to W. H. Moore.

The Government was particularly fortunate in securing as chairman of the Board, the services of W. H. Moore, a trained economist, a man of wide experience in knowledge of financial and industrial problems, and a man of judicial mind and temperament. Recognizing the confidence which Mr. Moore's impartial conduct of the Board's affairs has established in the public mind, some of our opponents, and the leader of the Opposition in particular, have, on this occasion, sought to belittle the services the Board has rendered, and in particular to raise a doubt concerning the disinterested character of the services of its chairman. The services of the chairman of the Board fortunately speak for themselves. The Government is more than satisfied to have them estimated solely on their merits. With the exception of an occasional jibe at the chairman by the leader of the Opposition, the fairness and impartiality of the Board's methods of proceeding have never been seriously challenged in parliament. I believe it is true that throughout the country each year has served to enhance public confidence in the Board itself.

All that is given in evidence at the hearings of the Board is taken down in shorthand and is printed. The Board's proceedings are communicated to parliament for its guidance, and may be had by the public on payment of a nominal printing charge. Tariff making requires technical knowledge. The tariff board is a body of investigation, collecting information and submitting it to the government and parliament. The government has the advice of the tariff board, but it must assume responsibility for what it recommends to parliament. It may accept or reject the advice tendered, but if it is true that the Board's advice has been largely accepted, it is simply because it has been good advice.

With the establishment of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation the day has gone for the making of tariffs on impulse, or because of momentary resentments.

No longer are tariffs to be made by clamor or self-interest, nor by the rhetoric of politicians. The business of the country deserves the cool, calm, reasoning that is devoted to the successful business of the individual and the corporation, and under present conditions through the tariff board the business of Canada as far as it is reflected in the customs schedule has been receiving that consideration.

Genesis of the Budget.

Having explained the functions and duties of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, may I now revert to the course taken by the Government in dealing with the revisions of the United States tariff in so far as they threatened adversely to affect our trade.

No sooner was the probability of a revision of the American tariff announced than the chairman of the board was advised by the then Minister of Finance, the late Mr. Robb and myself to have the Board study with the utmost care the probable effect of any changes in the United States tariff upon our trade. At the same time through the proper diplomatic channels and in accordance with approved diplomatic methods, the most complete representations were made to the Government of the United States through the Canadian Legation at Washington and through the Legation of the United States at Ottawa, as to the effect upon Canadian trade, and also the effect upon Canadian sentiment and the probable consequences of both, which the proposed changes, if put into effect, were likely to bring about.

When it became apparent that notwithstanding these representations, changes inimical to our country, and to its agricultural interests in particular, were likely to be made, and that our immediate neighbors were not prepared to continue to trade with us except upon unequal terms, a further important step was taken. Both the Minister of Finance and myself, speaking in Parliament, gave our own people to understand, that the Government was fully alive to the possible consequences of the action contemplated by the United States, that we were watching Canadian interests to the fullest possible extent. Public intimation was given, in words the significance of which the United States could not do other than fully comprehended, that in the event of tariff changes taking place which might adversely affect our interests, it would be found that Canada was well able to take care of herself; that all countries might expect to see that we proposed in matters of trade to extend our favors as far as might be possible to those countries most ready to favor us, and that where trade could not be expected except on unequal terms, use would be made of the tariff to divert the course of trade, first of all so as to deepen the channels of trade within the British Empire, and secondly to cause the trade of Canada hereafter more and more to flow in these channels which reciprocial treatment in matters of trade might help to develop between this country and other lands.

Statement in House of Commons by the late James Robb, on March 1, 1929.

Speaking on the introduction of his budget in the House of Commons on March 1, 1929, the late Mr. Robb said:

"This Dominion continues to be one of the world leaders in the volume of its external trade; therefore, problems arising in connection with our foreign trade can never be ignored. As the years go by an increasing quantity of our domestic production must necessarily be marketed abroad. It is our desire to trade freely with any and all who are willing to trade with us. What may, or may not, be possible in this particular necessarily depends in some measure on the purchasing power and the fiscal policies of other countries. The policy of this administration is not a high tariff policy; it is a low tariff policy. Its policy is to encourage production at home and the marketing of our excess of production abroad. In applying this policy both domestic and international factors must of necessity be considered.

In accordance with the fiscal policy of the Government, the tariff changes to be submitted to-day are designed to reduce taxation and to lessen the costs of production. The changes to be submitted arise out of references which the Advisory Board on tariff and taxation has investigated, and are based on its fact-findings. The Board is continuing its inquiries, on which substantial progress has already been made, into several larger problems which involve the consideration of whole tariff schedules and the interrelation of many important Canadian industries. While these inquiries are being pursued, opportunity will be afforded for considering the possible effect on trade of changes being proposed in the tariff schedules of other countries, should they be implemented by legislation."

Budget Forecast in 1929.

May I now quote an extract or two from a speech of my own to which much publicity was given at the time and to which frequent reference has since been made. It is the speech which I delivered at Winnipeg on November 1st of last year. That speech was devoted almost wholly to the question of the tariff and to the then existing situation. I pointed out wherein the Government had been urged by its opponents to adopt a "red-blooded" attitude towards the United States, to keep Parliament in session up to the moment of the final revision of their tariff by the United States. I said that any change of the American tariff, prior to the re-assembling of our Parliament was wholly improbable, and that having before us more in the way of exact information and knowledge, we would at the forthcoming session be in a much better position to deal with the tariff as circumstances might require, than we could possibly be at any other time. I stated that what was needed meanwhile was not so much a "red-blooded" as a "cool-headed" attitude.

Speaking of the position taken by our opponents in Parliament, I said: "We are told that we should retaliate; but what are we to retaliate against, they cannot so much as tell us, for up to the present, no changes in the American tariff have been made." I added, with regard to our own position, "I am not denying that changes by Congress in the United States tariff which may adversely affect our trade may call for action on the part of the Canadian Parliament to secure elsewhere markets for our exports which it is in the public interest to maintain."

I then outlined the method of the Liberal Administration in dealing with tariff matters and spoke particularly of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation. I then proceeded to outline the course the Government had been pursuing, and to answer the objection of those who thought that more in the way of formal protest to the United States Government should have been made by our Government. In this connection I said:

"Let it, however, never be assumed that because we have not been threatening, because we have not been expounding vociferously with regard to a situation that has not yet arisen, that in any particular we have been indifferent to possibilities; that we have not been making all proper and necessary representations, or that we have not been reflecting upon, studying and determining the course of action that it may be best to adopt in the event of any changes which may adversely affect our trade being made now or later on in the tariff of the United States or of any other country. This it was obviously our duty to do, and this we have been doing through the agency of more departments of government than one."

As to the U.S.

This, let me remind you, was said publicly last year. It had reference to the course the Government had been pursuing prior to that date. It was, I think, fairly pointed as to what the Government's course would be as a consequence of changes in the tariff of the United States, but I was more direct and specific than even this—not only as regards trade with the United States but also as regards the development of inter-imperial trade. Let me read what I said, and then ask whether there is reason to regard the present budget as in any sense the outcome of "premature," "unreasoned" action, or as hysterically inspired by party exigencies. Here are my words: They will be found in the very full reports of the speech which were made by most of the leading papers throughout the Dominion. Speaking specifically of the possible changes in the American tariff, I said:

"The mere fact that a revision of the United States tariff is possible, a fact which has received emphasis from the present discussions, has rendered it imperative that we should consider all probable and possible effects of a revision, and that we should explore in each and every direction the courses which it may be wisest to take in meeting whatever situation may ultimately develop. I wish to make it very clear that this is precisely what the Government has been doing, and doing through agencies especially designed and adapted for the purpose.

"I spoke a moment ago of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation. This board has been in existence now for three years. During the whole of that period it has been making a most searching and careful study of the tariff. It has been considering its schedules as a whole, and, one by one, in relation to special applications made for changes in the tariff which have been referred to it for consideration, and in relation to modifications of the tariff generally in accordance with the Liberal policy of watching the interest of consumers as well as of producers and manufacturers. The board's personnel is composed of able representative men from different parts of Canada. It has associated with it permanently, and is free to call in from time to time, persons in a position to give expert opinion.

"When the revision of the United States tariff was first mooted, the chairman of the board, Mr. W. H. Moore, was called into conference by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the Government, and was told that it was the wish of the Government to have, in case it should be required, as much information as might be possible with respect to changes in our own tariff which it might be deemed advisable to make in the interests of our own people, as a consequence of, or as an offset to, changes which might come in the United States tariff. Much of this information we already have, and the board's work is proceeding from day to day."

I then referred to the absurdity of any thought of changing a tariff over night, as implied in the attitude of our opponents and said: "The old method of threatened retaliation may have had its day, but the new method looks not to threats for what is best, but to close and accurate scientific study. It bases its conclusions on acquired information and knowledge."

Trade With Britain.

Then speaking of the development of inter-imperial trade, I said: "Finally, there is the movement of effecting more in the way of inter-imperial trade, which from voluntary as well as government agencies, has gathered momentum almost daily since the revision of the United States tariff began to be discussed. Here we already see the extent to which even the possibility of a revision of their tariff by the United States has served to bring home to component parts of the British Empire the wisdom of securing, within the Empire itself, with regard to any and every eventuality, as large a measure of inter-imperial trade as may be possible. There seems little doubt that Empire producers can supply vast quantities of goods now produced in the United States. What proportions this movement may assume, should actual changes adversely affecting different parts of the Empire ever come into effect, it is, of course, impossible to foretell. To this aspect, as far as Canada is concerned, we have been giving the closest possible attention.

"There should be in Canada the heartiest co-operation on the part of all parties to seek within the Empire new markets to replace any that may be lost elsewhere, and to place within the Empire, at home and abroad, as many of the purchases now given to any country that penalizes our trade and can be transferred without penalizing Canadians.

"What then is the present position with respect to possible changes in the tariff of the United States which may adversely affect our trade? That position is well known. It has not changed since the controversy commenced. It was stated in Parliament in the clearest possible terms by both the Minister of Finance and myself in the course of the debate on the budget in April last. The significance of what was then said is, I believe, as fully understood by the people of the United States as by our own people.

"We have made it clear that, in so far as we have a fiscal problem, our task would appear to be that of furthering the utilization of domestic resources, of encouraging greater and more economical production of quality products, of removing inequalities where inquiry proves such to exist, and of adjusting as necessity arises, our customs tariff schedules to meet new conditions. In applying these principles the availability of supplies, the proximity of markets and transportation costs are all factors that must be considered. Other things being equal, we would wish to favor those countries which favor our products. It is our desire to trade freely with any or all who are willing to trade with us; to buy from those who buy from us; and in so far as we may be able so to do, to secure markets for our products and merchandise on which we can rely. What may or may not be possible in this particular necessarily depends in some measure on the purchasing power and the fiscal policies of other countries. The policy of the present Administration is not a high tariff policy, it is one of promoting greater freedom in the matter of trade, in a manner which will encourage production at home and the marketing of our excess of production abroad.

Position Made Clear.

"Our position as respects the United States is perfectly clear, and, I may add, equally strong, come what may. In nothing have we been provocative. We have recognized that the United States is free to legislate as it pleases as respects its own tariff. We have been exemplary in our attitude in not attempting to interfere by threat or formal protest with respect to a matter which we recognized as one of domestic concern. As a neighbor with whom the United States is doing business, as its nearest neighbor, and in some respects its best customer, we have made known wherein certain tariff changes may adversely affect our interests. We have expressed the hope that our relations being neighborly, neighborly considerations would govern, by them, as by us, in respect to the tariff, as in all else. We have made it clear that only in an atmosphere of confidence and goodwill is it going to be possible to adjust with the greatest mutual advantage many of the problems which in their nature are bound to be international. If, in the face of all this, the tariff of the United States should be so altered as adversely to affect to any appreciable degree any interests in this country, the United States will surely be the first to recognize our right with respect to our tariff so to legislate as to have regard for Canadian interests, and in particular, Canadian interests as they may be affected, or as we may have reason to feel they are ever likely to be affected, by tariff revisions in the United States.

"The people of Canada may rely upon the present Administration taking care of Canadian trade in future, as we have taken care of it in the past. They may rely upon the Canadian tariff being made to serve Canadian interests. No situation has arisen during the past nine years which has not been satisfactorily met. The Government is fully prepared in the interests of Canada to readjust its fiscal policy from time to time to meet any changes in existing fiscal structures which may affect our markets. If the United States or any other country does not want to trade with Canada except on unequal terms, then surely we can look as never before to the rest of the world, and particularly to the rest of the British Empire. We will continue to shape our fiscal policies on a national basis in the interests of all sections in Canada. We will continue to legislate, not for one class but for all classes; not for a favored few but for the greatest good for the greatest number. Whatever the United States or any other country may do in tariff matters, we believe that our country has reached a stage in its development where it will be able to look after itself. Canada will make its own tariffs and will find its own markets."

Forecast of Budget Proposals.

I ask, ladies and gentlemen, could anything be plainer than that? How, in the face of so clear and emphatic a declaration of the Government's position can anyone claim that we have taken the country by surprise in the budget brought down this year. The intention of the Government, the statement of policy as outlined in this public address, and the substance of which was repeated time and again in the course of the journey which I made to and from the Pacific Coast, was made a half a year before our budget was introduced, and as I have already said, I was but repeating in Winnipeg what both the late Minister of Finance and myself had said in Parliament another half a year before that time. So that the Government's intention with regard to the present budget was publicly known at least a year in advance of the time that the budget itself was introduced.

But there are none so blind as those who will not see, and perhaps there are none so prejudiced and readily deceived as those who seek to prejudice and deceive the minds of others. The Tory party had gone so far in its efforts to misrepresent the position of myself and others in our attitude towards the United States and in our attitude towards Britain and other nations of the British Commonwealth that they had come to believe that what they had been repeating over and over again had in it some element of truth, and that any change in the tariff which might not accord with their own predictions was something quite impossible. Now they know that the Government meant every word of what it said, and they have before them in the form of legislative enactments, acts which speak very much louder than words.

I have been taken to task because I ventured to say that I did not believe in a course of conduct which might only serve to arouse international antagonisms and to defeat the very ends which we had in view, in other words that a provocative attitude is not the best one to take in international affairs. May I say that this applies no more to the United States than to any other country. Its application is as true of the relations between individuals as it is between nations, though the consequences of a wrong course of action may be much more serious where it relates to nations in their dealings with each other. The course of conduct that deliberately seeks to arouse prejudice and hatred, whatever other purpose it may be made to serve at the moment, never succeeds in doing good in the long run. Knowing the course which the Government was taking, and proposed to take, how far-reaching that course was certain to be, I felt my responsibility all the greater to see that, on the part of those countries which might be affected, not for today only but possibly for years to come, no cause should be given which might enable them to say that their adverse action toward Canada was the result of some offensive attitude on our part, rather than something which was wholly of their own creation.

Work of Tariff Board.

When the Honorable Mr. Dunning came to prepare the budget for presentation to Parliament this year, he had before him and was able to present to the Cabinet the fruits of the extensive study made by the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation and its body of experts. Moreover he knew the limits within which the revision of the United States tariff must necessarily be effected, and he knew substantially what the changes were likely to be. He had in addition much in the way of information collected by officers of his own department and by Trade Commissioners and the Commercial Intelligence Service of the Department of Trade and Commerce. With all this material in his possession he was able to place before his colleagues in the Government practically all essential considerations with respect to the changes to be made in the tariff and as a Government we were able deliberately so to place those changes as to take full account alike of the interests of producers and consumers and so to shape the probable channels of trade, that it would flow in increasing volume between our own country and countries prepared to trade on terms favorable to us, and, in particular to increase in volume between this nation and the other nations of the British Commonwealth. This is what has now been effected.

I do not think I need devote any time to exposing the weakness of the "stolen clothes" and "made in Washington" cries. As I have already said, if both are true the Tory party stands self-condemned. The Liberal party has never had occasion to steal political clothes from any party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Tory party. The Liberal party has its own consistent policy, a policy of moderation, a policy which has developed from time to time to meet the changing conditions in the world and in Canada itself. If it had been so ill-advised as to seek Conservative garments, where would it have found them? At the Winnipeg convention, where it will be recalled that the whole Tory party was painfully careful to make sure that the word "protection" appeared in not a line of its platform? Or from the Winnipeg address of Mr. Bennett last week, when protection returned in full and resounding force, not so much as a political garment, as a political umbrella, or political omnibus. You may have noted how at Winnipeg Mr. Bennett declared there was to be protection for labor and agriculturists, for producers and for consumers, as well as for manufacturers and others. Just how that protection is to be brought about he did not say. He has been studiously vague and indefinite, and he has not mentioned a single specific change that he would propose.

The British Preference.

But whatever Mr. Bennett and his followers may say of "stolen clothes" and of "made in Washington" policies, they will scarcely be able to say that either epithet applies to the increases made in the British Preference and which, after all, constitute the central feature of the budget.

I need not remind the people of Canada that the policy of British Preference is a Liberal policy. Many here present will still recall Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee in 1897. They will recall the Imperial Conference held in London in that year, the very year Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office. They will recall, too, that next to Queen Victoria herself, there was no more impressive or distinguished figure at that great gathering than Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself. When the Parliament of Canada assembled at its next session there was introduced the Laurier-Fielding tariff, the outstanding feature of which was the British Preference. Theretofore, Canada had had one tariff applicable to all countries, Great Britain and the British self-governing Dominions included.

The tariff of 1897 provided that thereafter goods coming to Canada from the British Isles should be permitted to enter at a rate of duty 25 per cent. lower than the duty on goods coming to Canada from other countries. This rate was subsequently increased to 33 1-3 per cent. In some instances the increase has been even greater, and on a vast number of commodities entry has been made free under the British Preference. Whenever there has been a Liberal government in office, further increases have been made in the British Preference. I think, however, I am right in saying that never once under a Conservative administration has any British Preference or increase of British Preference been given. In the first session the present administration was in office there were as respects several commodities further increases in the British Preference. To aid in the development of Canadian ports and Canadian trade routes an additional discount of 10 per cent. on the existing rate of duty was granted in 1923 to goods entering Canada under the British Preference through Canadian ports. When subsequently an enactment was passed making it conditional in order to entitle goods to the British Preference that they should be entered through Canadian ports, it was discovered that under the 10 per cent. discount something like 99 were already coming in that way. The policy of the British Preference and its gradual extension is, therefore, nothing new. It is a Liberal policy. Though it has not been changed under Conservative rule, in no sense can it be said to have been Conservative policy. Indeed, more and more the Conservative party has taken the position that it is not in favor of the granting of British Preferences, save when they are the outcome of some bargain driven between Canada and the Motherland or between Canada and other parts of the British Empire.

Policies Contrasted.

Perhaps I should here say that there appears to be a fundamental difference between the Liberal party and the Conservative under its present leaders as to the nature of trade, and a difference which has existed all along as to the grounds on which preferences should be granted. Both arise, I believe, from an essentially different conception of the nature of trade and its benefits. I doubt if that difference of view can better be expressed than it was in an exchange between the Hon. Dr. Manion and myself in the recent session of parliament. In the course of one his many speeches, the Doctor enlarged somewhat on his views upon trade. He epitomized what he had to say in the words: "Trade is war." I replied that I though trade was in the nature of exchange. Perhaps I should give you the exact quotation from Hansard's report of proceedings in the House of Commons of March 24th, of this year:

Mr. Manion—Does not the right hon. gentleman think we could have negotiated a treaty with a little more effect if we had kept our weapons until the negotiations were completed.

Mr. Mackenzie King—What weapons? This is not a case of war.

Mr. Manion—The right hon. gentleman talked of war the other day. But trade is war so far as that goes.

Mr. Mackenzie King—That is the language of my hon. friend—trade is war.

Mr. Manion—So it is.

Mr. Mackenzie King — I always thought trade was exchange.

Mr. Manion—Yes, but we have tariff wars.

Oddly enough, or perhaps I should say, naturally enough, you will notice Mr. Bennett return to the same theme in his speech at Winnipeg, which was to give to his followers the keynote of the campaign:

"Tell me, where did free trade ever fight for you as well. I will use them for the manufacturers. I will make a fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you."

In other words, to the Tory mind it would appear that trade is not something as the result of which each of the parties concerned may gain, but is in the nature of conflict, where as an outcome there must be gain to one and loss to another. So, Mr. Bennett goes on to say that he will have nothing to do with the giving of preferences save where something of a corresponding nature is given in return. He fails to see that people trade only because they wish to, and only because each of the parties concerned has reason to believe that he is benefitting by the exchange. Where a commodity is being bought or sold the buyer or seller believes that what he is getting in exchange is more to his advantage to him than that which is being given in exchange. In other words, both parties stand to gain or there would be no trade. The Liberal Party has consistently taken the view that where it has given a preference it has made possible an increasing measure of trade between the countries concerned.

Blasting a Way to Trade.

Even more important than tariffs and policies to a country is the spirit which animates the administration of domestic and foreign affairs. What is to be said of the spirit of the Conservative Party as revealed by the utterances of its leader.

Mr. Bennett at Winnipeg asks "When did free trade ever fight for you?" Free trade is not an issue in this campaign and Mr. Bennett knows it. But there is a country which has maintained a free trade policy for almost 100 years. Does Mr. Bennett suggest that Great Britain is guilty of economic cowardice because it has not followed the high tariff policies of the United States? "We will make our tariffs fight for you," he declared in ringing tones. "We will blast a way to trade." Let me ask you this questtion: Did you of any one blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade! There are business men, salesmen and commercial travellers in this audience. Let me ask you this question. Did you ever secure an order by force? Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle of business that trade is secured not by ill-will but by good-will? Not by awakening antagonism, but by developing friendliness and co-operation? To Mr. Bennett all countries are competitors. He forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone.

Through his entire speech one could detect an admiration of the tariff policy of the United States. It was a striking coincidence that on the same page of an Ottawa newspaper which carried a report of his Winnipeg speech there was a despatch from Washington referring to the consternation of business men of that country over the shrinkage in foreign trade which had taken place as a result of the effort of that country to blast their way to trade by shutting out the goods of other countries.

In the first quarter of the present year the foreign trade of the United States decreased by 20 per cent. Only a few days ago motor car manufacturers of the Middle West declared that they would be obliged to cut production 40 per cent. if the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Bill came into operation. If this is the harvest of using the tariff to blast a way to trade, Canada may well pray to be delivered from those priests of high protection who profess to be its friends.

May I ask you to ponder this question both now and until your votes are cast. Should the Government of this country be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference excepting on a basis of hard bargaining and who would destroy the foundations of good-will upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded to-day?

Mutual Preferences.

Mr. Bennett and his party insist that we should give absolutely no preference to the Mother Country unless as the result of a bargain, unless in return for an equivalent tariff preference from Great Britain. Is it true that we have received no advantage in Britain's market? It is true that Britain has not, except in a limited measure, established protective tariffs and given us a preferential reduction, but if she has not given us a preference over the foreigner she has given us equality with her own producers. An eminent Canadian recently reminded us that since Confederation Britain has bought from Canada five billions more than Canada has bought from Britain. We have not fared so badly in that great market.

We all wish to preserve and extend the British market. It has been our greatest outlet in the past. Whatever changes may come, it will remain a great and indispensable market. Looking at it as practical men, which is the better way of securing a favorable position in that market, to offer as the Liberal party has done, from the days of Laurier and Fielding to the present, a free-will preference to the Mother Country, or to insist that we will grant no preference whatever and will cancel the existing preference unless Britain reverses its fiscal system for the purpose of granting us a preference? Put yourself in the other's place. Would you prefer to deal with a country which has held out to you the hand of friendship and good-will, or with a country which held nothing in its hands but a club? We have not far to go for our answer. Look at the position to-day. What has been the result of the Dunning budget, a budget which gave the British producer the opportunity for a great expansion of trade in Canada, a trade in large measure diverted from foreign countries without any injury to Canadian industry? The result has been an immediate and warm response from every party and every part of Britain, a deep feeling which will inevitably be reflected in the action of individuals, in the action of parties, in the action of the community, in whatever form their good-will may most appropriately find expression. We do not propose to blast our way into the markets of Britain, but we have secured and we will hold the most favorable position any country enjoys to-day for the expansion of trade in the British Isles.

Give Canada Consideration.

If Great Britain comes to the point where she is prepared to adopt a policy of protection and is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the Government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward any proposal for reciprocal trade to a successful conclusion. But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal party stands for the policy, which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers, but is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The Conservative policy would deny the preference except on a basis unacceptable to Great Britain. It would cut down our imports from Great Britain at a time when Great Britain must sell us an increasing quantity of goods in exchange for our wheat. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country.

In short, whatever fiscal policy may be adopted by Great Britain, Canada, under the guidance of the Liberal policy, and the Liberal policy alone, is in the fortunate position of being able to secure the utmost advantage in the British market.

Policy Avoids Bargaining.

One of the real advantages of the Liberal method is that it avoids this very feature of bargaining which all too frequently creates difficult situations instead of relieving them. The ready manner in which the Island Colony of Bermuda within less than a month of the time in which our budget was introduced granted increased preference to Canadian bran, hay, middlings, shorts, wheat flour and fish, is evidence of the kind of response which is likely to be accorded a right, fair and generous attitude. Another great advantage of our method of proceeding is that we avoid altogether interfering in any way with the existing fiscal policies of other parts of the British Empire. The recognition of the fullest autonomy of all the self-governing parts of the British Empire by all the others is of the very essence of the maintenance of the whole structure. There is nothing that we in Canada would more resent than an effort on the part of Britain or any of the other Dominions to compel us to alter our fiscal system as a means of further co-operation in trade or in other matters between themselves and us. Most of all, is this true with respect to Great Britain. It is for the people of Britain to decide for themselves what fiscal policy they wish to maintain. It is for us in our endeavors to further co-operation between the different parts of the empire, to accept fiscal policies and conditions as we find them. To seek, either directly or indirectly, to alter the fiscal policies of other parts of the empire, is, I believe, only to invite discord where unity at all times should be the supreme aim. Whether it be a Conservative Government, led by Mr. Stanley Baldwin, as was the case at the last two Imperial Conferences, or a Liberal Government led by Mr. Lloyd George, or a Labor Government led by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the attitude assumed by the Liberal party towards Britain in the budget as introduced into and passed by Parliament cannot do other than win for it the best possible means of approach towards further co-operation on the part of Britain. Our policy, while of benefit to ourselves, is also beneficial to Britain, regardless of which political party may be in office or power there, and has, as we well know, been so recognized by all.

Economic Conferences.

I come now to the third of the issues, and with what I have to say in this connection, to the conclusion of my address. You are being called upon to decide which party—the Liberal or the Conservative is to represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic conferences to be held in London this year. To this issue, as I have said, is necessarily related the question of the personnel of the ministry which is to manage the affairs of Canada during the next Parliament.

Let me remind the country that the question of Canada's representation at the forthcoming conferences was stated by Mr. Bennett as so all important as to necessitate a mandate from the people. It was so important in fact as to be the one real issue of an electoral campaign. Mr. Bennett made his declaration for a general election on the issue of the forthcoming conferences in his speech on the Address at the opening of the recent session. He said that in his opinion and in that of the party which he represented so important were the conferences of this year in London that Canada should be represented only by a government which had, in the interval received a direct mandate from the people. When it came to the debate on the budget, Mr. Bennett repeated this expression of view, albeit, I confess, with something less in the way of emphasis. Ever since, however, he has been doing his utmost to get away from this issue, to create new issues, to say or to do anything which may help to obscure this all-important question as a real issue of the election, even to the calling of a special session of parliament immediately after the election.

When Mr. Bennett first stated that a mandate from the people should be obtained before any government ventured to represent Canada at the Imperial and Imperial Economic conferences, there was every reason why the present administration, in view of its approved record at previous conferences, might well have claimed this right as coming within the natural course of the time allotted to the late Parliament, irrespective altogether of any special mandate. So far as the Imperial conferences are concerned, the country has before it the record of the present administration in its representation of Canada at the conferences of 1923 and 1926. In the light of the general satisfaction which was felt throughout Canada with respect to Canadian representation in London on these previous occasions, we might well have assumed that the people of the Dominion would be prepared to continue to trust the representation of Canada to those who had previously represented her so well. We might, had we wished, have taken the position that there was no need for a special mandate, that the administration was entitled to remain in office until November of next year; that it could be held to account at a subsequent session of Parliament for the character of its representation; that that session would necessarily be followed by a general election at which the people, as well as their representatives in Parliament, would hold the ministry to account.

Need of a Mandate.

The situation became somewhat different, however, once the Minister of Finance had introduced his budget in the House and it was apparent that the budget was likely to become a matter of political controversy. The fiscal policies embodied in the Budget had been framed, amongst other things, in the light and in the knowledge of the conferences to be held in London this Fall. Those policies, as I have indicated, were deliberately shaped so as to make possible a wider measure of trade between this country and other portions of the British Ecpire, Great Britain in particular. The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets, the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was framed with a view to holding for Western Canada the market for her wheat which for so many years she has had in Great Britain and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere. To secure from the people of Canada approval of these policies before the Imperial Conferences take place, is, therefore, in our opinion, an all-important consideration if the Conferences are to do for the further development of our trade what, with all confidence, we believe they will. To have a mandate based upon the policies which are now before the people is, therefore, in our opinion, imperative. It is for this reason that we have not hesitated to dissolve parliament over fourteen months before the time at which dissolution becomes necessary. When we go to the Conference of 1930 we want to go, as we went to the Conferences of 1923, and 1926, with the voice of Canada behind us, and with all the influence and power which comes from the voice of the nation as a whole.

Let me remind the people of our country that there are two conferences at which Canada is to be represented in London, the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference. At each of these conferences will be assembled representatives of the Government of Great Britain and of the Governments of each of the Dominions and India. The Imperial Conference will deal more particularly with constitutional and political problems such as those of inter-imperial relations and foreign affairs. The Imperial Economic Conference will deal more particularly with questions which are primarily economic such as matters of co-operation in inter-empire trade and communications.

Canada in Pioneer Role.

The imperial Conference will give the seal of its approval to the far-reaching changes in constitutional status which have been brought about during the past seven years. In the task of creating a British Commonwealth of Nations on the basis of the national autonomy of its members, Canada, as I have already said, has played a pioneer role. At every step in our progress to the fulness of national stature the Liberal Administration has encountered the opposition of the Conservative Party. It opposed the separate signature of treaties. It opposed the establishment of Canadian Legations abroad. It attempted to throw derision on the profoundly significant declaration of the Imperial Conference of 1926. Each of these events is recognized in Great Britain and throughout the Empire as an essential feature of the great co-operative community which we call the British Commonwealth. The people of Canada must decide which party shall represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial Conference. Shall it be the party which labored and achieved, or shall it be the party that obstructed and opposed?

The economic conference will be concerned in the discussion of ways and means of enlarging the field of co-operation within the British Commonwealth. The Liberal party inaugurated the British preference and has made it a central feature of the fiscal structure of our country. In the budget brought down by Mr. Dunning on May 1, a Liberal Government announced the greatest extension of British preference since 1907. We have declared that it is in this spirit of co-operation that we shall approach the economic conference in September. Which party shall represent Canada at this conference? Shall it be the party that established and extended the British preference and negotiated the Australian Treaty and the West Indies Trade Agreement, or shall it be the party which has opposed or critized each of these great policies designed to enlarge the boundaries of Empire trade and co-operation?

Personnel of Ministry.

Ladies and gentlemen: The representation of Canada at the forthcoming conference is, as I have said, necessarily bound up with the personnel as well as with the policies of the Government which is to administer the affairs of the country during the next parliament. Were it not that the leader of the Opposition has gone out of his way to say a great deal about the constructive leadership which Canada requires, and to use the most uncalled-for language in speaking of the present Administration, I might spare him the questions to which I think the people of Canada have the right to demand an answer, namely, first, what in the way of constructive leadership has he himself to offer? And second, who are the men who are to comprise the cabinet which were he to be returned to power, he would have immediately to form?

Up to the present time, pretty much all that Mr. Bennett has said has been in the nature of platitudes or declamation. He has not put forward a single constructive idea, nor has he indicated a single policy with any clearness or definiteness of aim. In his speech at Winnipeg, he referred to the members of the present Government as: "This group of mercenaries, holding office by shame and subterfuge," and as, "forgetful, in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages." He said: "Look upon them, treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation." And at a meeting at Regina on the following day he spoke of "nine years of wasted effort before the great betrayal," and added: "It did not take Judas that long." May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled-for, and adds nothing to his stature in the position of leadership. Already I have heard it strongly resented by men of his own party. A government securely established which voluntarily appeals to a people on a great issue nearly a year and a half in advance of the completion of its term, is not "a group of mercenaries holding office by shame and subterfuge," nor are they persons "forgetful in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages."

May I say that I believe it is the general opinion that Canada at no time has had a government composed of abler men, of men more genuinely disinterested or of higher purpose than the men I am proud to have as my colleagues in the present administration. I believe it is true that no government has ever given a better account of itself both at home and abroad. May I ask Mr. Bennett who, in the administration that he has in mind, are to take the place of the ministers in the present Government from the Province of Quebec, from the Province of Ontario, from the Maritime Provinces, and west of the Great Lakes. Who are the gentlemen he has in mind as those who are to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference? I will tell him who of the Government will be among the number to represent Canada, if the present administration is returned: At the Imperial Conference, the present Minister of Justice, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who represented Canada with such ability and distinction at the Imperial Conference of 1926 and who represented Canada at the Subsidiary Conference on the Operation of Dominion Legislation which met in London last fall, will be one of the representatives. Another of the representatives at the Imperial Conference will be the present Minister of National Defence, Colonel the Hon. J. L. Ralston, who during the present year represented Canada with such credit to himself and to our country at the Conference on the Limitation of Naval Armaments. At the Economic Conference Canada will be represented by the present Minister of Finance, Hon. Charles A. Dunning, the author of the budget of 1930, a budget which has stirred and warmed the heart of the whole British Empire. Another representative will be the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, Hon. James Malcolm, under whose auspices the trade of Canada has expanded as never before to all quarters of the globe.

I ask Mr. Bennett to tell the Canadian people before the 28th of July who, from the Province of Quebec, he intends, if given the opportunity, to substitute for Mr. Lapointe? Who from the Maritime Provinces he intends to substitute for Colonel Ralston? Who from Ontario he intends to substitute for Mr. Malcolm? And who from the Canadian West he intends to substitute for Mr. Dunning? The Canadian people have a right to know who are to be their representatives at these two great conferences. The people have a right to know in addition, who for the next five years, the other members of the Government of Canada are likely to be.

"The Meeting of the Ways."

In the general elections of 1911, when the Liberal party in Canada, under its great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appealed to the country on a trade issue in the nature of reciprocity in natural products between Canada and the United States, a measure of greater freedom in trade so far as this continent was concerned, and of wider markets for the producers in the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, the forces that were opposed to the tariff changes then proposed, allied under the cry of "we are at the parting of the ways." I do not intend to go the length of saying that, having regard to the measure of increased trade assured by the budget of 1930 between Canada and Great Britain, and indeed between Canada and all other parts of the British Empire, we are "at the parting of the ways," or that the rejection of the budget, for such would be the significance of the defeat of the present Government at this general election, would mean an end to all endeavor further to promote inter-empire trade. I do, however, say what in very truth I believe to be the fact, that so far as inter-empire trade is concerned, "we are, at last, at the meeting of the ways," and that the acceptance of this budget by the people on July 28th will do more than all else to ensure for Canada's representatives at the Economic Conference in London that favorable response to our attitude and action which we believe will be given by the Government of Great Britain and by the Governments of all the sister Dominions of the Empire. It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may help to determine whether the highways of Empire are to become, as we hope they may increasingly become, the avenues of a British commerce expanding ever so widely, o'er land and sea, or, whether in so far as the component parts of the Empire are concerned, its highways are to remain indistinguishable from the other trade routes of the world.

Stakes Ministry's Fate On List of Achievements Stresses Imperial Trade

Declares Budget, Mandate for Imperial Conference and Government's Record Are Three Main Issues of Campaign in Keynote Speech at Brantford.

PROMISES EARLY ST. LAWRENCE STATEMENT

Accuses Conservatives of Attempting to Block Canada's Nationhood Status—Says 1911 Cry in Danger of Becoming No Truck or Trade With Empire.

By KEN. W. MacTAGGART.
Mail and Empire Staff Writer.

Brantford, June 16.—Right Honorable William Lyon Mackenzie King to-night laid his offering on the altar of public opinion.

It was the offering of achievement, Liberal achievement during eight and a half years of administration. He offered that administration to the people of Canada for the next five years and upon it, he stated, the Liberal party is ready to stand or fall. It was the manifesto of his Government.

Before the largest gathering that ever attended a political meeting in this city he told of the seven years through which Canada has most recently come. Seven thousand people packed the armories of the Dufferin Rifles, to which he was triumphantly paraded by the band of Post 90 of the Canadian Legion. He was accompanied by three Cabinet Ministers who seek with him re-election to Canada's Government.

In short, brief, pungent sentences, fired with feeling and thrown out in the manner characteristic of the Premier, he reviewed the work of his Government, told of the thoughts that had been behind its every action and move. Then he challenged Hon. Richard Bedford Bennett, Conservative chieftain, to tell Canadians what he had to offer Canada in its stead.

Challenge to Name Cabinet.

He demanded that Mr. Bennett tell now the men who will form his cabinet, the men who will represent Canada at the Imperial conferences to be held next September. Not till the names were told, Mr. King declared, will Canadians know what they are asked to do. "I ask him to tell you—and he said he will reply to me to-night in Vancouver—I asked him," and the Premier leaned low to the radio microphone, "who will he give you from Quebec to take the place of Lapointe, who to take the place of Ralston from the Maritimes, who to take the place of Ontario's cabinet members, who will represent as does Dunning the great people of the West? I ask that and make that my challenge to him now."

He predicted the complete abolition of sales tax, he intimated an early pronouncement on St. Lawrence development to be delivered on an occasion when more time be given the subject, he told of the creation of national unity through Federal cooperation with the Provinces, of the need of world markets, of the Government's past expenditures for British settlement, of the realization by Canada of a national status among the countries of the world and of the creation of national legations in Paris and Tokyo and he said: "Mr. Bennett says that every nation is a competitor. I say every nation is a customer. He says he will blast a way for trade. Is that the way to gain trade? Will you trade with the man who holds out his hand to you or the one who wields a club over your head? Look at the little island, England; free trade for a hundred years. Is she a coward?"

He then stated that Canada's representatives at the next Imperial conference, if the Government is returned, will be Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Col. Hon. J. L. Ralston and Hon. James Malcolm.

Upholds Dunning Budget.

In referring to the budget as the outstanding issue in the campaign the premier said that the budget of 1930 was the response of the Government to a combination of internal and external factors in the present economic situation.

He described the countervailing duties as a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms; a frank and sincere announcement to our neighbors "that we are ready in the future as we have been in the past to consider trade on a reciprocal basis."

Answering charges of the Conservatives, he declared that the Liberal party "has never had occasion to steal political clothes from any party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Tory party."

Swinging to imperial trade, he announced that the Conservative cry of 1911—"No truck or trade with the Yankees"—was in danger of becoming in 1930 "No truck or trade with Great Britain."

With the declaration that Conservatives had consistently tried to block the recognition of Canada's nationhood he interjected the constitutional issue into the campaign.

Replies to Ferguson.

The Premier made one brief reference to the presence in the campaign of Ontario's Premier, G. Howard Ferguson, on the five-cent piece speech issue.

Provincial problems faced the Liberal administration, he declared. They were met; there was not a single case of distinction.

"And in this issue," the Premier continued, "may I speak in view of the attitude of the Premier of this province and his Government. There was not a single case where we dealt with Liberals alone yet all received similar recognition; there was not the slightest suggestion of any party distinction as he (Premier Ferguson) well knows. We worked together and created a national unity never known before."

"We are at last at the meeting of the ways in so far as intra-empire trade is concerned. We are at the position where a favorable response to our attitude and action already expressed in our budget will be given by the Government of Great Britain and the sister Dominions of the Empire.

"It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may determine whether the highways of the Empire are to become the avenues of British commerce expanding ever more widely over land and sea or whether, in so far as the Empire is concerned, its highways are to remain distinguishagle from the other trade routes of the world."

The Premier opened his remarks by expressing his thanks to the millions of unseen listeners who form the people of Canada. To them thanks was due for the support the Government had been given in the last few years.

"It will be expected of the leaders in this campaign that they speak to all Canada. I am trying to do that. I am here in Brantford to-night to pay a tribute to the late citizen, your citizen Alexander Graham Bell. In a few days I will be in Cape Breton where his ashes remain a part of Canada.

"I also pay tribute to your two candidates, those two men who preceded me to this platform, Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Harold. I am glad to know them as my friends."

Leaping directly, then, into his address the premier divided the issues of the election into there classifications: the Government's record; secondly, the budget, and lastly, the choice of Canada's representatives at the Imperial Conference in September.

Other Speakers Heard.

Prior to the arrival of the Premier a number of local citizens spoke to the huge audience. The hall was packed nearly an hour before Mr. King's entrance and they cheered and applauded the addresses. Among the speakers were R. F. Miller, former M.P.P.; Dr. Charlton of Galt, Mayor Hilbert of Galt, A. T. Whitaker of Brantford, Charles Widdifield, Liberal candidate in South Waterloo.

hTe armories was draped with red, white and blue buntings. Placards announced: "Are you for Canada and the Empire?", "Build Canada and Empire trade—vote Liberal." "Let King and Dunning continue their work — vote Liberal." A. T. Whitaker, president of the local Liberal Association, acted as chairman and entered the hall a minute ahead of the Premier—causing much excitement amongst the sweltering crowd.

The Premier entered the hall behind a stalwart piper of the Hamilton Kilty Band. Both were warm from their struggle through the mobs that packed the street and entrance. On the platform were seated three Senators: Senators James Spence and W. H. Maguire of Toronto, and Senator Little of Windsor. The Premier was accompanied by Hon. W. D. Euler, Hon. J. C. Elliott and Hon. James Malcolm, Ministers of the recent Government. The address of the Premier was broadcast to all Canada through a network of 24 radio stations, the largest hook-up yet known in Canada. When the Premier began speaking a crowd of about 500 persons were standing in the corridors and aisles.

Mayor Beckett of Brantford welcomed the Premier on behalf of the city and the throng that overflowed through the exits and into the streets and on the lawn.

John Harold, Liberal candidate for North Brant, an old Liberal stronghold but a Conservative seat at present, reviewed in tabloid form some of the achievements of Liberal policies. W. Ross MacDonald, candidate of Brantford, was cheered as was Mr. Harold.

Mr. MacDonald called attention to the number of women electors present. Politics must be kept on a high level, he said, with women watching proceedings at all times. He declared that Brantford was honored in having a prime minister open his campaign here. On the Pacific coast and in the Maritimes people would know that a Canadian premier had opened his campaign from the same platform as the late A. S. Hardie, Liberal premier of Ontario.

"I feel confident," he stated, "that Brantford is going back to the Liberal party." Soldiers' aid and old age pensions were the ancient riding's necessities three years ago. Since then Canada has been given these two great needs. "And now," he said, "soldiers' pensions are not an issue because the necessary legislation has been written into Canadian history. That pledge is fulfilled. And the old people are receiving monthly payments, thanks to the same man, your prime minister."

Canada's Greatness Treads Path of Trade Wider Empire

RECORD OF GOVERNMENT LONDON ECONOMIC MEET AND BUDGET ARE ISSUES

Support Asked for Policies Which Lift Canada From Despond to Prosperity—Premier Leaves "Whisper of Death" to Bennett While He Plans Greater Dominion

MACKENZIE KING OPENS HIS CAMPAIGN

The following is an extended report of Premier King's speech at Brantford last night:

"It is now about a month and a half since I announced in parliament the intention of the government to hold a general election this year, and since that time public discussion both in and out of parliament has centred more or less upon the issues of the campaign now in progress.

"On July 28 the people of Canada will be asked to decide the policies and administration which are to guide the destinies of the Dominion during the next five years. It is the privilege, and indeed the duty of Canadian citizens to examine carefully the views presented by those who seek their confidence, and to record their votes freely and honestly in support of the administration and of the policies which they believe are designed to serve the best interests of our country.

"There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign. The first is the record of the government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third is the direct issue of a choice between Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year.

"Let me deal first of all with the record of the government; not only our record since we were returned to office in September, 1926, but our record from the time we first came into office in December, 1921.

"Were there no other issue before the people, I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances, we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years. For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history. The growth and development of Canada under the present administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation.

"Standing on a record of sound progressive accomplishment, we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The 'whispers of death,' the fear of returning depression, the complaints of an exodus which has ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party whose last tenure of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apparently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days.

"On March 31, 1914, the debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000.

"On March 31, 1922, as a result of the war, and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debt had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000. In the last two years of the Conservative administration no less than $174,000,000 had been added to the public debt. In addition not less than $355,000,000 had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years 1919-22. Depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contradicted; agriculture was depressed.

Period of Progress

"Against this dark background, which is still a vivid memory to many of us to-day, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known.

"We approached the problem from two directions; first, by the curtailment of expenditures, the second, with the raising of increased revenues by the necessary additional taxes. The second of these methods is traditionally unpopular. The previous administration had avoided it, at a time when the patriotism of the people might well have been counted on to support increased taxation to meet the tremendous cost of the war.

"Sir Thomas White has said that we should not include in the expenditures for the six years mentioned those made on capital account and on account of railway subsidies, which amounted in the six years to $8,500,000, also what appears in the public accounts as 'other charges,' being in fact largely the costs involved in raising loans. The only other possible figures that Sir Thomas might wish to exclude were non-active advances to the then bankrupt railways in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920, aggregating $45,780,000.

"My reply to this is, that in our expenditures for the eight and a half years we have been in office, we have included all expenditures made on account of capital outlay, all subsidies, or non-active advances to railways, and expenditures incurred in the negotiation of loans. So long as a like method of accounting is carried out with respect to both periods, and so long as what is meant is fully understood by all, no exception can be taken.

"I might add that of our total expenditures to-day it is estimated that forty per cent. is immediately attributable to the war, and had there been no war, would not appear in the public accounts. The additional provision made for war veterans by this year's legislation will still further increase the percentage due to expenditures arising out of the war.

"Where the previous administration avoided their responsibilities we met ours courageously and without regard to political consequences. We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national budget. To have continued the other course would have brought the country into a condition of bankruptcy. Within two years our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our budget but to give us on the 31st March, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000.

"From that time forward we began to pay off annually without intermission an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

Reducing Deficits

"May I say here that in all the years from Confederation down to the time that we came into office there were only eight years in which there was a surplus, four of which were under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of sixty-three years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present administration has held office. The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office. At the rate at which we have been reducing debt during the past four years, the total public debt of Canada would be paid off entirely in the course of the next forty years.

"Not only has the national debt been steadily reduced, but expenditures have been kept down to the minimum, consistent with efficient administration. Despite a period of unparalleled prosperity during the past five years, the government has kept national expenditures within prudent limits, and has thus set an example of thrift and economy for the country at large."

The long list of income tax reductions were enumerated by Premier King. The corporation tax was reduced to 8 per cent. on incomes in excess of $2,000. The exemption on each child was raised from $200 to $300. The salary exemption was raised from $2,000 to $3,000 in the case of married persons or persons with dependents.

The same course was pursued by the premier in connection with the sales tax reductions, until only 1 per cent. is left. "I need not ask you, ladies and gentlemen," said Premier King, "what will happen to that 1 per cent. if the present administration is returned to office."

The subject of immigration next received Premier King's attention, especially the refutation of Canadian emigration on a large scale into the United States. Such a movement, he contended, was very temporary, since the United States had prospered far more than Canada during the war, but now, owing to policies of the government in encouraging Canadian industry, Canada is more prosperous than the United States and the tide of migration is pouring back here, including many citizens of the United States.

"While conditions of employment in Canada," he admitted, "may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States or for that matter in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals to-day the migration from Canada to the United States."

British Preference

He easily spiked the allegation that the government was preferring foreign to British immigration, citing the alacrity with which the government had taken up this challenge of Mr. Bennett in the House, and had appointed an impartial commission to determine the facts, which showed that while Canada was spending 11 cents per capita on continental immigrants, she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on immigrants from the British Isles.

Soil is Kept British

"The most recent development in our immigration policy has been to link more closely the governments of the provinces and our own government in the determination of the classes and numbers of immigrants to be brought to Canada. With the return to the western provinces of their natural resources, we have felt that more in the way of provincial control of immigration was desirable, more particularly as the provinces themselves are the first to feel any adverse effects of an inadequate or an excessive immigration.

"I should not leave the subject of immigration without reminding you that, as respects Oriental immigration, which in our own as in other countries constitutes a most perplexing problem, we have in our term of office, without offence to the Orient, brought about complete exclusion of immigration from China, and, by diplomatic arrangement, a restriction of immigration from Japan so effective as to relieve both countries of further embarrassment on that score.

Basic Industries

"I need not remind you that we have regarded the development of the great basic industries as fundamental in our national progress," he continued. "We have recognized from the start that our manufacturing industries and our trade, both domestic and foreign, were dependent more than on aught else upon the utilization of our great natural resources.

"We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries."

Premier King briefly summarized some of the most familiar reductions in the tariff that have benefited the consumer since the present administration came into power. First, there was the reduction on some instruments of production, boots and shoes, sugar and textiles. The second year of the administration there was an additional 10 per cent. discount in the British preference rate on goods brought in through Canadian ports. In 1924 came great reductions on motor cars, motor trucks and other motor vehicles. This year, by the British preference, there is a complete removal of all duties on tea, porcelain, household utensils and other commodities affecting the homes of the people throughout Canada. All these changes lessened the cost of living. On account of a reduction in costs of production, all the people benefited from the great industries of agriculture, lumber, mining, fishing, and also from the manufacturing industries. Both at home and abroad, Canada's trade had extended.

"The confidence which the people of Canada have given to the present administration has enabled us to serve and to further the interests of this country, until to-day Canada stands as the sixth on the list of the great trading countries of the world. You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials; that we are parting with our birthright. Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of raw materials which Canada imports from the United States for her manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceed in value the total value of the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that the per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain.

Huge Trade Growth

"Let me add that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22 to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29. In other words, there has been a doubling of our total domestic export trade in a period of seven years. This spectacular increase of trade is no mere chance. It is the result of wise policies effectively administered by the department of trade and commerce.

"I shall have, I fear, to reserve for another time what I would like to have told you to-night of our policies with respect to labor and with respect to war veterans," Premier King declared. "May I just remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country.

"The success which has attended our efforts to see that the provision made by the state for our war veterans and their dependents was both fair and generous, is, I think, well known. It is, I believe, absolutely true that Canada's war pension legislation is the most advanced in the world and that no other nation has made provision for its ex-service men and their dependents on a scale of such open-handed justice as this country. The war veterans' allowances act, the revised machinery for dealing with pension claims, the decision to give to men who have served overseas the benefit of the doubt as to the cause of disability where application is made for pension; these and other measures, while supported by members of all parties in the House of Commons, are nevertheless a part of the record of Liberal policy and achievement.

"And here may I point out something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the premier of this province and his government in this general election, namely, that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present administration at Ottawa.

Eradicate Grievances

"It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative governments, our attitude throughout was the same: not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity these long standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or illwill.

"By our action in these particulars we have made over and strengthened the superstructure of Confederation. We have, at the same time, in the increased financial provisions which we have made for those provinces, reinforced its foundations. I say without fear of contradiction, that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several provinces and the federal government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

"Let me invite you to look beyond the empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds to-day?" he asked. "Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking, there has been the sudden steep ascent of war in which there were common heroisms and common sacrifices, and there has been the long, gradual, constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer.

"In this brief summary of the government's record, I have not had opportunity to make so much as mention of the positi[on] Canada has taken within the past few years at international conferences and at the League of Nations, a position not merely of helpful co-operation, but of leadership as well. Not only has Canada had a place on the Council of the League of Nations, and played an important role at its assemblies, but a member of the present government has held the high office of president of the Assembly of the League. We were one of the first countries of the world to signify our approval of the Briand-Kellogg pact, and were among its original signatories in Paris. We were the first of the British countries to urge the acceptance of the optional clause for the settlement of international disputes by arbitration. We were represented with distinction in London at the recent conference on the limitation of naval armaments. In Washington, Paris and Tokio our representation abroad has won for our country added and worthy recognition alike in America, Europe and the Orient."

The premier then turned to the question of the budget.

The anomaly of trying to fit the so-called "National Policy" of Sir John A. Macdonald and the Conservatives formulated in 1878 to the vastly changed Canada of to-day was exposed by Premier King. In other words, the Conservative party to-day says that Canada needs even more in the way of protection than she needed fifty years ago for the infant, struggling industries of that time.

A Compact Nation

"But is that the Canada we know to-day?" the premier asked. We have ceased to be a dominion of scattered provinces. We are a compact nation. There is no break in the chain from coast to coast. Our agencies of transportation and communication are world agencies.

"When we increased the British preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reduced duties on the implements of production, when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the National Policy and that we would ruin the country.

"I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedom of trade is the more deserving of being called a National Policy as we approach the third decade of the twentieth century. A national policy to-day in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world. It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets. It is essentially a policy of world markets.

"The budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four main proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1. The iron and steel tariff revision.
2. Countervailing duties.
3. The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4. Extension of the British preference.

"The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the tariff advisory board which have been conducted over a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an inquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great basic industries. The purpose kept in mind by the government in prosecuting this inquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain. This in turn was in conformity with the announced intention of the government to facilitate trade with those countries which are willing to trade with Canada on equal terms.

"The next feature of the budget, namely the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us. For the present we raise duties on these selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by other countries, but at the same time we tell our neighbor frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis. On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be one-sided.

Meet Growers' Needs

"In revising the customs tariff on fruits and vegetables, the government has had before it the evidence presented to the tariff advisory board on several occasions by those who were primarily interested in this important branch of our agricultural production. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and vegetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of other countries. It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers.

"We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates, which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules.

"In this manner we have endeavored to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which these specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of the consumers of these commodities. In past year, moreover, a large proportion of our early fruits and vegetables has been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business. Under the existing trade agreement these islands have assured us of a preference in their market. In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruits and vegetables under the British preference. Already we have seen what the response of other parts of the British Empire is likely to be to this attitude and policy. Bermuda has given to us since our budget was introduced, additional preference or free entry of our agricultural manufactured products, and this very week there is assembling at Trinidad representatives of all the British West Indies for the purpose of considering closer trade relations with our country.

"This brings me to the last feature of the budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British crown which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets, and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries to-day do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

Reciprocal Preference

"The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them to-day. They have said that we must have preference for preference, and that no favors should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forego the policy of free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on a basis of reciprocal preference.

"But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers and to intra-Imperial trade with its beneficial effects to the British Empire as a whole, but a policy which is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the mother country, in order that she may enlarge her exports to the mother country. In the far-reaching extension of the British preference under the budget of 1930, this has been our purpose and our objective. We have studied the situation with the utmost care, and have revised the tariff schedules with the definite aim of diverting a considerable portion of trade from the United States and other countries to Great Britain. We firmly believe that this policy will receive the wholehearted approval of the Canadian people.

Analyzes Criticism

"Against the fiscal and trade policies of the budget, what are the criticisms of the Conservative party as enunciated by the leader of the opposition? They may be summed up in a very few words. The first is that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objection, if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have "stolen the clothes" of the Conservative party. If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that party. The third is that our policy is a Washington-made policy. If that is true, which it is not, what becomes of the argument that we have stolen the clothes of our opponents? Finally, we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences there should be no trade, even with the mother country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference. In the reciprocity campaign of 1911, the cry of the Tory party was 'No truck nor trade with the Yankees.' This year it has come dangerously near being 'No truck nor trade with Britain.'

"In his address at Winnipeg, sounding the keynote of the Conservative campaign, Mr. Bennett characterized the tariff changes of the budget as 'this premature, unreasoned action.' Elsewhere in the same speech he referred to the budget proposals as a movement 'hysterically inspired by party exigencies.' Far from being 'premature' or 'unreasoned' or 'hysterically inspired,' I venture to say there never was presented to any parliament a budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well.

Mr. Bennett, said the Liberal leader, had asked at Winnipeg: "When did free trade fight for you?"

Free Trade Not Issue

"Well," said Mr. King, "free trade is not an issue in this campaign, and Mr. Bennett knows it. But there is a country which has maintained a free trade policy for almost 100 years. Does Mr. Bennett suggest that Great Britain is guilty of economic cowardice because it has not followed the high-tariff policies of the United States? 'We will make our tariffs fight for you,' he declared in ringing tones. 'We will blast a way to trade.'

"Let me ask you frankly: Did you ever hear of anyone blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade. There are business men, salesmen and commercial travellers in this audience. Let me ask you this question: Did you ever secure an order by force? Did you ever gain trade by ill will against your customer?"

"No, no," cried the crowd.

Is Commerce to Be War?

"Should the government of this country," asked Mr. King, later on, "be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference, excepting on a basis of hard bargaining, and who would destroy the foundation of good-will upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded today?"

Again the "No, no" cries rang out from the audience. Mr. Bennett was "nailed hard" by the prime minister for his references to the government ministers.

Premier King quoted statements by the late Hon. Mr. Robb and himself in the House and throughout the country, outlining step by step their attitude in face of the threatened increase in duties by the new United States tariff and their reasons for waiting until it was certain what the United States were really going to do before action by the government of Canada. In no way, he pointed out, was it the intention of Canada to be provocative.

"The people of Canada may rely upon the present administration taking care of Canadian trade in future," he quoted, "as we have taken care of it in the past. They may rely upon the Canadian tariff being made to serve Canadian interests. No situation has arisen during the past nine years which has not been satisfactorily met. The government is fully prepared in the interests of Canada to readjust its fiscal policy from time to time to meet any changes in existing fiscal structures which may affect our markets.

"I do not think I need devote any time to exposing the weakness of the 'stolen clothes' and 'made in Washington' cries. As I have already said, if both are true the Conservative party stands self-condemned. The Liberal party has never had occasion to steal political clothes from any party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Conservative party. The Liberal party has its own consistent policy, a policy of moderation, a policy which has developed from time to time to meet the changing conditions in the world and in Canada itself. If it had been so ill-advised as to seek Conservative garments, where would it have found them? At the Winnipeg convention, where it will be recalled that the whole Conservative party was painfully careful to make sure that the word 'protection' appeared in not a line of its platform? Or from the Winnipeg address of Mr. Bennett last week, when protection returned in full and resounding force not so much as a political garment as a political umbrella, or political omnibus. You may have noticed how at Winnipeg Mr. Bennett declared there was to be protection for labor and agriculturists, for producers and consumers, as well as for manufacturers and others. Just how that protection is to be brought about he did not say. He has been studiously vague and indefinite, and he has not mentioned a single specific change that he would propose.

"But whatever Mr. Bennett and his followers may say of 'stolen clothes' and of 'made in Washington' policies, they will scarcely be able to say that either epithet applies to the increases made in the British preference, and which, after all, constitute the central feature of the budget.

"Gave Us Equality"

"May I ask you to ponder this question both now and until your votes are cast. Should the government of this country be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference excepting on a basis of hard bargaining, and who would destroy the foundations of good-will upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded to-day?

"Mr. Bennett and his party insist that we should give absolutely no preference to the mother country unless as the result of a bargain, unless in return for an equivalent tariff preference from Great Britain. Is it true that we have received no advantage in Britain's market? It is true that Britain has not, except in a limited measure, established protective tariffs and given us a preferential reduction, but if she has not given us a preference over the foreigner she has given us equality with her own producers.

"We all wish to preserve and extend the British market. It has been our greatest outlet in the past. Whatever changes may come, it will remain a great and indispensable market.

"If Great Britain comes to the point where she is prepared to adopt a policy of protection and is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward any proposal for reciprocal trade to a successful conclusion. But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers, but is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The Conservative policy would deny the preference except on a basis unacceptable to Great Britain. It would cut down our imports from Great Britain at a time when Great Britain must sell us an increasing quantity of goods in exchange for our wheat. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the mother country in order that she may enlarge her exports to the mother country.

"In short, whatever fiscal policy may be adopted by Great Britain, Canada, under the guidance of the Liberal policy, and the Liberal policy alone, is in the fortunate position of being able to secure the utmost advantage in the British market."

Coming to the third of the issues—which party is to represent Canada at the imperial and economic conferences at London this year, Premier King described how the government, to Mr. Bennett's dismay, had eagerly accepted his challenge for a vote of the people, although the government was entitled to remain in office till November, 1931.

"The situation, however, became somewhat different," he said, "once the minister of finance had introduced his budget in the House, and it was apparent that the budget was likely to become a matter of political controversy.

"Those policies, as I have indicated, were deliberately shaped so as to make possible a wider measure of trade between this country and other portions of the British empire, Great Britain in particular. The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was framed with a view to holding for western Canada the market for her wheat which for so many years she has had in Great Britain, and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere. To secure from the people of Canada approval of these policies before the imperial conferences take place is, therefore, in our opinion, an all-important consideration if the conferences are to do for the further development of our trade what, with all confidence, we believe they will.

Far Reaching Changes

"Let me remind the people of our country that there are two conferences at which Canada is to be represented in London, the imperial conference and the imperial economic conference. At each of these conferences will be assembled representatives of the government of Great Britain and of the governments of each of the dominions and India. The imperial conference will deal more particularly with constitutional and political problems such as those of inter-imperial relations and foreign affairs. The imperial economic conference will deal more particularly with questions which are primarily economic such as matters of co-operation in inter-empire trade and communication.

"The imperial conference will give the seal of its approval to the far-reaching changes in constitutional status which have been brought about during the past seven years. In the task of creating a British commonwealth of nations on the basis of the national autonomy of its members, Canada, as I have already said, has played a pioneer role. At every step in our progress to the fulness of national stature the Liberal administration has encountered the opposition of the Conservative party. It opposed the separate signature of treaties. It opposed the establishment of Canadian legations abroad. It attempted to throw derision on the profoundly significant declaration of the imperial conference of 1926. Each of these events is recognized in Great Britain and throughout the empire as an essential feature of the great co-operative community which we call the British commonwealth. The people of Canada must decide which party shall represent Canadian opinion at the imperial conference. Shall it be the party which labored and achieved, or shall it be the party that obstructed and opposed?

"In the general election of 1911, when the Liberal party in Canada, under its great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appealed to the country on a trade issue in the nature of reciprocity in natural products between Canada and the United States, a measure of greater freedom in trade so far as this continent was concerned and of wider markets for the producers in the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, the forces that were opposed to the tariff changes then proposed, allied under the cry of 'we are at the parting of the ways.' I do not intend to go the length of saying that, having regard to the measure of increased trade assured by the budget of 1930 between Canada and Great Britain, and indeed between Canada and all other parts of the British empire, we are 'at the parting of the ways,' or that the rejection of the budget, for such would be the significance of the defeat of the present government at this general election, would mean an end to all endeavor further to promote inter-empire trade. I do, however, say, what in very truth I believe to be the fact, that so far as inter-empire trade is concerned, 'we are, at last, at the meeting of the ways,' and that the acceptance of this budget by the people on July 28, will do more than all else to ensure for Canada's representatives at the economic conference in London that favorable response to our attitude and action which we believe will be given by the government of Great Britain and by the governments of all the sister dominions of the empire. It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may help to determine whether the highways of empire are to become, as we hope they may increasingly become, the avenues of a British commerce expanding ever so widely, o'er land and sea, or, whether in so far as the component parts of the empire are concerned, its highways are to remain indistinguishable from the other trade routes of the world."

WEALTHY IN PLATITUDES BUT DON'T OWN SLIVER FOR BUILDING PLATFORM

Premier King Opening Campaign Argues Conservatives Bankrupt in Policy

WILDLY ACCLAIMED

Brantford Audience and Radio Listeners Hear Great Issues Lucidly Defined

Special to The Star

Brantford, June 17.—A sweltering June evening and an even warmer welcome greeted Rt. Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, premier of Canada, in Brantford last night.

Vociferous acclaim was accorded the premier from the moment he stepped from Canadian National Railway train No. 5 at 7.40 until a madly-cheering throng, which crammed the Brantford armories to capacity, permitted him to retire to his private car nearly four hours later.

Confidence in the administration of the Liberal government in the past and faith in Premier King's plans for the future were echoed in the shouting, applauding crowd which awaited his arrival at the railway station, lined the approach to the armories for three-quarters of a mile, and jammed the great hall to capacity for fully an hour before Premier King was scheduled to open his initial campaign address.

Several thousands struggled and pushed their way into a decorated armories to hear the premier review the record of his government since it first came into power in December, 1921, and define the issues of the campaign.

Not a single word of criticism was voiced or a single heckler silenced during a speech which lasted one hour and 50 minutes.

Despite the intense heat, unrelieved by even a breath of air, the crowd was continually enthusiastic during the three-hour rally.

Ladies fluttered fans before faces from which the powder had long since been washed by perspiration, but the crowd stayed to the end, eager to hear the premier's message.

All Canada was enabled to hear the premier's speech through a network of 25 added stations, the greatest hook-up ever attempted in the Dominion.

Legion Band Is Escort

A reception committee of local notables, headed by the band of the Brantford branch of the Canadian Legion, met the premier's party as the train drew into the station at 7.40 about 35 minutes late. The strains of "O Canada" were merged in the cheering which greeted Premier King's appearance at the door of his private car. Bowing in response to the outburst Premier King was led to 16-cylinder automobile to begin a triumphal procession through the city streets.

The band and a piper played the march of Auld Scotia, firecrackers banged, automobile horns hooted and screamed their welcome. Cars were parked on both sides of the street and stood four deep at intersections to honk their greeting.

Led by the piper, Premier King took his seat on the platform at 8.10. A Niagara of applause roared forth without cessation for three minutes as A. T. Whitaker, chairman of the meeting, called for three cheers. Premier King got the cheers and a litter of "tigers."

The crowd cheered him from the moment he voiced his pride in opening the campaign in the city which had produced Alexander Graham Bell, inventor of the telephone, until, hoarse of voice, he closed his speech by asking which party would represent Canada at the imperial conference in September—the party which had extended British preference, "or the party with a club in its hand."

They shouted their approval as he spiked the allegations made by Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader, in Winnipeg recently.

"Mr. Bennett referred to members of the present government as: 'This group of mercenaries, holding office by shame and subterfuge,' and as, 'forgetful in their love of office of all else but their own personal advantages'," Premier King told his hearers.

Not Dignified Language

"He said: 'Look upon them, treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation'," the premier continued warmly. "May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled-for and adds nothing to his stature in a position of leadership. A nation like Canada does not expect that kind of language from its leaders.

"Mr. Bennett hasn't given this country one single constructive idea in the whole of his campaign up to now," Premier King told his audience and radio listeners, which are stated to have included the opposition leader sitting at the dials of a radio in Vancouver, 3,000 miles away. "There has been a great deal of declamation—a great deal of platitudes, by the Tory party during the present campaign, but not a single sliver of constructive platform." (Prolonged applause.)

Pointing out that the Liberal government had gone to the country a year and a half ahead of time in order to go to the imperial conference "with the voice of Canada" behind them, Premier King hotly demanded: "Is that the action of a group of mercenaries holding office by shame and subterfuge?"

With pointed logic the premier stripped bare the Conservative objections to the Dunning budget in which they sought to show that the Liberals had "stolen the clothes" of the Conservative party and that the budget allowed the tariff to be "made in Washington."

"The Liberal party doesn't need to steal the clothes of any other party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Tory party," he declared. "If that were true, which it is not, that should not make our policies objectionable to their party. And if it were true, what then becomes of the argument that our policy is made in Washington? It doesn't say much for their policy."

Shows Conservative Mind

In an illustration of the operation of the Conservative mind Premier King recalled a debate on the floor of the House during the past session in which Hon. R. J. Manion, Conservative, participated.

"Trade is war," asserted Dr. Manion.

"Trade is exchange," corrected Premier King.

The crowd cheered when the speaker observed that Mr. Bennett saw a competitor where he ought to see a customer; that the present Conservative policy was a "political umbrella" or "political omnibus" to take care of everything under the sun.

The premier referred to speeches of the late Hon. J. A. Robb and himself, made over a year ago, warning the United States to expect reprisals in the Canadian tariff if the United States put through the contemplated additions to its tariff wall, in stirring refutation of Mr. Bennett's charge that the Dunning budget was "premature," "unreasoned" and "hysterically inspired to meet party exigencies."

His Policy Is Definite

"We aim to trade with those who trade with us," was a declaration of policy which almost literally "brought down the house." Premier King was cheered until he had to pause in his speech and bow as he explained the object of the countervailing duties with the United States.

They cheered when the speaker announced the government's intention to buy from Great Britain what had been purchased in the United States; the need for a national policy good for east and west; the appointment of the Hon. Cairine Wilson as first woman senator; and highlights of the Liberal government's enviable fiscal record since 1921.

He labelled the "national policy" of Sir John A. Macdonald "50 years behind the times," and told how Canada's export trade had doubled during the past seven years.

Premier King wanted to know what the Conservatives would say about unemployment now if General McCrae had been allowed to spend $300,000,000 on bringing 300,000 immigrants to Canada and declared the return of Canadian youth to the country of their birth was now greater than their exodus to the United States.

As Premier King's speech drew to a close, old and young crushed their way to the platform to grasp his hand. Those who couldn't reach him renewed their applause and the microphones were still vibrating to the din when the strains of "God Save the King" closed the broadcast.

Mr. King's Leading Points

THE highlights of Premier King's Keynote speech at Brantford last night follow:

Canada will do business with the nations that are willing to do business with her.

The Government is appealing to the electorate on its record of administration, on the facts of the Dunning budget and on the importance of Canada's representation at the forthcoming Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic conference.

The King Government again emphasizes Canadian national status, and questions the attitude of its opponents in this connection.

The King Government stands committed to a definite policy of strengthening intra-empire trade.

The King Government's position is that trade is an exchange of goods—not a war.

The King Government charges the Opposition with dealing in "platitudes and declamation, but no constructive ideas, nor clear policies."

The premier intimates that he will make a statement later on the St. Lawrence Waterways question.

Wiping out of the remaining one percent of sales tax is forecast.

The premier declares his government has always played fair with the provinces, and will continue to do so despite political leanings.

Canada Will Deal With Those Who Deal With Her

Dominion Ready to Do Business With Countries Which Will Meet Her Half Way, Mr. King Declares in Keynote Speech

Cites Countervailing Rates

Greater Commerce With Britain Needed to Offset Loss Of Exports to Republic, and to Develop Market For Wheat of Prairie Belt

Special to The Border Cities Star

BRANTFORD, Ont., June 17.—Serving notice on the United States that Canada is prepared to trade with countries willing to trade with her, but that "our commercial relations must not be one-sided," Premier W. L. Mackenzie King last night launched his re-election campaign hard on the heels of President Hoover's announcement that he would sign the bill raising United States tariffs against products of Canada. Washington despatches today intimate the new United States tariffs will be signed and in effect before midnight.

Countervailing features of the Dunning budget, the premier explained, are designed specifically to impress this determination and this desire for reciprocal trade upon the republic.

Another illustration of this intention, based largely, also, on a desire to increase trade with Great Britain and sell there Canada's products which the new United States tariffs shut out from the republic, is furnished in the budget's British preference features, he said.

Wheat Market Needed

Development of trade relations with Britain on a more extensive scale than in the past is also necessary in order to establish in the old country a market for Canadian wheat, a market which has been considerably curtailed.

Premier King defined the issues Canadian electors must pass on at the polls on July 28 as threefold: the government's record, the budget, and Canada's representation at the imperial conference and the imperial economic conference.

They will be called upon to decide, he said, whether or not they believe in the policy of "blasting a way to trade," as he said Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader, stated at Winnipeg, or if they prefer the viewpoint that trade is exchange for mutual advantage, and that it is "secured not by ill will but by good will."

Announces Delegates

Announcing that if returned to office the men who would accompany him to the empire conferences in London this fall would be Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. Charles A. Dunning, Hon. J. L. Ralston and Hon. James Malcolm, Premier King challenged Mr. Bennett to name the representatives he would select.

Turning to the budget, the premier said policies must be framed to meet existing conditions. The national policy of 1878 would not suit the Canada of 1930. What was more, he declared, the old national policy advocated by the Conservatives had not always served to meet conditions in the past.

"When we increased the British preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reduced duties on the implements of production, when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the national policy and that we would ruin the country," he said.

"I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedom of trade is the more deserving of being called a national policy as we approach the third decade of the twentieth century. A national policy today in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world. It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets. It is essentially a policy of world markets.

Not National Policy

"With the rapid development of western Canada and the emergency of a great agricultural population engaged in the production of a commodity which must seek its markets throughout the world, high protection, or an all round increase in the tariff can no longer be called a national policy. According to figures given in the Canada Year Book of 1929, over 80 percent of Canadian manufacturing is concentrated in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This percentage is based on figures of production, capital employed and number of employes. While it is true that manufacturing has developed to a considerable extent in western Canada these manufactures are based largely upon the primary industries of agriculture and mining and do not require a tariff protection to any considerable extent. It is therefore true to say that a general increase in the tariff in 1930 is essentially a sectional policy so far as the distribution of its benefits is concerned. It has forfeited every right to the name —national policy—given to it by Sir John A. MacDonald in 1878, and by Mr. Bennett in 1930.

"But if high protection is a sectional policy in the distribution of its benefits, it is equally true that having regard to the present industrial development of central Canada, a free trade policy would be detrimental in its immediate effects to one section of the dominion, even though it conferred benefits on those of our citizens who are obliged to seek markets abroad for their agricultural products and who derive little or no advantage from a protective tariff.

"It is apparent, therefore, that both a high tariff and free trade are sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada.

"What then is the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interests arising out of the tariff is the same as it is with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions.

"To the greatest possible extent sectional interests must be reconciled in the light of the larger interests of the whole.

Needs Moderation

"This can be effected only by moderation and compromise. Face the fact of our situation. Take Canada as it is, with its changing needs and its conflicting interests. Acknowledge the facts of geography and of divergent industrial development in east, and centre, and west. And having examined the realties of the situation, and having considered the demands of different sections for policies suited to their needs, so mould our social transportation and fiscal policies as to hold the scales evenly between class and creed and section and thus weld a far flung country into a united Canadian nation."

"The budget of 1930 was framed first of all to meet a situation in Canada arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes for policies suited to their needs. But because of the place which Canada has come to occupy in international trade, it was influenced also and in a special degree by our relation with two countries with which we are most closely associated in matters of commerce. The one is Great Britain. The other is the United States.

"When Mr. Hoover assumed office as president of the United States in March 1929, the United States congress began carrying out a far reaching revision of the tariff in conformity with the pledges given by the Republican party during the presidential campaign of the previous year. As that revision proceeded, it became increasingly apparent that the duties against Canadian agricultural products would be raised to such an extent as to cut off a considerable proportion of the existing Canadian exports to that country. In these circumstances and in accordance with its policy of using every endeavour to find wider markets for Canadian products the government gave instructions to the tariff advisory board to make a careful survey of the tariff schedules then applying against American imports, with a view to determining what extent these imports could be purchased from Great Britain or from other parts of the British Empire.

Imperial Meeting

"While this enquiry was proceeding, it was decided that an imperial economic conference would be held in London in September of 1930, to consider the subject of closer co-operation in matters of trade between the various parts of the Empire and to discuss the various policies which would contribute towards that end. Efforts had previously been made by the present administration to have this conference held in Canada. Subsequently, a condition developed in Great Britain which led to a market curtailment of purchases of Canadian wheat and resulted in a serious tie-up of our wheat in elevators, with consequent loss not only to Canadian growers, but to our transportation systems and to many branches of our industry and commerce. Prior to this development, Great Britain had purchased far more from Canada, largely because of our wheat exports, than Canada had purchased from Great Britain. It became apparent that if Canada was to maintain a British market for Canadian wheat, it was desirable that measures should be taken by diverting to Great Britain, many of the purchases being made at present in the United States and in other ways, to increase British imports to Canada and thus create an economic and psychological condition in Great Britain more favorable to the importation of Canadian wheat. These circumstances must be kept clearly in mind when examining the proposals in the budget presented to the House of Commons on May 1.

"The budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation.

Four Proposals

"It contains four proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1—The iron and steel tariff revision.
2—Countervailing duties.
3—The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4—Extension of the British preference.

"The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the tariff advisory board which have been conducted over a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an inquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great basic industries. The purpose kept in mind by the government in prosecuting this inquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain. This in turn was in conformity with the announced intention of the government to facilitate trade with those countries which are willing to trade with Canada on equal terms.

Countervailing Duties

"The next feature of the budget, namely, the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us.

For the present we raise the duties on those selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by either countries, but at the same time we tell our neighbor frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis.

"On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be one-sided.

Has Evidence

"In revising the customs tariff on fruits and vegetables, the government has before it the evidence presented to the tariff advisory board on several occasions by those who were primarily interested in this important branch of our agricultural production. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and vegetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of other countries.

"It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers. We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules. In this matter we have endeavored to meet requirements of growers during periods when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which these specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of consumers of these commodities. In past years, moreover, large proportion of our early fruits and vegetables has been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business.

Assure Preference

"Under the existing trade agreement these islands have assured us of a preference in their market. In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruits and vegetables under the British preference. Already we have seen what the response of other parts of the British Empire is likely to be by their attitude and policy. Bermuda has given to us since our budget was introduced, additional preference or free entry on some of our agricultural and manufactured products and this very week there are assembling at Trinidad representatives of all the British West Indies for purpose of considering closer trade relations with our country.

"This brings me to the last feature of the budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British Crown, which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic cooperation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries today do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

Definite Purpose

"The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them today. They have said that we must have preference and that no favors should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forego the policy of free trade.

"If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward to conclusion any proposal for trade on a basis of reciprocal preference. But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers and to inter-imperial trades with its beneficial effects to the British Empire as a whole, but a policy which is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the mother country, in order that she may enlarge her exports to the mother country.

"In the far reaching extension of the British preference under the budget of 1930, this has been our purpose and our objective. We have studied the situation with the utmost care and have revised the tariff schedules with definite aim of diverting a considerable portion of trade from the United States and other countries to Great Britain. We firmly believe that this policy will receive the wholehearted approval of the Canadian people.

Sums Up Criticisms

"Against the fiscal and trade policies of the budget what are the criticisms of Conservative party as enumciated by the leader opposition? They may be summed up in a very few words. The first is that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objection if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have 'stolen the clothes' of the Conservative party. If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that party. The third is that our policy is a Washington-made policy. If that is true, which it is not, what becomes of the argument that we have stolen the clothes of our opponents? Finally, we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences there should be no trade, even with the Mother country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference. In the reciprocity campaign of 1911 the cry of the Tory party was 'No truck nor trade with the Yankees.' This year it has come dangerously near being 'No truck nor trade with Britain.'"

The budget, declared the prime minister, was the outcome of the most mature deliberation.

"In his address at Winnipeg, sounding the keynote of the Conservative campaign, Mr. Bennett characterized the tariff changes of the budget as 'this premature, unreasoned action.' Elsewhere in the same speech he referred to the budget proposals as a movement 'hysterically inspired by party exigencies.' Far from being premature or 'unreasoned' or 'hysterically inspired' I venture to say there never was presented to any parliament a budget which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well."

Tariff Board

The work of the tariff advisory board in shaping the budget was gone into by the prime minister. He referred to the fact that the board had been established by the Liberal government as a fact finding body, and that its hearings were held in public.

"The government was particularly fortunate in securing as chairman of the board the services of Mr. W. H. Moore, a trained economist, a man of wide experience in knowledge of financial and industrial problems, and a man of judicial mind and temperament. Recognizing the confidence which Mr. Moore's impartial conduct of the board's affairs has established in the public mind, some of our opponents, and the leader of the opposition in particular, have, on this occasion, sought to belittle the service the board has rendered, and in particular to raise a doubt concerning the disinterested character of the services of its chairman. The services of the chairman of the board fortunately speak for themselves. The government is more than satisfied to have them estimated solely on their merits. With the exception of an occasional jibe at the chairman by the leader of the oppostion, the fairness and impartiality of the board's methods of proceeding have never been seriously challenged in parliament. I believe it is true that throughout the country each year has served to enhance public confidence in the board itself."

"With the establishment of the advisory board on this and taxation the day has gone for the making of tariffs on impulse, or because of momentary resentments.

Cool, Calm, Reasoning

"No longer are tariffs to be made by clamor of self-interest, nor by the rhetoric of politicians. The business of the country deserves the cool, calm reasoning that is devoted to the successful business of the individual, and the corporation, and under present conditions through the tariff board the business of Canada as far as it is conducted in the custom schedule has been receiving that consideration."

The genesis of the budget was then dealt with by Premier King. When the probability of a revision of the United States tariff was announced, he said, the tariff board was advised by the late Hon. J. A. Robb, then finance minister, and by the prime minister himself to study the probable effect on Canada of such revision. At the same time representations were made to the government of the United States.

"When it became apparent that notwithstanding these representations changes inimical to our country, and to its agricultural interests in particular, were likely to be made, and that our immediate neighbors were not prepared to continue to trade with us except upon unequal terms, a further important step was taken. Both the minister of finance and myself speaking in Parliament, gave our own people to understand that the government was fulily alive to the possible consequence of the action contemplated by the United States, that we were watching Canadian interests to the fullest possible extent.

Intimation Given

"Public intimation was given, in words the significance of which the United States could not do other than fully comprehend, that in the event of tariff changes taking place which might adversely affect our interests, it would be found that Canada was well able to take care of herself: that all countries might expect to see what we proposed in matters of trade to extend our favors as far as might be possible to those countries most ready to favor us, and that where trade could not be expected except on unequal terms, use would be made of the tariff to divert the course of trade, first of all so as to deepen the channels of trade within British Empire and secondly to cause the trade of Canada hereafter more and more to flow in these channels which reciprocal treatment in matters of trade might have to develop between this country and other lands. "Notations from speeches made by himself and Mr. Robb with respect to the position taken by Canada in regard to the United States tariff revision were given by Mr. King at some length. He referred to the speech at Winnipeg in 1929 in which he had said that what was needed was not so much a "red blooded" as a "cool headed" attitude in respect to the matter. At the conclusion of his questions he asked how, in the face of so clear and emphatic a statement of the government's position could anyone claim that the country had been taken by surprise in the last budget?

"But there are none so blind as those who will not see, and perhaps there are none so prejudiced and readily deceived as those who seek to prejudice and deceive the minds of others," continued Mr. King. "The Tory party has gone so far in its efforts to misrepresent the position of myself and others in our attitude towards the United States and in our attitude toward Britain and other nations of the British Commonwealth that they had come to believe that what they had been repeating over and over again had in it some element of truth and that any change in the tariff which might not accord with their own predictions was something quite impossible.

Actions Speak

"Now they know that the government meant every word of what it said, and they have before them in the form of legislative enactments, acts which speak very much louder than words.

"I have been taken to task because I ventured to say that I did not believe in a course of conduct which might only serve to arouse international antagonism and to defeat the very ends which we had in view, in other words that a provocative attitude is not the best one to take in international affairs. May I say that this applies no more to the United States than to any other country. Its application is as true as the relations between individuals as it is between nations, though the consequences of a wrong course of action may be much more serious where it relates to nations in their dealings with each other. The course of conduct that deliberately seeks to arouse prejudice and hatred and whatever other purpose it may be made to serve at the moment, never succeeds in doing good in the long run. Knowing the course which the government was taking, and proposed to take, how far-reaching that course was certain to be, I felt my responsibility all the greater to see that, on the part of these countries which might be affected not for today only but possibly for years to come, no cause should be given which might enable them to say that their adverse action toward Canada was the result of some offensive attitude on our part, rather than something which was wholly of their own creation.

"I do not think I need devote any time to exposing the weakness of the 'stolen clothes' and 'made in Washington' cries. As I have already said, if both are true the Tory party stands self-condemned. The Liberal party has never had occasion to steal political clothes from any party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Tory party. The Liberal party has its own consistent policy, a policy of moderation, a policy which has developed from time to time to meet the changing conditions in the world and in Canada itself. If it had been so ill-advised as to seek Conservative garments, where would it have found them?

"Painfully Careful"

"At the Winnipeg convention, where it will be recalled that the whole Tory party was painfully careful to make sure that the word 'protection' appeared in not a line of its platform. Or from the Winnipeg address of Mr. Bennett last week, when protection returned in full and resounding force, not so much as a political garment, as a political umbrella, or political omnibus? You may have noticed how at Winnipeg Mr. Bennett declared there was to be protection for labor and agriculturists, for producers and consumers as well as for manufacturers and others. Just how that protection is to be brought about, he did not say. He has been studiously vague and indefinite, and he has not mentioned a single specific change that he would propose.

"But whatever Mr. Bennett and his followers may say of 'stolen clothes' and of 'made in Washington' policies, they will scarcely be able to say that either epithet applies to the increases made in the British preference and which, after all, constitute the central figure of the budget." There appeared, said Mr. King, to be a fundamental difference betwen the Liberal party and the Conservatives and the nature of trade. In the House of Commons, he said, Hon. R. J. Manion had declared that trade was war. In the opinion of the prime minister trade was exchange. Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader, had taken a somewhat similar stand as Dr. Manion in his recent Winnipeg speech, said Mr. King. He quoted from Mr. Bennett's speech as follows: "Tell me where did free trade ever fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make a fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you."

One Gains—One Loses

"In other words," continued Mr. King, "to the Tory mind it would appear that trade is not something as the result of which each of the parties concerned may gain, but is in the nature of conflict, whereas an outcome there must be gain to one and loss to another. So, Mr. Bennett goes on to say that he will have nothing to do with the giving of preferences save where something of a corresponding nature is given in return. He fails to see that people trade only because they wish to, and only because each of the parties concerned has reason to believe that he is benefitting by the exchange. Where a commodity is being bought or sold the buyer or seller believes that what he is getting in exchange is more to his advantage than that which is being given in exchange. In other words, both parties stand to gain or there would be no trade. The Liberal party has consistently taken the view that where it has given a preference it has made possible an increasing measure of trade between the countries concerned.

"Even more important than tariffs and policies to a country is the spirit which animates the administration of domestic and foreign affairs. What is to be said of the spirit of the Conservative party as revealed by the utterances of its leader?

Not An Issue

"Mr. Bennett at Winnipeg asks 'When did free trade ever fight for you?' Free trade is not an issue in this campaign and Mr. Bennett knows it. But there is a country which has maintained a free trade policy for almost 100 years. Does Mr. Bennett suggest that Great Britain is guilty of economic cowardice because it has not followed the high tariff policies of the United States? 'We will make our tariffs fight for you,' he declared in ringing tones. 'We will blast a way to trade.' Let me ask you frankly did you ever hear of anyone blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade. There are business men, salesmen and commercial travelers in this audience. Let me ask you this question. Did you ever secure an order by force? Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle of business that trade is secured not by ill-will, but by good-will? Not by awakening antagonism, but by developing friendliness and co-operation? To Mr. Bennett all countries are competitors. He forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone.

"Through his entire speech one could detect an admiration of the tariff policy of the United States. It was a striking coincidence that on the same page of an Ottawa newspaper which carried a report of his Winnipeg speech there was a despatch from Washington referring to the consternation of businessmen of that country over the shrinkage in foreign trade which had taken place as a result of the effort of that country to blast their way to trade by shutting out the goods of other countries.

Are Insistent

"Mr. Bennett and his party insist that we should give absolutely no preference to the mother country unless as the result of a bargain," asserted Mr. King. "Unless in return for an equivalent tariff preference from Great Britain. Is it true that we have received no advantage in Britain's market? It is true that Britain has not, except in a limited measure, established protective tariffs and given us a preferential reduction, but if she has not given us a preference over the foreigner she has given us equality with her own producers. An eminent Canadian recently reminded us that since confederation Britain has bought from Canada five billions more than Canada has bought from Britain. We have not fared so badly in that great market.

"We all wish to preserve and extend the British market. It has been our greatest outlet in the past. Whatever changes may come, it will remain a great and indispensable market.

"Looking at it as practical men, which is a better way of securing a favorable position in that market, to offer as the Liberal party has done, from the days of Laurier and Fielding to the present, a free-will preference to the mother country, or to insist that we will grant no preference whatever and will cancel the existing preference unless Britain reverses its fiscal system for the purpose of granting us a preference? Put yourself in the other's place. Would you prefer to deal with a country which has held out to you the hand of friendship and good-will, or with a country which held nothing in its hands but a club? We have not far to go for our answer. Look at the position today. What has been the result of the Dunning budget, a budget which gave the British producer the opportunity for a great expansion of trade in Canada, a trade in large measure diverted from foreign countries without any injury to Canadian industry? The result has been an immediate and warm response from every party and every part of Britain, a deep feeling which will inevitably be reflected in the action of individuals, in the action of parties, in the action of the community, in whatever form their good-will may most appropriately find expression. We do not propose to blast our way into the market of Britain but we have secured and we will hold the most favorable position any country enjoys today for the expansion of trade in the British Isles.

To Get Advantage

"In short, whatever fiscal policy may be adopted by Great Britain, Canada, under the guidance of the Liberal policy, and the Liberal policy alone, is in the fortunate position of being able to secure the utmost advantage in the British market," said Mr. King.

"I come now to the third of the issues, and with what I have to say in this connection, to the conclusion of my address. You are being called upon to decide which party—the Liberal or the Conservative—is to represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conference to be held in London this year. To this issue, as I have said, is necessarily related the question of the personnel of the ministry which is to manage the affairs of Canada during the next parliament."

"Let me remind the country that the question of Canada's representation at the forthcoming conferences was stated by Mr. Bennett as so all important as to necessitate a mandate from the people. It was so important, in fact, as to be the one real issue of an electoral campaign. Mr. Bennett made his declaration for a general election on the issue of the forthcoming conferences in his speech on the address at the opening of the recent session. He said that in his opinion and in that of the party which he represented so important were the conferences of this year in London that Canada should be represented only by a government which had, in the interval received a direct mandate from the people. When it came to the debate on the budget, Mr. Bennett repeated this expression of view, albeit, I confess, with something less in the way of emphasis. Ever since however, he has been doing his utmost to get away from this issue, to create new issues, to say or to do anything which may help to obscure this all important question as a real issue of the election, even to the calling of a special session of parliament immediately after the election.

Situation Changed

Mr. King reminded his listeners that the present administration might have claimed that it had a mandate to represent Canada at the Imperial conference in view of the fact that it had still a year of office to run. The situation became somewhat different, however, with the introduction of the budget.

"The fiscal policies embodied in the budget had been framed, amongst other things, in the light and in the knowledge of the conferences to be held in London this fall. Those policies, as I have indicated, were deliberately shaped so as to make possible a wider measure of trade between this country and other portions of the British Empire, Great Britain in particular. The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets, the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was framed with a view to holding for western Canada the market for her wheat, which for so many years she has had in Great Britain and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere.

"To secure from the people of Canada approval of these policies before the Imperial Conferences take place, therefore, in our opinion an all important consideration if the conferences are to do for the further development of our trade what, with all confidence, we believe they will. To have a mandate based upon the policies which are now before the people is, therefore, in our opinion, imperative. It is for this reason that we have not hesitated to dissolve parliament over 14 months before the time at which dissolution becomes necessary. When we go to the conferences of 1930 we want to go, as we went to the conferences of 1923 and 1926, with the voice of Canada behind us, and with all the influence and power which comes from the voice of the nation as a whole."

Asks Question

The representation of Canada at the conferences was bound up with the personnel of the ministry, said Mr. King. What had Mr. Bennett to offer by way of constructive leadership? he asked.

"Up to the present time, pretty much all that Mr. Bennett has said has been in the nature of platitudes or declamation. He has not put forward a single constructive idea, nor has he indicated a single policy with any clearness or definiteness of aim. In his speech at Winnipeg, he referred to the members of the present government as 'this group of mercenaries holding office by sham and subterfuge' and as, 'forgetful in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages.' He said: 'Look upon them, treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation.' And at a meeting in Regina, on the following day, he spoke of 'nine years of wasted effort before the great betrayal' and added, 'it did not take Judas that long.' May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled for, and adds nothing to his stature in the position of leadership. Already I have heard it strongly resented by men of his own party. A government securely established which voluntarily appeals to a people on a great issue nearly a year and a half in advance of the completion of its term, is not 'a group of mercenaries holding office by sham and subterfuge,' nor are they persons 'forgetful in their love of office of all else but their own personal advantage.'

Points To Record

"May I say that I believe it is the general opinion that Canada at no time has had a government composed of abler men, of men genuinely disinterested, or of men of higher purpose than the men I am proud to have as my colleagues in the present administration. I believe it is true that no government has ever given a better account of itself both at home and abroad. May I ask Mr. Bennett who, in the administration that he has in mind, are to take the place of the minister in the present government from the province of Quebec, in the province of Ontario, in the Maritime Provinces and west of the Great Lakes? Who are the gentlemen he has in mind as those who are to represent Canada at the Imperial conference and the Imperial Economic conference?

"I will tell who of the government will be among the number to represent Canda, if the present administration is returned, at the Imperial conference, the present minister of justice, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who represented Canada with such ability and distinction at the Imperial conference of 1926 and who represented Canada at the subsidiary conference of the operation of Dominion legislation which met in London last fall, will be one of the representatives. Another of the representatives at the Imperial conference will be the present minister of national defense, Col. The Hon. J. L. Ralston, who, during the present year, represented Canada with such credit to himself and to our country at the conference on the limitation of naval armaments. At the Economic conference Canada will be represented by the present minister of finance, Hon. Charles A. Dunning, the author of the budget of 1930, a budget which has stirred and warmed the hearts of the whole British Empire. Another representative will be the present minister of trade and commerce, Hon. James Malcolm, under whose auspices the trade of Canada has expanded as never before to all quarters of the globe.

What Substitutes?

"I ask Mr. Bennett to tell the Canadian people before the 28th of July who, from the province of Quebec, he intends, if given the opportunity, to substitute for Mr. Lapointe; who, from the Maritime Provinces, he intends to substitute for Col Ralston; who, from Ontario, he intends to substitute for Mr. Malcolm, and who, from the Canadian West, he intends to substitute for Mr. Dunning? The Canadian people have a right to know who are to be their representatives at these two great conferences. The people have a right to know, in addition, who for the next five years, the other members of the government of Canada are likely to be.

"In the general elections of 1911, when the Liberal party in Canada under its great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appealed to the country on a trade issue in the nature of reciprocity in natural products betwen Canada and the United States, a measure of greater freedom in trade so far as this continent was concerned, and of wider markets for the producers in the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, the forces that were opposed to the tariff changes then proposed, allied under the cry of 'we are at the parting of the ways.'"

"At Meeting of Ways"

"I do not intend to go the length of saying that, having regard to the measure of increased trade assured by the budget of 1930 between Canada and Great Britain, and between Canada and all other parts of the British Empire, we are 'at the parting of the ways,' or that the rejection of the budget, for such would be the significance of the defeat of the present government at this general election, would mean an end to all endeavor further to promote interempire trade. I do, however, say what in very truth I believe to be the fact, that so far as interempire trade is concerned, 'we are at last, at the meeting of the ways,' and that the acceptance of this budget by the people on July 28 will do more than all else to ensure for Canada's representatives at the economic conference in London that favorable response to our attitude and action which we believe will be given by the government of Great Britain and by the governments of all the sister Dominions of the Empire. It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may help to determine whether the highways of Empire are to become, as we hope they may increasingly become, the avenues of a British commerce expanding ever so widely, o'er land and sea, or whether, insofar as the component parts of the Empire are concerned, its highways are to remain indistinguishable from the other trade routes of the world."

Three Main Issues

"There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign," the prime minister began. "The first is the record of the government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third, is the direct issue of the representatives of Canadian opinion at the imperial and economic conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year. This last issue is necessarily related to the question of the personnel of the ministry which is to manage the affairs of our country during the ensuing term of parliament.

"It is not easy to say which of the issues is the most important. All are of the greatest importance. They relate to the past; to the present and to the future. Perhaps I had better discuss them in this order.

"Were there no other issue before the people, I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances, we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years," asserted Mr. King, in dealing with the record of the government. "For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history. As a people and as a government we have been far too modest with respect to the achievements of the years we have been in office.

"We have been so modest, in fact, that the record is but partially known even to the people of our own country. The growth and development of Canada under the present administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation. It is right that these facts should be known and I propose to make the record of the administration an open book from one end of the country to the other.

"Gloomy Memories"

"Standing on a record of sound, progressive accomplishment, we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The 'whispers of death,' the fear of returning depression, the complaints of an exodus which has ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party, whose last tenure of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apparently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days."

Mr. King went at length into the financial record of the government. On March 31, 1914, the net debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000, he said.

"On March 31, 1922, as the result of the war, and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debt had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000. In the last two years of the Conservative administration no less than $174,000,000 had been added to the public debt. In addition not less than $355,000,000 had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years 1919-1922.

"Depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contracted; agriculture was depressed. Against this dark background; which is still a vivid memory to many of us today, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways; revived industry; stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known."

Revenues Increased

The government, continued the prime minister, had approached the problem first by curtailment of expenditures and second by increasing revenues. The latter had, of necessity, to be accomplished by additional taxation which, he said, was "traditionally unpopular." The Conservative government had avoided taxing the people to meet the increased costs due to the war, and had raised the necessary money by loan, a very considerable part of which was made exempt from taxation. He was aware that this statement had been challenged, but it was nevertheless true.

"Where the previous administration avoided their responsibility, we met our's courageously and without regard to political consequences," continued Mr. King. "We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national budget. To have continued the other course would have brought the country into a condition of bankruptcy.

"Within two years our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our budget but to give us on the 31st of March, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000. From that time forward, we began to pay off annually without intermission, an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

Fifteen Surpluses

"I say here in all the years in which there was a surplus; four of which were under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in 15 out of 63 years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present administration has held office. The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office. This is a record of accomplishment which is unequalled by any country or any government which participated in the late war from its commencement.

Reference to the tax reductions followed. Mr. King spoke of the various reductions in the income tax since 1926 up to those contained in the last budget. He referred to the persistent decreases in the sales tax which had brought it down from six to one percent. And he added: With this gradual elimination of the sales tax, I need not ask you ladies and gentlemen, what will happen to that one percent if the present administration is returned to office. He stated that the socalled 'nuisance taxes" had now all been eliminated with the exception of the two cents on cheques above $10, and he mentioned the reduction in the rates of letter postage in Canada from three to two cents and the re-establishment of penny postage.

"Leaving out of account the degree to which the postal revenues may have been affected by these reductions, it is estimated there has been saved to the Canadian taxpayer, of taxation which would otherwise have been collected, the following sums:

For the year	1926	$25,000,000
- - -	1927	27,000,000
- - -	1928	19,000,000
- - -	1929	25,000,000
- - -	1930	22,000,000

$118,000,000 Tax Cut

"Thus in five years," continued the prime minister, "there has been an estimated remission of taxation which would otherwise have been collected solely from the sources indicated, of an amount exceeding $118,000,000. The remissions indicated have been cumulative, assuming conditions similar to those of the last five years. From now on the amount of taxation imposed each year will be $118,000,000 less per annum than it was prior to 1926. May I add that all this takes no account of the further remissions of taxation affected by the reductions of duties under the several revisions of the tariff which have taken place since we came into office, and which as the country well knows, have been substantial."

The record of the government in respect to transportation was touched on by Mr. King.

"When we came into office," he said, "with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the railways of Canada in a completely disorganized and bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in the hands of a receiver. The Grand Trunk railway system had been acquired under arbitration, but it, too, was bankrupt, and the government which took over the road had studiously refrained from giving so much as an indication as to whether or not it was to be operated as a government owned system or whether the intention, in its acquisition, was to have the road subsequently re-transferred to private ownership.

Defends Rail Policy

"I notice that Mr. Bennett is saying that the records of parliament show that the Liberal party, when in opposition, opposed the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway as a government owned system. The Liberal party did nothing of the kind. What we did object to was the refusal of the government of the day to submit to parliament for approval the terms and conditions of the contract under which the system was to be acquired.

"We contended that, as the people were being made responsible for the purchase of the system, by terms arranged by agreement, the people's representatives in parliament were entitled to know what those terms were and to approve of them, before final acquisition of the system was made. This, however, government of the day refused to allow, though at a subsequent session of parliament, having failed to include some essential features of the transaction in the agreement, they were obliged to submit the whole measure to parliament and, in order to permit of the additional terms being inserted, to secure its approval which they were of course able to do in virtue of their majority."

Secured Thornton

'It was the present administration which made the necessary provision for the president and the board of directors of the system, and it was the present administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as president and chairman of the board," declared Mr. King. "It was the present administration that laid down the policy that there should be no political interference with the management or operation of the Canadian National Railways.

"Sir Henry Thornton has publicly testified, on more occasions than one, that the government has lived up to this policy, alike in letter and in spirit. It was the present administration which laid down as a further policy of railway management and operation in this country that government ownership was to be given a fair trial; and that, as between the government owned National Railways and the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway, there should be neither fear nor favor in the respective treatment to be accorded these roads. I venture to say that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his board of directors will be the first to say that, in the fulfilment of this policy, the government has sought to be scrupulously fair."

"Perhaps I should not be too severe on our opponents for seeking today to claim paternity of the Canadian National Railways. Their action in this regard is more or less characteristic of human nature. When the Tory party, as we came into office, left this neglected and famished foundling on our doorstep, suffering from many forms of malnutrition, there was not one member of the whole party who was prepared to allow his name to have any association with it, but now that the infant has been revived and has grown into vigorous and powerful proportions, resembling those of Sir Henry Thornton himself, not a few of them wish to give it their name. They say that on no account will they part with it, and Mr. Bennett heroically says that he will sacrifice an office which he does not hold rather than see it pass out of the hands of the state."

Hudson Bay Railway

"But organization of the Canadian National Railways has not been our only achievement in the realm of transportation. We have brought the Hudsons Bay Railway to completion, though the rails on a part of this road had been taken up by our opponents while in office, and the partially constructed roadbed allowed to fall into disrepair and decay."

"We have acquired, and, by making them a part of the Canadian National system, have revitalized not a few of the smaller privately owned railways in different parts of the dominion, and we have, on more than one occasion, made provision through parliament for extensive branch line construction in other parts of the country.

"We have completed the Welland Canal, and we have effected other developments with respect to St. Lawrence waterways, on which I shall have opportunity to say something on another occasion. I wish that time permitted me to say something of the developments in aviation, which the government has steadily sought to initiate and advance.

"May I now say a word with respect to immigration," the premier went on. "You have heard a great deal about our boys and girls leaving for the United States. You have heard a great deal about foreign immigration being encouraged to the relative disadvantage of immigration from the British Isles. During part of the time you have been told that we were not bringing in a sufficient number of immigrants; at another time the complaint has been that the number was excessive. The policy of the Conservative party, as outlined by General McRae, was that of a huge colonization and land settlement scheme involving an expenditure of some $300,000,000 and the bringing in of 300,000 fresh immigrants. Perhaps Mr. Bennett will tell the west how this policy, which he supported, would have helped to lessen the present unemployment of which he has had much to say during the present campaign.

Trend Toward U. S.

"It is quite true that, during the years immediately following our coming into office the trend of migration continued to be from Canada to the States. The reasons for that were very obvious. The United States had prospered while we had suffered through the war.

"During the period of re-establishment of our citizen-soldiery in Canada, preferences in the matter of employment were being given where possible to those who had served overseas. There were not the opportunities for employment here that there were in the country to the south for many of our boys and girls. Not a few of them and of our grown-ups as well left on that account. Moreover, the springs of immigration had, during the war, and the period immediately following the war, been permitted to dry up at the source.

"It takes time for a movement of immigration to get under way. Many had not the wherewithal to migrate in numbers from the British Isles or from other countries after the war, that they had had before, and Canada had not the free homesites to offer, nor was she able to advertise these or to give the low ocean and railway rates which were so important an inducement to British immigration in former years.

"It was not very long, however, before the fruits of our effort became apparent. Little by little the migration of Canadians to the United States began to lessen. In increasing numbers Canadians began to return from the United States to Canada, until today, while conditions of employment in Canada may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States, or, for that matter, in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals today the migration from Canada to the United States. These are the facts and, far from affording grounds of criticism, they are in the nature of a real achievement.

"With regard to the allegation that the government was preferring foreign to British immigration, it did not take very long to establish the facts. The findings of the parliamentary committee were to the effect that, while Canada was spending 11 cents per capita on continental immigrants, she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on imigrants from the British Isles. Reference to the statistics of the British Empire shows that of citizens of the British Isles emigrating of recent years to other dominions and other parts of the world, Canada has been receiving by a very long way the largest proportion.

Provincial Control

"The most recent development in our immigration policy has been to link more closely the governments of the provinces and our own government; in the determination of the classes and numbers of immigrants to be brought to Canada. With the return to the western provinces of their natural resources, we have felt that more in the way of provincial control of immigration was desirable, more particularly as the provinces themselves are the first to feel any adverse effects of an inadequate or an excessive immigration."

Mr. King dealt with the principles which underlay the government tariff policies.

"We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries," he asserted.

"We have recognized that, if our manufacturing and trade were to expand that world markets as well as home markets were an essential, and we hav recognized, further, that what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent in no inconsiderable measure upon the costs of production and the cost of living in our own land.

"So we have striven in our tariff revisions, consistently, to take those steps which, without injury to any legitimate business in the country, would at the same time tend to make possible more in the way of production in our basic industries, through reduction of duties of the instruments of production required in those industries, and on the necessities of life of those employed therein and in the manufactures and other businesses of our country."

He made brief reference to the tariff revisions effected by the present administration since taking office in 1921, and which culminated in the revision concluded in the last budget. Canada, he said, now stood as the sixth great trading country of the world.

Exports Enormous

"You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials; that we are parting with our birthright. Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of raw materials which Canada imports from the United States for the manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceed in value the total value of the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that the per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain.

"Let me add that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present government came into office at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29. In other words there has been a doubling of our total domestic export trade in a period of seven years. This spectacular increase of trade is no mere chance. It is the result of wise policies effectively administered by the department of trade and commerce.

"May I remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country," said Mr. King with respect to the government labor policies. "May I remind you that it was a Liberal administration which created the Canadian department of labor, which introduced its 'fair wages' policy, and which this year has given statutory effect to the payment of fair wages and to an eight-hour day on all public works carried out under contract for the dominion government, and with respect to all labor in the government's own employ."

Liberal policies with respect to the war veterans were touched on by Mr. King. Canada's war pension legislation, he believed, was the most advanced in the world. He referred to what had been accomplished at the last session of parliament.

Resources Returned

Then Mr. King went on to speak of the return of the natural resources to the prairie and British Columbia. For 30 years, he said, this had been a problem for different governments. It remained, he said, for the present administration to restore these lands. Ever since their entry into confederation, the Maritime Provinces had felt that they had not had a square deal.

"Here and there, in patchwork fashion, some adjustments have been made in dealing with particular grievances as they arose.

"It remained for the present administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesmanlike fashion. This we have done with respect to their transportation problems, with respect to the problems of their industries, with respect to their subsidies, with respect to their harbor and trade facilities, and to all other matters having a bearing upon the economic welfare of the Maritimes as an integral part of our dominion.

"I have not time to go into the provisions of these several agreements, but I do not hesitate to say that an examination of their provisions reveals a generosity in the manner of the treatment of those provinces such as has never characterized similar negotiations in the history of our dominion.

"And here may I point out that something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the premier of this province and his government in this general election, namely that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present administration at Ottawa. It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments, or, as happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative governments.

"Our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or ill will.

Stronger Confederation

"By our action in these particulars we have made over and strengthened the superstructure of confederation.

"I say without fear of contradiction, that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several provinces and the federal government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

"But if we have improved relations within the dominion between the governments of the provinces and the federal government, if we have removed sectional antagonisms and helped to develop a truly national spirit, what may not also be said of our achievements in inter-imperial and international relations?

"Here I come to the work of the imperial conference and the economic conference of 1923; the work of the imperial conference of 1926, the work of the subsidiary conference on the operation of dominion legislation, which concluded its sittings in London last autumn. Out of these conferences has come, for the first time in the history of the relations of Great Britain and the dominions, a statement of their relative positions, which has removed from the realm of possible controversy all further talk of colonial subordination, and which has accorded to Canada and to the other self-governing dominions a national status equal to that of Great Britain herself.

"With this clear recognition of nationhood these has come a corresponding development in free and effective co-operation, not only with the mother country, but with the sister nations of the commonwealth."

Liberal Pathfinders

"Let me invite you to look beyond the Empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds today? Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking, there has been the sudden steep ascent of war in which there were common heroisms and common sacrifices, and there has been the long, gradual, constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer."

The Conservative party had opposed every step of the way toward the responsible self-government of Canada in external affairs, the prime minister charged.

"When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties, we were seeking separation because forsooth we asked his majesty, in regard to an international negotiation on a matter of Canadian concern, to give full powers to a Canadian minister of the crown instead of to the British ambassador at Washington. When a little later we opened a legation at Washington and subsequently at Paris and Tokio we were again told that we were pursuing the path of separation. Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about 'Canada First.' Just what does his 'Canada first' mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the establishment of Canadian legations in other lands, and on Canada's status of co-equality with the motherland. I am not sure where he stands today, but I know where he stood in the session of Parliament just closed."

FLASHES FROM FIRST SPEECH OF RT. HON. MACKENZIE KING

When expenditures directly attributable to the war are deducted, it will be found that the total expenditures of Canada to-day are very little more than in 1914, notwithstanding the great increase in population and the fact that the value of the dollar to-day is only two-thirds of what it was in 1914.

At the present rate, the total public debt of Canada would be paid off entirely in the course of the next 40 years.

The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts since confederation is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office.

In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of 63 years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present administration has held office.

I need not ask you what will happen to the 1 per cent. of the sales tax remaining if the present administration is returned to office.

Whenever there has been a Liberal government in office, further increases have been made in the British preference. I think I am right in saying that never once under a Conservative government has any British preference or increase of British preference been given.

The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was framed with a view to holding for Western Canada the market for her wheat.

In the reciprocity campaign of 1911 the cry of the Tory party was, "No truck nor trade with the Yankees." This year it has come dangerously near being, "No truck nor trade with Britain."

We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us.

When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds to-day? There has been the long, gradual constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer.

Responsible self-government, not in internal affairs alone, but also in external affairs, is the corner-stone of our empire as it exists to-day. Canada blazed the trail which others have followed. In our progress towards that achievement we have been opposed by the Conservative party every step of the way.

It is, I believe, absolutely true that Canada's war pension legislation is the most advanced in the world.

No nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year, 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year, 1928-29.

Canada now stands as the sixth on the list of the great trading countries of the world.

While conditions of employment in Canada may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States, or, for that matter, in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals to-day the migration from Canada to the United States. These are the facts, and, far from affording grounds of criticism, they are in the nature of a real achievement.

The people of Canada must decide which party shall represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial Conference. Shall it be the party which labored and achieved, or shall it be the party that obstructed and opposed? The Conservative party opposed the separate signature of treaties. It opposed the establishment of Canadian legations abroad. It attempted to throw derision on the profoundly significant declaration of the Imperial Conference of 1926.

With the establishment of the advisory board on tariff and taxation, the day has gone for the making of tariffs on impulse, or because of momentary resentments.

While operating deficits of the Canadian National Railways have been changed into operating revenues, this has been accomplished by far-reaching reductions in railway rates in all parts of Canada.

Within the period of office of the present administration, Canada has welcomed for the first time in her history, the leaders of all the political parties in Britain, two of them in the office of prime minister.

RECORD OF GOVERNMENT LONDON ECONOMIC MEET AND BUDGET ARE ISSUES

Support Asked for Policies Which Lift Canada From Despond to Prosperity—Premier Leaves "Whisper of Death" to Bennett While He Plans Greater Dominion

MACKENZIE KING OPENS HIS CAMPAIGN

The following is an extended report of Premier King's speech at Brantford last night:

"It is now about a month and a half since I announced in parliament the intention of the government to hold a general election this year, and since that time public discussion both in and out of parliament has centred more or less upon the issues of the campaign now in progress.

"On July 28 the people of Canada will be asked to decide the policies and administration which are to guide the destinies of the Dominion during the next five years. It is the privilege, and indeed the duty of Canadian citizens to examine carefully the views presented by those who seek their confidence, and to record their votes freely and honestly in support of the administration and of the policies which they believe are designed to serve the best interests of our country.

"There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign. The first is the record of the government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third is the direct issue of a choice between Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year.

"Let me deal first of all with the record of the government; not only our record since we were returned to office in September, 1926, but our record from the time we first came into office in December, 1921.

"Were there no other issue before the people, I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances, we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years. For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history. The growth and development of Canada under the present administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation.

"Standing on a record of sound progressive accomplishment, we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The 'whispers of death,' the fear of returning depression, the complaints of an exodus which has ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party whose last tenure of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apparently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days.

"On March 31, 1914, the debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000.

"On March 31, 1922, as a result of the war, and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debt had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000. In the last two years of the Conservative administration no less than $174,000,000 had been added to the public debt. In addition not less than $355,000,000 had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years 1919-22. Depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contradicted; agriculture was depressed.

Period of Progress

"Against this dark background, which is still a vivid memory to many of us to-day, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known.

"We approached the problem from two directions; first, by the curtailment of expenditures, the second, with the raising of increased revenues by the necessary additional taxes. The second of these methods is traditionally unpopular. The previous administration had avoided it, at a time when the patriotism of the people might well have been counted on to support increased taxation to meet the tremendous cost of the war.

"Sir Thomas White has said that we should not include in the expenditures for the six years mentioned those made on capital account and on account of railway subsidies, which amounted in the six years to $8,500,000, also what appears in the public accounts as 'other charges,' being in fact largely the costs involved in raising loans. The only other possible figures that Sir Thomas might wish to exclude were non-active advances to the then bankrupt railways in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920, aggregating $45,780,000.

"My reply to this is, that in our expenditures for the eight and a half years we have been in office, we have included all expenditures made on account of capital outlay, all subsidies, or non-active advances to railways, and expenditures incurred in the negotiation of loans. So long as a like method of accounting is carried out with respect to both periods, and so long as what is meant is fully understood by all, no exception can be taken.

"I might add that of our total expenditures to-day it is estimated that forty per cent. is immediately attributable to the war, and had there been no war, would not appear in the public accounts. The additional provision made for war veterans by this year's legislation will still further increase the percentage due to expenditures arising out of the war.

"Where the previous administration avoided their responsibilities we met ours courageously and without regard to political consequences. We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national budget. To have continued the other course would have brought the country into a condition of bankruptcy. Within two years our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our budget but to give us on the 31st March, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000.

"From that time forward we began to pay off annually without intermission an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

Reducing Deficits

"May I say here that in all the years from Confederation down to the time that we came into office there were only eight years in which there was a surplus, four of which were under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of sixty-three years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present administration has held office. The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office. At the rate at which we have been reducing debt during the past four years, the total public debt of Canada would be paid off entirely in the course of the next forty years.

"Not only has the national debt been steadily reduced, but expenditures have been kept down to the minimum, consistent with efficient administration. Despite a period of unparalleled prosperity during the past five years, the government has kept national expenditures within prudent limits, and has thus set an example of thrift and economy for the country at large."

The long list of income tax reductions were enumerated by Premier King. The corporation tax was reduced to 8 per cent. on incomes in excess of $2,000. The exemption on each child was raised from $200 to $300. The salary exemption was raised from $2,000 to $3,000 in the case of married persons or persons with dependents.

The same course was pursued by the premier in connection with the sales tax reductions, until only 1 per cent. is left. "I need not ask you, ladies and gentlemen," said Premier King, "what will happen to that 1 per cent. if the present administration is returned to office."

The subject of immigration next received Premier King's attention, especially the refutation of Canadian emigration on a large scale into the United States. Such a movement, he contended, was very temporary, since the United States had prospered far more than Canada during the war, but now, owing to policies of the government in encouraging Canadian industry, Canada is more prosperous than the United States and the tide of migration is pouring back here, including many citizens of the United States.

"While conditions of employment in Canada," he admitted, "may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States or for that matter in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals to-day the migration from Canada to the United States."

British Preference

He easily spiked the allegation that the government was preferring foreign to British immigration, citing the alacrity with which the government had taken up this challenge of Mr. Bennett in the House, and had appointed an impartial commission to determine the facts, which showed that while Canada was spending 11 cents per capita on continental immigrants, she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on immigrants from the British Isles.

"I need not remind you that we have regarded the development of the great basic industries as fundamental in our national progress," he continued. "We have recognized from the start that our manufacturing industries and our trade, both domestic and foreign, were dependent more than on aught else upon the utilization of our great natural resources.

"We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries."

Premier King briefly summarized some of the most familiar reductions in the tariff that have benefited the consumer since the present administration came into power. First, there was the reduction on some instruments of production, boots and shoes, sugar and textiles. The second year of the administration there was an additional 10 per cent. discount in the British preference rate on goods brought in through Canadian ports. In 1924 came great reductions on motor cars, motor trucks and other motor vehicles. This year, by the British preference, there is a complete removal of all duties on tea, porcelain, household utensils and other commodities affecting the homes of the people throughout Canada. All these changes lessened the cost of living. On account of a reduction in costs of production, all the people benefited from the great industries of agriculture, lumber, mining, fishing, and also from the manufacturing industries. Both at home and abroad, Canada's trade had extended.

"I shall have, I fear, to reserve for another time what I would like to have told you to-night of our policies with respect to labor and with respect to war veterans," Premier King declared. "May I just remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country.

"The success which has attended our efforts to see that the provision made by the state for our war veterans and their dependents was both fair and generous, is, I think, well known. It is, I believe, absolutely true that Canada's war pension legislation is the most advanced in the world and that no other nation has made provision for its ex-service men and their dependents on a scale of such open-handed justice as this country. The war veterans' allowances act, the revised machinery for dealing with pension claims, the decision to give to men who have served overseas the benefit of the doubt as to the cause of disability where application is made for pension; these and other measures, while supported by members of all parties in the House of Commons, are nevertheless a part of the record of Liberal policy and achievement.

"And here may I point out something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the premier of this province and his government in this general election, namely, that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present administration at Ottawa.

Eradicate Grievances

"It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative governments, our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity these long standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or illwill.

"By our action in these particulars we have made over and strengthened the superstructure of Confederation. We have, at the same time, in the increased financial provisions which we have made for those provinces, reinforced its foundations. I say without fear of contradiction, that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several provinces and the federal government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

"Let me invite you to look beyond the empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds to-day?" he asked. "Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking, there has been the sudden steep ascent of war in which there were common heroisms and common sacrifices, and there has been the long, gradual, constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer.

"In this brief summary of the government's record, I have not had opportunity to make so much as mention of the positi.. Canada has taken within the past few years at international conferences and at the League of Nations, a position not merely of helpful co-operation, but of leadership as well. Not only has Canada had a place on the Council of the League of Nations, and played an important role at its assemblies, but a member of the present government has held the high office of president of the Assembly of the League. We were one of the first countries of the world to signify our approval of the Briand-Kellogg pact, and were among its original signatories in Paris. We were the first of the British countries to urge the acceptance of the optional clause for the settlement of international disputes by arbitration. We were represented with distinction in London at the recent conference on the limitation of naval armaments. In Washington, Paris and Tokio our representation abroad has won for our country added and worthy recognition alike in America, Europe and the Orient."

The premier then turned to the question of the budget.

The anomaly of trying to fit the so-called "National Policy" of Sir John A. Macdonald and the Conservatives formulated in 1878 to the vastly changed Canada of to-day was exposed by Premier King. In other words, the Conservative party to-day says that Canada needs even more in the way of protection than she needed fifty years ago for the infant, struggling industries of that time.

A Compact Nation

"But is that the Canada we know to-day?" the premier asked. We have ceased to be a dominion of scattered provinces. We are a compact nation. There is no break in the chain from coast to coast. Our agencies of transportation and communication are world agencies.

"When we increased the British preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reduced duties on the implements of production, when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the National Policy and that we would ruin the country.

"I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedom of trade is the more deserving of being called a National Policy as we approach the third decade of the twentieth century. A national policy to-day in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world. It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets. It is essentially a policy of world markets.

"The budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four main proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1. The iron and steel tariff revision.
2. Countervailing duties.
3. The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4. Extension of the British preference.

"The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the tariff advisory board which have been conducted over a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an inquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great basic industries. The purpose kept in mind by the government in prosecuting this inquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain. This in turn was in conformity with the announced intention of the government to facilitate trade with those countries which are willing to trade with Canada on equal terms.

"The next feature of the budget, namely the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us. For the present we raise duties on these selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by other countries, but at the same time we tell our neighbor frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis. On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be one-sided.

Meet Growers' Needs

"In revising the customs tariff on fruits and vegetables, the government has had before it the evidence presented to the tariff advisory board on several occasions by those who were primarily interested in this important branch of our agricultural production. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and vegetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of other countries. It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers.

"We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates, which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules.

"In this manner we have endeavored to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which these specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of the consumers of these commodities. In past year, moreover, a large proportion of our early fruits and vegetables has been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business. Under the existing trade agreement these islands have assured us of a preference in their market. In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruits and vegetables under the British preference. Already we have seen what the response of other parts of the British Empire is likely to be to this attitude and policy. Bermuda has given to us since our budget was introduced, additional preference or free entry of our agricultural manufactured products, and this very week there is assembling at Trinidad representatives of all the British West Indies for the purpose of considering closer trade relations with our country.

"This brings me to the last feature of the budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British crown which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets, and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries to-day do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

Reciprocal Preference

"The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them to-day. They have said that we must have preference for preference, and that no favors should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forego the policy of free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on a basis of reciprocal preference.

Premier King quoted statements by the late Hon. Mr. Robb and himself in the House and throughout the country, outlining step by step their attitude in face of the threatened increase in duties by the new United States tariff and their reasons for waiting until it was certain what the United States were really going to do before action by the government of Canada. In no way, he pointed out, was it the intention of Canada to be provocative.

"The people of Canada may rely upon the present administration taking care of Canadian trade in future," he quoted, "as we have taken care of it in the past. They may rely upon the Canadian tariff being made to serve Canadian interests. No situation has arisen during the past nine years which has not been satisfactorily met. The government is fully prepared in the interests of Canada to readjust its fiscal policy from time to time to meet any changes in existing fiscal structures which may affect our markets.

"I do not think I need devote any time to exposing the weakness of the 'stolen clothes' and 'made in Washington' cries. As I have already said, if both are true the Conservative party stands self-condemned. The Liberal party has never had occasion to steal political clothes from any party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Conservative party. The Liberal party has its own consistent policy, a policy of moderation, a policy which has developed from time to time to meet the changing conditions in the world and in Canada itself. If it had been so ill-advised as to seek Conservative garments, where would it have found them? At the Winnipeg convention, where it will be recalled that the whole Conservative party was painfully careful to make sure that the word 'protection' appeared in not a line of its platform? Or from the Winnipeg address of Mr. Bennett last week, when protection returned in full and resounding force not so much as a political garment as a political umbrella, or political omnibus. You may have noticed how at Winnipeg Mr. Bennett declared there was to be protection for labor and agriculturists, for producers and consumers, as well as for manufacturers and others. Just how that protection is to be brought about he did not say. He has been studiously vague and indefinite, and he has not mentioned a single specific change that he would propose.

"But whatever Mr. Bennett and his followers may say of 'stolen clothes' and of 'made in Washington' policies, they will scarcely be able to say that either epithet applies to the increases made in the British preference, and which, after all, constitute the central feature of the budget.

"Gave Us Equality"

"May I ask you to ponder this question both now and until your votes are cast. Should the government of this country be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference excepting on a basis of hard bargaining, and who would destroy the foundations of good-will upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded to-day?

"Mr. Bennett and his party insist that we should give absolutely no preference to the mother country unless as the result of a bargain, unless in return for an equivalent tariff preference from Great Britain. Is it true that we have received no advantage in Britain's market? It is true that Britain has not, except in a limited measure, established protective tariffs and given us a preferential reduction, but if she has not given us a preference over the foreigner she has given us equality with her own producers.

"We all wish to preserve and extend the British market. It has been our greatest outlet in the past. Whatever changes may come, it will remain a great and indispensable market.

"If Great Britain comes to the point where she is prepared to adopt a policy of protection and is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward any proposal for reciprocal trade to a successful conclusion. But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers, but is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The Conservative policy would deny the preference except on a basis unacceptable to Great Britain. It would cut down our imports from Great Britain at a time when Great Britain must sell us an increasing quantity of goods in exchange for our wheat. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the mother country in order that she may enlarge her exports to the mother country.

"In short, whatever fiscal policy may be adopted by Great Britain, Canada, under the guidance of the Liberal policy, and the Liberal policy alone, is in the fortunate position of being able to secure the utmost advantage in the British market."

Coming to the third of the issues—which party is to represent Canada at the imperial and economic conferences at London this year, Premier King described how the government, to Mr. Bennett's dismay, had eagerly accepted his challenge for a vote of the people, although the government was entitled to remain in office till November, 1931.

"The situation, however, became somewhat different," he said, "once the minister of finance had introduced his budget in the House, and it was apparent that the budget was likely to become a matter of political controversy.

"Those policies, as I have indicated, were deliberately shaped so as to make possible a wider measure of trade between this country and other portions of the British empire, Great Britain in particular. The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was framed with a view to holding for western Canada the market for her wheat which for so many years she has had in Great Britain, and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere. To secure from the people of Canada approval of these policies before the imperial conferences take place is, therefore, in our opinion, an all-important consideration if the conferences are to do for the further development of our trade what, with all confidence, we believe they will.

Far Reaching Changes

"Let me remind the people of our country that there are two conferences at which Canada is to be represented in London, the imperial conference and the imperial economic conference. At each of these conferences will be assembled representatives of the government of Great Britain and of the governments of each of the dominions and India. The imperial conference will deal more particularly with constitutional and political problems such as those of inter-imperial relations and foreign affairs. The imperial economic conference will deal more particularly with questions which are primarily economic such as matters of co-operation in inter-empire trade and communication.

"The imperial conference will give the seal of its approval to the far-reaching changes in constitutional status which have been brought about during the past seven years. In the task of creating a British commonwealth of nations on the basis of the national autonomy of its members, Canada, as I have already said, has played a pioneer role. At every step in our progress to the fulness of national stature the Liberal administration has encountered the opposition of the Conservative party. It opposed the separate signature of treaties. It opposed the establishment of Canadian legations abroad. It attempted to throw derision on the profoundly significant declaration of the imperial conference of 1926. Each of these events is recognized in Great Britain and throughout the empire as an essential feature of the great co-operative community which we call the British commonwealth. The people of Canada must decide which party shall represent Canadian opinion at the imperial conference. Shall it be the party which labored and achieved, or shall it be the party that obstructed and opposed?

"In the general election of 1911, when the Liberal party in Canada, under its great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appealed to the country on a trade issue in the nature of reciprocity in natural products between Canada and the United States, a measure of greater freedom in trade so far as this continent was concerned and of wider markets for the producers in the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, the forces that were opposed to the tariff changes then proposed, allied under the cry of 'we are at the parting of the ways.' I do not intend to go the length of saying that, having regard to the measure of increased trade assured by the budget of 1930 between Canada and Great Britain, and indeed between Canada and all other parts of the British empire, we are 'at the parting of the ways,' or that the rejection of the budget, for such would be the significance of the defeat of the present government at this general election, would mean an end to all endeavor further to promote inter-empire trade. I do, however, say, what in very truth I believe to be the fact, that so far as inter-empire trade is concerned, 'we are, at last, at the meeting of the ways,' and that the acceptance of this budget by the people on July 28, will do more than all else to ensure for Canada's representatives at the economic conference in London that favorable response to our attitude and action which we believe will be given by the government of Great Britain and by the governments of all the sister dominions of the empire. It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may help to determine whether the highways of empire are to become, as we hope they may increasingly become, the avenues of a British commerce expanding ever so widely, o'er land and sea, or, whether in so far as the component parts of the empire are concerned, its highways are to remain indistinguishable from the other trade routes of the world."

PREMIER HOLDS LIBERALS MADE CANADA SOUND

Claims Credit for Recent Years of Prosperity

SPEAKS AT BRANTFORD

Defends Record of "Progressive Accomplishment" in Opening Campaign

(By Canadian Press.)

Brantford, June 16.—The record of the Government, the budget and Canada's representation at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference—these are the major issues which the Canadian people are asked to pass upon at the coming election. They will be called upon to decide whether or not they believe in the policy of "blasting a way to trade" or if they prefer the viewpoint that trade is exchange for mutual advantage and that it "is secured not by ill-will but by goodwill."

Thus declared Prime Minister Mackenzie King in his keynote Liberal campaign speech here tonight. From the platform the words of the Prime Minister of Canada were carried over an all-Canadian radio hook-up into the homes of thousands of people across the Dominion from coast to coast. Mr. King spoke at length, dealing extensively with the record of the Government in respect to finance, taxation, natural resources, war veterans, labor, immigration, co-operation with the provinces, and more particularly with the important provisions of the budget.

"There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign," the Prime Minister said. "The first is the record of the government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third, is the direct issue of a choice between the Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and economic conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year. This last issue is necessarily related to the question of the personnel of the ministry which is to manage the affairs of our country during the ensuing term of parliament.

"It is not easy to say which of the issues is the most important. All are of the greatest importance. They relate to the past, to the present and to the future. Perhaps I had better discuss them in this order.

"Were there no other issue before the people, I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances, we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years," asserted Mr. King in dealing with the record of the government. "For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history. As a people and as a government we have been far too modest with respect to the achievements of the years we have been in office. We have been so modest, in fact, that the record is but partially known even to the people of our own country. The growth and development of Canada under the present administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation. It is right that these facts should be known, and I propose to make the record of the administration an open book from one end of the country to the other.

FUTURE PROBLEMS.

"Standing on a record of sound progressive accomplishment we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The 'whispers of death,' the fear of returning depression, the complaints of an exodus which has ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party whose last tenure of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apparently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days."

Mr. King went at length into the financial record of the government. On March 31, 1914, the net debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000, he said.

"On March 31, 1922, as a result of the war, and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debt had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000. In the last two years of the Conservative administration no less than $174,000,000 had been added to the public debt. In addition, not less than $355,000,000 had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years 1919-1922. Depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contracted; agriculture was depressed. Against this dark background, which is still a vivid memory to many of us today, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, coordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known."

The government, continued the Prime Minister, had approached the problem first by curtailment of expenditures and second by increasing revenues. The latter had, of necessity, to be accomplished by additional taxation which, he said, was "traditionally unpopular." The Conservative government had avoided taxing the people to meet the increased costs due to the war, and had raised the necessary money by loan, a very considerable part of which was made exempt from taxation. He was aware that this statement had been challenged, but it was nevertheless true.

RESPONSIBILITIES MET.

"Where the previous administration avoided their responsibilities we met ours courageously and without regard to political consequences," continued Mr. King. "We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national budget. To have continued the other course would have brought the country into a condition of bankruptcy. Within two years our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our budget but to give us on the 31st March, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000. From that time forward we began to pay off annually without intermission, an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

"May I say here that in all the years from Confederation down to the time that we came into office there were only eight years in which there was a surplus, four of which were under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of sixty-three years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present administration has held office. The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office. This is a record of accomplishment which is unequalled by any country or any government which participated in the late war from its commencement."

Reference to the tax reductions followed. Mr. King spoke of the various reductions in the income tax since 1926 up to those contained in the last budget. He referred to the persistent decreases in the sales tax which had brought it down from six to one per cent, and he added: "With this gradual elimination of the sales tax, I need not ask you ladies and gentlemen, what will happen to that one per cent if the present administration is returned to office." He stated that the so-called "nuisance taxes" had now all been eliminated with the exception of the two cents on cheques above ten dollars, and he mentioned the reduction in the rates of letter postage in Canada from three to two cents and the re-establishment of penny postage throughout the Empire.

"Leaving out of account the degree to which the postal revenues may have been affected by these reductions, it is estimated there has been saved to the Canadian taxpayer, of taxation which would otherwise have been collected, the following sums:

For the year 1926.....	$25,000,000
" " " 1927.....	27,000,000
" " " 1928.....	19,000,000
" " " 1929.....	25,000,000
" " " 1930.....	22,000,000

"Thus in five years," continued the Prime Minister, "there has been an estimated remission of taxation which would otherwise have been collected solely from the sources indicated, of an amount exceeding $118,000,000. The remissions indicated have been cumulative. Assuming conditions similar to those of the last five years, from now on the amount of taxation imposed each year will be $118,000,000 less per annum than it was prior to 1926. May I add that all this takes no account of the further remissions of taxation affected by the reductions of duties under the several revisions of the tariff which have taken place since we came into office, and which as the country well knows have been substantial."

TRANSPORTATION FACTS.

The record of the Government in respect to transportation was touched on by Mr. King.

"When we came into office," he said, "with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the railways of Canada in a completely disorganized and bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in the hands of a receiver. The Grand Trunk Railway system had been acquired under arbitration, but it, too, was bankrupt, and the Government which took over the road had studiously refrained from giving so much as an indication as to whether or not it was to be operated as a Government-owned system or whether the intention, in its acquisition, was to have the road subsequently re-transferred to private ownership.

"I notice that Mr. Bennett is saying that the records of Parliament show that the Liberal Party, when in opposition, opposed the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway as a Government-owned system. The Liberal Party did nothing of the kind. What we did object to was the refusal of the Government of the day to submit to Parliament for approval the terms and conditions of the contract under which the system was to be acquired. We contended that, as the people were being made responsible for the purchase of the system, by terms arranged by agreement, the people's representatives in Parliament were entitled to know what those terms were and to approve of them, before final acquisition of the system was made. This, however, the Government of the day refused to allow, though at a subsequent session of Parliament, having failed to include some essential features of the transaction in the agreement, they were obliged to submit the whole measure to Parliament and, in order to permit of the additional terms being inserted, to secure its approval which they were of course able to do in virtue of their majority."

"It was the present administration which made the necessary provision for the president and the board of directors of the system, and it was the present administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as president and chairman of the board," declared Mr. King. "It was the present administration that laid down the policy that there should be no political intereference with the management or operation of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton has publicly testified, on more occasions than one, that the Government has lived up to this policy, alike in letter and in spirit. It was the present administration which laid down as a further policy of railway management and operation in this country that Government ownership was to be given a fair trial, and that, as between the Government-owned National Railways and the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway, there should be neither fear nor favor in the respective treatment to be accorded these roads. I venture to say that the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his board of directors will be the first to say that, in the fulfillment of this policy, the Government has sought to be scrupulously fair."

"Perhaps I should not be too severe on our opponents for seeking today to claim paternity of the Canadian National Railways. Their action in this regard is more or less characteristic of human nature. When the Tory party, as we came into office, left this neglected and famished foundling on our doorstep, suffering from many forms of malnutrition, there was not one member of the whole party who was prepared to allow his name to have any association with it, but now that the infant has been revived and has grown into vigorous and powerful proportions, resembling those of Sir Henry Thornton himself, not a few of them wish to give it their name. They say that on no account will they part with it, and Mr. Bennett heroically says that he will sacrifice an office which he does not hold rather than see it pass out of the hands of the state."

HUDSON'S BAY RAILWAY.

"But organization of the Canadian National Railways has not been our only achievement in the realm of transportation. We have brought the Hudson's Bay Railway to completion, though the rails on a part of this road had been taken up by our opponents while in office, and the partially constructed roadbed allowed to fall into disrepair and decay. We have acquired, and, by making them a part of the Canadian National system, have revitalized not a few of the smaller privately-owned railways in different parts of the Dominion; and we have, on more than one occasion, made provision through parliament for extensive branch line construction in other parts of the country.

"We have completed the Welland canal, and we have effected other developments with respect to the St. Lawrence waterways, on which I shall have opportunity to say something on another occasion. I wish that time permitted me to say something of the developments in aviation, which the Government has steadily sought to initiate and advance.

"May I now say a word with respect to immigration," the premier went on. "You have heard a great deal about our boys and girls leaving for the United States. You have heard a great deal about foreign immigration being encouraged to the relative disadvantage of immigration from the British Isles. During part of the time you have been told that we were not bringing in a sufficient number of immigrants; at another time the complaint has been that the number was excessive. The policy of the Conservative party, as outlined by General McRae, was that of a huge colonization and land settlement scheme involving an expenditure of some $300,000,000 and the bringing in of 300,000 fresh immigrants. Perhaps Mr. Bennett will tell the west how this policy which he supported would have helped to lessen the present unemployment of which he has had much to say during the present campaign.

IMMIGRATION FACTORS

"It is quite true that, during the years immediately following our coming into office, the trend of migration continued to be from Canada to the States. The reasons for that were very obvious. The United States had prospered while we had suffered through the war. During the period of re-establishment of our citizen-soldiery in Canada, preferences in the matter of employment were being given where possible to those who had served overseas. There were not the opportunities for employment here that there were in the country to the south for many of our boys and girls. Not a few of them, and of our grown-ups as well, left on that account. Moreover, the springs of immigration had, during the war, and the period immediately following the war, been permitted to dry up at the source. It takes time for a movement of immigration to get under way, whatever its direction may be. People had not the wherewithal to migrate in numbers from the British Isles or from other countries after the war that they had had before, and Canada had not the free homesteads to offer, nor was she able to advertise these or to give the low ocean and railway rates which were so important an inducement to British immigration in former years.

"It was not very long, however, before the fruits of our effort became apparent. Little by little the migration of Canadians to the United States began to lessen. In increasing numbers Canadians began to return from the United States to Canada, until today, while conditions of employment in Canada may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States, or, for that matter, in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals today the migration from Canada to the United States. These are the facts and, far from affording grounds of criticism, they are in the nature of a real achievement.

"With regard to the allegation that the Government was preferring foreign to British immigration, it did not take very long to establish the facts. The findings of the parliamentary committee were to the effect that, while Canada was spending 11 cents per capita on continental immigrants she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on immigrants from the British Isles. Reference to the statistics of the British Empire shows that of citizens of the British Isles emigrating of recent years to other dominions and other parts of the world, Canada has been receiving by a very long way the largest proportion.

"The most recent development in our immigration policy has been to link more closely the governments of the provinces and our own Government in the determination of the classes and numbers of immigrants to be brought to Canada. With the return to the western provinces of their natural resources, we have felt that more in the way of provincial control of immigration was desirable, more particularly as the provinces themselves are the first to feel any adverse effects of an inadequate or an excessive immigration."

TARIFF POLICIES.

Mr. King dealt with the principles which underlay the Government tariff policies.

"We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade, would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries," he asserted. "We have recognized if our manufacturing and trade were to expand, that world markets as well as home markets were an essential, and we have recognized, further, that what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent in no inconsiderable measure upon the costs of production and the cost of living in our own land. So we have striven in our tariff revisions, consistently, to take those steps, which, without injury to any legitimate business in the country, would at the same time tend to make possible more in the way of production in our basic industries, through reduction of duties on the instruments of production required in those industries, and on the necessaries of life of those employed therein and in the manufactures and other businesses of our country."

He made brief reference to the tariff revisions effected by the present administration since taking office in 1921, and which culminated in the revision concluded in the last budget. Canada, he said, now stood as the sixth great trading country of the world.

"You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials; that we are parting with our birthright. Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of raw materials which Canada imports from the United States for her manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceed in value the total value of the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that the per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world with the exception of Great Britain.

"Let me add that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present Government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29. In other words, there has been a doubling of our total domestic export trade in a period of seven years. This spectacular increase of trade is no mere chance. It is the result of wise policies effectively administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

"May I remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace, in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country," said Mr. King with respect to the Government labor policies. "May I remind you that it was a Liberal administration which created the Canadian Department of Labor, which introduced its 'fair wages' policy, and which this year has given statutory effect to the payment of fair wages and to an eight-hour day on all public works carried out under contract for the Dominion Government, and with respect to all labor in the Government's own employ.

WAR VETERANS' STATUS.

Liberal policies with respect to the war veterans were touched on by Mr. King. Canada's war pension legislation, he believed, was the most advanced in the world. He referred to what had been accomplished at the last session of Parliament.

Then Mr. King went on to speak of the return of the natural resources to the prairie provinces and British Columbia. For thirty years, he said, this had been a problem for different governments. It remained, he said, for the present administration to restore these lands. Ever since their entry into Confederation, the Maritime Provinces had felt that they had not had a square deal.

"Here and there, in patchwork fashion, some adjustments have been made in dealing with particular grievances as they arose. It remained for the present administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesmanlike fashion. This we have done with respect to their transportation problems; with respect to the problems of their industries; with respect to their subsidies; with respect to their harbor and trade facilities, and to all other matters having a bearing upon the economic welfare of the Maritimes as an integral part of our Dominion.

"I have not time to go into the provisions of these several agreements, but I do not hesitate to say that an examination of their provisions reveal a generosity in the manner of the treatment of those provinces such as has never characterized similar negotiations in the history of our Dominion. And here may I point out that something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the Premier of this province and his Government in this general election, namely, that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present administration at Ottawa. It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative governments, our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that, in the interests of national unity, these long-standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or ill-will.

"By our action in these particulars we have made over and strengthened the superstructure of Confederation. We have, at the same time, in the increased financial provisions which we have made for those provinces, reinforced its foundations. I say without fear of contradiction that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several provinces and the Federal Government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

"But if we have improved relations within the Dominion between the governments of the provinces and the Federal Government, if we have removed sectional antagonisms and helped to develop a truly national spirit, what may not also be said of our achievements in intra-Imperial and international relations? Here I come to the work of the Imperial Conference and the Economic Conference of 1923; the work of the Imperial Conference of 1926, the work of the subsidiary conference on the operation of Dominion legislation, which concluded its sittings in London last autumn. Out of these conferences has come, for the first time in the history of the relations of Great Britain and the Dominions, a statement of their relative positions, which has removed from the realm of possible controversy all further talk of colonial subordination, and which has accorded to Canada and to the other self-governing Dominions a national status equal to that of Great Britain herself. With this clear recognition of nationhood there has come a corresponding development in free and effective co-operation, not only with the Mother Country, but with the sister nations of the Commonwealth.

"Let me invite you to look beyond the Empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds today? Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking, there has been the sudden steep ascent of war, in which there were common heroism and common sacrifices, and there has been the long, gradual, constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer."

The Conservative party had opposed every step of the way toward the responsible self-government in Canadian external affairs, the Prime Minister charged.

SEPARATION ALLEGED.

"When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties we were told that we were seeking separation because, foresooth, we asked His Majesty in regard to an international negotiation on a matter of Canadian concern to give full powers to a Canadian Minister of the Crown instead of to the British ambassador at Washington. When a little later we opened a legation at Washington and subsequently at Paris and Tokio we were again told that we were pursuing the path of separation. Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about Canada first. Just what does his Canada first mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the establishment of Canadian legations in other lands, and on Canada's status of co-equality with the motherland. I am not sure where he stands today, but I know where he stood in the session of Parliament just closed."

Then Mr. King turned to the budget of 1930, which he termed the second great issue of the campaign. Policies must be framed to meet existing conditions, he said. The National Policy of 1878 would not suit the Canada of 1930. What was more, he declared, the old national policy advocated by the Conservatives had not always served to meet conditions in the past.

"When we increased the British preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reduced duties on the implements of production, when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the National Policy and that we would ruin the country," he said.

"I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedom of trade is the more deserving of being called a national policy as we approach the third decade of the twentieth century. A national policy today in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world. It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets. It is essentially a policy of world markets.

EFFECT OF DEVELOPMENT.

"With the rapid development of western Canada and the emergence of a great agricultural population engaged in the production of a commodity which must seek its markets throughout the world, high protection, or an all round increase in the tariff can no longer be called a national policy. According to figures given in the Canada Year Book of 1929, over 80 per cent. of Canadian manufacturing is concentrated in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This percentage is based on figures of production, capital employed, and number of employees. While it is true that manufacturing has developed to a considerable extent in western Canada, these manufactures are based largely upon the primary industries of agriculture and mining and do not require tariff protection to any considerable extent. It is, therefore, true to say that a general increase in the tariff in 1930 is essentially a sectional policy so far as the distribution of its benefits is concerned. It has forfeited every right to the name—National Policy—given to it by Sir John A Macdonald in 1878, and by Mr. Bennett in 1930.

"But if high protection is a sectional policy in the distribution of its benefits, it is equally true that having regard to the present industrial development of central Canada a free trade policy would be detrimental in its immediate effects to one section of the Dominion, even though it conferred benefits on those of our citizens who are obliged to seek markets abroad for their agricultural produce and who derive little or no advantage from a protective tariff.

"It is apparent, therefore, that both a high tariff and free trade are sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada. What then is the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interests arising out of the tariff is the same as it is with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions. To the greatest possible extent sectional interests must be reconciled in the light of the larger interests of the whole. This can be effected only by moderation and compromise. Face the facts of our situation. Take Canada as it is, with its changing needs and its conflicting interests. Acknowledge the facts of geography and of divergent industrial development in East, and Centre, and West. And having examined the realities of the situation, and having considered the demands of different sections for policies suited to their needs, so mould our social, transportation and fiscal policies as to hold the scales evenly between class and creed and section. Thus weld a far flung country into a united Canadian nation."

"The budget of 1930 was framed first of all to meet a situation in Canada arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes for policies suited to their needs. But because of the place which Canada has come to occupy in International trade, it was influenced also and in a special degree by our relations with two countries with which we are most closely associated in matters of commerce. The one is Great Britain. The other is the United States.

"When Mr. Hoover assumed office as president of the United States on March 11, 1929, the United States congress began carrying out a far-reaching revision of the tariff in conformity with the pledges given by the Republican party during the presidential campaign of the previous year. As that revision proceeded, it became increasingly apparent that the duties against Canadian agricultural products would be raised to such an extent as to cut off a considerable proportion of the existing Canadian exports to that country. In these circumstances, and in accordance with its policy of using every endeavor to find wider markets for Canadian products, the government gave instructions to the tariff advisory board to make a careful survey of the tariff schedules then applying against American imports, with a view to determining to what extent these imports could be purchased from Great Britain or from other parts of the British Empire.

"While this enquiry was proceeding, it was decided that an Imperial economic conference would be held in London in September of 1930, to consider the subject of closer co-operation in matters of trade between the various parts of the Empire and to discuss the various policies which would contribute towards that end.

LESS WHEAT PURCHASE.

Efforts had previously been made by the present administration to have this conference in Canada. Subsequently, a condition developed in Great Britain which led to a marked curtailment of purchases of Canadian wheat and resulted in a serious tie-up of our wheat in elevators, with consequent loss not only to Canadian growers, but to our transportation system, and to many branches of our industry and commerce. Prior to this development, Great Britain had purchased far more from Canada, largely because of our wheat exports, than Canada had purchased from Great Britain. It became apparent that if Canada was to maintain a British market for Canadian wheat it was desirable that measures should be taken by diverting to Great Britain, many of the purchases being made at present in the United States and in other ways, to increase British imports to Canada and thus create and economic and psychological condition in Great Britain more favorable to the importation of Canadian wheat. These circumstances must be kept clearly in mind when examining the proposals in the budget presented to the House of Commons on May 1st.

"The budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four main proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

"1. The iron and steel tariff revision.

"2. Countervailing duties.

"3. The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.

"4. Extension of the British preference.

"The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the tariff advisory board, which have been conducted over a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an inquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great basic industries. The purpose kept in mind by the government in prosecuting this inquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain. This in turn was in conformity with the announced intention of the government to facilitate trade with these countries which are willing to trade with Canada on equal terms.

COUNTERVAILING DUTIES.

"The next feature of the budget, namely, the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us. For the present we raise the duties on those selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by other countries, but at the same time we tell our neighbor frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis. On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be one-sided.

"In revising the customs tariff on fruits and vegetables, the Government has had before it the evidence presented to the tariff advisory board on several occasions by those who were primarily interested in these important branches of our agricultural production. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and vegetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of other countries.

RATE DIFFICULTIES.

"It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers. We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates, which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules. In this manner we have endeavored to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which these specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of the consumers of those commodities. In past years, moreover, a large proportion of our early fruits and vegetables have been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business. Under the existing trade agreement those islands have assured us of a preference in their market. In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruits and vegetables under the British preference. Already we have seen what the response of other parts of the British Empire is likely to be to this attitude and policy. Bermuda has given to us since our budget was introduced additional preference or free entry on some of our agricultural manufactured products and this very week there are assembling at Trinidad representatives of all the British West Indies for the purpose of considering closer trade relations with our country.

"This brings me to the last feature of the budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increasing trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations, under the British crown which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries today do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

POLICY TRADITIONAL.

"The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them today. They have said that we must have preference for preference and that no favors should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forego the policy of free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on a basis of reciprocal preference. But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers and to intra-imperial trade with its beneficial effects to the British Empire as a whole, but a policy which is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother country, in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother-country. In the far-reaching extension of the British Preference under the budget of 1930, this has been our purpose and objective. We have studied the situation with the utmost care and have revised the tariff schedules with the definite aim of diverting a considerable portion of trade from the United States and other countries to Great Britain. We firmly believe that this policy will receive the wholehearted approval of the Canadian people.

"Against the fiscal and trade policies of the budget what are the criticisms of the Conservative party as enunciated by the leader of the Opposition? They may be summed up in a very few words. The first is that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly conceived, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objection if the proposals were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have 'stolen the clothes' of the Conservative party. If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that party. The third is that our policy is a Washington made policy. If that is true, which it is not, what becomes of the argument that we have stolen the clothes of our opponents? Finally, we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences there should be no trade, even with the Mother Country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference. In the reciprocity campaign of 1911 the cry of the Tory party was 'No truck nor trade with the Yankees.' This year it has come dangerously near being 'No truck nor trade with Britain.'"

The budget, declared the Prime Minister, was the outcome of the most mature deliberations.

"In his address at Winnipeg, sounding the keynote of the Conservative campaign, Mr. Bennett characterized the tariff changes of the budget as this 'premature, unreasoned action.' Elsewhere in the same speech he referred to the budget proposals as a movement 'hysterically inspired by party exigencies.' Far from being 'premature' or 'unreasoned' or 'hysterically inspired', I venture to say there never was presented to any Parliament a budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well."

TARIFF ADVISORY BOARD.

The work of the "Tariff Advisory Board" in shaping the budget was gone into by the Prime Minister. He referred to the fact that the board had been established by the Liberal Government as a fact finding body, and that its hearings were held in public.

"The Government was particularly fortunate in securing as chairman the services of W. H. Moore, a trained economist, a man of wide experience in knowledge of financial and industrial problems, and a man of judicial mind and temperament. Recognizing the confidence which Mr. Moore's impartial conduct of the boards affairs has established in the public mind, some of our opponents and the leader of the Opposition in particular, have, on this occasion, sought to belittle the services the board has rendered, and in particular to raise a doubt concerning the disinterested character of the services of its chairman. The services of the chairman of the board fortunately speak for themselves. The Government is more than satisfied to have them estimately solely on their merits. With the exception of an occasional jibe at the chairman by the leader of the Opposition, the fairness and impartiality of the board's methods of proceeding have never been seriously challenged in Parliament. I believe it is true that throughout the country each year has served to enhance public confidence in the board itself.

"With the establishment of the Advisory Board on tariff, and taxation the day has gone for the making of tariffs on impulse, or because of momentary resentments."

"No longer are tariffs to be made by clamor of self-interests, nor by the rhetoric of politicians. The business of the country deserves the cool, calm reasoning that is devoted to the successful business of the individual and the corporation, and under present conditions through the Tariff Board the business of Canada as far as it is reflected in the customs schedule has been receiving that consideration."

The genesis of the budget was then dealt with by Premier King. When the probability of a revision of the United States tariff was announced, he said, the Tariff Board was advised by Hon. J. A. Robb, then Finance Minister, and by the Prime Minister himself, to study the probable effect on Canada of such revision. At the same time representations were made to the Government of the United States.

"When it became apparent that, notwithstanding these representations, changes inimical to our country, and to its agricultural interests in particular, were likely to be made, and that our immediate neighbors were not prepared to continue to trade with us except upon unequal terms, a further important step was taken. Both the Minister of Finance and myself, speaking in Parliament, gave our own people to understand that the Government was fully alive to the possible consequence of the action contemplated by the United States, that we were watching Canadian interests to the fullest possible extent.

"Public intimation was given, in words the significance of which the United States could not do other than fully comprehend, that in the event of tariff changes taking place which might adversely affect our interests, it would be found that Canada was well able to take care of herself; that all countries might expect to see that we proposed in matters of trade to extend our favors as far as might be possible to those countries most ready to favor us, and that where trade could not be expected except on unequal terms, use would be made of the tariff to divert the course of trade, first of all so as to deepen the channels of trade within the British Empire, and secondly to cause the trade of Canada hereafter more and more to flow in those channels which reciprocal treatment in matters of trade might help to develop between this country and other lands.

Quotations from speeches made by himself and by Mr. Robb with respect to the position taken by Canada in regard to the United States tariff revision, were given by Mr. King at some length. He referred to the speech at Winnipeg in 1929 in which he had said that what was needed was not so much a "redblooded" as a "coolheaded" attitude in respect to the matter. At the conclusion of his quotations he asked how, in the face of so clear and emphatic a statement of the government's position could anyone claim that the country had been taken by surprise in the last budget."

"But there are none so blind as those who will not see, and perhaps there are none so prejudiced and readily deceived as those who seek to prejudice and deceive the minds of others," continued Mr. King. "The Tory party had gone so far in its efforts to misrepresent the position of myself and others in our attitude towards the United States and in our attitude towards Britain and other nations of the British Commonwealth that they had come to believe that what these had been repeating over and over again had in it some element of truth, and that any change in the tariff which might not accord with their own predictions was something quite impossible. Now they know that the government meant every word of what it said, and they have before them in the form of legislative enactments, acts which speak very much louder than words.

"I have been taken to task because I ventured to say that I did not believe in a course of conduct which might only serve to arouse international antagonisms and to defeat the very ends which we had in view, in other words that a provocative attitude is not the best one in international affairs. May I say that this applies no more to the United States than to any other country. Its application is as true of the relations between individuals as it is between nations, though the consequence of a wrong course of action may be much more serious where it relates to nations in their dealings with each other. The course of conduct that deliberately seeks to arouse prejudice and hatred, whatever other purpose it may be made to serve at the moment, never succeeds in doing good in the long run. Knowing the course which the government was taking, and proposed to take, how far-reaching that course was certain to be, I felt my responsibility all the greater to see that, on the part of those countries which might be affected, not for today only but possibly for years to come, no cause should be given which might enable them to say that their adverse action toward Canada was the result of some offensive attitude on our part, rather than something which was wholly of their own creation.

"I do not think I need to devote any time to exposing the weakness stitute the central feature of the Washington' cries. As I have already said, if both are true, the Tory party stands self-condemned. The Libery party has never had occasion to steal political clothes from any party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Tory party. The Liberal party has its own consistent policy, a policy of moderation, a policy which has developed from time to time to meet the changing conditions in the world and in Canada itself. If it had been so ill-advised as to seek conservative garments, where would it have found them? At the Winnipeg convention, where it will be recalled that the whole Tory party was painfully careful to make sure that the word 'protection' appeared in not a line of its platform? or from the Winnipeg address of Mr. Bennett last week, when protection returned in full and resounding force, not so much as a political garment, as a political umbrella, or political omnibus. You may have noticed how at Winnipeg Mr. Bennett declared there was to be protection for labor and agriculturists, for producers and consumers, as well as for manufacturers and others. Just how that protection is to be brought about he did not say. He has been studiously vague and indefinite, and he has not mentioned a single specific change that he would propose.

"But whatever Mr. Bennett and his followers may say of 'stolen 'clothes' and of 'made in Washington' policies, they will scarcely be able to say that either epithet applies to the increases made in the British preference and which, after all, constitute the central feature of the budget."

NATURE OF TRADE.

There appeared, said Mr. King, to be a fundamental difference between the Liberal party and the Conservatives as to the nature of trade. In the House of Commons, he said, Hon. F. J. Manion had declared that trade was war. In the opinion of the Prime Minister trade was exchange. Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader had taken a somewhat similar stand to Dr. Manion in his recent Winnipeg speech said Mr. King. He quoted from Mr. Bennett's speech as follows:

"Tell me where did free trade ever fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well, I will use them to blast a why into the markets that have been closed to you."

In other words, continued Mr. King, to the Tory mind it would appear that trade is not something as the result of which each party concerned may gain, but is in the nature of conflict, where as an outcome there must be gain to one and loss to another. So Mr. Bennett goes on to say that he will have nothing to do with the giving of preferences save where something of a corresponding nature is given in return. He fails to see that people trade only because they wish to, and only because each of the parties concerned has reason to believe that he is benefitting by the exchange. Where a commodity is being bought or sold the buyer or seller believes that what he is getting in exchange is more to his advantage than that which is being given in exchange. In other words, both parties stand to gain or there would be no trade. The Liberal party has consistently taken the view that where it has given a preference it has made possible an increasing measure of trade between the countries concerned.

"Even more important than tariffs and policies to a country is the spirit which animates the administration of domestic and foreign affairs.

What is to be said of the spirit of the Conservative party as revealed by the utterances of its leader.

"Mr. Bennett at Winnipeg asks 'when did free trade ever fight for you?' Free trade is not an issue in this campaign, and Mr. Bennett knows it. But there is a country which has maintained a free trade policy for almost one hundred years. Does Mr. Bennett suggest that Great Britain is guilty of economic cowardice because it has not followed the high tariff policies of the United States? 'We will make our tariffs fight for you,' he declared in ringing tones. 'We will blast a way to trade.' Let me ask you frankly, did you ever hear of any one blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade. There are business men, salesmen and commercial travellers in this audience. Let me ask you this question: Did you ever secure an order by force? Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle of business that trade is secured not by ill-will but by good-will? Not by awakening antagonism, but by developing friendliness and co-operation? To Mr. Bennett all countries are competitors. He forgets that all countries are also our customers, and that no nation liveth to itself alone.

"Through his entire speech one could detect an admiration of the tariff policy of the United States. It was a striking coincidence that on the same page of an Ottawa newspaper which carried a report of his Winnipeg speech there was a despatch from Washington referring to the consternation of businessmen of that country over the shrinkage in foreign trade which had taken place as a result of the effort of that country to blast their way to trade by shutting out the goods of other countries.

QUESTION OF PREFERENCE.

"Mr. Bennett and his party insist that we should give absolutely no preference to the Mother Country unless as the result of a bargain," asserted Mr. King, "Unless in return for an equivalent tariff preference from Great Britain. Is it true that we have received no advantage in Britain's market? It is true that Britain has not, except in a limited measure, established protective tariffs and given us a preferential reduction, but if she has not given us a preference over the foreigner she has given us equality with her own producers. An eminent Canadian recently reminded us that since Confederation Britain has bought from Canada five billions more than Canada has bought from Britain. We have not fared so badly in that great market.

"We all wish to preserve and extend the British market. It has been our greatest outlet in the past. Whatever changes may come it will remain a great and indispensable market. Looking at it as practical men, which is the better way of securing a favorable position in that market, to offer as the Liberal party has done, from the days of Laurier and Fielding to the present, a free-will preference to the Mother Country, or to insist that we will grant no preference whatever and will cancel the existing preference unless Britain reverses its fiscal system for the purpose of granting us a preference? Put yourself in the other's place. Would you prefer to deal with a country which has held out to you the hand of friendship and good-will, or with a country which held nothing in its hands but a club? We have not far to go for our answer. Look at the position today. What has been the result of the Dunning budget, a budget which gave the British producers the opportunity for a great expansion of trade in Canada, a trade in large measure diverted from foreign countries without any injury to Canadian industry? The result has been an immediate and warm response from every party and every part of Britain, a deep feeling which will inevitably be reflected in the action of individuals, in the action of parties, in the action of the community, in whatever form their good-will may most appropriately find expression. We do not propose to blast our way into the markets of Britain, but we have secured and we will hold the most favorable position any country enjoys today for the expension of trade in the British Isles.

"In short, whatever fiscal policy may be adopted by Great Britain, Canada, under the guidance of the Liberal policy, and the Liberal policy alone, is in the fortunate position of being able to secure the utmost advantage in the British market," said Mr. King.

"I come now to the third of the issues, and, with what I have to say in this connection, to the conclusion of my address. You are being called upon to decide which party—the Liberal or Conservative— is to represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial and economic conferences to be held in London this year. to this issue, as I have said, is necessarily related the question of the personnel of the ministry which is to manage the affairs of Canada during the next parliament."

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

"Let me remind the country that the question of Canada's representation at the forthcoming conferences was stated by Mr. Bennett as so all-important as to necessitate a mandate from the people. It was so important in fact as to be the one real issue of an electoral campaign. Mr. Bennett made his declaration for a general election on the issue of the forthcoming conferences in his speech on the Address at the opening of the recent session. He said that in his opinion and in that of the party which he represented so important were the conferences of this year in London that Canada should be represented only by a government which had, in the interval received a direct mandate from the people. When it came to the debate on the budget, Mr. Bennett repeated this expression of view, albeit, I confess, with something less in the way of emphasis. Ever since, however, he has been doing his utmost to get away from this issue, to create new issues, to say or to do anything which may help to obscure this all important question as a real issue of the election, even to the calling of a special session of Parliament immediately after the election. Mr. King reminded his listeners that the present administration might have claimed that it had a mandate to represent Canada at the Imperial conference in view of the fact that it still had a year of office to run. The situation became somewhat different however with the introduction of the budget.

"The fiscal policies embodied in the budget had been framed amongst other things, in the light and in the knowledge of the conferences to be held in London this fall. Those policies, as I have indicated, were deliberately shaped so as to make possible a wider measure of trade between this country and other portions of the British Empire, Great Britain in particular. The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets, the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was framed with a view to holding for western Canada the market for her wheat which for so many years she has had in Great Britain and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere.

"To secure from the people of Canada approval of these policies before the Imperial Conference takes place, is, therefore, in our opinion, an all-important consideration if the conferences are to do for the further development of our trade what, with all confidence, we believe they will. To have a mandate based upon the policies which are now before the people is, therefore, in our opinion, imperative. It is for this reason we have not hesitated to dissolve Parliament over fourteen months before the time at which dissolution becomes necessary. When we go to the conferences of 1930 we want to go, as we went to the Conferences of 1923 and 1926, with the voice of Canada behind us, and with all the influence and power which comes from the voice of the nation as a whole." The representatives of Canada at the Conferences was bound up with the personnel of the ministry, said Mr. King. What had Mr. Bennett to offer by the way of constructive leadership, he asked.

SERIES OF PLATITUDES.

"Up to the present time, pretty much all that Mr. Bennett has said has been in the nature of platitudes or declamation. He has not put forward a single constructive idea, nor has he indicated a single policy, with any clearness or definiteness of aim.

" In his speech at Winnipeg, he referred to the members of the present government as: 'This group of mercenaries, holding office by shame and subterfuge', and as 'forgetful, in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages'. He said: 'Look upon them, treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving, of your passionate condemnation'. And at a meeting at Regina on the following day he shook off 'nine years of wasted effort before the great betrayal' and added 'it did not take Judas that long.' May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled for, and adds nothing to his stature in the position of leadership. Already I have heard it strongly resented by men of his own party. A government securely established which voluntarily appeals to a people on a great issue nearly a year and a half in advance of the completion of its term, is not 'a group of mercenaries holding office by shame and subterfuge,' nor are they persons 'forgetful in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages'.

"May I say that I believe it is the general opinion that Canada at no time has had a government composed of abler men, of men more genuinely disinterested or of higher purpose than the men I am proud to have as my colleagues in the present administration. I believe it is true that no government has ever given a better account of itself both at home and abroad. May I ask Mr. Bennett who, in the administration that he has in mind, are to take the place of the ministers in the present Government from the province of Quebec, from the province of Ontario, from the Maritime Provinces and west of the Great Lakes. Who are the gentlemen he has in mind as those who are to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference.

"I will tell him who of the Government will be among the number to represent Canada, if the present administration is returned: At the Imperial Conference, the present Minister of Justice, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who represented Canada with such ability and distinction at the Imperial Conference of 1926 and who represented Canada at the Subsidiary Conference on the Operation of Dominion Legislation which met in London last fall, will be one of the representatives. Another of the representatives at the Imperial Conference will be the present Minister of National Defence, Colonel the Hon. J. L. Ralston, who during the present year represented Canada with such credit to himself and to our country at the conference on the Limitation of Naval Armaments. At the Economic Conference Canada will be represented by the present Minister of Finance, Hon. Charles A. Dunning, the author of the budget of 1930, a budget which has stirred and warmed the heart of the whole British Empire. Another representative will be the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, Hon. James Malcolm, under whose auspices the trade of Canada has expanded as never before to all quarters of the globe.

"I ask Mr. Bennett to tell the Canadian people before the 28th of July whom, from the province of Quebec, he intends, if given the opportunity, to substitute for Mr. Lapointe? Whom from the Maritime Provinces he intends to substitute for Colonel Ralston? Whom from Ontario he intends to substitute for Mr. Malcolm? And whom from the Canadian west he intends to substitute for Mr. Dunning? The Canadian people have a right to know who are to be their representatives at these two great conferences. The people have a right to know, in addition, who for the next five years, the other members of the Government of Canada are likely to be.

ELECTIONS OF 1911.

"In the general elections of 1911, when the Liberal party in Canada, under its great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appealed to the country on a trade issue in the nature of reciprocity in natural products between Canada and the United States, a measure of greater freedom in trade so far as this continent was concerned, and of wider markets for the producers in the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, the parties that were opposed to the tariff changes then proposed, allied under the cry of "We are at the parting of the ways.' I do not intend to go the length of saying that, having regard to the measure of increased trade assured by the budget of 1930 between Canada and Great Britain, and indeed between Canada and all other parts of the British Empire, we are 'at the parting of the ways,' or that the rejection of the budget, for such would be the significance of the defeat of the present government at this general election, would mean an end to all endeavor further to promote intra-Empire trade. I do, however, say, what in very truth I believe to be the fact, that so far as intra-Empire trade is concerned, 'we are, at last, at the meeting of the ways,' and that the acceptance of this budget by the people on July 28th will do more than all else to ensure for Canada's representatives at the economic conference in London that favorable response to our attitude and action which we believe will be given by the government of Great Britain and by the governments of all the sister dominions of the Empire. It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may help to determine whether the highways of empire are to become, as we hope they may increasingly become, the avenues of a British commerce expanding ever so widely, o'er land and sea, or, whether in so far as the component parts of the Empire are concerned, its highways are to remain indistinguishable from the other trade routes of the world."

Three Major Issues Upon Which Electors Asked To Pass At Coming Election

Premier King, in His Keynote Liberal Campaign Speech At Brantford, Declares These to Be the Record of The Government, the Budget and Canada's Representation at the Imperial Conference and Imperial Economic Conference.

Voters Must Decide Between "Blasting a Way to Trade" or "Securing It By Goodwill"

Prime Minister Deals Extensively With Record of Government in Respect to Finance, Taxation, Natural Resources, War Veterans, Labor, Etc. Forecasts Abolition of Sales Tax If Liberals Returned to Power.

(Canadian Press.)

BRANTFORD, Ont., June 16.—The record of the government, the budget, and Canada's representation at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference —these are the major issues which the Canadian people are asked to pass upon at the coming election. They will be called upon to decide whether or not they believe in the policy of "blasting a way to trade," or if they prefer the viewpoint that trade is exchange for mutual advantage and that it "is secured not by ill-will but by good-will."

Thus declared Prime Minister Mackenzie King in his keynote Liberal campaign speech here tonight. From the platform the words of the Prime Minister of Canada were carried over an all-Canadian radio hook-up into the homes of thousands of people across the Dominion from coast to coast.

Mr. King spoke at length, dealing extensively with the record of the government in respect to finance, taxation, natural resources, war veterans, labor, immigration, co-operation with the provinces, and more particularly with the important provisions of the budget.

Takes Definite Issue With Mr. Bennett.

And it was with respect to the budget that Mr. King took very definite and final issue with Hon. R. B. Bennett, leader of the opposition. There was, he said, a fundamental difference between the Liberals and Conservatives in their conception of the nature of trade. The Conservatives, he declared, had enunciated the belief that trade was war. On that assumption they spoke and declared that they were prepared to act.

Mr. Bennett had asserted at Winnipeg that the Conservatives would "blast a way to trade," continued Mr. King. "Let me ask you frankly," he said, "did you ever hear of anyone blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade."

The Prime Minister addressed himself particularly to salesmen and commercial travellers in his audience. "Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle that trade is secured by developing friendliness and co-operation?"

To Mr. Bennett, he declared, all countries were competitors. "He forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone."

A Liberal Policy

The policy of the British preference was a Liberal policy, Mr. King informed his listeners, and the Liberal party believed in conciliation, in friendliness, in the fact that trade was exchange and, if possible, should be mutually beneficial to all countries involved in the exchange.

"May I ask you to ponder this question both now and until your votes are cast," he said earnestly. "Should the government of this country be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference except on a basis of hard bargaining and who would destroy the foundations of goodwill upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded today?"

The attitude of the Conservatives with respect to efforts to give Canada fullness of national stature had been one of opposition and derision, Mr. King declared in discussing representation at the Imperial Conference. He asked which party should represent Canada overseas. "Shall it be the party which labored and achieved, or the party that obstructed and opposed?"

He demanded that Mr. Bennett tell the electorate who he would send to London as Canadian ministerial representatives at the Imperial Conference in the event of the Conservatives being returned to power. He would tell Mr. Bennett that if the present administration was again given office, the Canadian representatives at the Imperial Conference would include such men as Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. C. A. Dunning, Hon. J. L. Ralston and James Malcolm. Who would Mr. Bennett substitute for these men from the Maritime Provinces and from the Canadian West?

Review of Record

Mr. King's review of the government's record was featured by the declaration that the present administration, eight and a half years ago, found the country in a state of depression and despondency, and had lifted it to a position of prosperity. National debt and taxation had both been reduced. Deficits had been changed to surpluses, he said. He referred to reductions in the income tax, in the sales tax, the abolition of the "nuisance taxes," etc. He forecast the absolute removal of the sales tax if the government was returned to power. In five years, he declared, there had been a remission of $118,000,000 in taxation.

He spoke of the return of the natural resources to the provinces of the West, and the adjustment of Maritime claims. These he regarded as real achievements. Government after government had endeavored to accomplish the return of the resources but none had succeeded, he said. This government had been successful where others had failed.

Relations with the provinces were of the best, Mr. King said. "I say without contradiction that there never has been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the various provinces and the federal government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of the election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over," he insisted.

Mr. King dealt with the accusation which, he said, had been put forward by the Conservatives "that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election." This was not the case, he asserted with emphasis. "Far from being 'premature' or 'unreasoned' or 'hysterically inspired,' I venture to say there never was presented to any Parliament a budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration, or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well," asserted the Prime Minister.

Three Main Issues

"There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign," the Prime Minister said. "The first is the record of the government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third, is the direct issue of a choice between the Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year. This last issue is necessarily related to the question of the personnel of the ministry which is to manage the affairs of our country during the ensuing term of Parliament.

Past, Present, and Future.

"It is not easy to say which of the issues is the most important. All are of the greatest importance. They relate to the past, to the present and to the future. Perhaps I had better discuss them in this order.

Government's Record

"Were there no other issue before the people, I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances, we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years," asserted Mr. King in dealing with the record of the government. "For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history.

"As a people and as a government we have been far too modest with respect to the achievements of the years we have been in office. We have been so modest, in fact, that the record is but partially known even to the people of our own country. The growth and development of Canada under the present administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation. It is right that these facts should be known and I propose to make the record of the administration an open book from one end of the country to the other.

Leaves Pessimism to Others.

"Standing on a record of sound, progressive accomplishment we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The 'whispers of death,' the fear of returning depression, the complaints of an exodus which has ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party whose last tenure of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apparently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days."

Mr. King went on at length into the financial record of the government. On March 31, 1914, the net debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000, he said.

Net Debt

"On March 31, 1922, as a result of the war, and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debt had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000. In the last two years of the Conservative administration no less than $174,000,000 had been added to the public debt. In addition not less than $355,000,000 had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years 1919-1922. Depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contracted; agriculture was depressed. Against this dark background, which is still a vivid memory to many of us today, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known."

Cut Outlays, Revenues Higher.

The government, continued the prime minister, had approached the problem first by curtailment of expenditures, and second by increasing revenues. The latter had, of necessity, to be accomplished by additional taxation which, he said, was "traditionally unpopular." The Conservative government had avoided taxing the people to meet the increased costs due to the war, and had raised the necessary money by loan, a very considerable part of which was made exempt from taxation. He was aware that this statement had been challenged, but it was nevertheless true.

Met Responsibilities

"Where the previous administration avoided their responsibilities we met ours courageously and without regard to political consequences," continued Mr. King. "We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national budget. To have continued the other course would have brought the country into a condition of bankruptcy.

"Within two years our first task was accomplished: we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our budget but to give us on the 31st of March, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000. From that time forward, we began to pay off annually without intermission, an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

Years of Surpluses.

"May I say here that in all the years from Confederation down to the time that we came into office there were only eight years in which there was a surplus, four of which were under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of sixty-three years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present administration has held office. The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office. This is a record of accomplishment which is unequalled by any country or any government which participated in the late war from its commencement."

Reduced Taxation

Reference to the tax reductions followed. Mr. King spoke of the various reductions in the income tax since 1926 up to those contained in the last budget. He referred to the persistent decreases in the sales tax which had brought it down from six to one per cent. And he added: "With this gradual elimination of the sales tax, I need not ask you ladies and gentlemen, what will happen to that one per cent if the present administration is returned to office." He stated that the so-called "nuisance taxes" had now all been eliminated with the exception of the two cents on checks above ten dollars, and he mentioned the reduction in the rates of letter postage in Canada from three to two cents and the re-establishment of penny postage throughout the Empire.

Saving to Taxpayer.

"Leaving out of account the degree to which the postal revenues may have been affected by these reductions, it is estimated there has been saved to the Canadian taxpayer, of taxation which would otherwise have been collected, the following sums:

For the year 1926	$25,000,000
1927	27,000,000
1928	19,000,000
1929	25,000,000
1930	22,000,000

Total Over $118,000,000

"Thus in five years," continued the Prime Minister, "there has been an estimated remission of taxation which would otherwise have been collected solely from the sources indicated, of an amount exceeding $118,000,000. The remissions indicated have been cumulative. Assuming conditions similar to those of the last five years, from now on the amount of taxation imposed each year will be $118,000,000 less per annum than it was prior to 1926. May I add that all this takes no account of the further remissions of taxation effected by the reductions of duties under the several revisions of the tariff which have taken place since we came into office, and which as the country well knows have been substantial."

On Transportation

The record of the government in respect to transportation was touched on by Mr. King.

"When we came into office," he said, "with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the railways of Canada in a completely disorganized and bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in the hands of a receiver. The Grand Trunk Railway system had been acquired under arbitration, but it, too, was bankrupt, and the government which took over the road had studiously refrained from giving so much as an indication as to whether or not it was to be operated as a government owned system or whether the intention, in its acquisition, was to have the road subsequently re-transferred to private ownership.

The Liberal Stand.

"I notice that Mr. Bennett is saying that the records of Parliament show that the Liberal party, when in opposition, opposed the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway as a government owned system. The Liberal party did nothing of the kind. What we did object to was the refusal of the government of the day to submit to Parliament for approval the terms and conditions of the contract under which the system was to be acquired. We contended that, as the people were being made responsible for the purchase of the system, by terms arranged by agreement, the people's representatives in Parliament were entitled to know what those terms were and to approve of them, before final acquisition of the system was made. This, however, the government of the day refused to allow, though at a subsequent session of Parliament, having failed to include some essential features of the transactions in the agreement, they were obliged to submit the whole measure to Parliament and, in order to permit of the additional terms being inserted, to secure its approval which they were of course able to do in virtue of their majority."

Secured Sir Henry

"It was the present administration which made the necessary provision for the president and the board of directors of the system, and it was the present administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as president and chairman of the board," declared Mr. King. "It was the present administration that laid down the policy that there should be no political interference with the management or operation of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton has publicly testified, on more occasions than one, that the government has lived up to this policy, alike in letter and in spirit. It was the present administration which laid down as a further policy of railway management and operation in this country that government ownership was to be given a fair trial, and that, as between the government owned National Railways and the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway, there should be neither fear nor favor in the respective treatment to be accorded these roads. I venture to say that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his board of directors will be the first to say that, in the fulfilment of this policy, the government has sought to be scrupulously fair.

Anxious to Claim Credit

"Perhaps I should not be too severe on our opponents for speaking today to claim paternity of the Canadian National Railways. Their action in this regard is more or less characteristic of human nature. When the Tory party, as we came into office, left this neglected and famished foundling on our doorstep, suffering from many forms of malnutrition, there was not one member of the whole party who was prepared to allow his name to have any association with it, but now that the infant has been revived and has grown into vigorous and powerful proportions, resembling those of Sir Henry Thornton himself, not a few of them wish to give it their name. They say that on no account will they part with it, and Mr. Bennett heroically says that he will sacrifice an office which he does not hold rather than see it pass out of the hands of the state.

Northern Outlet

"But organization of the Canadian National Railways has not been our only achievement in the realm of transportation. We have brought the Hudson Bay Railway to completion, though the rails on a part of this road had been taken up by our opponents while in office, and the partially constructed road-bed allowed to fall into disrepair and decay. We have acquired, and, by making them a part of the Canadian National system, have revitalized not a few of the smaller privately owned railways in different parts of the Dominion; and we have, on more than one occasion, made provision through parliament for extensive branch line construction in other parts of the country.

Waterways Improvements

"We have completed the Welland Canal, and we have effected other developments with respect to the St. Lawrence waterways, on which I shall have opportunity to say something on another occasion. I wish that time permitted me to say something of the developments in aviation, which the government has steadily sought to initiate and advance.

Colonization Policy

"May I now say a word with respect to immigration," the Premier went on. "You have heard a great deal about our boys and girls leaving for the United States. You have heard a great deal about foreign immigration being encouraged to the relative disadvantage of immigration from the British Isles. During part of the time you have been told that we were not bringing in a sufficient number of immigrants; at another time the complaint has been that the number was excessive.

"The policy of the Conservative party, as outlined by General McCrae, was that of a huge colonization and land settlement scheme involving an expenditure of some $300,000,000 and the bringing in of 300,000 fresh immigrants. Perhaps Mr. Bennett will tell the West how this policy which he supported would have helped to lessen the present unemployment of which he has had much to say during the present campaign.

Reasons of Exodus

"It is quite true that, during the years immediately following our coming into office the trend of migration continued to be from Canada to the States. The reasons for that were very obvious. The United States had prospered while we had suffered through the war. During the period of re-establishment of our citizen-soldiery in Canada, preferences in the matter of employment were being given where possible to those who had served overseas. There were not the opportunities for employment here that there were in the country to the south for many of our boys and girls, not a few of them and of our grown-ups as well left on that account.

"Moreover, the springs of immigration had, during the war, and the period immediately following the war, been permitted to dry up at the source. It takes time for a movement of immigration to get under way, whatever its direction may be. People had not the wherewithal to migrate in numbers from the British Isles or from other countries after the war, that they had had before, and Canada had not the free homesteads to offer, nor was she able to advertise these or to give the low ocean and railway rates which were so important an inducement to British immigration in former years.

Return to Homeland

"It was not very long, however, before the fruits of our effort became apparent. Little by little the migration of Canadians to the United States began to lessen. In increasing numbers Canadians began to return from the United States to Canada, until today, while conditions of employment in Canada may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States, or for that matter in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals today the migration from Canada to the United States. These are the facts and, far from affording grounds of criticism, they are in the nature of a real achievement.

Immigration

"With regard to the allegation that the government was preferring foreign to British immigration, it did not take very long to establish the facts. The findings of the parliamentary committee were to the effect that, while Canada was spending 11 cents per capita on Continental immigrants she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on immigrants from the British Isles. Reference to the statistics of the British Empire shows that of citizens of the British Isles emigrating of recent years to other dominions and other parts of the world, Canada has been receiving by a very long way the largest proportion.

Link With Provinces

"The most recent development in our immigration policy has been to link more closely the governments of the provinces and our own government, in the determination of the classes and numbers of immigrants to be brought to Canada. With the return to the Western Provinces of their natural resources, we have felt that more in the way of provincial control of immigration was desirable, more particularly as the provinces themselves are the first to feel any adverse effects of an inadequate or an excessive immigration."

Tariff Principles

Mr. King dealt with the principles which underlay the government tariff policies.

"We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries," he asserted. "We have recognized that, if our manufacturing and trade were to expand, world markets as well as home markets were an essential, and we have recognized, further, that what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent in no inconsiderable measure upon the costs of production and the costs of living in our own land.

"So, we have striven in our tariff revisions, consistently, to take those steps which, without injury to any legitimate business in the country, would at the same time tend to make possible more in the way of production in our basic industries, through reduction of duties on the instruments of production required in those industries, and on the necessaries of life of those employed therein and in the manufactures and other businesses of our country."

Sixth Great Trading Nation

He made a brief reference to the tariff revisions effected by the present administration since taking office in 1921, and which culminated in the revision concluded in the last budget. Canada, he said, now stood as the sixth great trading country of the world.

"You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials; that we are parting with our birthright. Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of raw materials which Canada imports from the United States for her manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceed in value the total value of the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that the per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain.

Domestic Exports

"Let me add that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29. In other words there has been a doubling of our total domestic export trade in a period of seven years. This spectacular increase of trade is no mere chance. It is the result of wise policies effectively administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce."

Less Industrial Strife.

"May I remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country," said Mr. King with respect to the government labor policies. "May I remind you that it was a Liberal administration which created the Canadian Department of Labor, which introduced its 'fair wages' policy, and which this year has given statutory effect to the payment of fair wages and to an eight-hour day on all public works carried out under contract for the Dominion government, and with respect to all labor in the government's own employ."

Liberal policies with respect to the war veterans were touched on by Mr. King. Canada's war pension legislation, he believed, was the most advanced in the world. He referred to what had been accomplished at the last session of Parliament.

Return of Resources.

Then Mr. King went on to speak of the return of the natural resources to the Prairie and British Columbia. For thirty years, he said, this had been a problem for different governments. It remained, he said, for the present administration to restore these lands. Ever since their entry into Confederation, the Maritime Provinces had felt that they had not had a square deal.

Maritime Claims

"Here and there, in patchwork fashion, some adjustments have been made in dealing with particular grievances as they arose. It remained for the present administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesmanlike fashion. This we have done with respect to their transportation problems; with respect to the problems of their industries; with respect to their subsidies; with respect to their harbor and trade facilities, and to all other matters having a bearing upon the economic welfare of the Maritimes as an integral part of our Dominion.

Treated All Alike.

"I have not time to go into the provisions of these several agreements, but I do not hesitate to say that an examination of their provisions reveals a generosity in the manner of the treatment of those provinces such as has never characterized similar negotiations in the history of our Dominion.

"And here may I point out that something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the premier of this province and his government in this general election, namely that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present administration at Ottawa.

"It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative governments, our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or ill-will.

Provincial Relations

"By our action in these particulars we have made over and strengthened the superstructure of Confederation. We have, at the same time, in the increased financial provisions which we have made for those provinces, reinforced its foundations. I say without fear of contradiction, that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several provinces and the federal government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

Imperial and International.

"But if we have improved relations within the Dominion between the governments of the provinces and the federal government, if we have removed sectional antagonisms and helped to develop a truly national spirit, what may not also be said of our achievements in inter-Imperial and international relations? Here I come to the work of the Imperial Conference and the Economic Conference of 1923; the work of the Imperial Conference of 1926, the work of the Subsidiary Conference on the operation of Dominion legislation, which concluded its sittings in London last autumn.

National Status Accorded.

"Out of these conferences has come, for the first time in the history of the relations of Great Britain and the dominions, a statement of their relative positions, which has removed from the realm of possible controversy all further talk of colonial subordination, and which has accorded to Canada and to the other self-governing dominions a national status equal to that of Great Britain herself. With this clear recognition of nationhood there has come a corresponding development in free and effective co-operation, not only with the Mother Country but with the sister nations of the commonwealth.

Canada's Status

"Let me invite you to look beyond the Empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds today? Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking, there has been the sudden steep ascent of war in which there were common heroisms and common sacrifices, and there has been the long, gradual, constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer.

"The Conservative party had opposed every step of the way toward the responsible self-government of Canada in external affairs," the Prime Minister charged.

About "Canada First."

"When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties, we were told that we were seeking separation because, forsooth, we asked His Majesty, in regard to an international negotiation on a matter of Canadian concern, to give full powers to a Canadian minister of the Crown instead of to the British ambassador at Washington. When a little later we opened a legation at Washington and subsequently at Paris and Tokio, we were again told that we were pursuing the path of separation. Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about 'Canada First.' Just what does his 'Canada First' mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the establishment of Canadian legations in other lands, and on Canada's status of co-equality with the Motherland. I am not sure where he stands today, but I know where he stood in the session of Parliament just closed."

Second Great Issue

Then Mr. King turned to the budget of 1930, which he termed the second great issue of the campaign. Policies must be framed to meet existing conditions, he said. The national policy of 1878 would not suit the Canada of 1930. What was more, he declared, the old national policy advocated by the Conservatives had not always served to meet conditions in the past.

"When we increased the British preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reduced duties on the implements of production, when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the national policy and that we would ruin the country," he said.

Policy of World Markets.

"I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedom of trade is the more deserving of being called a national policy as we approach the third decade of the twentieth century. A national policy today in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world. It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets. It is essentially a policy of world markets.

"With the rapid development of Western Canada and the emergence of a great agricultural population engaged in the production of a commodity which must seek its markets throughout the world, high protection, or an all-round increase in the tariff can no longer be called a national policy. According to figures given in the Canada Year Book of 1929, over 80 per cent of Canadian manufacturing is concentrated in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This percentage is based on figures of production, capital employed, and number of employes. While it is true that manufacturing has developed to a considerable extent in Western Canada, these manufactures are based largely upon the primary industries of agriculture and mining and do not require a tariff protection to any considerable extent. It is, therefore, true to say that a general increase in the tariff in 1930 is essentially a sectional policy so far as the distribution of its benefits is concerned. It has forfeited every right to the name—national policy—given to it by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878, and by Mr. Bennett in 1930.

Would Be Detrimental

"But if high protection is a sectional policy in the distribution of its benefits, it is equally true that having regard to the present industrial development of central Canada a free trade policy would be detrimental in its immediate effects to one section of the Dominion, even though it conferred benefits on those of our citizens who are obliged to seek markets abroad for their agricultural produce and who derive little or no advantage from a protective tariff.

"It is apparent, therefore, that both a high tariff and free trade are sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada. What then is the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interest arising out of the tariff is the same as it is with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions. To the greatest possible extent sectional interests must be reconciled in the light of the larger interests of the whole. This can be effected only by moderation and compromise. Face the facts of our situation. Take Canada as it is, with its changing needs and its conflicting interests. Acknowledge the facts of geography and of divergent industrial developments in east, and center and west. And having examined the realities of the situation. and having considered the demands of different sections for policies suited to their needs, so mould our social transportation and fiscal policies as to hold the scales evenly between class and creed and section and thus weld a far-flung country into a united Canadian nation.

Why Budget Framed

"The budget of 1930 was framed first of all to meet a situation in Canada arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes for policies suited to their needs. But because of the place which Canada has come to occupy in international trade, it was influenced also and in a special degree by our relation with two countries with which we are most closely associated in matters of commerce. The one is Great Britain. The other is the United States.

Revision of U.S. Tariff.

"When Mr. Hoover assumed office as president of the United States on March 11, 1929, the United States Congress began carrying out a far-reaching revision of the tariff in conformity with the pledges given by the Republican party during the presidential campaign of the previous year. As that revision proceeded, it became increasingly apparent that the duties against Canadian agricultural products would be raised to such an extent as to cut off a considerable proportion of the existing Canadian exports to that country. In these circumstances, and in accordance with its policy of using every endeavor to find wider markets for Canadian products, the government gave instructions to the Tariff Advisory Board to make a careful survey of the tariff schedules then applying against American imports, with a view to determining to what extent these imports could be purchased from Great Britain or from other parts of the British Empire.

Closer Co-operation

"While this inquiry was proceeding, it was decided that an Imperial Economic Conference would be held in London in September of 1930, to consider the subject of closer co-operation in matters of trade between the various parts of the Empire, and to discuss the various policies which would contribute towards that end. Efforts had previously been made by the present administration to have this conference held in Canada. Subsequently, a condition developed in Great Britain which led to a marked curtailment of purchases of Canadian wheat and resulted in a serious tie-up of our wheat in elevators. with consequent loss not only to Canadian growers, but to our transportation systems, and to many branches of our industry and commerce. Prior to this development, Great Britain had purchased far more from Canada, largely because of our wheat exports, than Canada had purchased from Great Britain, many of the purchases being made at present in the United States and in other ways, to increase British imports to Canada and thus create an economic and psychological condition in Great Britain more favorable to the importation of Canadian wheat. These circumstances must be kept clearly in mind when examining the proposals in the budget presented to the House of Commons on May 1st.

Main Proposals

"The budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present government to a condition of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four main proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1. The iron and steel tariff revision.
2. Countervailing duties.
3. The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4. Extension of the British preference.

"The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the Tariff Advisory Board which have been conducted over a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an inquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great basic industries. The purpose kept in mind by the government in prosecuting this inquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain. This in turn was in conformity with the announced intention of the government to facilitate trade with those countries which are willing to trade with Canada on equal terms.

Countervailing

"The next feature of the budget, namely, the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us. For the present we raise the duties on those selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by other countries, but at the same time we tell our neighbor frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis. On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be one-sided.

Unreasonable Competition.

"In revising the customs tariff on fruits and vegetables, the government has had before it the evidence presented to the Tariff Advisory Board on several occasions by those who were primarily interested in this important branch of our agricultural production. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and vegetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of our countries.

"It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers. We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates, which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules. In this manner we have endeavored to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of the consumers of these commodities. In past years, moreover, a large proportion of our early fruits and vegetables has been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business. Under the existing trade agreement these Islands have assured us of a preference in their market. In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruits and vegetables under the British preference. Already we have seen what the response of other parts of the British Empire is likely to be to this attitude and policy. Bermuda has given to us since our budget was introduced additional preference or free entry on some of our agricultural manufactured products and this very week there is assembling at Trinidad representatives of all the British West Indies for the purpose of considering closer trade relations with our country.

Open to World

"This brings me to the last feature of the budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British Crown which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries today do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

Traditional Policy

"The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them today. They have said that we must have preference for preference and that no favors should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forego the policy of free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on a basis of reciprocal preference. But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers and to inter-Imperial trade with its beneficial effects to the British Empire as a whole, but a policy which is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country, in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country. In the far-reaching extension of the British preference under the budget of 1930, this has been our purpose and our objective. We have studied the situation with the utmost care and have revised the tariff schedules with the definite aim of diverting a considerable portion of trade from the United States and other countries to Great Britain. We firmly believe that this policy will receive the wholehearted approval of the Canadian people.

Criticism of Budget

"Against the fiscal and trade policies of the budget what are the criticisms of the Conservative party as enunciated by the leader of the opposition? They may be summed up in a very few words. The first is that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objection if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have 'stolen the clothes' of the Conservative party. If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that party. The third is that our policy is a Washington made policy. If that is true, which it is not, what becomes of the argument that we have stolen the clothes of our opponents? Finally, we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences there should be no trade, even with the Mother Country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference. In the reciprocity campaign of 1911, the cry of the Tory party was 'No truck nor trade with the Yankees.' This year it has come dangerously near being 'No truck nor trade with Britain.'"

The budget, declared the Prime Minister, was the outcome of the most mature deliberation.

Mature Consideration.

"In his address at Winnipeg, sounding the keynote of the Conservative campaign, Mr. Bennett characterized the tariff changes of the budget as 'this premature, unreasoned action.' Elsewhere in the same speech he referred to the budget proposals as a movement 'hysterically inspired by party exigencies.' Far from being 'premature' or 'unreasoned' or 'hysterically inspired,' I venture to say that never was presented to any Parliament a budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well."

Fact-finding Body

The work of the Tariff Advisory Board in shaping the budget was gone into by the Prime Minister. He referred to the fact that the board had been established by the Liberal government as a fact-finding body, and that its hearings were held in public.

"The government was particularly fortunate in securing as chairman of the board the services of Mr. W. H. Moore, a trained economist, a man of wide experience in knowledge of financial and industrial problems, and a man of judicial mind and temperament. Recognizing the confidence which Mr. Moore's impartial conduct of the board's affairs has established in the public mind, some of our opponents, and the leader of the opposition in particular, have, on this occasion, sought to belittle the services the board has rendered, and in particular to raise a doubt concerning the disinterested character of the services of its chairman. The services of the chairman of the board fortunately speak for themselves. The government is more than satisfied to have them estimated solely on their merits. With the exception of an occasional jibe at the chairman by the leader of the opposition, the fairness and impartiality of the board's methods of proceeding have never been seriously challenged in Parliament. I believe it is true that throughout the country each year has served to enhance public confidence in the board itself.

"With the establishment of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation the day has gone for the making of tariffs on impulse, or because of momentary resentments.

Deserves Reasoning

"No longer are tariffs to be made by clamor of self-interest, nor by the rhetoric of politicians. The business of the country deserves the cool, calm reasoning that is devoted to the successful business of the individual and the corporation, and under present conditions through the tariff board the business of Canada as far as it is reflected in the customs schedule has been receiving that consideration."

The genesis of the budget was then dealt with by Premier King. When the probability of a revision of the United States tariff was announced, he said, the Tariff Board was advised by Hon. J. A. Robb, then finance minister, and by the Prime Minister himself, to study the probable effect on Canada of such revision. At the same time representations were made to the government of the United States.

"When it became apparent that notwithstanding these representations, changes inimical to our country, and to its agricultural interests in particular, were likely to be made, and that our immediate neighbors were not prepared to continue to trade with us except upon unequal terms, a further important step was taken. Both the minister of finance and myself, speaking in Parliament, gave our own people to understand that the government was fully alive to the possible consequences of the action contemplated by the United States, that we were watching Canadian interests to the fullest possible extent.

Able to Care for Herself.

"Public intimation was given, in words the significance of which the United States could not do other than fully comprehend, that in the event of tariff changes taking place which might adversely affect our interests, it would be found that Canada was well able to take care of herself; that all countries might expect to see that we proposed in matters of trade to extend our favors as far as might be possible to those countries most ready to favor us, and that where trade could not be expected except on unequal terms, use would be made of the tariff to divert the course of trade, first of all so as to deepen the channels of trade within the British Empire, and secondly to cause the trade of Canada hereafter more and more to flow in these channels which reciprocal treatment in matters of trade might help to develop between this country and other lands."

Quotes Speeches

Quotations from speeches made by himself and by Mr. Robb with respect to the position taken by Canada in regard to the United States tariff revision were given by Mr. King at some length. He referred to the speech at Winnipeg in 1929 in which he had said that what was needed was not so much a "red-blooded" as a "cool-headed" attitude in respect to the matter. At the conclusion of his quotations he asked how, in the face of so clear and emphatic a statement of the government's position could anyone claim that the country had been taken by surprise in the last budget.

"But there are none so blind as those who will not see, and perhaps there are none so prejudiced and readily deceived as those who seek to prejudice the minds of others," continued Mr. King. "The Tory party had gone so far in its efforts to misrepresent the position of myself and others in our attitude towards the United States and in our attitude towards Britain and other nations of the British Commonwealth, that they had come to believe that what they had been repeating over and over again had in it some element of truth, and that any change in the tariff which might not accord with their own predictions was something quite impossible. Now they know that the government meant every word of what it said, and they have before them in the form of legislative enactments, acts which speak very much louder than words.

Never Succeeds.

"I have been taken to task because I ventured to say that I did not believe in a course of conduct which might only serve to arouse international antagonisms and to defeat the very ends which we had in view, in other words that a provocative attitude is not the best one to take in international affairs. May I say that this applies no more to the United States than to any other country. Its application is as true of the relations between individuals as it is between nations, though the consequences of a wrong course of action may be much more serious where it relates to nations in their dealings with each other. The course of conduct that deliberately seeks to arouse prejudice and hatred, whatever other purpose it may be made to serve at the moment, never succeeds in doing good in the long run. Knowing the course which the government was taking, and proposed to take, how far-reaching that course was certain to be, I felt my responsibility all the greater to see that, on the part of those countries which might be affected, not for today only but possibly for years to come, no cause should be given which might enable them to say that their adverse action toward Canada was the result of some offensive attitude on our part, rather than something which was wholly of their own creation.

Self-condemned

"I do not think I need devote any time to exposing the weakness of the 'stolen clothes' and 'made in Washington' cries. As I have already said, if both are true the Tory party stands self-condemned. The Liberal party has never had occasion to steal political clothes from any party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Tory party. The Liberal party has its own consistent policy, a policy of moderation, a policy which has developed from time to time to meet the changing conditions in the world and in Canada itself. If it had been so ill-advised as to seek Conservative garments, where would it have found t'.em? At the Winnipeg convention, where it will be recalled that the whole Tory party was painfully careful to make sure that the word 'protection' appeared in not a line of its platform? Or from the Winnipeg address of Mr. Bennett last week, when protection returned in full and resounding force, not so much as a political garment, as a political umbrella, or political omnibus? You may have noticed how at Winnipeg Mr. Bennett declared there was to be protection for labor and agriculturists, for producers and consumers, as well as for manufacturers and others. Just how that protection is to be brought about he did not say. He has been studiously vague and indefinite, and he has not mentioned a single specific change that he would propose.

"But whatever Mr. Bennett and his followers may say of 'stolen clothes' and of 'made in Washington' policies, they will scarcely be able to say that either epithet applies to the increases made in the British preference and which, after all, constitute the central feature of the budget."

Fundamental Difference.

There appeared, said Mr. King, to be a fundamental difference between the Liberal party and the Conservatives as to the nature of trade. In the House of Commons, he said, Hon. R. J. Manion had declared that trade was war. In the opinion of the Prime Minister trade was exchange. Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader, had taken a somewhat similar stand as Dr. Manion in his recent Winnipeg speech, said Mr. King. He quoted from Mr. Bennett's speech as follows:

"Tell me where did free trade ever fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make a fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you."

To Increase Trade

"In other words," continued Mr. King, "to the Tory mind it would appear that trade is not something as the result of which each of the parties concerned may gain, but is in the nature of conflict, where as an outcome must be gain to one and loss to another. So Mr. Bennett goes on to say that he will have nothing to do with the giving of preference save where something of a corresponding nature is given in return. He fails to see that people trade only because each of the parties concerned has reason to believe that he is benefitting by the exchange. Where a commodity is being bought or sold the buyer or seller believes that what he is getting in exchange is more to his advantage to him than that which is being given in exchange. In other words, both parties stand to gain or there would be no trade. The Liberal party has consistently taken the view that where it has given a preference it has made possible an increasing measure of trade between the countries concerned.

"Even more important than tariffs and policies to a country is the spirit which animates the administration of domestic and foreign affairs. What is to be said of the spirit of the Conservative party as revealed by the utterances of its leader?

Has Given Equality

"Mr. Bennett at Winnipeg asks 'When did free trade ever fight for you?' Free trade is not an issue in this campaign, and Mr. Bennett knows it. But there is a country which has maintained a free trade policy for almost one hundred years. Does Mr. Bennett suggest that Great Britain is guilty of economic cowardice because it has not followed the high tariff policies of the United States? 'We will make our tariffs fight for you,' he declared in ringing tones. 'We will blast a way to trade.' Let me ask you frankly, did you ever hear of anyone blasting a way to trade? Germany tried this method of gaining world supremacy in trade! There are business men, salesmen and commercial travellers in this audience. Let mé ask you this question. Did you ever secure an order by force? Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle of business that trade is secured not by ill-will but by good-will? Not by awakening antagonism, but by developing friendliness and co-operation? To Mr. Bennett all countries are competitors. He forgets that all countries are also our customers, and that no nation liveth to itself alone.

Admiration of U. S. Policy.

"Through his entire speech one could detect an admiration of the tariff policy of the United States. It was a striking coincidence that on the same page of an Ottawa newspaper which carried a report of his Winnipeg speech there was a despatch from Washington referring to the consternation of business men of that country over the shrinkage in foreign trade which had taken place as a result of the effort of that country to blast their way to trade by shutting out the goods of other countries.

Has Given Equality.

"Mr. Bennett and his party insist that we shall give absolutely no preference to the Mother Country unless as the result of a bargain," asserted Mr. King, "unless in return for an equivalent tariff preference from Great Britain. Is it true that we have received no advantage in Britain's market? It is true that Britain has not, except in a limited measure, established protective tariffs and given us a preferential reduction, but if she has not given us a preference over the foreigner she has given us equality with her own producers. An eminent Canadian recently reminded us that since Confederation Britain has bought from Canada five billions more than Canada has bought from Britain. We have not fared so badly in that great market.

"We all wish to preserve and extend the British market. It has been our greatest outlet in the past. Whatever changes may come, it will remain a great and indispensable market. Looking at it as practical men, which is the better way of securing a favorable position in that market, to offer as the Liberal party has done, from the days of Laurier and Fielding to the present, a free-will preference to the Mother Country, or to insist that we will grant no preference whatever and will cancel the existing preference unless Britain reverses its fiscal system for the purpose of granting us a preference? Put yourself in the other's place. Would you prefer to deal with a country which held out to you the hand of friendship and good-will, or with a country which held nothing in its hands but a club? We have not far to go for our answer. Look at the position today. What has been the result of the Dunning budget, a budget which gave the British producer the opportunity for a great expansion of trade in Canada, a trade in large measure diverted from foreign countries without any injury to Canadian industry? The result has been an immediate and warm response from every party and every part of Britain, a deep feeling which will inevitably be reflected in the action of individuals, in the action of parties, in the action of the community, in whatever form their good-will may most appropriately find expression. We do not propose to blast our way into the markets of Britain, but we have secured and we will hold the most favorable position any country enjoys today for the expansion of trade in the British Isles.

Secure Advantages

"In short, whatever fiscal policy may be adopted by Great Britain, Canada, under the guidance of the Liberal policy, and the Liberal policy alone, is in the fortunate position of being able to secure the utmost advantage in the British market," said Mr. King.

"I come now to the third of the issues, and with what I have to say in this connection, to the conclusion of my address. You are being called upon to decide which party—the Liberal or the Conservative—is to represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences to be held in London this year. To this issue, as I have said, is necessarily related the question of the personnel of the ministry which is to manage the affairs of Canada during the next Parliament.

The One Real Issue.

"Let me remind the country that the question of Canada's representation at the forthcoming conferences was stated by Mr. Bennett as so all-important as to necessitate a mandate from the people. It was so important in fact as to be the one real issue of an electoral campaign. Mr. Bennett made his declaration for a general election on the issue of the forthcoming conferences in his speech on the address at the opening of the recent session. He said that in his opinion and in that of the party which he represented so important were the conferences of this year in London that Canada should be represented only by a government which had, in the interval, received a direct mandate from the people. When it came to the debate on the budget, Mr. Bennett repeated this expression of view, albeit, I confess, with something less in the way of emphasis. Ever since, however, he has been doing his utmost to get away from this issue, to create new issues, to say or to do anything which may help to obscure this all-important question as a real issue of the election, even to the calling of a special session of Parliament immediately after the election."

Mr. King reminded his listeners that the present administration might have claimed that it had a mandate to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference in view of the fact that it had still a year of office to run. The situation became somewhat different however with the introduction of the budget.

Inter-Empire Trade

"The fiscal policies embodied in the budget had been framed, amongst other things, in the light and in the knowledge of the conferences to be held in London this fall. Those policies, as I have indicated, were deliberately shaped so as to make possible a wider measure of trade between this country and other portions of the British Empire, Great Britain in particular. The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets, the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was formed with a view to holding for Western Canada the market for her wheat which for so many years she has had in Great Britain, and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere.

Important Consideration.

"To secure from the people of Canada approval of these policies before the Imperial Conferences take place, is, therefore, in our opinion, an all important consideration if the conferences are to do for the further development of our trade, what, with all confidence, we believe they will. To have a mandate based upon the policies which are now before the people is, therefore, in our opinion, imperative. It is for this reason that we have not hesitated to dissolve Parliament over fourteen months before the time at which dissolution becomes necessary. When we go to the Conference of 1930 we want to go as we went to the Conferences of 1923 and 1926, with the voice of Canada behind us, and with all the influence of power which comes from the voice of the nation as a whole."

The representation of Canada at the conference was bound up with the personnel of the ministry, said Mr. King. What had Mr. Bennett to offer by way of constructive leadership, he asked.

No Constructive Idea

"Up to the present time, pretty much all that Mr. Bennett has said has been in the nature of platitudes or declamation. He has not put forward a single constructive idea, nor has he indicated a single policy with any clearness or definiteness of aim. In his speech at Winnipeg, he referred to the members of the present government as 'This group of mercenaries, holding office by shame or subterfuge,' and as 'forgetful, in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages.' He said: 'Look upon them, treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation.' And at a meeting at Regina the following day he spoke of 'nine years of wasted effort before the great betrayal' and added 'It did not take Judas that long.' May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled for, and adds nothing to his stature in the position of leadership. Already I have heard it strongly resented by men of his own party. A government securely established, which voluntarily appeals to a people on a great issue nearly a year and a half in advance of the completion of its term, is not a 'group of mercenaries holding office by shame and subterfuge' nor are they persons 'forgetful in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages.'

Never Better Govt.

"May I say that I believe it is the general opinion that Canada at no time has had a government composed of abler men, of men more genuinely disinterested or of higher purpose than the men I am proud to have as my colleagues in the present administration. I believe it is true that no government has ever given a better account of itself both at home and abroad. May I ask Mr Bennett who, in the administration that he has in mind, are to take the place of the ministers of the present government from the province of Quebec, from the province of Ontario, from the Maritime Provinces, and west of the Great Lakes. Who are the gentlemen he has in mind as those who are to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference?

"I will tell him who of the government will be among the number to represent Canada, if the present administration is returned: At the Imperial Conference, the present minister of justice, Honorable Ernest Lapointe, who represented Canada with such ability and distinction at the Imperial Conference of 1926 and who represented Canada at the operation of Dominion Legislation which met in London last fall, will be one of the representatives. Another of the representatives at the Imperial Conference will be the present minister of national defence, Colonel the Honorable J. L. Ralston, who during the present year represented Canada with such credit to himself and to our country at the conference on the Limitation of Naval Armaments. At the Economic Conference Canada will be represented by the present minister of finance, Honorable Charles A. Dunning, the author of the Budget of 1930, a budget which has stirred and warmed the heart of the whole British Empire. Another representative will be the present minister of trade and commerce, Honorable James Malcolm, under whose auspices the trade of Canada has expanded as never before to all quarters of the globe.

As to Substitutes

"I ask Mr. Bennett to tell the Canadian people before the 28th of July who, from the province of Quebec, he intends, if given the opportunity, to substitute for Mr. Lapointe? Who from the Maritime Provinces he intends to substitute for Colonel Ralston? Who from Ontario he intends to substitute for Mr. Malcolm? And who from the Canadian West he intends to substitute for Mr. Dunning? The Canadian people have a right to know who are to be their representatives at these two great conferences. The people have a right to know, in addition, who for the next five years, the other members of the government of Canada are likely to be.

"In the general election of 1911, when the Liberal party in Canada, under its great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appealed to the country on a trade issue in the nature of reciprocity in natural products between Canada and the United States, a measure of greater freedom in trade so far as this continent was concerned and of wider markets for the producers in the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, the forces that were opposed to the tariff changes then proposed, allied under the cry of 'We are at the parting of the ways.' I do not intend to go the length of saying that, having regard to the measure of increased trade assured by the budget of 1930 between Canada and Great Britain, and indeed between Canada and all other parts of the British Empire, we are 'at the parting of the ways,' or that the rejection of the budget, for such would be the significance of the defeat of the present government at this general election, would mean an end to all endeavour further to promote inter-empire trade. I do, however, say, what in very truth I believe to be the fact, that so far as inter-empire trade is concerned 'we are, at last, at the parting of the ways' and that the acceptance of this budget by the people on July 28th will do more than all to ensure for Canada's representatives at the Economic Conference in London that favorable response to our attitude and action which we believe will be given by the governments of all the sister dominions of the Empire. It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may help to determine whether the highways of Empire are to become, as we hope they may increasingly become, the avenues of a British commerce expanding ever so widely o'er land and sea, or, whether insofar as the component parts of the Empire are concerned, its highways are to remain indistinguishable from the other trade routes of the world."

Record of Liberal Govt. First Issue, King Claims

1930 Budget and Choice of Representatives to London Conferences Are Other Election Factors, Premier Says at Brantford

Brantford, June 16.—(Staff Special) Opening the campaign of the Liberal Party in the city, which defeated the late Hon. William Paterson, one of the authors of the rejected reciprocity pact of 1911 with the United States, and which has seen industry after industry smothered by competition from the same United States, Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, spoke to an audience which overflowed the Armouries here last night.

On Monday, June 9, Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative Leader, opened his campaign in Winnipeg. A week has elapsed and in the interval Mr. King has had an opportunity to study his opponent's strategy. It so happens that what Mr. Bennett said in his opening address were the principal issues in the campaign, Mr. King also announced were the issues. Mr. King may not have used the same words, but the meaning was similar.

"There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign," Mr. King said. "The first is the record of the Government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third is a direct issue between the choice of the Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year."

JUST TEMPORARY

Mr. King began by painting the post-war days when the last Conservative Government held office in the most sombre colors. He showed the rising of the sun of prosperity under the succeeding Liberal regime. He declared that since the Liberals took office Canada had enjoyed an era of prosperity never before known in her history. In a brief paragraph he mentioned the trade depression and unemployment problem which grips Canada to-day. The cause of his every body knew, but he assured his seen and unseen audience that this was only a temporary condition and would soon end.

Mr. King first touched upon the financial position of Canada. On March 31, 1914, the national debt stood about $336,000,000. On March 31, 1922, the total of the national debt was $2,427,000,000, as a result of the war and the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, he claimed.

The situation of the country at the end of 1922 was described. Money had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet deficits. Depression was general; the business community was anxious for the future; the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contracted; agriculture was depressed. All this was changed by the Liberal administration. Deficits became surplusses, taxes were reduced, the Canadian National Railways were co-ordinated and vitalized, agriculture stimulated, foreign trade extended, and the greatest period of progress it has ever known brought to Canada, he asserted.

"Where the previous administration avoided their responsibilities, we met ours courageously and without regard to political consequences," continued Mr. King. "We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national budget."

SURPLUSES.

Taking credit for surpluses, Mr. King stated that since Confederation there had been surpluses in 15 out of 63 years. Four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven during the eight and a half years of the present administration. He then claimed a reduction in taxation over a period of five years, commencing in 1926, estimated at $118,000,000.

All, too, had been wrong with the railways. With the exception of the Canadian Pacific, the railways of Canada were in a disorganized and bankrupt condition. The C.N.R. was formed. Then the Hudson's Bay Railway now nearing completion, and the Welland Ship Canal, shortly to be opened.

Immigration was the next subject. It was quite true, Mr. King admitted, that during the years following his taking the Premiership the trend of migration was from Canada to the United States. The United States had prospered, while Canada had suffered through the war. During the period of re-establishment preference in the matter of employment had been given where possible to those who had served overseas.

"There were not the opportunities for employment here that there were in the country to the south, for many of our boys and girls, not a few of them, and of our grown-ups as well, left on that account," he said.

People had not the wherewithal to migrate from the British Isles or from other countries after the war, and Canada had not the free homesteads to offer, nor was she able to advertise these or give low ocean and railway rates. But it was not long before this was all changed. Migration of Canadians to the United States began to lessen and that migration to-day of Canadians and others equals the movement from Canada to the United States. He denied that the Government preferred continental to British immigrants.

FOR INDUSTRIES

"We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade, would above all else further the growth and development of our basic industries, said Mr. King, beginning his argument in support of the fiscal policy of the Liberal Government. He pleaded that world markets as well as home markets were essential, and what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent upon the costs of production and of living in Canada.

Canada now stood as the sixth great trading nation of the world, he asserted. He said that the quantity of raw materials which Canada imports from the United States, such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceeded in value the total amount of the raw materials which Canada exported to the United States.

"Let me remind you that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada," he said.

Mr. King also claimed there had been less of industrial strife in Canada during the last few years than in any other country.

Credit was taken for the return of the natural resources to the prairie provinces, which had revealed a generosity of treatment that had never characterized similar negotiations in the history of the Dominion.

"Here may I point out that something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the premier of this province in this general election, namely, that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present administration at Ottawa," he said. "It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly with Progressive and Conservative governments, our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long standing grievances should once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or ill will."

ABOUT "STATUS"

Reverting to "status," Mr. King spoke of inter-imperial and international relations. There has been accorded to Canada and the other self-governing dominions a national status equal to that of Britain herself. The Conservative party had opposed every step of the way towards responsible self-government on Canada in external affairs, he charged.

Turning to the budget of 1930, Mr. King said policies must be framed to meet existing conditions. The national policy of 1878 would not suit the Canada of 1930, nor had that policy advocated by the Conservatives always served to meet conditions in the past. A national policy to-day in matters of trade, as in all else, was one which aimed to give Canada her place among the nations of the world, and not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets.

If high protection was a sectional policy in the distribution of its benefits, continued Mr. King, it was equally true that, having regard to the present industrial development of Central Canada, a free trade policy would be detrimental in its immediate effects to one section of the Dominion, even though it conferred benefits on those of our citizens who are obliged to seek markets abroad for their agricultural produce and who derive little or no advantage from a protective tariff.

The budget of 1930 was framed to meet a situation arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes. It was influenced also in a special degree by our relation with two countries with which we were most closely associated in matters of commerce—Great Britain and the United States.

If Canada was to maintain the British market for Canadian wheat it would seem desirable that many of the purchases at present made in the United States should be diverted to Great Britain and in other ways to increase British imports to Canada. So the budget of 1930 was a response to internal and external factors in the economic situation.

The countervailing duties were intended as a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade on fair and equal terms. The government regretted that United States had raised tariff duties against a considerable range of Canadian commodities. The countervailing duties were the subject of diplomatic exchange between the two countries, but at the same time, the United States had been told that Canada was ready in the future, as in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis.

NOT EASY

In the revised schedules on fruits and vegetables, Mr. King said it was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers. This situation had been met by combining advalorem rates which operate throughout the year with specific minimum rates which apply at designated seasons. In this way it was hoped to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices.

The British preference, Mr. King declared, was the traditional policy of the Liberal party. It was inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897.

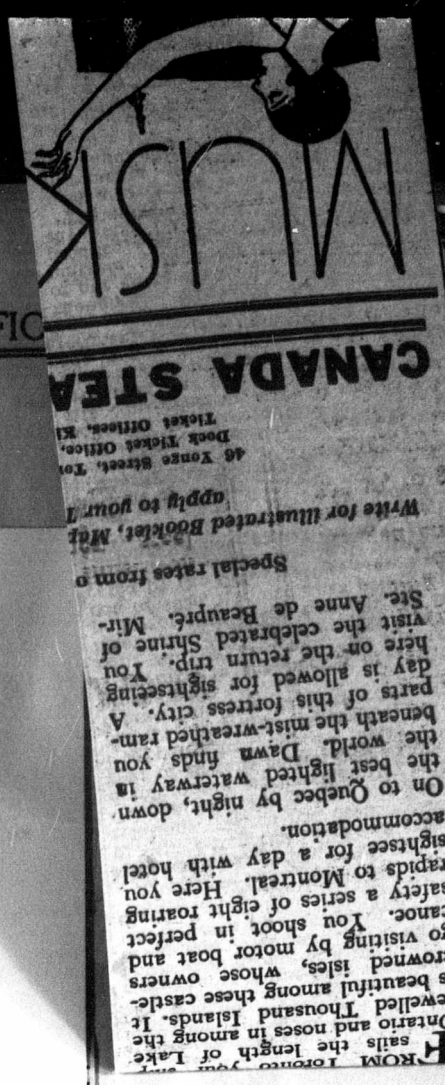
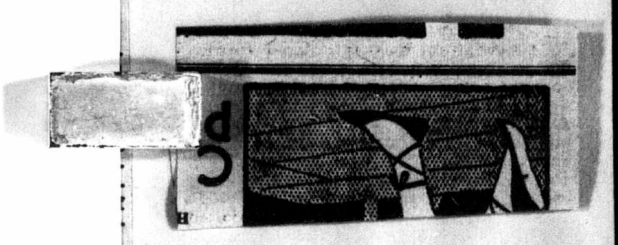
SUBJECT





"It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them to-day. They have said that we must have preference for preference, and that no favors should be extended to Great Britan until she is prepared to forego free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, it is not unreasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference, this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt?"

Mr. King denied that the 1930 budget had been hurriedly concocted.

Mr. King defended his position of avoiding giving rise to antagonisms in international affairs. A provocative attitude was no more advantageous than to individuals, but perhaps more serious. He did not think it necessary to expose the weakness of the "stolen clothes" and "made in Washington" cries. These epithets would scarcely apply to the increase in British preferences.

In conclusion, Mr. King said the people were being called upon to decide who should represent Canada at the forthcoming imperial economic conference—Conservatives or Liberals. If the government was returned the personnel representing Canada at the conference would include Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, Hon. J. L. Ralston, Minister of National Defence, Hon. Chas. A. Dunning, minister of finance and Hon. James Malcolm, minister of trade and commerce.

Goodwill, Not a Club, Liberal Trade Gesture, Premier Tells Canada

King Ministers Would go to Economic Conference in the Spirit of 1930 Budget—Prime Minister at Brantford Condemns Conservative Leader's Offer to "Blast" a Way into World Markets With Tariff—Oxford Well Represented at Big Gathering as Premier Delivers Opening Speech of Campaign.

By Staff Reporter.

Brantford, June 17.—Oxford Liberals who came down to hear Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King open his campaign last evening, and formed part of a capacity audience at the armory, went home declaring the prime minister's "keynote speech" the most effective he has ever delivered. There were three outstanding issues in the election, Mr. King said, namely, the record of the government from 1921, the budget of 1920, and, finally, the choice between the Liberal and Conservative parties as representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences in London next September. To these issues he addressed himself in a speech of almost two hours, broadcast from coast to coast over a record hookup of 24 radio stations. Judging from the enthusiasm, as indicated by applause, the prime minister's most effective appeal was that concerning Conference representation, with which he concluded his address.

Herein he took issue sharply with Hon. R. B. Bennett, over a passage in the latter's recent Winnipeg speech. The Conservative leader had said he would use tariffs to "blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you." The great audience last night responded instantly to Mr. King's question, "Did Britain 'blast' her way into her great world trade?"

GERMANY TRIED IT

"Germany," he reminded them, "tried to blast her way. Is that the policy we are going to follow, and above all, is that the policy we are going to follow toward the Mother Country? I ask you to put yourselves in the position of others. Our business is to take the policies of other countries as we find them.

"The spirit of a government in administration of its policies is often more important, perhaps, than the particular measures themselves. When did you ever hear of anyone starting out to get business by 'blasting' a way as Mr. Bennett proposes? Mr. Bennett sees in every other country a competitor, when he ought to see in every other country a customer as well."

Picturing the Liberal party as stretching out a hand of goodwill, and the Conservative party as holding a club, in trade matters, the prime minister called for a mandate to send his ministers to London in September, and demanded who Mr. Bennett would make Canada's representatives in place of Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Col. J. L. Ralston, Hon. Charles Dunning and Hon. James Malcolm.

PROMINENT LIBERALS

Three of his Cabinet colleagues were on the decorated platform, and at request of the chairman, A. T. Whitaker, stood up for the audience to see. These were Hon. W. D. Euler, minister of national revenue; Hon. J. C. Elliott, minister of public works, and Hon. James Malcolm, minister of trade and commerce. Among those on the platform were Senators E. S. Little, London; James Spence and W. H. Maguire, Toronto. Senator Rankin, of Perth, was discovered in the audience. Candidates in the present campaign included W. H. Taylor, Norfolk-Elgin; C. R. Widdifield, South Waterloo; Dr. D. B. Smith, North Perth; F. C. Biggs, Wentworth; F. Treleaven, Hamilton; William Urquhart, Toronto Northeast; Charles Hanna, Hastings; William Camelford, Haldimand, and from the Oxfords Hugh Allan and T. M. Cayley. Oxford people from practically every part of the county were present, overflowing the block of seats marked for them by a standard. They included Dr. D. J. Sinclair, ex-M.P.; J. F. McDonald, C. E. Sutherland and P. M. Dewan, president, secretary and treasurer, respectively, of North Oxford Liberal Association; A. S. Rennie, Tillsonburg; Dr. Furlong, Ingersoll; Dr. J. M. Brodie, Woodstock; Dr. H. B. Atkinson, Embro, and a carload or two from the Zorras, as well as parties from Blenheim, Blandford and various parts of the south riding.

R. F. Miller, ex-M.L.A., Haldimand, spoke over the amplifiers at 7.45 to an audience which was more or less patiently awaiting the arrival of the prime minister. Mr. Treleaven and Mr. Widdifield kept the ball rolling for a few minutes each, and Mrs. John Harold, Paris, said a few words into the "mike."

BRANT CANDIDATES

Then the prime minister entered, to the music of a pipe band, amidst much applause, and the chairman of the evening, A. T. Whitaker, president of Brantford Liberal Association, took charge. Mayor Beckett extended a civic welcome, and John Harold was introduced as Liberal candidate for Brant.

Mr. Harold commended the record of the government, and recalled that in 1921 he had advocated creation of a tariff board.

"You have placed a great responsibility upon me," he said, "and I accept it because I believe our premier has a greater responsibility, and that every citizen who has a call should be willing to take at least a minor position behind a leader who is one of the greatest statesmen Canada has ever had."

W. Ross MacDonald, candidate in Brantford, was warmly received. He spoke of the honor done the city in being made the scene of the prime minister's opening speech, and called attention to the fact that representatives of Brant and Brantford in the late Parliament voted against the budget which reduced the price of tea.

"I stand for the Dunning budget," he said, "because it tends to decrease trade with the United States and increase trade with the British Empire. The Conservatives have no great leaders today like Sir John A. Macdonald; he was a giant and leader of men. Today their leaders have no vision, they criticize, destroy and pull down. At one time they would have built up the British Empire, today they say, 'let the British Empire look after itself and Canada look after herself. At one time their battlecry was 'No truck nor trade with the Yankees'; today it is 'no truck nor trade with the Empire.' "

THE PRIME MINISTER.

Premier King was received with tremendous applause as he was called upon at nine o'clock, and then stood waiting while a radio announcer read over a long list of stations. The premier opened with graceful allusions to Alexander Graham Bell, inventor of the telephone, and tributes to the local candidates. He outlined the three great issues of the campaign, as he saw them, and dealt briefly with the government's financial record—seven surpluses in less than nine years, debt retirement, and "$118,000,000 a year less being levied in taxation today than in 1924."

The railways now comprising the national system had been left "famished foundling on our doorstep, suffering from all kinds of malnutrition," but now the Conservatives were quite willing to have their names associated with it.

Immigration was touched upon, and the premier inquired what the effect would have been upon unemployment if General McRae, Conservative organizer, had been able to carry out his $300,000,000 scheme to bring out 300,000 people. Mr. King then dealt with legislation affecting labor and ex-service men.

"All parties combined," he said, "to enact the legislation with respect to war veterans which is in force today at Ottawa, but the present administration took full responsibility in the matter, and it is legislation which I felt privileged indeed to be able to give a good deal of personal time and attention, and it is part of the Liberal record in which I feel perhaps a greater pride than any other part."

Coming to fiscal policy, Mr. King said that the National Policy of 1878 was designed to knit together scattered provinces—a condition which no longer exists. Today 80 per cent. of manufacturing is concentrated in Ontario and Quebec. A high tariff policy and a free trade policy alike could be of only sectional benefit.

CANADA'S POSITION.

"Let me invite you to look beyond the empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds today? Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking there has been the sudden steep ascent of war in which there were common heroisms and common sacrifices, and there has been the long, gradual, constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer."

The Conservative party had opposed every step of the way toward the responsible selfgovernment of Canada in external affairs, the prime minister charged.

"When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties, we were told that we were seeking separation because, forsooth, we asked his majesty, in regard to an international negotiation on a matter of Canadian concern, to give full powers to a Canadian minister of the crown instead of to the British ambassador at Washington. When a little later we opened a legation at Washington and subsequently at Paris and Tokio we were again told that we were pursuing the path of separation. Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about 'Canada first.' Just what does his 'Canada First' mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the establishment of Canadian legations in other lands, and on Canada's status of co-equality with the motherland. I am not sure where he stands today, but I know where he stood in the session of parliament just closed."

THE BUDGET.

Then Mr. King turned to the budget of 1930, which he termed the second great issue of the campaign. Policies must be framed to meet existing conditions, he said. The national policy of 1878 would not suit the Canada of 1930. What was more, he declared, the old national policy advocated by the Conservatives had not always served to meet conditions in the past.

"When we increased the British preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reduced duties on the implements of production when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the national policy and that we would ruin the country," he said.

"I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedom of trade is the more deserving of being called a national policy as we approach the end of the third decade of the twentieth century. A national policy today in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world.

"It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets it is essentially a policy of world markets. With the rapid development of Western Canada and the emergency of a great agricultural population engaged in the production of a commodity which must seek its markets throughout the world, high protection, or an all round increase in the tariff can no longer be called a national policy.

"According to figures given in the Canada year book of 1929, over 80 per cent. of Canadian manufacturing is concentrated in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

"This percentage is based on figures of production, capital employed and number of employees. While it is true that manufacturing has developed to a considerable extent in western Canada these manufacturers are based largely upon the primary industries of agriculture and mining and do not require a tariff protection to any considerable extent. It is therefore true to say that a general increase in the tariff in 1930 is essentially a sectional policy so far as the distribution of its benefits is concerned.

"It has forfeited every right to the name—national policy—given to it by Sir John A. MacDonald in 1878, and by Mr. Bennett in 1930.

FREE TRADE DETRIMENTAL

"But if high protection is a sectional policy in the distribution of its benefits, it is equally true that having regard to the present industrial development of central Canada a free trade policy would be detrimental in its immediate effects to one section of the Dominion, even though it conferred benefits on these of our citizens who are obliged to seek markets abroad for their agriculture produce and who derive little or no advantage from a protective tariff.

"It is apparent, therefore, that both a high tariff and free trade are sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada.

"What then is the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interests arising out of the tariff is the same as it is with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions.

"To the greatest possible extent sectional interests must be reconciled in the light of the larger interests of the whole.

"This can be effected only by moderation and compromise. Face the facts of our situation. Take Canada as it is, with its changing needs and its conflicting interests. Acknowledge the facts of Geography and of divergent industrial development in east, and centre, and west. And having examined the real ties of the situation, and having considered the demands of different sections for policies suited to their needs, so mould our social transportation and fiscal policies as to hold the scales evenly between class and creed and section and thus weld a far flung country into a united Canadian nation.

EMPIRE TRADE.

"The budget of 1930 was framed first of all to meet a situation in Canada arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes for policies suited to their needs. But because of the place which Canada has come to occupy, in International trade, it was influenced also and in a special degree by our relation with two countries with which we are most closely associated in matters of commerce. The one is Great Britain. The other is the United States.

"When Mr. Hoover assumed office as president of the United States on March 11, 1929, the United States congress began carrying out a far-reaching revision of the tariff in conformity with the pledges given by the Republican party during the Presidential campaign of the previous year. As that revision proceeded, it became increasingly apparent that the duties against Canadian agricultural products would be raised to such an extent as to cut off a considerable proportion of the existing Canadian exports to that country. In these circumstances and in accordance with its policy of using every endeavour to find wider markets for Canadian products the government gave instructions to the tariff advisory board to make a careful survey of the tariff schedules then applying against American imports, with a view to determining what extent these imports could be purchased from Great Britain or from other parts of the empire.

THE BRITISH MARKET.

"While this enquiry was proceeding, it was decided that an imperial economic conference be held in London in September of 1930, to consider the subject of closer co-operation in matters of trade between the various parts of the empire and to discuss the various policies which would contribute towards that end. Efforts had previously been made by the present administration to have this conference held in Canada. Subsequently, a condition developed in Great Britain which led to a marked curtailment of purchases of Canadian wheat and resulted in a serious tie-up of our wheat in elevators, with consequent loss not only to Canadian growers, but to our transportation system and to many branches of our industry and commerce. Prior to this development, Great Britain had purchased far more from Canada, largely because of our wheat exports, than Canada had purchased from Great Britain. It became apparent that if Canada was to maintain a British market for Canadian wheat, it was desirable that measures should be taken by diverting to Great Britain, many of the purchases being made at present in the United States and in other ways, to increase British imports to Canada and thus create an economic and psychological condition in Great Britain more favorable to the importation of Canadian wheat. These circumstances must be kept clearly in mind when examining the proposals in the budget presented to the House of Commons on May 1st.

FOUR PROPOSALS.

"The budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four proposals each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1.—The iron and steel tariff revision.

2.—The countervailing duties.

3.—The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.

4.—Extension of the British preference.

STEEL SCHEDULES

"The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the tariff advisory board which have been conducted over a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an enquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great basic industries. The purpose kept in mind by the government in prosecuting this enquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain.

"The next feature of the budget, namely, the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us.

FRIENDLY WITH U. S.

"For the present we raise the duties on these selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by either countries, but, the same time we tell our neighbor frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis.

"On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be onesided.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLES

"It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers. We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules. In this matter we have endeavored to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which these specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of the consumers of these commodities. In past years, moreover, a large proportion of our early fruits and vegetables has been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business. Under the existing trade agreement these islands have assured us of a preference in their market.

"In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruits and vegetables under the British preference.

BRITISH PREFERENCE

"This brings me to the last feature of the budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British crown which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries today do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

"The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them today.

"They have said that we must have preference for preference and that no favors should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forego the policy of free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt?

NOT STOLEN NOR U. S.-MADE

"Against the fiscal and trade policies of the budget what are the criticisms of the Conservative party as enunciated by the leader of the opposition? They may be summed up in a very few words. The first is that the budget propcsals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objection if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have 'stolen the clothes' of the Conservative party. If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that party. The third is that our policy is a 'Washington-made policy. If that is true, which it is not, what becomes of the argument that we have 'stolen the clothes' of our opponents? Finally, we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be no preferences there should be no trade, even with the Mother Country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference.

"In his address at Winnipeg, sounding the keynote of the Conservative campaign, Mr. Bennett characterized the tariff changes of the budget as 'this premature unreasoned action.' I venture to say there never was presented to any parliament a budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well."

THE TARIFF BOARD

The work of the tariff advisory board in shaping the budget was gone into by the prime minister. He referred to the fact that the board had been established by the Liberal government as a fact finding body, and that its hearings were held in public.

"With the establishment of the advisory board on this and taxation the day has gone," he said, "for the making of tariffs on impulse, or because of momentary resentments.

"No longer are tariffs to be made by clamor of self-interest, nor by the rhetoric of politicians. The business of the country reserves the cool, calm, reasoning that is devoted to the successful business of the individual and the corporation, and under present conditions through the tariff board the business of Canada as far as it is conducted in the custom schedule has been receiving that consideration."

The genesis of the budget was then dealt with by the premier. When the probability of a revision of the U. S. tariff was announced, he said, the tariff board was advised by Hon. J. A. Robb and himself to study the probable effect upon Canada. At the same time representations were made to the United States. When it became apparent that changes inimical to Canada were likely to be made, public intimation was given that in the event of such changes, it would be found that Canada was well able to take care of herself. The premier here quoted Mr. Robb's statement in Parliament on March 1, 1929, that "it is our desire to trade freely with any and all who are willing to trade with us, and this necessarily depends in some measure on the fiscal policies of other countries." The present budget, Mr. King added, was forecast by himself at Winnipeg last November.

THE CONFERENCES

"You are being called upon to decide which party, Liberal or Conservative, is to represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conferences to be held in London this year. Is it to be Conservative opinion such as I have described, or Liberal opinion as demonstrated in the budget? The strength of the government at that Conference is going to be the support you give us.

"Mr. Bennett has said a great deal about constructive leadership. He has not given one single constructive idea to the people of Canada in the whole of this campaign. There has been a great deal of declamation, a great many platitudes, but where is the policy he has specifically set out and said, 'This is the road we are going to take?' He has gone out of the way to speak of members of the present administration in a way I think he had little right to do. He said, 'This group of mercenaries, holding office by sham and subterfuge.' I ask Mr. Bennett to tell the people of this country who he is going to put in his cabinet as representatives of this country from the Maritime provinces. Who are to be his ministers from this province of Ontario, and who are going to represent the western provinces of the Dominion in his cabinet?

"Men who are prepared to give up 14 months of office in order to ask the people to pass upon a question of vital importance to the whole of this nation and the British Empire, these are not men to be spoken of as hanging on to office or forgetful in their love of office of all else except their personal advantage.

"I believe it is true, and I believe the people of Canada will say it is true, the present government stands as high in the estimation of the people of this country as any government we have had in the history of Canada. May I say this, that I do not believe you will find in any government of Canada men who are more upright, who are possessed of greater business ability, who are men thoroughly disinterested in the service of the nation, than the gentlemen by whom I have the honor and privilege of being surrounded in the Cabinet of Canada. (Applause).

"The people of Canada are entitled to know who Mr. Bennett proposes to send to the Imperial Conferences. At the Imperial Conference questions will be taken up which relate to political and constitutional matters, at the Economic Conference questions which relate to co-operation in trade and matters of that kind. Are you going to send to the Imperial Conference men who have to deal with these questions of treaty and status and the like who have opposed and obstructed at every turn the efforts we have made in connection with Canada's status as a nation? Are you going to send to the Economic Conference men who have said 'We approach this Conference in the spirit of this budget' or those who say 'We are going to blast our way into your market?'

"Ladies and gentlemen, I will tell you who will go to the Conference from the present government. From Quebec, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, minister of justice, who was over in 1926 and has recently been at the subsidiary conference on Dominion legislation and has served his country with such distinction. There will be in addition at the Imperial Conference Col. Ralston, who has this year served Canada at the conference for the limitation of naval armaments. At the Economic Conference there will be Hon. Charles Dunning, the man who brought this budget into Parliament—a budget that has created warmth and enthusiasm in the heart of the whole British Empire—and also my friend Mr. Malcolm as minister of trade and commerce, to put this country's position in trade to a point that it has never reached before in the history of Canada.

"These are the gentlemen who, among others, will represent the present government at the next Conferences. I ask Mr. Bennett to tell the people of Canada before July 28—I ask him to reply tonight at Vancouver—who do you propose to substitute for Mr. Lapointe from Quebec, (applause) for Col. Ralston, for Hon. Mr. Malcolm?

MEETING OF THE WAYS

"In the general elections of 1911, when the Liberal party in Canada, under its great leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appealed to the country on a trade issue, the forces opposed to the tariff changes then proposed were allied under the cry of 'we are at the parting of the ways.' I will not go so far tonight as to say that in the opportunities of further trade which this budget offers, and the extensions of the preference, and the advantages offered in other directions, we are at the parting of the ways. I will not say if the budget is defeated, which would be the significance of the defeat of the government, that all effort at further imperial trade will cease and the hands of the clock turn backward in that particular, but I will say what is in fact the very truth, that in respect of this budget and Conference we are at least at the meeting of the ways.

"We are at the meeting of the ways that lead to the heart of empire, from all parts of the Empire, the ways that help to make British trade what we want to see British trade made. There we will be at the meeting of the ways, and it is for you to say, ladies and gentlemen, who are to be there—the party with hand outstretched in goodwill or the party that comes with a club in its hand. Speaking in all sincerity, I believe on the fate of this budget this much may be said, that it may determine whether from now on the highways of British trade shall continue to deepen and strengthen and broaden over land and sea, through all parts of the Empire, or whether as respects the component parts of the British Empire these great highways of trade shall from now on remain indistinguishable from the other trade routes of the world."

OUTLINES PLATFORM IN SPEECH

Liberal Leader Addresses Dominion-wide Audience

RADIO UTILIZED

Speaking Tour Will Carry Premier From Atlantic to Pacific

By RAY BROWN,
Canadian Press Staff Correspondent

BRANTFORD, Ont., June 16 —The record of the Government, the budget, and Canada's representation at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference—these are the major issues which the Canadian people are asked to pass upon at the coming election. They will be called upon to decide whether or not they believe in the policy of "blasting a way to trade" or if they prefer the viewpoint that trade is exchange for mutual advantage and that it "is secured not by ill-will but by good-will."

Thus declared Prime Minister Mackenzie King in his keynote Liberal campaign speech here tonight. From the platform the words of the Prime Minister of Canada were carried over an all-Canadian radio hook-up into the home of thousands of people across the Dominion from coast to coast. Mr. King spoke at length, dealing extensively with the record of the Government in respect to finance, taxation, natural resources, war veterans, labor, immigration, co-operation with the provinces, and more particularly with the important provisions of the budget.

And it was with respect to the budget that Mr. King took very definite and final issue with Hon. R. B. Bennett, Leader of the Opposition. There was, he said, a fundamental difference between the Liberals and Conservatives in their conception of the nature of trade. The Conservatives, he declared, had enunciated the belief that trade was war. On that assumption they spoke and declared that they were prepared to act.

TRADE METHODS.

Mr. Bennett had asserted at Winnipeg that the Conservatives would "blast a way to trade," continued Mr. King. "Let me ask you frankly," he said, "did you ever hear of any one blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade."

The Prime Minister addressed himself particularly to salesmen and commercial travelers in his audience. "Did you ever secure any order by force?" he asked. "Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle that trade is secured not by ill-will but by good will, by developing friendliness and co-operation?"

To Mr. Bennett, he declared, all countries were competitors. "He forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone."

The policy of the British preference was a Liberal policy, Mr. King informed his listeners, and the Liberal party believed in conciliation in friendliness in the fact trade was exchange and, if possible, should be mutually beneficial to all countries involved in the exchange.

"May I ask you to ponder this question both now and until your votes are cast," he said earnestly. "Should the Government of this country be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference except on a basis of hard bargaining, and who would destroy the foundations of good-will upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded today?"

AS REPRESENTATIVES

The attitude of the Conservatives with respect to efforts to give Canada fullness of national stature had been one of opposition and indecision, Mr. King declared, in discussing representation at the Imperial Conference. He asked which party should represent Canada overseas. "Shall it be the party which labored and achieved or the party that obstructed and opposed?" He demanded that Mr. Bennett tell the electorate who he would send to London as Canadian ministerial representatives at the Imperial Conference in the event of the Conservatives being returned to power. He would tell Mr. Bennett that if the present administration was again given office, the Canadian representatives at the Imperial Conference would include such men as Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. C. A. Dunning, Hon. J. L. Ralston and Hon. James Malcolm. Who would Mr. Bennett substitute for these men from Quebec, from the Maritime Provinces and from the Canadian West?

Mr. King's review of the Government's record was featured by the declaration that the present administration, eight and a half years ago, found the country in a state of depression and despondency, and had lifted it to a position of prosperity. National debt and taxation had both been reduced. Deficits had been changed to surpluses, he said. He referred to reductions in the income tax, in the sales tax, the abolition of the "nuisance taxes," etc. He forecast the absolute removal of the sales tax if the Government was returned to power. In five years, he declared, there had been a remission of $118,000,000 in taxation.

He spoke of the return of the natural resources to the provinces of the west, and the adjustment of Maritime claims. These he regarded as real achievements. Government after government had endeavored to accomplish the return of the resources, but none had succeeded, he said. This Government had been successful where others had failed.

WITH PROVINCES.

Relations with the provinces were of the best, Mr. King stated. "I say without fear of contradiction that there never has been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the various provinces and the Federal Government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of the election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over," he insisted.

Mr. King dealt with the accusation which, he said, had been put forward by the Conservatives 'that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly conceived and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election." This was not the case, he asserted with emphasis. "Far from being 'premature' or 'unreasoned' or 'hysterically inspired,' I venture to say there never was presented to any Parliament a budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well," asserted the Prime Minister.

The record of the Government in respect to transportation was touched on by Mr. King.

"When we came into office," he said, "with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the railways of Canada in a completely disorganized and bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Railway system had been acquired under arbitration, but it, too, was bankrupt, and the Government which took over the road had studiously refrained from giving so much as an indication as to whether or not it was to be operated as a Government-owned system or whether the intention, in its acquisition, was to have the road subsequently re-transferred to private ownership.

"I notice that Mr. Bennett is saying that the records of Parliament show that the Liberal party, when in opposition, opposed the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway as a Government-owned system. The Liberal party did nothing of the kind. What we did object to was the refusal of the Government of the day to submit to Parliament for approval the terms and conditions of the contract under which the system was to be acquired.

"We contended that, as the people were being made responsible for the purchase of the system, by terms arranged by agreement, the people's representatives in Parliament were entitled to know what those terms were and to approve of them, before final acquisition of the system was made. This, however, the Government of the day refused to allow, though at subsequent sessions of Parliament, having failed to include some essential features of the transaction in the agreement, they were obliged to submit the whole measure to Parliament and, in order to permit of the additional terms being inserted, to secure its approval which they were of course able to do in virtue of their majority.

FOR C. N. R.

"It was the present administration which made the necessary provision for the President and the Board of Directors of the system, and it was the present administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as President and Chairman of the Board," declared Mr. King. "It was the present administration that laid down the policy that there should be no political interference with the management or operation of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton has publicly testified on more occasions than one, that the Government has lived up to this policy, alike in letter and in spirit.

MANAGEMENT.

"It was the present administration which laid down as a further policy of railway management and operation in this country that Government ownership was to be given a fair trial, and that, as between the Government-owned National Railways and the privately-owned Canadian Pacific Railway, there should be neither fear nor favor in the respective treatment to be accorded these roads. I venture to say that the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his board of directors will be the first to say that, in the fulfilment of this policy, the Government has sought to be scrupulously fair."

"But organization of the Canadian National Railways has not been our only achievement in the realm of transportation. We have brought the Hudson's Bay Railway to completion, though the rails on a part of this road had been taken up by our opponents while in office, and the partiality constructed roadbed allowed to fall into disrepair and decay. We have acquired, and, by making them a part of the Canadian National system, have revitalized not a few of the smaller privately-owned railways in different parts of the Dominion; and we have, on more than one occasion, made provision through Parliament for extensive branch line construction in other parts of the country.

"We have completed the Welland Canal, and we have effected other developments with resepect to the St. Lawrence waterways, on which I shall have opportunity to say something on another occasion. I wish that time permitted me to say something of the developments in aviation, which the Government has steadily sought to initiate and advance.

MARITIME CLAIMS

Then Mr. King went on to speak of the return of their natural resources to the Prairie Provinces and British Columbia. For 30 years, he said, this had been a problem for different governments. It remained, he said, for the present administration to restore these lands. Ever since their entry into Confederation, the Maritime Provinces had felt that they had not had a square deal.

"Here and there, in patchwork fashion, some adjustments have been made in dealing with particular grievances as they rose. It remained for the present administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesman-like fashion. This we have done with respect to their transportation problems; with respect to the problems of their industries; with respect to their subsidies; with respect to their harbor and trade facilities, and to all other matters having a bearing upon the economic welfare of the Maritimes as an integral part of our Dominion.

"I have not time to go into the provisions of these several agreements, but I do not hesitate to say that an examination of their provision reveal a generosity in the manner of the treatment of these provinces such as has never characterized similar negotiations in the history of our Dominion. And here may I point out that something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the Premier of this province and his Government in this general election, namely that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present administration at Ottawa. It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly with Progressive and Conservative governments, out attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long-standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or ill-will."

TARIFF POLICY

Mr. King dealt with the principles which underlay the Government tariff policy.

"We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries," he asserted.

"We have recognized that if our manufacturing and our trade was to expand that world markets as well as home markets were an essential, and we have recognized, further, that what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent in no inconsiderable measure upon the costs of production and the cost of living in our own land. So, we have striven in our tariff revisions, consistently, to take those steps which, without injury to any legitimate business in the country, would at the same time tend to make possible more in the way of production in our basic industries, through reduction of duties on the instruments of production required in those industries, and on the necessaries of life of those employed therein and in the manufactures and other businesses of our country."

Three Issues Facing Dominion, Says King in Opening Campaign By Reviewing Government Work

Government Record, Budget and Imperial Conferences Were Main Points in Vindication of Liberal Policy —Direct Issue Taken With Conservative Chief

KEY-NOTE SPEECH WAS GIVEN AT BRANTFORD

Brantford, Ont., June 17—(By Ray Brown, Canadian Press Staff Correspondent) — The record of the government, the budget, nd Canada's representation at the Imperial conference and the Imperial economic conference—these are the major issues which the Canadian people are asked to pass upon at the coming election, they will be called upon to decide whether or not they believe in the policy of "blasting a way to trade" or if they prefer the viewpoint that trade is exchange for mutual advantage and that it "is secured not by ill-will but by good-will."

Mr. King spoke at length, dealing extensively with the record of the government in respect to finance, taxation, natural resources, and veterans, labour, immigration, cooperation wit'. the provinces, and more particularly with the important provisions of the budget.

Mr. Bennett had asserted at Winnipeg that the Conservatives would "blast a way to trade", continued Mr. King. "Let me ask you frankly, he said, did you ever hear of any one blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade."

Customers and Competitors

The Prime Minister addressed himself particularly to salesmen commercial travellers in his audience. "Did you ever secure any order by force?" he asked. "Did you ever gain trade by ill will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle that trade is secured not by ill-will but by good-will, not by awakening antagonism but by developing friendliness and cooperation, to Mr. Bennett, he declared, all countries were competitors. "He forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone."

The policy of the British preference was a liberal policy, Mr. King informed his listeners, and the liberal party believed in conciliation, in friendliness, in the fact that trade was exchange and, if possible, should be mutually beneficial to all countries involved in the exchange.

"May I ask you to ponder this question both now and until your votes are cast, he said earnestly. "Should the Government of this country be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference except on a basis of hard bargaining, and who would destroy the foundation of good-will upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded to-day?"

The attitude of the Conservatives with respect to efforts to give Canada fullness of National Stature had been one of Opposition and derision, Mr. King declared in discussing representation at the Imperial Conference, he asked which party should represent Canada overseas. "Shall it be the party which laboured and achieved or the party that obstructed and opposed?" he demanded that Mr. Bennett tell the electorate who he would send to London as Canadian ministerial representatives at the Imperial Conference in the event of the Conservatives being returned to power. He would tell Mr. Bennett that if the present administration was again given office, the Canadian representatives at the Imperial Conference would include such men as Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. C. A. Dunning, Hon. J. L. Ralston, and Hon. James Malcolm. Who would Mr. Bennett substitute for these men from Quebec, from the Maritime Provinces and from the Canadian West?

Three Great Issues

"There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign," the Prime Minister said.

"The first is the record of the Government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office The second is the budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy The third, is the direct issue of a choice between the Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and economic conference which is to be held in London in September of the present year. This list issue is necessarily related to the question of the personnel of the Ministry which is to manage the affairs of r country during the ensuing term of Parliament.

"It is not easy to say which of the issues is the most important. All are of the greatest importance. They relate to the past, to the present and to the future. Perhaps I had better discuss them in this order.

"Were there no other issue before the people, I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances ,we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years," asserted Mr. King in dealing with the record of the government. "For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history. As a people and as a government we have been far too modest with respect to the achievements of the years we have been in office. We have been so modest, in fact, that the record is but partially known even to the people of our own country.

Unparallelled Growth.

"The growth and development of Canada under the present administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation. It is right that these facts should be known and I propose to make the record of the administration an open book from one end of the country to the other.

"Standing on a record of sound progressive accomplishment we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The 'whispers of death,' the fear of returning depression, the complaints of an exodus which has ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party whose last tenue of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apprently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days."

Mr. King went at length into the financial record of the Government. On March 31, 1914, the net debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000, he said.

Railway Policy

"It was the present administration which made the necessary provision for the President and the Board of directors of the system, and it was the present administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as President and Chairman of the Board," declared Mr. King. "It was the present administration that laid down the policy that there should be no political interference with the management or operation of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton has publicly testified, on more occasions than one, that the government has lived up to this policy alike in letter and in spirit.

"It was the present administration which laid down as a further policy of railway management and operation in this country that Government ownership was to be given a fair trial, and that, as between the Government-owned national railways and the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway, there should be neither fear or favor in the respective treatment to be accorded these roads.

"I venture to say that the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his Board of Directors will be the first to say that, in the fulfillment of this policy, the government has sought to be scrupulously fair."

"Perhaps I should not be too severe on our opponents for seeking to-day to claim paternity of the Canadian National Railways. Their action in this regard is more or less characteristic of human nature. When Tory party, as we came into office, left this neglected and famished foundling on our doorstep, suffering from many forms of malnutrition, there was not one member of the whole party who was prepared to allow his name to have any association with it, but now that the infant has been revived and has grown into vigorous and powerful proportions, resembling those of Sir Henry Thornton himself, not a few of them wish to give it their name. They say that on no account will they part with it, and Mr. Bennett heroically says that he will sacrifice an office which he does not hold rather than see it pass out of the hands of the state."

Transport Achievements

"But organization of the Canadian National Railways has not been our only achievement in the realm of transportation. We have brought the Hudson's Bay Railway to completion, though the rails on a part of the road had been taken up by our opponents while in office, and the partially constructed road-bed allowed to fall into disrepair and decay. We have acquired, and, by making them a part of the Canadian National system, have revitalized not a few of the smaller privately owned railways in different parts of the Dominion; and we have, on more than one occasion, made provision through Parliament for extensive branch line construction in all parts of the country."

"We have completed the Welland canal, and we have effected other developments with respect to the St. Lawrence Waterways, on which I shall have opportunity to say something on another occasion. I wish that time permitted me to say something of the developments in aviation, which the Government has steadily sought to initiate and advance.

Linking Provinces

"The most recent development in our immigration policy has been to link more closely the Governments of the Provinces and our own Government, in the determination of the classes and numbers of immigrants to be brought to Canada. With the return to the Western Provinces of their natural resources, we have felt that more in the way of provincial patrol of immigration was desirable, more particularly as the provinces themselves are the first to feel any adverse effect of an inadequate or an excessive immigration."

Mr. King dealt with the principles which underlay the Government tariff policies.

"We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries," he asserted.

"We have recognized that, if our manufacturing and trade were to expand, world markets as well as home markets were an essential, and we have recognized, further, that what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent in no inconsiderable measure upon the cost of production and the cost of living in our own land. So, we have striven in our tariff revisions. consistently, to take those steps which without injury to any legitimate business in the country, would at the same time tend to make possible more in the way of production in our basic industries, through reduction of duties on the instruments of production required in those industries, and on the necessaries of life of those employed therein and in the manufactures and other businesses of our country."

He made brief reference to the tariff revisions effected by the present administration since taking office in 1921, which culminated in the revision concluded in the last budget. Canada, he said, now stood as the sixth great trading country of the world.

Increased Exports

"You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials: that we are parting with our birthright. Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of raw materials which Canada imports from the United States for her manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceed in value the total value of the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that the per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain.

"Let me add that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present Government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29. In other words, there has been a doubling of our total domestic exports trade in a peiod of seven years. This spectacular increase of trade is no mere chance. It is the result of wise policies effectively administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

"May I remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years then has been enjoyed by any other industrial country," said Mr. King, with respect to the Government labor policies. "May I remind you that it was a liberal administration which created the Canadian Department of Labor, which introduced its "fair wages" policy, and which this year has given statutory effect to the payment of fair wages and to an eight-hour day on all public works carried out under contract for the Dominion Government, and with respect to all labor in the Government's own employ".

Natural Resources

Then Mr. King went on the speak of the return of the natural resources to the Prairie and British Columbia. For thirty years, he said this had been a problem for different governments. It remained he said for the present administration to restore these lands. Ever since their entry into confederation, the Maritime Provinces, had felt that they had not had a square deal.

"Here and there, in patchwork fashion, some adjustments have been made in dealing with particular grievances as they arose. It remained for the present administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesmanlike fashion. This we have done with respect to their transportation problems; with respect to the problems of their industries; with respect to their subsidies; with respect to their harbor and trade facilities, and to all other matters having a bearing upon the economic welfare of the Maritimes as an integral part of our Dominion.

"I have not time to go into the provisions of these several agreements, but I do not hesitate to say that an examination of their provisions reveals a generosity in the manner of the treatment of those provinces such as has never characterized similar negotiations in the history of our Dominion. And here may I point out something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the Premier of this Province and his Government in this general election, namely that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with governments of the same political persuasion as the present administration at Ottawa. It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal Governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative Governments, our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or illwill.

Imperial Conference

"By our action in these particulars we have made over and strengthened the superstructure of Confederation. We have, at the same time, in the increased financial provisions which we have made for those Provinces, reinforced its foundations, I say without fear of contradiction, that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several Provinces and the Federal Government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

"But if we have improved relations within the Dominion between the Governments of the Provinces and the Federal Government, if we have removed sectional antagonisms and helped to develop a truly national spirit, what may not also be said of our achievements in inter-Imperial and international relations? Here I come to the work of the Imperial Conference and the Economic Conference of 1923; the work of the Imperial Conference of 1926, the work of the subsidiary conference on the operation of Dominion Legislation, which concluded its sittings in London last autumn. Out of these conferences has come, for the first time in the history of the relations of Great Britain and the Dominions, a statement of their relative positions, which has removed from the realm of possible controversy all further talk of Colonial subordination, and which has accorded to Canada and to the other self-governing Dominions a national status equal to that of Great Britain herself. With this clear recognition of nationhood there has come a corresponding development in free and effective co-operation, not only with the Mother country but with the sister nations of the Commonwealth.

'Good Will Versus Ill Will' Issue in Battle, Says King

People To Choose Between 'Blasting Way To Trade' and Mutual Advantage, in Matching Party Policies

NATION HEARS PREMIER'S KEYNOTE SPEECH BROADCAST

By RAY BROWN, Canadian Press Staff Correspondent

BRANTFORD, June 17.—The record of the Government, the Budget and Canada's representation at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference—these are the major issues which the Canadian people are asked to pass upon at the coming election.

They will be called upon to decide whether or not they believe in the policy of "blasting a way to trade" or if they prefer the viewpoint that trade is exchange for mutual advantages and that it "is secured not by ill-will but good-will."

Thus declared Prime Minister Mackenzie King in his keynote Liberal campaign speech here last night.

From the platform the words of the Prime Minster of Canada were carried over an all-Canadian radio hookup into the homes of thousands of people across the Dominion from coast to coast. Mr. King spoke at length, dealing extensively with the record of the Government in respect to finance, taxation, natural resources, war veterans, labor, immigration, co-operation with the provinces, and more particularly with the important provisions of the budget.

POLICIES CONFLICT

And it was with respect to the Budget that Mr. King took very definite and final issue with Hon. R. B. Bennett, leader of the opposition. There was, he said, a fundamental difference between the Liberals and Conservatives in their conception of the nature of trade. The Conservatives, he declared, had enunciated the belief that trade was war. On that assumption they spoke and declared that they were prepared to act.

Mr. Bennett had asserted at Winnipeg that the Conservatives would "blast a way to trade," continued Mr. King. "Let me ask you fairly," he said, "did you ever hear of anyone blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade."

The Prime Minister addressed himself particularly to salesmen and commercial travellers in his audience. "Did you ever secure an order by force?" he asked.

"Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle that trade is secured by developing friendliness and co-operation?" To Mr. Bennett, he declared, all countries were competitors. "He forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone."

BRITISH PREFERENCE

The policy of the British preference was a Liberal policy, Mr. King informed his listeners, and the Liberal party believed in conciliation, in friendliness, in the fact that trade was exchange, and, if possible, should be mutally beneficial to all countries involved in the exchange.

"May I ask you to ponder this question both now and until your votes are cast," he said earnestly. "Should the government of this country go to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference except on a basis of hard bargaining, and who would destroy the foundations of goodwill upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded today?"

The attitude of the Conservatives with respect to efforts to give Canada fullness of national stature had been one of opposition and derision, Mr. King declared in discussing representation at the Imperial Conference. He asked which party should represent Canada overseas. "Shall it be the party which labored and achieved or the party that obstructed and opposed?"

He demanded that Mr. Bennett tell the electorate who he would send to London as Canadian ministerial representatives at the Imperial Conference in the event of the Conservatives being returned to power.

REPRESENTATIVES CHOSEN

He would tell Mr. Bennett that if the present administration was again given office, the Canadian representatives at the Imperial Conference would include such men as Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. C. A. Dunning, Hon. J. L. Ralston and Hon. James Malcolm.

Who would Mr. Bennett substitute for these men from Quebec, from the Maritimes and from the Canadian West?

Mr. King's review of the government's record was featured by the declaration that the present administration, eight and a half years ago, found the country in a state of depression and despondency, and had lifted it to a position of prosperity. National debt and taxation had both been reduced. Deficits had been changed to surpluses, he said.

He referred to reductions in the income tax, in the sales tax, the abolition of the "nuisance taxes," etc. He forecast the absolute removal of the sales tax if the government was returned to power. In five years, he declared, there had been a remission of $118,000,000 in taxation.

He spoke of the return of the natural resources to the provinces of the west, and the adjustment of Maritime claims.

REAL ACHIEVEMENTS

These he regarded as real achievements. Government after government had endeavored to accomplish the return of the resources but none had succeeded, he said. This government had been successful where others had failed.

Relations with the provinces were of the best, Mr. King said. "I say without contradiction that there never has been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the various provinces and the Federal government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of the election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over," he insisted.

Mr. King dealt with the accusation, which, he said, had been put forward by the Conservatives "that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and had been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election.

"This was not the case, he asserted with emphasis.

"Far from being 'premature' or 'unreasoned' or 'hysterically inspired,' I venture to say there never was presented to any Parliament a budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well," asserted the Prime Minister.

FINANCIAL RECORD

Mr. King went at length into the financial record of the government. On March 1, 1914, the net debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000, he said.

GOOD WILL OR ILL WILL

"On March 1, 1922, as a result of the war, and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debts had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000," said Mr. King. "In the last two years of the Conservative administration, no less than $174,000,000 had been added to the public debt. In addition, not less than $355,000,000 had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years, 1919-22.

"Depression was general; the business community was anxious for the future; the industrial life of the country was paralyzed; foreign trade was contracted; agriculture was depressed. Against this dark background, which is still a vivid memory to many of us today, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known."

The government had approached the problem, first by curtailment of expenditures and second by increasing revenues. The latter had, of necessity, to be accomplished by additional taxation, which, he said, was "traditionally unpopular." The Conservative Government had avoided taxing the people to meet the increased costs due to the war, and had raised the necessary money by loans, a very considerable part of which was made exempt from taxation.

RESPONSIBILITIES MET

He was aware that this statement had been challenged, but it was nevertheless true.

"Where the previous administration avoided their responsibilities, we met ours courageously and without regard to political consequences," continued Mr. King. "We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national budget.

"Within two years, our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our budget, but to give us on March 31, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000. From that time forward, we began to pay off annually without intermission an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the legislatures of the previous administration. Every year since 1924 we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven years, without exception, this has been the case.

"The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office.

"This is a record of accomplishment which is unequalled by any country or by any government which participated in the late war from its commencement.

"Leaving out of account the degree to which the postal revenues may have been affected by reductions, it is estimated there has been saved to the Canadian taxpayer, of taxation which would otherwise have been collected, the following sums:

"1928	$19,000,000
"1929	$25,000,000
"1930	$22,000,000

"Thus in five years," continued the prime minister, "there has been an estimated remission of taxation which would otherwise have been collected solely from the sources indicated, of an amount exceeding $118,000,000.

RAILWAY MUDDLE

"When we came into office," he said, "with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the railways of Canada in a completely disorganized and bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in the hands of a receiver. The Grand Trunk Railway system had been acquired under arbitration, but it, too, was bankrupt.

"I notice that Mr. Bennett is saying that the records of Parliament show that the Liberal party, when in opposition, opposed the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway as a Government-owned system. The Liberal party did nothing of the kind. What we did object to was the refusal of the Government of the day to submit to Parliament for approval the terms and conditions of the contract under which the system was to be acquired.

"It was the present administration which made the necessary provision for the president and board of directors of the system and it was the present administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as president and board," declared Mr. King.

"May I now say a word with respect to immigration," the Premier went on. "The policy of the Conservative Party, as outlined by Gen. McRae, was that of a huge colonization and land settlement scheme involving the expenditure of some $300,000,000, and the bringing in of 300,000 immigrants. Perhaps Mr. Bennett will tell the West how this policy, which he supported, would have helped to lessen the present unemployment of which he has had much to say during the present campaign.

"It is quite true that during the years immediately following our coming into office the trend of immigration continued to be from Canada to the States. The reason for that is the United States had prospered while we had suffered through the war.

CANADIANS RETURN

"It was not very long, however, before the fruits of our effort became apparent. Little by little the migration of Canadians to the United States began to lessen. An increasing number of Canadians began to return from the United States to Canada, until today while conditions of employment in Canada may not be all that we might wish, they are many times better than is the case in the United States.

"With regard to the allegation that the Government was preferring foreign to British immigration, the findings of the parliamentary committee were to the effect that, while Canada was spending 11 cents per capita on continental immigrants, she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on immigrants from the British Isles.

Premier King dealt with Canadian trade with the United States.

"You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials; that we are parting with our birthright. Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of raw materials Canada imports from the United States for her manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceed in value the total value of the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world, with the exceptions in Great Britain.

EXPORTS EXPAND

"Domestic export trade of Canada has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present Government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29.

"May I remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country," said Mr. King, with respect to the Government labor policies. "May I remind you that it was a Liberal administration which created the Canadian Department of Labor, which introduced its "fair wages" policy, and which this year has given statutory effect to the payment of fair wages and to an eight-hour day on all public works carried out under contract for the Dominion Government, and with respect to all labor in the Government's own employ."

"The Conservative party had opposed every step of the way to thwart the responsible self-government of Canada in external affairs, the Prime Minister charged.

STATUS IN EMPIRE

"When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties, we were told that we were seeking separation because forsooth, we asked His Majesty, in regard to an international negotiation, on a matter of Canadian concern, to give full power to a Canadian Minister of the Crown instead of to the British Ambassador at Washington. When a little later we opened a legation, at Washington and subsequently at Paris and Tokio, we were again told that we were nursing the path of separation.

"Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about Canada first. Just what does his Canada first mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the establishment of Canadian legations in other lands, and on Canada's status of co-equality with the Motherland."

THE DUNNING BUDGET

Then Mr. King turned to the budget of 1930 which he termed the second great issue of the campaign. Policies must be framed to meet existing conditions. he said.

It is apparent that both a high tariff and free trade are sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada. What then is the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interests arising out of the tariff is the same as it is with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions, he said.

"The budget of 1930 was framed first of all to meet a situation in Canada arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes for policies suited to their needs. But because of the place which Canada has come to occupy in international trade it was influenced also and in a special degree by our relation with two countries with which we are most closely associated in matters of commerce, Great Britain and the United States.

"It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian commerce. We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates, which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules.

EMPIRE TRADE

"Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country.

"The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then, as it is opposed by them today.

"The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country.

"Against the fiscal and trade policies of the budget what are the criticisms of the Conservative party as enunciated by the leader of the opposition?

"The first is that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objective if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have 'stolen the clothes' of the Conservative party. If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that party.

"The third is that our policy is a Washington-made policy. If that is true, which it is not, what becomes of the argument that we have stolen the clothes of our opponents? Finally, we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences, there should be no trade, even with the Mother Country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference.

"In the reciprocity campaign of 1911, the cry of the Tory party was 'no truck or trade with the Yankees,' this year it has come dangerously near being 'no truck nor trade with Britain.'"

"With the establishment of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation the day has gone for the making of tariffs on impulse or because of momentary resentments.

FOUR MAIN PROPOSALS

"The budget of 1930 is the response of the present government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four main proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1. The iron and steel tariff revision.
2. Countervailing duties.
3. The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4. Extension of the British perference.

"The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the tariff advisory board which have been conducted over a period of several years.

"The best feature of the budget, namely, the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and dual terms.

"We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us.

"In revising the customs tariff on fruits and vegetables, the Government has had before it the evidence presented to the tariff advisory board on several occasions. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and vegetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of other countries."

TORY POLICY VAGUE

"You may have noticed how at Winnipeg Mr. Bennett declared there was no protection for labor and agriculturists, for producers and consumers, as well as for manufacturers and others. Just how that protection is to be brought about he did not say. He has been studiously vague and indefinite, and he has not mentioned a single specific change that he would propose."

There appeared, said Mr. King, to be a fundamental difference between the Liberal party and the Conservatives, as to the nature of trade in the House of Commons, he said. Hon. R. J. Manion had declared that trade was war. In the opinion of the Prime Minister, trade was exchange. Hon. R. B. Bennett as Conservative leader, has taken a somewhat similar stand as Mr. Manion in his recent Winnipeg speech, said Mr. King. He quoted from Mr. Bennett's speech as follows:

"'Tell me where did free trade ever fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you."

"In other words," continued Mr. King, "to the Tory-minded it would appear that trade is not something as the result of which each of the parties concerned, may gain, but is in the nature of conflict, whereas an outcome of there must be gain to one and loss to another."

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. King reminded his listeners that the present administration might have claimed that it had a mandate to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference in view of the fact that it still had a year of office to run. The situation became somewhat different, however, with the introduction of the budget.

"The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was framed with a view of holding for Western Canada the market for her wheat which for so many years she has had in Great Britain and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere.

"The presentation of Canada at the Conferences was bound up with the personnel of the Ministry," said Mr. King. "What had Mr. Bennett to offer by way of constructive leadership?" he asked.

BENNETT RAPPED

"Up to the present time pretty much all that Mr. Bennett has said has been in the nature of platitudes or declamation. He has not put forward a single constructive idea, nor has he indicated a single policy with any clearness or definiteness or aim.

"In his speech at Winnipeg he referred to the members of the present Government as 'this group of mercenaries, holding office by shame and subterfuge,' and as 'forgetful, in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages.' He said: 'Look upon them, treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation.' At a meeting at Regina on the following day he spoke of 'nine years of wasted effort before the great betrayal,' and added 'it did not take Judas that long.'

"May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled for and adds nothing to his stature in the position of leadership.

"May I ask Mr. Bennett, who, in the administration that he has in mind, are to take the place of the ministers in the present Government from Quebec, Ontario, the Maritimes and west of the Great Lakes. Who are the gentlemen he has in mind as those who are to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference?"

INTER-EMPIRE TRADE

Mr. King referred forceably to the need for developing Inter-Empire trade in concluding his address.

"I say that so far as inter-empire trade is concerned, we are, at least, at the meeting of the ways, and that the acceptance of this budget by the people July 28 will do more than all else to ensure for Canada's representatives at the Economic Conference in London that favorable response to our attitude and action which we believe will be given by the Government of Great Britain and by the Governments of all the sister Dominions of the Empire.

"It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may help to determine whether the highways of the Empire are to become, as we hope they may increasingly become, the avenues of a British commerce expanding ever so widely over land and sea, or whether, insofar as the component parts of the Empire are concerned, its highways are to remain indistinguishable from the other trades routes of the world."

A FREE PREFERENCE, BUT—

Mr. William Lyon Mackenzie King has stated the grounds upon which he asks for a new mandate at the hands of the Canadian people. They are defensive grounds, and for that reason the Government enters the campaign at a serious disadvantage. Such would be the case even if the argument presented by the Prime Minister could be accepted as sound and reasonable, but as a matter of fact it is an argument of contradictions and it leaves the impression that the public confusion as to the intent and meaning of the Dunning budget is shared by the Government itself. This impression is likely to extend and deepen as the campaign progresses, since the tariff features of the budget are themselves disconnected and self-contradictory, and the 28th of July will probably find the electors of the Dominion with as hazy a conception of the Government's fiscal policy—assuming that there is a policy concealed somewhere among the "complex changes"—as they have now. The explanation offered by Mr. W. L. M. King, at Brantford, does not explain, and the inference is either that the authors of the budget do not understand their own handiwork, or that they have deliberately submitted a fiscal conundrum to the public in the hope and expectation that this or that class will find the answer best suited to its own interest and will vote accordingly. This may be an example of practical politics, but it will not do much to supply the economic deficiency which constitutes the country's most pressing problem.

In the early part of his speech Mr. King appeared as a witness to the modesty of the Government; because of this modesty, he said, the record of achievement is but partially known even to the people of the Dominion. It must be admitted that the Canadian people have no very high appreciation of these achievements, but they do not attribute their judgment in this respect to any lack of assertiveness on the part of Mr. King and his colleagues; Mr. King himself, later on, having warmed to his subject, or perhaps having convinced himself by his own utterances, declared that the country had never had a Cabinet of abler men and that no Government had ever given a better account of itself both at home and abroad. He made clear his own conviction that Canada cannot be properly represented at the forthcoming Imperial Economic Conference except by members of his Government. It was with an eye to this conference, according to the further statement of the Prime Minister, that the Government shaped its tariff revision. Tariff action on the part of the United States was pending. A condition had developed in Great Britain which led to a marked curtailment of purchases of Canadian wheat, a serious tie-up of wheat in Canada, with consequent loss to Canadian growers and transportation systems, and "it became apparent "that if Canada wished to maintain a market "for Canadian wheat it was desirable that "measures should be taken by diverting to "Great Britain many of the purchases being "made at present in the United States, and in "other ways to increase British imports to "Canada and thus create an economic and "psychological condition in Great Britain more "favorable to the importation of Canadian "wheat."

The meat of Mr. King's declaration is in the above sentence. If the statement means anything it means that the extension of the British preference was given for the purpose of securing a better reception for Canadian wheat in the markets of the Old Country. The Finance Minister, in delivering his budget, represented the extension as a free gift. The people of Great Britain have regarded it and accepted it as such. But Mr. King now says: "If we are to maintain in Great Britain an "assured market for Canadian wheat and other "articles of export, we must be prepared to "increase our imports from that country. This, "as I have already explained, can be done with-"out necessarily increasing our total importa-"tions, but merely by diverting to Britain, who "gives us a free entry into her markets, and "who is of our own household, purchases which "have been formerly made in other countries, "but which countries today do not give to us "equal or like opportunities of trade." This proposition will bear examination. Mr. King says that the budget was framed with the purpose, as outlined by him, definitely in mind, and he adds that if Great Britain comes to a point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference should ensure first consideration for this country. Furthermore, if the British Government indicates its desire to do so, the present Canadian Government can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on the basis of reciprocal preference; but in any event Mr. King and his party stand, as he says, for a policy which will benefit the Canadian consumer and promote inter-Imperial trade, a policy which is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. "The essential point is "that Canada must enlarge her imports from "the Mother Country in order that she may "enlarge her exports to the Mother Country." This is the purpose of the budget.

Mr. King calls this a free will preference. It will be seen from his statement that it is nothing of the kind, but a concession granted with a lively sense of favors to come. The explanation is intended obviously to meet the criticism that the extension of the preference should have been delayed for submission to the Economic Conference itself. Evidently this criticism has found its mark. The fact is that the extension of the preference was given unconditionally. It was accepted in Britain as an unconditional gift. Mr. King now says that its purpose is to encourage reciprocal action on the part of Britain. If that be the purpose, the Government has gone a strange way about it; and it does seem that Mr. King's declaration has been framed to suit conditions arising in this country after the budget was delivered.

THE MEETING OF THE WAYS

Premier Mackenzie King has placed the paramount issue squarely before the people of Canada. At the Imperial Economic Conference in London next October, leaders of the nations within the British union are to meet to consider possible measures of economic co-operation, for mutual aid in trade and commerce.

The Liberal approach to the conference is made clear in this year's budget, as introduced by the minister of finance, Mr. Dunning. The Liberals take the view that before Canada can hope to export more to Great Britain, Canada must be prepared to import more from British sources. Trade is an exchange of goods and services.

Changes in the Canadian tariff are intended to encourage the flow of trade in greater volume along eastern and western channels. Great Britain erects no barriers against Canadian produce, while the tariff policy of the United States is designed to discourage the southward movement of goods from Canada. It is nothing more than intelligence on the part of Canada to readjust the Canadian fiscal policy to give greater preference to British goods, wherever they can take the place of imports from the United States. In return, Great Britain will be the more likely to welcome Canadian wheat and other commodities.

The Conservative attitude toward trade is fundamentally different. The Prime Minister quoted Dr. Manion's view of trade, as reported in Hansard last session:

> Mr. Manion: Does not the right honorable gentleman think we could have negotiated a treaty with a little more effect if we had kept our weapons until the negotiations were completed?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: What weapons? This is not a case of war.
> Mr. Manion: The right honorable gentleman talked of war the other day. But trade is war so far as that goes.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: That is the language of my honorable friend—trade is war.
> Mr. Manion: So it is.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I always thought trade was exchange.
> Mr. Manion: Yes, but we have tariff wars.

This same protectionist belief in trade by force is expressed in Mr. Bennett's keynote speech at Winnipeg, as quoted with telling effect by the Prime Minister at Brantford last night. The Conservative leader said to the Western audience:

> Tell me where did free trade ever fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you.

The Conservative leader has, so far, avoided the issue of Canada's part at the Imperial Economic Conference—although he declared in the House that the government should have a mandate from the electorate before setting out to represent Canada at the conference. In the little that has been said by Conservative leaders on tariff policy toward British trade, it is apparent that Messrs. Bennett and Manion would go to London very much in the same belief about employing tariffs as weapons. Instead of meeting around the conference table to consider trade on the basis of exchange for mutual benefit, the Conservative approach would be from the point of view of force.

It would be better to have no conference, than to have such an element of disruption thrown in from Canada. It would be liable to be the parting of the ways for the British family of nations. As the Prime Minister has happily expressed it, however, the Imperial Economic Conference may well be the meeting of the ways. Surely this Liberal view must prevail with the great majority of Canadian people.

KING HOLDS HEARERS TENSE IN RECOUNTING STEWARDSHIP

Premier's Reception at Brantford Is Triumph for Himself and Government

CAMPAIGN NOW ON

By R. E. KNOWLES

"That a man stand and speak to his fellow-men," said Thomas Carlyle, "so that he speak honestly and fearlessly, is one of the sublimest spectacles on which human eyes can rest."

These words of the great master of words leaped to my mind last night as I gazed over the eager and cheering thousands within the walls of the armories at Brantford.

I reached the platform, guided by a devoted scout through the crowded throng. Thousands were sitting. Hundreds were standing—and I actually saw some sitting on the floor. Admission to the platform there was none. Senators, ex-members, candidates, ex-candidates, candidates - yet - to - be, ladies, gentlemen, youths, octogenarians, all composed the cheering throng.

And a MAN was speaking to them. A great servant was giving an account of his stewardship and appealing for a renewal of his colossal trust.

The prime minister of Canada, without manuscript, without even notes, "stood and talked" with his fellowmen.

The Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King was at his best. A little over a year ago, in London, at Birmingham, at Liverpool, at Llandudno, Wales—all over the kingdom—I heard the great speakers and parliamentarians of Britain. But, with the exception of Lloyd George alone, I did not hear a more masterful master of assemblies than the grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie proved himself last night.

Held His Audience

Often before have I heard this youthful looking orator; once, at least, in a similar opening deliverance, at Newmarket in 1925.

How King has grown—in mental stature, in clarity of statement, in mastery of phrase, in calm and impressive oratory, in the custody of a great audience which goes with conscious power!

The premier, while "O Canada" was being sung just as he was introduced, stood silent. Doubtless he was saving larnyx and vocal chords for their great two-hours' task. His hands were in his side coat pockets (there, too, for a portion of his speech, a habit he should conquer), his face in almost heavy innocence of all expression, his almost slumbrous eyes (like furnaces waiting to be blown) looking out over a throng which literally packed the great hall to a discomfort that only the charm of an orator could have compelled the unbroken audience to endure for the two sweltering hours that witnessed his great physical and mental effort.

There was little, if any, heckling. Nobody even shouted "Five-cent-piece." The worst enemy of Howard Ferguson could hardly wish the Ontario premier any more distressing two hours, had he been there to share them, durin, which nobody even mentioned that Immortal Nickel which the gallant Howard, thrusting Mr. Bennett and his paltry tariff issue off the platform, declared to be the REAL issue of issues in this great campaign. Indeed, the contempt with which Mr. Ferguson's chosen crusade, his sacred cause of tuppence ha'-penny (exactly the V, the explosive "Five-cent-piece" with which the Hon. Howard proposed to blow the King administration into smithereens)—the contempt, I say, with which all Conservative orators so far treat this heavy artillery with which Mr. Ferguson rushed to glory or the grave, must be one of the bitterest incidents of the little premier's embattled life!

With the keen instinct one would expect from a consummate politician, which friend or foe concedes Mr. King to be, the prime minister last night sank his teeth deep into the Conservative flank at its most vulnerable point. He knows well that, for the first time in Canadian history, if not in all major history, the Conservatives are in the pathetic position of having t. berate their opponents while at the same time they are compelled to approve their opponents' policy—unless they are to acknowledge that all their past professions of imperial devotion have been only sounding brass and tinkling cymbals.

This is the plain, historical, demonstrable truth, let it be wangled and side-stepped as it may—and Mr. King, with great restraint but with chapter and verse of inexorable fact and deduction, made the most of it. He well knows that the Conservative critic cannot convince a nation while he has to damn his opponent while at the same time he dare not upbraid or condemn a policy which only differs from his ancestral own in that it is characterized by a greater warmth, an increased generosity, and a more complete trust in the response that shall sooner or later, on the part of the motherland, voice her appreciation of a proposed policy by Canadian statesmen which has already stirred and warmed her heart.

Vindicate Tariff Policy

Further, with rare dexterity and heft of argument, Mr. King defended the alleged "change" in the "imperial" slant of the Liberal party. Beside showing that the "preferential" element was interwoven with the very fabric of the swaddling-clothes of the Laurier government in 1896, Mr. King beat his victorious wings above the two-fold defence and explanation inhering in the dual facts that, forsaking political hysteria and recognizing that "tariffs are for expert brains," he called to his aid—and to the help of the nation—such resource in a Commission of Specialists—and did not seek their aid for fun.

And, further, a great and convincing thrust, Mr. King drove home an argument which in effect is this: that the policies of any government toward other nations are contingent upon the attitude, gracious or alienating, of those other nations themselves. We alter as others provoke alteration.' No government, e.g., has WAR as a plank in its platform—but the attitude of other nations may justly provoke even this. Therefore, as Mr. King pressed, even the most "free-trade" government, under sufficient pressure of provocation, not only may, but duti-fully must, determine its own policy in the light of policies and provocations from abroad. As the Scotch say: "Ye must dae wi' things as things dae wi' ye."

Some of Mr. King's pungent phrasing surprised and delighted me last night: "vigorous and powerful proportions, resembling those of Sir Henry Thornton himself." Speaking of Canada's great development: "there has been the sudden steep ascent of war"—a phrasing that suggests almost Asquith himself. Again: "No longer are tariffs to be made by clamor of self-interest, nor by the rhetoric of politicians." In re "stolen clothes" we hear that "the Conservative party stands self-condemned." Once more: "Did you ever hear of anyone 'blasting' a way to trade?—Germany tried that." Profound philosophy, too, lies in this like water in a well: "There are none so prejudiced and readily deceived as those who seek to prejudice and deceive the minds of others." And, gem among them all, thrown off from a poetic mind, when referring to the charge of "the parting of the ways" from Britain, Mr. King cried, with telling effect: "I do, however, say what in very truth I believe to be the fact, that, so far as intra-empire trade is concerned, we are, at last, at the meeting of the ways."

As, last night, I pondered the memorable scene and listened to the unflinching words of a man who is growing into a political orator (but why, Oh why did Mr. King, an honor M.A., use, not once but four times, such grammatical construction as this: "I ask Mr. Bennett who he intends" to send to the conference, etc?)—as I pondered and listened, I could not but indulge this wistful wonder, viz.: May it be that, just as the name of Cobden is for ever linked with cheaper food, and the name of Gladstone linked with Home Rule, and the name of John Bright linked with the people's broader rights, and the name of Lincoln linked with Emancipation—may it be, why not?, that the name of Mackenzie King will be lighted down to later generations by the imperishable glow of the first great courageous gesture toward the closer fellowship, in heart and in trade, of the far-flung family of all the British peoples?

FLASHES FROM FIRST SPEECH OF RT. HON. MACKENZIE KING

When expenditures directly attributable to the war are deducted, it will be found that the total expenditures of Canada to-day are very little more than in 1914, notwithstanding the great increase in population and the fact that the value of the dollar to-day is only two-thirds of what it was in 1914.

At the present rate, the total public debt of Canada would be paid off entirely in the course of the next 40 years.

The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts since confederation is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office.

In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of 63 years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present administration has held office.

I need not ask you what will happen to the 1 per cent. of the sales tax remaining if the present administration is returned to office.

Whenever there has been a Liberal government in office, further increases have been made in the British preference. I think I am right in saying that never once under a Conservative government has any British preference or increase of British preference been given.

The budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the budget was framed with a view to holding for Western Canada the market for her wheat.

In the reciprocity campaign of 1911 the cry of the Tory party was, "No truck nor trade with the Yankees." This year it has come dangerously near being, "No truck nor trade with Britain."

We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us.

When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds to-day? There has been the long, gradual constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer.

Responsible self-government, not in internal affairs alone, but also in external affairs, is the corner-stone of our empire as it exists to-day. Canada blazed the trail which others have followed. In our progress towards that achievement we have been opposed by the Conservative party every step of the way.

It is, I believe, absolutely true that Canada's war pension legislation is the most advanced in the world.

No nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present government came into office, at the end of the fiscal year, 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year, 1928-29.

Canada now stands as the sixth on the list of the great trading countries of the world.

While conditions of employment in Canada may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States, or, for that matter, in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals to-day the migration from Canada to the United States. These are the facts, and, far from affording grounds of criticism, they are in the nature of a real achievement.

The people of Canada must decide which party shall represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial Conference. Shall it be the party which labored and achieved, or shall it be the party that obstructed and opposed? The Conservative party opposed the separate signature of treaties. It opposed the establishment of Canadian legations abroad. It attempted to throw derision on the profoundly significant declaration of the Imperial Conference of 1926.

With the establishment of the advisory board on tariff and taxation, the day has gone for the making of tariffs on impulse, or because of momentary resentments.

While operating deficits of the Canadian National Railways have been changed into operating revenues, this has been accomplished by far-reaching reductions in railway rates in all parts of Canada.

Within the period of office of the present administration, Canada has welcomed for the first time in her history, the leaders of all the political parties in Britain, two of them in the office of prime minister.

WARM WELCOME GIVEN KING AT BRANTFORD

Prime Minister Driven to Armories in Leading Car of Long Procession

Streets Lined With People and 3,000 People Present at Meeting

(Canadian Press Despatch.)

By RAY BROWN

Brantford, Ont., June 16. — A parade of flag draped automobiles, a cheering crowd of thousands which filled the gaily decorated armories, a crowded platform on which stood a formidable array of microphones and on which were seated members of the Dominion government and the house of commons, and prominent Liberals of western Ontario—these formed the setting for Premier Mackenzie King's opening campaign speech here tonight.

Brantford gave the prime minister a warm welcome. When his train pulled into the station his eyes encountered a sea of faces. Flags, cheers, the music of the Canadian Legion band, and the stirring notes of the bagpipes greeted him. He was conducted to the leading car of a long procession of flag-draped automobiles, and driven slowly through streets lined with people to the armories. Here a gathering estimated at three thousand people, some seated, some standing, awaited him. His entry was greeted with cheers. A civic welcome was conveyed to him by Mayor Ross L. Beckett. Presiding over the meeting was A. T. Whitaker, president of the Brantford Liberal association. Seated on the platform were Hon. James Malcolm, minister of trade and commerce, Hon. W. D. Euler, minister of national revenue, and Hon. J. C. Elliott, minister of public works.

Candidate in Brant Speaks

The chairman first called on the candidates in Brant county and in Brantford to speak briefly.

"I stand for the Dunning budget because it decreases trade with the United States and increases it with the British Empire," asserted Ross MacDonald, Liberal candidate in Brantford. "There is no doubt but that the Liberal party will be returned to power," he declared, and the declaration inspired resounding cheers. John Harold, Liberal candidate in the neighboring constituency of Brant, referred to his past parliamentary record, and asked for the support of the electorate.

The senate of Canada was generously represented on the platform by Senators E. S. Little, W. H. McGuire, J. H. Spencer and J. P. Rankin. W. G. Raymond, ex-member for Brantford, was present.

The prime minister, it was announced, would speak over a network of twenty-three stations, the largest broadcasting ever undertaken in Canada. When he rose to confront his audience, the applause was so great that his opening words were almost drowned.

Mr. King paid a tribute to the memory of Alexander Graham Bell, inventor of the telephone, who resided in Brantford at the time he made his invention. Then he proceeded to a discussion of the record of the government, of the budget, of the return of the natural resources to the prairie provinces, of immigration, and of Canada's representation at the coming imperial and economic conferences. He received a careful, attentive hearing and frequently his remarks were punctuated with applause.

Mr. King's speech occupied two hours, running from nine until eleven o'clock, eastern standard time.

Liberals Here Like Speech of Party Chieftain

Those Familiar with Premier's Efforts on Hustings Regard Keynote Effort as One of His Best.

(Citizen Political Correspondence)

Many, familiar with Premier King's speeches both in Parliament and on the hustings, regard his keynote effort at Brantford on Monday as one of his best with evidence of studious preparation and regard to the fact that he was addressing an invisible audience throughout the whole of Canada. If he spoke in a hurry, he had to do so to keep within the limits of the radio broadcast.

A week ago, in Winnipeg, Mr. Bennett started off his campaign, laying particular emphasis on business depression and pointing to protection, all round, as the remedy for these conditions. Mr. King, admitting that depression exists, says that it is a world wide condition of which Canada's share is the smallest and, leaving the Conservatives to talk about such a subject, he loud pedals the record of the government in debt and taxation reduction, in the National Railways regeneration, in soldiers' pensions and so forth and then glories in the budget.

What is regarded here as the particularly important feature of his speech is his emphasis of the coming economic conference and his charge, to which he seeks a reply at once, that, after calling for a mandate on this issue, the Conservatives are "running away" from or ignoring it. He also wants to know whom Mr. Bennett would take to such a conference with him in comparison with Messrs. Lapointe, Dunning, Ralston and Malcolm.

Liberals here express themselves as highly impressed with the Prime Minister's speech, believing that it will give a stimulus to the rank and file like that imparted by Mr. Bennett to his followers a week ago. How many people tuned in and sat it out cannot be estimated but Monday's radio hook-up established in its volume a Canadian record.

With the opening speeches of both leaders now delivered and widely disseminated, the campaign starts in earnest. The itineraries indicate that the party leaders intend to follow each other, for the Prime Minister will go over the territory Mr. Bennett is now touring and the opposition leader will do the same.

The issues now seem pretty well joined with Mr. Bennett preaching emulation of the United States in its policy of protection and the Prime Minister and his party contending that the country cannot live by itself but must seek export trade outside. As a means of developing that trade the policy of preference within the Empire is proposed to be extended.

The speeches of Dr. Manion in Ontario are regarded as an attempt to stir up anti-American feeling as was done in 1911, but difficulty is seen in making progress with such a campaign now when the budget elevates the tariff against the States and lowers it against the Mother Country.

Mr. King's impressive speech at Brantford is considered to be a great stimulus to his party and to increase the confidence they have in the result of the election.

TRADE IS EXCHANGE NOT WAR KING HURLS AT OPPOSITION

Premier's Opening Campaign Meet Marked by Great Enthusiasm

SAYS BENNETT TRITE

Special to The Star

Brantford, June 17.—A sweltering June evening and an even warmer welcome greeted Rt. Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, premier of Canada, in Brantford last night.

Vociferous acclaim was accorded the premier from the moment he stepped from Canadian National Railway train No. 5 at 7.40 until a madly-cheering throng, which crammed the Brantford armories to capacity, permitted him to retire to his private car nearly four hours later.

Confidence in the administration of the Liberal government in the past and faith in Premier King's plans for the future were echoed in the shouting, applauding crowd which awaited his arrival at the railway station, lined the approach to the armories for three-quarters of a mile, and jammed the great hall to capacity for fully an hour before Premier King was scheduled to open his initial campaign address.

Several thousands struggled and pushed their way into a decorated armories to hear the premier review the record of his government since it first came into power in December, 1921, and define the issues of the campaign.

Not a single word of criticism was voiced or a single heckler silenced during a speech which lasted one hour and 50 minutes.

Despite the intense heat, unrelieved by even a breath of air, the crowd was continually enthusiastic during the three-hour rally.

Ladies fluttered fans before faces from which the powder had long since been washed by perspiration, but the crowd stayed to the end, eager to hear the premier's message.

All Canada was enabled to hear the premier's speech through a network of 25 added stations, the greatest hook-up ever attempted in the Dominion.

The crowd cheered him from the moment he voiced his pride in opening the campaign in the city which had produced Alexander Graham Bell, inventor of the telephone, until, hoarse of voice, he closed his speech by asking which party would represent Canada at the imperial conference in September—the party which had extended British preference, "or the party with a club in its hand."

They shouted their approval as he spiked the allegations made by Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader, in Winnipeg recently.

"Mr. Bennett referred to members of the present government as: 'This group of mercenaries, holding office by shame and subterfuge,' and as, 'forgetful in their love of office of all else but their own personal advantages'," Premier King told his hearers.

Not Dignified Language

"He said: 'Look upon them, treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation'," the premier continued warmly. "May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled-for and adds nothing to his stature in a position of leadership. A nation like Canada does not expect that kind of language from its leaders.

"Mr. Bennett hasn't given this country one single constructive idea in the whole of his campaign up to now," Premier King told his audience and radio listeners, which are stated to have included the opposition leader sitting at the dials of a radio in Vancouver, 3,000 miles away. "There has been a great deal of declamation—a great deal of platitudes, by the Tory party during the present campaign, but not a single sliver of constructive platform." (Prolonged applause.)

Pointing out that the Liberal government had gone to the country a year and a half ahead of time in order to go to the imperial conference "with the voice of Canada" behind them, Premier King hotly demanded: "Is that the action of a group of mercenaries holding office by shame and subterfuge?"

The premier referred to speeches of the late Hon. J. A. Robb and himself, made over a year ago, warning the United States to expect reprisals in the Canadian tariff if the United States put through the contemplated additions to its tariff wall, in stirring refutation of Mr. Bennett's charge that the Dunning budget was "premature," "unreasoned" and "hysterically inspired to meet party exigencies."

His Policy Is Definite

"We aim to trade with those who trade with us," was a declaration of policy which almost literally "brought down the house." Premier King was cheered until he had to pause in his speech and bow as he explained the object of the countervailing duties with the United States.

They cheered when the speaker announced the government's intention to buy from Great Britain what had been purchased in the United States; the need for a national policy good for east and west; the appointment of the Hon. Cairine Wilson as first woman senator; and highlights of the Liberal government's enviable fiscal record since 1921.

He labelled the "national policy" of Sir John A. Macdonald "50 years behind the times," and told how Canada's export trade had doubled during the past seven years.

Premier King wanted to know what the Conservatives would say about unemployment now if General McCrae had been allowed to spend $300,000,000 on bringing 300,000 immigrants to Canada and declared the return of Canadian youth to the country of their birth was now greater than their exodus to the United States.

As Premier King's speech drew to a close, old and young crushed their way to the platform to grasp his hand. Those who couldn't reach him renewed their applause and the microphones were still vibrating to the din when the strains of "God Save the King" closed the broadcast.

LIBERAL CAMP REJOICES OVER KING'S SPEECH

Consider That Premier Made Good Impression

Address Was Delivered in Rapid Manner

In Order To Stay Within Allotted Time

From the Spectator's Ottawa Bureau,

Ottawa, June 17.—Many, familiar with Premier King's speeches both in parliament and on the huskings, regard his keynote effort at Brantford last night as one of his best, with evidence of studious preparation and regard to the fact that he was addressing an invisible audience throughout the whole of Canada.

Radio listeners found him speaking with unwonted speed, but he was evidently trying to finish the assigned period of radio broadcast. A week ago in Winnipeg, Mr. Bennett started off his campaign, laying particular emphasis on business depression and pointing to protection all round as the remedy for hese conditions.

Highlights of Speed

Mr. King, admitting that depression exists, says that it is a world-wide condition, of which Canada's share is the smallest, and, leaving the Conservatives to talk about such a subject, he loud pedals the record of the government in debt and taxation reduction, in the national railways' regeneration, in soldiers' pensions, and so forth, and he glories in the budget. What is regarded here as the particularly important feature of his speech is Mr. King's emphasis of the coming economic conference and his charge, to which he seeks a reply at once, that, after calling for a mandate on this issue, the Conservatives are "running away" from or ignoring it. He also wants to know whom Mr. Bennett would take to such a conference with him in comparison with Messrs. Lapointe Dunning, Ralston and Malcolm. It is evident that Liberals plan to make this British preference conference and the policy to be espoused in regard to it the outstanding plans of their platform.

Liberals Pleased

Liberals here express themselves to-day as highly impressed with the prime minister's speech believing that it will give a stimulus to the rank and file like that imparted by Mr. Bennet to his followers a week ago. How many people tuned in and sat it out cannot be estimated, but last night's radio hook-up established in its volume a Canadian record.

With the opening speeches of both leaders now delivered and widely disseminated, the campaign starts in real earnest. Thee itineraries indicate that the party leaders intend to follow each other, for the prime minister will go over the territory Mr. Bennett is now covering, and the opposition leader will do the same. Mr. King's speech last night supplies the needed fillip to the Liberal campaign by sounding a keynote on which the rank and file will be expected to tune in.

Canadians Plan Tariff to Match New U. S. Rates

Dominion Determined Trade Relations Shall Not Be One-Sided, Says Mackenzie King

By The Canadian Press

BRANTFORD, Ont., June 16.—Opening the Liberal party's campaign for the Parliamentary election on July 28, Prime Minister W. L. Mackenzie King tonight broadcast an address, devoted largely to the new United States tariff legislation, in which he announced Canada's intention of "trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us."

The Liberal leader, who has been Prime Minister since 1921, said that the Dominion was increasing duties on selected commodities to the level to be applied against Canadian exports, but made it plain that the nation was ready to trade on a reciprocal basis and desired friendly commercial relations with the United States.

Tells of Swing to Britain

Mr. King stressed the growing importance of Canada's trade with Great Britain, which he referred to as "an indispensable market," and noted that the Dominion had found it desirable, in order to maintain a British market for her wheat, to divert to England many of the purchases hitherto made in the United States.

Mr. King said that when the United States Congress began its tariff revision, and it appeared that increased duties would reduce Canadian exports across the border, the Tariff Advisory Board undertook to determine to what extent goods imported from America could be purchased in the British Empire.

"We cannot but regret," said Mr. King, "that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us.

Tells of Immediate Plan

"For the present we raise the duties on these selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by either countries, but at the same time we tell our neighbor frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis.

"On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States, as with every other country, have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interest of the Canadian people, that, our commercial relations must not be one-sided."

Mr. King explained that representations had been made to the United States when tariff revision first came up, and that when it became apparent that changes inimical to Canada's interests would be made anyway, he had made it plain in Parliament what would be the possible consequences of Washington's action.

"Public intimation was given," he said, "in words the significance of which the United States could not do other than fully comprehend, that in the event of tariff changes taking place which might adversely affect our interests, it would be found that Canada was well able to take care of herself; that all countries might expect to see that we proposed in matter of trade to extend our favors as far as might be possible to those countries most ready to favor us, and that where trade could not be expected except on unequal terms, use would be made of the tariff to divert the course of trade, first of all so as to deepen the channel of trade within the British Empire, and secondly to cause the trade of Canada hereafter more and more to flow in those channels which reciprocal treatment in matters of trade might help to develop between this country and other lands.

"Knowing the course which the government was taking and proposed to take, how far-reaching that course was certain to be, I felt my responsibility all the greater to see that, on the part on these countries which might be affected not for today only but possibly for years to come, no cause should be given which might enable them to say that their adverse action toward Canada was the result of some offensive attitude on our part, rather than something which was wholly of their own creation.

"We all wish to preserve and extend the British market. It has been our greatest outlet in the past. Whatever changes may come, it will remain a great and indispensable market. Would you prefer to deal with a country which has held out to you the hand of friendship and good will, or with a country which held nothing in its hands but a club?"

Mr. King Steps Forward

WE have stated again and again that there is only one real issue between the Liberals and the Conservatives in the present election campaign, and that that issue presented the opportunity of a lifetime to each of the leaders for a bold, constructive policy. Up to the present the political leaders of both parties have apparently been too timid to seize occasion by the hand and formulate a policy upon the issue. The issue in question is that of the future trade relations between this country and Great Britain—whether Canada should or should not take a bold and positive stand for mutual preferences or be content with nothing but "equal status" with all foreign nations in the market of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Bennett, in the inaugural speech of his campaign, missed the opportunity of formulating a policy around that central motive. Mr. King, who is nothing if he is not astute, has not missed any constructive point in the criticisms of the Budget proposals, and in particular he has not missed the representations of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Chambers of Commerce, and members of the western wheat pool, all of whom have pointed to the need of securing greater security in the markets of the United Kingdom.

Consequently in his Brantford speech last night he stepped far ahead of anything that Mr. Dunning indicated that he stood for when he presented his Budget. No longer can the Canadian people draw the inference, as they have hitherto had every justification for doing, that the increased preferences to the Mother Country were adopted as a retaliatory measure against the higher American tariffs against Canadian products. Mr. King told his Brantford hearers last night that these preferences were "framed with the desire of seeking in British markets the place that was being denied us in markets elsewhere." Not content with this general statement, he became specific. "Above all," he said, "the budget was framed with a view to holding for Western Canada the market for her wheat which for so many years she has had in Britain, and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere."

Mr. King asked for a mandate to go to the Imperial Conference with proposals based on this policy. He stated that should the Government of Great Britain indicate its desire to do so, then "the present administration can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on a reciprocal basis." He declared that Parliament was dissolved for the very purpose of going to England with a mandate for a policy "vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export," and he further declared that this was the central point upon which the whole election campaign revolved.

This is a bold and remarkable forward step for Mr. King and the party he represents. It confirms the stand taken by the Herald that the question of establishing mutual preferences is the most important issue that could be put before the Canadian people at the present juncture, and it comes very near the policy advocated in this connection by the Herald.

Mr. Bennett will have to travel rapidly and travel a long way, if he is to catch up with Mr. King in sizing up the way in which the trade winds are blowing and setting his sails accordingly.

Premier King's Keynote Speech

Premier King's keynote speech at Brantford will not set the heather on fire nor stir the lagging enthusiasm of the Liberals, who in the past have rallied to his standard as the enemy of the big interests, the friend of the common people, and the foe of protection. Mr. King is at his best when he has some issue where he can picture himself as the shining Galahad going forth to do battle. In 1921 he was battling against the trusts and mergers. How he made the welkin ring in his denunciations of these combinations which were crushing out the life blood of the people! At the same time he had his lance couched against the Senate which he proposed to fairly exterminate.

In 1925 Mr. King was the enemy of protection. How he appealed to all the foes of that abominable principle to join forces! He turned to the Progressives and free traders. Our policies are all the same; let us join forces against the terrible Tories. In 1926 Mr. King raised a constitutional issue. His oratory on such a subject was at its best. He was fighting over again the battles of his grandfather. He was waging war for representative and responsible government, or made himself believe he was.

But this election Mr. King is without an issue of this type. Trusts, mergers and combines have flourished like a green bay tree during his term; Senate reform has gone into the limbo of forgotten things. Having put into effect a tariff policy, which for the last nine years he has vigorously denounced, he can no longer appeal to the Progressives to vote for him because their policies are similar. There is no constitutional issue to help him out. He tried to trump up a moral issue, but failed.

Mr. King had to defend a budget, most of which he has denounced in the past. He made the most of a bad situation. Like old Socrates he can make the worst appear the better argument. There were no new policies enunciated by Mr. King, no grounds for hope for the unemployed, no confidence for industry, and no help for agriculture. It was a clever speech, as might be expected, because Mr. King is at all times a brilliant speaker, but it lacked that ringing eloquence of past campaigns. It was the speech of a premier who is on the defensive. It is not a speech that will rally the country to him.

THE PRIME MINISTER AT BRANTFORD LAST NIGHT.

The prime minister's speech at Brantford last night was that of a man on the defensive. From start to finish he labored to justify the course of an administration which is not admired by the people. We leave it to his immediate hearers, to the radio audience, and to the general run of newspaper readers to compare his effort of last night with the inspiring, rousing appeal made to the nation by Mr. Bennett at Winnipeg just a week ago. Mr. King has started a week late and he may never catch up. He may have been tired last night, but, whatever the reason, he failed at any stage of the proceedings to say anything new, to show a single flash of genius, or to produce a single phrase or slogan calculated to fire his bewildered followers.

As is due to the first minister of a great country, we devote more than two full pages to the speech, but we doubt if this will do the party cause much good. The address is full of "old stuff"—of abstract academic passages, of uninteresting disquisitions on the new national status and upon remote international relations. The right honorable gentleman ranged from Tokio to Timbuctoo while his hearers were intent upon their own affairs, their own businesses, their own livelihoods and the future here in Canada for their families. So far as we know, most Canadians have only one life to live on this earth and they are largely concerned that that life shall be as successful as their own endeavors and wise Government policies can make it.

We do not disparage the premier's ability. He is a talented man, but he was obviously not at his best last night. He reeled off column after column of statements and statistics to prove the happy condition in which the Canadian people to-day find themselves. He said that in eight and a half years of Liberal Government "the "country has been lifted out of a veritable slough "of despond. Out of years of depression it has "been brought into years of prosperity which has "not been equalled in its history." In another passage he observed that his administration has "revived industry, stimulated agriculture, ex- "tended foreign trade and brought to Canada "the greatest period of progress it has ever "known." Turning from this beautiful picture, painted by himself, Mr. King said that Mr. Bennett and the Opposition are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days.

Nothing is to be gained for the Liberal cause by contending that black is white. The men and women of Canada are not to be thus talked out of existing conditions, nor are the electors to be persuaded that the Opposition is pessimistic in its tone. The country has never before heard more buoyant addresses regarding the future of this Dominion as those which have proceeded from the Conservative leader in this campaign. He has told his hearers that they possess a country of unsurpassed resources and that, given chance, Canada will become one of the wealthiest and happiest nations in the world. His outspoken belief in the Canadian people and in the Dominion and its future has indeed already imbued his tens of thousands of hearers with a new confidence in Canada and in their own material future.

TORONTO GLOBE JUNE 17, 1930

THE BUDGET SHOWS THE WAY.

Premier King divided his campaign keynote speech at Brantford into three parts, which he defined as relating "to the past, to the present, and to the future." Undoubtedly it was with gratification that he exercised the prerogative of Administration Leader to comment: "It is not easy to say which of the issues is the most important." Setting aside to some extent the political aspect of the issues and thinking in terms of the voters, the speech could also be divided, along the same lines, as relating "to the Government, to the country, and to the Empire." Would it be wide of the mark to say that the latter two are inextricably bound together as issues easily the most important on which the people of this country have ever been called to make pronouncement? The first issue, as explained in the Prime Minister's address, is the record of the Government, the second the Budget of 1930, the third the determination of which party will send representatives of Canadian opinion to the Imperial and Economic Conferences.

The people are called upon to approve or disapprove the Budget, which the Premier aptly described as marking "the meeting of the ways" —a declaration of fiscal and trade policy with new and far-reaching possibilities. Upon the result will depend whether Canada is to seek greater prosperity and advantage in the markets and solidarity of the Empire, and continue to give strength to the Empire consciousness which has become so notable in recent months. The need of a correct decision imposes a responsibility on the voters worthy of their undivided attention. The eyes of the whole Empire are on them. It is their opportunity to make or mar a prospect such as has not heretofore opened to them.

A Government is always entitled to credit for meeting the demands of existing conditions constructively. The British preference in itself is not new. It has been accepted by the Liberal Party as a policy since the days of Laurier and Fielding, was put into effect by them and has been continued. In extending it, therefore, the 1930 Budget has followed an established practice. The accompanying features are what give it additional significance at this time and mark a new line of action: the raising of iron and steel duties, increases in vegetable and fruit tariffs, and adoption of the countervailing duties. By these means the Government showed that it was prepared to grapple with realities and to turn to the advantage of Canada a situation portending tremendous disadvantages. The United States began to close its markets further to Canadian commodities. Other countries were taking similar steps. The logical move, therefore, as explained by the Prime Minister, was to revise "the tariff schedules with the definite aim of diverting a considerable portion of trade from the United States and other countries to Great Britain."

When The Globe urged this two-edged policy a year ago it was convinced of the necessity of its adoption to preserve the trade of the Dominion, but not the less of the need of its permanency to build stable trade channels for the future. It was offered and promoted as a business policy for Canada, for it ties the Dominion up with the greatest potential market the world has ever seen, a market which will remain friendly, if properly cultivated, regardless of the political winds which blow the tariff fences of foreign nations hither and thither. Having incorporated it in the Budget, Premier King is able already to point to profitable results. Bermuda has reciprocated. The British West Indies are preparing to open their doors wider to Canadian products. Sentiment throughout the British Empire, and especially in Great Britain, has turned definitely in the same direction. This the Canadian people have before them as they ponder on the question of whether they should give the Budget their endorsation.

The matter of tariffs and trade, as Mr. King said, is no longer one to be settled by the rhetoric of the politician. Such changes as have been made in the tariff schedules have become possible through close study by the Advisory Tariff Board. When the Hawley-Smoot bill was shaped at Washington the Board began to prepare to meet it as affecting this country, but on the principle that freer use of the British market was the proper alternative. Extension of trade between British countries should be accepted by the people of Canada, therefore, as an unalterable policy. The Dunning Budget merits the fullest support for what it does, and especially for what it implies. In the words of the Premier, it was designed to meet, "not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well." It aims to place the Dominion in more active participation with a family group of trading nations whose requirements from one another will increase constantly. Is it not reasonable to assume, then, that the British preference principle must be applied more generally as time passes, and that there must be a corresponding elevation of tariff walls against those countries which decline to trade with the Dominion on fair terms? It is the hope and expectation of The Globe that as the tariffs are lowered to British Empire products they will be raised against similar products from foreign countries which continue to erect tariff barriers against Canadian trade, for in this it sees the future development of Canada. Mr. King referred in his Brantford speech to the countervailing duties as maintaining an open door for reciprocal trading. This, of course, is the significance of the term, and they may be the least desirable feature of the Budget. Canada can get her imported commodities from Empire countries on a fair trading basis. It should be her set aim to do so, to cultivate them accordingly, to pursue a steady course in this direction. There is enough business available within the Empire to bring prosperity and contentment to all British countries for generations to come.

The Budget on which the voters have to pass on July 28 is, nevertheless, a general and generous expression of Canada's desire to trade within the Empire first, an invitation to Great Britain and other Empire countries to meet one another at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference to further the aim set forth in this "glorious gesture." If the people of Canada have faith in the Empire and its possibilities they cannot do otherwise than support the Budget and select its sponsors as their representatives at London. This is the great issue before them. It is a tremendous issue, worthy of careful weighing on its business and economic merits. It can and should be considered apart from sectional or partisan interests, for it is bigger than any section or any partisan issue.

Bennett

PREMIER KING'S SPEECH

Premier King's opening campaign speech was focussed on the budget, which he described as "the meeting of the ways." Undoubtedly, economic factors—and especially Empire fiscal policies—engage the greater part of the attention of the electorate at this time, and there is a tendency to think less of party than of principles. Which side offers the best promise of achieving the great end in view—the development of the Empire along sound lines of intra-imperial trade and co-operation? That is the thought which is uppermost in the minds of the Canadian people, and the premier was wise in making that aspect the keynote of his address. Both parties are agreed on the need for immediate, effective action in furtherance of these imperial aspirations; the government is charged with plagiarism in the program which has been adopted. That there should be this unanimity of opinion on the general course which ought to be pursued is a matter for congratulation, so far as the country is concerned, rather than a matter for fault-finding. Mr. King dealt fully with this criticism. While denying that the Liberals had "stolen the clothes" of the Conservatives, he was logical in his contention that there can be little objection to last-hour conversion, "if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country." That is the important point which voters are called upon to decide. There is not, after all, such a similarity between the government and opposition programs that electors are left no choice. Premier King himself pointed out where the two policies differ, emphasizing the points of difference. Mr. Bennett is doing the same thing for his party.

As the campaign develops electors will have ampler opportunity of judging which side has the stronger case. In the meantime, the record of the government is under critical examination. The premier went into considerable detail on this subject, not sparing the Conservatives for what he regarded as the weaknesses of their past performances. But two can play at that game, and exceptional circumstances account for exceptional results. Both sides can fairly claim exceptional circumstances, and, after all, we are dealing with present economic conditions, which, it must be admitted, are none too cheering. It must fairly be said, however, that depression is universal, more or less, and that the blame cannot be placed on any one factor, political or otherwise. What is the best policy to ensure the future progress of the nation and the Empire? One's gaze must be directed forward rather than backward; great changes, affecting the welfare of the country, the Empire and the world, are impending. There never was an election which called for more earnest thought on the part of Canadian citizens. Animosity, prejudice, petty considerations must be put aside, in order to get the long view and the broad vision essential to prudent action at this critical time. It is not a matter of personalities, but of policies; of carefully weighing the merits of the great issues involved.

The Prime Minister's Speech

The Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King opened the election campaign last night in his speech at Brantford by making a deliverance worthy of a responsible statesman—worthy of his post as Prime Minister of a great country. There was no descent into the shop-worn recriminations, cheap pretenses and humbugs of party politics. Mr. King discussed the affairs of the country in a masterly manner, with a great audience before him and with, before him, also, thanks to the radio, the people of Canada from ocean to ocean. Never before had a public man in Canada so great an audience and Mr. King was aware of it and resolved to do justice to the occasion. Few realize as yet that in speaking to people all over a province or dominion a speech must have special qualifications not necessarily called for in an address delivered to a crowded and cheering audience in a public hall. Within four walls, with upturned faces, quick applause, warm contacts, a speaker may talk a good deal of nonsense if he does it fairly well. But when a speech is addressed to the whole country over the radio people sit in their own homes, detached, ready to be critical, unaffected by the arts of the actor and the magnetism of the speaker. There must be logic and good sense or the speech falls cold. Mr. King last night made a speech which showed that he appreciated the medium he was using and he rose to the occasion with fine effect.

The record of the government in its debt paying, in its tax reductions, in its tariff handling up to the present time; the purpose of the government in its present budget, to so direct tendencies that Canada shall do more of her buying where her selling is welcomed—these considerations were set forth by Mr. King with a lucidity that only the most determined opponents would fail to find convincing.

Such a statement of Canada's affairs and of her position in the world, as one of the most envied of countries, as given by the Prime Minister last night, leaves his political opponents very little to lay hold of in asking the country to vote for a change of government. Before the present administration came into office there had been, since confederation, four Conservative and four Liberal surpluses reported at Ottawa; the present Liberal administration has reported seven surpluses in succession. It is a curious fact—showing how Conservative the Conservative mind is—that during these seven prosperous years the opposition has talked blue ruin, evidently because Sir John Macdonald in 1878 won an election by means of that sort of talk. In the greatest seven years of Canada's history the opposition reverted to the technique of fifty years ago.

Mr. King has constructive policies for attaining definite and practical purposes. His opponents are without constructive proposals of any kind. They set up against him the rhetoric and invective of Mr. Bennett.

TWO HOURS OF EVASION.

For two solid hours, Premier King stood last night before the bar of public opinion. He extolled his past and foretold that his future would be equally satisfactory to himself and therefore to Canada.

But what his hearers were awaiting they never heard. The corrupt use upon the provinces of the Federal treasury—such as in the House of Parliament, he had announced to be his policy—was neither defended nor explained. For less than one minute he hovered above that subject and then floated away on the wings of platitudes.

Mr. King may plead that his time was short. Two hours is indeed all too short for the present Prime Minister to satiate his fondness for autohagiography. Still he could have condensed some of his self-appreciated remarks and made room for either repentance or information of the worst ward heeling sentiment that ever came from the lips of a Canadian Prime Minister.

That he used up two hours without touching upon the vital question of his own political morality is definite evidence that he has no qualms of conscience about the corruptive doctrine—"forward looking Liberalism." Electors who listened to his two hours' speech must feel that Mr. Mackenzie King was most eloquent in his guilty silence. His elongated address on other subjects simply drew attention more forcibly to the grave question as to whether a five cent politician should continue as Prime Minister of Canada.

PREMIER KING'S SPEECH

All over Canada last night, an immense radio audience listened to the words of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of the Dominion, as he delivered his opening speech in the campaign preceding the federal general election which takes place at the end of next month. And it was a speech worth listening to, regardless of the political affiliations of the listeners. In a masterly manner, the federal Premier discussed, as he put it, the past performances, to offer the as- he reviewed the record of his administration, dwelt upon the issues of the day and indicated the policies of his government for another term in office.

It is a proud record of achievement which the Prime Minister reviewed, as he compared conditions as they were in Canada when he first took office and as they are today and showed how great is the progress in almost every line of public and private endeavor that has been made.

For the present day problems, the government has shown that it can meet successfully national emergencies as they arise and can formulate policies adapted to changing conditions.

Looking to the future, Premier King was able, on the strength of past performances, to offer the assurance of a continuance of the careful administration that has marked his regime, of continued progress and increasing prosperity and of a greater Canada making the twentieth century more truly its own.

The Prime Minister's Speech

The Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King opened the election campaign last night in his speech at Brantford by making a deliverance worthy of a responsible statesman—worthy of his post as Prime Minister of a great country. There was no descent into the shop-worn recriminations, cheap pretenses and humbugs of party politics. Mr. King discussed the affairs of the country in a masterly manner, with a great audience before him and with, before him, also, thanks to the radio, the people of Canada from ocean to ocean. Never before had a public man in Canada so great an audience and Mr. King was aware of it and resolved to do justice to the occasion. Few realize as yet that in speaking to people all over a province or dominion a speech must have special qualifications not necessarily called for in an address delivered to a crowded and cheering audience in a public hall. Within four walls, with upturned faces, quick applause, warm contacts, a speaker may talk a good deal of nonsense if he does it fairly well. But when a speech is addressed to the whole country over the radio people sit in their own homes, detached, ready to be critical, unaffected by the arts of the actor and the magnetism of the speaker. THE PREMIER'S SPEECH

The prime minister lays down as campaign issues three things: the government's record since 1921, the budget of 1930, and the choice of Canadian representation at the coming conferences in London. Inasmuch as tariff policies largely govern a decision in the third instance, and also have an important part in the matter of administrative record, the fiscal issue necessarily stands out as predominating.

It is not ordinarily an issue likely to fascinate audiences. The tariff is complicated enough in most of its phases. It is so intricate that the prime minister himself points with pride to the fact that a tariff advisory board now does the fact-finding for the government. Yet Mr. King, dealing chiefly with this issue, made it interesting to his great audience last evening at Brantford, no small triumph in itself. The fact remains that people still relish most in election campaigns the aggressive sally, the individual challenge, the direct approach which made old-time contests so lively, and hence, no doubt, the applause which greeted the premier's assault upon Mr. Bennett's promise to use the tariff to "blast" a way into world markets, and his demand that the Conservative leader indicate who would be chosen from East and West of Canada to represent the Dominion at the Empire conferences in London.

It must have been in the minds of many who sat in Brantford armory last evening that upon his last appearance there Mr. King was frequently heckled on the tariff issue. Manufacturers and workmen alike were uneasy. Whatever conclusions may be drawn therefrom, the prime minister was subject to no interruptions on this occasion. Nor did he avoid the issue, for he mentioned the lowered duties on motor vehicles, etc., recalling that "there was some commotion at the time," but reminded his hearers that the government had been convinced "that the lessened cost of production and the larger sales through lowered prices would ensure those industries wider markets for their products than ever before."

The speech lacked pronouncement upon the St. Lawrence issue; presumably that will come later. Mr. King, indeed, traversed much more ground than would be undertaken in any but a "keynote" speech, permitting himself only the briefest reference to legislation on behalf of ex-service men and many other matters which will no doubt be presented in greater detail by himself and colleagues as the compaign proceeds.

The prime minister's statement that at present rate of reduction the national debt would be wiped out in 40 years presumably does not contemplate a Dominion without a debt, but means that, as under the Ontario plan, the "old debt" would disappear, though new commitments would accumulate meantime.

It was a unique experience for a Western Ontario audience to see on the platform three Cabinet ministers, colleagues of Mr. King, and hear from none of them. Now the prime minister has formally opened the government campaign, and the other departmental heads will be at liberty to go out and spread the gospel as they interpret it.

LONDON ADVERTISER JUNE 17, 1930

The Prime Minister's Opening Speech.

The Prime Minister's speech at Brantford last night was worthy of the man, of his high office and serious responsibilities, and of the important issues now being submitted to the people of Canada for their judgment. Of these issues Mr. King described three as the most outstanding:

1. The record of the Government since it first assumed office.
2. The budget of 1930.
3. The choice of Canadian representatives at the Imperial and Economic Conferences to be held in September.

On each and all of these the Government is entitled to a favorable verdict at the polls. The difference between the Canada of 1921, the last year of Conservative rule, and the Canada of today, measured by every test, is the difference between night and day. Deficits have been turned into surpluses totaling $273,000,000 after writing off $30,000,000 for soldiers' settlement, seed grain and relief advances; the public debt has been decreased by a corresponding sum; the total national expenditures (except those incurred by the war) are no greater than in 1914 despite the growth in population and the lower value of the dollar; taxes have been reduced by $118,000,000 in the past five years; the Canadian National Railways have been unified and Sir Henry Thornton (the Government's choice for the position) has been given a free hand with the result that the system has been raised to the highest standard and operating deficits have been converted into operating surpluses; the new Welland Canal has been completed; thousands of Canadians are returning from the United States and Canada is no longer losing population to that country; the western provinces have been given their natural resources; the cost of production has been lowered by tariff changes; the export trade has been nearly doubled; fair wages and an eight-hour day have been made a condition of contracts for Dominion public works; the legislation on war pensions and veterans' allowances is the most advanced in the world; the grievances of the Maritime Provinces have been redressed; the various Imperial Conferences have resulted in according to Canada and the other Dominions a national status equal to that of Great Britain herself, and Canada has acquired a new position in world affairs, with the right to negotiate her own treaties, and with her own diplomatic representatives at Washington, Paris and Tokio.

Here is a magnificent constructive record upon which the Government could proudly and confidently appeal to the country regardless of other questions. But it is not the whole story. The Government is not resting upon its past achievements. It is living in the present and looking to the future. The Prime Minister devoted much of his speech to the Dunning budget, and ridiculed the cry of the Government's opponents that the National Policy of 1878, framed when Western Canada was in its infancy, was adequate for conditions today. The worst period of depression Canada ever knew was in the years before the general election of 1896 when the authors of the N. P. were in office. The Liberal party rescued the country from this distress and the era of real national prosperity began. But when it increased the British preference, reduced the duties on implements of production and on motor vehicles and made other tariff adjustments, all of which stimulated Canadian progress, the Conservative party cried that it was destroying the National Policy and ruining the country. The Dunning budget was framed not only with a view to reconciling divergent economic and sectional interests—the only practical policy for Canada—but it was influenced in a special degree by Canada's relations with Great Britain and the United States, the two countries with which we have the greatest trade. Faced by the certainty that tariff legislation across the line would reduce Canadian exports to the United States the Dominion Government instructed the Tariff Advisory Board to make a careful survey of the tariff schedules then applying against American imports so as to ascertain to what extent these imports could be purchased from Great Britain or other parts of the British Empire. In the meantime a condition arose in Great Britain which led to a marked curtailment of the purchases of Canadian wheat and it became apparent that if Canada were to maintain the British market for that product it was essential that many of the purchases that had been made in the United States should be diverted to the British Isles so as to create an economic and psychological atmosphere there favorable to the importation of Canadian wheat. The budget of 1930 was conceived for that purpose. It contains four main provisions each designed to increase Canadian productivity and widen the bounds of our external trade:

1. The iron and steel revision.
2. Countervailing duties.
3. The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4. Extension of the British preference.

The Prime Minister made a penetrating analysis of these proposals. The new iron and steel duties were the outcome of years of expert inquiry and would turn over to British industry a large measure of our necessary imports hitherto supplied by the United States. The countervailing schedule would apply to other countries the same rates of duty they apply to Canadian products, "but at the same time," the Prime Minister added significantly, "we will tell our neighbor (the United States) frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States, as with every other country, have always been a primary concern of the present Administration." The new fruit and vegetable duties were designed to meet the requirement of the growers during the period when they would be threatened by the instability of prices arising from abnormal outside competition, and at the same time to divert to the British West Indies a large part of our purchases of early fruits and vegetables hitherto made in the United States. Already as a result of free entry under the British preference Bermuda has given Canada valuable tariff concessions, and representatives of all the British West Indies are meeting this very week to consider closer trade relations with Canada.

Naturally the Prime Minister laid stress on the British preferential features of the budget. These, he said, had been introduced in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. "Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms." But the Government did not forget that Canada is a member of the great community of nations under the British Crown which offered an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation. Great Britain bought far more from Canada than Canada bought from her, and if we are to maintain an assured market for our wheat and other articles of export we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. The present budget was framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It was the traditional policy of the Liberal party, opposed by the Conservative party when it was inaugurated and opposed by that party today. Replying to the Tory contention that Canada must have preference for preference the Prime Minister argued that the voluntary action of Canada would assure her first consideration in any new fiscal arrangements Britain might adopt, but even in the absence of any such proposals the Liberal party stood for a policy, embodied in the budget, which was vitally related to her export trade with Great Britain. "The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country." That sentence should be fixed in the mind of every elector. The Prime Minister clinched this part of his argument by holding up to derision the contradictory attacks of the Conservative leader and party upon the budget. He delivered a body blow in this message:

> We are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences there should be no trade, even with the Mother Country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference. In the reciprocity campaign of 1911 the cry of the Tory party was "No truck nor trade with the Yankees." This year it has come dangerously near being "No truck nor trade with Britain."

The Prime Minister quoted the recent remark of an eminent Canadian (Mr. J. W. Dafoe) that since Confederation Britain had bought from Canada five billions more than Canada had bought from Britain. "We have not fared so badly in that great market," he added. "We all wish to preserve and extend it. It has been our greatest outlet in the past." The attitude of the Conservative party toward Britain—that no preference should be given her unless she reversed her fiscal system—he compared to that of a man with a club, and he asked whether the Liberal policy of free-will preference was not more calculated to secure a favorable position in the British market. The Dunning budget had produced an immediate and warm response from every British party.

Coming to the third of the outstanding issues, Canadian representation at the Imperial and Imperial Economic Conferences, the Prime Minister explained the difference between the two gatherings. The Imperial Conference would be asked to seal with its approval the far-reaching constitutional changes of the past seven years, every one of which had been opposed by the Conservative party. The people of Canada must decide which party should represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial Conference. "Shall it be the party that labored and achieved or shall it be the party that obstructed and opposed?" The Economic Conference would occupy itself with ways and means of enlarging the field of co-operation within the British Commonwealth. Which party should represent Canada at this Conference? "Shall it be the party that established the British preference and negotiated the Australian treaty and the West Indies trade agreement, or shall it be the party which has opposed or criticised each of these great policies designed to enlarge the boundaries of Empire trade and co-operation?" The Prime Minister announced that if the Government received the mandate it asked for it would send to the Imperial Conference Hon. Ernest Lapointe and Hon. J. L. Ralston, and to the Economic Conference Hon. Charles A. Dunning and Hon. James Malcolm. He lamented Mr. Bennett's reference at Winnipeg to the members of his Government as "a group of mercenaries, holding office by sham and subterfuge"; and to the epithet of "Judas" which he applied to the Government in his speech at Regina. "May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled-for and adds nothing to his stature in the position of leadership. Already I have heard it strongly resented by men of his own party."

The Prime Minister disdained to reply to Mr. Bennett in kind, and kept his speech on the high level befitting the dignity of public life and public affairs.

Ontario and the Election

Special Correspondence

Toronto: Brantford City and Brant county Liberals regard it as a happy augury that Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King opens his campaign at Brantford. No Premier of Canada has previously so honored the district; but it is recalled that in the triumphal Ontario campaign of 1896, the then Mr. Laurier, leader of the opposition, addressed a monster gathering in the "Telephone City," which was regarded as definitely indicating a turn in the long tide of Tory victories. So it is now hoped that John Harold and W. Ross Macdonald, Liberal candidates for county and city, respectively, may redeem both seats.

The Ku Klux Klan and Orange combination which is blamed by party-first Tories for the fiasco at the convention in Hamilton, where the provincial organization had arranged for T. J. Mahony (who has since definitely withdrawn from the field) to be nominated for the federal riding of Wentworth, may find itself outmanoeuvred. For the moment it holds the boards. Its action in nominating S. E. Weaver has put a stop to the willingness of the provincial government to allow several other members of the Legislature—in which Mr. Mahony represents Wentworth South—to resign their seats and enter the federal arena. Karl Homuth, of Waterloo South, has secured consent to do so in order to fight against Hon. W. D. Euler. But that was arranged some time ago. It is a debatable question whether the provincial government wishes to drop Mr. Homuth, formerly a Labor member of the U.F.O.-Labor combination that was led by Hon. E. C. Drury, or whether it is a case of no one else offering for sacrifice.

Middlesex East Conservatives put on a battle resulting in failure to select a candidate and postponement in order to avoid an open fight. The last sitting member, A. K. Hodgins, declined renomination for health reasons. The Liberals ought to redeem the riding.

In Simcoe North a hectic battle is expected between Hon. E. C. Drury, former Premier of Ontario, and J. T. Simpson, county clerk of Simcoe. Mr. Drury, who has the backing of Liberals and Progressives, twice contested against W. A. Boys, last sitting member, who stays out now on health reasons. In 1925 Mr. Drury was defeated by over 500, and in 1926 had cut down that majority to 190. In the riding itself the feeling is that it is Mr. Drury's turn; in Toronto, where it is reported the provincial organization made strong efforts to get Mr. Boys to stay in the fight, the claim is publicly put forward that Mr. Simpson is a better candidate than the old member.

Toronto does not promise any more for the Liberals than it ever did, and despite its traditional Tory complexion, the Liberals hardly deserve more than they get out of it, for a variety of reasons, including former lack of energetic local organization and effort, but especially among the men, this is being remedied to some extent. The women's Liberal organization in Toronto is good, but it doesn't run election campaigns. The local Twentieth Century club may help to show some real results. Provincially the Liberal organization is vastly improved. It needs to be because the combined federal and provincial Tory organization is making the most strenuous fight in 20 years to try to show gains from this province.

In the circumstances if the Liberals and Progressives hold their own in Ontario, they will do more than some observers count on; if they make gains they will be entitled to more credit than others might concede. They have, at least, the advantage that in the last provincial elections they made substantial gains in the popular vote, even if their Legislative membership suffered. And it is doubtful whether the Ferguson eagerness to prove himself a pooh-bah in federal politics is not going to react unfavorably to the Tory party.

The Calgary Albertan June 17, 1930;

MR. KING SOUNDS THE KEY NOTE

WHAT, it might have been expected, would have been a defensive attitude was converted into a vigorous offensive by Mr. Mackenzie King in his opening speech of the campaign last night. Speeches of a Government leader must necessarily consist to some extent of a resume of what has been accomplished. Those of the leader of an Opposition, conversely, must consist mostly of what his party would do were it the Government. It follows that the more a Government has accomplished the more of the leader's speech is devoted to retrospection and the less to promise for the future. Therefore, Mr. King's opening speech was devoted almost entirely to a summary of the accomplishment of eight and a half years and of the future he had practically nothing to say. Perhaps the most significant reference to the future was his hint that the so necessary but so objectionable sales tax, reduced from 6 to 1 per cent during Mr. King's regime will disappear entirely when the Government has received a fresh mandate from the people of Canada. "With this gradual elimination of the sales tax," Mr. King said, "I need not ask you what will happen to that remaining 1 per cent if the present administration is returned."

To unemployment Mr. King made practically no direct reference. This will be the special subject of a speech which he is to make at a public meeting in Peterborough tonight. He referred to the topic, however, in passing when he defended his Government against the charge that it had been responsible for aggravating unemployment by its immigration policy. If over-immigration (although the Government has at other times been held responsible for not encouraging immigration) were a cause of unemployment, what, he asked, would have been the state of the labor market had the Opposition been free to enforce the McRae scheme for the immigration of 300,000 new settlers?

Leaving, as has been stated, unemployment for separate discussion, thereby indicating Mr. King's realization of the gravity of the question, he laid down three main "issues" on which he is appealing to the electors. First, the Government's record during eight and a half years; second, the budget; third, the choice between Liberals and Conservatives as representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial conference and the economic conference in London next September. Naturally, Mr. King could not refer to his Government's accomplishments without some pride and his confidence in their wisdom was reflected in his cheerful outlook for the future and his complete freedom from misgiving as compared with what he called his opponents' "minds shackled to the gloomy moments of other days."

But at no time is Mr. King unfairly nor unduly bitter against his opponents. Critical of their policies, yes—defensive against their attack, yes—but there is a complete absence of bitterness; evidence enough that the Prime Minister conscientiously believes in his policies as the best for Canada. The familiar accusation that Canadians are leaving Canada he answered with facts and figures to show that the exodus is now completely balanced by new immigrants including thousands of those same Canadians who had once left. Thus, also, he dispelled the theory that it is necessary nowadays to go to the United States to seek employment. Parenthetically it might be remarked that these are facts which Canadian figures and the obviously impartial statistics issued from Washington completely prove.

Mr. King's just pride in his Government's record is based mainly on what has been done; on the manner in which the administration has met the problems of reconstruction; turned deficits into surpluses, reduced or eliminated taxes; extended foreign trade; curtailed expenses and increased revenue; large reduction in the national debt; the completion of the Hudson Bay Railway and many other things which are commonplace to every thoughtful student of public affairs. Of more especial concern to Alberta and the West, of course, are such matters as the return of the natural resources and the vesting of control over immigration in provincial authorities among the accomplished facts and the development by tariff and other means of the great basic industries—agriculture throughout the Prairie Provinces, the oil of the Alberta fields, the mining business of Manitoba. Mr. King dealt at some length with the Government's tariff policy, so important an issue in the election, summing it up thus: That the Government seeks friendly and not hostile relations with all countries—that tariff policies suitable for the early days of Confederation may not claim the right to be called National Policy in 1930.

Mr. King's speech is no apologia. He makes few promises of what he and his Government will do, but he is immensely and justly proud of what they have done.

Mr. Mackenzie King has not forgotten the argument he started among the pundits early in the year by referring to 1930 as "the beginning of a decade." In his Brantford speech he said, "As we approach the third decade of the twentieth century."

Mr. King's Speech

A well-reasoned, exhaustive review of the work of his administration, a vigorous defense of its acts and policies, a ringing statement of its aims and aspirations, an optimistic outlook on the future of Canada, a plea for friendly trade as against attempts to "blast out" new markets, and a sharp challenge to the opposition on more than one vital point—these were the high spots in the prime minister's effective speech at Brantford last night, a speech that opened the government's campaign for re-election on July 28.

Mr. King was tendered a remarkable reception by the people of Brantford and surrounding district, and by Liberal stalwarts from all over Western Ontario who gathered in the Telephone City to hear the opening pronouncement of their distinguished leader. The speech itself lasted two hours and was broadcast over a nation-wide radio arrangements involving 24 stations. Incidentally, this is said to have been the largest hook-up to date, in Canadian history.

The prime minister's remarks were characterized by a happy restraint so far as bitter attacks on his opponents are concerned. In this respect they offered something of a contrast to the attitude of Mr. Bennett, who has been using extravagant language in his Western speeches, stamping Mr. King as a modern Judas, talking of the "great betrayal," and other such platform nonsense. Perhaps the prime minister—who, no doubt, is as good at that sort of thing as the next one—has appreciated that the public are no longer impressed by old-fashioned vilification and has therefore profited by Mr. Bennett's mistakes.

Mr. King went into a careful examination of the various features of the Dunning budget and pointed out that one of the underlying principles of Liberalism was to adapt itself to circumstances, to make such changes as were necessary from time to time. It was apparent, Mr. King said, that both a high tariff and free trade were sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada. What, then, was the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interests arising out of the tariff was the same as with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions. To the greatest possible extent, sectional interests had to be reconciled in the light of the larger interests of the whole. That, the premier pointed out, could be effected only by moderation and compromise.

Mr. King emphasized, also, the forthcoming Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference to be held in London, declaring that the Dunning budget, especially with reference to the extension of the British Preference on many articles, had been framed with these important empire meetings in mind. And the prime minister referred, with much satisfaction, to the favorable impression created in Great Britain by the budget.

His pride in this respect is indeed pardonable, for it is difficult to think of any other Canadian fiscal change, with the possible exception of the actual introduction of British Preference by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in, we think, the year 1907, that has created such profound satisfaction in the Old Land or brought down more appreciative comments on the heads of its Canadian authors. British opinion, almost without exception, warmed to the preference features of the Dunning budget, and on every hand they were hailed as a striking evidence of Canada's attachment to the Motherland and Canada's desire to be helpful in the promotion of empire trade. The Conservative party in Canada, one writer pointed out at the time, had always posed as the chief exponent of imperial affection, but the Liberal party was the party that actually carried out policies worth something in this direction.

One of the most telling points made by the premier is found in that section of his address dealing with Canada's position among the nations of the world. "Let me invite you," he said, "to look beyond the empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds today? The Conservative party has opposed every step of the way toward the responsible self-government of Canada in external affairs. When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties, we were told that we were seeking separation because, forsooth, we asked His Majesty, in regard to an international negotiation on a matter of Canadian concern, to give full powers to a Canadian minister of the Crown instead of to the British ambassador to Washington. When, a little later, we opened a legation at Washington, and subsequently at Paris and Tokio, we were again told that we were pursuing the path of separation. Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about 'Canada First.' Just what does 'Canada First' mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the establishment of Canadian legations in foreign lands, and on Canada's status of co-equality with the Motherland."

Mr. King is on very solid ground in this connection. Mr. Bennett's position with respect to Canadian nationhood is not satisfactory. The Conservative leader, we fear, has still to rid his system of the colonial complex. It is strange that a man who aspires to the premiership of this country should still think along such Victorian lines, but on more than one occasion Mr. Bennett has revealed that this is the case. Consequently, Mr. King cannot be blamed for calling the situation to the country's attention, and he is in a particularly strong position to do so because of the fact that, under his administration, Canada has made enormous strides along the path of nationhood. Curiously enough, a Conservative premier, Sir Robert Borden, laid the groundwork for the inauguration of Canada's system of sending her own ministers abroad, but we must conclude that Sir Robert's strong and admirable attitude on the subject of Canadian nationhood did not have the approval of his then follower, Mr. Bennett.

There can be no question, of course, as to the pride that Canadians have in the achievements of their country and in the change of position that has come about with the passing of the years. Our status as a nation is now affirmed by Great Britain and by others whose opinions we value—even if some of the colonial minds of Canada still fail to recognize the change. The most amazing thing, of course, is that anyone who calls himself a Canadian, anyone who loves his country and is anxious to see it take first rank among the nations of the world, should resist such a change, should cling, almost desperately, to a worn-out idea that can have no place in the modern scheme of things.

The Star believes that one of the greatest strengths of the Mackenzie King administration is the emphasis it places, and has always placed, upon Canadianism. Whether one admires him or not, one must admit that the present premier has done more than any of his predecessors to emphasize Canadian nationhood, to build up national pride, to bring Canadians to an appreciation of their importance as a nation. And all this has been accomplished without in any way impairing our connections with Great Britain and other partners in the British Commonwealth of Nations. Indeed, as we have already mentioned, the Liberal party's preference policy, of many years, plus the increases recently extended through the Dunning budget, are concrete examples of Canada's desire for close relations with her mother and sister nations.

Mr. King's speech, for some reason or other, has no reference to the St. Lawrence waterways proposition, and in this respect is disappointing. Mr. Bennett, in his keynote address at Winnipeg, came out for the lakes-to-ocean project. Perhaps Mr. King feels that his government has already publicly committed itself to the scheme, or it may be that he intends to deal with it in a later address. At any rate, the country will expect him to make a statement, and it should be an explicit one. Mr. Bennett's reference to the St. Lawrence has already been criticized on this ground—that it was not explicit enough. However, a wise campaigner does not use all his ammunition in the first engagement.

The ballot battle is now officially on. The leaders have spoken and outlined their policies. They are able men. One is determined to secure power, the other to retain it. A few weeks hence we shall know how well their arguments have impressed the people.

MR. KING'S SPEECH.

Is a government which rides upon the crest of a wave responsible for the creation of the wave? Mr. Mackenzie King's speech at Brantford, last night, would suggest that he believes it is. At any rate, he takes credit to himself and his government for a great many things which could only have been accomplished in a period of abounding prosperity, for the reduction of debt, for instance, for the reduction of the income and sales tax, for the scaling down of the exodus to the United States, for the better financial condition of the national railway, and for the increase in the country's trade.

But if the government is responsible for the height of the crest, is it not also responsible for the depth of the trough that follows? Mr. King escapes the necessity of discussing this phase of the question by virtually denying that there is a trough. He has all along refused to admit the gravity of the unemployment situation, and in his speech at Brantford—the first of the campaign—he appears to have made almost no mention of it. Certainly he has put forward no direct solution.

It would be foolish, of course, and manifestly unfair to attempt to hold Mr. King and his government responsible for the financial and commercial depression of the present summer. The depression is world-wide, the dullness is the dullness of an economic dip which affects not only Canada but all the principal trading countries of the world. But when he claims credit for giving us prosperity, Mr. King invites us to blame him when prosperity is not as full-bodied as we should like it to be.

It would be rather carping, however, to drive criticism of the speech at Brantford too far. It was a very good speech in many ways. Happily, it maintained a lofty and even tone throughout, and never descended to innuendo, to personalities or unworthy attacks, but discussed records and issues. One may disagree with Mr. King's premises in his arguments, one may dispute his conclusions; but one must concede that in this keynote speech he showed that he has a proper conception of the dignity of the office he holds, and that he credits the people of Canada, whom he was addressing, with intelligence and a real interest in public affairs. He opened his campaign in a decent and dignified manner, setting an example which, it is to be hoped, his supporters will follow in the constituencies.

The principal issue which the Prime Minister discussed was the record of the government, and in discussing this, it must be admitted, he was on pretty firm ground. The government has had great opportunities during the eight and a half years it has been in office, and, on the whole, it has made pretty good use of them. Here and there it has failed, as with immigration, for instance—and now it is trying to make a virtue of this failure—and, of late, with unemployment. But it has, as the Prime Minister has said, reduced debt and taxation, it has put the national railways on their feet, it has returned the natural resources to the western provinces, it has helped the Maritimes, it has encouraged foreign trade, it has increased Canada's prestige abroad. No government at all alive to its responsibilities could very well have failed to do most of these things.

The second issue which Mr. King put forward—the Dunning budget—is likely to furnish the principal talking points during the campaign. The Conservatives say it was stolen from them in large part. The Premier replies that it could not have been stolen from them and made at Washington, as some Conservatives say, at the same time. He points out also, that he and his party go much further in the matter of British preference than the Conservatives are prepared to go.

The third issue, and one on which Mr. King seems to lay great stress, is the granting of a mandate to one party or the other for attendance at the Imperial Conference in September. The conference is likely to be an important one, and it may, possibly, have far-reaching results in the creation of an Empire economic policy. All the same, the point is not one which is likely to develop any lively interest during the campaign. The people of Canada will choose their government on domestic rather than on Empire issues, on the records and promises of the men and the parties, and they will be quite content that the leaders of whichever party they favor shall represent them at London in September. In fact, they probably would not object to having the leaders of both parties present at the conference.

The Prime Minister's Speech

The Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King opened the election campaign last night in his speech at Brantford by making a deliverance worthy of a responsible statesman—worthy of his post as Prime Minister of a great country. There was no descent into the shop-worn recriminations, cheap pretenses and humbugs of party politics. Mr. King discussed the affairs of the country in a masterly manner, with a great audience before him and with, before him, also, thanks to the radio, the people of Canada from ocean to ocean. Never before had a public man in Canada so great an audience and Mr. King was aware of it and resolved to do justice to the occasion. Few realize as yet that in speaking to people all over a province or dominion a speech must have special qualifications not necessarily called for in an address delivered to a crowded and cheering audience in a public hall. Within four walls, with upturned faces, quick applause, warm contacts, a speaker may talk a good deal of nonsense if he does it fairly well. But when a speech is addressed to the whole country over the radio people sit in their own homes, detached, ready to be critical, unaffected by the arts of the actor and the magnetism of the speaker. There must be logic and good sense or the speech falls cold. Mr. King last night made a speech which showed that he appreciated the medium he was using and he rose to the occasion with fine effect.

The record of the government in its debt paying, in its tax reductions, in its tariff handling up to the present time; the purpose of the government in its present budget, to so direct tendencies that Canada shall do more of her buying where her selling is welcomed—these considerations were set forth by Mr. King with a lucidity that only the most determined opponents would fail to find convincing.

Such a statement of Canada's affairs and of her position in the world, as one of the most envied of countries, as given by the Prime Minister last night, leaves his political opponents very little to lay hold of in asking the country to vote for a change of government. Before the present administration came into office there had been, since confederation, four Conservative and four Liberal surpluses reported at Ottawa; the present Liberal administration has reported seven surpluses in succession. It is a curious fact—showing how Conservative the Conservative mind is—that during these seven prosperous years the opposition has talked blue ruin, evidently because Sir John Macdonald in 1878 won an election by means of that sort of talk. In the greatest seven years of Canada's history the opposition reverted to the technique of fifty years ago.

Mr. King has constructive policies for attaining definite and practical purposes. His opponents are without constructive proposals of any kind. They set up against him the rhetoric and invective of Mr. Bennett.

Three Main Issues Before Electorate Premier King Says

Scores "Blasting Way to Trade" Policy of Opposition.

KEY-NOTE SPEECH IS LENGTHY ONE

Discuss St. Lawrence Waterways at Later Date.

By RAY BROWN,
Canadian Press Staff Correspondent.

BRANTFORD, Ont., June 16. —The record of the Government, the Budget, and Canada's representation at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference — these are the major issues which the Canadian people are asked to pass upon at the coming election. They will be called upon to decide whether they believe in the policy of "blasting a way to trade" or if they prefer the viewpoint that trade is exchange for mutual advantage and that it "is secured not by ill-will but by good-will".

Thus declared Prime Minister Mackenzie King in his key-note campaign speech here tonight. From the platform the words of the Prime Minister of Canada were carried over an all-Canadian radio hook-up into the homes of thousands of people across the Dominion.

Budget Provisions.

Mr. King spoke at length, dealing extensively with the record of the Government in respect to finance, taxation, natural resources, war veterans, labor, immigration, co-operation with the provinces, and more particularly with the important provisions of the budget.

And it was with respect to the budget that Mr. King took very definite and final issue with Hon. R. B. Bennett, Leader of the Opposition. There was, Mr. King said, a fundamental difference between the Liberals and Conservatives in their conception of the nature of trade. The Conservatives had enunciated the belief that trade was war. On that assumption they spoke and declared that they were prepared to act.

Mr. Bennett had asserted at Winnipeg that the Conservatives would "blast a way to trade," continued Mr. King. "Let me ask you frankly," he said, "did you ever hear of any one blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade."

The Prime Minister addressed himself particularly to salesmen and commercial travellers in his audience. "Did you ever secure an order by force?" he asked. "Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle that trade is secured not by ill-will, but by good-will? Not by awakening antagonism, but by developing friendliness and co-operation?" To Mr. Bennett, he declared, all countries were competitors. "He forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone."

The policy of the British preference was a Liberal policy, Mr. King informed his listeners, and the Liberal party believed in conciliation, in friendliness, in the fact that trade was exchange and, if possible, should be mutually beneficial to all countries involved in the exchange.

Question For People.

"May I ask you to ponder this question both now and until your votes are cast," he said earnestly. "Should the Government of this country be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference except on a basis of hard bargaining, and who would destroy the foundations of good-will upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded today?"

The attitude of the Conservatives with respect to efforts to give Canada fullness of national stature had been one of opposition and derision, Mr. King declared in discussing representation at the Imperial conference.

He asked which party should represent Canada overseas. "Shall it be the party which labored and achieved or the party that obstructed and opposed?" He demanded that Mr. Bennett tell the electorate who he would send to London as Canadian ministerial representatives at the Imperial conference in the event of the Conservatives being returned to power.

He would tell Mr. Bennett that if the present administration was again given office, the Canadian representatives at the Imperial conference would include such men as Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. C. A. Dunning, Hon. J. L. Ralston, and Hon. James Malcolm. Who would Mr. Bennett substitute for these men from Quebec, from the Maritime Provinces and from the Canadian West?

Mr. King's review of the Government's record was featured by the declaration that the present administration, eight and a half years ago, found the country in a state of depression and despondency and had lifted it to a position of prosperity. National debt and taxation had both been reduced. Deficits had been changed to surpluses. He referred to reductions in the income tax, in the sales tax, the abolition of the "nuisance taxes."

Will Abolish Tax.

He forecast the absolute removal of the sales tax if the Government was returned to power. In five years, he declared, there had been a remission of $118,000,000 in taxation.

He spoke of the return of the natural resources to the provinces of the West and the adjustment of Maritime claims. These he regarded as real achievements. Government after Government had endeavored to accomplish the return of the resources but none had succeeded, he said. The present Government had been successful where others had failed.

Relations with the provinces were of the best, Mr. King said. "I say without contradiction that there never has been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the various provinces and the Federal Government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of the election and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over," he said.

Mr. King dealt with the accusation which, he said, had been put forward by the Conservatives "that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election."

This was not the case, he asserted. "Far from being 'premature' or 'unreasoned' or 'hysterically inspired,' I venture to say there never was presented to any Parliament a budget which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well."

"There are three outstanding issues in the present campaign," the Prime Minister said. "The first is the record of the Government in the discharge of its public duties since it first assumed office. The second is the budget of 1930, representing as it does the views of the present administration on important questions of fiscal and trade policy. The third is the direct issue of a choice between the Liberal and Conservative parties as the representatives of Canadian opinion at the Imperial and economic conferences which are to be held in London in September of the present year. This last issue is necessarily related to the question of the personnel of the ministry which is to manage the affairs of our country during the ensuing term of Parliament.

Past, Present and Future Issues.

"It is not easy to say which of the issues is the most important. All are of the greatest importance. They relate to the past, to the present and to the future. Perhaps I had better discuss them in this order.

"Were there no other issue before the people I should ask for nothing more than that we should be judged fairly and squarely on the manner in which, having regard for all circumstances, we have administered the affairs of Canada during the past eight and a half years," asserted Mr. King in dealing with the record of the Government. "For in that time the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond, and out of years of depression it has been brought into years of prosperity which have not been equalled in its history.

"As a people and as a Government we have been far too modest with respect to the achievements of the years we have been in office. We have been so modest, in fact, that the record is but partially known even to the people of our own country. The growth and development of Canada under the present administration stand without parallel in the history of this or any other nation. It is right that these facts should be known and I propose to make the record of the administration an open book from one end of the country to the other.

"Standing on a record of sound, progressive accomplishment we approach the problems of the future with the same faith, courage and optimism which have made possible the achievements of the past years. The 'whispers of death,' the fear of returning depresion, the complaints of an exodus which has ceased, the misgivings for the future, I shall leave to Mr. Bennett and other leaders of the Conservative party, whose last tenure of office was indelibly associated with acute economic depression, and whose minds apparently are still shackled to the gloomy memories of other days."

Government's Financial Record.

Mr. King went at length into the financial record of the Government. On March 31, 1914, the net debt of Canada stood at about $336,000,000, he said.

"On March 31, 1922, as a result of the war, and of the extravagance of the last Conservative administration, the net debt had reached the staggering total of over $2,427,000,000. In the last two years of the Conservative administration no less than $174,000,000 had been added to the public debt. In addition not less than $355,000,000 had been borrowed out of the public treasury to meet the deficits on our railways during the three fiscal years 1919-1922. Depression was general, the business community was anxious for the future, the industrial life of the country was paralyzed, foreign trade was contracted, agriculture was depressed. Against this dark background, which is still a vivid memory to many of us today, let me point out briefly the manner in which the Liberal administration met the problem of reconstruction, turned deficits into surpluses, reduced taxes, co-ordinated and vitalized the Canadian National Railways, revived industry, stimulated agriculture, extended foreign trade, and brought to Canada the greatest period of progress it has ever known."

Raised Revenue By Taxation.

The Government, continued the Prime Minister, had approached the problem first by curtailment of expenditures and second by increasing revenues. The latter had, of necessity, to be accomplished by additional taxation which, he said, was "traditionally unpopular." The Conservative Government had avoided taxing the people to meet the increased costs due to the war, and had raised the necessary money by loan, a very considerable part of which was made exempt from taxation. He was aware that this statement had been challenged, but it was nevertheless true.

"Where the previous administration avoided their responsibilities we met ours courageously and without regard to political consequences," continued Mr. King. "We imposed new taxes, we increased certain old taxes, but this we did from the urgent necessity of balancing the national budget. To have continued the other course would have brought the country into a condition of bankruptcy. Within two years our first task was accomplished; we had raised sufficient revenues not only to balance our budget but to give us on March 31, 1924, a surplus of nearly $36,000,000. From that time forward we began to pay off annually, without intermission, an increasing portion of the vast burden of debt which was the joint legacy from the war and the extravagance of the previous administration. Every year, including and since 1924, we have had a surplus instead of deficits in the public accounts. In seven successive years, without exception, this has been the case.

Created Surpluses Instead of Deficits.

"May I say here that in all the years from Confederation down to the time that we came into office there were only eight years in which there was a surplus, four of which were under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In other words, there have been surpluses in the public accounts in fifteen out of sixty-three years. Only four of these were in the entire period of Conservative administration, and seven have been during the eight and a half years that the present administration has held office. The sum total of surpluses in the public accounts is $315,000,000, of which $273,000,000 represents the surpluses achieved since we came into office. This is a record of accomplishment which is unequalled by any country or any Government which participated in the late war from its commencement."

Reference to the tax reductions followed. Mr. King spoke of the various reductions in the income tax since 1926 up to those contained in the last budget. He referred to the persistent decreases in the sales tax which had brought it down from six to one percent. And he added: "With this gradual elimination of the sales tax, I need not ask you, ladies and gentlemen, what will happen to that one percent. if the present administration is returned to office." He stated that the so-called "nuisance taxes" had now all been eliminated with the exception of the two cents on cheques above ten dollars, and he mentioned the reduction in the rates of letter postage in Canada from three to two cents and the re-establishment of penny postage throughout the Empire.

Says $11,000,000 Saved In Taxes.

"Leaving out of account the degree to which the postal revenues may have been affected by these reductions, it is estimated there has been saved to the Canadian taxpayer, of taxation which would otherwise have been collected, the following sums: For the year 1926, $25,000,000; 1927, $27,000,000; 1928, $19,000,000; 1929, $25,000,000; 1930, $22,000,000.

"Thus in five years," continued the Prime Minister, "there has been an estimated remission of taxation which would otherwise have been collected solely from the sources indicated, of an amount exceeding $118,000,000. The remissions indicated have been cumulative. Assuming conditions similar to those of the last five years, from now on the amount of taxation imposed each year will be $118,000,000 less per annum than it was prior to 1926. May I add that all this takes no account of the further remissions of taxation affected by the reductions of duties under the several revisions of the tariff which have taken place since we came into office, and which as the country well knows have been substantial."

Put National Railways On Feet.

The record of the Government in respect to transportation was touched on by Mr. King.

"When we came into office," he said, "with the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we found the railways of Canada in a completely disorganized and bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in the hands of a receiver. The Grand Trunk railway system had been acquired under arbitration, but it, too, was bankrupt, and the Government which took over the road had studiously refrained from giving so much as an indication as to whether or not it was to be operated as a Government owned system or whether the intention, in its acquisition, was to have the road subsequently re-transferred to private ownership.

"I notice that Mr. Bennett is saying that the records of Parliament show that the Liberal party, when in opposition, opposed the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway as a Government owned system. The Liberal party did nothing of the kind. What we did object to was the refusal of the Government of the day to submit to Parliament for approval the terms and conditions of the contract under which the system was to be acquired.

"We contended that, as the people were being made responsible for the purchase of the system, by terms arranged by agreement, the people's representatives in Parliament were entitled to know what those terms were and to approve of them, before final acquisition of the system was made. This, however, the Government of the day refused to allow, though at a subsequent session of Parliament, having failed to include some essential features of the transaction in the agreement, they were obliged to submit the whole measure to Parliament and, in order to permit of the additional terms being inserted, to secure its approval which they were of course able to do in virtue of their majority.

Secured Sir Henry Thornton.

"It was the present administration which made the necessary provision for the president and the board of directors of the system, and it was the present administration that sought and secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as president and chairman of the board," declared Mr. King. "It was the present administration that laid down the policy that there should be no political interference with the management or operation of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton has publicly testified, on more occasions than one, that the Government has lived up to this policy, alike in letter and in spirit. It was the present administration which laid down as a further policy of railway management and operation in this country that Government ownership was to be given a fair trial, and that, as between the Government owned National Railways and the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway, there should be neither fear nor favor in the respective treatment to be accorded these roads. I venture to say that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his board of directors will be the first to say that in the fulfillment of this policy, the Government has sought to be scrupulously fair.

Raps Bennett on Nationals.

"Perhaps I should not be too severe on our opponents for seeking today to claim paternity of the Canadian National Railways. Their action in this regard is more or less characteristic of human nature. When the Tory party, as we came into office, left this neglected and famished foundling on our doorstep, suffering from many forms of malnutrition, there was not one member of the whole party who was prepared to allow his name to have any association with it, but now that the infant has been revived and has grown into vigorous and powerful proportions resembling those of Sir Henry Thornton himself, not a few of them wish to give it their name. They say that on no account will they part with it, and Mr. Bennett heroically says that he will sacrifice an office which he does not hold rather than see it pass out of the hands of the state.

Completed Hudson's Bay Road.

"But organization of the Canadian National Railways has not been our only achievement in the realm of transportation. We have brought the Hudson's Bay Railway to completion, though the rails on a part of this road had been taken up by our opponents while in office, and the partially constructed road-bed allowed to fall into disrepair and decay. We have acquired, and, by making them a part of the Canadian National system, have revitalized not a few of the smaller privately owned railways in different parts of the Dominion; and we have, on more than one occasion, made provision through Parliament for extensive branch line construction in other parts of the country.

"We have completed the Welland canal, and we have effected other developments with respect to the St. Lawrence waterways, on which I shall have opportunity to say something on another occasion. I wish that time permitted me to say something of the developments in aviation, which the Government has steadily sought to initiate and advance.

Deals With Immigration.

"May I now say a word with respect to immigration," the Premier went on. "You have heard a great deal about our boys and girls leaving for the United States. You have heard a great deal about foreign immigration being encouraged to the relative disadvantage of immigration from the British Isles. During part of the time you have been told that we were not bringing in a sufficient number of immigrants; at another time the complaint has been that the number was excessive. The policy of the Conservative party, as outlined by General McRae was that of a huge colonization and land settlement scheme involving an expenditure of some $300,000,000 and the bringing in of 300,000 fresh immigrants. Perhaps Mr. Bennett will tell the West how this policy which he supported would have helped to lessen the present unemployment of which he has had much to say during the present campaign.

"It is quite true that, during the years immediately following our coming into office the trend of migration continued to be from Canada to the States. The reasons for that were very obvious. The United States had prospered while we had suffered through the war. During the period of re-establishment of our citizen-soldiery in Canada, preferences in the matter of employment were being given where possible to those who had served overseas. There were not the opportunities for employment here that there were in the country to the south for many of our boys and girls, not a few of them and of our grown-ups as well left on that account. Moreover, the springs of immigration had, during the war, and the period immediately following the war, been permitted to dry up at the source. It takes time for a movement of immigration to get under way, whatever its direction may be. People had not the wherewithal to migrate in numbers from the British Isles or from other countries after the war, that they had had before, and Canada had not the free homesteads to offer, nor was she able to advertise these or to give the low ocean and railway rates which were so important an inducement to British immigration in former years.

Migration to States Falls Off.

"It was not very long, however, before the fruits of our effort became apparent. Little by little the migration of Canadians to the United States began to lessen. In increasing numbers Canadians began to return from the United States to Canada, until today while conditions of employment in Canada may not be all that we might wish, they are, happily, many times better than is the case in the United States or for that matter in Great Britain or any other country, and the migration to Canada from the United States of returning Canadians and others equals today the migration from Canada to the United States. These are the facts, and far from affording grounds of criticism, they are in the nature of a real achievement.

"With regard to the allegation that the Government was preferring foreign to British immigration, it did not take very long to establish the facts. The findings of the parliamentary committee were to the effect that while Canada was spending 11 cents per capita on continental immigrants she was spending an average of $16.67 per capita on immigrants from the British Isles. Reference to the statistics of the British Empire shows that of citizens of the British Isles emigrating of recent years to other dominions and other parts of the world, Canada has been receiving by a very long way the largest proportion.

Latest Immigration Development.

"The most recent development in our immigration policy has been to link more closely the Governments of the provinces and our own Government, in the determination of the classes and numbers of immigrants to be brought to Canada. With the return to the western provinces of their natural resources, we have felt that more in the way of provincial control of immigration was desirable, more particularly as the provinces themselves are the first to feel any adverse effects of an inadequate or an excessive immigration."

Mr. King dealt with the principles which underlay the Government tariff policies.

"We have shaped our policies with respect to the tariff in a manner which, while keeping in mind essentials in the development of manufacturing and of trade would, above all else, further the growth and development of our basic industries," he asserted. "We have recognized that, if our manufacturing and trade were to expand that world markets as well as home markets were an essential, and we have recognized, further, that what was possible in the way of competition in the markets of the world was dependent in no inconsiderable measure upon the costs of production and the cost of living in our own land. So, we have striven in our tariff revisions, consistently, to take those steps which, without injury to any legitimate business in the country, would at the same time tend to make possible more in the way of production in our basic, industries, through reduction of duties on the instruments of production required in those industries, and on the necessaries of life of those employed therein and in the manufactures and other businesses of our country."

Tariff Revisions Effected.

He made brief reference to the tariff revisions effected by the present administration since taking office in 1921, and which culminated in the revision concluded in the last budget. "Canada," he said, "now stood as the sixth great trading country of the world."

"You sometimes hear it said that this trade is largely in raw materials; that we are parting with our birthright. Perhaps this is the best time at which to remind you that the quantity of raw materials which Canada imports from the United States for her manufacturing industries, raw materials such as cotton, rubber and the like, exceed in value the total value of the raw materials which Canada exports to the United States. This, too, is perhaps an appropriate moment at which to remind you that the per capita exports of manufactured goods from Canada exceed in value those of any other country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain.

Domestic Export Trade Doubled.

"Let we add that no nation in the world has enjoyed the same proportionate increase in domestic export trade since the war as Canada. It has risen from a total of $740,000,000 at the time the present Gooverment came into office, at the end of the fiscal year 1921-22, to over $1,363,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1928-29. It other words there has been a doubling of our total domestic export trade in a period of seven years. This spectacular increase of trade is no mere chance. It is the result of wise policies effectively administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

"May I remind you that there has been less in the way of industrial strife, more in the way of industrial peace in Canada during the last few years than has been enjoyed by any other industrial country," said Mr. King with respect to the Government labor policies. "May I remind you that it was a Liberal administration which created the Canadian Department of Labor, which introduced its 'Fair Wages' policy, and which this year has given statutory effect to the payment of fair wages and to an eight-hour day on all public works carried out under contract for the Dominion Government, and with respect to all labor in the Government's own employ."

Liberal policies with respect to the war veterans were touched on by Mr. King. Canada's war pension legislation, he believed, was the most advanced in the world. He referred to what had been accomplished at the last session of Parliament.

Return of Natural Resources.

Then Mr. King went on to speak of the return of the natural resources to the Prairies and British Columbia. For 30 years, he said, this had been a problem for different governments. It remained he said for the present administration to restore these lands. Ever since their entry into Confederation, the Maritime Provinces had felt that they had not had a square deal.

"Here and there, in patchwork fashion, some adjustments have been made in dealing with particular grievances as they arose. It remained for the present administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesmanlike fashion. This we have done with respect to their transportation problems; with respect to the problems of their industries; with respect to their subsidies; with respect to their harbor and trade facilities, and to all other matters having a bearing upon the economic welfare of the Maritimes as an integral part of our Dominion.

Generosity to Provinces.

"I have not time to go into the provisions of these several agreements, but I do not hesitate to say that an examination of their provisions reveals a generosity in the manner of the treatment of those provinces such as has never characterized similar negotiations in the history of our Dominion. And here may I point out that something which has also a bearing upon the somewhat surprising attitude of the Premier of this province and his Government in this general election, namely that in not a single case were the negotiations conducted exclusively with Governments of the same political persuasion as the present administration at Ottawa. It made no difference to us whether we were dealing with Liberal Governments or, as happened to be the case, more particularly, with Progressive and Conservative Governments, our attitude throughout was the same; not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long-standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or ill-will.

Strengthened Confederation.

"By our action in these particulars we have made over and strengthened the superstructure of Confederation. We have, at the same time, in the increased financial provisions which we have made for those provinces, reinforced its foundations. I say without fear of contradition that there has never been a time in the history of Canada where the relations between the several provinces and the Federal Government were as cordial and as harmonious as they were up to the very eve of this election, and as they will continue to be the hour the election is over.

"But if we have improved relations within the Dominion between the Governments of the provinces and the Federal Government, if we have removed sectional antagonisms and helped to develop a truly national spirit, what may not also be said of our achievements in inter-Imperial and international relations? Here I come to the work of the Imperial conference and the economic conference of 1923; the work of the Imperial conference of 1926, the work of the subsidiary conference on the operation of Dominion legislation which concluded its sittings in London last autumn.

Inter-Imperial Progress.

"Out of these conferences has come, for the first time in the history of the relations of Great Britain and the Dominions, a statement of their relative positions, which has removed from the realm of possible controversy all further talk of colonial subordination, and which has accorded to Canada and to the other self-governing Dominions a national status equal to that of Great Britain herself. With this clear recognition of nationhood there has come a corresponding development in free and effective co-operation, not only with the Mother Country but with the sister nations of the Commonwealth.

"Let me invite you to look beyond the Empire to the world at large. When did Canada ever hold a place in world affairs such as she holds today? Far be it from me to say that this place has been gained by any single path. Broadly speaking, there has been the sudden steep ascent of war in which there were common heroisms and common sacrifices, and there has been the long, gradual, constitutional endeavor for representative and responsible government, in which at every stage the Liberal party has been the pathfinder and pioneer."

The Conservative party had opposed every step of the way towards the responsible self-government of Canada in external affairs, the Prime Minister charged.

Accused of "Separatist" Policies.

"When we sought and won the right to negotiate our own treaties, we were told that we were seeking separation because, forsooth, we asked His Majesty, in regard to an international negotiation on a matter of Canadian concern to give full powers to a Canadian Minister of the Crown instead of to the British Ambassador at Washington. When a little later we opened a legation at Washington and subsequently at Paris and Tokio, we were again told that we were pursuing the path of separation. Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about 'Canada First.' Just what does his 'Canada First' mean? Perhaps he will tell us where he stands on the right to make our own treaties, and on the establishment of Canadian legations in other lands, and on Canada's status of coequality with the Motherland. I am not sure where he stands today, but I know where he stood in the session of Parliament just closed."

Reviews 1930 Budget.

Then Mr. King turned to the budget of 1930, which he termed the second great issue of the campaign. Policies must be framed to meet existing conditions, he said. The national policy of 1878 would not suit the Canada of 1930. What was more, he declared, the old national policy advocated by the Conservatives had always served to meet conditions in the past.

"When we increased the British preference, when we gave an added preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian ports, when we reduced duties on the implements of production, when we lowered the duties on motor vehicles, and when in a multitude of other directions we made what we believed to be necessary adjustments of the tariff, we were told by the Conservative opposition that we were destroying the National Policy and that we would ruin the country," he said.

"I have only to point to the conditions in Canada as they have been in the past four years to ask whether a policy of restriction or a policy of greater freedom of trade is the more deserving of being called a National Policy as we approach the third decade of the twentieth century. A National Policy today in matters of trade, as in all else, is one which aims at giving Canada her place among the nations of the world. It is not a policy primarily concentrated upon home markets. It is essentially a policy of world markets.

Eighty Percent. Manufactured In East.

"With the rapid development of Western Canada and the emergence of a great agricultural population engaged in the production of a commodity which must seek its markets throughout the world, high protection, or an all-round increase in the tariff can no longer be called a National Policy. According to figures given in the Canada Year Book of 1929, over 80 percent. of Canadian manufacturing is concentrated in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This percentage is based on figures of production, capital employed, and number of employes. While it is true that manufacturing has developed to a considerable extent in Western Canada, these manufactures are based largely upon the primary industries of agriculture and mining and do not require a tariff protection to any considerable extent. It is therefore, true to say that a general increase in the tariff of 1930 is essentially a sectional policy so far as the distribution of its benefits is concerned. It has forfeited every right to the name National Policy—given to it by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878, and by Mr. Bennett in 1930.

"But if high protection is a sectional policy in the distribution of its benefits, it is equally true that having regard to the present industrial development of Central Canada a free trade policy would be detrimental in its immediate effects to one section of the Dominion, even though it conferred benefits on those of our citizens who are obliged to seek markets abroad for their agricultural produce and who derive little or no advantage from a protective tariff.

Banish Sectional Tariff Interests.

"It is apparent, therefore, that both a high tariff and free trade are sectional policies when applied to the existing conditions in Canada. What, then, is the answer? The answer given by the Liberal party to a conflict of interests arising out of the tariff is the same as it is with respect to a conflict of interests in all other directions. To the greatest possible extent sectional interests must be reconciled in the light of the larger interests of the whole. This can be effected only by moderation and compromise. Face the facts of our situation. Take Canada as it is, with its changing needs and its conflicting interests. Acknowledge the facts of geography and of divergent industrial development in east, and centre, and west. And having examined the realities of the situation, and having considered the demands of different sections for policies suited to their needs, so mould our social transportation and fiscal policies as to hold the scales evenly between class and creed and section thus welding a far-flung country into a united Canadian nation.

"The Budget of 1930 was framed first of all to meet a situation in Canada arising from the requirements of different sections and economic classes for policies suited to their needs. But because of the place which Canada has come to occupy in international trade it was influenced also and in a special degree by our relation with two countries with which we are most closely associated in matters of commerce. The one is great Britain the other is the United States.

Seek Other Markets Than U. S.

"When Mr. Hoover assumed office as President of the United States on March 11, 1929, the United States Congress began carrying out a far-reaching revision of the tariff in conformity with the pledges given by the Republican party during the presidential campaign of the previous year. As that revision proceeded, it became increasingly apparent that the duties against Canadian agricultural products would be raised to such an extent as to cut off a considerable proportion of the existing Canadian exports to that country. In these circumstances, and in accordance with its policy of using every endeavor to find wider markets for Canadian products, the Government gave instructions to the Tariff Advisory Board to make a careful survey of the tariff schedules then applying against American imports, with a view to determining to what extent these imports could be purchased from Great Britain or from other parts of the British Empire.

"While this enquiry was proceeding, it was decided that an Imperial Economic Conference would be held in London in September of 1930, to consider the subject of closer co-operation in matters of trade between the various parts of the Empire and to discuss the various policies which would contribute towards that end. Efforts had previously been made by the present administration to have this conference held in Canada. Subsequently, a condition developed in Great Britain which led to a marked curtailment of purchases of Canadian wheat and resulted in a serious tie-up of our wheat in elevators, with consequent loss not only to Canadian growers, but to our transportation systems, and to many branches of our industry and commerce. Prior to this development Great Britain had purchased far more from Canada, largely because of our wheat exports, than Canada had purchased from Great Britain, many of the purchases being made at present in the United States and in other ways, to increase British imports to Canada and thus create an economic and psychological condition in Great Britain more favorable to the importation of Canadian wheat. These circumstances must be kept clearly in mind when examing the proposals in the Budget presented to the House of Commons on May 1.

Four Main Proposals In Budget.

"The budget of 1930 is therefore the response of the present Government to a combination of internal and external factors in our economic situation. It contains four main proposals, each of them designed to assist the great underlying purpose of assuring a continuance and increase of prosperity in Canada, and of widening as far as possible the boundaries of our foreign trade.

1. The iron and steel tariff revision.
2. Countervailing duties.
3. The fruit and vegetable tariff revision.
4. Extension of the British preference.

"The revision of the iron and steel tariff schedules has been based upon investigations of the Tariff Advisory Board, which have been conducted over a period of several years. Never in the history of Canada has there been so complete and exhaustive an inquiry into the relation of the tariff to one of our great basic industries. The purpose kept in mind by the Government in prosecuting this inquiry, and later in bringing about a revision of the iron and steel schedules, was the double one of promoting a greater efficiency and productivity in the Canadian iron and steel industry, and at the same time of diverting a large proportion of our necessary imports of iron and steel products from the United States to Great Britain. This in turn was in conformity with the announced intention of the Government to facilitate trade with those countries which are willing to trade with Canada on equal terms.

Countervailing Duties.

"The next feature of the budget, namely, the countervailing duties, is designed to give a practical illustration to the United States of the desire of Canada to trade at all times on fair and equal terms. The present administration has watched the revision of the American tariff with the closest interest. We cannot but regret that in respect of a considerable range of commodities the tariff duties have been raised against the importation of Canadian products. The wisdom of this policy, however, is for the United States to decide for itself. We, on our part, through the countervailing duties on a selected list of commodities, which are the subject of exchange between Canada and the United States, announce our intention of trading with those who are equally prepared to trade with us. For the present we raise the duties on these selected commodities to the level applied against Canadian exports of the same commodities by other countries, but at the same time we tell our neighbor frankly and sincerely that we are ready in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider trade on a reciprocal basis. On this point there can be no misunderstanding of our attitude. Friendly, not hostile, trade relations with the United States as with every other country have always been a primary concern of the present administration. This is a sound neighborly attitude. But we are resolved, in the interests of the Canadian people, that our commercial relations must not be one-sided.

Evidence On Early Vegetable Trade.

"In revising the customs tariff on fruits and vegetables, the Government has had before it the evidence presented to the Tariff Advisory Board on several occasions by those who were primarily interested in this important branch of our agricultural production. There has been for many years a tariff schedule imposing duties on the importation of fruits and vegetables. It was represented to us, however, that the existing scale of duties permitted an unreasonable competition at certain seasons of the year from the earlier maturing crops of our countries.

"It was not easy to devise a means of meeting the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers without, at the same time, imposing a severe burden on Canadian consumers. We have met the situation by combining ad valorem rates, which operate throughout the entire year, with specific minimum rates, which apply at certain designated seasons, which are set out explicitly in the new schedules. In this manner we have endeavored to meet the requirements of the growers during the period when they suffer from instability of prices, and at the same time by the limitation of the season during which these specific duties apply, we have kept clearly in mind the interests of the consumers of these commodities. In past years, moreover, a large proportion of our early fruits and vegetables has been purchased from the United States. We believe that the British West Indies are capable of supplying us with an increasing share of this business. Under the existing trade agreement these Islands have assured us of a preference in their market. In accordance, therefore, with our declared policy of trading with those who are willing to trade with us, we have made provision for the free entry into Canada of fruits and vegetables under the British Preference. Already we have seen what the response of other parts of the British Empire is likely to be to this attitude and policy. Bermuda has given to us since our budget was introduced additional preference or free entry on some of our agricultural manufactured products and this very week there is assembling at Trinidad representatives of all the British West Indies for the purpose of considering closer trade relations with our country.

Trade With the Empire.

"This brings me to the last feature of the Budget which I propose to discuss briefly at this time. Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our portals of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British Crown which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation in the period of rapid development which lies before us during the present century. Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export, we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This, as I have already explained, can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries, but which countries today do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade.

"The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then as it is opposed by them today. They have said that we must have preference for preference and that no favors should be extended to Great Britain until she is prepared to forego the policy of free trade. If Great Britain comes to the point where she is willing to concede an enlarged preference to any country, is it not reasonable to suppose that through the voluntary action of Canada in inaugurating and extending the British preference this Dominion would receive first consideration in any new fiscal arrangement Great Britain might adopt? If the Government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present administration can be trusted to carry forward to a successful conclusion any proposal for trade on a basis of reciprocal preference.

British Markets.

"But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers and to inter-Imperial trade with its beneficial effects to the British Empire as a whole, but a policy which is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country, in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country. In the far-reaching extension of the British preference under the budget of 1930, this has been our purpose and our objective. We have studied the situation with the utmost care and have revised the tariff schedules with the definite aim of diverting a considerable portion of trade from the United States and other countries to Great Britain. We firmly believe that this policy will receive the wholehearted approval of the Canadian people.

"Against the fiscal and trade policies of the budget what are the criticisms of the Conservative party as enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition? They may be summed up in a very few words. The first is that the budget proposals are something that have been suddenly concocted, and have been brought forward to meet the exigencies of a general election. Assuming that this were true, which, however, it is not, that would not be much of an objection if the proposals themselves were sound and obviously in the interests of the country, as we believe they are. The second is that in what has been done we have 'stolen the clothes' of the Conservative party. If that were true, which, however, it is not, it surely should not make our policies objectionable to members of that party. The third is that our policy is a Washington made policy. If that is true, which it is not, what becomes of the argument that we have stolen the clothes of our opponents? Finally, we are told that trade is in the nature of war, and that if there are to be preferences there should be no trade, even with the Mother Country, except as a result of bargaining, which will exact preference for preference. In the Reciprocity Campaign of 1911, the cry of the Tory party was 'No truck nor trade with the Yankees.' This year it has come dangerously near being 'No truck nor trade with Britain.'"

The budget, declared the Prime Minister, was the outcome of the most mature deliberation.

Keynote of Opposition.

"In his address at Winnipeg, sounding the keynote of the Conservative campaign, Mr. Bennett characterized the tariff changes of the budget as 'this premature, unreasoned action.' Elsewhere in the same speech he referred to the budget proposals as a movement 'hysterically inspired by party exigencies.' Far from being 'premature' or 'unreasoned' or 'hysterically inspired,' I venture to say that never was presented to any Parliament a budget which was the result of more thorough and mature consideration or which was more deliberately planned to meet, not merely a national situation of first importance, but an economic world situation as well."

The work of the Tariff Advisory Board in shaping the budget was gone into by the Prime Minister. He referred to the fact that the board had been established by the Liberal Government as a fact-finding body, and that its hearings were held in public.

"The Government was particularly fortunate in securing as Chairman of the Board, the services of Mr. W. H. Moore, a trained economist, a man of wide experience in knowledge of financial and industrial problems, and a man of judicial mind and temperament. Recognizing the confidence which Mr. Moore's impartial conduct of the Board's affairs has established in the public mind, some of our opponents, and the Leader of the Opposition in particular, have, on this occasion, sought to belittle the services the Board has rendered, and in particular to raise a doubt concerning the disinterested character of the services of its Chairman. The services of the Chairman of the Board fortunately speak for themselves. The Government is more than satisfied to have them estimated solely on their merits. With the exception of an occasional jibe at the Chairman by the Leader of the Opposition, the fairness and impartiality of the Board's methods of proceeding have never been seriously challenged in Parliament. I believe it is true that throughout the country each year has served to enhance public confidence in the board itself.

Tariff Board's Good Work.

"With the establishment of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation the day has gone for the making of tariffs on impulse, or because of momentary resentments.

"No longer are tariffs to be made by clamor of self-interest, nor by the rhetoric of politicians. The business of the country deserves the cool, calm, reasoning that is devoted to the successful business of the individual and the corporation, and under present conditions through the tariff board the business of Canada as far as it is reflected in the customs schedule has been receiving that consideration."

The genesis of the budget was then dealt with by Premier King. When the probability of a revision of the United States tariff was announced, he said, the Tariff Board was advised by Hon. J. A. Robb, then Finance Minister, and by the Prime Minister himself, to study the probable effect on Canada of such revision. At the same time representations were made to the government of the United States.

"When it became apparent that notwithstanding these representations, changes inimical to our country, and to its agricultural interests in particular, were likely to be made, and that our immediate neighbors were not prepared to continue to trade with us except upon unequal terms, a further important step was taken. Both the Minister of Finance and myself, speaking in Parliament, gave our own people to understand that the Government was fully alive to the possible consequences of the action contemplated by the United States, that we were watching Canadian interests to the fullest possible extent.

"Public intimation was given, in words the significance of which the United States could not do other than fully comprehend, that in the event of tariff changes taking place which might adversely affect our interests, it would be found that Canada was well able to take care of herself; that all countries might expect to see that we proposed in matters of trade to extend our favors as far as might be possible to those countries most ready to favor us, and that where trade could not be expected except on unequal terms, use would be made of the tariff to divert the course of trade, first of all so as to deepen the channels of trade within the British Empire and secondly to cause the trade of Canada hereafter more and more to flow in these channels which reciprocal treatment in matters of trade might help to develop between this country and other lands."

Warning of Higher Duties.

Quotations from speeches made by himself and by Mr. Robb with respect to the position taken by Canada in regard to the United States tariff revision, were given by Mr. King at some length. He referred to the speech at Winnipeg in 1929 in which he had said that what was needed was not so much a "red-blooded" as a "cool-headed" attitude in respect to the matter. At the conclusion of his quotations he asked how, in the face of so clear and emphatic a statement of the Government's position could anyone claim that the country had been taken by surprise in the last budget.

"But there are none so blind as those who will not see, and perhaps there are none so prejudiced and readily deceived as those who seek to prejudice the minds of others," continued Mr. King. "The Tory party had gone so far in its efforts to misrepresent the position of myself and others in our attitude towards the United States and in our attitude towards Britain and other nations of the British Commonwealth that they had come to believe that what they had been repeating over and over again had in it some element of truth, and that any change in the tariff which might not accord with their own predictions was something quite impossible. Now they know that the Government meant every word of what it said, and they have before them in the form of legislative enactments, acts which speak very much louder than words.

"I have been taken to task because I ventured to say that I did not believe in a course of conduct which might only serve to arouse international antagonisms and to defeat the very ends which we had in view, in other words that a provocative attitude is not the best one to take in international affairs. May I say that this applies no more to the United States than to any other country. Its application is as true of the relations between individuals as it is between nations, though the consequences of a wrong course of action may be much more serious where it relates to nations in their dealings with each other.

"The course of conduct that deliberately seeks to arouse prejudice and hatred, whatever other purpose it may be made to serve at the moment, never succeeds in doing good in the long run. Knowing the course which the Government was taking, and proposed to take, how far-reaching that course was certain to be, I felt my responsibility all the greater to see that, on the part of those countries which might be affected, not for today only but possibly for years to come, no cause should be given which might enable them to say that their adverse action toward Canada was the result of some offensive attitude on our part, rather than something which was wholly of their own creation.

"Made in Washington" Attack.

"I do not think I need devote any time to exposing the weakness of the 'stolen clothes' and 'made in Washington' cries. As I have already said, if both are true the Tory party stands self-condemned. The Liberal party has never had occasion to steal political clothes from any party, least of all the outworn garments which drape the Tory party. The Liberal party has its own consistent policy, a policy of moderation, a policy which has developed from time to time to meet the changing conditions in the world and in Canada itself. If it had been so ill-advised as to seek Conservative garments, where would it have found them? At the Winnipeg convention, where it will be recalled that the whole Tory party was painfully careful to make sure that the word 'protection' appeared in not a line of its platform? Or from the Winnipeg address of Mr. Bennett last week, when protection returned in full and resounding force, not so much as a political garment, as a political umbrella, or political omnibus. You may have noticed how at Winnipeg Mr. Bennett declared there was to be protection for labor and agriculturists, for producers and consumers, as well as for manufacturers and others. Just how that protection is to be brought about he did not say. He has been studiously vague and indefinite, and he has not mentioned a single specific change that he would propose.

The British Preference.

"But whatever Mr. Bennett and his followers may say of 'stolen clothes' and of 'made in Washington' policies, they will scarcely be able to say that either epithet applies to the increases made in the British preference and which, after all, constitutes the central feature of the budget."

There appeared, said Mr. King, to be a fundamental difference between the Liberal party and the Conservatives as to the nature of trade. In the House of Commons, he said, Hon. R. J. Manion had declared that trade was war. In the opinion of the Prime Minister trade was exchange. Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader, had taken a somewhat similar stand as Dr. Manion in his recent Winnipeg speech, said Mr. King. He quoted from Mr. Bennett's speech as follows:

"'Tell me where did free trade ever fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make a fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you.'

"In other words," continued Mr. King, "to the Tory mind it would appear that trade is not something as the result of which each of the parties concerned may gain, but is in the nature of conflict, where as an outcome must be gain to one and loss to another. So, Mr. Bennett goes on to say that he will have nothing to do with the giving of preferences save where something of a corresponding nature is given in return. He fails to see that people trade only because each of the parties concerned has reason to believe that he is benefiting by the exchange. Where a commodity is being bought or sold the buyer or seller believes that what he is getting in exchange is more to his advantage to him than that which is being given in exchange. In other words, both parties stand to gain or there would be no trade. The Liberal party has consistently taken the view that where it has given a preference it has made possible on increasing measure of trade between the countries concerned.

Spirit of Free Trade.

"Even more important than tariffs and policies to a country is the spirit which animates the administration of domestic and foreign affairs. What is to be said of the spirit of the Conservative party as revealed by the utterances of its leader.

"Mr. Bennett at Winnipeg asks 'When did free trade ever fight for you?' Free trade is not an issue in this campaign and Mr. Bennett knows it. But there is a country which has maintained a free trade policy for almost one hundred years. Does Mr. Bennett suggest that Great Britain is guilty of economic cowardice because it has not followed the high tariff policies of the United States? 'We will make our tariffs fight for you,' he declared in ringing tones. 'We will blast a way to trade.' Let me ask you frankly, did you ever hear of anyone blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade! There are business men, salesmen and commercial travellers in this audience. Let me ask you this question. Did you ever secure an order by force? Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle of business that trade is secured not by ill-will but by goodwill? Not by awakening antagonism, but by developing friendliness and cooperation? To Mr. Bennett all countries are competitors. He forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone.

Blasting Way to Trade.

"Through his entire speech one could detect an admiration of the tariff policy of the United States. It was a striking coincidence that on the same page of an Ottawa newspaper which carried a report of his Winnipeg speech there was a despatch from Washington referring to the consternation of business men of that country over the shrinkage in foreign trade which had taken place as a result of the effort of that country to blast their way to trade by shutting out the goods of other countries.

"Mr. Bennett and his party insist that we should give absolutely no preference to the Mother Country unless as the result of a bargain," asserted Mr. King, "unless in return for an equivalent tariff preference from Great Britain. Is it true that we have received no advantage in Britain's market? It is true that Britain has not, except in a limited measure, established protective tariffs and given us a preferential reduction, but if she has not given us a preference over the foreigner she has given us equality with her own producers. An eminent Canadian recently reminded us that since Confederation Britain has bought from Canada five billions more than Canada has bought from Britain. We have not fared so badly in that great market.

Free Will Preference.

"We all wish to preserve and extend the British market. It has been our greatest outlet in the past. Whatever changes may come, it will remain a great and indispensable market. Looking at it as practical men, which is the better way of securing a favorable position in that market, to offer as the Liberal party has done, from the days of Laurier and Fielding to the present, a free-will preference to the Mother Country, or to insist that we will grant no preference whatever and will cancel the existing preference unless Britain reverses its fiscal system for the purpose of granting us a preference? Put yourself in the other's place. Would you prefer to deal with a country which has held out to you the hand of friendship and good will, or with a country which held nothing in its hands but a club? We have not far to go for our answer. Look at the position today. What has been the result of the Dunning budget, a budget which gave the British producer the opportunity for a great expansion of trade in Canada, a trade in large measure diverted from foreign countries without any injury to Canadian industry? The result has been an immediate and warm response from every party and every part of Britain, a deep feeling which will inevitably be reflected in the action of individuals, in the action of parties, in the action of the community, in whatever form their good will may most appropriately find expression. We do not propose to blast our way into the markets of Britain, but we have secured and we will hold the most favorable position any country enjoys today for the expansion of trade in the British Isles.

Advantages in British Market.

"In short, whatever fiscal policy may be adopted by Great Britain, Canada, under the guidance of the Liberal policy, and the Liberal policy alone, is in the fortunate position of being able to secure the utmost advantage in the British market," said Mr. King.

"I come now to the third of the issues, and with what I have to say in this connection, will be the conclusion of my address. You are being called upon to decide which party—the Liberal or the Conservative—is to represent Canadian opinion at the Imperial and Economic Conference to be held in London this year. To this issue, as I have said, is necessarily related the question of the personnel of the ministry which is to manage the affairs of Canada during the next Parliament.

"Let me remind the country that the question of Canada's representation at the forthcoming conferences was stated by Mr. Bennett as so all-important as to necessitate a mandate from the people. It was so important in fact as to be the one real issue of an electoral campaign. Mr. Bennett made his declaration for a general election on the issue of the forthcoming conferences in his speech on the Address at the opening of the recent session. He said that in his opinion and in that of the party which he represented so important were the conferences of this year in London that Canada should be represented only by a Government which had, in the interval, received a direct mandate from the people. When it came to the debate on the Budget, Mr. Bennett repeated this expression of view, albeit, I confess, with something less in the way of emphasis. Ever since, however, he has been doing his utmost to get away from this issue, to create new issues, to say or to do anything which may help to obscure this all-important question as a real issue of the election, even to the calling of a special session of Parliament immediately after the election."

Mr. King reminded his listeners that the present administration might have claimed that it had a mandate to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference in view of the fact that it had still a year of office to run. The situation became somewhat different however with the introduction of the Budget.

"The fiscal policies embodied in the Budget had been framed, amongst other things, in the light and in the knowledge of the conferences to be held in London this Fall. Those policies, as I have indicated, were deliberately shaped so as to make possible a wider measure of trade between this country and other portions of the British Empire, Great Britain in particular. The Budget was framed with the design of seeking to gain in British markets, the place which was being denied to us in markets elsewhere. Above all, the Budget was framed with a view to holding for Western Canada the market for her wheat which for so many years she has had in Great Britain and this at a time when it is becoming increasingly difficult for her to hold her markets elsewhere.

"To secure from the people of Canada approval of these policies before the Imperial Conferences take place, is, therefore, in our opinion, an all-important consideration if the conferences are to do for the further development of our trade what, with all confidence, we believe they will. To have a mandate based upon the policies which are now before the people is, therefore, in our opinion, imperative. It is for this reason that we have not hesitated to dissolve Parliament over 14 months before the time at which dissolution becomes necessary. When we go to the conference of 1930 we want to go, as we went to the conferences of 1923 and 1926, with the voice of Canada behind us, and with all the influence and power which comes from the voice of the nation as a whole."

Attack On Bennett.

The representation of Canada at the conferences was bound up with the personnel of the Ministry, said Mr. King. What had Mr. Bennett to offer by way of constructive leadership, he asked.

"Up to the present time, pretty much all that Mr. Bennett has said has been in the nature of platitudes or declamation. He has not put forward a single constructive idea, nor has he indicated a single policy with any clearness or definiteness of aim. In his speech at Winnipeg, he referred to the members of the present Government as 'This group of mercenaries, holding office by shame and subterfuge,' and as 'forgetful, in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages.' He said: 'Look upon them, treacherous to you, self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation.' And at a meeting at Regina the following day he spoke of 'nine years of wasted effort before the great betrayal' and added 'It did not take Judas that long.' May I say to Mr. Bennett that language of this kind is wholly uncalled for, and adds nothing to his stature in the position of leadership. Already I have heard it strongly resented by men of his own party. A Government securely established which voluntarily appeals to a people on a great issue nearly a year and a half in advance of the completion of its term, is not a 'group of mercenaries holding office by shame and subterfuge' nor are they persons 'forgetful in their love of office, of all else but their own personal advantages.'

Able Men In Government.

"May I say that I believe it is the general opinion that Canada at no time has had a Government composed of abler men, of men more genuinely disinterested or of higher purpose than the men I am proud to have as my colleagues in the present administration. I believe it is true that no Government has ever given a better account of itself both at home and abroad. May I ask Mr. Bennett who, in the administration that he has in mind, are to take the place of the ministers of the present Government from the Province of Quebec, from the Province of Ontario, from the Maritime Province, and West of the Great Lakes. Who are the gentlemen he has in mind as those who are to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference?

"I will tell him who of the Government will be among the number to represent Canada, if the present administration is returned: At the Imperial Conference, the present Minister of Justice, Honorable Ernest Lapointe, who represented Canada with such ability and distinction at the Imperial Conference of 1926 and who represented Canada at the Subsidiary Conference on the Operation of Dominion Legislation which met in London last Fall, will be one of the representatives. Another of the representatives at the Imperial Conference will be the present Minister of National Defence, Colonel the Honorable J. L. Ralston, who during the present year represented Canada with such credit to himself and to our country at the conference on the Limitation of Naval Armaments. At the Economic Conference, Canada will be represented by the present Minister of Finance, Honorable Charles A. Dunning, the author of the Budget of 1930, a budget which has stirred and warmed the heart of the whole British Empire. Another representative will be the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, Honorable James Malcolm, under whose auspices the trade of Canada has expanded as never before to all quarters of the Globe.

"I ask Mr. Bennett to tell the Canadian people before the 28th of July who, from the Province of Quebec, he intends, if given the opportunity, to substitute for Mr. Lapointe? Who from the Maritime Provinces he intends to substitute for Colonel Ralston? Who from Ontario he intends to substitute for Mr. Malcolm? And who, from the Canadian West, he intends to substitute for Mr. Dunning? The Canadian people have a right to know who are to be their representatives at these two great conferences. The people have a right to know, in addition, who, for the next five years, the other members of the Government of Canada are likely to be.

General Election in 1911.

"In the general election of 1911, when the Liberal party in Canada, under its great leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appealed to the country on a trade issue in the nature of reciprocity in natural products between Canada and the United States, a measure of greater freedom in trade so far as this continent was concerned and of wider markets for the producers in the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, the forces that were opposed to the tariff changes then proposed, allied under the cry of 'we are at the parting of the ways.' I do not intend to go the length of saying that, having regard to the measure of increased trade assured by the budget of 1930 between Canada and Great Britain, and indeed between Canada and all other parts of the British Empire, we are 'at the parting of the ways,' or that the rejection of the budget, for such would be the significance of the defeat of the present Government at this general election, would mean an end to all endeavor further to promote inter-Empire trade. I do, however, say, what in very truth I believe to be the fact, that so far as inter-Empire trade is concerned 'we are at last, at the meeting of the ways' and that the acceptance of this budget by the people on July 28 will do more than all else to ensure for Canada's representatives at the Economic Conference in London that favorable response to our attitude and action which we believe will be given by the Government of Great Britain and by the governments of all the sister Dominions of the Empire. It may not be going too far to say that the acceptance or rejection of our budget may help to determine whether the highways of Empire are to become, as we hope they may increasingly become, the avenues of a British commerce expanding ever so widely o'er land and sea, or, whether in so far as the component parts of the Empire are concerned, its highways are to remain indistinguishable from the other trade routes of the world."

Canada's Stand Watched

(By Canadian Press.)

New York, June 17.—Premier Mackenzie King's address at Brantford, Ont., last night, in which he discussed the Canadian Government attitude toward new tariff legislation of the United States, attracted a great deal of attention here. Morning newspapers refrained from editorial comment, commenting themselves with a prominent display of the report of the Premier's speech.

The Herald-Tribune carried the report on its front page under the heading "Canadians plan tariff to match new United States rates."

The reaction to the passage of the tariff bill, however, is occupying the attention of newspapers and retaliatory action by Canada has been taken for granted.

20,000 WORDS OF—WHAT?

At the close of Mr. MACKENZIE KING's two-hour, twenty-thousand-word marathon, we thought of a story about LORD BIRKENHEAD. BIRKENHEAD, in his younger days, found himself in court with a legal opponent noted for his barren verbosity. For more than two hours this rhetorical gentleman went on in copious disregard of time, place, or subject. When at last he sat down, BIRKENHEAD arose, carefully wiped his glasses, observed to the judge in his blandest tone: "My Lord, following the example of my learned friend, I submit the case without argument."

For Mr. KING's speech was an extraordinary example of the use that can be made of words to express nothing in particular. The philosopher who said that there couldn't be thunder without lightning, never listened to our Premier on the radio, never listened to those long, crashing periods which, not unpleasant to the ear, baffle all analysis. For exactly one hour Mr. KING discussed—what? He talked things and issues which, whatever their relevancy five or six years ago, have no more relation to the issues of this campaign than the finances of Haiti. The ROBB budget, the Canadian National Railway's inception, the question of war financing, the matter of the sales and income tax; these things were issues in 1925 and 1926, but what in Heaven's name have they to do with an election in 1930? What bearing upon unemployment, upon the state of Canada today? They were voted upon four years ago.

One might devote some time to these things, might easily show, and from the official records, that Mr. KING, surveying these things, is a desperately bad historian. One might expose the appalling inaccuracy of his statements about the beginnings of the National Railway, expose the misleading character of his treatment of war financing, reveal his plain attempt to deceive on the question of taxation. All that, however, would be futile; would please Mr. KING. For the Prime Minister's strategy—and he is a most cunning tactician—is to camouflage the real issues, to compel the Opposition to thin its forces over a wide front, to avoid decisive combat on battlefields that count.

What—and this is the real question for the Canadian people—what did Mr. KING say about Mr. DUNNING's budget? For more than two hours words flew from him as thick and fast as snowflakes in a January blizzard, but will anyone who heard him say that he or she now knows more about the budget than before Mr. KING spoke? Was there a single sentence in the whole of the speech which even attempted to explain the reasons for and the possible benefits of the budget's various changes? Was there a sentence that shed the slightest light upon countervailing duties, upon the iron and steel schedules, upon the so-called preferences to Britain? That, after all, is the test. The fair way to judge.

Two hundred thousand Canadians walk the streets, unemployed. What message did Mr. KING have for them? He told them all about the status of Canada. He was eloquent about what we had done at Geneva, at Imperial Conferences; told them about Washington and Tokyo. Did he tell them anything about work? Did he indicate by a single syllable that he was concerned with them at all?

Here is a politician who rose to eminence through posing as a champion of labor. Here is a gentleman who prides himself upon being the author of "Industry and Humanity." That book lies before us now. We turn to its concluding passage to read a resounding phrase about "rolling back the stone from the sepulchre of labor," making for a glorious resurrection. Yet on Monday night at Brantford this great champion of the workers, this crusader for humanity, knowing that 200,000 of our people are workless, that children are being clothed and fed by charity, this in one of the richest countries of the world, said—what? He said that he hoped he would win this election so that he and Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE could go to the Imperial Conference. Mr. MACKENZIE KING, Prime Minister of Canada, actually said that.

There is no doubt about where Mr. BENNETT stands. Mr. BENNETT is held up to scorn by psuedo-Liberals as a "friend of the Big Interests." Yet it is this "friend of the Big Interests," not the spurious radical, who, sincerely moved by hard times and distress, declares boldly that, if given office, he will summon an extraordinary session of Parliament to deal with unemployment. To deal with relief. It is the measure of the two men, of the two parties.

Mr. KING poured forth a torrent of platitudes about the British Preference. What did it all mean? What actually did he say that informed anyone about his preference proposals? He was eloquent in declaring to the farmers of the West that such a preference was necessary to get a market for their wheat. By what process of reasoning—if it was reasoning at all—such a conclusion was reached, Heaven only knows. Does Mr. KING really believe that the British people are going to buy Russian wheat and Argentine wheat without concessions from Argentine and Russia, but will not buy our wheat unless we give them concessions? Is that his conception of Britain? Is that his estimate of their regard for the Empire? For Canada? The thing is palpably grotesque.

The British people are not fools. They stand ready, we believe—Mr. BALDWIN has clearly said so—to give preference for preference, to make mutually beneficial arrangements; but does anybody suppose that the British, the oldest and greatest traders in the world, are such easy simpletons as to be fooled by a fake preference, by a preference whose true character may be judged by the absurd gesture of removing the duty on hay? That, with scores of other items like it, was an insult to British intelligence. The cheapest sort of political trick.

Mr. KING spent much time in an endeavor to show that he had been long thinking of meeting fiscal aggression from Washington, that the DUNNING budget was no death-bed repentance. Is that true? If it is true, how comes it that the Minister of Finance, Mr. DUNNING, declared in Western Canada less than a year ago that duties on agricultural products would ruin the farming industry? Further: if what Mr. KING now says be right, what has his Government been doing these past eight years? Fiscal aggression from Washington is not a new thing. It has been going on ever since the FORDNEY-MCCUMBER tariff, passed in 1922. That tariff, one of the highest in the world, struck a deadly blow at Canada's farm exports to the States. It cut off those exports, cut them off by scores of millions, all but ruined our live stock industry. And what said Mr. KING? For eight years he went on doing nothing, scoffing at those who demanded just reprisals, witnessing the destruction of Canadian agriculture while he bargained with this, that and the other group to retain office and power. We must not, he whispered, provoke the United States.

In two elections, in 1925 and 1926, the Conservative Party, led by ARTHUR MEIGHEN, went down fighting for justice to Canadian industry, to Canadian agriculture. In those two elections, and after them, Mr. KING and his captains had nothing but derision, nothing but condemnation and scorn for the policies of Mr. MEIGHEN. Before us as we write are copies of the Liberal Party's Handbooks in those elections; from one end to the other they bristle with declarations that the MEIGHEN policy of protection for Canada was nothing but Tory folly. He was the puppet of plutocrats, the instrument of Big Interests and wealth.

What is the position now? After nine years that have brought failure, at a time when his policies and record are discredited, when Canadian factories are idle, agriculture depressed, and men walking the streets jobless and existing by charity, Mr. KING, seeking another lease of office, asks the Canadian people to let him do the things that he scoffed at and derided for more than a decade, when scoffing and derision meant power. That is the position.

The DUNNING budget was an electioneering budget. Designed to get votes. Insincere amateurish, incompetent, a mosaic of everything to get votes everywhere, it constituted and still constitutes one of the most brazen attempts ever perpetrated by a Canadian party to trample upon common political honesty to retain its hold on power. Countervailing duties for Ontario; iron and steel duties for the Maritimes; a fraudulent British preference for the West; patronage for Quebec—that is the story.

* * *

It will not prevail. The people of this country are weary and sick of Mr. KING's broken faith. They remember his promises of the past. They know that his word is not good. If there be those who believe that this is unfair controversy, let us call their attention to just one thing. For more than five years Mr. KING has been talking about the St. Lawrence Waterway. There have been negotiations, investigations, pledges. We turn to Hansard of May 29th, 1930, and we find this:

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY.

On the orders of the day.

Hon. T. L. Church (Toronto Northwest)—Mr. Speaker, shortly after the Easter recess the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) told the House that he hoped to be able to make a definite statement within two weeks as to the St. Lawrence waterway. Will that statement be forthcoming before the House closes?

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister)—I will think this matter over and let my hon. friend have a reply tomorrow.

Did Mr. KING keep his promise? He did not. More than that, in his speech of Monday night, the keynote speech of his campaign, and with all his pledges behind him, Mr. KING did not as much as mention the St. Lawrence. It was not even in the transcript of his speech that he gave out to the press.

And the St. Lawrence is not all. We could fill our entire page with the record of the broken promises of Mr. KING, but a few will suffice. There was that pledge, put into the Speech from the Throne in 1924, to reduce the cost of living. There was the pledge to drive the North Atlantic Combine off the seas. The pledge to give women representation on the Tariff Board. The pledge to reform the Senate. On all of these things, on all of these violated declarations to the people, Mr. KING was silent on Monday night. What confidence can be given such a leader?

It is these things, this record, that gives confidence that for Mr. KING, these days, the sands are running out. LINCOLN'S immortal dictum that you can't fool all the people all the time is still true, and there are indications that at last, after eight years of log-rolling and caballing, of muddle and miasma, this country is once more turning to the party which, whatever its mistakes, has at least kept faith, has at least been true to the principle of democracy that unless parties and governments keep faith with the nation, representative government becomes a mockery and a sham.

Mr. King Opens Fire

No one who heard the keynote addresses with which Mr. Bennett at Winnipeg and Mr. King at Brantford began their campaigns could help noticing a contrast. Mr. Bennett's address was full of rhetoric, vague phraseology and meaningless slogans like "give Canada a chance." Mr. King's effort contained fewer flourishes and more matter. Mr. Bennett deals in woolly abstractions like national safeguarding and an "even break for Canada," while Mr. King discusses concrete realities like railway lines, markets, taxes and customs duties, using specific terms throughout.

It is recognized, of course, that the two leaders have a different relationship to national affairs. The prime minister has the achievements of nine years in office to discuss while Mr. Bennett's function is that of critic and exponent of a party policy for the future. That may make it easier for Mr. King than for Mr. Bennett to come down to brass tacks. Still, it is not unfair to say that while Mr. King has described in exact language what his government has done and proposes to do Mr. Bennett is singularly vague both as critic and as prophet.

Mr. King at Brantford suggested that there are three main issues in this campaign. First, the government's record in office must be scrutinized. Have its measures redounded to the advantage and the credit of Canada? Then there is the Dunning budget. It revised the tariff extensively with the object of diverting Canadian business from the United States to Great Britain. The Conservative party opposes the increase in the British preference. Here is a clear-cut issue. Finally, there is the question who should represent Canada at the Imperial conference this fall. If the government is defeated, Canada's delegates will be Mr. Bennett and Conservative ministers who share his view that Canada should take no step, by way of tariff concessions to the mother country, to recapture and retain the British market for Canadian wheat.

On these three questions Mr. King discoursed with admirable concentration on their practical side. The record of his ministry is easy to defend. Tax reduction, debt reduction, humane provision for the aged and needy, completion of the Hudson Bay railway, measures to enlarge Canadian export trade, revision of the Pensions Act to give ex-service men a better chance—these are some of the good works of the government in office since 1926. To this record, as Mr. King says, the voters should pay some attention. The main issue is still the budget. Whether Canada is to follow an exclusionist policy, though its economic life depends on export trade, or take some steps to regain and develop business with Great Britain, its most consistent customer, is the principal question before the electors.

BLASTING A BOOMERANG

"HE who takes the sword, shall perish by the sword" is a centuries old saying and applies equally to trade wars. This was aptly pointed out by Premier King in his speech at Brantford, the opening speech of his present election campaign. He stood on absolutely sound economic ground. Mr. Bennett in his Winnipeg address had said that he would use the Tariff "to blast a way" into the markets of the world. To which Premier King pointedly replied:

> "Let me ask you frankly, did you ever hear of any one blasting a way to trade? Germany tried that method of gaining world supremacy in trade. Did you ever secure an order by force? Did you ever gain trade by ill-will against your customer? Is it not an elementary principle that trade is secured by developing friendliness and co-operation? Mr. Bennett forgets that all countries are also our customers and that no nation liveth to itself alone."
> "Should the Government of this country be entrusted to men who speak of commerce in terms of war, who would abolish the British preference except on a basis of hard bargaining, and who would destroy the foundations of goodwill upon which our tremendous foreign trade is surely founded?"

Premier King's ground is well taken. "Goodwill" is considered a very important business asset, and when a business is sold a considerable sum is often paid for its "good-will," because the firm had spent years in building it up. Canada is building up good-will and it would seem a spectacle of monumental folly to tear it down and attempt to build anything on a system of "blasting." This process, acclaimed by Mr. Bennett, inevitably fails.

Take the evidence of the Geneva Economic Conference made up of 194 members, with over 150 economic experts from 50 countries. This was their unanimous conclusion:

> "The advocates of exaggerated protection have often made the mistake of imagining that it is always more advantageous to hinder imports than to increase exports. . . . High tariffs of whatever system have, in many cases, also been imposed, in the first instance at all events, for bargaining purposes. (Mr. Bennett's "blasting" idea.) But subsequent negotiations have in practice not resulted in adequate modifications, with the consequence that the customs barriers have been left higher than before."

That is Mr. Bennett's case described in a nutshell. It defeats its own end. Trying to "blast" a way into the markets of the world, it only succeeds in blasting its own trade. The Conference declared such methods hindered trade, created bad feeling, and made for war. The Conference declared "that the time has come to put an end to the increase in tariffs and to move in the opposite direction." "Blasting" was economically unsound and defeated its own ends.

PREMIER KING AT BRANTFORD

Whether it is due to the hard-hitting of his opponents or to the consciousness of addressing the entire country in his radio audience, Premier King must be given credit for an unusually straightforward and clearcut statement of policy in his keynote speech at Brantford on Monday evening. Taken in conjunction with the Winnipeg utterance of Mr. Bennett we would welcome it as a satisfactorily definite joining of the issues between the two great parties in the campaign now under way, if painful experience on more than one occasion had not taught us that to pin the Prime Minister of this country down to any given position is an extremely difficult, if not an impossible task. Confronted with the most categoric statement from his own lips, he will split hairs and offer qualifications and interpretations that no mentality other than his own could possibly read into it. Therefore, there is at least the possibility that before July 28 Mr. King will have unsaid all or any of the things he said with so much eloquence at Brantford.

Meanwhile, the speech as it stands and for whatever it may prove to be worth, is undeniably clever in its plausibility and will not only tend to hearten his supporters but also to impress more independent observers favorably. It has already been pointed out—and the thing is obvious—that Mr. King is upon the defensive. For a Government to be in that position is not surprising but the present Administration has had amazing luck in wriggling out of it on previous occasions by one trumped up issue or another that distracted public opinion and forced Conservative campaigners to waste valuable time in repairing their own trenches. This time Mr. King himself defines the outstanding issues as being the record of his Government, the Dunning Budget and Canadian representation at the Imperial Economic Conference: all of them issues created by Mr. Bennett deliberately, as fighting ground, and not raised by himself. Not that the Premier does not aim some lusty blows at his opponents but these are in the nature of a rear-guard action covering retreat, rather than forming part of offensive operations.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Rinfret who is scandalized and disgusted by Conservative cries of "blue ruin" was listening-in when his leader delivered himself of the boastful assertion that in the eight and a half years of his own administration of its affairs, "the country has been lifted out of a veritable slough of despond and out of years of depression". Apparently, it is a libel on Canada for Conservatives to refer to unemployment and poor business under a Liberal regime but a perfectly legitimate criticism for Liberals to stigmatize the preceding Conservative regime, in the same manner.

There is fundamental unfairness but all the wile of the partisan politician in the Premier's contrast of the respective attitudes of the two parties towards economic problems and one may smile at neat trick by which he turns Mr. Bennett's words against him. In theory, Mr. King's economic position is an attractive one but it breaks down badly when tested by hard realities. As between the two men we value the opinion of the Conservative much more highly than that of the Liberal leader, quite apart from political sympathies. Mr. Bennett is a practical and experienced business man who knows what he is talking at first hand. Mr. King is the college professor who dogmatizes over abstract generalizations and has gained his knowledge of what he is talking about only from poring over textbooks and listening to lectures. It is no more true to say that Conservatives stand for economic war than it is to say they stand for ruthless militarism. But Conservatives recognize the fact that "competition is the life of trade" and that goodwill based upon onesided trade cannot fill Canadian pay-envelopes or put bread in Canadian mouths. We have pointed out repeatedly and there is no need to labor the point farther that the fundamental error of the Liberal Party's trade policy is to try to create world markets, while leaving the home market—which is always the best—to producers from outside a feat comparable to that of building a skyscraper without providing foundations for it to rest on.

The Premier's presumable object in this first deliverance was to conciliate western opinion, without antagonizing eastern sentiment and he made an effort to achieve the impossible in this direction that was at least an artistic success.

King and Dunning Underline the Issue.

Mr. Dunning's speech at Regina Monday night was the complement of Mr. King's speech at Brantford. They sounded impressively the same keynote, one in the East, the other in the West, another proof that Liberalism has the same message for all parts of the country, and has a truly national policy. They emphasized the fundamental issue of this campaign—the imperative necessity in the interests of industry and agriculture of cultivating closer trade relations with Great Britain. It was the refrain of the Prime Minister's speech recurring again and again, while the Minister of Finance devoted himself almost exclusively to the subject, relating it directly to the special needs and conditions of the wheat-growing region. Said the Prime Minister:

> If the Government of Great Britain indicates its desire to do so, the present Administration can be trusted to carry forward any proposal for reciprocal trade to a successful conclusion. But in the absence of any such proposals from Great Britain, the Liberal party stands for the policy which is not only of benefit to Canadian consumers, but is vitally related to the maintenance of a British market for Canadian wheat and other commodities of export. The Conservative policy would deny the preference except on a basis unacceptable to Great Britain. It would cut down our imports from Great Britain at a time when Great Britain must sell us an increasing quantity of goods in exchange for our wheat. The essential point is that Canada must enlarge her imports from the Mother Country in order that she may enlarge her exports to the Mother Country.
> In short, whatever fiscal policy may be adopted by Great Britain, Canada, under the guidance of the Liberal policy, and the Liberal policy alone, is in the fortunate position of being able to secure the utmost advantage in the British market.

The Minister of Finance made a practical application of the policy thus propounded and brought it home to the door of every farmer and manufacturer:

> While it was true industries had been built up in Canada, they would fade overnight if it were found impossible to sell Canadian wheat. The growing crop and its movement to the seaboard meant jobs for thousands. Wheat was vital to Canada and the only great market was in Great Britain. His budget had been framed with the sale of the wheat crop in mind. By making it possible to buy more from Great Britain it would make it possible for Great Britain to buy more from Canada.

The Dunning budget has been received by all parties in Great Britain with enthusiasm and gratitude, and has created in Great Britain a state of public opinion most favorable to this country, and to Canadian trade. Because of the realities of the situation it is appalling to hear the leader of the Conservative party talk of blasting a way for Canadian products into the British and other markets, and it would be a disaster if men of such views were sent to represent Canada at the coming Imperial Economic Conference. The Conservative party in this country is fighting the policy of diverting to Great Britain a large volume of the purchases now made by Canadians in the United States, yet, as Mr. King and Mr. Dunning contend, it is essential to increase our imports from the Mother Country if we are to maintain and enlarge the British market for Canadian products. Unless we can maintain that market the whole economic structure of Canada will be imperiled.

Mr. King and Mr. Dunning

Laying aside prejudices and political bias, the people of Saskatchewan should give serious consideration to the published reports of the speeches made on Monday night by Premier King at Brantford, Ontario, and by Hon. Charles Dunning, Minister of Finance, at Regina. They have been published practically in full in The Leader-Post and are therefore available for analysis by those who desire to make an intelligent study of campaign issues.

The Prime Minister's speech was an exhaustive review of practically all matters that are before the people in a public way at this time. There was no abuse of opponents, no personal slurs on political enemies, no attempt to evade responsibility. Mr. King laid out the record of the Government, explained why certain courses had been followed and certain decisions arrived at, and outlined the policies the Government was prepared to follow if returned to office. In every respect it appeared to be a sensible, business-like speech.

Mr. Mackenzie King is a man of moderate views who takes note of the actualities of the Canadian economic situation and of the Canadian political union. In a country of the magnitude of this Dominion there are conflicting interests; there are bound to be conflicting interests. They are here today; we have them tomorrow. Canada is not a country of free traders, neither is it a country given over completely to high protectionists. It is a country where the home market is of importance to certain Canadian industries but also a country whose prosperity is bound up with our ability to sell a great percentage of Canadian products in the markets of the world. It is a country that has a close affiliation with the British Commonwealth of Nations through its partnership with the other British nations and yet a country that must continue to develop its own individuality and its own willingness and ability to stand on its own feet.

These are facts that are known to all Canadians who will take time to think about them. The intelligent Canadian knows, no matter what his own views may be, that Canada will not become a free trade country within measurable time; he knows, too, that to run up our tariffs to the extent that Australia has done will merely reveal the fact that living will become so dear that we will be unable to compete in the markets of the world, and as a result will invite disaster to our primary industries.

Knowing these things Mr. King stands for a moderate policy that will be as fair as possible to the conflicting interests that make up the Canadian economic and political structure.

Is there any other policy that will better promote the interests of Canada taken as a whole? This is the point that must be considered by the people of Canada. There is a depression at this time, due in the main to a crop shortage and to world--wide conditions that have been brought about by a reaction from over-speculation, but the people of the country can look at the facts and say for themselves whether Canada has fared better under the Government of Mr. King that has been in power since 1921 or under the Conservative policies that brought Canada to great stages of depression in 1896, in 1913-14, and again in 1921? The facts, we submit, are altogether on the side of the moderate and balanced policies of the King Government.

The speech of Mr. Dunning at Regina was of special interest to Westerners. Mr. Dunning knows the West and its problems, and he was quick to sense that action was needed when it became apparent that difficulties were rising in connection with the marketing of the primary crop on the Prairies. In the previous history of Canada the marketing of Canada's wheat was not a matter of acute Government concern. Certain regulations and machinery had been set up by various Federal Governments and the marketing of the wheat, with the exception of the abnormal war years, pretty well took care of itself. The people of the West know today that the greatest problem facing the country has to do with wheat marketing.

Knowing what this meant Mr. Dunning took quick action as Minister of Finance responsible for the country's tariff policy to open the British market to a larger volume of Canadian farm products. This is being done by lowering the duties on a large number of British products that may be sold in Canada, in other words, increasing the flow of reciprocal trade between Canada and Great Britain.

Knowing the seriousness of the situation and knowing that Great Britain was Canada's best customer for wheat Mr. Dunning framed a policy and put in into effect. He did not attempt to haggle with Great Britain or to force the British people to change their fiscal policy to oblige Canada, which is Mr. Bennett's policy.

This is a serious time for the people of Western Canada. The question to be considered by Western Canadians both in town and country is whether the West is likely to find wider markets for its farm products—and these are what provide us with our living—under a policy worked out by a Saskatchewan citizen in the person of Mr. Dunning or by a man of Mr. Bennett's tariff outlook who says that our salvation is in higher tariffs, even on British goods entering this country.

This is a matter of dollars and cents to this Western country. It is a matter of bread and butter to the masses of the people.

Brantford

Canada as a Great Trading Nation

The Mail and Empire complains that in his "keynote speech" Premier King "ranged from Tokio to Timbuctoo while his hearers were intent upon their own affairs, their own businesses, their own livelihoods and the future here in Canada for their families." The inference is that Tokio and Timbuctoo, symbolical of far and foreign countries in general, are outside the scope of Canadian interest; that Canada should turn her eyes inward; trade within herself; grow rich by selling herself her own goods; and "let the rest of the world go by." It would indeed be a fatal policy. Canada, with an immense surplus of many products, and with the need of other products which she does not possess at all, has won her present position among the nations of the world by trading with those nations. The businesses of our people, their livelihoods, the future of their families in Canada—all of these things that the Mail would have its readers regard as independent of our foreign relations, are, as a matter of fact, bound up in the continuance of Canada's position as a world-trader; in her continued ability to sell her goods to other peoples.

The Mail finds fault with Mr. King for ranging as far afield as Tokio. But the fact is that Japan buys from Canada every year from 30 to 40 million dollars worth of Canadian products; is twice as good a customer as France; has bought, since Mr. King took office, nearly 250 million dollars worth of goods from us, in return for which we have imported less than 100 million dollars worth from Japan. We sell to Japan our 30 or 40 millions of goods per year, which is twice as much as when Mr. King took office. It is a bold man who would say that this great market is of no value to the businesses of Canada, to the livelihood of her people, to the future of her families.

Mr. King believes in trade; believes in it as something to be encouraged, not something to be stifled. But while he believes in trade with foreign countries, he is particularly anxious that our Empire trade should flourish. He said at Brantford:

"Throughout the entire revision of the tariff we have kept in mind the possibilities of increased trade with the British Empire. We have done this in no spirit of economic exclusiveness. Our ports of trade are open to the world on fair and equal terms. At the same time we do not forget that Canada is a member of a great community of nations under the British crown, which offers an unexampled opportunity for economic co-operation in the period of rapid development which lies before us in the present century.

"Great Britain purchases far more from Canada than we buy from her. If we are to maintain in Great Britain an assured market for Canadian wheat and other articles of export we must be prepared to increase our imports from that country. This can be done without necessarily increasing our total importations, but merely by diverting to Britain, who gives us a free entry into her markets, and who is of our own household, purchases which have formerly been made in other countries and which countries to-day do not give to us equal or like opportunities of trade. The present budget is framed with this purpose definitely in mind. It is not a new policy, it is the traditional policy of the Liberal party as inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding in 1897. It was opposed by the Conservatives then, as it is opposed by them to-day."

Mr. King believes in Canada's future as a great trading nation, not living unto herself but exchanging her products with the nations of the world, and particularly with the nations of the British Empire. Against that policy the attacks of Mr. King's critics will beat in vain.

FROM OUR BEST CUSTOMER.

Canada is facing a general election, and the opening of the campaign was signalized by Prime Minister KING'S speech, in which he gave marked attention to the Dominion's trade relations with the United States. He explained that his government could not fail to follow with concern our tariff legislation. As is well known, the Parliament at Ottawa, observing that the Hawley-Smoot bill proposed to levy higher duties on many Canadian products, passed a measure for countervailing rates upon certain exports from the United States. Mr. MACKENZIE KING regretted the necessity of such tariff reprisals, but said that Canada had no other recourse. Without in the least pretending a right to protest against any law enacted by the Congress at Washington, embodying a trade policy which the United States must itself judge to be wise or foolish, the Canadian Government was resolved to show that commercial relations with this country "must not be one-sided." The Canadian Premier asserted that the Dominion is more than willing to "trade with "those who are equally prepared to "trade with us." But if the United States insists upon levying customs taxes in such a way as to cut off a part of Canadian exports, there is nothing left for Canada to do but to reply in kind. She has the additional powerful motive of seeking to enlarge her commerce with Great Britain, so as the better to enable the English market to take larger quantities of Canadian wheat.

Here we have the first and prompt indication that our besotted protectionists are of the kind that cut off their noses to spite their faces. Canada has for some time been the best customer of the United States. Our exports, now admitted by every one, even by a protectionist President of the United States, to be vital to our industry and essential to our prosperity, have steadily been going to the Dominion in a larger share than to any other country. American business shrewdness, American shopkeeping sense, must certainly appear to have fallen into stupidity, thus to alienate neighbors who have been the largest purchasers of our wares. Prime Minister KING is for the most friendly relations with this country, and, as a Liberal and former free trader, is himself desirous of putting no check upon the free flow of commodities between the two countries. From it both stand to gain, just as both are likely to lose from any artificial restrictions upon trade. However, the final word of the Canadian Government is that it is unable to consider questions of international commerce except upon " a reciprocal basis."

President HOOVER has expressed confidence that through the Tariff Commission he will be able to meet the protests of other nations. He should lose no time in taking up the case of Canada. The Dominion makes no protest, but states its own position in a way to give pause to all at Washington who made light of the warnings of American economists and manufacturers, to the effect that the higher tariff was certain to cut deeply into our foreign commerce.

Mr. King's U. S. Policy

At Brantford Premier Mackenzie ing launched his election campaign. The key-note of his election y is the stressing of British preference and at the same time the deunciation of protection — twins, ard, if not impossible to reconcile, xcept by an ingenious word and hrase-twister like Mr. Mackenzie King. Having striven and struggled o cut the connecting link with the Mother country for the last ten years, aving played up to the United Stats for the same period, and now finding that Washington has deliberately purned his wooing and banged the ariff door in our face, Mr. King hinks he can at the eleventh hour ool the people by rising on his tipoe and frantically waving the Union Jack for all he is worth, a brazn attempt to cover the abject failure of his fiscal policy.

What was most remarkable in the Brantford speech was what it did not contain. It gave no adequate explanation of the loss of over 1,000,000 of population during Mr. King's regime; it gave no explanation of why Canadians were returning to Canada, it gave no explanation of why the duty was reduced on New Zealand butter, and why it is not to be increased until October 12, when Canada's winter's supply will be fully imported.

We lost over a million of our population in ten years because Mr. Mackenzie King refused to resort to countervailing duties—"brick for brick" policy,—until he found his very political existence depends upon it. The interests of Canada are a secondary consideration with him in his volteface.

Canadians are returning to Canada because it is the policy of Washington to drive them out of the United States unless they become American citizens. We have before us now the "Analysis of Statistics of Immigration for April 1930" issued by the U. S. Department of Labour, Bureau of Immigration, in which it is stated that 2,234 Canadians were "formally deported" in that month, while in addition to these 1,431 were notified but permitted to depart voluntarily without having the official stigma of "deported" attached to them. Thus, in the month of April alone, 3,665 Canadians were officially sent back to Canada; and why? Because it is the new policy of the United States to confine the work and pay of her industries to citizens of the United States only. Yet, Mr. Mackenzie King claims this to the credit of his Government and its policy!

New Zealand butter was admitted almost free, and is being continued practically on the free list, because Mr. King's policy is to allow American automobiles to be assembled in Canada and exported to Australia, New Zealand and other parts of the Dominion under the British preference.

Disguise it as he will, Mr. Mackenzie King cannot get away from the fact that he is biased in favour of the United States and that the whole tendency of his policy is to benefit that country at the expense of Canada and the Empire.

More Clothes Stealing

At Brantford, Ont., Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King stressed his so-called British preference policy and animadverted on his attitude and that of the Conservatives with regard to the position of Canada as a nation.

Mr. King is fond of putting up "straw men" merely for the pleasure of showing his audience how easily he can knock them down.

The attitude of the Conservatives with regard to Canada as a nation was laid down by Sir Robert Borden who first asserted the right of Canada to sign the Peace Treaty, and who passed the necessary legislation for the appointment of ministers at Washington and elsewhere.

The distinctive place of Canada as a world power, was delineated by the Rt. Hon. Arthur Meighen, then Premier, in 1920 in the following words:

> Our place in the family of nations is what the present time we want it to be. It suits the measure of our development as a British Dominion. It meets the aspirations of all who love the Empire, of which we are a part, and see in it the world's best hope. That means it accords with the desire of an overwhelming majority of the Canadian people. We have the right of a full-statured nation within the British Empire, and that is the best lot I know of. We have a distinct voice in the League of Nations comporting with our individuality as a nation and our importance as a country, and we are now living true in loyal service to the League we have joined. Our share in the relations of the British Empire to the rest of the world and our responsibilities as such will be, as time goes on, more and more clearly recognized and defined.

Nothing Mr. King has done since coming into power has altered this status or position by one iota. He attempted to draw "a red herring across the trail" in the 1926 election, but subsequently did nothing to justify his claim of having altered our status.

We are, as we were under Sir Robert Borden and Rt. Hon. Arthur Meighen—"a Full Statured Nation within the British Empire."

PREMIER KING'S "KEYNOTE"

The "keynote" speech of Premier King at Brantford was notably different in tone and structure from that delivered by Mr. Bennett at Winnipeg. It was characteristically free from bitterness and small talk, and constitutes a serious and straightforward appeal to the reason of the electors, based upon a full and dispassionate presentation of facts, and couched in language which nowhere approached discourtesy toward those of differing opinions.

Necessarily the record of the Government is an outstanding issue in the campaign, and the one to which the Premier devoted attention chiefly in his opening address. To that extent the speech was defensive. But to that extent only. It was not in the nature of an apology, for the record requires no apology. On the contrary, this is a chronicle of success such as no previous government of Canada has been able to recite, and such as no government of any other country has achieved in the period of post-war construction.

Insult to Injury

To the people of the Maritime Provinces the most remarkable feature of Prime Minister Mackenzie King's "keynote" speech at Brantford last Monday was his attitude towards the question of Maritime subsidy claims. "It remained," he boasted, "for the present administration to tackle the problem of Maritime claims in a thorough, statesmanlike fashion." He referred specifically to the settlement of these claims and to the "generosity" with which the Government had acted in this and other matters.

It is notorious that the most important of all the recommendations of the Duncan Commission in 1926, namely "immediate consideration" of the whole subsidy question with a view to a complete revision of the financial arrangements as between the Federal Government and the Maritime Provinces, has been persistently ignored. Every province in Canada, with the exception of the Maritime Provinces, has received justice in relation to financial matters and public lands and resources. The King Government allowed the entire last term of Parliament to expire without any action of an effective character to extend justice to this part of the Dominion. Mr. King and his colleagues made very certain that the three Prairie provinces would receive generous treatment in the matter of public lands and natural resources and financial arrangements in relation thereto; but the Maritime Provinces, which have a proprietary interest in vast areas of public lands given to other provinces, and which due to their territorial limitations cannot receive any further contiguous territory, are left entirely out of the picture. And this, as already stated, despite the definite recommendations of a Royal Commission set up by the King Government and which submitted its report to the Federal authorities nearly four years ago.

According to Ex-Premier Saunders, the claims of this Province for final subsidy readjustment have been persistently pressed upon the [illegible] during the past three and a half years. According to the present Premier, Hon. W. M. Lea, Prince Edward Island alone is entitled to over three and a quarter millions of dollars annual subsidy, in addition to $200,000 cash settlement on other grounds. Yet in the 1929 session of Parliament Premier King declared that the Maritimes had not come forward to press their subsidy claims, and during the last session of the House Hon. Charles Stewart, Minister of the Interior, with the recommendations of the Duncan Commission before him, made the extraordinary statement that "if and when" the Maritimes presented their claims, the Government would consider the same. Now we have the climax to the whole matter: the subsidy claims of the Maritime Provinces, according to the Prime Minister in his Brantford speech, have already been settled; there is nothing more to say or to worry about; everybody is satisfed; the Government's attitude has been "not an endeavor merely, but a determination to see that in the interests of national unity, these long-standing grievances should for once and for all be eradicated and eradicated in a way which would leave no vestige of distrust or ill will."

Of course, the man who made the notorious "five-cent piece" speech in Parliament is capable of saying anything. But in the face of the Duncan recommendations four years ago, and in the face of the persistent request to implement these recommendations in the matter of subsidy readjustment and settlement which the present Provincial Government claims to have made at Ottawa, it is incomprehensible how any public man—least of all the man primarily responsible for the inexcusable delay—could get up in Brantford, Ontario, and say in effect that the subsidy claims of these Provinces have been settled to the satisfaction of all concerned. If the Prime Minister expects to "get away" with a statement of that kind, it will be the privilege of the electors of this part of Canada on July 28th next to show him that so far as they at least are concerned, he underestimated the intelligence of the people with whom he had to deal.

More Half Truths

As Hon. Dr. Manion remarked in St. Thomas recently, Mr. King is an adept in telling those half-truths which are more dangerous and misleading than actual falsehoods. The prime minister takes a subject, deals with it in a high-flown oratorical manner, and tells just those facts in just that sequence which will convey the impression he wishes to convey. An illustration of particular interest to Western Ontario was furnished in the prime minister's keynote address at Brantford. He touched on the tariff on fruits and vegetables and told about half the story or just a little less.

Mr. King said that his kindly and gracious Government had long realized that the fruit and vegetable growers of this part of Canada needed seasonal protection, so a wise and just Government gave it to them. That was all he told the people of Canada. He did not tell them that his Government rescinded the Conservative order-in-council of 1926, which placed these seasonal tariffs on fruits and vegetables. He did not tell them that several times in the House he and his party voted down any attempt to renew these duties. He did not tell them that as late as March 4, 1930, Mark Senn. Conservative M. P. for Haldimand, urged immediate action in this direction and was told by the Government that such was not necessary or advisable. He did not tell them that in the budget speech of May 1 Mr. Dunning said, re the fruit and vegetable situation:

> "Seasonal tariffs, for instance, are NOT applicable to a country such as Canada, with its extremities of distance, latitude and climate." (Page 1709 Hansard.)

He did not tell the people of Canada that the budget imposed on fruits and vegetables specific and ad valorem all-year-'round duties, making a tariff for exploitation, costing consumers millions of dollars and doing the growers no good at all.

The prime minister did not tell the people of Canada that on May 19, 1930, Mr. Dunning announced these duties had been changed to the seasonal duties which 19 days before he had said were "inapplicable" and which he and his colleagues had opposed for years. At that time Mr. Bennett said in the House (page 2385 Hansard):

> "Then this is a farce; the honorable minister is only putting it on to get past an election, and then he will change. Apparently there is no reality in it after all."

So that in four weeks we see the Government in four different tariff attitudes:

1. No tariff at all on fruits and vegetables.
2. No seasonal tariff.
3. A fixed tariff.
4. Replacement of the fixed tariff with a seasonal tariff.

This is truly an astonishing performance, yet Mr. King did not tell a quarter of the facts when he made his proclamation to the people of Canada. One can readily understand that when instances such as this are multiplied many times the prime minister cannot afford to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Ontario Halts Progress On St. Lawrence Plan, Premier King Declares

Generous Offer at Recent Power Conference Made to Provinces and Not Accepted, He Says, and if It Were, Then Negotiations Could Proceed With Washington—But After July 28 All These Matters Will Be Cleared Up, He Tells Cheering Peterboro' Audience

GIVES THE GLOBE HIGH PRAISE FOR ADVANCING EMPIRE TRADE

(By D. R. OLIVER, Staff Correspondent of The Globe.)

PETERBORO', June 17.—Premier King had his full war-paint on tonight. Speaking here in the Riding of West Peterboro', on the eve of his departure for the Maritimes, the Prime Minister invaded the St. Lawrence seaway project, the unemployment question, and the "five-cent speech" controversy — hitherto-unopened fields of argument in so far as he was concerned—to loose upon the heads of the Conservative chieftain and his Ontario lieutenant, Hon. George Howard Ferguson, one of the severest pummellings that any campaign audience in recent years has listened to.

INTRA-EMPIRE TRADE POLICIES.

Criticizing the attitude of the Opposition Leader in claiming credit for initiating steps which led to the Government adoption of an intra-Empire trade policy, Mr. King advised his audience to look over the files of The Toronto Globe of last year—before the Government even had made any pronouncement on the tariff question. The Globe, the Prime Minister said, had constantly advocated the raising of the Canadian tariff against American goods, and the pursuance of greater trade with the Empire, if the United States raised her tariff against Canadian goods.

Other newspapers, too, had been educating public opinion toward intra-Empire trade, but The Globe, the Prime Minister said, had been outstanding in this respect.

"Is this policy," he asked, "in the interests of Canada and the British Empire? If so, let us support it. If it is not, let us reject it. That is the question before you to settle."

Pact With Provinces.

Mr King read the agreement submitted by the Dominion Government at the last Power Conference: the agreement which, with the Provinces' acceptance, would make possible the commencement of navigation negotiations with the United States; the agreement which, however, the Provinces have declined to sign to date, but an agreement which, along with other matters, will, in his opinion, be all cleared up, once the July 28 election is out of the way and over.

Mr. King objected in stirring tones to what he termed Mr. Bennett's policy of "exaggerating out of all proportion" the conditions of unemployment in Canada; charged that, were it not for his "desire to exploit unemployment for political purposes," Mr. Bennett, as a Canadian, would be proud to acknowledge the splendid manner in which the Dominion has met the recent slackening off of business; admitted that the Tories would continue to exaggerate conditions and convey a false impression to the country; and asked in blunt fashion where the Conservative Leader—who today speaks of emergency, demanding a special session of Parliament to settle it—was two months ago, when unemployment was being debated in the House of Commons, and when every one alive to the situation had the opportunity of contributing to the House argument.

And to Mr. Ferguson, the Prime Minister threw out the quiet-toned, but nevertheless acid-dipped reminder that it ill became him and his position to assume the position with regard to the "five-cent-piece" speech which he had taken from the public platform, and with a gentler suggestion that he "should attend to his own business" in future.

"Since when," demanded Mr. King indignantly, "has the Premier of a Province dared to interject the management of the affairs of his Province into a Federal campaign? Let Mr. Ferguson look after his Province's affairs. I will attend to my business and look after the affairs of the Dominion. I was put into office to try to keep peace and not stir up ill will."

Warning to Provinces.

Earlier in the evening Mr. King had thrown out a general warning regarding "ill will" to the Provinces of the Dominion. "I say to the head of every Province," he declared, "be careful what you do about trying to set Government against Government in your own country. The first duty of any man is to see that Governments work together in harmony."

Loud applause greeted this rejoinder and some voice called out, "That's one for Fergie."

The Liberal rally here tonight, on behalf of J. J. Duffus, who is endeavoring to turn Liberal a constituency which went Tory by some 2,100 of a majority in 1926, was the duplicate in enthusiasm and spirit, if not in actual size, of Mr. King's campaign debut at Brantford last night. At that, several thousand electors were in attendance, and heard the Prime Minister give a comprehensive review of the work of his Administration; stress the value of intra-Empire trade; touch on the banning of legalized export of whiskey to the United States as another piece of "new ground" breaking, and, generally speaking, apply to his handling of Conservative policies and Conservative leadership more sting and scorn than for some time has characterized his utterances—either Parliamentary or campaign-pronounced.

One feature of the rally was the reported presence in the audience of E. A. Peck, Conservative member of the last Parliament, and candidate now for re-election. In jocular fashion, the Premier referred to his attendance, assured him that he was not going to quarrel with him; felt "a bit sorry" for him because of the party to which he paid allegiance, and prophesied that he would be "the happiest man in the world" if he would only see "the light" and come under the Liberal banner, as another previous Tory M.P. of the district, Mr. Burnham, had done.

"Playing Fair."

The Prime Minister's approach to the St. Lawrence question was along the avenue of reiteration of his attitude of "playing fair" with all Provinces, irrespective of their political leanings; and a lengthy explanation of how the age-old question of the Western Provinces had been settled amicably through the offices of his Ottawa Administration.

Mr. King led his audience down through the various phases of the St. Lawrence question with a painstaking care, dealing with the first reports of the International Joint Commission, and the Supreme Court reference on it, and revealing the many financial, engineering and economic angles to it, as well as the constitutional rights of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec in respect of water powers and their priority over the rights of navigation held by the Dominion.

It had been the hope, last fall, the Premier stated, to adjust the constitutional question which the Supreme Court had failed to settle at an Ottawa conference attended by Premiers Ferguson and Taschereau of Ontario and Quebec, but no full settlement had been reached.

Settlement Tried For.

"We tried to settle it," he told his audience, "and very satisfactory progress, I may state, was made. But we haven't reached all the way yet in regard to a settlement. That is the reason, I confess, why we have not been able to take the next step on the question—that is, approaching the United States as to negotiating on the question of navigation.

"Having dealt generously with the Western Provinces," he continued, "with the Maritime Provinces and with our old Provinces of Quebec having taken the attitude that we were right in so doing, we, as the Dominion, said: 'We are quite prepared to establish a working basis in order to enable us each to get on with this project.'

"We said: 'You can have the power to develop, conditional on navigation requirements. We will treat you as if you owned the power. Go on with your plans. All we say is that you should submit your plans to us so that we can make sure that they fit in with the navigation requirements of the general development.'"

Mr. King then read to the audience the following memorandum:

"Conferences beginning Jan. 24 to reach a practical basis of agreement regarding the development of water powers in navigable waters. A memorandum setting forth the policy which the Dominion Government is prepared to adopt as a basis of agreement with the Provinces, without prejudice to the legal rights of the parties:

Rights of Provinces.

"1. Where a Province desires to undertake power development in navigable waters, its right to do so shall be recognized, conditional on the provision of the necessary navigation requirements.

"2. Should the Dominion Government at any time undertake or authorize the construction of any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation, it would be prepared to make available to an approved Provincial agency the surplus water power developed beyond that needed for the operation of the locks and purposes of navigation on a basis equivalent to that which would govern if the Provincial agency had itself undertaken the work as a power-development scheme.

"3. In either case, should the use of Dominion or Provincial property be required or the riparian or other property rights of the Dominion or Province be interfered with or affected, the acquisition of such property, or the authority to interfere with or affect such rights, could be made the subject of a special agreement in the particular circumstances of each case."

"Now, ladies and gentlemen," he declared, "we thought that that was a pretty generous position to take. I wonder if anything could be more generous or fair than that.

Not Accepted.

"But up to the present, ladies and gentlemen, we have not had it accepted. It doesn't go the length that the Provinces want. Just why, I cannot say. But they contend that they have a legal position that goes further.

"I put the agreement we are prepared to stand by before the people of the country. Here is a plan which enables the Dominion to go on with the navigation and the Provinces to go on with the power.

"It enables them to get any power over and above what it costs, for us to do our own navigation work. And, if that agreement is accepted, then the way is clear for us to enter negotiation with another country.

Difficulties at Home.

"But I think you will all agree that, as long as we have difficulties among ourselves on this question, we should not begin to negotiate with another country on this thing."

Mr. King supplemented his criticism of the Provincial attitude on the question with an expression of doubt as to whether any progress could have been made in negotiation with the United States during the last two years. The United States tariff bill increases had wrought such feeling in Canada that the Dominion probably would have been shown short shrift had they attempted any negotiations.

"There has," he said, "to be a certain atmosphere in countries in order to deal with any international question, and we would have been accused of running away to the United States with our project."

But, he felt, better days were coming. At midnight, as he had previously indicated, the United States tariff bill would become operative. "And on July 28," he added, "a lot of our other troubles will be over. This election will be over, and I don't think there will be so much trouble in getting together with the Provinces, but just at the present time there doesn't seem any indication on their part to assist us in this project."

To Study Main Issues.

At the outset of his address Mr. King pleaded with his audience to study the main issues of the election campaign, and not allow themselves to be side-tracked by minor issues. The question of who would represent the Dominion at the Imperial Conference was, he said, according to Mr. Bennett's own admission, sufficient issue to bring on an election.

"Don't let Mr. Bennett get away from that stand," said the Prime Minister. "I want to hold him to that."

The Prime Minister named, as he did at Brantford last night, the representatives he was prepared to send to the Imperial Conference, if his Government was returned to power, and again challenged the Conservative chieftain to say what representatives of equal calibre he could depute if handed the reins of administration on July 28.

Co-operation, friendship and goodwill were needed at all times, said the Liberal Leader, if the ultimate of success in the carrying out of policies between this Dominion and others was to be achieved. That course, he said, was the course practiced always by the present Government.

U.S. Tariff Bill Signed.

In leading up to a discussion of the tariff, the Prime Minister pointed out, significantly, that this day (Tuesday) at noon President Hoover of the United States had signed its tariff legislation and that it would be effective at midnight. The hour, he felt, was a momentous one in the history of the Dominion and of the British Empire.

Mr. King eulogized the work of the Tariff Advisory Board; strongly deprecated the suggestion from the Tory Leader that the Dunning tariff changes were of the "on the spur of the moment" type; argued with equal force that the revisions were the result of long and careful investigation and thought; and traced, step by step, Canada's representations from time to time in the face of prospective tariff rises at Washington. It was his contention that the "cool-headed" attitude of his Government in leading up to alterations of the Dominion's tariff had worked far more successfully than the "red-blooded" attitude that Hon. Dr. Manion had once advocated as the way to handle Washington.

Liquor Export Ban.

Mr. King referred to the Government's banning of export of liquor to the United States. He felt that difficult situations in the handling of the tariff and other questions with the United States might have eventuated had the Government clearances been continued in the export of liquor.

"Imagine," said he, "the feeling between the countries if a boat had been lives, American and Canadians, and with our own Government officials having passed the boat's shipment, and actually being a party to it."

"I knew," continued the Premier, "what we were facing in the matter of the tariff legislation. I knew how that would be felt in many quarters. I wanted to be particularly careful that in no particular the Government of the United States should have cause to think that this Government was not playing fair with them, as with every country in the world."

Unemployment Situation.

Mr. King referred to the unemployment situation as follows: "Mr. Bennett has been saying a great deal concerning conditions of unemployment in Canada during the course of the last few months. I have no complaint to make of the attention he has directed to this great economic problem, but I do object most strenuously to the manner in which he has exaggerated it out of all proportions, and to his attempt to convey the impression that the present unemployment in Canada is due to my neglect, or failure upon the part of the present Administration.

"As is well known by all students of economic conditions, the world is now passing through a period of price dislocation, following the recent financial crisis from stock markets.

"In some countries this price dislocation has led to a pronounced industrial depression and to widespread unemployment. It would be unreasonable to expect that they could remain entirely free from the effects of a situation which is universal in its application. At the same time, Mr. Bennett is perfectly aware that no country in the world has suffered less from the present depression than this Dominion, and, were it not for his desire to exploit unemployment for political purposes, he would, I think, as a Canadian, be proud to acknowledge it, and to assert there could have been no greater tribute to the stability of our industrial and commercial foundation of our prosperity than the manner in which we have met the slackening of business which has taken place within the recent months.

Canada Best of All.

"I make this statement without any reservations: that no country in the world has come through the recent financial crisis with more creditable showing than Canada. This is not merely the testimony of Government officials, but it is the unanimous verdict of presidents and general managers of financial institutions and the heads of investment houses whose business it is to study comparative statistics of trade and industry.

"Before leaving Ottawa a few days ago, I asked the Bureau of Statistics to prepare for me a statement dealing with the position in this country with respect to employment and unemployment during the recent years. The Bureau of Statistics collected monthly reports on the number of employees of over 7,000 firms who employed, on May 1, 1930, some 976,000 persons. These statistics have been collected monthly since 1921 and are expressed as index numbers, with the average for the calendar year 1926 taken as 100. I should like to point out to Mr. Bennett that for every 88 persons employed in these industries when the last Conservative Government was in office there were 119 persons employed in the year 1929. I should like further to point out that, for every 85 persons employed in April, 1921, there are over 111 employed in April, 1930. In other words, during the period of this Administration, in this country employment in these manufacturing industries has increased by 30 per cent., while the population of the country has increased only at the rate of 15 per cent. These are figures in which Canadians should take the greatest pride. While realizing to the full the necessity of meeting the existing conditions of unemployment, this evidence of stability should give us cause for faith and confidence in the sound and unassailable economic structure of our country.

Tories Silent on This.

"I venture to predict, however, that no Conservative speakers, despite their avowed attachment to 'Canada First,' will inform you of this splendid tribute to the stability of the Dominion, at a time when other countries are suffering severely from the effects of economic dislocation. They will continue to exaggerate conditions of unemployment, and will persist in conveying a false impression of the situation that exists.

"May I say further, in dealing with the question of unemployment, that in all the discussion of this important question the Conservative Party has put forward no constructive proposal to deal with the root cause of the unemployment problem.

"A few days ago Mr. Bennett put forward the bright idea of summoning a special session of Parliament to deal with the problem. He is strong on special sessions. Last spring he and his party were prepared to keep the Canadian Parliament in continuous session to await the adoption of the new United States tariff in order to give a red-blooded reply. Had they had their way the world would have been treated to the spectacle of the Parliament of Canada sitting all through the spring, all through the summer, all through the fall, all through the winter, all through another spring, and in fact sitting yet, watching and waiting for the egg to hatch.

What Has He to Offer?

"As to the present proposal, it is easy to test its worth and its sincerity. What constructive and practicable policy has Mr. Bennett proposed for such a session of Parliament to consider? None. What policy did he propose during the session of Parliament just ended, and which was just as good a session as any other? None. Would it be the policy of his first lieutenant and party manager, General McRae, who only a year ago, with his Leader's approval, urged Parliament to adopt a fantastic policy of bringing 300,000 additional immigrants to Western Canada? What would be the position in the West today if that policy had been adopted?

"Only two months ago there was a prolonged debate, a six-day debate, in the House of Commons on unemployment, arising out of a motion by a Labor member. What constructive policy did Mr. Bennett have to advance on that occasion? Surely, had he been genuinely convinced of the existence of an overwhelming emergency and convinced that he held the key to its solution, he would have taken advantage of that debate to expound it to the House. Would you believe it, that the Leader who now wants to call a special session today with unemployment did not, two short months ago, think it necessary to contribute a single word to that debate?

"But what of his colleagues? What practical ideas had they to advance? They rang the changes on two proposals: first, that the Dominion should make unemployment grants to the Provinces, which had not, and have not yet, asked for such aid; and, second, that we should adopt a policy of protection, protection as they have it in those protectionist paradises, the United States and Australia, where it has not averted an unemployment problem immensely more serious than our own."

Five-Cent-Speech Issue.

On the much-discussed five-cent-speech issue, the Premier said:

"Mr. Ferguson says: 'I am prepared to take the platform and use all the power of my Government against this man, all on account of a five-cent piece,'" declared the Prime Minister in referring to this new phase of his speech. He asked his audience to listen to the figures which he was about to quote, and then "ask yourself if a five-cent piece is a ground for a quarrel between Governments."

Since the present Government had come into power, continued the Prime Minister, it had paid to the Province of Ontario in subsidies the sum of $21,140,893; for highways, $4,550,945; for agricultural instruction, $590,304; for technical education, $2,400,024; for employment offices, $519,411; for unemployment relief (labor), $565,466; for eradication of disease, $336,939, and for old-age pensions, $1,127,844. This was a total of $31,231,805. Added to this might be sums which were given in the form of war pensions, unemployment relief from the Department of Pensions and National Health, and war pensions, all to individuals in Ontario, a further sum of $98,865,940. When added together these two totals made the large sum of $130,084,518.

Mr. Ferguson knew, declared Mr. King, that these sums had been paid to the Province of Ontario by the Federal Government, and yet, because of a five-cent piece, he was prepared to throw the full weight of his Government into the campaign against the Government which had paid these sums to Ontario.

Unemployment Discussion.

Then Mr. King described to his audience the circumstances under which, he said, he had made the five-cent reference in the House of Commons. There had been a lengthy discussion on unemployment, with respect to which "I knew very well what political ends were to be served," and in the course of that discussion he had endeavored to make it clear to the House that, if the Provinces came and asked for aid from the Dominion Government to meet unemployment conditions, careful consideration would be given to their requests. He had quoted from Premier Ferguson himself to the effect that Ontario did not require such assistance. His five-cent reference, made, he said, in answer to interruptions, was intended to apply only to conditions as they existed at that time, and had no bearing whatever on the general policy of the Government with respect to unemployment.

He felt that it ill became Premier Ferguson, in view of all the circumstances, to assume the position which had been taken by the Ontario Leader from the public platforms.

Enthusiastic Welcome.

The same spontaneously enthusiastic welcome which was accorded the Prime Minister at Brantford last night on the occasion of his inaugural campaign speech was tendered him here this evening by the electors of West Peterboro'. A street parade, playing bands, and a gaily decorated assembly hall added to the spirit of the large and triumphant party rally.

Premier King was supported on the platform by Mrs. Turner Skaith, daughter of Senator James Murdock, and President of the Twentieth Century Liberal Club of Toronto; by ex-Mayor J. J. Duffus, the Liberal candidate in the approaching election; by Hon. George N. Gordon, and by Dr. John J. Craig, President of the West Peterboro' Liberal Association, and Chairman of the evening.

Mrs. Skaith brought to the rally the same charm of manner and flair for public speaking which marked her chairmanship of the recent Lapointe banquet in Toronto.

Confident of Victory.

Mr. Duffus expressed the firm belief that with a vigorous organization behind him he would restore the riding to the Liberal encampment on the twenty-eighth of July. West Peterboro' was, he felt, altogether too prominent a constituency to have as its representative at Ottawa a member of the Tory Opposition.

Mr. Gordon, in introducing the Prime Minister to the audience, paid forceful tribute to the organizing ability of Mr. Duffus, as business man and municipal head; pleaded for his election; then, in biting tongue, switched to Conservative Leader Bennett, stating that he had begun his campaign "among the tombstones in Queen's Park," and that he would find himself among a lot of tombstones again when the election was over.

Presentation of flowers to the Prime Minister by little Bertha Bellegham and solos by Dorothy Allan Park were bright interludes on the evening's program.

LA POPULATION DE QUEBEC VA RECEVOIR DEMAIN SOIR LE T. H. W.-L. MACKENZIE KING

Une belle démonstration sera faite, sur la place St-Pierre, au Premier Ministre du Canada. — Les derniers préparatifs.

Tout est préparé pour faire une réception magnifique au chef du parti libéral, le T. H. W.-L. Mackenzie-King, premier ministre du Canada, qui viendra à Québec, jeudi soir, exposer sa politique sur la place Saint-Pierre, à Saint-Sauveur.

L'honorable M. Ernest Lapointe, ministre de la Justice, revenu d'Ottawa, où il a passé la fin de semaine, a conféré avec ses lieutenants hier soir, au Club de Réforme, pour régler les derniers détails de la manifestation.

Comme nous l'avons déjà dit à plusieurs reprises, M. King sera accompagné de son bras droit, l'honorable M. Lapointe, de l'honorable solliciteur général M. Lucien Cannon, et de plusieurs autres personnages politiques distingués, qui parleront après le premier ministre.

Une vaste estrade, très bien aménagée, sera réservée aux dames qui seront confortablement assises pour écouter le premier ministre et ses partisans exposer la politique libérale.

De grandes manifestations auront lieu avant l'assemblée alors que tous les clubs libéraux de la région et les citoyens se porteront à la rencontre du premier ministre à la gare pour l'escorter jusqu'à la place Saint-Pierre.

L'assemblée aura lieu de toute façon, qu'il fasse beau ou qu'il pleuve.

La semaine politique à Québec et dans toute la région offre donc un grand intérêt. Hier, les deux nouveaux ministres, les honorables Cyrus MacMillan, ministre des Pêcheries et W.-F. Kay, ministre sans portefeuille, ont été assermentés à la Citadelle en présence de Leurs Excellences, le gouverneur général et la vicomtesse Willingdon. C'est là un événement historique comme Québec n'en avait pas vu depuis longtemps.

L'honorable sénateur P.-J. Paradis, organisateur en chef des forces libérales de la province était à Montréal hier soir, tandis que M. J.-A. Lesage, son assistant, était parti pour Gaspé, où il assistera à la convention de jeudi pour le choix d'un candidat qui fera la lutte dans le comté dont l'hon. sénateur Rodolphe Lemieux fut le représentant pendant de nombreuses années.

MM. Kay et MacMillan sont arrivés à Québec hier matin pour prêter leur serment d'office devant le représentant de la Couronne au pays.

Les deux ministres furent présentés au gouverneur-général selon l'usage, par l'honorable M. Lapointe, en l'absence du premier ministre, l'honorable M. Lucien Cannon, solliciteur-général, et l'honorable sénateur P.-J. Paradis, organisateur en chef des forces libérales pour la région de Québec.

C'est M. E.-J. LeMaire, greffier du Conseil Privé, qui reçut le serment des deux nouveaux députés, en présence du gouverneur-général et des autres personnages présents.

C'est la première fois depuis la Confédération que des Conseillers Privés du Canada sont assermentés dans la Citadelle de Québec, mais ce ne sera pas la dernière fois puisque Leurs Excellences ont fait de Québec la résidence vice-royale d'été des gouverneurs du pays.

Après la cérémonie, les deux nouveaux ministres prirent congé pour retourner dans leurs comtés. L'honorable M. Kay partit pour Sherbrooke où il assistait hier soir au banquet donné en l'honneur de l'honorable sénateur E.-W. Tobin, récemment appelé à la Chambre Haute, et l'honorable M. MacMillan prit le premier train pour l'Ile-du-Prince-Edouard où il est candidat dans le comté de Queen's, ci-devant représenté par l'honorable J.-E. Sinclair, nommé sénateur.

Le nouveau ministre sans-portefeuille, M. W.-F. Kay, qui représente la minorité anglaise de la province de Québec dans le Cabinet, était député de Brome-Missisquoi depuis 1911. Il naquit à Montréal le 18 mai 1876, de W.-F. Kay, Canadien, et de H.-N. Jenkins. Anglaise.

Il reçut son éducation en Angleterre, et à l'Université McGill de Montréal où il prit ses grades puis il se livra ensuite à la culture. M. Kay, qui demeure à Philipsburg, Québec, est anglican.

L'honorable Cyrus McMillan, maître-ès-arts et docteur en philosophie, était professeur d'Anglais à McGill lorsque le premier ministre King le choisit comme son ministre des Pêcheries. M. McMillan naquit à Wood-Island, Ile-du-Prince-Edouard, en 1880, de Hester C. MacMillan et d'Isabelle Fraser. Ses parents avaient émigrés dans l'île en 1806 et s'étaient établis à Belfast dont ils furent parmi les pionniers écossais.

M. MacMillan reçut son éducation primaire dans la petite salle d'école de Wood Island et de là, il vint au Prince of Wales College, dont il sortit avec tous les honneurs. Il s'enregistra ensuite dans la seconde année des Arts à l'Université McGill. Après sa graduation, M. MacMillan fit du professorat, puis retourna à McGill et ensuite à l'Université d'Harvard,

M. Mac Millan ser vit dans 'armée canadienne pendant la guerre comme officier de liaison, avec le grade de major. Il fut ensuite nommé professeur d'anglais à McGill.

En 1929, il présida la Commission Royale d'Education dans l'Ile du Prince Edouard.

Le nouveau ministre descend d'une famille qui a toujours été libérale et il a participé à plusieurs campagnes, notamment dans Montréal-Saint-Antoine, en faveur de l'honorable Walter-G. Mitchell, et dans le comté de Montréal-Saint-Laurent, en faveur de l'honorable M. Marler, aujourd'hui ministre Canadien au Japon.

M. Mac Millan est l'auteur de plusieurs livres.

Premier Places Onus on Provinces For Delay in St. Lawrence Project Tells Ferguson to Mind Own Affairs Answers Critics of 5-cent Speech — Denies Refusing Aid to Tory Provinces.

ASSAILS R. B. BENNETT

Insists Reports of Unemployment Exaggerated — Enters Power Agreement as Issue.

By HARVEY JOHN HICKEY.
Mail and Empire Staff Writer.

Peterboro, June 17.—Back at his ace assailants in the Conservative ranks, Hon. R. B. Bennett and Premier G. Howard Ferguson, Premier Mackenzie King to-night lashed with all his vigor in a fighting speech that carried his campaign into the unemployment question, his famed-five-cent speech and the St. Lawrence waterways project.

Flatly denying that the had "refused to aid unemployment in Conservative provinces" the prime minister bluntly told Mr. Ferguson to go about his own business, the while accusing Mr. Bennett of exaggerating "out of all proportion" the amount of unemployment in Canada.

Turning to the St. Lawrence waterways question, Mr. King put the onus for delay in the progress of this great project on Mr. Ferguson and on Premier Taschereau of Quebec. Deft indeed was his manoeuvre to put the main burden on Conservative Ferguson, not on Liberal Taschereau, as he intimated to his cheering 3,000 hearers that the main obstacle was a matter of politics, that he expected the Dominion Government would have its differences with the provinces cleared up and would be ready to enter negotiations with the United States as soon as July 28 came and the election was over.

Conference Plan.

At the conferences between himself and Messrs. Ferguson and Taschereau in Ottawa last Winter, Mr. King declared the Dominion Government had laid before the provinces a plan whereby the provinces under certain conditions could go ahead at once with the power developments on the St. Lawrence while the Dominion might proceed with its international canal negotiations with the United States. This plan, he said, the provinces had not yet accepted.

Mr. King was indignant about Premier Ferguson's entry into the election campaign. "Since when," he demanded, "has a Premier of a province dared to interject the management of the affairs of his province into a federal campaign? Let Premier Ferguson attend to his own business. Let him look after his province's affairs; I will attend to my own business and look after the affairs of the Dominion. I was put into office to try to keep peace and not to stir up ill-will."

Belittles Bennett Plan.

After a tart assertion that Mr. Bennett was "strong on" special sessions of Parliament the Premier waved aside the Opposition leader's plan of a special unemployment session after the election and drew attention to the Government's proposal of a conference at which delegates from the Dominion, the provinces, the municipalities, the large employing corporations and the Labor organizations would attend in Ottawa this Fall. Was not that the better way, he asked.

"Mr. Bennett," he continued, "has taken me to task, claiming that I refused to aid unemployment in Conservative provinces. I should have been taken to task if such had been the case. But I certainly never said anything of the sort. What I did say was that all, provinces and dominion, have obligations.

"It is a problem too large for any one entity and it will be best solved with everyone concerned, provinces, municipalities, corporations and labor and the Dominion, all working to the one end. Only by all co-operating together to the best of their individual and united ability can we accomplish a solution.

Conference With Railways.

He instanced as something the Dominion had done his conferences with Sir Henry Thornton and E. W. Beatty at which the latter had agreed not to cut down the staffs of the railways.

"How can Mr. Bennett say that the Dominion Government has not done its best," the Premier asked. "The Conservatives say we should take moneys from the Federal treasury and give it to the provinces." Here he tabulated payments to the province of Ontario since his administration came into power in 1921. The total was $31,231,805, including subsidies, education and agricultural grants, unemployment relief, etc., and if war pensions was included it aggregated $130,000,000, he said.

"Mr. Ferguson says: 'I am prepared to take the platform and use all the power of my Government against this man, all on account of a five-cent piece'," the Premier said. He asked his hearers to listen to the figures he had and then "ask yourself if a five-cent piece is ground for a quarrel between Governments."

Five-Cent Reference.

Then Mr. King described to his audience the circumstances under which, he said, he had made the five-cent reference in the House of Commons. There had been a lengthy discussion on unemployment with respect to which "I knew very well what political ends were to be served," and in the course of that discussion he had endeavored to make it clear to the House that if the provinces came and asked for aid from the Dominion Government to meet unemployment conditions, careful consideration would be given to their requirements. He had quoted from Premier Ferguson himself to the effect that Ontario did not require such assistance. His five-cent reference, made, he said, in answer to interruptions, was intended to apply only to conditions as they existed at that time and had no bearing whatever on the general policy of the Government with respect to unemployment.

He felt that it ill-became Premier Ferguson, in view of all the circumstances, to assume the position which had been taken by the Ontario leader from the public platform.

In J. J. Duffus' Interests.

Mr. King was speaking at a large rally held in the armories here in the interests of ex-Mayor J. J. Duffus. The latter, who smilingly told his hearers that this was his birthday and the meeting his largest party yet, is making his second attempt to wrest the riding of West Peterborough from the Conservative ex-member, E. A. Peck, local barrister, who won in 1926 by a majority of 2,100.

The premier did not begin speaking until after 9.30 o'clock. He remarked in his opening words that he saw Mr. Peck, the Conservative ex-member, in the audience. Amid laughter, he assured Mr. Peck that he would say nothing adverse of him and expressed the wish, smiling the while, that Mr. Peck were a Liberal. He also complimented Mrs. Turner Skaith of Toronto, who was a previous speaker, and lauded, as a "true inspiration", the Twentieth Century Liberal Club, the young people's organization of which Mrs. Skaith is Toronto Women's president.

A gale of laughter swept the audience as Mr. King commented that the radio, in one way, was a "terrible thing". He was referring to the broadcast of his Brantford speech last night. "You know," he confided to his laughing hearers, "one cannot with radio take one speech and learn it, make it one place and then go another place and tell the people there, as well, that they are the finest community in the country, bar none."

Imperial Conference.

Bluntly the premier declared that he did not intend to let Mr. Bennett "get away" from a former declaration that Canada's representation at the Imperial Conference was the issue of this election. He had noticed that Mr. Bennett was not talking much about that now. He reiterated the challenge of his Brantford speech that Mr. Bennett name those who would accompany him to the conference, if he became premier.

If the Conservative Empire trade policy, as Mr. King saw it, were put into force, soon there would be no such thing as Empire trade, he declared. There must be reciprocation, a certain give and take of trade favors, if trade were to continue, the premier insisted.

To-day, the day on which President Hoover was signing the new Hawley-Smoot tariff bill was an historic day, Mr. King declared, approaching the tariff question. "That legislation," he said, "becomes law at midnight. So we are gathered together at a moment which is very significant in the history of this continent."

He referred to the bill having been the ultimate result of President Hoover's 1928 campaign promise of tariff revision, made "to the rural elements" of the United States.

"That was perfectly right as far as he was concerned," said the premier of Mr. Hoover. "It is not for us to say to the United States what it shall or shall not do. But it is our duty to let all countries know our feelings on an action they propose which may affect us."

He then recounted that representations had been made to Washington through diplomatic channels and read an excerpt from a speech made regarding the U.S. tariff changes by the late Hon. James Robb, finance minister at the time. Mr. Robb had dropped a hint to the United States. Then he recalled his own Western tour of last November and read an excerpt from his own Winnipeg speech on this same subject and along the same lines as Mr. Robb took.

Awaiting U.S. Action.

Amid laughter Mr. King sarcastically reminded his hearers of the Conservative demand made during the 1929 session of parliament that parliament sit on until the U.S. bill was passed so as to be able to make immediate retaliation upon its becoming law. "We should have still been sitting in Ottawa in the red-blooded attitude urged by Hon. Dr. Manion," said Mr. King, "because the U.S. bill is only becoming law to-day."

Emphatically denying the charges that the Dunning budget was framed for election purposes, Mr. King described that budget as a statesmanlike document, framed after great consideration to meet conditions imposed by the Hawley-Smoot tariff. Notice of this budget had been given, he claimed, as far back as November when he outlined fiscal policy at Winnipeg. Describing his speech there, he submitted that it was necessary for a Government leader to use "moderate language".

He instanced feeling over the U.S. tariff bill as an example of what pitch the people might reach if the continuance of rum-running, now stopped by law, had caused some international incident. "Imagine the feeling if a boat had been sunk with a loss of a dozen lives, Americans and Canadians," he exclaimed, referring to the export law, "and our own government officials, having passed the shipment, being a party to it.

"I knew what we were facing in the matter of the tariff legislation. I knew how that would be felt in many quarters. I wanted to be particularly careful that in no particular, the Government of the United States should have reason to think that the Government was not playing fair with them as with every country in the world."

Now, the United States has raised its tariff and this Government, pursuing its policy of trading only on equal terms, had enacted the countervailing duties.

"We have done it all," he exulted, "preserving the best of feeling on both sides. We have not made enemies on this continent and we have made better friends than ever with the mother country." A staccato outburst of applause greeted this earnest recommendation of the Dunning budget.

St. Lawrence Question.

Approaching the St. Lawrence question, Mr. King gibed Mr. Bennett who, he said, had lots to say on most things but was silent in Parliament on this question. He referred to Mr. Bennett's Winnipeg statement that the Government had not chosen to do anything on this problem. "That," said the Premier, amid laughter, "is pretty nearly as good an excuse as Mr. Ferguson gave when he spoke about the five-cent piece as his reason for getting into the election campaign.

"I say to the heads of every province in Canada, bar none," Mr. King continued, his voice raised in emphasis, "be careful what you do about trying to set government against government in your own country. The first duty of any man is to see that governments work together in harmony and not to stir up strife between governments."

Loud applause greeted this sally, aimed apparently at Premier Ferguson.

Mr. King then launched into a detailed discussion of the Western natural resources problems, taking credit to his government for the amicable settlement last session of these hoary differences between the four Western provinces and the Dominion. From that, he tacked back to the St. Lawrence question and gave his hearers a history, step by step, of the progress of this question from the time of the first report on it by the international joint commission to the time of the abortive reference on it to the Supreme Court of Canada.

"Linked with this question," he explained, "were great financial considerations, great engineering considerations, great economic considerations and also deep constitutional questions. And to make sure that we should make no mistake, we dealt with each of them one by one."

After discussing the steps taken in in connection with the engineering and other considerations, Mr. King came to the constitutional question, concerning the relative rights of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec to the waterpowers, as against the rights of the Dominion to waterpowers and its admitted supremacy over navigation.

Conference With Premiers.

He referred then to the conference he had last Fall with Premier Ferguson and Premier Taschereau of Quebec, at which it was hoped to settlet he constitutional question which the Supreme Court had failed to settle.

"We tried to settle that," declared the Prime Minister. "We have had conferences with the Premiers and very considerable progress has been made, but the full settlement has not been reached. That is the reason why we have not been able to take the next step on the question approaching the United States as to the final negotiations in the question.

"Having dealt generously with the Western provinces, with the Maritime Provinces and with our old Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, having taken the position that we were right in so doing, we said as the Dominion, 'We are quite prepared to establish a working basis in order to enable us each to get on with the work.' We said: 'You can have the power to develop, conditional on navigation requirements, we will treat you as if you owned the power. Go on with your plans. All we say is that you should submit your plans to us so that we can make sure that they fit in with the naval requirements of the general development.'"

Mr. King then read the memorandum which, he said, had been presented by the Dominion at the conference, laying down this position. It was as follows:

Text of Memorandum.

"Conference beginning January 24 to reach a practical basis of agreement regarding the development of waterpowers in navigable waters. A memorandum setting forth the policy which the Dominion Government is prepared to adopt as a basis of agreement with the provinces, without prejudice to the legal rights of the parties.

1—Where a province desires to undertake power development in navigable waters, its right to do so shall be recognized, conditional on the provision of the necessary navigation requirements.

"2—Should the Dominion Government at any time undertaken or authorize the construction of any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation, it would be prepared to make available to an approved provincial agency the surplus waterpower developed beyond that needed for the operation of the locks and purposes of navigation, on a basis equivalent to that which would govern if the provincial agency had itself undertaken the work as a power-development scheme.

"3—In either case, should the use of Dominion or provincial property be required or tne riparian or other property rights of the Dominion or province be interfered with or affected, the acquisition of such property, or the authority to interfere with or affect such rights, could be made the subject of a special agreement in the particular circumstances of each case."

Flagging Interest Revives.

This all seemed almost too heavy for Mr. King's hearers and their interest seemed to be flagging as he finished reading this memorandum. Yawns and lethargy quickly vanished, however, as he set down the paper and, his voice laden with emphasis, began his assault on the provincial premiers' position.

"Now, ladies and gentlemen," he declared, "we thought that that was a pretty generous position to take. I wonder if anything could be more generous or fair than that?

"But up to the present, ladies and gentlemen, we have not had it accepted. It doesn't go the length that the provinces want. Just why, I can't say. But they contend that they have a legal position that goes further."

Mr. King added to the effect of this statement by pausing a moment. Then he thundered "I put the agreement we are prepared to stand by, before the people of the country. Here is a plan which enables the Dominion to go on with the navigation and the provinces to go on with the power.

"It enables them to get any power over and above what it costs for us to do our own navigation work. And if that agreement is accepted, then the way is clear for us to enter negotiation with another country. But I think you will all agree that as long as we have difficulties among ourselves on this question, we should not begin to negotiate with another country on this thing."

Obstacle to Progress.

Bitterly the Premier commented that he doubted whether any progress could have been made in negotiation with the United States during the past two years even if matters had been settled with the Ontario and Quebec Governments, feeling had been at such a pitch on this side of the border over the new United States tariff bill.

"There has to be a certain atmosphere in countries in order to deal with any international question," he explained, "and in that time, with feeling what it was over the United States tariff bill, we should have been dealt with very quickly here if we had entered negotiations. They would have said of us that we were running away to the United States again before we did anything."

But the tariff bill was law to-night at midnight. That, he felt, would be out of the way. "And on the 28th of July," he added meaningly, "a lot of our other troubles will be over. This election will be over and I don't think there will be so much trouble in getting together with the provinces but just at the present time there doesn't seem any indication of the way being cleared further."

He again declared that the Dominion Government had desired "to deal in a fair and generous way with the provinces and consider their positions even before our own." He reiterated that the election campaign would eliminate difficulties at home and the Government could then get on with negotiations with the United States preparatory to launching this great project.

Piped by Kilties.

While the audience, standing lustily cheered and applauded, Mr. King opened the meeting by marching into the hall behind half a dozen kilted pipers. Introducing Premier King, Hon. George N. Gordon saw it as an omen that Mr. Bennett "opened his campaign among the tombstones in Queen's Park at Toronto."

"I venture to state," added the one-time Minister of Immigration, "that he will finish his campaign among the tombstones."

Laughter and applause swept the armory as Premier King bent over and kissed little Bertha Belleghem, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Belleghem, who presented him with a bouquet of roses before he began speaking.

Preceding the Premier were the candidate, J. J. Duffus, and Mrs. Turner Skaith of Toronto, daughter of Senator James Murdock. Mrs. Skaith also received a bouquet. Dr. John J. Craig, president of the Peterboro West Liberal Association, was chairman.

Those on the platform included R. R. Hall, K.C., ex-M.P. for Peterboro West; Mrs. B. F. McNeeley, president of the Peterboro Women's Liberal Association, and Miss Martha Ada Collins, president of the Mackenzie King Club of Peterboro, local young women's political organization.

PREMIER REVEALS MASTERFUL GRASP OF NATION'S NEEDS

Seems Inexhaustible in Power and Argument on Election Issues

LACKS FLAG-WAVING

By AUGUSTUS BRIDLE

Peterboro, June 17.—For two hours the prime minister of Canada, a stocky figure in gray, stood at the end of a long audience in the armories here to-night and talked without ceasing, except for applause. One of the longest hustings speeches on record and one of the most parliamentary. At 11.45 when he stopped speaking the premier probably rather exhausted, seemed to be just warming up to the power of the occasion.

Much is vitality, clear argument, power to speak without notes and to hammer enough truths as he sees them to make a book. There have been greater political speeches than this; speeches far more emotional and humorous; not often one of such a mastery of complete argument. It was the premier of Canada conducting a case in court on his own behalf.

He spoke, not so much as a politician as a counsel with a brief, or a minister replying to right hon. gentlemen opposite in parliament.

The armories holds about 3,000 people. The hall was packed except for a few of the rear seats where the duel of the six loud speakers in front of the hall became a duel with the battery outside. People left the rear seats to go out to the cool spaces of the park and hear the voice on the wall while they stood and watched the speaker through the archway.

Fine audience, of all sorts and ages. Motors parked on three sides of the park. Flags portiered on the walls. Placards postered over the stage—mainly about empire. A sounding board built over the speaker. Stage packed with supporters—including one lady representing the Twentieth Century club. Planks laid on chairs and upholstered with wrapping paper.

The Caledonia band stationed at the front. And before the chairman called upon the Hon. G. N. Gordon to introduce the premier Peterboro's popular soprano, Mrs. Dorothy Allan Park, sang "Land of Hope and Glory" as appropriate to the empire speech as a hymn is to a sermon.

In State of Tension

Everything modern. Old Peterboro that used to rally to hear Laurier and Stratton and Borden and all the other notables of last century keyed up to a state of tension mainly to hear a man who for most two hours did nothing but state a case.

The premier stood while the band played "O Canada." Even in all-British Peterboro it was realized that not since Laurier has that national hymn been so appropriate as it is to the man who succeeded to the Laurier traditions and prestige in Quebec. Mackenzie King has always been fond of music. Years ago he was an enthusiast for popular songs when that hymn was composed in Quebec city as the perpetual voice of one of the two great historic races in Canada.

He took care to copy nobody in his method. He spent no time on local history, said nothing about the pioneers of Peterboro or its home industries and traditions. His sole reference to the city concerned the welcome he had received and a graceful appreciation of everybody who had taken part in it. The only usual things he did before he squared away to his great argument were to kiss the little girl who handed him the bouquet and stand her on the table. After which he took a drink of water before he said a word.

Differs From Brantford

It was noticeable at once how well he uses the microphone. Some of the previous speakers had shouted at it so hard that the amplification distorted the words. The premier began very easily. For half his speech there seemed to be no loud speaker at work.

Without referring to a note, except when he read extracts from his own or the opposition leader's speeches, he mapped out a speech as far as possible different to the one he had given in Brantford the night before.

For most of his preliminary of nearly half an hour he used very few gestures. Much of the time with his hands behind or hands laid on his lapels, now and then both arms shot out in exhortation. In purely argumentive speaking he is never an orator. He warmed up as he made his opening appeal to the younger people—especially those born in the twentieth century—to consider the privileges of taking part in public affairs.

Referring to the forthcoming imperial conference, he became briefly eloquent as he named the men whom he intended to take with him to England. When he mentioned the name of Dunning the audience broke into a storm. It was obvious that the keynote of the occasion was to be fiscal.

Stresses Need of Harmony

The choice of force or of goodwill in national trade brought another salvo. The premier was always most eloquent when he talked compromise and conciliation. His whole speech was built of the need for harmonizing factions, whether in provinces, continents or empires.

The tariff occupied 45 minutes. In proving that the election tariff had not been mere sudden tactics, but the result of a tariff board and 18 months of study, he made no reference to the changed attitude of Liberalism on the tariff. This part of his speech was a masterpiece of clear exposition. He set out to teach his audience. He did it without stories, jokes or more than one personal reference to Mr. Bennett.

Many of his points in this rather dry exposition were applauded. Some of the younger people in the audience must have found so much tariff rather tiresome.

But the premier had his argument to make and he made it. When he referred to Mr. Bennett's "red-blooded" praise about dealing with tariff he brought a round of applause, one of the rare occasions when he bothered to play with an opponent's praise for the sake of oratorical effect.

Drives Points Home

Dealing with imperial trade he failed to become picturesque because he was still dealing with argument. His allusions to the empire had nothing to do with the old flag or the sun that never sets, or the throb of the war drum, but all to do with the necessity of creating inter-imperial trade whenever trade with other countries is made difficult by high tariffs. Conciliation and good will were the tunings he hammered home especially in matters of trade.

Treats Waterways Skilfully

He took special joy in reading what he had said on other occasions. One of these he read twice, and when he had finished he flourished the paper as he declaimed that in adjusting Canada's tariff to suit the exigencies of the United States tariff the government had created no offence to the other nation.

With great vigor he reverted for a few minutes to the liquor problem, when he became almost oratorical. But even this failed to keep him away from the tariff. One of his most rhetorical episodes was the reference to Mr. Bennett's accusation of the government stealing his clothes and the tariff that was made in Washington—with the inference that Mr. Bennett's political clothes must have been made in Washington.

The waterways problem was skilfully analyzed but with very little reference to it as a plank in the opposition platform. Here again he was most concerned with clearly arguing the case and with showing what difficulties the government had in getting an agreement between Ottawa and the provinces before it was possible to come to an understanding with Washington. In the flood of his argument the premier landed on the problems faced by his government since 1921. Here again he expounded his favorite ideas of conciliation and compromise. Passionately he placed the tune of what he and his government had done to bring together conflicting forces in Canada, in America, in the empire.

In His Best Form

All this led up to his peroration on unemployment which was the most eloquent part of his speech. From that to the end he was in his very best form, eagerly analyzing what he had done to grapple with the labor problem, and what were the causes of unemployment in Canada, the most prosperous country in the world.

Not often does an orator reach his greatest height in dealing with public distress. Mr. King dealt with the stock exchange and the wheat problem with almost poetic frenzy. And at the last he came down to the personal note regarding his own career as a man who had made a life study of Labor. Here he was pardonably enthusiastic, referring to the days when he had been editor of the Labor Gazette, and first deputy minister of Labor.

Hits Rhapsodic Heights

For twenty minutes in this finale he roused himself to a fine height of rhapsody. He ended his remarkable argument as an orator who was still arguing. Mr. King, with more sagacity than many and with a far greater grasp of modern methods in speaking focussed the entire argument of goodwill and conciliation in a vivid portraiture and of his grandfather, the great rebel of 1837, his mother, and of himself as the head of the government for which it was the privilege of all those he sent to vote.

The average political speaker in the old days would have vanished into a cab and gone home to bed. The inexhaustible premier of Canada spent half an hour shaking hands with the voters.

RAPS ONTARIO'S PREMIER FOR THREAT OF INTRUSION

Dominion Gov't Leader Charges His Stand on Unemployment Distorted

ANSWERS CRITICS

Special to The Star

Peterboro, June 17.—Unleashing a stinging fury of attack on those who have distorted his "five cent" speech to suit campaign purposes, Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, prime minister of Canada, flatly told Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, premier of Ontario, "to attend to his business" in a fighting speech to a monster Liberal rally in the armories here last night.

Not as a man seeking to explain the unexplainable, but as one whose words have been twisted and colored for political purposes, Premier King corrected the Conservative interpretation of his refusal to give employment relief from the federal treasury to Conservative provinces.

Recalling Mr. Ferguson's words, "I'll use the whole force of my provincial government to destroy the King government," Premier King clenched his right fist, bent low over the platform and hotly demanded:

"Since when has a provincial premier dared to commit his government to a federal issue? Let Premier Ferguson manage the affairs of the province of Ontario, as he was elected to do. Let Premier Ferguson attend to his own business."

Roar on roar of applause greeted this public rebuke.

Not a single provincial government had complained of inability to cope with the unemployment situation, when Conservative members of the House of Commons began to badger the premier with constant queries of what he intended to do for the provinces with regard to unemployment relief, Premier King told the audience.

"Read the whole of the debate in Hansard for that day, April 3," he invited, referring to the discussion which had preceded the "five-cent speech" in the Commons. "I know well the purpose of the discussion from the Conservative point of view and as each Tory member got to his feet and asked what the government was going to do for the province, I sensed the purpose at the backs of their minds.

Ferguson Had Declined Aid

"I indicated on that occasion that no province had confessed its inability to deal with unemployment. I said I did not think things had come to a pass where the provinces were not able to look after their own unemployed. I told the Conservatives I thought the time for granting unemployment relief should not come until the provinces could not deal with it themselves.

"This was, remember, only after I had drawn attention to the fact that Premier Ferguson, the man who is going to use his whole government to drive me from public life, has asserted his entire capability to deal with unemployment in Ontario."

In corroboration of this the speaker read a newspaper interview given last January by Mr. Ferguson, who said: "Our unemployment problem is spotty in various sections. It centres chiefly in Toronto, but we are paying one-third of the cost by the municipalities, and it seems to be meeting the situation."

"In the face of knowledge that the provinces were able at the time to look after their unemployed, should I have done what the Conservatives were seeking to have me do?" inquired Mr. King. "I was dealing with the unemployment situation at the time and at that time only. If you look at Hansard for that day you will see I was interrupted continually by Conservative members.

"Again, let me repeat, we have had no representation from any other province for federal aid because of the inability of the province to stand on its own feet. Ferguson was perfectly able to cope with the situation in Ontario, according to his own statement."

Denies Discrimination

From the outset of his administration aid had been given just as freely to Conservative governments as to Liberal or Progressive, Mr. King reminded the cheering audience.

"I sought to protect the public treasury against what I thought at the time was a purely political scheme," the prime minister stated. "I had no wish to set province against province or treat a Conservative province one whit differently than a Liberal province. My chief endeavor has always been to reconcile differences between province and province, province and Dominion and Dominion and the mother country.

"Is all that to be undone by the premier of a Conservative province entering the field of a federal election campaign? It is the first time any government has ever done that. I have never intruded into a provincial election nor has any of my cabinet, even as a private citizen. I was placed in office to try to keep peace, not to stir up ill-will and enmity. It seemed better taste and better form to stay out of provincial elections," he said, significantly.

"The speech from the throne had heralded a gigantic conference to discuss unemployment at the opening of the next session," Premier King stated. "Mr. Bennett wanted a special session of parliament, but what good is a special session unless you have a platform to adopt?" inquired the premier. "The conference will be something much better."

To it would be invited, not only the premiers of the provinces and their representatives, but the heads of Canada's giant transportation companies, representatives of great municipalities and envoys of Labor. "Every point of view will be represented and I am confident that we can work out a scheme which will deal with the unemployment situation. Is that not a better way than to have one entity, such as a province, ladling out charity on federal money, and failing altogether to attack the root causes of the trouble?"

Exposes Foes' Tactics

Hon. R. B. Bennett and the Conservative candidates are seeking to capitalize on existing unemployment and to place on the shoulders of the present government a condition over which they have no control, charged Premier King. Employment has actually increased 30 per cent. in the past nine years, he stated.

"Mr. Bennett has been saying a great deal of conditions of unemployment in Canada during the last few months," he said. "I have no complaint to make of the attention he has directed to this great economic problem, but I do object most strenuously to the manner in which he has exaggerated it out of all proportion, and to his attempt to convey the impression that the present unemployment in Canada is due to any neglect or failure upon the part of the present administration.

"As is well known by all students of economic conditions, the world is now passing through a period of price dislocation following the recent financial crisis from stock markets. In some countries this price dislocation has led to a pronounced industrial depression and to widespread unemployment. It would be unreasonable to expect that Canada could remain entirely free from the effects of a situation which is universal in its application. At the same time, Mr.

Bennett is perfectly aware that no country in the world has suffered less from the present depression than this Dominion.

"Were it not for his desire to exploit unemployment for political purposes, he would, I think, as a Canadian, be proud to acknowledge and to assert that there could have been no greater tribute to the stability of the industrial and commercial foundations of our prosperity, than the manner in which we have met the slackening of business which has taken place within recent months.

Canada Weathers Storm

"I make this statement without any reservation, that no country in the world has come through the recent financial crisis, with more creditable showing than Canada. This is not merely the testimony of government officials, but it is the unanimous verdict of presidents and general managers of financial institutions and the heads of investment houses whose business it is to study comparative statistics of trade and industry.

"Before leaving Ottawa a few days ago, I asked the bureau of statistics to prepare for me a statement dealing with the position in this country with respect to employment and unemployment in recent years. The bureau of statistics collect monthly reports on the number of employees of over 7,000 firms who employed, on May 1, 1930, some 976,000 persons. These statistics have been collected monthly since 1921 and are expressed as index numbers with the average for the calander year 1926, taken as 100. I should like to point out to Mr. Bennett that for every 88 persons employed in these industries when the last Conservative government was in office, there were 119 persons employed in the year 1929.

"I should like further to point out that, for every 85 persons employed in April, 1921, there are over 111 employed in April, 1930. In other words, during the period of this administration in this country, employment in these manufacturing industries has increased by 30 per cent., while the population of the country has only increased at the rate of 15 per cent. These are figures in which Canadians should take the greatest pride, while realizing to the full, the necessity of meeting the existing conditions of unemployment, this evidence of stability should give us cause for faith and confidence in the sound and unassailable economic structure of our country.

"I venture to predict, however, that no Conservative speakers, despite their avowed attachment to 'Canada first' will inform you of this splendid tribute to the stability of the Dominion, at a time when other countries are suffering severely from the effects of economic dislocation. They will continue to exaggerate conditions of unemployment and will persist in conveying a false impression of the situation that exists.

"May I say this further, in dealing with the question of unemployment, that in all the discussion of this important question, the Conservative party has put forward no constructive proposal to deal with the root cause of the unemployment problem.

"Only two months ago there was a prolonged debate, a six-day debate in the House of Commons on unemployment, arising out of a motion by a Labor member. What constructive policy did Mr. Bennett have to advance on that occasion? Surely, had he been genuinely convinced of the existence of an overwhelming emergency and convinced that he had the key to its solution, he would have taken advantage of that debate to expound it to the House. Would you believe it that the leader who now wants to call a special session to deal with unemployment did not, two short months ago, think it necessary to contribute a single word to that debate.

"But what of his colleagues? What practical ideas had they to advance? They rang the changes on two proposals: First, that the Dominion should make unemployment grants to the provinces, which had not and have not yet asked for such aid, and second, that we should adopt a policy of protection, protection as they have it in those protectionist paradises, the United States and Australia, where it has not averted an unemployment problem immensely more serious than our own."

Upholds Liquor Export Ban

Premier King expressed heartfelt gratitude that the Liberal government had severed its connection with the rum running traffic by prohibiting liquor exports to the United States.

"There are none of us who did not realize it was a detestable business—a traffic which could only have been carried on with the co-operation of Canadian government officials," he said. "It was transported on the permit of a government officer, although each of us knew it could not be imported into the United States.

"If anything serious had happened while Canadians were defying the laws of a friendly nation it is difficult to say just how far the consequences might have gone. Supposing a vessel had been sunk with a dozen Canadians aboard — who knows to what lengths the affair might have gone?"

Despite the increase in Canadian tariff laws against United States products Canada and the United States are now on friendlier terms than ever before, he urged, chiefly because Canada had shown her goodwill in banning the liquor export trade.

"Now the United States knows that any heightening of the Canadian tariff is not the result of petty spite but the consequence of its own act," Premier King declared.

"To-day is a very significant occasion in the history of the United States and this country," Premier King advised his hearers. "To day at noon President Hoover signed the new tariff bill which has raised its barriers against Canadian goods, and it will take effect at midnight.

"The tariff in the United States is the result of the belief of President Hoover that if he held out tariff changes as an inducement to the rural population, he would win the election. It is not for us to say what the U. S. can do, but it is for us to let the United States know that Canada is willing only to trade with those who are willing to trade with us."

Derides Conservative Plea

Mr. King held up to the ridicule of his audience the suggestion of Hon. R. J. Manion and Hon. R. B. Bennett that parliament remain in special session "in a red-blooded attitude" to retaliate when the United States brings in the tariff directed against Canadian farm products.

"We would have remained in this red-blooded attitude until now," Premier King reminded the meeting. "I believe that the policy I advocated then, that of cool-headed investigation and a careful search for fresh markets, is the more reasonable."

Tariffs are not easily changed at the slightest whim of sectional prejudice, he pointed out. "Tariffs are like a skein or net. You make a small hole in one spot and it begins to unravel to a degree of which we never dreamed."

The advisory tariff board, through careful, judicial investigation from every angle, could best indicate where the hole could be made with the best possible advantage to the skein.

"The budget has been framed to meet existing conditions, not one month, two months, or three months, but a whole year, before it was needed," Mr. King affirmed.

Seeks Agreement on Waterways

A policy of conciliation, settling the ancient disputes over power and navigation rights, which have prevented an agreement between the federal and provincial governments, and thus paving the way for negotiations with the United States for speedy construction of the St. Lawrence waterway, has been ignored by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, Mr. King stated, in outlining the efforts of the Liberal government to progress with the work.

"On January 24 last the federal government submitted a plan which would permit the Dominion to proceed with the navigation phase of the work and the provinces to go ahead with the power development," he told his audience. "It was an agreement we were prepared to stand by; an agreement whereby we said: 'You can have the power to develop, conditional on navigation requirements. We will treat you as if you owned the power. Go on with your plans. All we say is that you should submit your plans to us so that we can make sure they fit in with navigation requirements of the development."

"That was pretty generous, wasn't it?" inquired the premier, pausing. "We gave the provinces what they were fighting for, without prejudice to the legal rights of either federal or provincial governments. Up to now that agreement has not been accepted. If it had been accepted, the way would have been clear to negotiations with the United States. But as long as there is any difference between provinces and the Dominion government which the provinces refuse to attempt to adjust, no progress can be made with the St. Lawrence waterway."

Premier King observed that he did not think that any government could have worked out a satisfactory arrangement for development of the St. Lawrence in conjunction with the United States during the past two years.

"The reaction of Canadians against the tariff wall raised against our products to-day would have been too great," he said. "The Conservatives would have told you we were 'giving everything to the United States'."

Jurisdiction Overlaps

Premier King read the terms of the basis of agreement submitted to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

(1) Where a province desires to undertake power development in navigable waters, its right to do so shall be recognized, conditional on the provision of the necessary navigation requirements.

(2) Should the Dominion government at any time undertake or authorize the construction of any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation, it would be prepared to make available to an approved provincial agency the surplus water power developed beyond that needed for the operation of the locks and purposes of navigation, on a basis equivalent to that which would govern if the provincial agency had itself undertaken the work as a power development scheme.

(3) In either case, should the use of Dominion or provincial property be required or the riparian or other property rights of the Dominion or province be interfered with or affected, the acquisition of such property, or the authority to interfere with or affect such rights could be made the subject of a special agreement in the particular circumstances of each case.

The speaker outlined the difficulties which beset the construction of the waterway from the beginning. Rights of the United States, the federal government and the provinces had overlapped and conflicted from the beginning, and no sooner was one difficulty overcome than another was discovered, he stated.

Disputes over the manner of construction and ownership of power had been the main obstacles to development of the great plan. "Before we could make any progress at all in negotiations with the United States we had to settle the dispute between provinces and federal governments over the ownership of power rights," he said.

Preliminary to discussing the St. Lawrence waterways project, Premier King explained the evils which arose from international dissensions in any country, stressing his points in a manner which rendered them particularly applicable to Premier Ferguson.

"I say to the heads of every province in Canada, bar none," he exhorted, "be careful not to stir up trouble, nor raise old antagonism between governments. The first duty of any man is to see that governments work together in harmony. Try to reconcile differences—try to keep Canada united—to wipe out differences between class and class, creed and creed. Each must make some compromise if we are to live together in unity. The biggest task of all is to keep the provinces and the Dominion friendly."

Under his administration the Liberal government had amicably settled the ancient natural resources problem of the western provinces by generous treatment of their grievances, he stated. "We not only gave them back their natural resources but gave them also the subsidies previous governments had given in lieu of these resources," the premier reminded his audience.

"The provinces gradually began to believe they had been robbed of their resources and, as each Conservative government failed to settle them, the provinces became more and more acrimonious."

Sees Liberal Victory

Hon. G. N. Gordon, K.C., former minister of immigration, thought it significant for Liberal hopes in Peterboro that the prime minister had visited the city.

"Every time he has visited this city during a campaign, a Liberal member has been elected," he recalled. "Mr. Bennett must obtain 38 more seats at the coming election, to hold power. He can't do it.

"I bring a messagee to you from the youth of Canada—the Twentieth Century Liberal Club of Toronto," Mrs. Turner Skaith, a glowing vibrant figure of modern womanhood, told the audience.

"Canadianism and Liberalism are two terms that are synonymous to-day. Liberalism is the broad, free policy which can cast aside outworn conventions fearlessly when need arises. Conservatism is bound in iron fetters of thought. Its policy is to preserve what we have for those who have it—and to grab more when the opportunity presents itself.

"Who will say the policy of Sir John A. Macdonald was not fitted for the time in which it arose? But a policy which keeps the toilers in a state of semi-serfdom is not good enough for this new Canada. The national policy made a few rich men—and kept them so. The glamor of the name of Sir John A. Macdonald kept it alive long after it had outlived its usefulness."

Sir Wilfred Laurier legislated for the many, not for the few, she asserted.

"Opportunity for the youth of to-day can only come with the application of Liberal principles in government," she concluded.

Appreciates Aid of Young

The premier tendered thanks to Mrs. Skaith for her work on behalf of the Twentieth Century Club. "Think of that great force of young life, filled with high ideals and noble aspirations," the premier urged. "It is a great inspiration for us who are burdened with the work of the day.

"I am not one of those who think Conservatism is all wrong. Toryism is is all wrong, but Toryism is the worst feature of Conservatism. But you will notice that when the opposition appears in public it links the word 'Liberal' with 'Conservative'."

Liberalism sought to broaden the avenues of advance for the great bulk of the people, he said, and was more and more attracting men of upright character and splendid ability; men of the calibre of Mr. Duffus, the Peterboro candidate.

Laughter greeted the humorous sally of the premier at the disadvantages of the radio. "You can't go to a new city each day and tell them that they are the finest crowd you have addressed. They have heard you say the same thing in another city on the previous night, sitting at home at their radio."

The premier's visit fell on the birthday of J. J. Duffus, Liberal candidate for Peterboro West, who promised to conduct a clean, yet vigorous campaign in the interests of the party.

Says Bennett Switches

"I believe no man in Canada has a more comprehensive knowledge or a more sympathetic appreciation of the requirements to all classes of people from ocean to ocean than the present prime minister," he stated. "The present leader and members of the opposition have apparently no constructive policy whatever to offer. In addition, the honorable leader of the great Conservative party definitely made the statement less than four years ago in the House of Commons that Canada was only a colony; that legally and otherwise the time had not arrived for her to assume the status of nationhood. This same gentleman has the unadulterated effrontery to-day to say, 'This colony (Canada) first and Great Britain second.'

"In my opinion there is only one way to treat with this class of public men and that is to see to it with that sacred instrument, the ballot, on July 28 that he is eliminated from public life and that the present prime minister is returned to power with an overwhelming majority; that his cabinet ministers, who have labored so sincerely in the best interest of Canada, are returned with him and that Peterboro West is again placed in the Liberal fold."

Dr. J. J. Craig, president of West Peterboro Liberal association, extended to Premier King a hearty welcome. "It may be true that we are not enjoying to the fullest extent the prosperity of last year," he said. "But if we look at the prevailing conditions throughout the world to-day we are, in comparison with other countries of the world, in a most enviable position, and with the undoubted return of the prime minister and his government to office Canada will go forward to a greater height of prosperity than ever before."

THE PREMIER'S STATEMENT ON UNEMPLOYMENT.

At Peterboro the prime minister made a statement on unemployment, but we doubt if it will convince the public. He recited statistics to prove that there is more employment to-day than in 1926 or 1921, but figures can be made to support any theory, while existing conditions in every walk of life are obvious to every man and woman in the Dominion. The farmers of the west know that the Government has taken no effective steps to assist in the marketing of their surplus wheat. Dairy farmers and live stock raisers all over the country are suffering from the results of the administration's policies.

So are our manufacturing industries, and the unprecedented number of workless people who are walking the streets. It is noteworthy, moreover, that the prime minister continues to evade our questions regarding his notorious "Not a "five-cent piece" speech in the House of Commons.

PREMIER REVEALS MASTERFUL GRASP OF NATION'S NEEDS

Seems Inexhaustible in Power and Argument on Election Issues

LACKS FLAG-WAVING

By AUGUSTUS BRIDLE

Peterboro, June 17.—For two hours the prime minister of Canada, a stocky figure in gray, stood at the end of a long audience in the armories here to-night and talked without ceasing, except for applause. One of the longest hustings speeches on record and one of the most parliamentary. At 11.45 when he stopped speaking the premier probably rather exhausted, seemed to be just warming up to the power of the occasion.

Much is vitality, clear argument, power to speak without notes and to hammer enough truths as he sees them to make a book. There have been greater political speeches than this; speeches far more emotional and humorous; not often one of such a mastery of complete argument. It was the premier of Canada conducting a case in court on his own behalf.

He spoke, not so much as a politician as a counsel with a brief, or a minister replying to right hon. gentlemen opposite in parliament.

The armories holds about 3,000 people. The hall was packed except for a few of the rear seats where the duel of the six loud speakers in front of the hall became a duel with the battery outside. People left the rear seats to go out to the cool spaces of the park and hear the voice on the wall while they stood and watched the speaker through the archway.

Fine audience, of all sorts and ages. Motors parked on three sides of the park. Flags portiered on the walls. Placards postered over the stage—mainly about empire. A sounding board built over the speaker. Stage packed with supporters—including one lady representing the Twentieth Century club. Planks laid on chairs and upholstered with wrapping paper.

The Caledonia band stationed at the front. And before the chairman called upon the Hon. G. N. Gordon to introduce the premier Peterboro's popular soprano, Mrs. Dorothy Allan Park, sang "Land of Hope and Glory" as appropriate to the empire speech as a hymn is to a sermon.

In State of Tension

Everything modern. Old Peterboro that used to rally to hear Laurier and Stratton and Borden and all the other notables of last century keyed up to a state of tension mainly to hear a man who for most two hours did nothing but state a case.

The premier stood while the band played "O Canada." Even in all-British Peterboro it was realized that not since Laurier has that national hymn been so appropriate as it is to the man who succeeded to the Laurier traditions and prestige in Quebec. Mackenzie King has always been fond of music. Years ago he was an enthusiast for popular songs when that hymn was composed in Quebec city as the perpetual voice of one of the two great historic races in Canada.

He took care to copy nobody in his method. He spent no time on local history, said nothing about the pioneers of Peterboro or its home industries and traditions. His sole reference to the city concerned the welcome he had received and a graceful appreciation of everybody who had taken part in it. The only usual things he did before he squared away to his great argument were to kiss the little girl who handed him the bouquet and stand her on the table. After which he took a drink of water before he said a word.

Differs From Brantford

It was noticeable at once how well he uses the microphone. Some of the previous speakers had shouted at it so hard that the amplification distorted the words. The premier began very easily. For half his speech there seemed to be no loud speaker at work.

Without referring to a note, except when he read extracts from his own or the opposition leader's speeches, he mapped out a speech as far as possible different to the one he had given in Brantford the night before.

For most of his preliminary of nearly half an hour he used very few gestures. Much of the time with his hands behind or hands laid on his lapels, now and then both arms shot out in exhortation. In purely argumentive speaking he is never an orator. He warmed up as he made his opening appeal to the younger people—especially those born in the twentieth century—to consider the privileges of taking part in public affairs.

Referring to the forthcoming imperial conference, he became briefly eloquent as he named the men whom he intended to take with him to England. When he mentioned the name of Dunning the audience broke into a storm. It was obvious that the keynote of the occasion was to be fiscal.

Stresses Need of Harmony

The choice of force or of goodwill in national trade brought another salvo. The premier was always most eloquent when he talked compromise and conciliation. His whole speech was built of the need for harmonizing factions, whether in provinces, continents or empires.

The tariff occupied 45 minutes. In proving that the election tariff had not been mere sudden tactics, but the result of a tariff board and 18 months of study, he made no reference to the changed attitude of Liberalism on the tariff. This part of his speech was a masterpiece of clear exposition. He set out to teach his audience. He did it without stories, jokes or more than one personal reference to Mr. Bennett.

Many of his points in this rather dry exposition were applauded. Some of the younger people in the audience must have found so much tariff rather tiresome.

But the premier had his argument to make and he made it. When he referred to Mr. Bennett's "red-blooded" praise about dealing with tariff he brought a round of applause, one of the rare occasions when he bothered to play with an opponent's praise for the sake of oratorical effect.

Drives Points Home

Dealing with imperial trade he failed to become picturesque because he was still dealing with argument. His allusions to the empire had nothing to do with the old flag or the sun that never sets, or the throb of the war drum, but all to do with the necessity of creating inter-imperial trade whenever trade with other countries is made difficult by high tariffs. Conciliation and good will were the tunings he hammered home especially in matters of trade.

Treats Waterways Skilfully

He took special joy in reading what he had said on other occasions. One of these he read twice, and when he had finished he flourished the paper as he declaimed that in adjusting Canada's tariff to suit the exigencies of the United States tariff the government had created no offence to the other nation.

With great vigor he reverted for a few minutes to the liquor problem, when he became almost oratorical. But even this failed to keep him away from the tariff. One of his most rhetorical episodes was the reference to Mr. Bennett's accusation of the government stealing his clothes and the tariff that was made in Washington—with the inference that Mr. Bennett's political clothes must have been made in Washington.

The waterways problem was skilfully analyzed but with very little reference to it as a plank in the opposition platform. Here again he was most concerned with clearly arguing the case and with showing what difficulties the government had in getting an agreement between Ottawa and the provinces before it was possible to come to an understanding with Washington. In the flood of his argument the premier landed on the problems faced by his government since 1921. Here again he expounded his favorite ideas of conciliation and compromise. Passionately he placed the tune of what he and his government had done to bring together conflicting forces in Canada, in America, in the empire.

In His Best Form

All this led up to his peroration on unemployment which was the most eloquent part of his speech. From that to the end he was in his very best form, eagerly analyzing what he had done to grapple with the labor problem, and what were the causes of unemployment in Canada, the most prosperous country in the world.

Not often does an orator reach his greatest height in dealing with public distress. Mr. King dealt with the stock exchange and the wheat problem with almost poetic frenzy. And at the last he came down to the personal note regarding his own career as a man who had made a life study of Labor. Here he was pardonably enthusiastic, referring to the days when he had been editor of the Labor Gazette, and first deputy minister of Labor.

Hits Rhapsodic Heights

For twenty minutes in this finale he roused himself to a fine height of rhapsody. He ended his remarkable argument as an orator who was still arguing. Mr. King, with more sagacity than many and with a far greater grasp of modern methods in speaking focussed the entire argument of goodwill and conciliation in

THE ISSUE TO BE DECIDED.

Premier King put the election issue in a nutshell during his Peterboro' address when he said: "Is this policy (intra-Empire trade) in the interests of Canada and the British Empire? If so, let us support it. If it is not, let us reject it. That is the question before you to settle."

So momentous and yet so obviously plain a question is to be settled by the voters of Canada when they mark their ballots for or against Canada's Empire Budget on July 28. They will determine the fate of the country's future prosperity; they will decide whether the great wave of co-operative sentiment sweeping the Empire as a result of the Budget proposals is to be maintained or deadened.

Welcoming the delegates to the Empire Chambers of Commerce congress, the Prince of Wales said: "It is trade on which every constituent portion of the British Empire is built up, and to which it must look for its continued existence." Is it not logical, therefore, that the various parts of the Empire should get together and agree how they can best build themselves up through trade channels? Canada would put her imprimatur on this suggestion by sending to the Imperial Conferences spokesmen committed to her Empire Budget and competent and willing to explain its possibilities.

Viewed only from the standpoint of national selfishness, it seems impossible for the Dominion to consider any other solution for the trade situation. Markets are essential for her existence; those on which she has depended in the past to absorb a large portion of her products are being closed more tightly. Substitute outlets must be found—not for a season or a year, but for decades, if international trading is to be continued on a stable basis. The Empire units offer the only markets in which there is reasonable expectation of steady friendliness and reliability. And these other units are also looking for dependable countries with which to trade. The setting is complete for a mutually profitable agreement by which Empire countries will share the immediate advantage of $4,500,000,000 worth of additional commerce now going to foreign nations.

It should not be hard to see that the present is a particularly opportune time to grasp the possibilities of the Empire trade routes and increase their activity. Every nation is striving as never before to work out a fiscal and trade policy which will overcome the difficulties and causes of unemployment. The trade world seems to have reached another of those milestones in which the past is discarded and a new alignment sought or a new struggle made to become self-contained. No part of the British Empire remains unaffected by this. Therefore the Empire and all its constituents have to adjust themselves to conditions, in which the natural view is to consider how the $11,000,000,000 worth of Empire trade can best be directed for Empire profit. The solution is made immeasurably simpler by the fact that the Empire produces every known type of food and raw material, and, with few exceptions, notably cotton, in quantities sufficient for all Empire needs. No other aggregation of nations is so advantageously placed, and no other great aggregation can get together on a family basis.

Canada has been forced up against the hard facts by seeing her market in Great Britain decline during the past year because of economic conditions, and her markets in the United States and elsewhere restricted by tariffs. The latter must be accepted as the business policy of others, but the former is something which this country can and is obliged to help remedy. A big step has been taken by the Dunning Budget in offering greater opportunities for British commodities; it is a move to enable Britain to buy more Canadian products by selling in Canada articles heretofore purchased in countries which are proving to be unwilling to trade with us on fair terms. This is a direct illustration of how Empire countries can increase their trade to mutual advantage; it explains why it is an Empire Budget. Surely it makes clear that it is not only the best but the one way in which the ever-increasing production of the Dominion can be marketed. It is such a simple and patriotic business proposition that it is regrettable it should be made a party issue in the election. It is, in reality, a national and Imperial business issue, and ought to be accepted as such by the voters.

Après deux discours de M. King

M. King, premier ministre et qui veut le rester, et M. Bennett, jadis ministre dans les deux cabinets Meighen,—ceux des élections de 1921 et de 1926,—et qui veut supplanter M. King à la direction des affaires nationales, ont engagé pour de bon la bataille. De Brantford à Victoria, l'autre soir, ils ont alterné, l'un louangeant ce qu'a fait son parti depuis 1921, l'autre ne voyant le salut pour le Canada que dans ses mains, à lui seul. Tout ce qu'il y a de mauvais au Canada, selon l'un, est imputable au gouvernement; d'après l'autre, le ministère n'a jamais rien fait que d'excellent. Les électeurs intelligents auront tôt fait de démêler la vérité: elle n'est toute ni à droite ni à gauche; quant aux autres, ce qui se dira d'ici la fin des élections, un peu partout, ne sera pas pour les rendre moins perplexes; et s'ils n'ont, pour se guider le jour du scrutin, que leur esprit de parti, le conseiller sera précaire...

Nous avons déjà commenté le discours de M. Bennett à Winnipeg, la semaine dernière; celui de M. King, à Brantford, ces jours-ci, est si touffu, il couvre tant de terrain qu'il faut admirer quiconque, dès avant de l'avoir lu en entier, a pu tout de suite l'approuver ou le condamner en bloc. Pourtant, à la lecture attentive, on s'aperçoit que le bon et le moins bon s'y mêlent, comme a dit le député de Labelle du budget Dunning, à la mi-mai dernière.

A Winnipeg, à Regina, à Calgary, à Vancouver et à Victoria d'où il se dirige maintenant vers l'Est, M. Bennett a surtout parlé de l'avenir, de ce qu'il fera, de la prospérité qu'il offre au pays, tandis que M. King ne lui aurait apporté que le marasme, le chômage, la mévente des blés, des traités de commerce condamnables, bref, n'aurait conduit dans les pâturages canadiens que les sept vaches maigres de l'Ancien Testament. Lui, M. Bennett, il y mettra les sept vaches grasses, si on lui fait le plus petit signe.

M. King promet moins; dans son discours de Brantford, répandu de l'une à l'autre extrémités du pays par la radio, comme celui de M. Bennett, il a examiné le passé, commenté le présent, s'il n'a pas non plus oublié l'avenir.

Le passé, que fut-il, de 1921 à 1930, et surtout depuis 1926? M. King montre son gouvernement restaurateur de l'ordre dans les finances publiques compromises par la guerre et la politique de l'immédiate après-guerre; il fait voir la dette nationale portée de 336 millions à 2 milliards 427 millions de 1914 à 1921 et qui a baissé depuis de près de 300 millions grâce à son gouvernement à lui; il se félicite d'avoir aboli des impôts de guerre, d'en avoir diminué d'autres, avec cette conséquence qu'en 1930 le contribuable verse 118 millions d'impôts de moins qu'il y a cinq ans; MM. Fielding, Robb, Dunning, dit-il, ont, depuis 1924, accumulé une série de surplus annuels de 273 millions, employés à diminuer d'autant la dette nationale; et ces surplus réels, ils les ont obtenus en dépit du fait que le service des intérêts sur la dette de guerre absorbe encore environ 40 pour cent du revenu global de l'Etat; il y a eu, dit-il, consolidation, fusion et mise en oeuvre, de façon remarquable, des chemins de fer qui forment présentement le réseau des transports de l'Etat; les Provinces Maritimes ont obtenu le redressement de leurs griefs légitimes, celles des prairies, la remise de leurs ressources naturelles, en même temps que toutes les provinces ont reçu de l'Etat fédéral des sommes importantes, — l'Ontario à lui seul a touché 130 millions; entre temps, la situation internationale du Canada s'est améliorée, il est plus qu'un Dominion, il est maintenant une nation.

Le tirage des Zouaves de l'Immaculée-Conception

Les noms et numéros gagnants du tirage organisé par les Zouaves de l'Immaculée-Conception qui eut lieu hier soir sont: le no 30,463, R. P. Lavoie, S.J., directeur des missions de Chine, Québec. Le no 44,083, le Dr Roux, 2280 rue Ste-Catherine est, Montréal. Le no 40,544, Mlle Marguerite Couture, 4085 rue Papineau, Montréal.

Pourtant, un nombre grandissant de jeunes gens s'en viennent au journalisme, chaque année; il y a même une section de journalisme à l'Ecole des Sciences Sociales Economiques et Politiques à Montréal, elle a de ses anciens élèves dans plusieurs salles de rédaction. Or nulle part, dans la plaquette, il n'y a un mot sur cette école, ni sur le journalisme.

La lacune est frappante. Le journalisme serait-il donc qualité et occupation négligeables? M. Perron, un soir, a parlé de ceux qui "échouent dans le journalisme". Serait-ce donc un écueil?

De tout ce tableau, où M. King n'a pas mis d'ombres, il n'y a guère à reprendre. M. Bourassa l'a dit à Papineauville le premier juin, les adversaires du gouvernement King n'ont pu porter contre lui ni contre l'un quelconque de ses ministres la moindre accusation de malversation, depuis neuf ans qu'il tient le pouvoir. Le fait est à noter, il est d'importance, en un pays de régime démocratique.

Pour le présent, M. King insiste surtout, après avoir montré le résultat de son administration passée, sur la préférence britannique et l'imposition de droits compensateurs et d'un tarif saisonnier envers les Etats-Unis. De ces deux derniers articles, les lecteurs du Devoir se rappellent ce qu'a dit M. Bourassa dans son discours du 15 mai aux Communes et dans sa revue des travaux parlementaires devant ses électeurs, à Saint-André-Avellin (voir le Devoir du 2 juin). Le tarif compensateur a ses raisons; il correspond à une demande générale dans des groupes d'électeurs nombreux. Le gouvernement y a ajouté, après que M. Bourassa et d'autres députés eurent exprimé là-dessus l'avis qu'un tarif saisonnier, déjà suggéré par feu M. Roch Lanctôt, protégerait mieux le cultivateur et l'horticulteur, de nouvelles modifications, équitables pour ceux-ci. Peut-être cela ne donnera-t-il pas tout le résultat qu'en attendent les intéressés; du moins ils obtiennent le degré de protection périodique qu'ils ont réclamée.

Quant au long plaidoyer de M. King pour une préférence britannique accrue et unilatérale, aucun lecteur du Devoir ne peut ignorer là-dessus le point de vue du Devoir. M. Bourassa l'a dit aux Communes, il l'a répété à Saint-André et à Mont-Laurier, nous ne sommes pas, ici, partisans de la préférence britannique telle que l'expose le budget Dunning. "Il s'agit d'une question de commerce. Nous devrions, l'automne prochain, faire des propositions commerciales équitables au gouvernement anglais, au lieu d'accorder à l'avance une certaine faveur à une industrie ou à l'autre. Nous devrions entamer des négociations avec le gouvernement anglais en affirmant que le Canada est disposé à favoriser l'importation des marchandises anglaises en général, pourvu que nous sachions ce que les Anglais consentiraient à faire pour nous. De cette façon nous pourrions obtenir des accords commerciaux favorables et amener la Grande-Bretagne à acheter notre blé plutôt que celui de l'Argentine ou d'autres pays..... Il me semble que si nous voulions offrir des avantages commerciaux au gouvernement britannique et au peuple anglais, nous devions agir avec eux comme nous l'avons fait avec les Américains: énoncer nos conditions, non pas dans un esprit mercantile, mais sur la base solide de l'équité et des affaires" (M. Bourassa, discours du 15 mai aux Communes, Débats, version française, pp. 2200-2201). Aussi bien, la partie du discours de M. King à Brantford où il traite de la préférence britannique est la plus faible, si celle où il parle des droits compensateurs et du tarif saisonnier sur les importations d'origine américaine est meilleure, plus solidement étayée.

A Vancouver, il y a quelques heures, M. Bennett, en termes enflammés, a sommé M. King de se rappeler qu'une seule question se débat, à cette élection-ci: celle de ramener la prospérité économique au pays, qu'il représente conduit à la ruine par le ministère, appauvri, dévasté. Le seul remède, c'est une protection élevée. L'élection ne se fait pas sur un champ aussi restreint que cela. Il n'y a pas devant l'électeur que le problème tarifaire, le budget Dunning. Notre situation économique, pour une grande part, se rattache à la stupide politique de guerre du passé. La question tarifaire a du poids, certes; mais elle n'est qu'un des aspects de notre politique générale. On l'a dit ailleurs, elle tient une place secondaire dans l'ensemble de la situation. M. Bennett rattache tout à la protection. C'est une erreur. Le tarif n'est pas une panacée; quoi que l'on en pense, l'on ne doit pas oublier le reste, ni chercher à le faire oublier.

Au premier rang des questions vitales pour le Canada, il y a celle de l'impérialisme politique. M. Bennett, à Vancouver, n'a pas répondu à M. King qui lui demande quelle serait à Londres l'attitude de ses ministres, à supposer qu'il prît le pouvoir le 28 juillet; qui, par exemple, pourrait y parler comme M. Lapointe, en 1926, en 1929; quels représentants il y enverrait, capables d'y traiter avec la franchise, la fermeté, la diplomatie de ceux qui, depuis 1926, ont obtenu pour le Canada la situation que l'on sait, ont inauguré là-bas une politique franchement canadienne. M. Bennett répond dédaigneusement (Star du 18 juin, page 2), parle de "paper negotiations", ne veut pas admettre que, sur ce point, le gouvernement présent ait fait quoi que ce soit, obtenu quoi que ce soit de bon. C'est tenir pour négligeable le progrès accompli par le Canada dans la voie de l'autonomie complète, depuis 1921; c'est montrer un bout d'oreille à la fois coloniale et jingoe, tandis que le gouvernement, lui, peut se féliciter justement de ce qu'il a obtenu là-bas depuis 1921, surtout depuis 1926.

M. King, s'il expose de façon peu convaincante la question d'une préférence accrue, unilatérale, sans rien en retour, parle mieux et plus judicieusement du "parti qui a travaillé et réussi", mis en opposition à "celui qui a fait de l'opposition et de l'obstruction" dans la voie de l'autonomie. Et là-dessus, son interpellation à M. Bennett mérite une réponse plus précise que les paroles à la fois vagues et cavalières du chef de l'opposition.

Faisons le voeu qu'il la donne enfin au pays, d'ici le 26 juin, — date où il parlera à Montréal, — ou du moins ce soir-là même. Car il n'y a pas, pour les Canadiens fiers d'être Canadiens, que le tarif, ni la protection. "Canada first", a dit M. Bennett. C'est très bien. Mais dans nos relations économiques seulement? Et qui croira que tout l'avenir d'un pays est enfermé derrière la muraille la plus haute d'un protectionnisme "brick for brick"?

M. KING VISITE SA FORTERESSE

Rappeler que M. King doit ses succès électoraux à la province de Québec et à ses vieux lutteurs libéraux, ce n'est pas manquer d'égard envers le premier ministre du Canada. Surtout si nous nous empressons d'ajouter que, sans des talents particuliers et certaine habileté administrative, M. King n'aurait pas su maintenir son prestige même auprès d'un altruiste comme M. Lapointe et de ses ardents partisans québecois. Après dix ans de rentrée dans l'arène fédérale, et huit années de gouvernement, c'est probablement encore à Québec, de toutes les villes du Canada, que la visite de M. King et ses discours sont le plus impatiemment attendus. Aussi est-ce mieux que suivre une tradition d'hospitalité, c'est aller au-devant d'un voeu populaire que de souhaiter la bienvenue à M. King, en son nom personnel et en sa qualité de chef du parti libéral canadien, lorsqu'il vient passer en revue son état-major et l'armée de ses partisans canadiens-français, dans l'ancienen forteresse autrefois conquise par son illustre devancier — Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Nous sommes certain qu'il lui sera fait, comme toujours, une réception enthousiaste, et nous formulons l'espoir que la température sera favorable à une grande et belle assemblée.

U. S. AND PREMIER KING

Premier Mackenzie King's speech in Brantford, with which he opened the election campaign for his party, is being carefully—and rather nervously—scrutinized in the United States. Canada is Uncle Sam's "best customer," and the humor which that customer displays of not taking it lying down is causing general alarm; it must be said, however, that it creates little or no surprise. As keen business people, citizens of the United States fully realize Canada's position; there is no disposition to regard whatever retaliatory measures may be adopted by this Dominion as a sign of unfriendliness or an unwillingness to trade on a reciprocal basis. It is realized that Canada's action is entirely one of self-defense, if not of self-preservation. "American business shrewdness, American shopkeeping sense must certainly appear to have fallen into stupidity, thus to alienate neighbors who have been the largest purchasers of our wares," says the New York Times. "Prime Minister King is for the most friendly relations with this country, and, as a Liberal and former free-trader, is himself desirous of putting no check upon the free flow of commodities between the two countries. From it both stand to gain, just as both are likely to lose from any artificial restrictions upon trade. However, the final word of the Canadian government is that it is unable to consider questions of international commerce except upon 'a reciprocal basis.'"

It is pointed out that Canada makes no "protest;" all that Premier King does is to state the position of this country in a way which cannot possibly be misunderstood. President Hoover is appealed to by the Times to take up the case of Canada without delay, in view of the president's statement that he considered the powers of the tariff commission quite adequate to deal fairly and effectively with the grievances of other nations. It is quite evident that the stand taken by the Canadian government is having the effect of arousing public opinion in the United States to a sense of the probable consequences of the passage of the Hawley-Smooth legislation. The stimulation of imperial sentiment for which recent developments are responsible is another factor which is not lost sight of in the discussion.

Mr. King's Half Truths

Hon. Dr. Manion was right when he said that Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King equivocates and deals in half truths. It is hard to keep patience with a man who twists and turns his facts like Mr. King. Take for example his Peterboro speech of Tuesday night, in which to prove that he was not unfair to Ontario and that his "not a nickel to a Tory Government" speech meant nothing, he quoted statistics to show that since be became premier the Dominion Government had paid to Ontario a total of $31,231,805. This sounds very impressive. But let us examine the facts.

Under the British North America Act, passed in 1867, the Dominion Government must pay to each province an annual subsidy. Mr. King has no alternative. This has been paid to Ontario ever since Confederation. It totals $2,642,611.65 annually. Mr. King has the audacity to claim credit for this. The credit belongs to the Fathers of Confederation. Then Mr. King proceeded to point out what his Government had paid for highways, technical education and agriculture to Ontario. When Sir Robert Borden was prime minister he passed legislation whereby the Dominion Government assisted the provinces in the building of highways, the development of agriculture, and the encouragement of technical education. This legislation covered a ten-year period, and the time had not run out when Mr. King obtained power. Mr. King, under statute, had to pay this amount. As soon as the legislation expired Mr. King refused to continue it. He said it was obnoxious legislation. All these grants to Ontario have been cut off. Mr. King is claiming credit for payments to Ontario which were passed by a Conservative Government and which have now been eliminated by Mr. King. This he did not tell the people of Peterboro or Brantford.

In 1922, when the present Government came into power, Ontario was receiving $6,000,877.64 annually from the Dominion treasury. By 1929 that figure had been reduced to $2,736,607. Here is a comparative statement of federal payments to Ontario in the years 1922 and 1929:

	1922	1929
Statutory subsidy	$2,642,611.68	$2,642,611.68
Highway	2,047,918.28	Dropped
Agriculture	336,303.26	Dropped
Technical Education	314,206.97	Dropped
Employment offices	82,764.92	61,570.02
Unemployment relief	519,598.85	Dropped
Eradication venereal disease	57,472.68	32,425.43
	$6,000,877.64	$2,736,007.62

Premier King, in his efforts to cover up his five-cent speech, to offset his refusal to give aid for unemployment to Tory provinces, cites what he has done for the provinces. But he has included in his statement grants that he has now cut off to Ontario. He has cited half truths. He has reduced the assistance to Ontario practically to the subsidy arranged under the British North America Act. He tries to claim credit which belongs to the Fathers of Confederation.

Statements of Fact

Premier King, speaking at Peterboro, Ont., Tuesday night, in the second address of his campaign, charged Mr. Bennett with exaggerating the unemployment situation in Canada and with exploiting it for his own political ends. Pointing to the virtually world-wide nature of unemployment, he emphasized that the world is now passing through a period of price dislocation following the recent financial crisis in the stock markets. In some countries this price dislocation had led to a pronounced industrial depression and to grave unemployment. As for Canada, however, no country in the world had suffered less from the present depression than this country; indeed, no country had come through the recent financial crisis with a more creditable showing than the Dominion.

Mr. King has appraised the Canadian unemployment situation in the broad way that it should be viewed, and many who heard Mr. Bennett discuss this situation at his recent Regina meeting will note the contrast in the two leaders' whole discussion of it. Mr. Bennett ignored the unemployment that exists, and on a much more serious scale than in Canada, in the United States, Great Britain and several other countries. One would gather from the Conservative leader's remarks that Canada was the only country in the world with a problem of this nature.

An interesting tribute to the wealth of economic knowledge that Mr. King brings to discussion of the unemployment situation and other economic problems comes from R. J. Deachman, well known Western journalist. Says this writer: "Mr. Mackenzie King has been a student of financial conditions all his life. He is an economist of exceptional and outstanding ability. He notes the trend; he sees the facts."

It is this same wealth of economic knowledge that, in part, induces Mr. King to reject the fiscal policy that Mr. Bennett offers as a solution of unemployment and other Canadian problems. And it is interesting in this connection to compare employment conditions in Canada and the country to the south that Mr. Bennett holds up to Canada as a model of national management. In the period from 1923 to 1927 (the latest year for which figures are at present available) there was a decline of 537,000 in the number of men engaged in industrial work in the United States and during the same period there was an increase in the number employed in Canada of 93,666. The direct reflection of this is found in the decline in the movement of Canadians to the United States and the setting up of a considerable movement in the opposite direction. The fiscal policy of the United States and of Hon. R. B. Bennett is one that penalizes the worker, restricts the development of basic industries and increases unemployment. As has been pithily said, higher tariffs increase prices; increased prices lessen consumption; lessened consumption means less employment.

Premier King's analysis, in his Peterboro speech, of economic conditions in Canada served as an effective rebuttal of Mr. Bennett's disparagement of Canadian conditions and of that of one of Mr. Bennett's candidates as well—F. W. Turnbull of Regina. Many will recall the blue ruin talk that found a considerable place in the Regina Conservative candidate's remarks at the Armories the night of his leader's appearance here. Mr. King did not go as far as he could have gone in demonstrating that conditions in Canada are basically sound and that a good deal of prosperity obtains. It may be said that the value of manufactured products in Canada increased from $2,482,000,000 in 1922 to nearly $4,000,000,000 last year, bringing Canada to seventh place among the nations for industrial production; that our export trade grew from $740,000,000 to $1,364,000,000 in the same period, and our total trade from $1,501,000,000 to $2,655,000,000, establishing a new high record.

In the face of facts such as these, Mr. Bennett and his candidates have the effrontery to represent Canadian conditions as in a dire plight. Facts may not be as noisy as mere words, but they are frequently infinitely more eloquent of truth.

THE PUBLIC HAS TIRED OF BEING FOOLED.

At Peterboro the prime minister stated that he had not refused to assist Conservative provinces in the relief of unemployment. We fail to see how Mr. King hopes to gain anything by denying his own words clearly printed in Hansard. That official record of parliamentary debate shows that on April 3rd the premier deliberately asserted that while he might do something for Progressive provinces, he would not give five cents or even one cent for unemployment to any "Tory" province. He repeated this statement two or three times and seemed surprised that Conservatives in the House should show any resentment.

The prime minister insists that eight and a half years of Liberal rule has lifted Canada from the slough of despond to an unprecedented condition of universal prosperity. His exact phrases are: "Into years of prosperity which "has not been equalled in history," and "brought Canada to the greatest period of "progress it has ever known." Such statements cause people to rub their eyes and ask themselves if they have been dreaming or merely listening to another Baron Munchausen.

The prime minister is equally unconvincing in his statement regarding the St. Lawrence waterway project. He seeks to unload his incapacity for decision about this vital matter upon the premiers of Ontario and Quebec. The truth is that Mr. King could not move in regard to this project without offending either those who favor or those who oppose it. Mr. Bennett made it clear at Winnipeg that the Conservatives will get along with this undertaking once they are in office. So the country will have to wait for action until after July 28.

Mr. King and his colleagues are, moreover, extremely vulnerable on the charge of inconsistency. The present administration got into office by preaching free trade in the west and protection in the east, and it has maintained its hold upon power by continuing to straddle the fiscal issue. The Dunning budget includes many instances of absolute free trade together with some examples of extremely high tariff protection. In Quebec, Government speakers represent Mr. Bennett as an arch-imperialist who would sacrifice Canada to Great Britain, while in Ontario and the other English-speaking provinces Government campaigners charge the Conservative leader with being hostile to the Mother Country.

QUEBEC WELCOMES MACKENZIE KING

Premier Addresses Gathering in Market Square Despite Rain

By RAY BROWN,
Canadian Press Staff Correspondent

QUEBEC, June 19—Quebec welcomed the Prime Minister of Canada today in no uncertain manner. Dull skies, wet pavement, intermittent rain, a cool wind, these did not deter a huge crowd from gathering in St. Peter's Market Square, to stand for hours listening to Premier Mackenzie King, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, and chief Quebec lieutenant of the Prime Minister, and other speakers expound the doctrine of Liberalism.

The Prime Minister dealt with unemployment, taking the position that the Government of which he is the leader is determined to rid Canada of this problem and will bend every energy to the work. He declared the view that the budget, with its provisions for encouraging Empire trade, will have the effect of increasing Canada's business, and this will result in decreasing unemployment.

HUGE QUEBEC CROWD GREETS PREMIER KING

Taschereau Urges Support for Liberal Leader

RECORD IS OUTLINED

Hon. Ernest Lapointe Declares "Whisper of Death" Again Heard

By ABEL VINEBERG.
(Gazette Staff Correspondent.)

Quebec, June 19.—People of the ancient capital showed tonight once more that a leader of one of the great political parties of Canada is ever welcome in their midst, and certain of a hearing by a large multitude.

Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, came to this hitherto stronghold of Liberalism, and going into St. Sauveur, a part in which that party is looked upon almost as sacred, he found himself the recipient of a great reception by a crowd the number of which is almost impossible to estimate, but which filled the streets for two blocks away.

Rain threatened all evening, and the threat was carried out for a few moments, but the crowd remained standing in the streets, the great majority hearing the speech of the Prime Minister and the other speeches through loud speakers. The speakers' platform was erected on the steps of St. Pierre Hall, without covering, and the danger of a drenching for the speakers as well as for the audience was ever present.

Premier Taschereau, in presenting Premier King, at the request of the chairman, Mayor H. E. Lavigueur, ex-M.P. for Quebec county, said that in all his public life, and that goes back more than 30 years, he had never seen such a large crowd as that of this evening. It was without question one of the largest crowds seen here, and in that way recalled the great meeting addressed in the same neighborhood by the Rt. Hon Arthur Meighen in 1926.

In addition to the Premier, the speakers were Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. Lucien Cannon, Major C. G. Power, and Premier Taschereau. Hon. Mr. Lapointe denounced those who decry Canada, as he claimed the Conservatives are doing at present, spoke of the "whisper of death" as again being circulated, and dealt with the problem of Canada's status. The matter of status got even much more attention at the hands of Premier King, for he laid it down that there must be full status for Canada, equal to that enjoyed by any other part of the Commonwealth of British Nations, and equal to that enjoyed by Britain, and this both as to internal and external affairs.

Mr. King linked the matter of unemployment with that of trade, and talking of trade said that in extending the British preference the trail laid out by Laurier in 1897 was being followed. He pictured the arrival of Hon. Charles A. Dunning in Britain on the occasion of the coming fall Imperial Conference, and predicted that for Mr. Dunning there would be a welcome equalled by no welcome ever paid to any other Canadian Minister of Finance.

Mr. King warmly eulogized his colleague, Mr. Lapointe, pointing out that the two had never disagreed in council chamber, due chiefly, he said, to the fact that both had been trained under Laurier, and, in addition, were both imbued with Liberal doctrines and both were true Canadians.

FAMILY IS UNITED.

"In federal affairs I am only a humble soldier, but glad to lend my support to your chief, to my chief, the Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King," declared Premier Taschereau, after commenting on the size of the crowd. "The Liberal family at Quebec or Ottawa is a united family, in which we work hand in hand, and we are not divided as are our adversaries. I am happy in the name of the Quebec Government, in the name of the Quebec Legislature, to offer our homage to our leader, and your leader. Mr. King is today leader of the Liberal party. Those who die do not make mistakes as they go to their tombs, and Laurier asked the Liberal party to name as his successor he who will address you. I thank you from the bottom of my heart in the name of the Liberal party, Mr. King, for commencing your political campaign in the province of Quebec in this city. After all, is there a town in the province or country where the Liberal heart beats better than here? Mr. King commenced his campaign in 1926 in Quebec. He commenced among you here where hearts beat Liberal, and this year I know we will give him the same victory as in 1926. Mr. King and the colleagues around him deserve the confidence of the people of Quebec. Look around you and see what he has done for Quebec."

Mr. Taschereau said that it was due to the money voted for the enlargement of the port of Quebec that bigger ships, including those of the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. were to come to this city and make Quebec one of the great national ports. He could asusre Mr. King that he would find in this province the support needed to enable him to continue to give the good government he had given up to now.

He said he was also happy to pay tribute to the distinguished chief of the province of Quebec, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and also to render homage to the other chief of the province, Hon. Lucien Cannon. Those two in the federal arena had always been on the firing line, and in the name of the province and Liberal family he wished to say "thank you' to both.

"Mr. King will speak to you in English, but you will give an example to Canada to the effect that the French-Canadians know how to hear and understand and appreciate a speech which is not in their tongue," ended Premier Taschereau.

Hon. Mr. King, rising amidst loud and prolonged applause, started off in French, after first receiving a bouquet of roses from a little giri, a similar compliment having previously been paid to Mr. Lapointe. Both responded in the manner of Laurier to the tributes.

"I thank you from the bottom of my heart for your fine reception this evening, and I will never forget it," said Mr. King. "I will now speak in my natural language."

Turning into English, the Prime Minister complimented Mr. Lapointe, Mr. Cannon and Mr. Power. He said that in the past it had been customary to give a dual name to a government, such as Baldwin and Lafontaine, and he believed the present Government should be called the Lapointe-King Government. As to Mr. Power, the Premier said that of all members of the House of Commons this year he did not think there had been one who had rendered the Government and country greater service than "Chubby" Power. Mr. Power had worked day and night on two of the most important committees, and the work he and his associates had accomplished was so well-known that it was not necessary to mention it.

Mr. King said the people were called upon to decide on the government for the next four years, and to his mind there were three important points to be considered. The first was the record of the Government which had been in office eight or nine years. He asked that the record be regarded with care and if the record was found to be one of the best it was safe to entrust the same people with the care of the Government for another four years. He suggested there should be a comparison of conditions in 1921, when there had been depression everywhere, when the railways were dislocated and disorganized, when business was in confusion, when people were out of employment, not as today but in multitudes, with the conditions of prosperity of recent years.

The Premier said the matter of taxation should be studied, when it would be found that there had been reduction of taxes and also reduction of debt. The Government had reduced the duties on the implements of production and on many commodities affecting the cost of living, and helped to bring about the better times enjoyed in the recent past. The population question should also be considered, he said, and in this connection, instead of thousands of Canadians going out of the country, as was the case when the Government first came to power, the situation had changed and our own people were coming back from the United States. Mr. King dealt at considerable length with legislation and industrial and labor matters. He recalled that his had been a long connection with such matters, first as Deputy Minister of Labor, and later on as Minister of Labor.

He had often come to Quebec and met the workingmen, he recalled. The Laurier Government had created the Department of Labor, it should be remembered, which had introduced the fair wage clause in government conracts, and he was happy that last session of Parliament it had become the law of the land that the fair wage clause and the eight-hour day should be inserted in all government contracts, and for all government employees. Mr. King dealt with the Grand Trunk strike prior to 1911, and the refusal of the company to carry out its agreement to reinstate the strikers on the same footing as regards rank and pensions as if they had not gone on strike, and it had only been when he had come into power that he, in conjunction with Sir Henry Thornton, had seen to it that the men were righted.

It was one of the matters he had taken up with Sir Henry Thornton when the latter had come over here and discussed the matter of accepting the chairmanship of the Canadian National Railways. The Conservative Government had refused during its time of office, to do justice to the strikers, said Mr. King, which illustrated the difference, in the attitudes of the two Governments. It had been a Liberal Government which had brought in old age pensions, said Mr. King, a law which was being accepted more generally in Canada. This latter statement brought no applause, since this province has hitherto refused to accept the federal law.

STOCK CRASH HAD EFFECT.

The Prime Minister turned to the matter of unemployment, saying it required attention from all who have to do with government. There was a great deal of unemployment throughout the world, and some had come in Canada. Last year there had been a very serious dislocation of prices as a result of speculation on the stock exchange and a crash which took place in that regard. That crash had its effect on employment not only in the United States but in Europe and in Canada, as well. In this country people who thought they had money invested found that the money was not there, and began to cease to give employment to many people. It also happened at the same time that whereas in former years Canada had been selling great quantities of wheat to England the situation had become so that the wheat did not move, and the railway companies did not have the business, and little by little began to lessen their staffs, and, one business affecting other lines, there had come other unemployment. But, said Mr. King, both of those were temporary conditions, conditions not likely to last, but while here they created a situation that was serious for a number of people.

Mr. King said he had heartily agreed with Sir Henry Thornton as to the policy of keeping as many men as possible employed, and had promised him support to the limit for that policy. The Government had also aided by keeping men at work in coal mining tests, and had continued its programme of construction work during the winter time.

"We have tried to deal with this problem in a constructive fashion, but notwithstanding what we have done, because this depression is world-wide, because there are thousands upon thousands of men unemployed in the United States and Britain, we, too, feel some of the effects of it, and we have a problem which has to be met and met in a constructive way."

The Premier added: "The only remedy Mr. Bennett has proposed for the unemployment problem is the summoning of a special session of Parliament immediately after the present election. May I say to the leader of the Opposition that this is not a remedy at all. The mere summoning of a special session of Parliament does not afford the means of solving this or any other great social or economic problem. A special session of Parliament to consider the unemployment problem could only be of value if there were some definite and well-considered proposal to submit to it. If Mr. Bennett should be summoned, then he must have either in his own mind, or in the mind of his followers, some tangible scheme for the relief of unemployment. If he has such a scheme in mind, he certainly did not make any attempt to reveal it during the last session of Parliament.

"So far as one can judge from Mr. Bennett's utterance, both then and during the present campaign, or from the utterances of his followers during the past two sessions of Parliament, there are only three specific remedies which the Conservative party is prepared to offer to the Canadian people as a remedy for the unemployment problem. One is an all-around increase in the tariff in imitation of an American policy which has not prevented an unemployment problem in the United States, vastly more serious than our own, and which has led, during the past few months to an estimated total of unemployed workmen in the neighborhood of 4,000,000. Or perhaps Mr. Bennett proposes to carry into effect the immigration policy of General MacRae, his chief lieutenant in the present campaign, which would involve this country in the expenditure of $500,000,000 in order to bring out 300,000 immigrants to western Canada.

"May I remind you that this proposal was only made a year ago, and put forth in the House of Commons with the apparent approval of the leader of the Conservative party. The only other policy which Mr. Bennett may have in mind, is admittedly not a remedy, but an ineffective palliative for the problem, namely contributions from the Dominion treasury to the provinces, for the purpose of unemployment relief. Moreover, this policy does not require a special session of Parliament, as an emergent condition could be met, if need be, by Governor-General's warrant.

"If Mr. Bennett is serious in proposing a special session of Parliament, let him say quite definitely which, if any, of these policies he wishes to introduce as a solution of the problem which he is now endeavoring to exploit and exaggerate for political purposes.

"So far as the Liberal administration is concerned, let me again make it clear that we have the keenest and most sympathetic concern for those who are unemployed, and propose to deal with the question along lines recommended not only by constitutional propriety, but by economic investigations. We are not waiting for a special session of Parliament in order to deal with the several features of unemployment which may present themselves during the ensuing months. The whole question of unemployment is one which requires co-operative study and co-operative action by dominion, provincial and municipal authorities together with organizations of manufacturers and laborers representing the interests of those most severely affected by any slackening in the business of our country. Having this fact in mind, and having also in mind that no province has yet applied to the Dominion Government for monetary assistance in unemployment relief, we arranged, at the close of the past session of Parliament to summon a dominion-province conference with the least possible delay, following the present election campaign.

"From the time that it was decided to summon this conference, departments of the Government have been engaged in gathering data to bring before it during its session. We have also been in close communication with the provincial, municipal and other interested bodies who are engaged in a similar preliminary study of the problem, and will thus be able to secure a much more accurate survey of the entire situation than was possible during the last session of Parliament. The Dominion-provincial conference will be comprised of ministers and others whose business it is to be familiar with the several phases of the unemployment problem which will be discussed; it will include not only responsible ministers and representatives of Dominion, provincial and municipal Governments, but will also have the advantage of having expert evidence from representatives of labor organizations, manufacturers' associations and other similar bodies.

"From the standpoint of efficiency and constitutional propriety, a Dominion-provincial conference on unemployment is infinitely superior to a special session of Parliament. A special session is convened normally only to meet a grave national emergency. Were Canada to summon a special session of Parliament, as Mr. Bennett has proposed, it would undoubtedly advertise to the world that Canada is suffering from a very perilous situation which does not, in fact, exist. There is a right way and a wrong way in approaching every question. The right way in this case is by co-operation; the wrong way is by attempting to bring the unemployment question into the sphere of party controversy on the floors of Parliament. There is also an economical or an extravagant way to approach the question. A special session of Parliament is an extravagant method of dealing with this question. Besides being futile and unnecessary, it would cost the people of this country no less than $2,000,000 without a guarantee of any more practicable remedy for unemployment than emerged from the discussion of the last session.

CONFERENCE BEST WAY.

"This great dominion-provincial conference which is to be held, will, I believe, help us to work out a feasible scheme which will be suited to meet the great question of seasonal unemployment and other forms of unemployment which may arise. May I say that out of that conference I believe something will come which will be constructive and helpful, and something which will go far towards meeting the present situation. May I add that so far as I personally am concerned, I do not know of anything which would give me more real satisfaction and pleasure than to be of some real service at a conference of that character, if I am permitted to do so."

Hon. Mr. King said the only country which has not raised its tariff against Canada was Britain. Canadian farmers and manufacturers got the same privilges in the British market as the British farmers and British manufacturers, and the effect of the Dunning tariff would be to divert purchases from the United States to Britain, and, in turn, that would enable Britain to buy more from Canada.

"In doing this I cannot but feel that we are repeating what Laurier tried to do when he came back from the Diamond Jubilee in 1897," said the Premier. "He knew you cannot sell things to people unless you buy from them. All trade is in the nature of exchange, and if you want to sell to another country you must more or less buy from her also. Laurier under the British preference was giving Britain a chance to sell more goods here, and as a result knew that we would be sure of a market in the old land, and we are but repeating the policies of Laurier. This Budget gives a wider preference, and we all know that the people of Britain, whether Liberal, Conservative or Labor, all cheer for the Liberal Government of Canada for what it has done in this Budget."

Mr. King asked his audience to think of the feeling in Britain when it was said in Britain at the coming Imperial Economic Conference that Canada had given a wider preference which was believed would be helpful to Britain, and the suggestion thrown out that the Canadian people look to Britain to see what can be done towards helping Canada sell to Britain.

"Don't you think that the British Government will be able to find some means of helping to improve trade so as to help in the prosperity of Canada?" he asked. "I am sure the British Government will do its utmost to co-operate with us in helping to solve this great question of trade, which has to do with the problem of unemployment, and could any man be thought of to speak for Canadian trade better qualified than Mr. Dunning?"

Mr. King turned to the question of status, going back to Laurier in 1897 when the Liberal chieftain had spoken of the "Galaxy" of nations. Place that word "Galaxy" alongside of the word commonwealth, and note the accomplishment. Laurier had seen that the only way in which the Empire would always endure had been by equality of status. He had believed in the Empire, but also believed that his own country should have the same position as a nation as every other part of the Empire, that Canada was just as much entitled to be a nation as Britain was entitled to be a nation and once all came to have an equal status, then would come the co-operation. Laurier had laid down two principles, if we were to be a nation, the first being that we must be a united country in all respects, a happy and united country, and, said Mr. King, that was what the present Government sought to do, following in Laurier's foot steps.

WANT SELF-GOVERNMENT.

"As one who knew him intimately, enjoyed his friendship and confidence and revered him, I have sought in every way to further the conception of unity, whether of province and province, or creed and creed, or class and class. I have striven with my colleagues to serve the same Liberal point of view so as to bring about unity. While we have stood for unity, we have stood for nationality. We put stress on the word nation, meaning that in all things that pertain to matters of government, whether of internal or external affairs, we want to be able to have self-government in every sense of the term."

The march towards nationhood, continued the Premier, had been the result of the work of many years, and was largely the work of Liberalism. Some of the progress had come when the country had reached new stature following the tragedy of the war. At this point, the Premier turned aside to say that the highest duty of the Government was to see to it that those who had sacrificed themselves in the war were not forgotten; also that those who had come back impaired should be cared for, and in the legislation of last session these ideas had been kept in mind in the name of the Canadian people. Turning back to the nationhood issue, Mr. King said that there were still some further constitutional developments to come in the matter of full nationhood. He traced the progress made by Canada under his Government in the matter of signing treaties and naming ministers to the United States, France and Japan, and one of the treaties bringing in the name of the late Hon. Jas. A. Robb, Minister of Finance, Mr. King turned aside to pay the following compliment:

"Speaking here in the province of Quebec for the first time, let me say how greatly we deplore the loss of so noble a spirit, but how much all of us continue to revere his memory and follow his example."

Mr. King said that it was true that Sir Robert Borden, at the time of the signing of the peace treaty, had taken up the matter of a representative at Washington, but he had an entirely different idea to that held by the Liberals, and had wanted a Canadian associated with the British embassy. What of the attitude of Hon. R. B. Bennett? asked Mr. King. He quoted Mr. Bennett as saying in the House of Commons on April 13, 1927, the following words on the question:

"I am wholly opposed to the establishment of this embassy at Washington. It is but the doctrine of separation, it is but the evidence to many minds of the end of our connection with the Empire. For that is what it means. It is nothing else ultimately, because if we are a sovereign state we cannot belong to the British Empire."

Premier King commented on this Bennett view: "The other side is that if we are not a sovereign nation we have to have other people act for us in matters which concern our own affairs."

He quoted Mr. Bennett, talking to the Toronto Business Men's Conservative Club on June 14, 1923 as follows:

"I had hoped in my younger days, and I have not entirely lost my hope yet, that in maintainig the unity and solidarity of this Commonwealth of Nations we call the British Empire, we might attach Canadians, Australians, New Zealanders to the embassies abroad of the Empire. It may come that some Canadian may be Ambassador of the British Empire, just as much to be achieved by his ambition as if born within the sound of Bow Bells.

"I see no reason why that hope should be disturbed today. I see no reason why we should have separate embassies and legations, but rather embassies and legations should be of the united Empire, and every part of the Empire might find representation there when the moment of peril come, and they could speak with one voice without divided authority."

The Premier commented: "You note his proposal? Is that what we as Canadians want? Is that his idea of expressing our nationhood, or has he changed his mind? If he holds to it, how can he speak of putting Canada first, and want a full Canadian nationality in the truest sense? Does he think Canada is not entitled to equality of status? I am inclined to think, from his speeches in Parliament, he is far from ready to admit that Canada is a nation in the true sense of the word, or possesses equality with Britain."

Mr. King quoted Mr. Bennett once more, this time speaking at Halifax on July 26, 1928, when the Conservative leader is reported to have said: "What is meant by this talk of equality of status? What do all these legations mean? There can't be two kings. This may not mean what it seems and it may seem what it is, but it serves to make this country an independent nation. I say, for myself and for the Conservative party, that we in Canada are not prepared as yet to separate our allegiance to the British Empire. If Mr. King is sincere he will answer this question: 'What port are you bound for?' If we are independent, Mr. King should let us know that the people might have a say before it is too late."

Mr. King commented: "I think when I answered him that my chart was the British constitution as it had developed during the years and that port I was headed for was a united and happy country, that would be as much a nation as any nation in any part of the world. I think I told Mr. Bennett very plainly that if the Empire was to endure it would endure only on the cornerstone of self-government of every part, and I believe that if every part was recognized as a nation you would then have a great Empire that would never be overthrown, and would be a co-operating commonwealth in the true sense of the word."

Mr. King ended by painting a word picture of the importance of Canada in the scheme of world things. Bounded by two oceans Canada was closer to Asia than was Europe, the composition of her population was a link between France and Britain, and her position as a neighbor of the United States constituted much also from the point of view of being interpreter between the nations.

MAYOR PRESIDES.

Mayor H. E. Lavigeur of Quebec, ex-M.P., for Quebec county presided at the meeting and said the meeting recalled the Laurier meeting in 1917 at which he had also presided, having then also been chief magistrate.

Senator Georges Parent led off, and congratulated the Government on having honored the county in having chosen its representative in the House of Commons for a superior position, but at the same time he could not but regret having left the county after representing it for 17 years. He hoped to serve those whom he had grown to like in the superior position to which he had been sent. Now that the county was vacant he hoped a fitting candidate would be selected to be sent to the House of Commons. He hoped the electors would not listen to slander when making a choice, for it would be doing the French-Canadian race no good to destroy each other.

Speaking in English, Senator Parent told Premier King that nowhere in Canada had his work been more recognized than in the province of Quebec, but he hoped that all the other provinces would join with Quebec in returning him to power on July 28.

The presentation of Hon. Ernest Lapointe as the worthy successor of Laurier and the idol of the province was greeted with applause by the crowd.

Hon. Mr. Lapointe whose constituency is the neighboring one of Quebec East, thanked the people for turning out in such numbers to welcome the Liberal Leader. Quebec had been faithful to Mr. King, and as long as Mr. King was what he was the province of Quebec would remain faithful to him. "Recently the Conservative Prime Minister of Ontario said that the issue was Mackenzie King," said Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

"In the name of the Canadian Liberal party I accept the challenge, and pick up the gauge of battle. Mackenzie King represents the Canadian soul in all its clearness. He represents the Canadian conscience in the eyes of the world. He is a Canadian in all the acceptance of the word. He is a Liberal, faithful to the principles of Liberalism as preached by Laurier. Like all men he is not exempt from slanderous attacks. Only recently a Conservative member of Ontario used the radio to throw its venom of slander upon my chief, speaking with all the violence of a renegade and the rage of a jealous person. Those who think it a duty to attack the Prime Minister are building their hopes upon shifting sand. Mr. King has at his service many talents, a sense of devotion, a desire for hard work, and above all, a complete disinterestedness."

Hon. Mr. Lapointe spoke of conditions as they existed in 1921, drawing a picture of sombre conditions at that time, and claimed under Mr. King Canada had received a direction which made it the seventh manufacturing nation in the world, and brought national harmony to replace disunion. Mr. Lapointe said tariff matters were difficult in Canada, because of geography and the distinct elements which exist and the Government had followed a truly national policy, setting up a tariff board and getting expert opinion on such matters.

He claimed the Dunning tariff had been accepted in all parts of the country. He spoke of debt reduction since 1921, and yet Mr. Bennett was going through the country crying ruin. The "whisper of death" was again being heard, said Mr. Lapointe. It was false to say that conditions were better in the United States than in Canada, or that Canadians were still going to the United States. The United States had 3,500,000 unemployed, according to Wm. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, while as to emigration the figures showed that such New England cities as New Bedford, Fall River and Lowell had lost population in the last ten years and it had been to such cities the people of this province had been wont to go. The drop in the population showed French-Canadians had been returning to Quebec. What cities of Canada has suffered such reductions in population as the New England towns?

Canada would develop despite the slanders of the Tories, who seek to lower Canada in the eyes of the world, Hon. Mr. Lapointe rose to a high point of eloquence when he spoke of the necessity of racial and national harmony. A country could not grow when there was discord. It was necessary to have equality and justice for all citizens, and certainly the King Government was the Government of all classes and all races. National harmony and peace existed in Canada today because of the leadership given the country by Mackenzie King. National harmony had been aided by the restoration of the natural resources to the western provinces, and the Duncan Commission in the maritime provinces.

Turning to the Imperial Conference and the principles laid down there which had made the conference a historic one, Mr. Lapointe said union and liberty did not mean absorption.

"I have no hesitation in saying that a free Canada and a strong Canada is more of a guarantee for the permanency of the association of the British nations than a Canada which would not have all the liberty it enjoys today," said Mr. Lapointe. Mr. Lapointe said when he went to the next Imperial Conference he would work to bring into harmony certain British laws, passed in the colonial days of Canada, and Canadian laws, so that there would be equality for Canada in all respects.

"Will you send to the Imperial Conference men who will speak for Canada as a nation, or will you send men who will speak for Canada as if a minor in need of a tutor?" he asked.

King Offers Conference To Solve Unemployment

Prime Minister, Speaking at Quebec, Proposes Consultation Amongst Provinces And Large Employers—Emphasizes Government's Record in Labor Legislation

QUEBEC, June 20.—(Star Special by Staff Correspondent).—The St. Pierre Market Place was crowded last night, despite the unfavorable weather, by residents of Quebec district who gathered in thousands to see and hear Premier Mackenzie King, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. Lucien Cannon and others set forth the Liberal doctrine and defend the policies of the Liberal Government.

The shade of Laurier was freely invoked during the night's oratory, not a single speaker failing to make an appeal to the memory of the great leader of former days. Sir Wilfrid's name was pronounced 29 times during the evening by various orators, and the audience was assured that the present Liberal leaders were striving earnestly to walk in the paths to which their illustrious master had trained them.

To Hold Conference On Unemployment

Premier King dealt at length with the Government's attitude, and Liberal party's attitude, toward labor and also in regard to unemployment. In the latter respect, he announced that, instead of calling a special session of Parliament to talk about unemployment, as Hon. R. B. Bennett had promised to do, if returned to power, the Liberal Government proposed to call a conference of all interested parties, representatives of the Federal and all the Provincial Governments, labor bodies, manufacturing associations, large employers of labor like the railway companies, and so on—everybody who could be expected to contribute some useful suggestion for the solution of the problem. If from their deliberations there resulted some decisions which it required special legislation to put into effect, no time would then be lost in calling Parliament together to pass the necessary statutory provisions. This, Premier King thought was a much wiser plan than calling Parliament together without having any specific proposal to put before them.

The Premier pointed to the many acts of labor legislation which had been passed by the Liberal Government, including the Old Age Pensions Act. Not so much as a smile from the Provincial Premier, sitting on the platform near Mr. King, indicated that he recognized the project which the Liberal Government has consistently refused to put into effect in this Province, and which the local Conservatives have been clamoring to have applied here.

Mandate Wanted To Go To London

Hon. Ernest Lapointe furnished the audience with the reason for the present election. The cause of it all, he explained, was that Hon. R. B. Bennett had declared in the House of Commons that Mr. King and his ministers had no mandate from the people to go to the Imperial Conference in England this year. Thereupon Mr. King had decided to go to the people and obtain an unequivocal mandate, and the question for the people now to decide was who they wanted to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference and in subsequent negotiations with the rest of the Empire. "People like us, who will represent you as a grown-up nation, or people who want to represent you as minors, still in tutelage and in need of a legal guardian to protect your interests?"

Premier Taschereau introduced the Prime Minister, referring to him as "Your leader and mine."

The fates dealt unkindly with the organization. All day long the weather was threatening and for some time before the meeting was scheduled to open, rain fell in torrents. At 7 o'clock, however, it cleared up somewhat, and did not rain again until the Premier rose to speak. The fact that rain began to fall soon after he rose to speak undoubtedly hampered Mr. King, as he obviously felt it necessary, during the earlier part of his speech, to hurry along as rapidly as possible, lest the weather should become worse and possibly prevent him from finishing.

Hucksters Threatened To Usurp Meeting

So little likelihood did there seem to be of the weather clearing up for the meeting, that when the crowd began to gather they found a number of market stands already set up for this morning's market, and loaded with lake trout, eels, kippers and other fish, besides a good many baskets of fruit.

The growing crowd jested freely over the array of fish and fruit, right in front of the speaker's platform, while groups of people on the platform denounced it as an outrage, contending that the city council, the police, the Liberal organization and various other authorities deserved censure for allowing the market gargeners and fish mongers to interfere with the meeting. When the hour advanced however and the rain still kept off, the owners of the stands came back, explained that they had set up their stock in the belief that it would rain too hard to hold an open air meeting. Fish, eels, apples and bananas were loaded back on to trucks, and the crowd was at liberty to close in on the platform in peace, if not in comfort.

Premier King opened his remarks in French. "I wish to thank you all for your very kindly welcome this evening" he said in quite good French, "and will now proceed to address you in my native tongue."

He paid lavish compliments to Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Major C. G. Power, and the shade of Laurier, but decided to get to the meat of his speech quickly when some heavy drops of rain began to fall.

He asked the people to give their attention to the record of the Liberal Goernment, and to judge them by that. He pointed to the time he first had associations with the working people of Quebec, when he was a de-

Labor. He received a number of letters at that time from Mr. Grenier dealing with labor questions, and now that Mr. Grenier had passed on, he held those letters amongst his most treasured possessions. During those years, he had learned at the feet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and was still determined to carry on the work started by that great statesman.

Government's Record In Labor Legislation

He pointed to the labor legislation which the Liberal Goernment had given the country. It included the fair wage and eight hour day clauses in Government contracts; the Old Age Pensions Act; labor representation on the board of directors of the National Railways; and the restoration to old C.N.R. workers of the pension rights which some of them lost years ago through their participation in the Grand Trunk strike.

There was now a great problem confronting the Government, in the unemployment which was rife, not only in Canada, but in all the countries of the world. Factors which contributed to the unemployment trouble in Canada, were the stock market crash of last year, and the falling off of wheat exports. The first meant that people who thought they had money to invest found they hadn't and consequently were not able to keep as many men working for them as they otherwise would; the second implied less railway traffic and therefore less work for railwaymen. The Government under Mr. King had authorized Sir Henry Thornton to keep men at work on the C.N.R. even if it meant loss of revenue, rather than add to the unemployment in the Dominion. The Government had also made extended concessions in regard to the movement of coal from the western provinces, in order to keep men working as much and as long as possible in that industry. They had also carried on public works in winter, at greater cost than would be the case in summer, in order to keep as many people working as possible.

A problem still existed, however, and had to be met in a constructive way. The Liberal Government would endeavor to put forward something really constructive and efficient. Hon. R. B. Bennett, on the other hand, had nothing constructive to offer.

Bennett Scored On Unemployment

"The only remedy Mr. Bennett has proposed for the unemployment problem is the summoning of a special session of Parliament immediately after the present election. May I say to the leader of the Opposition that this is not a remedy at all. The mere summoning of a special session of Parliament does not afford the means of solving this or any other great social or economic problem. A special session of Parliament to consider the unemployment problem could only be of value if there were some definite and well-considered proposal to submit to it. If Mr. Bennett should be summoned, then he must have either in his own mind, or in the mind of his followers, some tangible scheme for the relief of unemployment. If he has such a scheme in mind, he certainly did not make any attempt to reveal it during the last session of Parliament.

Having this fact in mind, and having also in mind that no province has yet applied to the Dominion Government for monetary assistance in unemployment relief, we arranged, at the close of the past session of Parliament to summon a dominion-province conference with the least possible delay, following the present election campaign.

"From the time that it was decided to summon this conference, departments of the Government have been engaged in gathering data to bring before it during its session. We have also been in close communication with the provincial, municipal and other interested bodies who are engaged in a similar preliminary study of the problem, and will thus be able to secure a much more accurate survey of the entire situation than was possible during the last session of Parliament. The Dominion-provincial conference will be comprised of ministers and others whose business it is to be familiar with the several phrases of the unemployment problem which will be discussed; it will include not only responsible ministers and representatives of Dominion, provincial and municipal Governments, but will also have the advantage of having expert evidence from representatives of labor organizations, manufacturers' associations and other similar bodies.

"From the standpoint of efficiency and constitutional propriety, a Dominion-provincial conference on unemployment is infinitely superior to a special session of Parliament. A special session is convened normally only to meet a grave national emergency. Were Canada to summon a special session of Parliament, as Mr. Bennett has proposed, it would undoubtedly advertise to the world that Canada is suffering from a very perilous situation which does not, in fact, exist. There is a right way and a wrong way in approaching every question. The right way in this case is by co-operation; the wrong way is by attempting to bring the unemployment question into the sphere of party controversy on the floors of Parliament. There is also an economical or an extravagant way to approach the question. A special session of Parliament is an extravagant method of dealing with this question. Besides being futile and unnecessary, it would cost the people of this country no less than $2,000,000 without a guarantee of any more practicable remedy for unemploymen than emerged from the discussion of the last session.

Holds Tariff Futile To Solve Problem

"This great dominion - provincial conference which is to be held, will I believe, help us to work out a feasible scheme which will be suited to meet the great question of seasonal unemployment and other forms of unemployment which may arise. May I say that out of that conference I believe something will come which will be constructive and helpful, and something which will go far towards meeting the present situation. May I add that so far as I personally am concerned, I do not know of anything which would give me more real satisfaction and pleasure that to be of some real service at a conference of that character, if I am permitted to do so."

It seemed to be suggested by Mr. Bennett that raising the tariff all round would remedy the unemployment situation. Yet unemployment was more severe in practically all the high tariff countries than it was in Canada. There were 3 1-2 million unemployed in the United States. There was much unemployment in Australia. The Old Country was suffering far worse than Canada from unemployment.

The Old Country was the only country in the world which had not raised its tariff against Canada, and it was only fair and reasonable that Canada should show a reciprocal goodwill toward Great Britain. The Canadian manufacturer went into the old country market on an equal footing with the home manufacturer there. It was only fair that the same concession should be given to the British manufacturer here, and that he be given the advantage over the United States manufacturer. Besides, the increased preference would enable the Canadian delegates who would go over to England this year, to negotiate with the British Government for increased buying of Canadian products.

Laurier, he pointed out, had started the policy of wider British preference. Mackenzie King was trying to carry that policy forward. Laurier had started the theory of Canada a nation. It was Laurier who told Queen Victoria that the greatest of all her possessions was "this galaxy of nations which men call the British Empire." There was but little difference between the galaxy of nations of Laurier's remark, and the commonwealth of nations of which Canada was a part, and of which Mackenzie King and the Liberal party were steadily striving to make Canada an increasingly greater part.

Hon. Lucien Cannon, Senator George Parent and Major C. G. Power also spoke, Mayor Lavigueur of Quebec presided.

HUGE QUEBEC CROWD GREETS PREMIER KING

Taschereau Urges Support for Liberal Leader

RECORD IS OUTLINED

Hon. Ernest Lapointe Declares "Whisper of Death" Again Heard

By ABEL VINEBERG.
(Gazette Staff Correspondent.)

Quebec, June 19.—People of the ancient capital showed tonight once more that a leader of one of the great political parties of Canada is ever welcome in their midst, and certain of a hearing by a large multitude.

Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, came to this hitherto stronghold of Liberalism, and going into St. Sauveur, a part in which that party is looked upon almost as sacred, he found himself the recipient of a great reception by a crowd the number of which is almost impossible to estimate, but which filled the streets for two blocks away.

Rain threatened all evening, and the threat was carried out for a few moments, but the crowd remained standing in the streets, the great majority hearing the speech of the Prime Minister and the other speeches through loud speakers. The speakers' platform was erected on the steps of St. Pierre Hall, without covering, and the danger of a drenching for the speakers as well as for the audience was ever present.

Premier Taschereau, in presenting Premier King, at the request of the chairman, Mayor H. E. Lavigueur, ex-M.P. for Quebec county, said that in all his public life, and that goes back more than 30 years, he had never seen such a large crowd as that of this evening. It was without question one of the largest crowds seen here, and in that way recalled the great meeting addressed in the same neighborhood by the Rt. Hon Arthur Meighen in 1926.

In addition to the Premier, the speakers were Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. Lucien Cannon, Major C. G. Power, and Premier Taschereau. Hon. Mr. Lapointe denounced those who decry Canada, as he claimed the Conservatives are doing at present, spoke of the "whisper of death" as again being circulated, and dealt with the problem of Canada's status. The matter of status got even much more attention at the hands of Premier King, for he laid it down that there must be full status for Canada, equal to that enjoyed by any other part of the Commonwealth of British Nations, and equal to that enjoyed by Britain, and this both as to internal and external affairs.

Mr. King linked the matter of unemployment with that of trade, and talking of trade said that in extending the British preference the trail laid out by Laurier in 1897 was being followed. He pictured the arrival of Hon. Charles A. Dunning in Britain on the occasion of the coming fall Imperial Conference, and predicted that for Mr. Dunning there would be a welcome equalled by no welcome ever paid to any other Canadian Minister of Finance.

Mr. King warmly eulogized his colleague, Mr. Lapointe, pointing out that the two had never disagreed in council chamber, due chiefly, he said, to the fact that both had been trained under Laurier, and, in addition, were both imbued with Liberal doctrines and both were true Canadians.

FAMILY IS UNITED.

"In federal affairs I am only a humble soldier, but glad to lend my support to your chief, to my chief the Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King," declared Premier Taschereau, after commenting on the size of the crowd. "The Liberal family at Quebec or Ottawa is a united family, in which we work hand in hand, and we are not divided as are our adversaries. I am happy in the name of the Quebec Government, in the name of the Quebec Legislature, to offer our homage to our leader, and your leader. Mr. King is today leader of the Liberal party. Those who die do not make mistakes as they go to their tombs, and Laurier asked the Liberal party to name as his successor he who will address you. I thank you from the bottom of my heart in the name of the Liberal party, Mr. King, for commencing your political campaign in the province of Quebec in this city. After all, is there a town in the province or country where the Liberal heart beats better than here? Mr. King commenced his campaign in 1926 in Quebec. He commenced among you here where hearts beat Liberal, and this year I know we will give him the same victory as in 1926. Mr. King and the colleagues around him deserve the confidence of the people of Quebec. Look around you and see what he has done for Quebec."

Mr. Taschereau said that it was due to the money voted for the enlargement of the port of Quebec that bigger ships, including those of the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. were to come to this city and make Quebec one of the great national ports. He could asusre Mr. King that he would find in this province the support needed to enable him to continue to give the good government he had given up to now.

He said he was also happy to pay tribute to the distinguished chief of the province of Quebec, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and also to render homage to the other chief of the province, Hon. Lucien Cannon. Those two in the federal arena had always been on the firing line, and in the name of the province and Liberal family he wished to say "thank you' to both.

"Mr. King will speak to you in English, but you will give an example to Canada to the effect that the French-Canadians know how to hear and understand and appreciate a speech which is not in their tongue," ended Premier Taschereau.

Hon. Mr. King, rising amidst loud and prolonged applause, started off in French, after first receiving a bouquet of roses from a little girl, a similar compliment having previously been paid to Mr. Lapointe. Both responded in the manner of Laurier to the tributes.

"I thank you from the bottom of my heart for your fine reception this evening, and I will never forget it," said Mr. King. "I will now speak in my natural language."

Turning into English, the Prime Minister complimented Mr. Lapointe, Mr. Cannon and Mr. Power. He said that in the past it had been customary to give a dual name to a government, such as Baldwin and Lafontaine, and he believed the present Government should be called the Lapointe-King Government. As to Mr. Power, the Premier said that of all members of the House of Commons this year he did not think there had been one who had rendered the Government and country greater service than "Chubby" Power. Mr. Power had worked day and night on two of the most important committees, and the work he and his associates had accomplished was so well-known that it was not necessary to mention it.

Mr. King said the people were called upon to decide on the government for the next four years, and to his mind there were three important points to be considered. The first was the record of the Government which had been in office eight or nine years. He asked that the record be regarded with care and if the record was found to be one of the best it was safe to entrust the same people with the care of the Government for another four years. He suggested there should be a comparison of conditions in 1921, when there had been depression everywhere, when the raliways were dislocated and disorganized, when business was in confusion, when people were out of employment, not as today but in multitudes, with the conditions of prosperity of recent years.

The Premier said the matter of taxation should be studied, when it would be found that there had been reduction of taxes and also reduction of debt. The Government had reduced the duties on the implements of production and on many commodities affecting the cost of living, and helped to bring about the better times enjoyed in the recent past. The population question should also be considered, he said, and in this connection, instead of thousands of Canadians going out of the country, as was the case when the Government first came to power, the situation had changed and our own people were coming back from the United States. Mr. King dealt at considerable length with legislation and industrial and labor matters. He recalled that his had been a long connection with such matters, first as Deputy Minister of Labor, and later on as Minister of Labor.

He had often come to Quebec and met the workingmen, he recalled. The Laurier Government had created the Department of Labor, it should be remembered, which had introduced the fair wage clause in government conracts, and he was happy that last session of Parliament it had become the law of the land that the fair wage clause and the eight-hour day should be inserted in all government contracts, and for all government employees. Mr. King dealt with the Grand Trunk strike prior to 1911, and the refusal of the company to carry out its agreement to reinstate the strikers on the same footing as regards rank and pensions as if they had not gone on strike, and it had only been when he had come into power that he, in conjunction with Sir Henry Thornton, had seen to it that the men were righted.

It was one of the matters he had taken up with Sir Henry Thornton when the latter had come over here and discussed the matter of accepting the chairmanship of the Canadian National Railways. The Conservative Government had refused, during its time of office,to do justice to the strikers, said Mr. King, which illustrated the difference in the attitudes of the two Governments. It had been a Liberal Government which had brought in old age pensions, said Mr. King, a law which was being accepted more generally in Canada. This latter statement brought no applause, since this province has hitherto refused to accept the federal law.

STOCK CRASH HAD EFFECT.

The Prime Minister turned to the matter of unemployment, saying it required attention from all who have to do with government. There was a great deal of unemployment throughout the world, and some had come in Canada. Last year there had been a very serious dislocation of prices as a result of speculation on the stock exchange and a crash which took place in that regard. That crash had its effect on employment not only in the United States but in Europe and in Canada, as well. In this country people who thought they had money invested found that the money was not there, and began to cease to give employment to many people. It also happened, at the same time that whereas in former years Canada had been selling great quantities of wheat to England the situation had become so that the wheat did not move, and the railway companies did not have the business, and little by little began to lessen their staffs, and, one business affecting other lines, there had come other unemployment. But, said Mr. King, both of those were temporary conditions, conditions not likely to last, but while here they created a situation that was serious for a number of people.

Mr. King said he had heartily agreed with Sir Henry Thornton as to the policy of keeping as many men as possible employed, and had promised him support to the limit for that policy. The Government had also aided by keeping men at work in coal mining tests, and had continued its programme of construction work during the winter time.

"We have tried to deal with this problem in a constructive fashion, but notwithstanding what we have done, because this depression is world-wide, because there are thousands upon thousands of men unemployed in the United States and Britain, we, too, feel some of the effects of it, and we have a problem which has to be met and met in a constructive way."

The Premier added: "The only remedy Mr. Bennett has proposed for the unemployment problem is the summoning of a special session of Parliament immediately after the present election. May I say to the leader of the Opposition that this is not a remedy at all. The mere summoning of a special session of Parliament does not afford the means of solving this or any other great social or economic problem. A special session of Parliament to consider the unemployment problem could only be of value if there were some definite and well-considered proposal to submit to it. If Mr. Bennett should be summoned, then he must have either in his own mind, or in the mind of his followers, some tangible scheme for the relief of unemployment. If he has such a scheme in mind, he certainly did not make any attempt to reveal it during the last session of Parliament.

"So far as one can judge from Mr. Bennett's utterance, both then and during the present campaign, or from the utterances of his followers during the past two sessions of Parliament, there are only three specific remedies which the Conservative party is prepared to offer to the Canadian people as a remedy for the unemployment problem. One is an all-around increase in the tariff in imitation of an American policy which has not prevented an unemployment problem in the United States, vastly more serious than our own, and which has led, during the past few months to an estimated total of unemployed workmen in the neighborhood of 4,000,000. Or perhaps Mr. Bennett proposes to carry into effect the immigration policy of General MacRae, his chief lieutenant in the present campaign, which would involve this country in the expenditure of $500,000,000 in order to bring out 300,000 immigrants to western Canada.

"May I remind you that this proposal was only made a year ago, and put forth in the House of Commons with the apparent approval of the leader of the Conservative party. The only other policy which Mr. Bennett may have in mind, is admittedly not a remedy, but an ineffective palliative for the problem, namely contributions from the Dominion treasury to the provinces, for the purpose of unemployment relief. Moreover, this policy does not require a special session of Parliament, as an emergent condition could be met, if need be, by Governor-General's warrant.

"If Mr. Bennett is serious in proposing a special session of Parliament, let him say quite definitely which, if any, of these policies he wishes to introduce as a solution of the problem which he is now endeavoring to exploit and exaggerate for political purposes.

"So far as the Liberal administration is concerned, let me again make it clear that we have the keenest and most sympathetic concern for those who are unemployed, and propose to deal with the question along lines recommended not only by constitutional propriety, but by economic investigations. We are not waiting for a special session of Parliament in order to deal with the several features of unemployment which may present themselves during the ensuing months. The whole question of unemployment is one which requires co-operative study and co-operative action by dominion, provincial and municipal authorities together with organizations of manufacturers and laborers representing the interests of those most severely affected by any slackening in the business of our country. Having this fact in mind, and having also in mind that no province has yet applied to the Dominion Government for monetary assistance in unemployment relief, we arranged, at the close of the past session of Parliament to summon a dominion-province conference with the least possible delay, following the present election campaign.

"From the time that it was decided to summon this conference, departments of the Government have been engaged in gathering data to bring before it during its session. We have also been in close communication with the provincial, municipal and other interested bodies who are engaged in a similar preliminary study of the problem, and will thus be able to secure a much more accurate survey of the entire situation than was possible during the last session of Parliament. The Dominion-provincial conference will be comprised of ministers and others whose business it is to be familiar with the several phases of the unemployment problem which will be discussed; it will include not only responsible ministers and representatives of Dominion, provincial and municipal Governments, but will also have the advantage of having expert evidence from representatives of labor organizations, manufacturers' associations and other similar bodies.

"From the standpoint of efficiency and constitutional propriety, a Dominion-provincial conference on unemployment is infinitely superior to a special session of Parliament. A special session is convened normally only to meet a grave national emergency. Were Canada to summon a special session of Parliament, as Mr. Bennett has proposed, it would undoubtedly advertise to the world that Canada is suffering from a very perilous situation which does not, in fact, exist. There is a right way and a wrong way in approaching every question. The right way in this case is by co-operation; the wrong way is by attempting to bring the unemployment question into the sphere of party controversy on the floors of Parliament. There is also an economical or an extravagant way to approach the question. A special session of Parliament is an extravagant method of dealing with this question. Besides being futile and unnecessary, it would cost the people of this country no less than $2,000,000 without a guarantee of any more practicable remedy for unemployment than emerged from the discussion of the last session.

CONFERENCE BEST WAY.

"This great dominion-provincial conference which is to be held, will, I believe, help us to work out a feasible scheme which will be suited to meet the great question of seasonal unemployment and other forms of unemployment which may arise. May I say that out of that conference I believe something will come which will be constructive and helpful, and something which will go far towards meeting the present situation. May I add that so far as I personally am concerned, I do not know of anything which would give me more real satisfaction and pleasure than to be of some real service at a conference of that character, if I am permitted to do so."

Hon. Mr. King said the only country which has not raised its tariff against Canada was Britain. Canadian farmers and manufacturers got the same priviliges in the British market as the British farmers and British manufacturers, and the effect of the Dunning tariff would be to divert purchases from the United States to Britain, and, in turn, that would enable Britain to buy more from Canada.

"In doing this I cannot but feel that we are repeating what Laurier tried to do when he came back from the Diamond Jubilee in 1897," said the Premier. "He knew you cannot sell things to people unless you buy from them. All trade is in the nature of exchange, and if you want to sell to another country you must more or less buy from her also. Laurier under the British preference was giving Britain a chance to sell more goods here, and as a result knew that we would be sure of a market in the old land, and we are but repeating the policies of Laurier. This Budget gives a wider preference, and we all know that the people of Britain, whether Liberal, Conservative or Labor, all cheer for the Liberal Government of Canada for what it has done in this Budget."

Mr. King asked his audience to think of the feeling in Britain when it was said in Britain at the coming Imperial Economic Conference that Canada had given a wider preference which was believed would be helpful to Britain, and the suggestion thrown out that the Canadian people look to Britain to see what can be done towards helping Canada sell to Britain.

"Don't you think that the British Government will be able to find some means of helping to improve trade so as to help in the prosperity of Canada?" he asked. "I am sure the British Government will do its utmost to co-operate with us in helping to solve this great question of trade, which has to do with the problem of unemployment, and could any man be thought of to speak for Canadian trade better qualified than Mr. Dunning?"

Mr. King turned to the question of status, going back to Laurier in 1897 when the Liberal chieftain had spoken of the "Galaxy" of nations. Place that word "Galaxy" alongside of the word commonwealth, and note the accomplishment. Laurier had seen that the only way in which the Empire would always endure had been by equality of status. He had believed in the Empire, but also believed that his own country should have the same position as a nation as every other part of the Empire, that Canada was just as much entitled to be a nation as Britain was entitled to be a nation and once all came to have an equal status, then would come the co-operation. Laurier had laid down two principles, if we were to be a nation, the first being that we must be a united country in all respects, a happy and united country, and, said Mr. King, that was what the present Government sought to do, following in Laurier's foot steps.

WANT SELF-GOVERNMENT.

"As one who knew him intimately, enjoyed his friendship and confidence and revered him, I have sought in every way to further the conception of unity, whether of province and province, or creed and creed, or class and class. I have striven with my colleagues to serve the same Liberal point of view so as to bring about unity. While we have stood for unity, we have stood for nationality. We put stress on the word nation, meaning that in all things that pertain to matters of government, whether of internal or external affairs, we want to be able to have self-government in every sense of the term."

The march towards nationhood, continued the Premier, had been the result of the work of many years, and was largely the work of Liberalism. Some of the progress had come when the country had reached new stature following the tragedy of the war. At this point, the Premier turned aside to say that the highest duty of the Government was to see to it that those who had sacrificed themselves in the war were not forgotten; also that those who had come back impaired should be cared for, and in the legislation of last session these ideas had been kept in mind in the name of the Canadian people. Turning back to the nationhood issue, Mr. King said that there were still some further constitutional developments to come in the matter of full nationhood. He traced the progress made by Canada under his Government in the matter of signing treaties and naming ministers to the United States, France and Japan, and one of the treaties bringing in the name of the late Hon. Jas. A. Robb, Minister of Finance, Mr. King turned aside to pay the following compliment:

"Speaking here in the province of Quebec for the first time, let me say how greatly we deplore the loss of so noble a spirit, but how much all of us continue to revere his memory and follow his example."

Mr. King said that it was true that Sir Robert Borden, at the time of the signing of the peace treaty, had taken up the matter of a representative at Washington, but he had an entirely different idea to that held by the Liberals, and had wanted a Canadian associated with the British embassy. What of the attitude of Hon. R. B. Bennett? asked Mr. King. He quoted Mr. Bennett as saying in the House of Commons on April 13, 1927, the following words on the question:

"I am wholly opposed to the establishment of this embassy at Washington. It is but the doctrine of separation, it is but the evidence to many minds of the end of our connection with the Empire. For that is what it means. It is nothing else ultimately, because if we are a sovereign state we cannot belong to the British Empire."

Premier King commented on this Bennett view: "The other side is that if we are not a sovereign nation we have to have other people act for us in matters which concern our own affairs."

He quoted Mr. Bennett, talking to the Toronto Business Men's Conservative Club on June 14, 1923 as follows:

"I had hoped in my younger days, and I have not entirely lost my hope yet, that in maintainig the unity and solidarity of this Commonwealth of Nations we call the British Empire, we might attach Canadians, Australians, New Zealanders to the embassies abroad of the Empire. It may come that some Canadian may be Ambassador of the British Empire, just as much to be achieved by his ambition as if born within the sound of Bow Bells.

"I see no reason why that hope should be disturbed today. I see no reason why we should have separate embassies and legations, but rather embassies and legations should be of the united Empire, and every part of the Empire might find representation there when the moment of peril come, and they could speak with one voice without divided authority."

The Premier commented: "You note his proposal? Is that what we as Canadians want? Is that his idea of expressing our nationhood, or has he changed his mind? If he holds to it, how can he speak of putting Canada first, and want a full Canadian nationality in the truest sense? Does he think Canada is not entitled to equality of status? I am inclined to think, from his speeches in Parliament, he is far from ready to admit that Canada is a nation in the true sense of the word, or possesses equality with Britain."

Mr. King quoted Mr. Bennett once more, this time speaking at Halifax on July 26, 1928, when the Conservative leader is reported to have said: "What is meant by this talk of equality of status? What do all these legations mean? There can't be two kings. This may not mean what it seems and it may seem what it is, but it serves to make this country an independent nation. I say, for myself and for the Conservative party, that we in Canada are not prepared as yet to separate our allegiance to the British Empire. If Mr. King is sincere he will answer this question: 'What port are you bound for?' If we are independent, Mr. King should let us know that the people might have a say before it is too late."

Mr. King commented: "I think when I answered him that my chart was the British constitution as it had developed during the years and that port I was headed for was a united and happy country, that would be as much a nation as any nation in any part of the world. I think I told Mr. Bennett very plainly that if the Empire was to endure it would endure only on the cornerstone of self-government of every part, and I believe that if every part was recognized as a nation you would then have a great Empire that would never be overthrown, and would be a co-operating commonwealth in the true sense of the word."

Mr. King ended by painting a word picture of the importance of Canada in the scheme of world things. Bounded by two oceans Canada was closer to Asia than was Europe, the composition of her population was a link between France and Britain, and her position as a neighbor of the United States constituted much also from the point of view of being interpreter between the nations.

MAYOR PRESIDES.

Mayor H. E. Lavigeur of Quebec, ex-M.P., for Quebec county presided at the meeting and said the meeting recalled the Laurier meeting in 1917 at which he had also presided, having then also been chief magistrate.

Senator Georges Parent led off, and congratulated the Government on having honored the county in having chosen its representative in the House of Commons for a superior position, but at the same time he could not but regret having left the county after representing it for 17 years. He hoped to serve those whom he had grown to like in the superior position to which he had been sent. Now that the county was vacant he hoped a fitting candidate would be selected to be sent to the House of Commons. He hoped the electors would not listen to slander when making a choice, for it would be doing the French-Canadian race no good to destroy each other.

Speaking in English, Senator Parent told Premier King that nowhere in Canada had his work been more recognized than in the province of Quebec, but he hoped that all the other provinces would join with Quebec in returning him to power on July 28.

The presentation of Hon. Ernest Lapointe as the worthy successor of Laurier and the idol of the province was greeted with applause by the crowd.

Hon. Mr. Lapointe whose constituency is the neighboring one of Quebec East, thanked the people for turning out in such numbers to welcome the Liberal Leader. Quebec had been faithful to Mr. King, and as long as Mr. King was what he was the province of Quebec would remain faithful to him. "Recently the Conservative Prime Minister of Ontario said that the issue was Mackenzie King," said Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

"In the name of the Canadian Liberal party I accept the challenge, and pick up the gauge of battle. Mackenzie King represents the Canadian soul in all its clearness. He represents the Canadian conscience in the eyes of the world. He is a Canadian in all the acceptance of the word. He is a Liberal, faithful to the principles of Liberalism as preached by Laurier. Like all men he is not exempt from slanderous attacks. Only recently a Conservative member of Ontario used the radio to throw its venom of slander upon my chief, speaking with all the violence of a renegade and the rage of a jealous person. Those who think it a duty to attack the Prime Minister are building their hopes upon shifting sand. Mr. King has at his service many talents, a sense of devotion, a desire for hard work, and above all, a complete disinterestedness."

Hon. Mr. Lapointe spoke of conditions as they existed in 1921, drawing a picture of sombre conditions at that time, and claimed under Mr. King Canada had received a direction which made it the seventh manufacturing nation in the world, and brought national harmony to replace disunion. Mr. Lapointe said tariff matters were difficult in Canada, because of geography and the distinct elements which exist and the Government had followed a truly national policy, setting up a tariff board and getting expert opinion on such matters.

He claimed the Dunning tariff had been accepted in all parts of the country. He spoke of debt reduction since 1921, and yet Mr. Bennett was going through the country crying ruin. The "whisper of death" was again being heard, said Mr. Lapointe. It was false to say that conditions were better in the United States than in Canada, or that Canadians were still going to the United States. The United States had 3,500,000 unemployed, according to Wm. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, while as to emigration the figures showed that such New England cities as New Bedford, Fall River and Lowell had lost population in the last ten years, and it had been to such cities that the people of this province had been wont to go. The drop in the population showed French-Canadians had been returning to Quebec. What cities of Canada has suffered such reductions in population as the New England towns?

Canada would develop despite the slanders of the Tories, who seek to lower Canada in the eyes of the world. Hon. Mr. Lapointe rose to a high point of eloquence when he spoke of the necessity of racial and national harmony. A country could not grow when there was discord. It was necessary to have equality and justice for all citizens, and certainly the King Government was the Government of all classes and all races. National harmony and peace existed in Canada today because of the leadership given the country by Mackenzie King. National harmony had been aided by the restoration of the natural resources to the western provinces, and the Duncan Commission in the maritime provinces.

Turning to the Imperial Conference and the principles laid down there which had made the conference a historic one, Mr. Lapointe said union and liberty did not mean absorption.

"I have no hesitation in saying that a free Canada and a strong Canada is more of a guarantee for the permanency of the association of the British nations than a Canada which would not have all the liberty it enjoys today," said Mr. Lapointe. Mr. Lapointe said when he went to the next Imperial Conference he would work to bring into harmony certain British laws, passed in the colonial days of Canada, and Canadian laws, so that there would be equality for Canada in all respects.

"Will you send to the Imperial Conference men who will speak for Canada as a nation, or will you send men who will speak for Canada as if a minor in need of tutor?" he asked.

Mr. King ended by painting a word picture of the importance of Canada in the scheme of world things. Bounded by two oceans Canada was closer to Asia than was Europe, the composition of her population was a link between France and Britain, and her position as a neighbor of the United States constituted much also from the point of view of being interpreter between the nations.

MAYOR PRESIDES.

Mayor H. E. Lavigeur of Quebec, ex-M.P., for Quebec county presided at the meeting and said the meeting recalled the Laurier meeting in 1917 at which he had also presided, having then also been chief magistrate.

Senator Georges Parent led off, and congratulated the Government on having honored the county in having chosen its representative in the House of Commons for a superior position, but at the same time he could not but regret having left the county after representing it for 17 years. He hoped to serve those whom he had grown to like in the superior position to which he had been sent. Now that the county was vacant he hoped a fitting candidate would be selected to be sent to the House of Commons. He hoped the electors would not listen to slander when making a choice, for it would be doing the French-Canadian race no good to destroy each other.

Speaking in English, Senator Parent told Premier King that nowhere in Canada had his work been more recognized than in the province of Quebec, but he hoped that all the other provinces would join with Quebec in returning him to power on July 28.

The presentation of Hon. Ernest Lapointe as the worthy successor of Laurier and the idol of the province was greeted with applause by the crowd.

Hon. Mr. Lapointe whose constituency is the neighboring one of Quebec East, thanked the people for turning out in such numbers to welcome the Liberal Leader. Quebec had been faithful to Mr. King, and as long as Mr. King was what he was the province of Quebec would remain faithful to him. "Recently the Conservative Prime Minister of Ontario said that the issue was Mackenzie King," said Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

"In the name of the Canadian Liberal party I accept the challenge, and pick up the gauge of battle. Mackenzie King represents the Canadian soul in all its clearness. He represents the Canadian conscience in the eyes of the world. He is a Canadian in all the acceptance of the word. He is a Liberal, faithful to the principles of Liberalism as preached by Laurier. Like all men he is not exempt from slanderous attacks. Only recently a Conservative member of Ontario used the radio to throw its venom of slander upon my chief, speaking with all the violence of a renegade and the rage of a jealous person. Those who think it a duty to attack the Prime Minister are building their hopes upon shifting sand. Mr. King has at his service many talents, a sense of devotion, a desire for hard work, and above all, a complete disinterestedness."

Hon. Mr. Lapointe spoke of conditions as they existed in 1921, drawing a picture of sombre conditions at that time, and claimed under Mr. King Canada had received a direction which made it the seventh manufacturing nation in the world, and brought national harmony to replace disunion. Mr. Lapointe said tariff matters were difficult in Canada, because of geography and the distinct elements which exist and the Government had followed a truly national policy, setting up a tariff board and getting expert opinion on such matters.

He claimed the Dunning tariff had been accepted in all parts of the country. He spoke of debt reduction since 1921, and yet Mr. Bennett was going through the country crying ruin. The "whisper of death" was again being heard, said Mr. Lapointe. It was false to say that conditions were better in the United States than in Canada, or that Canadians were still going to the United States. The United States had 3,500,000 unemployed, according to Wm. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, while as to emigration the figures showed that such New England cities as New Bedford, Fall River and Lowell had lost population in the last ten years, and it had been to such cities that the people of this province had been wont to go. The drop in the population showed French-Canadians had been returning to Quebec. What cities of Canada has suffered such reductions in population as the New England towns?

Canada would develop despite the slanders of the Tories, who seek to lower Canada in the eyes of the world. Hon. Mr. Lapointe rose to a high point of eloquence when he spoke of the necessity of racial and national harmony. A country could not grow when there was discord. It was necessary to have equality and justice for all citizens, and certainly the King Government was the Government of all classes and all races. National harmony and peace existed in Canada today because of the leadership given the country by Mackenzie King. National harmony had been aided by the restoration of the natural resources to the western provinces, and the Duncan Commission in the maritime provinces.

Turning to the Imperial Conference and the principles laid down there which had made the conference a historic one, Mr. Lapointe said union and liberty did not mean absorption.

"I have no hesitation in saying that a free Canada and a strong Canada is more of a guarantee for the permanency of the association of the British nations than a Canada which would not have all the liberty it enjoys today," said Mr. Lapointe. Mr. Lapointe said when he went to the next Imperial Conference he would work to bring into harmony certain British laws, passed in the colonial days of Canada, and Canadian laws, so that there would be equality for Canada in all respects.

"Will you send to the Imperial Conference men who will speak for Canada as a nation, or will you send men who will speak for Canada as if a minor in need of tutor?" he asked.

Crowd of 8,000 Stands In Rain To Hear Speech

Vast Audience at Quebec Gives Premier King Attentive, Friendly Hearing Despite Weather.

Unemployment Is Chief Theme of His Address

Criticizes Conservative Proposal to Call Parliament To Deal With Problem.

QUEBEC, June 19.—The historic square of St. Peter's market, which has many times rung to the voices of Laurier and Macdonald, was again this evening the scene of such a political assembly as only it seems able to present. Only the ballot-conscious voters of Lower Canada could be expected to cap their day's work by standing three hours under a dripping sky to listen to a speech in what to many of them is an unfamiliar tongue.

It is true that the chairman, Mayor Lavigueur; Hon. Ernest Lapointe and Premier Taschereau addressed them in French, but when the last-mentioned gave place to Premier King, who, save for a preliminary word of thanks, spoke in English, there was no visible shrinkage in a crowd of about eight thousand. As he commenced, the rain, which had been holding off, came down afresh, but they hoisted umbrellas and obeyed Mr. Taschereau's injunction to "Show how you French-Canadians can listen to, understand and applaud a speech in a language that is not your own."

Preaching to Converted.

It would seem that the Prime Minister was preaching to the converted at this initial open-air meeting, for the time is almost forgotten when Quebec West returned a Conservative. The seat has been thrown open, however, with elevation of its representative, George Parent, to the Senate. Furthermore, there was occasion for dealing in an industrial constituency with that most insidious of all political foes, unemployment. It was on this one subject that Mr. King focussed most of his attention.

Mr. Lapointe had already dealt at some length with the government's record in general.

Mr. King called attention to the fact that the present slackness of business is not confined to Canada but is virtually world-wide. He remarked further that the principal immediate causes of today's dullness in Canada were last autumn's slump on the New York stock market and the subsequent check in our sales of wheat to Europe.

Mr. Bennett's proposal that Parliament be summoned forthwith to consider unemployment could be of no help unless there was a definite proposal to lay before Parliament, he continued. It would appear that Mr. Bennett had no special remedy to offer save an all-round tariff increase, "Imitation of an American policy which has not prevented an unemployment problem in the United States vastly more serious than our own, and which has led during the past few months to an estimated total of unemployed workmen in the neighborhood of four million," or contributions from the Dominion treasury to the provinces for unemployment relief. He ironically suggested that, alternatively, the Conservatives might contemplate carrying out General McRae's $300,000,000 Peace River immigration scheme as a remedy.

Session Unnecessary.

None of these would, he said, require the summoning of Parliament. His government, bearing in mind that unemployment was a problem calling for Dominion, provincial and municipal co-operation, had arranged for a conference of the Dominion and provincial authorities with the least possible delay after the election, meanwhile the government departments were already at work on preparations for this conference.

From the standpoint of efficiency and constitutional propriety, he said, this proposed conference was greatly preferable to a special session of Parliament. He trusted that out of it would come a feasible scheme suited to meet the great questions of seasonal and other unemployment.

Leading up to the question of the approaching Imperial Conference, he traced the part of the Liberal party in the evolution of Dominion status and cited various criticisms directed by Mr. Bennett against the expansion of Canada's responsibility in foreign affairs.

Throughout the speech, his audience gave him an attentive and friendly hearing—just such a hearing as they accorded Mr. Meighen on just such an evening four years ago. Lacking the formula for reading the inscrutable political mind of Quebec, one might hesitate to say whether the enthusiasm of tonight's gathering under the arc lights is to be taken as an earnest that Quebec holds as firm as ever to her Liberal faith or, as in the case of Mr Meighen, an evidence that even where it does not wholly concur it can veil the fact politely.

SPEAKS IN OPEN AIR.

(Canadian Press.)

QUEBEC, June 19. — For the first time since the opening of the campaign the Prime Minister spoke tonight in the open air. From a newly-constructed platform in St. Peter's market, Mr. King spoke, under leaden skies, to a great audience which stood to hear him. Many of his listeners were employes of factories in the district.

The platform, constructed of rough boards draped with wet bunting, was high above the head of the crowd, and from it Mr. King looked down on a sea of faces dimly illuminated by the small electric lights. A band played while the crowd waited.

Loud speakers, fastened to the electric-light poles, carried the voice of the Prime Minister and of his colleagues to the edges of the gathering. Some rain fell on the heads of the audience, the speakers and the newspapermen dufing the evening.

The meeting was in the constituency of Quebec-West, represented in the last Parliament by George Parent, K.C., who was recently appointed to the Senate. The Liberal candidate in the constituency has not yet been nominated, but George de Blois, a young lawyer, is regarded as a probable choice.

On the Platform.

Among those on the platform were: Hon. Ernest Lapointe, minister of justice, Hon. Lucien Cannon, solicitor-general, Premier L. A. Taschereau, Senator Parent, and Major C. G. Power, member for Quebec-South. H. E. Lavigueur, mayor of Quebec and member for Quebec-Montmorency, was in the chair and introduced the speakers. An announcement from the platform of Liberal gains in New Brunswick drew applause from the audience.

It was a quarter to nine o'clock before Mayor Lavigueur called the meeting to order.

The first speaker was Senator George Parent, former member for the constituency.

Accepts Ferguson's Defi.

He was followed by Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who was received with cheers. Mr. Lapointe spoke in French. He declared that the province of Quebec would remain faithful to Premier Mackenzie King. In the name of the Liberal party Mr. Lapointe accepted the challenge of Premier Ferguson, of Ontario. Premier Ferguson, said Mr. Lapointe, had declared Mr. King was the issue. He (Mr. Lapointe) was prepared to accept the issue.

The Prime Minister was introduced by Premier Taschereau, of Quebec.

Opens in French.

It was a quarter to ten o'clock before Mr. King began to speak. His first few words in French were received with great applause. He thanked the meeting for its generous welcome.

Proceeding in English, Mr. King commented on the huge meeting. He expressed confidence that the province of Quebec would once more rally to the support of the government at the coming election. In the old days, commented Mr. King, they had six times called governments by the names of two leaders. If this was the case today the present government might well be called the "Lapointe-King" government because of the great work done by Mr. Lapointe.

Mr. King had just begun to speak when it began to rain. Umbrellas were produced from those in the crowd fortunate enough to possess them.

Reviews Govt's Record.

The Prime Minister remarked that, as the rain was beginning, he must hurry his speech. He proceeded to review the record of the government. Taxes had been decreased, he said. Canadians were being brought back to Canada, the financial situation had been improved.

He spoke of the fact that it was the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which created the Department of Labor, but he (Mr. King) had lived to see the day when government contracts must contain a fair wage clause and also provision for the eight-hour day. This was an achievement of the present government. Pension rights had been restored to those Grand Trunk employes who took part in the strike of 1911. He had told Sir Henry Thornton, before he was appointed, that these rights and past money due must be given to the employes, and this had been done.

Unemployment.

Mr. King turned to a discussion of unemployment. It was a world condition, he said, and last year the stock market crash had aggravated conditions. The failure of the grain movement was another factor.

"The only remedy Mr. Bennett has proposed for the unemployment problem is the summoning of a special session of Parliament immediately after the present election," continued Mr. King. "May I say to the leader of the opposition that this is not a remedy at all. The mere summoning of a special session of Parliament does not afford the means of solving this or any other great economic problem. A special session of Parliament to consider the unemployment problem could only be of value if there were some definite and well considered proposal to submit to it. If Mr. Bennett is sincere in his suggestion that a special session of Parliament should be summoned, then he must have either in his own mind, or in the mind of his followers, some tangible scheme for the relief of unemployment.

"If he had a scheme in mind, he certainly did not make any attempt to reveal it during the last session of Parliament.

Conservative Remedies.

"So far as one can judge from Mr. Bennett's utterances, both then and during the present campaign, or from the utterances from his followers during the past two sessions of Parliament, there are only three specific remedies which the Conservative party is prepared to offer to the Canadian people as a remedy for the unemployment problem. One is an all-round increase in the tariff in imitation of an American policy which has not prevented an unemployment problem in the United States, vastly more serious than our own, and which has led, during the past few months, to an estimated total of unemployed workmen in the neighborhood of 4,000,000. Or, perhaps, Mr. Bennett proposes to carry into effect the immigration policy of General McRae, his chief lieutenant in the present campaign, which would involve this country in the expenditure of $300,000,000 in order to bring out 300,000 immigrants to Western Canada.

Made Only Year Ago.

"May I remind you that this proposal was only made a year ago, and put forth in the House of Commons with apparent approval of the leader of the Conservative party. The only other policy which Mr. Bennett may have in mind, is admittedly not a remedy, but an ineffective palliative for the problem, namely, contributions from the Dominion treasury to the provinces, for the purpose of unemployment relief. Moreover, this policy does not require a special session of Parliament, as an emergent condition could be met, if need be, by Governor-General's warrant."

"If Mr. Bennett is serious in proposing a special session of Parliament, let him say quite definitely which, if any, of these policies he wishes to introduce as a solution of the problem which he is now endeavoring to exploit and exaggerate for political purposes.

Sympathetic Concern.

"So far as the Liberal administration is concerned, let me again make it clear that we have the keenest and most sympathetic concern for those who are unemployed, and propose to deal with the question along lines recommended not only by constitutional propriety, but by economic investigation. We are not waiting for a special session of Parliament in order to deal with the several features of unemployment which may present themselves during the ensuing months. The whole question of unemployment is one which requires co-operative study and co-operative action by Dominion, provincial and municipal authorities together with organizations of manufacturers and laborers representing the interests of those most severely affected by any slackening in the business of our country. Having this fact in mind, and having also in mind that no province has yet applied to the Dominion government for monetary assistance in unemployment relief, we arranged, at the close of the past session of Parliament, to summon a Dominion-provincial conference with the least possible delay, following the present elections campaign."

Gathering Data.

"From the time that it was decided to summon this conference, departments of the government have been engaged in gathering data to bring before it during its session. We have also been in close communication with provincial, municipal and other interested bodies who are engaged in similar preliminary study of the problem, and will thus be able to secure a much more accurate survey of the entire situation than was possible during the last session of Parliament. The Dominion-provincial conference will be comprised of ministers and others whose business it is to be familiar with the several phases of the unemployment problem which will be discussed. It will include not only responsible ministers and representatives of Dominion, provinicial and municipal governments, but will also have the advantage of having expert evidence from representatives of labor organizations, manufacturers, associations and other similar bodies. From the standpoint of efficiency and constitional propriety, a Dominion-provincial conference on unemployment is infinitely superior to a special session of Parliament. A special session is convened normally only to meet a grave national emergency.

Not a Perilous Position.

"Were Canada to summon a special session of Parliament as Mr. Bennett has prospected, it would undoubtedly advertise to the world that Canada is suffering from a very perilous situation which does not, in fact, exist. There is a right way and a wrong way in approaching every question. The right way in this case is by co-operation, the wrong way is by attempting to bring the unemployment question into the party controversy on the floors of Parliament. There is also an economical or an extravagant way to approach the question.

"A special session of Parliament is an extravagant method of dealing with this question. Besides being futile and unnecessary, it would cost the people of this country no less than $2,000,000, without a guarantee of any more practicable remedy for unemployment than emerged from the discussion of the last session.

To Draft Feasible Scheme.

"This great Dominion-provincial conference which is to be held will, I believe, help us to work out a feasible scheme which will be suited to meet the great question of seasonal unemployment and other forms of unemployment which may arise," declared Mr. King. "May I say that out of that conference I believe something will come which will be constructive and helpful, and something which will go far towards meeting the present situation. May I add that so far as I personally am concerned, I do not know of anything which would give me more real satisfaction and pleasure than to be of some real service at a conference of that character, if I am permitted to do so."

"Unemployment in the United States is indefinitely greater than in Canada today," continued Mr. King. There were three or four millions out of work in the United States. But the government of Canada was determined to meet the unemployment problems. He asserted that the question was bound up with trade, and Great Britain was a country which had not raised its tariff against Canada, and the government, in its budget, was trying to develop and encourage trade with Great Britain.

British Preference.

Today in widening the British preference, the government was merely carrying out the policies of Laurier, said Mr. King. He was sure that the government of great Britain would be sympathetic to Canada's efforts to develop trade, and increased trade meant greater employment. Who could be a fitter man to go to the Imperial Conference than Hon. C. A. Dunning, minister of finance, the author of the budget, asked Mr. King.

He had always tried, as had Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to promote unity in Canada, said Mr. King. Laurier had visualized Canada as a nation "in a galaxy of nations," and his vision was coming true. The Imperial Conference, he felt, would put its seal of approval on Canada's full nationhood. Canada had sacrificed herself to attain nationhood, the Prime Minister continued. But a country could not be termed a nation until she made her own treaties, and so Canada determined to make her own treaties, and the government had so advised His Majesty.

Hon. Ernest Lapointe had signed the first treaty on behalf of Canada. This step, asserted Mr. King, had been opposed by the Conservatives, as had the opening of legations.

Mr. Bennett had spoken on this point in the House of Commons as follows, declared Mr. King: "I am wholly opposed to the establishment of this embassy at Washington. It is but the doctrine of separation, it is but the evidence to many minds of the end of our connection with the Empire. For that is what it means. It is nothing else ultimately, because if we are a sovereign state we cannot belong to the British Empire."

LIBERAL PARTY HAS SYMPATHY FOR WORKLESS

Premier King Discusses Unemployment In Quebec Speech.

SPEAKS IN OPEN ON RAINY NIGHT

Says Plan For Special Session of Parliament Too Costly.

By RAY BROWN,
Canadian Press Staff Correspondent.

QUEBEC, June 19.—Quebec welcomed the Prime Minister of Canada today in no uncertain manner. Dull skies, wet pavement, intermittent rain, a cool wind—these did not deter a huge crowd from gathering in St. Peter's Market Square, to stand for hours listening to Premier Mackenzie King, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice and chief Quebec lieutenant of the Prime Minister, and other speakers, expound the doctrine of Liberalism.

It was a meeting in the city which sent Sir Wilfrid Laurier to Parliament, and in the neighboring constitutency to that represented by the old chieftain. Frequently his name figured in the speeches of the Prime Minister and others who participated, and again and again it drew applause.

Bend Every Energy.

The Prime Minister dealt with unemployment, taking the position that the Government of which he is the leader is determined to rid Canada of this problem and will bend every energy to the work. He declared the view that the budget, with its provisions for encouraging Empire trade will have the effect of increasing Canada's business, and this will result in decreasing unemployment.

If Canada could improve her market in Great Britain and sell her wheat, conditions in this country would improve rapidly. The condition was a world condition and Canada's position was much better than that of many other countries. There were four or five million unemployed in the United States which was a highly protected country, Mr. King declared.

Imperial questions also occupied the Prime Minister. He emphasized once more that the Government in widening the British preference was merely carrying on the policy laid down by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. King criticized the attitude of the opposition leader toward unemployment. Mr. Bennett's proposal to call a special session of Parliament to deal with this matter, said Mr. King, would not be as effective as the Government proposal to summon a Dominion-Provincial conference. But if Mr. Bennett was serious in his suggestion that a special session should be summoned he should indicate what his policy was and how he proposed to deal with the problem.

At the conclusion of his speech the Prime Minister boarded his train for the Maritimes. He speaks in Moncton tomorrow night.

First In Open.

For the first time since the opening of the campaign, the Prime Minister spoke in the open air. From a newly-constructed platform in St. Peter's market, Mr. King spoke, under leaden skies, to a great audience which stood to hear him. Many of his listeners were employes of factories in the district.

The meeting was in the constituency of Quebec West, represented in the last Parliament by Georges Parent, K.C., who was recently appointed to the Senate. The Liberal candidate in the constituency has not yet been nominated, but George de Blois, a young lawyer, is regarded as a probable choice.

Among those on the platform were: Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice; Hon. Lucien Cannon, Solicitor-General, Premier L. A. Taschereau, Senator Parent, and Major C. G. An announcement from the platform of Liberal gains in New Brunswick drew applause from the audience.

Remain Faithful.

Senator Parent was followed by Mr. Lapointe, who was received with cheers. Mr. Lapointe declared that the province of Quebec would remain faithful to Premier Mackenzie King. In the name of Liberal party Mr. Lapointe accepted the challenge of Premier Ferguson, of Ontario. Premier Ferguson, said Mr. Lapointe, had declared Mr. King was the issue. In the old days, commented Mr. King, they had six times called Governments by the names of two leaders. If this was the case today, the present Government might well be called the "Lapointe-King-Government" because of the great work done by Mr. Lapointe.

Mr. King had just begun to speak when it began to rain. Umbrellas were produced from these in the crowd fortunate enough to possess them.

But a country could not be termed a nation until she made her own treaties, and so Canada determined to make her own treaties, and the Government had so advised His Majesty.

Mr. Lapointe had signed the first treaty on behalf of Canada. This step, asserted Mr. King, had been opposed by the Conservatives, as had the opening of legations.

Mr. King referred to a report of a speech by Mr. Bennett at Oshawa, which, he said, had been published in The Ottawa Morning Journal of July 23, 1928, and which read as follows: "What port is Mr. King bound for?" Mr. Bennett asked, referring to recent declarations by the Premier of Canada's equal status in the British Empire and the establishment of embassies in foreign countries. "If he wants to make this an independent country, let him say so. Let us have a well defined expression from Premier King as to where he is heading, what his chart is and what his port."

He would tell Mr. Bennett that his chart was the British constitution, Mr. King asserted. His Government had stood for equality of status in the British Commonwealth, and now it asked for a mandate to send Hon. Ernest Lapointe as the representative of Quebec and one of the representatives of Canada to the Imperial Conference.

Québec L'Evénement 20 juin 1932.

M. Mackenzie King ouvre sa campagne à Québec

Le Premier Ministre prédit qu'il sera maintenu au pouvoir. — M. le maire Lavigueur préside. — M. Taschereau souhaite la bienvenue au chef de son parti.—Discours de MM. Ernest Lapointe, Lucien Cannon, Georges Parent et "Chubby" Power. — Improvisation de M. le sénateur Béland.

PLACE ST-PIERRE

Les libéraux ont ouvert leur campagne électorale dans le district de Quebec, hier soir, par une assemblée sur la place St-Pierre, à St-Sauveur, là où naguère Sir Wilfrid Laurier venait reprendre contact avec "ses chers électeurs" de Québec-Est, (en ce temps-là, St-Sauveur était partie de son comté) chaque fois qu'il faisait appel au peuple. Le souvenir de l'illustre chef libéral était dans tous les esprits et tous les orateurs prononcerent à maintes reprises son nom que tout le Canada vénère.

La place St-Pierre était bondée, bien que la température fut incertaine. Le ciel fut clément, cependant. Pendant le discours du Premier Ministre King, une petite ondée vint rafraichir la foule et l'on vit des centaines de parapluies s'ouvrir. Mais ce fut un orage de quelques minutes seulement et le chef libéral put revoir les figures de tous ses auditeurs.

Son Honneur le maire H.-E. Lavigueur présidait et présenta les orateurs.

L'hon. sénateur Georges Parent para le premier et exprima sa gratitude a ses électeurs de la fidelité qu'ils lui avaient témoigné, ajoutant que c'est grâce à eux qu'il a obtenu l'nonneur d'entrer au Senat.

L'hon. M. Ernest Lapointe vint ensuite. Il fit un magnifique éloge de son chef: "Le Premier Ministre d'Ontario", dit-il, "a déclaré que la question en jeu dans cette élection etait Mackenzie King. Au nom du parti libéral canadien, j'accepte le défi et je relève le gant". Un peu plus tard, il faisait appel à toutes les provinces: "Soyons unis", s'écria le ministre de la Justice, "bannissons de ce pays les fauteurs de discorde et les semeurs de préjugés".

M. le Maire invita l'hon. M. L.-A. Taschereau à présenter le très hon. M. King: "Dans cette campagne fédérale", déclara le Premier Ministre de Québec, "je suis un humble soldat...

—"Un grand soldat", lança une voix.

—"Je suis heureux de présenter les hommages de la Législature de Québec et de souhaiter la bienvenue à mon chef, M. Mackenzie King".

M. King se leva alors et remercia tous ses amis de leurs compliments. Il parla pendant environ une heure. Il compara son cabinet à l'ancien ministere Lafontaine-Baldwin, déclarant que l'hon. M. Lapointe y tenait le rôle de premier plan, celui de Sir Louis Hyppolite, puisqu'il dirigeait la politique avec lui. "Nous n'avons jamais eu un désaccord entre nous", ajouta le Premier Ministre, qui démontra ensuite qu'il n'a que cela, des désaccords, avec l'hon. M. Bennett, ce qui est tout naturel. Mais M. King tenta de prouver que la présente attitude du chef conservateur ne s'accorde pas avec des paroles qu'il a prononcées dans le passé. M. Bennett fut la cible de tous les traits qu'il lança.

Dans ses remerciements à ses collègues de Québec, le chef libéral fut très flatteur pour le major C.-G. Power.

Le major Power fut invité à adresser la parole après le Premier Ministre. S'il faut en juger par les applaudissements qui soulignèrent son discours, c'est "Chubby" qui eut le "cake" de la soirée. Ses amis s'attendaient qu'il aurait en même temps son portefeuille, mais c'est encore partie remise, parait-il. Le major Power fut très spirituel. Il enthousiasma la foule.

L'hon. M. Lucien Cannon, qui devait être le dernier orateur de la soirée, broda un joli discours, après son ami "Chubby", sur l'évolution de la nation canadienne, commencée sous le gouvernement Baldwin-Lafontaine et qui a fait un grand pas sous le gouvernement "King-Lapointe".

Il était 11 heures 20. L'assistance, qui avait écouté près de trois heures de discours, en voulait encore. M. King avait signalé la présense sur l'estrade de l'hon. sénateur Henri Béland, ancien ministre. Lorsque M. le Maire annonça que le programme était épuise, la foule cria: "Béland, Béland". L'ancien collègue de Laurier voulut résister à cet appel, mais, sur les instances de MM. King et Lapointe, il se leva, s'avança et improvisa une charmante allocution.

La soirée se termina par le chant du "God Save The King" et trois hourrahs vigoureux en l'honneur de Sa Majesté le Roi, que son très digne représentant du Canada, M. le Vicomte Willingdon, dut entendre de la Citadelle. — E. C.

A 8 heures, la place St-Pierre était presque remplie. L'estrade était bondée de sénateurs, députés, candidats, aspirants, amis politiques. Vers 8 heures 20, on estime qu'il y avait 15,000 personnes.

La fanfare Morin sérénada la foule pendant une demi-heure.

A 8 heures 30, une auto arriva, amenant le très honorable M. Mackenzie King, l'hon. M. Ernest Lapointe, l'hon. M. Lucien Cannon, l'hon. M. L.-A. Taschereau, l'hon. sénateur F.-J. Paradis et Son Honneur le maire H.-E. Lavigueur.

L'assistance entonna "O Canada". Puis on applaudit les gros bonnets du parti libéral. L'hon. M. Lapointe, souriant, conduisit le Premier Ministre à l'estrade.

M. O.-A. Bériau proposa M. le maire Lavigueur comme président de l'assemblée. Notre premier magistrat s'avança au bord de l'estrade et prit la parole.

"Il me fait grand plaisir", dit le maire, "d'accepter l'honneur de présider cette assemblée du T. H. M. W.-L. Mackenzie King. Cette enthousiaste assemblée me rappelle celle en l'honneur d'un ancien premier ministre du Canada, le regretté Sir Wilfrid Laurier, que je présidai en 1917. C'est un honneur pour moi, ce soir, de souhaiter la bienvenue en votre nom, mesdames et messieurs, et au nom de toute la ville au premier ministre du Canada, mon chef" (appl.).

Le maire présenta ensuite comme premier orateur l'honorable sénateur Georges Parent, ancien député de Québec-Ouest, qui fut accueilli par des applaudissements, des vivats et la traditionnelle chanson: "Il a gagné ses épaulettes."

Le sénateur Parent dit d'abord son émotion de se retrouver au milieu de ses anciens électeurs, en une pareille circonstance, et souligna l'honneur fait au comté de Québec-Ouest par le gouvernement lorsqu'il a élevé son député au rang de sénateur.

"On ne se sépare pas sans un serrement de coeur", dit-il, "d'une population au milieu de laquelle on a vécu pendant 17 ans et que l'on a eu l'honneur de représenter à Ottawa. Mais je me propose, dans la mesure de mes forces, de continuer de vous servir. Car je n'oublie pas, électeurs, vous surtout, mes amis de St-Sauveur, que c'est vous qui avez placé mon père au poste de premier ministre de cette province, et que c'est à vous que je dois l'honneur qui m'échoit aujourd'hui" (appl.).

Le sénateur Parent, après un mot délicat aux dames, conseilla à ses anciens électeurs de se choisir un député digne d'eux pour les représenter à Ottawa. Il les enjoignit de ne pas écouter les mensonges, les calomnies ,dans le choix de leur représentant. Parlant ensuite en anglais, le nouveau sénateur souhaita la bienvenue à M. King, lui disant qu'il n'y a peut-être pas d'endroit au Canada où son oeuvre a été plus admirée que dans Québec-Ouest, et lui promettant une grande victoire pour le 28 juillet.

Le maire Lavigueur présenta alors à l'auditoire l'hon. M. Ernest Lapointe, en qui il salua "l'idole de la province, l'homme qui jouit de la considération de tout le pays". Le ministre reçut une ovation en se levant. La foule chanta et l'applaudit bruyamment.

"Je veux d'abord", dit en commençant l'hon. M. Lapointe, "saluer cette immense foule accourue à notre appel, malgré l'inclémence de la température, et vous remercier, mesdames et messieurs, de ce magnifique hommage que vous rendez au chef de la nation canadienne. Aussi longtemps que Mackenzie King restera ce qu'il est, la province de Québec lui demeurera fidèle. Il y a quelques semaines, le premier ministre conservateur de l'Ontario, M. Ferguson, disait dans un grand discours que la question en jeu dans cette élection était Mackenzie King. Au nom du parti libéral, j'accepte le défi et je relève le gant. M. emple, on ne dissimule pas l'appréhension que l'objectif des ennemis de l'Eglise ne tende à lèser plus facilement les droits et la foi des familles, au moyen de "l'Ecole unique", en face de laquelle, précisément à la faveur de cette gratuité et de cette sélection professionnelle opérée avec les moyens puissants de l'état, "l'enseignement libre" se trouverait dans une condition de désastreuse infériorité dans un pays où il n'y a pas parité entre les écoles d'Etat et les écoles privées et où fait défaut la Répartition proportionnelle scolaire des subsides.

Dans ces conditions, la voie au monopole scolaire de l'Etat est grande ouverte.

C'est pourquoi la Fédération nationale catholique a offert en hommage au Saint-Père un livre de M. J. Mora, intitulé: le Vrai Visage de l'Ecole unique. Et l'Eme cardinal secrétaire d'Etat, remerciant le général de Castelnau, le 24 mars, écrivait: "Les droits et les devoirs du père et de la mère découlent immédiatement des responsabilités dont Dieu lui-même les charge en les associant à sa puissance créatrice pour communiquer la vie à leurs enfants.

tion canadienne dans tout ce qu'elle a de plus pur, de plus limpide, il est un Canadien dans toute l'acception du terme (appl.).

"Comme tous les grands hommes", continua le ministre, "M. King n'a pas été exempt de la calomnie. Il y a quelques jours encore, un député tory, parlant au radio, a jeté la calomnie à la face de mon chef avec toute la rage d'un renégat. M. King a pour lui une vertu, une qualité d'autant plus précieuse qu'elle est plus rare: le désintéresserent le plus complet. Il a donné à ce pays une administration qui fait l'orgueil de la nation. Sous sa direction, le Canada a pris la première place parmi les nations et a eu une période de progrès sans précédent dans son histoire.

"A notre arrivée au pouvoir, l'union nationale avait cessé d'exister", poursuivit l'hon. M. Lapointe. "Le ministère King a été un ministère de reconstruction nationale, de croissance canadienne. Sphère impériale, sphère économique, sphère internationale, dans toutes ces sphères, le Canada a été placé au premier rang. A cause de notre géographie, des éléments distincts qui composent notre population, le problème du tarif est difficile à résoudre. M. King l'a résolu avec beaucoup de maîtrise. Le gouvernement libéral n'a pas été le gouvernement d'un groupe, d'une classe, d'une province, mais il a été un gouvernément canadien.

"L'on vous avait dit en 1921, puis répété en 1925 et en 1926", dit encore le ministre, "que la politique libérale signifierait la ruine des industries canadiennes. Que s'est-il passé? La semaine dernière, un ancien ministre des Finances conservateur disait à Toronto, devant un groupe d'actionnaires, que le Canada a pris la septième place, dans le monde, au point de vue de l'industrie manufacturière. Il y a 27 pays du monde où la population est plus forte qu'au Canada, mais il n'y a que quatre pays qui occupent un rang plus élevé que celui du Canada pour leurs exportations. Le budget Dunning va continuer cette politique d'expansion commerciale, et c'est pour cela qu'il a été accueilli avec enthousiasme d'un bout du Dominion à l'autre. Nous voulons ouvrir des marchés aux pays qui veulent commercer avec nous: c'est cela la politique libérale" (appl.).

CITATIONS D'UN BRAVE

On a dit, ces derniers jours, que M. Raymond Poincaré, dont on connaît le fervent attachement à sa profession d'avocat, serait tout disposé à se laisser élire bâtonnier de l'Ordre en juillet 1931.

Il est fort possible que l'ancien président de la République accepte ce suprême hommage de ses pairs, mais ce que nous pouvons affirmer, c'est qu'il ne s'en est ouvert à personne, et que ceux qui, au palais, se targuent d'avoir reçu ses confidences se moquent de leurs auditeurs.

En réalité, le bruit qu'on fait actuellement courir est un petit "battean" qu'on monte aux "batonnables", dans l'espoir peu charitable de troubler leur sommeil. Qui oserait, en effet, opposer sa candidature à celle de M. Raymond Poincaré?

Mais, nous le répétons, jusqu'à présent, cela reste dans le domaine des pures hypothèses, — ce qui ne veut pas dire, d'ailleurs, que le "canard" d'aujourd'hui ne puisse pas devenir la vérité de demain.

UN "BATEAU"

Après avoir dit que le gouvernement libéral a diminué les taxes et augmenté les sources de revenus, avoir déclaré que le dollar canadien se cote à prime sur les marchés mondiaux, l'hon. M. Lapointe accusa le chef conservateur de se promener dans le pays avec un "message de désolation", un "souffle de mort". Il nia l'assertion de M. Bennett et du Dr Manion, son collègue, à l'effet que les Canadiens s'en vont encore aux Etats-Unis.

"Tout cela est faux", dit le ministre. "Dans le "New York Times" de dimanche dernier, par exemple, on peut lire que dans les villes américaines de Lowell, de New-Bedford et de Fall-River la population a diminué depuis dix ans. Cela veut dire que nos Canadiens reviennent des Etats-Unis. Dans le Canada nous n'avons pas une ville où la population ait diminué depuis dix ans" (appl.).

L'hon. M. Lapointe dit que notre pays jouit de la paix industrielle, qu'il y a eu moins de grèves depuis tice.

Deuxième citation (secteur de Montauban.) — "N'a pas hésité à se jeter à la nage, dans une eau profonde, malgré la violence du courant, pour dérouler un câble entre la berge et une maison sur le toit de laquelle un officier et sa famille s'étaient réfugiés. A persisté pendant deux heures dans ses efforts héroïques et n'a pu rever qu'en s'aidant de son câble dans un état complet d'épuisement".

L'adjudant Jacquemain fut déjà titulaire de citations élogieuses pendant la grande Guerre et au Maroc.

les quatre dernières années qu'en aucune autre époque de la Confédération canadienne. Le ministre fit allusion au problème des vétérans, "pour lesquels le Canada doit faire quelque chose".

"A la dernière session", affirma le ministre, "un comité présidé par mon ami "Chubby" Power (appl.), a étudié des questions complexes, qui ont été réglées à la satisfaction des vétérans. Eux-mêmes l'ont admis par la bouche d'un porte-parole".

Le ministre affirma que le parti libéral a reçu de Laurier l'enseignement qu'il n'y a de véritable progrès que celui qui est basé sur l'harmonie. Il dit encore qu'il ne faut pas qu'une classe domine le pays, et que toutes les classes ont droit d'être représentées dans le gouvernement. Il affirma que l'union nationale doit présider à l'administration du pays et que la haine doit être bannie du Canada.

L'hon. M. Lapointe montra, dans le monument élevé, à Québec, à la mémoire de Wolfe et de Montcalm, le symbole de l'union des deux races en ce pays.

"Bannissons de ce pays", dit-il, "les fomentateurs de désordre et les semeurs de préjugés". (appl.)

Le ministre rappela la rétrocession aux provinces de l'ouest de leurs ressources naturelles, disant qu'il fallait le courage de Mackenzie King pour aborder et régler cette question. Il rappela, encore, l'adoption du rapport Duncan en faveur des provinces maritimes.

"La paix nationale existe dans ce pays et elle est due à la direction du premier ministre du pays", dit l'hon. M. Lapointe.

L'hon. M. Lapointe parla brièvement aussi de la conférence impériale de 1926, déclarant qu'elle a valu aux Dominions l'égalité de statut, l'union dans la liberté, la liberté complete dans l'administration des affaires domestiques et internationales.

"Nous devons garder notre individualité propre, et le Canada continuera son évolution progressive en adoptant les politiques qui lui sont propres", ajouta le ministre de la Justice.

L'orateur rappela qu'il a représenté le Canada, en 1929, à la Conférence qui avait pour but de codifier les lois impériales et les lois canadiennes selon le nouveau statut légal des Dominions. Il dit que le rapport de cette conférence a reçu l'approbation unanime des conservateurs et des libéraux, à la Chambre des Communes.

"Electeurs de la cité de Québec", s'écria enfin l'hon. M. Lapointe, "électeurs de la province, électeurs de tout le Canada, je vous le demande: voulez-vous envoyer à Londres, à la prochaine conférence impériale, les hommes qui ont commencé le travail, qui se sont prononcés en faveur de la liberté du Canada, ou bien voulez-vous envoyer des hommes qui parleront comme des pupilles ayant besoin de tutelle? Si j'ai l'honneur d'y aller encore, comme mon chef l'a déclaré à Brantford, laissez-moi vous dire que je représenterai les vues de ceux qui m'ont élu depuis tant d'années, que j'irai en véritable Canadien".

L'hon. M. Lapointe déclara que l'établissement des légations à Washington, à Paris, à Tokio, répondait au besoin, pour le Canada, de parler à ces pays comme à des égaux. Il signala l'honneur conféré au Canada par l'élection du sénateur Dandurand dans le conseil de la Ligue des Nations et rappela que le Canada a signé la clause de l'arbitrage, à Genève, il y a quelques mois.

"Voulez-vous que cette oeuvre se continue, que le Canada continue d'avancer dans la voie du progrès, de la liberté", demanda encore le ministre. "Le Canada sera ce qu'on le fera. J'ai confiance que la jeunesse qui m'entend sera imbue des principes qui ont inspiré les fondateurs de la Confédération canadienne. En les maintenant, ces principes, nous réaliserons les desseins de la Providence. Que votre vote, le 28, soit donné pour King et la victoire, pour King et l'unité dans le Canada, pour King et un pays plus beau que nous serons fiers de laisser à ceux qui viendront après nous". (appl.)

Le ministre reçut des applaudisse-

que la dépréciation de la flotte, on atteint toutefois $5,929,758, somme très élevée, bien qu'inférieure de $1,612,867 à celle de l'année précédente. La continuité du déficit fournit des arguments à ceux qui mettent en doute la nécessité d'une marine marchande soutenue et administrée par l'Etat. Pourquoi, disent-ils, conserver des navires qui nous coûteront toujours si cher? Pourquoi ne pas laisser à l'initiative privée le soin de tirer le maximum d'une exploitation que le gouvernement ne pourra jamais rendre rémunératrice? La question est trop vaste pour être tranchée en quelques lignes. A d'autres d'y répondre. Contentons-nous de signaler un aspect du problème. Notre marine marchande nous permet de garder avec certains ports un contact direct qu'aucune compagnie privée ne voudrait maintenir. Ottons, par exemple, les services Canada-Antilles et, en général, Canada-possessions britanniques. Ces services sont des expériences coûteuses pour le moment, mais qui, un jour ou l'autre, nous rapporteront. Second avantage. Par son nom même, notre marine constitue un excellent mode de propagande et un facteur commercial important. La vieille maxime "Le commerce suit le pavillon" garde encore beaucoup de sa valeur. Qu'on puisse obtenir le même résultat avec des entreprises privées, cela ne semble pas encore prouvé. A moins qu'on ments prolongés en reprenant son siège.

Le maire Lavigueur, s'avançant ensuite sur le bord de l'estrade, invita l'honorable M. L.-A. Taschereau à présenter à l'auditoire le très honorable M. W.-L. Mackenzie King. Le Premier Ministre Taschereau fut accueilli par des applaudissements prolongés. On chanta "O Canada" et "For He's a jolly good fellow".

"Je voudrais", dit l'hon. M. Taschereau, en commençant son discours, "que chacun des auditeurs fût sur cette estrade pour voir cette mer de monde. Il y a trente ans que je suis dans la politique, et je n'ai jamais tant vu de libéraux. (rires)

"Dans cette campagne électorale", continua le Premier Ministre de la province, "je ne suis qu'un modeste soldat..."

—"Un grand soldat!" lança un auditeur de l'estrade.

..."et je suis heureux, comme tel, d'acclamer, ce soir, le chef du parti libéral dans notre pays. Je me réjouis d'appartenir à un parti si uni, contrairement à ce que l'on voit chez nos adversaires. En voyant ce que le gouvernement King a accompli depuis quelques années, je me rends compte que Laurier voyait clair quand il dit que le vingtième siècle serait le siècle du Canada.

"Je remercie M. King", poursuivit l'hon. M. Taschereau, "de commencer sa campagne électorale dans Québec. Y a-t-il, je vous le demande, mesdames et messieurs, une province du Dominion où le coeur libéral bat plus fort que dans la province de Québec?"

L'hon. M. Taschereau promit au Premier Ministre du Canada une victoire plus grande qu'en 1925 et en 1926, déclarant que M. King et ceux qui l'entourent le méritent.

"Le développement de Québec, nous le devons à ces hommes", ajouta le chef du gouvernement provincial. "La semaine dernière, par exemple, on lançait en Angleterre un immense transatlantique, l'"Empress of Britain", qui aura son port d'attache à Québec. A quoi pouvons-nous attribuer cela, sinon aux millions que le gouvernement fédéral veut dépenser pour agrandir le port de Québec".

L'hon. M. Taschereau dit encore que c'est le gouvernement King qui a rendu possible la construction d'un tunnel sous le Cap Diamant par le Pacifique Canadien. Le Premier Ministre termina son discours en rendant un bel hommage à l'hon. M. Lapointe et à l'hon. M. Cannon, qu'il appela les deux chefs libéraux de la province. Il les remercia, au nom de la province de tout le travail accompli dans l'intérêt du développement de Québec et souhaita encore en terminant une cordiale bienvenue à M. King.

Je dois remercier particulièrement M. le maire Lavigueur, l'hon. M. Taschereau et enfin M. Lapointe. Notre gouvernement devrait s'appeler le gouvernement Lapointe - King car s'il est un homme qui a contribué à la direction politique de ce pays, c'est le ministre de la Justice. (Appl). Nous n'avons jamais eu une seule dissension entre nous, parce que nous nous sommes toujours inspirés de l'enseignement du très hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. (Appl).

"Je veux aussi rendre hommage à l'hon. M. Cannon pour tout le travail qu'il a accompli à nos côtés. Mais je tiens à louer surtout mon ami Chubby Power. Pendant la dernière session, il a dirigé les travaux de deux comités et il a mérité la reconnaissance de tout le peuple canadien. Aucun député n'a plus travaillé pour son pays que Chubby Power". A ce moment, la pluie commence à tomber et M. King annonce qu'il va abréger son discours.

"Quelle est l'oeuvre de notre gouvernement ?" dit le Premier Ministre. "Nous avons diminué les taxes, nous avons réduit le coût de la vie, nous avons essayé de faire revivre les beaux jours d'autrefois. Je demande aux ouvriers de considérer leur situation actuelle et de la comparer avec leurs conditions de travail de l'ancien temps. J'ai débuté à Ottawa comme rédacteur de la Gazette du Travail. J'ai donc été mêlé aux affaires de la classe ouvrière. Je me souviens du temps que je correspondais avec un chef ouvrier de Québec, M. Grenier. Je garde de M. Grenier le meilleur souvenir.

"Ouvriers de Québec, vous savez que c'est le gouvernement Laurier qui a amélioré vos conditions. Comme sous-ministre du Travail j'ai préparé une législation pour rendre obligatoires les salaires raisonnables. Comme Premier Ministre, j'ai fait adopter une loi qui oblige les entrepreneurs à payer des salaires raisonnables aux ouvriers. (Appl).

"C'est aussi le parti libéral du temps de Laurier, qui a assuré le règlement facile des différends ouvriers. Lorsque les conservateurs étaient au pouvoir, j'ai essayé de faire rendre aux anciens employés du Grand Tronc la pension à laquelle ils avaient droit. Le gouvernement Meighen refusa d'écouter mes suggestions. Plus tard, je suis ar-rivé au pouvoir et j'ai demandé à Sir Henry Thornton de rendre aux employés du Grand Tronc leurs droits à la pension. J'ai obtenu justice pour ces braves ouvriers.

"C'est le gouvernement actuel qui a fait adopter la loi des pensions de vieillesse. Autre chose que nous avons fait pour les ouvriers : nous avons nommé un travailleur dans le bureau de direction des C. N. R.

"Actuellement, nous avons un grand problème à résoudre. Au Canada comme ailleurs, il y a des sans-travail. Nous avons l'intention de régler ce problème. Nous nous en sommes occupés déjà. Nous avons maintenu en service des employés des C.N.R. bien que le trafic du pain ait diminué considérablement.

"M. Bennett parle beaucoup du chômage depuis la fin de la session. Il n'en a pas parlé à la Chambre, mais il nous annonce que s'il est porté au pouvoir il convoquera le Parlement pour assurer du travail aux ouvriers. Mais quelles sont les mesures qu'il présentera ? Il ne l'a pas dit. Je ne crois pas que la simple convention du Parlement suffise à régler le problème du chômage.

"Quelle a été notre attitude ? Nous avons convoqué une conférence nationale qui sera tenue au commencement d'août. Tous les intéressés y sont invités. Le problème du chômage sera étudié sous toutes ses faces et s'il est nécessaire de faire des lois, alors nous convoquerons le Parlement. S'il est nécessaire de le faire, nous demanderons un mandat spécial au gouverneur-général pour aider immédiatement les sans-travail. Le fait que M. Bennett ne songe qu'à convoquer le Parlement me fait croire que notre adversaire est tellement certain de ne pas arriver au pouvoir qu'il ne songe pas à aller à la conférence impériale. (rires et appl.) M. Bennett ne veut évidemment pas que nous discutions la représentation du Canada à cette conférence.

"Le chef conservateur nous dit que l'élévation du tarif préviendrait le chômage. Est-ce juste ? Les Etats-Unis ont élevé leur tarif et ils ont du chômage. Si nous en avons au Canada, il faut reconnaitre que nous en avons moins que les autres pays du monde.

"M. McRea, organisateur conservateur, a proposé à la Chambre le projet de faire venir au Canada 300,000 immigrants en vertu d'un grand plan de colonisation. M. Bennett a voté pour. Est-ce là la solution du problème du chômage que nous offre le parti conservateur ?

"Je vous ai dit que le trafic du blé de l'ouest diminuerait. Nous n'avons pas vu cette année l'exportation habituelle de notre blé en Angleterre. C'est là une des causes du chômage. Qu'avons-nous fait ? Nous avons accordé une préférence aux produits britanniques afin de diriger vers l'Angleterre une partie du commerce que nous faisions aux Etats-Unis. Nous allons donc acheter davantage de la Grande-Bretagne et nous avons confiance que la mère-patrie achètera en retour une plus grande quantité de blé canadien. Nous avons basé cette politique de préférence britannique sur les principes énoncés par Sir Wilfrid Laurier, en 1897, l'année du jubilé de la Reine Victoria. C'est notre illustre chef qui a compris le premier que l'on ne vend pas à un pays l'orsqu'on n'achète pas de ce même pays. Nous continuons cette politique de Sir Wilfrid Laurier et nous savons que le peuple anglais tout entier applaudit le gouvernement canadien pour ce qu'il a fait dans son dernier budget.

"Ouvriers canadiens, si le gouvernement libéral est délégué à la conférence impériale, vous pouvez être certains qu'il saura s'entendre avec le gouvernement travailliste de M. Ramsay Macdonald pour régler cette question de commerce entre l'Angleterre et le Canada, si intimement lié au problème du chômage. A cette conférence, nous déléguerons M. Dunning lui-même, l'auteur de notre présent budget.

"En 1897, Sir Wilfrid Laurier a parlé du Canada à la conférence impériale de Londres et il a proclamé alors que notre pays était une nation et que l'Empire britannique était un Commonwealth de nations. Sir Wilfrid a dit à la Reine Victoria que nous étions une union de nations autonomes. Quelle vision ! N'est-ce pas la situation qui est admise aujourd'hui dans tout l'Empire ?

"Sir Wilfrid Laurier a aussi prêché l'harmonie et la tolérance dans ce pays. Son ambition était de faire un Canada uni et prospère. Voilà la politique du gouvernement que j'ai l'honneur de présider. Nous voulons l'unité entre provinces, l'unité dans tout le Dominion. Telle a été l'ambition du parti libéral. Son oeuvre n'est pas complètement accomplie mais elle le sera peut-être lors de la prochaine conférence impériale.

"Le libéralisme a été le pionnier du gouvernement responsable. Les libéraux se sont battus pour l'obtenir et ils ont essayé de diriger notre pays vers l'indépendance et l'autonomie. L'indépendance nationale ne s'obtient pas en un jour. C'est une oeuvre de patience et de temps. Nos vaillants soldats ont fait beaucoup pour faire du Canada une nation. Nous l'avons reconnu en assurant aux survivants de la guerre et à leurs descendants des pensions raisonnables.

"Un pays autonome doit faire ses traités lui-même. Le Canada a négocié un traité du flétan avec les Etats-Unis. Qui devait signer ce traité au nom du Canada et du Roi? Nous avons cru qu'aucun homme n'était plus digne de cette mission que l'hon. M. Ernest Lapointe . (appl.) Le Roi a approuvé notre choix. Qu'avons-nous nous vu alors au Parlement? Nous avons vu l'opposition dire que la signature de ce traité était un pas vers la séparation.

"Nous avons négicié d'autres traités, lorsque M. Robb était ministre des Finances—et j'en profite pour rendre hommage à ce noble esprit, dont nous vénérons la mémoire— et lorsque nous comptions parmi les membres du gouvernement un homme que je vois sur cette estrade, mon ami l'hon. sénateur Béland. (appl.)

"Non seulement nous avons inauguré la négociation de traités, mais nous avons créé des ambassades aux Etats-Unis, en France et au Japon. Lorsque nous avons proposé de créer ces ambassades, le chef actuel de l'opposition, M. Bennett, s'y est opposé énergiquement: "Si nous sommes un état souverain, nous n'appartenons plus à l'Empire britannique". Et cependant, M. Bennett fait aujourd'hui la campagne en criant: "Le Canada avant tout!" M. Bennett a dit encore à Toronto: "Je crois que nous devrions attacher Canadiens, des Australiens ou des Néo-Zélandais aux ambassades britanniques à l'étranger. C'est là mon projet et j'espère le réaliser". Est-ce là ce que veut le peuple canadien? Je demande à M. Bennet de nouveau: "Comment pouvez-vous accorder cela avec votre motto: "Le Canada d'abord , le Canada avant tout". (appl.)

"Nous avons dit au Parlement que nous avions obtenu une égalité de status pour le Cansda et M. Bennett a ridiculisé cette affirmation. Parlant à Oshawa, M. Bennett s'écriait: "Vers quel port M. King se dirige-t-il?" Je lui répondrai que je me dirige vers le port d'un pays heureux et prospère". (appl.)

"A Halifax, M. Bennett a répété: "Pourquoi toutes ces ambassades séparées ? Avons-nous deux Rois? Vers quel port M. King se dirige-t-il? Veut-il obtenir pour le Canada la séparation". Je réponds de nouveau à M. Bennett que je me dirige vers le port du développement de mon pays dans la voie de la prospérité. Je ne veux qu'un Roi et je veux l'union dans l'empire britannique, mais l'union ne doit rien enlever à l'autonomie des nations qui composent cet empire.

"Pour ma part, un des faits les plus remarquables de notre histoire, c'est lorsque la France a envoyé en ce pays son premier ministre plénipotentiaire, M. Knight, 300 ans après l'arrivée de Champlain dans la ville où nous sommes assemblés ce soir. M. Knight est venu avec un message de la république française demandant au Canada de continuer ses relations amicales avec la France.

"Mesdames et messieurs, le 28 juillet, vous aurez à décider qui vous représentera à la conférence impériale de Londres. Nous venons vous demander un mandat pour aller réclamer de nouveau une égalité de status et l'autonomie de notre pays dans l'empire britannique. Enverrez-vous à cette conférence M. Lapointe pour représenter Québec ou si nous laisserez M. Bennett choisir le représentant de votre province? Qui donc pourrait-il choisir pour représenter les Provinces Maritimes, à la place de M. Ralston, l'Ontario à la place de M. Malcolm, et l'ouest à la place de M. Dunning dont le récent budget a été si bien accueilli par la mère-patrie? Choisirez-vous comme représentants les hommes qui croient que le Canada est une nation ou ceux qui disent que nous n'avons pas d'égalité de statuts dans l'empire britannique. Je connais le peuple canadien et je sais qu'il fera le meilleur choix dans l'intérêt de notre pays". (longs appl.)

Le discours de M. King terminé, le maire Lavigueur céda la parole au député de Québec-sud à Ottawa, le major C.-G. Power, qui fut lui aussi vivement applaudi.

"Je vous remercie et je vous félicite", commença M. Power, "de cette belle et enthousiaste assemblée que nous avons pour souhaiter la bienvenue à M. King.

"Cette assemblée est pour le premier ministre la garantie que la ville de Québec restera fidèle au parti libéral. Les conservateurs sont prêts à l'admettre, d'ailleurs. Sur les 24 comtés, en effet, qui entourent la ville de Québec, ils n'ont choisi qu'un candidat officiel et c'est moi qui ai l'honneur de l'avoir pour adversaire. M. Dinan est un bon diable. Je suis content de croiser le fer contre lui.

"J'ai dit que Québec restera fidèle au parti libéral et je me demande pourquoi nous avons des élections. Quel est le dossier du gouvernement actuellement au pouvoir? Ce sont les mesures passées depuis 1921. A la vue de toutes ces mesures, nos adversaires disent que ce sont les leurs. Le retour des ressources naturelles aux provinces de l'Ouest, ils disent: C'est notre programme; les gages raisonnables, la journée de huit heures, à les entendre, c'est leur programme; les mesures prises pour agrandir le port de Québec, le rétablissement des finances des chemins de fer nationaux, c'est encore leur programme. Même au sujet de la loi pour l'exportation des liqueurs aux Etats-Unis, M. Bennett a dit à M. King: "Il y a quatre ans que vous auriez dû faire cela". Moi, je suis resté seul de mon groupe et j'ai voté contre les deux. (rires et appl.)

"M. Bennett dit encore que le tarif, c'est sa mesure. Nos adversaires déclarent: Vous nous avez volé notre chemise. Moi, je dis qu'elle est trop petite. Voyez-vous M. Lapointe dans la chemise de M. Antoine Rivard? (rires et appl.)

"Tout ce que le parti libéral a accompli, nos adversaires disent que c'est grâce à eux. Mais, si le parti libéral a été capable en aussi peu de temps, de passer des mesures telles que les partis conservateurs n'en ont jamais passées, il n'y a qu'une chose à faire, c'est de laisser nos arversaires dans l'opposition. (appl.)) Bien plus, je crois que, si aujourd'hui, M. King disait à M. Bennett: reston comme nous sommes, le second accepterait, mais nous perdrions au change. Nous sommes mieux de continuer la lutte. Je vous demande en terminant de donner confiance à notre parti qui est celui de notre ville, de notre province et de notre pays".

Quand les applaudissements eurent cessé, M. le maire présenta l'honorable M. Cannon à la foule qui l'applaudit lui aussi chaleureusement.

"L'assemblée de ce soir est une des plus belles auxquelles il m'a été donné d'assister", dit M. Cannon au début de son discours. "Il convenait que cette assemblée fut tenue à Québec et dans Saint-Sauveur qui a vu de si belles luttes. Vous avez fait votre devoir de citoyens, votre devoir de Canadiens, anxieux de se renseigner sur les questions politiques avant de donner leur vote. Cette assemblée devait être ce qu'elle est. Quelle est en effet, l'occasion qui nous réunit ce soir ? C'est le ralliement des forces vives de la nation canadienne appelée à se choisir une administration pour les quatre années qui vont suivre. Non seulement vous réalisez l'importance de la réunion actuelle, mais vous appréciez la personnalité du premier ministre qui nous rend visite ce soir. (appl.)

"Lorsqu'en 1919", poursuivit le Solliciteur Général, "il s'est agi de choisir un successeur à Sir Wilfrid Laurier qui devait payer son tribut à la nature, on a choisi l'honorable M. King. Avons-nous eu tort de donner confiance à Mackenzie King en 1920? Il est devenu l'un des plus importants hommes politiques de l'Empire britannique. (appl.)

"Vous avez entendu bien des discours ce soir", poursuivit M. Cannon, "mais je voudrais attirer votre attention sur trois points en particulier. Dans sa carrière politique, Laurier entretenait un rêve qu'il voulait réaliser : faire de la vieille cité de Québec une des villes les plus importantes de l'Amérique par le développement de son port. M. King a réalisé ce rêve en faisant voter plus de dix millions. Nous sommes heureux, ce soir, de lui dire notre gratitude et notre reconnaissance.

"Le deuxième point, c'est que M. King a toujours été souverainement Canadien dans sa politique. Dans le domaine de l'immigration, M. King a dit que celle-ci devait être contrôlée et il a laissé à chaque province le soin de règlementer l'immigration chez elle.

"Le troisième point, c'est que nous assistons à une crise économique. Les Etats-Unis ont adopté hier, un tarif qui est un défi économique au reste du monde. Les conservateurs disent que M. King est un pro-américain. Cependant il a eu le courage de dire aux Etats-Unis : il est vrai que vous êtes plus nombreux que nous, mais notre esprit national est aussi fort que le vôtre et si vous voulez la lutte, vous l'aurez.

"L'histoire est encore l'histoire", poursuivit M. Cannon, "et c'est là qu'on trouve les leçons et les exemples. En 1840, l'union s'est faite entre Québec et l'Ontario, quand l'hon. M. Lafontaine et l'hon. M. Baldwin ont conquis ensemble nos libertés constitutionnelles.

En 1926, nous avons demandé à MM. King et Lapointe d'améliorer la charte de nos libertés internationales ; en juin 1930 nous leur demandons de compléter cette charte. Lorsque vous verrez les hommes d'état s'en aller vers l'Angleterre, vous regarderez vers le firmament canadien et vous verrez, nous verrons tous MM. King et Lapointe, nouveaux Lafontaine - Baldwin, compléter l'oeuvre qui nous est chère à nous, citoyens de cete province, citoyens du Dominion.

Réclamé par l'assistance, l'hon. Sénateur Dr Béland dut céder aux instances de ses amis et dire quelques mots. "A la requête de mon chef vénéré", commença-t-il, "je viens vous remercier et vous féliciter: vous remercier pour vous être rendus en aussi grand nombre et vous féliciter pour l'accueil fait à M. King.

"Il y a vingt ans, je ne manquais pas de venir dans Saint - Sauveur et dans Saint - Roch, alors que luttait le regretté Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Il me semble que si son âme peut être présente ici ce soir, elle applaudit aux paroles qui ont été prononcées. Il me semble que par notre voix Sir Wilfrid Laurier vous demande de rester fidèles au parti libéral. Et je m'aperçois que l'idée libérale est plus forte que jamais à Québec.

"Le 28 juillet, donnez - vous la main et renvoyez au pouvoir ceux qui vous ont donné une administration sage.

"Je vous remercie de cette attention que vous avez eue pour moi. Soyez fidèles à la politique libérale. C'est celle - là qui a fait le Canada ce qu'il est, c'est celle - là qui le fera continuer dans la voie de la grandeur nationale".

La foule réclamait encore des discours, mais M. Lavigueur dit que l'hon. M. King devait prendre le train pour se rendre dans les provinces maritimes. M. le maire adressa un dernier merci à la foule, puis, au nom de cette dernière, il souhaita "Bon Voyage" et "Bon succès" au premier ministre.

Après le chant de l'hymne nationale O Canada ! et du "God Save the Kink", l'assistance fit encore une ovation à M. King et se dispersa.

L'ARRIVEE DE M. KING

Les personnes qui s'étaient rendues à la gare pour deux heures, furent quelque peu désappointées quand on leur eut annoncé pour trois heures et demie seulement l'arrivée du premier ministre. Plusieurs ne se découragèrent pas toutefois, et attendirent dans la gare, car la pluie commençait à l'extérieur et elle devait tomber en averse quand le train du Canadien National qui transportait le premier ministre arriva.

Jusqu'à l'heure fixée pour l'arrivée, la foule augmenta dans la gare, formant une double haie. A trois heures 25 les honorables MM. Lapointe et Cannon firent leur apparition et se rendirent sur la plateforme, suivis d'un groupe d'officiels. Les journalistes devaient cependant franchir la barrière après bien des difficultés.

A trois heures et demie précises le train entra. En descendant de son wagon spécial l'honorable M. King fut accueilli par l'honorable M. Ernest Lapointe, Ministre de la Justice, l'honorable M. Premier King Addresses Large Open-Air Meeting

TALKS ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Says British Preference Follows Laurier's Policy

QUEBEC, June 19.—(Canadian Press Dispatch.)—Quebec welcomed the prime minister of Canada to-day in no uncertain manner. Dull skies, wet pavement, intermittent rain, a cool wind—these did not deter a huge crowd from gathering in St. Peter's market square to stand for hours listening to Premier Mackenzie King, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, minister of justice and chief Quebec lieutenant of the prime minister, and other speakers expound the doctrine of Liberalism. It was a meeting in the city which sent Sir Wilfrid Laurier to Parliament, and in the neighboring constituency to that represented by the old chieftain. Frequently his name figured in the speeches of the prime minister and others who participated, and again and again it drew applause. The meeting did not open until shortly after 9 o'clock in the evening and it continued until well after 11.

On the open-air platform with the prime minister were gathered the stalwarts of the Liberal party in this part of Quebec Province. Mr. King was introduced by Premier Taschereau. The chairman of the meeting was the mayor of Quebec City, H. E. Lavigueur, who is a member of Parliament. The speakers of the evening included George Parent, recently member for Quebec West and now a member of the Dominion Senate; Hon. Ernest Lapointe and C. G. Power, ex-member for Quebec South. The preliminary speeches were in French, and Mr. King drew applause when he addressed a few words to his audience in the mother tongue of the great majority. He spoke, however, in English.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

The prime minister dealt with unemployment, taking the position that the Government, of which he is the leader, is determined to rid Canada of this problem and will bend every energy to the work. He declared the budget, with its provisions for encouraging empire trade, will have the effect of increasing Canada's business, and this will result in decreasing unemployment. If Canada could sell her wheat, conditions in this country would improve rapidly. The condition was a world condition and Canada's position was much better than that of many other countries. There were four or five million unemployed in the United States, which was a highly protected country, Mr. King declared.

Imperial questions also occupied the prime minister. He emphasized once more that the Government in widening the British preference was merely carrying on the policy laid down by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He also asserted that Sir Wilfrid had visualized Canada as one of "a galaxy of nations" and it had remained for the Government of the day to make his dream a reality. The effort of the Government in the direction of nationhood, Mr. King charged, had met with opposition and criticism from the Conservatives. He quoted Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader, to show that the attitude of Mr. Bennett in this connection has been unfavorable to Canada's national status.

Mr. King criticized the attitude of the Opposition leader toward unemployment. Mr. Bennett's proposal to call a special session of Parliament to deal with this matter, said Mr. King, would not be as effective as the Government proposal to summon a Dominion provincial conference. But if Mr. Bennett was serious in his suggestion that a special session should be summoned he should indicate what his policy was and how he proposed to deal with the problem.

At the conclusion of his speech the prime minister boarded his train for the Maritimes. He speaks in Moncton to-morrow night.

For the first time since the opening of the campaign the prime minister spoke to-night in the open air. From a newly constructed platform in St. Peter's Market Mr. King spoke under leaden skies to a great audience which stood to hear him. Many of his listeners were employees of factories in the district. The platform, constructed of rough boards draped with wet bunting, was high above the heads of the crowd and from it Mr. King looked down on a sea of faces dimly illuminated by the small electric lights. A band played while the crowd waited.

Loud speakers, fastened to the electric light poles, carried the voice of the prime minister and of his colleagues to the edges of the gathering. Some rain fell on the heads of the audience ,the speakers and the newspapermen during the evening.

The meeting was in the constituency of Quebec West, represented in the last Parliament by George Parent, K.C., who was recently appointed to the Senate. The Liberal candidate in the constituency has not yet been nominated, but George De Blois, a young lawyer, is regarded as a probable choice.

Among those on the platform were: Hon. Ernest Lapointe, minister of justice; Hon. Lucien Cannon, solicitor-general; Premier L. A. Taschereau; Senator Parent, and Major C. G. Power, member for Quebec South. H. E. Lavigueur, mayor of Quebec, and member for Quebec-Montmorency, was in the chair and introduced the speakers. An announcement from the platform of Liberal gains in New Brunswick drew applause from the audience.

ACCEPTS FERGUSON'S CHALLENGE

It was a quarter to 9 o'clock before Mayor Lavigueur called the meeting to order.

The first speaker was Senator George Parent, former member for the constituency. He was followed by Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who was received with cheers. Mr. Lapointe spoke in French. He declared that the Province of Quebec would remain faithful to Premier Mackenzie King. In the name of the Liberal party Mr. Lapointe accepted the challenge of Premier Ferguson, of Ontario. Premier Ferguson, said Mr. Lapointe, had declared Mr. King was the issue. He (Mr. Lapointe) was prepared to accept the issue.

The prime minister was introduced by Premier Taschereau, of Quebec. It was a quarter to 10 o'clock before Mr. King began to speak. His first few words in French were received with great applause. He thanked the meeting for its generous welcome. Proceeding in English, Mr. King commented on the huge meeting. He expressed confidence that the Province of Quebec would once more rally to the support of the Government at the coming election. In the old days, commented Mr. King, they had six times called governments by the names of two leaders. If this was the case to-day the present Government might well be called the "Lapointe-King Government" because of the great work done by Mr. Lapointe.

Mr. King had just began to speak when it began to rain. Umbrellas were produced from those in the crowd fortunate enough to possess them.

HURRIES WITH SPEECH.

The prime minister remarked that, as the rain was beginning, he must hurry his speech. He proceeded to review the record of the Government. Taxes had been decreased, he said. Canadians were being brought back to Canada and the financial situation had been improved. He spoke of the fact it was the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which created the department of labor, but he (Mr. King) had lived to see the day when Government contracts must contain a fair wage clause and also provision for the eight-hour day. This was an achievement of the present Government. Pension rights had been restored to those Grand Trunk employees who took part in the strike of 1911. He had told Sir Henry Thornton, before he was appointed, that these rights and past money due must be given to the employees, and this had been done.

DISCUSS UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. King turned to a discussion of new unemployment. It was a world condition, he said, and last year the stock market crash had aggravated conditions. The failure of the grain movement was another factor.

"The only remedy Mr. Bennett has proposed for tre unemployment problem is the summoning of a special session of Parliament immediately after the present election," he continued. "May I say to the leader of the Opposition that this is no a remedy at all. The mere summoning of a special session does not afford the means of solving this r any other great economic prblem. A special sessin of Parliament to consider the unemployment problem could only be of value if there were some definite and well considered proposal to submit to it. If. Mr. Bennett is sincere in his suggestion that a special sessio nof Parliament should be summoned then he must have either in his own mind, or in the mind of his followers, sme tangible scheme fr the relief of unemployment. If he had a scheme in mind, he certainly did not make any attempt to reveal it during the last session of Parliament.

CONSERVATIVE PARTY'S REMEDY

"So far as one can judge from Mr. Bennett's utterances both then and during the present campaign, there are only three specific remedies which the Conservative party is prepared to offer to the Canadian people as a remedy for the unemployment problem. One is an all-around increase in the tariff in imitation of an American policy which has not prevented an unemployment problem in the United tates vastly more serious than our own, and which has led, during the past few months to an estimated total of unemployed workmen in the neighborhood of 4,000,000. Or perhaps Mr. Bennett proposes to carry into effect the immigration policy of Gen. McCrae, his chief lieutenant in the present campaign, which would involve this country in the expenditure of $300,000,000 in order to bring out 300,000 immigrants to Western Canada.

May I remind you that this proposal was only made a year ago and put forth in the House of Commons with apparent approval of the leader of the Conservative party. The only other policy which Mr. Bennett may have in mind is admitttedly not a remedy, but an ineffective palliative for the problem, namely, contributions from the Dominion treasury to the provinces for the purpose of unemployment relief. Moreover, this policy does not require a special session of Parliament, as an emergent condition could be met, if need be, by governor-general's warrant."

King Offers Conference To Solve Unemployment

Prime Minister, Speaking at Quebec, Proposes Consultation Amongst Provinces And Large Employers—Emphasizes Government's Record in Labor Legislation

QUEBEC, June 20.—(Star Special by Staff Correspondent).—The St. Pierre Market Place was crowded last night, despite the unfavorable weather, by residents of Quebec district who gathered in thousands to see and hear Premier Mackenzie King, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. Lucien Cannon and others set forth the Liberal doctrine and defend the policies of the Liberal Government.

The shade of Laurier was freely invoked during the night's oratory, not a single speaker failing to make an appeal to the memory of the great leader of former days, Sir Wilfrid's name was pronounced 29 times during the evening by various orators, and the audience was assured that the present Liberal leaders were striving earnestly to walk in the paths to which their illustrious master had trained them.

To Hold Conference On Unemployment

Premier King dealt at length with the Government's attitude, and Liberal party's attitude, toward labor and also in regard to unemployment. In the latter respect, he announced that, instead of calling a special session of Parliament to talk about unemployment, as Hon. R. B. Bennett had promised to do, if returned to power, the Liberal Government proposed to call a conference of all interested parties, representatives of the Federal and all the Provincial Governments, labor bodies, manufacturing associations, large employers of labor like the railway companies, and so on—everybody who could be expected to contribute some useful suggestion for the solution of the problem. If from their deliberations there resulted some decisions which it required special legislation to put into effect, no time would then be lost in calling Parliament together to pass the necessary statutory provisions. This, Premier King thought was a much wiser plan than calling Parliament together without having any specific proposal to put before them.

The Premier pointed to the many acts of labor legislation which had been passed by the Liberal Government, including the Old Age Pensions Act. Not so much as a smile from the Provincial Premier, sitting on the platform near Mr. King, indicated that he recognized the project which the Liberal Government has consistently refused to put into effect in this Province, and which the local Conservatives have been clamoring to have applied here.

Mandate Wanted To Go To London

Hon. Ernest Lapointe furnished the audience with the reason for the present election. The cause of it all, he explained, was that Hon. R. B. Bennett had declared in the House of Commons that Mr. King and his ministers had no mandate from the people to go to the Imperial Conference in England this year. Thereupon Mr. King had decided to go to the people and obtain an unequivocal mandate, and the question for the people now to decide was who they wanted to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference and in subsequent negotiations with the rest of the Empire. "People like us, who will represent you as a grown-up nation, or people who want to represent you as minors, still in tutelage and in need of a legal guardian to protect your interests?"

Premier Taschereau introduced the Prime Minister, referring to him as "Your leader and mine."

The fates dealt unkindly with the organization. All day long the weather was threatening and for some time before the meeting was scheduled to open, rain fell in torrents. At 7 o'clock, however, it cleared up somewhat, and did not rain again until the Premier rose to speak. The fact that rain began to fall soon after he rose to speak undoubtedly hampered Mr. King, as he obviously felt it necessary, during the earlier part of his speech, to hurry along as rapidly as possible, lest the weather should become worse and possibly prevent him from finishing.

Hucksters Threatened To Usurp Meeting

So little likelihood did there seem to be of the weather clearing up for the meeting, that when the crowd began to gather they found a number of market stands already set up for this morning's market, and loaded with lake trout, eels, kippers and other fish, besides a good many baskets of fruit.

The growing crowd jested freely over the array of fish and fruit, right in front of the speaker's platform, while groups of people on the platform denounced it as an outrage, contending that the city council, the police, the Liberal organization and various other authorities deserved censure for allowing the market gargeners and fish mongers to interfere with the meeting. When the hour advanced however and the rain still kept off, the owners of the stands came back, explained that they had set up their stock in the belief that it would rain too hard to hold an open air meeting. Fish, eels, apples and bananas were loaded back on to trucks, and the crowd was at liberty to close in on the platform in peace, if not in comfort.

Premier King opened his remarks in French. "I wish to thank you all for your very kindly welcome this evening" he said in quite good French, "and will now proceed to address you in my native tongue."

He paid lavish compliments to Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Major C. G. Power, and the shade of Laurier, but decided to get to the meat of his speech quickly when some heavy drops of rain began to fall.

He asked the people to give their attention to the record of the Liberal Goernment, and to judge them by that. He pointed to the time he first had associations with the working people of Quebec, when he was a deputy minister in the Department of Labor. He received a number of letters at that time from Mr. Grenier dealing with labor questions, and now that Mr. Grenier had passed on, he held those letters amongst his most treasured possessions. During those years, he had learned at the feet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and was still determined to carry on the work started by that great statesman.

Government's Record In Labor Legislation

He pointed to the labor legislation which the Liberal Goernment had given the country. It included the fair wage and eight hour day clauses in Government contracts; the Old Age Pensions Act; labor representation on the board of directors of the National Railways; and the restoration to old C.N.R. workers of the pension rights which some of them lost years ago through their participation in the Grand Trunk strike.

There was now a great problem confronting the Government, in the unemployment which was rife, not only in Canada, but in all the countries of the world. Factors which contributed to the unemployment trouble in Canada, were the stock market crash of last year, and the falling off of wheat exports. The first meant that people who thought they had money to invest found they hadn't and consequently were not able to keep as many men working for them as they otherwise would; the second implied less railway traffic and therefore less work for railwaymen. The Government under Mr. King had authorized Sir Henry Thornton to keep men at work on the C.N.R. even if it meant loss of revenue, rather than add to the unemployment in the Dominion. The Government had also made extended concessions in regard to the movement of coal from the western provinces, in order to keep men working as much and as long as possible in that industry. They had also carried on public works in winter, at greater cost than would be the case in summer, in order to keep as many people working as possible.

A problem still existed, however, and had to be met in a constructive way. The Liberal Government would endeavor to put forward something really constructive and efficient. Hon. R. B. Bennett, on the other hand, had nothing constructive to offer.

Bennett Scored On Unemployment

"The only remedy Mr. Bennett has proposed for the unemployment problem is the summoning of a special session of Parliament immediately after the present election. May I say to the leader of the Opposition that this is not a remedy at all. The mere summoning of a special session of Parliament does not afford the means of solving this or any other great social or economic problem. A special session of Parliament to consider the unemployment problem could only be of value if there were some definite and well-considered proposal to submit to it. If Mr. Bennett should be summoned, then he must have either in his own mind, or in the mind of his followers, some tangible scheme for the relief of unemployment. If he has such a scheme in mind, he certainly did not make any attempt to reveal it during the last session of Parliament.

"So far as one can judge from Mr. Bennett's utterance, both then and during the present campaign, or from the utterances of his followers during the past two sessions of Parliament, there are only three specific remedies which the Conservative party is prepared to offer to the Canadian people as a remedy for the unemployment problem. One is an all-around increase in the tariff in imitation of an American policy which has not prevented an unemployment problem in the United States, vastly more serious than our own, and which has led, during the past few months to an estimated total of unemployed workmen in the neighborhood of 4,000,000. Or perhaps Mr. Bennett proposes to carry into effect the immigration policy of General MacRae, his chief lieutenant in the present campaign, which would involve this country in the expenditure of $500,000,000 in order to bring out 300,000 immigrants to western Canada.

"May I remind you that this proposal was only made a year ago, and put forth in the House of Commons with the apparent approval of the leader of the Conservative party. The only other policy which Mr. Bennett may have in mind, is admittedly not a remedy, but an ineffective palliative for the problem, namely contributions from the Dominion treasury to the provinces, for the purpose of unemployment relief. Moreover, this policy does not require a special session of Parliament, as an emergency condition could be met, if need be, by Governor-General's warrant.

"If Mr. Bennett is serious in proposing a special session of Parliament, let him say quite definitely which, if any, of these policies he wishes to introduce as a solution of the problem which he is now endeavoring to exploit and exaggerate for political purposes.

Conference Better Than Parliament

"So far as the Liberal administration is concerned, let me again make it clear that we have the keenest and most sympathetic concern for those who are unemployed, and propose to deal with the question along lines recommended not only by constitutional propriety, but by economic investigations. We are not waiting for a special session of Parliament in order to deal with the several features of unemployment which may present themselves during the ensuing months. The whole question of unemployment is one which requires co-operative study and co-operative action by dominion, provincial and municipal authorities together with organizations of manufacturers and laborers representing the interests of those most severely affected by any slackening in the business of our country. Having this fact in mind, and having also in mind that no province has yet applied to the Dominion Government for monetary assistance in unemployment relief, we arranged, at the close of the past session of Parliament to summon a dominion-province conference with the least possible delay, following the present election campaign.

"From the time that it was decided to summon this conference, departments of the Government have been engaged in gathering data to bring before it during its session. We have also been in close communication with the provincial, municipal and other interested bodies who are engaged in a similar preliminary study of the problem, and will thus be able to secure a much more accurate survey of the entire situation than was possible during the last session of Parliament. The Dominion-provincial conference will be comprised of ministers and others whose business it is to be familiar with the several phrases of the unemployment problem which will be discussed; it will include not only responsible ministers and representatives of Dominion, provincial and municipal Governments, but will also have the advantage of having expert evidence from representatives of labor organizations, manufacturers' associations and other similar bodies.

"From the standpoint of efficiency and constitutional propriety, a Dominion-provincial conference on unemployment is infinitely superior to a special session of Parliament. A special session is convened normally only to meet a grave national emergency. Were Canada to summon a special session of Parliament, as Mr. Bennett has proposed, it would undoubtedly advertise to the world that Canada is suffering from a very perilous situation which does not, in fact, exist. There is a right way and a wrong way in approaching every question. The right way in this case is by co-operation; the wrong way is by attempting to bring the unemployment question into the sphere of party controversy on the floors of Parliament. There is also an economical or an extravagant way to approach the question. A special session of Parliament is an extravagant method of dealing with this question. Besides being futile and unnecessary, it would cost the people of this country no less than $2,000,000 without a guarantee of any more practicable remedy for unemployment than emerged from the discussion of the last session.

Holds Tariff Futile To Solve Problem

"This great dominion - provincial conference which is to be held, will I believe, help us to work out a feasible scheme which will be suited to meet the great question of seasonal unemployment and other forms of unemployment which may arise. May I say that out of that conference I believe something will come which will be constructive and helpful, and something which will go far towards meeting the present situation. May I add that so far as I personally am concerned, I do not know of anything which would give me more real satisfaction and pleasure that to be of some real service at a conference of that character, if I am permitted to do so."

It seemed to be suggested by Mr. Bennett that raising the tariff all round would remedy the unemployment situation. Yet unemployment was more severe in practically all the high tariff countries than it was in Canada. There were 3 1-2 million unemployed in the United States. There was much unemployment in Australia. The Old Country was suffering far worse than Canada from unemployment.

The Old Country was the only country in the world which had not raised its tariff against Canada, and it was only fair and reasonable that Canada should show a reciprocal goodwill toward Great Britain. The Canadian manufacturer went into the old country market on an equal footing with the home manufacturer there. It was only fair that the same concession should be given to the British manufacturer here, and that he be given the advantage over the United States manufacturer. Besides, the increased preference would enable the Canadian delegates who would go over to England this year, to negotiate with the British Government for increased buying of Canadian products.

Laurier, he pointed out, had started the policy of wider British preference. Mackenzie King was trying to carry that policy forward. Laurier had started the theory of Canada a nation. It was Laurier who told Queen Victoria that the greatest of all her possessions was "this galaxy of nations which men call the British Empire." There was but little difference between the galaxy of nations of Laurier's remark, and the commonwealth of nations of which Canada was a part, and of which Mackenzie King and the Liberal party were steadily striving to make Canada an increasingly greater part.

Hon. Lucien Cannon, Senator George Parent and Major C. G. Power also spoke, Mayor Lavigueur of Quebec presided.

King Proposes Nation-Wide Conference To Deal With Problem Of Unemployment

Causes, Proportions and Proposed Solution of Problem Formed Theme of Premier's Speech in Opening Liberal Campaign in Quebec District Last Night

LAPOINTE CLAIMS THE DOMINION PROSPEROUS

A proposal to meet the unemployment situation in the Dominion by calling a nation-wide conference of politicians and industrialists out of which "some important suggestions were certain to arise," was the outstanding feature of the opening of the Federal election campaign in Quebec last night by the Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada.

The causes, proportions and proposed solutions for the unemployemnt problem formed the theme of the Prime Minister's speech in which little reference was made to the more pertinent topics on which discussion was anticipated, and in which mention of the Imperial Conference in London was introduced principally through its bearing on trade and employment conditions in this country.

Speaking under a threatening sky in the St. Peter Square, before an audience of between two and three thousand, the past record, present situation and future aspirations of the Liberal Government were reviewed by eight speakers in succession, the second speech of the evening being delivered by the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, who refuted the alleged steady emigration of Canadians to the United States.

His Worship Mayor H. E. Lavigueur presided, and the other speakers were the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, Premier of the Province of Quebec, who introduced the Prime Minister; the Hon. Lucien Cannon, Solicitor-General; Major C. G. Power, Liberal member for Quebec South; Hon. Senator Parent, former member for Quebec West; and Hon. Senator Beland, former Cabinet minister.

The ball was set rolling by Mayor Lavigueur, who in presenting the various speakers, pointed out to the audience that the occasion was the opening of the Federal campaign in Quebec, and welcomed the Prime Minister, on behalf of the city. The crowd, led by the large platform party, greeted each of the orators with applause, and the singing of various vocal tributes.

Outlined Record

As in his two previous speeches of the campaign, the Prime Minister devoted considerable time to outlining the record of the Government, concentrating for the rest mainly on unemployment, and the personnel of the delegates to represent Canada at the forthcoming Imperial Conference in London.

After saying a word in French to express his gratification at the size of the meeting, Mr. King reverted to English, to open by congratulating his friends in the Province for the support they had given the Liberal Government during its term of office. He thanked Mayor Lavigueur and Premier Taschereau, and paid particular tribute to the work in the Government of the Hon. Mr. Lapointe and the Hon. Mr. Cannon. Mr. Lapointe, the Prime Minister said, had always been ready to bear a heavy share of the load of responsibilities.

"The first main item you electors should consider," Mr. King then declared, "is the record of the Government. I ask you to look at it and study it with care. I am sure you will find that that record is one of the best any government has ever had, and that you will be safe in entrusting the safety of the country to it."

"Compare conditions in the country today with what they were ten years ago, when the Liberal administration came into power. At that time the whole business of the country was in a depressed state, railways were disorganised; and from that condition up to the present time Canada has come steadily, little by little, under the Liberal Government, to the condition of prosperity of more recent years.

Canadians Returning

"You will find that taxes have been reduced, income tax, sales taxes, taxes on different articles of one kind or another, duties on implements of production, and on commodities generally affecting the cost of living.

"As far as population is concerned, read the statistics published by that department, referring to Canadians going across the line to American cities. You will find that whereas there were hundreds, perhaps thousands, of Canadians going to the United States when we first came into office, today the tide is the other way, and people are coming back from the United States to Canada.

"Consid our legislation with respect to industrial and labour conditions," Mr. King asked, and recalled how he had started work in the Dominion Government as a deputy minister, whose duties referred particularly to industry and labour.

"It was the Government of Laurier," he stated, "that first created the Department of Labour to deal with industrial questions. It was the Laurier Government that introduced a resolution that all Government contracts should contain clauses to the effect that the workmen should be paid a fair wage and should work fair hours. It was my duty as Deputy Minister of Labour to see that the right regulations were made in this respect. I have lived to see the day when a resolution to the same effect became the law of the country.

"That is legislation which has been passed by the present administration, at the last session of the House."

The Prime Minister then referred in detail to the strike of Grand Trunk Railwaymen twenty years ago, when the men were deprived of their pensions after re-instatement. When the present Government was returned in 1921, he said, one of the leaders of that strike was made Minister of Labour, and the wrong was righted.

Different Attitudes.

"That," Mr. King declared, "illustrates the different attitudes of the two Governments, Liberal and Conservative. Never before until the present time has labour been given a place on the board of directors of any railway company. We appointed the president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada as one of the directors of Canadian National Railways. We passed the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, under which, where a combine tried to hold up prices and affect the cost of living, we are able to introduce a better condition of things.

"At present we have a problem which will require much thought and attention from all who have to do with Government. In all parts of the world there has been much unemployment. Last year there was a very serious dislocation of prices as a result of speculation on the Stock Exchange, and the crash that followed. That crash had its effect on employment not only in the United States, where it took place, but in Europe and in Canada as well.

"In this country, people felt the effect of the change that had taken place, by losing the money they had had to invest, and consequently ceasing to give employment to as many people as they would otherwise have engaged.

"Another serious thing at the same time was that, whereas in former years we had been selling great quantities of our wheat to England, the purchase of grain stopped for a short time. The grain stood in the elevators and as it was not moving the railways had not the business they had had formerly. They began to lessen their staffs; and one line of business affected another, with subsequent increase in unemployment.

"Both were temporary conditions, not likely to last, but nevertheless many people suffered from the change.

Dealing With Unemployment

"How did the Government try to deal with the question? We did not begin to talk about things, and advertise to other countries that there was a condition that required remedy in the country, because we felt that the less said about unemployment, and the more said about the great prosperity of the country, the better it would be for everyone in the land.

"Sir Henry Thornton came as president of Canadian National Railways, and said that the alternative to laying off men was a loss of revenue. The Government took up the position that it would be much wiser to continue with the employment of the men than to face an unemployment problem, and did all that could justifiably be done to keep up the employment.

"In connection with mines in Certain provinces, from which coal had to be moved to other parts of the country, we extended the time allowed for certain experimental tests in order to help to keep men at work; while with regard to Government employment we went ahead with the completion of various public works in winter, although it cost more, in order to keep labour employed.

"We have tried to deal with those questions in a constructive manner, but notwithstanding what we have done we still have a problem that has to be met, and met in a constructive manner. The depression, however, is world-wide, and in the United States there are thousands and thousands of men out of work.

"Mr. Bennett has been saying a great deal about this unemployment problem, but I notice that all he has had to say has been since Parliament was in session. We discussed unemployment at great length during the session, but you will not find an instance where he made any contribution to the question in any particular way.

"Now Mr. Bennett says that if he is returned he will call a session of Parliament immediately to deal with the question. He knows that Parliament cannot be summoned for at least forty days after elections are over, and even then it must have a programme before it.

Conference Proposed

"I ask Mr. Bennett to tell the people of Canada, before he says he will summon this Parliament, what he proposes to put to it as a means of settling this programme. What is the great thing he is going to do for the unemployed in Canada: Is he going to ask Parliament to vote money out of the Treasury, to give something to every one of the unemployed: Is he going to build certain public works: The mere calling of Parliament does not help to solve any problem. That depends on the matters put before Parliament.

"What has been our policy: We have arranged to bring together not merely the members of Parliament, but a Parliament of those interested who are likely to be vitally concerned in the solution of the problem. We have made provision for the calling together of a great conference representative of the whole Dominion, the Provinces and the leading municipalities, and are also inviting to it representatives of manufacturing associations and labour organisations, as well as asking the great employers of labour, in railways and other concerns, to send their representatives to this gathering.

"It will meet early in August, and will be an opportunity for considering most carefully all aspects of the subject. Out of the discussions to take place there are certain to arise many concrete and important suggestions; and if they require legislation we can then have Parliament called for whatever is necessary.

"I am beginning to think that the reason Mr. Bennett is talking so much about summoning Parliament is that he has given up all hope of going to the Imperial conference, and does not want to discuss it.

"There are going to be questions discussed at the Imperial conference which are going to have a very vital effect on employment here.

Preparing For London

Premier King then referred to what the Liberal Government was doing in preparation for the Imperial Conference working out lines of suggestion likely to be helpful in discussing matters of trade and employment. The delegates, he said, would go well prepared, after they had studied the matter for a couple of months.

"The only suggestion Mr. Bennett has made in the nature of an improvement," the Prime Minister continued, "is that there be an all-round increase in the tariff; as if such an increase were going to solve the question. Consider the unemployment in the United States, which has the highest tariff in the world. There are over three million unemployed there. Australia, another country with very high tariffs, has also more unemployment than Canada.

"Mr. Bennett is saying a great deal about 'Canada first' and being 'a true Canadian,' but I venture to say he would be a much truer Canadian if he would tell people the truth about the condition of this country as compared to others, rather than emphasising this wail of despair and gloom which in the past has made it so hard for this country to prosper as it otherwise would have done."

Reference was then ...de by the speaker to a resolution which he said was brought into the House last year by General MacCrae, which was to bring in three hundred thousand settlers in a great colonisation scheme, putting which into effect would cost about $300,000,000. Mr Bennett and the Conservative party, Mr King said, supported it.

"Is that the way," he asked, "in which they are going to try to settle the problems of industry?

Mr. King then referred at length to the Imperial conference, with special bearing on its relation to the problem of finding markets for Canadian grain.

"Some of the European countries have put up their tariff barriers," he stated, "and the United States has done the same. One of the few that has not done so in recent years is Great Britain. Britain gives us the same position in her markets as is given to her own manufacturers. She lets us in on equal terms there and if we can get into that country to sell our commodities we will get back in return what is needed to continue our industries, and to give greater employment to our people."

Canada's Role.

The Prime Minister then gave a detailed account of the work done in connection with trade with Britain by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, stating that Laurier's dream of Canada which would have a national status of its own was in process of being realised.

There was still, he added, essential constitutional development to be carried on before Canada reached full nationhood. He then referred to the fact that the Liberal Government had been responsible for the stationing of Canadian ambassadors at Washington, Paris and Tokio, and stated that when the necessary legislation was passed it was opposed by Mr. Bennett, who, he said, had warned the House that it was a step towards Canada's breaking off from the British Empire Mr. King claimed that it was a step towards the complete nationhood of Canada, that she was now able to sign certain treaties, affecting her own affairs, by minister plenipotentiary.

"I believe Canada has a great role to play in world affairs," the Prime Minister announced, in conclusion.

"At the end of next month you will be called upon to decide who is to represent you at the great Imperial Conference. Are you going to send Mr. Lapointe as representative of this Province and Dominion as one of the delegates, or are you going to let Mr.Bennett choose a representative? Whom would Mr. Bennett send instead of Mr. Lapointe from the Province of Quebec, from the Maritime Provinces instead of Colonel Ralston, from Ontario instead of Mr. Malcolm, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and from the prairie provinces instead of Mr. Dunning?

"In your decision you settle whether the men who represent Canada at the conference will be those who fought to gain the full nationhood of the Dominion, or those who obstructed, opposed, denied and are still denying our right to equality of status. I am confident that there is no doubt in the mind of Canada."

Taschereau's Tribute

On being requested by His Worship Mayor Lavigueur to introduce the Prime Minister of Canada, to the audience, Premier Taschereau paid a graceful tribute to the party leader and to Hon. Ernest Lapointe. Quebec's Premier stressed the prevailing harmony and unity of the Liberal party and expressed pride in the unity which characterizes the traditional party of Quebec.

"Mr. King" said the Premier "opened his campaign in 1926 here in Saint Sauveur and this time we are going to give him the same victory as we gave him then. Thanks to the King government, we have a harbour which bids fair to become one of the great Canadian ports, and the wisdom of the harbour development is confirmed by the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway is on the eve of bringing forty-thousand ton liners to the city, which will be a great factor in commerce and tourist traffic. In the same connection the Canadian Pacific are tunnelling through the cliffs in order to give better transportation facilities at the new port."

Lapointe's Address

Re-iteration of the prosperity of the Dominion as compared to other nations, a vigorous defense of the tariff policy of the King Government, and a forthright declaration that Canadians who had previously emigrated to the United States were now returning to the Dominion, were the high points of an eloquent address by Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who with Premier King shared the honors of the opening rally of the Quebec campaign.

Beginning with an eloquent tribute to the Prime Minister, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice de lared that the Province had been faithful to Mr. King and he was profoundly convinced that it would remain so. He referred feelingly to the wholehearted co-operation of the Prime Minister and himself in carrying out the traditions of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

"Like all great men" he stated, "premier King has not been exempt from the voice of calumny, but all the efforts to sully his reputation have been in vain. Under the King government the country has recovered lost ground and has made signal advances.

"No! It's gone down" shouted a voice in the audience.

"Canada," continued the Minister of Justice", has taken the place which her importance merits in all spheres, economic, imperial, social, national and international under the sane and progressive direction of the King government. It is not a government by a group, or by a province, but is all-Canadian in scope and drawn from all the provinces and all classes of Canadian citizens.

Tariff Commission

"Before the tariff in force during the Liberal regime went into force, an investigation was carried on by a special commission. So thorough and so effective was the work of the Commission that chiefs of industries affected had publicly declared that the members of the Commission knew the economic and industrial questions even better than many of the counsel engaged to plead the cases before them. It was stated in 1921, in 1925 and again in 1926 that this Liberal tarif policy would ruin Canadian manufacturing. What has been it's true result: A few weeks ago a former Minister of the Conservative government speaking at Toronto stated that Canada today classes seventh amongst world nations in point of production and manufactures.

"On a basis of population, Canada omes twenty-eighth, and yet due to the work of the Liberal Administration, the Dominion ranks fifth in the volume of her export trade, led only by the United States, Great Britain, France and Germany.

Budget Provisions

"Throughout the King regime, it has been the fixed principle to deal with nations who deal with us. At the last session of parliament the government took still further measures along these lines and giving specific benefits to the countries which trade with the Dominion enacted the Dunning Budget. We want markets in the countries who sell goods to us, and it is the recognition of this principle which has caused the Dunning Budget to be met with favor from every part of the Dominion."

Mr. Lapointe then asserted that despite all obstacles placed in its path by adversaries, the Liberal government had decreased the National Debt and effected substantial reductions in taxes. He instanced the fact that the Canadian dollar was at a premium last week in world money markets as a clear-cut denial of the opposition claim that the country was undergoing a period of depression. Quoting Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor to the effect that there were three millions unemployed in the United States at the present time, Mr. Lapointe alleged that conditions in Canada were infinitely better than those of the United States.

Canadians Returning

"Mr. Bennett" continued the Minister of Justice, "aided by his lieutenant Dr. Manion have made statements recently to the effect that Canadians are leaving the country and crossing the line to the United States.

"This is not true. On the contrary Canadians are coming back to Canada and to the Provice of Quebec from such large industrial towns as New Bedford, Lowell and Fall River in the New England states. In a recent issue of prominent New York paper, population statistics of these towns were quoted, showing their decrease in population within the past decade and attributing the exodus to Canadians returning to their native Province of Quebec. (Hearty applause).

"In Lowell alone there are four thousand enemployed, and a notable decrease in population. Where will you find in the Province of Quebec, towns and cities where like conditions prevail?"

The Minister of Justice then referred to the work done by the Liberal government in the interests of the veterans of the Great War. He defined that attitude of the administration as one of tribute to the men who had made sacrifices, and under a solemn pledge to recognize as far as possible their services to the nation.

"There was a Committee named at the last session of the Dominion parliament to deal with the question of war veterans, headed by my confrere "Chubby" Power. Questions of great difficulty were presented and many intricate and delicate problems solved by the excellent and understanding work of Mr. Power aided by the united support of the government. To-day the work has been brought to a successful conclusion and the veterans are satisfied.

"Progress in Canada at the present time" continued Mr. Lapointe, "must be based on union and harmony, and this union and harmony can only exist where there is justice for every element of the Canadian population. Here in this old city of Quebec where many years ago the two great races met in historic combat, where the descendants of those two great races erected a monument to the memory of the two soldiers who fell fighting against one another on the old battlefields, let us banish all discord and all hatred."

Record of Govt.

Discussing the reforms and beneficial legislation enacted by the King government, Mr. Lapointe enumerated the giving of the natural resources of the Prairie Provinces to their respective provincial governments, and the sympathetic attitude towards the Maritime provinces. The maritime provinces felt that they were gaining no advantage from Confederation Mr. Lapointe said, and clamored for some form of relief from general depression. Mr. King took the matter in hand, appointed a special committee and enacted legislation which was successful in ameliorating the situation there.

Again the Minister of Justice dwelt on the work accomplished by Mr. King and himself at the Imperial conference of 1926 where the status of Canada as a nation was defined, and the work which he himself had carried through during the past summer in bringing about the abolition of certain laws, which still left the Dominion in a position of inferiority. He urged the people to send the same representatives to London this fall as they had in 1926, 1929 and this year, and pledged himself to represent the true spirit of Canada if he were elected and chosen for the mission.

Lauding the policy in establishing Canadian Embassies in Washington, Paris and Tokio, Mr. Lapointe hailed this development as a forward step in the interests of Canada as a world nation, and spoke with pride of the Dominion's work on the League of Nations. Canada he said has a just reason to be proud of the fact that a Canadian, Senator Raoul Dandurand was elected to serve a term as president of that great international force for world harmony.

Appeal To Voters

In conclusion Mr. Lapointe made an appeal for the return to power of the King government. "I ask your support" he announced, "and ask you to show your confidence in the men who have given their work, their thought and their devotion to the best interests of Cnaada. On the twenty-eighth of July vote for King. King and Victory! King and Unity!

An immense bouquet of roses was handed to Mr. Lapointe at the end of his address by a little girl clad in crimson silk dress and bandeau, representing the spirit of the Liberal party.

George Parent, recently appointed to the Canadian Senate and for many years the representative of Quebec West in the House of Commons opened the programme of the evening with an expression of thanks for the sturdy support given him by the electorate in the past. Although pointing out that he had been named to a higher position in political life, Senator Parent assured the audience that he would still protect and further the interests of his old constituency.

He lauded the Mackenzie King administration and praised the Premier for following in the footsteps of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and protecting the rights of Labor throughout the Dominion. Senator Parent also had a word of thanks for the women who supported him in his electoral campaigns, and asked them to continue their support of the party which he represented in their riding. Signalizing the fact that the seat of Quebec West is now vacant, Mr. Parent urged the members of the party to choose a representative worthy of them, and who they can confidently expect to protect their rights in the federal House. In conclusion Quebec's newest Senator paid a further tribute to Mackenzie King and assured him that no constituency in the Dominion entertained a higher appreciation of the work of the Liberal Government during the past ten years than that of Saint Sauveur.

"Chubby" Power

In a brief and witty address delivered in an free and easy style, "Chubby" Power, member for Quebec South spoke of the forthcoming electoral campaign from a Quebec angle and enumerated the outstanding acts of legislation passed by the King Government.

The reception given to Mr. King and other members of the Cabinet, was, he said, a guarantee that Quebec City and district will rest faithful to the Liberal flag on the twenty-eighth of July.

Referring to the recent nomination of a city alderman to contest his seat, Mr. Power said "Dinan is a good fellow and for my part I'm quite satisfied to have him as an adversary."

The Conservative party continued the member for Quebec South, has raised the cry that the Liberals had stolen their platform. They raised it over the return of the natural resources to the Prairie Provinces, over the aid given to the Maritime Provinces, over the fair-wage laws abd again over the eight-hour day. They even went so far as to claim credit for the Quebec Harbour and the ground-work of building up the Canadian National Railways system. On the floor of the House, Mr. Bennet affirmed that the law closing down on the export of liquor to the United States should have been passed four years ago. Mr. Power recalled in amusing terms that he had bolted the party and stood pat against this law to which almost unanimous consent was given.

While denying the charge of stealing the Conservative platform, Mr. Power argued, if the Conservative party while in opposition could force the Government to pass so many excellent laws, the best policy was for them to remain in opposition.

Mr. Power continued "Bennet says 'You've even stolen our shirt' '. It's not true,—the shirt would have been too small!"

In conclusion the member for Quebec South declared that if the people of the City of Quebec, the province and the Dominion could have confidence in their economic future, they must see to it that the country is governed in the future as in the past by a Liberal faction.

Solicitor-General

The last speaker on the official programme of the evening, Hon. Lucien Cannon, Solicitor-General emphasized the responsibility of the electors as free citizens to choose the government which would best guide the destinies of the Dominion from 1930 until 1934. He paid a glowing tribute to the Prime Minister, and recalled the latter's visit to Saint Sauveur in 1919. He lauded Mr. King as being the true political heir to Sir Wilfrid Laurier not only in principle but by the legislation which was enacted during his tenure of office for the past ten years.

Through Liberal administration continued Mr. Cannon, Quebec had obtained a harbour which was rapidly becoming one of the greatest of the Atlantic ports. The federal government had paid out more than ten millions of dollars towards the achievement of port improvements. In this venture as well as in many others, he affirmed that Premier King was realizing a dream of the late Sir Wilfrid.

Refuting the charge of pro-Americanism which the Conservatives had brought against Mr. King, Mr. Cannon asserted that the tariff provisions of the recent Dominion Budget had proved eloquently that the charge was unfounded, and that the Prime Minister was ever ready to defend the rights of his people against invasion of foreign interests.

On the request of the audience Senator Beland concluded the evening's rally with a few words of praise of the Liberal administration and an exhortation to the people to remain faithful to the traditions of Liberalism of the City and the Province.

MR. KING IN QUEBEC.

No one who followed the speech of the Prime Minister at Quebec on Thursday could have failed to note the lack of substance which was the chief characteristic of his address. Mr. King discussed the record of his Government, the question of unemployment, and dealt at some length with a matter that is so dear to his heart but which is of so little concern to the people of Canada generally, namely, the constitutional status of the Dominion. He enlarged upon this latter subject, assuming, no doubt, that it is of some special interest to this province; it is not, and neither the efforts of the Prime Minister nor those of his equally misguided lieutenants will suffice to make their own ambitions in this respect an issue in the campaign. The people of Canada are concerned over practical problems of government, matters which are of direct concern to their welfare as a people and as a nation, and the nearer Mr. King gets to an intelligent discussion of those problems the better will be his chances of retaining the power which he is so loath to relinquish. He tells the electors of Quebec that there are still some further constitutional developments to come in the matter of nationhood. He prudently refrains from indicating the character of these developments, or from stating their purpose. Will they bind the Dominion more closely to the Mother Country, or will they stretch the existing ties another notch or two? How will they harmonize with the loyal gesture which Mr. King has made in enlarging the British preference, and of which he has had so much to say in Ontario? These are matters which he may care to include in his next address to an Ontario audience.

The Prime Minister paid a great deal of attention to the statements made by Hon. R. B. Bennett in the course of the latter's speaking tour. This, surely, is a compliment to the Opposition leader, and by no means without its significance. It is an acknowledgment of the force of Mr. Bennett's arguments, an admission that the Conservative campaign is having effect, and that the Government has not succeeded in winning away from the defensive attitude with which it entered the campaign. Mr. King, however, did manifest more hardihood in inviting the people of Quebec to consider the record of his administration with care. They may do so, and in the doing they will look in vain for any act initiated by the present Government which had for its design and purpose the industrial advancement of this province and the promotion of its people's welfare. The King-Dunning budget, if it is of any value at all, comes in the nature of a death-bed repentance, and when all has been said for it that can be said, there is not enough to offset the years of indifference and neglect to which the electors of Quebec and their parliamentary representatives were called upon to submit. Neither in its great manufacturing communities nor in its rural areas has the province of Quebec received at the hands of the King Government the benefits of a constructive policy. Perhaps Mr. King may be conscious of his shortcomings and omissions in this respect, yet, with a hardihood to which the public have become familiar, he claims credit for the prosperity which the Dominion for a time enjoyed but disclaims any responsibility for the new and less happy conditions which have followed. Mr. King cannot have it both ways, and a pretence of this sort is much too obvious to beguile a people who are by nature logical and who rule their actions by the dictates of common sense.

Nor is the Prime Minister any more convincing in his references to unemployment. He has nothing but scorn for the pledge given by the Conservative leader in regard to the calling of a special session; a special session would cost money and Mr. Bennett has not announced any plans to be submitted at such a session. But what remedy does Mr. King offer? He mentions none, but he says the whole matter will be submitted to "this great Dominion-provincial conference" which he will convene some time in the future. Assuming that such a conference were called and some remedy found, that remedy would then remain inoperative pending a session of the Dominion Parliament, and the unemployed—would still be the unemployed. What does Mr. King expect of his "great conference"? He says: "Out of that "conference I believe something will come "which will be constructive and helpful," etc. This is Wilkins Micawber at his best, but the portrayal, however admirable artistically, offers little consolation to the heads of families who are seeking employment and cannot find it. And there is another aspect of this great conference idea. Among the provinces to be represented will be some—a majority—having Conservative governments. Will a federal administration headed by Mr. William Lyon Mackenzie King consent to assist such provinces out of the Dominion exchequer? The Prime Minister has already expressed his personal determination in that respect; he will not give them a five-cent piece. Moreover, the provinces, some of them at any rate, have already made known their views to Mr. King and his colleagues through their municipal delegates, and they have gone away empty-handed. Mr. King has stated that unemployment relief is the business of the provinces. Well and good; but, that being so, why call these provinces into conference? Or is this talk of a great Dominion-provincial conference nothing better or more sincere than an election expedient?

PREMIER KING OPENS MARITIME TOUR IN MONCTON

He Deals With the Trans portation and Other Issues Dwelling also on the Work of the Duncan Commission, New Car Fer ry to be Built in Canada, so that Canadian Wo rkers may be Aided. Premier Leaves for Prin ce Edward Island.

(Canadian Press)

MONCTON, N. B., June 21.—Premier King, opened his Maritime speaking tour in this railway centre last night and talked among other things of railroads.

'The transportation problem was overpowering when this government came into power," said Mr. King. There were a number of bankrupt roads. It was the present government that unified these roads into a single system, it was the present government that got Sir Henry Thornton," continued the Prime Minister and this reference to the head of the Canadian National Railway system was applauded.

The Prime Minister spoke in a theatre, but loud speakers set up in a nearby park carried his voice to those who formed an overflowing meeting there.

Hon. P J. Veniot, Postmaster General of Canada and a former Premier of New Brunswick preceded the Prime Minister in a brief address, as did H. R. Emmerson who was yesterday selected as the Liberal standard bearer in Westmoreland County in the forthcoming general elections.

Immediately after the meeting Mr. Mackenzie King boarded his private car for the trip to Prince Edward Island where he will address a meeting in Summerside this afternoon and in Charlottetown tonight.

Maritime Rights.

Dealing more particularly with Maritime conditions, Mr. King referred to the old agitation for Maritime Rights, and the steps his government had taken to secure these rights for the Maritimes.

A Royal Commission to study these problems and recommend remedies had been appointed. "When we did this the Conservatives laughed at us and ridiculed us," declared Mr. King.

Seven Surpluses in Eight and a Half Years.

In eight and a half years the government had produced seven surpluses and brought the country out of depression into prosperity, Mr. King said.

Aiding Canadian Workmen.

The Prime Minister told the meeting that the new ferry to ply between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of New Brunswick was to be built in Canada at a cost of $2,112,600 although it could be built in England where the one in present use was built at a cost of about $1,090,000.

In spite of the one hundred per cent greater cost the government had decided to build the vessel in Canada to aid Canadian workers, said Mr. King.

PREMIER KING'S SPEECH

It was a statesmanlike address which those who crowded the Capitol Theatre last evening, and the vastly larger audience to whom the speech came through outdoor amplifiers and by radio, heard from the lips of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, in opening his tour of the Maritime Provinces. That it was not only statesmanlike but popular in its appeal and convincing in its arguments was indicated by the volume and frequency of the applause which punctuated the speech. In the review of the administration of the affairs of the country since the present government entered office, in the summary of what has been achieved for the advancement of the Dominion and of the people who comprise its population and in the statement of policies suited to present situation and the future needs of the country, Premier King presented unanswerable reasons for the extension of the Liberal term of office.

To show what has been achieved by the present government, Premier King recalled conditions as they were when he and his colleagues assumed office in 1921 and compared them with those of the present. Handicapped as they were at that time by a period of much deeper business depression than has been witnessed during the last year and by the conditions left by a preceding government which had not managed to make ends meet and pay its current expenses, and handicapped further by possessing a majority of only one in the Commons and an adverse majority in the Senate, such a radical change was brought about in the administration of the nation's business that within two years a surplus was shown, and since then there has been a surplus in every year, while the national debt has been reduced by $270,000,000. Since 1923 taxes have been reduced by sums totalling $118,000,000 a year, in addition to the savings effected by tariff reductions and reduced freight rates and the lowered cost of living. It is a magnificent record, one for which the government is entitled to full credit and one which merits the endorsement of the people at the polls.

The policy of the government, the Premier explained, has been to promote the prosperity of the basic industries of the Dominion—agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing—in the realization that, if these great industries flourish, the manufacturing and other industries must share in the general prosperity.

The National Policy of Sir John A. MacDonald, he pointed out, was framed to meet conditions which existed more than fifty years ago, and he indicated the changes that have occurred both within the Dominion and in its external trade relations which make that policy unsuited to the present day.

Of especial interest in a railway centre such as Moncton was his discussion of the transportation policy of the government has resulted in linking up the bankrupt railway systems which the previous government had been forced to take over, and welding them into the present efficient and increasingly prosperous Canadian National Railways System, while giving fair and square treatment to the great privately-owned competing system. The elimination of politics in railway management, the creation of efficient management, the absorption of branch lines, the reduction of freight rates, the appointment of a Labor leader to the railway directorate and the introduction of responsible government in railway management—a plan which he recommended for other industries also—were among the policies which have brought about this transformation in the nation's transportation system.

As an illustration of the attitude of the government toward Labor, he recalled the fact that the employees of the Grand Trunk Railway, who had been denied their pension rights when they returned to work in 1910, had to wait until the present government took office in 1921 for the restoration of those rights.

How the Maritime Provinces have benefited under the present administration was shown by a review of the tremendous advantages which have accrued to these provinces through the implementing of the recommendations of the Duncan Commission, the appointment of which was vigorously opposed by the Conservative representatives from these provinces. These policies have been worth many millions to the Maritimes already and their benefits are continuing, while additional benefits are about to be enjoyed.

In dealing with the question of unemployment which, as the Prime Minister pointed out, is less serious in Canada than in almost any other country in the world, he showed how much the Dominion government has done to offset this condition through providing employment for many who otherwise would have been without work and in making easier conditions of living. One instance of those which he mentioned may be taken as typical. It is the decision to find employment for as many of the employees of the Canadian National Railways, with as little reduction in hours as possible, instead of doing as other railway systems had done in sharply reducing their staffs when business fell off. It has been the policy of the government to provide work rather than doles, and the whole country has benefited by this policy.

Concerning the relations between the Dominion and the provinces, the Premier quoted figures showing how many millions of dollars the province of New Brunswick alone had received from the Dominion treasury since 1922, this year's amount, in the form of subsidies and grants totalling $1,427,000 apart from the annual contribution of $119,000 for railway taxes.

In dealing with the last budget brought down, the Prime Minister reviewed its provisions for the encouragement of the iron and steel industries and coal mining, the countervailing duties to offset adverse tariff action by other countries, the arrangement to prevent the dumping of fruits and vegetables and the increased British preference, the effect of which is to divert trade from the United States, which has put up additional barriers against our products, and to direct it to Great Britain, which has been our best customer.

In conclusion, the Premier spoke of the approaching Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference and of the government's response to Mr. Bennett's challenge to appeal to the country in order that Canada's representatives might go to London with endorsement of the people. His plea for support for policies which would increase Canada's trade in overseas markets and which would aid in promoting intra-empire prosperity and goodwill was a fitting peroration to an address which left a deep impression upon his hearers and which must have won many supporters for his policies.

In dealing with the question of unemployment which, as the Prime Minister pointed out, is less serious in Canada than in almost any other country in the world, he showed how much the Dominion government has done to offset this condition through providing employment for many who otherwise would have been without work and in making easier conditions of living. One instance of those which he mentioned may be taken as typical. It is the decision to find employment for as many of the employees of the Canadian National Railways, with as little reduction in hours as possible, instead of doing as other railway systems had done in sharply reducing their staffs when business fell off. It has been the policy of the government to provide work rather than doles, and the whole country has benefited by this policy.

Concerning the relations between the Dominion and the provinces, the Premier quoted figures showing how many millions of dollars the province of New Brunswick alone had received from the Dominion treasury since 1922, this year's amount, in the form of subsidies and grants totalling $1,427,000 apart from the annual contribution of $119,000 for railway taxes.

In dealing with the last budget brought down, the Prime Minister reviewed its provisions for the encouragement of the iron and steel industries and coal mining, the countervailing duties to offset adverse tariff action by other countries, the arrangement to prevent the dumping of fruits and vegetables and the increased British preference, the effect of which is to divert trade from the United States, which has put up additional barriers against our products, and to direct it to Great Britain, which has been our best customer.

In conclusion, the Premier spoke of the approaching Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference and of the government's response to Mr. Bennett's challenge to appeal to the country in order that Canada's representatives might go to London with endorsement of the people. His plea for support for policies which would increase Canada's trade in overseas markets and which would aid in promoting intra-empire prosperity and goodwill was a fitting peroration to an address which left a deep impression upon his hearers and which must have won many supporters for his policies.

PREMIER KING OPENS MARITIME CAMPAIGN

Presents The Record Of His Government In Moncton Speech

Labor and Railway Matters Are Reviewed

DUNCAN REPORT

Rights of Ex-Service Men Who Signed Away Their Pensions to Be Restored

By RAY BROWN,
Canadian Press Staff Correspondent

MONCTON, N. B., June 20—The record of the present Dominion Government was laid before the people of the Maritime Provinces here tonight by Canada's Prime Minister. From the stage of a theatre Premier Mackenzie King fired the opening gun of his Maritime Province campaign. By radio his words were carried through the Maritime Provinces into the homes of thousands of people.

The Prime Minister reviewed labor and railway matters—this city is a railway centre—discussed the question of Maritime rights and the Duncan Report and made a plea for calm consideration of the Government's record. An excellent hearing was accorded him and his speech was punctuated with applause.

DUNCAN REPORT

Recommendations of the Duncan Report had been implemented by the Government, said the Premier, and he outlined the action which had been taken. He referred in conclusion to benefits which would accrue to Maritime ports through increased trade under the British preference.

SPEECH BROADCAST.

A radio hook-up of stations CNRA, Moncton, and CFBO, Saint John, carried the voice of the Prime Minister to all parts of the Maritime Provinces. Through the medium of loud speakers the speech was heard in a park not far from the theatre.

C. C. Avard, of Sackville, president of the Westmorland Liberal Association, acted as chairman of the meeting. Hon. Dr. P. J. Veniot, Postmaster-General and New Brunswick representative in the Federal Cabinet, sat at the right of Mr. King. Senator A. B. Copp, of Sackville, a former member for Westmorland constituency, occupied a seat on the platform, as also did Senator C. W. Robinson.

The meeting was called to order shortly after 8.30 p. m. and the chairman announced that Henry R. Emmerson had been chosen as Liberal candidate in Westmorland constituency. He immediately called on Mr. Emmerson to speak.

Mr. Emmerson remarked that if Premier Ferguson wanted to make Prime Minister Mackenzie King the issue in this campaign he thought the people of Canada would accept the issue. He asked for the support of the electors.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Postmaster-General Veniot was the next speaker. He congratulated the Liberals of Westmorland on selecting Mr. Emmerson as their candidate. In so doing they were perpetuating a great name, for no man had done more for Westmorland county and New Brunswick generally than had the late Hon. H. R. Emmerson.

Dr. Veniot, referring in particular to his own department, said reduction in the rate of postage from three to two cents had meant a cut in postal revenue of $7,500,000. He was glad to say, however, that so great was the prosperity of Canada that now these reductions had been successfully overcome.

SEES FAST SERVICE.

Dealing with the air mail service, the Minister declared that he hoped to have it in operation from Halifax to Vancouver during the year. The continent, he hoped, would then be bridged in 38 hours.

The old Intercolonial Railway would never lose its identity in the Canadian National System, Dr. Veniot asserted. He said he would not speak at length just now, in view of the coming address by the Prime Minister, but would return later to Moncton and discuss public issues.

THE PREMIER.

The vision of Sir Wilfrid Laurier of Canada as one in "a galaxy of nations" was touched on first by the Prime Minister. The years which had intervened had shown the truth of the vision which Sir Wilfrid Laurier saw so many years ago, asserted Mr. King.

TARIFF AND INDUSTRY

Development of the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing were of primary importance to the Maritime Provinces, Mr. King declared. And, in this connection he emphasized the importance of world markets. Canada must be in a position to compete in the markets of the world, he said, but she must do so on a profitable basis. This was where the tariff came in. By lowering the tariff on instruments of production the cost of production was decreased. It was the Government's effort to reduce the tariff in a way which would help the consumer without injuring Canadian industry.

"The transportation problem was overpowering when this Government came into power," Mr. King declared in dealing with the railway issues which his administration had met. There were a number of bankrupt roads.

"It was the present Government which unified these roads into a single system" he continued. "It was the present Government that got Sir Henry Thornton." This statement met with applause. Mr. King described how he had secured Sir Henry's services. The arrangement was that Sir Henry Thornton was to have a free hand.

"It was the present Government which, for the first time, appointed a labor man to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway," Mr. King informed his listeners. The Government had appointed the president of the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada to the Canadian National Board. This statement evoked applause again and Mr. King went on to declare that he hoped that some day labor would be represented on the boards of all large institutions employing labor.

MARITIME PROBLEMS

Turning more particularly to the Maritime Provinces, Mr. King referred to the agitation which had gone on in the past for Maritime rights. His Government had undertaken to study the problem, find out what was wrong and apply the necessary remedy. Therefore the Royal Commisison on Maritime claims had been appointed by the Government.

"When we did this the Conservatives laughed at us and ridiculed us," continued Mr. King. But now that the Commission had made its report the Conservatives, he said, had adopted and accepted it. Their view toward the Commission had completely altered.

During the 1926 election campaign he had undertaken, if returned to power, to carry out the recommendations of the Duncan Report.

"Now," said Mr. King, "I am appearing before you at the end of the Parliament, and I want to ask you if you think the Government has done everything in its power to implement that report."

There was a round of applause.

THE BENEFITS

Mr. King then went on to refer to what the Government had done in implementing the report. Subsidies to the Maritime Provinces had been increased and the increases paid, he said. Freight rate had been reduced in a substantial way. Harbor facilities had, he declared, been improved. Trade was directed to Maritime ports; the steel and coal industries were benefitted; special rates on Nova Scotia coal destined to the central markets had been established.

"In accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commission Maritime claims, a new ice-breaking car ferry steamer is being constructed for the Prince Edward Island car ferry service," Mr. King went on. "The original ferry on this service was constructed in England, and, while consideration was given to the possibility of having the present boat built in a British yard, it was decided in view of the industrial conditions obtaining in Canada at the moment, to restrict the call for tenders to Canadian shipyards. Seven Canadian shipbuilding yards were asked to tender, and three tenders were received.

The contest went to the lowest tendered at $2,112,600.

"No British firms were asked to actually tender, but one stated that they would be willing to accept the work for about $1,090,000," he said. "The lowest Canadian tender was therefore 100 per cent higher."

"Despite this fact, however, the Government decided in view of the existing conditions to have the car ferry constructed in Canada in order to provide additional employment for Canadian workmen."

RIGHTS RESTORED.

Mr. King said that since coming to Moncton he had received a letter asking him if something could not be done for those veterans who had signed away their pension rights. He wanted to assure this man that, under legislation passed at the last session such veterans were to have their rights restored.

"That will cost the country two million dollars," said Mr. King.

"What does that matter? We fought for it," came a voice from the audience.

"I'll agree with you, my friend," responded Mr. King.

He went on to describe what had been done at the last session for returned men.

The Prime Minister referred to the fact that he had known the late Hon. H. R. Emmerson in Ottawa years ago. He had been impressed with the generous and good qualities of Mr. Emmerson, and it was a pleasure to know that his son was to represent the Liberal cause in Westmorland.

VENIOT TRIBUTE.

A tribute to the work of Hon. Dr. P. J. Veniot was voiced by the Prime Minister. Penny postage and development of the air mail were due very largely to the work of Dr. Veniot, and, added Mr. King, the Postmaster-General was now in communication with the British Government with a view to obtaining a reciprocal reduction in parcel post rates between the two countries.

"You have just passed through a provincial election here," continued Mr. King. As Prime Minister of Canada he had never interfered in provincial politics, and he did not believe in so doing. He merely asked the electors not to confuse provincial with federal issues. He wanted the people to review the record of the Government and give it a fair consideration, and then, whether Liberal or Conservative, to vote for what they thought was right.

"I'm a Liberal through and through, and I confess I can't see any good in Toryism," remarked the Prime Minister with a smile.

He went on to emphasize that feeling which might have been stirred up in the provincial contest should not bias the electorate in dealing with federal issues.

The financial record of the Government was reviewed briefly by the Prime Minister. He asserted that out of eight and a half years in power, the Government had produced seven surpluses. It had reduced taxation. It was meeting the war costs, and it had brought the country out of depression into prosperity, he claimed.

Premier Claims Prosperity Due To Govt. Policy

Present Satisfactory Conditions in Maritimes Largely Result of Implementation Of Duncan Report.

MONCTON, N.B., June 20. — Entering the Maritimes today, Premier Mackenzie King opened one of the most significant phases of his election campaign. From now until next Friday, when he returns westward from St. John, the Liberal leader will devote himself to reducing the salient made in his lines by the Conservative landslide of 1925 in these three Eastern Provinces. His hopes of doing so have naturally been stimulated by yesterday's reduction in the Baxter government's majority; for politics is politics in the Maritimes and even though the New Brunswick contest was fought largely on local issues it is an augury of sorts for July 28.

Recent political history in the Martimes speaks for itself. The Liberal phalanx which Right Hon. W. S. Fielding and Hon. George Murray had recruited over a quarter of a century, was shattered by the Maritimes' rights agitation in 1925. That election found Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island solid Liberal, and, out of the thirty-one Maritimes' seats, only five in New Brunswick held by Conservatives. It left the Liberals with six seats to the Conservatives twenty-three. The campaign of 1926 and two subsequent by elections have since improved matters for the Liberals to the extent of giving them three members from Nova Scotia, three from Prince Edward Island and five from New Brunswick in the Parliament just dissolved.

Hinges on Two Things.

The government's prospect of securing further reinforcements from the Maritimes this year would appear to hinge on two things.

The grievances of 1925 have to a great extent been removed through the instrumentality of the Duncan Commission, and—which is equally important—the Maritimes, which in 1925 floundered in depression while the rest of Canada prospered, are today, relatively, the most prosperous section of Canada.

No one travelling through these provinces today can doubt the spiritual value of the outlet supplied them by the Duncan Commission. Its sympathetic study of their difficulties was in itself a tonic to the morale of the Maritimes; and the practical adjustments which followed gave purchase to the lever of their refreshed ambition. Their present well-being is doubly stimulating because it is the fruit of their own efforts and in their present mood it is logical to suppose that they will look favorably on the government which cleared the way for those efforts.

Furnished Text of Address.

The Duncan Commission, and collateral measures for improving the condition of the Maritimes furnished the Prime Minister with his text for tonight's address at Moncton. He recalled that the commission was appointed by his government in 1926 in fulfilment of a campaign pledge and, though its investigation was carried out during the brief Meighen regime, it was the present Liberal government which received its report and proceeded to put its recommendations into effect.

He was able to present to his audience a picture of these recommendations almost fully implemented, and in some cases exceeded. Interim grants had been made to the Maritime Provinces pending a revision of their financial arrangements with the Dominion, which revision was now being studied by the board of audit. With certain necessary modifications, the recommended freight rate reductions had been granted; and in extending them to railways other than the Canadian National, the government had exceeded the terms of the Duncan report.

Terminal Facilities.

Prince Edward Island had been granted a new car ferry and improved terminal facilities at a cost of over $3,500,000.

Saint John and Halifax had been given statutory harbor commissions and the advance of $5,000,000 to Saint John and $5,500,000 to Halifax authorized by Parliament. To encourage the coking of Canadian coal, coking plant subsidies in excess of the three per cent. recommended had been provided for and, in consequence, a coking plant had been started at Quebec. Halifax had this year been granted $6,200 for this purpose, and $10,000 placed in the estimates for a test of Nova Scotia coal in the big Lasalle coking plant at Montreal.

The recommended bonus on Canadian coal used in iron and steel manufacture had been granted in the present budget. Revision of the iron and steel tariff had also been completed within a year of the time when Besco's last brief on the subject was submitted to the tariff board.

New Brunswick had been relieved of her embarrassing railway problems and in addition the Inverness Railway had been taken over by the C.N.R. and thus saved from probable discontinuance. The Guysborough Railway, a political issue in eastern Nova Scotia since 1911, was now being constructed as a C.N.R. extension.

New Fisheries Dept.

The fisheries administration had been placed not only under a separate deputy minister, as recommended, but now under a minister of fisheries as a separate department. Educational work, fisheries conservation and the encouragement of co-operative effort among the fishermen had also been provided for.

The test freight rates on coal—both winter shipments to Ontario and Quebec from the Maritimes, and inland shipments from St. Lawrence ports during the summer—were the government's response to this section of the Duncan report. In addition the government had co-operated in construction of a modern cold storage plant at Halifax and was making similar provision for a plant at Moncton to provide for the needs of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Under the Liberal regime, Mr. King declared, prosperity had returned to the Maritimes. That was the ground on which he claimed their support.

Mr. King was accompanied on the platform by Hon. P. J. Veniot, postmaster-general. As a preface to the meeting, the selection of H. R. Em-

Hail To The Liberal Chief

Early this morning Prince Edward Island was glad to welcome to its shores once again Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, who speaks in Summerside this afternoon and Charlottetown tonight.

When he last visited here it was in 1927, in company with the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, Prime Minister of Great Britain, and on that occasion he delivered a non-political speech, from the balcony of the Provincial Building.

On this occasion he comes on a different mission. The election campaign is on, and as the Liberal leader, and head of the government, Hon. Mr. King will discuss the political situation, review the record of his government, and indicate the policy of the party.

When Hon. Mr. Baldwin spoke in Toronto three years ago, he said: "I defy any one to find two statesmen who pull together better for the good of the Empire than Mr. Mackenzie King and myself."

At this time a brief sketch of his life and career may be of interest.

W. L. Mackenzie King was born at Berlin, (Kitchener) Ontario on December 17, 1874.

The son of John King, K. C., a former President of the Reform Association of North Waterloo and Lecturer in Constitutional Law at Osgoode Hall, Toronto, and the grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie the great Reformer, he inherited a keen interest in politics and constitutional questions which was still further developed by his university studies at Toronto and abroad.

Graduating from Toronto with degrees in Arts and Law, he succeeded in winning a Scholarship at Harvard University where he continued his study of political and economic problems and spent his vacations in gaining practical experience of social welfare and settlement work.

During this period his investigations of the labour conditions of the clothing trades in Toronto lead to the adoption of legislation by the Dominion Parliament which prevented the exploitation of women in the garment industry, and assured them a reasonable standard of wages and working conditions.

In the meantime, he succeeded by his own efforts in gaining a travelling scholarship which afforded him the means of continuing his studies abroad.

In 1900, while he was studying in Italy, Sir Wilfrid Laurier invited him to return to Canada to accept appointment as Editor of the Labour Gazette, and to assist in the organization of a Department of Labour in the Canadian Government. From this date until the present day, he has had a career of continuous public service which in variety and usefulness is unique in the political annals of the Dominion.

As the first Deputy Minister of Labour in the Dominion, he organized the Department, and was chiefly responsible for the drafting of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, a statute which has lead to the settlement of numerous strikes and lockouts which threatened to retard the industrial progress of Canada.

At the same time he earned a reputation as a successful conciliator of industrial disputes which won for him the confidence of the employees and employers with whom he was called upon to deal.

In 1908, he represented Canada at important conferences in England dealing with Oriental immigration.

In the following year, his services were requisitioned by the British Government as a member of the British delegation on the International Opium Commission which met at Shanghai.

A little more than twenty years ago, he entered the Dominion Parliament and Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as Minister of Labour, and in 1919 following the death of Sir Wilfrid Lauier, was elected leader of the Liberal party. He was elected to Parliament by acclamation for Prince, P. E. Island in October, 1919.

Tow years later, Mackenzie King became Prime Minister of Canada, Minister of External Affairs, and President of the Privy Council.

Except for a brief interruption, he has held these portfolios during the past nine years.

During this same period, he has represented Canada at the historic Imperial Conferences in 1923 and 1926, and at the Council and Assembly of the League of Nations in 1928.

On this last occasion, he expressed the desire of the Canadian people to co-operate in every effort towards world peace, and was paid the high honour of election of Vice President of the Assembly of the League.

If there is one quality above all others which has given Mackenzie King a commanding position in the political life of Canada, it is his rare gift of conciliation, a willingness to recognize the sincerity of different points of view, and a power of finding the means to bring opposing interests together towards the achievement of a common purpose.

His success in the settlement of industrial disputes gave him an international reputation.

The same related qualities of tolerance and conciliation have enabled him as Prime Minister to solve some of our most difficult economic and constitutional problems.

In a country of different races and creeds, with those conflicting economic interests which are certain to arise over a vast expanse of territory, these qualities of tolerance and conciliation are the first prerequisites of statesmanship.

Aided only by his own talents, and making his way by the force of native ability and devotion to the service of his country, Mackenzie King has represented Canada with conspicuous success in the Councils of the Empire at London and in the councils of the world at Geneva.

Civil Servant, author, conciliator, Deputy Minister of Labour, Minister of Labour, Minister of External Affairs, Prime Minister of Canada, and Vice-President of the Assembly of the League of Nations, he has served the people of the Dominion for a period of more than twenty years, and is recognized today as one of the outstanding statesmen of the British Commonwealth.

Canadians will entrust again to his mature experience the great responsibilities of government which he has discharged with eminent ability during the recent critical period in the economic and constitutional development of our country.

BASIC INDUSTRIES MOST IMPORTANT.

Development of the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing were of primary importance to the Maritime Provinces, Mr. King declared; and in this connection he emphasized the importance of world markets. Canada must be in a position to compete in the markets of the world, he said, but she must do so on a profitable basis. This was where the tariff came in. By lowering the tariff on instrument of production the cost of production was decreased. It was the Government's effort to reduce the tariff in a way which would help the consumer without injuring Canadian industry.

"The transportation problem was overpowering when this Government came into power," Mr. King declared, in dealing with the railway issues which his administration had met. There were a number of bankrupt roads.

"It was the present Government which unified these roads into a single system," he continued. "It was the present Government that got Sir Henry Thornton." This statement met with applause. Mr. King described how he had secured Sir Henry's services. And the arrangement was that Sir Henry Thornton was to have a free hand.

"It was the present Government, which, for the first time, appointed a labor man to the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway, Mr. King informed his listeners. The Government had appointed the President of the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada to the Canadian National Board. This statement evoked applause again, and Mr. King went on to declare that he hoped that some day labor would be represented on the board of all large institutions employing labor.

DEALS WITH MARITIME RIGHTS

Turning more particularly to the Maritime Provinces, Mr. King referred to the agitation which had gone on in the past for Maritime rights. His Government had undertaken to study the problem, find out what was wrong and apply the necessary remedy. Therefore the Royal Commission on Maritime Claims had been appointed by the Government.

"When we did this the Conservatives laughed at us and ridiculed us," continued Mr. King. But now that the Commission had made its report the Conservatives, he said, had adopted and accepted it. Their view toward the Commission had completely altered.

During the 1926 election campaign he had undertaken if returned to power, to carry out the recommendations of th Duncan report.

"Now," said Mr. King, "I am appearing before you at the end of the Parliament, and I want to ask you if you think the Government has done everything in its power to implement that report."

There was a round of applause.

Mr. King then went on to refer to what the Government had done in implementing the report. Subsidies to the Maritime Provinces had been increased and the increases paid, he said. Freight rates had been reduced in a substantial way. arbor facilities had, he declared, been improved. Trade was directed to Maritime ports; the steel and coal industries were benefitted; special rates on Nova Scotia coal destined to the central markets had been established.

In accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Maritime claims, a new icebreaking carferry steamer is being constructed for the Prince Edward Island carferry service," Mr. King went on.

"The original ferry on this service was constructed in England and, while consideration was given to the possibility of having the present boat built in a British yard, it was decided in view of the industrial conditions obtaining in Canada at the moment, to restrict the call for tenders to Canadian shipyards. Seven Canadian shipbuilding yards were asked to tender, and three tenders were received. The contract went to the lawest tender at $2,112,600.

"No British firms were asked to actually tender, but one stated that they would be willing to accept the work for about $1,090,000 he said. The lowest Canadian tender was therefore 100 per cent. higher."

"Despite this fact, however the Government decided in view of the existing conditions to have the car ferry constructed in Canada in order to provide additional employment for Canadian workmen."

TELLS WHAT HAS BEEN DONE FOR VETS

Mr. King said that since coming to Moncton he had received a letter asking him if something could not be done for those veterans who had signed away their pension rights. He wanted to assure this man that, under legislation passed at the last session such veterans were to have their rights restored.

"That will cost the country two million dollars," said Mr. King.

"What does that matter? We fought for it," came a voice from the audience.

"I quite agree with you, my friends" responded Mr. King.

He went on to describe what had been done at the last session for returned men.

Mr. King closed with reference to the Budget and its effect on the Maritimes. He referred to the provision with respect to fruit and vegetables pointing out that increased importations of these commodities from the West Indies would mean more business for Maritime ports.

The Prime Minister referred to the fact that he had known the late Hon. H. R. Emmerson in Ottawa years ago. He had been impressed with the generous and good qualities of Mr. Emmerson, and it was a pleasure to know that his son was to represent the Liberal cause in Westmorland.

A tribute to the work of Hon. P. J. Veniot was voiced by the Prime Minister. Penny postage and development of the air mail were due very largely to the work of Mr. Veniot, and, added Mr. King, the Postmaster General was now in communication with the British Government with a view to obtaining a reciprocal reduction in parcel post rates between the two countries.

"You have just passed through a provincial election here," continued Mr. King. As Prime Minister of Canada he had never interfered in provincial politics, and he did not believe in so doing. He merely asked the electors not to confuse provincial with federal issues. He wanted the people to review the record of the Government and give it fair consideration, and then, whether Liberal or Conservative, to vote for what they thought was right.

"I'm a Liberal through and through, and I confess I can't see any good in toryism," remarked the Prime Minister with a smile. (The audience laughed.)

He went on to emphasize that feeling which might have been stirred up in the provincial contest should not bias the electorate in dealing with federal issues.

The financial record of the Government was reviewed briefly by the Prime Minister. He asserted that, out of eight and a half years in power, the Government had produced seven surpluses. It had reduced taxation. It was meeting the war costs, an it had brought the country out of depression into prosperity, he claimed.

King Forecasts Greater Future For Maritimers

Opens Federal Campaign at Moncton—Outlines Work Done in East.

Moncton, N.B., June 21. — The record of the present Dominion Government was laid before the people of the maritime provinces here last night by Canada's Prime Minister. From the stage of a theatre Premier Mackenzie King fired the opening gun of his maritime province campaign. By radio his words were carried through the maritime provinces into the homes of thousands of people.

The Prime Minister reviewed labor and railway matters—this city is a railway centre—discussed the question of maritime rights and the Duncan report, and made a plea for calm consideration of the Government's record. An excellent hearing was accorded hm and his speech was punctuated with applause.

Recommendations of the Duncan report had been implemented by the Government, said the Premier, and he outlined the action which had been taken. He referred in conclusion to benefits which would accrue to maritime ports through increased trade under the British preference.

A radio hook-up of stations CNRA, Moncton, and CFBO, St. John, carried the voice of the Prime Minister to all parts of the maritime provinces. Through the medium of loud speakers the speech was heard in a park not far from the theatre.

C. C. Avard, of Sackville, president of the Westmorland Liberal Association, acted as chairman of the meeting. Hon. P. J. Veniot, Postmaster-General, and New Brunswick representative in the Federal Cabinet, sat at the right of Mr. King. Senator A. B. Copp, of Sackville, a former member for Westmorland constituency, occupied a seat on the platform, as also did Senator C. W. Robinson.

The Prime Minister referred to the fact that he had known the late Hon. H. R. Emmerson in Ottawa years ago. He had been impressed with the generous and good qualities of Mr. Emmerson and it was a pleasure to know that his son was to represent the Liberal cause in Westmorland.

A tribute to the work of Hon. P. J. Venoit was voiced by the Prime Minister. Penny postage and development of the air mail were due very largely to the work of Mr. Venoit. And added Mr. King, the Postmaster General was now in communication with the British Government with a view to obtaining a reciprocal reduction in parcel post rates between the two countries.

REMINDS ELECTORS PROVINCIAL ISSUES NOT LIKE FEDERAL

Premier Mackenzie King Appeals for Support at Moncton, New Brunswick

REVIEWS THE PAST

Moncton, June 20—Feelings which might have been stirred up during the provincial elections here should not bias the electorate in dealing with federal issues, declared Premier W. L. Mackenzie King, speaking here to-day at the nomination meeting of Henry R. Emmerson, Liberal federal candidate for Westmorland.

"You have just passed through a provincial election here," he remarked, stating that he as prime minister of Canada had never interfered in provincial elections and did not believe in so doing. He merely requested the electors not to confuse provincial with federal issues.

He wished the people to review the government's record, and then, whether Liberal or Conservative, to vote for what they thought was right.

"I am a Liberal through and through and I confess that I cannot see any good in Toryism," remarked Premier King, smiling.

He referred to the fact that he had known the late H. R. Emmerson in Ottawa years ago. He had been impressed with the generous and good qualities of Mr. Emmerson, and it was a pleasure for him to know that his son was to represent the Liberal cause in Westmorland.

PARCEL POST RATE, CANADA TO BRITAIN, MAY BE REDUCED

Premier King Intimates That Negotiations Are in Progress

SPEAKS IN MARITIMES

Reviews Government Record in Address at Moncton

(Special and C.P. Despatches.)

Moncton, June 20.—A hint that the Government was now trying to obtain reciprocal reduction in parcel post rates between Canada and Britain was given here tonight in the speech by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister.

Mr. King reviewed the record of the Government, and emphasized the good work done in the railway field.

The Prime Minister reviewed labor and railway matters—this city is a railway centre—discussed the question of Maritime rights and the Duncan report, and made a plea for calm consideration of the Government's record. An excellent hearing was accorded him, and his speech was punctuated with applause.

Recommendations of the Duncan report had been implemented by the Government, said the Premier, and he outlined the action which had been taken. He referred in conclusion to benefits which would accrue to Maritime ports through increased trade under the British preference.

A radio hook-up carried the voice of the Prime Minister to all parts of the Maritime Provinces.

C. C. Avard of Sackville, President of the Westmorland Liberal Association, acted as Chairman of the meeting. Hon. Peter J. Veniot, Postmaster-General, and New Brunswick representative in the Federal Cabinet, sat at the right of Mr. King. Senator A. B. Copp of Sackville, a former member for Westmorland, occupied a seat on the platform.

The Chairman announced that Henry R. Emmerson had been chosen as Liberal candidate in Westmorland constituency. He called on Mr. Emmerson to speak.

Ready for Mr. Ferguson.

Mr. Emmerson remarked that if Premier Ferguson wanted to make Prime Minister Mackenzie King the issue in this campaign he thought the people of Canada would accept the issue. He asked for the support of the electors.

Mr. Veniot, referring in particular to his own department, said that reduction in the rate of postage from three to two cents had meant a cut in postal revenue of $7,500,000. He was glad to say, however, that, so great was the prosperity of Canada, now this reduction had been successfully overcome.

Dealing with the air mail service, the Minister declared that he hoped to have it in operation from Halifax to Vancouver during the present year. The continent, he hoped, would then be bridged in 38 hours.

The vision of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of Canada as one in "a galaxy of nations," was touched on first by the Prime Minister. The years which had intervened had shown the truth of the vision which Sir Wilfrid Laurier saw so many years ago, asserted Mr. King.

The Prime Minister referred to the fact that he had known the late Hon. H. R. Emmerson in Ottawa years ago. He had been impressed with the generous and good qualities of Mr. Emmerson and it was a pleasure to know that his son was to represent the Liberal cause in Westmoreland.

A tribute to the work of Mr. Veniot was voiced by the Prime Minister. Penny postage and development of the air mail were due very largely to the work of Mr. Veniot. And, added Mr. King, the Postmaster-General was now in communication with the British Government with a view to obtaining a reciprocal reduction in parcel post rates between the two countries.

Provincial and Federal Affairs.

"You have just passed through a Provincial election here," continued Mr. King. As Prime Minister of Canada he had never interferred in Provincial politics, and he did not believe in so doing. He merely asked the electors not to confuse Provincial with Federal issues. He wanted the people to review the record of the Government and give it fair consideration and then whether Liberal or Conservative to vote for what they thought was right.

"I'm a Liberal through and through, and I confess I can't see any good in Toryism," remarked the Prime Minister, with a smile. The audience laughed.

He went on to emphasize that feeling which might have been stirred up in the Provincial contest should not bias the electorate in dealing with Federal issues.

The financial record of the Government was reviewed briefly by the Prime Minister. He asserted that out of eight and a half years in power the Government had produced seven surpluses. It had reduced taxation. It was meeting the war costs, and it had brought the country out of depression into prosperity, he claimed.

"The transportation problem was overpowering when this Government came into power," Mr. King declared, in dealing with the railway issues which his Administration had met. There were a number of bankrupt roads.

"It was the present Government which unified these roads into a single system," he continued. "It was the present Government that got Sir Henry Thornton." This statement met with applause. Mr. King described how he had secured Sir Henry's services.

least he could have done was to have apologized to Canadians for his rash statement. The fact that he has not done so would indicate that if he is returned to power on July 28 dark times are ahead for at least five of the nine Provinces of Canada.

"The Dunning Budget, carefully camouflaged as it is, struck no responsive chord among the people of our Province. In addition to this, the silence of Mr. Dunning and Mr. King in the face of such a lurid campaign of misrepresentation as is being carried on in Quebec against the Saskatchewan Government by the Liberal Party indicates that they are in sympathy with such methods.

"The people of Saskatchewan believe in fair play and honesty in public life. They believe in issues being presented fairly and squarely without cunning and without subtlety, and they are prepared to express themselves accordingly in no uncertain terms on election day."

Presents The Record Of His Government In Moncton Speech

Labor and Railway Matters Are Reviewed

DUNCAN REPORT

Rights of Ex-Service Men Who Signed Away Their Pensions to Be Restored

By RAY BROWN,
Canadian Press Staff Correspondent

MONCTON, N. B., June 20—The record of the present Dominion Government was laid before the people of the Maritime Provinces here tonight by Canada's Prime Minister. From the stage of a theatre Premier Mackenzie King fired the opening gun of his Maritime Province campaign. By radio his words were carried through the Maritime Provinces into the homes of thousands of people.

The Prime Minister reviewed labor and railway matters—this city is a railway centre—discussed the question of Maritime rights and the Duncan Report and made a plea for calm consideration of the Government's record. An excellent hearing was accorded him and his speech was punctuated with applause.

DUNCAN REPORT

Recommendations of the Duncan Report had been implemented by the Government, said the Premier, and he outlined the action which had been taken. He referred in conclusion to benefits which would accrue to Maritime ports through increased trade under the British preference.

SPEECH BROADCAST.

A radio hook-up of stations CNRA, Moncton, and CFBO, Saint John, carried the voice of the Prime Minister to all parts of the Maritime Provinces. Through the medium of loud speakers the speech was heard in a park not far from the theatre.

C. C. Avard, of Sackville, president of the Westmorland Liberal Association, acted as chairman of the meeting. Hon. Dr. P. J. Veniot, Postmaster-General and New Brunswick representative in the Federal Cabinet, sat at the right of Mr. King. Senator A. B. Copp, of Sackville, a former member for Westmorland constituency, occupied a seat on the platform, as also did Senator C. W. Robinson.

The meeting was called to order shortly after 8.30 p. m. and the chairman announced that Henry R. Emmerson had been chosen as Liberal candidate in Westmorland constituency. He immediately called on Mr. Emmerson to speak.

Mr. Emmerson remarked that if Premier Ferguson wanted to make Prime Minister Mackenzie King the issue in this campaign he thought the people of Canada would accept the issue. He asked for the support of the electors.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Postmaster-General Veniot was the next speaker. He congratulated the Liberals of Westmorland on selecting Mr. Emmerson as their candidate. In so doing they were perpetuating a great name, for no man had done more for Westmorland county and New Brunswick generally than had the late Hon. H. R. Emmerson.

Dr. Veniot, referring in particular to his own department, said reduction in the rate of postage from three to two cents had meant a cut in postal revenue of $7,500,000. He was glad to say, however, that so great was the prosperity of Canada that now these reductions had been successfully overcome.

SEES FAST SERVICE.

Dealing with the air mail service, the Minister declared that he hoped to have it in operation from Halifax to Vancouver during the year. The continent, he hoped, would then be bridged in 38 hours.

The old Intercolonial Railway would never lose its identity in the Canadian National System, Dr. Veniot asserted. He said he would not speak at length just now, in view of the coming address by the Prime Minister, but would return later to Moncton and discuss public issues.

THE PREMIER.

The vision of Sir Wilfrid Laurier of Canada as one in "a galaxy of nations" was touched on first by the Prime Minister. The years which had intervened had shown the truth of the vision which Sir Wilfrid Laurier saw so many years ago, asserted Mr. King.

TARIFF AND INDUSTRY

Development of the great basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing were of primary importance to the Maritime Provinces, Mr. King declared. And, in this connection he emphasized the importance of world markets. Canada must be in a position to compete in the markets of the world, he said, but she must do so on a profitable basis. This was where the tariff came in. By lowering the tariff on instruments of production the cost of production was decreased. It was the Government's effort to reduce the tariff in a way which would help the consumer without injuring Canadian industry.

"The transportation problem was overpowering when this Government came into power," Mr. King declared in dealing with the railway issues which his administration had met. There were a number of bankrupt roads.

"It was the present Government which unified these roads into a single system" he continued. "It was the present Government that got Sir Henry Thornton." This statement met with applause. Mr. King described how he had secured Sir Henry's services. The arrangement was that Sir Henry Thornton was to have a free hand.

"It was the present Government which, for the first time, appointed a labor man to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway," Mr. King informed his listeners. The Government had appointed the president of the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada to the Canadian National Board. This statement evoked applause again and Mr. King went on to declare that he hoped that some day labor would be represented on the boards of all large institutions employing labor.

MARITIME PROBLEMS

Turning more particularly to the Maritime Provinces, Mr. King referred to the agitation which had gone on in the past for Maritime rights. His Government had undertaken to study the problem, find out what was wrong and apply the necessary remedy. Therefore the Royal Commisison on Maritime claims had been appointed by the Government.

"When we did this the Conservatives laughed at us and ridiculed us," continued Mr. King. But now that the Commission had made its report the Conservatives, he said, had adopted and accepted it. Their view toward the Commission had completely altered.

During the 1926 election campaign he had undertaken, if returned to power, to carry out the recommendations of the Duncan Report.

"Now," said Mr. King, "I am appearing before you at the end of the Parliament, and I want to ask you if you think the Government has done everything in its power to implement that report."

There was a round of applause.

THE BENEFITS

Mr. King then went on to refer to what the Government had done in implementing the report. Subsidies to the Maritime Provinces had been increased and the increases paid, he said. Freight rate had been reduced in a substantial way. Harbor facilities had, he declared, been improved. Trade was directed to Maritime ports; the steel and coal industries were benefitted; special rates on Nova Scotia coal destined to the central markets had been established.

"In accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commission Maritime claims, a new ice-breaking car ferry steamer is being constructed for the Prince Edward Island car ferry service," Mr. King went on. "The original ferry on this service was constructed in England, and, while consideration was given to the possibility of having the present boat built in a British yard, it was decided in view of the industrial conditions obtaining in Canada at the moment, to restrict the call for tenders to Canadian shipyards. Seven Canadian shipbuilding yards were asked to tender, and three tenders were received.

The contest went to the lowest tendered at $2,112,600.

"No British firms were asked to actually tender, but one stated that they would be willing to accept the work for about $1,090,000," he said. "The lowest Canadian tender was therefore 100 per cent higher."

"Despite this fact, however, the Government decided in view of the existing conditions to have the car ferry constructed in Canada in order to provide additional employment for Canadian workmen."

RIGHTS RESTORED.

Mr. King said that since coming to Moncton he had received a letter asking him if something could not be done for those veterans who had signed away their pension rights. He wanted to assure this man that, under legislation passed at the last session such veterans were to have their rights restored.

"That will cost the country two million dollars," said Mr. King.

"What does that matter? We fought for it," came a voice from the audience.

"I'll agree with you, my friend," responded Mr. King.

He went on to describe what had been done at the last session for returned men.

The Prime Minister referred to the fact that he had known the late Hon. H. R. Emmerson in Ottawa years ago. He had been impressed with the generous and good qualities of Mr. Emmerson, and it was a pleasure to know that his son was to represent the Liberal cause in Westmorland.

VENIOT TRIBUTE.

A tribute to the work of Hon. Dr. P. J. Veniot was voiced by the Prime Minister. Penny postage and development of the air mail were due very largely to the work of Dr. Veniot, and, added Mr. King, the Postmaster-General was now in communication with the British Government with a view to obtaining a reciprocal reduction in parcel post rates between the two countries.

"You have just passed through a provincial election here," continued Mr. King. As Prime Minister of Canada he had never interfered in provincial politics, and he did not believe in so doing. He merely asked the electors not to confuse provincial with federal issues. He wanted the people to review the record of the Government and give it a fair consideration, and then, whether Liberal or Conservative, to vote for what they thought was right.

"I'm a Liberal through and through, and I confess I can't see any good in Toryism," remarked the Prime Minister with a smile.

He went on to emphasize that feeling which might have been stirred up in the provincial contest should not bias the electorate in dealing with federal issues.

The Prime Minister's Visit

Irrespective of party affiliations our citizens will extend a courteous welcome to the Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, whose addresses at Summerside this afternoon and at Charlottetown this evening will open the speech-making campaign in this Province. Mr. King is a pleasing and fluent orator, and may be expected to present the case for his Government in the most plausible way.

Of course, his Maritime tour would have been more cheering to Premier King had the result of the New Brunswick elections been less unfavorable to his party provincially. The people of New Brunswick were evidently determined to teach him a lesson with regard to his refusal to recognize the claims of provinces administered by "Tory Governments," and they accordingly returned the Baxter administration with an overwhelming majority.

Evidently, too, Alberta is not affected by Premier King's assurances of what he had done and was further prepared to do for the Western Provinces.

Certainly the people of Prince Edward Island have not benefited to any extent, if at all, by having two Liberal Governments "in line." For all the regard that the Prime Minister has shown to the specific claims of this Province we might better have had a provincial Conservative administration.

Premier King Soft Pedals

Dr. Manion's criticism of Premier King's opening campaign speech at Brantford, that it was "a mess of platitudes and generalities, a few kernels of wheat in a barrel of chaff," might fittingly have been applied to many of Mr. King's utterances in the Strand Theatre here on Saturday. The Premier went to the length of criticising the Conservative leader for emphasizing in his platform matters so important to this Province as a national policy of highways and old age pensions. He did not state in Charlottetown what he stated emphatically in the House of Commons, namely that the payment of money to the Provinces by the Dominion for highways and old age pensions constituted "a thoroughly vicious principle." On the contrary, he labored to show that he might give these matters consideration if re-elected. But he had no definite assurance to offer, no constructive policy of any kind to set before the people.

It was very evident from the cautious manner in which the Prime Minister approached these subjects, that he was fully aware of the weakness of his position. For if he were favorably disposed to continuing the federal grants for highway construction, how could he explain the fact that he had himself withdrawn these grants and spoken in criticism of them in Parliament? Mr. King's excuse for refusing to make a definite announcement regarding national highways because "he did not believe in holding out to the electors in general as one of the great projects of a particular election something simply to take their minds off the great issues" was, in the circumstances, an insult to the intelligence of his hearers.

The Premier had the temerity to ask the people of Prince Edward Island, in considering the Conservative policy of national old age pensions, not to forget "that an Old Age Pensions law which does not divide up the obligations of the country means more and more in the way of taxation." If he meant to imply, as obviously he did, that Mr. Bennett's policy which would enable this Province to share equally with all the Provinces of Canada in old age pensions was an unfair division of obligations, he was shooting very wide of the mark indeed. The fact is, of course, that the King Government's policy of making the Provinces pay fifty percent of the expenditures under Old Age Pensions effectively shuts out this Province from participating in the scheme, while it utilizes federal taxes imposed in this Province for the payment of old age pensions in other and wealthier provinces.

The Premier boasted that he made Old Age Pensions an election issue in the last campaign. He might have gone further and reminded his hearers that the local Liberal party also made it an election issue in the provincial campaign of 1927. Provincially and federally, Liberal politicians unscrupulously exploited the credulity of the aged poor in this Province on two occasions by leading them to believe that they would be provided for under an Act which was so framed that with the limited revenues at our disposal it was impossible for Prince Edward Island to receive any benefit whatever.

In view of the fact that the Conservative leader proposes definitely to put an end to this unfair discrimination and to allow Prince Edward Island to participate fully in Old Age Pensions, it is difficult to see what consolation Mr. King expected the aged poor of the Province to receive from his statement: "Don't be too sure that Mr. Bennett is going to get back into office and have any chance of putting that law into force!"

Again, there was Mr. King's extraordinary explanation of the attitude of his Government towards the New Zealand butter situation. First he assured his hearers that the wholesale dumping of this product into Canada at the expense of our own dairy industry must be accepted as an evidence of Canada's prosperity. Then he declared that the Government proposed to terminate the New Zealand trade arrangement, not because it was injurious to Canada but "because our treaty with New Zealand was being misrepresented through the emphasis placed on this New Zealand butter." And finally he promised that when negotiating a fresh agreement "we will take good care to see that it is so drawn that this kind of thing won't happen again if we can possibly prevent it!" The last statement, if made by a prisoner in a court of law, could only be construed as a confession of guilt coupled with a plea for mercy on the ground of ignorance or incompetence.

What The Premier Omitted

On the subject of federal aid to agriculture, which is a strong plank in Mr. Bennett's platform, the Prime Minister had nothing whatever to say to his audience in Charlottetown Satnrday night. Doubtless he knew too well how any criticism of this measure would be received in a Province such as Prince Edward Island, so largely agricultural and so badly in need of federal assistance. Doubtless, too, he had some qualms of conscience; for it was he, Premier King, who had caused to be discontinued the federal grants for agricultural and technical training which the Conservatives carried on, and which, if returned to power, they will again put into effect.

On the matter of Maritime subsidies Premier King seemed to be completely at sea. At times he spoke as if he were under the delusion that the final adjustment of subsidies recommended by the Duncan Commission in 1926 as a measure requiring "immediate consideration" had been carried out; as, for example, when he declared that his promise at the last federal election to implement the Commission's findings had been fulfilled almost to the very letter and certainly in the spirit in which it was made." Again, as in his statement that it was he who persuaded ex-Premier Saunders not to press the subsidy claims of this Province until the Western Provinces had been dealt with, Mr. King seemed completely to have forgotten that in 1929, in the House of Commons, he had declared, as a reason why the Maritime claims were not being settled at the same time as the claims of the Western Provinces, that "for some reason or other" these provinces had not come forward with their claims.

Having confessed that he was responsible for the delay in settling the subsidy claims of this Province when Mr. Saunders was pressing these claims, Premier King added: "However, the Audit Board was put to work at once on the financing and that work of necessity has been going on ever since." Surely this statement will have to be construed in a super-Pickwickian sense. The Audit Board was never mentioned until a few months ago. It held one sitting at Ottawa and there was some talk of it coming to the Maritime Provinces. Its duties with respect to our claims were admittedly of a preliminary nature and its work was so tardily performed that it was unable to present even a preliminary report at the last session of Parliament.

MR. KING'S VICIOUS PRINCIPLE

Speaking in Charlottetown on Saturday night, Premier Mackenzie King stated that he was "not averse" to consider the taking over of old age pensions as a Federal obligation. How does this statement tally with his statement in Parliament in 1929 that contributions by the Dominion Government to the Provinces for old age pensions was a "thoroughly vicious principle"? On that occasion he was asked to state his attitude. Would he say, as he said of federal grants for highway construction and agricultural training, that federal aid to the Provinces for old age pensions was a vicious principle? The Premier's reply, as reported in Hansard of that year, is given verbatim:

"MR. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is, yes. I HAVE COME TO THE CONCLUSION THAT IT IS A THOROUGHLY VICIOUS PRINCIPLE."

PREMIER KING USES DESTROYER ON TRIP

H.M.C.S. Champlain Ferries Parley From P. E. Island to Sydney

BIG RECEPTION GIVEN

Prime Minister Reviews Ottawa's Action on Maritime Claims

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I., June 23 — (C.P.) — Flags flew from the mast and rigging of H.M.C.S. Champlain last night to welcome on board Premier MacKenzie King and members of his party. This morning the long, clean-cut white destroyer steamed slowly out of Charlottetown Harbor bound for Sydney, where Mr. King will speak tonight. It was considered likely that the run would take seven or eight hours and that Mr. King would arrive some hours before the time set for his first meeting in the province of Nova Scotia. As the meeting will take place in the centre of the Nova Scotia steel and coal district, it is expected that the Prime Minister will devote a part of his speech to discussing matters bearing on this industry.

Yesterday was a quiet day for the Prime Minister. His private car lay at the station in Charlottetown throughout the entire day, while Mr. King attended church and rested. The previous evening he had spoken at a large meeting here, while earlier in the day he had addressed another gathering at Summerside. These two meetings comprise the tour of the Prime Minister in Prince Edward Island. This morning he said farewell to the little island province.

MARITIME ISSUES TALKED

As was to be expected, Mr. King devoted much of his speaking time in Prince Edward Island to a discussion of subjects which are primarily of interest in the Maritimes. He declared that the Government had implemented all major recommendations in the Duncan report. He pointed out that the question of further subsidy payments was now before the board of audit, and that a report on the situation would be presented the Government at a later date. He referred to the appointment of a Minister of Fisheries and explained why he had chosen his new minister from the province of Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Island, he said, was the only province of the Dominion which was without ministerial representation at the time Dr. Cyrus MacMillan was selected as Minister of Fisheries. Dr. MacMillan occupied a seat on the platform at both of Mr. King's meetings, and was one of the speakers. Among other subjects touched upon by Mr. King here were the New Zealand Treaty, the proposal to construct a national highway across Canada, and the budget.

COUNTERVAILING DUTIES.

With respect to countervailing duties, the Prime Minister remarked that apparently these were attracting some attention in the United States. He said that he gathered from newspapers that President Hoover was considering bringing down duties on the commodities affected by the countervailing provisions in the Dominion tariff. With respect to the suggestion of Hon. R. B. Bennett that the Dominion should assume the entire cost of old-age pensions, Mr. King said that it would be advisable to have an accounting between the Dominion and the provinces to determine just what amount should be contributed by the former in the way of subsidies. If such an accounting indicated that the Federal Government should assume the whole obligation of old-age pensions, then the British North America act might be changed to provide for this departure.

The Prime Minister addressed two meetings in this province, the first at Summerside on Saturday afternoon, and the second in the capital city of Charlottetown, Saturday night. At each place he spoke to large audiences which accorded him careful attention. Both meetings were held in theatres, but the use of broadcasting apparatus made it possible for thousands who were not actually present to hear the words of the Prime Minister.

GRATIFUL TO SUMMERSIDE.

Summerside, where Mr. King spoke first, is situated in the county of Prince. It was this constituency which first elected the Prime Minister to Parliament after he was chosen to lead the Liberal forces in Canada. This fact was commented on by Mr. King. His visit, he said was in the nature of a homecoming and he thanked his audience for inviting him to represent them when he was a young and untried political leader.

On the platform with the Prime Minister at both meeting, was seated one of the newest members of Mr. King's Cabinet, Dr. Cyrus MacMillan, recently appointed Minister of Fisheries, who also spoke briefly. Mr. King took the opportunity to welcome Dr. MacMillan, and to declare that he considered his joining the Government a real acquisition. On the platform at Summerside was Premier W. M. Lea, who recently succeeded to this post in Prince Edward Island. Hon. J. E. Sinclair, now a member of the Senate, but formerly one of the representatives of Queen's, and A. E. McLean, ex-member for Price constituency; were also present. Torrid weather did not deter a large crowd from assembling and listening carefully to all that the Prime Minister had to say. At Charlottetown, D. J. Riley, president of the Queen's County Liberal Association, presided and R. H. Jenkins, ex-member for Queen's and again a candidate, was one of the speakers.

STATES PROMISE IS CARRIED OUT TO THE LETTER

Premier King Discusses Maritime Rights With P.E.I. People.

SPEAKS IN RIDING FIRST ELECTING HIM

Federal Old Age Pensions Plan Would Increase Taxes.

By RAY BROWN.
Canadian Press Staff Correspondent.

CHARLOTTETOWN, P. E. I., June 22.—To a general discussion of the major campaign issues Premier Mackenzie King yesterday added certain features of particular interest to the Maritime provinces. The Prime Minister addressed two meetings in this little island province, the first at Summerside in the afternoon and the second in the capital city of Charlottetown last night.

Summerside, where Mr. King spoke first was the constituency which first elected the Prime Minister to Parliament after he was chosen to lead the Liberal forces in Canada. This fact was commented on by Mr. King. His visit, he said, was in the nature of a homecoming and he thanked his audience for inviting him to represent them when he was a young untried political leader.

New Minister Present.

On the platform with the Prime Minister at both meetings was seated one of the newest members of Mr. King's Cabinet, Dr. Cyrus MacMillan, recently appointed Minister of Fisheries, who also spoke briefly. Mr. King took the opportunity to welcome Dr. MacMillan and to declare that he considered his joining the Government a real acquisition.

Mr. King went carefully into the questions involved in the term "Maritime rights". He told how there had been an agitation for these rights for many years and how the present Government finally came to the conclusion that a royal commission should be appointed to investigate them. When the commission had been appointed, he said, the Conservative members in the House of Commons had ridiculed the proposal.

However, he had gone ahead, the commission was appointed and one of its members was Dr. MacMillan, who now sat at the Cabinet table.

Shortly after the commission went to work, the Government appealed to the country, Mr. King continued.

This commission was appointed with the knowledge that the men who were on it would undertake to carry out its recommendations.

"The Conservatives never made any such promise", he went on, "but that promise we made has been carried out almost to the very letter and certainly in the spirit in which it was made." The Prime Minister proceeded to review what had been done by the Government.

In implementing the Duncan report, increased subsidies had been and were being paid to the Maritime provinces. In the case of Prince Edward Island, the increase had amounted to $125,000 a year, he said, and in the case of the other provinces the amounts were larger.

Old age pensions occupied the attention of the Prime Minister for a few minutes. "Mr. Bennett will be here soon and he will tell you that he will put in an old age pension law, the whole cost of which will be borne by the Federal Government," he said. "Now don't you be too sure that Mr. Bennett will have a chance to take any such action. It's very easy to make promises when you don't think you will have to implement them."

Higher Taxation.

He warned his listeners that the proposal of Mr. Bennett would mean increased taxation, and he also stated that the first time the old age pensions legislation was introduced in the House of Commons the Conservatives had opposed it.

"I am not opposed to the Federal Government taking over the old age pensions as a Federal obligation," said Mr. King, but before any such action was taken he thought that there should be an accounting as between the Dominion Government and the provinces. He felt that perhaps the time had come for a further revision of the provincial subsidies. At the Dominion-Provincial conference in Ottawa some years ago, went on Mr. King, the provinces had taken the ground that they did not want money with strings attached to it. Their view was that the Dominion should pay them fair subsidies and that they should be permitted to dispose of the money as they saw fit. In view of this fact, the best thing to do would be to have a new accounting, and then, if it appeared that the Federal Government should assume the cost of old age pensions, the British North America Act could be changed.

Another subject which was being emphasized by Mr. Bennett was the need for a national highway, Mr. King said. As a matter of fact, he felt that Mr. Bennett was trying to introduce new issues to keep the minds of the people off the great main issues of the campaign, Mr. King continued.

Shortly after the election there was to be a great conference of unemployment in Ottawa. At that conference the question of a national highway might be taken up. Representatives of the Dominion, the provinces, the municipalities, the railways and other interests would be represented at that conference. If that conference was favorable to the completion of a national highway, he would be too, Mr. King said. Really what was needed, perhaps more than a national highway, were better side roads leading into the highways.

RIGHTS OF MARITIMES GRANTED BY LIBERALS PREMIER DECLARES

Tells Prince Edward Island Audience of Progress Recorded

NEW CAR FERRY TO COME

Intimates Accounting With Provinces if Ottawa Pays Old-Age Pensions

(By RAY BROWN.)
(Staff Correspondent Canadian Press.)

Charlottetown, P.E.I., June 22.—To a general discussion of the major campaign issues Premier Mackenzie King yesterday added certain features of particular interest to the Maritime Provinces. The Prime Minister addressed two meetings in this little island Province, the first at Summerside in the afternoon, and the second in the capital city of Charlottetown last night. At each place he spoke to large audiences which accorded him careful attention. Both meetings were held in theatres, but the use of broadcasting apparatus made it possible for thousands who were not actually present to hear the words of the Prime Minister.

Summerside, where Mr. King spoke first, is situated in the County of Prince. His visit, he said, was in the nature of a homecoming, and he thanked his audience for inviting him to represent them when he was a young untried political Leader.

Praises New Minister.

On the platform with the Prime Minister at both meetings was seated one of the newest members of Mr. King's Cabinet, Dr. Cyrus Macmillan, recently appointed Minister of Fisheries, who also spoke briefly. Mr. King took the opportunity to welcome Dr. Macmillan and to declare that he considered his joining the Government a real acquisition. On the platform at Summerside was Premier William Lea, who recently succeeded to this post in Prince Edward Island. Hon. John E. Sinclair, now a member of the Senate, but formerly one of the representatives of Queen's, and A. E. McLean, ex-member for Prince constituency were also present.

Torrid weather did not deter a large crowd from assembling and listening carefully to all that the Prime Minister had to say. At Charlottetown, D. J. Giley, President of the Queen's County Liberal Association, presided, and R. H. Jenkins, ex-member for Queen's, and again a candidate, was one of the speakers.

Mr. King went carefully into the questions involved in the term "maritime rights." He told how there had been an agitation for these rights for many years, and how the present Government finally came to the conclusion that a Royal Commission should be appointed to investigate them. When the Commission had been appointed he said the Conservative members in the House of Commons had ridiculed the proposal.

"They said, 'we asked you for a loaf and you gave us a stone,'" Mr. King told his listeners. However, he had gone ahead, the Commission was appointed, and one of its members was Dr. Cyrus Macmillan, who now sat at the Cabinet table.

Work of Commission.

Shortly after the Commission went to work the Government appealed to the country, Mr. King continued. During the campaign he had spoken of the work of the Commission from the platform.

"I said," declared the Prime Minister earnestly, "that having appointed this Commission and knowing the men who were on it, we would undertake to carry out its recommendations. The Conservatives never made any such promise," he went on, "but that promise we made has been carried out almost to the very letter and certainly in the spirit in which it was made." The Prime Minister proceeded to review what had been done by the Government in implementing the Duncan report.

Increased subsidies had been and were being paid to the Maritime Provinces. In the case of Prince Edward Island the increase had amounted to $125,000 a year, he said, and in the case of other Provinces the amounts were larger. The Government had not delayed in making these payments and in the past three years there had been given to the Maritime Provinces in the form of increased subsidies the total sum of $4,800,000. Again, the Government, he said, had decreased Maritime railway freight rates something like 20 per cent. This meant that already several millions of dollars had been saved to the Maritime Provinces by way of freight rates. A new car ferry to ply between the island and the mainland was being constructed. "We have given the contract for that ferry and it is going to cost over two million dollars," declared Mr. King. He gave his listeners details of the new ferry. It was to be oil-burning, with accommodation for sixteen freight cars and deck accommodation for 40 average-size automobiles, as well as passengers. It would be delivered on June 1 of next year.

New Terminals.

In addition to the car ferry itself, new terminals would be necessary because of the increased size of the boat. These would bring the total cost of the project up to $2,853,246, "or nearly $3,000,000 for this connecting link between the island and the mainland. And, added Mr. King, the Government had decided that, although the cost would be about $1,000,000 greater, the car ferry would be constructed in Canada instead of in Great Britain, thus giving employment to Canadian workmen.

Further, in pursuance of the Duncan report recommendations, tariffs affecting the iron and steel industry had been changed, bounties were being paid on coal used in the manufacture of steel in Canada, the movement of Nova Scotia coal to the markets of Ontario and Quebec was being encouraged, Harbor Commissions had been established at Halifax and Saint John, and on the ocean had been placed one of the finest lines of steamships which it would be possible to obtain to run between the Maritime Provinces and the West Indies, Mr. King declared.

Department of Fisheries.

The Duncan Commission, he said, had recommended a separate Department of Fisheries with a Deputy Minister of its own. It had remained for the Royal Commission on Fisheries to recommend the appointment of a Minister of Fisheries. When this appointment was under consideration, said Mr. King, he began to receive representations from British Columbia and from Nova Scotia asking that the new member of the Cabinet be selected from one of those Provinces.

The Province of British Columbia, said Mr. King, pointed out that its fisheries were more valuable than those of the Maritime Provinces, "and I began to feel in a pretty delicate position." "I had to consider the matter from the point of view of the whole country," he went on. It had always been his desire to have a Cabinet Minister from every Province of the Dominion, and British Columbia already had a Minister, while Prince Edward Island had not. "I am going to give Prince Edward Island a Minister," Mr. King asserted, and his statement was received with applause.

Old--age pensions occupied the attention of the Prime Minister for a few minutes. "Mr. Bennett will be here soon, and he will tell you that he will put in an old-age pension law, the whole cost of which will be borne by the Federal Government," he said. "Now don't you be too sure that Mr. Bennett will have a chance to take any such action," he interjected, while the audience laughed. "It's very easy to make promises when you don't think you will have to implement them.

"I am not opposed to the Federal Government taking over the old age pensions as a Federal obligation," said Mr. King, but before any such action was taken he thought that there should be an accounting as between the Dominion Government and the Provinces. He felt that perhaps the time had come for a further revision of the Provincial subsidies. Another subject which was being emphasized by Mr. Bennett was the need for a national highway ,Mr. King said. As a matter of fact, he felt that Mr. Bennett was trying to introduce new issues to keep the minds of the people off the great main issues of the campaign, Mr. King continued. At any rate, the question of a national highway had been brought up. Shortly after the election there was to be a great conference of unemployment in Ottawa. At that conference the question of a national highway might be taken up. Representatives of the Dominion, the Provinces, the municipalities, the railways and other interests would be represented at that conference. If that conference was favorable to the completion of a national highway, he would be too, Mr. King said. Really what was needed, perhaps, more than a national highway, were better side roads leading into the highways. These would be of great value to those living in outlying districts.

Mr. King outlined what had been done by the Government to assist the war veterans. It was an extensive program. "But," he said, "if what we have done doesn't meet the situation we will have to call another committee of Parliament to meet next year, and find out what is the matter."

"You can't sell to any country unless you promise to buy from that country," declared Mr. King in turning to a brief reference to trade. Canada had made treaties with a number of countries, he went on. One of those treaties of which "our Conservative friends complain very much" was the New Zealand treaty. Their complaint, he said, was based on the fact that "for the moment a good deal of butter is coming in from New Zealand."

One reason for the increased butter importations from New Zealand, Mr. King asserted, was the prosperity of Canada under the Liberal Government. People were more prosperous and they were eating more butter. When Canade made her treaty with New Zealand she was a butter-exporting country, but butter consumption in Canada increased, and the price began to climb. Finally, he said, it got to a point where it attracted the New Zealand butter dealers, and they began to ship to Canada.

Also, said Mr. King, with increased prosperity in Canada there came increased consumption of such milk products as ice cream. There was a demand for milk from the United States, and milk was turned into cheese. All these were factors in increasing the price of butter.

To Make New Treaty.

The Government had decided to make a new treaty with New Zealand, the Prime Minister said, and the necessary six months' notice terminating the old treaty had been given. "We did not know at the time that we took this action that there was going to be a general election," he asserted, but the Government proposed to see that the new treaty was satisfactory. Today, he said, Canada stood sixth among the exporting countries of the world. As far as the export of manufactured commodities alone was concerned, the Dominion, figuring on a per capita basis, stood second only to Great Britain in the whole world.

The Budget provided for a great widening of the British preference, the Premier told his listeners. "We want to trade in our own family," he continued. "The most precious market in the whole world for our wheat is the British market." But Mr. Bennett was declaring that Canada should demand a preference from Great Britain before she gave Great Britain a preference. "Great Britain can't give us a preference in the sense that we give her one," asserted Mr. King. "She is a free trade country. She has no tariff wall." Mr. Bennett was saying that Great Britain should put up a tariff wall. But Canada, said Mr. King, could not tell Great Britain what she was to do in the matter of fiscal policy. Should Canada say to Great Britain: "We will not trade with you unless you put up a tariff wall"? "We are not going to Great Britain with a club in our hand," the Prime Minister declared. He added that the present Labor Government in Britain would be most unlikely to put up a tariff wall around that country. It contained such men as Right Hon. Philip Snowden, a confirmed free trader; Premier Ramsay MacDonald, and others, who did not look with favor on tariffs.

Premier Deals With Maritime Issues In Address At Charlottetown

SAYS BUDGET WILL AID EAST

Goes Carefully Into Questions Involved In The Term, "Maritime Rights"

CHARLOTTETOWN, June 22—(By Ray Brown, Canadian Press Staff Correspondent)—To a general discussion of the major campaign issue, Premier King, yesterday, added certain features of particular interest to the Maritime Provinces. PREMIER DISCUSSES FISHERIES MINISTER

Says He Gave Appointment to Prince Edward Island Because It Had No Minister

Addresses Large Meetings at Summerside and at Charlottetown

(Canadian Press Despatch.)

By RAY BROWN

Charlottetown, P.E.I., June 21.—To a general discussion of the major campaign issues, Premier Mackenzie King yesterday added certain features of particular interest to the Maritime provinces. The prime minister addressed two meetings in this little island province, the first at Summerside in the afternoon and the second in the capital city of Charlottetown last night. At each place he spoke to large audiences which accorded him careful attention.

Summerside, where Mr. King spoke first, is situated in the county of Prince. It was this constituency which first elected the prime minister to parliament after he was chosen to lead the Liberal forces in Canada. This fact was commented on by Mr. King. His visit, he said, was in the nature of a homecoming and he thanked his audience for inviting him to represent them when he was a young, untried, political leader.

On the platform with the prime minister at both meetings was seated one of the newest members of Mr. King's cabinet, Dr. Cyrus MacMillan, recently appointed minister of fisheries, who also spoke briefly. Mr. King took the opportunity to welcome Dr. MacMillan and to declare that he considered his joining the government a real acquisition.

After outlining what had been done to implement the Duncan report, Premier King turned to the new ministry of fisheries.

The Duncan commission, he said, had recommended a separate department of fisheries with a deputy minister of its own. It had remained for the royal commission on fisheries to recommend the appointment of a minister of fisheries. When this appointment was under consideration, said Mr. King, he began to receive representations from British Columbia and from Nova Scotia asking that the new member of the cabinet be selected from one of those provinces.

Minister in P.E.I.

The province of British Columbia, said Mr. King, pointed out that its fisheries were more valuable than those of the Maritime Provinces, "and I began to feel in a pretty delicate position. I had to consider the matter from the point of view of the whole country," he went on. It had always been his desire to have a cabinet minister from every province of the Dominion, and British Columbia already had a minister while Prince Edward Island had not. "I said, I am going to give Prince Edward Island a minister," Mr. King asserted, and his statement was received with applause. Both Nova Scotia and British Columbia had acted chivalrously in the matter, said Mr. King. There was another factor which had influenced him in the selection of Dr. MacMillan as a member of the government, the prime minister said. The final settlement of financial terms for the Maritime Provinces was yet to be made. The audit board was engaged in investigating this matter, and its reports would come before cabinet. He felt that he could not have a better man sitting with him at the council table, when this report came up for consideration, than Dr. MacMillan. Dr. MacMillan had been a member of the Duncan commission and he had investigated the matters first hand.

Old Age Pensions.

Old age pensions occupied the attention of the prime minister for a few minutes. "Mr. Bennett will be here soon, and he will tell you that he will put in an old age pension law, the whole cost of which will be borne by the federal government," he said.

He warned his listeners that the proposal of Mr. Bennett would mean increased taxation, and he also stated that the first time the old age pensions legislation was introduced in the house of commons the Conservatives had opposed it.

"I am not opposed to the federal government taking over the old age pensions as a federal obligation," said Mr. King, "but before any such action was taken he thought that there should be an accounting as between the Dominion government and the provinces. He felt that perhaps the time had come for a further revision of the provincial subsidies. At the Dominion-provincial conference in Ottawa some years ago," went on Mr. King, "the provinces had taken the ground that they did not want money with strings attached to it. Their view was that the Dominion should pay them fair subsidies, and that they should be permitted to dispose of the money as they saw fit. In view of this fact, the best thing to do would be to have a new accounting, and then, if it appeared that the federal government should assume the cost of old age pensions, the British North America act could be changed."

Another subject which was being emphasized by Mr. Bennett was the need for a national highway, Mr. King said. As a matter of fact, he felt that Mr. Bennett was trying to introduce new issues to keep the minds of the people off the great main issues of the campaign., Mr. King continued. At any rate the question of a national highway had been brought up. Shortly after the election there was to be a great conference on unemployment in Ottawa. At that conference the question of a national highway might be taken up. Representatives of the Dominion, the provinces, the municipalities, the railways and other interests would be represented at that conference. If that conference was favorable to the completion of a national highway, he would be, too, Mr. King said. Really what was needed, perhaps more than a national highway, were better side roads leading into the highways. These would be of great value to those living in outlying districts.

One of the complaints of Hon. R. B. Bennett against the government was that it was "selling Canada's birthright," continued Mr. King, but every country had to sell some of its natural resources. England would be only too glad at the very moment if it could get a market for its coal. The Englishman did not complain about selling his birthright. He wished he could sell more coal.

The budget provided for a great widening of the British preference, the premier told his listeners. "We want to trade in our own family," he continued. "The most precious market in the whole world for our wheat is the British market."

Reference to the countervailing duties which apply to the United States was made by Mr. King. From what he read in the press, he said, he imagined that the countervailing provisions of the budget were having their effect in the republic, and that President Hoover was considering bringing down the duties on commodities affected. He asked his listeners if they wanted to send to the imperial conference those people who had fought the government on the budget.

Prime Minister Speaks In Province

Addressed Large Audiences At Summerside And Charlottetown On Saturday.

Prime Minister's Office
Dec 31 1930
OTTAWA

(Canadian Press)

CHARLOTTETOWN, P. E. I., June 22—To a general discussion of the major campaign issues, Premier Mackenzie King yesterday added certain features of particular interest to the Maritime Provinces. The Prime Minister addressed two meetings in this little Island province, the first at Summerside in the afternoon and the second in the capital city of Charlottetown Saturday night. At each place he spoke to large audiences. Both meetings were held in theatres, but the use of broadcasting apparatus made it possible for thousands who were not actually present to hear the words of the Prime Minister.

Summerside, where Mr. King spoke first, is situated in the county of Prince, and it was this constituency which first elected the Prime Minister to parliament after he was chosen to lead the Liberal forces in Canada. This fact was commented on by Mr. King. His visit, he said, was in the nature of a homecoming, and he thanked his audience for inviting him to come and represent them when he was a young and unried political leader.

On the platform with the Prime Minister, at both meetings, was seated one of the newest members of Mr. King's Cabinet—Dr. Cyrus Macmillan, recently appointed Minister of Fisheries—who also spoke briefly. Mr. King took the opportunity to welcome Dr. Macmillan, and to declare that he considered his joining the Government a real acquisition.

Conspicuous on the platfrom at Summerside was Premier W. M. Lea, who recently succeeded to this post in Prince Edward Island. Hon. J. E. Sinclair, now a member of the Senate but formerly one of the representatives of Queens, and Mr. A. E. McLean, ex-member for Prince constituency were also present. Torrid weather did not deter a large crowd from assembling and listing to all that the Prime Minister had to say.

CHARLOTTETOWN ADDRESS

Mr. D. J. Riley, president of the Queen's County Liberal Association, presided Saturday night at the mass meeting at the Strand Theatre. The preliminary speeches of Mr. R. H. Jenkins and Dr. Cyrus Macmillan of McGill, the Liberal candidates for the county, were very short.

The Prime Minister expressed pleasure at being again in Prince Edward Island, which was full of the happiest memories for him from the association he had with it for a time as federal representative of Prince County. He would always look back with deep gratitude to the people here who offered him the candidacy by which he came back into Parliament as leader of the Liberal party in Canada. That was eleven years ago. "They say that absence makes the heart grow fonder," he remarked. "I certainly have felt today as though I were coming home again to the Island which, as I say, was the one that received me so cordially and gave me such a good welcome and such a splendid start at the beginning of very responsible duties."

The Premier expressed gratitude for the support he had received from the Liberal members in Queens County. He congratulated Hon. Mr. Sinclair on receiving a Senatorship and the Province on having such a representative in the Senate.

Mr. King particularly thanked Mr. Jenkins "for his great loyalty and great chivalry in matters that have sometimes been rather difficult to solve." He cited the appointment of a Minister of Fisheries, Dr. Cyrus Macmillan was highly qualified for the position but he, Premier King, considered that Mr. Jenkins was himself as well qualified. If one had only to consider the constituencies and not some of the intricate problems the Governmet has to face, he addned, the choosing of Cabinet ministers would be an easier matter. In arranging the present tour Mr. King said he had insisted on having one day to himself on Prince Edward Islad, preferably Sunday, so that he could go to church in the morning and go for a "swim"in the afternoon, or at least have some time to himself.

The Premier welcomed the opportunity which a general election campaign presented of seeing so much of Canada. "The great problem of government," he added, "is how the Dominion can be kept united, can be made prosperous and held within this great orbit of nations which go to make up the British Commonwealth.

Three Main Issues

The three main issues of the present election, the Prime Minister insisted, were:

(3). The Imperial and economic conferences at London this fall and the representatives Canada will send to those conferences.

So far as the Government's record was concerned, Premier King asked his hearers to consider the depressed conditions of business when he assumed office. The whole business of the war had been carried on with borrowed money. Moreover, during the six year period of war and demobilization the then Government did not raise enough money to make revenue and expenditure meet. They added $117,000,000 to the debt with the result that when the Liberals came into power the Canadian dollar was no longer at par, but was worth only about 85 cents. What made the credit of the country so bad was that year after year, instead of balancing the accounts, they had all been allowed to go on the wrong side. "We got to the point where there was nothing but more and more debt, notwithstanding this great burden of the war which hung like a vast mortgage on the country."

The Liberal Government started in to see if they could not balance the accounts. To do that they had to levy a little more taxation. Inside of two years they were able to balance receipts and expenditures and to show a surplus of something like $34,000,000; and from that time to this we have had surpluses instead of deficits in the public accounts of the country every year. The total amount of surpluses in the past seven and a half years is larger than the total surpluses of any other equal period in our parliamentary history. Also, the Government wiped out $270,000,000 debt in the last eight anda half years, and in late years have reduced the taxes. Taxation reduction was started immediately they got the accounts to balance. There have been reductions in Income Tax and sales tax, wiping out of "nuisance" taxes with the exception of the tax on cheques of over $10.00 in amount, reduction of postage from three to two cents, etc.

Income Tax

The relief caused by reduction of income tax would average about $25,000,000 a year for the last five years. In other words, the Government had made a saving of $120,000,000 of taxation in that period.

This year the people are paying $118,000,000 less taxes than they were paying in 1924, the Premier declared. This reduction will be continued to next year and the year after, and to all the years to come, with such additional amounts as may be added in the way of further reduction of taxation.

The Government's success in financing the country, he said, were due to honesy and economy as the foundation priciples on which they had based the whole of their financial work.

There was also a reduction of taxation through the tariff, the Premier continued. The first year they came into office the Liberals increased the British preference. The most important budget changes up to the present year, were effected in 1924 and 1926, the intention being to advance the interests of the four great basic industries of the country namely, agriculture, lumbering, fishing and mining, by enabling them to produce cheaply and thus develop wider markets. The Government realized the necessity of reducing the cost of the implements of production in these industries, which they did, the Premier declared, in the budget of 1924. After doing that they helped to make possible over a period of years the release of an immense amount of money to the people engaged in these industries, and helped also the manufacturers to get their raw materials at a less cost. In 1926 the Government motor vehicle tariff which meant reduced cost to the purchaser.

Trade Treaties

Reference was made by the Prime Minister to the numerous trade treaties entered into by the Government. There has been a good deal of talk in particular about the New Zealand trade arrangements. The Conservatives contend that it is not working out very well, at least for the dairy industry, because of the fact that New Zealand butter has been coming into Canada in large quantities.

"Here may I say: Don't allow our opponents by bringing up one little question here and another little question somewhere else, to get you to focus your mind only on that thing which may please for a day and may never be heard of again and cause you to forget the main issues. Our friends in the Opposition are fond of speaking about the New Zealand treaty because at the moment large quantities of butter are coming into Canada through that treaty. I am going to ask you if that treaty itself is anything other than an evidence of the increased prosperity of this country? When we got that treaty some years ago we were buying very much less from Australia and New Zealand than those countries were buying from us.

"As men get more prosperous they use more butter and more commodities of that kind. The result in Canada has been that butter became more and more in demand. Prices of butter began to go up. They didn't begin to go up until the demand was so much greater, and the demand didn't become greater until prosperity made the demand greater."

The prohibition of oleomargarine in Canada, the increased demand for ice-cream and milk and cream products other than butter, had also contributed towards making butter prices high in Canada and thus encouraging New Zealand competition.

New Zealand Butter

"About a year ago, however, there began to be a depression all over the world and that depression began to be felt to some extent in our own country. When we saw that depression coming on and we saw that butter began to come from New Zealand we said: "Here is a practical, concrete situation with which the dairy industry is faced. Our first duty as a Government is to look after our own people and we think it would be unwise to allow this competition to go on to an extent which might possibly begin to affect adversely the dairy interests.' We knew that a great conference was going to be held in England to deal with the whole question of trade within the Empire, so we concluded that the best thing to do was to cancel that treaty,—not because we didn't want to trade with New Zealand but because our treaty with New Zealand was being misrepresented through the emphasis placed on this New Zealand butter,—and to take up the whole question with New Zealand at the Imperial Conference. We gave six months notice which means that that treaty becomes cancelled at the expiration of that time. That is why notices have been given to stop the agreement under that treaty. We didn't know at the time we took that action that we were going to have an election. We did know that there ence; but we didn't know that there was going to be a debate on the budget which would make it necessary to go to the people.

Promises Something Better

"When we come to negotiate a fresh agreement," the Premier said, "we will take good care to see that it is so drawn that this kind of thing won't happen again if we can possibly prevent it."

However, he cautioned his hearers not to forget that there were producers as well as consumers in the country. The point he wished particularly to stress was that the New Zealand butter situation was brought about as a result of our great prosperity. We stand sixth of all the countries in the world in the matter of trade, and so far as the exports of manufactured goods are concerned, we stand second. The only country in the world that exports more per capita in the way of manufactured goods is not United States, but the mother country of Great Britain.

Mr. Bennett was very fond of talking about Canada parting with her raw materials. It is true we are selling some of our raw materials because we have lots of them; we have got illimitable resources. Also, the total value of the raw materials we buy from the United States is greater than the total value of the raw materials we sell to that country.

The Prime Minister, as in his speeches at other centres, discussed what the Government had done for Labor during its term of office. Under his regime, he contended there has been less in the way of industrial dustrial peace than in any other country in the world. Among strife, and more in the way of industrial peace than in any other country in the world. Among other things he cited the introduction of the Old Age Pensions Act.

Old Age Pensions

"Mr. Bennett will be here shortly and he will tell you that his policy is to have an Old Age Pensions Act the cost of which will be borne exclusively by the Federal Government. Don't be too sure that Mr. Bennett is going to get back into office and have any chance of putting that law into force!" (Applause from gentlemen on the platform.) "It is easy to make very big promises if you are not at all sure that you are going to be called upon to fulfill them. Don't forget that an Old Age Pensions law which does not divide up the obligations of the country means more and more in the way of taxation. Don't think that because Mr. Bennett proposes to take all that over it is not going to affect the people of this Province financially. The great secret of our prosperity up to the present time has been our policy to keep down taxation and distribute the general burden more equitably over the country. But Mr. Bennett and his friends had their chance to show their interest in the pensions scheme when it was introduced. When we brought our Old Age Pensions law into Parliament it was opposed by the Conservatives, and after it passed the House of Commons, the Conservative Senate threw the bill out. It was only by our appeal to the people in the last general election and our promise, that if returned we would put it through that the Act was finally put into effect.

"It ill behooves Mr. Bennett to say that he is going to do this in a broad and generous way. Let us see that each part of the Dominion does its full share in the first instance.

"Most of the Provinces have already adopted Old Age Pensions. Under the law this is a Provincial matter. What we have done in this, we have agreed that wherever the Provinces introduce an Old Age Pensions law we will supplement this by an equal amount from the Federal treasury. We have come, that far to help the Provinces in this matter. Some of the Provinces have distributed their share of the burden on with the municipalities; that, of course is a matter for themselves; but we do say we will help to the extent of 50 per cent.

Not Averse

"May I say this." I am not averse to the idea of taking over the Old Age Pensions law as federal obligation, but I think before we take over any more obligations at the present time, we had better have a pretty careful accounting of what the total amounts are of those things that we are contributing to, and what the total expenditures are, both provincially and federally. This is all bound up with the constitution of our country. When the Provinces came into Confederation they gave up certain rights of taxation. For that they were given in consideration; they were given an agreement to get so much in the way of subsidy. That means that they would be handed out of the federal treasury certain grants of money which the Federal Government would have to raise in the form of taxes. Under that arrangement Prince Edward Island got so much. The intention of Confederation was that each of us—the Provinces and the Dominion—would work in our own field. Now, I think the time has come when those arrangements especially with regard to subsidy should be revised even more than they have been. When we had a Dominion-Provincial Conference at Ottawa, I found that the Premiers of the different Provinces and their ministers all took the view that whatever is being given to them from the federal treasury should be given in a lump sum and that the Provinces be allowed to spend that money as they think best. They stated in so many words: We don't like this contribution for highways, etc. 'Give us the money and let us do what we think best.' I think that is a fair way to go on. Let us make the subsidies fair and let each Province expend the money as it thinks advisable.

"Quite Prepared"

"I am quite prepared at the appropriate time, to go very carefully into this whole question of the matter of subsidy and what should be given, and if in this connection it may seem advisable for the Dominion Government to take over the Old Age Pensions we can get our British North America Act amended to take over that particular charge, and we can write off against that expenditure what we propose to give in the way of subsidy. But a matter of this kind that relates to the Dominion as a whole, in relation to the several Provinces should not be made a matter of party politics, but should be made a matter of straight business and good government."

The Premier also discussed Mr. Bennett's policy with regard to federal responsibility for highway expenditure. He criticised the Conservative leader for bringing up these issues to becloud the three main issues of the campaign. By referring to New Zealand butter, Old Age Pensions and National Highways, Mr. Bennett, he charged, was trying to get away from the important issues. National highways, he said, was something that already existed in Canada in very large part. National highways does not mean a contribution to highways to be used wherever the Provinces like to use it. It simply means a national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. All the Provinces have made with Federal aid, certain highway stretches that linked together will make a highway right across the country.

"We are facing now a question of possible unemployment in different parts of Canada. I say that the best thing you can do, if you are going to consider a question of that kind, is to take up this question of national highways at the conference, which is to deal with the question of unemployment, which is to take place at Ottawa this summer immediately after the general election. We have called a conference of this kind and we are going to see if we cannot work out some sort of a co-operative policy as between the municipalities, the provinces and the Dominion, whereby labor can be kept employed throughout the different seasons of the year, and in connection with a great conference of that kind, we would be wise to reserve what we desire with regard to national highways for consideration at that time. If at that conference the different provinces of the Dominion come to an agreement that it is a desirable thing in connection wtih some schemes that they may be working out for the Federal Government to co-operate with them in [illegible]kings of that kind, then personally, I will be highly favorable to seeing something of that kind done. But I don't believe in holding out to the electors in general as one of the great projects of a particular election something simply to take their minds off the great issues.

"I think, probably on this Island the people will do well to consider, if there is going to be a contribution from the Federal Treasury for any national highway scheme, whether it would not be better to have that contribution made applicable to highways, generally, so that you could apply it to any of your highway needs rather than have one main street through the Province, which would be a federal highway. What is needed is more smaller highways rather than one straight highway, and it is for the Provinical Government deal with the problem as it thinks best. The more you study the whole question of what is best for our country, the more you come to consider those gentlemen, who met in the Legislature BuildinfgacvOttURH the Legislature Building of Charlottetown, and there drew up the different articles that have gone to make up Confederation, the more you feel that they had the right idea.

The right idea was that something should be left to the Dominion Government and that other things should be left to the Provinces, and there should not be any confusion as between the two. One of the great dangers. I see in Canada today—and it comes up only for political purposes—is this business of trying to them a certain thingOIceasyyouefel influence the electors by telling them a certain thing will help one Province, all the time forgetting that all the contributions that we made from the Federal Treasury comes out of the taxes of the people as a whole. I say there is great danger if selecting government in this respect. We don't want to be competing. We don't want to be competing, Dominion Government against Proivncial Government. We want to be working in harmony and unity, and the only way to do that is to settle at a conference what is the object of each of us. Then let us go on and work in harmony with that end in view.

War Vets Legislation

The Premier than discussed war-veterans' leg' tion explaining the measures introduced. At plaining the measures introduced. the last session of Parliament. If there is now any doubt as to a returned soldier's disability being attributable to war services the soldiers get the benefit of the doubt. This measure was supported by all members of rliament irrespective of a party and affiliation.

given to the class of ex-soldiers to "burnt outs" who were unfit to eli-

Special considated was being given to the class of ex-soldiers known as iblega "burnt-outs" who were unfit to earn a livelihood. These men would be eligible for Old Age Pension irrespective of their actual age. The Government had tried to live up to its promise to look after the men who went over seas.

The Prime Minister reviewed the events leading up to the appointment of the Duncan Commission. The Conservatives were now commending this Commission but when they were in office during the short lived Meighen Government there was not one of them who would pledge himself to carry out the recommendations, whatever they might be. It was he, Premier King, who made that promise and he submitted that that promise had been carried out "almost to the very letter and certainly in the spirit in which it was made."

The Duncan Commission had recommended that there should be reconsideration of the whole financial situation as between the Maritime Provinces and the Dominion. Immediate interim annual payments, as recommended, totalling $1,600,,000 for the three provinces, were granted, with the result that some $4,800,000 additional subsidy. The Government also implimented the Commission's recommendations with respect to transportation and freight rate reduuction, effecting a saving of several millions of dollars. Not only did the Government allow the railway rates to be cut 20 per cent but they went farther and made the reduction appliaible to some of the railways which were not mentioned by the Commission at all.

A contract has now been awarded for the new car ferry. To give employment to Canadian workmen, this contract was let to a Canadian firm, though it meant $1,000,000 more than it would cost to have the steamer built in the Old Country. Between the car ferry and the terminal facilities it will cost the Government between $3,000 000 and $4,000,000 to implement this transportation recommendation of the Duncan Commission.

Tariff

The tariff rate for the iron and steel industries have also been changed in accordance with the recommendaations of the Tariff Advisory Board. In addition bounties have been given on coke made from Canadian coal. The Government had also standardized the railway gauge in Prince Edward Island and put up railway warehouses; created harbor commissions in St. John and Halifax; entered into an agreement with the West Indies to promote trade and inaugurated a fine steam ship service for the purpose of furthering that trade.

As a result of the carrying out of these recommendations the Maritime Provinces had materially prospered.

Another recommendation of the Duncan Commission was that there should be a separate department of Fisheries and that it should have at its head a separate Deputy Minister. The Government made provision accordingly, aand also appointed anaother Commission to deal with the fisheries of the Maritime Provinces and the Magdalen Islands.

"That Commission made some very valuable suggestions with regard to the industry as a whole. Among other things it recommended that there should be a Minister of Fisheries, a separate portfolio. This year we put through an appropriation to appoint a Minister of Fisheries. It came then to the question of who that minister should be. I have in my hands another report that is important, dealing with the British Columbia fisheries. That report was submitted by a committee of Parliament, and the chairman of that committee was Mr. William Duff, from the Maritime Provinces. That committee made a very thorough study of the needs of the fishing industry on the Pacific Coast. In the face of all that it was not easy to select who was the best person to appoint as Minister of Fisheries. You who have large families know how difficult it is to choose one child for one particular purpose. You don't like to show favoritism in one direction or another. The only thing you can do is look around and see what are the definite qualifications of every one. My duty as Prime Minister is to consider not merely my personal friendships but the position of the country as a whole in relation to its great problems, and in this matter, when the pressure began to come on me from British Columbia, when they insisted that their fisheries were more important in value than the fisheries of the Maritime Provinces, I began to feel in a pretty difficult position."

Remember a "Promise"

Finally however, Premier King continued, he remembered a promise he had made that he would not be happy until he had in his Government a representative of every province in Canada. British Columbia had a Minister and Prince Edward Island had not. They had a minister for a short time but without portfolio, and circumstances made it impossible to give a portfolio in the interim. So he decided to give the Fisheries portfolio to this Province. Then, the Premier said, there was the question of "his good friends Messrs. R. H. Jenkins and A. E. McLean. The latter gentleman had been a long time in Parliament and was well able to fill the position. "'Yet I had to consider what I was to say to British Columbia, to Nova Scotia and to other parts of Canada as to the reason why I selected one person rather than another. Then I said: 'Who was on the Duncan Commission? who has been on the Fisheries Commission? who were selected by the Government of Prince Edward Island to deal with education problems? and I had a talk with Mr. Jenkins, Mr. McLean, Mr. Sinclair and other members and we discussed the whole situation together. After discussing it these men took the same chivalrous attitude and said: Mr. King, whatever you think is best we will support.'

Unsettled Question.

"I asked Dr. Cyrus MacMillan to accept this offer for the reasons I have mentioned. I thought that he was qualified as no other man in Canada for the particular portfolio of Minister of Fisheries. He had given that subject special study and consideration. Not only that,' 'but there is a larger question which is not settled yet; that is the final adjustment of the financial terms for the Maritime Provinces. Dr. MacMillan was on that Commission and was one of those who made that recommendation. At the present time the Audit Board is going through the financial terms, looking into all should be taken not only in regard to the affairs of this Island but of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as well. When that report is completed it will come before the Cabinet for consideration and the Cabinet will then have to decide whether it will act on the report of the Audit Board, or what decision it will make Now, ask, do you think it is possible for a Government that wants to do what is fair and square by you in the matter of seeing that those recommendations are implemented in full, to find a better way to do that than by having seated at the council table a man who was a member of the Commission that made this recommendation for subsidy readjustment, in the first instance? When it comes to the settlement of these terms, if Dr. MacMillan is returned not only will Prince Edward Island but Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have the benefit of an ideal Minister at the council table."

Subsidy Claims

The Prime Minister referred eulogistically to Dr. Cyrus MacMillan's career. He then continued:

"What we are doing for the Maritime Provinces is only part of what we are doing for the other provinces of Canada. The other provinces have had their grevances. Well, we have adjusted their grivances. We started with the Maritimes. I remember after we had given these interim grants that the former Prime Minister of this Province, Mr. Saunders, came to Ottawa on two or three occasions and wanted me and wanted Mr. Robb to settle the financial terms there and then. I said: 'Mr. Saunders, don't press us at this time; you won't do as well in the end, because you have to get all parts of Canada to back you up. You settle it now, before this Western Resources question is settled and you will not be in as strong a position. We have dealt with the Maritimes to begin with. Let us now get settled with the Western Provinces. When we get through with them and if as a result of those agreements something more should come to Prince Edward Island, you will be in a better position to see that something more is granted. You will then stand a better chance.' However, the Audit Board was put to work at once on the financing and that work of necessity has been going on ever since."

Concluding, the Prime Minister denied that the Dunning Budget was prepared for election purposes. He reviewed briefly the countervailing duties and the British preferential clauses, urging that his Government was prepared to go to the Imperial Conference in a spirit of friendship while the Conservative leader was threatening to "blast" a way for Canadian trade in the markets of the world.

CHARLOTTETOWN, P. E. I., June 23.—Belief, founded on what he had read in the press, that the countervailing duties of the budget were having their effect in the United States, and that President Hoover was considering bringing down the duties on commodities affected, was expressed here by Premier Mackenzie King, launching his campaign in this island province.

Speaks on Maritimes

To a general discussion of the major campaign issues, Premier King added certain features of particular interest to the Maritime Provinces. The prime minister addressed two meetings in this little island province. The first at Summerside in the afternoon and the second in the capital city of Charlottetown at night. At each place he spoke to large audiences which accorded him careful attention. Both meetings were held in theatres, but the use of broadcasting apparatus made it possible for thousands who were not actually present to hear the words of the prime minister.

Summerside, where Mr. King first spoke, is situated in the county of Prince. It was this constituency which first elected the prime minister to parliament after he was chosen to lead the Liberal forces in Canada. This fact was commented on by Mr. King. His visit, he said, was in the nature of a homecoming and he thanked his audience for inviting him to represent them when he was a young, untried political leader.

On the platform with the prime minister at both meetings was seated one of the newest members of Mr. King's cabinet, Dr. Cyrus MacMillian, recently appointed minister of fisheries, who also spoke briefly.

Traces Development

Mr. King went carefully into the questions involved in the term "Maritime rights." He told how there had been an agitation for these rights for many years and how the present government finally came to the conclusion that a royal commission should be appointed to investigate them. When the commission had been appointed, he said the Conservative members in the House of Commons had ridiculed the proposal.

Shortly after the commission went to work, the government appealed to the country, Mr. King said. During the campaign he had spoken of the work of the commission from the platform.

"I said," declared the prime minister earnestly, "that having appointed this commission and knowing the men who were on it, we would undertake to carry out its recommendations. The Conservatives never made any such promise," he went on, "but that promise we made has been carried out almost to the very letter and certainly in the spirit in which it was made." The prime minister proceeded to review what had been done by the government.

In implementing the Duncan report, increased subsidies had been and were being paid to the Maritime Provinces. In the case of Prince Edward Island, the increase had amounted to $125,000 a year, he said, and in the case of other provinces the amounts were larger.

A new car ferry to ply between the island and mainland was being constructed. "We have given the contract for that ferry and it is going to cost over two million dollars," declared Mr. King. He gave his listeners details of the new ferry.

In addition to the car ferry itself new terminals would be necessary because of the increased size of the boat. These would bring the total cost of the project up to $2,853,246, "or nearly three million dollars for this connecting link between the island and the mainland." And, added Mr. King, the government had decided that although the cost would be about a million dollars greater the car ferry would be constructed in Canada instead of in Great Britain, thus giving employment to Canadian workmen.

Steel Tariffs Changed

Further, in pursuance of the Duncan report recommendations, tariffs affecting the iron and steel industry had been changed, bounties were being paid on coal used in the manufacture of steel in Canada, the movement of Nova Scotia coal to the markets of Ontario and Quebec was being encouraged, harbor commissions had been established at Halifax and Saint John, and on the ocean had been placed one of the finest lines of steamships which it would be possible to obtain to run between the maritime provinces and the West Indies, Mr. King declared.

The Duncan commission he said, had recommended a separate department of fisheries, with a deputy minister of its own. It had remained for the royal commission on fisheries to recommend the appointment of a minister of fisheries. When this appointment was under consideration, said Mr. King, he began to receive representations from British Columbia and from Nova Scotia asking that the new member of the cabinet be selected from one of those provinces. "I said I am going to give Prince Edward Island a minister," Mr. King asserted, and his statement was received with applause.

Old Age Pensions

Old age pensions occupied the attention of the prime minister for a few minutes. "Mr. Bennett will be here soon and he will tell you that he will put in an old age pension law, the whole cost of which will be borne by the federal government," he said. "Now don't you be too sure that Mr. Bennett will have a chance to take any such action," he interjected, while the audience laughed, "it's very easy to make promises when you don't think you will have to implement them."

"I am not opposed to the federal government taking over the old age pensions as a federal obligation," said Mr. King, but before any such action was taken, he thought that there should be an accounting as between the Dominion government and the provinces. He felt that perhaps the time had come for a further revision on the provincial subsidies.

"You can't sell to any country unless you propose to buy from that country," declared Mr. King in turning to a brief reference to trade.

Canada had made treaties with a number of countries, he went on. One of these treaties, of which "our Conservative friends complain very much," was the New Zealand treaty. Their complaint, he said, was based on the fact that "for the moment a good deal of butter is coming in from New Zealand."

One reason for the increased butter importations from New Zealand, Mr. King asserted, was the prosperity of Canada under the Liberal government. People were more prosperous and they were eating more butter. When Canada made her treaty with New Zealand she was a butter exporting country. But butter consumption in Canada increased the price began to climb. Finally, he said, it got to a point where it attracted the New Zealand dealers, and they began to ship to Canada.

Decided on New Treaty

The government had decided to make a new treaty with New Zealand, the prime minister said, and the necessary six months' notice terminating the old treaty had been given. "We did not know at the time that we took this action that there was going to be a general election," he asserted. But the government proposed to see that the new treaty was satisfactory.

One of the complaints of Hon. R. B. Bennett against the government was that it was "selling Canada's birthright," continued Mr. King. But every country had to sell some of its natural resources. England would be only too glad at the very moment if it could get a market for its coal. The Englishman did not complain about selling his birthright. He wished he could sell more coal.

The budget provided for a great widening of the British preference, the premier told his listeners. "We want to trade in our own family," he continued. "The most precious market in the whole world for our wheat is British market." But Mr. Bennett was declaring that Canada should demand a preference from Great Britain before she gave Great Britain a preference. "Great Britain can't give us a preference in the sense that we give her one," asserted Mr. King. "She is a free trade country. She has no tariff wall."

Reference to the countervailing duties which apply to the United States was made by Mr. King. From what he read in the press, he said, he imagined that the countervailing provisions of the budget were having their effect in the republic and that President Hoover was considering bringing down the duties on commodities affected.

He asked his listeners if they wanted to send to the Imperial Conference those people who had fought the government on the budget. He asked Mr. Bennett to say who he proposed to send to that conference if he was given a mandate, and he thought that the Conservative leader should answer the question and tell the country before July 28.

Dr. MacMillan, the new minister of fisheries, expressed the view that the main issue in this election lay between the privileged classes and the masses of men. To the fishermen of Canada he hoped to dedicate whatever talents he possessed for the next few years. By the old test of government, the happiness of the governed, the King administration was content to be tried. If any man had struggled to bring an era of prosperity on Canada, that man was the prime minister, Dr. MacMillan asserted. Prince Edward Island had never been more prosperous.

Waiting on Hoover

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 23.—The Hawley-Smoot tariff bill now being a matter of history, Washington is waiting to see how President Hoover is going to use the flexible provision to rectify duties. It is not improbable something may be done about cattle, lumber, maple sugar or boots and shoes

The duty on soft wood lumber, which affects the producers of British Columbia was a highly controversial matter in the Senate. It is suggested the transfer of lumber from the free list was the price of some votes for the whole tariff bill. The keeping out of Canadian lumber is obviously out of line with President Hoover's conservation program, and if the tariff commission could find basis for a reduction of the duty, it would probably be made.

Upon maple sugar the tariff commission has already made a report, in which the duty necessary to equalize the opposition of competitors in Canada and the United States is set at 5 1-2 cents. But the Senate clapped a duty of 8 cents upon the springtime sweet largely for the benefit of one manufacturer.

Boots and shoes are already upon Senator Borah's list of duties he wants the tariff commission to investigate. Canada sends some boots of a special kind into the United States

The tariff commission is due for reorganization and quick action upon the Hawley-Smoot duties is not looked for. When reorganization has been accomplished the president, the Senate or the house or any American importer may call for an investigation and a report to the president.

KING DISCUSSES MAJOR ISSUES IN THE MARITIMES

Speaks at Summerside And Later at Charlottetown

(By Canadian Press)

Charlottetown, P.E.I., June 23.—To a general discussion of the major campaign issues, Premier Mackenzie King Saturday added certain features of particular interest to the Maritime provinces. The prime minister addressed two meetings in this little island province, the first at Summerside in the afternoon and the second in the capital city of Charlottetown last night. At each place he spoke to large audiences which accorded him careful attention.

Summerside, where Mr. King spoke first, is situated in the county of Prince. It was this constituency which first elected the prime minister to parliament after he was chosen to lead the Liberal forces in Canada. This fact was commented on by Mr. King.

Homecoming

His visit, he said, was in the nature of a homecoming and he thanked his audience for inviting him to represent them when he was a young untried political leader.

On the platform with the prime minister at both meetings was seated one of the newest members of Mr. King's cabinet, Dr. Cyrus MacMillan, recently appointed minister of fisheries, who also spoke briefly. Mr. King took the opportunity to welcome Dr. MacMilland and to declare that he considered his joining the government a real acquisition. On the platform at Summerside was Premier William Lea, who recently succeeded to this post in Prince Edward Island. Hon. J. E. Sinclair, now a member of the senate but formerly one of the representatives of Queen's, and A. E. McLean, ex-member for Prince constituency, were also present.

At Charlottetown, D J. Riley, president of the Queen's County Liberal Association, presided and R. H. Jenkins, ex-member for Queen's and again a candidate, was one of the speakers.

MARITIME RIGHTS

Mr. King went carefully into the questions involved in the term "Maritime rights," and reviewed what had been done by the government.

In implementing the Duncan report, increased subsidies had been and were being paid to the Maritime provinces. In the case of Prince Edward Island the increase had amounted to $125,000 a year, he said, and in the case of other provinces the amounts were larger. The government had not delayed in making these payments and in the past three years there had been given to the Maritime provinces in the form of increased subsidies the total sum of $4,800.000. Again, the government, he said, had decreased Maritime railway freight rates something like twenty per cent. This meant that already several millions of dollars had been saved to the Maritime provinces by way of freight rates.

The Duncan commission, he said, had recommended a separate department of fisheries with a deputy minister of its own. It had remained for the royal commission on fisheries to recommend the appointment of a minister of fisheries.

One of the factors which had influenced him in the selection of Dr. MacMillan as a member of the government, the prime minister said, was that the final settlement of financial terms for the Maritime provinces was yet to be made. The audit board was engaged in investigating this matter, and its reports would come before cabinet. He felt that he could not have a better man sitting with him at the council table, when this report came up for consideration than Dr. MacMillan. Dr. MacMillan had been a member of the Duncan commission and he had investigated these matters first hand. He had given them real study, and Mr. King said he always liked to have men who had studied questions to advise them. He expressed the hope that Prince Edward Island would give him Dr. MacMillan, just as he hopes that, on the Pacific coast, British Columbia would give him Captain Ian Mackenzie.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Old Age pensions occupied the attention of the prime minister for a few minutes. "Mr. Bennett will be here soon and he will tell you that he will put in an old age pension law, the whole cost of which will be borne by the federal government," he said. "Now, don't you be too sure that Mr. Bennett will have a chance to take any such action," he interjected, while the audience laughed, "it's very easy to make promises when you don't think you will have to implement them."

He warned his listeners that the proposal of Mr. Bennett would mean increased taxation, and he also stated that the first time the old age pensions legislation was introduced in the House of Commons the Conservatives had opposed it.

Have Accountant First

"I am not opposed to the federal government taking over the old age pensions as a federal obligation," said Mr. King, but before any such action was taken he thought that there should be an accounting as between the Dominion government and the provinces. He felt that perhaps the time had come for a further revision of the provincial subsidies. At the Dominion-provincial conference in Ottawa some years ago, went on Mr. King, the provinces had taken the ground that they did not want money with strings attached to it. Their view was that the Dominion should pay them fair subsidies, and that they should be permitted to dispose of the money as they saw fit. In view of this fact, the best thing to do would be to have a new accounting, and then, if it appeared that the federal government should assume the cost of old age pensions, the British North America Act could be changed.

National Highway

Another subject which was being emphasized by Mr. Bennett was the need for a national highway, Mr. King said. As a matter of fact, he felt that Mr. Bennett was trying to introduce new issues to keep the minds of the people off the great main issues of the campaign. Mr. King continued. At any rate the question of a national highway had been brought up. Shortly after the election there was to be a great conference of unemployment in Ottawa. At that conference the question of a national highway might be taken up. Representatives of the Dominion, the provinces, the municipalities, the railways and other interests would be represented at that conference. If that conference was favorable to the completion of a national highway, he would be too, Mr. King said. Really what was needed, perhaps more than a national highway, were better side roads leading into the highways. These would be of great value to those living in outlying districts.

Veterans' Legislation

Mr. King outlined what had been done by the government to assist the war veterans. It was an extensive program. "But," he said, "if what we have done doesn't meet the situation, we will have to call another committee of parliament to meet next year, and find out what is the matter." He added, however, that General Sir Arthur Currie had stated that, after what had been done this year for the veterans he did not think that parliament would be called upon to deal with soldiers' problems again for many years to come.

"You can't sell to any country unless you propose to buy from that country," declared Mr. King in turning to a brief reference to trade. One of the complaints of Hon. R. B. Bennett against the government was that it was "selling Canada's birthright," continued Mr. King, but every country had to sell some of its natural resources. England would be only too glad at the very moment if it could get a market for its coal. The Englishman did not complain about selling his birthright. He wished he could sell more coal.

British Preferences

The budget provided for a great widening of the British preference, the premier told his listeners. "We want to trade in our own family," he continued. "The most precious market in the whole world for our wheat is British market." But Mr. Bennett was declaring that Canada should demand a preference from Great Britain before she gave Great Britain a preference. "Great Britain can't give us a preference in the sense that we give her one," asserted Mr. King. "She is a free trade country. She had no tariff wall." Mr. Bennett was saying that Great Britain should put up a tariff wall.

But Canada said Mr. King could not tell Great Britain what she was to do in the matter of fiscal policy. Should Canada say to Great Britain, we will not trade with you unless you put up a tariff wall. "We are not going to Great Britain with a club in our hand," the prime minister declared. He added that the present Labor government in Britain would be most unlikely to put up a tariff wall round that country. It contained such men as Right Hon. Philip Snowden, a confirmed free trader, Premier Ramsay MacDonald, and others who did not look with favor on tariffs.

Countervailing Duties

He had asked Mr. Bennett to say who he proposed to send to that conference if he was given a mandate, and he thought the Conservative leader should answer the question and tell the country before July 28.

The people of Great Britain, Mr. King said, were waiting to see whether or not the budget would receive the hearty endorsation of the Canadian people. If it did so, Canada's representatives at the Imperial ecomic conference might reasonably expect that some steps would be taken by Great Britain designed to promote trade with Canada.

MacMillan Speaks

Dr MacMillan, the new minister of fisheries, expressed the view that the main issue in this election lay between the privileged classes and the masses of men. The Charlottetown Evening Patriot June 23, 1930.

THE PRIME MINISTER'S MEETINGS

The Prime Minister has come and gone, but the memories of the wonderful recepition tendered him by a grateful people will forever remain.

As a result of his inspiring message, the Liberal enthusiasm will run still higher and in each of the three counties there will be a greater determination than ever to return to power a party led by such a brilliant leader, possessing such exceptional mental gifts, and such magnetic personality, as Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King.

The two meetings which he addressed in Summerside and in Charlottetown were wonderful beyond anticipation.

Today, the Patriot gives a summary of a number of the salient points made, and very shortly will publish his speeches at greater length. We ask our people to carefully read and study his statements before judging for themselves whether they should support the Liberal or Conservative policies on July 28th. Let them ask themselves:

1st. How has the Liberal policy affected the Dominion of Canada as a whole?

2nd. How has it affected Prince Edward Island?

3rd. What can Canada or Prince Edward Island hope to gain in making a change of governments at the present time?

4th. What would be the effect on the development of Empire trade if the government, and incidentally the budget, were defeated?

5th. Which of the two governments should represent Canada at the Imperial Conference? A government that is in favor of granting a greater preference to Britain, or a government that is opposing such a preference unless Britain gives a quid pro quo and levies duties against the rest of the world?

6th. Is it for Canada to dictate to Britain what her trade policy shall be?

7th. Is it for her to say that the Mother Country must put up a tariff wal land lower that wall to a certain extent in favor of Canada?

Such questions naturally suggest themselves after listening to the Prime Minister on Saturday.

Besides fully explaining and reviewing the Liberal policy and record, Hon. Mr. King dealt with several matters touching on planks in Mr Bennett's platform. These include old age pensions and national highways.

We are glad to see the Conservative press giving special prominence to Hon. Mr. King's utterances on this question.

The Premier points out that he is not averse to taking over old age pensions as a Federal obligation, but before that is done there should be a careful accounting as between the Dominion and the provinces. He was quite prepared to go carefully into the matter of Federal subsidy and in this connection if it may seem advisable for the Dominion government to take over the old age pensions, the British North American Act can be amended and they can write off against that expenditure what is supposed to be given in the way of subsidy. But this should be a matter of straight business and good government, not party politics.

In regard to a national highway, as proposed by Mr. Bennett. The local press have been declaring that it means the taking over by the Dominion government all the highways of this province. That is a most absurd interpretation of the Conservative leader's words. In no other province has the attempt been made to write such an interpretation into his speech. Even Mr. Bennett himself, if questioned on it, would declare that such an interpretation is ridiculous. He simply meant a national highway from coast to coast, and in all the provinces they have certain highway stretches which linked together would form a highway across the country.

In discussing the question of subsidies, Hon. Mr. King certainly struck a responsive chord in the audience. He declared that when making the final adjustment which the Federal government will have to make after the Audit Board is through with their work, it is certainly a fortunate thing that he will have at his council board the benefit of the advice and counsel of the Hon. Cyrus Macmillan, Minister of Fisheries, representing Prince Edward Island, a member of the Duncan Commission that had gone carefully into the whole question and in accordance with whose recommendations, the King government has since given the provinces, by way of payments in the meantime, increases in annual subsidies of $4,800,000.

Judge Wallace, another member of the Commission has passed away, Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, is in England and Hon. Mr. Macmillan alone remains.

The meetings on Saturday were held under very favorable weather conditions. The rains had laid the dust on the roads, and the sun came out again, as the Liberal sun of prosperity shone after the Conservative clouds of depression in 1921 had rolled away.

A Poor Compliment

It was plainly to be seen that Mr. Mackenzie King was labouring under a grave disadvantage in explaining why he turned down the elected choice of Prince Edward Island for the Ministry of Fisheries, and selected instead his own favorite. He realizes now, when it is too late, that he made a serious tactical blunder in deliberately flouting the claims of Mr. Jenkins and Mr. MacLean, and insisting upon the selection of Dr. Cyrus Macmillan. Mr. Jenkins is a business man, who, if good enough to represent the county, is surely good enough to administer a department. He had in his constituency one of the best fishing areas in the Province and during the past four years could have been of some service to it in the capacity of Minister. Then there is Mr. MacLean, a practical lobster packer, familiar with every branch and avenue of fisheries, representing a large fishing population, yet his undoubted claims on his leader were turned down. And why? Because, Mr. King told the people on Saturday, Mr. Duff wanted the job as representing Nova Scotia, and British Columbia wanted it, and it would not do to offend either, so he decided to ignore all the sitting members and bring in a brand new Minister on the following logical reasoning: The Duncan Commission, of which Dr. Cyrus Macmillan was a member, recommended a separate deputy Minister of Fisheries, but not a separate Minister. He (Premier King) then named another commission on Fisheries, of which Dr. Cyrus Macmillan was also a member and this commission recommended a separate minister as well as a separate deputy minister. Dr. Cyrus Macmillan having been a member of both commissions, why not then appoint him to the ministry thus recommended? It did not seem to occur to the Prime Minister that the Minister he selected should first be the chosen of the electorate.

An Ineffective Defence

Premier King came to the Province on Saturday, saw, but did not conquer. His meetings were characterized by a lack of spontaneous enthusiasm. There was a good deal of applause from the faithful, of course, but there was a coldness running through them that was all the more impressive because of the warmth of the weather. Premier King is an able speaker, most persuasive in his arguments, and with a vocabulary equal to almost any occasion. Notwithstanding, he could not enthuse, far less enthral his audience. The reason was not far to seek. He came not with a message of hope, but with a plea in defence of his Government's short-comings. He was on the defensive all the time, about the only grain of hope in his two-and-a-half hours' speech in the Strand Theatre was when he promised—or rather hinted—that if he were again returned to power he would wipe out the remaining one per cent Sales Tax. A statesman with one stroke of the pen would have wiped out that nuisance tax entirely, instead of merely reducing it by half. Now, however, the politician dangles that one per cent Sales Tax before our eyes as a bribe to re-elect him!

RICHMOND HAS BIG FIGHT AHEAD FOR MITCHELL

Conservatives Choose Dr. Francois Lafleche as Candidate

STIRRING SPEECHES MADE

Hon. Senator Rufus Pope and J. H. Rainville Voice Hopes of Victory

(Special to The Gazette.)

Richmond, Que., June 21.—The electors of Richmond-Wolfe turned out en masse here today, and amid scenes of great enthusiasm unanimously chose Dr. Francois Lafleche, of Windsor Mills, as Conservative standard-bearer in the forthcoming federal election The doctor's opponent is Walter Mitchell, K.C., the Liberal hope, who was chosen, among four "rouge" aspirants at a convention held in Richmond also a week or so ago.

Dr. Lafleche's name was proposed by K. A. Willard, of Marbletown, and seconded by Francis Charland, prefect of the county, mayor of St. Francois Xavier, and a former Liberal organizer J. H. Cote, N.P., of Asbestos, proposed that Dr. Lafleche's candidature be unanimous, the crowd roaring its approval.

Liberal and Conservative veterans alike who have witnessed many a political battle claim that never before in the history of the riding had such an enthusiastic convention taken place. The event lasted all day. In the early forenoon the actual convention was held, and in the afternoon prominent speakers, from the county as well as from Montreal, addressed a crowd, estimated at 1,500, in the Town Hall. Nothing daunted, though it poured rain practically all day, men and women, young and old, flocked to the county seat from distances ranging anywhere from 30 to 80 miles. They were rewarded by oratory aplenty.

The candidate, due to a severe cold, was greatly hindered in his speech, but captivated the gathering with the few words he did utter. He said: "I regret that, owing to a severe cold contracted in the interests of our great party, I find myself unable to address you as I would like. Nevertheless, I wish to thank you all from the bottom of my heart for your cordial reception. I shall endeavor to work with all the energy and ability I have to carry our banner to victory. With your assistance and that of our good friends, I have no doubt our combined efforts will be crowned with success."

Hon. Rufus Pope, popular septuagenarian Senator from Cookshire, brought down the House by his remarks concerning the personality of the Prime Minister. Senator Pope declared it was the first time he had witnessed a "real convention," in Richmond. He congratulated the citizens on the excellent choice they had made in Dr. Lafleche, adding that it gave him great pleasure to see that unlike the Liberals, the Conservatives had not gone to Montreal "to borrow a candidate." He remarked, that Mackenzie King's promises were of no value whatsoever, and warned everybody that if he was returned to power Canadian mothers would be raising good healthy Canuck babies, eventually to have them converted into Yankee citizens. Mackenzie King wants, and thinks he is going to go to the Imperial Conference," the speaker continued, "let him go to England, or to the United States, or anywhere he likes for all I care." The effect of these words was electrifying. Everyone cheered wildly and a good five minutes elapsed before the Senator could resume.

J. H. RAINVILLE SPEAKS.

Another speaker who received a warm welcome was J. H. Rainville, organizer of the Conservatives forces in the province of Quebec. He talked on the subjects of unemployment, immigration and the importation of butter from foreign lands. When he asked the electors what they themselves thought of the situation as applied to these issues the answer came back, "Rotten." "You bet they are rotten." Mr. Rainville went on." Just imagine, you farmers represent 63 per cent. of the total vote in the country, and King believes that you are not able to supply the remaining 37 per cent. with butter. Believe it or not, 42,000,000 pounds of butter were imported into Canada from other countries last year. And now dwell a while on the immigration situation. I myself checked up and found out that in one town alone in Nicolet county, 63 families had left for the United States within the past five years. Still Mr. King insists on spending $20,000,000 of your dollars annually on bringing to our Dominion sun worshippers who walk naked in the forests, Mennonites, and the scum of Europe generally."

His final plea to the crowd that this year they vote for their land, which, in his opinion, is dying. "Forget Red or Blue," he said, "and vote for Bennett and protection, the protection, you so richly deserve."

J. E. C. Bumbray, Conservative candidate in Laurier-Outremont, who followed Mr. Rainville, expressed himself as being convinced the tide was turning. "Look at all the former Liberals who are joining the Conservative ranks this year," he said. "Right here you have working for the Conservative party such former stalwarts of the Liberal organization as Damase Brouillette, Philippe Roy, J. B. Monfette, George Purcell and Henri Roux. Don't forget also that you have here on the platform, acting as chairman, no less a personage than Francis Charland, prefect of the county, mayor of St. Francois Xavier and a former Liberal.

"These are all favorable indications that Canada, contrary to what

Figures From Quebec Liquor Likely to Be Submitted

(Special to The Gazette.)

Quebec, June 22.—The last meeting of the Cabinet, marking the close of the fiscal year, will take place tomorrow morning and a number of departmental matters will be taken up. The report of the fiscal year will not be given out until the latter part of July but it is likely that at this last meeting some figures regarding the receipts of the Quebec Liquor Commission for the year ending April 30 will be submitted to the members of the executive. However, in accordance with the custom no declaration will be available until the financial statement is issued.

It is generally expected, however, that the receipts for the Commission will be slightly higher due to the increase in tourist traffic.

Premier Taschereau will leave after the meeting for Montreal and will attend the St. Jean Baptiste celebration. He will return here on the 2nd and will preside at a meeting of the Cabinet on July 3.

MACNIDER PRAISED BY U.S. SENATORS

New Minister to Canada Expected to Occupy Ottawa Post Soon

(By Canadian Press.)

Washington, D.C., June 22.—Hanford MacNider, United States Minister to Ottawa, is expected to come to Washington shortly from his home in Mason City, Iowa, to go over with Government officials here the details of current affairs between Canada and the United States. He will then, it is understood, go immediately to Ottawa to occupy the post which has been vacant for six months.

Friends of the new minister in Washington are jubilant over confirmation of his appointment by the Senate without a record vote despite the attack made upon the nomination by Senator Smith Wildman Brookhart. The senator from Iowa was the only one who voted nay.

Senator Daniel Steck, a personal friend of Col. MacNider, who defended his nomination on the Senate floor, had on his desk today telegrams of congratulation from Iowa and other states. He said he had no wish to pursue the argument further with Senator Brookhart. "There is no doubt in my mind," he said, "that Senator Brookhart was determined to carry the fight to a roll call vote but when he observed the disposition of the Senate he gave it up."

Representative Cole of Iowa was enthusiastic. "Hanford MacNider is one of the finest and ablest men we have in our state," he said, "I congratulate the people of the United States upon having as their minister in Ottawa a man of the ability and standing of Colonel MacNider."

DOMINION AID TO MARITIMES IS OUTLINED

Premier King Tells of Results of Report

SUBSIDIES INCREASED

Many Expenditures Planned For Eastern Provinces as Trade Increases

(By Canadian Press.)

Charlottetown, P.E.I., June 22. — To a general discussion of the major campaign issues Premier Mackenzie King yesterday added certain features of particular interest to the Maritime provinces. The Prime Minister addressed two meetings in this little island province, the first at Summerside in the afternoon and the second in the capital city of Charlottetown last night. At each place he spoke to large audiences which accorded him careful attention. Both meetings were held in theatres, but the use of broadcasting apparatus made it possible for thousands who were not actually present to hear the words of the Prime Minister.

Summerside, where Mr. King spoke first, is situated in the county of Prince. It was this constituency which first elected the Prime Minister to Parliament after he was chosen to lead the Liberal forces in Canada. This fact was commented on by Mr. King. His visit, he said, was in the nature of a homecoming and he thanked his audience for inviting him to represent them when he was a young and untried political leader.

On the platform with the Prime Minister at both meetings was seated one of the newest members of Mr. King's cabinet, Dr. Cyrus MacMillan, recently appointed Minister of Fisheries, who also spoke briefly. Mr. King took the opportunity to welcome Dr. MacMillan and to declare that he considered his joining the Government a real acquisition. On the platform at Summerside was Premier W. M. Lea, who recently succeeded to this post in Prince Edward Island. Hon. J. E. Sinclair, now a member of the Senate, but formerly one of the representatives of Queen's, and A. E. McLean, ex-member for Price constituency, were also present. Torrid weather did not deter a large crowd from assembling and listening carefully to all that the Prime Minister had to say. At Charlottetown, D. J. Riley, president of the Queen's County Liberal Association, presided and R. H. Jenkins, ex-member for Queen's and again a candidate, was one of the speakers.

Mr. King went carefully into the questions involved in the term "maritime rights." He told how there had been an agitation for these rights for many years and how the present Government finally came to the conclusion that a Royal Commission should be appointed to investigate them. When the commission had been appointed he said the Conservative members in the House of Commons had ridiculed the proposal.

"They said, 'we asked you for a loaf and you gave us a stone'," Mr. King told his listeners. However, he had gone ahead, the commission was appointed and one of its members was Dr. Cyrus MacMillan, who now sat at the cabinet table.

PROMISE CARRIED OUT.

Shortly after the commission went to work the Government appealed to the country, Mr. King continued. During the campaign he had spoken of the work of the commission from the platform.

"I said," declared the Prime Minister earnestly, "that having appointed this commission and knowing the men who were on it we would undertake to carry out its recommendations. The Conservatives never made any such promise," he went on, "but that promise we made has been carried out almost to the very letter and certainly in the spirit in which it was made." The Prime Minister proceded to review what had been done by the Government.

In implementing the Duncan Report, increased subsidies had been and were being paid to the Maritime provinces. In the case of Prince Edward Island the increase had amounted to $125,000 a year, he said, and in the case of other provinces the amounts were larger. The Government had not delayed in making these payments and in the past three years there had been given to the maritime provinces in the form of increased subsidies the total sum of $4,800,000. Again, the Government, he said, had decreased maritime railway freight rates something like 20 per cent. This meant that already several millions of dollars had been saved to the maritime provinces by way of freight rates. A new car ferry to ply between the island and mainland was being constructed. "We have given the contract for that ferry and it is going to cost over $2,000,000," declared Mr. King. He gave his listeners details of the new ferry. It was to be oil-burning with accomodation for 16 freight cars and deck accommodation for 40 average size automobiles as well as passengers. It would be delivered on June 1st of next year.

In addition to the car ferry itself, new terminals would be necessary because of the increased size of the boat. These would bring the total cost of the project up to $2,852,428, "or nearly $3,000,000 for this connecting link between the island and the mainland." And, added Mr. King, the Government had decided that although the cost would be about $1,000,000 greater, the car ferry would be constructed in Canada instead of Great Britain, thus giving employment to Canadian workmen.

Further, in pursuance of the Duncan Report recommendations, tariffs affecting the iron and steel industry had been changed, bounties were being paid on coal used in the manufacture of steel in Canada, the movement of Nova Scotia coal to the markets of Ontario and Quebec was being encouraged, harbor commissions has been established at Halifax and St. John, and on the ocean had been placed one of the finest lines of steamships which it would be possible to obtain to run between the maritime provinces and the West Indies, Mr. King declared.

Then he turned to the new Ministry of Fisheries. The Duncan commission, he said had recommended a separate department of fisheries with a deputy minister of its own. It had remained for the royal commission on fisheries to recommend the appointment of a minister of fisheries. When this appointment was under consideration, said Mr. King, he began to receive representations from British Columbia and from Nova Scotia asking that the new member of the cabinet be selected from one of these provinces.

The province of British Columbia, said Mr. King, pointed out that its fisheries were more valuable than those of the maritime provinces, "and I began to feel in a pretty delicate position. I had to consider the matter from the point of view of the whole country," he went on. But it had always been his desire to have a Cabinet minister from every province of the Dominion, and British Columbia already had a minister while Prince Edward Island had not. "I said, I am going to give Prince Edward Island a minister," Mr. King asserted, and his statement was received with applause. Both Nova Scotia and British Columbia had acted chivalrously in the matter, said Mr. King. There was another factor which had influenced him in the selection of Dr. MacMillan as a member of the Government, the Prime Minister said. The final settlement of financial terms for the maritime provinces was yet to be made. The audit board was engaged in investigating this matter, and its reports would come before the Cabinet. He felt that he could not have a better man sitting with him at the council table, when this report came up for consideration, than Dr. MacMillan. Dr. MacMillan had been a member of the Duncan commission and he had investigated these matters first hand. He had given them real study, and Mr. King said he always liked to have men who had studied questions to advise them. He expressed the hope that Prince Edward Island would give him Dr. MacMillan just as he hopes that, on the Pacific coast, British Columbia would give him Capt. Ian Mackenzie.

Old age pensions occupied the attention of the Prime Minister for a few minutes. "Mr. Bennett will be here soon and he will tell you that he will put in an old pension law, the whole cost of which will be borne by the Federal Government," he said. "Now don't you be too sure that Mr. Bennett will have a chance to take any such action," he interjected, while the audience laughed. "It's very easy to make promises when you don't think you will have to implement them."

He warned his listeners that the proposal of Mr. Bennett would mean increased taxation, and he also stated that the first time the old age pension legislation was introduced in the House of Commons, the Conservatives had opposed it.

"I am not opposed to the Federal Government taking over the old age pensions as a federal obligation," said Mr. King, but before any such action was taken he thought that there should be an accounting as between the Dominion Government and the provinces. He felt that perhaps the time had come for a further revision of the provincial subsidies. At the Dominion-provincial conference in Ottawa some years ago, went on Mr. King, the provinces had taken the ground that they did not want money with strings attached to it. Their view was that the Dominion should pay them fair subsidies, and that they should be permitted to dispose of the money as they saw fit. In view of this fact, the best thing to do would be to have a new accounting, and then, if it appeared that the Federal Government should assume the cost of old age pensions, then the British North America Act could be changed.

HIGHWAYS DISCUSSED.

Another subject which was being emphasized by Mr. Bennett was the need for a national highway, Mr. King said. As a matter of fact, he felt that Mr. Bennett was trying to introduce new issues to keep the minds of the people off the great main issues of the campaign, Mr. King continued. At any rate the question of a national highway had been brought up. Shortly after the election there was to be a great conference on unemployment in Ottawa. At that conference the question of a national highway might be taken up. Representatives of the Dominion, the provinces, the municipalities, the railways and other interests would be represented at that conference. If that conference was favorable to the completion of a national highway, he would be too, Mr. King said. Really what was needed, perhaps more than a national highway, were better side roads leading into the highways. These would be of great value to those living in outlying districts. Mr. King outlined what had been done by the Government to assist the war veterans. It was an extensive programme. "But," he said, "if what we have done doesn't meet the situation, we will have to call another committee of Parliament to meet next year, and find out what is the matter." He added, however, that General Sir Arthur Currie had stated that, after what had been done this year for the veterans he did not think that Parliament would be called upon to deal with soldiers' problems again for many years to come.

"You can't sell to any country unless you propose to buy from that country," declared Mr. King in turning to a brief reference to trade. Canada had made treaties with a number of countries, he went on. One of these treaties of which "our Conservative friends complain very much," was the New Zealand treaty. Their complaint, he said, was based on the fact that "for the moment a good deal of butter is coming in from New Zealand."

One reason for the increased butter importations from New Zealand, Mr. King asserted, was the prosperity of Canada under the Liberal Government. People were more prosperous and they were eating more butter. When Canada made her treaty with New Zealand she was a butter exporting country. But butter consumption in Canada increased, and the price began to climb. Finally, he said, it got to a point where it attracted the New Zealand butter dealers, and they began to ship to Canada.

Also, said Mr. King, with increased prosperity in Canada, there came increased consumption of such milk products as ice cream. There was a demand for milk from the United States, and milk was turned into cheese. All these were factors in increasing the price of butter.

The Government had decided to make a new treaty with New Zealand, the Prime Minister said, and the necessary six months' notice terminating the old treaty had been given. "We did not know at the time that we took this action that there was going to be a general election," he asserted, but the Government proposed to see that the new treaty was satisfactory. Today, he said, Canada stood sixth among the exporting countries of the world. As far as the export of manufactured commodities alone was concerned, the Dominion, figuring on a per capita basis, stood second only to Great Britain in the whole world.

One of the complaints of Hon. R. B. Bennett against the Government was that it was "selling Canada's birthright," continued Mr. King. But every country had to sell some of its natural resources. England would be only too glad at the very moment if it could get a market for its coal. The Englishman did not complain about selling his birthright. He wished he could sell more coal.

The Budget provided for a great widening of the British preference, the Premier told his listeners. "We want to trade in our own family," he continued. "The most precious market in the whole world for our wheat is the British market." But Mr. Bennett was declaring that Canada should demand a preference from Great Britain before she gave Great Britain a preference. "Great Britain can't give us a preference in the sense that we give her one," asserted Mr. King. "She is a free trade country. She has no tariff wall." Mr. Bennett was saying that Great Britain should put up a tariff wall. But Canada, said Mr. King, could not tell Great Britain what she was to do in the matter of fiscal policy. Should Canada say to Great Britain, we will not trade with you unless you put up a tariff wall. "We are not going to Great Britain with a club in our hand," the Prime Minister declared.

He added that the present Labor Government in Britain would be most unlikely to put up a tariff wall round that country. It contained such men as Right Hon. Philip Snowden, a confirmed free trader, Premier Ramsay MacDonald, and others who did not look with favor on tariffs.

Reference to the countervailing duties which apply to the United States was made by Mr. King. From what he read in the press, he said, he imagined that the countervailing provisions of the budget were having their effect in the republic and that President Hoover was considering bringing down the duties on commodities affected. He asked his listeners if they wanted to send to the Imperial Conference those people who had fought the Government on the budget. He had asked Mr. Bennett to say whom he proposed to send to that conference if he was given a mandate, and he thought the Conservative leader should answer the question and tell the country before July 28.

The people of Great Britain, Mr. King said, were waiting to see whether or not the budget would receive the hearty endorsation of the Canadian people. If it did so, Canada's representatives at the Imperial Economic Conference might reasonably expect that some steps would be taken by Great Britain designed to promote trade with Canada.

Dr. MacMillan, the new Minister of Fisheries, expressed the view that the main issue in this election lay between the privileged classes and the masses of men. To the fishermen of Canada he hoped to dedicate whatever talents he possessed for the next few years. By the old test of government, the happiness of the governed, the King administration was content to be tried. If any man had struggled to bring an era of prosperity on Canada, that man was the Prime Minister, Dr. MacMillan asserted. Prince Edward Island had never been more prosperous.

county had gone to Ottawa they had met Mr. Lacombe in the morning, handed him some documents, and he had promised to introduce them to the Minister of Agriculture during the afternoon.

"But when the afternoon came you could not be found," charged Mr. Sauve. "Yes, it is true, and your artificial smile condemns you."

"Yes, go ahead and tell how I hid when the market gardeners came to Ottawa," said Mr. Lacombe.

"You won't tell it," said Mr. Sauve.

"Yes, I will."

"Then, you have no shame left. You promised to meet the delegation in the afternoon."

"Never, never, that is an invented story," retorted Mr. Lacombe.

The audience took a hand at this point, some crying out that it was true, and others that it was false. It was some time before peace was restored.

"I accuse you of trying to trouble the meeting," said Mr. Sauve to Mr. Lacombe. "What did you do with the documents given to you by the delegation? Did you loose them?"

The cross-fire began to get worse, and at one point Mr. Sauve turned to his adversary and told him to keep quiet.

"You have enough experience as a public man to know how to behave properly," chided Mr. Sauve. "Your chief, Mr. King, has no confidence in you. Why did he not put you on the agricultural committee since you represented an agricultural county?

"I don't know," admitted Mr. Lacombe, refusing to remain quiet.

"Why did you not try to find out, why not have asked to go on that committee?" asked Mr. Sauve. "Perhaps, if you had asked, Mr. King would not have listened to you Where were you when the debate arose on the cost of transportation? Where were you when there was a discussion on apple cider. That is an important matter. We discussed it at Quebec, but where were you when it came up at Ottawa?"

Mr. Lacombe giving no answer, Mr. Sauve turned to the crowd, and commented with a shrug of his shoulders:

"What does apple cider mean to him? He does not like apple cider."

Mr. Lacombe came to his feet in a hurry.

"Lots of people don't like apple cider," added Mr. Sauve. "That does not mean that you like anything else. Do you like tobacco warehouses? If you do you were not there when the matter was discussed in the House."

TARIFF ATTACKED.

Getting away from Mr. Lacombe personally, Mr. Sauve turned to the tariff. He said that the more he studied the Dunning tariff the more he felt convinced that it was double-edged. He claimed the increase in the British preference mean ruin for the canning industry of this province. It was claimed that it was a protective tariff, but Liberals such as Dr. Hermas Deslauriers of St. Mary's division, of Montreal, had talked in the House of foodstuffs coming in from the West Indies to keep prices down.

"In another aspect it is a reciprocity tariff," claimed Mr. Sauve. "When there is a good group of some foodstuffs in the United States the president will reduce the tariff, as he has a right to do, and that means the Canadian tariff will come down to that level, and we will be flooded with American goods. That is the basis of reciprocity.'

He discussed the entry of New Zealand butter, and asked what had been given Canada in exchange for allowing that butter to flood the Canadian market.

"Mr. Lacombe said the other day that I am a traitor," said Mr. Sauve. "A traitor? Premier Taschereau gave an interview the other day to the effect that he was sorry I was leaving the Legislature, that my departure would be regretted by both sides of the House. A traitor after 22 years of service to my fellow-citizens? Sauve a traitor?"

The crowd was growing enthusiastic, applauding wildly at this point.

"I am called a traitor because I said that Borden was the first to lay down the basis of autonomy for Canada, but does not Mr. Lacombe know that his chief, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, said in the House of Commons more than I did as to Sir Robert Borden?"

"Who said it?" interrupted Mr. Lacombe.

"Your chief, Mr. Lapointe," said Mr. Sauve, producing Hansard, and waving it in the face of Mr. Lacombe. The latter looked dubious. "Here I will read it to you," said Mr. Sauve, and he did so, and next asked: "Will you dare to say that Mr. Lapointe did not tell the truth, and is a traitor because he gave justice to a former Premier of Canada?"

Mr. Sauve said much was made of a question as to who would represent the province of Quebec at the Imperial Conference in case Hon. R. B. Bennett came to power. He could suggest one name at least, and that was Hon. Senator Thomas Chapais, the greatest historian of the province, and a man who could rep-

National Highway, Old Age Pensions, Province Subsidies, King Topics

Total Federal Assistance for Aged Means Increased Taxes; Governments Conference Needed; Unemployment Meet, Canada Road, Related

CHARLOTTETOWN, P. E. I., June 23.—Bearing of the whole cost of old age pensions by the Federal Government would mean increased taxation; belief that the time had perhaps come for a further revision of Provincial subsidies, and that the proposed national highway could come under discussion at the Dominion-Provincial unemployment conference this year were the highlights of an address by Premier W. L. Mackenzie King here Saturday evening.

While not opposing the Federal Government taking over the old age pensions as a Federal obligation, the Premier felt there should be an accounting between the Dominion and Provincial governments before any action was taken. If the unemployment conference were favorable to construction of a national highway he would be agreeable to its development, but he believed, perhaps, that better side roads leading to highways were the real need of the time and would be of great value to those living in outlying districts.

Maritime Interests

To a general discussion of the major campaign issues Premier King added certain features of particular interest to the Maritime Provinces. The Prime Minister addressed two meetings in this little island province, the first at Summerside in the afternoon and the second in the capital city of Charlottetown Saturday night.

Summerside, where Mr. King spoke first is situated in the County of Prince. It was this constituency which first elected the Prime Minister to parliament after he was chosen to lead the Liberal forces in Canada. This fact was commented on by Mr. King.

Homecoming Visit

His visit, he said, was in the nature of a homecoming and he thanked his audience for inviting him to represent them when he was a young untried political leader.

On the platform with the Prime Minister at both meetings was seated one of the newest members of Mr. King's cabinet, Dr. Cyrus MacMillan, recently appointed Minister of Fisheries, who also spoke briefly. Mr. King took the opportunity to welcome Dr. MacMillan and to declare that he considered his joining the Government an acquisition.

"Maritime Rights"

Mr. King went carefully into the questions involved in the term "Maritime rights," and reviewed what had been done by the Government.

In implementing the Duncan Report, increased subsidies had been and were being paid to the Maritime Provinces. In the case of Prince Edward Island the increase had amounted to $125,000 a year, he said, and in the case of other provinces the amounts were larger. The Government had not delayed in making these payments and in the past three years there had been given to the Maritime Provinces in the form of increased subsidies the total sum of $4,800,000. Again, the Government, he said, had decreased maritime railway freight rates something like 20 per cent. This meant that already several millions of dollars had been saved to the Maritime Provinces by way of freight rates.

The Duncan Commission, he said, had recommended a separate department of fisheries with a deputy minister of its own. It had remained for the Royal Commission on fisheries to recommend the appointment of a minister of fisheries. When this appointment was under consideration, said Mr. King, he began to receive representations from British Columbia and from Nova Scotia asking that the new member of the cabinet be selected from one of those provinces.
