In any event, these two people, the respondent and the co-respondent were supposed to have been together, but the committee members will recall that the nearest we could establish these two people had been found together was when they were in an automobile and that when they were in the house itself the nearest they were ever proved to be to each other was when one was in the basement and the other was in an upstairs bedroom. This is the evidence which was produced in the committee by five professional witnesses, which is supposed to prove adultery.

An hon. Member: What about a little bit of order?

Mr. Peters: On the other hand, I certainly did not appreciate the type of evidence given by the co-respondent, which was flamboyant and in many cases he ran away with the cross-examining lawyer. His evidence was not substantiated in many respects, it was contradictory, although it was given under oath. In some instances he was supposed to have been in the Quebec area for two or three days and in other cases in Pembroke, while the detectives had said he was somewhere else. All this evidence should have been checked by the committee and I also believe that the evidence respecting the car in question should have been checked. There was a great deal of talk about the kind of automobile which was supposed to have been taken from here to there and there to here, back and forth on different nights.

I think that if we had had the proper facilities at our disposal we could have examined the situation respecting this witness and could have found out whether or not he was telling the truth. I am quite sure that the counsel representing both the defendant and respondent in this case would have been most happy if the committee had been able to decide which side was telling the truth, because we were faced with a problem as to which of the witnesses had lied. We knew these things were contradictory and we had to assume that these people were perjuring themselves. I think we are not being unfair in assuming that this committee next year may well have to hear this case again so that it should be able to call witnesses. If the committee exists as it does today—and I hope it does not—it should have the power to cite the people who are giving false testimony and it should have the power to do something about it when such people are cited.

The committee should also have at its disposal the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in order to investigate such matters as the committee itself decides should be investigated. If the lawyers are not in a position to prove or disprove, or do not make any attempt to prove or disprove evidence considered to be pertinent to the case, then the committee must have this right, and there must be the right to appeal.

There have been other cases, including the Gregory case, in respect of which the committee has leaned over backwards—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member has stated that five professional witnesses in this case have committed perjury respecting adultery, and yet at the end of his statement he also told the committee that he did not know whether or not the co-respondent was telling the truth.

The fact of the matter is that either the five witnesses are not telling the truth, and are therefore committing perjury, or the two witnesses, the wife and the co-respondent, are not telling the truth and they are therefore committing perjury.

This matter was thrashed out with the help of a great deal of evidence for over a day and a half and, as the hon. member has pointed out, there was a good deal of argument in the committee about the conflicting evidence and the eventual decision of the committee was very, very close. I do not intend to give my own views this afternoon but rather to draw to the attention of this committee as briefly as I can the evidence, both pro and con, so that the committee in its own time can make its decision in this matter.

Firstly, the hon. member stated that there was lipstick on the pillow of Mrs. Terry. On reading the evidence and checking my notes I do not believe any such evidence was presented. If it had been so presented that would be a very telling point against her but, in fairness to the respondent in this case, I do not believe there was any such evidence.

The hon. member has mentioned the conflicting evidence of the five professional witnesses—a mixed bag of detectives—and in that regard he is perfectly correct. There was firstly the question of the door bell, as to whether it was a door bell with a regular ring or a gong; secondly, the position of the stairway in the house, which was of some importance, and whether the stairway had treads; thirdly, there was the question of the light in the basement; and, fourthly, whether footsteps were heard pounding downstairs from the bedroom; there was conflicting evidence on all those points.

On the other hand, we have the allegations of the petitioner that on five different occasions the co-respondent was found in the home of the respondent. According to the two detectives, they took up surveillance there on the night of May 21, when the two parties, the respondent and the co-respondent, were in the house. The detectives remained until 1.20 the following morning, when the Pointe Claire police came along and cleared them out of the area. On July 10 two of the detectives took up surveillance and the two parties were inside the house when the detectives left at 3.30 the following morning. At least, if the co-respondent had left the home before that time they had not seen him leave.

The two detectives kept up surveillance during the night of July 31 and when the detectives left at 8.00 a.m. on August 1 they had not seen the co-respondent leave. On August 13 they again kept surveillance and on this occasion the two professional witnesses saw the co-respondent leave the home of the wife at 7.40 the next morning. Then we come down to the date of August 30, which is the date about which most of the evidence was presented, and my friend has already given the committee a very good synopsis of the evidence concerning that particular evening.

These were the problems facing the committee. We heard these professional witnesses give conflicting evidence on the points I have mentioned and there was conflicting evidence, perhaps, on other points as well. Perhaps one might expect this to be the case or, on the other hand, if they all told the same story we could very well say they told a patched up story. It is a very difficult problem, as the closeness of the committee's decision would indicate. One could not really tell who was telling the truth and who was telling a lie. I do not think anyone in his heart of hearts could have said definitely "That fellow is telling the truth and that fellow is telling a lie." You have to draw your suppositions or inferences from the evidence as to who seems to be presenting the better case and whose story seems to hold water.

In that connection may I quote two remarks made by the co-respondent under cross-examination. First, when he was asked about kissing Mrs. Terry he said, in answer to the question, "Did you kiss Mrs. Terry?" "Not to my knowledge." Secondly, he was asked a question arising out of the detectives' evidence that on August 31 he was seen bare-waisted in the lady's bedroom. The question was asked after a great deal of conflicting testimony as to whether the nearby street was 50 feet, 75 feet, 125 feet, 150 feet, 300 feet or 500 feet away from this particular bedroom window, and was as follows: "Were you ever bare to the waist in the woman's bedroom?" And his answer was, "I don't think I was ever in that bedroom stripped to the waist. Also I don't think you could see into that bedroom from the street."

This was the difficulty we had with the witnesses, and it is unfair to quote just two examples of their evidence and to say that they are not to be believed because of the type of evidence they gave. My hon. friend will probably agree that we also had a good deal of trouble with the co-respondent. He tended to be too rapid with his answers and time after time for his own protection I had to try to slow him down and to tell him to think about his answers, not to try to rationalize them but not to blurt out something for which he would be sorry.

There was evidence one way and the other, and I might say that from the wife's standpoint and that of the co-respondent they both appeared before us and denied under oath that they had had sexual intercourse. When you have such a denial under oath you have to pay very great attention to it, and you cannot dismiss it lightly. As the hon. member who has just spoken remarked, we had suggestions from the respondent's lawyer, Mr. John McDonald of Ottawa, who is a very experienced counsel, that we must be very careful in the way in which we look at the evidence of professional detectives. He quoted from an old English case, and also from a more recent one, Sopwith versus Sopwith, and that is perfectly proper. That is the law and we have those directions to guide us. We were also very fortunate in having Dr. Maurice Ollivier, the law clerk in constant attendance upon our committee, and he was available for questions about the probability of certain matters with respect to inferential law, which was an important guide to the members of the committee before making up their minds. After a couple of days of hearings under our belts we finally made our decision and reported it to the House of Commons.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, as this is probably the last occasion when divorce cases will be discussed during this session I should like to say a few words on this case.

I have been a member of the committee on miscellaneous private bills for a great many years. As one hon. member has pointed out, this was a most difficult case—one of the most difficult cases I can ever remember—and one which illustrates the difficulties under which the committee labours in discharging its duties. This is certainly one committee from which I would be most happy to be excused, but I serve on it because I accept it as part of my parliamentary duties. This committee has responsibility to this house because it is set up by this house, and it also has a responsibility to the parties who appear before it and who will be affected by its decisions. In cases such as this it also has another responsibility, namely to see that our traditions of justice are maintained. The history of this case shows very clearly as the hon. member for Timiskaming pointed out, that the miscellaneous private bills committee cannot possibly discharge its responsibilities as it is presently set up.

If we go back through the history of this case we find it came before the Senate divorce committee and then it came before the miscellaneous private bills committee. In that committee we heard arguments from lawyers on behalf of each of the parties. On the basis of those arguments we decided not to grant this divorce. I may say here that our responsibilities to this house are greatly increased by the fact that there is no written record. Every member of this committee will have to say yea or nay and vote on this bill depending largely upon what we tell the committee in order to form an honest opinion. Having heard this case for the first time and having rejected this application for divorce the bill came before you and was recommitted to the committee in order that further evidence might be heard.

On the first occasion we heard only the arguments of the lawyers for each of the parties but this time we called witnesses. Here, again, we have to depend on our memories, for there is no written record of what was actually said. One of these witnesses was on his feet for nearly two hours being grilled by a lawyer and while I did not regard him as a very good witness and while there was lots about him I did not like I must say that if I were in his place and on trial there being grilled for two hours I am afraid I would get tripped up with regard to some of the things I might say.

Having heard the evidence and having had an opportunity to size up the witnesses personally and to arrive at a better judgment, because we had the opportunity to judge not only the words that were said but the people who said them, we made another decision and recommended that a divorce be granted. That points up one of the weaknesses of the miscellaneous private bills committee in that we do not have any fixed set of rules or procedures. Here is a decision which affects people's lives—the most serious decision that this house can make because it affects the lives of these people and the people connected with them, their relatives and so on—and yet that decision was made on the basis of a simple majority. Members know that attendance at a committee of that kind is never 100 per cent perfect; there is always someone missing, and I get the horrible feeling inside me that if those who happen to be absent were there in the committee and if somebody else was absent the decision would be different, and one of the things which I think this house must consider in cases such as this is that decisions should be based not on a simple majority but on a two-thirds majority—certainly not on a simple majority, at least—to offset the factor of people coming in late, of people who attend only part of the hearing and so on, and to offset also the factors that work inside ourselves, because when we hear evidence we like to be objective—we like to set ourselves apart altogether and be totally impartial, but because we are human beings we cannot do that. There is in each one of us a propensity, I suppose, to believe the worst of anyone and this is very hard to get out of your mind, and it is hard to be absolutely impartial when you are hearing evidence.

There is in everyone of us a tendency, also, to react against other individuals. A certain witness will say something, and say it in a way which will sort of rile you; you react against it, and that is something we cannot help. And there is in most of us, I suppose, a propensity to sympathize with the underdog. These are all factors which interfere with the balance of our judgment. There must be factors in this committee to offset all the other factors which are likely to offset our judgment in matters like this. We are all sincerely endeavouring to do our best and do what we believe is right but we have a haunting fear that whatever we do we have a 50 per cent chance of being wrong.

There was only one witness in this case who, I believe, did not tell one lie, and that was the son of Mrs. Terry, a young boy of 17 or 18 years of age. He was straightforward and very convincing. In the evidence of all the other witnesses there were flaws and it is not right to pick out one and say one was more reliable than another. There are flaws in all their evidence. However, when we come to make our decisions we have a responsibility to uphold the tradition of justice on which we have prided ourselves down through the centuries and that tradition is that a person is innocent unless proved guilty. We must be certain, the proof must be convincing and it must relate to certain days specified.

There is any amount of suspicion in cases like this, but suspicion is not enough. You cannot judge a case on suspicion. There must be proof, and opportunity is not enough. As the chairman pointed out this afternoon there were five occasions when the respondent and the co-respondent were together in the house. There was opportunity, but there was no proof, and on four of those occasions there was no proof that they were alone in this house. There could have been other people present, children or visitors. All we know is that these people were alone in the house at the time the detectives broke in but they were found in separate parts of the house and we do not know who was present prior to the break-in. You cannot say that proof of adultery lies in the fact that two people are alone in a house. Reference was made to the fact that the gentleman was bare to the waist but even if that were true it is no proof of adultery because the woman might not have been in the room with him at any time. The argument was pinned on those circumstances on the night the detectives broke in to secure the evidence.

The very fact that people in their desire to secure evidence of adultery will go to the length of violating the law and breaking down a person's door and invading their privacy causes me to place little reliance on whatever evidence they give. I am suspicious because they were prepared to go to such lengths to secure the evidence.

We also must consider what will be the results of granting this divorce. If I vote for or against it I have a 50-50 chance of being wrong because it is almost impossible to reach an accurate decision on the basis of the evidence presented in this case. Also I must as an individual consider what will be the results of my voting for this bill and I must attempt to take the course of action that will produce the least harmful results. If I were to vote in favour of the preamble of this bill carrying I must consider some of the following results. In the first place if the committee votes for the bill it will have taken a step that cannot be retraced. Once the divorce is granted the marriage is terminated. If we do that we are in effect reversing the tradition of British law by saying that because a person is suspected of misconduct he is guilty and he has to prove his innocence and that because he has not proved his innocence he is guilty. But we have no positive proof of actual adultery. This couple were found in the same house but in different parts of it when the detectives broke in. Although the detectives had been following these people for a number of months they had witnessed no open display of affection between them.

All hon. members know that a great deal of the evidence that comes before us in these cases is evidence that is contrived, set up or manufactured. People arrange to be found together in compromising circumstances but in every other case of which I have knowledge at least the two parties concerned were found in the same room and there was supporting evidence in that a bed was ruffled or there was underwear strewn about or some other supporting evidence. If because two people are found in the same building, one in the attic and one in the basement, they are guilty of adultery, we are establishing an extremely bad precedent and making it easier in future for people who want divorces to manufacture evidence.

On the other hand, however, hon. gentlemen must consider that if we do not pass the bill the situation will remain as is and the marriage will not be dissolved. If the wife has been guilty of misconduct she will no doubt persist in it and there will be another opportunity provided for her husband to secure more substantial evidence to place before us. For the above reasons I cannot support the carrying of this preamble.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Halifax who serves very capably as chairman of the committee on miscellaneous and private bills highlighted one of the most important features of the work of the committee when he referred to the difficulty of the committee particularly in cases of this nature to reach an honest and sound decision. I have been bothered a great deal by the fact that difficult cases of this nature are rendered even more difficult when hon. members of the committee are as rushed as we have been during this session. I speak from personal experience, one which I am sure is shared by most hon. members serving on that committee, when I say I find great difficulty in concentrating on these cases because other thoughts keep going through my mind. One thinks of a speech one must prepare for a certain time, one wonders if a certain report is yet available and one remembers a couple of letters one should have answered the day before but overlooked. I submit that hon. members are in no position to reach sound decisions with respect to difficult cases when they are as busy as we have been this session.

The history of this case has been outlined by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. The case came before the committee of the other place, was passed by the other place, reached the house, was rejected and referred back to the committee. When it concluded its discussions the committee was split down the middle. One side was as convinced they were right as they were that the other side was wrong.

An important fact to bear in mind is that if we pass this bill we are establishing an extremely bad precedent.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): We can all see what this will inevitably lead to in the future.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. It being six o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to consider this bill again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for the consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

414. Departmental administration, $162,855.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, although I almost committed myself to the minister that I would not participate in this debate I hope he will forgive me for taking a few minutes of the time of the committee to say a few words in French on this item.

(Translation):

First, I would like to say what a happy choice it was when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) appointed Mr. Hees as Minister of Transport. It is true that it is not too easy to follow in the footsteps of men like the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and Mr. George Marler; but I must say that the present Minister of Transport knows his job, and that you will never find a more affable person. But knowing how very modest he is, I suppose he would not take issue with me when I say that even the passage of time will not give him the profound knowledge possessed by his predecessors.

On that note, I wish him the best of good luck—and that does not mean I hope he has to spend too long burdened with the administration of the Department of Transport.

I shall conclude these opening remarks by saying that he can consider it an honour to be appointed Minister of Transport. My personal experience has very often given me first-hand insight into the high standard of efficiency and the conscientiousness of senior officials and personnel in the Department of Transport. I am revolted at the childish and baseless charges made in the press by the one whom I must still call the "honourable" member for Brantford (Mr. Wratten).

Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the minister and congratulate him for his speech when he introduced his estimates. Considering the short time he has been in office, I think he has shown that he has really "gone to it" and that while he has perhaps not solved all the problems of Canadians in this field, he has grasped them. May I also pay tribute to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who held the portfolio of transport for 9 years and who personally announced the construction of the Beattyville-Chibougamau railroad.

Mr. Pigeon: By the skin of his teeth.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Oh, "by the skin of his teeth"! May I ask why? Of course, the jab comes from a government member; there are a few of them who like interjecting, which is just about all they're able to contribute to the debates of the house. Just the same I will—

Mr. Parizeau: Come to the point, assuming you have a point.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): If the member for Lake St. John (Mr. Parizeau) wanted to get up and say something perhaps we could reply to him—even regarding the Lake St. John airport in Alma.

I thank the former administration for having given us the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railway. Many things were said during the last elections, and even during the 1957 campaign, about the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railroad. I have no doubt that several members in the opposition, even my predecessor and Mr. Gagnon, the hon. member for Chicoutimi, have made inquiries in this house and took some steps in order to intercede with the minister. I do not deny that they made some effort, but I also want to commend Mr. Andre Gauthier, the distinguished predecessor of the hon. member for Lake St. John and also the former hon. member for Roberval, Mr. Georges Villeneuve, who urged my former employer, the Hon. George Marler, to proceed with the project. And I am all the better in a position to know what I am talking about because at that time I was Mr. Marler's humble secretary, and Messrs. Gauthier and Villeneuve pressed Mr. Marler so much that at one time the former minister of transport told me: "Now, you'll just have to tell them to stop bothering me; I know we must build a railway between St. Felicien and Chibougamau, and we are going to build it."

If I say this, Mr. Chairman, it is because many electors of the constituencies of Lake St. John, Lapointe, Chicoutimi and Roberval have heard another story. I do not in the least intend to minimize the merit of all those who spoke in favour of the railway between Chibougamau and St. Felicien. Mr. Gagnon spoke about it; my predecessor in the constituency of Lapointe, Mr. Girard, spoke about it, but the fact remains that the Liberal government gave us the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railway.

During the last election campaign and even during the campaign of 1957, I heard a candidate state that it was through the intervention of members of the opposition that the construction of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railroad had been decided. No doubt the committee will allow me to recall a witty remark made over television by a former Liberal member who said: "If you are willing to give credit to the Quebec Liberal opposition for the Talbot boulevard in our area, we are ready, on our part, to give credit to the Conservative opposition for the construction of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railroad".

In that connection, Mr. Chairman, I also wish to pay tribute to Mr. Grenier, the late lamented secretary of the Conseil économique de l'orientation du Saguenay. Before he died, over a year ago, he had made great efforts and had pleaded on several occasions with Mr. Marler for the construction of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railway.

The Minister of Transport will perhaps allow me, and I believe this is about all I am going to say on the first item because I do not want to take up all the time of the committee, to read a letter that was sent to me by the president of the brotherhood of railroad employees of my riding, about the lay-offs which have been made in that organization, respecting the number of miles for the section men in the Lake St. John-Saguenay areas.

Mr. Chairman, I beg your pardon, but I will only read a short part of this letter into the record. I hope that the minister will avail himself of the good offices of his deputy, who speaks French very well, or of those of the marine services where there are quite a number of people quite conversant in that language. As a matter of fact the minister himself speaks French very well indeed. I would like, then, to read a passage from a letter I have received from the chairman of the railway employees union of my area:

> At the regular quarterly meeting of the Brotherhood Maintenance of Way Employees' local 417, held at Jonquiere on April 5 last, it was proposed and unanimously carried that a letter should be sent to you to congratulate you on your election—

In this instance I am not alone. There are three other members from the area who were elected along with me. I continue:

> —and to wish you a long life in the service of Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that I will have a long life in the service of Canadians.

> I have also been asked to acquaint you with the facts and to ask your help to stop a project which high officials of the C.N.R. have been considering for a fairly long time, a decision which would not be very beneficial to our area since it would tend to lower the standards of security and speed, and to curtail the service and improvements on the "Laurentian" division. Under this project, the sections which now are 7 to 8 miles long and are manned by three sectionmen would be increased to 12 to 15 miles for about the same number of men, thus causing the dismissal of 50 or 60 regular workers out of a total number of 300 who look after 600 miles of railroad.
> As you are not acquainted with the work of regular sectionmen who look after the maintenance and upkeep of the railway line, I may tell you that a section crew is made up of a foreman and two men who have from 7 to 8 miles to maintain, which means that they have to patrol the area, inspect the rails, change them when necessary, change the sleepers, mend the fences, level the line, keep it straight, take care of public and farm crossings, of ditches, sideways, switches, in short maintain everything belonging to the C.N.R.
> Moreover, our winters with snow, ice and frost considerably increase the amount of work to be done.
> I shall add that the dieselization did not reduce our task so that, as in other departments, this changeover to another form of power cannot be invoked as a reason for decreasing the number of regular employees. Mr. Gordon once said that sectionmen were the backbone of the railways.

Consequently, their number cannot be reduced without endangering the security of the passengers, the employees and the equipment. People may say that in other divisions such a rearrangement of sections actually did take place, but I can assure you that ours is not comparable to any other.

I perfectly understand the attitude of the C.N.R. management in this respect. I do not want to criticize Mr. Gordon, because I have seen too many hon. members in the opposition, including the present hon. Minister of Transport, putting the blame on the National Railways authorities. I had the pleasure of working with several C.N.R. officials and I know—and to my mind the hon. Minister of Transport knows it too—that Mr. Gordon and his colleagues are doing a tremendous job for the Canadian National Railways. They do so in a spirit of devotion and competence, which is second to none among the employees to that of other crown corporations in our country.

I am not questioning the decision of the authorities. I merely note the fact that from 30 to 40 employees were laid off on account of that decision. I shall certainly not criticize the president of the Canadian National Railways for trying to administer the company intelligently and on a business-like basis. He is a very competent man and, I repeat, he is second to none in the country as far as competence is concerned in the exercise of his duties. However, the government will perhaps admit that there is a problem there, because among those who are laid off, there are married people with families to bring up, and who have worked 10, 12, or 15 years for the Canadian National Railways. They learned a trade that they cannot exercise in private industry, elsewhere than in the Canadian National Railways or in the Canadian Pacific Railways. That is a grim situation. I also ask the hon. minister, when the session is over, to have my speech read to one of his officials and to communicate with the C.N.R. authorities to see if there is no way of overcoming this thorny problem.

At the beginning of my remarks, I said I would not take up too much of the committee's time. I will just say this: I know the member for Saguenay (Mr. LaRue) complained this afternoon about the former Liberal administration not having done much for his constituency. Of course, he was careful not to refer to what they actually did; he simply concentrated on what they had not done in his riding. I do not reproach him for trying to help his riding, but regarding the former Liberal administration, he could have been a little more objective and could have tried to grant some credit.

I call upon the hon. minister to be good enough to have my speech read by one of his officials, so that he can tackle this problem; I thank him in advance for his kind attention.

(Text):

Mr. Garland: You are about to see an example, Mr. Chairman, of the benefit of an extended discussion. I came into the house last evening prepared to speak for at least 40 minutes. This morning, I changed my mind and cut that down by 50 per cent. This afternoon, as the discussion wore on, I threw away my speech. Tonight, I am only going to detain the committee for a short time to discuss one matter that is of real importance in my district and that is the problem that arises from the conflict of interests between navigation and the lumber interests in our district. It is a matter that is the result of what I might call the lack of teeth in the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

I am going to outline the problem as briefly as I can, then I should like to say what has been done about it and what I think should be done about it. It is a problem that can be fully corrected only by action of this parliament. It is brought about by what I might call the misuse of the Sturgeon river by certain companies, and in this case I have in mind one company, in the movement of logs down that river. The river is very important to the people of my district. There is the tourist industry, which is tremendously important; there are other activities across the lake and there are the local people who like to enjoy the facilities that the river provides. All of these people are handicapped by what I call the misuse of this river in these logging operations.

In the past when the drive was on in the spring the logs were shot down the river with complete disregard for the people who normally use those waters. The matter usually came to the attention of the council or chamber of commerce, and they in turn perhaps discussed the matter together and then went to the offending firm. Sometimes results were obtained. In later years, the matter generally came to the member of parliament. I know this process has been going on for the last 30 years. The member then would appeal to the minister. Until three or four years ago the member usually went to the minister of public works and members of the engineering branch, most of whom worked at that time out of Ottawa, used to visit the area. All of this takes time, and by the time the engineering branch visited the area, nature or the offending company had usually corrected the problem. However, there was no permanent solution.

Time went along, and in 1955 we were able to get the two companies that now use the river together with the Sturgeon Falls council and the members of the chamber of commerce. At that meeting there was a recognition of the problem and a promise that this misuse would not be committed in the future. Since that time the one company has been most co-operative and has avoided moving logs on holiday week-ends or when there was insufficient water in the river. They have had a regard for the interests of other people using these waters. The other company, it seems, still continues to disregard their responsibilities in this area.

As recently as a few days ago I received another telegram which I should like to take the time to read to the committee. This is a telegram from the Sturgeon Falls chamber of commerce and is directed to me. It reads:

Contractor for J. B. Smith Company started moving logs through sluice about ten days ago. Loose logs in Minniha-Sa bay and Sturgeon river makes navigation most dangerous. Conditions last week-end were the worst in past ten years. Tourists trying to go across the lake had to detour to Lavigne. It is evident that the contractor is deliberately disregarding safety of those travelling on the river. Several thousand logs were released last week-end even when it was apparent that waters above dam would not be released because of shortage. Please pray the Minister of Transport to see that conditions are remedied as soon as possible. Gordon Lumber Co. gave us full co-operation this year.

Mr. Chairman, I have stated the matter. I have brought it to the attention of the minister personally, and I know he is giving it his attention. Part I of the Navigable Waters Protection Act has to do with permits for construction of things in and on navigable waters. Part II of the Navigable Waters Protection Act deals with the use to which these waters can be put. I raised this matter when the Navigable Waters Protection Act was amended in 1956. At that time I thought perhaps an amendment could be made to part I. However, upon reflection, I think this legislation can only be amended as to part II. There could be a solution to this problem if teeth were put into this legislation. In the past, when officials of the department have gone to the area it would depend perhaps on how hard they stamped their feet whether or not they obtained desirable results. However, if teeth are put into this legislation this problem can be solved. I should like to suggest an interdepartmental committee. I had this suggestion close to realization at one time. I am now suggesting it again. I suggest that perhaps an interdepartmental committee could be set up of representatives of the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport to study this problem with a view to bringing in an amendment to the Navigable Waters Protection Act that would specifically spell out this problem and the corrective.

Before I take my seat I should like to thank the Minister of Transport for the kind and sympathetic attention he gave to a request earlier this year in connection with the relocating of the administration or terminal building at the North Bay airport. I would not want this opportunity to pass without thanking the minister on my own behalf and particularly on behalf of the chamber of commerce and the other people in my district who are so greatly interested. I wonder whether the minister has anything further to say as to the progress on that project.

Mr. Hees: I might just answer the hon. member now on that matter. I should like to assure him first of all that we are looking into the question that he first raised. I can tell him that we shall do our very best to work out the best possible solution for that very real problem which the people he has mentioned are running into.

Second, with regard to North Bay airport terminal building, I am glad to be able to report that a new civil area for development of civil terminal facilities has been selected quite separate from the military installations. Engineering planning is proceeding now and we hope that we may be able to commence some clearing during the winter this year and that with further development the construction contract can be let next year.

Mr. Stanton: Mr. Chairman, I will not take up too much time of the committee at this stage. I am going to take a cue from the minister in past years. He always said what he had to say in about ten minutes. It has always been my considered opinion that it should not take a person 30 minutes to build up what he had to say in ten minutes.

At this time, Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the minister for his kindness in the grant that he has given us in Leeds county and the city of Brockville for the municipal airport. I should like to bring to the attention of the committee something about which I have spoken frequently in past years, namely the condition of the railway station which we have had to put up with now for a good number of years. This station in Brockville is outdated and outmoded and if it stands much longer it will be outlawed. It was built shortly after the Grand Trunk railway was completed between Montreal and Toronto. I feel that it was built to accommodate the people of Brockville at a time when Brockville was a very small town. But I might say the population of Brockville has increased about 100 per cent in the past 18 years. It is now a thriving city. I believe that the people of Brockville are deserving of a station in proportion to the prospects for the future and that the industry which is thriving there at the present time merits nothing less. The city of Brockville is on the eastern outskirts of the Thousand islands and is indeed in what I might call Leeds the lovely.

I have another problem which I wish to bring before the committee this evening, namely the level crossing on William street in Brockville. It is extremely inconvenient. Not only that, but it is dangerous. Brockville is expanding to the north. That is the only way it has to expand. William street, which crosses the double tracks of the C.N.R. from Montreal to Toronto and also the main C.P.R. line from Brockville to Ottawa, is closed off by the several trains that pass over those tracks during the 24 hours of the day. It is a serious matter. We have schools in this vicinity and another large school is being built at the present time north of those tracks which children are obliged to cross. Not only that, but these tracks are closed off by passing trains and trains which are stationary at the station, sometimes for intervals of quite some duration.

I should like to give a good illustration of that situation. Not too long ago an ambulance was hurrying a patient to the hospital—a catastrophe patient—and it did not get there in time for medical aid. Not only that, but it has been known in the not too distant past that a maternity ambulance had to stop at this crossing and I might say that the results were rather regrettable. There are three highways passing over this street, namely highways 29, 42 and the road from the new highway 401, which bypasses Brockville. Increased traffic to Brockville will come over that route. Within another year traffic will be terrific and I say without hesitation that it is time that something is done with regard to this level crossing in order to make it less hazardous and more convenient for the people.

I have spoken on this matter on several occasions in this house but apparently what I have said has fallen on deaf ears. I am happy to state now that negotiations are under way at the present time between the three levels of government, namely the board of transport commissioners, the provincial department of highways and the municipal government of the city of Brockville. I am hopeful that no stone will be left unturned in an effort to bring about immediate improvements and that a subway or overpass may be constructed on this street which will make passage more convenient and less hazardous. I hope the minister will use his influence in every way he can to eliminate this obstacle and to further the building of this subway which will be much appreciated by the residents of the area which I have the honour to represent.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I wish to present to the new Minister of Transport a problem which I hope in the months ahead, when the pressure of work will not be so urgently upon him, he will very seriously consider and which I hope he will bring to the attention of his colleagues in the cabinet and to the attention of interested parties in the lower mainland of British Columbia in order to see whether or not a new approach can be instituted. I have in mind the problem of the Fraser river. We now have a new government and a new minister and I am hoping that he can restore a bit of order out of the mess of confusion which exists in the mouth of that river.

As the minister knows, we have in New Westminster what is known as the New Westminster harbour board; in south Burnaby we have the north Fraser harbour board, and we also have the national harbours board administering most of the other waters in and around the mouth of the Fraser river. Large areas of water and shoreline are really nobody's business at all, although technically speaking all of what used to be the wilderness areas of the waterfront were at one time assigned to the national harbours board and therefore come under the jurisdiction of the harbour master in Vancouver. Actually these areas have received no attention from the government, from the harbour master or from any of the harbour boards for a very long period of years, and with the upset of the government many of the municipalities concerned are very, very optimistic for the future and they are now hoping that out of the tens of millions of dollars voted annually for the purpose of looking after the mouth of the Fraser river a little bit of development will come their way.

There are many conflicting interests involved in the administration of the waters of the Fraser river and I believe it is not by evil design but that it is primarily because of these conflicting interests that many matters have not received attention which should have received attention and that very large sums of money now being voted each year are an absolute waste. The federal government has a number of ministers who are involved. When it comes to taking the water off the land, the Minister of Agriculture is concerned; when it comes to making surveys the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is concerned, and he has a large vote with respect to the Fraser river in his estimates; when it comes to taking sand out to enable ships to navigate and to building the breakwaters the Minister of Public Works is concerned. The Minister of Transport is concerned with the harbours in the area and the Minister of Agriculture is concerned with the problem of erosion of the rich agricultural land. The Minister of Fisheries is very much concerned with what happens in and around the mouth of the Fraser river and in an emergency, such as that which happened a few years ago in British Columbia, the whole cabinet is involved. On that occasion, in 1948, it had to vote many, many millions of dollars to augment the even greater number of dollars spent by the British Columbia government to alleviate the conditions caused by the flooding of the river. The Minister of Public Works is also involved with respect to this river when it comes to the building of bridges across it.

Our British Columbia government also has many ministers involved in what happens on the Fraser river. The minister in charge of highways has to look after the bridges, and the minister of fisheries in British Columbia is concerned. Another minister deals with the building of dikes along the river banks. The British Columbia government is vitally concerned that the river should be adequately used by the lumber interests and we have in the heart of my riding the largest sawmill in the British commonwealth, which is situated on the banks of the Fraser river. The government of British Columbia is also concerned that this river may be an important source for the development of hydroelectric energy. There are others who are concerned, it will be seen, besides the Minister of Transport. There are the farmers, the fishermen, the shipping interests, the longshoremen, the industrial concerns and those who are interested in the recreational possibilities of the shorelines of the lower mainland.

I remember the Minister of Public Works, when he was in the opposition, for some time advocating to the then minister of transport that that minister should accept the establishment of an advisory committee to the national harbours board and I believe that what the Minister of Public Works had in mind was that on this advisory committee might be found representatives of the various, and at times, conflicting, interests. The then minister of transport, after hours of coaxing, eventually agreed that there was merit in the suggestion of an advisory committee composed of local interests who were concerned with the matter, somewhat similar to that which existed in respect of the harbour board at Halifax. I understand, however, that such a committee has never been established; it was left more or less in the hands of one of the aldermen of the city of Vancouver, who apparently did very little about it.

I wish the minister would look into that possibility, particularly to see if an advisory committee established to assist the national harbours board in the administration of harbour facilities in the lower mainland could have on it adequate representation from the municipal corporations affected. I would like to go much further and to see established a Fraser river board or a Fraser river authority, having a board composed of representatives of all municipalities from the mouth of the Fraser all the way up to Hope. The federal and provincial governments might then reach an agreement whereby they could through their various authorities supply the technical and administrative personnel necessary. However, this Fraser river authority, constituted of all the interests concerned, would lay down the general policy as to how, when and where things were to be done along this vital river.

This river is of vital importance to most of the people of our province. On this Fraser river board should be, primarily, representatives of municipal bodies, of the shipping companies, of industrial interests—in particular, lumber and fisheries—of labour—the longshoremen's and fishermen's unions and the agriculture organizations.

What kind of work would this Fraser river board do? First of all it would do the work now being done by the national harbours board, the New Westminster board and the North Fraser harbour board. This board would replace these local boards and would undertake a much more comprehensive organization, an organization which would be much wider in its interests than the interests being served at the present time.

The first responsibility of a Fraser river board would be to undertake a complete survey of the potentialities of the river. This has been recommended to the Minister of Public Works and, I believe, to the Minister of Transport by the lower mainland regional planning board. This is an organization which has very excellent advisers. They have technical men on their payroll and they have received the active support of the municipal corporations along the banks of the Fraser, bodies from which they derive most of their income.

This lower mainland planning board has asked that the potentialities of this river be explored. We cannot have proper and economic development of this river unless a survey is made of all its potentialities. This would avoid much of the overlapping which now takes place. It would ensure that shipping interests would not be hampered from time to time by the lack of an adequate dredging program. For several weeks in almost each and every year ocean-going vessels cannot load grain because the federal government has not adequately carried out its responsibilities on this river. We would be able to obtain full utilization of all the resources that this river can afford. We would see a little harbour development in Burnaby, along the Pitt river and along the eastern end of the Fraser river. Up to now this river has been developed in a slipshod and haphazard manner; there has been no element of design attached to it. However, it is now time that we should realize we are either going to continue the mess we are in now or we are going to begin to utilize the river in such a manner as the ingenuity of the people concerned can best accomplish.

I should like to pass on two other thoughts. I hope the minister will at some time consider asking that the corporation of Burnaby, which has a railroad running through the centre of it, be supplied with a railway station if for no other purpose than to load and unload passengers and take on express. After all, the city of Toronto has all kinds of places where the trains stop on the way to and from the city. Montreal has the same facilities. We are asking for the same thing in Burnaby. We do not like to go through heavy traffic for many miles to the railway stations at New Westminster or Vancouver.

I should like to thank the department for deciding against locating an auxiliary airport in my riding. The people in my riding have long been apprehensive lest the quiet of their homes be disturbed by the noise and by the danger which is involved in living next door to an airfield. I understand that the department has now developed an auxiliary airport in the Pitt Meadows area and I should like the minister if possible to give a report on the progress being made in the development of that airfield.

Mr. McWilliam: Mr. Chairman, I know the committee is anxious to pass this main item. I will therefore move directly to the local matter I wish to raise.

In the constituency of Northumberland-Miramichi there has been a continuing problem facing the department in connection with the dominion government telephone line which serves the area from Black river bridge to Escuminac on the south side of Miramichi bay.

There is a heavy concentration in this area of people who are engaged for the most part in the fishing industry and who reside, in the main, along the Chatham-Escuminac highway. Their only means of telecommunication is the federal government telephone line. This telephone line was constructed many years ago, primarily as an aid to navigation as a connection link between Chatham and the marine lighthouse at Escuminac point but also for the dispatch of pilots from shore to ship to guide ocean going steamers to inshore ports along the Miramichi river for cargoes of lumber, and to relay notification of the steamer's arrival at point Escuminac to transport and customs and excise officials at Chatham.

This telephone line has never been properly equipped to a point that assured services under all conditions, despite the concentrated efforts of the maintenance crew and the diligent work of the board operators. Over the years the department has expended moneys for the upkeep of the line but expenditures were never sufficient to bring it to the standard of other telephone systems operating in the province.

The department's expenditures may have been based on the revenue derived from this line. I know that revenues have decreased of late years and that collections have been difficult. One reason why collections have been poor and why patrons whose accounts were always promptly paid have discontinued the service is the poor service rendered, particularly at nights.

In the first place the equipment is not adequate to provide uninterrupted service. Many times there has been no service for periods of two and three days and on occasions for a full week. Another reason—and a very important one— is that the service is operated only during day time. During the night it is not possible to contact a clergyman or doctor or nurse. When medical care is required during the night there is no way to contact the closest doctor at Chatham, up to 30 miles away, except by driving over the highway and during storms in the wintertime that is almost impossible.

For several years I have made representations to the department outlining existing conditions and urging that the line be adequately equipped. The situation is becoming worse even to the point of a curtailment in the hours during which operators are on duty. The department should either provide adequate service or offer their franchise and equipment to a public utility company, as a solution which I previously advanced to the department. Even if the department turned over the entire equipment gratis and granted a subsidy in respect of the telephone service for the lighthouse and pilots, the government would save money.

Telephone service in this area is away out of step with the standard enjoyed in other places. It is an important fishing area and adequate telephone connections are essential for this and other obvious reasons. Even the British empire lightweight champion, Yvon Durelle, who lives in this area has to drive to Chatham to make his telephone contacts. It is difficult to realize that in the year 1958 a well-populated area settled hundreds of years ago is so inadequately served. I trust the minister will see to it that this area receives telephone service in keeping with modern day requirements and that this problem will not be sidestepped further by small annual expenditures that only put salve on the sore.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Transport I should like to inquire of the minister whether or not it is his intention to proceed at this session with the resolution standing on the order paper in his name to amend the Transport Act to provide for the appointment of a transport controller. I ask this in view of the great interest that has been taken in the Bracken royal commission on boxcars and their distribution. As people who are acquainted with this problem well know, if any major step is to be taken to provide a fair basis for the distribution of boxcars at elevator points in the prairie region it is quite possible and indeed almost likely that authority such as is requested in this resolution would be required.

I can see no reason the government might have had for placing this resolution on the order paper other than its belief that this power was needed as a result of the pending report of the Bracken commission. If it is needed or if it is likely to be needed then I feel the legislation should be passed during this session. If on the other hand the government knows that Mr. John Bracken in his report will not be suggesting anything that will require such power or will not be making any recommendation that will require such power before the next session of parliament then I do not feel there is any reason for the government to go forward with this resolution. In other words, if the government believes the power that would flow from having passed this measure is required, I for one am fully prepared to support it. If on the other hand the government believes that this power is not necessary between now and the next session of parliament then I can see no reason for proceeding. I should like the minister to tell me whether it is needed in the light of any report that may be made by the Bracken commission.

Mr. Hees: I am very glad to answer that question, Mr. Chairman. Since introducing this legislation I have looked into the matter very carefully and I can see no indication of any need for such legislation between now and the next session of parliament and so I have withdrawn the legislation. If at some future time it appears that a controller is needed then legislation to appoint one will be introduced.

Mr. Argue: I believe the minister has taken a very reasonable position. I am not asking the minister to comment on this but it would suggest to me very definitely that Mr. John Bracken will not be reporting anything to the government that would require this type of power between now and the next session of parliament. I realize, of course, that other powers may be available, for example, under the Canadian Wheat Board Act or that a solution could be found through some measure other than the one to which the minister referred.

I wish to support all those organizations, provincial governments and members of this house who have impressed upon the government the need to provide a toll-free seaway. The people of the prairies and industries in eastern Canada have looked forward to the establishment of the St. Lawrence seaway as a means of providing great savings to their industries and have shared the hope that on the completion of the seaway it would be made toll-free. They are disturbed not only by the report of the minister that tolls will be levied on the seaway but also by the reported possibility that tolls may be levied on the Welland canal. They believe this is a retrograde step and something the government should resist. Knowing the many statements made by hon. members of the Conservative party in the past to the effect that they would support Canadian interests when they came into conflict with United States interests, I express the hope that the Canadian government will exert its influence to make the seaway toll-free.

I have examined a number of submissions that have been made in this regard by many organizations and I find the body of opinion supporting a toll-free seaway is very substantial indeed. Representations have been made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, by the interprovincial farm union council and by a well known and important newspaper of this country, the Globe and Mail, which, in spite of a few screwball editorials and a recent one in particular which comes to my mind, is in my opinion a newspaper of very high stature in Canada. I believe it is becoming, as it were, Canada's New York Times. In a thoughtful editorial in the Globe and Mail in the issue of July 29 it is pointed out that there should be no tolls on the Welland canal.

Also in opposition to tolls on the Welland canal are the great lakes fleet owners, the Steel Company of Canada, the Niagara Peninsula communities, the province of Saskatchewan and the province of Manitoba. Indeed, a very large percentage of the Canadian public as represented by these organizations and provincial governments believe that Canada's policy should be a toll-free seaway.

The Minister of Transport in the past has given his version of what a system of tolls might save in the way of lower freight rates on grain. The people of the prairies are naturally interested in the St. Lawrence seaway in the hope that it will reduce their freight rate burden both on goods being shipped to the west and on goods being shipped to the east and particularly on grain shipments. They have noted with a great deal of concern as I am sure the government also has that the route through Port Arthur and Fort William, through the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river, in relation to the west route through Vancouver, in recent years has become relatively uneconomical for the movement of grain.

When appearing before the agriculture committee of this house during this session the chairman of the Canadian wheat board W. C. MacNamara gave figures relating to the cost of shipping through various routes. We were informed that to ship wheat from Fort William to Montreal cost 22¼ cents a bushel. To trans-ship this wheat to the United Kingdom from Montreal costs 14.4 cents a bushel. On the other hand, the total rate out of Vancouver to the United Kingdom is only 18 cents a bushel that is compared with the total eastern rate of more than 36 cents a bushel.

The minister said that the St. Lawrence seaway would result in a saving of 4 cents a bushel to the shippers of wheat. In the agricultural committee I asked the chairman of the wheat board the following question:

> Do you know whether or not the saving might be in the neighbourhood of 4 or 5 cents a bushel?

To this question the chairman of the Canadian wheat board replied:

> No. I think that is anybody's guess. I will be pleasantly surprised if it results in a saving of 4 cents per bushel for our producers.

I should like the minister, if he can, to give the committee the assurance once again that the use of the St. Lawrence seaway will result in a minimum saving of 4 cents a bushel. I know that the minister must have had very good grounds for making this statement but I also believe that the chairman of the Canadian wheat board is an expert on all matters relating to wheat and it was disturbing to me to hear him state that he would be pleasantly surprised if the seaway results in a saving of 4 cents per bushel. I repeat my suggestion to the minister that in so far as possible the St. Lawrence seaway should be toll free.

There is another matter I wish to raise on item one of these estimates. I refer to the whole question of C.N.R. lay-offs and the policy of the C.N.R. with regard thereto. On previous occasions I have raised during this session the matter of lay-offs by the C.N.R. at various shops across the country and in reply to my questions the Minister of Transport has always said that he would be quite prepared to discuss the matter with the C.N.R. management. While I have no doubt that the minister has always discussed this matter with the C.N.R. following requests in the house, little seems to have been gained by these discussions and the lay-offs are continuing.

The lay-offs seem to be taking place at a large number of points across Canada. I have in my hand a letter from the Moncton and district labour council sent to me on June 13 of this year which reads in part as follows:

> Commencing a short time after the election, lay-offs in the C.N.R. have been constant—small, but constant. There is every indication that the eventual padlocking of the C.N.R. shops in Moncton is on the planning board.

That is a very strong statement made by J. E. McAllister, secretary of the Moncton and district labour council. He goes on to say, and I believe this has been discussed before in the house, that the Minister of Transport, according to newspaper reports and in statements made during television appearances, had assured the people of Moncton that this thing would not happen in the future. I think it is time that the C.N.R. and the minister gave the people who are employed by the railway company some indication whether or not they can look forward to a reasonable degree of security in their work in the months and years that lie ahead.

I know it will be said that nothing can stop progress and nothing should stop progress, and that these people are merely casualties because of technological improvement. That may be an answer that satisfies some people but it does not satisfy the men who are affected. If Canada had a full employment economy at the present time these men could look for comparable opportunities in other industries and the complaint would not be nearly so serious. But there is every danger, in spite of anything that has been said, that as these men are laid off they will be added to the unemployed rolls in the country. Perhaps I might make reference to an article that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of Saturday, July 15, 1958. The writer is Michael Harris and he is dealing with a statement made by Mr. George D. Battigelli, secretary-treasurer of district lodge No. 2, international association of machinists, railroad division. The article reads in part as follows:

As an example of progressive reductions, he cited the proposed lay-offs at the Stratford, Ont. shops—150 men at July 11, 70 at August 1, 70 at September 1, 60 at October 1, and 200 between April 1 and October 1, 1959—making a total of 550 shop craftsmen. These cuts will involve machinists, electricians, pipefitters, painters, carpenters, sheet metal workers, blacksmiths' helpers and other helpers and apprentices. Mr. Battigelli thinks the Stratford shops will be closed down before those at Fort Rouge.

Earlier in the article it is pointed out that C.N.R. employees at Winnipeg are very concerned about the rising lay-offs at the C.N.R. shops, particularly the Fort Rouge shop, and the report that this shop will be entirely closed in the future. I have merely given these examples of C.N.R. lay-offs to impress upon the minister again the importance of giving the House of Commons and these employees something more tangible by way of an answer than the answer we have heard heretofore, namely that the minister will discuss the matter with the C.N.R. management, without any indication being given that anything was done as a result of his representations.

If these changes are necessary in the future it would seem to me that as long as we have widespread unemployment the lay-offs should be postponed until employment picks up. From the national standpoint I can see no advantage in putting these people on the unemployed rolls now merely to draw unemployment insurance or to be a burden on the country in some other way. It would seem to me that it would be logical at this time for the government to do everything possible to see that these people retain their jobs. When the minister replies I hope he will be able to give the men who have been or may be affected greater encouragement than he has been able to give in the past.

Mr. Morris: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Morris: Does the hon. gentleman, who is the leader of the C.C.F., not think that the interests of organized labour in the east, which he alluded to in his reference to the railway workers at Moncton, would be severely harmed if the government were to take his advice and institute a toll-free St. Lawrence seaway? Would that not affect labour in the east seriously?

Mr. Argue: I do not think that at all. I for one do not feel that you can play the interests of one part of Canada against the interests of another. I am in favour of steps being taken that will improve the economic standards of people in all parts of Canada. One of the main reasons there is widespread unemployment across the nation today is the fact that the prairie grain producers are in a state of recession. I know that members of the government, including the Minister of Transport, have given very careful consideration recently to some help for the grain producers.

But I would suggest with great respect to the government that they should do a whole lot better in this regard than has been indicated by certain leaks in the newspapers to date. If they did that, it would take care of some of the problems to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. Hees: I should like to answer the two questions which the hon. member for Assiniboia put to me. First, he was asking me to guarantee a saving of four cents a bushel on grain being moved from the lakehead to Montreal. This, of course, I cannot do and never intended to do. When I was asked I said the best estimate I was able to make, based on the best economic information I was able to obtain, was that it was hoped and expected that the saving on a bushel of grain being transferred from the lakehead to Montreal would be four cents. Naturally, I cannot guarantee anything of that kind. All I can do is to give the best estimate available to me to make.

Secondly, the hon. member asked me to give some assurance to the workers on the Canadian National that their jobs would remain intact. This, of course, is another thing, as I think the hon. member knows, but it is impossible for me to do. The management of the railway is, by statute, responsible for all matters to do with the running of the railway. I have, as I have told my hon. friend and other members in this house when questions about Canadian National employment have been brought up, in every case brought these cases to the attention of the management and have discussed them with the management. The management has assured me, as I have informed the house, that wherever it is possible to keep an employee working, that is done. Employees are only let out very reluctantly and when there is absolutely no work for an employee to do. I am afraid I cannot give the hon. member or the house any more information about future employment possibilities on the Canadian National than that.

Mr. Argue: I think that if it is impossible for the minister, through his negotiations, to give us any more assurance than he has been able to do tonight, then surely it is the responsibility of the government to provide in Canada an economy in which there is full employment. We have gone over the cabinet ministers, almost one by one, during this session to try to find out if one of the cabinet ministers or the government itself had any plan or any program to provide full employment in this country. I, for one, have heard nothing of any program that would suggest to me that full employment was something to which we could look forward in the near future. As a matter of fact, there has been no indication yet that the government has a winter employment program, and without an adequate winter program the fears of the people who may face lay-offs from the Canadian National shops are, of course, greatly increased.

I wonder if I may ask the minister a question as to whether, as a result of his discussions with Canadian National management, he can assure the house and the workers involved in Winnipeg that the report by Mr. A. J. Crofts and the Winnipeg Free Press of July 15 to the effect that, the Fort Rouge shops at Winnipeg will be closed by 1960, is not correct? Apparently the newspaper has some information as to the planning and program of the Canadian National. I would think the minister would be able to get, without difficulty, information from the Canadian National about its plans for the shops in Winnipeg, the Strathcona and Fort Rouge shops. Apparently the chief concern at this time is that further lay-offs will be made and that by 1960 there will be a complete closing of the Fort Rouge shops.

Mr. Hees: In answer to that question, I may say that I am aware of no such plan. I shall be glad to speak to the management of the Canadian National to ascertain if any such plan exists, but I have not heard of it.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister, either in the house or by letter, would communicate to me the result of his discussion with the management?

Mr. Hees: Yes, I shall be glad to do that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Batten: I just want to take a few moments of the committee's time to bring to the attention of the minister one or two points concerning my own riding. I should like, first of all, to talk about the city of Corner Brook and the facilities which are needed there. Corner Brook is the second city in Newfoundland. It is the site of, if not the largest the second largest integrated newsprint mill in the world. In addition to that, it is also a transshipping point for the northern coast of western Newfoundland. For these two reasons, there is within that area a great deal of shipping, by rail and by boat.

I know that at the moment improvements are being made to the railyard, improvements which I believe will add much to the facilities of the area. However, there is one fear that the people within the city have, and that is that it is possible to have this yard expanded, then have some type of dock built there, and to arrive at a position where there is a good dock and a railyard and yet the one is not complementary to the other because of the locations. I wonder if, when we come to the proper item of the minister's estimates, he would be able to give some information regarding the Canadian National railyard at Corner Brook.

The Canadian National now maintains the old public building which exists in the city of Corner Brook. I believe they rent part of it to the provincial government. I should like to suggest to the minister that he, in turn, suggest to the Canadian National that one improvement that could be made in the Canadian National service within the city is to have a ticket office installed in that old public building. Actually the railway station is a little out of the way. It is down on the waterfront, which is a very busy section. I think it would be extremely convenient to the travelling public if they were able to go to an office in the public building, which is in the central part of the city, and there buy railway tickets or make reservations which they want to make. I seriously make that recommendation to the minister in the hope he will, in turn, make it to the officials of the Canadian National.

Undoubtedly, the minister is aware, and I am sure the officials of his department are, that at various times within the port of Corner Brook we have a serious icebreaking problem. Following the winter of 1956-57 it was well into the month of June before ships were able to move newsprint from the port of Corner Brook to the markets of the world. Various representations have been made by the company, by the unions and by other bodies, both to the minister and to the officials of his department for icebreaking service in that area. In the spring of 1957 the mill was completely tied up because it was impossible to ship by boat. We were fortunate at that time in being able to secure the services of a United States navy icebreaker the U.S.S. Edisto, which was able to come into Corner Brook and break the ice there Afterwards, we were able to look after it ourselves. In the meantime we also had the service of the icebreaker N.B. McLean, which did a fine job around that section of the coast in breaking the ice and starting off spring transportation. May I digress here for a moment to pay tribute to the captains and crews of both the U.S.S. Edisto and the N.B. McLean for the fine job that was done at that particular time.

May I once again urge the minister that in making his plans for icebreaking both in the lower St. Lawrence and on the west coast of Newfoundland particular attention be given to a problem which can be a serious one if the port is blocked by ice during the winter period. If the port is blocked for any prolonged period the company is not able to ship its paper. Neither are the various commercial concerns able to bring in commodities as cheaply as they can by water. The result is that in the paper industry, where the market is very competitive at the moment, 12 per cent is added to the cost of the paper. Considering the many other transportation costs in Newfoundland this added expense results in a cost which is very restrictive in the paper industry of Newfoundland. I would therefore urge the minister to give consideration to this problem of icebreaking within bay of Islands and the port of Corner Brook.

Before I leave the C.N.R. there is one other thing I should like to say. Dotted along the railway line in Newfoundland are small flag stations. These stations are not looked after by a caretaker. The station is just a small building where people can wait to board a train or where a small quantity of freight can be taken off a train or where freight can be put to be loaded on the train upon its arrival. These small flag stations dotted across the country are sometimes found to be in a state of serious disrepair. It would cost very little to have these small buildings kept in good repair all the year round. I should like to suggest to the minister than an effort be made to have these small flag stations repaired and painted. That procedure would add to the appearance of the C.N.R. property along the line.

We have down the northern coast of Newfoundland an area which, over the past few years, has had very little telegraph and telephone communication. The service there now is not only incompatible with present day needs but it does not even measure up to the standard which was experienced by people 30 years ago. Many representations have been made to the Canadian National Telegraphs and every time the reply is given that the cost of installing the necessary equipment is so great, compared with the revenue which could be derived, that they feel they are not prepared to make the necessary outlay.

I would suggest to the minister that somewhere between the aims of a commercial body trying to make a profit and a government body trying to operate a service for the people there arises the question of service. I would hope that the minister would either get the Canadian National Telegraphs to look into this problem or the Department of Transport itself to take over this area and service the telegraph and telephone services as it is doing in some other places. The area to which I refer is the area on the west coast of Newfoundland north of Bonne bay on the Port au Port peninsula and the area from St. George's west to the Codray valley. These areas are very poorly served by telegraph and by telephone. If there is no other solution, if the Canadian National Telegraphs is not able to handle the problem I would hope that some arrangement can be made with the Department of Transport to have this matter looked into and promptly dealt with.

Last year the Department of Transport was able to build on Kepple island near Port Saunders on the St. Barbe coast a very fine lighthouse and fog horn and a residence for the keeper. To date however this installation is not working. I should like to recommend to the minister that this installation be put into operation at the earliest possible date. It is an important one. Many of the ships that travel up and down the coast such as the C.N.R. boats have their navigation aids such as radar and so on. However the smaller boats have no navigational aids and they need the services which this lighthouse and the fog alarm are able to give.

During the debate on this first item of the estimates of the Department of Transport we have heard on more than one occasion today mention of the motor vessel William Carson. I understand that the William Carson went into Port aux Basques yesterday. I would hope that when we come to that particular item the minister will be able to give us some report on that trial run. Although it has not been stated it has been intimated that possibly it will be found that the harbour at Port aux Basques is not suitable for the William Carson and that maybe some other port will have to be found.

Let me first say—and here I agree with my colleague the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo—that in the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada it was agreed that this ferry should operate from North Sydney to Port aux Basques. If, however, it should happen that the harbour at Port aux Basques is not found to be suitable for the William Carson, it is my belief that the only alternative port for the William Carson would be that of Corner Brook. Here there are rail facilities. For those who are travelling by boat there are hotel facilities. It would be an admirable solution to a difficult problem should the port of Port aux Basques be found unsuitable for the motor vessel William Carson.

I have a number of other small questions, Mr. Chairman, but I think I shall leave those until we come to the particular items.

Item agreed to.

415. The St. Lawrence river joint board of engineers—Canadian section, $132,090.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask just one question. Are the duties of the St. Lawrence river joint board of engineers completed now or will they be completed soon?

Mr. Hees: We expect that their duties will be terminated with the completion of the seaway early next year.

Item agreed to.

Canal services—

416. Administration, $162,855.

Mr. Chevrier: On canals, perhaps I could bring to the attention of the minister one matter. With the opening of the seaway will disappear the Soulanges canal and the Ontario-St. Lawrence canals, thereby putting out of work many hundreds of people. I know that a committee had been established, even when I was occupying another position, to deal with this problem. I would simply bring to the attention of the minister the fact that in so far as the Soulanges canal is concerned, I believe there are perhaps not a sufficient number of positions on the Beauharnois canal to look after them but certainly a large number of them could be looked after, and I hope that will be done. However, the position is not quite the same with respect to the Ontario-St. Lawrence canals. I think the minister said the other day some 70 people would be out of work. May I make this suggestion to him. With the headquarters building at Cornwall there will be, with maintenance staff, elevator operators and so on, perhaps some 14 or 15 positions; I do not know how many. But it seems to me that those men who are out of work in the canal services should be given preference for those positions. I hope it will be possible for him to do that on the new Iroquois lock and that the employees of the St. Lawrence canals will be given preference.

Mr. Hees: I want to assure the hon. member that this matter is receiving very intensive study at the present time. We are working with the St. Lawrence seaway authority on the matter. Everything possible will be done to place these displaced employees.

418. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, including payments to provinces or municipalities as contributions towards construction done by those bodies, $2,531,177.

Mr. McMillan: The minister was asked several questions and I thought probably he intended to reply to some of those questions. We do not want to repeat them all over again if the minister has the answers.

Mr. Hees: I will be very glad to answer the questions put a little earlier by the hon. member for Welland. First, he asked me if the government agreed that pilotage is necessary in restricted waters, and I am very glad to assure him that the government agrees that this is so. In reply to his second question, I assure him the government is not taking any sides in the great lakes dispute. We have no jurisdiction in the matter and are taking no sides. Thirdly, I wish to advise him that the Welland ship canal will be taken over by the seaway by means of an order in council early next year.

In reply to his next question, tolls on the seaway are still under consideration and the toll structure will be proclaimed by order in council when it is finally decided upon.

The fifth question had to do with the commencement of work on the old canal clean-up. This work will be started this autumn.

Finally, the hon. member asked if in my opinion we had too many men employed in his district during the last election, and I am very glad to assure him that we did not have too many men employed there but that we had too few shovels.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it that this means the operation and control of the Welland canal will now be entrusted to the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Mr. Hees: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Chevrier: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which was forcibly brought to my own attention just yesterday, and that is that the Department of Transport has built a new asphalt road on the north side of the Lachine canal which is being used, I am told, exclusively by the Montreal transportation commission for the operation of the buses which are now taking the place of the Montreal tramways. These buses serve Lachine and the surrounding municipalities.

This road was originally known as Le Chemin de Touage, and it was opened to the public, but since this asphalt road has been constructed it has been closed and it is only by means of a pass that persons who, for instance, want to get to work at the Turcot yards of the Canadian National Railways or at Ville Saint-Pierre can get through. The point I am making is that although it is true that this is not public property but is owned by the Department of Transport, it does seem to me that it should not be closed to the public but rather that it should be used by the public as it was in the past. I know that the minister cannot be aware of all these things, but perhaps he would be good enough to bring it to the attention of his officers with that end in view.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. Bourget: Could the minister give us a breakdown of item 418, just for construction?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, there are a great many items here, I think too many to give in any complete detail, but if the hon. member wishes I will be glad to give him the total monetary values by systems.

For the Cornwall system, $152,000; for Williamsburg, $142,500; for St. Peter's, Nova Scotia, $6,400; for Canso, Nova Scotia, $180,000; total covering Ontario, St. Lawrence and Nova Scotia systems of $465,400.

Mr. Bourget: In order to save the time of the committee, perhaps the minister might tell me if there are any big projects involved so far as construction is involved, let us say over $200,000?

Mr. Hees: Yes, the Lachine canal project is $500,000, but that is the only single item of any size.

Mr. Bourget: May I ask the minister if the plans and specifications are prepared for these works in the department or are they prepared outside of the department by consulting engineers or architects?

Mr. Hees: For large jobs such as the project I have just mentioned we employ an outside firm of engineers, but in the case of the smaller jobs the work is done by our own engineers.

Item agreed to.

Marine services—

421. Construction or acquisition of vessels and equipment, $22,230,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this is a pretty large item, and I presume it has to do with the icebreakers which the minister mentioned earlier. Would he give us a breakdown of the number of vessels and the marine districts in which they will be used?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for St. John's Newfoundland agency has an estimated cost of $2,500,000—in this year's estimates the figure is $1 million. For the lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for Halifax agency, the estimated cost is $3,250,000—this year's estimates $1,850,000. The lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for Charlottetown agency, estimated cost $2 million—in this year's estimates $1 million. The lighthouse supply and buoy vessel Saint John, New Brunswick agency, estimated cost $1,500,000—in this year's estimates $900,000. An icebreaker for our northern areas, estimated cost $12 million—this year's estimates $5 million.

Mr. Chevrier: Based where, please?

Mr. Hees: It will be based in the lower St. Lawrence area.

Mr. Chevrier: Is that Halifax or Quebec?

Mr. Hees: We have not yet decided on the home port. An icebreaker, diesel electric, estimated cost $3,200,000—this year's estimates $2,050,000.

Mr. Chevrier: What district is that one for, please?

Mr. Hees: That will be based in the lower St. Lawrence and the gulf area, but we also have not as yet decided on the home port for that ship. Further details along the lines requested by the hon. gentleman are as follows: a lightship for the Quebec agency, estimated cost, $720,000—$600,000 in this year's estimates; a service vessel for the St. Lawrence ship channel service, estimated cost, $1,300,000—$1,150,000 in this year's estimates; a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the Sorel agency, estimated cost $1,500,000—there is a mistake there—the estimated cost for that ship is $700,000—$600,000 in this year's estimates; a survey and service vessel for the Sorel agency, $1 million—$600,000 in this year's estimates; a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the Parry Sound agency, $2,400,000—$1,500,000 in this year's estimates; a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the Prince Rupert, B.C. agency, $3,900,000—$2,340,000 in this year's estimates; a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the Victoria, B.C. agency, $2 million —$1 million in this year's estimates; workboats for Fort Smith, Northwest Territories Agency, $190,000 in this year's estimates; conversion and refit of the Labrador, $500,000 in this year's estimates: lightering equipment for northern resupply operations, $3,420,000 in this year's estimates; construction or acquisition of equipment, $30,000 in this year's estimates. That total amounts to $23,730,000, less $1,500,000 short fall, giving a total of $22,230,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I notice there is no supply or buoy vessel for either Quebec or Montreal districts.

Mr. Hees: We have just completed two ships for that area, the Montcalm and the Montmorency, and one of the new icebreakers which we are building will probably be used in that area.

Mr. Bourget: Looking at the details of this item on page 547, am I right in assuming that for all those ships tenders have been asked in the previous fiscal year?

Mr. Hees: All have been called by tender but some have been called in the present fiscal year.

Mr. Bourget: Can the minister give us a list of those ships for which tenders have been called this fiscal year?

Mr. Hees: I am advised that six were called last winter. The expenditure starts in the present fiscal year but they were actually called in the past fiscal year.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask if any of these have been allocated through the Canadian maritime commission and the defence purchasing board?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bourget: I remember that the minister some time during the last session gave us a list of ships for which tenders were asked—I think it was in February last. So I am wondering if the department had a new program for new ships in this present fiscal year.

Mr. Hees: There will probably be five new tenders called in this coming winter.

Item agreed to.

Aids to navigation—

422. Administration, operation and maintenance, including a contribution to the international association of lighthouse authorities in the amount of 2,000 Swiss francs, notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the estimated equivalent in Canadian dollars that is detailed in the estimates, $5,868,450.

Mr. Herridge: Because of the rapidly increasing traffic in small craft from the Grand Coulee dam on the Columbia in the United States to as far north as Revelstoke I would urge that every consideration be given to installing aids to navigation. There has been some improvement in recent years, but the minister probably knows the channel between the international boundary and Castlegar. In that channel there is a nine knot current with rocks at various places in the river and one has to follow a careful course in order to keep out of difficulty. There is also a need for good markers between Cottonwood point in the Narrows and West Demars also between Arrowhead and Revelstoke. I mention this on behalf of a number of local organizations and also on behalf of an increasing number of United States tourists who are using small craft and, in some cases, quite large cruisers on these waters.

About four years ago at the request of one of the captains on the steamer I took a trip down the whole river. I know the river like a book. He was interested to find out how many buoys and reflectors were missing. I found 11 buoys out of place in one very bad channel, and a number of shore reflectors were gone. The person who had been paid to do the work had apparently not been on the job for a year; he had not been near the buoys or the reflectors. That situation has now been corrected but I suggest that a thorough survey be made of the river in view of the increasing traffic and satisfactory aids to navigation should be put in which would be understood by persons operating small craft. I was wondering whether any chart is provided for the guidance of persons operating small craft coming from the United States containing information as to the meaning of the buoys—black, red or striped—or as to the meaning of certain reflectors, because a 100-foot deviation from the true channel could mean the wrecking of any one of these small vessels.

Mr. Hees: I will have to consult the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys who are in charge of the hydrographic survey to find out if such charts are available.

Mr. Herridge: In view of this very interesting and rapidly increasing traffic, if no chart is available could the minister see that some simple chart is provided for people coming up the river so they would know what the different markings mean?

Mr. Hees: I will ask about that.

Item agreed to.

426. Steamship inspection service, including the carrying out of the provisions of the conventions for the safety of life at sea and load lines and contributions as detailed in the estimates, $999,901.

Mr. Herridge: I am sorry to interrupt again, but I have been asked to bring this question to the attention of the minister. I want to speak on lifesaving equipment very briefly and ask a question or two. We all know that because of the great increase in the number of small craft on all the rivers and lakes of Canada there has been a necessity for legislation providing for regulations and licensing. This has created a very improved situation, and I want to compliment the minister and his officials on "Safety Afloat". I have distributed a goodly number around the constituency to launch clubs and boat owners and people of that sort and they appreciated it very much.

However, I do want to say this: The present life jackets that are approved by the Department of Transport are not altogether satisfactory. They are satisfactory on large vessels where you have time to put them on and adjust and tie them but they are not satisfactory for use on small craft. In the first place they are most uncomfortable to wear all the time. Secondly, accidents in small craft occur very quickly and there is little or no time to tie the blasted things on. In addition to that I want to point out I have been informed by some ladies that they are most uncomfortable to wear in the boat and most difficult to adjust at times—to put it as delicately as possible—owing to the contours of their bodies. I have some experience in that field—I mean boating. I mention that seriously.

There is a type of jacket or vest without sleeves that can be worn with comfort. I make a point of having the family put these on. Not only are they comfortable but, as far as I know, they are practical and safe but I understand these vests or jackets are not approved or recommended by the department at the present time. I suggest that there should be some further study made of the value of these jackets and with regard to their being recommended to the public at large as well as with respect to their improvement.

In recent months in Canada there have been a number of cases where persons were found drowned on account of accidents in small boats and who were discovered in the water wearing the standard type of life jacket but put on improperly; their heads were in the water, and so on. It is a serious matter and I believe the department should give further consideration to it and educate the public to understand that these vests or jackets are approved by the department and are the best thing to wear. The department should urge people to wear them when boating. If this were done I believe we would reduce the number of deaths through boating accidents.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer the hon. member on that question.

Mr. Chevrier: I shouldn't!

Mr. Hees: I believe the answer is that if people are going out in small craft in dangerous weather that is rough or windy they should put on their life jackets before they go out. Secondly, we try to bring this to the attention of the public in our booklet entitled, "Safety Afloat". Thirdly, we have a committee of the department which is working constantly with the boating industry and the manufacturers of life-saving equipment in an attempt to work out better designs for life jackets and life-saving equipment.

427. Marine reporting service, $157,734.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, before we complete the marine service item I wonder if the minister could tell us if it is the intention of the department to build an extension to the King's wharf in Quebec city which project was commenced under the program of the previous administration?

Mr. Hees: It is the Queen's wharf, Mr. Chairman, and the answer is yes.

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship services—

432. Newfoundland ferry and terminals, $3,637,000.

Mr. Tucker: Does this item include Bell Island in Newfoundland?

Mr. Hees: No, it does not include the Bell Island service. This is a service carried out by the C.N.R. for the government.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, what is the relationship between vote 432 and vote 436? Would the minister explain that?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, vote 432 is the operating deficit for those ferries; vote 436 is the construction vote.

Mr. Carter: That is what I wanted to get at, Mr. Chairman. Vote 432 is the operating deficit. That deficit is charged to the Newfoundland ferry but it covers payments other than for the William Carson. Any one glancing at this item would assume that $3,637,000 was the deficit on the William Carson and it is nothing of the sort. I should like the minister to clarify that further.

Mr. Hees: It covers the deficit on 15 different ships, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, earlier today I asked the minister if he could give a breakdown of the cost of the William Carson and the harbour improvement at Port aux Basques.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The cost of the William Carson was $10,959,429. The cost of the new Port aux Basques dock and terminal facilities is $5,538,131 and for the North Sydney dock and terminal facilities, $3,572,236.

Mr. Carter: And the harbour construction and improvements at Port aux Basques?

Mr. Hees: That comes under the Department of Public Works. It does not come under the votes of this department.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I understand the William Carson made a trial run last Tuesday. Could the minister inform the committee if the run was successful and when the ship will take up her scheduled run?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, the first run of the Carson was a success but it was carried out in calm weather and it will be necessary to conduct further trials in all types of weather. If these trials prove successful it is hoped to start the regular service later in the year and just as soon as possible.

Item agreed to.

Strait of Canso—

433. Transportation improvements and facilities, $15,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have a question with reference to this and the three following items, the strait of Canso, the enlargement of the dock and terminal facilities at North Sydney and the other little item. Is this the last amount required for the Canso causeway, the enlargement of the docks at North Sydney and the like?

Mr. Hees: This is the maintenance vote which we are required to pay to the province of Nova Scotia and we expect to carry some of it next year. It is a three-year agreement. That will be the end of it.

Item agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Shall 438 carry?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hees: Let us carry on.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hees: Might it not be possible to carry on for a little while? Things have dragged pretty heavily today.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Is there unanimous consent to continue for a reasonably short period of time?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): If there is any question in anybody's mind, the last item that carried was 437.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the acting house leader what the business will be tomorrow and also what legislation we will take up on Monday?

Mr. Churchill: For tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will carry on with estimates, taking the Department of Transport followed by the Post Office Department, the remaining items under trade and commerce and public works and then the Department of Finance. On Monday the legislative program will be as follows: The first item will be No. 9 on today's order paper, the resolution dealing with the South Saskatchewan river project; next will be item No. 1 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-52, an act to amend the Railway Act; that will be followed by item No. 5 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-57, an act to approve certain expenditures relating to the financial year which ended on March 31, 1958; and then item No. 4 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-51, an act to amend the Customs Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 4.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

A—Department—

414. Departmental administration, $2,144,060.

415. The St. Lawrence river joint board of engineers—Canadian section, $132,090.

Canal services—

416. Administration, $162,855.

417. Operation and maintenance, $7,265,295.

418. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, including payments to provinces or municipalities as contributions toward construction done by those bodies, $2,531,177.

Marine services—

419. Marine services administration including agencies, $812,360.

Marine service steamers—

420. Administration, operation and maintenance, $13,689,553.

421. Construction or acquisition of vessels and equipment, $22,230,000.

Aids to navigation—

422. Administration, operation and maintenance, including a contribution to the international association of lighthouse authorities in the amount of 2,000 Swiss francs, notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the estimated equivalent in Canadian dollars that is detailed in the estimates, $5,868,450.

423. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $3,681,000.

424. Nautical services—administration, operation and maintenance, including grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates; rewards for saving life from vessels in distress; subsidy to a salvage company; and the payment of expenses, including excepted expenses, incurred in respect of Canadian distressed seamen as defined in section 306 of the Canada Shipping Act, $546,871.

425. Pilotage service—administration, operation and maintenance, including authority for temporary recoverable advances not exceeding $20,000, $720,258.

426. Steamship inspection service, including the carrying out of the provisions of the conventions for the safety of life at sea and load lines and contributions as detailed in the estimates, $999,901.

427. Marine reporting service, $157,734.

Ship channel service—St. Lawrence and Saguenay rivers—

428. Administration, operation and maintenance, $2,014,946.

429. Contract dredging, including acquisition of land for ship channel improvement, $4,094,685.

Railway and steamship services—

430. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $59,820.

Payments to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made by the company to the Minister of Finance, to be applied by the company in payment of the deficits, certified by the auditors of the company, arising in the operations in the calendar year 1958—

431. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals, $1,963,000.

432. Newfoundland ferry and terminals, $3,637,000.

Strait of Canso—

433. Transportation improvements and facilities, $15,000.

434. Causeway maintenance, $10,000.

435. Enlargement of dock and terminal facilities at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, $65,000.

436. Construction of new dock and terminal facilities at Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, $185,000.

437. Construction or acquisition of auto-ferry vessels and equipment as listed in the details of the estimates, provided that Treasury Board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended upon individual listed projects, $1,025,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, August 30, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1958-59

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates (1) for the financial year ending March 31, 1959, was presented by Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Seventeenth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. McCleave.

IMMIGRATION

LIST OF OCCUPATIONS FOR PLACEMENT IN CANADA

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the course of discussion of the estimates the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked to be provided with a list of occupations for which immigrants were being selected for placement anywhere in Canada. I have now had this list prepared and, in accordance with his request, to be found at page 4205 of Hansard, I ask leave to table it.

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON GOVERNMENT POLICY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the house would give me leave to do so I should like to make a statement arising out of a number of requests made by the hon. member for Assiniboia and others relative to the question of agriculture and what is intended to be done at the present session, as well as a general outline of that problem. I am not going into what has been done to date in connection with the development of a national agricultural program. What I intend to do is refer to one of the items in the further supplementary estimates which were tabled this morning by the Minister of Finance.

In regard to the general situation in respect of western agriculture, we made a beginning with a national agricultural program at the last session, but some of the basic problems of Canadian agriculture will yield only to long range solutions. As I see it, and I think the members of this house will agree, the need is for a sound, comprehensive and co-ordinated program to attack specific problems and meet specific needs, but in developing a national agricultural policy we have found it necessary to deal with specific regional problems.

Our concept of a national policy is based on the belief that the national welfare demands positive action to meet the basic causes of distress and maladjustment in particular industries and regions. The agricultural policy divides itself naturally into two parts, the one being national in scope and the other being primarily concerned with specific regional problems which nevertheless form a necessary part of a national agricultural policy. In other words, regional policies must not be in conflict with but must be an integral part of the national policy.

Among the more difficult of these regional problems are those concerned with the prairie grain producers. Over the years the prairie farmer has experienced a succession of good times and bad. I have seen that situation at first hand from the time my people first went into the western provinces in 1903, and during that period of time there have been times of high income and times of low income. There have been years of almost complete crop failure and years of abundant crops. The most outstanding characteristic of the prairie farm income situation since the opening of the prairie provinces has been the variability of income. Technological improvements and marketing techniques have tended to reduce some of this variability, but as one endeavours to look into the future it would appear that this condition will remain in the western farm economy.

Averages are often used, but the use of averages in relation to farm income conceals the real problem of a large proportion of prairie farmers who are operating small farm units. While during the years 1955 and 1956, the income of the prairie farmer in general declined markedly from the level of the period from 1945 to 1952, it has been the small farmers particularly who have experienced real hardship. These farmers, whose costs of production are much higher than those on the larger farms, have lacked the necessary income to provide the essentials which have become part of an acceptable Canadian level of living.

It is therefore this problem of the small farmer, together with the general problem of the variability of farm income, which the government seeks to meet through a comprehensive farm program. During the last twelve months the government has received representations from western farm organizations with regard to deficiency payments on grain for the crop years 1955-56 and 1956-57. This problem has received the most careful consideration, in fact none which has been before us has received greater care, and a most exhaustive study has been made of all the factors involved.

The government has come to the conclusion that deficiency payments, however attractive they appear to be at first glance, would not provide a solution to the problems facing prairie agriculture but would indeed create new problems. Deficiency payments applied to deliveries of grain would fail to help those producers most in need and, if adopted, would require very large subsidies from the treasury, would inevitably lead to increased surpluses and would add further burdens in financing the disposal of those surpluses. Such payments would tend to impede essential adjustments to changing conditions of technology and demand which are essential both to the welfare of the producers and the health of the Canadian economy as a whole.

It is obvious, furthermore, that the greatest benefit from such payments would accrue to the large producer rather than to the small farmer upon whom the situation which has prevailed during the past years presses most heavily. If such payments were made on wheat alone it would constitute discrimination against the oats and barley producers, would encourage farmers to put their acreage into wheat, and would be an encouragement to additional surpluses of wheat. If such payments were made on oats and barley there is an extremely likely possibility that the United States would react in one of two ways, exclude Canadian oats and barley from their markets or place countervailing duties against them equal to the amount of the deficiency payment made. This could be particularly serious in connection with our large exports of grain to the United States, which in 1956-57 accounted for 96 per cent of our export trade in oats and 25 per cent of our barley exports.

For these general reasons we have come to the conclusion that deficiency payments to producers are not in the long run interest of either the western grain producer or the nation as a whole. It is therefore evident that the solution—not capable, of course, of achievement by a short run method—must be looked for in a long range program aimed at providing the maximum benefit to the largest number of farmers. And of the 230,000 farm units in western Canada, approximately 63 per cent are family farm units of under 300 acres utilized for the production of grain.

Keeping in mind the needs of the majority of western farmers, the government will be submitting legislation to parliament at subsequent sessions to bring about a broad coordinated program aimed at the basic problems, namely the problem of the small farm and the problem of variability of income. This is not merely a western Canadian problem. The impact of variability in prairie farm income is felt beyond the local community. Industries which supply agriculture with production materials and equipment and those which transport, process and distribute farm products are affected as well. Serious crop failures which result in major reduction in income to western grain producers have had serious, direct and immediate repercussions on industrial activity and employment in eastern Canada. It is apparent, therefore, that a program which will bring greater stability to the income of prairie grain producers and, indeed, to farmers across the nation, is clearly in the interest of the economy as a whole.

The government therefore intends to bring into being the following far-reaching and comprehensive program designed to fill some of the gaps in our national agricultural policy which, among other things, will provide for the particular needs of western grain producers.

First, the government proposes, subject to approval by parliament at the next session, to continue the fund to assist in the export of surplus wheat stocks to non-commercial markets under the Colombo plan so as to assure the continuance of the full scale sales promotion and market development program which has been in effect during the past year. Indeed, I may say this: that one thing of which Canadians as a whole can be proud is the fact that during the past year, a difficult one for exports of wheat, Canada's exports have increased while those of other exporting countries of the world have decreased.

During the past year $50 million was taken up under this plan for assistance in securing non-commercial markets in non-commercial market areas. There are still sufficient funds available for the purpose of carrying on until the next session of parliament. In the meantime the Department of Trade and Commerce will continue without interruption an intensive program of extending markets for wheat which has been so successful during the last year.

Second, the government is studying in consultation with the provinces, and hopes as a result of this study of this very complex and difficult problem to introduce at the next session of parliament, legislation in co-operation with the provinces which are prepared to join, to provide for a comprehensive crop insurance program. It has been one of the demands of farmers in general throughout the years that something be done to protect within reason against the uncertainties to which agriculture is subjected.

Third, in recognition of the recurring hazard of drought to the stability of livestock production in the prairie provinces, the government has taken steps to provide assistance to provincial governments, which have the prime responsibility for meeting the needs of feed deficit areas, and is giving sympathetic study to the establishment, under provincial administration but with federal financial assistance, of a forage bank program under which farmers will receive certain incentives to put up forage as a reserve against an emergency situation.

Fourth, the government is presently engaged in a comprehensive study and review of the Canadian Farm Loan Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and the Veterans' Land Act, with a view to determining where enlargement of scope, expansion in function, or improvement in methods of operation may be required. Pending the establishment of improved agricultural credit facilities on a reorganized basis, the government has already taken steps to meet the demand on the part of farmers throughout Canada for increased credit through amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act which have increased the authorized capital of the Canadian farm loan board from $4 million to $6 million and its lending capacity from $80 million to $120 million.

Fifth, as a means of meeting the small farm problem the government has under consideration ways and means of improving the level of living for farmers on small farms by means of better land use, encouraging the formation of economic family farm units, improving technical training, extending unemployment insurance benefits to certain classes of farm workers, and by extending the vocational and technical training agreement for the benefit of those who wish to enter new occupations.

Sixth, plans are already under way for a national conservation conference, which will have important and far-reaching effects. Canadian farmers will, of course, be helped substantially through the protection given their capital resources by this national conservation program.

As I said before, the basic problems of Canadian agriculture will yield only to long range solutions. Unavoidably some time must elapse before these long range solutions can be fully implemented and their benefits made available to farmers. This proposal is an endeavour to give some temporary assistance on as equitable a basis as possible.

For a long time certain producer organizations have been advocating a two-price system for wheat, having in mind a domestic price considerably higher than the selling price of wheat for export. It is noted that the proposal applies only to wheat for human consumption. This is a proper limitation, because any attempt to impose a domestic price on wheat for feeding purposes would simply destroy the market and cause feeders to use other grains or feed products as a substitute.

There are those who feel that the establishment of a high domestic price would leave Canada in a vulnerable position if this country desires restraint on the part of other countries which subsidize wheat exports. They would argue that as long as Canada is selling wheat to domestic consumers at the same prices at which it is selling wheat abroad, no one can criticize the basis of our participation in export markets.

On the other hand, farm organizations over the years have contended that the Canadian consumer has been getting wheat too cheaply. Just as other producers expect a fair market price for their goods, so the Canadian wheat producer should receive a fair price for the wheat sold in the domestic market. That has been the general contention through the years.

Over a seven-year period the average domestic human consumption of wheat has been 45 million bushels. This is only 10 per cent of the total annual disposition of western wheat. An increase of 50 cents per bushel in the price of wheat for domestic consumption would be reflected in an increase of only 6.5 cents per bushel on the basis of total marketings. To achieve this would require a contribution to be made by parliament to the wheat board, or it would result in an estimated increase to the consumer of 2 cents per loaf of bread. Such a contribution would amount to a figure considerably lower than that which is proposed for this year only, namely the provision in the further supplementary estimates for payments to western grain producers of $1 per acre up to a maximum of 200 acres per farm in accordance with regulations of the governor in council, the amount of that distribution to be $40 million. This amount, which is designed to meet the needs of the small farmer, will be distributed by the Canadian wheat board to producers on the basis of $1 per specified acre, including acreage seeded to flax, up to a maximum of 200 acres.

Agriculture—Government Policy

A situation of emergency has developed in the western provinces which has created hardship, particularly among a large proportion of farmers whose operations are on a relatively small scale.

The long range plans now being formulated by the government will be instituted as soon as possible. They will constitute a truly national program. Several of these measures are designed to meet the particular regional problems of western farmers. The others are truly national in application and will be a potential source of help to every farmer in Canada, as has been the legislation so far introduced in connection with the Agricultural Stabilization Act. What we are trying to do is establish a concept of national policy designed to ensure equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

Continuing efforts will be made to maintain the primary industry of agriculture, and I can say that at all times we are prepared to consider proposals which will add to the completeness and effectiveness of the program, at all times, too, considering the national interest.

The immediate and long-term approach to the basic problem facing Canadian farmers is a recognition of the fact that the prosperity of Canada is indivisible and that a reasonably high and stable level of income in Canadian agriculture adds to the welfare of all Canadians. The variability of farm income in all parts of Canada—and I speak now particularly, in view of this provision in the supplementary estimates, of western Canada—affects industries which supply agriculture with production materials and equipment and those which transport, process and distribute farm products. Serious crop failures result in major reductions in income to western grain producers and in turn result in serious direct and immediate repercussions in industrial activities and employment in eastern Canada and in other parts of Canada. It is apparent that a program which will bring a greater stability to the income of prairie grain producers, and indeed of farmers across the nation, is in the interests of the Canadian economy as a whole.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made a very important and comprehensive statement on a very important aspect of our economy, and it is not easy to deal at this time with all the points he raised. He has announced today certain short range action that is to assist grain producers in the west, and he has also indicated some long range policies that the government proposes to follow to assist agriculture.

So far as the first announcement is concerned, we recognize that there has been a growing gap between what the grain producer receives for his produce and what he has to pay for the instruments of production. We are quite sure, on this side, that the grain producers, with that problem before them, will welcome this particular assistance, will welcome this particular grant though they may be disappointed in the amount. I have no doubt that when my hon. friend from Assiniboia gets up immediately after I conclude he will call it peanuts.

Mr. Argue: I did that a couple of days ago. I shall call it a pittance today.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps he may even refer to it as salted peanuts. However, though this may be disappointing to the grain producers, I think it has one provision that is to be welcomed; that the amount of $1 per acre shall be paid on a maximum of 200 acres, so that the very large grain growers will not benefit disproportionately to the smaller farmers.

This problem of our western grain producers is a regional problem, but it is also a problem of national importance. It seems to me that it has to be solved in a way which will keep the balance among all primary producers in this country. Otherwise the solution will not be permanent and will not redound to the national advantage as it should. While I have said that the grain producers will welcome this grant, though they may consider it too small, and it will help them up to a point to meet their special problems, there are other primary producers in this country who will undoubtedly relate this kind of assistance to their own difficulties. I am thinking particularly at this moment of the fisherman who has also had his hard times, and who perhaps will look with a certain amount of envy to this kind of action taken by the government for the grain producers.

All this means is that any action of this kind, desirable and worthy though it may be, which assists one segment of our producers, has to be kept in equitable balance with the other elements of primary production in this country or there will not be the good results that should follow from it. This means, surely, that assistance of this kind to primary producers of one type or another, to be effective and to have long range value, should be based on sound principles which can be applied to other primary producers.

This particular action, because it is a grant and is not based on any such principle—it is not based on the principle of parity prices or on any formula of deficiency payments; indeed, if I understood the Prime Minister aright he has rejected the deficiency payment formula as the solution to the problem of our grain producers in the west—does not meet that test.

I agree with the Prime Minister when he pointed out that in the adoption and application of any formula of this kind to assist primary producers one has to be particularly careful to meet two requirements; one, not to take action which will result in a burdensome surplus which, in the long run, may hurt the producer as much as the immediate aid may help him; and second, not to take the kind of action—the Prime Minister referred to oats where such a high percentage of our crop goes to the United States, and he was using a good illustration—the kind of governmental assistance which may result in retaliation in the market to which we export our products.

I agree, therefore, that any kind of principle that may be adopted has to keep these two things in mind, but I do reiterate that there should be some principle behind assistance of this kind. Nevertheless, in so far as this action will assist, for the time being, the grain producers of the west to meet their special problems, we welcome it.

Then the Prime Minister went on to talk about some long range policies for agriculture which his government has in mind. He spoke with some satisfaction over the position in regard to wheat exports and what is going to be done to maintain and perhaps improve that position in the years ahead. It is quite true, and I think all Canadians must get a great deal of satisfaction from it, that our wheat exports have held up remarkably well this year, and in fact have increased in volume. It is true also that one reason for that increase is the export to these non-commercial markets about which the Prime Minister spoke, particularly under the Colombo plan. We welcome his statement that that policy is to be continued with increasing effectiveness, we hope, next year, so that even more wheat may be exported for that particular purpose.

But while that is true, and while good results may have been achieved in this regard this year and our wheat exports may have been increased, it must be remembered that this was due in part to this increase in the exports to non-commercial markets. It was due also to the fact that some other countries which normally export wheat had small crops. Perhaps also it is something to be kept in mind that the United States, in spite of all the devices which have been adopted to push wheat into world markets, such as barter, sales for local currency, gifts, and long term easy credit, was not able to increase its wheat sales in the last year. Perhaps there is a moral to be drawn from that which we could use in this country. It would be this, that the greater the steps taken to force wheat on the world markets in terms which are other than commercial, the more difficult it will be to sell your wheat on commercial terms. That is something which has to be kept in mind in our wheat export policy.

The Prime Minister mentioned also that consideration is being given to a system of national crop insurance in co-operation with the provinces. We shall follow these developments with great interest, because nothing could be of greater importance to agriculture than to be protected in the way he has suggested. He mentioned also the importance of agricultural credit. We on this side have for some time been advocating the consolidation and unification of all the agricultural credit facilities of the government. I know that consideration is being given to this by the government, and we shall hope there will be some results from that consideration at the next session.

Not only will it be desirable to have this kind of consolidation of agricultural credit in the interests of the farmer himself, but even more important may be the establishment of an agricultural export bank or even an export bank not limited to agriculture, to help in the way that has been done in the United States. I would say that this development of agricultural credit which the Prime Minister has mentioned has a very direct connection also with the importance of land use. The two should be tied together in this connection. Perhaps it is not inappropriate to mention that the former government set up a committee of the Senate to study this question of land use, from which good results may follow.

Today we have been confronted with an announcement by the government of short range action and a policy of long range importance. Speaking for our party, we hope the long range policy will enable agriculture to obtain its fair share of the national income, because without that there can be no prosperity in this country. We hope the long range policy will be more effective in accomplishing those objectives than the short range action to assist the grain producers at this time.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the very long statement that has been made by the Prime Minister. When a statement is made on motions, the length of the statement seems to be in inverse ratio to the acceptability of the announcement. If it is an excellent announcement it can be dealt with very quickly. If it is an announcement which is likely to be met with a good deal of criticism, then of course it is a long statement and one has to drag in a good many other things in an attempt to muddy the statement and so confuse the people who are being affected.

This statement is not new, Mr. Speaker. This $1 an acre is not new. This is another famous repetition, as we have seen so many times this session, of the press getting a very important leak from the cabinet. Whether it is a leak that is reported as a newspaper story or whether it is a document or some other matter, the press seem to be most efficient at getting advance information. Hence, with advance information in this instant having been given to the country, we are by this time able to get at least an indication of the reaction of the producers who are mainly affected, I have in my hand the Winnipeg Free Press of Thursday, August 28.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Hon. members may keep on laughing if they like. It has a story by Peter Thomson on the front page and it is quoting James Patterson, the president of the interprovincial farm union council. Mr. Patterson has referred to the $1 per acre and the $200 maximum as "a pittance". He says it will not in any way meet the needs of the prairie producers. He also says:

> We certainly expected something reasonable . . . and the $25 million—

Now it is $40 million.

> —falls far short . . . It takes a long time to pay bills with nickels.

I could go on to other parts of the article such as this:

> It will give the farmer a little "spending money" said Mr. Patterson, and the government apparently thinks that will settle matters for a while.

The farm organizations across this nation have taken the position that agricultural producers, when they are efficient, should obtain a standard of living comparable to that of other people in similiar or comparable occupations. Hence farmers over the years have asked for parity prices, prices that will give the producers a fair share of the national income. Until recent months they had believed that this government believed in parity prices. They had the statements by the Prime Minister on many occasions when he was in the opposition. They had on record of the Canadian House of Commons motions by the Prime Minister asking for parity prices. But when the Prime Minister was in a position to bring about parity prices, parity prices were dropped. Then deficiency payments became the accepted policy. We have the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and certainly a paramount feature of that act, and a continuing feature, has been the making of deficiency payments. Only this week the Minister of Agriculture, in an announcement that we all welcomed, suggested that deficiency payments would be provided to the peach industry on a certain formula. But in this announcement the government's position is one of opposition to deficiency payments. Instead of deficiency payments we have a payment of $1 per acre up to $200. A $200 payment, Mr. Speaker, while of some value—the value of $200—will go no real distance in allowing the farmer to pay his bills, to provide his family with a reasonable standard of living and to replace his equipment when it wears out.

The farm organizations on the prairies have taken the stand that deficiency payments should be made. The farm organizations are united in that policy; and not only are the farm organizations united on it but organizations representing people generally on the prairies are in full support of this idea. The Saskatchewan wheat pool has perhaps spearheaded the drive, with full support from other farm organizations and all major organizations on the prairies. They have asked for a payment on wheat of 22 cents at least for 1955-56 and 36 cents for 1956-57, with comparable payments of 14 and 15 cents on oats and 14 and 22 cents on barley.

These deficiency payments which the farmers' organizations have requested have been worked out in an exact manner with a definite formula. They have taken the crop years from August 1, 1947 to July 31, 1955. They have averaged out the payments the farmers have received in that time, and they have said that the payments that are now made on wheat, oats and barley should be brought up to that level, that is deficiency payments of that amount. They point out that since 1947 the farmer's cost of production has gone up by 50 per cent but the price of wheat has dropped by 21 per cent. They are not asking that their position be maintained by restoring the position they had in 1947. They are not asking for a deficiency payment which would be based on the cost of production or a parity price. However, they are asking that in the years ahead they shall not receive, even with the cost having gone up a large amount, less than the average price they received in that eight-year period.

These farm organizations are very serious in this request. I do not think the $200 per farm, which amounts in total to something less than 10 per cent of the total amount of deficiency payments the farmers have asked for these two years, will in any way satisfy these organizations or will in any way reduce their efforts to obtain a square deal for their members.

A great deal of sympathy is being expressed for the small farmer. Hence the payments, they say, are being kept to a maximum of $200 on 200 acres. I think we should be helping the average farmer including the small farmer. The average farm in Saskatchewan today is of about 500 cultivated acres.

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Agriculture can make his speech also. It is about 500 cultivated acres.

Mr. Harkness: That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Argue: I am talking about the mean average.

Mr. Harkness: That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Agriculture has been wrong so many times that I do not mind his being wrong again. Mr. Speaker, the average is very much higher than the 200 acres that is being set as this small limit. In asking for deficiency payments the farm organizations have not said the government should pay large sums of money to large farms. They have said there should be a maximum. They have said that the maximum should be not $200 but $1,500, and that it should be paid on a bushel basis.

I was also disappointed in the stand taken by the Leader of the Opposition. He did not come out four-square for deficiency payments. He did not come out against them, either. He took a diplomatic position, leaning first to one side and then to the other side. He wanted to be sure, along with the Prime Minister, that any action taken would not result in burdensome surpluses. All I can say to both those hon. gentlemen is that if they think the kind of payments which have been requested by farm organizations would increase burdensome surpluses, they are mistaken. The acreage which would be seeded to those grains in the prairies is a stable acreage; it changes very little. The farmer's pattern of seeding has not changed appreciably over the years. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce and other ministers of trade and commerce have pointed out so many times that it was not a huge expansion of Canadian wheat acreage which had brought about our surpluses, and so deficiency payments of the order asked for by farm organizations will not add to our burdensome surpluses because the acreage which is now being seeded to grains will in general continue to be seeded to those grains in the future.

The Prime Minister has intimated that the government has some other aspects of this farm program in view; he has talked about a surplus disposal program. We in the C.C.F. have asked for a surplus disposal program for many, many years, and when Washington was being roundly condemned for its so-called giveaways, we said it might be a better use of Canada's energy if it were spent at least in part in developing our own surplus disposal program.

As far as crop insurance is concerned, I have studied this question rather thoroughly over the years, and it is a difficult question. There are many problems connected with crop insurance; and if we are going to make crop insurance actuarially sound on an individual farm basis, as they have endeavoured to do in the United States, it means that the premium which an individual farmer must pay in the high risk areas becomes so great that it is almost impossible for him to meet his payments. Therefore any system of crop insurance cannot be the type of insurance about which we ordinarily speak, but must be a type of crop failure protection or crop failure assistance which will be supported by governments before it can be successful.

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been amended from time to time in this house. I think it is a good act and that it should be expanded. I would like to see the maximum payment, as I have said already during this session, increased to $10 per acre in keeping with today's costs of production and the other payments in the schedule set at varying amounts in accordance with that maximum. If this were done, along with increased contributions from the producers themselves and increased contributions from the treasury, we would have the type of crop failure protection which would give real financial protection to the farmer when his crop failed, and would not have attached to it the great many difficulties which ordinarily go with crop insurance.

The announcement that farmers will now be paid up to a maximum of $200, which means that most farmers will receive $200, in no way removes the necessity to keep on working for deficiency payments, to keep on working for payments based on a formula and to keep on working for a permanent policy, and not to be in any way satisfied with what amounts to a one shot affair, the $40 million put into the supplementary estimates for this year. This is not a permanent policy, this $40 million item in the estimates. We would naturally welcome any continuation of this as a permanent policy, but it seems most inadequate to keep the producers in a state of suspense by saying, "We will give you $40 million this year as a supplementary item and we will leave these other things over to a later date".

Agriculture—Government Policy

The Leader of the Opposition has said there should be a comprehensive policy for all sections of the country; he has also said that the fishermen may look somewhat critically—I do not want to misinterpret him—at this legislation, or may look at it with some envy. I have every sympathy for the fishermen as primary producers and I would certainly support, as would the C.C.F. group, any and every measure to help the fishermen of this country; but I hope we will not hear in this house members who represent ridings in which fishing is very important opposing this legislation because it does not give anything for the fishermen.

I realize, as do other members, that the fishermen today can obtain unemployment insurance under certain circumstances, while the grain producer cannot do so. The fishermen can obtain loans through their co-operatives under the fishermen's loan act, while Canadian grain producers are not able to obtain loans from co-operatives under the farm loan legislation. There is certain beneficial legislation which the fishermen now have which the grain producers do not have. We do not object to that; we are merely anxious that the benefits which today apply to fishermen may be obtained by grain producers and indeed by all producers. That is the position we take.

This $40 million will mean $200 in assistance to each qualifying producer, but in all seriousness I feel the amount is most inadequate, and that it is not a fulfilment of the statement by the Prime Minister that sympathetic consideration would be given to deficiency payments, or the statement by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources that the government was going to provide a revolutionary farm program which would include deficiency payments on western grain.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. He has referred to the suggested payments to be made on specified acreage, and indicated that flax will be included. Will rape seed and grass seed come under the specified acreage as well?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The only acreage that would be comprehended by the payment would be that mentioned in the permit book.

[Later:]

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would inform the new hon. members of the house under what rule of privilege the hon. member for Assiniboia is allowed to rise and speak on the first order of business. I have looked through the books and can find nothing which says that anyone other than the Leader of the Opposition should rise. If it is done through an agreement among the different parties in this house I would suggest that the hon. member for Assiniboia abused that privilege when he did what he did this morning, rose and made a long political speech.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a point of order to raise which is to take objection to anything that is being done in the house, he should do it at the time. I shall be glad to discuss the matter privately with the hon. member, but it is not my function to answer questions from the chair.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if he would correct the inference he apparently left this morning when he opened with the remark that he was replying to a question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia. It would appear that his whole program was outlined because the hon. member for Assiniboia asked a question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman left out two words; I said "the hon. member for Assiniboia and others".

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMUNIST CHINA—REPORTED ATTACKS ON NATIONALIST ISLANDS—CANADIAN POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the tense situation in the Formosa straits. Has the position of the Canadian government, which the minister stated the other day is one of non-involvement, again been brought to the attention of the United States government?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the Leader of the Opposition for having advised me of his intention to ask this question. As hon. members will recall, I stated in this house on August 25 that the Canadian government had no commitment to involve itself in a dispute between the two Chinese authorities in the Taiwan straits. This statement has been drawn to the attention of the authorities in Washington with whom we are in constant touch with respect to the situation on the China coast, and I have no doubt whatever that they fully understand our attitude on this matter.

We are keeping a close watch on the Chinese situation which, I must inform the house, gives continuing cause for concern. I do not think that it is possible to evaluate the intentions of the Chinese communist regime at this time, but we greatly hope that the consequences of precipitate action are understood by all concerned and that they will exercise restraint.

ICELAND—RESULT OF NATO INTERVENTION IN DISPUTE WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question arising out of the report in the press that the NATO council has been considering the deplorable dispute between the United Kingdom and Iceland on territorial waters and fisheries rights, and that this consideration has resulted in no solution of the problem. I should like to know if this report is true, and what stand the Canadian representative at NATO took in regard to this matter.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have endeavoured to make clear that Canada does not favour the taking of unilateral action by states in respect of fishing zones so long as there is hope that a new international conference on the law of the sea will be convened in the near future to deal with the question of territorial sea and fishing rights.

The Geneva conference adopted a resolution that will be presented to the next regular meeting of the general assembly to the effect that the United Nations should authorize forthwith the holding of another conference as soon as possible. We will, of course, support that resolution in the 13th session of the general assembly. We have hoped, and we still continue to hope, that both the United Kingdom and Iceland will come to some mutual understanding and thereby resolve their differences, or to postpone consideration of their differences until they can be dealt with by such a new international conference.

We are anxious about this dispute between the United Kingdom and Iceland. I can inform the house that we have expressed our anxiety in this regard to the governments directly concerned; that is the Canadian attitude.

To refer more closely to the question of the Leader of the Opposition as addressed to me, I can inform the house that recently under the auspices and under the direction of the NATO council, regional meetings at the expert level of the parties directly concerned were held. Since Canada is not in the region we were not represented at these meetings. My information is that the negotiations at the last regional meeting broke down, but I must inform the house that I too have to rely, as the Leader of the Opposition does, on reading the newspapers for the details.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PRATT—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN" AND ON C.B.C. TELECAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pratt (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to take exception to an article written by Bruce Phillips of the Southam news services which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on Friday, August 29, 1958 in reference to conduct of the inquiry by the public accounts committee into the cost of the printing bureau in Hull. This article says in part:

> The catalogue of chippy remarks made by inquisitors on the committee is almost unending. Typical are those of Walker, who said he doubted whether architect Ernest Cormier would ever get another job, and Conservative John Pratt, also an architect, who accused Mr. Cormier of submitting "phony plans."

The remarks attributed to me in this article are completely false. At no time have I criticized Mr. Cormier's plans—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pratt: I repeat that at no time have I criticized Mr. Cormier's plans, nor have I criticized his professional qualifications. What I did criticize was the file of exhibits and the uselessness of trying to discuss costs on the basis of the incomplete preliminary plans which were filed instead of on the basis of complete contract documents—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pratt: —some of which I later succeeded in having filed. I should like to read into the record what I actually said as reported on page 394 of the official minutes of the standing committee on public accounts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that even on a matter of privilege it is in order to read from the record of a committee which has not yet reported. The hon. member has made his point, and I think it would be better to leave it at that.

Mr. Pratt: Mr. Speaker, may I also take exception to a television broadcast by Frank Swanson on C.B.C. immediately after the late newscast on Friday, August 29, 1958, in which he attributed to me certain statements concerning offers of architectural employment, which statements were never at any time made by me.

My examination of the witness, Mr. Cormier, was made in a restrained manner in spite of continual provocation, and it was made as a member of a parliamentary committee only. Not once did I ever even mention that I was an architect, nor did I ever mention any offers of work, big or small, to me as an architect.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—PROSECUTION OF DOCTOR ON MANITOULIN ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a Canadian Press dispatch dated August 28 concerning the prosecution of an Indian affairs doctor on Manitoulin island, which the reeve of the township is reported as saying was "a damned disgrace"?

Can the minister inform the house of the circumstances surrounding this unusual case, and if the Ontario college of physicians and surgeons objects to arrangements made by her department for the medical care of Indians?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Although I did comment briefly on this matter in the course of the discussion of the estimates of my department, this is actually a matter for the Department of National Health and Welfare, because the health service to Indians is under that department.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): In the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare the only comment I can make at this time is that I think the hon. member is wrong in his suggestion that the Ontario college of physicians and surgeons objects to the arrangements made by the department for the medical care of Indians. I do not think there was any objection to the arrangements made for the medical care of Indians. As I understand the circumstances, the objection was to the Indian doctor looking after some of the white people on Manitoulin island.

The matter was brought up by the Leader of the Opposition the other day, and if the hon. member will refer to page 4251 of Hansard he will see that though the hon. lady modestly said she did not give a long answer, a fairly complete explanation was, I think, given at that time. If there is anything further the hon. member would like to know about the matter I will see that the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare is called to it.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his answer. I will have to reflect on the matter further before asking any more questions.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Is it not a fact that there was no justification for the charges made, and that they should not have been proceeded with?

Mr. Brooks: That is a hard question to answer, and I will certainly bring it to the attention of the minister.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL OF RIGHTS—SUGGESTED PROCEDURE RESPECTING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister would be good enough to tell the house whether it is the government's intention to proceed with the human rights bill in all its stages during this session, or whether the government has given consideration to the feeling held by some that there might be advantage in bringing it forward a certain number of stages this session and leaving its final determination until another session, in order that representations of all interested groups might be made.

I think the Prime Minister will understand that there has been a great deal of concern and real questioning among hon. members as to what the procedure will be.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am entirely guided by the will of the house. The bill of human freedoms is one which, of course, will affect Canadians for years to come. I think I can say with modesty that throughout the years I have given a great deal of study to this matter. It was studied as well by committees of parliament. I should like very much to have the whole matter considered at length rather than in the dying days of this session—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in order to assure that the bill of rights will in fact be as effective as it is possible to secure. In saying that, I recollect that two weeks ago I stated that it was the purpose and the desire to have it go through completely during the present session. I am still in a position to proceed with all stages of this bill. The studies that have been made by the Department of Justice are full and comprehensive. But I feel that the hon. gentleman's suggestion is one which deserves serious consideration by the house as a whole.

The bill of human freedoms will be an advance which I had hoped to attain during the session, a milestone in the pathway of freedom. If the house is agreeable I would suggest that the best course we could follow, in the event that we do not intend to stay here and debate it at length, as we will at some stage, so as to assure that the bill of rights shall be all-comprehensive while protecting and maintaining human freedoms, is that first reading might take place and on first reading, following the course which was adopted by the previous prime minister on the federal district commission legislation, after preliminary words by myself as mover of the resolution and then by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia, the bill might be tabled and then taken up first thing at the next session. I do not know whether or not that will meet with the approval of the house, but I want to see the fullest possible discussion on this matter to assure that what we do will be effective, practical and comprehensive to the limit of the capacity of hon. members of this house to achieve.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps in the circumstances I may be permitted to say a word. The procedure outlined by the Prime Minister is quite satisfactory so far as we are concerned. This question, as the Prime Minister has said—and I am not now referring to the bill but to the question—is one of such fundamental importance that it deserves the fullest consideration. It is even more important than the C.B.C. legislation. Therefore I do not think it should be proceeded with in what have been called the dying days of this session. Irrespective of what may have been said previously by the Prime Minister regarding this matter, I think the procedure he has outlined now would be quite satisfactory as far as we are concerned.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, as it might have been taken from the way I put the question, we in this group are appreciative of the attitude the Prime Minister has adopted in that parliament itself, through its various spokesmen, can decide whether this bill is to be proceeded with at this session in all its stages or whether it is to be introduced now and finally considered at the next session.

We believe this is one of the most important questions with which parliament will deal in many years. We believe the wise course would be to introduce it as the Prime Minister has suggested and have some discussion on it, but leave final approval until the next session of parliament, when all of us will have been able to benefit from the important advice of Canadians in all walks of life. We are certain the procedure outlined by the Prime Minister will result in more effective legislation when action is taken.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I do not ask questions, but I should like to ask the hon. member for Assiniboia a question at this time. Would the proposal I made respecting the Leader of the Opposition and one speaker for the C.C.F. group have the support of both parties? Apparently the suggestion meets with the approval of the Leader of the Opposition, and if so that will be the course that will be followed unless the house otherwise demands.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I see that I have the consent of my colleagues, so I can say to the Prime Minister that the course to which he has just referred, of having a spokesman from each party speak, will be satisfactory to our group.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that no order should be made now. It is just an understanding which will be subject to renewal when the bill is actually before the house.

INQUIRY AS TO OPPORTUNITY TO DISCUSS PENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the house leader. Can he inform us when we shall have an opportunity to discuss the important legislation brought down this morning by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the house leader wishes to deal with the question, he may do so, but no legislation was brought down this morning. Is the hon. member not under a misconception?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question may I point out that the items are contained in the supplementary estimates, and those will not be discussed until well into next week.

Mr. Chevrier: Further supplementaries.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ROCKCLIFFE AIR BASE—REPORTED DENIAL OF SCHOOL FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I am prompted to do so because of a headline in Le Droit which was given to me as I came into the house. Across the paper is written "Ecoliers dans une impasse". The article which I shall pass on to the minister goes on to state that 40 children from Rockcliffe air base will find themselves without a school when the school term commences next week.

In fairness to the minister I think I should point out that the article goes on to recite that in 1955 arrangements were made for the accommodation of those children at the air base. Then in the following years, because of a school that was nearby, arrangements were made and paid for by the department to send the children to the nearby school. Now because of the large numbers of children attending that nearby school the school commission has decided not to receive the children from Rockcliffe air base, and therefore within the last 48 hours or so the parents of these children have been told they have no school to attend.

I have given the minister no notice of my intention to ask this question, and indeed I could not have given notice to him. I know of his extreme sympathy and understanding in these cases. The question I should like to address to him is this. Will he be good enough to see that accommodation is provided for at the Rockcliffe air base so these children may receive their education in accordance with the laws of the province in which they reside.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very pleased to look into the matter and give an answer next week.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO SPECIAL PRIORITY BROADCAST BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Is it true that he has sought and obtained special priority on broadcasting networks for an address he proposes to make on Tuesday next and, if so, does this mean something new and momentous in the way of an announcement of national policy?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand that arrangements have been made for a national broadcast by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday evening in connection with our entering the final phase of the conversion loan campaign. The timing, of course, follows immediately after Labour day, when a great many persons who have been absent from their homes on vacation will be back in their homes while we are entering the final fortnight of the campaign.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

438. Newfoundland coastal services—construction or acquisition of passenger-cargo vessels and equipment, $1,100,000.

The Chairman: This item will be found on page 78 of the estimates book, the details at page 562. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I have a few questions about the construction of vessels for the Newfoundland coastal service. Would the minister prefer that I ask the questions one by one?

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Carter: Does this vote cover only the four ships for the C.N.R. service in Newfoundland, or are there any other ships included?

Mr. Hees: Yes, it covers just those four ships.

Mr. Carter: Are all four being constructed simultaneously? If not, which ones are being constructed first?

Mr. Hees: Two will probably be constructed this winter, and the first ship for which tenders will be called will be the Burgeo, a replacement for the old Burgeo.

Mr. Carter: Have orders been placed for those ships?

Mr. Hees: No; tenders will be called this winter.

Mr. Carter: Are those ships being built to Lloyd's specifications?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Carter: Will those ships be classed as common water carriers, or as an integral part of the Newfoundland railway, as is the case with the ships employed in the ferry service?

Mr. Hees: The same situation will apply that exists now with the present ships which are plying those waters.

Mr. Carter: Will the minister take whatever steps are necessary to have that changed so that all the ships operated in the coastal service will be regarded as an integral part of the railway, in order that freight claims arising out of accidents to the ships will be treated in the same way as accidents occurring on the railway or on the ferry boats?

Mr. Hees: We will be prepared to give consideration to that suggestion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Carter: A few days ago, in reply to a question, the minister stated that the Canadian National management had decided to dispense with Lloyd's inspection. Can he say how much saving will result from that decision, and whether that is the only reason for dispensing with this service?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, we would have to obtain that information from the Canadian National. I will be glad to ask the Canadian National and advise the hon. member as soon as I receive it.

Mr. Carter: Thank you. It has always been the tradition of Newfoundland and of the Newfoundland government, even when we were hard up for money, to retain Lloyd's inspection service because, as I understand it, it in many ways complements the Canadian steamship inspection service. The minister should inquire as to whether any possible savings on the one hand might not be offset by other disadvantages, because as I understand it Lloyd's maintain a world-wide service. They keep a very accurate record of every inspection and every sign of damage, everything that happens, so that a ship which is sold has a much greater value with this record of Lloyd's service than would otherwise be obtained just by the Canadian inspection.

As I understand it, the Canadian inspection is interested mainly in the comfort and safety of passengers, whereas Lloyd's are interested in the strength of the hull and the framework. They keep a very close record of the wear and tear of the ship, which can be worth a great deal of money and probably worth more than the savings which might be effected.

Mr. Tucker: I have been trying to put a question to the minister, but this may not be on the proper item. I do not think he will mind my asking it. It refers to the auto ferry service from Portugal Cove to Bell island.

Could the minister advise this house if the auto ferry which will operate from Portugal Cove to Bell island will take care of the express parcels?

Mr. Hees: This new ship will be adequate to handle express shipments and if the Canadian National wish us to handle that service and so on, this ferry will be able to do it.

Item agreed to.

439. Yarmouth, Nova Scotia-Bar Harbor, Maine, U.S.A., ferry service—deficit, 1958, $165,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I see that the amount of the deficit is $165,000, which I think speaks highly of the efforts made by the department's officials, because when this service was started I think perhaps a greater deficit was expected. I should like to know, is it expected that next year this service will operate at a surplus?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman; this deficit is about the kind of operating result we expect in the future, and certainly next year.

Item agreed to.

441. Degaussing Canadian-owned merchant ships, of 1,000 gross tons and over, of Canadian registry, or of United Kingdom registry if subject to retransfer to Canadian registry under special intergovernmental arrangement, $300,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I have one question here. This is an item which appears practically every year, and has for many years. Now that the merchant fleet is fast disappearing, is it expected that the degaussing of this type of ship shall cease? How many more ships require to be degaussed?

Mr. Hees: I am advised by my officials that the program will continue, because we are continuing to do this work on Canadian ships going under British registry.

Item agreed to.

442. Martime Freight Rates Act—for the payment to the railway companies operating in the select territory designated by the act, of the difference occurring on account of the application of the act, between the tariff tolls and normal tolls under approved tariffs (estimated and certified to the Minister of Transport by the Canadian National Railway Company and approved by auditors of the said company respecting the eastern lines of the Canadian National Railways and in the case of the other railways by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1958, $14,000,000.

Mr. Chevrier: This is an extremely large item, as the minister knows, and one which is required in the maritime provinces. In view of statements that have been made repeatedly, is it the intention to increase the payments under the Maritime Freight Rates Act from the amount which is paid now?

Mr. Hees: This whole question is under intensive study at the present time, and we expect to have a report on it by the end of the year.

Mr. Benidickson: This is an item in which I, too, am interested. I notice that for the current fiscal year an additional $525,000 is requested. When the Minister of Finance tabled his report with respect to the Governor General's warrants, he indicated that this was a place where there had been an economy, and I think it was indicated in the Governor General's warrants which were tabled that the requirement had been reduced by $1,200,000 for the last fiscal year. In the estimates as tabled for 1957-58 the amount asked for was $14,675,000.

As I say, it was an item in which it was considered there had been economies, so why have we an increase this year? Is this not an expenditure that is simply based on a fixed rate per mile or per ton of traffic, and does the minister expect that there is going to be an increase in the volume of traffic in that area to which this subsidy applies?

Mr. Hees: This increase is due, first of all, to the effect of the increase of 30 per cent for a full year on certain outward traffic, and second to freight rate increases authorized by the board of transport commissioners since last year when the estimate was prepared.

Mr. Benidickson: The whole amount is something that is statutory, that the minister cannot control?

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. Benidickson: So there is no opportunity for the minister to make an economy. If the bills come in and the amount shown in the estimate was not adequate, he would simply have to ask for a supplementary estimate?

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Item agreed to.

443. Payment to Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited (hereinafter called the company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made by the company to the Minister of Finance, in the amount of the deficit, certified by the auditors of the company, in the operation of the company in the calendar year 1958, $190,000.

Mr. Chevrier: This is an item which I feel I cannot allow to pass without making a short statement. I shall not hold up the committee, but I feel that in view of the attitude taken on this side of the house and the position of the minister, which I understand, there should be at least a brief statement on it.

In the first place, as the house knows, this is an item to pay the deficit on the operation of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships for that portion of the year during which they were in operation. It has to do also with the decision, approved by the Canadian government, to sell these eight vessels.

I should like to say here that I think that decision was a mistake. I say this having regard to what happened in the past. I think it was a mistake to have attempted in the earlier session to transfer the flag to Trinidad, and now it is an equal mistake to transfer it to Cuba. After all, what is being done is this. It is a United States company operating out of Detroit under a Cuban flag that will now operate these ships, thereby depriving the officers and men of these eight ships, of their livelihood, apart from all of the business which was generated between the Caribbean countries and our own Canadian shore.

I think it was a mistake also because the former government had decided to effect a five-year plan under which these eight ships would have been put into operation for a period of five years to determine whether, at the end of that period, it would be advisable to wind up the operations of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships. I realize that even then it was a marginal operation. It is for this reason I have no hesitation in saying now that that decision to transfer the flag was wrong, that the decision should not have been made, that the decision should not have been approved by the Canadian government.

Having said that, I come to the other question which is perhaps of greater importance and greater concern to the house, that is the question of a Canadian deep sea fleet. I know the position in which any minister of transport finds himself with reference to that matter. There is no doubt that following the war years it was possible to operate a deep sea fleet at a profit because the Canadian bottoms were available and bottoms from other countries were in short supply at the time. Then came the Korean war and again there was a great demand for ships and shipping services by all countries, and the Canadian deep sea fleet did operate profitably. For a period of two or three years, I believe, following that time there was an item of $3 million or $3.5 million put in the estimates of the Department of Transport in order to assist this fleet.

I know that, having regard to general policy, it is perhaps difficult for one department to bring its point of view to bear upon the whole government. I know the Canadian maritime commission and the departmental transport officials, as well as the minister, must of necessity be sympathetic to a case such as this, but the point I want to make and the blame, if any, I want to direct at the minister in as gentle a way as I can is with regard to the decision taken by the Canadian maritime commission quite some time ago that at no time should the Canadian merchant fleet ever get below 750,000 deadweight tons. This was considered by the Canadian maritime commission as a bare nucleus for a Canadian fleet and that is what we, when we were in office, were determined to maintain. We did that during all the years we were in office.

Now by the sale of the eight Canadian National (West Indies) ships, and other transfers that have taken place, this minimum requirement recommended by the Canadian maritime commission, an agency of the Minister of Transport, has been reduced away below the 750,000 deadweight tons. What it is at the moment I do not know, but I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia say yesterday, I think, that it was somewhere in the neighbourhood of 185,000 tons; of that I am not sure. My attention is directed to the fact that it is now 186,000 tons.

The point is that it is now very far below what was required as a nucleus. The question I bring to the minister's attention and ask him is this. In view of the recommendation of his own agency that the Canadian mercantile fleet should never at any time be below the figure of 750,000 deadweight tons, what does the government propose to do in the face of the recommendation of its own agency?

Before I resume my seat I feel that I should say something in answer to a criticism made by the hon. member for Danforth yesterday concerning the president of the Canadian National Railways. I had already spoken at the time; otherwise I would have risen then to say this. I did not always agree with the recommendations made by the president of the Canadian National Railways, but I always considered that he was a public servant of the highest character. I have come into contact with him over a period of nine years, and I not only respected him for his loyalty to the government which he served—and I am sure he is giving the same loyalty to the present administration—but was impressed by his full understanding of all the questions that we discussed together.

I regretted very much the reflection made yesterday upon the quality of his services. I was again brought into contact with him in my capacity as president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, and we had some bitter discussions about a matter which I know has come to the attention of the Minister of Transport. But notwithstanding those discussions I believe that he is one of the finest types of officials that the government of Canada has. I deeply regret that any member of the house should have felt it necessary to attack him under the circumstances.

Mr. Hees: To what the hon. member for Laurier has just said about Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways, I should just like to add this. I have always found, as he did while he was a member of the government, the most complete co-operation from Mr. Donald Gordon in all my dealings with him. I have complete confidence in him as president of the railways, and I believe his energies are at all times directed to the efficient and effective operation of the railway. I believe he is doing his utmost to run that railway in an effective and efficient manner, and I have complete confidence in him.

The Chairman: Shall vote 443 carry?

Mr. Chevrier: The minister did not answer my question.

Mr. Hees: In reply to what the hon. member for Laurier said earlier with regard to shipping policy generally, I should like to point out that on June 30, 1957, which after all was only nine days after we assumed office, there were only 26 ships listed on Canadian registry, 18 of which were dry cargo ships and 8 were tankers. I am now talking about deep sea ships. They had a total gross registered tonnage of 186,163. I should like to give the comparative figures for the year 1948. At that time there was a total of 172 deep sea ships on Canadian registry. Of those, 157 were dry cargo ships and 15 were tankers, and they had a total gross tonnage of 1,178,791. I think the hon. member will therefore agree that a great deal of reduction in the Canadian fleet took place under the late government of which he was a member. I just mention that matter in order to point out the fact that this reduction is something that has been going on for a long time, and that a great deal of it went on under the former government.

This matter is of concern to me and to this government. Later on this fall I intend to bring the subject again to the attention of the government, and it will be thoroughly discussed.

Mr. Argue: As has already been said by both hon. members who have spoken, Canada's merchant fleet has been reduced very rapidly in recent years. My purpose in rising was really to ask the minister whether, in view of the great interest in the transaction —I refer to the sale of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships vessels—it will be referred next session to the standing committee of this house dealing with railways, air lines and shipping owned by the government.

I have found that a great many Canadians are not only disturbed by the fact that the Canadian merchant fleet is being very rapidly reduced, but are particularly concerned about the events surrounding the sale of the Canadian National (West Indies) steamships. There is the whole question of whether Canada received value for the ships. There is the question—and the minister has already referred briefly to this matter in the house—of other offers being made and in one instance, though the minister says the offer came late, an offer that was higher than the sale price obtained for the ships. In the public interest —and it may be the intention of the government to do it anyway—I think this extremely important sale should be referred to a standing committee of this house so that members may inquire as to the circumstances surrounding the sale and find whether or not there is any foundation for the fears expressed by some that the Canadian government did not get for the ships the value it might have obtained.

I know the minister will say that was the very best offer the government could get. That being the case I can see no reason why, from the government's standpoint, there should be any objection to this course being followed. I think such an airing should be given to this sale.

Mr. Hees: The government has no objection at all to any members of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, which will of course meet next year, asking Mr. Donald Gordon any questions they wish to ask about this matter. I feel sure that Mr. Gordon will be pleased to answer fully any questions that are put to him. Neither the government nor the Canadian National Railways have anything to hide in this matter. It was a perfectly open transaction. It was a good transaction. As hon. members know, both the Canadian National Railways and the government were reluctant to sell this fleet. We took the step as the only one we felt to be sensible in all the circumstances.

As to the circumstances of the sale, the prices offered and the actual price that was accepted, there is nothing to hide with regard to any of those matters. I am sure that next year Mr. Gordon will welcome any questions about the transaction which any member of the committee would like to ask him next year.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate the answer of the minister. I myself am not certain, because I have never had the privilege of being a member of this committee, whether or not persons in addition to Donald Gordon should be called, but I take it from the general purport of the minister's answer that he is quite prepared to have a full inquiry into this transaction next year, and certainly his statement is satisfactory to me.

Mr. Hees: As far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing, but this is a matter for the committee itself to decide. If the committee decides to call somebody before it for examination, that is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to this particular item, is that exactly the position of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamship Company? My impression has been that it is really a government operation, and it is simply put under the administration of the Canadian National Railways. So the responsibility of the government in respect of matters of policy, I think, is quite different from what it would be if we were dealing with a property which strictly belonged to the Canadian National Railways. This is simply under their administration, something like the Hudson Bay railway, is it not? I must say that I share the view of the member for Laurier in that we are very disappointed that there has not been a greater effort to carry out that five-year program.

Second, when the decision was made to sell these ships I had very grave doubts that, considering the difference between the lowest and the next lowest tender, the best decision was made in the national interest. I believe the minister, when he made the announcement about the sale, indicated that he had received some assurances from the purchaser that the ships would continue to be engaged in carrying traffic between Canada and the West Indies, which is of so much value to our national economy.

The minister is probably aware of the fact that there was an article just a week or so ago in the New York Times to the effect that this was not the intention of the purchaser over the long pull, but that just as soon as the seaway was open it was the company's intention to withdraw these ships from the West Indies trade and that they would simply be used to the best commercial advantage. That would probably be in seaway traffic and not necessarily, as it has been in the past, contributing a very important aid to Canada, largely in respect of the maritime economy, in the development of our trade with the West Indies.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, the information we have is that when the seaway is open, in addition to using the ports of Halifax and Montreal this company is considering the possible further extension of its operations to the great lakes ports, but not the elimination of the ports of Montreal or Halifax.

Mr. Benidickson: I am more concerned about the elimination of the regular traffic, with the West Indies being the other end of the route. What assurance has the minister received from the purchaser in that respect?

Mr. Hees: The Canadian National (West Indies) Steamship Company was assured by the purchaser that it intended to serve the ports I mentioned when I made the announcement to this house. If the purchasing company wishes to change its mind at any time, it owns the ships and it can do so; but we were given that assurance, which I passed on to the house and, as I have said, the only change of which we know is that it is contemplating the possibility of extending its operations into the great lakes after the seaway is open.

Mr. Benidickson: Would all the crews be Cuban citizens?

Mr. Hees: That, Mr. Chairman, is the business of the purchasing company. That company now owns the ships and can hire whatever crews it wishes.

Mr. Chevrier: Under the Cuban flag they could not have other than Cuban crews, could they?

Mr. Hees: I am not too familiar with the regulations governing registry under the Cuban flag, but I would assume they would be Cubans.

Mr. Deschatelets: Was the government or the minister given any written assurance in this matter?

Mr. Hees: I understand the purchasing company wrote a letter to Canadian National Railways to that effect but, as I say, once the transaction was completed the ships are the property of the company and it can change its plans as it sees fit.

Air Services—
Administration division—
449. Air services administration, $1,116,241.

Mr. Chevrier: This is a pretty important item in that it covers a rather wide field, and perhaps it might be advisable to call it one o'clock. If not I shall proceed with the remarks I have to make.

Mr. Hees: No; I think it would be perfectly satisfactory to do so. I agree that this would be a good place to stop.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the house to call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned at one o'clock we had reached the item Air Services Administration and on this item I just want to bring one matter to the attention of the minister, and I do not want to deal with it at any length.

I did have the opportunity when the committee on railways and shipping was established to say something about air competition, and what I have to say at this moment on the subject will be brief. This is, as the committee knows, and as the minister in particular knows, a subject of extreme interest and importance, namely competition in trans-continental air routes. In view of the statements which were made earlier by the minister and others—sweeping statements to the effect that there would be all-out competition in this field—I want to tell the minister that I think he was well advised to seek advice from a British consultant and to have tabled in the house some time ago what is known as the Wheatcroft report. The Wheatcroft report clearly establishes the principle of festina lente—make haste slowly—and I believe the minister has come to the conclusion now that there should be no ill considered action taken.

As the committee knows, C.P.A. and Pacific Western Airlines have made application before the air transport board, and the matter being sub judice. I have no intention of discussing it other than to say, arising out of the Wheatcroft report, that there are three alternatives which could now apply: first, the status quo, leaving the position remain as it is; next, all-out competition; and, thirdly, a policy which would be midway between the two. That may be what the Wheatcroft report has in mind in effect—gradual competition in the field of these trans-continental air routes.

However, there are many things which come into play in deciding whether or not competition is advisable. There is the density of the traffic, there is the financial implication involved and there are, in addition, such questions as the adequacy of the service, the frequency of the service and the quality of the service. But there is one point on which the Wheatcroft report lays great stress and that is that there are only three routes in Canada where there is enough traffic to sustain competition, and those routes are Toronto-Montreal, Vancouver-Victoria and Toronto-Winnipeg.

I did attempt to discuss this matter at the committee on railways and shipping but I was ruled out of order. I think the ruling was mistaken and erroneous, particularly in view of the fact that the Wheatcroft report had been tabled in the house, but nonetheless I will not take advantage of the opportunity to discuss the matter here other than to say that I believe the effect of competition on Trans-Canada Air Lines is one thing that should be carefully considered and carefully studied having regard not only to the Wheatcroft report but to the whole position of air traffic in Canada.

There is no doubt in my mind that there is no better air line in the world than T.C.A. I have had the opportunity in the position which the minister now holds of using many air lines but I have never found one which better deserves, in the over-all acceptance of the term, the statement that there is no finer air line in the world than Trans-Canada Air Lines. There may be certain misgivings about T.C.A.—I have no doubt there are—and some mistakes have been made, but on the whole few air lines do compare with it.

Now I wish to make a statement which I hope the committee will accept in the right spirit. It is that when men go out of public life it seems they are so often forgotten and that never again is a word said about them. I wish to refer now, in particular, to the work done with regard to T.C.A. by the Right Hon. C. D. Howe. I think the establishment of T.C.A. is a monument which will always live to his credit. I can remember many debates in this house—many heated and bitter debates—having to do with T.C.A., but I will not go into them now in order to keep away from anything which might be contentious. However, I do want to say that now that this great public servant has gone out of public life the committee should be reminded that one of the many lasting things which he accomplished for this country of ours was the establishment of one of the finest air lines in the world—Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. Hees: I should like to say at this moment that I agree completely with what the hon. member for Laurier has said about Trans-Canada Air Lines and the services which it provides. I agree with him completely in that. I think it is absolutely first class, and I am very proud to be the minister who reports to parliament for T.C.A. I should also like to agree with him regarding the great contribution which Mr. Howe made to the building up of this fine corporation.

Mr. Argue: I want to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by this item to say that we in the C.C.F. are proud of the operations of the T.C.A. We feel that it is an outstanding example of efficiency and quality of operation. It is a tribute to and an example of what can be done by public ownership in this important field. We know the statements that have been made by government members in the past regarding Trans-Canada Air Lines have not always been complimentary. There seems to have been a great desire on the part of Conservative members to introduce an element of so-called competition but aimed in a direction which we would suggest would reduce the efficiency of Trans-Canada Air Lines and would merely be of assistance to the Canadian Pacific Air Lines which itself is a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

We have noted with interest the Wheatcroft report and were pleased that it did not condone any early interference with Trans-Canada Air Lines. With regard to its stated attitude toward T.C.A. in the past we hope the Conservative party will change and will maintain Trans-Canada Air Lines intact in the form in which it now exists, will allow the air line to expand and will turn thumbs down on the proposition that transcontinental flights should be turned over to private companies.

The annual report of Trans-Canada Air Lines in our view is a solid indication of the efficient service of this company. The fact that it has been able to continue to expand at a very rapid rate and acquire the most modern planes and equipment and increase its service and at the same time reduce passenger rates is a worth-while and welcome respite from the kind of action we usually see these days by private corporations. In scarcely any other service can one find a substantial reduction in prices in 1957. I should like the minister to give us a more comprehensive statement than that he has given thus far as to what the policy of the government is going to be with regard to Trans-Canada Air Line services. I hope he will tell the committee the government has no desire to provide so-called competition —and I do not think it is really competition at all—to Trans-Canada Air Line services.

The Wheatcroft report pointed out that not only does Trans-Canada Air Lines provide highly efficient service but to a degree the provision of service by Trans-Canada Air Lines in areas where passenger traffic is not particularly great is in effect a subsidy for the people in that area. As a person coming from the prairies I am naturally interested in having as good service as possible for that region and I realize if we had to depend upon competitive service only without the operation of a public company like Trans-Canada Air Lines which considers the welfare of the general public we might have much less service and service of a considerably poorer quality than we now have.

I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Laurier and with the Minister of Transport in the tribute they paid to our friend, Right Hon. C. D. Howe. I do not believe there is any one sitting in this committee today who has clashed with Mr. Howe more often than I have. If I have been able to acquire some knowledge of the procedures of this house and some knowledge of the activities of the Department of Trade and Commerce and in particular some knowledge of the grain marketing business, I can thank Mr. Howe for a good part of it because whenever I asked him a question on orders of the day, even as a new member, he treated me with courtesy and always gave me a full and frank answer. One thing I always liked about C. D. Howe was that he was a good, hard and tough debater. He did not give any quarter and he did not ask any quarter but at the end of a debate one always parted from him on excellent terms.

C. D. Howe is a big businessman. He has acquired much power and authority in the Canadian business world. He has many good qualities but as is the case with every hon. member of this committee he occasionally displayed certain human weaknesses. One quality of his character which I always admired and considered good was that he constantly protected the people within his department and defended the operations of organizations within the purview of his department. When C. D. Howe was the minister in charge of Trans-Canada Air Lines, Polymer Corporation or any other project coming under his department's jurisdiction one could be reasonably assured that the operation would be efficient based in the public interest and would expand.

Mr. Benidickson: He was a great miner for talent for the public service.

Mr. Argue: I believe that is true. I do not think any one could say that in his philosophical make-up C. D. Howe had any particular love for public enterprise and he was probably as anti-socialist as anybody who sat on the treasury benches. But he was a pragmatist and when he saw that public ownership would do a much better job than private ownership in a particular field, in spite of his basic belief he did not hesitate to promote public ownership.

I believe that Trans-Canada Air Lines is one of the best air line services in the world and it has provided excellent service to the Canadian nation without profit. If Canada is going to compete with foreign air lines in providing air services in days that lie ahead we will be more apt to compete in an efficient way and keep abreast of technological improvements if we maintain this publicly owned corporation and refuse to turn it over to private hands. Canada in competition with the air lines of the world should tell the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, the United States and other nations that we have a publicly owned corporation that has the backing of the Canadian government and the Canadian people and that we intend to compete efficiently with all comers. I am hopeful that the Minister of Transport will tell the committee there is no intention on the part of his department to turn Trans-Canada Air Lines over to a private company and I ask him that question.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure what the hon. member has asked. Is he implying that this government is intending to hand over Trans-Canada Air Lines to some private company or is he suggesting that if the air transport board should decide some measure of competition would be beneficial the government should simply refuse to accept the decision of the air transport board?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the last part of the minister's question I will say yes. The fact that we have established a certain board does not mean that board is paramount to parliament. The board is not paramount to parliament. In recent months the board of transport commissioners allowed an increase in freight rates. The governor in council, by its authority under the law, refused to allow the increase to go into effect. I am asking the minister whether the government—never mind the air transport board —has a policy of maintaining the T.C.A.'s present position on the trans-Canada air lines runs, or whether it is prepared, in the words of the minister, to allow competition in this service?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member knows and as all hon. members know, the air transport board was established to examine applications brought before it by various air lines in Canada. That is being done at the present time in the case of an application for a trans-continental route. Two air lines have applied for the right to operate on that route as well as the T.C.A. In accordance with the terms of reference under which the air transport board operates, those applications will be heard and the recommendation of the air transport board will be transmitted to the government and the government will examine that recommendation. That is the course we propose to follow.

Mr. Argue: From my point of view the minister's answer is entirely unsatisfactory. Of course, what the government does in the future can only be determined by events. After the government receives the recommendation from the air transport board, if it should acquiesce in allowing so-called competition which will do nothing but hurt the services in this field the government will be doing a disservice to the people of this country. I am hopeful that in the days that lie ahead the minister will support Trans-Canada Air Lines as it now exists, with the rights it now has, and will maintain an expanding Trans-Canada Air Lines and oppose any diminution of Trans-Canada Air Lines rights and will refuse to allow so-called competition. In the tribute that the hon. member for Laurier has paid to Trans-Canada Air Lines there is implicit in his remarks, though he may not agree, that in the light of its history Trans-Canada Air Lines should be given a full and unimpeded opportunity to continue to improve its now excellent service.

452. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $11,385,000.

Mr. Bourget: I tried to find some details on page 571 but I could not find any. I am not going to delay the committee, but I would ask the minister whether he would not follow the pattern established by the Department of Public Works and on the last pages of the estimates book give details of the projects that are mentioned in this item so that we would have some idea of the projects in the different provinces for which he is asking money.

Mr. Hees: I can give the information on the main items but I emphasize—

Mr. Chevrier: He wants the minister to do it in the future.

Mr. Bourget: I am not asking for it this year but in future years. Details of the vessels that are to be built are given for this year, but with respect to this item for $11,385,000, I am asking the minister whether in future years we could not have details of the different projects that are included in the item so that we would have information on the projects, as we have been doing in public works.

Mr. Hees: We will give every possible consideration to doing that. The only difficulty is, it would be a tremendous volume of details but we shall give every consideration to the possibility of doing what the hon. member requests.

Mr. Bourget: I am not asking for all the small projects but just for projects over $100,000.

Item agreed to.

Radio Act and regulations—

453. Administration, operation and maintenance, including contributions as Canada's share of the costs of various international radio, telegraph and telephone organizations, as detailed in the estimates, $2,359,295.

Mr. Benidickson: The other day a question was asked about the opportunity to introduce

[Mr. Argue.]

United States television programs by the introduction of a cable into Canada. I do not think the minister has replied to that question yet but I, of course, am interested because the location in question in Canada was Fort Frances. It was indicated that a United States firm felt that, without insisting on approval from the department, it could bring in to Fort Frances a program which in turn would be paid for by installation charges paid by the United States company. Another common practice in some communities that cannot get good reception is to pay a monthly rental fee for the service. I heartily approve of this in this particular location because I have some experience with the long delay in getting the C.B.C. sound radio programs in that area. They are 150 miles from the microwave television network and I surmise it might be rather late in the program of the C.B.C. to provide them with service. I think this comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport and I wondered whether the minister could tell us that his department has been dealing sympathetically with the application of International Television Cable Corporation to allow residents of Fort Frances who have subscribed a certain amount of capital for this service and who feel keenly that they are getting television reception from nowhere, to take advantage of it. Is the minister aware of this situation?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, we have just heard of this matter informally. The government has no control over a cable of this kind.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister asserts that if a company crosses an international river by means of renting a telephone company's lines and introduces programs that it will be possible to recable it on the Canadian side?

Mr. Hees: I am adviced by my officials that if they wish to bring in this cable they can do so.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this item covers the administration of the Radio Act and regulations. Very briefly I wish to mention four matters which I have been asked to raise on the floor of the house by various organizations and persons in my constituency.

No doubt the minister is aware of the fact that in Kootenay West we have had great difficulties with respect to radio interference occasioned by power lines. The matter has been taken up repeatedly and the minister's officials have visited the district to try to locate the causes and advise the local people how best to overcome it. They appreciate that but I do suggest that the department do everything possible to continue to assist those people who at the present time are almost denied radio reception completely because of interference from power lines. However, I do suggest that this problem will not be corrected until we have the necessary low-power relay stations.

Mr. Hees: If the hon member is going to ask all four questions, perhaps I can deal with each one as it comes up. In answer to that question, Mr. Chairman, we are working with the power company in this regard. The difficulty so far is that the signals are very weak indeed. We are continuing to work with them and will do everything we can to be of assistance.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his reply, and I was coming to that point. I think the signals are so weak the only solution will be the erection of two or three of these low power relay stations. I hope the minister uses his influence with the Minister of National Revenue, and together they will soon have these stations erected.

The other matter to which I wish to refer was piped-in television. I want to explain to the minister that I am not mechanically minded. My mechanical ability ceases with the lawnmower and wheelbarrow. We have piped-in television around the Nelson and Trail areas through coaxial cable service and a reflector on the mountain top. There has been a great deal of complaint about the rates and fees charged when there is a change of occupancy in a house, and things of that sort. I have taken this matter up with the department, and I understand the department issues a licence but has no control over the fees and charges. I have taken it up with the public utilities commission in British Columbia, and they say they accept no responsibility in that respect. Apparently, therefore, the administration of this business lives in a vacuum. I ask the minister if it would not be possible for the officials of his department to take the matter up with the public utilities commission so there is some regulation with respect to fees, charges and other costs exacted by these companies.

Mr. Hees: My suggestion is that if these people believe these charges are excessive, this would be a matter to take up with the new regulatory board which is in the process of being established.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for that answer. This is like a cricket match, one wicket at a time.

The other matter I should like to mention relates to community television. I have one or two groups in my constituency who have a co-operative arrangement for the use of some sort of reflector on the mountain top reflecting signals for television, without cables, to certain vital areas in the district. I understand they have been refused the right to instal this system as there is some distinction in law between the use of the air in that way and bringing signals in by coaxial cable. Would the minister inform me why these people are refused the right to instal their own television system when they are unable to obtain any other, and the distinction between this form of television and the one I previously spoke about which is piped-in?

Mr. Hees: This operation would be completely dependent upon United States programs, so we considered that it would be advisable to hold this matter up and let it be considered by the new board. This is quite an important matter.

Mr. Herridge: Did the minister say that would be referred to the new board?

Mr. Hees: Our suggestion is the applicants should refer this matter to the new board as soon as it is appointed.

Mr. Herridge: I have one other matter, and then I shall subside for a few minutes. I have had it brought to my attention, Mr. Chairman, and been asked to obtain information as to why the government does not demand commercial operator's standing for station engineers the same as is required under the federal communications act in the United States. I understand our present act allows anyone to operate the physical equipment at a transmitter site and also automatically-operated equipment under the juke box principle, and according to my information this negates the need for any Canadian studying or taking exams in the field of radio broadcasting. I have been asked to inquire of the minister to see if the act could be amended to require licensed personnel as the operators of radio stations?

Mr. Hees: The technical qualifications of such engineers have to meet the standards set by the department, so in effect what the hon. member believes is not so. We do not allow engineers to operate these stations unless they come up to our technical standards.

Mr. Benidickson: May I revert to my former question, and ask whether another form of T.V. service might be provided at a border town? I take it that the minister's department, under the Radio Act, would have control of an organization that picked up a United States broadcast and then relayed it within Canada, but that if a United States company simply provided their service by cable they are exempt from regulation?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is correct.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone service—

455. Administration, operation and maintenance, $277,802.

Mr. Batten: I have one or two questions to ask on this item. Does the Department of Transport operate any telegraph or telephone services within Canada, and if so how many?

Mr. Hees: There is the Magdalen islands service, the service in Cape Breton and a small service in New Brunswick.

Mr. Batten: May I ask the minister, are these land lines or are some of them wireless systems?

Mr. Hees: They are chiefly land lines, Mr. Chairman, but there are some radio links.

Mr. Batten: I have one more question, and I do not expect the minister to answer this question now. I wonder if, when it is convenient for him to do so, he would give me the population in the areas served by these systems?

Mr. Hees: Yes, we shall be glad to convey that information to the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

Meteorological division—

457. Administration, operation and maintenance, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $10,708,161.

Mr. Chevrier: There is one word here which I cannot resist saying because, at times, there is some criticism about the fact that headquarters buildings are removed from Ottawa and given to other cities. I have reference to the printing bureau, which has gone to Hull; to the national film board, which has gone to Montreal; and the seaway headquarters which are alleged to go to Cornwall. I want to say here that, perhaps unknown to the house, the meteorological service of the Department of Transport have their headquarters in the city of Toronto. This is a decision that was taken earlier, and I know when I was holding the position which my hon. friend holds there was a difference of opinion between certain officers of the department and I had to take a decision at one time as to whether the headquarters would be brought back to Ottawa or remain in Toronto. In order that there may be no doubt about the view of the present officers, I can say that those who discussed the recommendation with me are no longer with the department. They have retired.

I did have to seek advice as to what was the best thing to do under the circumstances. I sought the advice of Dr. Andrew Thompson, who is director of the meteorological services.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Of course, he was strongly of the opinion that this service should remain in the city of Toronto. I remember one evening getting a telephone call from the president of the University of Toronto, who is now the Secretary of State for External Affairs, giving strong reasons why, because of the association of the University of Toronto with meteorologists, it was so important that that service be maintained in the city of Toronto. I need hardly tell the house that the decision was taken to leave the headquarters where they are.

My only reason in rising at this time is to say that sometimes it is in the national interest that headquarters buildings be removed from the city of Ottawa and established elsewhere.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to ask the minister if he could give the committee a report on the meteorological stations in the Arctic. How many of such stations are under the sole control of Canada; how many are under joint control; and how many, if any, are by agreement under the control of the United States? Can he tell the committee what progress is being made to ensure that Canada eventually will be able to take full responsibility for this important work in the Canadian Arctic?

Mr. Hees: In answer to the hon. gentleman's question may I say this. There are five Canadian stations, five joint stations and no United States stations. We have been increasing our component every year.

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister give some idea as to the respective participation of Canadians and Americans in those five joint stations?

Mr. Hees: We have in each case the officer in charge. We provide 50 per cent of the supplies. We undertake the supply work. We have the majority of the operators in each of the stations.

Mr. Pearson: The minister anticipates that, as Canadian technicians are trained and made available, it will not be very long before we have complete responsibility for the maintenance of those five stations?

Mr. Hees: Our primary responsibility is to have the new stations on a 100 per cent Canadian basis before we start taking over the joint bases.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

459. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $1,866,225.

Mr. Chevrier: There is just one matter here that comes to my attention. It has to do with the statement that the minister made in the house earlier, namely that it would be in the public interest that licences for air services using only the small type of aircraft be granted freely on request. The minister will recall that I asked him a number of questions on that matter because I had received representations from smaller air carriers protesting against that decision. I want to bring it to his attention now, not in order to delay the committee but to point up some of the difficulties that arise. The decision that was taken and announced by the minister is, in my opinion, one which is not in the general interest of these carriers because it opens up the charter aircraft field to wide-open competition. I have grave doubts about the matter lest it bring about bad results which will affect these companies that are operating under difficult circumstances in wide areas of the country at far away points. It strikes me that they will be seriously affected by this decision.

I will go so far as to say this. The minister stated earlier that there should be wide-open competition and that, because of the Wheatcroft report, there had to be a change in policy. It may very well be that it was decided to make that free and wide-open competition in this restricted field; and it may well be that, in order to carry out in part at least the statement or the promise made by the minister earlier, this was being done.

I should like to bring to his attention the fact that many of the air carriers in the class "C" category are greatly disturbed about this decision. They have been established at great sacrifice to themselves and they will be materially and unfavourably affected if this policy is allowed to be carried out. All I want to do is to bring the matter to the attention of the minister and to ask him if he will not reconsider it. I ask him if he will not bring the matter to the attention of his officers, particularly the air transport board, so that they might give consideration to the representations which I am sure these small carriers will want to make to the board, and which I am sure they have already brought to the attention of the minister. Without saying more, I will resume my seat in the hope that the minister will give consideration to what I have said.

Mr. Benidickson: On vote 459 which I think comes under the administration of the controller, although my remarks might be equally applicable under vote 460, I just want to raise one or two matters very briefly. When I was the parliamentary assistant to the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Laurier, I had the honour of opening a modest expansion to the Winnipeg airport. At that time I said frankly on behalf of the department that this extension was recognized as being merely a temporary expedient. Since then there has been an addition. But on the other hand, the minister's predecessor wrote me in 1956, prior to the change of administration, that he had every expectation that construction of a new terminal building for Winnipeg would commence in 1957. I am wondering whether the minister would tell us something about progress in this respect.

I have another item; and I must say that generally I receive from the Minister of Transport the utmost consideration. I am only going to draw his attention to a little incident that is not going to affect our personal relations very much. I want to point out to him that I made a written inquiry about new construction on the Kenora airport on April 25. While his letter to me was dated June 6 in reply, indicating that it was expected that they would soon obtain a contractor for the work at the Kenora airport, it just so happened that the defeated Conservative candidate in the district was able to make an announcement about this matter two or three days prior to the receipt by me of the letter from the minister. I do not think that is typical of the minister. I am sure it was just an oversight that the letter did not, in the usual channels through the mail, reach me as it should. I am sure the minister would not want that to happen as a regular practice. He will recognize from the dates I gave that I had shown a great interest in this matter long before a reply was possible. Then for some reason or another I did not receive the letter dated June 6 until after the announcement had been made in the Kenora papers by someone else. However, I must give him the full benefit of any doubt; in fact, I really have no doubt. From my own experience I know that sometimes mail presented to me by a secretary is typed for a certain date, and I do not necessarily change the date if I have not had the opportunity on that particular day to sign the letter. I am sure it was not deliberate. However, I am just hoping that the minister will try to avoid that type of thing in the future.

Mr. Hees: I wish to assure the hon. member that was not intentional.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—

Operation and maintenance—

460. Civil aviation services, and to provide, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act or any other act, that the treasury board may authorize arrangements to be made for the operation of hotel, bakery, restaurant, staff messing, staff accommodation and similar facilities at airports and may authorize the disbursement of revenues derived therefrom and payment of deficits that may occur in the management and operation of these facilities, $14,342,200.

Mr. Chevrier: There is just one question I wish to ask. It has to do with the Dorval airport. As the minister knows, the air terminal was envisaged some years ago and there was then designed a plan for this international airport. There are three questions that come to my mind. The first is this. What was the original estimate? What was the intermediate estimate? By that, I mean the one that was made by the immediate predecessor of the minister. Finally, what is the estimate today, in 1958. Then I should like to know from the minister, if he will be kind enough to tell me, why it was necessary to revise these estimates. I take it that it was because of the fact that, during the planning of this important air terminal there were changes in design brought about by the jet era. Strips must be longer and stronger. Where a strip of 4,000 feet or 5,000 feet sufficed at one time, now it is necessary to have strips two or more miles in length.

An hon. Member: Four miles?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; there is a strip several miles in length out here at Uplands airport which is in operation at the moment. Because of the new instruments and so forth it also becomes necessary to amend the plans and specifications. I wonder, therefore, if I could not get an answer in respect to those questions.

There is another question having to do with air conditioning, and I do not want to repeat what has been said earlier. I know the reasons why at the outset it was decided against air conditioning. These were because it was not the policy of the government to put air conditioning in their buildings because it would have brought about a serious delay and would have increased the cost, but I think that in view of the developments in the aviation field a complete change has been brought about with respect to this aspect of the question. There are a number of alternatives which have entered the picture, more particularly the strong recommendation by the international civil aviation organization which strongly favours the air conditioning of new terminal buildings. I therefore hope it will be found possible to make a complete study of this matter and to come up with a recommendation which would favour air conditioning. I also hope the minister will be able to answer my earlier questions.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad to do so.

First, with regard to Dorval airport, various cost estimates were made at various stages, although a complete cost estimate was not possible until 1957 because final plans and specifications for the building itself were not completed until that time. Earlier estimates varied from $10 million, when the plans were in the early stage of preparation, to $12.5 million in 1956 and, last year, to $15 million, as the plans and specifications were completed. These amounts were for the terminal building only and not for the ramp area and aero quays and fingers connected with the ramp area. The cost of the fingers and the aero quays is estimated to be about $2 million and if air conditioning is added to the public waiting room, this could run to another $500,000 which, when added to the cost of the main building itself, would give a total of around $17.5 million. It has been necessary because of changing conditions in aviation to modify the plans on more than one occasion. The ability to do this has indeed been an advantage in providing for a more modern terminal since that time and if the plans had been made inflexible in the first instance they could not have kept abreast of the changing requirements of the air lines and indeed the building might have been obsolete in some regards when completed.

The interior layout plans were adjusted on several occasions as the result of discussion with the air lines and with customs and immigration, whose requirements continued to evolve throughout the period. The most difficult issue and one which has only recently been settled related to the fingers and aero quays layout for the movement of passengers to the aircraft.

With regard to the matter of air conditioning, I quite agree with the hon. member for Laurier and with other members who have spoken. In fact a number of the members from the Montreal area have spoken to me about this matter outside of the house and I and my department agree that air conditioning is very desirable if it can be put in without serious delay. During the past week we have been carrying on an intensive study and we shall continue to do so to see if this can be done. As I indicated yesterday, I hope to be able to make an announcement on this matter very shortly.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if I might follow that up with one or two questions. I believe the various estimates mentioned by the minister were $10 million to $12.5 million, then $15 million and lastly $17.5 million. I take it that these various estimates were made necessary because of a change in the design and plans required by the circumstances which existed from time to time?

Mr. Hees: That is partly true, Mr. Chairman, and as my officials have advised me, we knew more about the costs of materials and other factors going into the layout as the plans were developed and it therefore became easier to arrive at a more definite figure.

Mr. Chevrier: And the first estimate of $10 million to $12.5 million did not include the fingers which the minister mentioned and the other item which escapes me?

Mr. Hees: The fingers and the aero quays and the possible air conditioning.

Mr. Chevrier: One last question—I understand that this building has been divided into a number of contracts.

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. Chevrier: There was a contract for the steel, there was one for the foundation and another for the frame of the building. Could the minister tell the house how many contracts have been awarded for this building?

Mr. Hees: I am advised the number is five.

Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister give the breakdown of those five contracts?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I am advised that first of all there was a contract for excavation and foundation, second, for steel structure, third, for the curtain walls, fourth, for the stone work and fifth, the general completion.

Mr. Pearson: I want to be sure I understand what the minister has said. Is it a fact, then, that in 1956, which I believe was the date he gave, the estimate for this airport building was $12.5 million and then in 1957 it was raised for reasons which the minister mentioned to $15 million, and that if you add the $2 million for what are called aero quays and fingers and the $500,000 for air conditioning, you get a figure of $17.5 million—is that correct?

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. Bourget: May I ask the minister who were the lowest bidders in each case and was the contract given to the lowest bidder?

Mr. Hees: In each case I am advised the contract was awarded to the lowest bidder. It would take some time to give the names and the amounts, but that information could be made available later on if the hon. member desires it.

Mr. Bourget: I will be satisfied if the minister will let me have the names later on.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister make comment now about the plan for a permanent terminal at Winnipeg? I imagine the minister is very much like his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, who said—although I believe facetiously—that attention would be given to the requests of hon. members in just about inverse proportion to the amount of time they took at this stage when ministers want to pass their estimates. Therefore, I do not want to elaborate on the matter of the development of a public service airport at Atikokan and at Fort Frances. My constituents, however, would feel that I was remiss if I did not at this stage of the debate draw these matters to the attention of the committee of supply for it is of great concern to them.

Thirdly, a public air service between Winnipeg and the lakehead, something which has been lacking for a great many years, was inaugurated when the minister granted a licence for it but has at the moment bogged down because of a lack of adequate airport facilities. The minister does not need to reply to that. He has invited me to speak to his deputy minister and I have had preliminary discussions with him. But has the minister approved anything with respect to the Winnipeg development?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we have been working with the air lines for the past nine months to try to arrive at satisfactory plans for what we intend to be a first class building. We have worked our way through four different sets of plans to date, and we hope that we are working now on the final set of plans. As soon as this matter is decided, we will be able to go ahead with the construction.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): On this matter I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I understand that the Department of National Defence or T.C.A. are erecting a terminal at Bagotville airport. I should like to know if this means that the department has completely abandoned the idea of establishing a civil airport within the boundaries of the counties of Chicoutimi and Lapointe. I hope the minister has not given up this idea, because this will help me to keep even more pleasant memories of my association with his department.

Mr. Hees: Bagotville is in the long term plans of the department. At the present time we are moving the civil terminal from its present location to a new location. I am advised by my officials that we are planning a new airfield in the long run but that, as I have said, is a matter of long term planning.

Mr. Pearson: I want to bring up a matter—I think this is the right item—and I wish to do so in no critical sense because I have nothing to criticize. However, I want to impress on the minister, though perhaps he does not need it, the importance of an airfield or an airstrip at least on the north shore of Georgian bay between Sudbury and the Sault to serve what is perhaps the most important industrial development in Canada, that is the Blind River-Elliot Lake uranium development. The population of this Elliot Lake north shore area has grown in a few years from almost nothing to between 25,000 and 30,000. It is the centre of a large investment and of high uranium production. In these circumstances, air travel and air transport are becoming increasingly important. I know that the minister's department is looking into this matter and I know that his officials are co-operating with the local authorities there, but I would venture to emphasize the importance of air transport for this development.

Mr. Hees: We are examining possible sites in the area, but it is somewhat difficult to find a site which is suitable. However, we are making progress.

Item agreed to.

462. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, including construction work on municipal airports and payments to municipalities as contributions towards construction done by those bodies, and amounts to be paid in settlement of claims for compensation by persons whose property is injuriously affected by the operation of a zoning regulation made under authority of paragraph (j) of subsection (1) of section 4 of the Aeronautics Act, $61,348,000.

Mr. Morris: I should like to ask the minister three brief questions having to do with the Halifax international airport. Would he be in a position to indicate to us when it is anticipated that the new Halifax international airport will be open for business? When will aircraft be able to fly on and off that airport?

Mr. Hees: I will answer those questions one at a time if I may. The runways can be used at the present time. The building has just been started and we expect it will be ready in the winter of 1959-60.

Mr. Morris: Can the minister indicate whether any other air lines have evinced any interest in securing hangar accommodation on the airfield?

Mr. Hees: Not as yet.

Mr. Morris: Finally, has T.C.A. determined its hangar requirements on this site?

Mr. Hees: No, they have not advised us of that.

Mr. Chevrier: I have two questions I should like to ask the minister about airports. One concerns the airport at Flin Flon. Can the minister advise the committee when the airport will be built there estimated to cost $2 million; when will it be commenced and what is the expected date of completion?

Mr. Hees: We have plans in quite an advanced stage. We picked out a site which appeared to be suitable but I am now advised that we have received word that it is not suitable to the municipality, so the position is uncertain at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand, then, that the department will not proceed until such time as there is an agreement between the departmental officials and the municipalities with regard to a site.

Mr. Hees: That is correct. The municipality has to operate the field and of course it must be in a location which would be satisfactory to the municipality.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it that providing there is agreement an airport will be built there which will cost in the vicinity of $2 million.

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you. May I ask a question with reference to the airport at Three Rivers? I understand that there is a question of constructing an airport at Three Rivers which would cost in the neighbourhood of $5 million. Is that correct and, if so, may I ask how that airport will be built?

Mr. Hees: The estimated cost is between $3 million and $5 million. The city provides the site and operates the field and we build the airport.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the present position of the negotiations between the department and the city of Three Rivers with respect to the establishment of this airport?

Mr. Hees: They have agreed to this plan. We expect to award the contract this winter and a survey is going on at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask one last question about the airport at Cornwall? The minister knows this has been under discussion for a long time. It was even included as an item in the estimates on one, if not, on two occasions, and that, I think, was found necessary because of the fact that this community is in the centre of the seaway operation and it was felt that it would be a desirable location.

Since then I have seen something which has interested me very much and upon which I must commend the minister. It is that the department intends to establish an airport at Brockville. I commend the minister on this, if it is the case, because I think it would be an excellent idea if there was a milk run between Montreal and Toronto along the St. Lawrence ports to serve places such as Cornwall, Brockville, Kingston and Belleville.

Mr. Benidickson: As is the case on the Winnipeg to the lakehead run.

Mr. Chevrier: If it is the intention to proceed in this fashion at Brockville I am sure the minister will want to give Cornwall the consideration it deserves and state that an adequate airport will be established there on the same basis as in the case of Flin Flon and Three Rivers.

Mr. Hees: Yes, we are willing to enter into the same kind of agreement with Cornwall as with Flin Flon, Three Rivers and other municipalities on the basis of their providing the land and operating the field. We will build it, and we have recently received a request to resurvey a possible site.

Mr. Chevrier: Could I make one further suggestion there? It is that perhaps the Cornwall case might be envisaged in a different light in view of the fact that it is now considered the hub of the seaway for both power and navigation. I know there are exceptions to the cases the minister has mentioned in the department in that sometimes, because of special circumstances, the department undertakes to pay for all the facilities. I am wondering if consideration cannot be given to that because of these special circumstances?

Mr. Hees: We will certainly give every possible consideration to it.

Mr. Bourget: May I ask the minister to apply my remarks on a previous item to item 462? Here we have the biggest item in the estimates, amounting to $61 million, and we have no details at all. The minister will realize that with the possible exception of the hon. member for Laurier who was formerly the minister of transport hon. members have difficulty finding out where the money is going to be spent and it is therefore difficult to ask questions intelligently.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. We will certainly see what possibly can be done. We will study the matter and make recommendations to the Department of Finance in this regard. As the hon. member knows the Department of Finance would have to agree to anything we may suggest. We will have a go at it.

Mr. Bourget: May I suggest that you follow the pattern established by the Department of Public Works. That is a good pattern.

Mr. Hees: We will do what we can. I agree with the hon. member about the desirability of following that pattern.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not agree at all, Mr. Chairman, I think the Department of Transport is a superior one to the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Hees: Thank you. I agree heartily with the hon. member for Laurier in that respect.

Mr. Bourget: The hon. member for Laurier was away from the house for three years.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister if there is a firm date for completion and operation of the new international airport at Edmonton?

Mr. Hees: There is no firm date, Mr. Chairman. At present it is estimated that it will be ready in 1961. We certainly hope so.

Item agreed to.

464. Contributions to municipalities or public bodies for construction and improvements of airports on land acquired by such organizations, including contributions to appropriate authorities in respect of airports at Lourdes-du-Blanc-Sablon and at Harrington Harbour, Quebec, $125,916.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a question on this item and I shall use the utmost paucity of language. Under this item there have been certain improvements suggested to the Castlegar airport. I know the minister's engineers in British Columbia examined it, interviewed the manager of the airport and made a report. I do not see any particular figure here but knowing what the words "contingencies" and "incidentals" can cover, I wonder if the minister could inform the committee if there is any provision in the estimates this year for improvements to this airport disguised under the nom de plume of contingencies?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I am advised by my officials that because of the characteristics of the location there is nothing we can do to further develop that particular field. I am familiar with it as I have landed and taken off from there several times and I know the problem. If there is anything that can be done we will do it but the limitations are those imposed by the particular terrain.

Mr. Herridge: Did I understand the minister to say that if anything can be done to improve the situation it will be done?

Mr. Hees: Yes, it certainly will, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Air Transport Board—

467. Salaries and other expenses, including the Canadian delegation to the international civil aviation organization, $337,179.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to hold up the minister. Yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made some remarks to which I believe I could simply say "ditto". The minister knows I have had some qualms about the rigidity of the protection of a base under all circumstances within a radius of 25 miles for a class 3 type, I believe it is. On the other hand this seems to be a most radical departure the minister has in mind. It has caused extreme consternation among the smaller air operators in the country. I would imagine that at least 50 per cent of the time spent by the air transport board in the past must have related to applications that are of a type that the minister is going to put in the unregulated field. I believe a second look should be given to this question. I believe there were some rigidities which were not necessary but the complete plunge that is proposed is undesirable in my view. If I am right in thinking that about 50 per cent of the time of the air transport board has been spent in the field of the smaller operators can the minister advise the committee what economies and reduction in staff are likely to result in consequence of this decision. Will the board be reduced? Will the total number of personnel be proportionately reduced as a result of no longer having anything more than what will probably be a routine look at this type of application? As I say, I protest the policy but I wish to know what kind of economy will come as a result of it.

Mr. Hees: I am advised by my officials that the type of licence referred to covers only 3 per cent of the total traffic in the country.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps that is so but I am not thinking in terms of mileage or dollar volume. I am thinking about my own correspondence and in terms of the time that would be involved in processing the charter applications. I am wondering to what extent the minister considers that the board under this policy will show a reduction in personnel of civil servants.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, the percentage of time spent by the board in the past in working on applications of this type amounted to about 10 per cent. There will be no reduction in personnel in the board. It will simply enable the board to get ahead faster with other types of applications.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I must continue to urge the minister to have another look at this when the session concludes. I know that at the moment he is receiving very strong representations from the aviation industry of this country. They are alarmed and disturbed and I hope a final decision has not been made. I have always felt some modification might be desirable for all classes of licence but I believe the minister has gone too far in the announcement he made to the house this session.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada—

468. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,013,742.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I understand that under this item one can discuss in general terms matters relating to the board of transport commissioners. My remarks will have to do with the railway grade crossing fund.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

(Translation):

I understand those grants were made by the various governments and by the Board of Transport Commissioners for the purpose of giving the general public adequate protection at grade crossings.

Everybody knows that this legislation was enacted some years ago to provide protection at level crossings, because of the increase in highway and railway traffic.

On looking into the matter I have noted that this legislation has been improved from year to year. In fact, there is a government motion on the order paper calling for further improvements.

A case that I would like to deal with more specifically is that of proposed level crossings. I believe that according to the provisions of section 265, paragraph 6 of the act as amended in 1955, a level crossing must have been in use for three years before the Board of Transport Commissioners can make the grant requested.

(Text):

I should like to know if it is the intention of the government to further amend the law so the railway grade crossings to be constructed will benefit from those grants?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, there is a bill before the house at the present time which outlines exactly what is going to be done. Any application that has been approved by the board since January 30 of this year, when I made the announcement of an additional amount of money to be set aside for this purpose, will be eligible for the additional grants which will be made available by the legislation which I trust will be passed by parliament on Monday.

Mr. Roberge: Did I understand the minister to say that this will apply to railway crossings that are to be constructed or just to those that are actually recommended?

Mr. Hees: Anything that comes up from now on during the next three years and any applications that have been agreed to by the board of transport commissioners since January 30 of this year.

Mr. Carter: Has an agreement been reached between the board of transport commissioners and the provincial government of Newfoundland with respect to the overpass between the trans-Canada highway and Isle Morte road at the Port aux Basques terminal?

Mr. Hees: My officials advise me that they do not think that is the case but they will check the files and advise the hon. member next week.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister. If agreement has been reached perhaps he can also say what, if any, contribution the federal government is making toward this.

Mr. Hees: Yes. I will give that information to the hon. member.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make about a problem in the ridings of Hochelaga and Maisonneuve-Rosemont under this item. I am going to say a few words in French and then at the end of my remarks I will sum up and ask a few questions.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity of calling the minister's attention to a problem which is peculiar to the ridings of Maisonneuve-Rosemont and Hochelaga. If I include Hochelaga, it is because the hon. member for that riding (Mr. Eudes) has been confined to his home by illness for over a month.

I refer to an old railway line which crosses the ridings of Hochelaga and Maisonneuve up to Montreal East. For about ten years now we have tried to get the C.N.R. authorities to remove this old track and use the one bordering on Montreal harbour. The old track is not only a nuisance, but a hazard to children.

Ten years ago, the Businessmen's Association of Montreal East set up a committee which, after an on-the-spot investigation, made representations to the C.N.R. authorities. Furthermore, the member for Hochelaga and myself met several times with the C.N.R. authorities and tried to make them see that it was time that this track be lifted out, so as to clear up this section of Montreal. To this day we have not been able to convince the authorities that it is a matter of public interest to remove this track and to divert tank car and freight car traffic to the track bordering on Montreal harbour. The C.N.R. management claims this track still serves 25 to 30 industries situated along the track. We doubt this is still the case; at all events, these trains make several daily journeys across these ridings especially during rush hours, that is, towards 5.30 p.m., with the result that all the north-south and east-west traffic in Montreal East is brought to a standstill for more than five minutes at a time.

Mr. Chairman, this eastern part of Montreal is developing considerably, not only from a residential point of view, but also from a commercial point of view, and the continued use of this track in 1958 is a disgrace for the eastern part of the city, not to mention the resentment and discontent it causes among local residents. There is no reason why Montreal East should be treated differently from Montreal West, and even if the C.N.R. management could show that this track is still a paying proposition, I feel this is no reason for putting their own interest above that of the public, which requires that this time-worn, outdated, obsolete track disappear from our streets.

(Text):

I welcome this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to ask the minister to take the proper steps and make recommendations to the Canadian National Railways to have the old railway line in the east end of Montreal removed so that the C.N.R. will transport its freight, and so on, along the shoreline of Montreal and not cross the east end of the city. I should like to ask three questions which the minister can take as notice and perhaps give me the information in a few days. If in the meantime the session ends I shall be satisfied if the minister will write me a letter to that effect.

First of all, I would like to know whether the old railway line crossing the east end of Montreal does so under a contract with the city of Montreal? If so, when was this contract signed and when does it terminate? How many industries and industrial plants are served by this old line actually, and what are the names of those industries concerned? What has been the volume of freight on this old line in the past year? What was the volume of freight in a comparative year, let us say 1950 and 1951?

Before taking my seat I would like to say that this old railway line is an eyesore which is impeding the progress of the east end. In a large measure this monstrous railway line which crosses the territory is one of the reasons why the eastern part of Montreal has been slower in its development than the western section. It is not only an ugly sight but a hazard. The minister would certainly render a humanitarian service to our community if he would intercede with the Canadian National Railways and ask them to place the interest of the whole population of the eastern part of Montreal above their financial interests.

Mr. Hees: I shall be glad to look into these matters and advise the hon. member early next week.

Mr. Campeau: I should like to make a suggestion regarding the problem of the elimination of railway grade crossings. I take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Transport upon having the courage and wisdom to bring forward the most drastic solution to this serious problem of railway grade crossings ever proposed since 1909.

During the last 50 years each succeeding government has had to face this problem with its increasing toll of human life and suffering as well as the detrimental economic losses. However, it is sad to note that even with increased financial help from the federal government from 1909 to 1957 not more than 4,000 level crossings have been protected, of which no more than 1,500 were grade separated, leaving almost 30,000 crossing without any protection.

There is no doubt that with the urban development which has taken place throughout Canada, the increase in the speed of trains, the increase in the number of automobiles, the $63 million which was spent from 1909 to 1958 by the federal government, the provinces, the municipalities and the railway companies, the amount of money spent so far has been only a palliative and not a solution of this problem.

In the city of Montreal itself, the metropolis of Canada, there are about 140 railway crossings, 80 of which have grade separation, 40 are protected only by bells and other systems, and 20 have no protection at all. In addition, there are about 150 sidings crossing city streets which are absolutely unprotected. Statistics prove that in the city of Montreal accidents are 2½ times more numerous at level crossings protected by manually or automatically operated gates than at unprotected level crossings. This proves that the only thorough manner of eliminating railway accidents at level crossings is by a long term program of grade separation. However, there has been very little done throughout Canada towards improvement in this direction during the last 50 years.

The proposed measure providing $10 million for grade crossing improvement and elimination is a very constructive one, particularly since one of its main results will be to ease the financial burden on municipalities. This is one of the main reasons that the efforts made up to date have not met with too much success. In fact, for the next three years, the board of transport commissioners will be empowered, if the proposed measure now before the house is adopted, to increase its share of the cost of these works from 60 per cent to 80 per cent, while the maximum contribution from the board will go up from $300,000 to $500,000. These provisions will most certainly promote the actual separation of rail from road. The government believes it will have this effect because they have announced their intention to make available $10 million annually for the next three years to the railway grade crossing fund. This is almost twice as much as the amount spent by previous governments from 1909 to 1957.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have had the announcement of a great national development program by the present government, which is being gradually implemented by appropriate measures, which will integrate the human, physical and economical forces of all regions of our great country towards full employment, and which will fully exploit on a long term basis all our potentialities from the Atlantic ocean to the Pacific ocean and even deep into the Arctic regions. The proposed measure tending to reduce useless deaths and suffering and increase the efficiency of our railways and highways certainly is justified in view of the goals set for such an integrated national development program, namely the betterment of the standard of living of every Canadian citizen; the preservation of our human capital and natural resources; the tapping of our numerous undeveloped resources; the broadening of our basic production and the binding of the Canadian economy into a solid, compact unit giving an equal opportunity to every province.

This integral national development program, Mr. Chairman, is bound to provoke the construction of many new highways and the extension of many railway lines as part of a program of public works which is an integral part of this national development program of ours. It would be regrettable if in the implementation of such a program we were still to suffer the plague of level crossings with their useless toll of life and efficiency.

As the present Minister of Finance so aptly said in 1955, it is true that grade separations cost a lot of money but one has to consider also the economic losses and the suffering which occurs every year at level crossings, and which could be avoided. One has to take into consideration also the effects of fast and efficient transportation on the Canadian cost of living. The main obstacle in the past has been the inability of both railway companies and municipalities to meet the cost of grade separation. Since 1909, the federal government has been forced into showing more and more interest in the national problem of railway grade crossings. Experience has proven that federal aid had to be constantly increased over the years. However, it is to be noted that it was during the economic crisis that most of the grade separations were effected because additional funds were granted to the railway grade crossing fund and even contributions of 100 per cent could be made by the then board of railway commissioners towards these projects.

The present measure provides the most daring effort ever made by any government towards an efficient solution of this problem, and I am entirely in favour of its adoption. The proposal is for a three-year period, probably as a means of testing the effectiveness of the measure with a view towards finding a permanent solution. May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that during this three-year testing period intensive research be conducted towards finding a way of relieving the municipalities of the financial burden which is worsening their already poor financial situation. If we could integrate these grade separation projects within the national development program we would thus ensure the implementation of an efficient and realistic program of railway grade crossing elimination within a reasonable period of time to the great benefit of our constantly increasing urban population.

Mr. Lambert: I wonder if the minister could advise whether or not there are outstanding before the board of transport commissioners any applications for proposals from the city of Edmonton with respect to overhead or subway crossings of the mainline of the Canadian National which comes into the city of Edmonton? In this particular respect I should like to draw his attention to the necessity for the early construction of some form of grade separation at the western limits of the Calder yard on the mainline of Canadian National at 127th street. Because of the very rapid expansion of the residential area in Calder, and the use of this single crossing of the mainline of the Canadian National which is the only crossing for nearly 2½ miles and because of the residential developments in connection with the Namao and Griesbach military camps, it is of great necessity within the near future to have grade separation constructed in this area. There is a great deal of traffic and horrible tie-ups result at the wrong time of day.

Mr. Hees: In so far as the question of the hon. member is concerned, we have not that information available here, but we will get it for the hon. member.

Mr. Gour: I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport the fact that I have innumerable level crossings in my riding over both the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. A great many accidents have happened, most of them within the city of Ottawa. I find that there is too much delay on the part of the two railroads in deciding to have special protection at these crossings within the city of Ottawa. I can think of at least four accidents that have happened within a year, most of them in the Alta Vista and Riverside drive area.

In my own village the railway runs through the middle of the village and now that people wish to travel so fast, these special trains go through at rates that appear to be about 100 miles an hour. The trains are not going that fast actually, probably only about 70 miles an hour. In my own village there are five very dangerous railway crossings. I find that the solution suggested by the railway is too high in cost for that small place. It will cost a considerable amount for the small municipality. With the increase in the estimate this year I should like to bring to the attention of the CNR that they should have gates or at least the lights. I refer to blue lights or rather red lights. The government is the former colour; I prefer the red lights anyway.

I congratulate the Minister of Transport. He is doing a good job. He is a good imitation of his immediate predecessor in office. If he will just go ahead like that he will be a first-class imitation of two first-class ministers of transport, namely Mr. Marler and the present hon. member for Laurier.

I will not say any more at this time except that I think it would be only reasonable that trains slow down when they pass this Casselman crossing and that they should not pass it at a speed greater than 40 miles an hour. I understand that people want to travel fast today but I think they are going a little bit too fast. People get on the train and they think they can be in Ottawa right away. The old people are not going so fast and I think they should have some protection at this Casselman crossing. The same applies in other places such as Limoges, where trains pass in the middle of the village. In every place where they pass in the middle of a small village or town, they should slow down to a speed of not more than 40 miles an hour.

Supply—Transport

469. Amount to be credited to the railway grade crossing fund, in addition to the amount, if any, to be credited to the fund under the Railway Act in the current fiscal year, for the general purposes of the fund and for the purpose of contributing towards the cost of an exceptional number of railway grade separation projects on the trans-Canada highway in British Columbia, $10,000,000.

Mr. Bourget: I understand that this is a new item, that it was not in the estimates last year. Can the minister tell us what will be the amount for the purpose of contributing towards the cost of an exceptional number of railway grade separation projects on the trans-Canada highway in British Columbia, or what part of the $10 million will be attributed to that purpose?

Mr. Hees: Approximately $2 million.

Mr. Bourget: Is there a special agreement with the province of British Columbia for that purpose?

Mr. Hees: There is no agreement. There are several projects which will be proceeded with under this vote.

Mr. Bourget: Can the minister give us some comments on the matter? I cannot understand exactly the purpose of that vote. Frankly, I have no objection to it but I should like to know how it works and what is the procedure followed in the circumstances in connection with the province of British Columbia. I know there are a number of railway grade separation projects because I have been on that highway. However, I should like to know what is the procedure to be followed.

Mr. Hees: I think this gives the hon. member the answer to his question. On October 1, 1957 there was in the fund an uncommitted balance of some $2,400,000. However, the cost of current urgent projects which should be undertaken during the present fiscal year exceeds this uncommitted balance. Hence if grants were to be made available to trans-Canada highway separation projects in British Columbia, no funds would be available for allocation to current projects elsewhere in Canada. On the other hand, if funds are not made available to solve the problem occasioned by the construction of the trans-Canada highway in British Columbia, the province can rightfully claim that this constitutes a departure from the treatment accorded all other provinces in the past. I am advised that other provinces have received the same type of treatment. It just happens that it is more expensive in British Columbia.

Mr. Bourget: I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to tell the minister that in the city of Quebec there are many railway grade crossings. The city of Quebec is not in a financial position to do that work. I was wondering whether the city of Quebec, for instance, even though it is not on the trans-Canada highway, could make application under that "special contribution" as it is described here.

Mr. Hees: The city of Quebec and any other municipality may make application under the railway grade crossing fund at any time.

470. Administration, $153,488.

Mr. Howard: I should like to inquire from the minister as to what are the arrangements at the moment with respect to the subventions to be paid to shipping companies on the coast of British Columbia; what companies are to be paid; the amounts and the routes to which the subventions apply.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. At the present time the Canadian maritime commission is negotiating with Northland Navigation Company Limited for the establishment of the services on the west coast of Vancouver island on the one hand and to the Johnson straits-Bella Coola and northern ports area on the other hand. For the west coast of Vancouver island the subsidy will be based upon the annual rate of $100,000; the contract will cover the period from August 13 to December 31, 1958; there will be a recapture provision preventing excessive profits. The contract will provide for weekly service to the following ports with the former Canadian Pacific railway vessel Princess of Alberni: Vancouver, Sointula, Port Hardy, Bull Harbour—at the contractor's option—Fisherman's Cove—at the contractor's option—Chamiss Bay, Esperanza Inlet, Zeballos, Ceepeecee, Tahsis, Nootka, Gold River, Moyah Bay, Hesquiat, Hot Springs Cove, Clayoquot, Ahousat, Kakawis, Tofino, Clo-oose, Port Renfrew and Vancouver. This is not the same service as formerly provided by the C.P.R. and if it is not as satisfactory there is an option in favour of the crown to revert to the former service. The contract will contain a further option in favour of the crown to make the service fortnightly with service on alternate fortnights to the Queen Charlotte islands covering the ports of: Vancouver, Queen Charlotte City, Sandspit, Massett, Port Clements, Justkatla, Port Hardy, Sointula and Vancouver.

For the service in the Johnson straits-Bella Coola and northern ports area, subsidy will be paid at the annual rate of $194,500; the contract will cover the period from the first sailing, a couple of weeks ago until March 31st, 1959. There will be a recapture provision similar to the one mentioned in the previous paragraph. The following ports of call will be served on a weekly basis: Vancouver, Englewood . . . Alert Bay, calls at Rivers Inlet, at the contractor's option provided they do not interfere with the schedule, Namu, Bella Coola, Ocean Falls, Bella Bella, Klemtu, Butedale, Prince Rupert, Port Simpson, Kincolith, Stewart, Alice Arm, Prince Rupert, Kitimat, Butedale, Klemtu, Bella Bella, Ocean Falls, Bella Coola, Namu, Alert Bay, Englewood, Vancouver.

In the near future I will be placing a submission before the treasury board to authorize the transfer of the money formerly voted for the Canadian Pacific railway subsidy to the Northland Navigation Company. This will take some time as the company has not yet filed with the commission all the necessary information for this purpose. The service has already started.

Mr. Howard: I would like to congratulate the minister on his pronunciation of some of the names, and I appreciate his difficulty because they are very difficult to pronounce if you are not familiar with them. I understood the minister to say that the maritime commission was presently in communication with this company with respect to the services with which he has just dealt, so that there is nothing definite at the moment.

Mr. Hees: The contracts are not yet signed, Mr. Chairman, but the service has already started on the basis I have outlined.

Mr. Howard: I have one or two remarks to make with respect to shipping on the coast of British Columbia. The report of the royal commission on coastal shipping was made public not too long ago, which cost the taxpayers some $251,000. I am sure residents in other parts of Canada who are affected by coastal trading and shipping generally were interested in this report, but those of us from British Columbia, who are naturally interested in shipping, were hoping for something fairly decent in the way of recommendations by this royal commission. In so far as the British Columbia shipping is concerned, however, it was a complete waste of a quarter of a million dollars. The shipping needs of the people on the coast of British Columbia appear to have been disregarded or forgotten by the gentlemen who composed that royal commission.

For quite a number of years now the attitude of the governments of Canada—and this remark does not apply to any particular government or to any particular minister—with respect to shipping on the coast of British Columbia has been one of negligence. They appear to be fumbling from one year to the next, hoping that not too many difficulties will arise at the start of the year and when the year is at an end they say, "Well, nothing serious happened; we have got through another year, so we don't have to worry too much about it." I am sure the minister will agree with me that this is not too sensible an attitude to have adopted in past years. The needs of the people living in the communities all up and down the coast should no longer be disregarded, nor should the service to them be disregarded in the development of any shipping policy so far as the Canadian government is concerned.

Unfortunately, in the past few years a number of charges have been made that political consideration was the main factor in respect of our coastal shipping. Union Steamships Limited, for instance, is a company which has been operating on the coast of British Columbia for quite a few years, and some years ago it came under the ownership of an hon. member of the other place, a senator who belongs to the Liberal party, When this took place one heard charges laid that the government of the day, which was a Liberal government, was playing political favourites with Union Steamships because the owner of the company was a member of the Liberal party. That, of course, did not help the situation too much; it in fact clouded over the issue and it is unfortunate that these things were said. Then we had another company which was mentioned just a moment ago by the minister, Northland Navigation Company Limited. Until this year this company was actively engaged only in a freight service, but this year it entered into a passenger service on the coast. Charges were made that the Northland Navigation Company had very close connections with our Social Credit government in Victoria, and as a consequence was able to get special favours in respect of the shipment of goods coming under the jurisdiction of that government. That, of course, did not help matters either, but it too tended to cloud over the issue.

Last year we got into a most difficult situation owing to the difference of opinion between one of the companies operating on the coast with respect to the amount of subsidy they needed and for some months during last winter we had no adequate passenger or freight shipping facilities on the coast of my province. The whole program, the whole schedule of routes which had been established over many, many years, and which were adjusted from year to year by the companies concerned, was entirely upset, and many communities were isolated. I got telegrams, letters and phone calls galore, as I am sure did the minister or the officials in his department, as a result of this turmoil in shipping last January.

Unfortunately the picture in so far as the possibility of further charges of political considerations in respect to shipping on the coast of British Columbia is concerned, is a bleak one. I say this because we know that the Northland Navigation Company—and it is certainly within its rights to do this if it wishes and I am not suggesting that these things should not have been done; but I merely raise this to point out that it once again lays the question of shipping on the coast open to charges of political connivance and of favouritism to a particular company—or an officer of that company contributed to the campaign funds of the Conservative party. This is very unfortunate, because the people who suffer are certainly not to any extent the shipping companies and certainly not the federal government, but the hundreds of people living in the many small communities all up and down the coast of the province of British Columbia. There are a number of question marks which we must raise with respect to this particular arrangement which has today been announced by the minister.

We understood, and it was announced by the minister, that when Northland Navigation bought two ships from the C.P.R., the Princess Alberni that used to run along the west coast and the Queen of the North that used to run on the upper coast, those two ships would be operating under the same subvention arrangements that were made with the C.P.R.—the regulations might be changed a little here and there, but nothing too drastic. Northand Navigation entered into an agreement to buy the ships knowing that certain subsidies were in question and that certain routes were involved. Union Steamships and Northland Navigation serve certain parts of the coast and the attitude should have been: no change in the subvention, no substantial change in the routes to be followed; no drastic adjustments in the ports of call. They should be able to operate under the conditions and under the subvention arrangements that existed before they bought the ships from the C.P.R. unless they knew in advance they were going to receive some different consideration.

But we find that Northland Navigation is not going to operate on the same routes as the C.P.R. Whether it is for better or for worse, time will tell, but we find that Northland Navigation is going to change its routing around Vancouver island. Instead of going around the southern end they are to go around the northern end, under subsidy, to compete in effect with a service by another company to the same areas operating on a non-subsidy basis. We find that part of the northern run the C.P.R. was operating is going to be abandoned. An announcement was made by Northland Navigation a few days ago that the former Queen of the North—I do not know what the name is now; they have changed the name of it—that was operated by the C.P.R. is not now going to call at the Portland canal ports, Fort Simpson, Kincolith, Stewart island and so on. The former Queen of the North is not going to call in at these places. The run to Stewart is going to be abandoned by the ship that was formerly the Queen of the North and added to that is the route into Bella Coola under subsidy competing with the company operating into Bella Coola now without subsidy. We find that Northland Navigation, because it has abandoned the northern route, an additional round trip of about 80 miles, is able to revise its schedule and come into certain ports on the coast about one and a half hours before the Union Steamships are scheduled to call there, they being under subsidy, and Union Steamships not under subsidy.

I understand that under previous subvention arrangements it was difficult for a company receiving a subvention or a subsidy to change its schedule. It had to have prior permission from the Canadian maritime commission, which was most difficult to obtain. Apparently Northland Navigation does not have that difficulty in view of the announcements they make from day to day about changes. It has always been my understanding that the attitude of the governments in the past and the attitude of the Canadian maritime commission is that you should not subsidize one company to compete against another company that is not receiving a subsidy, but that is precisely what is happening in this case.

As I said earlier, the people who will suffer will be the people who live all along these coastal points. From the knowledge we are able to get of the work which will be done in the logging industry on the coast of British Columbia it is likely they will be operating to full capacity with the industry going as far as they can into the winter regardless of the amount of snow because they are short of logs and because markets are picking up to some extent. We find, and I am sure, the government will find this winter, that it will not be necessary to pay a subsidy such as they set out just a moment ago. That is something that should have been taken into consideration in years past. It should have been studied. It should have been looked at. I am sure many people who are interested in this, maybe from a particular point of view, would like to know—but I do not know—why there was a sudden change in attitude with respect to subsidies that were being paid. I have copies of a couple of telegrams which I would like to read into the record. One is a copy—it did not come out too well, but I believe it is dated August 8—of a telegram to Captain J. A. Macdonell, of Union Steamships Limited, Vancouver, B.C. and it says:

As result various proposals discussed am now authorized advise you submission to treasury board will be made requesting authority pay to you subsidy on basis $150,000 per year prorated for time served from date of contract to 31 March 1959 calling with vessel Catala at ports listed for Catala route your letter 25 July 1958 with call at Campbell River at your option. Contract will contain recapture clause as outlined to Chestnut. At same time concluding arrangements with Northland Navigation for service similar to former C.P.R. service with Queen of North result of which will be duplication of service at Alert Bay, Namu and Ocean Falls only. No action being taken on your other proposals. Expect Northland to undertake service to four northern ports for which you receive interim subsidy on August 12 so anticipate discontinue interim subsidy accordingly.

That was on August 8 and it was signed by Mr. L. C. Audette, Chairman of the Canadian maritime commission.

On August 11, a Monday, over the week end another wire was sent to Captain J. A. Macdonell of Union Steamships signed by L. C. Audette of the Canadian maritime commission. This said:

Cancel my telegram August 8 concerning your proposals for subsidized steamship service. Urge no action on your part based on my previous telegram.

So during the week end the Canadian maritime commission obviously—and I am quite sure it was this way; certainly not on its own but in consultation with other officers in the department—had decided that certain arrangements were going to be made. Then on Monday the mind of the maritime commission was changed for it and other arrangements were entered into. We wonder why the decision was reversed. We can expect, I am sure, that it was because Northland Navigation Company Limited said: we are able to operate this service at a subsidy or a subvention much lower than that which you have had to pay in years past. The departmental officials undoubtedly looked at this and said: that sounds like a good idea; it is going to cost us less money. Go ahead and do it. And they did this without any investigation of the requirements on the coast other than the cursory one last January when they had to do something. There was no thorough study, no idea of passenger requirements or freight requirements. Why was this decision suddenly taken to reverse completely what had been decided?

That, coupled with the fact, as I mentioned earlier, that political consideration has been dragged into this question of shipping on the coast in years past certainly makes one wonder whether that is still being given consideration.

I certainly do not wish to place on the record any mention of the amount of those contributions or to whom they went, but they were made. It is most unfortunate that after the experience of last winter the government has decided to go ahead with certain subsidies to a specific company for certain routes without giving too much thought about what may happen in years to come. This demonstrates a lack of foresight. When this government took office I sincerely hoped there would be a change of attitude and that there would be someone appointed with a thorough and comprehensive knowledge of shipping and shipping requirements to study completely and thoroughly the problem along the coast of British Columbia and make recommendations and if it were found that subsidies are necessary that person could have decided what they should be, when they should be applied and to what routes they should be applied but so far we have had nothing of that nature.

I repeat again that in my opinion and in the opinion of C.C.F. members as far as transportation is concerned and specifically transportation on the coast of British Columbia there is only one solution. I have heard a number of people who do not belong to the C.C.F. and who certainly are not partial to it agree with the contention that in order to provide adequate service there it must be done through one agency and not through a group of companies, some under subsidy one year and some under subsidy another year depending on who is in office, some having shipments channeled by the government depending on how friendly they are and, all in all, service being a secondary consideration. I am not familiar with the shipping situation in other parts of Canada but unless we can operate shipping on the coast of British Columbia through one agency we are going to continue to experience this turmoil.

I would hope there will be a detailed analysis of the requirements of shipping and transportation on the coast of British Columbia and arising out of that study sensible recommendations made on the basis of the service necessary for those communities that have been disregarded for almost a year.

I hope, just as I am sure the minister hopes, that the announcement he made a moment ago with respect to subventions and the routes they are to cover will not lead us into the same difficulty and confusion we experienced last winter when ports of call were abandoned.

I am sure there are not many in the department or on the government side of the house who know whether or not the subsidy arrangements will work out satisfactorily. I am sure they hope as I do that they will. With all due respect to Northland Navigation my fear is that the company will not be able to perform the service at the suggested price under which it got the contract. I understand that already the company has had to make changes in the number of personnel manning the ships. It has encountered difficulties and already the operating costs are somewhat near those experienced by the C.P.R. when that company was providing the service and of course the C.P.R. was able to absorb substantial losses because of its size.

I appreciate the opportunity of mentioning these things. Doubtless I have repeated statements I have made in other related debates but I felt it necessary to do so. Under our present system I am not partial to any particular company operating in preference to any other. I am concerned only that service be provided to these communities. In my opinion the only way that can be done is through one comprehensive organization—a crown corporation, if you wish to put it that way—that will have as its supreme consideration service to isolated ports.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity of clearing up several of the points raised by the hon. member for Skeena. First of all I am glad to be able to assure him that the four ports north of Prince Rupert will not be abandoned. Service will be continued but by a smaller vessel, the Alaska Prince, which will make it possible for the larger vessel, the Queen of the North, to make the long run, 60 miles in and 60 miles out, to Bella Coola which service the hon. member last winter was very keen on having carried out.

I am glad to be able to assure both the hon. member and the committee that rather than Northland Navigation being able to get the same subsidy for a smaller number of calls, actually the company is adding one extra call, that is the long trip into Bella Coola, and is doing it for exactly the same subsidy as the C.P.R. received.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make one further comment. You will have noticed that I was very careful to say the Queen of the North was abandoning the run.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member apparently misunderstood me. I simply said that these ports were not being abandoned and that a similar ship would be servicing the four ports north of Prince Rupert and would enable the Queen of the North to make the long run into Bella Coola which run the hon. member last winter was very keen to have made. It will make the long run into Bella Coola and out again.

Mr. Howard: We are probably agreeing with each other but using different words. Before this item passes I shall make one further comment. The minister made reference to a ship that would service the Queen Charlotte islands. It will never be able to do it. If it attempts to cross Hecate strait or Queen Charlotte sound in the fall or winter there will be no ship at all because it will be at the bottom of the water. There is only one ship on the coast that is adequate to service the Queen Charlotte islands. Any attempt to subsidize the ship of another company to service the Queen Charlotte islands will be detrimental to the requirements of the people there.

471. Steamship subventions for coastal services, as detailed in the estimates, $4,898,000.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister to whom the Newfoundland portion of these subventions are paid, in what amounts, and on what basis?

Mr. Hees: To the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Chairman, and the amount is $2,800,000.

Mr. Carter: I know the amount, Mr. Chairman. Does any one else other than the C.N.R. get any payment?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Carter: Can the minister say on what basis that is calculated?

Mr. Hees: It is paid on a straight deficit basis.

Mr. Carter: Deficit?

Mr. Hees: Yes, deficit on operations.

Item agreed to.

National Harbours Board—

472. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1958 on any or all of the following accounts:

Reconstruction and capital expenditures—
Halifax	$ 855,000
Saint John	100,000
Chicoutimi	400,000
Quebec	5,000,000
Generally—
Unforeseen and miscellaneous	200,000
	$6,555,000
Less—Amount to be expended from replacement funds	25,756
	$6,529,244.

Mr. Argue: Under this item I believe I can raise the question of tolls charged on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges in Montreal. I do so because this problem has been brought to my attention by a number of residents of Montreal and of other residents of the province of Quebec, including Mr. Michel Chartrand, the leader of the C.C.F. party in that province. I am informed that those tolls add to the taxation burden or the burden of doing business in the Montreal area and are a real nuisance to the people who have to pay them. I understand that the Victoria bridge, at any rate, is an old bridge that was paid for many years ago. As far as Jacques Cartier bridge is concerned, its operation is by agreement among the government of Canada, the government of the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal. Under this item, can the minister inform us what consideration has been given to this problem and whether the people of Montreal can look for action from the government which will result in the removal of those tolls in the near future, about which the people of this area feel very strongly?

Mr. Deschatelets: As a citizen of Montreal, I should like to say a few words on the problem of those two bridges. Is the minister aware of the tremendous increase in traffic which has taken place in the past few years and the difficulties that the people have, especially on week ends, to cross those two bridges in their cars?

If possible, I would like the minister to promise me that one of those week ends after the session is over he will take his car and try to cross one of those bridges on a Sunday. If he does that, I am sure he will come back and will find a way if possible to facilitate the movement of cars over those bridges. What remedies can be brought to bear on the problem I do not know. I did not make any special study of the problem, but I just wonder whether, until we build a third bridge in the east end—and all across the country where there is a similar problem—on Sundays we could remove all tolls on all bridges that come under the jurisdiction of this board. I do not want to say any more on this problem at the present time but I should like the minister to examine the possibilities of accelerating the movement of traffic on those two bridges.

Mr. Hees: I would like to answer these questions as we go along. First of all, with regard to the question of the hon. member for Assiniboia with respect to the removal of tolls on those bridges, this matter has been considered very seriously and there are no plans at the present time for removing those tolls. With regard to the question of congestion on the Jacques Cartier bridge, the national harbours board will be calling tenders for the building of one additional lane on that bridge in about two weeks time.

Mr. Denis: May I suggest to the minister that he communicate with the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec. I understand three parties are concerned in this toll business on the Jacques Cartier bridge. I think the city of Montreal has something to do with it and so has the province of Quebec. If I recall correctly, during the regime of the former government a question was asked by the former member for St. Mary. The minister at the time answered that the federal government was ready to negotiate a way in which to abolish this whole business of tolls if the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec would undertake to negotiate with the federal government at that time.

Will the minister try to communicate with the province of Quebec and see whether the provincial government is still interested because there are so many things we are stuck with. It looks as if the minister is afraid to communicate with the province of Quebec to see whether the present government of Canada or the government of Quebec is to blame. The people would like to know because the Jacques Cartier bridge and the Victoria bridge are an obstacle to the movement of traffic. Montreal is an island. We have over a million people on that island. Like the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, I suggest that the minister take a drive down there on a week end. If he lived in Montreal I am sure the minister would never use his car on Saturday or Sunday. This is so important that my colleague might want to make another province of the city of Montreal. I do not suggest that he is absolutely wrong. I suggest that the minister communicate with the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal to see whether a means can be found to get rid of tolls because they are obsolete. It is time that we organized Montreal as well as the rest of the country.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question? I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend but I am going on to another subject, namely the amount of money allocated for the port of Quebec. Will the minister give details of that expenditure?

Mr. Hees: Yes, I shall be glad to, Mr. Chairman. Reconditioning and widening of berth No. 18, $900,000; marine towers and receiving galleries of berth No. 18, $1,500,000; addition to grain elevator, $2,000,000; improvements to electrical system of Princess Louise docks, $150,000; construction of shed No. 8, $350,000; partial dust control system in grain elevator, $25,000; concrete wall at open berth No. 27, $25,000; additions and changes to existing grain elevator system, $50,000; total, $5,000,000.

Mr. Chevrier: What will be the additional capacity of the grain elevator?

Mr. Hees: It will be 2 million bushels.

Mr. Chevrier: Is that extension being made in anticipation of further grain trade arising out of the development of the seaway?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I have been asked to bring some figures to the attention of this committee, but first may I say that yesterday the hon. member for Halifax placed figures on the record which showed the very serious disproportion of trade of Canadian produce leaving this country through United States ports rather than Canadian ports. I wish to associate myself in every respect with the remarks he made at that time. Perhaps I should commend him upon the fine research work he did in this regard. This subject has been mentioned on previous occasions in this house, but the hon. member has come up with a very fine bit of work which calls attention to this problem in a very pertinent way. I hope that in later sessions we will have the opportunity of going into this problem in greater detail.

Referring particularly to the port of Saint John, which is my main consideration here today, I want to say at the outset that we are very optimistic about our future. Our industrial expansion in the city has been commendable. We appreciate the new facilities that the Department of Transport is planning. There is a new marine agency wharf, and I understand that plans for a long wharf will be produced shortly. It might be in order also to mention the leadership of the minister in negotiations which are nearly completed with regard to a new oil refinery that will be established there, and the part that the national harbours board played.

However, keeping in mind that optimism, we are a bit worried about the future, particularly in so far as the St. Lawrence seaway is concerned and its impact on the shipping and freight of this nation. We are keeping our eyes open in that regard. Incidentally, I have here, Mr. Chairman, figures which perhaps are not as widely circulated as the tonnage figures issued by the national harbours board. The tonnage figures, of course, do not give the complete story of the actual work a community receives from the movement of freight in and out of that particular port. The figures that are now available, I think, point up some trend that could be serious for both Halifax and Saint John.

The international longshoremen's association and the shipping federation of Canada keep a record in Montreal, which is audited by Clarkson, Gordon and Company—I have them here and they go back to 1954—which shows the amount of hours and the amount of pay that longshoremen alone received. This record does not refer to any other workers in a port, only the longshoremen. This record is maintained in connection with their various social benefits and particularly in connection with the new retirement plan. I will not put the entire figures on the record today, Mr. Chairman. As I say, they do not necessarily prove anything at this stage, but I should like to compare the eight-month period ending July, 1958, with that same period ending July, 1957. These records show a loss of manhours in the port of Saint John of 345,024; in Halifax of 310,339; Montreal is down, but only to the extent of 176,305, and Quebec is not greatly affected since the loss in this period is only 31,677.

I merely draw this to the attention of the house because it suggests that Halifax and Saint John are going to have to watch their position very closely in the future, particularly when the seaway is open. This may be the beginning of a trend towards a serious decrease in the manhours which the longshoremen work in these particular ports. I know that the department and the national harbours board are on their toes so far as port business is concerned, but I suggest that we will have to come up with some idea of specialized port traffic, something to take away from the extremely seasonal nature of the work and the dependence we have upon the few short winter months that now exist.

Mr. Chevrier: I have one last question. Can the minister tell me when the work was started on the extension of the grain elevator at Quebec?

Mr. Hees: January 1, 1958, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Campeau: I should like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport a major traffic problem in relation to the harbour of Montreal. When the St. Lawrence seaway is completed the harbour of Montreal will no longer be located in a cul-de-sac, and will have to face intensive competition from other Canadian urban centres. This competition will mean Montreal will have to offer better conditions and facilities in its harbour, especially from the point of view of traffic. An extensive study recently made by a McGill University group has demonstrated this very point. The report has shown the need for renovating the traffic facilities in the harbour area.

If one looks at the access roads to the harbour he will be convinced that they were designed a long time ago for means of transportation other than those presently in use. Furthermore, the harbour of Montreal cannot be dissociated from the rest of the city. There is no doubt that the east-west expressway planned by the city along the waterfront should be integrated with the future development of the harbour. In fact, from McGill street to the Jacques Cartier bridge, such an expressway could very justly be considered as a vital part of the harbour itself. Millions of dollars may be spent on grain facilities and other freight sheds, but all these improvements will be useless unless they are served properly by adequate traffic facilities from the city. Let us point out as an example the loading and unloading of trucks in the middle of Commissioner street, which is certainly the least efficient solution which could be found at the present time to these trucking problems.

In this connection the harbour could gain much needed vital space in its most crowded and active section by co-operating with the city of Montreal in the implementation of its project for the rehabilitation of the old warehouse and wholesale district between Place Royale and Bonsecours church, and the integration of the east-west expressway within that rehabilitation project.

May I point out also that parking accommodation is lacking, although the stevedores alone do park more than 500 cars today in the harbour area. Some thought could be given to the suggestion made by the local unions for using the roofs of sheds for parking accommodation until the time when ground space will become available.

Loans, investments and advances—

St. Lawrence seaway authority—

512. Loans to the St. Lawrence seaway authority in such manner and subject to such terms and condition as the governor in council may approve, $128,000,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry to hold up this item, but I feel that I should make a short comment. It is to tell the minister that I think he has in the seaway authority three excellent officers to carry out the work which was begun. He has an expert in finance, an expert economist and an expert engineer, the three of whom are quite familiar with all the work that remains to be done. I had the opportunity of visiting the seaway recently, and I was happy to see that progress in the work was going ahead at a rapid pace. There were some difficulties in the way. I see by the press that many have been ironed out. I refer particularly to the bridge at Cornwall, which I understand will now be completed in time for the month of November as first anticipated. Water has been, I understand, put in the Lachine section at Caughnawaga, and that operation has been successful.

I should like to have the minister state that the work is progressing according to schedule. Then, there is one final word, and I do not apologize for stating it at this time; it has to do with the headquarters building at Cornwall. I regret very much that there is misunderstanding in connection with this building. I want to make it quite clear that it was always the intention, in the minds of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, to establish at Cornwall the headquarters building of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. That was decided by the government at the time. If that decision is not carried out, I think an injustice will be done to the citizens who reside in that community. At the time what was envisaged was that there would be brought to Cornwall all of the officers of the St. Lawrence seaway authority save and except the head office group which would remain in Ottawa. Over and above that, the headquarters of the canal services would be moved to Cornwall. There would also be the technical engineers and staff of the international board of control that are to remain in existence for a period of 10 years. This is the group that will supervise the operation of the seaway at the level 238 for the first 10 year period after which it will go up to 242. The resident engineers of that board were to be established there as were the toll collectors. Those who would be responsible for the collection of tolls were to go to that area as well as the administrative officers of the Ontario-St. Lawrence canals, making a group of 250 to 300 people. I was keenly disappointed the other day to hear that only about 125 people are going to occupy this building. I hope that is not the case. I hope the minister will see to it that the decision which was made by the earlier government is carried out. It is true that the minister and this government can change that decision; they have the power to do that. However, if they do it, I think an injustice will be done. There is in Cornwall a building which has not been too costly and which is being operated at little or no cost because the then directors, the members of the St. Lawrence seaway authority had, in my opinion, the good sense to rent the ground floor to the Canadian Bank of Commerce for a period of many years, on a long-term lease. I believe that is the only occasion of which I am aware where a crown agency has done that, although I may be wrong. That decision makes it possible for that building to be maintained without cost to the government of Canada. It therefore seems to me that no vacant space should be left in that building. I appeal to the minister to carry out our decision.

I hesitate again to take up another two minutes but I regret the statement which was made yesterday by the hon. member for Danforth when he paid tribute to the decision of the Canadian government to get tough on the question of the St. Lawrence seaway, when he paid tribute to the former administration for their determination to see to it that if there was not to be co-operation with the United States government, Canada would go ahead and build the seaway alone. Having said that, with which I find myself in agreement, he went on to add this paragraph which in my opinion is unfortunate and with which I entirely disagree. I quote from page 4290 of Hansard:

> But after that our tough policy was watered down. It became lukewarm and the United States eventually took over and dictated the whole policy as far as the St. Lawrence seaway was concerned.

That statement is absolutely incorrect and inaccurate. The whole policy or a great portion of the policy in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway is being initiated by the federal government. It was dictated by the last government and it is being handled by this government in co-operation with the United States government. What we must not forget is this. The St. Lawrence seaway authority has succeeded with the present administration in following the recommendations made by the former administration that all of the tolls—although much of the traffic is going to be on the United States side—Canadian and United States are going to be collected in Canada by the St. Lawrence seaway authority on behalf of the United States authority and turned over to them. This is certainly not dictation by the United States. Furthermore, two-thirds of the canal is on Canadian territory. Two-thirds of the cost is being paid by Canada. It is a joint enterprise so far as operation is concerned. But as to decisions that were taken, certainly Canada has not become lukewarm in the slightest degree. On the contrary, Canada has respected the rights and obligations of others and I believe that Canada is acting in the way it should act under the circumstances.

Mr. Hees: I am glad to be able to assure the hon. member for Laurier and other hon. members of the house that work on the St. Lawrence seaway is proceeding on schedule.

Canal services—

513. To provide for the acquisition of land required in connection with the development of the 27 foot Cornwall navigation system, $100,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister say what this vote is for?

Mr. Hees: This is to buy the land that would be necessary in the event that we decided to build an all-Canadian seaway at some future time.

Mr. Pearson: That gives me the opportunity just to say a word because it bears on the point that has been raised by my hon. friend. As the minister knows, this provision was made in order to make certain that in certain circumstances, whether the United States liked it or not, we would have an all-Canadian seaway. Those who say that we have been dictated to by the United States in the development of this waterway, this power development and navigation development, do not know very much about the diplomatic negotiations that went on leading to this development. Those who say that we should have from the beginning insisted on constructing an all-Canadian seaway do not seem to understand that if that was to be done without any power development going along with it, it would have meant a phenomenal expenditure and perhaps be beyond Canadian means at this time. Once it became a power and navigation development, once that power had to be secured from boundary waters, then both governments were involved and there was no other way of doing it. You cannot have a power development halfway across a stream. As it was agreed to be both a power and a navigation development, it was bound to be an international development unless, as I have just said, we had decided to construct a purely navigational development on the Canadian side; and surely that was impracticable.

But we did at that time—and this item in the estimates confirms it—make it quite clear to the Americans that in certain circumstances we could, once the power and navigation project was completed, build another Canadian channel which would make it an all-Canadian seaway. The United States at that time took strong exception to that suggestion. I attended some meetings which dealt with this matter and the language was extremely frank indeed. We were told that this was at the time contrary to their understanding of the original arrangement. We felt that we were acting only in Canadian interests and were acting fairly in this regard. The result was that this action was taken, and there is a continuation in this particular item of that action which will make it possible for us in the future to have an all-Canadian seaway if and when it is desirable.

Mr. Hees: I should like to reply to the hon. member for Laurier and the Leader of the Opposition by saying that since I have held this portfolio and in the dealings this government has had through the seaway authority with the authorities of the United States there has been no attempt at all by the United States authorities to dictate in any way to us and there has been nothing but complete co-operation and harmony existing between the seaway authority of Canada and the seaway development corporation of the United States.

Mr. Chevrier: I just want to add one word and it is this. This item is just one of three things that were done in order to prepare the way for an all-Canadian seaway in case of the accomplishment of the conditions envisaged in the exchange of notes between Canada and the United States, for which my friend the Leader of the Opposition was responsible at the time, came about. The three things were as follows: (1) The construction of a structure in the dike at Cornwall in order to provide for future 27-foot navigation on the Canadian side; secondly, the dredging of a channel 27 feet in depth on the north side of Cornwall island leading to the structure in the dike; and, thirdly, the expropriation of land on the Canadian side from the dike right down to the present locks. These three things provided for a complete canal on the Canadian side of the line in case the volume of traffic was such in, say, two, three, five or more years, that it would be necessary to duplicate facilities on our side of the line. These three things have now been done, which means that 50 per cent of the work leading up to an all-Canadian seaway has been terminated, so that if at a later date it becomes necessary to expand because of the volume of traffic it will be as easy for us in Canada to duplicate the facilities in the international section as it will be for the United States to do so. The thing to do at that time would be to say to our friends in the United States, "We will duplicate at Cornwall, and since we, in Canada, have built at Iroquois, you in the United States go ahead and duplicate opposite Iroquois. Then we will have a Canadian lock on the Canadian side and you will have an American lock on the United States side, the one to circumvent the Long Sault rapids, the other to circumvent the control dam at Rockway point on the United States side." That, I hope will be accomplished one day.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Transport has said that there has always been agreement and great harmony between the Canadians and the United States seaway authorities, and I wonder whether that statement indicates that no representation has been made by this government for lower tolls or for a toll-free St. Lawrence seaway. I am all in favour of harmony and agreement, as far as construction and other aspects of the matter are concerned, but as far as tolls are concerned I think that Canada's interests would best be served by a toll-free seaway. The minister's statement that there has been all this harmony leads me to ask him whether the government has pressed for a toll-free seaway.

Mr. Hees: Several weeks ago I announced in the house a proposed schedule of tolls to be paid by those who use the seaway which would be examined in both countries. I said at that time that hearings would be started on August 6 in Washington and in Ottawa, at which hearings those who would be using the seaway could put forward their views regarding these proposed tolls. The proposed tolls were agreed to by both the Canadian and United States governments. I do not think I can say anymore.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope my hon. friend the member for Assiniboia who has just spoken, will not feel that I wish to enter into an argument with him when I make the following remarks. I think I should remind the house, however, that in 1951 parliament agreed to the imposition of tolls—there is no doubt about it. It was included not only in United States legislation but also in Canadian legislation that this was not to be a charge upon the taxpayer but was to be payable by those who use the seaway. The hon. member for Assiniboia was a member of the house at that time, and I believe must have voted for it, because my recollection is this was unanimously passed—

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. Chevrier: —by all parties in the house. I cannot see how, in view of the circumstances, firstly, the agreement between the United States and Canada and, secondly, the legislation passed in this house, it would be possible to have a toll-free seaway at this time.

That does not cover the question of the Welland canal, which is another matter altogether. Whether or not tolls should be extended to that canal is another question, but I think it did envisage a through toll, that is to say from the head of the lakes to Montreal, passing through the Welland canal. As to whether or not there should be tolls on the Welland canal itself, that is to say, for the local traffic, is another matter on which I am not pronouncing any judgment at the moment. I do feel that I should say, however, in fairness to parliament, that in 1951 this matter was clearly established and clearly approved of. This parliament, of course, can alter that, but the impression that was given by the then government and by myself as president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority was that all of these charges were to be paid by those who would be using the facilities and would not be a charge against the taxpayers.

Mr. Argue: All the statements made by the hon. member for Laurier as to what has taken place may be correct. We have all had the experience of voting for something of which we were completely in favour in principle but which we would like to see amended in some detail, and if the St. Lawrence seaway project was before the house at this time in precisely the same terms as it was back in 1951 I am sure I would support it now as I did then. However, 1951 was some years ago and every session parliament amends acts to bring them up to date in terms of modern thinking. I am suggesting that as the years go by the direction toward which this matter will go —I hope at any rate this will be so—will be in the direction of reductions in tolls on this vital seaway and not in the direction of increasing them. I think that it is perfectly consistent and proper to voice at this time on behalf of many provincial governments and many organizations the request that the seaway be toll-free and to emphasize particularly that as far as the Welland ship canal is concerned it should be toll-free and should be toll-free without any question.

I wish to say to the hon. member for Laurier that while we agreed in 1951 on the seaway project as it was then contemplated and would today agree to the same project, it is nevertheless quite proper to suggest that certain improvements should be made at this time.

Marine services—

Aids to navigation—

630. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $326,523.

Mr. Benidickson: Has the minister a new policy with respect to the Kenora subagency aids to navigation? Is it to be combined with Selkirk?

Mr. Hees: They are related subagencies, Mr. Chairman, but the final decision has not yet been made as to staffing.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Benidickson: There is a great difference in mileage between the two points, as the minister will recognize, and I would rather question the efficiency of combining the two, as I understand is contemplated.

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship services—

635. Payment to Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited (hereinafter called the company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made by the company to the Minister of Finance, in the amount of the deficit, certified by the auditors of the company, in the operations of the company, in the calendar year 1958—further amount required, $600,000.

Mr. Benidickson: I notice that in the main estimates the deficit was so much smaller than what is being asked for. Under item 443, which we passed, the deficit was $190,000, and this is a requirement for an additional $600,000. The ships have not been operating for some time, so what accounts for the difference?

Mr. Hees: The lay-up expenses of the ships, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

General—

636. To provide for the expenses of an inquiry into the coasting trade of Canada authorized under the Inquiries Act, including the payment, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, of honoraria or allowances as may be authorized by the treasury board to officers, clerks or employees permanently employed in the civil service for services rendered by them in connection with the inquiry, $15,650.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the basis for this item? This seems to be a new principle and I wonder if the minister would explain it?

Mr. Hees: These are wind-up expenses for the royal commission on coasting trade. I can give you all the details.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it it is extra expenses and emoluments going to civil servants who did this work?

Mr. Hees: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

638. Construction services administration—further amount required, $148,540.

Mr. Chevrier: There is one question which I failed to ask earlier. I wonder if I could bring it up now. It is in connection with Rimouski airport. The minister will remember that I asked him a question about it the other day. There was a fire which destroyed the facilities there. Is anything being done to assist Quebecair in these circumstances or to assist in the rebuilding of these facilities?

Mr. Hees: The question of the assistance that we can make available for the terminal building is now under discussion.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the total that this item involves refers entirely to increases in the salaries of civil servants. May I say that I have generally had a feeling that some of our departments could well dispense with a construction department and utilize the services of the Department of Public Works. However, in this particular department I must say I think the construction department is sometimes in advance of the Department of Public Works. I realize they have a lot of work to do and I recognize that additional expenditure may be necessary.

Mr. Hees: Thank you.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask one question on item 636—I shall have to revert to it. It has to do with the recommendations of the royal commission on coastal trade. Has the government any intention of implementing those recommendations?

Mr. Hees: We expect to be considering those recommendations this autumn.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—

645. Civil aviation services—further amount required, $1,084,420.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this is a very large request after the presentation of the main item and perhaps the minister will be able to table with Hansard, with the consent of the committee, the items which would make up this vote. Or, possibly an explanation by the minister would serve. Has there been a growth in the size of the aviation operations sufficient to require this increase?

Mr. Hees: One of the large amounts is for the taking over of three airports which were operated by the R.C.A.F.: the airport at Whitehorse, $338,500; Tofino, British Columbia, $59,000; and Knob Lake, Quebec, $60,000. The other large item is in respect of increased responsibilities at Frobisher Bay.

Item agreed to.

647. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required including authority to contribute up to $250,000 in 1958-59 to the province of Nova Scotia towards the construction of a highway providing access to the new Halifax international airport; and for additional development work at Beaverlodge airport on land owned by the province of Saskatchewan, $1.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the minister recognizes that those of us who have been in the house as long as he has and as long as I have been are always a little curious and dubious about these $1 items and I wonder if there is any significance attached to a contribution to a highway. It is usual?

Mr. Hees: I am advised that it is by order of the Auditor General that this wording is used to cover this item.

Mr. Benidickson: Is there any precedent for such a highway contribution by the Department of Transport?

Mr. Hees: Normally we build the road from the airport to the nearest provincial road. In this case we are turning the money over to the province and letting them do the building.

Item agreed to.

648. Contributions toward airport development and other airport projects on cost-sharing basis, in the amounts detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $123,176.

Mr. Argue: On item 648 I should like the minister to give me some explanation as to the basis on which these moneys are paid out. I have in my constituency in the city of Weyburn a flying club which uses the runways and some of the facilities of the old air force airport at Weyburn. Is it possible under this item for a grant to be obtained, with provincial agreement or upon other condition, for the repair of such runways, their modernization and, their maintenance in a good state of repair so that this very laudable and enterprising community service may be carried on?

The local residents at Weyburn have taken a good deal of pride in this project and they have used the airport facilities for the training of pilots and for use by members of the local club. I am wondering if it is possible under this item for such a club or for such a city at this time to obtain a grant to have them maintain these runways.

Mr. Hees: The principle is that if it is a remote area we usually make a grant. If it is a local flying field we do it on a cost-sharing basis. A flying club such as the hon. member has mentioned has every right to make an application and it will be considered on its merits.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his statement and I am sure that judging from the way I have been able to get along with him in the past he will give the progressive community of Weyburn, every sympathetic consideration.

Item agreed to.

Board of transport commissioners for Canada—

649. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $24,550.

Canadian maritime commission—

650. Administration—further amount required, $14,665.

651. Steamship subventions for coastal services, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $703,000.

Mr. Argue: I missed the main item being out of the chamber when it was discussed. I have a few remarks to make on this item, and the minister need have no worry about the clock.

For some years past there has been a concerted effort by both the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. to close railway stations in the province of Saskatchewan. They have been making one application after another to the board of transport commissioners to have railway stations closed and to have the agents removed. As a matter of fact, in the last five years no less than 44 stations in the province of Saskatchewan have been closed. Every community that has a station with an agent providing service is, naturally, most reluctant to see its station closed and to have its agent removed. So in many instances when an application is made to the board of transport commissioners residents of the district sign a petition and send it to the board and to the minister and subsequently a local hearing is held. My experience in connection with these local hearings is that they usually accomplish very little as far as the residents are concerned. I have attended some of these hearings myself. The representative from the board of transport commissioners as well as representatives from the railway company appear at a public meeting in a given community. In my part of the country these officials have very often come out of the city of Regina. They ride to the meeting in the same car—I suppose it is economical to do it that way—and they seem to be very much in agreement about what should be done. The representative of the board of transport commissioners is, ostensibly, a person who is sitting in something of a judicial capacity. He is supposed to give everyone a fair hearing but it seems to me that after having driven in the same car with the representatives of the railway company he gives very little consideration to the case put forward by the local residents.

I suppose station agents to a degree have become a casualty of technological improvements and that it is impossible to maintain the same number of station agents now as in the past. Nevertheless it does seem to me that in the closing of these stations the railway application is too often given far greater consideration than the case presented by the local residents. I have had a considerable amount of experience with these applications. I am rather discouraged by the attitude taken by the board of transport commissioners and their officials. In the vast majority of cases when an application is made the station is automatically closed. The railway company has a long story to tell to the effect that when the station is closed they will put in a caretaker and a telephone and thus maintain facilities. The caretaker is often the wife of the section foreman and in some cases of which I have knowledge they receive the magnificent sum of $10 a month for taking over some of the services once provided by the station agent. Certainly as far as Saskatchewan is concerned, if the operations of the railway came within Saskatchewan labour legislation Saskatchewan would not allow the C.P.R.—that is the railway with which I have acquaintance and for all I know the C.N.R. may do the same thing—

Mr. Benidickson: Just the same.

Mr. Argue: —to exploit the services of those people by paying such a trivial sum.

I do not like to see stations closed. In many instances I have worked hard to keep them open. Although there are a few exceptions, in the majority of instances my efforts have met with very little success. I would hope that the board of transport commissioners would give greater consideration in future to the wishes of the people in the communities where they desire to close the station and remove the station agent.

As far as Saskatchewan is concerned, apparently the railways are out to close most of the stations. They want to maintain only a few agents here and there and close the vast majority of stations. I do not believe this trend can be entirely arrested and I do not think I would ask the board or the government to go that far but I would hope that in future there would be much more consideration given to the advice of local residents and not a continuation of something that appears to be a cut and dried decision made in advance. In many instances the meetings that are held to consider the application are just a farce and an insult to the intelligence of all the people who participate in them. It does not seem to matter how good your case is. Nothing happens and the station is closed down in due course.

It may be that if a federal election is being held and you create enough opposition concerning it they will delay closing the station until after the election but immediately following the election they go merrily on their way closing stations at the same rate. I hope the minister will put the brakes on the board of transport commissioners in this respect.

Item agreed to.

Canal services—

661. To provide for the acquisition of land required in connection with the development of the 27 foot Cornwall navigation system—further amount required, $141,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to ask a question on the minister's last item but I should like to have him give me the details of items 141 and 513, the $100,000 and the $141,000 items. This may require some time but perhaps he would be good enough to let me have this by letter at a later date.

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: On that item I would just like to bring to the attention of the minister, since we are discussing a matter concerning Cornwall, the exchange of correspondence we had arising out of the desirability of establishing port facilities in that area. The minister will remember an application was pending for the establishment of a port authority in Cornwall and the minister replied that the old canal facilities would be turned over to the seaway authority there so that advantage could be taken of them for industrial development at Cornwall. While on the face of it that may appear an answer, I am afraid when it is studied it is not satisfactory. It is not because the old facilities are located on a 14-foot navigation canal that industry will be attracted and the minister knows the moment the seaway is opened all of these 14-foot vessels will become obsolete and the new 27-foot vessels will be in demand for use in the new channel.

The area where the port authority was requested is an area in deep water. The water in that area is anywhere from 25 feet to 40 feet deep so the depth is sufficient. It would be unfortunate if the one were traded off for the other. This is a matter that will eventually have to be decided by the municipal authorities of the city of Cornwall. It is for them to determine what is in their best interests. However, I am merely bringing to the attention of the minister the fact that the alternative is not the answer. There must be there for the future development of the community deep water facilities, namely 27-foot facilities, and the area they have suggested seems the most logical one in which to establish them.

Item agreed to.

General—

662. To increase to $6,000,000 the amount that may be charged at any time to the revolving fund mentioned in subsection (2) of section 101 of the Financial Administration Act, chap. 12, statutes of 1951 (2nd session), and extended by vote 630 of the Appropriation Act, No. 2, 1955; additional amount required, $1,000,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I must confess I have not done enough research on this item, not that I especially feel I should have done so. I think this type of thing has probably gone on for some time but it is not fair to hon. members of the committee of supply because it requires them to do some individual investigation of the statutes without the slightest initimation of what the item is all about. I have no doubt this is traditional but I wonder if the minister would give a little explanation.

Mr. Hees: I would be very glad to do so, Mr. Chairman. At the present time the department operates a revolving fund of $5 million for the purchase of stores required in the various operating branches of the department. During the past year there has been a considerable expansion of the activities of the air services branch chiefly as a result of the taking over of a number of establishments from the Department of National Defence and also the program for the establishment of surveillance radar equipment at 15 airports across Canada.

There has also been a marked increase in the activities of the marine services branch chiefly in regard to the operations of the dominion steamers and also the establishment of a district marine agency at Fort Smith, Northwest Territories. Consequently, it is considered that there now exists a need to increase the stores revolving fund by a total amount of $1 million to take care of the following increased requirements: (1) increased stocks of radio spares, chiefly for surveillance radar equipment, $500,000; (2) sub-stores depot for radio spares laboratory at Ottawa, $70,000; (3) estimated additional amount required to take care of increased commodity prices, unforeseen new stock requirements and a working capital equal to one month's stores issue, $180,000; (4) printing and stationery stocks for the meteorological service, Toronto, $250,000, making a total of $1 million.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister for his explanation. I merely want to suggest that we have had a great turnover in members of parliament. I had some association with this department and I probably should have recollected this but I did not and no doubt not more than two members of the committee had any knowledge of what this was all about. There was nothing in the estimates in layman's language to indicate what it is. I suggest to those in the treasury board who draft these estimates that this is not a proper attitude to adopt toward hon. members of parliament and particularly in the last stages of the session when it is difficult for hon. members of the committee to go to the statutes and find what the references are.

Mr. Hees: I agree with the hon. member. I will bring that up with the other two matters.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Transport.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

305. Operations—Including salaries and other expenses of staff post offices, district offices, railway mail service staffs, and supplies, equipment and other items for revenue post offices, including administration, and to authorize the re-appointment, effective the 16th day of September, 1955, of G. V. H. Christiaenssens as postal clerk 2 in the Magog post office, at a salary of $2,700 per annum for the period from the 16th day of September, 1955, to the 31st day of March, 1956, and at a salary of $2,940 per annum for the period from the 1st day of April, 1956, to the 30th day of April, 1957, $101,387,706.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, we were kind to the Postmaster General last week by passing the first item, therefore I do not think that he will expect too much of us today. After all, we are members of the opposition. He used to be in the opposition and as far as the Post Office Department is concerned he has done his share of—I will not say delaying or postponing—lengthening the discussion on the estimates of this department in former years and caused great difficulty to the postmaster general at that time. As a newcomer he deserves a little criticism. I would not call him a newcomer because in 1953 and in 1954 he was so close to the Post Office Department that he even had access to the—

The Chairman: Order. I must inform hon. members that if they wish to carry on conversation it would be preferable for them to do so in the smoking rooms behind the curtains.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, may I say first that the Postmaster General was listening very carefully to what I was saying even though it was noisy in the house. I was saying that the Postmaster General was not a newcomer because when he was an ordinary member of parliament he had access to the offices of the department to the extent that even the material that was supposed to be confidential between the minister's officials and the minister himself was made available to him.

I want to refer to a statement which was made by the Postmaster General on July 26 when he said, as reported at page 2742 of Hansard.

> I find that in my general remarks here I have dealt I think with most of the points raised by the hon. member for St. Denis. Again I want to emphasize the fact that I do not accept his statement that I claimed the post office was poor or that it offered poor service in previous years. I never said that.

I want to answer that statement. He did not say that word for word. I did not even say that he said that the post office was poor, but he made many statements to that effect. I do not know whether his memory is poor but on July 26 I quoted what he said as follows:

> But I criticise in the very strongest terms the Postmaster General for his administration of the department, and for many of the ways in which it is administered under his direction.

He was referring to the former postmaster general. He said: "It is administered", not the way it was administered. If I understood him, he wished to tell the committee that he was criticizing the postmaster general alone. I do not know why he says in one sentence that the Post Office Department is second to none and in the next sentence that the postmaster general is no good. He has to choose between the two; he has to choose one or the other. If the Post Office Department is well administered, or if he had nothing to say against the officials and the way in which they did their work, why did he say that the postmaster general was no good? Was it because he was not good-looking, was it because he was not well dressed, or something? I do not understand. He has to choose between the two. He made many statements during the time he sat in opposition. I therefore challenge his statement that he never criticized the department. He talked against the post office saving bank. He criticized the way in which security was carried out in the post office. He even wanted the mounted police to take over so far as thefts were concerned. He even said that the department was slow moving. I do not know whether I have the statement here but on January 20, 1956, the minister said, as reported in Hansard at page 363:

> Slow moving as the department is and slow moving as the minister may be, we at least have sufficient time for him to make up his mind and do something about this particular situation.

If that is not criticism I wonder what he meant by criticism. As a matter of fact, every time he criticized the departmental officials or the service the name of the minister was always included. He even went so far as to call the minister of that time a stupid minister. I do not know whether he is trying to imitate the former postmaster general so far as thefts are concerned. I heard him say last week that there were about twice as many burglaries under his administration but the amount of money taken was not as large. So far as stupidity is concerned, I think that was a stupid sentence. It is not the fault of the postmaster general if the burglary is $12 instead of $1,200.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): It is the result of this Postmaster General's changes in the system.

Mr. Denis: There was a report known as the Woods-Gordon report. The Postmaster General of today used almost every sentence of that report before the postmaster general of that time announced what was contained in it. I challenge the Postmaster General to say to the country—

(Translation):

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), but as it is 6 o'clock, I must leave the chair.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the business of the house is for Monday? In view of the fact that we have made such excellent progress today—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chevrier: —perhaps the minister will project his mind and tell us what will happen on Tuesday?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: In view of the interruptions, I think I should say that the normal time for passing the estimates of the Department of Transport is three days. I think we did pretty well in getting them through in about one day.

Mr. Green: On Monday, we shall commence with item No. 9 on today's order paper, the resolution concerning the South Saskatchewan river project; then, take item No. 1, house in committee on a bill to amend the Railway Act; then, item No. 5, second reading of a bill for approving certain expenditures authorized for the public service; then, item No. 4, second reading of a bill to amend the Customs Act. We shall continue with legislation on Tuesday. There would remain item No. 2, which is consideration of amendments made by the Senate to an act respecting taxation of estates, and item No. 6, second reading of a bill to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 4.

Supply—Items Passed

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

438. Newfoundland coastal services—construction or acquisition of passenger-cargo vessels and equipment, $1,100,000.

439. Yarmouth, Nova Scotia-Bar Harbor, Maine, U.S.A., ferry service—deficit, 1958, $165,000.

440. To provide towards the cost of surveys of Newfoundland railway properties entrusted to the Canadian National Railway Company, $17,500.

441. Degaussing Canadian-owned merchant ships, of 1,000 gross tons and over, of Canadian registry, or of United Kingdom registry if subject to retransfer to Canadian registry under special intergovernmental arrangement, $300,000.

442. Maritime Freight Rates Act—for the payment to the railway companies operating in the select territory designated by the act, of the difference occurring on account of the application of the act, between the tariff tolls and normal tolls under approved tariffs (estimated and certified to the Minister of Transport by the Canadian National Railway Company and approved by auditors of the said company respecting the eastern lines of the Canadian National Railways and in the case of the other railways by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1958, $14,000,000.

443. Payment to Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, limited (hereinafter called the company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made by the company to the Minister of Finance, in the amount of the deficit, certified by the auditors of the company, in the operations of the company in the calendar year 1958, $190,000.

444. To authorize the governor in council to grant to Canadian National Railway Company a subsidy of $25,000 per mile, but not exceeding $7,450,000, towards the construction of the line of railway referred to in chapter 49 of the Statutes of Canada, 1953-54, as branch line number 1 (described approximately as a line of railway from St. Felicien to Chibougamau and from Chibougamau to Beattyville in the province of Quebec); such grant of subsidy to be made in such manner and in such amounts and subject to such conditions, if any, as the governor in council deems expedient; estimated requirement for the fiscal year 1958-59, $1,600,000.

Pensions and other benefits—

445. Amount required to pay pensions at the rate of $300 per annum to former pilots: Arthur Baquet; Adelard Delisle; Raoul Lachance; Jules Lamarre; Wilhelm Langlois; Auguste Santerre, $1,800.

446. Railway employees' provident fund—to supplement pension allowances under the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum allowance payable in the calendar year 1958 $30 per month instead of $20 per month as fixed by the said act, $9,500.

447. Supplemental pension allowances to former employees of Newfoundland railways, steamships and telecommunication services transferred to Canadian National Railways, $54,000.

Special—

448. To provide, notwithstanding anything in the Financial Administration Act or any other act or law, for payment to the widow of the late John H. Tudhope formerly Canadian representative to the commonwealth telecommunications board and civil aviation advisor to the high commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom in respect of which employment no pension is payable, $5,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 1, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

LABOUR DAY

TRIBUTES TO CONTRIBUTION OF ORGANIZED AND GENERAL LABOUR

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak for all hon. members in paying tribute to labour, whose day this is. We honour the contributions made by labour during the years since unions were first recognized in the early 1870's, when, as a result of the bill introduced by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald, recognition was given to the right of labour to organize.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then in 1894, during the regime of Sir John Thompson, legislation was passed both in this country and in the United States making the first Monday of September a day on which tribute would be paid to those who labour and to the importance of labour in the lives of all of us.

It is well that there should be this day when we give national recognition to the fact that every advance in our development is made possible by work. Labour has done much and will do much now and in the future for the achievement of Canada's undeniable destiny. My hope is that on this day, as we review the contribution made by organized labour and by labour in general, all Canadians will join in paying tribute to those belonging to the ranks of labour.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to comment on what the Prime Minister has said, may I say that perhaps one of the best ways in which we can give recognition to labour is to ourselves labour, as we are doing, on Labour day. May I also join with the Prime Minister in saying that increasing recognition of the rights and importance of labour has been given over the years by Canadian governments representing both our parties.

May I also put a statement of mine on the record for Labour day, Mr. Speaker, because it expresses, in perhaps better words than I could find on the spur of the moment, my views on this matter. This statement was issued by myself on behalf of our party on Saturday last, and is as follows:

It is with great pleasure that I join other Canadians in paying sincere tribute to the working men and women who have contributed so magnificently to the growth and prosperity of our country.

Labour day is a good occasion to recall that the rights of labour, at times hard won through stern struggle, are now regarded by all good citizens as an indispensable element of a free society.

These rights must be maintained and even extended just as the responsibilities that go with them are accepted and discharged.

I am certain that labour will continue to make an invaluable contribution to the development of Canada, and to ensure that all citizens participate to the fullest extent in the benefits that will flow from that development.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the C.C.F., I wish to associate myself with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in paying on this Labour day a very well deserved tribute to Canadian labour. The whole fabric of our Canadian society, a free society, depends in large measure on the welfare, the freedom and the responsibility of labouring people in this country.

We have been fortunate in Canada in the past to have had a responsible trade union movement representing, as it does, more than 1,250,000 trade unionists, and we pay tribute at this time not only to organized labour but to all those Canadians who earn their living by toil.

As the Leader of the Opposition has said, we recognize Labour days in perhaps the best way in this house by conducting the public affairs of this nation. I think the greatest tribute we could pay to organized labour, to unorganized labour and to all Canadians who have labour in mind at this time would be so to order our affairs as to guarantee full employment and a high standard of living to all the working people of this country.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—REPORTED RECOMMENDATION TO RAISE UNITED STATES TARIFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he would care to comment on an Associated Press dispatch to the effect that President Eisenhower is now considering recommendations to raise the tariff on lead and zinc imports into the United States?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen that dispatch, but I will look at it and have an answer for the hon. gentleman tomorrow.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—STATEMENT ON PROSECUTION OF DOCTOR ON MANITOULIN ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, while I was unavoidably absent from the house, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Kootenay West asked questions relating to a charge laid against Dr. Michael Ash, a physician employed by my department to care for the Indians of Manitoulin island and attend the small cottage hospital operated by Indian health services at Manitowaning.

Dr. Ash is an eminently qualified English physician, who served with the R.A.M.C. in Africa and Burma and practised for ten years as a general consultant on London's Harley street. He became interested in coming to Canada and made inquiries at our medical immigration office in London. As the director of Indian health services was passing through that city on his way to the world health organization meeting in Geneva, Dr. Ash was interviewed and careful inquiries were made as to his ability as a physician. He was highly recommended by senior officers of the British ministry of health and others. Dr. Ash took up his present position as medical officer, grade 2, in March of this year.

Naturally it is the policy of this department, wherever possible, to employ Canadian citizens licensed to practise in the province where their duties take them. Licensing of physicians is under the college of physicians and surgeons in each province. I might point out, however, that there is a serious shortage of doctors who are prepared to take up duty in some of the more remote areas where the services of medical officers are required for the care of Indians and Eskimos.

In view of this shortage it has been necessary on occasion to employ physicians from outside Canada. Reciprocation exists between the United Kingdom and six or seven of the provinces, but unfortunately this reciprocation for registering and licensing does not exist between the province of Ontario and the United Kingdom. To obtain a licence to practise in Ontario, Dr. Ash would have to write a set of examinations set by the dominion medical council in order to obtain the degree of licentiate of the medical college of Canada.

It has been ruled by the Department of Justice that physicians fully employed by the federal government do not, of necessity, have to be licensed in any particular province unless they "profess to practise for gain". In other words, as long as they confine their work to the position they occupy with this department, they cannot be legally required to obtain a licence, but if they were to practise medicine with the public it would be an infringement of the medical act of the province concerned.

This situation was explained to Dr. Ash, and he was instructed to treat non-Indians only when emergency cases came to his attention. This understanding was known to the other doctors of Manitoulin island and had their full approval.

The Ontario college of physicians and surgeons saw fit to send an investigator to Manitowaning who posed as an emergency case requiring treatment and medicine for the relief of severe pain. Dr. Ash treated him and gave him some tablets known as 222's, containing aspirin and codeine. He charged his patient $5 and issued him an official receipt, so that this money is returned to the Receiver General of Canada.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that officials of my department suggested to the president and the registrar of the Ontario college of physicians and surgeons that they withdraw the charge that was laid as a result of this incident, but they refused to do so. In consultation with the Department of Justice, legal counsel was appointed to defend Dr. Ash. The charge was dismissed by the magistrate in Little Current on August 27 of this year.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the minister for the statement he has given, and express the hope that the experience to which Dr. Ash has been subjected will not discourage the doctor in the fine service he is giving in Manitoulin island.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister know that according to a press statement of August 30, patients who want treatment must telephone a doctor in Sudbury to obtain his permission before Dr. Ash can treat them, and then only on an emergency basis?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I do not believe that is exactly the situation, Mr. Speaker. If an emergency does exist I understand the patient is free to go to Dr. Ash directly.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ROCKCLIFFE AIR BASE—STATEMENT ON REPORTED DENIAL OF SCHOOL FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the hon. member for Laurier asked a question regarding the arrangements made at the Department of National Defence school at Rockcliffe for children whose parents desire that their children should be given their education in the French language.

In the past, through arrangements with the city of Ottawa, parents of French-speaking elementary pupils have been permitted to send their children to the French-speaking elementary schools in Ottawa. This year parents of 28 children ranging from kindergarten to grade 8 applied for attendance at French-speaking schools in Ottawa. Unfortunately, on August 15 last the superintendent of the Ottawa separate schools advised that there would be no accommodation available for these 28 pupils this year.

These children may now attend the Rockcliffe school. At Rockcliffe the instruction is given in English but there are French-speaking teachers on the staff. This education is strictly in accordance with the educational laws of the province of Ontario, the province in which these children reside. It would be impractical to set up separate classrooms for these 28 children, as they range widely in grades, from kindergarten to grade 8.

DOMINION DAY

INQUIRY AS TO CORRECT DESIGNATION OF NATIONAL HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am in a bit of a dilemma and I hope the Prime Minister can resolve it. Whereas the Prime Minister in a recent official communication referred to our national holiday of July 1 as Confederation day, and whereas the Department of the Secretary of State continues to use in official communications the name established during Sir John A. Macdonald's time, namely Dominion day; in order that hon. members may write and speak with exactitude on this question, which is of national interest, would the Prime Minister inform the house what is to be the correct designation for this national holiday during the period of his administration?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that this question is appropriate at this stage of the house's proceedings. It does not seem to relate to any urgency. As July 1 has already passed, perhaps the hon. member would raise his question next year.

Mr. Herridge: It is of great public interest; I have had inquiries about it.

Mr. Speaker: It is not very clear what responsibility of government the hon. member is inquiring about. Perhaps he can rephrase his question.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the Prime Minister's use of the word "Confederation" in one international communication and the use by the Department of the Secretary of State of the words "Dominion day", I am asking what is the correct term to use during the period of his administration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course the hon. gentleman knows that this is not a proper question for the orders of the day, but recognizing that care for small things which characterizes him, I find it may be necessary simply to point out that on July 1 a message was received from Mr. Khrushchev, chairman of the council of ministers of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, extending—I think I have it here—congratulations as follows:

> On the occasion of the national holiday—confederation day—I send you my sincere congratulations. I beg you to convey to the Canadian people from the Soviet people and from the government of the U.S.S.R. the best wishes for peace and prosperity.

As is the custom in the Department of External Affairs when a reply is given to a message such as that, the words used by the nation conveying the congratulations are repeated in order to prevent misunderstanding. I am sure under those circumstances the use of the expression, coupled with the congratulatory message, will clarify this matter for the edification of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister say that the name of this national holiday is a small matter to Canadians?

Mr. Diefenbaker: My understanding is that the name was fixed long since, and I think the hon. gentleman realizes this. The day has had its official designation fixed by parliament.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ARGUE—REFERENCE TO ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON AUGUST 13

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of questions and answers as reported in Hansard on August 13. On that day, as a second question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I asked:

> —whether the wheat board has yet been able to establish buying prices for grain this year and, if not, whether those prices will be established within the next few days.

In answer to my question the Minister of Trade and Commerce replied as follows, as reported at page 3455 of Hansard. I had asked two questions, and the minister said:

In answer to the second part, I have been advised that the wheat board has established buying prices for the various grades of wheat it sells, and an announcement to this effect will be made very shortly.

Then I asked a supplementary question as follows:

I wonder if the minister is able to say now whether those buying prices will be the same as last year or whether there would be some differences.

The minister replied:

When the announcement is made and the prices are published a comparison can be made with the prices for last year, but I have not got the figures in my head now.

I hold in my hand the Canada Gazette, part II, dated Wednesday, August 27, 1958, and on page 953 there is a copy of an order in council dealing with the establishment of buying prices for wheat, oats and barley. After the proper preamble it reads as follows:

Therefore, his excellency the governor general in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, pursuant to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, is pleased hereby to approve the sums certain to be paid to producers selling and delivering to the board wheat, oats or barley of the grades set out in the schedule hereto during the period commencing on the 1st day of August, 1958, and ending on the 31st day of July, 1959.

My question of privilege is that the minister did not inform the house that he had recommended these buying prices two days before I asked my question; and since they were established on the recommendation of the minister I believe he would have knowledge of the action that took place. The second question had to do with the exact buying prices, to which the minister replied that he did not have the figures in mind at that time. I had asked whether the figures were the same as the previous year. There are a great many grades and if there had been changes I would not and did not expect the minister to know, but on checking the figures set forth in the order in council and the prices for the grades in the previous year I can find no change in the grades set forth. I find that they are exactly the same.

I feel that the answer was misleading, though I do not suggest deliberately so. The minister had the information, he recommended the order in council two days before, and the information was not given to the house.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there was no intention whatever to mislead the hon. member or any member of the House of Commons. The order in council had been passed and was transmitted to the wheat board. It was left to them to make the announcement in due course.

[Mr. Argue.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

VANCOUVER—PAYMENT OF BENEFITS TO LOCKED OUT ELECTRICIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, if I can talk with the cold I have I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour, and in his absence to the acting minister. Has the attention of the Minister of Labour been drawn to a court decision in Vancouver that electricians, members of the international brotherhood of electrical workers, local union 213, were illegally locked out? Since a worker illegally locked out is entitled to unemployment insurance, will the minister inform the house if these electricians, illegally locked out for many weeks, will now be paid the unemployment insurance benefits which they were unjustly denied?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I shall draw the question to the attention of the Minister of Labour.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—APPROVAL OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament approve the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan respecting the South Saskatchewan river project, signed on the 25th day of July, 1958, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are things which one looks forward to achieving throughout the years. This is one of those days in that, on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture, I am able to move the motion in question to confirm the agreement for the building of the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project. Throughout the years I have been of those who have advocated the building of the dam in order to meet a situation which has existed in central and southern Saskatchewan for generations. Indeed, as one reads the history of the early development of the country and of our early explorers one is struck by the fact that from 1691 to the present time those areas in southern and central Saskatchewan, and also in the neighbouring provinces to a much lesser extent, have been subject to drought.

On July 25 the Minister of Agriculture announced that an agreement had been signed with the government of Saskatchewan providing for the construction of this project. As the house knows, this project has been under study for many years, and I am very happy to be able to bring this agreement before the house, for it represents another of the promises made by this party in the days of opposition, as well as since forming a government, which is now being carried into effect.

While there have been conflicting opinions as to the usefulness of the project, the weight of official and public opinion is such as to justify the conclusion that the project will be of lasting benefit not only to the province of Saskatchewan and the people it will serve there, but that it will be a project which will constitute another major step in the national development plan of this government. The immediate benefits upon the completion of this project will be that an irrigation potential of 500,000 acres will be created; a power potential of 200,000 horsepower will be made available; ample water supplies for urban and industrial developments in southern Saskatchewan will be assured, and the water levels of the Saskatchewan and Qu'Appelle valleys will be placed in a position where use will be made of those waters which for tens of thousands of years have simply been wasted by working their way ultimately, without benefit to the surrounding area, into Hudson bay. In addition there will be the recreation and tourist values consequent upon this development. These benefits, of course, will not be realized immediately, but my hope is that within a generation this project will be an achievement of such importance that it will be recognized as an asset of national consequence.

The essential features of the agreement are that the dominion government will design and build the dam and the essential works required for creating the reservoir that will impound 8 million acre feet of water. The estimated cost of this reservoir is $96 million, of which the dominion government will pay 75 per cent and the provincial government 25 per cent. Whatever the additional cost may be, the provincial share will in no case exceed $25 million. Furthermore, the national government will pay 25 per cent of the cost of the penstocks required to produce that minimum of power to which I have referred already.

Furthermore, as to the province's share of the expenditure for the reservoir which, as I said, is 25 per cent of the amount and in any event, regardless of the cost of the reservoir, will not exceed $25 million, the national government will aid in financing one-half by an obligation under which the province has 20 years in which to repay at an interest rate representative of the current cost to Canada of long term borrowing, and a carrying charge of one-eighth of one per cent. In other words, Saskatchewan's share of the cost is to be paid annually as the work progresses, one-half of such share to be paid in cash and the remainder in 20 years under the loan plan to which I have made reference. Saskatchewan will construct, operate and maintain at its own expense all power and irrigation facilities. The province will relocate provincial highways and ferries affected by the dam and reservoir, and the national government will pay 75 per cent of the cost of this work up to the equivalent of standards existing at the date the agreement was entered into.

When the reservoir has been filled to a level that provides a minimum operating head, it and all related works will be transferred to the province of Saskatchewan and that province will be responsible for operation, water allocation, and other decisions arising from the use of the impounded waters. For a period of six years from the transfer of the reservoir to Saskatchewan the national government will furnish all work and materials for maintenance and assume the full cost. For the next four year period the Saskatchewan government will share such costs equally and will thereafter relieve the national government of all obligation for further construction and maintenance.

I believe, sir, that in presenting this motion I can say that it represents a step in the achievement of a national policy which is based on the belief that the national welfare demands positive action to meet maladjustment in particular regions and industries. I am hopeful that this motion will receive the general support of members in all parts of the house, and that in the years ahead we will be able to look back on this day, particularly in the province of Saskatchewan but in the western provinces as well and throughout the country, as having brought about the beginning of an achievement which will give hope to those in that area for the future and will lay still stronger the foundations of a national development program to assure a reasonable degree of equality of opportunity in all the provinces of this country.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): From July 25, Mr. Speaker, the day on which the Prime Minister made an announcement in respect to the South Saskatchewan river project, to date we have been led from one surprise to another. First of all it was an agreeable surprise when on July 25 the Prime Minister announced that the government had signed an agreement with Saskatchewan. Then it was a surprise also when on August 18 there appeared in Votes and Proceedings the motion which we are debating this morning. It is another surprise to see that the Prime Minister is presenting this motion instead of the Minister of Agriculture. Of course the Prime Minister has taken such a great interest in this project, which is located in his own province, and he has worked so hard for this project in the past that, if we are surprised that the Minister of Agriculture is not presenting the motion, we are pleased to see the Prime Minister doing so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what we are being asked to do by this resolution is to approve the terms of an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan with regard to the South Saskatchewan river project. This motion, in fact, is a blank cheque, to which the approval of both houses of parliament is requested. It is as simple as that. This resolution is not in the usual form, that it is expedient to introduce a comprehensive measure, but is to the effect that it is expedient that both houses of parliament approve an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan respecting the South Saskatchewan river project.

On July 25 last the house was informed by the Prime Minister that an agreement in regard to this project between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan had been signed earlier that day on behalf of the federal government by the Minister of Agriculture. We were told that the project was in the state where construction could proceed, and following this announcement the leader of our party expressed satisfaction that this agreement had been signed and told the house that he felt confident that the project would be of value not only to Saskatchewan but to the prairie provinces and, as such, would make its contribution to the national development.

As a result of this announcement by the Prime Minister every member had good reason to believe that a comprehensive measure would be introduced in the house in the usual manner. In fact, until the present resolution appeared in Votes and Proceedings on August 18 we of this group had good reason to believe that a bill would be introduced, which bill would be preceded by a resolution in the usual form and that we would be given the opportunity to discuss the bill in all its stages. We were expecting a measure in which would be outlined certain rules and regulations regarding the construction, operation and maintenance, the allocation of water in respect of irrigation, domestic consumption and hydroelectric power and so on, a measure in which would be mentioned the approximate amount of money to be spent by the federal government on this project. We were expecting a measure in which would be outlined the basic procedure to be followed in order to carry this project to its full utilization.

But instead of being called upon to approve an act of parliament, which I think this project would have warranted, an act which would have become part of the statutes of Canada, we are simply asked to approve an agreement which on the whole seems to meet the requirements, especially as far as the two authorities are concerned—the federal and provincial governments—because, after all, both parties have signed an agreement. This agreement could have been referred to in the bill; but the seriousness of the matter is that we are asked to give the government a blank cheque for the next three or four years.

We are very much in favour of the government proceeding with the construction of this project; there is no question about that, and while we do not disapprove entirely of the agreement as such, we disapprove of the procedure which is now being followed by this government in order to secure the authority of parliament to initiate the construction of such an important project. For this reason, later in my remarks I propose to move an amendment to this resolution.

The need of irrigation in the South Saskatchewan area is a fact that cannot be denied by anyone who knows the situation in that part of the province. The desirability of launching an irrigation scheme such as the South Saskatchewan river project is also admitted by all persons who are really informed on this problem. That the time has come to consider this development in terms of national benefit rather than of isolated or local development has been clearly established in the report of the royal commission of 1952. That the full utilization of the South Saskatchewan river should be undertaken as a national obligation is also recognized. That the conservation and control of water in that watershed is partly a federal responsibility, I do not think there can be much doubt.

This is a very important point, and I would like to quote from the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project as to what was submitted by the province of Alberta, which appears at page 19, as follows:

> Because the conservation and best use of interprovincial streams in the Saskatchewan river drainage basin can only be attained through the regulation of the flow of the streams by storage, and because the natural and artificial storage sites are in the mountain and foothill regions of the drainage basin, it is not possible to administer the water resources of this basin in the best interests of the respective provinces except through a single administrative authority. In other words, these interprovincial streams cannot be administered in the best interests of the most beneficial use of water by the respective provinces separately.

The former premier of Manitoba, in a letter to the commission, in referring to the effects of the upstream developments had this to say, as reported at page 342 of the same report:

It would appear therefore that your commission should give consideration at this time as to what responsibility the government of Canada should accept for the integrated development of the entire watershed.

What I have said regarding the necessity of irrigation in that part of the province, the necessity of conserving the water and the necessity of distributing this water, is very important. We are aware that the South Saskatchewan river project is a measure certain to help the prairie economy. We have always been aware of this, and we also know of the great advantages which will result once the project is completed. We do not underestimate the importance of irrigating 500,000 acres in the southern part of that province and the benefits which will be derived from a transfer from dry farming to irrigated farming. The production of 375 million kilowatt hours of firm energy annually, of which 325 million kilowatt hours will be available for commercial use, will also provide opportunities for new industries.

The future of municipal water supplies, as the Prime Minister mentioned, especially for the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw, will be very much improved, and this is another important factor. I could also mention the fact that the control of the natural flow of the river will improve the quality of the water in the Qu'Appelle valley; it will permit the development of other areas downstream, and will most likely also improve the hydro-electric power development down the river.

In my estimation, however, one of the most important advantages is that it will offset the decline of population in this area. It will also probably help to reduce the assistance payments to dry farmers and will provide extra employment. There are other benefits to be derived from this project when completed, such as an increase in the number of farms in the irrigated area of the province and also increased facilities for the tourist trade in the province of Saskatchewan.

After twelve months of negotiation the federal government and the government of Saskatchewan are now proposing to undertake the development of an irrigation and agricultural rehabilitation project incorporating hydro power facilities. Both governments have agreed on certain terms, as outlined by the Prime Minister, which terms are incorporated in an agreement dated July 25, 1958, tabled in this house on August 1. This agreement, as the Prime Minister has said, is divided into six parts. The first part—and I say this is the most important part—relates to the construction of the reservoir. This will be accomplished by building two dams, a main dam located at Coteau creek and a subsidiary dam on the Qu'Appelle river in order to stop the flow. These are, of course, the main works. But it is not only a question of building the dams themselves; there is also the question of installing the necessary facilities.

The second part of the agreement has to do with the operation and maintenance of the reservoir, and the third part relates to the construction of a power house and facilities, such as penstocks for generation and transmission of hydro-electric power. The fourth part of the agreement sets out the responsibility of the province with regard to irrigation facilities over 500,000 acres of land, and the fifth and sixth parts have to do with records, inspection, payment and generalities.

Mr. Speaker, we welcomed this morning the statement by the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman mentioned that the cost was estimated to be $96 million. However, we would have liked to hear him give a more accurate estimate, because we are under the impression that the cost of constructing the dams on the South Saskatchewan river at Coteau and in the Qu'Appelle valley will exceed $96 million. I say this because an estimate has been prepared and because, of course, the estimate which was incorporated in the report of the royal commission of 1952 has been criticized. Many have said that the estimated cost was exaggerated, but it is surprising to see that when the province of Saskatchewan established the cost of its share of the work, it was under the impression that it would have to pay an amount up to $110 million. Of course we understand very well that this sum would not be paid in a matter of two, three or five years. We realize it will probably be spread over a period of 20 years.

We understand that the province will pay 25 per cent of the cost of building the dam, and I gather that of this amount of $25 million the province will only have to pay 50 per cent, or $12½ million in cash. This is likely to be the amount which the province will have to pay over the next seven or eight years, because I understand the timetable for the construction of the dam envisages a period of between six and eight years. It is a substantial amount. As far as I am concerned, I feel the province might have been asked to pay less. However, it is not an exaggerated share for the province to have to pay. In addition, the province will have to pay the cost of the power house, including 75 per cent of the cost of the penstocks, the federal government having agreed to pay 25 per cent of the cost of these installations. These, the province says, will cost $35 million.

There must also be taken into account the irrigation scheme. The building of canals and the pumping stations will cost, according to figures we read in the newspapers, another $45 million, and I think that estimate is conservative in view of the fact that so many pumping stations will have to be built. The share of the provincial government may eventually amount to more than $110 million, but if we take that figure it is surprising to see that it coincides with the figure mentioned in the report. In the report, of course, the cost of construction of the dam alone is estimated at $139 million, by which I mean the cost of the construction of both dams and of the facilities connected with them.

Thus we can presume that the cost of building those two dams and creating the reservoir will amount to much more than $100 million. We do not object to this, but we feel that the Prime Minister should have come forward and told us, "We are asking, now, for a revised estimate", or "We have asked the engineers to prepare new estimates".

However, this is not an objection. We do not object to that. What we object to is the fact that this motion has been presented in the form of a resolution simply to approve an agreement which has been entered into by both parties. The cost to the province will be quite high. I know that negotiations have gone on for 12 months because the province of Saskatchewan felt it should have had the same advantages that were extended to the maritimes with regard to the production of hydro-electric power. They certainly have something there. However, this government feels that all it can do in this respect is to pay 25 per cent of the cost of intalling penstocks in the dam and down to the power house.

There are many questions we should like to ask the Prime Minister, but I understand that Your Honour being in the chair we are not permitted to ask questions and have them answered back and forth. We can only ask the minister to give us some additional information, when he rises to reply and closes the debate, with regard to the timetable. When does the government intend to begin this work? I know the Prime Minister has said that as soon as an agreement could be signed the work would be started. When the Prime Minister said that, he was anxious to see the work begun. However, we would like to be given this information with somewhat greater precision.

We should also like to ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to organize an authority to build the dam. I know that under the agreement there is mention of a board, and the duties of that board are outlined in part 6 of the agreement, on page 15:

> 21. (1) Canada and Saskatchewan will constitute a board of officials, to be called the South Saskatchewan river development board, to consist of seven members, four of whom, including the chairman, shall be appointed by Canada and three of whom shall be appointed by Saskatchewan, and the duties of the board shall be as follows:
> (a) to review the general design of the project with particular reference to the schedule of construction and the design relationships of the main dam and reservoir to ensure the most economic use of water for irrigation and electric power;
> (b) to maintain continuous liaison with the parties hereto and their agencies;
> (c) to correlate the planning and information required for the proper timing of construction;
> (d) to be fully informed of all construction work undertaken pursuant to this agreement; and
> (e) to advise upon accounting and records procedures required for the sharing of costs and the payment thereof.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are not sure if this board will decide on contracts, for instance. We do not know if the board will see that tenders are called. I can understand that this board would be a body acting between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Saskatchewan in respect to those matters which are outlined on page 16.

Another question to which we would like an answer is this. Has the government established a timetable for the work? We have read in various reports that the work will take a considerable length of time to complete. First there was mention of a period of eight or ten years, but now we are told in the report of the royal commission and by the P.F.R.A. that the work can be done in six years. So much the better. At the end of six years there will be a period during which the federal government will operate and maintain the reservoir, and then the reservoir will be transferred to the province following that period. These are matters on which we would like to have clear answers.

Another question of interest to us is this. Has the government prepared a final estimate? I mentioned that we were worried because we have had only a rough figure of $96 million. In view of the fact that some figures of the royal commission report for the construction of the dam have been used, we feel they will probably be closer to reality.

There are many other things we would like to know. For instance, is it the intention of the government to have this agreement approved by both houses of parliament and then perhaps next year present a bill to proceed with the work? Of course this would be quite good publicity for the government. One year we have a resolution and the next year we have a bill. I observe that the Prime Minister is shaking his head; apparently he is saying no. We would have hoped the government would have come forward with a bill in which would have been incorporated all the things I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks including the cost, the amount of money the federal government intends to spend to realize this project, and many other things.

There is another important question mentioned in the report of the royal commission of 1952. According to contractors, men who have had some experience in the building of large projects, it would be of advantage for the government to give one main contract. It may be that the government intends to give one main contract for the construction of both dams in order to fill the reservoir. On the other hand, perhaps the government intends to give separate contracts for each dam. Perhaps it intends to give separate contracts for building the construction sites and for building the necessary roads to proceed with the job. Those are the things we would like to know about, and when the Prime Minister closes the debate I trust he will answer these questions.

I do not wish to take too much of the time of the house. As I have already said, we were disappointed that a bill was not introduced. It is true that certain amounts of money are included in the estimates. There is a small amount in the main estimates and a substantial amount in the supplementary estimates; but those estimates came before the house on August 1, the day the agreement was tabled. I would not swear to it, but I believe it was not mentioned that the agreement had been tabled or, if it was mentioned, I would point out that it was tabled the same day the Minister of Agriculture completed his estimates. Therefore I will ask the Prime Minister to answer some of the questions I have raised.

May I repeat that we would have preferred to have a bill. While we are anxious to see this project proceeded with, and while we do not disapprove of the agreement contained in the document consisting of 17 pages, we do disapprove of the procedure adopted by the government in this regard. For this reason I move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan):

That all the words after "1958" in the resolution be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"but that this approval be not given until a measure preceded by the recommendation of the Governor General thereto has been introduced by the government providing for the authorization of the necessary expenditures for the whole project."

Mr. Speaker: While this amendment might be appropriate on a bill, I am not clear that it is in order on a resolution. I should like to refer the hon. member who has moved the amendment to the obstacles which I see to it, in case he has some citation or authority which would change the view which appears to me to be appropriate at this time. Citation 203 of Beauchesne's "Parliamentary Rules and Forms", fourth edition, deals with amendments. Paragraph (1) reads:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject matter with the original motion, they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto.

This amendment does not propose to deal with the motion before the house at all; it proposes to declare that some other course of action should be taken which I think is really declaratory of a principle. That sort of amendment is dealt with by Beauchesne in his third edition, in citation 346 at page 137, where he says:

Moreover, the amendment could not be a declaration of principles because the only motions on which such a declaration can be moved are motions for the address in reply to the speech from the throne, motions to go into committee of supply or ways and means and for the second reading of public bills.

On that basis it seems to me that the relevancy of the amendment must be that it relates to the subject matter of the resolution. This proposed amendment does not seek to modify the resolution; it seeks to dispose of it altogether on the basis that the government should have taken some other course. Before I rule the proposed amendment out of order I would like to hear hon. gentlemen on it.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would draw your attention to citation No. 202, subsection 13 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

An amendment to alter the main question, by substituting a proposition with the opposite conclusion, is not an expanded negative and may be moved.

Now, we admit at once that this does substitute an alternative to the course proposed by the government. The course proposed by the government is that it is expedient that the two houses of parliament approve this agreement. We are not proposing to amend that part of the motion. What we are questioning is that this house should approve the same at this time. What we are suggesting is an alternative line of procedure. I suggest to Your Honour with deference that the amendment is not declaratory of a principle but is procedural, and on the facts does seem to come completely within the ambit of the citation I have cited.

It also seems clear to me that it is relevant to the question in this sense, if I may say so with respect, that it does propose a course to be taken with respect to the first proposition, and therefore is relevant to the first proposition, but a course different from that which the government desires to have the house take.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, in addition to the citation you have mentioned, namely 203 in Beauchesne's fourth edition, there is the other one which I have not yet been able to lay my finger on but which will be familiar to you and to all hon. members, namely the citation dealing with the principle that an amendment which raises a new matter cannot be moved except after notice thereof has been given.

There are the two branches of the proposition: first, that an amendment must be relevant to the question if it is to be in order; or, if it is not relevant to the question but raises an entirely new matter, then it can only be introduced after notice has been given. There are on the records of the house many speakers' decisions ruling amendments of this nature out of order on a combination of those two grounds.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has admitted that this raises a different proposition, leading to an opposite conclusion which, of course, is exact proof of the point I make that this amendment raises new matter. They are asking not that we do one thing which the government has suggested in the resolution now before the house and of which proper notice has been given, but that we do an entirely different thing, raising a new course of action, and they have given no notice whatsoever of this amendment.

Therefore on those two grounds, first because it is not relevant to the motion under consideration and second because it raises a new matter and therefore can only be introduced after notice, I submit that the point of order is entirely apt and that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, would you hear me very briefly on the second point raised by the Minister of Justice? It does not seem to me that the amendment raises any new matter; it merely proposes to deal in a different way with the matter which has been raised by the government, and there is no new matter. There is a new proposition, I grant you, but no new matter in the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. members for their help in this matter. In effect the amendment asks that the resolution be not now dealt with but that some intermediate step be taken, and specifies what that step should be. To my mind it is not an amendment which proposes the opposite conclusion, as referred to in subsection 13 of citation 202 of Beauchesne's "Parliamentary Rules and Forms", fourth edition, to which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred. It is either an expanded negative in the sense that it disposes of the resolution entirely or it is a declaration of principle, and on either of those grounds I do not think I can accept the amendment as being in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this is an historic day not only for Canada but more particularly for the people of Saskatchewan. It demonstrates very clearly that when the people of a province are united, as the people of Saskatchewan have been for so many years in asking for the building of this dam on the South Saskatchewan river, no matter what the obstacles, no matter how many learned commissions may inquire into the proposition, their united faith and determination will win through against all obstacles.

To a very considerable degree the debate on this motion and its adoption are non-political matters. Over the years the Prime Minister has been consistent in his advocacy of a dam on the South Saskatchewan river. He has been consistent, and he has been a very persuasive advocate of this proposition.

I said it was a matter which commended the support of the people of Saskatchewan without regard to politics. I think that was true even under the former Liberal administration. For many years we had in this house Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner as minister of agriculture. I am sure no one doubts that Mr. Gardiner was fully in support of this proposition. When Jimmie spoke on the floor of the house one was not always able to ascertain that he personally was in favour of it, because he was a very excellent debater and apologist for the cabinet on any given proposition. Nonetheless his stand has been consistent, and I am sure that he, with all other residents of Saskatchewan, will rejoice that this step is being taken.

The premier of Saskatchewan, who signed the agreement on behalf of that province, has been a firm champion of the South Saskatchewan river project both as a member of parliament from 1935 to 1944 and subsequently as premier of the province and I think, together with the Prime Minister, his faith is amply demonstrated by the agreement that has been signed.

The hon. member for Villeneuve made a very interesting speech. While he comes from another province, he has shown that by applying himself to the subject he has been able to obtain an excellent grasp of its many details. I think it is rather important to note that the spokesman for the official opposition in this debate represents a constituency in the province of Quebec. This is further proof to me of something I have believed for a long time; that although the main benefits of a given project before parliament will accrue to a particular section of the country, members from all areas will forget their regional differences and support such a project as in the national interest even though its primary benefits will be felt by the people of another province.

I do not want to open old wounds, but I am further convinced in my attitude by the statement of the hon. member for Villeneuve that the former prime minister was not right when he said the project was not in the national interest, or that he had not been convinced that it was in the national interest. We see a member from the province of Quebec speaking for the official opposition who, while asking many questions and suggesting an alternative procedure, has left no doubt that the official opposition will support the project.

This year, 1958, is perhaps a good year to proceed with the dam, as it is a year of widespread drought in the province of Saskatchewan. The degree of drought was not nearly as bad as some of us feared some weeks ago; nevertheless Saskatchewan faces a short crop and in various areas there is a difficult feed problem. This summer the people of Saskatchewan and the South Saskatchewan river development association once again demonstrated their faith in the project at a meeting at Outlook which 700 persons attended for the purpose of lending their support to the proposition that a dam should be built on the South Saskatchewan river.

It has been said by the deputy minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, and again this is something with which everyone will agree, that the project will stabilize feed reserves within a radius of 150 miles from the site of the dam. If this is true, and I believe it is, it will mean the stabilization of the fodder supply for farmers year in and year out, no matter whether the crop is good or bad, over an area of 70,000 square miles or 45 million acres.

The dam will also provide certain power facilities and, as the Prime Minister has said, will result in the irrigation of a maximum of 500,000 acres. We in Saskatchewan expect that this will go a long way toward providing a substantial measure of industrialization in the years ahead.

While it may be impossible to prove from a cost accounting standpoint that all the money going into the development will be returned with interest, I believe time will show that it was a good, sound investment from the national point of view, and that together with the direct dividends the indirect dividends that will flow from the project will more than warrant the action parliament is taking today.

I think the project is being proceeded with at an auspicious time because of the slackness in the Canadian economy, although I do not want anyone to think we believe we should have waited until there was a degree of slackness in the economy before starting the dam. We are hoping that work will be started immediately, and that as construction is launched it will reduce unemployment in the nation very materially and provide for the taking up of part of the slack in our economy. It has been estimated that the project will take 18 million man hours and probably a work force of 1,800 men plus machinery to lay one million cubic yards of concrete and 50,000 tons of structural steel. These materials will go to build a dam 250 feet high and 8,000 feet long which will provide a main reservoir covering 8 million acres which will be 140 miles long, with a shore line of between 400 and 500 miles.

It has been estimated that the total cost of the project will be $180 million. I have said that this proposition is supported by all the people of Saskatchewan. I hope and expect that when the vote is taken on the resolution it will be passed unanimously. But I do not think that the public should assume that this is a hand-out or gift to the province of Saskatchewan, because it is a joint project toward which both Saskatchewan and the federal government will pay very large sums of money. Of the total estimated cost of $180 million it is estimated that the total federal government contribution will be $74 million. Therefore the people of Saskatchewan will be paying directly more than half the total cost of the project when completed.

It has been said that next year will mark the one hundredth anniversary of the time the project was first suggested. However, since 1935 it has been put forward as an idea that might be fulfilled within a short time and the Liberal government, through its minister of agriculture from Saskatchewan, did not hesitate on every occasion to set out the advantages that would flow from the project. We had always understood, in the early days of discussion, that the federal government was to bear responsibility for the project. As the years have gone on, more and more of the cost has been laid upon the province of Saskatchewan. In 1953 the present Prime Minister in speaking on this particular point had this to say, as recorded on page 1586 of Hansard for February 3, 1953:

> Then on May 31, 1951, for the first time to my knowledge, a suggestion was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that it would be necessary for the province of Saskatchewan to accept the responsibility of providing irrigation facilities. Until that time I had never heard, nor am I able to find any record anywhere, that there was any responsibility to fall upon the province of Saskatchewan.

Those were the words of the present Prime Minister speaking in this house at that time. It was clearly stated by the Liberal government that Saskatchewan would have to bear the cost of providing irrigation facilities. We had expected, in the light of order in council P.C. 2298 of June 19, 1947, that in addition to the dam the main irrigation canals would be maintained by the federal government. In this instance I think I am correct when I say that these main irrigation canals will be a responsibility which must be borne by the provincial government. In the order in council to which I have just referred it was made very clear that when the federal government built the dam, that is the main dam and the main canals, the federal government would operate those projects. In paragraph 4 of this order in council there are these words:

> In the construction of an irrigation project hereunder, Canada will undertake and assume responsibility for the construction of the main reservoirs and any connecting canals and will be responsible for the maintenance and operation of such works;—

This was laid down as an over-all condition for all main irrigation programs in Canada by the former Liberal administration. It is true that this did not apply to Saskatchewan. It was not applied to Saskatchewan because we were not given the opportunity of proceeding with the dam. Nevertheless that was the overriding condition, and it was to apply when such an agreement was signed. We find now, after a period of ten years and in the face of great opposition from Saskatchewan, that the main dam is to be turned over to the province for operation. Saskatchewan would have preferred that the operation of this dam be assumed by the federal government in perpetuity. This is another responsibility that the Saskatchewan government has been asked to assume.

Then Saskatchewan has been asked to pay not only for the installation of power facilities at the dam site, but also a portion of the cost of construction of the dam itself. The main dam, it is estimated, will cost $96 million and Saskatchewan has to pay 25 per cent of this amount or $24 million, with a ceiling of $25 million because a ceiling has been written into the agreement. This is another cost that Saskatchewan must pay. When the negotiations for this agreement were taking place Saskatchewan asked for a $20 million loan to provide power facilities. This loan was not granted, although agreement was given to a loan for half the 25 per cent of the cost of the dam for power purposes.

Then, of course, there was the whole question of damage to property of third persons if the dam should go out, either as the result of faulty construction or because of flash floods or some other act of God. The government has gone some distance in agreeing that it would assume this responsibility under certain conditions, but a substantial part of this responsibility may be left with the province.

These are some of the steps that have been taken as the negotiations have been conducted, and which have led to greater and greater burdens being accepted by Saskatchewan. If Saskatchewan had turned them down there would be no dam.

I do not believe this is the final agreement. I do not believe this agreement will stand forever in this final form, or will even stand in this form during the life of the members of this house. I feel that Saskatchewan has a case for asking, in the years ahead, for the federal government to assume a larger share of these costs. I have no doubt that Saskatchewan, no matter what the composition of the legislature, will unanimously request the federal government from time to time to be more generous in its sharing of the costs than is set forth in this agreement, just as the legislature gave unanimous approval to this agreement.

This will be a very heavy burden upon the treasury of Saskatchewan. It is estimated that the share of the Saskatchewan people, apart from their share of the federal proportion as citizens of this country, will total $110 million. This is a severe burden on any province and it will be a large burden on a province like Saskatchewan, even though Saskatchewan revenues continue, as they have in recent years, to expand and improve. In addition to the heavy burden that comes from the provision of this sum of money itself, the burden will further be increased—and no one can deny this—by the financial policies that have been proceeded with by this government during this session. The reconversion loan will make moneys for provincial projects more expensive, and will add to the cost to be born by the Saskatchewan treasury.

In my remarks I have said this is a project that appeals to the citizens in Saskatchewan of all political parties. I give it my full and wholehearted approval. The people of Saskatchewan will rejoice as they see this project proceeded with in the years ahead. There may be instances when we feel, so far as the power loan is concerned or other aspects, that we have a greater claim on the federal treasury, especially in the light of what is being done in other parts of Canada, than the government is prepared to accept at a given time. However, we are good Canadians and we shall support similar projects in other regions when they have a similar value for the residents of those regions. We do hope and we are confident that in the days ahead the terms for the province of Saskatchewan will be improved and that this very important joint project will prove to be one of the best undertakings the Saskatchewan government and the federal government have ever undertaken.

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): As the member for Rosetown-Biggar, where the South Saskatchewan dam will be located, I should like to tell hon. members about some of the ways in which we will benefit from this great project. First I would like to say that this is not a new project; it has been spoken of for years. In fact the first time the South Saskatchewan river dam was mentioned, according to a little story, was during the period of drought before Saskatchewan became a province and when it was part of the Northwest Territories. During this period of drought all the buffalo and antelope had left for greener pastures in the north, and the Indians on the plains were starving. One day, away on the horizon, a band of Indians saw a herd of buffalo and the chief called together his braves and picked from them his best hunters. He put them on the fastest horses and sent them out to bring in some meat to his starving tribe. After riding for many miles they came to the Saskatchewan river and there, on the other side, they saw the herd of buffalo peacefully grazing on the banks. One of the braves looked across the river and said, "Damn that river." That was the first mention of the South Saskatchewan river dam.

To be more serious, it was in the 1850's that a party of men headed by a Mr. Palliser was sent into the Northwest Territories to see what the value of that country would be west of the rockbound shores of lake Superior. The party spent about six years there and eventually brought back a report to the effect that it was a short grass, treeless country, the land being very fertile, but owing to the long period of drought it would never be fit for agriculture. Mention was made of this great river running across the plains which could be dammed up and the water used for irrigation purposes. Nothing was done, however, until the great drought of the thirties, when the people realized that something had to be done to improve conditions on the prairies and they began to study the feasibility of a South Saskatchewan river dam. After years of study, negotiation and no action, I now have the privilege of supporting a government which proposes to build that dam, so it will become an immediate reality.

I wish now to say a few words on the dam itself. The dam will be of earth construction, 205 feet high, 16,700 feet long and the water behind the dam will be 180 feet deep. This will create a lake 135 miles long with a shore line of 475 miles. One can realize from those figures just what the benefits will be. First, there will be recreational facilities including camping, boating, fishing and summer resorts within a two-hour drive of over half the population of Saskatchewan. The Qu'Appelle valley starts on the Saskatchewan river at a point near Elbow, and the waters from the Saskatchewan river dam will flow down that valley to a depth of 80 feet. An auxiliary dam will be built in the Qu'Appelle valley to allow a gradual flow of water down the river, which will keep five beautiful lakes at their original levels. There are many summer homes and camping grounds built around these lakes, and in the 1930's the people looked out from their summer homes on to dry, dusty lake bottoms, so this is but a by-product of the main benefits which will be received when the South Saskatchewan river dam is built.

The next point with which I would like to deal is the domestic water supply. The thriving cities of Moose Jaw and Regina have spent millions of dollars on their water supply, and in late years they have tapped Buffalo lake in the Qu'Appelle valley. Yet they have only a two months' water supply during the dry period. In the 1930's there was a penalty imposed for using municipal water for washing your car or watering your garden and many of the beauty spots dried up, just as did the farmers' crops. Small towns and villages in Saskatchewan are presently passing bylaws for water works, sewage and sanitation, but the real problem is the water supply from the South Saskatchewan river. These reservoirs I have mentioned can be tapped so these small towns and villages can get an adequate water supply.

I shall be brief with respect to power. The dam will produce 210,000 horsepower or an average annual output of 475 million kilowatt hours. At the present time Saskatchewan power is generated through steam turbines. The hydro power to be produced by the South Saskatchewan river dam will give us an abundance of cheap power to aid in the development of the natural resources of the province.

I come now to the main purpose, that of irrigation. The present proposal is to irrigate 500,000 acres, which I feel will take 500,000 acres out of our one crop economy, wheat, and put agriculture in Saskatchewan on a more stable economic basis. I particularly have in mind the cattle industry. At one time we had a cattle industry, but during the drought period of the thirties our herds were cut down, the climax coming in 1937 when the government and the municipalities could only supply enough feed for one cow per farm for milking purposes. If you kept more than one cow you had to provide the feed. Then in 1937 the government bought up all the surplus stock at 1½ cents and 2 cents per pound. After that experience the farmers were very reluctant to build up herds, but more recently the younger farmers have built up cattle herds of better quality and Saskatchewan now has more cattle than ever before. There is, however, always the danger of another drought period as a result of which the farmers would have to sacrifice their cattle as they did in the thirties.

Summer pasture is always a problem when it takes five acres of our native pasture to feed one cow. On the other hand, on irrigated pasture seven cows can be supported by one acre of land. This is typical of the benefits to be derived from the irrigation of 500,000 acres of the dry area of Saskatchewan.

Statistics show that the development of the area under P.F.A.A. meant the paying out of assistance totalling $10,200,000 during the period 1939 to 1950. Would it not have been better to have paid out this money for the construction of the dam? Further statistics show that the population in this area dropped from 32,000 in 1926 to 18,000 in 1951 because the small farms were being taken over by the larger ones, for only the larger ones could carry on under the dry conditions. We all know that we have to have population in order to prosper, and that we cannot attract people under existing conditions.

[Mr. Cooper.]

The hon. member for Medicine Hat stated in the house that we expect a land flowing with milk and honey, and that all our problems will be over when the South Saskatchewan river dam is finished. This is not correct, but we do expect a green oasis in Saskatchewan's dry belt, and we will benefit by the experience of our Alberta friends who have had the advantage of irrigation for some time. This is a long term project, but Saskatchewan farmers are quick to seize any opportunity to get away from a one crop economy dependent on wheat.

To sum up the benefits to be provided, they are the irrigation of 500,000 acres, cheap electric power development, improved domestic water supplies, recreation and tourist attractions.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to take exception not to the subject matter of this resolution but to the form in which this question is presented to parliament. It does seem to me that what we are witnessing today is either a completely meaningless gesture or a new and improved and streamlined form of closure. I do not much care which interpretation is put on it; in any case it does not seem to me an appropriate way in which to bring a matter of this kind before parliament. It is perfectly obvious, of course, that when this resolution is adopted—as I have no doubt it will be, considering the distribution of parties in this parliament—it will have no legal effect whatsoever.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are you going to oppose it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman seems to me to be speaking on a point of order as to whether or not this matter is properly before the house in its present form. If I am right, I must tell him he is out of order. The time to have taken such an objection was when the question was proposed at the beginning of the debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not suggesting to Your Honour or to the house that there is anything improper according to the rules. All I am suggesting is that this is an inappropriate way for the government to treat the house, and I am sure Your Honour would not contest the right of a member of the opposition to argue that point. I maintain that in a matter of this importance dealing with a project which at the very lowest calculation is going to involve an expenditure of over $100 million, this is a most unusual procedure. I hesitate to say it is unique, but I suspect it is a unique way of dealing with a project of this character.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he does not realize there will be a vote each year in respect of the expenditure for that year, and that his statement is incorrect?

Mr. Pickersgill: I realize that perfectly well, and it is precisely the point I am coming to. That is precisely why, if I may refer to it, my hon. friend from Villeneuve made the motion he did, the motion which Your Honour ruled out of order and with regard to which we, of course, accept your judgment. We feel this is a most improper way in which to deal with a proposal of this character, involving as it does piecemeal financing in bits and pieces without knowing in advance where this undertaking is going to lead. I recognize that I am coming close to transgressing the rules when I say this, but we have heard in another place criticism by hon. members opposite of what is alleged to have been bits and pieces financing of a project which, compared with this one, is very small indeed; and it seems to me that if parliament is to make a real judgment on this matter it should consider the whole proposal as a legislative project in a fashion which would enable all hon. members to examine every aspect of the proposition.

I said, and of course we all know, that when this resolution is passed it will commit the government to absolutely nothing. All it does is commit the two houses to express the view that they approve this undertaking. But a resolution of the two houses, as again we all know, has no legal effect whatsoever; it is merely a pious expression of approval.

What we fear is that the government is going to use this expression of approval of the two houses as a blank cheque, as the hon. member for Villeneuve very correctly put it, and that they are going to bring in an estimate in respect of the amount of work which they feel can reasonably be done each year without this house at any time being given an opportunity to consider, with all the details before it, what should be the proper judgment of parliament with regard to a matter of this magnitude.

I am sure there is no one in the house—at least, I know of no hon. member of the house—who has any question in his mind but that this project in itself is a good thing; that it will be a very desirable thing to develop this hydro-electric power; that it will be a very desirable thing to have this great lake in south Saskatchewan; that it will be a very desirable thing to have this water available for irrigation. No one doubts that. But this country is filled with desirable projects which all of us, or some of us at any rate, would like to see developed.

It is, of course, the responsibility of parliament in appropriating money to make choices, because under our present system—and I hope it will long continue to be our system—the supply of money is not unlimited. It is our responsibility in appropriating money to make choices between desirable things and it is not possible, I submit, to make an intelligent choice on the basis of a resolution of this character.

What we should have before us, it seems to me, is a resolution with a message from the crown and a bill setting out the whole scheme, a bill which could be considered in committee and through all the stages that are provided with regard to money bills of that character. We will not be in committee on this resolution. Once a vote is taken on it the matter is disposed of as far as this house is concerned. We have no way of scrutinizing the agreement and no way of asking questions of the government with regard to the details of the agreement; no way of knowing, beyond what is in the text itself, how it is proposed to proceed to implement this agreement.

And when I said that it seemed to me this resolution was either a meaningless affair, a pious expression of good intention, or it was a new, improved and streamlined form of closure, I meant exactly what I said. I admit that the government and the Prime Minister are very clever at this kind of thing. I yield to no one in my admiration for the Prime Minister in this field, because he presents us with a dilemma. He says, "Either you vote against this resolution, in which case we will go all over the country saying you are against the South Saskatchewan dam, or you vote for it, and from then on every time you say a word in criticism we will get up and say you approved it".

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? I appreciate the personal reference, but the rules would not allow me to pursue it. As a member of the government which had before it the report of the royal commission and which studied this matter most carefully for a long while, what is the hon. gentleman's opinion as to whether or not this should be proceeded with?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister, like myself, has taken the privy councillor's oath. He took it much more recently than I did, and I imagine the words are still quite familiar to him. While I appreciate very much his intervention, I am discussing what the present government is doing, not engaging in historical reminiscence, and I have no intention of being diverted into that field by the Prime Minister.

I wonder if I might call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for the luncheon recess I had repeated a statement I made at the outset of my observations, and perhaps for the sake of continuity I should repeat it again, namely that this motion can be looked upon in one of two ways, either as a pious expression having no legal effect or as a new, improved, streamlined form of closure. I do not want to indulge in the kind of exaggeration about these matters which I thought was indulged in on this side of the house in the parliament before last, and I intend to try to keep what I have to say completely within reasoned and measured terms. I think all of us who were here recollect what happened in the parliament before last in the session of 1956.

To illustrate what I mean by the objectionable character, from the point of view of proper consideration by the house, of this project and the motion before us, I intend to indicate what conceivably could have happened in that session of parliament if a similar motion had been made. It will be recalled that what we were considering in the session of 1956 was a bill based on a resolution, a bill to implement an agreement made with the Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company and another agreement made with the government of Ontario. The only difference in principle between that situation and this is that there were two agreements instead of one. There was an agreement with this company and also an agreement with the provincial government.

If I apprehended correctly what the Prime Minister suggested when he interrupted me at one point, it seems to me it is the intention of the government once this motion has been accepted to proceed merely by annual estimates. This would have been on all fours with what might have been done in that case. In other words the government of that day in 1956 might have introduced a motion such as this to say it was expedient for the two houses to approve the agreement with the Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company and the agreement with the government of Ontario, and that this house do approve the same. That would have permitted debate on a motion that it is not too easy to amend, so that each hon. member except the mover could speak only once and there could be no opportunity to probe the agreements, to consider the details and to have the questions and answers at all the stages that are necessary in money bills concerning large projects of this character. Then all that would have been required would be the appropriate items in the estimates—I assume there would be more than one item because of there being two agreements instead of one—in order to carry out this project.

I leave to the imagination of hon. members what would have been said if that had been done. I could have brought Hansard for the 1956 session into the house today to illustrate the kind of things that would have been said about this method of procedure if it had been adopted by the previous government, what would have been said about this invasion of the rights of parliament, this attempt to bypass the traditional method of appropriating money and the traditional method of carrying on the business of parliament. But I have neither the eloquence, nor at this stage of the session do I think the house has the patience to listen to those arguments at length—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: —so I do not intend to attempt to make them at length. All I want to do is say that it seems to me the procedure we are following denies to the opposition and indeed to private members who support the government who may want to probe into this matter a real opportunity to give it the kind of consideration it ought to have.

Mr. Pallett: You have had ample occasion and opportunity.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have the agreement, but it is not a contract with anybody to do the work. It is merely an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pallett: That is more than we got on the pipe line.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is merely an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan and nothing more. I admit that my argument would collapse in part at once if the Prime Minister were to get up at any stage and give us an assurance that before this project proceeded beyond the survey stage—which it is easy to understand should be done by items in the estimates, and quite properly—before the point had been reached at which it could not really be stopped, we would have a measure brought in with a message from the crown, as was done in the case of the pipe line and the St. Lawrence seaway and, as far as I can recollect, as has always been done with great national projects of this kind. Then what we would be doing today would be merely giving a kind of approval in principle to this agreement, and that would certainly be a great deal less objectionable; though it would still be objectionable, I submit, because no matter what attitude we may take in the matter it is going to create a false impression on the part of the public. It cannot help but do that.

We on this side of the house, having had the agreement only since August 25, cannot pretend to have scrutinized it with the care it should have had.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was it not August 1?

Mr. Pallett: Surely it was long before August 25. Was it not July 25?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, in any event, with the hours we have been sitting in this house and the kind of session we have had, whatever the date and without the capacity—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is right, without the capacity.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was using the word "capacity" in the sense in which it is used in the other official language of this country, that is to say without the opportunity of questioning the minister who would be responsible—

Mr. McIlraith: But the government does not want to provide an opportunity for questioning. This is a new form of closure.

Mr. Pallett: Nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member for Ottawa West said it better than I can, is that through the government following this procedure of bypassing the ordinary methods used in parliament, we will not have an opportunity to give this measure the kind of consideration parliament ought to give to so important a national project.

Mr. Drysdale: Why not let the hon. member for Ottawa West speak, then?

Mr. Pickersgill: When we vote and however we vote on it, that vote is bound to be construed either as a vote against the project or as a vote in favour of the agreement.

Mr. Drysdale: Then don't vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is, of course, a possibility that is open to us. That is a course that has been taken by certain hon. members in this house in times past, but it is one which I must say is rather repugnant to me.

Mr. Pallett: Oh, come, now; you walked out of one the other night.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a course which I do not think is desirable. What I do say is that this is not the right way to embark upon a great national project of this sort. It does seem to me that since we shall have to make a choice in the circumstances in which we have been placed by the government—and I repeat that I have a great deal of admiration for the skill of the Prime Minister in devising these dilemmas—I do not know whether those slick procedures are precisely the kind of respect for the rights of parliament that the public were led to expect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. Will he tell the house what the government of which he was a member did in respect of the St. Mary's dam, on which up to the present time has been expended some $40 million? What was the course followed?

Mr. Pickersgill: With respect to the St. Mary's dam, as I understand it, an item was put in the estimates—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and it was, of course, a project of a magnitude not in any way comparable with this one. Not only was it not comparable in any way with this one, but I suspect—and I am glad the Prime Minister has reminded me of it, because it does add great force to the argument I am making —that it is precisely because the government has very little confidence in its estimates of cost that it does not bring in a proper measure, with a proper estimate of the whole cost of this project. Everybody knows, of course, that the St. Mary's dam was started at a time when we were—I cannot remember the exact date; I cannot remember whether it was while we had price controls or just after they were lifted, but it was immediately after the war, at a time when the price level was very much lower than it is, unhappily, at the present time. Any estimates of cost at that time, of course, have been greatly exceeded in this project, and I suspect that exactly the same will be true in the case of the South Saskatchewan project.

That seems to me, sir, precisely the best argument for taking the proper course in this matter and giving the house a proper opportunity, under the rules for dealing with money bills, to envisage this whole project because, as I said at the beginning and I repeat, this project is going to cost a great deal of money. Because of its size it is not the kind of project that ought to be carried out merely by annual items in the estimates. Members of parliament should have the opportunity to exercise their judgment about the project as a whole, with all the facts in front of them, and have full opportunity to question the responsible ministers with regard to it. That is the basis of our objection to this method of procedure.

It seems to me, sir, that in the circumstances in which we find ourselves, we are asked to use a procedure which, so far as I can recollect, has been used in the past for approval of agreements with foreign countries where no expenditures were involved, though no doubt the Prime Minister will have precedents of a different character. Not having had the time or perhaps the assistance to do research that he has had, some of those precedents may conceivably have some superficial resemblance to what we are embarking upon today; but I should be immensely surprised, sir, if at any time the two houses of parliament have been asked to embark upon a great project of this kind, involving a very large expenditure of money, by the use of this particular device.

I do know that there have been instances in the past when there have been agreements with foreign countries where expenditures of moneys were involved and in those instances, as was the case with the treaty of Versailles itself, legislation was introduced. The treaty was not approved by this particular method. Indeed, my recollection is that this method has generally been used for agreements that did not involve expenditure at all, though I do recall one occasion when a motion of this kind was made to approve a trade agreement. I believe that was not proceeded with, and if my recollection serves me right it was not proceeded with precisely because it was represented that it would be a bypassing of the full rights of parliament to discuss the matter in every possible respect. I think that was in 1947 or 1948, about 10 years ago. Again I have not the precise reference at hand.

As I said, we are faced with a real dilemma here. The Leader of the Opposition indicated —and I think it was one of the first statements he made after he became the leader of our party—that he favoured in principle proceeding with this great national project. As the leader of our party he has indicated the support of our party in principle for the project. As I say we are faced with the choice of voting against this motion and thereby having it represented that we are against the project, or voting for it and being told subsequently, "Well, you approved of that agreement; you have no right to criticize it."

It seems to me that as between those two not very attractive choices we can choose only the second. The only course we can take is reluctantly, because of the method being used, to support this motion. But in saying that I speak for myself, and I am sure I speak for most of the other members of my party, though I have not consulted all of them, when I say that we do not feel that in voting for this resolution we are expressing any approval whatsoever of the details of the agreement. I do not feel that we should be asked to approve the details of the agreement without going through the proper parliamentary processes; and we reserve the right, when this matter comes before parliament for the appropriation of money in whatever form it may take, to criticize anything in the agreement that in the light of the practical experience of executing it seems to be deserving of criticism.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have pretty well boxed the compass, have you not?

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, as one representing a constituency, namely the constituency of Macleod, which has within its bounds the headwaters of the South Saskatchewan river watershed, the headwaters which will supply the South Saskatchewan dam, I think I might be permitted to say a word or two on behalf of those who are living in that area and also in the various other areas which are served by the South Saskatchewan watershed system.

I think we should all take a look at the riparian rights of the different industries and different sections of the country which are fed by that water system. I am greatly in favour of the South Saskatchewan development. But we must regard it as only one development, on the South Saskatchewan watershed. To the west of it lies the city of Lethbridge. I should like to bring to the attention of the house and of the government the serious problem which exists at the city of Lethbridge with respect to water supply for industrialization. I refer particularly to the month of February. The Oldman river which is a tributary of the South Saskatchewan and joins the river at Lethbridge is almost dry in February. Industrial development of that area is contingent upon the continuity of the flow of water and so the development of dams and other structures in the headwaters of the Oldman river is long overdue. This is related to the waters of the South Saskatchewan dam. In other words—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have not read the agreement, but I doubt if there is anything in it with relation to the damming of the Oldman river.

Mr. Kindt: When I talk about the waters of the South Saskatchewan watershed it is just like talking about the relationships of so many balls in a bowl. When you move one ball all the other balls shift to a new position. If you use water out of the river at Lethbridge you are affecting the continuity of flow of water which will run the turbines and provide irrigation at the South Saskatchewan dam. Therefore when I am talking about the watershed and the South Saskatchewan dam I am, I hope, talking on the subject.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot accept that proposition from the hon. member for Macleod, and I hope he will confine himself to the motion under consideration.

Mr. Kindt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall try to do so. Having covered that point, may I say that so far as the South Saskatchewan river dam is concerned, I have heard many arguments that the production which may flow from the farms will disturb the prices of agricultural products. We all know that in the establishment of an irrigation system there is a time lag of six to eight years before the system is brought into operation. There is also a period of some 25 years before the complete shift in production from dry to irrigated farming takes place. In other words the growth of population, the time lag in development and so on will make the situation such that the incidence of production with regard to the agricultural price structure will not be felt to any extent whatsoever. Therefore from an economic point of view I think that problem can be dismissed.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the government for undertaking this project, which is the first step in the development of the South Saskatchewan watershed system.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as a member representing a British Columbia constituency concerned for many years, about the development of its hydro resources, I rise to express my support for the principle of the resolution. However, like some members of the official opposition, we would have preferred the government to bring the matter before the house in the form of legislation which we could discuss in principle, followed by a discussion of the various clauses of the bill. We would have had the opportunity to ask the Prime Minister questions, which we all enjoy doing, and to deal with the various details of this very interesting and worth-while project.

Regardless of the part of Canada from which we come, I am sure we all recognize that the government's decision in this respect is of benefit to the whole of Canada and of particular benefit to the province of Saskatchewan. There is no question but that it will provide greater stability of income, more security and improved standards of living for the people residing in the area that will be served by the dam.

Personally I am very pleased to see such measures introduced, because they provide for the conservation and development of our natural resources. The government has assisted the maritimes with respect to hydro development. Millions have been spent in the development of hydro resources on the St. Lawrence seaway; and while the hydro development was undertaken by the province of Ontario it was the federal government expenditure that made it possible. Now we have this very fortunate development in Saskatchewan. I hope these developments are segments of a national policy that will mean that the government intends to bring a measure before the house in the very near future providing for the development of hydro resources on the Columbia.

I am trying to keep in order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the conversion of the premier of British Columbia to the principle of protecting Canadian rights on the Columbia, and as a result to the development of the water resources of the Columbia under public ownership in co-operation with the federal government, we all hope that agreement in principle with respect to downstream benefits will soon be arrived at between the governments of Canada and the United States and that we shall see the implementation of the policy of development of hydro resources continued by the commencement of the development of the resources of the Columbia.

If I were to go further, Mr. Speaker, I think I might be out of order. In any event, we are all very pleased to see that this development is being proceeded with, because of the value it will be to the province of Saskatchewan. Once again I say we hope it represents a policy that will be pursued and which will be continued in British Columbia.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, so much has been said over the last number of years with regard to the South Saskatchewan dam that there is very little new that is left to say. But as the elected representative of the constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre I feel I must express to the government the thanks and appreciation of my constituents for the decision to start construction of this great project. I am happy to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, whose constituency adjoins Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

It was an occasion for celebration when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture signed the agreement respecting the dam in the presence of the other 15 Progressive Conservative members from the province of Saskatchewan, including the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. To mark the occasion the Saskatchewan members had a picture taken as an historic record of having been part of a government that keeps its promises.

The agreement was signed on July 25. I mention that date to emphasize the speed with which one more promise of the government has been carried out. It was carried out as promptly as possible in spite of provincial politics attempted to be played during the negotiations about the sharing of costs. I am sure that all Canada will commend the government for its quick action to honour a pledge made to the electors. The dam has been too long delayed. In answer to a question I asked on July 2 the Prime Minister stated, as recorded on page 1829 of Hansard:

> —climatic conditions in Saskatchewan this year indicate how necessary it was that this dam and irrigation project should have been proceeded with at least six or seven years ago.

This is a statement with which we in Saskatchewan will agree most heartily, especially the livestock farmers who are short of feed this year because of the dry weather during the summer. In his statement on July 2 the Prime Minister also outlined the financial terms of the agreement with the province of Saskatchewan. I do not agree with the charges of the Saskatchewan premier, or the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia this morning that the province has been discriminated against as far as the sharing of costs is concerned. I think the terms of the agreement are very generous. They were fully explained by the Prime Minister on page 1829 of Hansard, and were outlined by him again this morning.

I shall not attempt to review those terms here, but I repeat that I think they are most generous and most helpful in regard to the construction of the dam. This dam will assure the cities of Moose Jaw and Regina of an adequate supply of water in Buffalo Pound lake for their future domestic and industrial needs. Letters I have received, and I know the Prime Minister has also received similar letters, indicate that Moose Jaw greatly appreciates this help in solving its long-time water problem. I am sure Regina appreciates this help also.

Some constituents of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre will benefit directly from the irrigation canals, and all the province will benefit indirectly from the agricultural and industrial advancement resulting from the dam. For these reasons in particular, and because of the many other benefits that will result in a wider field, I speak for all in Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and commend the government for making this long-time hope in Saskatchewan a reality.

Today we heard in this house what I consider to be indirect Liberal opposition to the construction of this dam. We were hoping, we were almost certain, that the Prime Minister's motion would have received quick and unanimous approval. I still hope that this unanimous approval will be given here today, now that the Liberal delaying amendment has been ruled out of order.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I rise to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, because of the remarks that have just been made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. He said that what we are now witnessing in this house is indirect opposition to this project on the part of the official opposition. What he had expected to see, and what he had hoped to see, was quick and unanimous approval of this resolution. He had hoped to see quick and unanimous approval of this kind of resolution, unprecedented in our parliamentary history, this kind of resolution which would commit us to approval of an agreement for the expenditure of many millions of dollars.

The hon. member who just spoke said that what he had hoped to see was quick and unanimous agreement, without discussion presumably; because debate on this resolution was commenced today about 12 o'clock, so we have been talking about it for a couple of hours. However, even that is too long for the hon. member who just resumed his seat for us to be dealing with a resolution of this importance which entails the expenditure of many millions of dollars and deals with a project of national significance. If we cannot spend a few hours on a resolution of this kind without being accused of obstruction, then the Prime Minister's talk about parliamentary rights and other rights about which we are going to hear a lot during the rest of this week, does not mean very much.

Then the Prime Minister, in an interjection which may or may not be in Hansard—he will pardon me for mentioning it, but it was quite clear across here—said that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, when he sat down after speaking on behalf of our party, had very successfully boxed the compass.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not say "successfully".

Mr. Pearson: Well, that he had boxed the compass; I withdraw the word "successfully". The Prime Minister's intervention at that time seems to me to be quite eloquent evidence of what the Prime Minister may have had in mind in submitting this resolution in this unprecedented form. What the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did when he spoke for our party, made it quite clear that we were not going to fall into the trap which had been set by the introduction of this resolution in this form. As he pointed out very clearly, and perhaps it could be repeated, if we carry our objections—and they are sincere objections—to the form of this resolution to the point where we vote against it, now that our amendment has been ruled out of order, then it will be stated by hon. members opposite—indeed it has already been indicated by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre—that we are opposed to the project itself. If we vote for the resolution we vote for a resolution in a form which we think does deny the right of parliament to discuss it in the approved form which has been followed in the past in matters of this kind.

The St. Lawrence seaway development, the trans-Canada pipe-line development and other projects of national importance involving the expenditure of many millions of dollars were proceeded with by means of a resolution preparatory to the introduction of a bill. There was discussion of the resolution and the bill. It was possible to examine the agreement, if there was a financial agreement, as a basis for the legislation, also it was possible to examine the minister in detail to find out what was in the agreement and why. We have no opportunity to do that on this particular resolution, which is in the form usually followed in connection with agreements between Canada and foreign states. It is in the form of a resolution which asks us merely to approve an agreement; and if we do approve it, and in so far as we are concerned we are going to vote for this resolution—

An hon. Member: Are you?

Mr. Pearson: We are going to vote for it for the reasons I have indicated, because if we vote against it we will be accused of being opposed to the project, and that is exactly the position in which the Prime Minister wished to place us by the introduction of the resolution in this form.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the hon. gentleman does not want to ascribe motives. I do not mind the conclusion, but when he says the Prime Minister wished to place him in that position, he knows that that is not right.

Mr. Pearson: I will not ascribe any motive to the Prime Minister; I will withdraw that. I shall describe what will happen as a party. We have already described ourselves as in favour of this project. This was done first of all on February 28 by me, speaking for the party, in Saskatoon, and it has been stated since in the house. We approve of this project as one of national importance. Yet, Mr. Speaker, approving the project as we do, recognizing and appreciating its importance, and with some realization of the expenditure of money involved, we take strong exception to the procedure that is being followed in this resolution, whatever the motives may have been which inspired the government to proceed in this way. We are being asked in this resolution to approve of an agreement, not to approve of a bill which could be discussed in committee and at all its stages. We are not being given an opportunity to question the government in respect of this agreement.

When the Prime Minister rises to close this debate, that will be the last chance we will have to deal with this agreement, certainly in this parliament. If in the future we wish to discuss this matter and the way it is working out, if we take exception to this agreement, if we find some clauses are not as we hoped they would be and that the agreement should be changed, we can and no doubt will be told by the government, "You supported this agreement in the house on Labour day, 1958; what are you complaining about now?"

This is another reason why we object to this kind of procedure. Surely we have the right, now that we the opportunity, to object to this way of proceeding on constitutional grounds. We do not intend in the future to be told that because we have put forward these constitutional objections we are hesitant about the value of this project, or that we attempted to oppose it indirectly, as has already been suggested.

The hon. member for Assiniboia this morning mentioned the position of our party in regard to this matter, and said that he regretted the stand taken by the prime minister of previous years, namely Mr. St. Laurent. I would like to put on record Mr. St. Laurent's last statement on the South Saskatchewan river dam, which was made in answer to a question asked on April 12, 1957, I believe addressed to him by my right hon. friend who is now Prime Minister, and which reads as follows:

> My position is that I have not yet been able to reach the conclusion that it is something which, constructed at this time, would return to the national economy more than it would require from the national economy in interest and amortization charges.

Mr. St. Laurent took this position after careful consideration, and he took it with honesty and with sincerity. Believing as he did in it and because that is the kind of man he was, he stated this position frankly to the House of Commons and did not take refuge in any weasel words that could perhaps have gained him some political support and by which he may have indicated that he was in favour of the project at some time in the future but that he would have to look into it and see whether it could be worked out later and all that kind of thing. He got up in the house and explained that having given it the consideration which he felt it should be given, he could not convince himself that at that time it would return to the national economy more than it would require from the national economy.

It is no secret that during those years when this matter was under consideration by the previous government the former minister of agriculture did support the project and did his very best to convince his colleagues that they should also support it. There will be no person in Canada who will more rejoice in the initiation and completion of the project than Mr. Gardiner himself. It is also no secret, because I have mentioned it on more than one occasion, that this party under its present leadership did take a different position in this matter from that taken by the party under its previous leadership. I myself and my colleagues came to the conclusion last February that this is something which should be proceeded with in the national interest. While perhaps on the strict ground of economic returns in the years 1958, 1959 or even 1960 it will not be justified in the light of the money that will have to be spent, there are, nevertheless, considerations other than economic returns. There are intangible and psychological benefits and, adding up all these things, we felt that this was a project which should be supported and so we do support it.

Having said that, I return to our difficulties over the procedure adopted in this matter because we are not being given an opportunity during this session to examine the government in detail in respect of the agreement on which this project is based. It is true that the agreement was tabled many weeks ago—I forget the exact date—by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Harkness: August 1.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the house does not remember, however, that when the agreement was tabled in this house, without prior notification—and I am not complaining about that—it was done on the last day of the minister's estimates, so we did not have an opportunity even in connection with the Department of Agriculture estimates to examine the minister in respect of this particular agreement at this particular session. If it had been tabled a week before we would have had that opportunity; if the estimates had been held over for a week we would have had that opportunity. But in fact we have not had that opportunity, and are now being asked to support this kind of resolution in order to give a blank cheque to the government in respect of the carrying out of an agreement upon which we have not had a chance to examine the government in detail. Surely that gives us the right to complain about the procedure adopted in this very important matter—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —a procedure which not only violates precedents but also violates parliamentary traditions and parliamentary rights. Therefore, while we support this resolution because we have no alternative but to support it, since we are in favour of this project, we nevertheless reserve our right to bring up this constitutional question again. We also reserve our position in regard to criticisms which we may advance in the future with respect to the detailed working out of this agreement. We have not been given that chance now, but we will certainly take advantage of any opportunity in the future.

I know what the Prime Minister is going to say when he gets up. He is going to say, "You will have ample opportunity to discuss this matter on the estimates next year or the year after that. There will be ample opportunity for the opposition to discuss this agreement; there will be ample opportunity to discuss all these things on the estimates." If that is the case, then what was the purpose of bringing forward this resolution in this form at the present time? What purpose does it serve; what constitutional purpose or what discussion purpose does it serve, when we cannot examine the government in respect of the agreement on which the resolution is based? It is quite true that we may have an opportunity in the future of discussing the agreement on the estimates. If that is the case then perhaps the Prime Minister will explain why, in these closing days of the session, he has brought forward a resolution in this form which does, as I have said and as I now repeat, violate parliamentary traditions; which asks us to support an agreement involving the expenditure of many millions of dollars, and which is in a form as I believe, having regard to all the circumstances, unprecedented in our parliamentary history.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I know you will be relieved when I say I am going to deal with the South Saskatchewan river dam rather than with the constitutional issue which at this time has been dragged in. I shall leave discussion of that issue to others who may speak later.

I would like to place on record at this time some of the efforts made for many years and by many people on behalf of this great project. It was mentioned earlier in the debate today that some Indians on the bank of the South Saskatchewan river had first mentioned the idea, and that was a good story with which to start a speech; but I would like to place on record an official document submitted to the legislative council of Canada in 1859 by Henry Youle Hind, M. A., professor of chemistry and geology at Trinity College, University of Toronto, who was sent out in the year 1858 to explore the Assiniboine and Saskatchewan river systems on behalf of the government of Canada of the time. I promised myself many years ago that the work of this man of exactly 100 years ago should one day be remembered and now it is acted upon by this government.

I am going to read sections from paragraphs 16, 17 and 18. Firstly, in speaking of the South Saskatchewan river paragraph 16 reads as follows:

> A dam, 85 feet high, and 600 to 800 yards long (a few miles lower down the length of the dam would be much less) across the deep narrow valley in which the south branch flows, below where the Qu'Appelle valley joins it, would send its waters down the Qu'Appelle valley, thence down the Assiniboine past Fort Garry, and thus establish a splendid and probably uninterrupted navigation, for steamers of large size, for a distance exceeding 600 miles.

He was thinking 100 years ago of this dam as a means of communication across the whole prairies for 600 miles. Then in paragraph 18 he speaks of the possibility of flooding the towns along the Assiniboine, such as Portage la Prairie, Brandon and Winnipeg, and he speaks of the Assiniboine and the peculiarities of the valley as follows:

> Here the river glides in an excavated trench about 16 feet below the prairie, but in times of very high floods it sends water across the prairie, down the broad, shallow valley of Rat Rivulet, into lake Manitoba. Rat Rivulet rises in the Bad Woods, west of Prairie Portage, within two or three miles of the Assiniboine; and the ridge which divides it from the river is an imperceptible rise in the prairie which the eye can scarcely detect.
> A shallow cut through the gentle rise separating the Assiniboine from Rat Rivulet would permit all flood waters to flow into lake Manitoba, and protect the settlements on Red river from any danger of being flooded.

And now, 100 years later, a report is being handed to this government concerning lake Manitoba and lake Winnipeg recommending the same cut to save these cities from being flooded. At this time I think it is well to give credit to those who so long ago saw the possibilities of diverting and damming the waters of the Saskatchewan river system.

In more recent times one thinks of such men as John R. MacNicol, a member for one of the Toronto ridings—I believe it was Danforth—who made known to newspaper editors in eastern Canada the possibilities of water control and diversion on the South Saskatchewan. In one year, out of his own pocket, he spent $37,000 on the services of engineers and surveyors who examined this proposition, and it turned out that the figures he supplied agreed almost exactly with the conclusions reached after the expenditure of many millions of dollars under P.F.R.A. in examining the same proposition.

Then, turning to those here today, credit has been given very briefly to the work of the Prime Minister in speaking across Canada and particularly in the west on behalf of the dam. In addition, his speeches here in this house, his questions and his motions, probably did more than anything else to convince the people of western Canada that here was a man who was pledged to this project and who never quibbled or used weasel words about its economic future. For that reason many of us from the west joined forces behind the Prime Minister and recognized in him the person best able to lead those forces across Canada, a man who was thinking in terms of national development rather than in terms of stagnation and allowing things to drift. I think at this time that as one of the younger men in the west who rallied behind the Prime Minister and struggled for the achievement of this project I should like to pay a tribute to him on behalf of all those people who looked to him as their champion.

The house may not even be aware of it today, but when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made, I believe, his maiden speech, he was speaking with a record of service toward this project hardly equalled by anyone. He is at present vice president of the Saskatchewan river development association and over the long, difficult years he went about his part of Saskatchewan calling meetings of farmers, municipal boards, boards of trade and so on advocating the building of this dam. When I think of all the hours of driving and the hours of hard work which have been done by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I wish he was here at this time to hear what I am saying.

Along with others—the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Pascoe), the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Jones), the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More), the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) for example—many of us have helped in this work and there were others, too, of all political affiliations who did their best to let Canada know that this scheme was in the national interest.

I do not intend to deal at any great length with the benefits the dam will bring, because they have been discussed so many times over so many years by so many people. However, I should like to emphasize just one benefit which I do not think has been fully realized.

South Saskatchewan River Project

This dam is not just for the irrigation of farm lands; it is not just for the development of power. It will have many uses.

This new dam will give us in western Canada a chance to bring in industry. With the discovery of natural gas in the last five years we have now, for the first time, an opportunity to bring in the petrochemical industry which requires large amounts of water for cooling purposes. This is a benefit which is just as important as any other benefit which this scheme provides. Speaking solely on this question of industry, the matter of the surplus of power over the needs of pumping is something which has not been appreciated by many who have been great supporters of the project. I think they have failed to recognize the full significance of this development to the three prairie provinces, and I am taking the liberty of reading a quotation from the royal commission report at page 188 where reference is made to this aspect which has been almost forgotten. The report says:

> There are five potential power sites which would benefit from this regulation. Two 75-foot head sites exist between Saskatoon and the junction of the North and South Saskatchewan rivers, and two 120-foot and one 50-foot head plants on the Saskatchewan river below the Forks. They are:
> | | foot head |
> |---|---|
> | Batoche | 75 |
> | Coxby | 75 |
> | Fort a la Corne | 120 |
> | Nipawin | 120 |
> | Squaw | 50 |
> The Fort a la Corne site has been studied in detail by the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. With an installed capacity of 125,000 h.p. this plant would be capable of producing 598,400,000 kilowatt hours of energy annually. This regulation provided by the reservoir will increase the annual output by nearly 100,000,000 kilowatt hours.
> Studies have not been made of the other sites mentioned. However, the potential of these sites would be increased to a degree proportionate to that indicated for the Fort a la Corne site.

That should really be Squaw Creek.

In other words, one of the great benefits of the dam at Coteau creek is that it will not only produce 325 million kilowatts annually for the distribution system of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation in this locality, but that it will increase the potential of five downstream power dams. This is a point which has been forgotten, and I hope the province of Saskatchewan will visualize that it will be one of the great assets produced by this joint operation between the provincial and the federal governments.

I should like to make a passing reference to the benefits to the tourist trade. With this lake a new body of water some 135 miles will come into being. It will give us 475 miles of new shoreline. Sixty-nine per cent of the population of Saskatchewan will live within 150 miles of this large body of water, and it will be available to them for recreational use. I should like to remind the house that in the United States where they keep extensive records of visits to national parks, national forests and recreation areas, it has been found that every year more people visit reclamation projects similar to this than visit their national forests or their national parks. This will give to Saskatchewan, one of the dry areas of the world, its first opportunity to have a large lake area right in the heart of the settled portion of the province.

The next subject I should like to mention is one which has been discussed already at some length in this debate, the frank admission on the part of the hon. member for Villeneuve this morning that this dam is now in the national interest. This is a phenomena which those of us from Saskatchewan and the three prairie provinces generally will recognize as a revolution of outstanding importance.

The previous prime minister was praised on many occasions because he was intellectually honest. He was opposed to the dam and he said so. Immediately upon the election of a new leader of the Liberal party there was a change of opinion. In February we heard that the party was in favour. What was not in the national interest a few months before suddenly became in the national interest. I wondered as I listened today how the front benches of the official opposition were going to handle the situation. I wondered, after all the years of stonewalling and delay, what they were going to do and how they could explain their conversion to acceptance of this important scheme. When I heard the amendment moved by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) and seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) I thought, that is their approach; they will let the backbenchers carry the blame for the conversion and the front benchers will keep quiet. But the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) spoiled my analysis of the situation. He felt he had to enter the debate and when he came up with the ingenious proposition of a constitutional principle I saw how he could stand up and claim that he was still fighting a good rearguard action for those opposed to the dam.

I do not know who opposed the former minister of agriculture in the cabinet but since it has been mentioned here by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) that the former minister of agriculture was in favour of the dam I can only assume there must have been some one in the cabinet of the previous administration opposed to it. I could not help but contrast the attitude of the previous government with the attitude of the present administration. Here we have a government thinking and working only toward having this old political football brought to a happy conclusion. In spite of some provocation and obstruction this government has moved forward and signed an agreement. The agreement was tabled August 1 in this house. And then suddenly, as a smokescreen, we have had this type of diversion on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. As I look at this thing it leads me to believe this is either an effort to fight a delaying action on the bill—

Mr. Pearson: There is no bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where is the bill?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question. I would ask him where is the bill on this subject about which he now speaks?

Mr. Pearson: That is what we are asking for.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, we are not interested in small-time diversions. We are interested only in the diversion of this water for useful purposes.

I am just going to put it bluntly to those in the front benches of the official opposition. When you speak about a man who is not used to using weasel words, think of the other connotation we can put on that expression.

Since these national benefits are now accepted by the official opposition it is interesting to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that we are the only ones who have accepted this proposition on the basis of the report of the royal commission. I take it they have now repudiated the royal commission's report and its findings.

There has been some suggestion that the cost would be the same figure they show here. I assume they have repudiated the recommendations of this commission and therefore I can now go on and speak about the other argument that has been put forward in this house and in western Canada dealing with the question of the cost of this project to my province of Saskatchewan. I believe I can do it best by asking hon. members to make a simple comparison.

The federal government over the next eight years will have to put up $75 million cash plus some additional amount of say $11 million or $12 million by way of a loan, making a total of $87 million. On an annual basis this averages out to approximately $11 million per year. The provincial government during this same eight-year period will be putting up $12 million cash for the dam. It will be paying half of the $25 million which is its share in the form of a loan from us which it will have to pay back. The power will cost between $24 million and $35 million. I may tell the house there is no exact figure yet. The province's share of the penstocks will come to about $6 million but its share of the irrigation under a term the provincial government itself has asked for will be only approximately $8 million over the next eight years. And if you add up all these amounts including the full amount of the loan it comes to approximately $73 million or so. Over an eight-year period it will be an average of approximately $9 million. That is what the provincial government of Saskatchewan will be asked to put up each year. It will pay $9 million as opposed to the $11 million paid by the federal government.

Let us put the provincial payment of $9 million into perspective. I presume some of the money will be spent by the Saskatchewan power commission. I refer to the $24 million to $35 million. This year in Saskatchewan the commission is planning to borrow and spend $60 million for expansion of electrical and gas services for the province of Saskatchewan for one year alone. An additional $9 million a year for all irrigation and power expenses combined is a small figure compared with what is spent each year for the usual development and expansion of electrical and gas utilities in that province. This point should be kept in mind.

There has been some discussion about this government being discriminatory against Saskatchewan because last year the federal government made money available to provinces in the maritimes for power development under two bills, one relating to the Beechwood project and the other relating to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act. I should like to draw a comparison here. The sum of $30 million was advanced with respect to the Beechwood project over an eight-year period and has to be paid back. The government will also advance periodically as the need arises money for thermal power plants and transmission lines. The money will be loaned on a 30-year and 40-year basis and will have to be paid back.

We are also trying to help the coal industry. We believe the money thus spent will be of great assistance in maintaining this industry at a level of production that will keep the industry going until long range plans are brought into effect. I should like to point out that all the money advanced to the maritime provinces either for the Beechwood project or thermal power has to be paid back and in addition we have asked the maritime provinces to concentrate the advantages of all this financial assistance into the provision of cheaper industrial power.

Those are the key things to remember about the maritimes side of the deal.

It is true that in Saskatchewan we are only advancing one-half of the provincial share of the dam on a 20-year basis. That was a concession not given to them in any previous agreement by any government and we have extended this concession. Where in the maritimes deal is there approximately $75 million being given without it being paid back? I believe that is the answer to that point of view.

In concluding I wish to mention that the hon. member for Villeneuve referred to page 90 of the report of the royal commission where it is recommended there should be a single administrative authority over the waters of the entire Canadian west and I believe the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt) was working around to the same suggestion. I should like to point out that this report was given to the government in 1952. I can find nothing in the records to indicate that that particular recommendation or suggestion in the report was ever acted upon. This government came into power just a little over a year ago, and already we have made great steps forward in getting plans ready for the conservation conference to deal with this matter of water resources and their use all across the country. We are moving forward with this type of program.

Over the years many of us have recognized the great necessity of considering our country, not on the basis of narrow provincial boundaries but on the basis of all the provinces working together to help each other. We have had at least two examples to my knowledge in the last little while of provinces working together and getting more power cheaper because they did work together. It is true that this recommendation in the royal commission report is a long range solution to the whole problem of dealing with the resources of western Canada. Eventually, it will have to be looked at as a regional problem and it will take some time to get it into operation; but I think the effective answer is that we are in action on this very fundamental thing.

I have spoken on this resolution with some feeling because I think back now to the many long hours of work and the many long drives that some of us have had trying to make the farmers and the business people of western Canada realize that the only way we can get out of our difficulties in western Canada, where we are so dependent on the ups and downs of prices and of crops, is to do something to conserve this water moving through to the sea without being used. As I look back over the years and think of all those who were with us I realize that to us this is truly a great agreement, and I hope that it will be remembered for many years.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) make it necessary for me to speak on this resolution. His main point and main complaint seem to be that the political strategy one member had contemplated for this measure did not work and he supported his remarks with a complaint about the constitutional question being dragged in. "Dragged in" were his own words. If he has any doubt about why they were dragged in I think we ought to clarify it. I think it is apparent from his remarks that he did not understand the situation at all.

The resolution before us reads:

> That it is expedient that the houses of parliament approve the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan respecting the South Saskatchewan river project, signed on the 25th day of July, 1958, and that this house do approve the same.

This resolution, if approved, concludes the matter. What is usual in this type of subject matter and this type of question is a resolution reading like this:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to approve the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan respecting the South Saskatchewan river project, signed on the 25th day of July, 1958.

The latter, and the correct procedure, would give all hon. members an opportunity to question the ministry in committee of the whole house on two occasions, namely at the resolution stage and again at the committee stage of the bill. I wish to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources what is it that he does not want to be questioned about when he takes the extraordinary procedure of introducing this resolution. What is it about this project that he does not want discussed? What information is he not willing to give or is not able to give? Why this extraordinary procedure? I point out to him that in the latter part of his remarks he gave information as to the financial implications flowing from the agreement, but he did that after the house had been debating this measure for some time. He did not put himself in the position where we could ask him where he got an estimate for one figure he gave, or where he got the estimate for the other, or to ask him to produce the data on which he based those figures, and that sort of thing.

When he used the term "historical perspective" in relation to the fine document he quoted from, which was produced some 100 years ago, I ask him why he does not apply that terminology to the constitution and to the practices in this House of Commons? Why does he not use the same historical perspective and have some respect for the traditions of this House of Commons?

He went on to talk about the Prime Minister never quibbling or using weasel words in relation to this great project. Well, that is fine. No one accused the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) of using any weasel words at all in relation to this project, at least none that I heard, and I certainly have no intention of accusing him of any such thing. I have no such feeling; but what put that thought in the mind of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources? What did he mean when he talked about the other connotation of that expression? When he came back to the expression "quibbling, or using weasel words", I thought of one of the meanings that he ought to have given it. Did he apply it to the remarks or to the action? Some of us have some regard for the action taken in these things. What was the motive he was seeking to answer in making the kind of argument he did?

He used other language in describing the right of any opposition member to speak about this great new project now to be undertaken. He used the term "smokescreen" because Liberal members in speaking on the subject are seeking to raise a question that is an important one affecting the rights of this parliament. Then a little later on he referred to it as small-time diversion. They are not small; they are very important and very basic. I want to remind him—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am sure the hon. member would not mind a correction. The term "small-time diversion" was in regard to the use of the word "bill".

Mr. McIlraith: Well, that is my whole point, Mr. Speaker. He regards the right to have this measure brought properly before parliament and the house resolved into committee of the whole at the resolution stage and again at the bill stage so that we can ask questions as a small-time diversion. In other words, the government now no longer is to answer any questions of members of parliament.

Mr. Harkness: Nonsense.

Mr. McIlraith: It is not nonsense. You were one who had a part in the decision and you must accept your share of the responsibility for the method of bringing this measure before parliament.

Mr. Harkness: I do.

Mr. McIlraith: Then, you will answer for it and it will not be to me. You will answer for it in the ordinary way in due course to the Canadian voters.

I also wish to point out that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources referred to this thing as a political football. After that he went on to talk about some development measures in this country. I was very glad to hear him talk about the development measures in this country. I would point out to the minister that at the present time less national development is going on in Canada than at any time since the conclusion of the second great war. I would also point out that this great measure—and I am glad to see it going forward and moving ahead—is now coming forward at a time when we are just completing the great pipe line for bringing gas from western Canada to central Canada, one of the greatest engineering projects in this field in the world. That was brought forward just after that great national project, the St. Lawrence seaway, probably one of the outstanding development projects in the world. To use the minister's own words, he should at least use a bit of historical perspective in considering these matters.

I know that hon. members are anxious to get forward with the business of the house and I have no quarrel with them for being somewhat impatient at this stage of the session. It is a feeling I sometimes share myself and I cannot quarrel with anyone for it. But I think it should be pointed out to hon. members supporting the government on this measure that the practice being followed today is closure with a vengeance, the like of which has never been seen in the Canadian parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: Nonsense.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to point out that this method of proceeding with respect to this measure, which I know has interested so many hon. members so much, particularly those from the west, and which they are so impatient to get ahead with, is really legislation by concealment, concealment of the facts that we are entiled to elicit from the minister in committee of the whole.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution to approve an agreement whereby federal financial assistance will be granted to the government of Saskatchewan to develop a project which will provide both hydro power and water for irrigation in that province. Our leader has already indicated our support for the principle of the resolution and there is no need for me to elaborate on that point. Coming from a province which has a considerable hydroelectric power potential, it would be natural for me to support a principle of this kind.

Before I go further, I should like to correct a statement made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) a few minutes ago. With reference to the former prime minister of Canada, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, he said that he was a man of great intellectual integrity and that he was opposed to this project and had said so. I have been here since 1949 and have heard the project discussed on numerous occasions. I do not think anyone can find anywhere in the record any words spoken by the former prime minister indicating that he was opposed to the project. On numerous occasions he said that he was in favour of it, that is was a desirable thing to do, but he pointed out that we were engaged in the other developments mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) such as the St. Lawrence seaway, Trans-Canada Air Lines and the pipe line and that this project would have to compete with other projects of that kind. What the former prime minister did say was that he was convinced at that time that the returns to the national economy from the South Saskatchewan project would not be commensurate with the drain upon the national economy through interest, amortization and other fixed charges.

My main purpose in intervening in the debate is to re-echo the hope expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) that this resolution will mark another step forward towards the development of a national policy respecting the development of water resources. In my own riding at Bay D'Espoir there is a potential of half a million horsepower and the development of that waterpower would transform the whole economy of my riding which at the present time must depend upon the fisheries, the only other resource available. Not only would it transform the economy of my riding but no other single project could contribute as much to the improvement of the economy of our province. Therefore I urge the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to consider the development of a national policy whereby the same assistance as will be granted Saskatchewan under the resolution may be made available to all provinces along the lines indicated by the principle of the resolution.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Carter.]

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. Minister of Agriculture speaks now he will close the debate. Perhaps I should say that that is my interpretation of rule 37. The house will recall that the Prime Minister opened the debate by moving the motion on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture. On that account I consider that is the effect of the rule.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address myself for a moment to a procedural problem which I do not seem to be able to reconcile with the present situation. We are asked to approve by resolution the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan. It is a fait accompli. The agreement has been completed and signed. I think we are just going through the motions pure and simple without being able to have any effect on it. If this were a resolution that it was expedient to introduce a measure to approve a proposed agreement I could see that parliament would then have something to debate. We would then be in the position of the government planning to sign an agreement with the government of Saskatchewan and asking parliament to approve a resolution that it was expedient to present a bill and so on. But from my standpoint we are simply faced now with something that is already accomplished. I find it difficult to reconcile this resolution with other resolutions that have come before the house in the terms referred to by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), namely that it is expedient to present a measure to do so and so and so and so. Somehow or other we are avoiding something. I cannot put my finger on it but to me this just does not seem to add up.

If the government had come before parliament, said that they planned to enter into an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan to do this and asked for permission to introduce a bill to that effect, I could understand that procedure because it would be regular. Some hon. members who have spoken before me have said that this is a novel procedure. If it is novel we should tread very cautiously. For example, last week we adopted a measure to build a bridge. We did it by a bill. If we are to follow this procedure it could have been done just as easily by introducing a resolution to this effect, be it resolved that a bridge be built between this place and that place. We would then have done it by resolution without requiring a bill. It is that sort of legislation that puzzles me. I think the Prime Minister interjected, when one hon. member was speaking, that this is not novel procedure and does not set a new precedent. I would be grateful if he would point out to the house when legislation of this kind, and of this importance, was proceeded with in this way.

I am somewhat of a novice in the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order; the hon. member is verging really on a point of order. This resolution is before the house quite regularly and he need not feel concerned on that account. It is quite in order, so the matter of it not being properly before parliament does not arise.

Mr. Crestohl: I bow to your decision; you are quite right.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have entertained a good deal of comment as being relevant concerning how this might have been done otherwise, but the line which the hon. member has been following, it seems to me, verges on being a criticism of the procedure of the house. Actually, what we are doing is quite in order.

Mr. Crestohl: I accept Your Honour's decision. Nevertheless I would appreciate if the Prime Minister would point out to the house a precedent for this.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I need to repeat the caution which I gave before that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate. I would have taken the same view if the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had spoken now, because he would then be speaking twice in the same debate and the only means by which that could be justified would be that he was again speaking for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness).

Mr. Harkness: In so far as this resolution is concerned, the opposition have attempted to raise a constitutional issue where no constitutional issue whatever exists. This is a good example of the paucity of issues upon which they can attack the government when they try to build up a completely imaginary case. Actually, the situation in regard to matters of this kind, I think, can be stated fairly briefly. There are really three ways in which a matter of this kind can be handled. We could have had an item in the estimates, and you get legislative authority as a result of the passage of the item in the estimates. I shall come back to that method later, but that is what the previous government did on a few occasions.

Mr. McIlraith: That is not true.

Mr. Harkness: I shall come back to this later and demonstrate that it is true.

The second way in which it could have been handled is the way in which it is being done in this case, by a resolution introduced in the house to approve the agreement, and that is done in conjunction with an estimate to provide the money.

The third way in which the thing could be handled would be by the passage of a bill through the house. This is the way in which the members of the opposition say the matter should be handled, and that to do it any other way is unconstitutional and so forth.

Mr. Crestohl: I rise on a point of order. You have ruled, Mr. Speaker, that the constitutional question does not arise and that the resolution is properly before the house. I see no reason for the minister having to defend that position.

Mr. Speaker: Just to make it clear, I did not take any exception to the constitutional argument concerning the preferable way of doing these things, the only point I made with the hon. member was that this present motion is one regular way of doing it.

Mr. Harkness: The purpose of the resolution, Mr. Speaker, is to afford to parliament an opportunity of debating and passing judgment upon the action taken by the government in entering into this agreement with the province of Saskatchewan. As I have indicated, this could be done in different ways. There could have been a bill passed and a statute enacted expressly approving the agreement and appropriating at the same time all the contributions to be made by the government of Canada in respect of the project. Under those circumstances, parliament would have but one opportunity of dealing with the matter, and that is all. They would have been "all washed up" in connection with it. The money would have been appropriated for years and years to come by that bill. This, of course, was the method which was followed by the former government in a few cases, and the trans-Canada highway is one example.

In this case, parliament will be asked to provide the necessary funds in the ordinary way by an annual appropriation. This method was followed on the grounds that appropriations made on an annual basis as funds are required will be more realistic than a lump sum appropriation in advance of the whole project. Furthermore, of course, parliament is given the opportunity of reviewing the work annually as it progresses, whereas if we had acted in the way hon. gentlemen opposite have asked, that is by the passage of a bill, that opportunity would not be there. We would deal with the whole thing at this time, and years from now as the work was being carried on there would be no appropriation in the estimates and parliament would not have an opportunity of examining the project.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the hon. minister would permit a question for clarification, two questions really. In so far as the first and third methods he outlined are concerned, namely with a resolution and a bill, I take it he would admit two things. First, that the bill may or may not provide for all the expenditures in connection with the measure, that is that the bill could provide for some of the expenditures to start the project and there might be further moneys appropriated by estimates. Would he admit that? Second, would he agree that either the first method he suggested or the third method would give members of parliament an opportunity to question the minister and that the second method, the one presently being followed, is the only method that precludes hon. members from questioning the minister at this stage.

Mr. Harkness: These questions, Mr. Speaker, demonstrate the fact that for the 15 years or 20 years he has been here the hon. member has not done his homework and does not know how these things are done, as I have pointed out to him on a few past occasions. If a bill were to provide for the entire cost of this project, and this is what the previous government has done on a number of occasions, then parliament would have no opportunity to question the minister about it afterwards. The procedure that we have followed, contrary to what hon. members opposite have said to the effect that it is a method of bypassing parliament or, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) said, bypassing the usual procedures of parliament and attempting to use slick procedures, attempting to use a type of closure—

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: When I have completed this portion. These statements are all complete nonsense. As a matter of fact, the procedure which hon. gentlemen opposite have requested would afford far less opportunity for a review by parliament than the procedure which we have followed. Under this procedure every year when these estimates come before the house the house will have a full opportunity of asking all the questions they want to ask of the minister or of the government in connection with the project as it proceeds. The procedure that they have requested would mean that such an examination would not take place. Once the bill had been passed, the thing would be finished, and there would be no more questioning of the government in connection with it. This method, which hon. gentlemen opposite have said bypasses the usual procedure of parliament, provides for full parliamentary control, much more so than the procedure followed by the previous government in so far as some construction projects were concerned.

Mr. Pearson: My question is this. Will the minister inform us what opportunity we will have to discuss this agreement before we are asked to approve of it?

Mr. Harkness: They have had all day today to discuss it; they have had a full opportunity to discuss it and could have asked any questions that they wanted to ask.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, the only hon. member who did that was the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas). I have a list of those questions which I took from the blue sheets, as unfortunately I was not able to be here this morning, and I propose to answer them. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) did not really want any more information about this project, what they wanted to do was to raise an imaginary issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: We want a great deal of information.

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said it was an unprecedented type of resolution, the sort of thing which had never been done before. That is quite incorrect and, he very well knows, in practically all cases where Canada makes an agreement with other countries no change is necessary in the law.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is Saskatchewan another country?

Mr. Harkness: It is exactly the same thing here, and all that is done is that a resolution is put through the house, exactly the same as in this case, for parliament to approve of the agreement.

Mr. Pearson: When we have to spend $100 million? It has never been done.

Mr. Crestohl: Since when was Saskatchewan another country?

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition went on to say that his party was not going to fall into the trap set by this legislation. There is no trap in this legislation; there was never any thought of a trap in this legislation. Those ideas dwell only in the dark recesses of his own mind, which seems to produce these suspicions without the slightest difficulty.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Guilty conscience.

Mr. Harkness: And then he went on to say, "If we vote against it on constitutional grounds we will be said to be against the project." Mr. Speaker, I can well understand the sensitiveness of the Leader of the Opposition and of the other members of the former Liberal government in regard to this matter, for they were in power for 22 years, during which period they could have put this into effect, but they refused to enter into an agreement with Saskatchewan during those 22 years.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: The answer is no.

Mr. Pickersgill: No questions; I thought you said we could ask questions.

Mr. Harkness: I refuse to have the hon. member for Ottawa West take up my time with pointless and witless questions.

Mr. Pickersgill: The rights of parliament!

Mr. Harkness: As I was saying, I can understand the sensitiveness of hon. members opposite with respect to the South Saskatchewan dam. They refused for 22 years when they were in power to enter into an agreement or to go ahead and build this dam. Now they come in here and they talk about weasel words. What weasel words were used by them during that period, and what weasel words are being used by them now, when they come here and talk about how the former minister of agriculture was in favour of this project. And he was, but they nowhere point out that he completely failed to persuade other members of the Liberal government to go ahead with the project.

Today they are trying to ride on the coat tails of the former minister of agriculture in regard to their approval of this project and are trying to have the general public forget that for 22 years they said, "No, the project is not economic and we will not build it."

Mr. Crestohl: There was a war on during that time.

Mr. Harkness: There was no war from 1945 on, and surely those 13 years were quite long enough to initiate the project.

An hon. Member: There was an adjustment period after the war.

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition went into quite a to-do about the disregard of parliament, and I think I have already dealt with this matter—there is no disregard for parliament whatsoever. I would like to point out that in so far as all projects of this nature are concerned the previous government to which he belonged never submitted them to parliament at all except in the form of an estimate.

Mr. Pearson: Not true.

Mr. Harkness: I have in my hand a list of all the major projects of an irrigation nature, the building of dams and so on, which were built by the previous government.

Mr. Pearson: Under authorized legislation.

Mr. Harkness: The St. Mary's dam and irrigation system and the Bow river irrigation project.

Mr. McIlraith: Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act—why do you mislead the house?

Mr. Harkness: These two projects were really—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harkness: These two projects, and they are all really the integrated irrigation system in the southern part of Alberta, came to $46 million, and how did the former government deal with that matter?

Mr. Pearson: Under legislation.

Mr. McIlraith: Under legislation in this parliament in the usual way.

Mr. Harkness: The only way in which they dealt with those matters was by means of items in the estimates year after year. There was never any bill submitted to the house nor was there any agreement such as we have put forward in connection with this matter. They signed agreements with the government of Alberta, but they did not submit those agreements to parliament for approval. All they did was to put an item in the estimates, and as I said to begin with, legally and constitutionally that is quite correct. That is one of the ways in which such things can be dealt with, and I outlined three ways in which they can be dealt with. That is one of them, but it does not give as much opportunity to parliament to deal with the matter as the procedure which we have followed. As a matter of fact we are using that procedure plus a procedure of submitting the agreement, as we have today, for parliament to express its approval or disapproval.

Mr. McIlraith: Without giving parliament a chance to discuss it.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, this constitutional problem that they have attempted to raise is complete nonsense, it amounts to nothing whatever. I have a whole list of these irrigation projects, dams and so on, which the former government authorized, and in not one case did they pass a bill and in not one case did they submit an agreement to parliament.

Mr. Pearson: It was all done under bills.

Mr. Harkness: No, in not one case did they ever submit an agreement to parliament nor did they submit a bill to parliament.

Mr. Pearson: They were all authorized by bills.

Mr. Harkness: I think that blows sky high the allegation of the Leader of the Opposition that there was disregard for parliament, and it shows how hollow an argument it is and how hard up for ideas he is when he raises it.

The hon. member for Ottawa West made no contribution to this debate, but he did make one statement which I think I should immediately refute. He was speaking of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) and he said, "What is it that you do not want to discuss in regard to this project, what are you trying to hide?"

What he was attempting to do in that statement was to insinuate something to lead the people of this country to believe that we have something to hide here, that there is something we do not want to bring out.

Mr. Pickersgill: Probably another secret report.

Mr. Harkness: A completely unworthy and reprehensible piece of conduct on the part of the member for Ottawa West. We have absolutely nothing to hide.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps then the minister would allow a few questions of the government.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, the opposition will have the next several years, in fact the next six or eight years if some of them are still here, which is very doubtful, in which to question us about this matter, and about this project as it proceeds—

Mr. Pearson: After the agreement is final.

Mr. Harkness: —or anything else along that line.

Mr. McIlraith: Maybe the new Minister of Agriculture will be prepared to answer our questions.

Mr. Harkness: Hon. members opposite will have all the opportunity they wish to discuss the matter in any manner they desire. But these members are trying to insinuate that we have something to hide, and I do not think that is very good business on their part. I am rather surprised to find the hon. member for Ottawa West stooping to that sort of thing.

Mr. Pearson: Then why did you not follow the normal procedure?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) said that we were placing before the house something that was already in effect accomplished, so what was the use of bringing this forward now? Well, the use is this—it provides an opportunity for parliament to discuss this agreement which has been made and, of course, if parliament does not approve of it, then it provides an opportunity for them to throw out the government. It is the same in connection with every bill introduced in this house by the government—if the majority of members do not approve of the bill they can defeat the government, and we did the same thing as far as this resolution is concerned.

Mr. Crestohl: Would the minister permit a question? Would the minister not say that expecting the approval of the resolution means taking parliament for granted?

Mr. Harkness: No. It is not taking parliament for granted. We know that the resolution is an extremely good one and that it will commend itself to the house. In fact, the hon. gentlemen opposite have said they are going to vote for it. They approve of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly what we said you would say.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. gentlemen in the corner are going to vote for it, everybody is going to vote for it.

Mr. Pearson: That is why you put it in this way.

Mr. McIlraith: That is why you used the closure method of putting this measure through.

Mr. Pearson: That is where the trap is.

Mr. McIlraith: We now have had the trap explained by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness).

Mr. Harkness: As was indicated by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the hon. gentlemen opposite, having refused to build this dam for 22 years, are now trying to cover that up and to get into people's minds that they were not really opposed to it, although they nevertheless failed to build it.

There were a few comments made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) about which I should like to say something:

"The main dam is to be turned over to the province for operation. Saskatchewan would have preferred that the operation of this dam be assumed by the federal government in perpetuity. This is another responsibility that the Saskatchewan government has been asked to assume." Then the hon. member goes on to complain about the amount the Saskatchewan government may have to pay, and so on. What he is doing, apparently, is parrotting some of the remarks which have been attributed in press statements to Premier Douglas, to the Saskatchewan minister of agriculture, and so on. Here is a clipping from the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix in which Premier Douglas is reported as having said:

> In the course of negotiations Ottawa has insisted that Saskatchewan should assume responsibility for operating and maintaining the dam when it is completed. We are, therefore, seeking some assurance that Saskatchewan and its citizens will be safeguarded against financial loss in the unlikely event of a failure in the dam following its construction.

What the hon. member for Assiniboia has said today amounts to just the same thing. This statement is absolutely incorrect. The original agreement which we offered to the province of Saskatchewan provided that we would operate and maintain the dam in perpetuity in the same way as we operate and maintain the St. Mary's river dam in Alberta, and the agreement went forward on that basis. There was never any question about that. But the premier of Saskatchewan thought they should take over the operation of the dam. It was their request; they asked to take over the operation. We did not ask them to do it. They asked us and we agreed to it. At the same time, though they wanted to take over the operation they wanted us to be responsible for the maintenance. I pointed out the difficult situation which would result if one government was responsible for maintaining the dam and another for operating it. Difficulties between the two bodies would constantly be arising and it just would not make a reasonable undertaking. Premier Douglas agreed with this point of view, and he agreed to take over both the operation and the maintenance of the dam. Other aspects of the agreement were modified in consequence.

Then, after the whole thing was done and sent to be signed—after we had made a lot of concessions in the light of what had been agreed to—Saskatchewan made a demand that we should assume both the operation and the maintenance of the dam. It just was not a reasonable proposition. And if there is any question of the operation and maintenance being in the hands of Saskatchewan it is because the premier of Saskatchewan asked for it himself, not because we tried to force it upon the province. So much for that point.

A little further on, the hon. member said—

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what document the Minister of Agriculture is quoting from. I can tell him I do not mind if he continues quoting, but I know that we on this side, when we have the same document in our hands as I believe he has, have been asked not to quote from the document because it is not an official record. I think it is not within the rules of the house that the minister should quote—

Mr. Harkness: These are the blue sheets which I borrowed from the press gallery.

Mr. Argue: That is exactly my point of order. I am not objecting, myself, as long as the same rule applies in the future to all hon. members. However, my understanding is that it is against the rule to quote from the document the minister is quoting from.

Mr. Pearson: It certainly is.

Mr. Speaker: The point is a novel one for me. In my experience I have never asked anyone to refrain from quoting from these documents and rather than commit myself to a ruling now I should like to see what the practice has been in the past. I understand the hon. member has no objections to the quotations.

Mr. Argue: No, but I do think that if this practice is one that is to be followed it is one which makes the Hansard record of little value, if this is to be taken as the official reproduction. But I have no objection now, in view of the statement which has been made, to the minister quoting from the unofficial document.

Mr. Harkness: If there is any question about this I will not use it at all. I will forget it. I thought the hon. gentleman would be happy to have me quoting him but apparently he objects.

Mr. Argue: No, that is not the point. I am perfectly happy for the minister to keep on quoting, but I raise the point of order because if quotations are going to be read in this way we would like to have the same privilege at future sittings of this house.

Mr. Speaker: Then I understand the matter is resolved without a decision at this time.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member went on to say that we had been very hard on Saskatchewan, that we have laid greater and greater burdens on them and that we were asking them to bear an undue share of the cost.

As a matter of fact I think our treatment of Saskatchewan in connection with this agreement was extremely generous. The original agreement which was submitted to the province of Saskatchewan was an agreement which had been drawn up by the Right Hon. Mr. Gardiner, the former minister of agriculture. It had been submitted to the province of Saskatchewan and they had agreed to accept it. Mr. Gardiner brought it back here, but the Liberal government refused to sign it. However, the government of Saskatchewan had agreed to accept that agreement which was drawn up, apparently, between the former minister of agriculture and themselves.

We offered them that agreement over a year ago. Had they accepted it, as they had accepted it formerly, construction could have started a year ago instead of starting right now. Their action delayed construction, because they would not agree to this agreement which they had said previously they would accept. They wanted concessions. We made a large number of concessions. We gave them a much better deal than they had been offered by the Right Hon. James Gardiner, though, I might add, he had no authority to offer it. We offered them a much better deal, finally. Thus, why there should be complaints of this kind on the part of the hon. member for Assiniboia, or on the part of anybody in the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan, I find it difficult to understand. They have had extremely generous terms as far as this government is concerned. In fact, I have seen some editorials in some eastern newspapers to the effect that the terms have been too generous rather than the reverse.

Mr. Pickersgill: Have you read the Winnipeg Tribune?

Mr. Argue: Could I ask the minister a question at this point?

Mr. Harkness: No. My time is getting short, but should I have any time left later I would be glad to deal with any questions that might arise.

The hon. member for Villeneuve in dealing with the matter posed a considerable number of questions. He complained that this had been done by resolution. I have already dealt with that point. And then he wanted to know whether or not we were satisfied with the estimate of the cost, and so forth. I can only say that I personally, as the minister responsible, am quite satisfied with the estimated cost. The hon. member knows as well as I do that an estimate made now with regard to a project which is not going to be completed for six or eight years may not prove to be correct because if prices go down the cost will be less, and if prices rise the cost will be more. I would point out there is an item included which provides for a gradual rise in prices.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister draw that to the attention of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker)?

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member who has just spoken had been devoting more attention to these things when he was in the government he might still have been there, and the same applies to his colleagues. Now to return to the estimated cost, I am satisfied that this estimate is a good estimate. As a matter of fact, three of the greatest experts on earth-filled dams in the world have been consulted in connection with this matter. They have been consultants to this project for several years past. I think the estimate is a good estimate. I am not predicting that it is going to cost exactly that amount because no one knows what will happen in the next eight years with regard to prices going up or down.

The next point the hon. member wanted covered was when does the government intend to begin this work and the answer is that it has already begun. Tenders for the first piece of work in connection with the construction of an access road 12 miles in length from a main highway near Loreburn to the damsite were put out immediately after the agreement was signed. I believe tenders closed on August 18 and I expect to be able to announce the awarding of the contract almost immediately.

Tenders have also been put out or are in process of being put out for construction of the campsite. A tender will also be put out for another access road. This does not involve the building of a road but calls for putting a gravel surface on a municipal road which already exists, to give access to the north to highway No. 15 which runs east and west, north of the dam.

Another contract to be let very shortly is for the preparation of the aggregate which will be needed to go into the dam. Another contract will be for the building of a work bridge required for construction purposes. All these will be called for this fall and work will be started on them. Another is the excavation—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: —where the abutment of the dam will go in on the eastern side of the structure. That will involve the movement of over four million cubic yards of earth. All these contracts will be let this fall.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: Just a minute until I finish answering these questions. I cannot answer three at once. When I have answered the questions asked by the hon. member for Villeneuve I will be glad to answer yours.

Mr. Pickersgill: All right.

Mr. Harkness: The next question was in connection with the function of the construction board. That is set out in detail on page 15 of the agreement. I do not think I had better take the time to go over what the functions of the construction board will be. That board will consist of four members appointed by the federal government and three members appointed by the provincial government. Generally speaking the function of the board will be to exercise a sort of general supervision over this work as it proceeds during the time the dam is under construction, and particularly it is to serve as a body through which any difficulties which may arise between the federal government on one hand and the provincial government on the other hand can be ironed out and decided upon.

The next question related to the time in which the work is to be completed. The estimates in connection with this question vary between six and ten years. These estimates have been made by various people. Most people who are qualified to judge think the dam will be completed in a period ranging between six and eight years. No precise estimate of the time can be given because that will depend to a considerable extent on the amount of flooding which comes down the river each year as the work is in progress. If there is a particularly high level of water it will hold back construction for a considerable length of time each year. As I say, because the speed of construction is going to depend on the weather and also, of course, on the difficulties that may be encountered, no more precise estimate of the time of construction can be given than six to eight years.

The hon. member for Villeneuve also raised a question about whether there would be one large contract for this dam. I believe he expressed the idea that a considerable number of people were of the opinion that that is what should be done. Is that not correct?

Mr. Dumas: That is correct.

Mr. Harkness: We are following exactly the reverse procedure. We think it is very much wiser on a project of this nature to let smaller contracts for two reasons. First of all it gives many more contractors an opportunity to tender and therefore you get more competition, more bids and lower prices. There will be the various contracts I have mentioned that will be let this fall. There will be six separate contracts and I suppose six different people will get them. In addition to that if you let one large contract for the whole project most of the work would be subcontracted anyway by the large contractor and it is impossible for a contractor to give a firm price on something which is not going to be completed for eight years. The only sort of price they will give is one which has an escalator clause in it. We considered it very much wiser to have small contracts. As I say, it gives a greater opportunity for smaller Canadian contractors if it is let through a series of contracts as the work progresses at a time when contractors are in a position to know definitely the prices for which they are prepared to do the work. Also if you let it in one large contract there is only a limited number of people in this country who would be able to undertake it and if there were only one large contract it would be more likely that the contract would be secured by someone in another country. For all those reasons we considered it much wiser to let it in a series of smaller contracts.

I believe I have covered most of the points that were raised. I have not gone into the many values of this project.

Mr. Pickersgill: I believe the minister said he would answer a question of mine, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harkness: I will. As I was saying, I have not discussed in detail the many values of this project because they were ably covered by the Prime Minister in his statement earlier today and in statements he has made at various other times over the years. The values of this project were also capably covered in the remarks of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, those of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Cooper) and those of other hon. members who have spoken.

Mr. Winch: I would like to call you as a witness before the committee on public accounts.

Mr. Harkness: I therefore did not think it necessary for me to go into the many values of this project.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to make a comment to the minister. In view of what you just said, I would like to call you as a witness before the committee on public accounts.

South Saskatchewan River Project

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I believe one or two hon. members had some questions and I will be glad to answer them at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, my question is a very simple one.

Mr. Baskin: It would have to be simple coming from you.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) if before the government decided on this policy of calling a number of small contracts he consulted his colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green)? My reason for asking that question is that we have been told repeatedly in another place that this is a most unbusinesslike way of proceeding.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I have outlined the reasons why we considered it wiser to let a number of smaller contracts. As I said, if we were to let it to one large contractor he would let the work to a number of small subcontractors and take off his percentage of the profit. In a project of this kind you have all kinds of different types of contracts. I have already mentioned six contracts to be let this fall, each of which is different. One is for a road to be built; one for a road to be resurfaced; one is for the preparation of aggregate which means cleaning and washing of gravel and so forth; one is for the construction of a bridge; and one is for an excavation job. They are altogether different types of contracts.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have one more question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister by any chance read the evidence of Mr. Cormier because he gave exactly the same reasons in the public accounts committee.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interrupt the minister but in view of his statement about the advantages of letting a number of small contracts I wanted to invite him to appear as a witness before the public accounts committee because hon. members of the Conservative party have been damning the previous government because it let individual contracts and not one general contract, and over eight years, too.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the reason they are raising complaints about it is that it was spread over eight years and should have been done in two years. In this case we know it is going to take six or eight years and are governing ourselves accordingly.

Mr. Benidickson: It will probably take 16 years, then.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister. Is this project in his opinion a project of national importance—

An hon. Member: Where have you been?

Mr. Deschatelets: —and, if so, why is the federal government forcing the province of Saskatchewan to pay $25 million?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, in my opinion it is very definitely a matter of national importance, and one which the hon. gentleman's previous leader and party apparently could not understand was one of national importance. I am glad to see that they are now coming around to see that it is. Certainly, we have always taken that point of view and we are proceeding on that basis.

Mr. Deschatelets: Why should we force the province of Saskatchewan to pay $25 million? That is the second part of my question.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the reason for that is very simple. The project is of national importance. There is no question about that. But the greatest benefit is going to go to Saskatchewan and the people of Saskatchewan and therefore it seems reasonable that they should pay some proportion of the cost.

Many things are done under the Department of Agriculture in the way of constructing dams, drainage works, and so on, which are the concern of a province or, in some cases, the municipality and they are asked to bear a proportion of the share of the cost. That has been done on numerous occasions under the previous government ever since this type of work has been carried on by the dominion government.

Mr. Speaker: The minister's time has now expired and it is my duty to put the question. Further questions cannot be put except by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pearson: That is the end of it.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed to the motion will please say nay. I declare the motion carried with no voice to the contrary.

And more than five hon. members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; I had already declared the motion carried but members may have been standing before.

Mr. Winch: It is carried unanimously and everybody knows it.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): You boys do it every time.

Mr. Argue: When we do it we do it at the right time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Your Honour did act pretty fast. There is a desire for a vote and I see no reason why it should be denied.

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me that this motion was passed and the business completed. Is it competent to the house to open again a question that has been settled at that session?

Mr. Speaker: I declared the motion carried. I left the door open by saying I may not have seen the members who had risen before. If there were members standing at that time I certainly do not want to deprive any members of their right to have a recorded vote and therefore I shall ask the members to be called in.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Diefenbaker, for Mr. Harkness) which was agreed to on the following division:

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING GRADE CROSSING FUND

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-52, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

On Clause 1—Limit of amount to be applied.

Mr. Chevrier: Has the minister a statement to make?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman. I made a statement at the resolution stage and a short statement on second reading of the bill. The bill has received thorough consideration in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I think that just about all that needs to be said about it has been said.

Mr. Chevrier: The main object of the bill is to place $5 million at the disposal of the grade crossing fund and also to increase the amount that can be paid out of the grade crossing fund from 60 per cent to 80 per cent. However, if one looks at the bill the accent seems to be placed on the reflective markings that are to be put on the sides of railway cars and all through the first section of the bill that seems to be the most important part, which deals with an amendment to section 265 of the act. I should like to ask the minister why the bill has been framed in this fashion?

Mr. Hees: I believe that probably the hon. member for Laurier felt when he was minister it is sometimes difficult to understand exactly why those who draw up these bills do so in the way that they do. However, when he reads the bill I think he will agree that the provisions are all outlined in it. I think it is all very clear once you have read through the three clauses.

Mr. Chevrier: I wish I could agree with that.

Mr. Hees: I hope he will agree with me.

Mr. Peters: I should like to say that we hoped for a great deal more than appears to be in the bill. Certainly we are very appreciative of the fact that the minister seems to have attached a great deal of importance to this matter of reflective markings on box cars. We believe there are a number of other things that should have been done along this line and which should have been put in this bill. I think that at the resolution stage we mentioned such things as increasing the effectiveness of the horns which are now used on diesel trains by changing them so that they would be similar to the sound of a steam whistle.

During the last few days I noticed while driving in rural areas that many of the railway crossing signs are still those that were originally erected many years ago. They are right at the railway crossing and have no reflective markings of any type on them, many of them have not even been painted for some time. I think, in the near future, consideration must be given to the speed with which people approach railway crossings today as compared with the speed at which they approached those crossings when the original signs were erected. A great deal more emphasis must be put upon the markings on railway crossings, and this includes block signals and crossings at which houses are built right up to the edge of the crossing so that a person approaching is given little opportunity to see if a train is coming. There is a great deal more that should be done in this field.

Then, of course, there is much work that could be done in the field of eliminating railway crossings altogether. I think this is a very important matter. I think we can safely say that before this Labour day week end is over, which some people in the country are enjoying, tragedy will strike at level crossings and the occupants of automobiles will be seriously hurt. I do not think we can treat this matter of the improvement of railway crossings too lightly. We hope the marking of cars will be extended to include engines. A great deal more money must be put into this fund so that we can bring all the crossings up to date. I am sure that the minister, because of the consideration he has given to this subject, will also take these other things into consideration and we hope that they will be included in a bill to be introduced soon.

Mr. Herridge: Before this clause carries I should like to say that I am pleased to see provision is made for putting reflectors on box cars. I want to ask the minister a question because I know that with his encyclopaedic mind on transport matters he will be able to answer it. Why, in view of the experience and value of reflectors in many other ways for the protection of human life and safety, has it taken the government so long to come to the conclusion it is worthwhile to assist in the placing of reflectors on box cars? Could the minister inform the house how much it costs to put reflectors on box cars?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am advised that the estimated cost is in the vicinity of $15 per car and that at the present time there are 198,100 box cars in operation in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it that the balance of the 40 per cent is payable by the railway?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman, in future the government will pay 80 per cent of the cost.

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is 60 per cent for reflectors on box cars, out of the grade crossing fund, I take it?

Mr. Hees: If you read on, Mr. Chairman, into paragraph 4—as I say, I agree with the hon. member for Laurier that sometimes these things have to be done in a rather complicated way—in line 20 you find this:

> The total amount that may be applied toward the cost of placing reflective markings on the sides of railway cars shall not exceed 80 per cent of such cost,—

Then, it goes on to deal with another matter.

Mr. Chevrier: How do you reconcile that with the first part of paragraph 2 which says that the total amount that may be applied toward the cost of placing reflective markings on the sides of railway cars shall not exceed 60 per cent of such cost?

Mr. Hees: Clause 2 applies to a statute which is a permanent statute. Clause 4 will apply for the next three years and I assume for a lot longer than that. I quite agree with the hon. member that this has perhaps been stated in a complicated way and all I can say is that I believe as hon. members read through the bill it all will become clear by the time they reach the end.

Mr. Chevrier: Clear as mud. May I come back to my first question—who pays the 20 per cent?

Mr. Hees: The railway pays the 20 per cent, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Peters: Is there going to be any compulsion upon the railways to complete this work?

Mr. Hees: The board of transport commissioners hopes to reach an agreement in this regard.

Mr. Peters: Could the minister inform us how long he anticipates it will take to complete such an agreement or to complete the work?

Mr. Hees: The meeting is scheduled for October, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: Is it not a fact that the moment this bill goes into effect and application is made to the board, then it applies, and whether the railway agrees or not the 80 per cent for the three years must come out of the railway grade crossing fund and that the railway pays the other 20 per cent?

Mr. Hees: I am advised that the meeting which will be held in October is to work out the mechanics of how it will be done, but that the principle is in effect once this bill is passed by parliament.

Mr. Argue: Perhaps this is in the bill, although I have not had a chance to examine it in detail. Could the minister explain the intent here? Surely there is some period of time over which the agreement will operate. What is the objective of the government in connection with the date when all box cars will have these markings placed upon them—is it three years, five years, ten years or one year?

Mr. Hees: This arrangement will last three years, starting January 31 of this year, and I think certainly that when we approach January 31, 1961 this matter will again receive very serious consideration, and I have no doubt it will then be either continued or improved.

Mr. Chevrier: Could I put it this way, that perhaps the minister expects that during the three-year period while this will be in force the railways might be prevailed upon to mark all their box cars with these reflective markings?

Mr. Hees: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister inform the house what colour these reflectors are going to be?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, red, of course.

Mr. Hees: The exact colour has not yet been worked out, but that will be done—

Mr. Bourget: I presume it will be red on one side and blue on the other.

Mr. Hees: I am sure it will be something of the nature which is most easily seen by cars at night.

Mr. Peters: Will the same type of thing apply to the signs referred to in subsection 270 of the act, which refers to sign boards? I suppose that means the cross arms which they now use on the railway. Is any consideration being given to moving those particular sign boards back from the railway crossings? They are now about 8 or 10 feet from railway crossings, and at the modern rate of speed of automobiles you are probably well past the railway crossing before you register what the sign said.

Mr. Hees: I am advised that any sign outside of the railway right of way is under the jurisdiction of the municipality and not of the railway.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FINANCE

MOTION TO APPROVE EXPENDITURES AUTHORIZED BY SPECIAL WARRANTS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-57, for approving certain expenditures authorized for the public service, and the application of certain amounts in the accounts, of the financial year ended the 31st March, 1958.

Mr. Benidickson: Has the minister any additional comments to make?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I doubt if there is anything I might usefully add to what I endeavoured to say on the resolution stage preceding the introduction of the present measure. The resolution was before the committee of the whole on August 19 and August 20, when I had an opportunity to make certain comments by way of explanation of the report on supply and the effect of the present bill. The debate is reported at page 3808 of Hansard for August 19 and at page 3822 and following pages of August 20. By this report on supply we have, I believe, fulfilled the undertaking given to this house on the opening of the present session and have fully accounted for the three governor general's warrants included in the approving provisions of the bill now before the house.

I pointed out at page 3809 of Hansard for August 19 that the house is being asked to approve of supply which was released, whether in the form of appropriations made by parliament or by governor general's warrants. The house is not being asked to approve actual expenditure as such. The actual expenditure will be duly reported and, after audit by the Auditor General and included in the public accounts for the fiscal year 1957-58.

I have drawn attention to eleven items which are contained in the fourth column of the report on supply and which aggregated $110,042,595, and fully explained the purpose of those items, which are of a transfer or legislative character.

Mr. Benidickson: I fully realize that in what we hope will be the last week of the sittings of this particular session of parliament, when a member rises there is always a little consternation in some sections of the house and there is perhaps among some members the feeling that a debate of this kind is being unduly prolonged. It is true that in the bill we are considering here we are dealing with the bringing forth for debate, after a denial of the right, of certain governor general's warrants which were passed in the fiscal year 1957-58. Speaking as I do on one side of what might be called a no man's land ditch consisting of a big group of surplus Conservative members on my left, I realize their feelings but I must point out to them that they too often give unqualified, uncritical and, I think, all too generous support to the proposals of the administration. So it is the duty of the opposition, however small, to draw certain matters to the attention of the house. I wish to indicate to some of these new members just why debate is sometimes prolonged, and why I feel obliged to say something on this matter at the present time. Many hon. members are in the house today who were not in the house during the previous parliament—

Mr. Pallett: And many hon. members are not here today who were in the previous parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance had certain comments to make on this bill about some economies he had introduced as a result of a few months of office. I just want to say to the new members that sometimes debate would not be so prolonged if some of the ministers introducing bills would stick to the facts and not engage in overmuch boasting or what I call peacocking about. Very quickly after assuming office the Minister of Finance gave a press interview on June 26, 1957, indicating there would be vast reductions in expenditure and economies as a result of the elimination of extravagances which he expected to find. And probably, in deference to that very widely publicized statement which was made in June, the minister felt obliged in December, when he was making a financial statement, to make certain assertions to the house which I suggest do not hold water. Then the other day when he introduced a resolution preceding this bill he did the same thing and I suggest to hon. members that that is why there is an obligation on those of us who do not accept such assertions in an unqualified way to make some remarks at this time.

On December 6, 1957, the Minister of Finance in his financial statement which was sometimes called the baby budget but which was in fact a discussion of the first item of the estimates of the finance department of that year, felt obliged to stick out his chest and assert that the new administration was providing economies to the extent of some $170 million. We know that $100 million of that had reference to two provisions which had been cautiously put into the budget for the year by his predecessor with respect to sums which will eventually have to be paid. If these are eliminated from the accounts of last year there is nobody who studies the accounts of this country who does not know that both those items of $50 million each will eventually be a charge on the taxpayers —it was simply a matter of whether the expenditure would be deferred until another year or whether it would be taken in the accounts of the fiscal year which the hon. minister's predecessor proposed. One was an allowance against the reserve for assets and the other was a $50 million appropriation for a deficiency which actuaries tell us is in the superannuation account and must be made up sometime.

The minister indicated, of course, that beyond this there were some other things which he took great pride in claiming as economies and as savings due to the elimination of waste as a result of the change of administation. Again, not being too anxious to get legislation of this kind through in the present session when we had our first reference to governor general's warrants and appropriations for supply, in the new parliament on May 13 the Minister of Finance said he had succeeded in reducing the amount of the estimates which had been drawn up—he was referring to last year, the year we are discussing now—and tabled by the previous government that by efforts—I emphasize efforts—in the various departments of government the sum of $73.6 million had been eliminated.

It is bold, unjustified and boastful assertions of that kind which demand a reply. I have checked, and I find it is not unusual to have in almost every year what are known as lapses. The public accounts of 1956-57 which were tabled this session indicate that the lapsing—the items that have been put earlier into the book of estimates but which at the end of the year were not fully spent—amounted to $86 million or 3 per cent. In the previous year 1955-56 lapsing amounted to $136 million or 4 per cent. I may say that none of these items have any reference to such items as appear in the document we will be studying more closely in a few minutes entitled "Loans investment and working capital advances". In the year before that, 1954-55 lapsing amounted to $359 million or 11 per cent, and in 1953-54 lapsing amounted to $309 million or 9½ per cent. So I do not want new members to take seriously some of these assertions in introducing a measure of this kind such as I think the Minister of Finance is a little too prone to make. He is introducing a financial statement and I think we would make better progress if it was divorced from provocative political assertions which I think after examination do not bear much examination.

Similarly, when we discuss warrants and general business administration under appropriation bills we find it necessary to return to another assertion which, I say, was completely, political and unjustified, namely, the assertion by the Prime Minister in the course of the election campaign when he took a lot of figures together which totalled, I think, $1,185 millions. He referred to these as being public works items which would help to deal with the employment situation. Two hundred and eighty million dollars of this amount, he said, would be spent in the last quarter of the last fiscal year ending on March 31, 1957 and the impression was given to the public that this was something unique, something wonderful and different by reason of the right hon. gentleman's administration. We are dealing this afternoon with the appropriations which were recommended under the governor general's warrant including the last quarter of the last fiscal year, because parliament was not then sitting and instead of there being any increase in the category of public works and work-creating measures there were actually, in several categories, reductions under governor general's warrants as compared with the proposals which were introduced by the previous administration.

I might say in passing that this business of lapsing is a fairly normal one and when one looks at the time table of the preparation of government business and estimates one can readily understand how that would come about. The estimates are for the fiscal year commencing in April and they are normally examined by the treasury board and finally approved before Christmas in order that the blue book of estimates for the new year commencing April 1 which we all receive shortly after parliament opens can be printed. One therefore recognizes that when the Minister of Finance in December 1957 made reference to certain economies against the background of the book of estimates prepared by his predecessor he was referring to estimates which had been prepared a year earlier. Consequently one can understand that there would be certain changes of plans and that within three months of the conclusion of the fiscal year every department of government could probably foresee, either some delay in getting plans or materials ready or the postponement and in some cases the abandonment of projects which it had seemed desirable to put in hand 12 months earlier. That is actually what we are dealing with now, but when I challenged the minister with it on August 20 when we were dealing with the resolution which proceeded the introduction of this bill, I obtained no reply.

One can look at the column in the bill which refers to things that the minister has always asserted were economies and savings. I asked him very definitely how much of this actually represented the cancellation of programs and the elimination of plans and how much was really in fact a simple deferment of the things we would be called upon to revote and doubtless in the current fiscal year. Perhaps the minister will recall some of the illustrations I gave him. Since that debate on August 20 we have had several references in this house to some of the larger items of this $73 million so called savings item.

We had a statement the other day from the ministry pointing out that they take pride in the fact that there was a step-up in sales of wheat and flour as a result of our contributions under the Colombo plan. I pointed out that the saving of ten million on the appropriation of last year would doubtless be picked up in the current year. We examined the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) with respect to maritime freight rates on Saturday and where there was a claim for an economy there we found it was a statutory item. I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) whether or not the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had gone to him and asked him to scrimp a little bit with respect to disability pensions and veterans allowances. I could tell from the smile on the face of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and knowing him as I do that no economy was attempted in that sphere as claimed.

But nonetheless items of this kind are all part and parcel of this $73 million that has been presented to the people as savings and economies as a result of a change of administration. I say that interestingly enough they compare with the lapsing and normal procedure that concludes the final accounting of every fiscal year of which I have given an illustration for four or five years.

The biggest item of the $73-odd million, of course, refers to the Department of National Defence. Here there is a claim of a saving of some $32 million. Again I have looked to the relationship between the maximum amount voted by parliament in previous years and the amount that might be expended by that department when the final accounts for the year are completed. In 1956-57 which is the last year which the Auditor General has reported upon to this house I found there was a lapsing in National Defence Department of $15,990,000. The previous year 1955-56 there was an underspending, shall I call it, of some $25 million and in the year before 1954-55 the underspending was no less than $242 million.

On December 5 in the last session I tried, I thought fairly valiantly, as did Mr. Henderson the former hon. member for Kingston, to get some breakdown in detail with respect to the savings that were represented in this item of $32 million. We were not very successful in our attempt. In a broad way we received some information from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) which appears on page 1903 of Hansard. I will not repeat that in too much detail but it refers to such an economy as the transfer of the ship Labrador from his department to the Department of Transport. It also refers to the cancellation of further production with respect to the CF-100 aircraft. I have no doubt that probably any administration examining an item that had been decided upon one year earlier with respect to something as volatile as decisions in the aircraft business would probably have reached that decision.

There was also some boasting about savings in travelling expenses of the troops. We have had a very extensive study of the defence department expenditures in the estimates committee and we found that there is to be a savings this year with respect to transportation but when we probed as to the reason we found that this is not one of the years when there will be a rotation of the troops in Europe which is an extremely expensive proposition and that it has now been decided to do this every three years and any very large saving is accounted for by this. It is such an attractive suggestion to say to the public that one has reduced travelling expenses!

This is just an illustration of the undesirability in presenting what is essentially a business statement of introducing it with preliminaries that are definitely of a political character and must receive challenge in an assembly such as this. It is in the public interest that that be done.

As the minister has said, we have discussed the general question of governor general's warrants previously. We have done so on May 13 and 14. We discussed the Financial Administration Act on July 29 and I made reference to the history of bringing to this parliament an examination of these warrants at that time as I did on August 19 as reported at page 3766 of Hansard and on August 20 as reported at page 3822 of Hansard. I wish to point out, however, without repeating myself that there certainly is a Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde complex on the part of the Minister of Finance. When we regard his appreciation of the rights of parliament with respect to supply when he was sitting in opposition and the attempt that was made on February 1 by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) to say that the law would be satisfied irrespective of historic practice if the Minister of Finance simply announced his governor general's warrants to the house without debate.

The minister, of course, said we had had debate. We had it because we were debating on a point of order and not because the government decided to give us that historic privilege. I also wish to remind the minister that in the debate on May 14 we had a little argument as to just how much of the estimates of the 1957-58 fiscal year had received attention in the committee of supply in the last parliament and I think he said that more than one half had been approved. It is true that we had interim supply bills with respect to the ten-twelfths and in some instances with respect to the eleven-twelfths but I find that only five departments received discussion that could in any way be considered fairly full and six departments received partial consideration before dissolution of the parliament of last year. We also noted that the departments which were of particular public interest because of the economic crisis did not come before parliament at all. I refer to the Department of Labour, the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport.

I must say we are grateful that there was a change of mind and heart with respect to the decision about giving us no opportunity in the committee of supply to consider governor general's warrants in some detail, a tradition that has existed since time immemorial. I congratulate the Minister of Finance for the form in which the information has been prepared. It was available at the time of the resolution and also appears as an appendix to the bill. I have no doubt that in committee we will be able to proceed item by item if there is a desire, and this is a very convenient form of discussion.

Before concluding I wish to say that I have noticed all throughout this session another extremely undesirable practice setting in and some reference was made to it the other day by the Leader of the Opposition and myself; that is that we are asked in committee of supply to give consideration to the activities of the departments without having available the latest official report on the activities of the department. I believe it was an oversight, but it happens that the second biggest spending department of the government actually broke the law. There is a statute which says that within a certain period of time they must provide the House of Commons with a report on the activities of the department. I refer to the Department of National Health and Welfare which is making expenditures, statutory and items in the estimates, that exceed $1,200 million. We found to our great surprise and inconvenience, and to our great loss in the value of our work in committee, that when we were asked to examine the estimates of the Department of National Defence very closely in committee—and we spent a lot of time on them—we were greatly handicapped to find that for the first time for years we had neither a white paper which previous ministers had always prepared for the use of parliament in advance of the discussion of the ministers' estimates nor alternatively, and usually both, the annual report.

I admit immediately that to our great surprise when we examined the statute with respect to the Department of National Defence we found that there was no statutory obligation to submit an annual report to parliament. I think that that should be drawn to the attention of the administration. It is the biggest spending department; it is spending $1,700 million. I do feel that annually this house and the public at large should not be deprived of a statement, either a white paper or an annual report, or both. I can certainly say that when one who is not naturally abreast of the developments of this sphere is asked to give hours and hours of attention in close study in committees, which are meeting several times a week for two hours at a stretch, one is exceedingly handicapped when he finds that the last available information to him is something that happened in 1956. Surely that is a sphere upon which we must be up to date if we are to bring effective thought and criticism to bear upon it.

I want to point out that there may be other instances, but I think that this is a tendency that must be deplored. I do not think my hon. friend can suggest very many precedents for this in the past unless the calendar was responsible for it. It was not something that was too coincidental or, shall I say, deliberate? Maybe this sessions events are not deliberate. But perhaps there was no department this session that we were more concerned about examining with the best possible background than the Department of Labour.

I found that within a few days after the minister was released with respect to his estimates we were able to get in our mail boxes the last annual report of that department. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) indicated to the house the other day in an inquiry of the minister, which may be found at page 4162 of Hansard that the very important report of the advisory council with respect to unemployment insurance was available to the cabinet on July 31. In the meantime, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) had his estimates before the committee of supply. A couple of days after he was released and his estimates passed we got this report in our mail boxes. I say there is something radically wrong in what seems to be the trend in this respect, and I must advance the strongest possible protest. Our opposition may not be too large but because of the fact the government, as never before in the history of this country, has so many supporters one would think it would be all the more anxious to make sure that the best possible information at the earliest possible date is made available to the opposition. I can recall the many eloquent speeches of my hon. friend in the past, advancing the importance of the role of the opposition in our parliamentary life and government.

There are some items in the schedule that I should like to ask the minister about. Perhaps in particular we shall hear from him at the committee stage something about the old age pension situation because that transfer or an appropriation of $103 million is the largest item in the total of $114 million that comes under the category of increases and not decreases.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we in this group approve the principle of this bill which is to seek parliamentary approval for certain expenditures that were incurred without previous approval owing to the dissolution of parliament. I cannot help but bring to the attention of the house the fact that this group fought very hard last session in support of the very procedure that the government is adopting in the introduction of this bill, which at the time seemed unpopular to certain members on the government side who expressed that feeling during that debate which took the better part of an afternoon and an evening. However, we are very glad that the government has listened to our arguments, and apparently has gone over those arguments in between the sessions and by the introduction of this bill has come to the conclusion that we were right. There is no question about it, Mr. Speaker, in our opinion the government was on very shaky constitutional ground last session with respect to the failure to produce certain estimates on immigration, I think it was, when they were under discussion in the house, seeking expenditures which had been occasioned as a result of governor general's warrants.

We may have some questions to ask at the committee stage but at this time I wish to conclude by congratulating the government on its recognition of the validity of our argument last session and on its repentance in between sessions and also on its position, as a result of our appeal, in finally restoring to parliament its rights in respect of the introduction of this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): No, Mr. Speaker. I should like to say just a word or two but I am not going to make a speech. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) said that his group approved the principle of this bill. I do not think that we can approve the principle of the bill. As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) has said, we think the government has done the right thing in bringing those warrants before parliament. We think that is the proper thing to do. Of course, that is what a distinguished member of the C.C.F. party and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) both asked in the last parliament should be done. But it seems to me that if we voted for this bill we would be not only approving having warrants brought here for our consideration but we would also be giving our approval to the government in spending a great sum of money in February and March by governor general's warrants and we most emphatically do not approve of that.

Our position is that the government had no excuse whatever for that dissolution, not the slightest excuse, except the desire for power.

An hon. Member: That is over with.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, yes. Those hon. gentlemen who do not seem to understand very much what parliament is about say that that is over with, that is done. That is certainly right—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): One-man party.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly the point I was trying to make. This avid desire for power, seizing the moment regardless of parliamentary institutions, is what has made it necessary for the government to bring this bill now. The government, having got an overwhelming vote of confidence from the previous house, should have stayed here and carried on with the nation's business and had the money voted by parliament for that purpose. We feel that if we voted for this bill we would be supporting the course taken by the government which we think was not justified except, of course, by the success at the polls. While we do not contest that, we do contest as a matter of principle the way it was arrived at.

I am just going to say one word about the possible parallel. It is true that on January 25, 1940—the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) will correct me if I am wrong—parliament met in the morning and was dissolved in the evening. It is true that the government of that day did have to use governor general's warrants for the new fiscal year up until May 16, 17 or 18, 1940, when parliament did provide further money.

But I would point out that there are three very important respects in which the two situations differ. In the first place, that was already the fifth year of that parliament. There had to be an election some time during that year. We were in the midst of a war and it was very important, if at all possible, to have the election at a time when there would be the least possible disturbance of the nation and the least possible disturbance of the time of ministers; in other words, at a time before the real fighting began. By the dissolution at that date that was accomplished.

The second difference, of course, is that the government of that day had been challenged, it is true not in the house but outside it, by the premier and the leader of the opposition of the largest province and there was an urgent need to discover whether that government or some other government should be entrusted with the supreme duty of carrying on the war.

The third, and in a technical sense the most important respect in which the two situations differ, is that supply had already been voted months before right up until March 31 so that there was no question of using warrants while the election was on. There was no question of using warrants before the election which, if my memory serves me correctly, was on March 26 and, of course, supply had been provided until March 31. Whatever the outcome of that election it would have been a government with a fresh mandate from the people which would have used warrants for the short interim period between the election and the opening of parliament.

My attention has been drawn by the member for Kenora-Rainy River in this connection to something said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) when he was sitting on this side of the house. In a debate on interim supply on April 28, 1949, he said, as found at page 2698 of Hansard:

—the government had moved closer to the election and they had carefully investigated all aspects of their supply problem, because when the Prime Minister arrived in Ottawa last Saturday on his return from his western tour he was met by the press and this question of supply came up. If you please, sir, the Prime Minister informed the press that financial supply could be authorized by governor general's warrants instead of by votes in the House of Commons. That is the statement of the Prime Minister. Why are we here? Sir, we are apparently just going through some motions here, because the government has already decided that whether it gets a vote of interim supply or not, it is going to spend whatever money it wishes to spend between now and the date on which the new parliament will assemble. Did you ever see, sir, any more bare-faced renunciation of responsibility——to parliament, any clearer evidence of the fact that this government has treated parliament, is treating it today as it has treated it hitherto, with studied contempt? This was a carefully calculated statement by the Prime Minister and we may be sure that he made it after due consideration.

This is the Minister of Finance speaking about Mr. St. Laurent.

What happened in 1949? In 1949 we—not "we"; I was not here—the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and other hon. members, including the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You were right the first time.

Mr. Pickersgill: —sat here until supply was voted by parliament. Mr. St. Laurent did not get in an aeroplane, say he was going to Winnipeg, land in Quebec and come back with dissolution in his pocket. He conducted himself in the proper constitutional fashion, as the Minister of Finance said he should have done. He did not show the contempt for parliament which, according to the Minister of Finance, was shown to the previous parliament on the first of February.

For these reasons and many others I could add we cannot support second reading of the bill.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I am wondering about the convenience of the committee. On May 14, of course, the minister made a very wide but proper assurance that we would be able to have a fairly complete debate if desired on these items, such as we might have had in committee of supply if they had been brought forward in the usual way. I do not anticipate there will be an extensive debate, but I am just wondering about the best method of proceeding. Perhaps without calling the individual items unless some hon. member should require more detail, it would be possible, for example, to call the department and then the sub-heading of the department?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That will be quite agreeable, Mr. Chairman. I understand the hon. gentleman is suggesting that when we reach the schedule you would simply call agriculture, for instance, then administration service, science service, experimental farms service, and so on.

Mr. Benidickson: That is right; unless somebody wants something more detailed.

The Chairman: Is that procedure agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Purposes, terms and conditions.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, clause 4 raises one question in my mind. Is there any significance in subclause 2 about the date being set at April 1?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clause 4 is in part new. It is proposed that the new form here should become the standard form in appropriation bills. This is based on a recommendation of the legal advisers in the Department of Justice. The hon. gentleman will recall that we had a counterpart of clause 4, subclause 1 in the interim supply bills this year. Clause 4, subclause 2 purports to be simply a statement of the legal position as it has been understood hitherto to be in connection with the final appropriation bill. It is simply a confirmatory statement, and it is proposed now that this should be the standard form used in appropriation bills.

Mr. Benidickson: I am glad of that explanation. The hon. gentleman will not think I am rude if I say he must be a little suspect on a bill of this kind because on February 1 last he had advice similarly from the Department of Justice and they told him the warrants should not necessarily come before us at all for an examination such as we are now having. I take it that the departments have 15 days after the end of the fiscal year in which to tidy up their accounts, during which period they would still be included in the fiscal year ending March 31. This is perhaps a result of that practice and it probably makes the position a little clearer.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Benidickson: I realize we are one day into the fiscal year and that arouses curiosity.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not the reason for it at all. The hon. gentleman is referring to a provision in the Financial Administration Act. This provision in this bill is simply intended to clarify and confirm what has always been understood to be the effect of the appropriation acts, I am informed.

Mr. Benidickson: Why is it April 1 instead of March 31?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because that is the first day of the fiscal year in respect of which this supply applies.

Mr. Benidickson: Of course. A year back.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

On the schedule.

The Chairman: Agriculture, experimental farms service.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a reduction here of $312,000. Was this merely that the building program was not completely carried out, or was something eliminated? This is under the heading construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Construction was delayed pending the establishment of a new animal centre and satellite farm.

Mr. Pickersgill: It did not represent a saving, just a delay?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was delayed for the reason I have indicated.

The Chairman: Shall the item headed "Special" carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I should like to make a comment on this respecting one of the items which comes in the column headed "Not Yet Authorized". It refers to the agricultural commodities stabilization account to cover the net operating loss of the agricultural commodities stabilization board as at March 31, 1958. Hon. members will recognize on looking at the column to the extreme left that the previous administration, when they drew up the budget item for 1957-58 put in—I do not know whether it was a nominal or a realistic figure, but it looks close to the total actually required—put a figure in their estimates of $8 million in respect of what would have to be raised by taxation and so on.

I notice here that we have a request for an additional grant which amounts to $988,544. This, I think, has extra significance in that as I read the estimates for 1958-59 there is nothing similar to the provision of $5 million which was made last year. It is true that the Minister of Finance when he calculated his possible large deficit for the current fiscal year warned us that it did not include anything for the agricultural commodities stabilization account. But we have already had a debate on the agricultural estimates and I think very little information was given with respect to payments of this kind except with respect to fruit. I wonder if the minister would indicate what products have resulted in this deficit? The minister and I probably do not see eye to eye on just whether we are appropriating or what we are doing under this bill, but hon. members will recognize the asterisk in the extreme right column. It is a very exceptional item because the other items are, for the most part claimed savings. This is an addition and I wonder if the minister would explain the necessity for the extra amount?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I explained on August 19 and 20 on the resolution stage there are three items of a transfer nature, this being one of them, where we took the actual amount as the figure to be inserted for this purpose in the supply bill. Ordinarily it is an estimated figure, but by reason of the fact that with the passing of the date March 31, 1958 we have the precise amount of the deficit and are providing for it we have used the exact figure. The hon. gentleman will see on page 7 of the report on supply an explanation of the asterisk. The figure of $988,544 is the difference between the estimated deficit provided for in the estimates and the actual deficit reported.

The other two items in this same category are Nos. 803 and 820. I mentioned these three items in particular at the resolution stage. They cover respectively deficits in the agricultural commodity stabilization account, the lobster trap indemnity account and the old age security fund.

Mr. Benidickson: I was wondering, though, if the minister would give us the detail of the losses that occasioned this vote under the agricultural commodities stabilization account?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no one particular loss to which this can be ascribed. It is just the total and the actual figures will appear in the public accounts when they are audited.

Mr. Benidickson: That, of course, is perfectly true. I think the Auditor General is not obligated to submit his public accounts and statements until about December 30 of this year. But on the other hand we want to keep up to date on the commodities that are involving some cost to the treasury. In the debate this year on this year's estimates with respect to the agricultural commodities stabilization account I believe the Minister of Agriculture indicated that only one product that was subject to stabilization was actually at a price that was less than the market price and consequently I believe there would be interest in the country respecting losses incurred prior to March 31 of this year. Is there a major product?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend wishes details on that I will obtain them for him and send them to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is another item of interest here. I notice that $400,000 of the appropriation for the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act was not spent. Could the minister tell us about that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That amount was not required by reason of construction delays beyond the department's control.

The Chairman: Shall atomic energy control board carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: This large sum of $2,700,000 does not appear to have been spent at Deep River. Is that a permanent saving?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In April 1957, Mr. Chairman, construction of the nuclear power demonstrator reactor was suspended for major redesign work which continued throughout the fiscal year. Construction began again in the summer of 1958.

Mr. Benidickson: So this apparent saving for the last fiscal year might very well be in our expenditures for the current fiscal year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friends will have an opportunity to deal with that in the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce in relation to atomic energy. I believe they have not yet been reviewed in the committee of supply for this coming year.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a very large item involving $2,700,000. It simply emphasizes the point I made not only today but earlier that when savings of $73 million are claimed they involve in large part a simple deferment of expenditures.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, item No. 54 under the heading "Atomic Energy of Canada Limited", research program, reads as follows:

Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment and to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to undertake construction of works at Deep River for Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited.

I understand that Deep River is now an incorporated village under the municipal act. I am just wondering why there is an expenditure of $7,400,000 included when the status of Deep River has been changed in the last 12 months. Perhaps the minister could give me an explanation of that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There will be an opportunity on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, under the items respecting the atomic energy control board, to discuss that. I understand those items have not yet been reached in the committee of supply.

The Chairman: Shall Canadian Broadcasting Corporation carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could explain this. Was it just a difference between the estimates? What actually was the deficit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, an upturn in revenue from the special excise tax in the latter months of the year made it possible to reduce the grant toward the deficit.

The Chairman: Shall immigration branch under the heading "Citizenship and Immigration" carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, hon. members will recognize that here we have another unusual item. It is an increase and, of course, I know it refers to one of the governor general's warrants of the summer of 1957 shortly after the election of the new government. Would the minister please explain this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this item is one that was provided by governor general's warrant. The explanation is to be found on page 9 of the report of supply, in explanation of the asterisk. It reads:

In addition to the amounts shown in tabled estimates, $2,428,000 was authorized by special governor general's warrant of August 19, 1957 (P.C. 1957-1134).

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

This is the amount that was required to provide largely for the Hungarian refugees who were coming into Canada and for the support of whom insufficient had been provided in the estimates.

Mr. Benidickson: This, I think, is the key to the whole reason for departure from making it open to the committee of supply to debate governor general's warrants in subsequent sessions of parliament. We all know that we had an election in June of 1957 and the administration that replaced the old one on June 10 of that year made a great deal of political capital about what had been done for Hungarian refugees. I am quite confident that the reason there was a desire to not have subsequently a debate about governor general's warrants was the fact that while they had criticized not only these allowances but their immigration itself even though the recent minister of citizenship and immigration, the present Minister of Justice, told my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that he had not gone far enough with Hungarian immigration. I believe this is the item that explains the whole reason why the new government departed from the traditional system of giving an opportunity in subsequent books of estimates and in subsequent meetings of the committee of supply to debate any item that was involved in the governor general's warrants.

One will see here extra funds were required by the new administration for this purpose. They apparently decided it was desirable and in the public interest and should be continued and they went to the governor general and got the warrant to make that possible. But in so far as bringing it up in the subsequent session of parliament for debate was concerned, they tried to avoid it and I well realize it was because of what they had to say in the 1957 election campaign.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the amount in question was provided by special warrant and the purpose of it is described as follows. Perhaps I should read the warrant:

Pursuant to order in council P.C. 1957-1134 of 19th August, 1957, the Minister of Finance and Receiver General is hereby authorized to pay, out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the consolidated revenue fund, the sum of $2,428,000 (in addition to the sums already granted under vote 71 by the Appropriation Act, No. 3, 1957, and the Appropriation Act, No. 4, 1957) to provide, subject to the approval of treasury board, for expenditures in respect of transoceanic and inland transportation and other assistance for immigrants and settlers, including care en route and while awaiting employment.

That warrant was duly gazetted. It appeared in the Canada Gazette of August 31, 1957, and a copy of it was tabled in this house at the beginning of the next session, in October, 1957.

The Chairman: Shall Indian affairs branch carry? Shall national gallery of Canada carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I notice that the amount in the estimates was $130,000; the amount authorized was $108,334. I also notice that in the estimates we passed the other day this amount was cut down to $100,000. Is it the policy of the present administration to reduce the annual grants to the national gallery?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would not be proper for me to make any comment on the 1958-59 estimate. So far as the 1957-58 item now before the committee is concerned, I simply point out that when the warrant was issued in early February we did not go one cent beyond existing commitments. That is the reason for the reduction of $21,666.

Mr. Pickersgill: What does the minister mean by "existing commitments"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Existing commitments as at the date of the issuance of the warrant. My hon. friend will recall that the special warrant in question was issued on February 7.

Mr. Pickersgill: I presume the minister means that this amount represented the difference between 10 months and 12 months, or does it go up to February 7?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It means that in drawing the warrant on February 7, so far as purchases for the gallery are concerned, there was none provided for, for the remainder of the fiscal year to March 31. In other words, the appropriations at that point stopped with the commitments as they stood at that date.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not quite understand. I may be exceedingly stupid about this, but I do not understand what the minister means by "commitments" because he surely realizes that whatever is appropriated is paid into the purchase account. There is no question of any commitment of any kind. The government decides to recommend how much parliament should have to pay into the purchase account and the gallery may not have spent that that year at all. It had been the practice for a number of years to appropriate $130,000 for this purpose and I would have thought, this being in the estimates and fractions of it having been voted on two or three occasions, it was an implication on the part of the government that they intended to appropriate the full amount for the fiscal year. I do not think we were given any indication up to February 1 that this amount was going to be cut. I could be wrong about that. I just wonder whether that is so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In submitting to His Excellency in early February the warrant for his approval the cabinet considered that in this respect it should not go beyond the commitments that then existed. If parliament had been sitting and had chosen to come forward and appropriate the full $130,000 that would have been one thing; but in drawing the warrant for submission to His Excellency for his approval cabinet felt that it should not go beyond the commitment existing at that date.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not understand what the minister means by "commitment", commitment to whom?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are actual commitments for purchases of paintings at the date the warrant was drawn.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister sure of that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can he produce any evidence of that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the information I received.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say I would like more than just that statement to satisfy me. However, if I cannot get it, I cannot get it.

The Chairman: Shall civil service commission carry? Shall defence production department, A, carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps my remarks would be related to all the items of so-called savings under defence production. I note they total not quite a million dollars? These, of course, are all part and parcel of the claim that $73 million of savings had been created. These are items of capital assistance for construction and for defence construction, I think largely housing, for service people in the forces. Are these real cancellations of the program or are they deferments?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is my hon. friend referring specifically to item 89?

Mr. Benidickson: Items 89, 91 and 92.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps we had better take them one at a time. Item 89 provides for capital assistance. There was a deceleration of the production of the CF-105, a cancellation of certain equipment for that plane and a lower than anticipated cost for the FN rifle project. That figure is $499,265.

Then, on item 90, which is the provision for payment of grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown-owned defence plants, the difference of $26,000 is accounted for by the fact that under the terms of lease with Canadian Pratt and Whitney Limited that company will pay the taxes on the plant at Longueuil. Under item 91, under crown companies, there was a slow-down in the over-all defence construction, accounting for the reduction of $211,021.

Item 93, under Canadian Arsenals Limited, the difference was owing to the same cause.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the minister very kindly drew to my attention when we were on the resolution stage the five items before us that are dollar items.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, there are five.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think I have a quarrel with respect to the others but I am curious about the fact that there is no language to explain the reason for $1 for administration and operation of Canadian Arsenals Limited. Is that simply for the purpose of debate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Under Canadian Arsenals Limited, the item is provided to permit the operation of the plant. It is a matter of purchases and sales, and this is the item under which discussion can be had.

Mr. Benidickson: There are some crown companies that have not even got an item of $1 in our estimates. Is that so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, there are some crown companies, it is true, to which there is no direct reference in the items of the estimates. My hon. friend can recall some, for instance, that report to departments such as defences production or trade and commerce and which are normally discussed for that reason under the first item of those departments.

The Chairman: Shall external affairs carry?

Mr. Pearson: There is a reduction in item 97 of $356,000, for construction, maintenance and rental of buildings abroad. Is this merely a deferment of the construction program or is it an abandonment of some part of the program which had been planned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The proposal for construction of a chancellery in Canberra and the residence in Brussels was not proceeded with last year. The department's limited technical resources were fully occupied with other projects.

Mr. Benidickson: None the less, is it going ahead this year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I will have to leave my hon. friend to raise that point on the 1958-1959 estimates.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Pearson: I think the 1958-59 estimate has shown that they were proceeding with them this year.

The Chairman: Shall general carry? Shall North Atlantic treaty organization carry? Shall international civil aviation organization carry? Shall international joint commission carry? Shall terminable services carry?

Mr. Pearson: There is an item here, 797, which shows a reduction of $10 million for the purchase of wheat and flour to be given to India, Pakistan and Ceylon to relieve food shortages. Would the minister be good enough to explain to the committee what this reduction means because it is our understanding that these amounts have been increased this year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They have been increased this year. So far as this item is concerned, arrangements for shipment could not be completed before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Benidickson: So that particular saving of $10 million also out of the $73 million did not require all the hard work that the minister said he was going to put into savings and economies compared with the previous estimates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item is not one related to economy. This is an item that was provided for last year and for the reason I have given, because arrangements for shipment could not be completed before the end of the fiscal year, the money was not required. But my hon. friend is well aware of the program in the 1958-59 estimates.

Mr. Pearson: I take it that the result of this would be that in the wheat statistics of the previous year this amount of $10 million will not show. There will be a reduction to that extent and that $10 million will be shown in the current statistics of wheat and flour shipments under the new vote.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. Obviously nothing is going to be shown as applied to 1957-58 that was not provided in that year. The figure for 1958-59 will make the provision intended for the present fiscal year.

Mr. McIlraith: It is not quite as simple as that. This is the item in the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce where he tried to show the sharply increased wheat exports this year in terms of bushels of wheat exported. That is something I think we are all very glad to see but in his effort to do so it was not clearly demonstrated that there was a comparison made with the previous year whereas there were merely deferred shipments that had been provided for in the previous year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend realizes that this is only part of the item. There was provision made for $15 million of which wheat to the extent of $5 million was shipped.

Mr. McIlraith: I quite realize that, Mr. Chairman, but I want to point out that this is the very difficulty we were trying to have clarified on the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was not present when they were being discussed.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one question I am sure the minister can answer. When did this $15 million first appear in the estimates? I suppose the minister should tell me that I ought to look that up myself but I have not done it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It appeared in the supplementary estimates which were tabled last autumn. I will have to obtain the exact date for my hon. friend, but I think it was in the further supplementary estimates, No. 2.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, it was anticipated in the autumn that $15 million would be required and in fact only $5 million was required before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hope was that arrangements could be made for shipment of the full amount covered by the sum proposed to be appropriated. Part of it was shipped, but not all.

Mr. Benidickson: But this is one of the items of the $73.6 million referred to on page 18 of Hansard of this session when the minister was dealing with accounts for the previous year, when he said savings had been effected.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would not be able to answer that question without looking it up. I know it is part of the items I referred to on August 19 at the resolution stage.

Mr. Pearson: There is an item here, 795, for the provision of technical assistance to the West Indies and to Ghana and a saving of $135,000 is shown. I take it that is merely a deferment of that expenditure to the current year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That program was initiated in February, 1958, which left less than two months before the close of the fiscal year. Within that short period of time it was possible to post only a small number of technical experts prior to March 31. The hon. gentleman is aware of the plans for technical assistance to the West Indies in the fiscal year 1958-59.

Mr. McIlraith: Would that explanation not mean that the provision of the item of $150,000 in the previous estimates when they were presented would be quite misleading because it was obvious that the money would not be spent in that fiscal year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not misleading at all. Parliament was asked to provide the money, and every attempt was made to employ and post technical experts. However, in the time available it was not possible to post more than a small number of technical experts prior to March 31. It was not for lack of effort, I can assure the committee.

Mr. McIlraith: What item is this in last year's estimates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is item 795.

The Chairman: Shall terminable services carry? Shall finance, general administration carry? Shall administration of various acts and costs of special functions carry? Shall public debt charges carry? Shall payments to municipalities carry? Shall contingencies and miscellaneous carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I am not as familiar as I should be with the Financial Administration Act. This, of course, is an item to delete from the accounts certain debts due to and claims of Her Majesty, each of which is in excess of $1,000, amounting in the aggregate to $627,411.15. Will these appear specifically in the public accounts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend is referring to item 689?

Mr. Benidickson: No, 690.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend is aware of the provision that has been made in the recent amendments to the Financial Administration Act in connection with the deletion from the public accounts of debts due to Her Majesty. Item 690 simply contains a form of authorization, which is the form employed hitherto prior to the amendment to the Financial Administration Act, under which treasury board derives authority to delete from the accounts debts due and claims of Her Majesty, each of which is in excess of $1,000, amounting in the aggregate to $627,000 odd.

Mr. Benidickson: Do they appear in the public accounts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, they do.

Mr. Benidickson: Because I notice that 689 appears to be in the form of legislation.

I do not know whether or not this is something we have done before but in 689 it does say specifically that these items shall be reported in the public accounts whereas under 690 the same clear provision is not present.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are referring to two different things.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Originally when 689 was introduced it was intended to authorize the making of regulations by treasury board providing for the deletion from the accounts of certain debts due Her Majesty. It was our feeling that sort of item should not be a method of legislation. That was the reason for introducing specific and continuing statutory authority.

Mr. Benidickson: It is superseded by the recent amendment to the Financial Administration Act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Recently, yes.

The Chairman: Shall contingencies and miscellaneous carry? Shall special carry? Shall general items of payroll costs including superannuation payments carry? Shall university grants carry? Shall miscellaneous grants carry? Shall fisheries, general services, carry? Shall field services carry? Shall international commissions carry? Shall special carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: On special, Mr. Chairman, item 159 is to provide for the operation and maintenance of the Newfoundland bait service. I notice there was a reduction of $100,000. Could the minister tell us what occasioned that reduction?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, it was not found possible to proceed as quickly as had been expected with the construction of bait facilities at Bonavista, Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought that was it, and I wanted to say that I still think they are not being proceeded with nearly as rapidly as they should be. As the minister is well aware, there is a very serious shortage of bait in Newfoundland. I do hope he will urge the Minister of Fisheries to do his utmost to see that this delay is not continued any longer than it absolutely has to be.

The Chairman: Special carried. Shall Fisheries Research Board carry? Shall governor general's and lieutenant governor's carry? Shall insurance carry? The next is Department of Justice. Shall A-Department carry? Shall penitentiaries carry?

Mr. Benidickson: This item 184 is one of the larger items and there has been a saving claimed of $1 million. Is this a deferment also?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This reduction was made in committee of supply itself on January 10, 1958 at the request of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Benidickson: Was it simply because he recognized that construction would not proceed within the fiscal year and would probably go into the accounts of the succeeding year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

The Chairman: Shall labour carry? Shall special services carry? Shall vocational training co-ordination carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: On this item there seems to be a very large saving of $4.5 million. Could the minister explain that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item 197, and the sum of $2 million had been reserved in case Quebec signed an agreement. The balance of the reduction was possible because provinces were not claiming the full amounts available in the first year of the new vocational and technical training agreement No. 2.

The Chairman: Shall government employees' compensation carry? Shall unemployment insurance carry? Shall legislation, the Senate, carry? Shall the House of Commons carry? Shall the library of parliament carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder what this saving is? Could the minister tell us?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was difficulty in recruiting cataloguing staff and that resulted in a salary saving, and there was a lesser amount spent for the purchase of books, microfilming and book repair than was originally estimated.

The Chairman: Shall pensions and other benefits carry? Mines and Technical Surveys, shall administration services carry? Shall surveys and mapping branch carry? Shall geological survey of Canada carry? Shall mines branch carry? Shall geographical branch carry? Shall dominion observatories carry? Shall general carry? Shall dominion coal board carry? National Defence, shall defence services carry? Shall general services carry?

Mr. Pearson: On national defence services, there was a very large saving of $32 million. I wonder if the minister would make a statement, and particularly inform us how much of this is due to deferment of construction?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The figure of $32 million is a net figure. The reduction is the result of decreases, at least in the national defence estimates, on portions other than that applicable to defence research board, which is offset in part by an increase in the provision made for the defence research board. I can give the committee a breakdown, if that is desired.

The decreases are as follows: Departmental administration, $380,000; inspection services, $1,604,267; navy, $6,270,206; army, $20,752,000; air, $6,614,142; defence expenditures by other departments, transport $750,000; mutual aid, $10,716,385, for a total of $47,087,000. There was an offsetting increase in the provision for the defence research board of $15,000,087, resulting in a net reduction of $32 million.

Mr. Pearson: Could the minister give the committee any indication of the proportion of this saving of $32 million that appears in the current estimates. In other words, how much of this is deferment of expenditure?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as the relationship of the 1958-59 estimates is concerned, that was fully discussed before the estimates committee. It is there as a matter of record. This subject was gone into on a return made to a question put in that committee by the hon. member for Levis.

The Chairman: Shall pensions and other benefits carry? Shall national film board carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the sentiments about the film board that used to be expressed by the Minister of Finance when he was on this side of the house, was he not able to find any economies in this service?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is my hon. friend referring to any particular item?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, to the over-all picture.

The Chairman: National health and welfare, departmental administration, shall that carry? Shall health services carry? Shall general health branch carry? Shall grants to health organizations carry? Shall special carry? Shall welfare branch carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Was not something provided in connection with this particular item by the previous minister of finance in the way of a definite transfer item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For the old age security fund?

Mr. Benidickson: On the old age pensions item you have in the estimates, on the extreme left, $103 million. I take it that when the governor general's warrant was drawn up it was decided to include nothing in respect of this fund. I have every reason to understand why that might be the case. I take it that the original estimate is to be exceeded by almost a million dollars, nine hundred and some odd thousand. What is the present position of the fund? I have a Canadian Press dispatch from Harold Morrison which has been widely quoted throughout the country, and I am sure before preparing his article he saw the officials of the department. The article was prepared after the commencement of the new fiscal year. He said it was expected that the total disbursement from the fund this year would be about $555 million, which would be a rise of $118 million over last year, and it was felt that the special taxes that are allocated to the fund would amount to $330 million which would leave a deficit of $225 million. The minister and I had some discussion on that phase at the time of the budget debate and he had some calculations. Then, I think he thought the deficit would be $190 million; I am not sure of that, but I think it was $190 million. It is two months or more since we have had a discussion on this matter. Would the minister make any comment as to whether or not he has a new forecast as to the probable deficit in the fund if new regulations are not provided?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I would not care to attempt any new forecast with respect to the present fiscal year, 1958-59, so far as the deficit of the fund for the year 1957-58 is concerned, I think my hon. friend is under a misapprehension in saying that some provision was made in that behalf by my predecessor. The statutes provide for crediting to that fund the proceeds from the 2-2-2 formula. That is a matter of statute law, it is not a matter of provision in the estimates, but it has been customary—

Mr. Benidickson: To guess at it in advance of the year end.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —at the end of each fiscal year to ask parliament to vote a sum of money to pay the deficit in the fund because the 2-2-2 formula has not been adequate to meet the charges on the fund.

In 1957 increases were made in the scale of payments in the spring of the year and further increases effective as of November last, with the result that the charges on the old age security fund have been very substantially increased and the credits to the fund continue under the 2-2-2 formula. Consequently on this basis there will be an increasing deficit in the fund.

So far as the deficit for the year 1957-58 is concerned, we are there dealing with a transfer item. The amounts were incurred as a charge on the treasury in accordance with the Old Age Security Act and here parliament is simply being asked to approve a transfer from the consolidated revenue fund to eliminate the deficit for the year 1957-58 on the old age security fund itself in the consolidated revenue fund. That is the function of this item and, as I mentioned earlier, it is one of three items where we are taking the exact amount of the deficit at March 31, 1958 rather than the estimate which had been used up to that time.

It was thought that with respect to these three deficits it would be much more satisfactory for parliament to approve a transfer to meet the deficits in their actual rather than their estimated amounts.

The Chairman: Shall civil defence carry? Shall the national research council carry? Shall national revenue, customs and excise divisions, carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: We cannot hear, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pearson: Before I was able to get to my feet you called the civil defence on which I wished to speak, Mr. Chairman. I wanted to ask the minister if he could explain this decrease in civil defence when we have learned from the Prime Minister that civil defence is becoming increasingly important in our planning for the future.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Under item 287 the report on supply shows that the sum of $1,168,347 out of the original estimate was not employed. This, in turn, was made up of two items, the first being $600,000, and the explanation of that portion is that under that the grants to the provinces funds had been provided for Quebec in case that province signed an agreement, and at the time of the warrant Quebec had not signed, so that the warrant was correspondingly reduced. The second item is one of $568,347 under materials and supplies. There were delays on some of the deliveries on items for the medical stockpiling program. This program was begun in 1952-53, and this was a matter of delay in respect of certain medical items.

The Chairman: Shall taxation division carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I think you skipped the national research council, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Chairman called that earlier but we went back.

Mr. Benidickson: Just two minutes ago I saw the Minister of National Revenue in the chamber, but he does not appear to be here at the moment. That minister knows I am interested in the attempt of the United States government to collect taxes against a Canadian company, namely, Premium Iron Ores. I have reference to an assertion referring to something said a few months ago during the fiscal year 1957-58. I know the hon. member for Port Arthur has raised this subject on several occasions but I thought a very pertinent point was that on page 77 of Hansard for May 14, 1958 he asserted that on March 27, 1958 the deputy minister of national revenue was reported as having made an indication to the United States tax collecting authorities that he had some agreement with the United States position. I know a parliamentary return has been provided to us during this session, but my recollection is that the correspondence provided to this house was between Mr. McEntyre, the deputy minister of national revenue and his opposite numbers in the United States, and completely antedated the date referred to by my hon. friend the member for Port Arthur, namely March 27, 1958, at which time it was asserted representations were made before a United States congressional committee. I also know that the references in the correspondence which are subject to a parliamentary return relate to something in the Toronto Telegram written by the well-known journalist, Miss Robinson, and her articles also antedate the date which I gave, that is March 27, 1958.

I know that in the previous administration the minister of finance, the minister of national revenue, the secretary of state for external affairs and I believe the prime minister took some interest in this matter, so I would imagine even in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Finance might know something about it. It is the date in which I am interested.

Mr. McEntyre, I know, completely denied, and in that denial was supported by his opposite numbers in the United States, that there had been an agreement or understanding between them such as was referred to in the column of Miss Robinson of about March 18 last, but my recollection is that the member for Port Arthur referred to a later date, which as I say was March 27, 1958, within the fiscal year of the items before us. I am wondering, therefore, what the Minister of Finance might tell us with respect to this problem, which I think he knows has been exercising many people in the national resources industries. Steep Rock Iron Mine is in my constituency; we have had several severe lay-offs there and expect more if this kind of double taxation discouragement should develop because it was expected that it would be avoided under our tax treaty with the United States.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This subject was very fully discussed and dealt with when the estimates of the Minister of National Revenue for 1958-59 were before the committee of supply on August 27.

Mr. Benidickson: I know that the hon. member for Port Arthur again contributed very valuably to that debate, but the reference I now make is to an assertion which was made by a United States internal revenue officer, apparently within the last fiscal year, and I wondered if that particular point had been cleared up.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know whether my hon. friend was present in the house on August 27.

Mr. Benidickson: I was not and that is why I raise this matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This matter was very fully dealt with at that time and it would not be competent for me to re-open it again on the estimates of another minister.

The Chairman: Northern Affairs and National Resources, water resources branch.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a question with regard to item 310. There is a reduction there of $300,000. I assume it is just a deferment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. Expenditure under that heading is determined by the rate of progress made by the provincial program.

The Chairman: Post Office Department.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister a question about the Post Office Department. I was under what appears to be a misapprehension, namely that the estimates of the Post Office Department were carried in the parliament before last and included in the appropriation act. If I am right, I wonder why the department is included in this bill at all.

Mr. Benidickson: I thought it was the only department that was cleared completely.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the estimates of the Post Office Department were carried and there was an appropriation bill for the purpose. If the hon. gentleman will look back at the summary on page 2 of the report on supply he will find that in the recapitulation of all the estimates for 1957-58 we have taken the aggregate of all items except statutory items and then deducted from this total the amounts voted by parliament in a series of appropriation bills. Of those six bills the third is the one which appropriated for the Post Office Department.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, this is put in to make the thing complete.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. This schedule contains the complete appropriation for the year, but the enacting clauses make it clear that parliament is being asked to appropriate only the net amount.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Privy council. Special item.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot let this pass without saying a brief word about item 723 relating to remuneration for members of the privy council. I think I should like to express once again my feeling that this was a most inappropriate and, I suggest, unconstitutional thing for the governor in council to have done.

It does seem to me that however far they might go in appropriating money for other persons it is carrying the power conferred upon the governor in council under the Financial Administration Act pretty far when it is extended to the point of handing out additional sums of money to members of the cabinet who are themselves responsible to parliament for recommending all appropriations. It does seem to me that this is a function which should have been left exclusively to parliament. I had thought the other day when we had a discussion on the Prime Minister's estimates that the right hon. gentleman was going to get an opinion from the law officers of the crown about this whole subject, and I still hope he is going to do that. I think this is a practice which ought never to occur again, and having said that I do not intend to say anything more about it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman has not added anything to what he said on a previous occasion on this subject, but so far as approval by parliament is concerned I should like to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that this item was before the previous parliament during the 1957-58 session and that parliament appropriated a portion of this amount in several of the interim supply bills. Thus there cannot be any suggestion that parliament was not aware or that parliament did not approve.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now if the minister had shown a little more forbearance I should have said nothing more on this subject, but I cannot let that pass. The other day when I spoke on this matter I read two extracts from the minister's statement made on his first interim supply bill last October. He made no mention whatsoever of this item; it was never mentioned as far as I can discover in any of the statements the minister made. It is true it was in the estimates, but the minister said what we were doing there was not in any sense final. It does seem to me that because we in the opposition conveniened the government by giving them interim supply, that the government should come forward now and say that because we gave them interim supply and because we overlooked something which was not drawn to our attention this indicated there was parliamentary approval, because there was not parliamentary approval in any except the most technical sense. And we were considerably abused, if I remember correctly the minister's speech at that time—his manners have somewhat improved since then, I might add—for holding up interim supply as long as we did. I admit it was perfectly legal to make those payments up to January 31 on the basis of the interim supply which was voted, but I think it was a very improper thing and an unconstitutional thing for the government to have done it in the hole and corner in which they did, without the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister coming here and telling us what was being done. I think it was a wholly inexcusable thing to appropriate further moneys under the Financial Administration Act by governor general's warrant for this purpose.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Federal district commission.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to comment on the last item, the item which has to do with the provision of $2 million a year toward the national capital fund. As was explained by the Prime Minister on his estimates, this is merely a deferment of a payment. It was shown in last year's accounting as a saving whereas in fact it is not a saving at all, and it appears this year in the estimates for 1958-59 in addition to the regular item of $300,000.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): National library.

Mr. Pickersgill: Here, again, I asked the hon. lady who presides over this department, during the discussion of her estimates the other evening, if she could explain to me why the item of $40,000 which had been put into Mr. Harris' estimates for the purpose of acquiring books had been reduced to $33,334. It was the last question addressed to the minister on her estimates. I said I did not wish to hold up the committee because the minister had no answer available. This is not intended as criticism of the hon. lady, because she was not the minister at the time and I did not see any special reason why she should have known. But here again it seems to be a rather extraordinary reduction to have been made, and I notice that the item is again $40,000 this year.

I wonder if the minister could explain how this item came to be reduced, because the policy which has been followed is, I think, a well understood one. I am glad the minister and the department have gone back to an appropriation of $40,000 a year for this account.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item relates to the payment to the national library purchase account for the purpose of acquiring books. The account is on a non-lapsing basis and the rate of purchase is irregular, depending on the state of the market and the availability and manuscript collections. At the time of the dissolution of parliament there had been an appropriation of $33,334. In view of the fact that there was a balance available in the account the governor general was not advised to include the amount of $6,666 in the warrant.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister quite sure that that reduction was made only at that time and that it was not made many months before?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no. My friend has only to look at page 44 of the report on supply to see that the sum of $33,334 was authorized by appropriation acts passed by parliament. In view of the fact there was no parliament I would have thought it met with his approval that there should be nothing appropriated by a warrant for that purpose in the balance of the fiscal year.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that is a conclusion with which I would find it difficult to agree. The few cases where the government did see fit not to use warrants were those cases where habitually over a long period of years parliament had appropriated a special sum to go into these funds. The Prime Minister told us when the federal district commission estimates were before us that this practice was followed with respect to the national capital fund but he also indicated that in that case the difference was being made up —and indeed more than made up—in a supplementary appropriation in the current fiscal year.

I drew attention a few moments ago to the item in respect of the national gallery which was reduced in the manner the minister has just described and now we have this one for the national library similarly reduced but in neither of these cases is there any suggestion that the amount should be appropriated this year in any supplementary estimates of which I have heard. It seems to me that these grants which for use and wont have been made for a number of years were precisely of a kind that no one would have taken any reasonable exception to but it is these exceptional and extraordinary items that we find it hard to understand, not items of a conventional character such as this. The extraordinary scruples of the minister in this particular regard do not appeal very much to me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not expect they would, Mr. Chairman, but I will remind my hon. friend of the provisions of the Financial Administration Act that require that with respect to every sum proposed to be appropriated by governor general's warrant it is necessary to submit a recommendation that the proposed expenditure is urgently required for the public good. In this particular case the amount was not urgently required under the circumstances.

The Chairman: Shall the national library carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite satisfied with that because it does tempt me to raise once again the question we were discussing a few moments ago.

The Chairman: Shall national library carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall public printing and stationery carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: There seem to be some reductions here and since this is a subject of great public interest at this time perhaps the minister would tell us what they are about.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there are two items of which the amount proposed in aggregate to be appropriated does not amount to as much as the estimate. The first is item 347. The sum of $60,000. The fact is that when the year advanced and the time came in early February to recommend what would be required for the balance of the fiscal period it was found that we could meet what was required in this typewriter repair program without including the sum of $60,000.

In the combined items 352 and 727, involving an amount of $131,000, the purchase of presses, was postponed.

The Chairman: Public works.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this general item 353 and following items show a reduction of about $2¾ million a substantial portion of which I would judge—and the minister will probably be able to give us some more detailed figures in this regard—is due to a reduction of the construction. Indeed, that is obvious in some items. I would point out that this reduction in public works of this amount occurred at a time when public works was being put forward by the government as the main remedy for unemployment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, but that statement, of course, does not tell the whole story. In a large program such as was provided for in the 1957-58 estimates the Department of Public Works will have some projects that naturally are not proceeded with or not proceeded with to the extent originally contemplated and there will be others which are. Now the extent to which the amounts originally estimated were not fully appropriated in the end is attributable in cases to the sort of situation that I have indicated. It certainly was not due to any slowing down of the program of construction. The situation was fully discussed in parliament in 1957. The rule that was followed was that where any construction project involved the creation of work there was to be no slowdown of the construction program in that regard at all because our concern was for the provision of employment as well as for the provision of needed public facilities.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I would point out to the minister that his answer does not really deal with the point raised. It will be recalled that on February 18, 1958 the Prime Minister announced expected expenditures by government departments and agencies on public works projects totalling $280 million during the first quarter of 1958 and that was put forward across the country as a vastly increased works program that was to assist in meeting the problem of unemployment. While it was not admitted by him that a serious unemployment problem existed apparently he recognized that a need for a program of this kind did exist. As against the statement we all recall was made by the Prime Minister on that occasion we have the facts coming out through these figures showing there was not an increase at all in the first quarter of 1958 but that there was in fact the usual decrease that comes because of the impossibility of estimating precisely what the amount of works will be and the short-falls that are inevitable in any system where you estimate to a definite period and do not carry on the construction for reasons that are easily understandable up to the full amount.

The Prime Minister's statement that was followed up and repeated across this country was in fact of a nature that created an impression in the public mind which was quite contrary to the facts as revealed today by the figures we are now examining and put forward by the minister in his report on supply for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that statement cannot be allowed to pass without reply. The fact is we are dealing here with the estimates of the Department of Public Works. The construction program to which the Prime Minister made reference on the occasion to which my hon. friend has alluded related to the total construction program of the government embracing all departments.

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Some of the very large expenditures in those figures the Prime Minister gave came from departments other than public works.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think this is an interesting point because it did obtain widespread publicity in February after a certain use was made of certain figures given by the Prime Minister that involved public works expenditures. The Minister of Finance a few moments ago when he was referring to the lapsing that resulted from this vote of about $3 million indicated that the vote itself was a large one. The vote was prepared by the previous administration.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Benidickson: For 1957-58? There is no addition here; in fact, there is a reduction in the total expenditure made in 1957-58, as compared with what was asked for by the administration that came in in June, and the amount that was asked for in the estimates.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend is overlooking the fact that items were added in the supplementary estimates that the new government introduced.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, there were some supplementary estimates but I think all hon. members well know that supplementary estimates are not to be regarded in any way in the same manner as original estimates for the year round planning of administration. I have before me the estimates for 1958-59 and I agree they are not particularly relevant in discussing 1957-58, except that in each year it is customary in preparing the book of estimates to provide a summary of standard objects of expenditure and special categories. Under buildings and works, including land, column 13 of the new table, an over-all figure is given for the construction and for acquisition of buildings and works, including land, of all departments including public works. I can repeat my point when we come to some of the departments that are to follow. Actually, here is a lapsing of $3 million in public works. On December 6, the minister said that nothing would be allowed to lapse if it could possibly proceed, because of unemployment conditions. Here in public works there is a lapsing of $3 million. I accept his explanation that this is $3 million out of a very large appropriation, but the appropriation was basically provided by the previous administration. In the main estimates, under column 13, for 1957-58, which we are now discussing, the total for all departments was $374,442,000. The main estimates of the new administration prepared for 1958-59, with unemployment continuing and the administration being very impressed by it as a result of the election activity we all had throughout the country in recent months, provides an increase of only $6 million.

The next comparable item would be purchases of equipment by the government. I refer to construction or acquisition of equipment in column 16 of this summary of standard objects of expenditures and special categories. In the main estimates under this category the previous administration for 1957-58 provided for an expenditure of almost $549 million. The proposals for the current year in the main estimates are almost $548 million, just about the same thing, and conditions at the time of preparing this estimate were entirely different. If as we proceed we keep this debate in mind we will find in the transport department a substantially larger lapse in expenditures on airports and construction of that kind which would have been very worthwhile last winter because of the unemployment situation. We will find under loans and advances even more considerable sums but as long as the administration continues to assert that in the matter of providing public works in tough times it is doing something different from which the previous administration planned to do in December, 1956, when they were fighting inflation I think the time of the committee is well spent in pointing that out.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I just wish to add one word. This does, I think, pretty well burst the bubble of the more than $280 million crash program of public works for unemployment until March 31 of this year. A very important part of that program was obviously construction work and in the Department of Public Works we find there is a reduction in this appropriation of some $2¾ million. If you look forward to another item in the report on supply you find construction, airways, air fields and buildings and that sort of thing, and there is a reduction of $4 million. There are others but they do all throw the spotlight of truth on those exaggerated statements of last February and March about this $280 million crash program of public works for unemployment.

The Chairman: Shall general administration carry?

Mr. Hardie: Can the minister give me an explanation of the cuts under item 649? There is a cut of 34 per cent, from $539,000 to $393,000.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Less progress was made on the project, Cambridge bay, Northwest Territories wharf than was anticipated to the extent of some $70,000, and it was found for the time being no dredging would be required at Tuktoyoktuk to the extent of $130,000.

Mr. Hardie: Is that the total of the cut?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; the total of the two items is $200,000. The first one I mentioned was $70,000 and the second one $130,000.

Mr. Caron: Will the minister explain the cut in the Quebec harbours item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a group of items there, five in all, where progress was delayed or suspended for various reasons.

Mr. Caron: The reasons are not given for that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can give them.

Mr. Caron: Give us the reason.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Very well; if my hon. friend wishes the details I shall be glad to give them to him. The first was the "Little Cascapedia river; dredging—federal government's share of cost". The Bathurst Power and Paper Company declined to share in the project because no booming ground waterlot could be obtained. That accounts for $132,000. The second was "Pointe au Pere; towards wharf improvements". Further planning prior to construction was decided upon during the year, with the possibility of combining improvements in a winter port. That accounted for $70,000.

The third was "Riviere du Loup—toward wharf improvements". Detailed borings indicated benefits would not justify the expenditure. That was $50,000. On the fourth, "Rimouski dredging" the contractor's plant was engaged elsewhere longer than was expected and the work was not proceeded with to the extent of $128,000. On the fifth item, "Sept Isles, towards wharf" delays in securing part of the site prevented the construction costs from requiring the amount provided to the extent of $245,000.

The Chairman: Shall public works construction and services carry?

Mr. Fisher: I have one question. Can the minister tell me how much was spent over and above what had originally been estimated for the dredging of the Fort William harbour?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What item is my hon. friend inquiring about?

Mr. Fisher: Harbours and rivers, engineering services.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend will appreciate that the figures we are dealing with here are figures of estimates and not figures of actual expenditure. The figures of actual expenditure will not be available until these accounts have been closed with the passage of the present bill and the auditor has completed his audit. They will be in the public accounts for the year 1957-58.

Mr. Fisher: I just wanted to know what the estimate was. I know they extended the contract because the estimated amount had been used up and I wanted to know the extent of the extension, if I may put it that way.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will endeavour to obtain that information and communicate it to my hon. friend.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall harbours and rivers engineering services carry? Shall development engineering services carry? Shall public works, general, carry? Shall Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation carry? Shall Royal Canadian Mounted Police carry?

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to items 405 and 703 there is a reduction of $275,000, not a large amount. These items refer to the government's contribution to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pension account. Surely this was not one of the things with respect to which the minister set out to economize. I imagine there is a set formula for our obligation to contribute to this fund. This is one of the items, together with many other illustrations tonight, that is part and parcel of the $73.6 million which the government claims represents the avoidance of extravagance and economy on their part. How does this come about? Were there fewer personnel on the staff in the year and consequently not the same need for contributions?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. My hon. friend will see that the item arose in connection with the issuance of the governor general's warrant, and it was not found at that stage that it was necessary to appropriate within the terms of the Financial Administration Act in relation to governor general's warrants.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall Secretary of State carry? Shall trade and commerce, general administration, carry? Shall exhibitions carry? Shall standards branch carry? Shall dominion bureau of statistics carry? Shall board of grain commissioners carry? Shall special carry? Shall transport, department, carry? Shall canal services carry? Shall marine services carry?

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to item 450, contract dredging including acquisition of land for ship channel improvement, St. Lawrence river ship channel service, there is a saving of $400,000. Has this program, which I understood was to run over a period of years, come to a halt or is this another deferment, something that will be incurred in a subsequent year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Work was not proceeded with in 1957-58 to the extent of $400,000.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall railway and steamship services carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I wish to refer to item 465 having to do with the Maritime Freight Rates Act. When we were dealing with the estimates of the Minister of Transport the other night he indicated to us that this $1,200,000 is not a permanent saving but simply an awareness a month or two before the end of the fiscal year that traffic throughout the year had gone down and consequently the obligatory subsidy under statute was not likely to be required from the administration to the same extent. This is another one of those items that contribute to the so-called, pretended saving of $73.6 million.

Mr. McIlraith: With respect to item 468 I want to point out to the committee that this is another of these construction items which were supposed to be so sharply increased. The facts as revealed here are that the amount provided in the estimates was not expended by some $725,000. It is another example where, instead of the amount estimated being sharply increased, there was a shortfall.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, for a very good reason. Construction work proceeded more slowly than was anticipated due to the conditions of muskeg and rock that were encountered.

Mr. McIlraith: This once again illustrates that the statements made by ministers about sharply increasing construction were not correct.

Mr. Fulton: We have an example of spending money on muskeg in Hull. Do you want more?

Mr. McIlraith: They were not in accordance with the facts. They were not able to sustain the estimated construction and works program.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend can make these statements but his assertions do not mean that what he is saying is true. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, I think the statements he has attempted to controvert have been confirmed. In this particular case there would have been a larger use of the funds proposed to be appropriated in the estimate had the conditions to which I have referred not been encountered. Surely there is no ground for complaint that more of this amount was not expended when the reason for its not having been expended to a greater extent is the reason I have given.

Mr. McIlraith: The reasons the minister has given for its not having been expended are quite true and anyone knowing anything about the construction business would understand them precisely.

Mr. Fulton: You are beginning to learn after the printing bureau.

Mr. McIlraith: What these figures do point out is that the statements made by the Prime Minister and his colleagues to the country in February and March of this year were not in accordance with the facts. These figures now reveal what the construction program that took place in the first three months of this year really was and the statements made forecast a very much increased construction program during those three months.

Mr. Caron: Under items 465 and 668 there was a saving of $1,200,000 with respect to the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Is this saving the result of reduced trade in the maritime provinces?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That item was dealt with, Mr. Chairman. The payments are statutory.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think that heading was carried.

The Chairman: Shall railway and steamship services carry? Shall general carry? Shall pensions and other benefits carry? Shall air services carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I notice there is an item here, 483, with a reduction of $313,000. Could the minister tell us about that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are a bit ahead of us.

The Chairman: We have not reached that particular item yet. Shall telecommunications division carry? Shall meteorological division carry?

Mr Pickersgill: The item I was speaking about comes under this heading.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect to item 483, a reduction of $313,000, due to the remoteness of the location the installations which were provided for by this item could not be proceeded with until spring.

Mr. Benidickson: I am an item behind I want to raise a question on this $1 item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 480.

Mr. Benidickson: Has anything taken place since the end of the fiscal year with respect to this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is an item that contemplates the operation of the system referred to in it. It is one of these $1 items—

Mr. Benidickson: With whom have we an agreement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —by which parliament is made aware of the operation and authorizes the carrying on of the operation involving the receipt of revenues and the making of disbursements.

Mr. Benidickson: This authorizes a lease, does it not, to a private enterprise of a telephone system that was created out of public funds; is that right? If so, who is the present operator and how long has this lease been current?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand that there was nothing new entered into in this respect for the fiscal year 1957-58, Mr. Chairman, but if my hon. friend wishes me to be precise about it I shall look that up and supply him with more detailed information.

Mr. Pearson: I am interested in this item 482, 863 and 483. The minister has said in relation to what had been put in the estimates by the previous government for the construction of meteorological buildings in northern Canada, that it has not been possible to spend all this money because of the remoteness of the area. Was this money being spent for the construction of new Canadian meteorological stations in the Arctic, manned by Canadians, which would make it possible for us to take over some of the stations now manned by the United States? Does that explain the saving?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will permit me, I shall have to obtain information to deal with the matter and communicate it to him. My information on that point is that the work on the installations, by reason of the remoteness of the location, had to await the arrival of spring before it could be proceeded with.

Mr. Hardie: I wonder if the minister could tell us what locations those were?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I cannot.

The Chairman: Shall civil aviation division carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a $4 million saving here?

The Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the minister could explain this saving of $4 million in the construction and acquisition of buildings.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this item 487, together with two other items 768 and 865 comes under the heading, airways and airports. Included in the final supplementaries is a transfer from the land account to a capital vote. Legislation, however, was required, and so it was deleted when the warrant was required.

Mr. Pickersgill: This does not represent any saving, at all?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It depends on what you mean by saving, I suppose.

The Chairman: Shall air transport board carry? Shall board of transport commissioners carry? Shall Canadian maritime commission carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister expects to make any saving on this item now that the merchant marine has been liquidated?

The Chairman: Shall national harbours board carry? Shall veterans affairs carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Under veterans affairs there are two large items of reductions which come to about a million and a half dollars, one involves hospital construction. Is that a deferment also? I am referring to item 502. Then on item 507 there is a saving of $750,000 with respect to war veterans allowances. Was that merely foresight on the part of the department, three months before the end of the year, that commitments under the statute had not been as much as they were represented to be?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On item 502, $700,000, I may say that certain construction projects had not proceeded as rapidly as had been expected, in some cases due to lateness of tenders and in other cases to delays caused by strikes.

In the case of item 507 and the related item 669, war veterans allowances, I may say that the requirements are determined by earnings. The statistical forecasts of the effects of two amendments to the legislation made during the year were not borne out.

Mr. Benidickson: I made some reference to this earlier. I am sure my hon. friend would give us the assurance that he did not, when he was looking for economies, go to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and ask him to be tougher on these applicants for veterans allowances in order to save this $750,000?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My friend is not flattering in asking a question like that.

The Chairman: Shall war veterans allowances and other benefits carry? Shall miscellaneous payments carry? Shall Canadian pension commission carry? Shall soldier settlement and Veterans Land Act carry? Shall terminable services carry? Loans, investments and advances; shall atomic energy of Canada limited carry?

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the minister would explain this saving of $7 million which surely must be a deferment rather than a saving.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Both with respect to items 524 and 525, the N.R.U. reactor did not begin to operate as early as was expected, and consequently the requirement for working capital to purchase uranium for fuel was considerably reduced.

The Chairman: Shall defence production carry? Shall external affairs carry?

Mr. Pearson: I must call the attention of the committee to a saving under the Colombo plan authorization of $10 million. This is extremely interesting because this $10 million is a very sizeable proportion of the total amount which is supposed to have been saved under these estimates. Yet, while we have this so-called $10 million saving here, we have the government taking credit, and quite rightly, for an increase of $10 million in the Colombo plan this year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was under this item that a loan was made to India of $25 million. The balance was not taken up prior to March 31, 1958.

Mr. McIlraith: This means once again that the wheat that was not shipped in the last year will be shipped this year, is that it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I did not say that. The provisions for shipment under the agreement with India required the shipments to be completed—I am speaking now from memory—by the end of June and certainly before the close of the 1957-58 crop year.

Mr. Pearson: That is quite right, but the fact was that in the previous estimates there was provision made for $35 million for Colombo plan—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, with respect, that was an item that was introduced in the house by further supplementary estimate introduced by the new government, and not the old government.

Mr. Pearson: Whoever introduced it, Mr. Chairman, it is a $10 million saving, and boasted as such by my hon. friend, and it is also a $10 million extra amount in this year's Colombo plan amount and boasted as such by the government as an increase. You are getting it both ways.

The Chairman: Shall penitentiaries carry? Shall national defence carry? Shall northern affairs and national resources carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister tell us for what purpose this item 873 was used?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The item describes its purpose. There is no difference here between the supply provided and the estimate. It is an item provided for advances in accordance with agreements entered into or to be entered into pursuant to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: I recognize that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have been all over that subject, have we not?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking the minister for what were these advances made, for Beechwood or for the thermal plants?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This was for the transmission lines, not the Beechwood project.

The Chairman: Shall privy council, federal district commission, carry? Shall public works, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, carry? Shall transport, St. Lawrence seaway authority carry?

Mr. Pearson: This is a reduction of $9 million in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I think all members of the committee know that this is a special project mentioned by the Prime Minister to provide, through public works, extra employment. I now notice that the amount has been reduced by $9 million, and perhaps the minister would explain that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is quite obvious to fairminded people. It does not require very much explanation. Something like 90 per cent of the amount which was in the estimate was employed so that this is not a very serious retardation of the work under contemplation when the estimate was written. The progress of the work was to a very minor degree slower than was anticipated.

The Chairman: Shall canal services carry? Shall air services carry? Shall the national harbours board carry? Shall veterans affairs, soldier settlement and Veterans Land Act carry?

Shall the schedule carry?

Mr. Benidickson: May I just make a comment while we are concluding discussion of the schedule. I think we have gone over this quite exhaustively and have all convinced ourselves, as I said when I was speaking when Mr. Speaker was in the chair, that it is doubtful that a businesslike bill of this kind should be introduced accompanied by features such as purple words and big explosives which turn out to be pretty blank cartridges respecting savings. I say this because when one examines the minister's claim of savings of $73.6 million, such as has been made, we find how phony was this claim and that in the last quarter of the year 1957-58—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, is this relevant to the last item? My friend is speaking of shots and cartridges, but this sounds like a pretty blanket charge.

Mr. Pearson: Or blank charge?

Mr. Benidickson: We have been discussing the schedule and Canadian Arsenals and I thought it might be appropriate—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend has had a couple of opportunities to speak generally, and this is not the time for a general discussion.

Mr. Benidickson: Just in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I think the minister will be convinced that the passage of a bill of this kind if it were not introduced, as I say, with purple words such as those with which he introduced this bill and with references to savings which were, we now find, pretences and are really mostly deferments and not real savings at all—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There were no purple words and no pretences. The information given to the house was all factual, and I do not think my hon. friend can remember, as I can certainly not remember, when this house was given more information—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —with respect to any supply motion than that which we have had today and that which is contained in the report on supply.

Schedule agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Before this bill is carried, may I just point out that for two hours, and only for two hours, we have been discussing governor general's warrants totalling about $540 million. That is all the consideration we have been permitted to give this bill because of the circumstances under which we have discussed it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is not permitted under the rules to speak on third reading, sir.

An hon. Member: What kind of a new rule is this?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going to insist on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Closure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh no, it is the rule.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I simply wish to make one comment on one expression used by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pearson: Out of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He said that two hours was all the time which the house had been "permitted" to devote to the consideration of the estimates.

Mr. Pearson: That is right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There has been no limitation whatever imposed upon the house or upon any member of it in relation to consideration of this measure, which was before the committee on two occasions in the resolution stage and it has been before the committee today—

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the minister has no right to make a speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There has been no attempt to restrict the freedom of this house to discuss this measure.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pearson: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might ask the house leader what is proposed for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall take item No. 2 on today's order paper, consideration of amendments made by the Senate to the taxation of estates act; then we will take item No. 4, which is second reading of a bill to amend the Customs Act, and then item No. 6, second reading of a bill to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 4.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 2, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF UNIFICATION OF CHAPLAIN SERVICES

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on August 25 I announced that a decision had been reached to combine the medical services of the navy, army and air force into one unified medical service.

A further step is now being taken in the integration of the armed forces. In future the spiritual welfare of the navy, army and air force will be directed by a Protestant chaplain general and a Roman Catholic chaplain general instead of by six principal chaplains. They will be appointed shortly and will hold the rank of brigadier or equivalent. There will be a single headquarters of the chaplain service in Ottawa, five area command headquarters in Canada and one in Europe.

In reaching this decision I have consulted with the Canadian council of churches and the Roman Catholic bishop ordinary to the Canadian armed forces. I am satisfied that this is another step which will result in greater efficiency and economy.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL OF RIGHTS—SUGGESTED PROCEDURE RESPECTING LEGISLATION

On the order:

Introduction of bills—The Prime Minister—Bill intituled: An act for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I ask that this order should stand, Mr. Speaker. So that the house may have some idea when this matter will be brought up, I suggest, if it is agreeable, that it be dealt with on Friday morning.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

VANCOUVER—STATEMENT ON PAYMENT OF BENEFITS TO LOCKED OUT ELECTRICIANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver East yesterday raised a question regarding a decision that was handed down in a Vancouver court in regard to a dispute in which were involved members of the international brotherhood of electrical workers, local 213, and asked whether because of that decision they would be entitled to unemployment insurance.

I have checked with the department on the ruling in this regard, and the answer is that the question of whether a stoppage of work arising from a labour dispute is legal or illegal has no bearing on the payment of unemployment insurance benefits. No consideration whatsoever is given to the merits or demerits of the matter in dispute. According to the Unemployment Insurance Act, a person who loses his employment because of a stoppage of work due to a labour dispute is disqualified from the receipt of benefit for the duration of the stoppage of work unless he can prove that he is not participating in, or financing or directly interested in the dispute that caused the stoppage of work, and that he does not belong to a grade or class of workers any of whom are participating in, financing or directly interested in the dispute.

Mr. Winch: That does not make sense.

Mr. Starr: It means that unemployment insurance is not available to these persons.

Mr. Winch: It does not make sense if they are illegally locked out.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL PAYMENTS LAST YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Would the minister inform the house if during the course of last year unemployment assistance in federal funds has been paid to the province of Quebec in respect of unemployable persons not qualifying for unemployment insurance?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I am not able to answer that question without investigation. I will make inquiries and convey an answer to the hon. member.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STANDARD OF TREATMENT OF MENTALLY ILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. With reference to the minister's statement in the house on July 15, at page 2240 of Hansard, concerning the care of the mentally ill through the hospital insurance and diagnostic services program, can the minister tell the house what facilities for the treatment of the mentally ill have been provided or are contemplated under this scheme in the general hospitals of the provinces which have entered the hospital insurance plan as of July 1?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question, which refers to part of a statement I made in the house on July 15 last.

In referring to psychiatric wards in general hospitals I had in mind the generally accepted concept of this relatively new development, namely that they are units within a general hospital specially designed for the short-term care of mental illness. To date these units have been limited to teaching hospitals and large general hospitals, because they require highly skilled specialist supervision, and are presently being assessed in terms of the over-all mental health program in many of our provinces. These wards are not separately identified in the list of hospitals annexed to agreements signed by the provinces under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, as they are considered to be integral parts of these hospitals.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member's question refers to the provinces which have entered the hospital insurance plan as of July 1, but I thought the above might help to clarify this matter. With regard to these provinces, a complete reply could only be provided after consultation with each province. However, the assistance provided under the health grants for the development of psychiatric wards in general hospitals will give a fairly good appraisal of the situation. This source would indicate that there are psychiatric wards in at least ten general hospitals in these provinces. I believe these wards usually contain 20 to 40 beds.

Future development will depend on a number of factors, including the priority placed by the individual provinces on these services, which in turn will depend on continuing appraisal as to their relative value as compared to other aspects of the mental health program. In order to assist with this appraisal I have asked my advisory committee on mental health to place the subject on the agenda of its next meeting and report the results of the discussion to me.

[Mr. Cardin.]

TRADE

REPORTED VISIT OF JAPANESE FOREIGN MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I regret not having an opportunity to give him notice, but from the nature of the question probably he will be able to answer it in any event. I want to ask him if the Japanese foreign minister is coming to Ottawa, as reported in the press this week, to discuss mainly trade matters. If so, would the minister give us any information he feels he can about the particular trade matters to be discussed?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are looking forward with anticipation to the visit of the foreign minister of Japan. He will be very welcome. The subjects that will be discussed when he is here I think will cover subjects other than matters affecting trade, but I would judge that we could have extremely useful conversations with him concerning trade between our two countries.

Mr. McIlraith: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are there any special trade matters that could be described as the purpose of his visit as far as our Canadian minister is concerned?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of the general purpose of the visit of the Japanese foreign minister. He arranged for the visit. We will welcome him and discuss any matters of mutual concern.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ICELAND—SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF FISHERIES DISPUTE TO UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister would be kind enough to inform the house as to the present position of the Icelandic-United Kingdom dispute with relation to the 12-mile limit, and also whether consideration has been given to placing the question on the agenda of the United Nations general assembly for discussion at its session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. Canada keenly hopes that the NATO countries concerned in the Icelandic fisheries dispute will continue to try to resolve their differences and come to an understanding at this time pending the convening of a new international conference on the law of the sea, which we hope will be held at the earliest possible date.

It goes without saying that all NATO members and in fact all peace-loving countries should encourage the settlement of this dispute by peaceful means. There has been a suggestion that the Danish government has proposed a meeting to be attended by 15 NATO countries. Whether or not that will be achieved, I do not know.

However, with respect particularly to the question of the hon. gentleman that the general assembly take up this matter, it is already planned that the assembly will consider in a very short time—perhaps before the end of this month, and in any case during the course of this forthcoming session—the desirability of having a new international conference on the law of the sea convened. Canada intends to give its full support at the general assembly to the convening of such a conference and to take the initiative, if necessary; because we are hopeful that in such discussions a permanent solution can be found not only of the particular fisheries dispute as between Iceland and the United Kingdom but of the world-wide question of the breadth of the territorial sea and the coastal states' rights to the contiguous fishing zone.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Is it a fact, as reported, that the Icelandic government itself has already requested that this unfortunate dispute be put on the agenda of the forthcoming United Nations general assembly? If that is so, would it not be desirable to make perhaps a prior ministerial effort to settle this matter in the NATO council?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the NATO council is concerned, I think a day or so ago the minister mentioned in the house that NATO had not afforded a successful conclusion to this dispute. I think it is admitted that it is really up to the parties to the dispute themselves to come to a solution. While NATO itself has, of course, an interest, as have all countries, in the peaceful settlement of this dispute, it is doubtful whether the problem itself can be regarded as specifically a NATO problem and one for which NATO can provide a solution. The dispute is, as the hon. gentleman knows, essentially a world-wide problem with world-wide implications, and it is for this reason that Canada put its confidence and faith in the possibility of having another international conference at an early date, at which all countries of the world could work out a solution of the question of fishing rights. In the meantime, I believe the proper course is to have the matter dealt with at the United Nations, and under its aegis a decision made for the convening of such a conference.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion that this matter be referred to the United Nations is an excellent one, particularly in view of the great success the United Nations general assembly has had recently in settling another very difficult dispute. On the principle of the question, I wonder whether I can ask the Prime Minister to say what Canada's general position is toward the 12-mile territorial limit, whether Canada has agreed that if that can be arranged by international agreement it is the preferable thing to do?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, as to Canada's general position, that was made very clear at the time of the conference at Geneva. It would require quite a lengthy answer to give the details. Canada's stand was made very clear at that time and, as the hon. gentleman knows, there was for a time the belief that the views held by Canada in this regard would be generally accepted. However, as the conference proceeded divisions arose which made it impossible to bring together the various elements. When a new conference is convened, then we can at least hope that by building on the results at Geneva and the degree of unanimity that was attained there, there will be a higher hope for success than was apparent in the last few days of that conference.

Mr. Argue: Can I take from the Prime Minister's statement that Canada's initial position at any rate would be in support of the 12-mile limit?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, Canada's position was one of divergence from the general principles that were acceptable to one or two nations. We endeavoured to arrive at an intermediate position, as the hon. gentleman knows, without binding ourselves to the 12-mile territorial limit or any other broad limit.

Mr. Winch: Do not deviate from a good principle today.

Estate Tax Act

TRANSPORT

GREAT LAKES PILOTAGE—REPORTED U.S.-CANADIAN DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. My question stems from a story in the Globe and Mail of this date to the effect that discussions between Canada and the United States are already under way at the state department level on the great lakes pilotage agreement. Has the minister any information to give the house on this matter from his department's viewpoint?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask this question. There are no discussions at the state department level going on at the present time. We hope that such discussions will take place, but no final arrangements have been made yet.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONCLUSIONS OF RECENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Labour give the house an assurance that the report of the conference on winter employment will be submitted to the house before the end of the session?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes; I am expecting to table the report tomorrow.

ESTATE TAX ACT

NEW BASIS FOR ASSESSMENT OF SUCCESSION DUTIES

On the order:

Consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. C-37, an act respecting taxation of estates.—The Minister of Finance.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Senate has returned Bill No. C-37, an act respecting the taxation of estates, to the house with eight amendments. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that a situation in which there may be differences between the two houses is of a nature which has not arisen in the experience of parliament since 1947.

I may remind hon. members that the eight amendments are to be found in Votes and Proceedings of the house for Thursday, August 28, at pages 512 and 513. Of the eight amendments seven are perfectly acceptable so far as the government is concerned, and the Senate committee on banking and commerce was so informed. Indeed, those seven amendments were requested on behalf of the Minister of Finance in that committee. In each case they are amendments that clarify the provisions of the bill or enlarge the rights of the taxpayers. They relate to such matters as the lien on real property for unpaid estate tax and other matters, which in each case I trust will be acceptable to the house.

There is, however, one of these amendments which I should like to discuss now and which I may say the government hopes the Senate and the house will both choose to reject on further consideration. It is the fourth of the amendments and is to be found on page 512 of Votes and Proceedings. It proposes to add certain words to clause 26 of the bill, which is in that part of the bill relating to the determination of value. That clause now reads as follows:

For the purposes of this part, in determining the value of any property no allowance or deduction shall be made for or on account of income tax.

That provision, or one to precisely the same effect, has been in the Dominion Succession Duty Act for years. The provision in the present succession duty act is section 34, subsection 3 and it reads as follows:

The fair market value of all property shall be determined for the purposes of this act without allowance or deduction for income tax.

So it will be quite clear that clause 26 of the bill simply continues the legislation that has been in effect for years under the provisions of the succession duty act. But the amendment which has been proposed by the Senate would add to the words of clause 26 of the bill the following; after the words "income tax" there would be inserted a comma, and the following words added:

—except where a superannuation or pension benefit is taxable under the Income Tax Act.

It is obvious that this amendment will introduce a change so far as the law in the Dominion Succession Duty Act is concerned. It is obvious also that it is intended to make a special rule in respect of benefits received from superannuation or pension. It would say, in effect, that where the present value of such a benefit is being reckoned to determine its capital value for estate tax purposes, some attempt would be made, in a manner not disclosed clearly by the amendment, to deduct what might be thought to be the income tax that might be levied upon all such benefits in the future years during which such benefits might be payable. This is done on the theory that in this way relief is extended from what is said to be double taxation.

I simply point out, Mr. Speaker, that this is a new theory. The estate tax and the income tax are two entirely different taxes, and it cannot be said that there is any double taxation where any benefit is subject to two entirely different taxes. That certainly is not the accepted idea of what is meant by double taxation.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that if this amendment were adopted it would have the effect of relieving from the estate tax what is considered to be the liability for income tax in future years of a particular class of property that passes on the death of a person.

In that respect, in my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, it would create a discrimination. Whatever may be the arguments about it in general, I think it is inescapable that this would create a discrimination in favour of a particular type of property.

I might point out to the house as well, Mr. Speaker, that no such relief or deduction is permitted under the laws of the United States, nor is there a precisely similar deduction permitted from estates or exemption granted under the laws of the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom allows a concession—what would be from our point of view a very slight concession—by simply exempting the first £52 per year of a pension from estate tax. That would be the equivalent today, Mr. Speaker, of something like $145, and according to the standards of this bill, with the very generously enlarged exemptions which it creates, could not be regarded as a very serious concession.

The second point I should like to make is that the benefits of any such amendment, if it were administratively workable at all, would deprive the treasury of certain revenue, and the benefit of that reduction in revenue would accrue to a relatively small number of larger estates. In our approach to this broad question of what might be done in reference to different types of suggestions which have been put forward by many organizations in regard to small exemptions which might be awarded here and there, we felt it was better to put exemptions on a broad basis and to enlarge general exemptions. In our opinion that is not only an equitable approach to the problem, but from the point of view of reducing the burden of estates tax, particularly tax on estates of a smaller size, is a much more generous approach.

Under this bill I might remind hon. members that the legislation affects only those Canadians who have accumulated a significant amount of wealth under the protection of the state. No estate of $50,000 or less is taxed, and where there is a widow with dependent children allowance is made accordingly. For instance, a widow with three dependent children will have an exemption of $90,000 to begin with, and if she has four dependent children there is an exemption of $100,000 to begin with. Even under the present Dominion Succession Duty Act there are only about 4,000 estates per year which are subject to succession duty, so that only about one death in 33 gives rise to a taxable estate. Under the new bill the proportion of taxable estates will be still less. Moreover, only a portion of those taxable estates will contain superannuation or pension benefits, so I think the impression should not be left anywhere that this proposed amendment would benefit those who are in serious need.

The third observation I should like to make upon the amendment is that it is vague in its meaning and, from the administrative point of view, quite unworkable in its effect. It proposes that in valuing a superannuation or pension benefit, the value to be assigned to it is to be reduced by what may be thought to be the income tax on those superannuation or pension payments as they are made. It will at once be clear that this kind of amendment assumes that it will be possible on the date of death to make a calculation of what will be the future income tax payable on the pension or superannuation payments. There is no indication in this proposed amendment as to how that is to be done.

When I appeared before the Senate committee on banking and commerce, some suggestions were made about how one might write into the language of the act methods of determining that future income tax liability for the purpose of deducting it from the capital value of the superannuation or pension right at the date of death; but nothing emerged from this discussion, and nothing is contained in this proposed amendment to give any indication as to how that income tax liability is to be calculated. It assumes that the rates of income tax are going to continue to be uniform throughout the period of years during which the superannuation or pension is payable; and it would, I take it, also assume uniformity of income on the part of the recipient of the superannuation or pension benefit. How those assumptions can be made I do not understand.

Then there is a further practical difficulty, and it is one which should not be overlooked. In calculating income tax is it to be assumed that the annuitant or pensioner has no other income? There are certain exemptions accorded by the Income Tax Act to everyone. Are those exemptions to be deducted from the assumed income tax liability reckoned on the assumption that the income from the superannuation or pension benefit is the only income of the recipient of the superannuation or pension? If it is not to be calculated on that basis, then on what basis of assumed income on the part of the recipient are we to proceed? Are we to assume that we are going to tax for income tax purposes all parts of the income of the recipient of that superannuation or pension benefit equally, that is to say, is it going to be a pro rata calculation, or are we to assume that the income from the superannuation or pension benefit is either the bottom slice or the top slice of the recipient's income?

It is quite obvious that there is no guide whatever in this proposed amendment to indicate how the Department of National Revenue is to proceed in these matters. In this amendment there is simply nothing to define the basis upon which the calculation of assumed income tax is to be made. I am therefore obliged to say that this amendment, contriving as it purports to provide a new basis of calculation of capital value of these benefits, is quite unworkable. If it were enacted today one would simply not know how to go about putting it into effect.

In conclusion may I simply say that the problem of how most equitably to tax superannuation or pension payments in respect of their capital value at the date of death is a difficult matter. It is a matter which engaged our attention very fully before the bill was first introduced, and on it we received not only a large number of representations but I might say also the greatest variety of representations. There have been more representations on this subject in point of number than there has been agreement on the way in which this problem should be met, and we considered that in all the circumstances the most equitable way to proceed was to carry into the new bill the provisions of the present Dominion Succession Duty Act in this respect.

I may say that there is no finality to any tax legislation. Legislation of this kind must be constantly under review. I indicated in appearing before the banking and commerce committee of this house, as I did when I appeared before the banking and commerce committee of the Senate, that it is the government's intention to continue to bring under review this new legislation, when adopted, as well as other taxing legislation. There will always be differences of opinion as to the fairest and most equitable way in which to write the detailed provisions of taxing legislation. There is no finality to any such legislation. The Income Tax Act is a very good example. It was completely revised and codified in 1949, and every year since that time large numbers of amendments have been introduced.

While we believe that the present bill is a good bill and a major advance over the legislation in the present Dominion Succession Duty Act, I am quite prepared to say that there is no such thing as a perfect taxation act, and it will be our intention to give continued study to any of these problems which have presented difficulty in connection with the language of the present bill. We are not keeping our minds closed on any of these subjects which have presented difficulties.

For the reasons that I have given, I submit to the house that the fourth amendment proposed by the Senate should not be accepted by the house. I therefore move, seconded by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness):

> That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house agrees to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. C-37, an act respecting the taxation of estates, with the exception of the fourth amendment to which this house disagrees for the following reasons:
> 1. It creates discrimination in favour of a particular class of property.
> 2. The amendment is unworkable.
> 3. The amendment will reduce government revenues, and will particularly tend to reduce revenues from estates of larger value.
> And that the Clerk of the house do carry the said message to the Senate.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Finance and the government have something of a fight on their hands with the other place, and I am not going to get into that fight. I think the other place is quite capable of standing up for its own views with respect to the points on which the minister differs with the amendment proposed.

On the other hand, I want to point out that the discussions in the banking and commerce committee of the other place were prolonged and thorough. Unlike our own banking and commerce committee, they did receive outside evidence. They received evidence from the chairman of the executive council of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, from the associate general counsel of the Sun Life Insurance Company, from a representative of the Montreal Trust Company, a representative of the trust association of Canada, and from two or three representatives who I thought should have been heard by our own banking and commerce committee—and I said so not only in the house but in the committee—Mrs. G. D. Finlayson, of the national council of women, Mrs. J. F. Flaherty of the Canadian Federation of university women.

I do not want the house to get the impression which it might get from hearing a radio commentary, such as I heard this morning, that the criticisms of the estates tax bill in the other place came entirely from supporters of the Liberal group in the Senate. When this bill was introduced in the Senate and debated on August 14, any criticisms

I made concerning the bill in this place were certainly greatly improved upon and exceeded by such newly appointed senators supporting the government as Senator Brunt and a former member of this house, Senator White. They had firm and strong criticism of the bill to make, and I do say that this amendment came to us after very careful consideration.

I do not intend to elaborate at any length with regard to the merits or demerits of the amendment in dispute. Already in the banking and commerce committee I have pointed out the hardship which results from the imposition of double taxation on both successions and pension income therefrom. I simply want to express a view which I think is generally highly endorsed, a view which has been expressed by the Canadian tax foundation and a view which was put forward during the sittings of our banking and commerce committee after an additional review had been made of the revised estates tax bill. The bulletin of the Canadian tax foundation had this to say on this subject in examining Bill No. C-37:

> It also seems to us that something might finally have been done to alleviate the heavy burden of tax on pensions, annuities and other periodic payments that are subject to death duties and income tax almost simultaneously.

In criticising Bill No. 248, which was introduced in the previous session of parliament, the general view in all the briefs which I believe were received by the minister after the bill became public were well expressed in the brief of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, when they said this:

> Comment is made here in our brief upon the whole question of the taxation of income rights, etc. This comment is made subsidiary to the general recommendation that pensions and death benefits be not subject to estate tax. Such rights are received over a term. It has always been undesirable that the tax on the capitalized value should be payable immediately when even the amount of tax itself may only be recovered by the recipient over a period or may never be recovered. In particular, it is invidious to assess and immediately collect tax based on a capitalized value, by the application of mortality tables, when the successor may not even live long enough to receive benefits equal to the assessed tax. It is excessively harsh that no account is taken of the impact of income tax when computing estate tax on such benefits and vice versa.

We do not propose, as I say, to make extensive comment on the conflict, if there is one, between the government and the Senate. I simply point out again that the criticisms in the other place were on a bi-partisan basis and that they reiterate and, I think, confirm criticisms which I myself and others advanced here when the bill was before us. I think those in our group will have to say "on division" with respect to the motion proposed by the minister.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think the motion presented by the Minister of Finance should be supported not only on the ground of the main content of the motion, with which I am in complete and full agreement, but also to demonstrate, I would hope, as a result of its passing at this time that the House of Commons should be supreme in all matters affecting the revenues of this nation and the balance of ways and means.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River talked about the government having a fight on its hands. I doubt very much if that is really correct. I would assume that the members of the other place, in their good judgment, in their certain sense of security and wel-being, knowing full well the stature of the Canadian House of Commons in the minds of the public of this country, would have second thoughts and would very speedily agree to this motion which will pass this house today.

We in the C.C.F. will not be saying "on division", because we support the motion and are quite prepared to vote for it.

This is the first time in my memory in this house that the other place has amended a bill of the House of Commons in a way which would reduce the revenues to the national treasury. I would hope that such amendments would not be forthcoming from the other place in future much as I, in a given instance, might like to see certain revenues and certain taxes reduced. I feel that the other place has made not only a mistake in substance but a mistake as far as the operation of our Canadian parliament is concerned.

I do not for one moment question at this time the constitutional right of the other place to do such a thing, but I do not think it should be done. I do not imagine the government has a fight on its hands in the other place even though the government party does not command a majority there; but I would say that if the other place should reject this motion then there should be a conference, as is provided under our rules, between this chamber and the other place to consider appropriate amendments to the constitution of this country to make it abundantly clear that the Canadian House of Commons has the overriding authority.

I believe that hon. members of the other place perform a certain function in that they are able to look over legislation and make amendments, but I think the amendments they make should be considered more as suggestions than as amendments. If it appears necessary I believe there should be a working out of the final formula and method of procedure to make it abundantly clear that in main constitutional questions and money matters the Canadian House of Commons is supreme.

I agree with the purport of the argument of the Minister of Finance. The minister has a tremendous command of the English language, and he can make a very excellent case when he is on solid ground. I enjoyed listening to him present his case this morning. Listening to his extremely strong statements and well chosen phraseology I was pleased, for the first time in my memory, not to have them directed particularly at the opposition in this house. While the Minister of Finance seldom wins an argument in this house by way of unanimous vote, I am hoping that following the passage of this motion it will be made clear that the minister has spoken for the House of Commons and the Canadian people, and that the members of the other place will agree that that is the situation.

The Minister of Finance has demolished the substance of the amendment by pointing out that it is discriminatory and would work to the advantage of well to do persons receiving benefits from large estates, and that these exemptions that are already in the act provide a good measure of relief to a very small proportion of the population who under difficult circumstances are fortunate enough to have an interest in an estate of a value above $50,000. I accept the minister's statement because of his knowledge and the advice he is able to obtain from his officials that the suggested amendment would be unworkable. It is perfectly clear that if it were to pass it would result in a reduction of revenue to the national treasury. Believing that revenues in this case on the basis of the merit of the amendment alone should not be reduced, and also on the principle that the House of Commons should be supreme in this matter, I shall certainly be very pleased to support the motion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped, like the hon. member for Assiniboia, that this house would be prepared in connection with this matter to speak with a unanimous voice. I had hoped that would be the message that might be carried to the other place. However, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, the financial critic of the official opposition, has said the bill will be carried only on division. It is quite clear, therefore, that the official opposition opposes this amendment.

[Mr. Argue.]

Let me very briefly make some comment on several of the statements the hon. member made. He sought to give the impression, I gathered from his remarks, that he had taken some consistent course on this subject which is in accord with the view expressed by a majority in the Senate in the terms of the present proposed amendment. Mr. Speaker, clause 26 of the bill has run the gamut of all stages in this house and extended hearings before the banking and commerce committee of this house, as well as having gone through the similar processes of the other place. I scanned the record, and I find that in the banking and commerce committee of this house in the presence of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and others of his party this clause was carried without any challenge, without any division and without any indication of opposition from them; indeed, without any spoken criticism of this clause. I have also consulted the record of the committee of the whole and I find the same thing there.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was not even a word uttered by my hon. friend or by any of his party on clause 26 of the bill when it was before the committee of the whole of this house.

Mr. McIlraith: We could not be there in committee because of the hours the house sat. That is not fair.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have already said that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was present in the committee when this clause was reached. As a matter of fact others of the party were also there. If the hon. member for Ottawa West did not find it possible to be there he should not try to leave the impression that it was not possible for others of his party to be there, because the financial critic of the party was there and he had a great deal to say.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister permit me to clarify what I said?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the impression ought not to be left that the committee hurried over its work.

An hon. Member: He is listening to himself just now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It conducted its proceedings in a thorough manner and—

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Will he not acknowledge that I asked in the committee that the representations and criticisms of double taxation be read carefully from the briefs, and did we not afterwards hear from Dr. Eaton a certain comment as a result?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked for a number of things in regard to the representations that had been made. I think he will be fair enough to agree that either I or the officials, depending on who was leading the discussion before the committee, put before the banking and commerce committee of this house the substance of all the representations we had received on all subjects, whether those representations were in accord with the terms of the bill or opposed to them. I think that ought to be said for the record and in fairness. We gave the committee the substance of all representations we had received.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have one further comment to correct any possible wrong impression that may have been left by the remarks of my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. He may have left the impression in the minds of some that this bill is going to create a severe hardship in the matter of the rate of payment or what is sometimes called the periodicity of payment of taxes with respect to those periodical payments in the form of superannuation or pension benefits. Where these benefits flow through the executor of the estate the estate tax thereon is a charge on the estate and not, under this bill, on the successor, the recipient of the superannuation or pension benefit.

That is the first point. I wish to make it perfectly clear that if payments of this kind flow through the executor, then no estate tax liability except in a secondary sense is laid upon the recipient of the superannuation or pension benefit.

In the other case, where the payment flows not through the executor but goes direct to the successor, the recipient of the pension or superannuation payment, provision is made in clause 15 of this bill for payment of the liability in six annual instalments. The present Dominion Succession Duty Act, which apparently was quite adequate in the view of hon. members opposite, has provided for payment over four years. We have enlarged that to six years. Furthermore, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River went far outside the scope of the amendment proposed by the Senate in talking about the basis of determining present value of future periodical payments of this kind for estate tax purposes.

I remind the house that the Senate has not attacked the basis of determining the capital value of those periodical payments. That was discussed in the Senate committee, but the Senate has not attacked it. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River went completely outside the scope of the amendment in introducing that subject. The Senate has accepted that basis of calculation. It has been established for a long time, and it is simply carried forward in this present bill. I wish to make perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that the basis of calculation upon which he undertook to deliver some strictures this morning is not attacked in the Senate amendment, and is not involved in the Senate amendment.

This amendment has the one purpose and the one effect which I described in speaking earlier, and with great respect to those in the Senate who supported this amendment and those who drafted it, I do wish to say it is quite clear that the amendment they have proposed is quite unworkable. I have placed the position that we have taken on this amendment on the merits of the amendment. We are not inviting any clash or difference or dispute with Their Honours in the other place. We have placed our position on the merits of this amendment, and I did hope that we might have a unanimous expression of opinion of this house to support us when this message goes to Their Honours in the other chamber. But if we cannot have, as we are told by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, a unanimous expression, then I do express the hope that we shall have support as nearly unanimous, or as strong an expression of support for the bill in this respect, as is possible.

Mr. Benidickson: Before the minister concludes will he just inform the house as to the procedure, which I am not clear upon, with respect to the conference procedure between this house and the Senate. Does the conference follow the report at this stage if the Senate continues to persist in its views? Is it after this motion is carried that the conference procedure comes into play? I recall that some years ago there was such a conference. Three members of the administration meet with three representatives of the Senate, I believe.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend I think is away ahead of the rest of us at this stage of the proceedings. What the house is being asked to do this morning is to say that we reject the fourth amendment proposed by Their Honours in the other chamber and, in accordance with the practice, the message contains the reasons for our rejection. We hope that when Their Honours receive this message from this house they may in their wisdom be prepared to concur in the position which has been taken by this house. My hon. friend is talking about a stage which we trust may never develop.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may ask the minister a question which is bothering me a bit about the actual motion itself, the language of it. As I read the motion it gives me some difficulty, because we are making findings about the reasons for rejecting paragraph 4 of the proposed amendments. Is it necessary to make all these findings? The one that bothers me is that the amendment is not workable. For my part I am quite prepared to reject the proposed amendment, but I dislike having to approve the language put in the motion by the Minister of Finance. How does he view this motion? Is it simply a rejection of the amendment that he wants rejected? How will our vote on this thing be interpreted by him?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Their Honours will have the message of this house before them in the terms of the motion if the house sees fit to adopt it.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a final question. Is it not true that in this motion he is asking us to accept his categorical statement that this amendment is not workable? That categorical statement of fact, that finding and its expression may give rise to some doubt in the minds of hon. members on this side who are not supporting the Senate amendments at all.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) which was agreed to on the following division:

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VALUE FOR DUTY, APPEALS TO EXCHEQUER COURT, ETC.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-51, to amend the Customs Act.

He said: In his budget speech my colleague the Minister of Finance announced that I would shortly submit a bill to parliament to amend the valuation provisions of the Customs Act. The present law is adequate to deal with most cases of dumping or distress selling, but does not provide a safeguard against sales at prices below cost-plus. It appears to us necessary to rectify this situation in order to protect the Canadian economy against unfair competition and the virtual importation of unemployment as a result of goods being brought in at prices which are below the cost of production plus a reasonable addition for selling cost, administrative cost and profit. This, then is the primary reason for revising the present law.

Experience over the years with the current valuation provisions of the Customs Act has indicated a want of certainty as to the true meaning of certain phrases and indeed sections, bringing about resultant difficulty not only for departmental administration but also placing an undue burden on both the tariff board and the exchequer court. Developments have been such as to point up the desirability of clarifying and rendering beyond question the meaning of the provisions which have been giving difficulty. It seems prudent, therefore, to take this opportunity, when the valuation sections are being amended, to resolve this problem and at the same time to regroup the various sections in more appropriate order.

In this regard, the proposed wording of the bill does not contemplate any material departure from current practice. The cardinal principle of valuation which has been in effect since confederation and which is to continue to apply is based upon the fair market value of like goods when sold in the home market in similar circumstances. A number of subsidiary and clarifying rules have been laid down with a view to establishing a more workable procedure for determining value for duty.

In his budget speech my colleague the Minister of Finance also stated that I would submit a bill to amend the Customs Act in the matter of appeals from our decisions under item 1201 of the Customs Tariff Act. This item is the one which prohibits the importation of material of a treasonable, seditious, immoral or indecent character. In a recent judgment the tariff board questioned whether it is the appropriate body to hear such appeals. The government shares this doubt, and accordingly provision is being made in the new bill which is before us today for appeal in such cases to be made to the courts.

Section 45 of the Customs Act deals with appeals to the exchequer court from decisions of the tariff board. At this time the opportunity is being taken to revise and clarify the procedure, which should make for a more orderly disposition of cases coming before this body. Three main changes are involved as follows:

(a) The appeal period has been increased from 30 days to 60 days.

(b) The necessity for the appellant and the deputy minister to obtain leave to appeal has been eliminated, but persons who entered an appearance at the tariff board must still obtain such leave.

(c) A complete code of appeal procedure, including right of cross appeal.

Those, Mr. Speaker, include the salient points which are embodied in the bill now before the house. Later on in the day, when the debate is completed, I will have an opportunity to deal with any arguments which might be raised for or against the bill and also, of course, in committee to clarify any matters in respect of the various sections.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister in introducing this bill took five minutes to deal with one of the most important customs measures introduced into this house in many years, a bill which could have a far-reaching and harmful effect on our trade and, indeed, on Canada's trading relationships. He took five minutes.

Mr. Harkness: An example of the beauty of brevity.

Mr. Pearson: That was a quarter of the time which was required in this house this morning for an unnecessary division, and that is all we are being given by way of explanation of the bill and analysis of its contents, which as I have said is of very far-reaching importance. Indeed it is probably as important as any customs bill which has been introduced into this house for many, many years. The minister has said, of course, that this bill is really confined—and I believe these are the words he used—largely to subsidiary and clarifying rules. I hope, however, to demonstrate that it is far more than that and I regret, though perhaps not as much as I would have regretted half an hour ago, that I shall have to take a certain amount of time to give the views of our party on this matter.

The bill before us deals with the problem of the determination of the value of imported goods for duty purposes. It is a subject which is as complex as it is important because, as hon. members know, a valuation for duty purposes can be as important as the duty itself. It is because of this importance that it is necessary for an objective and sound basis to be established for the determination of value. The necessity for that is obvious.

It seems to me that three requirements should be met in establishing this basis. Firstly there is the necessity of preserving the rights of parliament over taxation because, as we know, a duty is a tax and a valuation can be a duty. If parliament determines a rate but the valuation is left to a minister or his officials, or both, then parliament's rights over this form of tax are reduced accordingly and may be nullified by administrative action.

Second, there is the requirement to prevent unfair discrimination between those who, as consumers and taxpayers, are bearing the tariff burden, unfair discrimination which could result from arbitrary valuations through administrative action. Finally there is the requirement to create and maintain orderly conditions for international trade. I believe it would be quite impossible to meet that requirement if nations customarily used arbitrary valuations for customs purposes, that this would stop trade expansion and would introduce rigidities and restrictions into trade.

To meet these three requirements, as I have said, an objective and equitable basis of valuation for duty purposes must be established. I realize, of course, that such a basis applicable to every case which might arise is very difficult to find indeed, and I suppose it is impossible; but a fair basis for general application must be found and must be embodied in our law. If an alternative is required it should be used only if the primary basis cannot be applied; should be used only in special cases. That principle has been recognized in the present customs law.

I agree with the minister that the basis which we have established in this country over the years is fair market value, though I am not sure it will remain fair market value if this bill becomes law. Fair market value in accord with prices in the country of origin is the best and fairest basis obtainable. This we have found in the light of experience. This principle is included in GATT and is generally accepted by the members of GATT. I admit, of course, that there are other bases included in GATT and, indeed, in our law, but they are for use only when fair market value cannot be applied.

I know, as the minister knows, that arbitrary valuations are permitted under article 19 of GATT. This is, of course, an escape clause, I agree. We have, however, more than once protested, and vigorously protested, when that article has been used in a way contrary to the spirit and objectives of GATT. We have always taken the position in our negotiations under GATT that this article should be restricted to real emergencies and used only as a last resort. If it is not if it is used in some other way, then it invites retaliation which can destroy GATT, can restrict trade and can even hurt the country which is applying the other form of valuation.

The present Canadian law on this matter is designed to meet the three requirements I have mentioned. It is in conformity with the spirit and the objectives of GATT except possibly for one section of the present law, namely section 38, to which I shall return later. Incidentally that particular section, No. 38, was put in by the Conservative government of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. It was, I admit, retained by Liberal governments after 1935 to be available in a genuine emergency. But the fact that the Liberal government had that and only that in mind in retaining this particular clause is shown by the fact that in the 22 years of Liberal administration that clause was used only once and then, perhaps ironically, after the general election of June 19, 1957. The only time that clause was used was, I believe, in connection with the importation of strawberries.

The new bill, however, changes all this. It alters drastically, and not in a subsidiary or unimportant way as the minister indicated, the present system of valuation. I hope I will be able to convince the minister of that before I finish.

Mr. Nowlan: It will take a lot of speeches to do that.

Mr. Pearson: You have no idea how long this is going to be.

It embodies a new and wrong approach. Furthermore, the government must intend to use these new powers which it is requesting, else what whould be the purpose of making these changes? I suggest that if this bill becomes law, fair market value is likely to become an exception rather than the rule. Therefore this bill in its provisions prejudices that objective basis which I have mentioned and it widens, I think in a dangerous way, the application of arbitrary valuations. It does that first of all through a greater use of the cost of production test—and I will have something to say about that test later—and second, through wider discretionary powers given to the minister, to the governor in council and to officials.

How then is this principle on which we have based our law for so many years, this principle of fair market value, to be restricted in this bill? It is to be restricted in at least three ways. I intend to deal with this matter now only in a general way because this is the second reading stage, but when we come to the committee stage we on this side will deal with each clause as it arises, and I think we can show how these clauses will restrict the fair market value principle. If hon. members will look at clause 39 of the bill, for example—I single this out as one glaring illustration—they will find that it reads:

Where the minister is satisfied that material injury has been or may be caused to any industry—

I draw those words to the attention of the house—"has been or may be caused"— —in Canada or any portion thereof, by reason of the importation of any new or unused goods or class of such goods at a value for duty less than the cost of production thereof, plus a reasonable amount for gross profit, he may so report to the governor in council, and, notwithstanding anything in this act, the governor in council may order that the value for duty of those goods or that class of goods shall be increased to an amount equal to the cost of production thereof plus a reasonable amount for gross profit, having regard to the gross profit generally earned in that trade in the country of export, to be determined in the manner prescribed in section 37.

This means that in all cases, not only where injury has been caused but where injury may be caused, the minister and the cabinet will have full discretionary powers to determine the value for duty purposes.

Then there is clause 38, subclauses (b) (c) and (d) which I will not quote, but in which provision is laid down—and we will come back to this in detail during the committee stage—that the value for duty shall be determined in such a manner as the minister prescribed. And in these cases, fair market value even when it can be determined will not be used. In my opinion those clauses, or certainly part of them, are contrary to our obligations under GATT. They give the minister far-reaching discretionary and arbitrary powers to use.

There is another clause, clause 37, which again I will not quote, but I will come back to it later. It states that when comparison for duty has to be made with similar goods the value for duty, unlike the provision in the present legislation, is determined by cost of production plus gross profit. Again, fair market value is abandoned. Clause 36 also contains some new conditions which must be met before the fair market value rule can be applied, just as clauses 37, 38, 39 and 40 lay down some new limitations on that rule.

To sum up, the cardinal principle for determining value for duty which has been used in this country for so long, that is to say the fair market value of like or similar goods sold in the home market in similar circumstances, is being so greatly weakened in this bill as to become almost valueless. It will become, as I have said, the exception rather than the rule as the government uses the new provisions. It is being replaced by cost of production plus gross profit or reasonable profit, or by the discretionary and arbitrary power of the minister to fix valuation.

The cost of production test is an impracticable basis for valuation, often an impossible basis; therefore we are left with arbitrary valuation. I say, therefore, that because of this development and because of what is implicit and explicit in this bill, parliament's right to tax and to control taxes is being prejudiced and weakened. It puts the executive in control. It increases the dangers of discrimination as between taxpayers, and it ignores both the spirit and the objectives of GATT. In consequence we oppose this bill, and we oppose it strongly. We will do our utmost to defeat it and we will do our best, if we cannot defeat it, to amend it and to make it at least a better bill.

This is important because so much now will depend on the administration of this measure, and because that is so it is important to ascertain its purposes, in so far as we are able to do so, in the eyes of the government as well as to trace, as I propose to do, the legislative history of these provisions.

The Minister of Finance in his budget speech indicated that these provisions which are before us now were designed to protect Canadian producers against dumping. This party and the governments of this party have always supported, and we still support, legitimate anti-dumping measures. Our record in this connection when we were in power is shown by the inclusion in the Customs Tariff Act of the anti-dumping provision in section 6; it is shown by the inclusion in the present Customs Act of sections 38(1) and 35(12). It is shown in the bill we passed in 1950 dealing with seasonal rates of specific duties.

So we are not opposed to anti-dumping legislation. We have supported it in the past and we have enacted it in the past. But we are opposed to extending the power of the executive in this way in the guise of adding to anti-dumping legislation. The Minister of Finance—and I quote from page 1247 of Hansard of this session—had this to say:

The government intends to defend Canadian producers against the practice of dumping, whatever form it may take. This will require the strengthening of the present valuation provisions of the Customs Act and their effective enforcement. To this end my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) will shortly submit a bill to parliament amending the valuation provisions of the Customs Act—

This is the bill now before us. I continue:

—to add a provision to section 35 along the lines of the legislation in effect prior to 1948—

I will show what that means later. I continue:

—requiring that, where appropriate, the value for duty of imported goods shall not be less than the cost of production plus a reasonable advance for selling cost and profit.

The Minister of National Revenue who has introduced this bill made a statement in this house on July 3, and repeated it this morning, in which he related the problem of unemployment to this bill. On that date he said that the amendments which are now before us would help to deal with the unemployment situation by dealing with goods brought into this country at below cost of production. As reported at page 1892 of Hansard at that date the Minister of National Revenue said:

> After all, the term "fair market value" must surely have some meaning, and it must be remembered that it has been determined time and time again that the market value has really had no reference whatsoever to fair market value, and that anyone by making a few sales in the country of origin could then send the goods here, avoiding dumping duty. And when such goods are sold superficially below cost they threaten not only Canadian industry but, what is more important, the employees of Canadian industry.

With the objective of that statement, the protection of Canadian industry against unfair competition brought about by dumping as it was understood in the past, we of course have no quarrel. In fact we support it. But we do question the minister's view that you can curb unemployment in this country by trying to export it. Some of us will remember very well that this was the remedy adopted by Mr. Bennett and his government from 1930 to 1935. From what the minister has said it is clear that the government attaches importance to these amendments not only as an instrument of protection but as a cure for unemployment. I venture to state the results in that respect will not be good, and the experience of the period 1930 to 1935 to which I have already alluded strengthens these doubts in my mind.

Perhaps I should now make a short historical review which will help to explain why we have such strong doubts about the wisdom and value of these amendments. In making this review, of course, we must keep in mind a clear distinction between the dumping provisions in the Customs Tariff Act and the valuation provisions as they exist in the present amendments to the Customs Act.

The anti-dumping provisions of the Customs Tariff Act are in section 6 of that act, and I believe were first introduced in this country in 1904. Those provisions in the present act over the years became the standard for other countries who adopted them, and indeed they became the standard for GATT where they are embodied, I believe in articles 6 and 7. The word "dumping" is defined in the Customs Tariff Act in these words:

> —sale in Canada of goods at a price lower than the fair market value in the principal markets of the exporting country.

When dumping was proven under those provisions a duty was charged on the higher price and a penalty of not more than 15 per cent was imposed. These provisions, we should remember, are not affected by the present amendments which deal with valuations for duty under the Customs Act.

Let us look at the valuation provisions of the present Customs Act. Subsection 2 of section 35 of the Customs Act is the present basic valuation provision. It reads:

> The value for duty shall be the fair market value, at the time when and place from which the goods were shipped to Canada, of like goods when sold in like quantities for home consumption in the ordinary course of trade under fully competitive conditions and under comparable conditions of sale.

That concept of fair market value—and the house will pardon me if I go back a little in Canadian history—goes back as far as the Galt tariff of 1859. It continued unchanged and indeed was adopted by other countries, which is a tribute to its wisdom and value, until 1921 when the Conservative government of that year amended the Customs Act to introduce a new principle; cost of production plus reasonable profit, as the value for duty. I believe that was the first time that principle was introduced into our customs legislation, and it was done under Mr. Meighen's government. It did not last very long and was repealed the next year by the Liberal government which came into power in 1922.

The reasons for that action are set out very clearly in the House of Commons debates of that time, when Mr. Fielding said this was an attempt to boost the tariff without letting the people of Canada know what was being done by creating a fictitious price in order that the government might increase the duty. He argued that cheapness of itself was no reason for keeping out goods, and should be distinguished from dumping. That clause was repealed.

Mr. Fulton: Was any substitution made?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, there were substitutions but nothing based on cost of production. There were various measures introduced, and I shall come to some of them.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, before one o'clock in developing my arguments against the provisions of this bill I had shown that in 1921 the Conservative government introduced the principle of cost of production into valuation for duty; that their act in this regard was repealed by the Liberal government in 1922, and that this cost of production formula did not reappear until the government of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett came into power in 1930, when it was used as a formula to combat unemployment by increasing protection.

This Bennett formula, if I may call it that, provided that the value for duty of new and unused goods in no case was to be less than the cost of production of similar goods at date of shipment direct to Canada plus reasonable advances for selling costs and profit, that the minister should be the sole judge of what constituted a reasonable advance in the circumstances and that his decision thereon was to be final. The leader of the opposition of that day strongly opposed those provisions as we are opposing the provisions of this bill today. The leader of the opposition at that time, Mr. Mackenzie King, stated as reported in Hansard for 1930 at page 213, and I repeat it today in connection with this bill—

> The government proposes . . . to take power to fix an arbitrary valuation for customs purposes on whatever articles it likes, and to continue it as long as it likes.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the same criticism could be levelled against this legislation as an open invitation to arbitrary valuations and to administrative protection. In 1930 Mr. Mackenzie King argued, as I am attempting to argue today, that the power to impose a duty is the power to tax; that this power belongs to the Commons and should not be parted with or delegated to any government whatever, except in a strictly limited way for a genuine emergency. The then leader of the opposition, Mr. Mackenzie King, said at that time:

> The bill—

He was referring to the 1930 bill.

> —is wholly subversive of responsible government in every sense of the word and should not for one moment be countenanced.

We take the same position in regard to the bill before us. Mr. Ralston, a leading member of the opposition at that time, continued the attack and objected because the tariff-making authority was being shifted from parliament to the executive. This is one of the main bases for our objection to this bill. He argued, and the argument can be used against this bill—

> It is simply an enactment for the purpose of providing that the government without any check or control by parliament may make tariffs to suit the situation or to suit their own particular tariff ideas.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal warnings at that time, warnings of the effect of this kind of legislation on our economy went unheeded, but they were later proven to be right, and they have since, I think, been fully vindicated in the attitude they took at that time. It is the attitude we are taking today in regard to this bill. A recognized Canadian authority on customs matters who is now a member of the tariff board, Professor Elliott, had this to say in his book "Tariff Procedures and Trade Barriers", at page 187, talking about the provisions of the Bennett legislation:

> This set of administrative provisions was Canada's distinctive contribution to the trade barriers of the great depression.

Later on he said:

> That Canada's methods were effective in obstructing trade is attested by the complaints of British and foreign exporters and of Canadian importers; by the reports of a Canadian royal commission and of the United States tariff commission; by the pains taken to obtain concessions for empire goods at the Ottawa conference and by the fact that the governmen was able to pacify Canadian manufacturers while making concessions; by the United States' threat to exclude Canada from the benefits of the earlier treaties under the trade agreements act; and finally by the provisions of Canada's trade agreements with the United States in 1935 and 1938.

This is what Mr. Elliott had to say. Another Canadian customs authority, Professor Blake of Winnipeg, in his study of Canadian customs administration reached similar conclusions when he said in regard to this earlier legislation:

> An enormous increase in the power of the Minister of National Revenue over the tariff, and a concomitant decline in the power of parliament, resulted from the legislation of 1930.

Later on he said:

> It was decided to place the tariff weapon in the hands of the "war cabinet", and this was accomplished, neatly and effectively, through the Customs Act. By a process of extending, amending, and increasing the Canadian executive presented to the world a customs barrier which in many of its aspects resembled the crudest form of mercantilism.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that again we in this house in 1958 are being asked to go back to 1930 in the amendments to the bill before us, amendments which are in the view of the minister merely clarifications but which, as I have said, in our view go very much beyond that. The fact is that the cost of production as a basis for customs evaluation is an arbitrary and subjective valuation test. What is it? The cost of production in Canada or the cost of production in the country of export? How is it to be ascertained? Which of many differing costs is to be used, and what is reasonable profit? Why, the minister who introduced this bill is himself on record already in this session as to how arbitrary in his opinion is the concept of cost of production. At page 1803 of Hansard of July 1 the minister had this to say; we were talking about coal:

> They talked about producing coal at cost and using it for producing power. As the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond said, "What is cost?" It could be anything.

The minister told us on July I that the cost of production could be anything. We say that under this legislation it can be anything the cabinet arbitrarily decides it to be, that in doing so they establish the value for duty, and that is the power to make and increase tariffs at the will of the executive.

But we cannot leave the problem at that point. In the discussion of this very matter in 1930 the minister of national revenue of that time, Mr. Ryckman, left no other conclusion in the minds of members of the house of that day but that the cost of production he had in mind was the cost of production in Canada. He stated at that time that he could quite conceive, as can everyone else, that goods might be sold in Canada at below the cost of production in Canada, and that this might be what he would call unfair or piratical trade. At another point in the debate of 1930, as found at page 288 of Hansard of September 16, the minister of national revenue of that day said:

> If goods manufactured in another country were sold continually in Canada at a price lower than they can be produced here our manufacturers would be driven out of business.

So, Mr. Speaker, we wonder whether the present Minister of National Revenue subscribes to the point of view held on this matter by his predecessor who had the misfortune to introduce similar legislation almost three decades ago. On this particular point Mr. Ralston was quick to point out, as I should like to point out now, that the philosophy proposed at that time by the minister of national revenue would endanger the whole basis of international exchange of goods. Mr. Ralston said then, and I believe he was right, as found at page 289 of Hansard of September 16, 1930:

> Canadians are selling many of our exports at a price below the cost of production in the country where those goods are sold. That is the reason we are selling them there. We are not building a barbwired fence around Canada and swapping jackknives with ourselves. We are selling all over the world.

That is something we have to keep in mind in this country as we discuss customs matters. The use of this test of cost of production as a method of valuation has led us into difficulties in the past and we fear it will do so again. The historic position of the Liberal party is opposed to it. Liberal spokesmen, as we have seen, pointed out its dangers in 1921. In 1922 the Liberal government repealed a provision based on this test. The Liberal party fought it again in 1930 and, as soon as it came into office in 1935, the arbitrary valuations were removed through trade agreements with the United States and then the arbitrary valuation provision was repealed in 1948.

That point perhaps requires further elaboration in view of the statement of the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. The Minister of Finance has already pointed out, and quite correctly, that the cost of production provision as a basis for valuation was not repealed by a Liberal government until 1948. But he did not go further and point out that this cost of production feature of our tariff law had declined in importance and that its use had been restricted by trade agreements made by the Mackenzie King government after 1935 until it had become virtually inoperative. True, its formal repeal was not made until 1948, when it was formally done in order to reconcile our law with the requirements of the general agreements on tariffs and trade. But steps had been taken long before 1948 to render its provisions, as I have said, virtually inoperative.

The trade agreement between Canada and the United States at that time, 1935, involved an exchange of notes relating to this very point. In that agreement both governments gave undertakings that the fair market value should be taken for duty purposes. That was the first step to do away with this iniquitous cost of production test and arbitrary valuation feature of the Bennett legislation. The Liberal government removed about half the arbitrary values on United States goods on January 1, 1936.

Mr. Nowlan: 1936?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, that was when removal took place; and the remaining dumping valuations on United States goods were removed in the second United States-Canada trade agreement in 1938. Similar action was taken in all the other trade agreements we signed during that period when our trade was again on the upgrade. But, as I have just said, this particular provision in the legislation was not formally removed until it was rescinded in 1948, although it had been virtually inoperative for many years before that.

Surely it should now be clear, Mr. Speaker, to all hon. members that this particular technique about which I have been talking has been a favoured and exclusive instrument of commercial policy used by Conservative governments. It is now being reintroduced with its background of failure and its association with the depression period of Conservative rule from 1930 to 1935.

At this stage I am not going to make a detailed examination of the provisions of the bill, but I wish merely to use one illustration to show the kind of arbitrary powers the government would have if the bill were approved by parliament. Let us suppose for the sake of argument, and perhaps it is a realistic argument, that it is felt desirable to give more protection by executive action outside parliament to the Canadian primary textile industry against United States competition. If the government decided to do that it could choose from three courses of action which are permitted under three different sections of the bill.

In the first place, under new section 40A (7) (c), if the governor in council, the cabinet, is satisfied that United States textiles "are being imported into Canada under such conditions as to prejudicially or injuriously affect the interests of Canadian producers or manufacturers, the governor in council may authorize the minister to determine the value for duty"—

Mr. Nowlan: I know the Leader of the Opposition wants to be fair. He is not quoting from the bill when he refers to United States textiles being imported.

Mr. Pearson: Of course not. My quotation began with the words, "are being imported into Canada under such conditions as to prejudicially or injuriously affect the interests of Canadian producers or manufacturers, the governor in council may authorize the minister to determine the value for duty ... or may authorize the minister to prescribe the manner in which the value for duty shall be determined ...". Those last words are new.

In the second place, the government could use the new section 39 which says that—I quote from the section, having already quoted from it this morning—"where the minister is satisfied that material injury has been or may be caused to any industry in Canada ... the governor in council may order that the value for duty of those goods ... shall be increased to an amount equal to the cost of production thereof plus a reasonable amount for gross profit ..."

Those are two ways in which the government could proceed. But there is a third and simpler method of preventing foreign competition in the field of semi-manufactured goods, such as primary textiles often are. I refer the minister to section 38, which says:

> Where in any case or class of cases...
> (b) the goods imported...are intended to be... further manufactured in Canada or are intended to enter into the course of manufacture in Canada... the value for duty shall be determined in such manner as the minister prescribes.

Surely there is no further need to show that the government, the executive, has taken far-reaching powers unto itself in these provisions, in these amendments, to deal with customs valuation, thereby dealing with customs duties and thereby dealing with taxation. In this last provision I mentioned, section 38, there is no need even to show that material injury has been or may be caused, or to get authority from the governor in council. Under this section the minister can act on his own initiative—indeed, he will have no alternative but to act on his own initiative—in all cases described in section 38 unless the government decides to invoke the other sections, 39 or 40A(7)(c), which I have mentioned. In fact, it is true to say that the powers given the minister under section 38 are even wider than those given to the governor in council to deal with similar cases under section 39 or section 40A (7) (c).

Then there is one other point I want to mention, namely the effect of this legislation on the British preferential tariff. This is certainly a point which deserves to be raised at this stage, because it has a direct relationship to our imports from the United Kingdom. Under section 38 of the old legislation, which under the proposed bill, with one change, becomes section 40A (7) (c), it will be noted that the so-called anti-dumping valuation cannot be used for goods "entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff". That exception or that qualification appears in the present legislation, namely section 38 of the present bill.

Mr. Nowlan: The present act.

Mr. Pearson: Yes. Section 38 of the present act, which I think is clause 40A (7) (c) of the bill we are now considering. The government in this new bill, in its amendments, are maintaining that provision giving British goods exceptional treatment. They are maintaining that provision, but it now has no real significance of any kind because it is probably not its intention to use that provision very much since there are other provisions in this bill which give the government full power without such a qualification. I refer to the new section 39 under which—and this is an important change, which according to the government is to be a safeguard against dumping—goods entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff are not exempted.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is another blow at British exports to this country just a few weeks before the commonwealth economic conference. But that is not the worst thing. From now on, under section 38 the value for duty of all British goods which are not fully manufactured products will be determined in a manner prescribed by the minister, so the government will be in a position to discriminate against such British goods as woollen textiles, whether or not dumping practices have been used. That is under section 38 of the new bill.

In short, Mr. Speaker, this is bad and dangerous legislation, especially when it is viewed in the light of economic history. It requires parliament to surrender many of its rights in this most important field of taxation. It gives wide and arbitrary powers to the minister and the governor in council. It threatens the best interests of Canadians consumers, importers and exporters who are already bearing a heavy burden imposed by our tariffs. It will be a hard blow to GATT, and it can expose our country to damaging retaliation by other nations.

We do not know, of course, Mr. Speaker, the intentions of the government in applying these regulations. We do not know what are the industrial sectors that the government intends to protect with these wide and arbitrary powers. We do know, however, that once it has yielded to pressures in one sector, it will be extremely difficult not to do the same for others. We do know also that the first industrial sector would likely be that of primary textiles, according to previous statements made by members of the government.

Hence in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say a word about this particular problem. We all know that our primary textile industry in this country has been going through great difficulties for a long period of time. We know that in fact it has enjoyed real prosperity only when Canadian demand was abnormally high and foreign producers were not in a position to take advantage of our market.

I am not going to attempt at this stage, Mr. Speaker, to analyse the sources of weakness of this most important Canadian industry in terms of production and employment. Most of the causes of these difficulties have been indicated in two special studies which were prepared for and under the auspices of the Gordon commission. One is entitled "The Canadian Primary Textiles Industry" and the other "Canadian Secondary Manufacturing Industry". The reports of the tariff board are also interesting in this respect.

I want to emphasize, however, that these difficulties which are being experienced, and which have been experienced now for many years, are not due to the lack of Canadian skill or efficiency in this field or to the prevailing wages in this industry in comparison with the over-all level of wages in Canada. The causes are much deeper and more basic. For instance, the size of the domestic market, the great variety of tastes of Canadian consumers who are influenced, of course, by United States fashions; the lack of specialization within our own industry and technological changes are some of the factors that have brought about the present difficult situation.

I myself am convinced that some form of government assistance and encouragement will be needed in order to maintain this important Canadian industry and increase its productivity. But we on this side of the house do not feel that government assistance of this kind should take the exclusive form of ever-greater protection against foreign competition, because such a remedy does very little indeed to cure the industry of its basic difficulties.

I obviously cannot outline now what are the other forms of government assistance that might be adopted, but I hope to have, before long, an occasion to do so. I firmly believe, however—and I want to emphasize this—that if the government feels at present that the industry needs more protection, it should have the courage to follow the only normal democratic method and ask parliament to increase the tariff either against ordinary foreign competition or against dumping, rather than trying with this bill in effect to by-pass parliament, to ask for wide and discretionary powers and impose arbitrary values. That is not the way to do it, Mr. Speaker. This approach, in our view, is the wrong one not only from the point of view of our democratic and parliamentary institutions but also from the point of view of our best long term economic interests in promoting orderly commercial relationships.

The bill now before us purports to protect Canadian industry against dumping and, as I said before lunch, with that purpose we are in agreement. Our good faith in that respect is shown by the measures introduced by Liberal governments in the past to give Canadian industry bona fide protection against illegitimate dumping, but this bill goes much further than that. It is a restrictive measure, as we see it, and puts restrictions on trade expansion; indeed, it is obstructive of the expansion of trade. In addition it gives unnecessarily arbitrary powers to the minister and the cabinet which entrench on the rights of parliament in this most important aspect of taxation policy.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith):

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:
> "That this bill be not now read a second time because of new provisions for arbitrary valuations which transfer the tariff-making authority from parliament to the minister and the cabinet, contrary to the principles of responsible government and the essential right of parliament to tax."

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I would refer Your Honour to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 202, subsection 12, which reads as follows:

> An amendment proposing a direct negative, though it may be covered up by verbiage, is out of order.

Nothing, Mr. Speaker, could be much clearer than that hon. gentlemen opposite once again are seeking to do indirectly that which they cannot do directly, namely to move a direct negative under the guise of an amendment. With whatever verbiage they cloak their amendment I suggest to you, sir, that it becomes perfectly obvious that, without saying so, they are merely trying to move a negative and thus disguise their real reasons for what they hope will be a defeat of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in reply to what the Minister of Justice has just said, I would draw to your attention two things. In the first place, I point out that on September 16, 1930, when similar legislation was introduced in a previous parliament, Mr. Stewart of Edmonton moved an amendment in the following terms:

> The character of this bill is such as to transfer to the government the authority of parliament over taxation, which is contrary to the principles of responsible government.

Your Honour will therefore see that in substance, though not precisely in words, that amendment is on all fours with the amendment just moved by my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition. There was no challenge of the validity of that amendment at that time, and it is therefore a precedent which I feel we must respect in this house. I would also remind the Minister of Justice and recall to Your Honour's mind citation 382 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which is directly related to amendments on the second reading of a bill, and of which the relevant part reads as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions—

I think that is the relevant portion, and I do not wish to detain the house unnecessarily.

Mr. Speaker: It is perhaps not always easy to draw the line between an amendment which is simply a negating of the principle of the bill and an amendment which is declaratory of a principle. It is clear that on second reading an amendment can be moved which declares a contrary principle, as has been—

Mr. Fulton: May I address you on that point, sir?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: I think the form of amendment which Beauchesne had in mind when referring to an amendment declaratory of a principle is where the mover of the amendment seeks to substitute for the bill some other principle, so that if the amendment were adopted there would in fact be some other principle being followed in the legislation, but not simply advancing in the form of an amendment of reasons or alleged reasons for opposing the bill. This is because the alleged reasons for opposing the bill are, of course, matters of argument and not matters to be incorporated in an amendment.

My hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition in his speech gave what he said were valid reasons for opposing this bill. He alleged that the effect would be to transfer control over taxation from parliament to the executive, and those are matters of argument. He has now sought to incorporate the same argument into his amendment and he has merely asserted reasons why he believes the bill should not be adopted. He has not set forth a principle which, if his amendment were adopted, would be substituted for the principle of the legislation which the Minister of National Revenue has introduced.

It will be perfectly obvious that if the amendment were adopted it would in fact be a straight negative of the bill. I have not the amendment before me, but as I recall it it says in effect that the bill should not be adopted "because", and then proceeds to assert matters which are argument and which, I submit, are so clearly an expanded negative as to fall 100 per cent within the citation of Beauchesne which I have read. This citation has been the over-all guiding principle of this house for many years in spite of the precedent referred to us by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I suggest that a temporary aberration is not sufficient to override a principle of long standing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, if I may address myself to the remarks which have just been made by the Minister of Justice, which were to the effect that this was not an amendment declaratory of a principle different from the bill, it does seem to me that it is declaratory of the principle that the tariff-making authority belongs to parliament and that this bill seeks to transfer that tariff-making authority from parliament to the minister and the cabinet—

Mr. Fulton: That may be a reason in the mind of the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: —that this is contrary to the principle of responsible government and the essential right of parliament to tax. It does seem to me that no more fundamental principle could possibly be asserted in the House of Commons than the principle asserted in this amendment.

Mr. Fulton: If perhaps the amendment were phrased in the form that the bill should not now be read a second time but that it be resolved that some other proposition be substituted therefor and then there followed the proposition which the hon. member alleges, then I submit the amendment might—if it did not fall on some other ground—be in order.

But that is not what is said in this amendment. What is said in this amendment is that the bill should be not now read a second time because of new provisions for arbitrary valuations which transfer the tariff-making authority from parliament to the minister and the cabinet. In other words, nothing could be clearer than that what has happened here is that my friends have inserted their arguments into their amendment. But they have not moved in this house that some other principle be substituted for that which they allege to be the principle of this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: A return to this standard principle.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word on this point of order. The Minister of Justice cited Beauchesne's fourth edition, section 202, subsection 12. If he had gone on to cite subsection 13 it would have been a little different. It says:

An amendment to alter the main question by substituting a proposition with the opposite conclusion is not an expanded negative and may be moved.

And section 201 says:

A motion may be amended: (a) by leaving out certain words; (b) by leaving out certain words in order to insert other words; (c) by inserting or adding other words.

I think from these citations it is clear that the amendment should be declared in order.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their views with regard to this proposed amendment. It is true that the effect of asserting a principle is to deny the bill and therefore, perhaps, this is a negative resolution as has been argued by the Minister of Justice. I think that is the necessary consequence of moving an amendment which asserts a principle. I might refer the house to the Parliamentary Dictionary which has a paragraph on an amendment which gives reasons, as this one does. The amendment proposes that the bill be not read a second time now, and it goes on to give reasons. This is what is said on that subject by the Parliamentary Dictionary at page 162. This is in the edition of 1956:

Reasoned Amendment: A reasoned amendment may be moved on second and third reading of a bill and on certain other occasions, as stated below. This form of amendment seeks, by substituting other words for those of the question "That the bill be now read a second (third) time", either to give reasons why the house declines to give a second or third reading to the bill, or to express an opinion with regard to its subject matter or to the policy which the bill is intended to fulfil.

Furthermore, we have a clear precedent already referred to of an amendment which is about as close as one could expect to find to the amendment which is proposed today, and that is the one which will be found in the Journals of the house for September 16, 1930 at page 23, which was accepted without objection. In my opinion this amendment satisfies the requirements of the rules.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in the C.C.F. feel that this matter should not be proceeded with at this time. There are a great many reasons why we feel it is a mistake, and we will endeavour to put those reasons on record.

Canada, perhaps more than any other nation in the world, is dependent for a prosperous economy on the continuance of large scale trade and an expansion of trade, and I think perhaps more than any other nation we should be most careful to do nothing which would impede trade and prevent its expansion. I have in my hand Trade of Canada showing exports for December 1957, and I see that our exports in 1957 amounted to the very large total of $4,840 million. Anything that is likely to result in the reduction of our exports because we set up barriers to trade should not be lightly entered upon. Many of our main industries depend very greatly for their prosperity on a large export market.

In 1957 the value of agricultural and vegetable products going into export amounted to $831 million; animals and animal products, $302 million; fibrous textiles and textile products, $27 million; wood, wood products and paper, $1,456 million; iron and its products, $520 million; non-ferrous metals and their products, $1,006 million; chemicals and allied products, $195 million, and other miscellaneous commodities $154 million.

Canada was for many years the third exporting nation of the world, but according to information given to the Gordon commission and contained in the report, The Future of Canada's Export Trade, by 1955 Canada had dropped to fifth position, behind the United States, the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany and France. I submit that it would not be in the interests of our economy to take any steps which might result in a reduction of our exports and a general reduction in our trade.

Thus we have to look at this bill most carefully, and we find in it certain principles to which we object. We object to the principle of the valuation of imports into this country on the basis of an arbitrary cost of production to which is added an arbitrary gross profit. We object to this bill because the decisions that will be taken will be decisions flowing from the cabinet or from the minister. How often in the past have we heard the Prime Minister object to government by order in council, government by cabinet decision? Hansard contains innumerable such references by the Prime Minister. And if there was one thing which beyond any other factor resulted in the Conservative party obtaining office, I believe it was that they were able to sell this principle to the Canadian public; that parliament should be supreme, that the supremacy of parliament should always be maintained, and that the governor in council should not be given authority to set in an arbitrary way such things as tariffs.

Under this legislation the governor in council will in certain circumstances arbitrarily establish a cost of production plus gross profit price with regard to goods entering into this country and for the purpose of establishing tariffs. This government is apparently going to acquire much more detailed information about the cost of production in foreign countries than it has been able to obtain regarding the cost of production at home. We have on the statute books the Agricultural Stabilization Act, in which the government has agreed to set certain floor prices for Canadian agricultural products based on the cost of production.

When we have asked whether these statistics on the cost of production of important agricultural commodities are available we have been informed that they are not. When farm organizations have come to Ottawa and asked that these figures be produced they have been informed that they are not obtainable because it has been impossible to ascertain the cost of producing these agricultural commodities. If that is the case, how much more impossible will it be for Canada to decide on the cost of production of goods coming into this country from foreign countries?

Another reason we feel this bill is not well timed is that it is being proceeded with just a few weeks before the forthcoming commonwealth conference. How can we reasonably expect an expansion of trade with commonwealth countries, and how can we reasonably expect the conference to succeed, if two weeks before the conference takes place parliament by passing this measure increases trade barriers against goods coming into this country from the commonwealth?

As has already been pointed out, section 38, subsection 1 of the existing Customs Act now provides for certain arbitrary powers, as follows:

38. (1) Where at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council on a report from the minister that goods of any kind not entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff or any lower tariff are being imported into Canada either on sale or on consignment, under such conditions as prejudicially or injuriously to affect the interests of Canadian producers or manufacturers, the governor in council may authorize the minister to fix the value for duty of any class or kind of such goods, and notwithstanding any other provision of this act, the value so fixed shall be deemed to be the fair market value of such goods.

Here is an arbitrary fixing of values, but it is an arbitrary fixing of values limited to those goods not entitled to enter under the British preferential tariff. This new bill removes this section and by section 39 allows the same arbitrary valuation of all goods coming into this country, no matter from what nation. One of the most significant purposes of this bill is to make it possible for the governor in council to erect further barriers based on arbitrary valuation against goods coming into this nation from commonwealth countries. We feel that the principle of this bill is wrong, and we believe most strongly that it should not be invoked against British goods by removing this exemption.

There has been a long history in this country of enactment of legislation such as we have before us today. In spite of the very learned statement by the Leader of the Opposition and the many excellent facts he brought forth, it has not always been the Conservative party which took the initiative in this direction. The record of the Liberal party is not without blemish. In 1922 under the prime minister of that day, Mr. Mackenzie King, the following amendment was placed on the statute books of this country. Section 3 of chapter 18 of the 1922 statutes reads as follows:

3. The said Customs Act is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 47 thereof:

"47. (a) If at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council on a report from the minister of customs and excise, that natural products of a class or kind produced in Canada are being imported into Canada, either on sale or on consignment, under such conditions as prejudicially or injuriously to affect the interests of Canadian producers, the governor in council may, in any case or class of cases, authorize the minister to value such goods for duty, notwithstanding any other provisions of this act, and the value so determined shall be held to be the fair market value thereof.

The same kind of arbitrary valuation about which the Leader of the Opposition complained so effectively this afternoon is found in the statutes of this country in 1922, placed there by a Liberal government. But in those days the tables were completely turned; the situation was not that which we find in parliament today. At that time we had as leader of the opposition the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen who had many interesting and important comments to make about this section. I should like to quote from Mr. Meighen's remarks as recorded at pages 3414 and 3415 of the House of Commons debates of June 22, 1922. This is what Mr. Meighen had to say:

This provision applied to natural products—

Oh, I am on the wrong line.

Mr. Benidickson: You had better get back on the party line.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Meighen had this to say:

I do not know whether this is fully understood or not by the hon. gentlemen to my left; but I admit that it is fully understood by me. This provision is protection personified. This is the last emanation from the government that denounced protection two or three days ago. For purposes of valuation the minister can fix the value where he likes, and any basis he likes, on any principle he likes, to suit any interest he likes, as low as he likes, as high as he likes, and when he likes. In a word, this simply puts into the power of the minister the whole elevation of the tariff of this country.

If Mr. Meighen were in the house today sitting on the opposition side he could use exactly the same words. He went on to say:

He—

The minister. I continue.

—can put on any valuation he thinks fit. In other words, it virtually enables him to fix the tariff where he pleases, and the house is asked to support the minister in that. We are asked to do so by a government who have denounced protection, but who, nevertheless, are introducing the most distinctly protectionist measure ever submitted to parliament. There has never been anything that embodied every element of protection so clearly as does this clause . . . the house is being asked to support an administration that takes to itself the power virtually to fix the tariff by order in council—an administration composed of gentlemen who howled for months against the ordinary functions of order in council.

—Now, let me repeat, if ever a government came down to parliament with a measure distinctly, emphatically, superlatively protectionist, that measure is the one now proposed.

...That hon. gentleman—

Referring to Mr. MacKenzie King.

—is now standing up and asking parliament to give him power to exercise a degree of autocracy unknown in any country in the world.

Those were statements made by a Conservative leader against a Liberal government which introduced a measure to provide for arbitrary valuation in the case of the importation of natural products. In 1958 the tables are turned. This government is introducing a measure which provides the same objectionable arbitrary powers, but not only against the importation of natural products into this country but of all products. Therefore, if Mr. Meighen was right in 1922, how much more would he be right in making the same kind of statement against a bill which is much wider in scope than the amendment to the Customs Act of 1922?

There is one section in this bill that I have noticed with particular interest, namely the section which has to do with natural products. I refer to subparagraph (b) of subclause (7) of clause 40A, on page 5 of the bill, having to do with the importation of fruits and vegetables into Canada. It is well known that the producers of fruits and vegetables in this country from time to time face very severe competition from the importation of such goods, mainly from the United States. This particular clause might give some protection or might alleviate in a minor degree for a short period the great difficulties that those producers face; but I think there is a better method of dealing with the situation that faces those producers than by embodying a provision in an act such as this.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In view of the amendment that is now before the house, it seems to me that the proper course to follow is to debate the principle which is enunciated in the amendment until the house has had an opportunity to deal with it, and that principle is limited to the objection that the bill transfers the tariff-making authority from parliament to the minister and the cabinet, contrary to the principles of responsible government. I think it would be out of order to debate any other principles of the bill except the one embodied in the amendment.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, that would be a rather severe limitation of the scope of debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate the fact that when the amendment is disposed of he can then debate the other matter.

Mr. Argue: That is what I was coming to, Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to make a second speech in this debate. If I am unable to proceed in this way at this time—and I want to refer to it only briefly—I am quite prepared to make a second speech. I am not endeavouring to adopt a course that is either objectionable to the house or will extend the scope of the debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure that if the house was asked whether or not the hon. gentleman might be allowed to continue his general speech and not be limited to the terms of the amendment it would certainly feel favourable to his proceeding.

Mr. Benidickson: At this stage of the session.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, if it is the wish of the house to debate the entire question as one I have no reason to object to that course. Does it commend itself to the house that members speak only once on this bill?

Mr. Pickersgill: Your Honour, I do not think we could accept that limitation. I think the spirit of the Prime Minister's suggestion is one that we would all agree with.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not in any way suggesting that there would be any limitation in that regard because that, of course, is far removed from my wishes at the moment. I thought the hon. gentleman was building his argument, and I think the house would agree. Your Honour is strictly right in your interpretation, but I feel that the tenor and the feeling of the house is that the hon. gentleman should proceed.

Mr. Crestohl: Does that also apply to subsequent speakers following the hon. member for Assiniboia?

Mr. Speaker: I am not very clear. It is a bit difficult for the house to express its view about having a debate on this subject as well as on the bill we have before us, but I shall allow the hon. member to proceed on the basis that he is speaking only once. If he rises again, however, I will be more severe with him.

Mr. Argue: I did not intend to volunteer that I would not speak again but I am quite willing to accept the speaker's suggestion as to the course I should follow.

I want to thank the Prime Minister for the statement he has made. I think it is an indication that perhaps the session has not many more days to go, and in a general co-operative spirit and with the feeling of good will amongst the members we can agree on an innovation in the rules that would seem to expedite the business of the house.

Mr. Nowlan: And that we are not arbitrary.

Mr. Argue: Not arbitrary so far as the rules of debate are concerned, but I would not want my remarks to be interpreted too widely.

I did point out that producers of certain fruits and vegetables in this country had faced very severe competition from time to time and that the clause enunciated in this bill would not provide for those producers the kind of marketing arrangements that I felt would be in their best interests and that they would like to have. I was about to say that I thought the policy put forward in this house the other day by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) in regard to peaches, in that a floor price was established, and the minister indicated that assurances could be provided to peach producers that adequate canning facilities and markets were being provided, was much better than anything that is contained in this bill.

We are most anxious that producers of fruits and vegetables in this country, along with other primary producers, should have the chance to market their products in an orderly fashion and at reasonable prices. Rather than the section of this bill we would suggest the full use of the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act by the establishment of such minimum prices. This could be applied particularly to fruits and vegetables and more especially to peaches, apricots, plums and prunes. This has already been done in the case of peaches. Positive steps should be taken to assure adequate and continuous operation of canning and processing facilities.

Further we would suggest that an annual federal-provincial agricultural conference, attended by representatives of the federal and provincial governments, producers organizations, producers marketing and sales agencies and processors, for the purpose of orderly marketing and processing of fruit and vegetable products, should be arranged. We feel that this is an important provision. We would suggest the encouragement of international co-operation between Canadian grower organizations and United States grower organizations to undertake negotiations and discussions for the orderly marketing, on an agreed basis, of fruit and vegetable products between our two countries. We understand that to a degree such co-operative policies are already in effect. They provide at certain times of the year for the orderly importation into Canada of certain fruits from the United States and conversely orderly export of certain Canadian fruits during certain other parts of the year into the United States.

We feel that the provisions which this bill contains should not be proceeded with, and particularly not proceeded with at this time, in the light of the coming commonwealth trade conference. Canada, as one of the major trading nations of the world, is in no position to start down the road that leads to increased trade barriers and a worsening of our trade position.

We feel that there is another reason why we should not embark on such a policy at this time and that is the growing threat in the field of international trade as a result of the current Soviet economic trade offensive. It is not wise for Canada, it is not wise for other countries of the western world to undertake measures which will make trade more difficult at a time when the Soviet union and the countries associated with it have embarked on a very aggressive program of expansion of international trade. We feel, Mr. Speaker, that the problems which this measure endeavours to deal with should be dealt with in other ways.

In introducing the measure the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) said that he thought it would help employment in our country. I am very fearful that any such measure which can result in increased trade barriers will have the very opposite effect and that it will result in more unemployment and further difficulties for the major export industries of our country which are so important to our economy and to which our nation owes so much. For these reasons we oppose the bill in principle and suggest alternative proposals for the industries that it is claimed the bill would help.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I, at this stage, enter the debate on the bill introduced by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan)? The minister also reports to the house for the C.B.C. and after hearing him, I feel that he should be a member of the C.B.C. performers' guild, for he introduced this legislation, which he knows to be of vital importance, with a nonchalance implying that the bill contained nothing important.

The fact remains, though, that this bill is a superlatively protectionist step, and is well in line with Conservative tradition.

It has been said in certain quarters that the Minister of National Revenue was no more enthused over the prospect of introducing this legislation than was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), but that the Prime Minister was anxious that it be brought forward at this time in order to prove that, though he had been a Liberal until 1928, he has really become a one hundred per cent Tory. In fact, if we study the history of the Conservative party, we will see that it has at all times identified itself with protectionism. When the party was being led by Sir John A. Macdonald, it was a protectionist party but its protective legislation was introduced in the house itself, and it was the house and not the cabinet that arbitrarily decided upon a given tariff that set the valuation of goods for duty.

[Mr. Argue.]

In those days Sir John A. Macdonald could well have definite reasons to follow a protectionist policy, because the population of this country was predominantly rural, to the extent of 70 per cent, and agriculture in those days was a family operation, and just enough was produced for personal requirements.

It will readily be understood that, in those days, customs duties were more a source of revenue for the country than a means of protecting industry, which, at the time was, to all practical purposes, inexistent, or very limited. The same thing held true about the United States. Indeed, at that time the United States, like Canada, had a protectionist policy because of the influence of its 70 per cent rural population. Today, the converse is true. The population of industrial cities represents about 70 per cent of the entire population, and even the farming industry—we describe it as such because it has achieved the status of industry—is comprised of all kinds of co-operatives which enable it to produce enough not only to provide for family needs but also to supply large national and international markets.

If Sir John A. Macdonald were back with us, I am convinced that, as a man of acknowledged superior intelligence, he would look upon tariff protection with a different eye than does the present Prime Minister.

Today, the government is taking devious means to reach an objective that they do not wish to admit. Tariffs are not being increased and we might be told in a moment, when the minister replies, that the government does not intend to raise tariffs and that this is meant simply to protect industries going through temporary difficulties. To my way of thinking, to adopt a particular tariff, or to provide under the bill for some way of arbitrarily setting the valuation for duty purposes of goods so that their price at entry will be higher than the original cost is in fact a tariff increase, even if the rate of duty is not raised.

If today the Conservative party chooses to use this roundabout way to introduce a protectionist policy, for which it is well known, it is because it fears representations from the west and from the maritimes which require foreign markets for their expansion, cannot be satisfied with domestic markets, and will have to seek foreign markets.

Under this bill, the minister is given unlimited powers. I will not deal with the sections of the bill, which is allowed only in committee, but I find that the different sections are so drawn as to give to the hon. minister and to the government the power to increase the valuation of goods especially on the basis of their cost of production plus a profit.

The cost of production is something that is extremely hard to determine intelligently. Let us take the case of two manufacturers. One of them uses old methods and outdated machinery; he leaves his business to its fate, good or bad. As a consequence his cost of production is much higher than in the case of an industrialist who takes advantage of new methods and new machinery and keeps his business under close supervision. Thus, if the government were to abuse its arbitrary powers and wanted to protect a mismanaged industry, it would at the same time increase the revenue of well organized industries, that is of big industries because in most cases the lesser industries are the ones that are not so well organized.

In any event I feel I can say that this bill is the fulfilment of an election promise, even if the government does not dare admit it. That explains why this devious method is being used to invest the Minister of National Revenue with such extraordinary powers.

I have here a translation of an article published in Saturday Night for May 10 and signed by John A. Stevenson. I quote:

> One hundred and seventeen out of the 208 Progressive Conservative members in the new parliament come from Ontario and Quebec. Most of these 117 have been elected under specific pledges to work for the better tariff protection of industries in their constituencies which are suffering from foreign competition, and the prevailing volume of unemployment will supply them with ammunition for fortifying their pressure upon the government for remedial action.
> Accordingly there are signs that ministers are in a serious quandary about their policy in regard to trade and tariff. They know that any policy which gave the protectionist forces in the United States congress an excuse for passing damaging retaliatory legislation would be a very dangerous adventure and so they have been singing very low about the project for a diversion of our import trade. The Prime Minister has lately broken a long silence about it by an explanation that he had merely said that a diversion of 15 per cent from the United States to Britain would cure the present lack of equilibrium in Canada's balance of trade with the United States and whoever had represented him as having given an explicit pledge to accomplish this had been guilty of what Sir Winston Churchill once called "a terminological inexactitude."

And further:

> Every Tory member for a seat which has a textile plant within its bounds will be aggrieved if some succor in the form of higher duties is not forthcoming when Mr. Fleming submits his first budget.

This article therefore clearly states that the devious way in which things are being done at this time is designed to avoid irritating the west, irritating the east, irritating those extremists which come from the central provinces, Quebec and Ontario. In any event, every time a Conservative government has been in power the same thing has never failed to happen. The same devious method was always resorted to in order to achieve that end.

And still farther on:

> At the moment the Canadian Tariff Board is working overtime to deal with an abnormal flood of applications for higher protection for domestic industries.

In 1921, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) pointed out a few minutes ago, the same legislation was passed, under which the minister was given power to establish the value of production costs, and to add a reasonable profit. That is mainly what makes this legislation bad. We do not object to the minister having certain powers, but if he is enabled to exercise those powers for increasing tariffs, without this house or the Canadian people being informed, I say that this is wrong, and that we should therefore not support the legislation.

The Liberal party had to revoke the act in 1922. However, exactly the same legislation was enacted in 1930 by the Bennett administration, when the tariff was based on the valuation of production costs plus a set profit. Moreover, the minister had some discretionary powers which went beyond all limits; it was a protectionist power. Anyhow, as the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) said on another occasion, "What are production costs?" They may be anything and everything. This is perfectly true, and how will the minister be able to establish the value of a product in an efficient way at the best possible price?

Is it up to the government to protect an industry which does not look after its own business? Is it up to the government to protect an industry which is not well organized? No, but it is up to the government to safeguard an organized industry, not only so as to enable the owner to make a profit but so that those who are buying the goods may also benefit. Even the best government cannot be, any more than is the minister, in a position to determine a reasonable production cost with a reasonable profit. That is why we are opposed to the passage of this bill, as were the Liberals in 1921 and in 1930, since we recall that in 1922 and in 1935, they had to repeal those bills, otherwise the United States would have kept on establishing tariffs themselves, as a reprisal measure against Canadian trade. Besides, that was one of the reasons for clause 38 of the former Bennett bill, which the Liberals wanted to repeal in 1948, in connection with British preferential treatment. Today, this provision is being kept in the bill, precisely through arbitrary powers granted to the minister, with regard to the determination of production cost, as well as through arbitrary powers placed in the hands of the minister, with regard to the determination of that cost and the establishment of related tariffs. This bill, therefore, ignores British preferential treatment.

Besides, let us not forget that Canada is an exporting country, which produces much more than it is able to consume. Canada needs markets, and if every change in government must give rise to difficulties as a result of the establishment by the party in power, through devious means such as this, of a protection tariff, I think unemployment, resentment and hardship will follow. A measure like this was adopted in 1921, and was followed by a slight business slump. Thank God, Canada put the Liberal party back into office, and the party created new markets after opening up the older ones. Unfortunately, in 1930, Mr. Bennett came back into power with his slogan that he was going to "blast his way into the world markets" through those devious means, and we saw what the consequences were for Canada.

Furthermore, advantage is always taken of any slackening in the tempo of business to have these same arbitrary measures and methods adopted. I put it to you squarely that I am concerned for Canada; I fear our industry will not be able to go on selling its products abroad, and that this will give rise to a production surplus, and a production surplus will give rise to unemployment. And when you get unemployment, the way to meet it is not to adopt that sort of measure, any more than to hand out unemployment insurance on a silver platter, but to clear the way for the marketing of our goods so that we have no surplus.

There has been talk lately of the important problem of textile products. The textile industry is exposed to difficulties, and is having trouble in riding the storm. Is it because of overproduction? Or dumping? I say no.

[Mr. Caron.]

Mr. Tremblay: It's because of the Liberals!

Mr. Caron: What is the hon. member saying?

Mr. Tremblay: It's a political stalemate.

Mr. Caron: I would never have thought that a university professor could display such ignorance!

Mr. Tremblay: Much loud talk but all meaningless.

Mr. Caron: The textile industry is going through a bad period. It is not by means of arbitrary measures like this one that we shall end the problem. It is all very well to be able to help the industry with this measure, but what is the use of doing so if it means throttling the country's economy in the process? To begin with, the textile industry is in difficulties in Canada, just like it is in the United States, England, Italy and indeed the whole world. Markets have changed, conditions are different, and one of the main difficulties confronting the textile industry arises from its having come into being in Canada at a time when communications facilities were poor and we hardly produced enough for ourselves. Today, however, there are fine communications facilities throughout the world, and the textile industry is in difficulties because, to begin with, we in Canada lack the raw materials, we have to import them from abroad, we must shoulder the transportation costs, and then re-export the finished product. Accordingly, production costs and sales prices are higher, and we have a hard time competing with prices prevailing on the American market. Indeed, the American market has had its own difficulties. Manufacturers in the state of Maine moved their industry to the south of the United States so as to be closer to the source of their raw materials because of dual transportation costs and some American industries even moved to South America.

We cannot solve this problem by adopting this arbitrary provision proposed by the government. Setting the cost of production against the market value is really bad and arbitrary powers conferred upon the minister are hardly any better. Encroachment upon the rights of parliament is the reason why we cannot accept this measure and why this amendment was moved.

When he was in the opposition the Prime Minister used to stand in the defence of rights of parliament whereas, today, he would have us confer arbitrary powers upon the minister and the government. After censuring government by orders in council, he is the first one to resort to this method.

He, the first to condemn such a practice, gives his ministers powers which never before in Canada were exercised even by Conservative ministers. This we must oppose because it constitutes a threat to our trade with the world. Moreover, it is incompatible with the Geneva agreements and may lead to all sorts of difficulties in our trade with several countries. It is not in accordance with the spirit of GATT. While imposing on other countries, by indirect means, higher tariffs on the importation of goods into Canada, even though it may be contrary to the spirit of GATT, we do not like to see other countries react in the same way and resort to the same means for their own protection.

Well, here is one section which goes far enough since it states:

Where the minister is satisfied that material injury has been or may be—

Those words are beyond me.

—caused to any industry.

This means that when the minister thinks some prejudice may be caused, he has by that very fact the right to order the enactment of a tariff equal to production costs which will make the importation of some foreign commodity to this country practically impossible.

Section 38 says:

The value for duty shall be deemed to have been duly fixed by the minister pursuant to subsection (1) if the same is fixed on a basis or by a method prescribed by the minister.

That is to say not in the manner it should normally be dealt with on the world market, but by a method prescribed by the minister. It is inconceivable that the government should think of such an action, more particularly after everything that had been said by our hon. friends opposite especially during the last few sessions. Heaven knows how shocked they were when they were sitting on the other side of this house and the Liberal government was ruling by order in council. And now they themselves want to impose their point of view in this matter.

If you look the budget speech over again, you will see that the Minister of Finance announced that he wanted to determine the production cost plus a reasonable amount for gross profit. His mind was therefore made up even before the election! As it was said in an article published in Saturday Night, that decision was taken to please some members from Ontario and Quebec. The production cost was going to be established, plus a reasonable profit, but nobody wanted to ask for a raise of tariffs in this house because nobody wanted to displease people both east and west. The minister may well answer that the fair market value can be fictitious. That may be so. But nobody will ever find a way to know what the market value will be in other countries. We know it in the case of British articles imported in this country. We knew their market value; we know their value on the English market; if we didn't know, we could easily find out by asking the Board of Trade in London. But who is going to tell us how to determine the cost of production plus profit? And if you leave it in the hands of the minister, and he does whatever he wants to do, unbeknownst to parliament, what will happen? The Canadian people might very well pay more without knowing why, and without the house being told why!

Here is the definition of dumping in section 35:

Sale in Canada of goods at a lower price than the fair market value on the main market of the exporting country.

I know it is not too difficult to determine fair market value, but when it is claimed that the tariff is the cause of disquiet in the textile industry, I cannot help quoting the following article by Grant Dexter, in the Winnipeg Free Press:

(Text):

The tariff board report showed that the Canadian woollen mills were in difficulty but that the cause did not lie with imports. The chief causes were: More intense competition from synthetic fabrics and the heavy loss on inventory due to the fall in prices in 1953-54.

(Translation):

I could go on and give clear proof that, even according to the tariff board, textiles are not in that position.

We are asked at this time to give arbitrary power to support the textile industry, or so it is claimed. But who is to say where those in authority will stop? Who will tell us if, under pressure, the minister will not be induced to act in a way in which he would not normally act? He is as human as anybody else, and the cabinet ministers form a group who, like the rest of us, are subject to bargaining and to political difficulties. In order to make friends, they might well act in a way in which they would not act if they had to render a frank and honest accounting to parliament in this respect.

Well, we of the opposition have fought this legislation today because the point at issue is a transfer to the government of the powers of parliament. How will the cost of production be determined? Nobody knows. The Department of National Revenue as well as the Minister of National Revenue are quick in admitting that the cost of production may be anything at all. Since there is agreement on that score and since the minister is being vested here with arbitrary powers, it does seem to me that the government should accept the amendment put forward at this time and which is designed, to a certain extent at least, to change part of what we are asked to approve. In fact, the very principle of the bill endangers all those agreements which, up to now, have benefited this country.

Canada is an exporting country. As such it cannot afford to let the minister endanger our foreign trade by indulging in arbitrary decisions.

Personally I am somewhat inclined to free trade. I wonder why, with the arbitrary power which is being given the minister, how he will be able to meet with British parliamentarians with representatives of the government of the United Kingdom, when they will arrive in Montreal later this month to discuss agreements with the Canadian government, especially if account is taken of the fact that they have already suggested free trade.

Those people are not fools and, upon reading the bill, they will soon discover its hidden faults.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Hull could certainly not do that.

Mr. Caron: Besides, we have had an extraordinary experience in the field of free trade. Indeed, before Newfoundland entered confederation, the British preferential tariff applied between the two countries and our exports to Newfoundland amounted to about $60 million a year. Since Newfoundland joined confederation, tariffs have completely disappeared and I am told that we now sell Newfoundland goods to the value of $200 million, which is a substantial increase and shows that free trade is not likely to affect a country with a sound economy.

In my opinion, such discretionary and extraordinary power is something that we cannot accept and which most parliamentarians who do not have blinkers could not accept.

I was reading recently the report of the 47th conference of the interparliamentary union which was held in Rio de Janeiro on July 24. Here is what Mr. Herbert Morrison, former labour minister in the British government, had to say in this report:

(Text):

It is not healthy for parliamentary life that parliament should be run by the government coming along with a policy or a decree, parliament forthwith holding up its hands and agreeing.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I believe that, following what the government proposes now, parliamentarians will have only one thing to do in the face of arbitrary decisions taken by the minister, and that will be to raise the hand and approve the requests made.

I therefore urge members of the government—and I am afraid that they will accept it because the Prime Minister is bent on having this bill passed—to recall what they said when they sat on this side of the house. I especially ask the Prime Minister to recall the moving statements he made in connection with respect for the rights of parliament, when he was sitting on this side of the house. I make the same request to all members of the cabinet and, if they care to recall their past statements, I am convinced that, if they do not postpone passage of this bill until the next session in order to improve it, they will at least move some amendment themselves in order to make it more acceptable and more agreeable, not only to members of the opposition, but also to the public at large.

(Text):

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this matter from another standpoint altogether. The hon. minister is a lawyer and he may, like his other legal confreres in the house, appreciate what puzzles me. It is one thing to write a law; it is another thing to interpret it and to apply it. It is quite simple for the minister to write regulations but I wonder whether he has ever given thought to his colleagues on the bench who may be called upon to interpret those regulations. It is from that standpoint that I should like to speak.

I am not critical of the draftsmanship of the bill but I confess I find it extremely difficult to understand the various clauses of the legislation. I address myself to all members of the house irrespective of the side they are sitting on, and ask them whether they can say in all honesty and frankness that they have read all the various clauses of this bill and understood them. I find it very difficult to vote for a measure which I must honestly admit I do not understand. There are clauses set up at great length consisting of one sentence sometimes extending over two pages, and by the time one reaches the end one cannot trace any connection with the beginning. I do not want to think of myself as a representative of the society for the prevention of cruelty to lawyers and to judges nor do I want to suggest that the members of the bar who may have to deal with these clauses will need to take post graduate law courses in Philadelphia, but that is the way I look at this legislation. Let me quote, as one illustration, clause 40 which is a relatively brief clause:

Where sufficient information has not been furnished or is not available—

I underline those words "and is not available".

—to enable the determination of cost of production, gross profit or fair market value under section 36, 37 or 39, the cost of production, gross profit or fair market value, as the case may be, shall be determined in such manner as the minister prescribes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if such information is not available will the minister assume the role of having divine power and being a seer? Where will the minister get the information to determine this cost if the information is not available? That question, Mr. Speaker, a judge on a bench may at some time have to determine. The information is not available, and that is why I say in all frankness that sometimes I cannot understand the legislation. The measure points out in one clause after another—it is the protective phrase which runs all through this legislation—that where it is not possible to determine value it shall be done in such a manner as the minister prescribes.

It would have been a simple matter for the minister to have written this law by saying the value shall be determined as the minister prescribes, and nothing else. What is the purpose of writing a full page of a clause which then concludes by saying: "If this is not possible, the minister shall determine the method by which value should be established". It would have been simpler to have written one sentence: "Value for duty purposes shall be that which the minister shall prescribe or determine."

Similarly, on the question of appeal, I see that section 45 is repealed and replaced, and reference is made to appeals on a question of law. I address myself directly to the minister. A man is entitled to appeal on a question of law. Is it a question of law to determine cost of production? That is purely a question of fact. It is almost an elementary question of fact. Cost of production is not a question of law. If it is so difficult to determine cost of production why should one not have the right to appeal on a question of production cost?

Fair market value is not a question of law. The minister will surely admit that fair market value is a question of fact after determining a great many elements which go into the determination of fair market value. Why should not one be permitted to appeal a matter of fact such as fair market value?

Let us consider gross profit. Is that a question of law? It is not a simple matter from all these clauses to determine how gross profit will be established. If it is so difficult to establish gross profit the procedure of establishing it can be only by examining the facts. Why should not one be permitted to appeal the question of gross profit? The same thing applies to value for duty. It seems to be referred to very frequently and is almost the basis of the entire measure.

In my dealings with the department I have found the departmental officials most cooperative, congenial and anxious to serve. If a member of parliament can express a preference as to what department out of all the departments of government he prefers to deal with, my choice would certainly be the Department of National Revenue and the customs branch. I find them most cooperative. I also find, however, that they are placed on the spot in having to interpret. I do not like to press them for various interpretations. I believe the minister should not have created such a complicated vehicle to attain the objective he seeks. The protectionist objective could have been achieved in four or five sentences rather than in page after page of complex clauses that are practically all one sentence. He makes it extremely difficult for the officials of the department. I know they will have further difficulty in interpreting. They are constantly trying to divine what is in the mind of the minister.

I wish I could understand this measure. If I could I would perhaps deal with it in another fashion. Although I agree with everything my leader has said about the merits of this type of legislation and the principle which underlies it, in view of the fact that the legislation is not clear and is most confusing I cannot vote for it. Perhaps it was intended to be confusing and if it represents an attempt to cover up something the minister wishes to say but cannot say directly, I must say that not understanding the law I cannot in all good conscience vote for it.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself fairly directly to the amendment that has been proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). I hope to take another opportunity, perhaps in committee, to discuss some other aspects of tariffs and protection. I quite well realize that pressure is increasing in the country when there is something in the nature of a recession to keep out foreign goods. This amendment is not concerned with the problem of dumping. Dumping is a cry that is always raised by protectionists whenever they cannot meet certain situations on merit.

What we are discussing with respect to this amendment is a question of parliamentary authority over the fundamental principle of taxation something I suggest we should be zealously guarding at all times. The power to tax traditionally belongs to parliament and not to a minister or the executive and that is the main point, as I see it, in the amendment that has been advanced and which is before us at the moment.

The new government is proposing to go back to the experience with which most of us are familiar and one that was associated with the previous Conservative administration under Mr. Bennett. I would suggest to hon. members of the government, particularly those from constituencies in western Canada and the maritimes, that if the electors in those areas had any idea that the result of the election would be a return to arbitrary valuations such as they rejected so emphatically in 1935 the outcome of the election would not have been as it was on March 31. I suggest that those hon. members whose geography I know best who come from the prairie provinces should give very careful consideration to this.

I should like to draw to the attention of certain hon. members and particularly those from sections of the country where primary industry depends on trade the desirability of considering some of the practical results of this policy when it was promoted in the thirties under the last Conservative administration. I have in my hand a rather classic and up to date textbook with respect to customs administration in Canada, written by Gordon Blake, and appearing as one of the Canadian studies in economics, No. 9 of the series. At pages 102 and 103 of this volume which is an analysis of our tariff system under the heading "Reaction Against Administrative Protection", when reviewing the situation in the thirties, the author states:

> Official valuations were used also to impose very heavy duties on textiles. Values were listed on the basis of cost of production plus a reasonable advance for selling cost and profit, which in turn was based on the New York spot raw cotton price of seven cents per pound.

I wish to give illustrations of what happened before and after the issuing of a departmental letter of April 7, 1932. That is all it was but it represented the power to tax. Speaking of this the author states:

> A departmental letter of April 7, 1932, to collectors and appraisers gave instruction as to values for duty to be applied to various qualities of cotton fabrics, when imported from the United States.

Here is the result. The figures are taken from invoices that appeared in evidence before the United States tariff commission when they were, under their more liberal trade policy, prepared to exclude Canada from any of the benefits of that new policy. Prior to the letter we had an invoice value in Canadian currency on a textile imported on April 6, 1932, of $55.32. I shall not go into the detail of how the duty was calculated but the total duties, regular, special and excise tax, amounted to $28.69, still a very substantial portion of the invoice value of the goods. Then, a month later, following this mere writing of a letter with no authority from parliament other than parliament surrendering its authority by giving it to a minister, on May 8, 1932, on goods with an invoice value in Canadian currency of $51.66 the total duties, regular, special, and excise tax amounted to $49.08, approaching the full value of the goods.

This is in practical form what results when parliament surrenders its rights to decide upon the over-all levels of taxation and certainly a tariff levy is a tax. It is a tax immediately on the importer but the importer, as we all know, immediately passes that tax on to the ultimate consumer. I suggest it is important that this government and paricularly its backbenchers should consider that they now have the largest majority that has ever been returned to parliament in the history of this country and there is nothing to stop them expressing out in the open and in a proper legislative form their views as to what tariff rates should be. I suggest it is completely improper for them to remain silent in this respect and I again point out that the electors in many parts of Canada would not have elected them if they felt the government they support was going to use this back door method.

I suggest that it is perfectly proper to indicate to the administration what these rates on these commodities should be. It should be made known; it should be something of public knowledge; it should be the law of the land and not something that is a back door, hole in the corner, secretive, arbitrary type of taxing solely at the discretion of the Minister of National Revenue.

There are strong feelings with respect to this type of taxation and impost of cost, which I say are very quickly passed on in the form of cost on working men's overalls, or the cost of children's clothing, or those various things. This is something of utmost importance. I do not think I have read a better expression concerning this right to tax than an article which appeared in the Victoria Times of July 30, which had this to say:

> Foreign goods must not be sold here—

Apparently it had reference to announcements which were forecast in the budget. I continue:

—unless their selling price is as high as the cost of production, plus a reasonable profit.

How can the cost of production be determined? Will every foreign manufacturer tell the Canadian government how much he is spending on production or what profit margin he is earning? Of course not. Besides, the production costs and profits of every manufacturer are different.

Since the facts are unobtainable, the government will dream them up for itself. It will guess what it costs to produce a certain article, it will add an imagined reasonable profit and then levy import duties on the resulting figure.

Now, as I say, addressing myself simply to the amendment, I want to ask hon. members, particularly those from the prairie provinces and the maritimes and from northern Ontario, where we produce almost entirely for export markets, and in the past on a large and expanding two-way trade, whether or not they really want to vote for something that is hole in the corner, back room administration, resulting in taxation by simply writing a letter, as the most practical thing that might be the law of the land rather than a tariff rate expressed by parliamentary vote.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I thought the minister was going to reply, but since he is not I should like to make a few remarks that are strictly relevant to the—

Mr. Nowlan: I was going to speak briefly before the amendment was put but I certainly do not intend to make a speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not intend to make a speech, either. In fact, what I intend to do mainly is to repeat a part of an excellent speech made in this house 28 years ago by another Liberal, sitting at that time in opposition, which I happened on and which I would add is far better than I could have done myself. But I wanted to say, first, Mr. Speaker, that after I read the bill, which is now before the house, I remembered the great interest that the Prime Minister always took when he was on this side of the house in King Charles' head which is relevant to the question which is before us now. The minister will remember, of course, that King James I, when he sought to liberate himself from the financial control of parliament, hit upon the bright idea that since duties were a tax on foreigners and not on the subjects they were not under the control of parliament. The Minister of National Revenue, of course, remembers the history of a merchant named Bate who was seeking to import currants. This became a very celebrated case in parliament and it led ultimately, in King Charles' time of course, to different and other methods of trying to get around parliamentary control of taxation. It led to the famous provision in the petition of right which I do not hesitate to mention here, sir, because it is one of the great charters of our liberties which I understand we are going to seek to confirm or start confirming later in the present week. It is something odd that as a prelude to that confirmation we should have this deliberate front door attempt to take the control over taxation away from parliament.

I really was tempted to get up to speak on this mainly by the fact that, in the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia, the ghost of the progressive party walked through this house this afternoon with Mr. Meighen's temporary cloak over him. It was very interesting to hear what I suppose, if one went through all his speeches, must have been the only Liberal speech that Mr. Meighen ever made. I daresay it was made purely as revenge because his arbitrary legislation of the year before was being taken off the statute books. At the time that other legislation was put on, Mr. Ian Mackenzie said, as reported at page 257 of Hansard of September 16, 1930, in seconding Mr. Stewart's motion, to which reference was made earlier this afternoon, and what is completely relevant to the matter before us:

This legislation definitely deprives parliament of all control over our system of taxation in Canada. The fabric of our taxation system in this dominion, as in other countries, is concerned with our revenues and expenditures. What is the situation? By section 4 we are delegating to the cabinet council of Canada the complete right and authority to fix valuation, without limitation, on any article whatsoever imported into the dominion.

I am going to leave out a bit because it really has not any relevancy and go on:

The only argument adduced by the minister—

The minister on that occasion had adduced a little more in the way of argument than the minister has adduced today. I continue:

The only argument adduced by the minister in defence of this legislation is the tu quoque argument;—

Apparently, Tory governments never change. They either say, "You did it or you did not do it". That is their argument. I continue:

The only argument adduced by the minister in defence of this legislation is the tu quoque argument; he says, "You hon. gentlemen, when you sat to the right of the Speaker introduced a special section 43, or section 37a,—

That is the section on natural products to which the hon. member for Assiniboia referred this afternoon. Mr. Mackenzie went on:

—whatever it may have been, and you gave the same authority with regard to natural products." Now, although I do believe that the fruit industry of British Columbia is in need of protection, I believe at the same time that there may be far better remedies to meet the difficulties of the fruit growers of British Columbia than giving them the protection which is given by this government.

That is very similar to what was said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) with reference to textiles. Then, Mr. Mackenzie went on:

> I am opposed to the principle of the old section 43, or 47a. I do not believe that parliament should give up its supreme authority and delegate it to any cabinet council, be it Liberal or Conservative, farmer or labour.

As I imagined the minister intended to refer to this matter when he replied, I thought it desirable to put on the record now that Mr. Ian Mackenzie in 1930, speaking for the Liberal party, repented at that time and we think he was right to take the position he took at that time. He took the position that the legislation of 1922 was objectionable, not as objectionable as this bill, but it was objectionable, and we agree.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of making two speeches as such on this bill. I suspect that when second reading is concluded I will speak at some length and deal with the arguments which have been advanced. In so far as the amendment before the house is concerned, I simply say that in no way is this bill before us in any way a violation of parliament or a transfer of the powers of parliament to the executive. Ninety per cent of this bill is drafted to cover only executive rulings and administrative practices which have grown up in the department throughout the years and which were practised at the time hon. gentlemen opposite were sitting over here. If this is a violation of parliament, then, to use the tu quoque argument, they are the ones who are responsible for it.

The government cannot accept this suggestion in any way, shape or form and we cannot accept the amendment.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Pearson) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Arthur Maloney (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, with unanimous consent I wonder if item No. 29, which is second reading of Bill S-17, of which I am sponsor, might be considered first. It is a non-contentious bill respecting the change of name of the board of trade of the city of Toronto.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I am standing in for the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), who also has a private bill on the order paper, and I regret that I must object.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. S-16, respecting Westcoast Transmission Company Limited.—Mr. Morton.

KENNETH HERBERT GREGORY

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-231, for the relief of Kenneth Herbert Gregory—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Peters: This bill for the relief of Kenneth Herbert Gregory is another bill which has brought before the house many of the faults and failings of the committee handling these bills. In this particular case a number of things occurred which should not have occurred in normal procedure. The Senate committee when hearing this particular case—and it is a contested case—heard evidence on clauses 12 and 14. It will be noticed that there are 16 clauses and that allegation No. 12 reads as follows:

> That on October 29, 1957, respondent committed adultery with the said Ernest Meyers at the Tudor hotel, 599 Shelberne street, in the city of Toronto in the province of Ontario.

And No. 14 reads:

> That on Monday, April 28, 1958, respondent committed adultery with the said Ernest Meyers at the Queen's hotel in the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec.

Senate report No. 239 discusses the allegations contained in clauses 12 and 14. The clause following the allegations reads:

> Wherefore your petitioner humbly prays that your honourable house—

Well anyway it is not in that section.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Peters: On page 8 the report says:

> It was resolved to report to the main committee that:—"Your subcommittee find as a fact that, according to the evidence adduced, the allegations contained in paragraphs 1 to 16 both inclusive and particularly that the respondent committed adultery as alleged in paragraphs 11, 12, 13 and 14 of the said amended petition, have been proved."

It would appear to be rather difficult to find out from the report of the subcommittee of the Senate how the allegations in clauses 11 and 13 could have been proved, because there was no evidence on those two particular allegations. They say that the allegations have been proved and that it was only fair and just that when an objection was made to the decision of the committee of the House of Commons they should be able to re-open this case on these two allegations which they had not previously discussed and that when they presented these allegations then they could come before the House of Commons committee. They brought evidence through new witnesses and presumably the evidence of those witnesses must have been the evidence on which the case was decided.

This, in my opinion, points up one problem facing the committee which should certainly be resolved before the committee sits again, for here we have the Senate ruling on divorce procedure and handling a case while hearing two allegations out of four and yet ruling on four of them that they had been proved, therefore making it necessary when an appeal was made on the two allegations which had not been heard before the House of Commons committee, that they should be able to re-open the case. I feel this is unfair to the House of Commons and it is unfair to the people involved. It is unfair to Mr. Gregory and to Mrs. Gregory, both of whom are involved in this case. They are being tried on two allegations and the decisions are made on those allegations, which are re-investigated before the house and a decision is made and then the case is again re-opened. Then we hear two different allegations which were not discussed at any length previously. We hear from witnesses on the second two allegations and in this case a different decision is arrived at.

In arriving at this decision another question was brought to light and that is that neither of the two lawyers, who are considered competent lawyers, both the lawyer for the petitioner and the lawyer for the respondent, after hearing the evidence on the second two allegations, presented very much of a case. It could be inferred, I think, because of the fact that cross-examination was not conducted as it had been in the previous allegations, that a settlement had probably been arrived at, and this was the reason for the basis of the divorce. If this is so I think the section here which says the petitioner in no way connived at or condoned the adultery committed by the respondent and that no collusion exists between the petitioner and the respondent to obtain a dissolution of the marriage does not apply if there was an arrangement between the petitioner and the respondent I suggest there was collusion in that case and that this section of the Senate evidence was disproven.

It has been said in one of our recent cases, I assume it was this one, that these two people have no intention of living together again and therefore we should do the charitable thing and dissolve the marriage as they were asking. I do not think we are constituted as a committee to grant this divorce simply because the two people are not going to live together and I do not think we should be in a position where we are going to do it because the settlement is satisfactory or not.

This case points out another problem: are the petitioner and the respondent fit people to obtain a private bill in this House of Commons. The evidence of the petitioner in this case indicated certain facts to the committee. I believe everybody who heard the petitioner was not too impressed with his sincerity or his mental attitude and there may be some justification for the fact that this lady is now an alcoholic and has been treated on a number of occasions for this affliction. It could be suggested that part of the affliction from which this lady is now suffering was a result of the years during which she lived with this particular man.

In the second case where we heard the last two allegations on sections 11 and 13, there was a lady who testified as to the adultery having taken place. Her evidence before cross-examination was very good evidence, I should say. She testified very straightforwardly, remembering the complete case, the hours, the dates and the times. She was very concise and straightforward in her particulars of the case. It was only after the lawyer concerned failed to cross-examine her to any extent, and her own lawyer did not lead her in any direction, that the members of the committee did ask a number of questions and establish the fact that though she remembered these particulars very well she did not remember some of the other things. It was brought out by the committee that the petitioner in this case had contacted this lady within a few days of her appearing before us and discussed the case with her, and the implication was that arrangements had been made for her to testify in this case. If this is so I think it points out another implication that collusion did take place in this particular case.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Peters: I was not involved in the collusion. I think the house should feel ashamed if they are going to pass this type of case and I think it points out the need for a closer examination of these cases. In my opinion if the lawyers in these cases are not going to carry them to a conclusion and I think the committee will agree there was very little questioning on the latter allegations, there is always in people's minds the opportunity for the inference that there may have been some arrangement arrived at.

I think that this man does not deserve this divorce but I do think that probably the adultery charge has been proven. Certainly it was not disproved by the committee. I think the committee should have the right to make the decision in the first place and that when these allegations are cited the case must rest on the allegations they attempt to prove in the first place. If there are any allegations left over those allegations cannot be reheard because it would appear that if you are going to have a contested divorce you are going to be hearing these cases eight or ten times if they want to put in seven or eight allegations and have them heard each time. I am sure the chairman would agree that we do not want to get into a position that we got into this time where we are going to hear allegations that were not heard before.

Again it points out that when we are hearing new witnesses evidence should be taken down so that a final dispensation on the evidence can be made if the need should appear from something that happened later. The evidence should be taken down in a written form as it is now in the Senate. Also, we should have some direction on this committee from the House of Commons in setting up and constituting it. If we are going to have these divorce cases, as we have, we are going to have to have some pattern set up which will enable us to handle them in a proper manner and this particularly points this up. If we think that the man is not a fit subject to obtain a divorce I think the committee should obtain direction along that line. That should be part of the direction given to the committee when it is constituted the next time.

I am of the opinion that this particular case is a case where the allegations have not been completely proved. I am not satisfied in my mind that these people should have a divorce. I would say that we did not in my opinion prove or disprove the evidence that was given in the last two allegations in obtaining the divorce, so for that reason we are not objecting to the passing of this particular bill.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member who has just spoken has made several points before the House of Commons which, if he had held a strong enough opinion on them, could have been made equally well before the committee.

There is the question of the character of the petitioner in this case, and whether the character of the petitioner was such as to entitle him to come before parliament and ask for relief. That was the ground on which the respondent's lawyers originally made an objection, but later it was withdrawn. In my handling of this case before the committee, before the evidence was completed and before the petitioner left the room I told the committee that if anyone had any questions regarding the man's merit to receive a divorce I would see that those questions were answered by the man when he was before us. When the committee came to consider its decision—a decision which was unanimous and included the vote of the hon. member who just sat down—that point was raised and no vote was taken upon it. We then dealt with the prime issue of the case, whether the allegation of adultery had been proven and we disposed of that, again unanimously.

On the matter of the procedure followed, it is perfectly true as the hon. member pointed out that the petitioner had two bites at this case. First, the hotel evidence. The two allegations were disposed of. Second, on the instruction of the House of Commons, where the hon. member might have made his objection, it came back before us and we heard evidence concerning two other allegations. I have learned something from that experience. Next year when we have counsel before us in these contested cases if they are going to rely on only two allegations out of a number of allegations they will be asked to either give positive evidence on the other allegations or close off their cases at that point so the experience we had this year will not be encountered in similar circumstances next year.

Some emphasis was laid by the hon. member on the question of collusion. It is an unhappy fact in divorce law that two parties cannot get together and enter into a written agreement on separation. Legal action has to be taken in that regard subsequent to the divorce being granted. In this particular case the lawyer acting for the petitioner and the lawyer acting for the respondent came before me. We discussed the matter at some length. It was clearly stated by these men who are reputable Queen's Counsel that no such agreement could possibly exist. It was unfortunate. They would have liked to have seen one exist in this case because the woman involved was an alcoholic and will obviously need some care before this chronic condition of hers is overcome. But the state of the law being as it is these lawyers could not make an agreement which would have been beneficial to the parties concerned, would have made the task of our committee a much happier one and would have been of benefit to society as well.

There is no possible evidence of collusion and to raise that question in the House of Commons is to question the reputations of two reputable lawyers by suggesting that they acted in a way in which they could not have acted and continue to maintain their standing in the bar associations of their respective provinces.

Mr. Peters: If, as the hon. member who just sat down states, there has been no settlement in this case then I would oppose the passing of this bill. I would assume there has been some arrangement made. I failed to ask that question in the committee and therefore I am partly to blame for not being able to say there had been some type of settlement in this case. If there was no agreement between the two parties—and we can only guess about that—then I am very much opposed to the divorce being granted on the simple ground that this woman will be left completely dependent on the mercies of the province in which she lives or whoever may be looking after her welfare. I am of the opinion she still has a serious medical problem that remains to be solved. I would submit that this problem is not entirely her own responsibility. From my encounter with the petitioner I believe some of the blame must be shared by him.

There is another matter about cases of this kind which I shall not discuss at length. I have no objection to what the lawyers do in these cases. After all, they are in this type of business and it is a smart business. The lawyer reopened the case on certain grounds. In my opinion he would have been well advised not to have pursued the matter. He knew it could not be pursued to any extent. I think the other lawyer felt the same way about the matter and did not pursue it but I believe some hon. members of this house who are members of the medical profession would have liked to have gone into the matter.

This case illustrates the problems we have to face. If we are going to hear divorce cases we should have a certain procedure to follow. The Senate has a procedure which it follows and a set pattern under which it operates but the House of Commons does not operate under that type of pattern. In my opinion we should be advised of settlements in these cases. If by means of a private bill we are going to dissolve a marriage after a number of years we should have the opportunity of making an assessment of the situation and assuring that an arrangement is made for the continued support of the woman in the case.

If the hon. member who just took his seat is saying that no decision has been made I would be very much opposed to the divorce being granted. I am not asking him to say that. He does not have to defend the lawyers. It is my personal opinion—as his was a personal opinion—that a settlement has been arrived at in the case. Although it would be nice to keep these people together so they could not ruin the lives of other people I think we should grant the divorce.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I have to answer that point. When we discussed this matter with the lawyers they said no written settlement had been reached between them. The husband has some amount of money and if after the divorce because of his wife's alcoholic condition he wished to make some financial provision for her that course would always be open to him but there could be no agreement reached between them beforehand or that would have constituted collusion.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I do not know any of the facts in this case nor do I know the parties but I am rising as a result of a statement made by the hon. member for Timiskaming. If I correctly understood his remarks he made a statement that creates something of a paradox for the House of Commons. He appeared to insinuate that there may have been some sort of collusion or some sort of deal made between the lawyers that a divorce be granted. The hon. member constantly used the word settlement and said that a settlement was made as a result of which he would like to see the divorce granted.

I do not know if I correctly understood the ambiguous remarks of the hon. member but they appear to create a paradox for parliament. Under the law if there had been any collusion or if a deal had been made between the parties for a divorce to be granted the hon. member cannot properly say he will vote for the granting of that divorce. I do not know who were the solicitors in the case but I certainly do not think we should reasonably allow a reflection to be cast on them to the effect that a deal had been made and as a consequence parliament will grant the divorce.

The chairman of the committee on miscellaneous private bills assured this committee that no such indication was given and that indeed no collusion existed between the parties and that would be a better basis on which to pass this bill.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

[Mr. Peters.]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. Peters: On division.

Bill reported on division.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time on division and passed.

MID-CONTINENT PIPELINES LIMITED

Mr. A. R. Smith (for Mr. Rynard): Mr. Speaker, I am standing in for the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) who unfortunately was injured in a motor accident today and I would like to proceed. I therefore move the second reading of Bill No.S-15, respecting Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this company has had a most interesting life history since 1952. Those hon. members who were in the house at that time will recall that the charter legislation sought by this company in 1952, and later, was most vigorously opposed by prominent members of the present government, by some members of the Liberal party and by the members of the C.C.F. Those who were here at that time will recall that there were some very interesting and at times caustic debates surrounding this legislation. For the information of the newer members who might not know the background and the history of this company which has presented this bill to the house for its consideration at this time, may I say I have taken some pains to prepare some rather careful notes so that I will condense the telling of the history of this company in as short a space as possible. After doing that I intend to quote from the speeches of various members of the government to illustrate to the house how they fought at that time for the protection of the interests of the Canadian people.

From our point of view, Mr. Speaker, and I think from the point of view of those gentlemen who opposed this pipe line bill so vigorously in years past, the history of this company is not particularly good. This bill marks the third separate and distinct proposal that this company has made to parliament.

The first occasion was in 1952, when, under the name of the Boundary Pipe Line Corporation, this company came before parliament with a bill that would have authorized them to construct a pipe line within Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba or outside of Canada. Their declared aim at that time was to pipe natural gas from the area near Medicine Hat to Winnipeg, with the possibility of exporting gas to a United States pipe line company from that point.

The next year they came before the house with a new bill masquerading under a new name, something like political parties do on occasions, the Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited, and a new proposal, namely to build an all-Canadian pipe line to transport natural gas from Alberta to central Canada. Actually, this new proposal seemed to be a mere gambit, in my opinion, in order to secure the approval of the House of Commons and the passage of the bill, for evidence before the House of Commons committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines shows that the company had not spent any money on economic surveys, and so forth, other than, if I remember correctly, the $25,000 that had been spent before the 1952 bill was presented to this house. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) was most critical of the bill at that time and on a later occasion, on March 3, the present Minister of Public Works had this to say:

> I believe it was felt last year by many members of the house that these applicants were merely trying to get a charter for its nuisance value. If they could get a charter and then by hook or crook get permission to export gas from Alberta ahead of other pipe line companies, they would be in position to call the tune. There would be no doubt that they would have a most valuable asset. I believe the same position exists today with these applicants applying again for a charter.

This was on their second application. I continue:

> Another ground on which we opposed the application last year was that the gas was to be taken to the United States.

It seems rather clear that this new attempt to secure powers to build a pipe line outside of Canada has a similar motive. When the bill was in the House of Commons committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in 1953 it was amended on the motion of the present Minister of Public Works and various words which the company now wants restored were struck out. The bill was amended at that time to prevent the company from doing the very thing that it proposes to do in the bill before the house at this ime. I remember very well how prominent members of the government, prominent members of the party and the former leader of the Progressive Conservative party fought this proposal most heartily. A sidelight is that as the company's parliamentary agent, Mr. D. K. MacTavish, said at the time these amendments were quite acceptable to the promoters. He said that the amendments proposed by the members on this side who were opposing the bill were quite acceptable then. What I want to know is, why are they no longer acceptable? The reason lies in the failure of the promoters of this company to get the blessing of either the Alberta government or the federal government so far as the trans-Canada pipe line project is concerned.

The promoters were not able to capitalize on their nuisance value. As I understand it, they were not able to call the tune and so they have set their eyes on a different project. Now they come before parliament with their plan to build an oil pipe line from the Edmonton area to Chicago. Most of the pipe line companies have provisions restricting them from building pipe lines outside of Canada. The Interprovincial Pipelines is one exception. If Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited were able to get this bill through, then they would indeed be in a very powerful position—this is one point I want to bring to the attention of the house—if at any time in the future such a pipe line route becomes generally acceptable.

A bargaining position is certainly all that the promoters of this company are trying to attain. So far as the members of this group can understand, I do not think that anybody can pretend that access to the Chicago market could be obtained without deals with United States oil and pipe line interests that would almost certainly involve very substantial United States control of this company which proposes to transport Canadian natural resources. Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited may be a Canadian company now and it may propose to set up a wholly-owned subsidiary in the United States to operate that portion of the pipe line built in the United States, but we can be sure that if and when this project comes to reality the parent company would itself become United States-controlled. An example of the kind of thing that could happen is in Westcoast Transmission where, in order to obtain a large sales contract with Pacific Northwest Pipeline Corporation, the company was advised to sell Pacific Northwest Pipe Lines approximately 25 per cent of its stock, making the matter of Canadian control of this company a rather open and debatable question.

In order that new members of the house can understand the background of the bill and know the opinions expressed by prominent members of the government, the former leader of the Progressive Conservative party and prominent members of the Liberal party, I intend to quote from Hansard for the 1952-53 session. One gentleman whom I have pleasure in quoting on this occasion is the present Minister of Public Works who had this to say as found on page 2582 of Hansard for March 3, 1953:

In effect, the only thing he has said is that if they get the charter they intend to build a gas pipe line from Alberta through different Saskatchewan centres to Manitoba; and then he said something to the effect that they intend to go on to eastern Canada. I must admit at the commencement of my remarks that if I really believed that was the intention of the applicants, I would have little objection to this bill. But because I do not think that is as yet their real intention, I propose to make a few remarks with regard to the bill.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra of that day went on to say:

A similar provision was written into last year's bill in committee; but unfortunately that provision does not mean very much, if anything, where a pipe line company proposes to run its line down to the United States boundary and then sell the gas to an associate company incorporated under the laws of the United States.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra of that day also said:

Furthermore I believe that the people who are behind these applicants are the same people who were behind the bill presented in 1952. They were listed in the other place, and one of them was stated to be the Fish Engineering Corporation of Houston, Texas. In effect that company was the main applicant for a charter last year, and I believe is the main applicant behind this present bill. It is worth noting that this same corporation, the Fish Engineering Corporation of Houston, Texas, is today putting up a very bitter battle before the United States federal power commission to prevent the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited from taking Peace river gas into the northwest states. The very company which comes here now asking for this charter is trying to prevent Peace river gas going into the states of Washington and Oregon. It is doing so through another subsidiary, known as the Pacific Northwest Pipe Line Corporation.

He goes on to say:

I believe it was felt last year by many members of the house that these applicants were merely trying to get a charter for its nuisance value. If they could get a charter and then by hook or crook get permission to export gas from Alberta ahead of other pipe-line companies, they would be in position to call the tune. There would be no doubt that they would have a most valuable asset. I believe the same position exists today with these applicants applying again for a charter.

That is Boundary Pipeline Corporation, the people applying under the name of Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited. As found on page 2704 of Hansard for March 6, 1953, the present Minister of Public Works said:

Then if there is an exchange agreement the result will be that Ontario and Quebec will be subject to the federal power commission of the United States.

He further says on the same page:

I suggest that an exchange agreement is completely impracticable, particularly as there is a time element involved.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Further, he says:

In conclusion may I say that I believe it will be a great tragedy if this western gas is not used to supply Canada first.

Those are the remarks of the present Minister of Public Works. Then we had a very active member of the Liberal party opposing the bill on that occasion. As found on page 2706 of Hansard for March 6, 1953, Mr. Cruickshank, at that time the member for Fraser Valley, had this to say:

You may have noticed in the papers of the day before yesterday that Fish interests behind this bill have instructed their lawyers to take a new line of protest to prevent the movement of gas from Alberta and the northern part of our own province. They instructed their lawyers at Washington to see that under no consideration was any of this great natural resource being produced in Canada to be utilized for the development of Canada.

During the debate on that bill on March 10, 1953, Mr. Drew, the former leader of the Progressive Conservative party, had some very strong things to say about the bill presented at that time and I want to quote briefly from his remarks as found on page 2809 of Hansard for March 10, 1953. He said:

We will know then that we are dealing with a reality instead of simply the incorporation of a company which they have no intention of ever permitting to operate within any measurable period of time.

He went on to say on the same page:

Let the bill which permits the incorporation of pipe lines be amended to provide that a corporation dealt with in that bill shall be incorporated under the Companies Act of Canada. Then any applicants complying with the ordinary provisions of the Companies Act can make their applications for a charter, and the charters will be granted if they have complied with the basic requirements.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that what the hon. member is reading is relevant to the bill we have before us. There are two principles in the bill, one having to do with a revision of the capital stock and the other the extension of powers.

Mr. Herridge: I am dealing with the previous debate on a bill which was brought before the house under the same name by the same interests. I was trying to indicate for the information of new members of the house the attitude of prominent persons in the house who spoke at that time.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the hon. member that the principle under debate then was different. We have before us Bill No. S-15; and the previous history of the company is only relevant in so far as it relates to the two matters which Bill No. S-15 brings before the house, the changing of its capital and the extension of its powers.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Vancouver East has suggested a point I was just about to raise. Are we justified, Mr. Speaker, in accepting this bill or trusting this company in view of its past performance and the expressions of opinion by prominent people in the government at the present time who suspected the company greatly on that occasion of not having the capacity to do the things it said it would do to the advantage of the Canadian people? I am doing this to illustrate their attitude towards the company with respect to its ability to do the things that it said it would do. In the first instance it came here and sought to be incorporated as Boundary Pipeline Corporation. Then it came here and sought incorporation as Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited and at that time it was proven in the committee that regardless of the great claims of the company as to what it was going to do regarding the export and transmission of gas or oil it had only spent $25,000 in a preliminary survey of the area for which they were seeking incorporation at that time. I just have a few more quotations, Mr. Speaker. Personally, my attitude to the bill is that it should go to a committee. I am taking this opportunity so that members of the committee will know what the attitude of prominent members of their own parties was with respect to former legislation with which this company was concerned. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, on that basis I should like to deal with two or three more citations before concluding.

Mr. Speaker: As long as they are relevant to the principles of the bill I have no objection.

Mr. Herridge: I have one here from Mr. Drew which I think is relevant to the principle of pipe lines in general. As found on page 2810 of Hansard for March 10, 1953, Mr. Drew said:

> Already on different occasions we have indicated our belief that there should be an over-all declaration of policy by the government that the interest of Canadians will be the first consideration, subject always to the soundness of the application itself and those backing it, and subject also to the ordinary economic conditions which require to be considered in a case of that kind.
> —we also ask that a policy be clearly declared that in any future instance pipe lines carrying Canadian oil to the east will follow a Canadian route instead of through the United States as is now going to be the case.

That is still the case in this bill. The intention of the company is still the same, as I understand it, in that respect. I just want to finish by quoting the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) who was a great opponent of this bill at that time. I hope that the members of his party will listen to his words of wisdom on this occasion. As found at page 3160 of Hansard of March 20, 1953, he had this to say:

> We have also asked for the assurance that Canadian needs, wherever they might exist and wherever they might be served potentially by the gas transported in the pipe line, would be served, before any export was permitted to the United States—
> Our position—

By that he means the position of the Progressive Conservative party.

> —is that parliament must ensure that the Canada first policy is pursued, so that the needs of Canada will first be served.

I have quoted at some length from these various members' remarks when a somewhat similar bill was before the house in 1953. I did so in order that new members of the house will have some understanding of the background of this bill and of the opinions expressed by various members in the House of Commons.

Before concluding I simply wish to say that I want this bill to go to the committee. I hope that the members of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines will take advantage of their opportunity thoroughly to examine this bill and to get all their questions satisfactorily answered by the officials and other witnesses provided by the company or by other persons from whom they may be interested in obtaining information.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): There are some questions I should like to ask about this particular bill. I should like to know who the directors are, what their addresses are and also where the head office of the company is.

Mr. McIlraith: We are not in committee yet.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have opportunity to ask questions in committee. There is no scope on second reading for the asking of questions. By rising and asking questions he has exhausted his right to speak. If the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) wishes to speak, he may do so but he will close the debate.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, at this point I would prefer not to speak.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

BOARD OF TRADE OF THE CITY OF TORONTO

Mr. Arthur Maloney (Parkdale) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-17, respecting the board of trade of the city of Toronto.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Parkdale wish to say something?

Mr. Maloney: Yes, Mr. Speaker. With the unanimous consent of the house I would request that the bill be considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed and that the usual practice of requiring the bill to be referred to a standing committee be dispensed with.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to the procedure proposed by the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VALUE FOR DUTY, APPEALS TO EXCHEQUER COURT, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nowlan for the second reading of Bill No. C-51 to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, it has been said in this house, and I think rightly so, that although the government was elected on a Liberal ticket it has been administering the country with old and worn-out Tory policies with about the same alarming results which were obtained by previous Conservative administrations.

Mr. Benidickson: Back to Bennett.

Mr. Cardin: This return to Tory policy has been evidenced in the government's general attitude toward international trade.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It has been increased, has it not?

Mr. Cardin: And more particularly it is evidenced in this bill to amend the Customs Act where under the guise of anti-dumping regulations the government is once again returning to the traditional Tory policy of protective trade barriers used by the Conservative administration decades ago with the deplorable results of which we are all aware.

We on this side of the house do not for a moment underestimate the dangers of dumping practices in this country, nor are we against anti-dumping regulations which will effectively stop this very unfair and piratical form of trade.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Then vote for this legislation.

Mr. Cardin: It is quite evident that the previous government was not against anti-dumping regulations because it included in its legislation under the Customs Tariff anti-dumping regulations and we are completely in favour of any legislation which might curb this very nefarious practice. We are, however, opposed to legislation which, under the guise of anti-dumping regulations, is in fact a not too subtle return by the government to Conservative protectionism against normal competition or competition which is known throughout the world as being on a fair basis. We are opposed, as we have been opposed for a good many years, to the Conservative theory which the government is apparently re-introducing by this bill of the evaluation of duty based on cost of production plus a reasonable amount of gross profit and where the minister has the widest discrimination of guessing what is the cost of production and what a reasonable amount for gross profit might conceivably be and then fixing a completely arbitrary value for duty on such goods as he may deem fit.

I submit that this legislation is no longer anti-dumping legislation but is laying the foundation for the old Conservative protectionist theory. It seems to me that we should remember the experience of the Conservatives with this type of legislation. History does not warrant for one single moment a return to that type of protection. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that everything points to the contrary, and that beween 1930 and 1935 I think everyone will agree that this same type of legislation was not at all successful. It did not for a moment protect industry, nor did it solve the unemployment problem of that time and it certainly did not help our export trade. As a matter of fact, it was detrimental to the export trade and moreover it increased the number of unemployed during that period and today, when all the nations of the world, even those who in the past have been most reluctant to do so, have embarked upon policies of freer and freer trade—

Mr. Nowlan: Which ones?

Mr. Cardin: —and at a time when the Canadian economy depends far more on the maintaining and expanding of its foreign markets than it did in 1930, I submit that the return by this government to the unsuccessful and obsolete Tory protectionism can and will do very serious damage to our foreign trade without solving the problems which now face certain Canadian industries.

All hon. members know and I believe sympathize with the problems facing our primary textile industry and no doubt the government had this primary textile industry in mind in bringing down this legislation. However, if the government is convinced that the true solution to the textile problem is greater protection, then I say that the government should act by the methods which have always been followed in this house, namely by asking parliament to raise tariffs against dumping or against unfair competition, if that is the purpose of this bill. I submit, however, that it is fundamentally wrong for the government to engage in a sort of high tariff protectionism by letting parliament and the people of Canada believe that it is legislating on anti-dumping measures whereas the government is bypassing parliament and the minister is being given the widest discretion to impose arbitrary values on imported goods.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member is too intelligent to make such a stupid argument.

An hon. Member: The hon. member should make his own speech.

Mr. Cardin: I would recommend that the hon. member not only make his own speech but that he should look very carefully over the record of what happened from 1930 to 1935.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: What about clause 39 of the bill; take a look at it.

Mr. Benidickson: Arbitrary powers.

Mr. Cardin: Personally I do not believe that the basic cause of the textile industry's problem is low tariffs; I do not believe that the true solution to the textile problem lies in high tariff protection against normal competition. To me the problem is far more basic than that and the solution to be brought forward in order to solve that problem cannot be a superficial or temporary one such as the solution offered by the present government.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Such rot!

Mr. Cardin: This does not mean that the government should not give assistance and encouragement to this very important and responsible industry in Canada, but it does mean that the government should give assistance which is more aggressive and more imaginative and that it should be aimed at making the industry itself more competitive and more economical, rather than offer, as this bill provides, a passive assistance by protection which will in time stifle, smother and finally destroy the industry by making its existence impossible in this highly and increasingly competitive and hard-bargaining world.

I feel sure that Canadian manufacturers and industrialists realize, as we all do, that for some years now we have been witnessing a veritable revolution in world trade practices and policies. We see that we cannot successfully meet the serious challenge of new trading conditions by counting exclusively on the artificial and outdated forms of protection. Although I may scandalize certain people in this house and in the country I sincerely believe that the successful adaptation of the textile industry and other industries to present trading conditions can only be achieved after careful, complete, objective and honest scrutiny has been given to ascertain whether the industry either in whole or in part in its present form and with the present market is economically viable and sound.

If it is not, I submit that it is in the true interest of employees and manufacturers alike to face the situation as it really is and not as they would like it to be, and work together in order to change the method of production, the market or the product in order to make this industry economically sound and viable in present trading conditions. If the industry is economically sound and viable, then notwithstanding the serious difficulties and problems which now face it I submit that government, management and labour must consider together what steps should be taken to bring prices into line with those of other countries not only in Canada but on the world market. I feel that the basic problem facing the textile industry is not so much the problem of dumping but normal competition which is considered in the world as fair competition.

If the industry is to continue to exist I submit that normal competition must be met. There is really no easy way out of this problem. This bill, popular though it may be among some hon. members of the house and some people in certain industries in some areas, will not, in my opinion, solve the problem. It can only assure the complete disappearance of the industry by making it a misfit in present conditions and rendering it incapable of continued existence.

I believe that it is most unwise, most unsound and even dangerous for the government to assume, as it does in this bill, the role of protector of free enterprise at the expense of the general economy and by jeopardizing our vital export trade without giving in effect any real protection to the industry. Of course, the government has a responsibility and a definite interest in helping those industries which are now in difficulty to readapt themselves to completely new conditions. That help should be sound, objective and effective and it should also be completely in accord with the true interest of the general economy of this country.

I do not pretend to be an expert on either the textile industry or the custom structure but I cannot help feel there must be some measure other than the unsuccessful and obsolete protectionist method embodied in this bill, which might offer a more effective solution to the problem, and which would be far more in keeping with our concept of free enterprise. It seems to me that if the government were to grant to the textile industry and to other affected industries an accelerated rate of depreciation allowance on machinery in order to permit the industry to reequip with the latest machinery and techniques so as to reduce the cost of production it would be a far more effective approach to this problem than the artificial protection contemplated in this bill.

I also believe that if the industries themselves lessened their diversification of production and concentrated on producing as cheaply as possible one or two qualities or patterns of goods in greater quantities they would be far more competitive than they are today. Then, through our Canadian trade missions throughout the world, the industry should cater to world trade. It should seek out potential world markets and organize themselves to compete in those markets with reduced diversification rather than cater to the home market exclusively with its limited purchasing power and its demand for highly diversified products. Most countries of the world have in recent years geared their industries to the home market, if you like, but with a keen and watchful eye on the world market and on world demand. In Canada, perhaps because our country is comparatively young, we have geared our industry to supplying the needs and tastes of the home market, despite its exigencies, neglecting the fact that the world market offers a great opportunity of stabilizing those industries which are now in difficulty if the necessary steps were taken to adapt the method or production and to set the cost of production in accordance with world demand rather than limiting operations to the very restricted and very exacting demands of the home market.

The former government foresaw this very marked trend toward freer and freer world trade, and because the former government did realize that the world market offered a very good solution to the problems which are accompanying our economic expansion, Canada became not only a signatory to the general agreement on tariffs and trade but a very active and enthusiastic member of that extremely important international organization which I consider to be essential if we are to have free trade in the world. It may be useful to put on the record once again the introductory paragraph of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. After citing the different countries which are signatories to the agreement we read, and I quote:

> These governments . . . recognizing that their relations in the field of trade and economic endeavour should be conducted with a view to raising standards of living, ensuring full employment and a large and steadily growing volume of real income and effective demand, developing the full use of the resources of the world and expanding the production and exchange of goods.
> Being desirous of contributing to these objectives by entering into reciprocal and mutually advantageous arrangements directed to the substantial reduction of tariffs and other barriers to trade and to the elimination of discriminatory treatment in international commerce—

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the cost of production formula which is the key note of this present bill for establishing value for duty is contrary to the objective and spirit of GATT, a portion of which I have just read. It is true that the present legislation does provide for the use of the cost of production method as a technique of last resort but under the present legislation we can have recourse to the cost of production method in evaluating duty only after we have gone through and exhausted the six or seven other methods that must be followed. Only when it is impossible to arrive at a value for duty, according to the present legislation, are we allowed to follow the cost of production method.

But under this bill the cost of production is given a competely new status. It is no longer a residual method of determining value for duty but is an alternative method under which the minister is no longer required to exhaust the other methods of determining value for duty but is given the widest discretion of guessing what the cost of production may be on certain items and imposing that as the value for duty.

I submit that this theory is a form of high tariff protection. It is a barrier to trade, discriminatory in practice, and contrary to the objective and spirit of GATT. It also conflicts very strongly with section 2 (a) of article 7 of GATT which establishes that value for customs purposes, and I quote:

> —should be based on the actual value of the imported merchandise on which duty is assessed, or of like merchandise, and should not be based on the value of merchandise of national origin or on arbitrary or fictitious values.

Part (b) of section 2 of article 7 of GATT makes it quite clear, and again I quote:

—actual value should be the price at which, at a time and place determined by the legislation of the country of importation, and in the ordinary course of trade, such or like merchandise is sold or offered for sale under fully competitive conditions.

Therefore, I submit, GATT lays down a natural price in the market of export as the basis for the value for duty and the price is not a guess on the part of the minister or any one else as to what the cost of production may be. All of this, Mr. Speaker, to say that the type of legislation now brought before the house is not compatible with GATT.

In support of my contention I have the great pleasure and honour of citing a person who to my mind is one of the greatest authorities on this matter, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, who on December 16, 1953, as reported at page 976 of Hansard of that date, said:

Our interpretation of our obligation under GATT is that we cannot resort to the cost of production price, if there is another way of determining what is the fair market value. It is only when we are prevented from using other ways of determining the fair market value that we feel that under GATT we can resort to investigation of the cost of production.

Later in the same debate, as recorded on the same page of Hansard, Mr. St. Laurent said:

We undertook to allow the importation of goods at the tariff rates based upon fair market value, and this form—

Cost of production. I continue:

—of determining value was discussed in the negotiations and discarded. It was urged that that was not fair market value and that the cost of production might have very little relation to the actual market value of the goods.

Later, as reported at page 977, Mr. St. Laurent said:

Mr. Chairman, it is not the government that the hon. member would have to satisfy that you can go back to the pre-1948 practice and still comply with GATT. It is the other members of GATT. They would regard a return to the 1948 situation as a clear violation of the undertakings of GATT.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that what this legislation is doing is going back to the pre-1948 practice. I also say that as a result of this legislation retaliatory action on the part of other signatories of GATT, provided for under the agreement, could be imposed against Canada and this, of course, would be very prejudicial and have dire consequences on our foreign trade and our general economy in Canada. At a time when there is economic difficulty and unemployment in Canada I submit we cannot afford to risk any further deterioration in our economy by introducing legislation which was so unsuccessful in the past. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

this house reaffirms the adherence of Canada to the spirit and objectives of GATT, which are clearly violated in the provisions of this bill.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think it is probably hardly necessary for me to raise the point of order—

Mr. Benidickson: No, it was ruled upon earlier.

Mr. Fulton: —that this amendment is out of order under the provisions of subsections 3 and 5 of citation 203 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. Subsection 3 of citation 203 reads:

An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

Subsection 5 of this citation reads:

An amendment was ruled out because it raised a new question which could only be considered on a distinct motion after notice.

I believe the argument of my hon. friend who just moved the amendment defeats his amendment because if as he says this is a complete violation of GATT then obviously the proposition involved in GATT is foreign to the proposition involved in this bill. I do not of course accept his argument but that was his argument and therefore his amendment is out of order under both subsection 3 and subsection 5 of citation 203.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would cite again to Your Honour—and perhaps it is almost redundant to do so—the relevant words of citation 382 of Beauchesne's fourth edition:

It is . . . competent . . . to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill—

Mr. Fulton: It must be relevant thereto, though.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course. I am sure Your Honour could not entertain for a moment the suggestion that a bill which seeks to provide in the Customs Act items that are different from those to which we agreed at GATT is certainly not relevant to GATT and GATT to it.

Mr. Cardin: I am not an expert on procedure but I would like to read from "May's Parliamentary Practice", sixteenth edition, at page 530:

It is also competent for a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment".

I consider, Mr. Speaker, that what I moved was a reasoned amendment. Paragraph 1 of this section, speaking of an amendment, says:

> It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or different from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the principle in this particular case was GATT and the policies in the bill which are adverse to GATT are the cost of production. I really believe in my own mind, Mr. Speaker, that my amendment is completely in order.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Justice makes the proposition that the amendment deals with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion. Perhaps he would like to elaborate on that. We have been referred to treaty obligations under GATT which relate to the method of valuing goods for duty purposes and that this bill deals with that same subject matter. I do not consider it as self evident, as the minister seems to do, that this is a foreign principle. It is an adverse principle. The question is whether it is relevant as being related to the subject matter of the bill or whether it is foreign.

Then, the other point which the minister may make is that it raises a new question and therefore requires notice. Perhaps he wishes to deal further with the question of relevancy. What he has said scarcely establishes that principle.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rely, of course, entirely on the citations in Beauchesne and the past rulings of Speakers of this house which are to the effect that when a minister introduces a bill which is an amendment to existing legislation, then it is not open to another member to introduce by way of amendment a proposition which raises a new question and is in that sense not relevant to the bill before the house.

Let us consider the position. Here we have a bill to amend the Customs Act. My hon. friends who have advanced a number of propositions by way of argument as to why that bill, in their opinion, should not be approved on second reading are again, I submit, seeking to put forward now argumentative matter under their amendment that it is not open to them to do. They have advanced a number of propositions which in their view indicate that the bill should not be supported.

But an amendment to the Customs Act, by their own arguments, has nothing to do with GATT whatsoever. They say it is a breach of GATT. We, of course, do not accept that argument but that is a matter of argument. Now, they are leaving the principle of the bill and advancing an entirely new proposition which is that "this house reaffirm the adherence of Canada to the spirit and objectives of GATT, which are clearly violated in the provisions of this bill." That has nothing to do with the proposal made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) in the legislation before the house. By their very own arguments it has nothing to do with it. Therefore, it is a matter entirely unrelated to it. What they are seeking to do are two things: one, to advance an argumentative matter by way of amendment; and, two, to introduce a proposal which has no relation to the subject matter of the resolution before the house.

I recall time after time in my experience when hon. members have sought to introduce new subject matter not related to the principle of a bill and they have been ruled out of order by successive Speakers—I recall Mr. Speaker Macdonald, particularly—on the basis that an amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved. We had just yesterday an example of a proposition which advanced new subject matter which was not relevant, and as I submitted at that time—I recall the point of order was raised by Your Honour—an amendment not relevant could only be introduced after notice. That is the very reason for the provision in the rules that amendments which raise new matter can only be introduced after notice so that the house will not be taken by surprise.

I submit very firmly that this amendment sets forth a proposition which certainly deals with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion, and is shown to be so by the very arguments by the hon. member who has moved the motion and as such it raises a new question which could only be considered on a distinct motion after notice. Notice has not been given. I rely on the clear words of subsections 3 and 5 of citation 203 in the point of order which I put forward.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, this bill is one to amend the Customs Act in respect of valuations for duty and in no other respect. Each clause in this bill is concerned only with valuations for duty.

Mr. Nowlan: Not wholly.

Mr. Pearson: It is concerned with valuations for duty. The GATT agreement, to which Canada is a party, also has very important clauses dealing with this matter of valuation for duty and nothing could be more relevant to the clauses in this bill than the obligations we have undertaken under GATT in respect of the procedure for determining value for duty. If it is felt, as we do feel, that some of those valuation provisions contravene obligations we have undertaken under GATT, then surely it is relevant to this bill to move an amendment along the lines of the amendment which has been moved by my hon. friend. To say that our obligations under GATT in respect of valuations for duty are not relevant to this bill which deals with valuation for duty seems to me to be a completely unrealistic position to take.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have just one observation I should like to make on the point raised by the Minister of Justice. He referred to the decision made by Your Honour yesterday. I suppose it is hardly necessary to recall that it had relation to a resolution and not to a bill and that Your Honour drew the attention of the house to that fact and in doing so pointed out that it was competent to move this kind of amendment on the second reading of a bill but that you did not feel it was on a mere resolution of that character.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling on this matter, the Leader of the Opposition has said this bill deals with matters of valuations for duty. That is true in part. There are sections here dealing with valuations for duty but there is also a section here dealing with the power of the minister with respect to censorship and procedures which should be followed with respect to books which are pornographic or seditious. Is that a violation of GATT or is that a violation of the Bible? Just where does the amendment come in with respect to that?

Again, there are several sections here dealing with the appeal procedure and that certainly has nothing to do with GATT. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if there are specific sections here which, in the opinion of members of the house, are a violation of GATT that matter can be raised when we are dealing with the section itself, but the bill covers composite matters involving customs administration, customs procedure, valuations and other kindred things. Therefore I suggest that the amendment is entirely out of order. In case you should rule otherwise, Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I should say as well that the government certainly recognizes the spirit and objectives of GATT just as much or more so than do hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Pearson: If you did you would not have introduced this bill.

Mr. Speaker: As this is the second time today we have had to consider the relevancy of an amendment on second reading perhaps I might take a minute to refer to the principles that should govern the house in its procedure at this time. I think they are well stated in May, 16th edition, at page 530, referred to by the hon. member who moved the amendment to the motion for second reading.

May refers to the usual six months hoist amendment, which is one type, at some length, and I will not read that. He then goes on to the second category of amendments into which this amendment must fall if it is to be sustained and calls them reasoned amendments. He says:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment". . . . A reasoned amendment is placed on the paper in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories.
> (1) It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill.

That is the first test, that it declares an adverse principle.

> (2) It may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill or otherwise opposed to its progress.
> (3) It may seek further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence.

At page 531 the following appears:

> The following rules, govern the contents of reasoned amendments:
> (1) The principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such motion. The amendment must "strictly relate to the bill which the house, by its order, has resolved upon considering."—
> (2) The amendment must not be concerned in detail with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee.

That is the point the Minister of National Revenue raised, that this matter might more appropriately be dealt with by amendment in committee as it relates only to certain sections of a bill which has a broader principle. I continue the quotation:

> Nor is it permissible to propose merely the addition of words to the question, that the bill be now read a second time, as such words must, by implication, attach conditions to the second reading.
> (3) An amendment, which amounts to no more than a direct negation of the principle of the bill, is open to objection.

On hearing what has been said and from a perusal of the bill I would have thought it would have been possible to frame an amendment which proposed as an adverse principle that the bill was in contravention of the treaty obligations of Canada under GATT, subject to what the Minister of National Revenue says about that perhaps being a matter relating to specific sections rather than to the whole principle of the bill. I would have thought that such an amendment could properly be framed within that meaning and form the subject of a debate on the principles involved, focusing attention, as it were, on that particular objection to the bill and thereby providing an opportunity for a directed and perhaps limited debate.

But I must say that this particular amendment seems to me to go about the matter from the other end. It begins by reaffirming the adherence of Canada to the spirit and objectives of GATT and that seems to me to be going outside the matter that is before us at this time. That involves a new, different and quite extensive proposition that could scarcely be entertained in a debate on the second reading of this particular bill. As an afterthought the following words are tagged on, "which are clearly violated in the provisions of the bill". In the form in which it is presented I am of the opinion that the amendment does not meet the requirements of the practice of the house.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to have a few words to say on this most interesting and important bill intended by the government, we presume, to prevent unfair competition for certain manufacturers and industries in this country and certain agricultural producers. Before proceeding further, I must say that we think the minister means well so far as this legislation is concerned and we give him full credit for that.

The minister said today that the principle of valuation had been in effect since confederation with modifications from time to time to meet certain conditions and circumstances, but a reading of Hansard and amendments to legislation throughout the years indicate that it has had a zigzag course and the fundamental problem that existed when the Liberals gave effect to dumping legislation in 1922 remains with us today. I remember the 1930 election when the Conservative party campaigned in the fruit districts of the interior of British Columbia and suggested that improvements in dumping legislation would bring stability to the fruit industry, and I am quite sure they intended to do that. They received a very heavy vote in the Okanagan and the Kootenays at that time because of the desire of the fruit growers to find some security so far as their marketing problems were concerned.

But that has not been the result. While I freely admit that this bill is intended to provide some measure of relief to fruit producers and others, the basic problems of these producers—I am speaking now particularly of the fruit industry of which I have some knowledge—are still with us because we have failed to face them and have relied from time to time on legislation like this. As I read the record, this course of action was commenced by the Liberal government in 1922 and at that time was denounced by the Conservatives. The legislation was then extended and improved under the leadership of Mr. Bennett in 1930 in accordance with his promises to the fruit growers in his campaign of that year. At that time the Liberals opposed Mr. Bennett's amendments to the legislation most vigorously. However, the Liberals continued to support the legislation in principle after their return to office in 1935. Therefore from our point of view we cannot understand how the Liberals can logically oppose or criticize legislation which in principle was begun by them in 1922.

Mr. Pearson: Oh no, not at all.

Mr. Herridge: I think that statement is correct.

Mr. Pearson: No, quite incorrect.

Mr. Herridge: We are not in the habit of making statements without checking the facts beforehand. I suppose we should view this legislation as an attempt by the government to provide a temporary expedient to cover certain conditions and circumstances with respect to marketing problems so far as the fruit industry is concerned that have occurred frequently throughout the year. None of this type of legislation has finally solved those problems. As I said before, this bill may provide some remedy, some slight improvement but the basic marketing problem of the fruit industry of British Columbia and the rest of Canada remains with us today.

While the type of industry—I mean the manufacturing industry—affected by this bill is generally found in eastern Canada and, as far as western Canada is concerned, in the larger centres, there is included a section in response to the representations of the fruit growing interests in Canada and certain of the vegetable growing interests. No doubt that is why the government has included this section in the bill.

On this question I can speak with some experience. I come from a family that came to this country to grow apples and grow rich. I may say that we certainly have not grown rich except in experience. I know all about bringing the virgin forest into production, planting an orchard and working it into shape. We planted a small orchard of about five acres of apples. I remember in the first instance when it cost us $500 an acre to clear the land in the early days. I remember marketing our first box of apples. No one will realize the thrill one gets when marketing their first box of apples when they are produced from virgin soil. As to the first box of apples we marketed, I was sent by my father to borrow 10 apples from a neighbour in order to make up the box. You can understand what a celebration it was for us with our trying experience, and our experience was the experience of many others.

An hon. Member: Did you ever return the 10 apples?

Mr. Herridge: I mention that only to indicate the hope, labour and capital that went into developing the industry and to indicate that I have some knowledge of the industry in British Columbia from the grass roots up, and that I am very sympathetic indeed to the fruit growers' problems and have a thorough understanding of them.

I also happen to have been a representative of the Kootenays on an organization committee that organized and agitated. That was in a period when respectable Conservatives and Liberals, lay down on the railroad in Kelowna and refused to let the trains move and carried placards around. Actually they acted like members of the working class under similar circumstances. Anyway, we in this group know that, whether they were Conservatives, Liberals or C.C.F., they were in a difficult position. I was on the committee representing the Kootenays that first organized and agitated the fruit growers into action. As a result there was finally placed on the statute books of British Columbia the first marketing legislation which has been a model for the rest of Canada and which the people in Ontario, Quebec and other places have seen fit to follow and to pattern their legislation upon. So, Mr. Speaker, I speak with some interest in and some concern for the welfare of my fellow fruit growers, with a knowledge of production and marketing problems of tree fruit growers in British Columbia.

I know of their efforts to improve production methods, to improve their marketing practices, I realize that they have done practically all that can be done by an intelligent group of growers to organize their production which is on a very excellent basis indeed and to organize their marketing processes. What is required now, both in the federal and in the provincial field, is government action to supplement these self-help efforts that have been going on for the last forty years if the fruit growers not only of British Columbia but of the rest of Canada are going to receive a fair return for their product.

I know that this bill is introduced by the government as an attempt to do something on a temporary basis to meet a very critical situation so far as the fruit industry in British Columbia is concerned. Fruit and vegetables are very difficult crops to market compared to some other agricultural commodities. You can store beef; you can store grain; and you can store other farm commodities easily; but there are certain fruit crops, such as soft-stone fruits which you cannot store and which must be marketed often under difficult conditions. They are subject to quick and wide price fluctuations due mostly to changes in weather conditions which cause rot or delayed maturity. For instance, a short crop may mature all at once and cause a glut on the market. Bad weather, unseasonable rains, abnormal temperatures, all these things can put a fruit grower in a very difficult position. Crops which affect Canadian producers start in the southern United States and gradually work north. We have that experience every year with respect to certain crops. The early production from such areas usually brings a fair return, which return ensures the producer the over-all cost of production plus some profit in those circumstances. Canadian production commences and must meet competition from the height of the season production from the border states. Certainly our growers seldom enjoy the higher returns they are entitled to from their early production.

We are affected by climate. We are affected by geography and we are affected by the vicissitudes of the fruit industry so far as storage and marketing are concerned. However, conditions respecting a certain group in the producing area in the United States with which they are competing in our market reach the point quite frequently where sales are made at prices which give no return whatsoever to the producer. That is the situation that the government aims to do something towards remedying by the introduction of the particular clause in this bill that deals with fruit. While I recognize that one section of this bill particularly is the government's response to the representations of fruit and vegetable growers, I am sure the majority of them after their experience since the days of the first world war—and I have attended a good many meetings—recognize the fact that it can only be a temporary and a partial remedy to their basic problems and does not provide a comprehensive and long time solution to their marketing problems.

Mr. Speaker, I speak as a free trader in principle. I was brought up in a free trade family. As a matter of fact, my father was a Liberal free trader, my mother was a Conservative free trader and I am a C.C.F. free trader. You can therefore well understand that free trade policies flow through my system. However, regardless of what can be done under this bill, I think if we examine it thoroughly in the light of present world and national conditions, we must recognize that the principle of this bill, first of all goes in a direction contrary to the spirit of the times with respect to international markets and the spirit that is being expressed by progressive people in the world who realize that world prosperity depends on an increased flow of goods across international boundaries and so on.

Second, as the previous speaker mentioned, in our opinion, regardless of the best intentions of the government and of the minister, it violates the spirit and the objectives of GATT.

Third, it places potential restrictions on trade with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries. I am sure that an examination of the effect of this bill will indicate that.

Fourth, over a period of time this policy, if carried to its logical conclusion, can invite economic retaliation from the countries directly affected.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, regardless of what the government is trying to do at the present time, I hope that this measure is considered by the government only as a temporary stopgap that will provide time and opportunity for the government to develop a policy in step with the urge and the demand for the extension of international trade as the basis of prosperity for all producers in Canada and all producers in other countries.

As I have said before, this problem of which I am speaking particularly now has been with us since 1922 and in our opinion it will not be solved by the section in this bill that is intended to relieve the situation at this time.

Having expressed our criticism of the bill and our sympathy for the fruit growers and without questioning in the slightest the motives of the minister, I think we are now called upon to present an alternative policy. If you criticize you must also be prepared to say what you would do if you were in office. I suggest a program along the lines mentioned this morning by the leader of this group, and which I now want to repeat and to mention one or two other aspects relating to the situation which I understand from experience.

We say that we are going to have to tackle the basic problems of these fruit and vegetable growers and I am particularly dealing with that group. It is a funny thing, but I have always noticed at the many conventions I have had the pleasure of attending, both of the fruit growers and of the livestock breeders, that it is very easy to find evidence of the difficulties faced by these people. One can find such an illustration by looking at the physiques of the men attending the conventions. When you attend a livestock convention they are all well padded and of good weight, whereas those attending the fruit growers' conventions mostly look like me.

We suggest the full use of the agricultural prices stabilization legislation for the establishment of minimum prices. I may say that the stone tree fruit growers or the soft tree fruit growers of British Columbia were very disappointed indeed that the government had failed to recognize in any way their present need by failure to grant any deficiency payments for the 1957 crop. That sort of stabilization is very necessary and I particularly emphasize that this does not apply to apples only but it is also necessary for the stone tree fruit growers because they have to deal with fluctuations in climate, and in marketing conditions caused by geographical conditions, to a greater extent than any other tree fruit growers or, as a matter of fact, any growers of the fruit marketed from this area.

Secondly, we suggest that positive steps be taken to assure adequate and continuous operation and maintenance of processing facilities. I want to say a few words on that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) brings forward his item of $30,000 for the employment of an administrative staff intended to help small business in Canada under present circumstances. We do suggest that both this government and the provincial governments get together with the processors and the canners of this country and get them to recognize their responsibilities to the fruit and vegetable industry across the country and not to allow the continuation of the purchase of the canneries and processing plants in Canada by United States interests and then to have them close them down while the growers in question are in a price squeeze resulting in very little return for their labour.

Thirdly, we believe the federal and provincial agricultural conference which is attended annually by representatives of the federal and provincial governments and which in the past has dealt mainly with production problems should be called and should include representatives of the producer organizations, the marketing and sales agencies and the processors and canners for the purpose of obtaining—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member's remarks would be better directed to the clause when it is in committee. If the principle of this bill is to help the fruit growers then it is to help them by tariff action and not by the countless other ways which the hon. member is attempting to describe. I think he is trespassing on the time of the house by going into these various other remedies.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, the principle of my speech is to help the fruit growers, but I am just concluding. We are sure a very great deal could be done in this respect rather than accepting the principles adopted in this bill as permanent policy.

Look what we have done in defence. When we have to get together on an international basis things are done quickly and definite action is taken. We want the same sort of action for the farmers and the producers of this country, and I think we should also give encouragement to co-operation between Canadian and United States grower organizations to work out together some of these problems. There has been limited success in that respect in the tree fruit industry and there is a great avenue for exploration in that direction.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Herridge: In conclusion, I say that rather than introducing this legislation the government shoud give a lead to action along the lines I have suggested as best I could while trying to remain in order.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I did not intend to take part in this debate but in view of the challenge voiced by both Liberal and C.C.F. members in respect of their remarks concerning the welfare of the fruit industry of this country and those who are concerned with it, I cannot help but feel compelled to say a few words in regard to the action proposed by this government.

Something was said by one Liberal member in regard to what Louis St. Laurent had accomplished by his trade and export policies during the time he was in power in Canada. If I recall correctly he was named leader of the Liberal party in 1948, and I have a publication which I received the other day from what I believe some members of this house consider a reliable organization. It is Canadian Labour, the official journal of the Canadian Labour Congress and I would like to take the time of the house for one moment to read part of an article, which has a bearing on this particular matter, which reads as follows:

> Take rubber footwear, in which labour costs account for more than 50 per cent of total factory costs, as an example. Canadian production declined from more than 24,000,000 pairs in 1947, to about 12,500,000 pairs in 1956, and employment in Canadian rubber footwear factories fell from about 7,000 workers to 5,000 workers, as a direct result of the almost total loss of a large export business, as well as a substantial part of the Canadian market to foreign competitors.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member will relate what he is reading very directly to the bill because it does not appear to me to have any bearing upon it. He is talking about exports and this Customs Act relates to imports.

Mr. Nasserden: I am getting down to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am expressing the hope that the hon. member will get down to it.

Mr. Nasserden: Thank you very much. It went on to say:

> There appears to be little prospect of a reversal of this sorry trend, and we have to assume that henceforth the fortunes of the Canadian rubber industry will depend almost entirely on development in its home market.
> Protection of Industry is Essential
> There is every reason to fear that a similar trend is developing in waterproof rubber footwear, and that unless the government takes action to protect the Canadian manufacturers and their remaining 5,000 workers against price competition, based on wages as low as from four cents to 15 cents an hour in Hong Kong, the rubber footwear industry is doomed.

If the kind of thing that the Liberals and the C.C.F. members of this House of Commons do not want to see this government do is protect those who are engaged in labour in this country then I think that is a new page in the history of this country as far as those two parties are concerned. All I want to say is that I think every member of this House of Commons can support this measure. It is a measure designed to give our industry and our labour a fair share of the dollars being made here in Canada. I was certainly surprised to hear some hon. members, particularly in the C.C.F. group, rise on this occasion to take the stand they have taken in view of the stand they took across this country with regard to their desire to work in the interest of labour.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I will speak briefly at this stage because I believe that is the sense of the house, but I must say I regard this measure as perhaps more important than any which has come before us during this session of parliament. I say that because of its implications in relation to the foreign trade of this country on which so much of our prosperity depends. I will try not to repeat anything in the course of my remarks which has been said already in the speeches which have been made so far and to present in the briefest way possible the arguments I wish to make. I must say that I would wish to speak at greater length on this subject because of my feelings with regard to it, but sensing the feeling of the house I will not do that. I am concerned with the principle of this bill, and I must say this measure has been presented in a strange way to the house because the minister took exactly five minutes on the motion for second reading, three minutes in replying to a proposed amendment and less than one minute in speaking to a point of order.

In speaking to that point of order he raised a question as to what was the principle of the bill. I had assumed until that time that this was anti-dumping legislation, legislation aimed at preventing the trade practice commonly known as dumping, a term which is probably ill-defined but which is well understood by everyone concerned with trade. In any event I want to point out that the principle of a bill can only be determined through a study of what is actually included in the bill. In this particular measure there are five clauses. Clause No. 1 repeals sections 35 to 40 of the Customs Act and substitutes new clauses in their place. The new clauses which it is proposed to substitute begin with clause 35 which reads:

(1) The value for duty of goods imported shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of sections 36 to 40B.

And so on. The next new clause to be substituted is clause 36 which begins:

Subject to section 38, the value for duty shall, notwithstanding any invoice or affidavit to the contrary—

And so on.

The next new clause to be substituted is clause 37 and it goes on to say:

Subject to section 38, where like goods were not sold for home consumption, or were not sold for home consumption in the circumstances described in section 36, but similar goods were so sold, the value for duty shall—

And so on. That is the subject matter of that particular clause. The new proposed clause 38 starts off this way:

Where in any case or class of cases...the value for duty cannot be determined . . . the value for duty shall be determined in such manner as the minister prescribes.

I will only read a sentence of clause 39 to illustrate my point. It says:

Where the minister is satisfied that material injury has been or may be caused to any industry in Canada or any portion thereof...the governor in council may order that the value for duty of those goods or that class of goods shall be increased—

And so on.

The proposed new clause 40 reads:

Where sufficient information has not been furnished or is not available to enable the determination of cost of production, gross profit or fair market value under section 36, 37 or 39, the cost of production, gross profit or fair market value, as the case may be, shall be determined in such manner as the minister prescribes.

Then the proposed new clause 40A goes on to set out the whole procedure with regard to valuation and uses the expression, beginning at line 29:

The value for duty shall be the amount for which the goods were sold, less the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the goods has decreased between the time of purchase and the time of exportation.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

We could go through every subclause and find a similar reference to value for duty. The proposed new clause 40B begins:

If the value for duty as determined under sections 36 to 40A does not include—

And so on. Clause 2 of the bill deals with section 45 of the act. It repeals that section and substitutes a new one. This procedural clause reads as follows:

Any of the parties to an appeal under section 44—

Section 44 is not dealt with in the bill, but it starts off this way:

A person who deems himself aggrieved by a decision of the deputy minister
(a) as to tariff classification or value for duty.

Clause 3 of the bill substitutes a new section 46(1) and this again deals with valuation or tariff classification. Note the term "valuation." And then 46A makes reference specifically to sections 43, 44 and 45 of the act, all of which refer to valuation for duty.

Clause 4 of the bill now before us deals with invoices and the fair market value of goods determined in accordance with sections 36 to 40B, every one of which sections refers to value for duty.

Now we come to clause 5 of the bill. Clause 5 refers to paragraph (b) of subsection (7) of section 40A of the act. It will be found that that also brings in the question of value in paragraph 5 which is concerned with the proclamation of the governor in council.

What I want to point out is that every clause in this bill deals with the matter of value for duty of goods being imported into this country and that every proposed new section of the act deals with that subject. From this we can arrive at only one conclusion: notwithstanding the argument of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), which he made in the course of a discussion on a point of order, that this does not deal with value for duty, it does, and it deals with nothing else.

That is the whole principle of the bill. I do not think the minister should deal with it other than on that basis.

After recognizing the bill as being an anti-dumping measure, a measure providing means for fixing the value for duty purposes, I wish to place on the record two clauses of the GATT agreement, clause 2 (a) and 2 (b) of article 7, which read as follows:

2. (a) The value for customs purposes of imported merchandise should be based on the actual value of the imported merchandise on which duty is assessed, or of like merchandise, and should not be based on the value of merchandise of national origin or on arbitrary or fictitious values.

(b) "Actual value" should be the price at which, at a time and place determined by the legislation of the country of importation, and in the ordinary course of trade, such or like merchandise is sold or offered for sale under fully competitive conditions. To the extent to which the price of such or like merchandise is governed by the quantity in a particular transaction, the price to be considered should uniformly be related to either (i) comparable quantities, or (ii) quantities not less favourable to importers than those in which the greater volume of the merchandise is sold in the trade between the countries of exportation and importation.

I could go on reading other clauses from the GATT agreement to illustrate my point but perhaps these are sufficient for that purpose to the extent to which they deal with value for duty.

That brings me to this point. As indicated in the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in the early stages of the debate on this bill, this measure is one in which the government is asking added powers for the executive to fix value for duty purposes. It is requesting extraordinary additional powers. I will not develop that argument further because an amendment was advanced on that point which has been disposed of by the house. As indicated by the vote the house wants to proceed with the bill notwithstanding the points outlined by my leader. I shall not reopen the argument in that respect.

The minister has made no case for seeking these extraordinary powers. He has not argued nor illustrated the inadequacies of the existing legislation. He made no case on that point whatsoever. The measure before us does not simply deal with changes in the existing legislation but it extends the right of the executive to fix values in the way indicated in the argument presented by my leader this morning. The effect of granting these powers is going to injure our trade. I ask hon. members to bear in mind what I said about the government having put forward no case whatever concerning why the executive should be granted these additional arbitrary powers. My fear is that Canada's trade will suffer. Canadian trade sharply increased since 1946. Perhaps it is unnecessary to place on the record all the figures I have before me relating to this point. I shall put only the total exports on the record. In 1946 Canada's total exports amounted to $2,339 million and in 1957 they amounted to $4,934 million.

That vast trade was built up by this country with a great number of other nations. It was built up at a time when efforts were being made to free and increase trade all over the world. One of those efforts was the general agreement on tariff and trade to which we should adhere. That may come as news to some hon. members of this house but I do not want to argue that point. Nevertheless, that is how the trade was built up. We are now being asked to jeopardize our relations with all the foreign countries with whom we trade. We are now putting them in the position where they could argue that we have violated the agreement to which we are a signatory. Why? No reason has been given to us by the government and we are entitled to have reasons given. If there is a fear of the evil of dumping then the house should be told about it. This is a drastic and serious remedy we are seeking; but a remedy against what? Nothing. There is no evidence of the inadequacy of the existing legislation or, if there is, it has not been put on the record.

I feel that something should be said in reply to the argument advanced by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) and I shall reply very briefly. The hon. member tried to indicate that this bill would help labour. This bill is the very antithesis of help to labour. It is the very thing that will increase unemployment in this country and unemployment is a worrisome problem to many Canadians at this time. I want to remind the hon. gentleman that the method of determining value for duty incorporated in part in the bill now before the house is the method that was brought into the house and enacted into legislation by a Conservative government headed by the late Lord Bennett, in the 1930's. If the hon. member will look at Canadian trade statistics he will observe what happened to Canada's trade under that type of legislation. If he studies the problem he will see the severity with which dumping legislation was administered at that time. It undoubtedly contributed to tensions in international trade and to the reduction of trade.

When the hon. member talks about pay for labour let me remind him that coming from Rosthern he knows what the term "Bennett buggy" means. He also knows what hon. members of this house are talking about when they refer to the time when labour in this country got 20 cents a day. He understands those references.

Mr. Benidickson: Trade was cut off.

Mr. McIlraith: Do not let hon. members from the west be mislead about the dangers inherent in this bill. The dangers are that the bill will interfere with and lessen Canada's trade. If the government wants to make changes in the procedures affecting the existing dumping legislation let it bring in amendments. This bill will not accomplish that because it goes much further. In fact, I have often wondered if it does not go much further than the minister wanted or intended it to go, but perhaps that is not properly debatable at this stage.

Mr. Nasserden: That is not what labour thinks.

Mr. McIlraith: For all the reasons I have asserted, Mr. Speaker, and holding the views I do about the inherent damage that will be done to our foreign trade, and particularly because of the incompatibility of this bill with our obligations under GATT, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house declines to proceed with a bill the fundamental terms of which are repugnant to the spirit and objectives of the treaty obligations of Canada under GATT.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the Minister of National Revenue is the one that bothers me most about this amendment; that is, that this alleged conflict with GATT could be dealt with at the committee stage; but having gone through the bill, I find the only section which does not relate to value for duty is the procedural sections and to some extent these sections are related to the method of appeal from valuations for duty. If the minister or any member wishes to speak they will have to convince me that this is not so.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not think it takes much convincing in the form in which it is put. It is far different from any other amendment. It says, "This house declines to proceed with a bill". Have you ever seen an amendment before which says that the house declines to proceed with a bill? It is a sheer negative to express reasons possibly to show that the house declines to proceed with a bill the fundamental terms of which are repugnant. I suggest in the first place the form of the amendment is completely out of order.

In so far as the bill itself is concerned, Your Honour said you were somewhat troubled by my reference to the division of legislative powers contained within the bill. What the hon. member for Ottawa West said, of course, is perfectly right. Certain subsections here deal with valuing procedures. I point out to Your Honour that this bill contains only three sections.

Mr. McIlraith: Five.

Mr. Nowlan: It is true that one of them is longer than any other two. One section, and only one, deals with valuation for duty.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Nowlan: Absolutely, only one section deals with valuation procedure. We turn to section 3. Section 1, of course, is something which provides for repealing sections 35 to 40 of the Customs Act, and we go on to various subsections set forth there. Then, we come to section 3 which gives power to the deputy minister to refer any question to the tariff board. That deals with appeal procedures. That has nothing whatever to do with GATT or anything of the kind. Then, the next section has to do with importation of goods. Any seditious material comes under section 3, and section 4 is also a matter having no reference whatsoever to valuations. Your Honour is in this position. One out of the four sections of this bill deals with valuation procedure. The Leader of the Opposition shakes his head, but that is correct. It is true that section 1 sets forth five old sections or new sections of a bill.

In so far as this bill is concerned, that is the situation. I want to emphasize this, Mr. Speaker. Of those five sections only one is new; only one can be construed as a violation of GATT, section 39, and when we come to 39, either tonight or tomorrow, we will be perfectly prepared to argue with those who wish to argue whether 39 is a violation of GATT or not. All of the other subsections, except subsection 39, are simply administrative practices which have been carried on under government administration and all that they do is to clarify the matter. There is no change in principle whatsoever.

There is no point in extending the argument on this, Mr. Speaker. You can make your ruling and it, of course, will be dealt with and we will deal with the amendment as Your Honour sees fit to rule, but I do say very strenuously that this bill does not in itself constitute a violation of GATT. It has three different parts, but the main part is the longer part, consisting of four or five pages. There is only one subsection in that which could possibly be construed as an amendment of GATT and that can be argued, I submit to Your Honour, when the section is dealt with in the committee and not before. Surely the bill should not be ruled out of order, or the house decline to proceed with it, because one subsection of the many may or may not be a violation of GATT.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order briefly and on only one aspect of it, I think there was some misunderstanding about the provision for appeal. It is subject to section 44 of the act which deals with valuation for duty as well as with other things. Therefore, we have the extraordinary situation that value for duty is not only dealt with in every clause of the bill but as well in each of the new sections of the act embodied in these clauses.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether Your Honour wishes to hear argument on the other point raised by the Minister of National Revenue—

Mr. Speaker: I prefer to hear argument from the other side of the house. If the Minister of Justice has had a chance to look at this—he was concerned with the previous amendement—he might want to direct himself to it.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have been out looking up some of the previous occasions on which amendments have been ruled out of order on the grounds either that they raised new matter which could only be raised after notice or else that they were irrelevant to the terms of the bill. I have not Hansard before me; the volumes are coming in, but on second reading of a bill the principle is established most clearly that any amendment must be strictly relevant to the principle of a bill.

This is a bill to amend the Customs Act. My hon. friends have sought twice now to move an amendment which alleges that the bill is contrary to the spirit and objectives of GATT. That, Mr. Speaker, is a matter of argument that may be in order but as an amendment it is not relevant to the principle of the bill. Your Honour has already ruled out of order the last amendment which read:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house reaffirms the adherence of Canada to the spirit and objectives of GATT, which are clearly violated in provisions of this bill."

As I say, this is a matter of argument which may be in order but as a matter of amendment it is not relevant to the principle of the bill. Now they are trying to do the same thing by alleging that:

> This house declines to proceed with a bill the fundamental terms of which are repugnant to the spirit and objectives of the treaty obligations of Canada under GATT.

There are a number of occasions, and especially in the parliament from 1949 to 1953, where Mr. Speaker Macdonald ruled that on all occasions amendments with respect to the principle of motions or bills must be strictly relevant. He dealt with the argument put forward by my hon. friends opposite that the amendment might advance a proposition which, as they say, asserts a principle different from or opposed to the principle of the bill. In every case Mr. Speaker Macdonald ruled that while that is a principle of amendment nevertheless the amendment must be so phrased that it is strictly relevant to the principle of the bill itself.

I have not had much time since returning from the library to find the most apt amendment. I have four occasions here before me and perhaps I might refer Your Honour to them. There is October 17, 1949, pages 856 and 857; April 21, 1952, pages 1438 and 1439.

Mr. Benidickson: Give us the circumstances.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps this one is more relevant here. On November 15, 1949, there was an attempt made to amend the National Housing Act. The then hon. member for York South moved that the bill be not read a second time but rather that the house should resolve that consideration be given—

Mr. Benidickson: You had better read it first.

Mr. Fulton: I am trying to find it.

Mr. Benidickson: Read it first for the first time, I mean.

Mr. Fulton: I told the hon. gentleman I had been to the library reading these precedents.

Mr. Habel: Dispense.

Mr. Fulton: The amendment was in these words:

> That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate and prior consideration to rescinding the order announced on November 3 providing for increases in domestic rents.

My hon. friends would certainly attempt to argue that increases in domestic rents were related—

Mr. Pickersgill: To build new houses.

Mr. Fulton: —to the matter of the National Housing Act and to the amendment of the National Housing Act. That is on all fours with the argument they are putting forward tonight that the treaty obligations of Canada under GATT are relevant to the principles of this bill. The one is just as relevant as the other. Mr. Speaker Macdonald dealt at length with that point. He said that it was indeed in accordance with citation 657 of Beauchesne's third edition. He said that it was competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill to move as an amendment to the question a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosecution or otherwise opposed to its project.

But he went on to say that he would refer hon. members to citation 354 of Beauchesne's third edition which reads as follows:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

Accordingly he ruled that the amendment dealt with a matter which was foreign to the proposition dealt with in the motion.

The motion was for amendment of the National Housing Act and yet the Speaker ruled that a matter dealing with the rate of rents—

Mr. Pickersgill: On old houses.

Mr. Fulton: —was so foreign to the proposition involved in the motion before the house that it was out of order and could not be moved notwithstanding citation 657 of Beauchesne's third edition.

There are other occasions both with respect to bills and resolutions. Another occasion I have before me was on November 23, 1949, when there was a motion before the house for the second reading of a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act. Once again the amendment moved on that occasion by the present Prime Minister, who was then the member for Lake Centre, set forth a different proposition, suggested that the bill should not now be read a second time but that certain different courses should be followed. In this case the amendment was as follows:

> That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:
> "While this house is at all times anxious to assist in remedying any defects in the law with respect to combinations in restraint of trade that operate against the public interest, it regrets that His Majesty's ministers have failed to comply with the mandatory requirement of publication of reports under the Combines Investigation Act and that before inviting parliament to enact the said bill have failed to give any assurance that there will be no similar breach of the constitution in respect of this or any other act passed by the parliament of Canada."

Here, Mr. Speaker, was an amendment which dealt with the conduct of the government with respect to the requirements of the Combines Investigation Act which was then being amended by the bill before the house. Mr. Speaker Macdonald ruled that the amendment raised a matter which was different from the principle advanced in the motion before the house, that it was not relevant and was therefore not in order. I submit that what the opposition is trying to do here is exactly on all fours with that occasion. They are in effect condemning the government for introducing a bill, as they allege, which is repugnant to the spirit and objectives of GATT. In other words, they are expressing an opinion on this bill in relation to GATT in exactly the same way as the hon. member for Lake Centre, as he then was, introduced an amendment expressing an opinion with regard to the government's actions under the Combines Investigation Act but with relation to a different subject. Yet on that occasion the Speaker ruled that the amendment was not relevant and could not be introduced notwithstanding the provisions of citation 657 of Beauchesne's third edition.

I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that if Your Honour will look at the whole trend of decisions, particularly during the parliament from 1949 to 1953 and also in the parliament from 1953 to 1957 and earlier parliaments, Your Honour will find that the trend of the rulings has been that amendments introduced may not raise a matter which should really only be raised after notice because otherwise the house would be taken by surprise, and the rule that requires that all matters of debate must have proper notice would be set at naught.

My hon. friends are introducing an amendment here which seeks not to debate the merits of the principle of the bill before the house but to debate the merits of the GATT treaty. I submit to you, sir, on that ground that in general such amendments are out of order. I also submit that it is out of order on the same grounds that you ruled the previous amendment out of order, namely, that these are matters which may be made the subject of amendment in committee; that any specific provision which can be shown in committee to violate any particular of Canada's treaty obligations can be made the subject of an amendment in committee. What my hon. friends are seeking to do here is in particular to anticipate a discussion which should be raised in committee on the clauses.

Mr. Speaker: If the house is ready for the question I shall attempt to dispose of this matter right away.

Mr. Pearson: I will be very brief on the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether anyone wishes to speak on the amendment. Otherwise I might defer my judgment until tomorrow. If not, I will give my decision now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let us have it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the importance of this matter and the apparent desire of the opposition to continue with a series of amendments that require the fullest consideration, I suggest, with the obvious purpose in mind that this matter should be given very full consideration by Your Honour, that the decision might be made whenever we return to a discussion of this matter. It is obvious that we are not going to be able to conclude by 10 o'clock this evening, the automatic closing hour. I would not want to do anything to prevent the opposition from advancing those things that are regular. But in view of their general attitude today, I feel that the fullest consideration should be given to this matter.

Mr. Pearson: On the point to which the Prime Minister has spoken, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I do not know what the purpose is in his mind. He has no right to attribute to us any purpose in the production of these amendments. We are trying to produce an amendment which will improve this bill. I do not know why the government is putting up such a long and hard fight to restrict the rights of the opposition to move an amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I agree that the discussion has taken a turn which is not warranted. As I say, if there are any hon. members who wish to speak to this amendment, I will defer my decision and give it in the morning. I will even hear further argument now on the point of order. But if the house is ready for the question, I will give my decision now.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: If no other hon. members wish to speak, I will give my decision. This is the third time I have had to deal with this matter today. I will not repeat what was said previously. The first question which must be considered is relevancy. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), in acknowledging that it would be relevant to debate whether the sections of this bill are in conflict with our obligations under GATT, thereby acknowledges that an amendment directed to that same purpose is relevant, because if it is relevant to debate it,—if the amendment is otherwise good—it is relevant to move an amendment declaratory of a principle to the same effect.

I am troubled by the minister's statement that this is an argument. It is an argument; any assertion of principle would be an argument. Hence I do not think the issue should be determined on that ground at all.

Then the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) rather underplays the importance of the value for duty part of this bill. In what he said I think he in effect acknowledged that it is the one substantial change in the bill.

Mr. Nowlan: Not at all.

Mr. Speaker: Many changes are made but they are more or less procedural changes. They are not important changes until you come to section 39 which is new and which is an important change. The other items are procedural. It therefore seems to me that the value for duty strikes at the basic principle of the bill. On that ground I do not think that the principle of the amendment should be deferred for consideration in committee.

It remains then to consider whether this amendment is different from the one that I ruled out earlier. The earlier amendment called on the house to adhere to its GATT obligations, and opened the door to a very extended debate which might have nothing at all to do with this bill. This amendment calls on the house to refuse to read this bill the second time because its terms are repugnant to the spirit and objectives of the treaty obligations of Canada under GATT, thereby declaring a principle which is to my mind relevant and which is adverse to the principle of the bill. The amendment certainly is opposed to the terms of the bill in that it calls on the house to decline to proceed. To my mind it is not a mere direct negative. It meets all these tests. It seems to me that on second reading, where the house has the acknowledged right to debate the principles which are involved in the bill, it is preferable not to be too restrictive in the type of amendment which brings before the house in specific form and emphasizes the principles which are involved, the principle in this case being that the sections of this bill may be adverse to the spirit and objectives of the treaty obligations of Canada under GATT. I therefore rule the amendment to be in order and I shall now put the question.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. McIlraith) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

The question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: On division?

Mr. Pearson: No.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nowlan: Before the question is put I have some things I should like to say in reply—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment.

Mr. Speaker: I understood that the hon. minister rose to speak without objection.

Mr. Habel: No. I move to adjourn the debate. It is ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we will take, first, the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, then the estimates of the Department of Public Works, the Post Office Department and the Department of Finance. Hon. members should be prepared to consider also any of the items in the further supplementary estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the minister intends that the house should take up on Thursday?

Mr. Green: I am afraid I cannot give the hon. gentleman that information this evening.

At 10.19 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 4.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 3, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCHILL—REPLY TO STATEMENT BY HON. MEMBER FOR ASSINIBOIA

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) alleged on a question of privilege that I had misled the house. I now rise on a question of privilege to correct him. The hon. member was dealing with the question of the buying prices established for grain in western Canada, and I quote his words from page 4397 of Hansard, as follows:

> The second question had to do with the exact buying prices, to which the minister replied that he did not have the figures in mind at that time. I had asked whether the figures were the same as the previous year. There are a great many grades and if there had been changes I would not and did not expect the minister to know, but on checking the figures set forth in the order in council and the prices for the grades in the previous year I can find no change in the grades set forth. I find that they are exactly the same.
> I feel that the answer was misleading, though I do not suggest deliberately so.

I must say that was extremely charitable of the hon. member, but the facts are otherwise. He was referring to the Canada Gazette of August 27, 1958 and I presume compared the figures in that publication with the figures in the Canada Gazette of August 27, 1957, the publication for the previous year. I draw the attention of the house to the following facts. No. 1 Canada western amber durum is shown at a price of $1.50 in 1957 and $1.40 for 1958. No. 2 Canada western amber durum was $1.47 for last year and is $1.36 now. The No. 3 grade was $1.40 last year and is $1.30 now. In all, seven grades show substantial changes.

The hon. member for Assiniboia examined the Gazettes according to his own admission, yet he informed the house on Monday that there had been no changes. I make no comment as to whether or not the hon. member was deliberately misleading the house.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, if I may reply, also on a question of privilege, I frankly admit that I did not check the amber durum prices. I checked wheat as wheat is commonly known in the trade. Durum wheat is known as amber durum, as the minister has referred to it. Wheat is known as bread wheat. I checked wheat, oats and barley, and there was no change. But the first part of my statement has not been alluded to by the minister, namely that it was his order in council that recommended these prices, and though the question was asked two days later apparently the minister did not know it had taken place.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is once again attempting to mislead the house. I answered the first part of his question on Monday. The order in council was passed with regard to these prices. He asked a question about when the prices would be set. I said I had been advised that the wheat board has established buying prices for the various grades of wheat, which was quite true. I also said, "An announcement to that effect will be made very shortly," which was quite true. The announcement was made and published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. Argue: You didn't know you had an order in council.

ROYAL VISIT

ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING VISIT OF HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN AND PRINCE PHILIP

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house will be pleased to know that Her Majesty the Queen has now graciously agreed that her visit to Canada next year with Prince Philip will take place approximately from the middle of June to the end of July, and that the tour will extend to all parts of our country.

While announcing the timing and the general duration of Her Majesty's tour, it is not possible as yet, of course, to be more specific as to the dates or as to the special items and cities and towns to be included in the program. A number of suggestions have been received which will be considered by a special committee appointed for this purpose, and further announcements will be made later when Her Majesty has considered the recommendations of that committee for the general program of her tour.

Canadians in all parts of Canada I am sure will welcome Her Majesty's decision to spend some weeks with us and to travel extensively across the country. When she inaugurates the St. Lawrence seaway Her Majesty will associate herself with the completion of a project which is bound to have profound significance in our national development. It will be a source of satisfaction to all Canadians that Her Majesty, in opening a new chapter in our history, will thus exemplify in vivid fashion a characteristic of our constitution involving the close relationship between the Queen and her people of Canada.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side will share in the pleasure of all Canadians in the announcement the Prime Minister has just made that next summer the Queen is to visit her realm of Canada. That pleasure will be increased by the knowledge that she is to be accompanied by her husband, Prince Philip. It is also increased by the Prime Minister's announcement that she will be here not merely to open this great national and international undertaking, the St. Lawrence seaway, but that she will also have a chance to visit all parts of our country. She will, I know, receive the warm and enthusiastic welcome that she and her husband have received on previous visits to this country. Her visit will give us an additional opportunity to show our loyalty to the crown as a cornerstone of our democratic institutions.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in the C.C.F. welcome the announcement made by the Prime Minister that Her Majesty, with Prince Philip, will visit our country in July of next year for the purpose of opening the St. Lawrence seaway. We welcome Her Majesty not only as Queen but we welcome her because we are part of the commonwealth and she symbolizes the commonwealth itself in many respects. We hope the tour that is planned for the Queen will not be a killing one; we hope that time may be provided for relaxation; we hope that in making those plans every opportunity will be given the ordinary citizen to see the Queen. We in the C.C.F. are most anxious that this visit be made, and we welcome the statement by the Prime Minister.

STARRED QUESTIONS

GEORGE P. LEBLANC—ALEX P. BOUDREAU

Question No. 33—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Were George P. LeBlanc and Alex P. Boudreau dismissed from the Cape Breton Highlands national park effective June 10, 1958?
2. How long had each of these employees been employed by the national park?
3. What was the reason for dismissal in each case?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes. The answer to the second question is as follows. George P. LeBlanc was continuously employed from April, 1951, to the date of his dismissal. Alex P. Boudreau was originally taken on strength on October 6, 1954. Mr. Boudreau was struck off strength on February 14, 1955 and was again taken on strength on May 11, 1955. He was continuously employed from that date to the date of his dismissal.

The answer to question No. 3 is that the dismissal in each case was made on the basis of a declaration by an hon. member that the employee had taken an active part in politics.

VISITS TO NORTHERN DEFENCE INSTALLATIONS

Question No. 39—Mr. Argue:

1. Have any Canadian departmental officials been unable to make visits in the Canadian north because of delay in granting permission by American authorities?
2. If so, what were the names of such officials?
3. What were the purposes of the visits?
4. When was permission requested of United States authorities?
5. By whom were the requests made and to whom?
6. Were there replies from the United States authorities to these requests? If so, what was the nature of the reply in each case?
7. Did any Canadian departmental official for whom these requests had been made leave the employ of his department?
8. If so, what was the date of such departure?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this question involves several departments, and I ask that it be made an order for return.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether it might be tabled during this session. I hope so.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

ANSELM BOUDREAU

Question No. 40—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Has Anselm Boudreau of Cheticamp, Nova Scotia, been dismissed from the position as clerk in the public works engineers office in the Cape Breton national park?
2. If so, what is the reason for the dismissal?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is that Mr. Anselm Boudreau was employed on a casual prevailing rate basis at $1.20 per hour by the highways division in Cheticamp, Nova Scotia. He was appointed on June 11, 1958, and was released on or about August 8 after two weeks' notice. The answer to the second part of the question is that the clerical work at Cheticamp is to be carried out by the department's regular staff.

3. What were the purposes of the visits?
4. When was permission requested of United States authorities?
5. By whom were the requests made and to whom?
6. Were there replies from the United States authorities to these requests? If so, what was the nature of the reply in each case?
7. Did any Canadian departmental official for whom these requests had been made leave the employ of his department?
8. If so, what was the date of such departure?

FEDERAL LIQUOR EXPENDITURES

Question No. 43—Mr. Howard:

1. Has the government spent any money for spirituous liquor during 1956 and 1957?
2. If so, how much was spent by or on behalf of each department for: (a) each month in the said years; (b) within Canada; (c) in countries other than Canada?
3. Of the amount spent in Canada, how much was spent for (a) domestic spirituous liquors; (b) imported spirituous liquors?

PUBLIC WORKS EXPENDITURES, SHELBURNE-YARMOUTH-CLARE

Question No. 192—Mr. McWilliam:

1. What is the total amount of moneys expended by the Department of Public Works in the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare in the years 1949 to 1957 inclusive?
2. What are the annual amounts spent for the years 1949 to 1957 inclusive, under the following: (a) acquisition, construction and improvements for public buildings; (b) acquisition, construction, improvements and dredging for harbour and rivers?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

RESOURCE ROADS PROGRAM, ONTARIO

Motion No. 15—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of all correspondence since September 1, 1957, between the federal government and the province of Ontario respecting cost sharing of a roads to resources program.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Stand.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, we are coming to the end of the session and this motion has been on the order paper a long time. I think hon. members will recognize that in principle it is no different from returns that have been made under this heading many times this session even though continued negotiations may be proceeding with the provinces and are not concluded.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member agreeable that this should stand?

Mr. Benidickson: Has the minister any explanation why he cannot comply with the motion?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The same explanation I made earlier in the session. Both No. 15 and No. 39 are in the same category. It is impossible to table this correspondence while negotiations are going on because it would embarrass the governments concerned.

Mr. Benidickson: His friends in Toronto.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): When we are negotiating with nine provinces, as we are now, I think it only proper that the correspondence remain privileged until the negotiations are completed.

Mr. Benidickson: Stand.

Motion stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any comment to make on a prediction reported to have been made by the Minister of Defence Production in Sherbrooke, to the effect that Canada has decided to change her defence system.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether or not the Leader of the Opposition has correctly read the press report. I did not read it in the definitive terms he has just used. In any event, until I have an opportunity to hear from the minister as to what was said I have no comment to make.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I should read it so there will be no misunderstanding. Possibly I put it in my own words in a way which is not exactly as reported in the Canadian Press dispatch. The article reads as follows:

Defence production minister O'Hurley says no one should be surprised if they hear soon that Canada has decided to change her defence system.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder whether I might ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether such an announcement will be made soon? I am not asking for the announcement, but will an announcement on this matter be made soon?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have nothing to say as to that at this moment.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that wood scalers are primarily interested in quantities and amounts, is there any special significance to this announcement being made to the Quebec wood scalers association? Is the policy going to be that the estimates are going to be scaled either up or down?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

QUEBEC—STATEMENT AS TO FEDERAL PAYMENTS LAST YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked my colleague the Minister of Labour if during the course of last year unemployment assistance in federal funds had been paid to the province of Quebec in respect of unemployable persons not qualifying for unemployment insurance. Since this matter comes within the responsibility of my department, I might furnish the hon. member with the following answer.

No federal funds were paid to the province of Quebec on behalf of unemployable persons last year, since this province has not yet signed an agreement with the federal government under the Unemployment Assistance Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a supplementary question, may I ask the minister if there are agreements with all the other provinces?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PULPWOOD—INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Can the Minister of Justice inform the house if there have been any new developments with regard to the prosecutions in connection with the pulpwood price fixing practices of certain pulp and paper companies, as outlined in a report dated March 31, 1958 which was filed in this house on May 14 last?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I can advise him that the pulpwood case, as has been previously stated, has been referred to counsel in the province of Quebec for prosecution. I am advised that preparation is proceeding without delay. The combines branch has been given to understand also that the practices described in the report of the restrictive trade practices commission have been discontinued.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say whether counsel retained have had any previous experience in such prosecutions?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Fulton: I could not tell the hon. member whether or not they have had previous experience in this particular type of prosecution. They are experienced prosecution counsel, but I would have to find out whether or not they have ever been engaged in a combines case before this date.

HIGHWAYS

URANIUM CITY, SASK.—CONSTRUCTION AND ROUTE OF ACCESS ROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Can the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources say whether or not the projected road to Uranium City has been decided upon, what is the route of the road, and when construction will start? There seem to be conflicting reports.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The route of the road has been decided upon, Mr. Speaker, but the actual start on construction has not been made and I cannot inform the hon. member as to that. The agreement with the province of Saskatchewan is still not complete. There are some difficulties about the question of the financial formula.

Mr. Argue: In view of the great interest in this road, is the minister able to say now what route has been agreed upon?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The understanding I have with the minister of resources in Saskatchewan is that the announcement will be made simultaneously by both governments.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

National research council—

257. Salaries and other expenses, $22,660,729.

Mr. McIlraith: The estimates of the national research council have not been before the committee for slightly more than two years. In view of that fact, would the minister care to make a statement particularly advising us of any changes in the work of the research council, or any changes in policy affecting the research council?

Mr. Churchill: I have a short statement to make, Mr. Chairman. It is on its way down from my office. I expect to have it shortly and would ask my hon. friend just to wait for a minute.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you.

Mr. Churchill: I do not want to delay the committee while waiting for a document, Mr. Chairman. I thought I should like to make a short statement under three headings, namely what the federal government is doing with regard to research; some comments with regard to the laboratories of the national research council; then the problem of university support, concluding with mention of some highlights in the estimates themselves.

The national research council has three essential functions, namely the promotion and co-ordination of scientific research in Canada, the operation of laboratories, and the financial support of university research in science. The research carried on by the agencies of the Canadian government is of high quality, the facilities and conditions of work are good, and funds in considerable quantity are being provided for that purpose. It is estimated that when you consider all the money being expended for the purpose of research under federal government auspices it is approaching $140 million, which is a considerable sum for a country the size of Canada.

Sometimes expenditures of this nature are compared with those of other countries, and we naturally look to the United States to see what that country is doing along that line. The comparisons are of necessity rather rough, since accounting systems and definitions vary; but dealing with the subject of research for civilian purposes, I may say that Canada's showing is very good and shows, on a per capita basis, a figure slightly above that of the United States. But then when you add all the money that is being spent on research, adding military expenditures in the United States along with their civil expenditures for research you find, of course, that they vastly exceed those of Canada. The emphasis that is placed on military research in other countries such as Russia and the United Kingdom indicates also that they have very high expenditures for this purpose. Nevertheless, on the civilian side Canada's position is good, and it is expected that the continuing expansion of technology would require a continued expansion in government civilian research.

On the question of the laboratories, the laboratories of the national research council carry out fundamental and applied research in science and engineering which is of national importance and which is not being done elsewhere. The work is organized in eight scientific divisions in Ottawa and two regional laboratories at Halifax and Saskatoon. The laboratories have undergone a steady growth since 1939, when the staff was only about 300 until today, when in spite of having split off defence research and atomic energy the staff numbers 2353.

During this expansion every effort has been made to maintain a steady and effective expansion of the laboratories as manpower considerations permitted. This steady increase is being continued. On June 30, 1957, the staff numbered 2260, on August 11, 1958 it numbered 2353, and the estimates allow for a further expansion to 2422 by the end of the fiscal year. Further, this year's expansion is being concentrated on scientific staff, who number at present 647 and will be recruited, it is hoped, to 700 by the end of the fiscal year. There is nothing spectacular in the estimates for the laboratories, but they permit a steady and efficient expansion as in the past.

On the subject of university support, which is of general interest, recent events have emphasized the importance of an extended effort among the western countries in basic research in science and medicine. The universities are the major source of such research and are also the sole source of trained personnel for research of all kinds. In Canada the main financial support for university scientific research, as distinct from teaching, has for 40 years been the national research council. Sizeable contributions are made for special purposes by other government agencies, but all of these are considerably smaller than the support from the council itself.

I should not like to give the impression that the national research council is the only one which has done research in Canada, because the pioneering work in research was commenced by agriculture and mining in days gone by. Since that time the national research council and other government agencies have entered the field. While as I have said, sizeable contributions are made for special purposes by other government agencies, all of these are considerably smaller than the support from the council. Support from private agencies is smaller still. In view of the magnitude of the research council support and its 40 years of operation it can be claimed with considerable justification that the present status of Canadian science is largely due to financial support from the national research council.

The expansion of the universities, together with the desirability of scientific expansion in the western world, however, has made the financial problems of university scientific research very difficult. Recognizing this, the government decided to increase national research council support to universities by 70 per cent in the present estimates. This increase of $2½ million is by far the largest increase which has ever been made in the national research council budget for university support. This is a very substantial contribution and an obvious recognition of the need for the support of research within the universities.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister mind repeating that figure?

Mr. Churchill: The figure was $2½ million, representing an increase of 70 per cent. The committee might be interested in the figures for earlier years, which are as follows:

Year	Estimates for support of university research by national research council
1952-53	$1,630,000
1953-54	1,680,000
1954-55	1,910,000
1955-56	2,340,000
1956-57	2,985,000
1957-58	3,495,000

There is support from other sources for scientific research in the universities and when one lists, as can be done, the support given through the various other agencies of the government one finds that the total is close to $10 million a year now being given toward research in the universities. Increases will be necessary to maintain a program of this magnitude, and in future years the estimates will likely be enlarged, but we feel that this year's estimates make a major contribution to the development of Canadian university science.

To conclude this brief statement I will just draw attention to certain highlights in the estimates. It will be seen that there is a total increase of $4,858,153. Of this sum approximately $500,000 represents increased capital expenditure. It is expected that more progress will be made this year in completing projects on time. The increase in the operating vote is $4,344,568, and the main items in this increase are as follows: scholarships and grants for university research, $2,461,000—quite close to the $2½ million I mentioned—and salaries, $1,238,107. These two items thus account for $3.7 million out of a total increase of $4.3 million. The remaining $750,000 is made up of a large number of relatively small amounts.

Mr. Chairman, that is just a brief review of the major activities of the national research council, special emphasis being placed on the important part it is playing in supporting research in the universities of Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: Arising out of the last part of the minister's statement with particular reference to the increase of $2½ million to the universities, may I ask if that increase is being granted on the same basis as previous expenditures on that account, or has there been any change in the system?

Mr. Churchill: The same practice is being followed as in the past.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it from the minister's statement—and I hope he will correct me if I am not accurate—that the national research council is continuing the policy of the previous government. I also take it from his remarks that he shares the view concerning the work of the council that was expressed in the committee in 1956 when the estimates were last before it, an occasion when high praise of the council was expressed. He will recall that on that occasion two hon. gentlemen in the then opposition, the present Minister of Public Works and the present Minister of Veterans Affairs, spoke in praise of the work of the research council as it was conducted under the previous government. I take it that he shares that view and that there is no change in policy with respect to the research council.

I had the honour of heading the committees that looked into the work and activities of the research council since the end of the war and also the committees dealing with the operations of the atomic energy control board since that time. I must say I hold the view that the activities conducted by the government through the national research council were such as to commend themselves to hon. members on all sides of the house.

I must frankly admit I have always had a particularly favourable impression of the way they conducted their work in conjunction with the universities. Instead of drawing off manpower from the universities and in that way damaging them, they have sought to aid the work of the universities and have carried out that policy in different ways, through grants in aid of scholarships and fellowships. I believe the outstanding work done in the last number of years in that field has not had sufficient public acknowledgment or sufficient appreciation by hon. members, if I may speak for my colleagues in that respect.

At this stage of the session I do not have any further specific questions to ask about the estimates of the national research council. I merely want to encourage the minister to continue the activity of this body in the way in which it has been conducted in the past, and to seek to support and expand it as the development of the country goes on.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, if I may reply immediately to one or two of the points raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West, I would say I am very happy that he drew attention to the fact that the policy with regard to the national research council is a continuing one as to which there has been no political or party disagreement.

If in 1956 when these estimates were up I had been given an opportunity to speak on the subject I would myself have commended the council at that time and the policy followed by the government of that day. I have always had a very great interest in the matter of research, and in another legislative chamber I spoke at great length on the necessity for it. I welcome the hon. member's words of praise for the national research council. I continue to have, now in my present position, the same respect and admiration for the research council I had in the days when I was in the opposition.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, it is not easy to exaggerate the importance of the work of the national research council or the skill and devotion with which it has been conducted. One aspect that was mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa West which particularly interests me is the relationship of that work to the universities, and I wish to pay tribute to the intelligent way that has been carried out. There has been some uneasiness expressed in the United States over the fact that in some universities so much of the research work is now being conducted under government supervision or through government assistance that this may in the long run prejudice the independence of the universities. I am quite sure that this danger does not exist in this country.

I should like to ask the minister merely one question. I believe he mentioned $10 million as having been made available to the universities for research through the national research council. Could he inform the committee what proportion of the funds devoted to scientific research at the universities is now represented by government contributions of this kind?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the $10 million figure I mentioned included the contributions of all government departments, because the Department of Defence Production, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of National Health and Welfare contribute along with contributions from the atomic energy source, and other moneys are made available for research purposes in the universities. That is what raised the total to an approximate figure of $10 million. It is rather difficult to estimate. We do not have an accurate summation of the amount of money devoted by the universities themselves to this particular field.

Item agreed to.

Atomic energy control board—

48. Administration expenses of the atomic energy control board, $62,818.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the minister is going to make a statement on this important matter. If he is I will wait until he is finished before I say what I want to say.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you very much. I have a rather comprehensive statement to make on this topic, which is of major importance nowadays. I hope hon. members of the committee will bear with me for the next 15 minutes as I review the activities of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and indicate the objectives of that organization. The activities of that body may be considered in four general categories: (a) fundamental research (b) applied research (c) production and marketing of radioactive isotopes and (d) power reactor projects. I discussed the nature and objectives of these categories in my statement to parliament on February 1 last, and I would now like to bring that statement up to date and give a broad summary of each of these four categories of activities, dealing first with fundamental research.

The great developments in atomic energy during and since the war were based on a working capital of fundamental scientific knowledge built up earlier and especially during the 1930's. Our debt to Ernest Rutherford and to the scientists of several nations who followed him in exploring the physics of the atomic nucleus is one which can never be overemphasized. The present worldwide development of atomic energy is still drawing on that original capital of fundamental knowledge, and it is incumbent upon us to try to add to it to the extent that our resources permit.

Chalk River has lived up to its obligations in this regard. From the early days Canadian fundamental research has been held in high international esteem. At present Chalk River is pioneering in a number of new fields, and as an example I would mention the theoretical studies by one of the Chalk River physicists on the thermonuclear reactions that occur in stars. This work, which has attracted considerable attention, is leading to a better understanding of nuclear processes and has been made possible through the use of the electronic computer installed at Chalk River in 1956.

In the early days it was often possible to carry out fundamental nuclear research with very simple equipment. However, as the science has steadily become more complex it has been necessary to turn to increasingly powerful tools. The NRX reactor and a Van de Graaf machine have been the main tools of fundamental research at Chalk River over the past decade. To ensure continued progress it has been necessary to add new equipment. A very precise beta-ray spectrometer has recently been brought into operation; a new high energy Van de Graaf is under construction, as well as special facilities for the study of the changes occurring in metals during irradiation.

But the most important of the new tools is the NRU reactor, which makes possible many experiments which hitherto could not be performed. In many of its facilities NRU is unequalled by any other reactor in the world and provides unique opportunities to Canadian fundamental research.

Fundamental research also has other uses. It is an extremely effective training ground for young men who in later years will turn to applied research and the exploitation of scientific knowledge. The applied research program at Chalk River has to a large extent depended on the contributions of men who began their careers in fundamental research. Another bypath of a healthy fundamental research program is that it tends to leaven the whole of the activities of an establishment like that at Chalk River. Daily contact with colleagues engaged in truly creative work acts as a stimulant to those involved in the applied research and development programs and contributes markedly to the rate of progress achieved. Canada's position as one of the leading atomic powers will be maintained only so long as we are prepared to devote some of our resources to the kind of research that lays the foundations on which all practical developments are based.

Applied research at Chalk River is mainly concerned with the translation of fundamental knowledge into sound reactor technology. Nuclear engineering brings together a wide variety of different disciplines. Complex electronic instruments are needed; the chemical and corrosive properties of the various liquids in a reactor system must be carefully controlled; radiation hazards must be thoroughly understood and the engineering design adjusted to minimize them; new fields in structural and mechanical engineering are opened up by the employment of novel materials; for example the metal zirconium, about which very little was known 10 years ago.

While all these problems are receiving attention in the applied research program at Chalk River, the largest effort is devoted to two problems that will have a decisive effect on our efforts to achieve economic nuclear power. The first of these is the improvement of uranium fuel elements, the second is the design of more efficient arrangements for the reactor core.

The heat contained in a ton of natural uranium is equivalent to the heat contained in 2,700,000 tons of coal. It is this basic fact which has given to atomic energy its great significance as a new source of fuel for power plants. But how much of the heat contained in a ton of uranium fuel can one release and use? Obviously the more use one can obtain the more efficient the reactor will be and the more likely it is that the electricity produced will be economic. Therefore the design, fabrication and testing of uranium fuel systems is an essential part of the applied research program.

The testing of such systems is carried out in the NRX and NRU reactors, where it is possible to simulate the conditions that will prevail in a nuclear power station. The testing is done in equipment known as "loops" which pass through the heart of the reactor. There are six such loops working continuously in NRX, which in effect are six separate reactors using different materials of construction, different coolants and different fuels operating under a variety of conditions. New loops in NRU will permit further engineering studies of various power reactor systems, including those cooled by gas as well as those cooled by liquids. New metallurgical laboratories under construction will be important for the examination of experimental fuel elements after removal from the loops as well as for fundamental research. Many of the studies in loops are carried out in co-operation with the United States atomic energy commission and the United Kingdom atomic energy authority.

The efficiency of a reactor depends to a large degree on the design of its core. The design of a reactor core requires careful calculation and experiment, since its behaviour depends critically on the size, shape and arrangement of the fuel and other components that are contained in it. Reactor cores are studied in the ZEEP reactor. The letters stand for zero energy experimental pile, which first came into operation in 1945, when it was one of the first reactors in the world. ZEEP was used to work out the best arrangement for the core of NRX, and when NRU was designed ZEEP was used to find the best arrangement for that reactor, too. It has recently been remodelled and is now being used to work out arrangements for our proposed power reactors.

However, as these reactors will be considerably larger than ZEEP itself, only part of a core can be studied at one time. It is therefore proposed to build a new, large ZEEP so the complete core of a power reactor can be specified precisely and costly margins need not be left to cover unknown factors.

Another new reactor, the PTR, the pool test reactor, is in use for related experiments. In these one determines just how much a piece of fuel will contribute to the reaction. This reactor is unique in that it was designed especially for the purpose and can measure pieces of fuel at intervals during their service in other reactors. With ZEEP, the new large ZEEP and PTR, Chalk River will be well equipped to obtain the precise information required to design cores for future economic power reactors.

Applied search in the use of plutonium as a reactor fuel has been pursued to the point where Canada has a leading position in this field. In addition, applied research at Chalk River indicates what appear to be economic methods of disposing of radioactive wastes.

For many years considerations of security kept secret much of the fundamental and virtually all of the applied research at Chalk River. Fortunately in recent years it has become possible to remove these restrictions, and the work of the research scientists is now freely published and discussed. Much of it has recently been reviewed and has been recorded for presentation at the second conference on the peaceful uses of atomic energy organized under the United Nations at Geneva, which I believe is now in progress.

On the subject of production and marketing of radioactive isotopes, the commercial products division of AECL was established to develop markets for radioisotopes produced in the Chalk River reactors. This work involves processing and selling, but in addition a considerable amount of applied development and design of accessory equipment must be done in order to develop uses and maintain markets. The already wide application of isotopes in many branches of industry, agriculture, research and medicine is expanding and will no doubt continue to expand. The volume of business of this division has steadily increased to where it is now levelling out at about $2,500,000 per year. There has been a very marked increase in the curie quantities of radioactive material produced; for example, 94,000 curies were shipped in 1956 and 196,000 curies in 1957.

The principal source of revenue continues to be cobalt 60 and cobalt 60 beam therapy machines. Four models of these machines are available on a production basis, and one other is ready for production. About 115 machines have been installed in 20 countries. Since about 85 per cent of the business is export, and in a highly competitive market, world trade conditions and the premium value of the Canadian dollar are having their effect in limiting the volume of sales.

This division operates as a separate accounting unit and tries to break even on its operations. It continues to have a relatively large program of development, with special emphasis on the use of radioisotopes. From 15 to 20 per cent of total revenues are invested in development work, which is considerably more than is normal in a purely commercial operation. In spite of this the cumulative loss of the division since 1952 has been held to $54,000.

I now deal with power reactor projects. This is a field in which the experience with atomic energy leads to its practical application in the development of power. It has been established for many years that electric power can be produced from a nuclear plant, but it is also recognized in all nuclear power programs that the economics of nuclear power can only be demonstrated by designing, engineering, constructing and operating nuclear power stations. It is because of this fact that it has become the practice to refer to the first round of power reactors now in operation or under construction as demonstration power reactors. Examples are the Calder Hall station in the United Kingdom, the PWR station in the United States, the G-2 and G-3 stations in France and our own NPD reactor in Canada.

While the fuel costs in a nuclear power station will be lower than the fuel costs in conventional thermal stations, the capital cost of nuclear power stations will be higher. The capital cost of the first round of demonstration power reactors will range fom $600 per kilowatt to $1,000 per kilowatt. This cost must be reduced very greatly—an acceptable target would be a cost between $250 and $300 per kilowatt—if the benefits of lower fuel costs are not to be offset by excessive capital charges. The reduction of capital costs is primarily a task for the engineer and the manufacturer. Major engineering development work will be required before acceptable designs and manufacturing specifications can be produced.

Canada has two power reactor projects under way, the design and construction of a demonstration power reactor, the NPD, which will have an output of 20,000 kilowatts electric, and a design study for a power reactor with an output of 200,000 kilowatts electric. Both these projects are directed toward the development of a power reactor technology based on the use of natural uranium as fuel and heavy water as moderator, the technology which Canada pioneered with the NRX reactor.

NPD, the small reactor now under construction, is a co-operative effort of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the Canadian General Electric Company and the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario. The design studies for a larger power reactor started with the work of a small group of engineers drawn from various Canadian utilities and other companies working in collaboration with A.E.C.L. staff at Chalk River.

The first report on the large reactor design study became available early in 1957. This report introduced for the first time a highly attractive design that, with development, offered excellent promise of producing power in a public utility at a cost of not more than 6 mills per kilowatt hour. In certain important respects this design was unlike that of the NPD reactor. It called for the use of horizontal pressure tubes for the containment of the pressure system including the fuel elements, in place of the single pressure vessel specified for the NPD reactor. This substitution of pressure tubes for a pressure vessel would remove one of the major problems incidental to the design and manufacture of a large nuclear power station using natural uranium as a fuel. An ingenious and very simple method of fuel loading and unloading was also proposed that almost doubles the yield of energy and therefore avoids the need of chemically processing the highly radioactive spent fuel. This was a decided improvement on the method to be used in the NPD reactor.

It was therefore decided that the work on the earlier design and on the construction of the NPD reactor should be suspended, and that a redesign should be prepared which would incorporate these new features. This redesign has been carried out by the Canadian General Electric Company in co-operation with Chalk River and the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario. While the redesign has delayed the completion of this demonstration unit, now known as NPD2, it is considered that such a delay is well warranted, as it may now be considered as a prototype of a large reactor. The present design has been thoroughly evaluated, and the Chalk River staff are particularly pleased with the results and are confident that the basic design will stand comparison with any other in the world. Work has recommenced at the site near the Des Joachims power station, and the scheduled completion date of mid-1961 seems very realistic.

As I mentioned in my statement on February 1, the report of the preliminary design study for the large reactor recommended a broad program of engineering development, since such a program is essential to the proving of the engineering feasibility of the conceptual design and the establishment of a reliable estimate of costs for a power reactor with an output of 200,000 kilowatts electric. A part of this development program will be undertaken in connection with the NPD2 reactor. However, the remainder of the proposed development work will have to be carried out independently of the NPD2 project.

It was therefore decided to establish a new division of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited in Toronto, to be known as the nuclear power plant division, which has the responsibility of directing the program for the large reactor project and co-ordinating the NPD2 project. Bearing in mind the desirability of carrying on the program in a manner which will provide for the fullest participation of the utilities and the manufacturers, the major portion of the development work will be done by contract, and it is proposed that the staff for the new division be recruited to the fullest extent possible from the utilities and manufacturers. Some manufacturers, consultants and utilities have already assigned staff to the office in Toronto. The Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario is contributing 15 engineers and is making available at no cost to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited office space in Toronto for the new division.

Although the fundamental research, applied research and nuclear power programs of A.E.C.L. have been discussed separately, they may be said to have the following common objectives:

(a) To contribute to the development of economic nuclear power in order that nuclear power may be available for use in Canada and other parts of the world where a new source of energy is required to supplement conventional sources, and to make this contribution in a manner which will provide for the most effective participation of the utilities and the manufacturers.

(b) To expand the civil market, both domestic and foreign, for Canadian uranium.

As I stated on February 1, the net cost of A.E.C.L.'s entire program, including A.E.C.L.'s share of NPD2 and the large power reactor development program, will be $140 million spread over four years. The estimates for this fiscal year total $27.7 million. Approximately $22.7 million is for the Chalk River program, with $5 million assigned to the nuclear power plant division and NPD2.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee will have heard with interest the statement of the minister dealing with this very important matter. Indeed, it is difficult to contemplate any question that could come before parliament which would be more important than the question of atomic energy, which will have such a far reaching influence on our future and, indeed, may determine whether we have any future at all in this world. It is of some coincidental interest to realize that this subject has been brought up here at the beginning of the second conference at Geneva on the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.

Canada, as I think the minister mentioned at the beginning of his statement, has been a pioneer in the development of the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes along with the United States and the United Kingdom. I think that over the years we have had a fine record of accomplishment in this field due largely, of course, to the skill of the scientists to whom we owe so much in the development of this new form of energy and due also in part, I think, to the backing they have been given by the Canadian government. We also owe a lot, of course, to the co-operation we have had with the countries I have just mentioned. Our record in this field is not merely one of national progress but one of good and fruitful international co-operation.

It is interesting to recall that from the very beginning of the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes during the war Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom have worked together in the closest kind of three-power co-operation. In those days at the beginning and right up to the time I ceased having anything to do with this matter in an official way the exchange of information was always on a three-power basis. The combined policy committee in Washington which dealt with atomic energy matters was a committee that consisted of representatives of the three countries.

I hope Canada will be able to maintain that position of equality, at least equality in regard to the exchange of information and co-operation in this field with the other two countries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not really qualified in any way, shape or form to go into the scientific aspects of this matter. I confess even that there were some parts of the minister's statement that I was not able to understand as an expert would. But I did realize from his statement that in this country we are continuing to make encouraging progress in this field. I do have, perhaps, a greater understanding of the political, economic and even strategic consequences of the work that is going on. I should like for a moment to say something about the sources of atomic energy which we are fortunate enough to possess in Canada and without which we would not be able to conduct this work. I am referring, of course, to our resources of uranium which are, at the present time at least, the source of the energy in question.

I am informed that at the moment the estimated resources of uranium ore in Canada amount to 334,100,000 tons, which is 100 million tons more than that made in 1956. It is not, of course, all being developed because the uranium mining industry has grown by leaps and bounds, but the development has already begun. Uranium production in Canada in 1957 amounted to $150 million, of which we exported $127 million. In the first six months of 1958 we exported, according to the official figures, $115 million worth of uranium to the United States, which is the market for the great majority of this product, whereas in the first six months of 1957 we exported to that market only $45 million. This shows what has happened to this industry in a very short time. It is now an industry in which more than $400 million is invested in this country, and uranium will very soon be our mineral of greatest export value.

The centre of this development at the present time, the most important area, is the Blind River and Elliot Lake area. It is perhaps, at the moment, the most important uranium producing area in the world. It is a centre where, in the words of the Ottawa Journal of a few weeks ago, uranium has built a modern community, as rich and confident as any in North America.

Not long ago this government ended the government monopoly in the buying and selling of uranium, and I think that was a sensible and wise decision to make. It is now possible for uranium to be exported by producers, at least in small quantities up to 2,500 pounds, under the present regulations.

I think that was a good move to make. It is of course, as the minister will agree very necessary to keep the export of this product under control. I think the government is wise in following an arrangement which had been laid down previously, that export could only be to the countries with which we have agreements. But within the boundaries of this control, for obvious reasons which I need not go into, it is of the greatest possible importance for the development of atomic energy in Canada that we seek and find markets for this commodity abroad, and that we should not have to rely any more than is necessary—it is certainly necessary at the present time—on selling to the United States.

I realize that efforts have been made by the government in this direction, and that markets have been found in the United Kingdom and are being sought in Japan, Switzerland and Germany. It seems to me that a very important market might be developed in Germany. I was a little disappointed to read in the Montreal Gazette a Canadian Press story dated September 1 to the effect that West Germany appears to have lost interest, at least for the present, in the purchase of Canadian uranium. The story goes on, and the minister perhaps has seen it:

> Last May 21 Germany signed a contract for the purchase of Canadian uranium, and thus became the first friendly country other than Britain and the United States, to do so.
> However, the contract was for the purchase of only about 15 tons of the atomic metal. It was described by government officials as a trial order, expected to be followed by a larger order for 500 tons.
> Now, government officials say there have been no active negotiations for a 500-ton contract.

I hope we can press ahead with this German contract, and indeed other contracts, because as I have already said it is extremely important to diversify our market for this product, especially in view of the fact that the present contract which we have with the United States comes to an end in 1962.

There is another difficulty which is looming up in respect to the marketing of this product, which is essential for atomic energy, a difficulty which I know the minister appreciates; that is that there is now going to be increasing competition with the United States in this field. There is not now, if I can believe some of the reports I have read, the same incentive for discovery and development of uranium as there was a year or two ago, because there are indications that at the present time the supply is in excess of the demand. In that connection I was very interested to read what Dr. Lewis, who I take it is heading our delegation to the Geneva conference, had to say as reported in the press on August 31 when he arrived in Geneva. This is a United Press report. It begins:

> A top atomic scientist said today the heyday of the strike it rich uranium prospector was over—at least for 15 or 20 years.
> Dr. W. B. Lewis of Canada made the forecast—
> He said uranium was available in such surplus that, short of discovering an excessively rich vein of the strategic metal, there were no more fortunes to be made by uranium prospecting—
> "For the moment, however, the uranium prospector has had his day," Dr. Lewis added.

I would be glad if the minister could comment on that report, which undoubtedly was received with great interest by the uranium industry of this country. Some credence was given to that view in an article in the New York Times some time ago, under the heading "Uranium Plentiful, U.S. Limits Output." An atomic energy commission spokesman said on that date, October 29, 1957, according to this report, that uranium is now so plentiful it no longer is in the interest of the government to expand production of uranium concentrate.

Then this spokesman of the United States government went on to say that continuing major explorations should be conducted. The thing that worries one is that if in fact there is enough uranium for our immediate use and if the United States authorities admit that, but at the same time are encouraging the effort in the United States for further exploration, discovery and production of uranium, this is going to be an overhanging threat to our own industry. It underlines, if it needs underlining, the desirability of the closest kind of Canada-United States co-operation not only in the field of scientific progress such as that which the minister dealt with in his statement but in the field of materials development and materials planning; the kind of planning of raw materials production which we had, in fact, during the war.

It seems to me that such planning could with advantage be applied to the production and development of this new source of energy so we shall not find ourselves in the same position as that in which we have found ourselves in this country on so many occasions in the past in connection with metals and minerals development. When there is a shortage in the United States, as there was of uranium a few years ago, they come to Canada on bended knee and ask us to do everything we can to increase production. Then they find new sources of material or metal or mineral in the United States and we are left, if I may use a colloquialism, holding the bag. I certainly hope that will not happen in the field of uranium production.

The minister referred in his statement to the United Kingdom market; and that market, of course, is of growing importance to us in this field because the United Kingdom has made, I suppose, greater progress in the development of atomic energy for power purposes, than even the United States. Under their plans there will be 12 atomic power plants in operation in the United Kingdom by 1965. That constitutes, of course, an important and growing market for our uranium.

The minister made some interesting references to the progress that has been made at Chalk River in the development of a power reactor, and the progress we have made there in this matter and in power reactor technology generally under the direction of the atomic energy board of Canada. This is an important encouraging development. One of the encouraging features of it is that it has been a co-operative development within the country among governmental agencies like the provincial hydro commission, and private industry. The minister stated—and I do not think anyone will have any quarrel with this statement—that the government is allocating $140 million, which I think is the figure he used, spread over four years for this work. That may seem to be a large sum of money, but I feel sure that it is not too large in view of the importance of the development itself. Perhaps it does not seem so large when you relate it to the fact that it now costs about $100 million in the United States to build one atomic submarine. Perhaps as a result of this progress before long atomic power in Canada may become competitive with other sources of energy.

The Northern Miner in an edition of June 26 of this year had an extremely interesting report on this matter. In this issue of Northern Miner a statement was printed by Dr. Lewis, whom I have already quoted this morning. Dr. Lewis stated:

"We feel we have reached an objective of years of research and can now design a nuclear power plant to generate electric power at 6 mills a kilowatt hour."—

I think that was the figure the minister himself mentioned. Dr. Lewis went on to say:

But we are not stopping at just beating coal at $8 a ton—

There are some members of this house who will not get a great deal of satisfaction out of the prospect of beating coal as a source of energy, but this is Dr. Lewis' prediction:

But we are not stopping at just beating coal at $8 a ton . . . We fully expect to go beyond that in power-cost cutting, which would accelerate the building of nuclear power plants not only in Canada, but in the United States and other countries.

We have always appreciated the impact the successful development of nuclear power would have on uranium-rich Canada. It would establish a broad civilian use for uranium and consequently cheap nuclear power has been a foremost objective of research at Chalk River and will likely continue to be for years to come.

The minister this morning gave us some evidence which showed that this objective certainly has not been lost sight of. But while that is a very encouraging report from one of the men in the scientific and development field and probably most concerned with this whole matter, I noticed a month or so ago a Canadian Press dispatch quoting an atomic energy engineer and scientist from an outside country. I refer to Dr. Arms of Great Britain, who said:

—electricity produced by nuclear power plants would cost 55 per cent more for construction in Canada than in Britain.

Then he went on to say this, according to this report:

He could see no reason why operating costs of a nuclear plant should be significantly different from operating costs of a conventional thermal plant in Canada. Fuel costs should not be higher in Canada than in the U.K. except for the relatively small cost of freight and insurance.

But according to his calculation that cost at the present time was a very great deal higher. If we are going to continue to progress, and if we are to realize the objective which Dr. Lewis mentioned in the statement I have read, we shall certainly have to cut down our costs of nuclear reactors.

Then there has been an interesting development in the United States in this field which I do not think the minister mentioned in his statement and which certainly has Canadian implications. That is the development—I think I have already mentioned this in the house—in the United States of what is called the Argonne low power reactor. This is a reactor which promises to be extremely important especially in Arctic territories—the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources mentioned this in his statement a few weeks ago—it is a small reactor with great power. Demountable; it weighs only ten tons, I am told. These are considerations which make it suitable as a portable power plant in remote areas. This United States portable atomic plant, according to the report I read from the United States, has been designed for Arctic operations for the reasons I have indicated, and particularly for operation in the D.E.W. line. However, this particular atomic plant is operated not by natural uranium but by enriched uranium which, I take it, in non-scientific terms is a kind of high octane uranium.

If that is the case then that would, under present conditions, give the United States a monopoly of these plants because I believe I am right in saying that we do not ourselves produce enriched uranium. I therefore ask the minister whether we could not in this country—and perhaps this is being considered; perhaps progress has been made in it—design a kind of portable atomic power plant of the type of the Argonne reactor which we could manufacture in this country as it would be designed to be operated by natural fuel. Otherwise we would be dependent on the United States for this kind of thing unless we made our own enriched fuel.

I am wondering whether we should not at this time take up with the United States in a very insistent way the question of D.E.W. line equipment of this kind, and urge that D.E.W. line or Arctic equipment to be used in Canada by the United States should be of a kind which would permit a later take over and Canadian operation; of a kind which we could ultimately develop and manufacture in our own country. This might be of importance in the Arctic far beyond the D.E.W. line itself.

In this connection the minister of northern affairs said on August 14 in a discussion we had on northern matters, as reported at page 3513 of Hansard:

> A package atomic power station developed by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited especially for such northern stations is expected to be built at the site—

He was talking about Frobisher Bay.

> —although it will be coupled with diesel generated power source until day to day operation bugs are ironed out.

And then the minister is reported as having said:

> We have such a station ready now but it is being run by scientists. We want to be sure it can be operated by ordinary technicians—perhaps Eskimos—before we use it as a single power source.

It would be unfortunate, I think, if we developed that single power source for Arctic use of a type suitable for us while the Americans developed the kind of power source to which I have referred for use in the north in stations to be operated by Americans a type which we could not take over and operate ourselves. I ask the minister when he replies to say something about this.

I have detained the committee for quite a considerable time, but I do not think it is necessary to apologize in view of the importance of the subject we are discussing. I shall conclude by saying that we on this side are satisfied with the minister's report, which indicates that we are making steady progress in this important field.

Mr. McIlraith: I hope the minister can reply to the wider issues which were raised by my leader, but in the meantime there are some other questions I should like to ask. The minister did not deal specifically in his remarks with the NRU reactor, and I wonder if he would tell us something about the temporary shut-down of that plant, whether it is to resume operation, and so on.

Next, I wonder if he would advise us of the progress being made in providing a reactor for India, which I understand is to be similar in general type to the NRX reactor. It was to have been made available under the Colombo plan, I believe, by the former government. In any event it is being continued in the program.

I would also ask the minister to tell us if there have been any changes in the personnel of the atomic energy control board as indicated in the annual report of that board for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958, which was tabled on June 30. The members of the board listed in that annual report were Dr. Mackenzie, president, Mr. Bateman, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Gagnon and Dr. Steacie, members of the board. I wonder, also, whether the minister would indicate any changes in the personnel of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited whose annual report was tabled on July 15 and whose officials, as of March 31, 1958 are named on the front page of that report. Perhaps I can leave my other questions until later, when I have received a reply from the minister.

Mr. Churchill: I am sure hon. members of the committee listened with a great deal of interest to the constructive remarks by the Leader of the Opposition, who has had considerable experience in this field in its application to affairs abroad and the implications of the use of atomic energy internationally.

I am not sure I can answer some of the questions he raised with regard to various matters and statements by various people—for example, the statement that the uranium prospector has had his day. I am not too sure about that, because while very large quantities of uranium have been discovered in various parts of the world, there are nevertheless different grades of uranium, and a prospector still has an opportunity to locate high grade ore which would, of course, be better than ore of a low grade.

I was particularly interested in the hon. gentleman's remarks about the necessity for close co-operation between the United States and Canada with respect to materiel planning. Obviously if either country overemphasizes the production of lower grade material, that would not be conducive to the long range objectives of the development of atomic energy and, moreover, we could get into difficulties with regard to overproduction. The link between Canada and the United States in the whole field of atomic energy has, of course, been quite close from the very beginning, and we keep in contact with our friends down there.

The Leader of the Opposition drew attention to a statement originating in the United Kingdom with regard to the cost of construction of atomic plants in Canada, suggesting it was unusually high compared with the United Kingdom standards. That would require examination, and I do not have the facts in front of me with regard to it at the moment. The objective is, of course, as has been stated, to arrive at lower capital costs so the target figure of 6 cents per kilowatt can be reached.

On the subject of a lower-power reactor, the Argonne, using enriched uranium, the Leader of the Opposition made some pertinent remarks. We are interested in developing reactors that can be used in isolated areas and in the north country, but we feel that natural uranium might well be used as a fuel. Studies are being considered regarding these reactors of lesser power. The enriched uranium program followed by the United States is of course an extraordinarily expensive program. Though we are now spending millions of dollars on research and development, we cannot perhaps match all the expenditure that can be made by a country as large and as wealthy as the United States.

However, with the exchange of scientific knowledge we benefit from the things they do as they do from the things we accomplish. Whether or not they might have a monopoly with regard to this particular type of atomic plant will have to be determined later on, as experiments continue. It does not necessarily follow that an atomic reactor using enriched uranium will produce lower cost power than one with natural uranium and a heavy water coolant such as is being developed in Canada. Canada has played a prominent part in this scientific investigation.

I would like to examine some of the other matters raised in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and perhaps convey to him later the information which is not readily at hand with regard to some of these problems as, for example, his interest in the reaction of West Germany toward contracts for uranium from Canada. I would want to examine that question and determine the state of negotiations.

The hon. member for Ottawa West asked about the NRU reactor. This went out of action on May 24 this year. That was caused by failure of one of the fuel elements where the aluminum sheath was not bonded to the uranium. As the damaged fuel element was being removed part of it fell and caught fire on top of the reactor, causing radioactive contamination to a certain extent throughout the building. But the building and equipment have been completely decontaminated, and the personnel at Chalk River with the assistance of personnel from the armed services conducted that work. There are about 160 rods to replace within the reactor and only a few of them can be removed each day, so the reactor will not be operating at its full power of 200,000 kilowatts before early October. That is the situation with regard to the NRU reactor.

The reactor for India which is being built under the Colombo plan is reaching completion and should be ready for operation in 1959. It is coming along very well. Officials of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited have visited the plant from time to time during the last two years and have been keeping a very close eye on the work that is going on there, so perhaps a year from now that atomic plant will be in operation and will make its contribution to research and development there as our own plants are doing here in Canada.

The hon. member mentioned the atomic energy control board and the changes in personnel there. Mr. Bennett and Mr. Bateman resigned from the control board. It now consists of Doctor Mackenzie, Doctor Steacie, Doctor Gagnon, Mr. Gilchrist of Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, now president of that firm, and Mr. Gray, the president of Atomic Energy. They comprise the board.

With regard to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the directors are as follows: Mr. Gray, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Duncan, Mr. Gaherty, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Hearn, Mr. O'Sullivan, Mr. Stephens, and Mr. Wallace. Resignations were received from Mr. Bennett, Mr. Ambridge, Mr. Masseu and Mr. Scully.

Before concluding my remarks on this very important topic I should like to pay my tribute to the members of the atomic energy control board and the personnel of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for the very fine co-operation they have shown during the time I have been occupying this position. I have received nothing but the finest co-operation from them. They have relayed to me a great deal of information, and although experts in their fields and some of them very distinguished scientists they have very patiently explained the intricacies of atomic energy to a layman, and for that I am extremely grateful.

I had the opportunity last year of visiting Chalk River and seeing the plants in operation there and meeting the scientists who are doing such excellent work. I believe the program Canada embarked on some years ago and is now vigorously pursuing is really very much worth while. Canada is keeping well in the forefront of atomic energy research. We are training Canadians in this field. Their work is on a basis comparable with that of scientists in other countries. Our development work in these reactors at Chalk River and our projects for the power reactors have attracted the attention of scientists throughout the world.

It is sometimes not realized that there is a constant exchange of scientists in this nuclear field. Some of our people may be found in the United States and the United Kingdom, and representatives of those countries are here in Canada, exchanging information and learning on the spot new developments in each of these countries.

Our people are making a distinguished contribution in the presentation of scientific papers to the meetings of learned societies dealing with the problems of nuclear physics. All told, this program has developed in Canada a body of scientists expert in the nuclear field, and as our power reactor program continues the engineering and manufacturing sides will similarly in their turn develop skilled personnel so we will be in a position to compete satisfactorily with other countries when it comes to the construction and eventually the export of machinery or the type of building that is required for an atomic reactor.

With our large supplies of uranium in Canada we want to play an active part in the supplying of uranium to countries which in time will be requiring power reactors. None of this could be done without the basic work of Canadian scientists and the application of their knowledge to reactors such as the NRU and the NRX and these power reactors which are envisaged. Then in cooperation with that application we have the very good work being done by the engineers and manufacturers, who have gained a great deal of knowledge from their activities at Chalk River. I think, by and large, we may consider that Canada is making an eminently satisfactory contribution in the field of atomic energy.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to hear the minister speak in this way about the work being done by the scientists and technicians in this program and also the extremely important work being done by the engineers and manufacturers. I am sure he will not mind my expressing a personal thought. Having been associated in a small way with this program through the former minister, Right Hon. C. D. Howe, when these projects were being developed between 1945 and 1953, I am keenly interested in the program.

Personally I have a very keen appreciation of the work of that great engineer, and I am sure the members of the government will take no political offence at what I am saying in that respect. I have the most profound respect, admiration and loyalty, of course, for that friend whom I regard as a great Canadian and a great minister of the crown, but the point I wanted to bring out was his great work as an engineer in understanding this type of problem, pressing it forward and being able to organize and reconcile the work of the scientists, the engineers and the government.

I have a suggestion I would like to commend to the minister and the leader of the house, for their consideration, and I shall try to express it very briefly. Recognizing the importance of the Canadian government continuing to press forward the activities of government in the research field for peaceful uses of atomic energy, I am going to venture to ask the government whether they would consider setting up a committee to examine into this subject next session. I think perhaps the best evidence of the value of such examination is the volume of evidence taken by previous committees. The volumes of evidence put out by the committee are equal to about the volumes of three weeks' Hansards of this house. Well, it is obviously impossible on the discussion of the estimates to take three weeks of the house's time to go into the subject, yet I feel the subject is of such paramount importance that it should receive that kind of treatment.

I am one of those who hold the view that there are already too many committees sitting, and the retort could immediately be made that here I am asking for another one. I would suggest that an examination be made of the problem from the point of view of leaving the activities of one of the present active committees in abeyance for the year to permit the setting up of a committee to examine into this subject instead of into one or other of the matters considered by the committees during the current session. With these words I will close any general remarks I have on the subject.

Item agreed to.

692. To amend vote No. 786, of the Appropriation Act No. 4, 1951 by deleting therefrom the words "at a salary of $12,000," and substituting therefor the words "at such salary rate as the governor in council determines, but not exceeding $16,500", $1.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to say something very briefly on this and the next item. Perhaps I can discuss them together. This item, I take it, has to do with the appointment of a new assistant deputy or associate deputy minister, as the case may be. Will the minister very briefly explain this item, and then the next item, which has to do with commodities services. The item reads:

Further amount required including expenses of the small business branch, $30,000.

Am I right in assuming that this item is for the small business branch of the department?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that is right.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to make one brief comment. In the throne speech we were led to believe that there was to be some new activity of government on behalf of small business. It was in the same careful language usually used in a throne speech, but from the reference many of us assumed that some major activity on behalf of small business was being undertaken.

Here I want to interject a note of criticism of the government for having come forward on May 12 with that subject matter in the throne speech, and now we find that all that is contemplated is a gross expenditure of $30,000. It must be borne in mind that this includes such things as travelling expenses and very limited personnel. Really it is something that should not have been mentioned. It is merely an administrative matter within the department and should not have been in the throne speech. In other words, the language in the throne speech indicates one type of action, but the action taken by the government is merely an administrative action that is more or less routine in any department at any time in the administration of departmental business. In my view the government is subject to criticism and censure for having made the official pronouncement in the throne speech and then coming forward with no action in keeping with the pronouncement.

Mr. Pearson: May I say one word. I do not think the $30,000 item justifies the $30 million build-up.

Mr. Argue: I am keenly disappointed with the step the government has now taken in the light of all the soundings of trumpets and the $30 million build-up for this tiny and insignificant item. This may not be a question of much ado about nothing, but there has been much to do about very little. This will be something of a shock to the small business people of this country who were looking to the government for action in a very real way on this very important question. I wonder whether you would call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister like to continue for 15 minutes?

Mr. Churchill: Unless there is extended discussion, what I have to say would take not more than five minutes.

Mr. Argue: I thought I would break into my own speech by calling it one o'clock, and I shall continue my remarks at 2.30.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, at one o'clock I was saying that the small business community will be exceedingly disappointed with the item we are now discussing. Of course there is nothing wrong or bad about the item itself but it is so trivial in relation to the many promises made by the government to come to the assistance of small business in this country. I have in my hand a report that appeared in the Charlottetown Guardian of February 28, 1958. It reports a speech made by the Prime Minister and reads as follows:

> He announced that if his government is re-elected, it is their intention at the first session of parliament to give consideration to a system whereby small business may be able to expand on reasonable terms, and have available to it a system of financing which is being considered to enable small business to meet its responsibility in expanding and assuring extra jobs. A community will continue to prosper and expand if small business expands, he said.

Where are the loans? Where is the system of credit in the item now under discussion? This is surely a very trivial and inconsequential item in comparison with the broad system of credit for small business promised by the government. The Prime Minister made speeches in many other places reiterating the same statement I have quoted from the Charlottetown Guardian. Small businessmen are very much in need of credit facilities at reasonable rates of interest. Over the years the federal government, including both Liberal and Conservative administrations has made available and continued a system of bank credits for farmers by way of guaranteed loans, guaranteed loans to fishermen and loans under the National Housing Act, but one of the very important gaps and omissions is the whole field of small business credit.

The average small businessman is not able to obtain long term credit at reasonable rates of interest. The banks cannot or do not provide credit on a long term mortgage basis. Banks will provide credit only for a short period. A businessman who needs short term credit of a few months duration to stock his store is very likely able to get that type of credit from a bank but if he needs long term credit to renovate his store or to build new premises or expand it is not readily available.

A couple of years ago we had a witness before the banking and commerce committee of the house from the hotel association of Ontario. He said that if hotel proprietors in Ontario wished to obtain money for expansion they had to pay an interest rate in excess of 14 per cent. I know of many businessmen who in order to stock their stores and provide facilities and equipment have had to go to finance companies, and borrow at rates of interest from 15 to 20 per cent per annum. The small businessman is not able to get credit in the same way a large business or corporation can. A very large incorporated business can obtain money on the money markets. It can float debentures and obtain credit at reasonable rates. The small businessman is not able to do this. Yet in a given community it is very often the small businessman who provides credit to his customers on a short term basis without interest. He does this in competition with big business firms which are able to obtain credit for the purposes of their businesses at very low rates of interest but, when they provide credit to their customers on instalment purchases, charge interest rates of 15, 20 or 30 per cent per annum or more.

Therefore the small businessman is caught two ways. He is not able to obtain credit at reasonable rates of interest and he has to compete price-wise with big retail firms that charge enormous interest rates on instalment purchases by their customers. Because of the interest charges and the subsequent huge profits that flow to these companies therefrom they are often able to undersell the small businessman.

During this session we in the C.C.F. have made a special study of the needs of the small businessman. From time to time throughout the session members of our party have advocated measures in the interests of the small businessman. I do not know what other members are receiving in the mail but I know that I and other members of this party are receiving a great many letters from small businessmen having to do with the government's policy or lack of it as far as they are concerned. Many of these letters are identical and they are being sponsored by the retail merchants association. I have in my hand such a letter which is representative of the type of letters I have been receiving. It reads as follows:

> I am writing to you in the hope that you will bring to the attention of the house the urgency of early enactment of legislation, the subject of which being small business asistance.
> This subject was introduced in the throne speech and it is legislation if enacted that will redound to the benefit of the country as a whole. This is particularly true of the individual engaged in the operation of a retail store and who is desirous of obtaining terms of financing greater than that presently obtained from the chartered banks or institutions.
> Small business loans can be, if patterned after the small business assistance act which our neighbours in the U.S.A. have in effect, self-liquidating . . . All that they need is government guarantee. We urge you, as our member, to voice your opinion in the house on this very important matter now.

This letter is signed by Mr. Aron Jansonn of Crestwynd, Saskatchewan. As I have said, this letter is similar to that used by a great many small businessmen in writing to their members of parliament. I would hope the minister and the government would act as requested at an early date. We are disappointed in this estimate, which is so inadequate. We hope that action will be forthcoming in the very near future.

The small businessman is a very essential part of what is termed by many as our free enterprise economy. Most people, when they use the words "free enterprise economy", probably mean an economy wherein there are a very large number of independently owned and operated small businesses. I do not agree with the misnamed free enterprise system if by that is meant the kind of monopoly-ridden and monopoly-choked economy that we see in our country in many fields. But I do believe that the small, independent businessman, the local merchant and dealer is a very important part of our Canadian society; that he performs a very worth-while function in his community; that he is an asset to our nation, and that the government should do everything within reason to assist him to maintain the very important services that he provides.

I am one who believes very firmly in private property, so long as it is private property and so long as it is not used to exploit the community. The more private property we have, in the sense of property owned and controlled by individuals who do not use this property to try to exploit their neighbours, the better it will be for our Canadian society. We believe in private ownership, which is best illustrated by the kind of small businessman to whom I have been referring. We believe in co-operative enterprise, an association of many members in a co-operative organization on a self-help basis, with one membership to each participant and with one vote for one membership. This provides the greatest degree of democratic control of such an economic organization.

We believe in public enterprise. I referred the other day to Trans-Canada Air Lines as a publicly owned enterprise which I felt was doing an excellent service for the people of Canada. We do not feel that such a service can be provided by private enterprise, as I have defined it, by one or two people providing that service, obviously neither does it lend itself to a co-operative enterprise. We feel that rather than have Trans-Canada Air Lines owned and operated as a joint stock company or a private monopoly it is better to operate that organization under public ownership. The fourth type of ownership I would call corporate ownership, and when corporate ownership becomes a monopoly and such monopoly is used to exploit either the consumer or the worker, then we are opposed to such a type of ownership.

I feel that the government, in keeping with its election promises, should be doing far more than is being done under this legislation. There is need now for a system of credit to small business at reasonable terms of interest. I feel that is an essential step that should be taken now. Small business firms often find it very difficult to compete with the larger firms on a price basis. There is a widespread but mistaken opinion that the small, independent businessman is not efficient; that to have efficiency you have to have bigness. The reason big firms are able to override small business firms is because of their corporate strength; it is because they are able to buy more cheaply, because they can get credit more cheaply and because they are often in a position to provide credit to customers on an instalment basis at a very high rate of interest. But if the small, independent businessman in this country could have the goods laid down at his door at the same general cost level as the goods are laid down at the door of the big chain stores, I am certain that the small businessman would lick the chain stores every time. Small business can operate on a smaller margin. It can give better service, but small business has great difficulty now because of the things I have mentioned and more especially because it is unable to obtain long-term credit at reasonable rates.

I do not know why the government does not act now. I think parliament is sympathetic to the position of the small businessman. I would urge the government to fulfil its election promises, and not by providing a few thousand dollars in an estimate to hire one office manager and two or three stenographers to provide gratuitous advice to the small business people of this country. I do not think it is the kind of advice that they need. Unless the people who are appointed in accordance with this item in the estimates are most outstanding, I would question whether they are competent to give advice at all. I would be inclined to believe that the part of the item which has to do with travelling expenses is there so that the one or two officials who are appointed under this estimate may travel across the country interviewing small businessmen and learning themselves the kind of second-hand advice they should pass on if they get some letters of inquiry. I do not believe that, by this item, the government has shown that they believe at all in the free enterprise system about which they talk so much. One would wonder, from this item, whether or not the government believes at all in the system of free enterprise. However, I urge again that the government take adequate steps, even in the dying days of this session, to provide credit facilities to small, independent businessmen so that they can continue to provide essential services in their communities, and so that the government will be able to say to the Canadian public, we have kept this election promise.

Mr. Carter: I should like to take advantage of this item to bring to the minister's personal attention a matter which is of very great importance to my own constituents, indeed to all the people of Newfoundland and particularly those who have to live in the smaller settlements. My problem has to do with the regulations laid down by the division of weights and measures, in so far as they apply to the sale of coal in Newfoundland.

Prior to confederation the standard ton in Newfoundland was the British weight of 2,240 pounds. This tradition, of course, left its mark on the ways of our people. Coal is sold in most settlements in Newfoundland over the side of a ship and is unloaded into a small boat which is rowed ashore, then men shovel that coal out of the boat into a barrel or measure. Then they have to carry it sometimes as far as half a mile or a quarter of a mile up to their homes, up the land wash and overland without any roads at all. The standard measurement that has been used all this while is that of 12 tubs to the ton, which gives a tub a weight of 187 pounds. That has been an easy thing to do because they can always get a pork barrel or a beef barrel and saw it off at the required length, and that gives the exact weight and measurements for this purpose. Furthermore, this weight of 187 pounds is about the weight that two people can carry under the conditions which I have just described. Also in certain places people contribute to the schools. Instead of contributing cash they contribute a barrel of coal. I may say that the people themselves own their own measures which they take off and compare with the one on board ship. Then on shore they use that same measure with which to unload the coal from the small boat and carry it up to their storehouse. They also use that same measure to carry coal to the schoolhouse if they are contributing in kind.

The standard ton or legal ton under Canadian law is the short ton of 2,000 pounds. The division of weights and measures have laid down the regulation that the only legal measure is a tub of 100 pounds or multiples of 100 pounds. A 200 pound tub is too heavy for two people to carry around under the conditions which I have just described. Some people in Newfoundland—a very few firms, I might say—store coal for resale. The ordinary small businessman whom the hon. member for Assiniboia has just described might carry perhaps 20 tons or 30 tons as a sort of emergency stock to tide people over the winter if winter conditions are unusually severe. The people who stock coal in quantity use the short ton, or they have adapted themselves to the short ton, but they find it more convenient to use the 250 pound tub because two tubs weigh one-quarter ton, four tubs half a ton and eight tubs would fill up the ton. These are amounts by which coal is bought on the retail basis. I would therefore urge the minister to do one of two things. I would urge him either to suspend these regulations in so far as they apply to the resale of coal in Newfoundland or else legalize the two measurements which are most convenient for Newfoundland to use, namely the 250 pound tub and the 187 pound tub.

Mr. Garland: I have no desire to delay the committee, Mr. Chairman, but I should just like to ask a couple of questions. It is a well known fact that this matter of assistance to small businessmen was promised during the 1957 campaign and again during the 1958 campaign. Then again, as was pointed out this morning, it was mentioned in the speech from the throne. I should simply like to know what is the present status of the government's thinking on this subject. It will be recalled that in the 1957 campaign—and I will be very brief—the Prime Minister in speaking on the subject at that time sought to encourage small business. He said that a parliamentary committee would be appointed composed of cabinet ministers and representatives of small business associations from all parts of Canada. That was prior to the election. Then in June of this year the present Minister of Justice, in speaking to a group of retail merchants associations in his own province, dealt with the subject. The headline of one story that emanated from that meeting was "New Plans Announced by Fulton". It reads in part as follows:

> The federal government is proceeding "at once" to set up a small business section in government aimed at helping small businesses solve their problems, Justice Minister Fulton said tonight.

Then in an address to that same group, The Retail Merchants Association of Canada, he said this:

> —Mr. Fulton said these steps are being taken to remove "artificial" obstacles to small businesses in Canada.

I was wondering whether the minister might enlarge on that aspect of the matter. Then we move along to other stories that have been emanating from what are usually represented as reliable sources, namely that all small businessmen may expect is some advice and not loans or any real assistance. I would appreciate any comment the minister would care to make.

Mr. Gour: I will not remind the minister of the promises made during the election campaign in my riding. He promised five big bridges on the Ottawa river across from my riding to Quebec. On two occasions ministers were there in support of the Tory candidate and they were producing those promises. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys was one of them. However, I will not speak about politics.

I think it is a good thing that we should have some kind of credit guarantee by the government for small businessmen. I am the only one in my own town—and I thank God for it—who is able to stay in business in competition with these big companies. These big companies are using the business people in my riding to make them work for them and in ten years they will be out with nothing. It is through these big organizations or stores, through their sales, that these people are induced to buy refrigerators and everything. Many sell their products and there is nothing remaining for these people who sacrifice their own business. The point is that they do not sell on credit. It is only the small businessman who will help the people who want credit without interest. Most of the small businessmen give credit. Many of them give credit up to six months and many times—I and my friends have done it—a year without interest. If we had some kind of plan to guarantee these business people through the bank, something like that for farm development and for housing purposes, whereby a loan can be obtained at the bank at a lower interest rate, these people could give credit without interest to their customers. They treat their customers as friends, not as does big finance. Most of the time, now that a Tory government is in power, when they are short of work all over and business is bad they need more credit than ever. If it were possible to guarantee the loan to the bank or to have a special organization for small business people it would be a great advantage for all Canada. It will give credit to these people. They will buy more. As I said a moment ago, it is not for me. Up to now I have not needed a government loan. But I am only one in quite a large territory.

That would render a service to customers and give them a chance to buy the products they need—seed, agricultural machinery and so on. This is a good thing which has been promised, and this is the time to do it. As I said a minute ago the need today is greater than it was two years ago, since there is now less work and a greater shortage of money.

A measure of this sort will help to provide more work because it would give the people who need the goods a chance to buy them.

As many speakers have said, if borrowers go to the finance company they are obliged to pay interest at the rate of between 12 and 15 per cent. If, on the other hand, they bring their financial problems to the bank, the loans could be guaranteed by the federal government. The managers of the banks in the various districts are gentlemen. They know their people. They know those who should receive credit, and they know those who are likely to ask for more credit than they can handle. I do not think you could find anybody more qualified to extend credit than the managers of the banks in rural districts, certainly, and to some extent in urban areas also.

There is an urgent need for something to be done. However, I have one criticism to make. Thirty thousand dollars is not enough. It is peanuts. I myself would need more than that amount if I were to set out to buy something on any scale at all. I urge the minister, who is a businessman and who is in a position to be called the minister of business affairs, to consult with his friends in the cabinet and remind the Prime Minister of what he said so that something may be done this year to settle this urgent question.

Mr. Churchill: I judge from the opinions that have been expressed during the last half hour and just before the lunch hour that there is general agreement that a small business branch should be set up and proceed to deal with the problems of small business.

I notice from the remarks which hon. members have made that they are fully aware of the problems which affect small business and are quite sympathetic towards them. These remarks will be studied carefully and the suggestions which have been made will be given close attention. I appreciate the fact that hon. members have put on the record some of their observations gathered from their own personal experience, as the hon. member for Russell, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo and others who are in close contact with small business and know something of the problems which small businessmen face, have indicated.

I will set out briefly the plan as we see it at the moment, and conclude with one or two comments. As has been pointed out, this arrangement was forecast in the speech from the throne in the following words:

> In order to assist small business, there will be established a small business section within the administrative machinery of government. The functions of this organization will be to provide liaison between the government and small businesses, to study the problems of small business and to advise on measures necessary to meet them.

Small business is a large and important segment of the Canadian economy in terms of its contribution to employment and national output and its worth in the life of many communities. More than four-fifths of all manufacturing establishments in the country have fewer than 50 employees and account for over one-sixth of the total selling value of factory shipments. Retail stores with under five employees represent close to nine-tenths of all establishments of this type and are responsible for over two-fifths of the total value of retail sales. In the case of wholesale trade, firms with fewer than five employees make up about two-thirds of all establishments and conduct about one-fifth of all the wholesale business in the country. Small establishments with under five employees predominate to an even greater extent in the service industries, representing almost nine-tenths of all establishments and accounting for over one-third of total receipts.

Many representations have been made to the federal government by individuals and trade associations for some form of assistance to enable small business to meet more effectively the problems with which it is confronted. Most of the proposals have involved the establishment of a service which would provide small businessmen with information and advice on their production and marketing problems.

In the light of these considerations, the main objective of the small business office would be to help small businessmen to help themselves. The following terms of reference are suggested:

1. To act as a clearing house in referring inquiries of small business to the appropriate departments of the Canadian government or provincial and municipal governments and to various other organizations and institutions;
2. to compile and distribute bulletins and reports on topics of general interest to small business including information on government procurement;
3. to assist small business on request to obtain statistical, technical and other information on management, production and marketing problems;
4. to undertake studies concerning small business, particularly for guidance of the government in developing new policies in this field and as background material for dealing more effectively with the problems of small business;
5. in the course of its work, to consult and co-operate with educational institutions, representative business associations and other private organizations.

That, Mr. Chairman, presents in general terms the functions that will be performed by the small business office which will be set up in the Department of Trade and Commerce. The Department of Trade and Commerce has a wealth of experience in dealing with business across this country whether large or small. Within the industrial development branch of the department a great deal of information has been compiled in the past and consequently it is appropriate that this section should be set up in this particular department where considerable experience is already available.

I appreciate the fact that some hon. members feel we have not gone far enough at this stage. That is, of course, a criticism to which any proposal is open. However, I suggest we are indicating here the government's intention to do what can be done to assist small business, and I have already indicated the importance of small business in Canada.

The paragraph in the speech from the throne and the terms of the reference which I have just read out indicate that we are aiming to determine the problems of small business before any further plans are made. I am sure hon. members will appreciate that this is the proper way to approach any subject such as this where you are entering into a relatively new field. All the facts should be assembled, representations should be heard from those engaged in small business, the operation of similar institutions in other countries should be studied and plans carefully laid for the furtherance of the interests of small business in the future.

These things cannot all be done overnight impatient as some of us may be to get on with the job. We must have this background of material before proceeding and I think this is a step in the right direction. During the course of the month of October this office will be functioning and will be available for consultation with business associations across this country and before many months have elapsed I believe there will be established a body of information from which we can draw conclusions that will be advantageous to the government in formulating its plans for the future in connection with small business.

Mr. Benidickson: I believe the minister in describing the policies of the administration has spoken as a true Conservative. Probably some of us expected this but on the other hand in a debate that took place yesterday or the day before I indicated that during the election campaign the Conservatives had used pretty large explosives which proved in the end to have very blank cartridges. I believe that is very true in regard to this particular vote which we are asked to approve.

In Yarmouth on March 25, 1958, the Prime Minister made a statement on the subject as reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of March 26, as follows:

> The Prime Minister said his government was planning to provide financial assistance for the small businessman, "who had found himself hampered by tight money".

[Mr. Churchill.]

He blamed this, of course, on the previous administration. I continue:

> An inter-departmental committee in Ottawa was presently studying the problems of small business, he said and "the net step" would be a program making available financial assistance for this type of business.

That is not what we are asked to approve at this stage many months after this assertion. We are asked simply to approve a small vote for an increase in the civil service of an advisory nature and I believe there is an element of travelling expenses involved there.

The Financial Post analysing this problem some time ago indicated that perhaps the two elements of small business which had been most active and regular in approaching governments in the past had been retail merchants and the operators of tourist resorts who felt that the ordinary sources of money supply in this country were not available to them. I know that since the last decision of the electorate both these organizations have sent representatives to the federal government. They have sent their national officers to interview the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, I believe. After all the promises we have heard it is pretty small potatoes when the government provides only $30,000 to set up a body to counsel and advise. I do not believe it is advice that the small businessmen seek at this time.

We have the industrial development bank. It is not appropriate to discuss that at this moment and I will not enlarge upon it. We will have an opportunity in a matter of a day or two to discuss that with respect to the estimates of the Minister of Finance. I believe the retail merchants association particularly which in its annual conference had heard a rather glowing speech in Vancouver from the Minister of Justice following the election will be disappointed to find that despite the very obvious hints made in that speech, this vote of $30,000 is simply to enlarge the staff of civil servants in the department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to give advice to the small business community. That is not what they have sought. The thing they want most is access to credit facilities.

The mere fact that this supplementary vote is contained in the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and not in those of the Minister of Finance indicates for sure that all the present administration is likely to give to small business, notwithstanding the statement of the Prime Minister at Yarmouth which I quoted, is advice and counsel and, I suppose, a pat on the back. I believe this is very contrary even to the speech made by the Minister of Justice in Vancouver to the retail merchants association. Surely the administration has noted that very recently, and I believe largely because of depressed economic conditions the United States Congress before adjourning as they did last week—and they were only generous in some of their fiscal changes with respect to small business in the matter of tax relief and in the matter of lending—did something very important and substantial to help what they call the small business community of the United States. Here we have what is simply a vote of $30,000, 75 per cent of which is for an increase in salaries for civil servants and the balance of which, as far as I know, is for the travelling expenses of those civil servants.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that the minister made a passing reference to the problem I placed before him a few moments ago. May I have his assurance that he will look into the matter and see what can be done because by so doing he will not only be helping the small businessman but also the people who depend on coal for fuel. If merchants are forced to go to the extra expense of these additional measures which his department is insisting upon that cost will be passed on to the purchasers and the cost of coal is already fantastically high in Newfoundland.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly look into the matter presented by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. I quite appreciate that that is a really pressing problem on the part of the people who are accustomed to a different measure.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I have a question to ask the minister. On July 17 when the house went into supply on the minister's estimates I asked him then what progress was being made in connection with the small business proposal. The minister at that time told us that the government had not yet assigned a department which would deal with this matter. The house took it for granted that this would fall within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When the minister spoke on July 17, as reported at page 2357 of Hansard, he said:

> I cannot let this opportunity pass without correcting my hon. friend with respect to the statement I made on the setting up of the small business section. There has been no withdrawal from the plan to give such assistance as may be possible to small business in Canada. All I said was that a final decision had not been reached as to whether or not the Department of Trade and Commerce would have that responsibility and I hope within a very short time an announcement will be made to this house as to the setting up of a small business section.

My question now is, can we take it for granted that this small business section will fall within the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Chairman. When we discussed this on July 17 the decision had not been made, but the fact that it is under the trade and commerce estimates is one indication that it will be done by this department, and I so announce at this time.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister did not in a particular way refer to the remarks I made a few moments ago, but we have learned through the press that he proposes to enlarge his staff with the acquisition of, I have no doubt, an estimable gentleman who I understand served with the minister in the armed services during world war II, and he will take a distinguished position in the department. I know nothing about the gentleman concerned. Is he what might be called a small businessman? Press reports indicated that he might be taking the lead in advising the minister with respect to small business problems. Is any part of this vote of $30,000 to provide for the salary of the gentleman in question?

Mr. Churchill: No. My hon. friend is referring to the appointment of the associate deputy minister, Mr. J. M. Roberts, who served as a brigadier in the army in the second war. This small business section may be placed under his supervision within the department; but in setting up a new section like this a most active part will be played by the deputy minister himself who has had 30 years of experience within the department. Mr. Roberts has had considerable experience in business. We hope to enlist from departmental circles people who have had experience along this line and, if necessary, receive other assistance from people who have had similar or even greater experience with small business.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, because we in this group are firm believers in legitimate free enterprise which as part of the mixed economy we believe is the next evolution that our economy will move toward, we have been very interested in the question of small business for some years. In fact, the group to which I belong have given some study to this question to my knowledge for a period of over five or six years.

I am very pleased indeed that the government is seizing on the idea at this time or, at least, thinking about the question. I listened closely to the minister's statement and explanation of the purpose of this $30,000. And while this, shall I say, is a very short step in the right direction, in view of the statements made by members of the government in the country and the anticipation aroused amongst small business people during the election—and this is indicated by the actual correspondence that I receive from day to day—the minister's explanation this afternoon is going to be what I would call a damp economic squib.

I know very well that this cannot be undertaken without an organization and I am glad to see that the organization is being established and some study is being given to the matter because we believe that small business is an essential and very necessary part of our economy, particularly in view of the monopolistic tendencies that are being developed in all directions. It is for that reason that we believe some study should be given and an effort made to assist in a proper and sound way small industry, distribution and some services which would include tourist resorts and operations of that type.

I spoke previously at this session on this question and I do not intend to take up the time of the committee now except to say that I know dozens of small businesses which are being well operated at the present time and well managed, but because of the lack of opportunity to borrow capital over long terms at low interest they are experiencing difficulties, difficulties which are not created by inefficiency or poor management but which are created by our present economic system and by the intensive competition which comes from larger segments of our economy. I do urge that the government give consideration to every possibility of rendering the financial assistance that is so urgently needed. As this group has recommended and suggested before, it might be done through the industrial development bank; it might be done through guarantee by this government to banks of 10 per cent of the losses on loans, similar to the scheme which is provided under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, or it might de done by an amendment to the Bank Act. There are a good number of avenues open for exploration in this respect and I do hope the government gives this question very urgent and close consideration and at the next session presents this house with a proposal which will offer opportunities for legitimate private enterprise which on a sound basis can qualify to receive the necessary financial assistance that it urgently requires at this time.

Mr. Garland: Would the minister care to reply to the second question I asked earlier this afternoon with respect to the comment of the Minister of Justice who said that steps are being taken to remove artificial obstacles to small business?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Churchill: I am not sure that I would know exactly what the Minister of Justice was referring to there, but I presume that in our planning and in our discussions with small business organizations we shall find what those artificial obstacles are and do our best to remove them. I would say that no one is more interested in this particular problem of small businessmen than the Minister of Justice who has discussed some of those matters with me on several occasions and has made constructive suggestions as to the operation of this particular section.

Mr. Garland: He said steps are already being taken. The minister can understand my concern.

Mr. Benidickson: The Financial Post asserted that the chief small business people who were organized were concerned about some government development in the field of credit. They represented the retail merchants association and the hotel and motel associations. As a result of this coming before us last week as a vote in the Department of Trade and Commerce would the minister suggest that from now on those organizations make their approaches to him rather than as in the past to the Minister of Finance, notwithstanding that their chief concern was the matter of arrangement of credit on a basis that would be comparable to that available to big industry under the industrial development bank, or to farmers under the farm loan board or the Farm Improvement Loans Act, or to fishermen, and so forth?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to suggest to any association with which department it might consult. We are quite prepared to meet with representatives. If, on the other hand, they prefer to talk to the Minister of Finance and relieve me of that I would be perfectly happy. But at the moment I imagine that organizations such as the hon. member refers to might want to confer with the heads of both departments.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Public buildings, construction and services—

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amounts required—

673. Newfoundland, $35,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. Is this a new project or is it just additional money?

The Chairman: Shall 673 carry?

Mr. Carter: On item 673 may I just bring to the minister's attention again the plight of one settlement in my riding which I have already brought to his attention and concerning which considerable correspondence has been exchanged. I refer to the fishing community of Seal Cove in Fortune bay. The people of this community were forced to give up the fishery because the harbour deteriorated to such a point that they could no longer carry on that occupation. Subsequently most of them found employment in the woods operations of the paper companies in Newfoundland. With the curtailment of woods operations now they are once more forced back to the fishery.

Mr. Green: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member but I think that comes under item 682.

Mr. Carter: Oh, I am sorry. I thought it was 673.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this extra $35,000 for another project or is it just additional money?

Mr. Green: Item 673 is for additions and alterations to the building at Stephenville.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the new building completed three or four years ago?

Mr. Green: Yes, apparently that is the case.

Item agreed to.

675. Quebec, $270,000.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister if he would allow this item to stand so that after the public accounts committee has completed its sittings there may be an opportunity for the house, if it so desires, to discuss any matters arising out of the hearings.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt it would be very interesting to have a discussion on what has been happening in the public accounts committee. The details of this item will be found on page 7. It covers four different buildings, a public building at Hudson in the amount of $35,000, a public building at Loretteville in the amount of $60,000, Pont Viau postal station in Montreal, $100,000—

Mr. Benidickson: That is Hudson, Quebec, not Hudson, Ontario?

Mr. Green: Yes, Hudson, Quebec. It also covers a public building at Schefferville, $75,000, or a total of $270,000. The vote is only for these buildings and I suggest that it would not be in order to discuss projects in Hull under the vote.

Mr. Chevrier: May I bring these points to the attention of the minister? First, if he held up this item I do not think there would be a lengthy discussion of anything arising out of the public accounts committee but I think it is only fair to those of us who have been in the public accounts committee for many weeks that there should be one item on which there would be an opportunity to have such a discussion if that opportunity should be found desirable at the end of the session. I am sure the minister will realize that it is not with the intention of delaying consideration of the estimates that this is being requested. On the contrary, these estimates have been going through at a pretty rapid pace. This is the only item I can find under which, since it pertains to public buildings, such a discussion could take place. While strictly speaking the item is perhaps not attributable to the printing bureau in Hull, nevertheless it is the one that is more closely associated with it. Because of that I again appeal to the minister. I also appeal on another ground. It is my understanding that these items can sometimes be transferred from one building to another by virtue of a ruling of the treasury board. For that reason also perhaps the minister might want to co-operate with us to that extent.

Mr. Green: It would be quite improper to make any arrangement of that kind. Under the rules of the house there is provision for discussing the reports of committees, and I believe it would be quite without reason for me to hold up an item which has nothing whatever to do with the printing bureau simply so that there can be a discussion of the printing bureau. It may be that the committee will not bring in a report. I do not know.

Mr. Chevrier: Quite possibly.

Mr. Green: I really think it is unfair to ask that the estimates of the Department of Public Works be held up—

Mr. Chevrier: One item.

Mr. Green: —that even one item be held up under these conditions.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to pursue the matter unduly. If the public accounts committee did not bring in a report there would be no further opportunity to discuss the matter. I think I can assure the minister that if he were to allow this item to stand there certainly would not be any lengthy discussion at this time. However, in view of his attitude I am not going to pursue the matter unduly because we have arrived at the point where I think we want to give due consideration to his estimates. Having refused that request, would the minister be good enough to answer this question. Would he tell us whether or not it is accurate that on May 7, 1958, a call for tenders went out from the department for the installation of a centrifugal refrigeration system at the public printing bureau in Hull?

Mr. Green: Now, the hon. member is trying to reach the same objective by another route. This is a question having to do with the printing bureau, and it would be quite out of order for me to deal with it here on this vote. There was a vote passed by the house some weeks ago—

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister remember how much?

Mr. Green: —which dealt with—

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister remember how much it was?

Mr. Green: I think it was $800,000; two votes of $400,000 each.

Mr. Chevrier: Was it in the main estimates or in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. Green: There was $400,000 in the main estimates and $400,000 in the supplementaries. This is just a case of getting the door open one inch, and then going through it. I have no intention of doing that. The rules provide for the conduct of discussion on these estimates, and I must ask that the hon. members abide by the rules.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I say a word on the point of order, and on the point of order only? The minister is well aware of the fact that these votes are all for public buildings in Quebec. What he is now asking is to add $270,000 to the votes that have already been passed by the house for public buildings in Quebec. The treasury board has the power to transfer this amount—I know this well because I sat on the treasury board over and over again when it was done—from one building to another in the province. It is the present intention to vote this money for the four buildings, but it is in fact available for any public building that is mentioned in the estimates this year in the province, and one of these is the printing bureau at Hull. I submit it would be quite wrong to ask any questions about anything that has happened in the past, but anything that is going on in the current fiscal year it does seem to me is quite in order under the rules because of the fact that the item relates to public buildings in Quebec in general and therefore my hon. friend's question is quite in order.

Mr. Green: In so far as the question the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has mentioned is concerned, if his suggestion were to be acceded to then the result would be, in effect, that there would be a second discussion on an item which was passed weeks ago. This, of course, gets us into an impossible position; it would be quite out of order. I can give to him assurance that these moneys that are voted here will be spent for those buildings which are listed under the vote I am now asking the committee to pass.

Mr. Bourget: I just want to add a word on this subject. I think hon. members will find that for the past 18 years it has been the practice to allow hon. members to discuss any construction projects in any province as long as the item is in the main or supplementary estimates. If the minister will look in Hansard for the past years, he will find that great latitude has been given to members to discuss any project, and even if there were only four projects listed in the supplementary or further supplementary estimates. This has been the practice. I remember well, having been the parliamentary assistant for four years, that we allowed members to discuss all kinds of projects. As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has stated, any of this money can be transferred from one project to another, and that means we are allowed to discuss any construction project in the province of Quebec on that particular item.

Mr. Green: From what I have read in the press, Mr. Chairman, I believe there has already been a rather wide opportunity to discuss the printing bureau in that committee. I do not doubt but that there will be a somewhat lengthy discussion even yet, before the house is prorogued. I say once again that I realize how nice it might be to have a free-for-all on the printing bureau, but this would be quite out of order on these estimates and I ask Your Honour to rule accordingly.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no question of having a free-for-all about the printing bureau. I can assure the minister that is not the intention. Certainly in so far as I am concerned, and I think I can speak for my two colleagues who have joined me in this, my intention is to ask two, three or four questions, and then I will resume my seat. The first question I should like to ask the minister is, if it is a fact that on the 7th of May, 1958 there was a tender called for centrifugal refrigeration machinery at the printing bureau, and whether or not it is so that that tender was recalled.

Mr. Green: I submit that question is out of order.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order; it is quite impossible for the chair to permit hon. members to get away from the question of relevancy in connection with the items being discussed at the moment. It is impossible for the chair to know what is being decided by the treasury board and consequently we cannot, on this particular item, talk about what is being decided by that particular body. We can only discuss the items which appear in the estimates before us. Consequently, I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the item under discussion.

I believe that this question of the printing bureau can be discussed when the committee presents its report. Questions can be asked also about this matter during the orders of the day. I do not consider that it is relevant now to discuss this matter. Furthermore, in so far as the remarks of the hon. member for Levis are concerned, although there may have been a certain latitude given in the discussion in former years, I must adhere to the rules of relevancy which demand that we discuss the particular items as they appear before us. I, therefore, must ask hon. members to keep their remarks as relevant as possible.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if I might just ask a question for enlightenment, because I am sure you will want to guide those of us who sit on this side of the house. You have just stated that the matter could be discussed when the public accounts committee presents its report. However, if the public accounts committee should not present a report or if concurrence should not be moved in the report, then there is no opportunity for discussion. You stated also, sir, that a question may be asked on orders of the day, but the Speaker will rule such a question out of order immediately because the matter is before the public accounts committee.

What we are trying to do now is not to discuss matters that are before the public accounts committee, but to discuss a matter for which a portion of this vote, namely $270,000 for public buildings in Quebec, may be transferred for the construction and completion of a public building, namely the printing bureau in Hull, Quebec. All I am seeking to do is to ask three or four, at the most, pertinent questions, and not to delay the consideration of the estimates in any way, but to get this information for use elsewhere.

Mr. Green: The hon. member, in his very last sentence, has given another reason why he is completely out of order. He wants to get these answers for use elsewhere, that is in a committtee of the house. We cannot discuss in the house what is happening in a committee. This is certainly, without any doubt, the rule, and for the hon. member to ask a question here in order that he can use that information in committee is another ground on which he is completely out of order in asking the question. He has no right at all to come in here and start asking questions about it.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is quite wrong because we did elicit from the Minister of Transport and from the Minister of Agriculture the other day information concerning the procedure with reference to an airport building at Dorval and information concerning the Saskatchewan dam, and there was use made of that information at the committee.

Mr. Green: They were not under discussion in a committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I say to the minister respectfully that if a minister in the House of Commons makes a statement with reference to the policy in his department concerning a public building, surely that can be used at the committee. The purpose of this question is simply to confirm the information that we have at the moment with reference to this matter. The question I asked the Minister was whether or not this tender had been advertised for and recalled.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not know whether the committee on public accounts will report. However, I do not think that matter is relevant at the moment when we are discussing this item. I was given the privilege for several years of attending certain meetings of treasury board, but only those that had reference to preparing the estimates for the forthcoming year. However, as a result of that experience I have a recollection that in respect of a vote of this kind great freedom is given to the minister to transfer appropriations such as this one, which in total is $380,000, from one project to another provided it is within the province, notwithstanding the detail that is given the House of Commons in this particular respect on page 9. We are given an indication that it is intended —and I believe sincerely intended—to appropriate this $380,400 in a certain way as outlined in the details on page 9. But the vote after passing today is available to the minister and to his department, as far as I recollect. If he finds that one or two or more of these projects cannot be proceeded with for any other reason, he has full freedom to use the vote that we might now make and apply it to the printing bureau in Quebec for air conditioning or anything else that is subject to discussion, maybe not appropriately, in the committee on public accounts, because I think their basic job is to consider expenditures that were made prior to the end of the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958. But notwithstanding that, the point I want to make is that there is such transferability with respect to this vote that we are asked to approve, such discretion left with the minister, that we would have every right at this stage, quite irrespective of the public accounts committee, to ask the minister with respect to almost every appropriation that could conceivably be an item that would be transferred and utilized as a result of the vote we are just about to make, including the possibility of a further expenditure on the public works in Quebec and that involves the printing bureau in Hull.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the minister has no discretion whatever to transfer money from this account. On the two points I have raised, namely that this matter is not covered under the item under discussion but under an item passed some weeks ago, and also the fact that here we have an attempt to combine the house and a committee which has not yet completed its business, getting information by questions in the house to be used in the committee, I submit that these questions are quite out of order.

Mr. Benidickson: That is a very interesting statement from the minister. I want to know whether we in committee of supply henceforth can feel that he has bound himself. I should like to know to what extent. We are being asked to vote $380,000 for public works within the province of Quebec under a certain statutory item in the estimates. All right. On page 9 we are given some details as to the purported intentions. There are probably ten individual items given in detail on page 9 of the further supplementary estimates (1), 1958-59.

Mr. Green: You are looking at the harbours and rivers.

Mr. Pickersgill: Look at page 7.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, page 7. The same principle, of course, applies with respect to the province of Quebec, the amount being $270,000 instead of $380,000 which I was referring to because I was looking at the other page. Do I understand the minister to believe that he would be restricted, under our rules or past practice? If it was not possible to expend within the fiscal year say $35,000 for the public building at Hudson, am I to understand that he would not be able to spend any part of this $35,000, part of the $270,000, on anything connected with a public building in the province of Quebec except perhaps Loretteville, Montreal and Schefferville? Is that the restriction which my hon. friend feels he is confined to under the practice of the treasury board and so on?

Mr. Green: The statement I made, Mr. Chairman, was that I as minister have no discretion whatever to transfer any money from these projects.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to point out to Your Honour that the language of the vote is what governs and not the minister's own disposition in the matter, however agreeable that might be. The relevant words of the item are as follows:

—provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—

I should like to put a question to the minister and I am putting it to him with the utmost sincerity. Does the minister maintain that this vote 675 has no relation to the vote in the main estimates; in other words that the transfers can only be made between the four projects listed in the details of this vote and that it would not be competent to treasury board to take any of this $270,000 and transfer it to any other project in the year's program? On this point I quite honestly confess that the minister could be right and I could be wrong. However, my impression—and it is quite a strong one—is that these supplementary votes are added to the main vote and that in the bill it becomes one vote for public building in the province and that the transferability is between all of those projects.

I think our differences narrow down to this. If the minister is right in law that this item applies only to these four projects, I do not think we could insist any further, much as we think that the minister ought to be generous and take the kind of view his predecessor took.

Mr. Green: And be foolish.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg the minister's pardon?

Mr. Green: In other words, he ought to be foolish?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister wants to say that his predecessor was foolish, that is his right. I do not want him to put those words in my mouth. What I am saying is that I think the minister ought to show some generosity, especially when he as an instrument of the executive is here craving from the Commons money to carry on the government of the country and he is not here as someone ordering us to stop asking questions.

The minister will appreciate the point, of course, because he has been quite recently in this position himself. What I am saying is this. If the minister with his legal experience and from experience in the treasury board can say that these supplementary items are treated entirely separately and distinctly in the statute from the main items, then I think our argument falls to the ground. But if, as I believe to be the case, in the appropriation act they are lumped together as a single vote for the purpose of building these public buildings and it is competent to the executive —not to the minister, I agree but to treasury board—to transfer the amounts within these from one to the other, I submit there could be no possible ground for arguing that we cannot ask questions about any of the listed projects in this year's estimates for the province of Quebec.

Mr. Green: What the treasury board might or might not be able to do I cannot say, but to follow the argument of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to its logical conclusion would mean, if he is right, that whenever estimates are brought in such as these further supplementary estimates there could be a repetition of the discussion which took place at an earlier time, which would be an unbusinesslike and fantastic procedure. The test is: this is a vote for money to build four buildings, and the discussion should be confined to those four buildings.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going to make one request of the minister. I am going to request the minister that he should not ask the Chair to rule on this point but that he should get a legal opinion on the point I have raised. We do not intend to pursue the matter any further at this time in view of the objection of the minister but we do think that the rights of the committee of supply are so important that he should get an opinion as to whether the minister is or I am right on this question, and if the minister is prepared to do that we are prepared to let this go through.

Mr. Green: The point I am interested in is whether or not it is in order to discuss the printing bureau on this item and I have made my submission to the Chair that it is not in order.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I have raised the point —and in as conciliatory a manner as I could— that these projects are all lumped together and, therefore, that they constitute one item and that if the executive asks for more money for buildings in a province it is open to us to discuss any of the buildings in the province to which that amount might be applied. The minister does not think that is correct, but neither of us is sure of his ground—

Mr. Green: I am perfectly sure of my ground and I have asked the chairman to rule on that point.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have asked the hon. gentleman if he will ask the chairman to reserve his judgment, in which case we will pass the item because I would prefer not to have a ruling on that important question without knowing—

If the minister will withdraw his request for a ruling, we will pass the item.

Mr. Green: As long as the item is passed, I do not want a ruling and I will not insist on a ruling.

Mr. Benidickson: I agree with my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate, and I point out to the committee that one of the things we are talking about, the second point, is the right of the treasury board and the government to have transferability within a certain item. In the main estimates there is an item of $400,000 for the national printing bureau and our concern was whether or not the right of transferability within a provincial item would extend to a further appropriation by vote in the committee of supply in the further supplementary estimates such as we are discussing now, and the supplementary estimates, neither of which refer, of course, to an item for the printing bureau. The minister, by reason of our votes, is given a total sum of money to spend within the province of Quebec on the construction of public works. I quite agree that this is an important question and one that I do not recall has been raised in any detail in the past, but my understanding is that there is a great deal of freedom once a vote is made at any stage for provincial public works construction. If it is found that one building can go ahead faster than another there is an opportunity for the department to go to the treasury board and say: we think we would prefer to spend it this way; we are still within the province and we are still within the vote and we ask you to approve that it be transferred from, say, Quebec, to Hull, because the Hull project is proceeding faster than the Quebec project prior to the end of the fiscal year.

I think this is a very important question because there are related to it not only this question of transferability within votes in the main estimates and the various supplementary estimates but, of course, the opportunity to have debate in committee of supply in consequence.

My colleagues have suggested that we are not going to press this at the moment, but I think that when the minister comes next before the committee of supply this is something about which he should have a very firm opinion.

Item agreed to.

679. Saskatchewan, $30,000.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, may I take this opportunity on behalf of the residents of Watson and district and myself to express our gratitude to the Minister of Public Works for including in the supplementary estimates the sum of $30,000 for a new post office in Watson. This public project is long overdue and anybody who has ever seen the old post office will agree with me in what I have just said namely, that it is long overdue.

The town of Watson has a population of just over 1,000 and serves a district of approximately 20 miles in radius. Two highways go through the town of Watson and two railroads. It is a prosperous district and the people are extremely thrifty. According to the royal commission on agriculture and rural life, Watson is a town that is classified as a service centre.

To be classified as a service centre it must be a certain distance away from cities and towns. It must have facilities to give adequate service to the town and district residents. Watson can fill these requirements adequately. The closest town is located 30 miles away and the closest city about 100 miles.

Watson has a hospital, physicians, dentists, barristers, a local newspaper, theatre, bank and churches of many denominations. The town has retail facilities including clothing, household appliances, drugs, apparel and accessory stores, furniture and liquor stores. Indeed, it provides the urban and rural population with a high level of service and entertainment.

It is a fast expanding town, as just last year four gas service stations established themselves there and the Saskatchewan department of highways built a storage shed and has a service branch in this centre. All this is an indication, Mr. Chairman, that Watson is justified in obtaining a new post office to give a better service to its people.

The new post office is going to have 1,000 foot working space. Although we were desirous of 1,200 feet, nevertheless we are grateful to the minister for the proposed new building with provision to enlarge if the need arises in future.

I sincerely hope that in due course he will give consideration to other public projects in my constituency which we feel are urgently required and in many cases overdue. On behalf of Watson and district I would like the house to approve the estimates before us for a new post office in Watson, Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbours and river works—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, harbour and river works listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amounts required—

682. Newfoundland, $269,500.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the minister for the provisions made for Newfoundland and particularly for my own riding under this vote. I wish also to make one final appeal to him on behalf of the settlement of Seal Cove in Fortune bay. As I pointed out earlier, this is one of the larger fishing settlements in my riding with a population of about 500 people and a fishing population of approximately 85 or 90 fishermen. These fishermen were forced to leave the fishery years ago because the harbour had deteriorated to the point where they could not carry on the fishery successfully. Subsequently they found employment in the woods but that employment is no longer available and the people of this community are now forced to return to the fishery as the sole means of livelihood. They cannot carry on this occupation unless some dredging is done.

I have had a great deal of discussion with departmental officials concerning this question and I know it poses a dilemma for the department because the only way in which the harbour can be dredged at the present time is by hand dredging. I know we will all agree that hand dredging is not the most economical way of approaching this kind of job. On the other hand, if hand dredging is not done then the harbour cannot be made suitable for fishing for at least two or three years. This will mean the people of this settlement will have to accept able bodied relief for at least two years. There is a choice between two alternatives neither of which is very appealing. I urge the minister to take another look at this and see what can be done to make this harbour useable by the fishermen at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the difficulty here is that we cannot get a bulldozer into Seal Cove. The departmental officials are of the opinion that hand dredging would not do the work properly and so the intention is to do some work at Hermitage and then land a bulldozer there from the sea. Apparently it could be taken from Hermitage to Seal Cove by road. We hope to get that done next spring.

Mr. Carter: I understand that perfectly, Mr. Chairman, but what I was trying to point out to the minister is that if this course is followed it will be a year at least before the bulldozer could be landed at Hermitage. That would mean the fishermen would not be able to carry on the fishery for a year or more. Then there is the problem of getting the bulldozer from Hermitage to Seal Cove which might take another year. There is the possibility of a delay of two years or more before the fishermen in that settlement could carry on the fishery. That is the urgency of my appeal.

Mr. Green: We are very sympathetic to the hon. member's request but evidently it is simply a matter of what can and what cannot be done. We believe we can get this work done within a year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the people of Davidsville, Hare Bay—Bonavista Bay—and Musgravetown I wish to express the appreciation I know they will feel to the minister and his department for what his department is doing.

Item agreed to.

686. Ontario, $188,000.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the people in the Montreal river harbour area north of Sault Ste. Marie I want to express appreciation for what the department did up there this past summer in making a new entrance to the harbour. I should like to remind the minister, however, that unless some cribbing is done to protect the entrance it will fill in. The gravel is washing away now on one side of the entrance. I believe it would be wise if the minister would have an engineer investigate the situation as soon as possible. I was there last week and saw what was happening. For very little money we could save the work that has already been done. I believe it would be worth while doing so.

Mr. Green: I am grateful to the hon. member for making this suggestion. We will have an engineer sent in right away.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you very much.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I rise with a great deal of trepidation. I very much fear the Minister of Public Works particularly after the remark he made in an earlier debate this session when he suggested that the results with respect to requests made of him were very likely to be in reverse proportion to the amount of speaking one did formally in the House of Commons. I have that very much in mind and I want to assure him he has me very frightened notwithstanding our personal friendship.

I was very pleased to have a decision from the minister with respect to the placing of what I call a ramp or an apron on the shoreline of the public wharf at Fort Frances which will facilitate the launching of the hundreds—yes, even thousands—of boats that are being trailed today by tourists going up and down our highways. This type of provision is not new. It really came to my attention because one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Nipissing, has been able to obtain such a concession from the minister's predecessor. I had been asking for this kind of thing for some time but I guess I was not a good enough salesman.

I know the minister has travelled the trans-Canada highway which is under his jurisdiction and he will have noted as I have noted just how important this kind of thing is because alongside most of our public wharves we have a few feet of public leased land, probably leased from the provinces or at least there is a short space of land there. With very little expense a concrete base could be constructed to prevent the automobiles and trailers from getting bogged down when they back up to launch boats from which they want to enter a lake and do some fishing.

From the federal point of view the government has some doubt as to the responsibility because of the interest of the provinces in the tourist business as well, but having regard to the fact that the tourist industry may be the third or fourth most important source of revenue from the United States and without being extravagant in these matters, modest aprons or ramps could be provided alongside many of our wharves particularly in northern Ontario. I believe it is only proper that the federal government should do it in consequence of the value the government of Canada receives from the exchange position that is created by United States tourist trade.

Mr. Green: I had the opportunity of visiting Fort Frances about a year ago. It is a delightful town with very pleasant surroundings. We are planning to do this work at Fort Frances as soon as there is low water.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to remind the minister that even before Fort Frances, I had urged the department—and probably even his predecessor two years ago—that similar provisions be made at Sioux Lookout, Kenora and indeed at most of the wharves in northern Ontario. In my opinion it is a facility that could be provided costing not more than $1,000 at each place. It would be very much to the advantage of our tourist industry.

Mr. Green: Another ramp is being put in at Kenora. The hon. member must not press us too hard because we have had a great many things requested by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Benidickson: I remember his big speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: It made a good beginning.

Item agreed to.

687. British Columbia and Yukon, $251,500.

Mr. Herridge: I see that $21,000 of this vote is for a proposed breakwater at Okanagan Landing which I am sure is very necessary. Can the minister inform the committee what the breakwater is intended to protect and whether there was any particular organization interested in securing this breakwater at Okanagan Landing?

Mr. Green: As I recall it, requests were made from different bodies in Vernon, including the boat club or yacht club. I do not remember the exact name of the organization. In building those projects we always take account of the number of tourists who will be making use of them. A great many tourists are now using small boats from Okanagan Landing. Also, there is considerable danger in a south wind. The departmental officials decided that the request for a breakwater there was in order and that this work should be done. I expect the hon. member will be pleased to know—he already knows it—that we are going to put in a ramp at Boswell in Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: I am pleased with that and I know the residents are; but on this vote I do want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that an identical situation exists in the community called Nakusp in my constituency where many United States tourists use small boats, and the bay suffers from a south wind.

Dredging—

689. Construction or acquisition of plant and equipment—further amount required, $250,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister tell us what kind of dredging equipment is being constructed or purchased by the department?

Mr. Green: This vote of $250,000 provides for the construction or acquisition of new equipment to augment the present fleet, or replace existing worn-out plant, such as dredges, tugs and so forth, required to maintain departmental dredging across Canada. This particular item provides $125,000 for Prince Edward Island—

Mr. Chevrier: May I simplify the matter? This is really not what I wanted to know. Does the department do its own dredging with its own fleet of dredges, or is it done by contract? Is this item for the purpose of purchasing a dredge?

Mr. Green: The department does some of its own dredging and does some by contract. We believe, as the previous government did, that it is essential that the department should be able to do some of its dredging for one reason, namely to check on costs of the work done by the dredges which are privately owned. The sum of $50,000 of this vote is towards replacement of dredge No. 14 in Prince Edward Island; $25,000 is toward a new tug in Prince Edward Island; $50,000, alterations to dredge No. 12 in Prince Edward Island; $25,000 is for a five-drum hoist, dredge No. 201 on lake Winnipeg; and $100,000 is to provide for a contract to replace the Essington, which is a snag boat on the west coast.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the largest dredge owned by the department and where is it located?

Mr. Green: The largest dredge is one on the west coast; it was built within the last two years and is No. 203.

Item agreed to.

690. Maintenance and operation of graving docks, locks and dams—further amount required, $52,625.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister tell me whether any of this is for a graving dock in Montreal?

Mr. Green: The sum of $40,175 of this vote is for the Champlain drydock and $6,950 for the Lorne drydock, both in the province of Quebec, and $5,500 for concrete walls at the Champlain graving dock.

Item agreed to.

General—

691. Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for: a maximum of $15,000 may be expended in respect of any one work and, with the approval of treasury board, that maximum may be increased to $25,000 in the case of any one building construction project—further amount required, $400,000.

Mr. Pearson: May I bring up a work under miscellaneous works which is certainly not miscellaneous but very important and which I probably should have brought up under 667, but unfortunately I could not be in the committee at that time. It has to do with a federal building in Elliot Lake where the need, of course, as the minister knows, is very great. The site has at last been secured. I would like to impress on the minister the need for getting ahead with this building in this growing community.

Mr. Green: As the Leader of the Opposition said, there has been considerable difficulty in obtaining a satisfactory site at Elliot Lake, but this problem has now been settled and we shall get ahead with the construction of the building just as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Pearson: I understand the services have been in a temporary building on the assumption that a new building would be constructed soon. I hope that construction will soon begin.

Mr. Green: We are pushing ahead with this building just as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Garland: May I inquire as to the status of the dock to be built at Lavigne, Ontario? The project was approved at least two years ago but it could not be proceeded with because of the relocation and the rebuilding of a road by the department of highways of Ontario. What is the status at the present time?

Mr. Green: Unfortunately, no provision is made for this project but I will have it checked at once.

Mr. Bourget: We are making good progress and I wonder whether the minister would not permit me to ask whether the figures put on Hansard on June 27 by the hon. member for Victoria are official. I assume he must have got them from the department. I am quite sure the minister has not got the figures here but I should like to know if these figures are official.

Mr. Green: Those were figures concerning the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Bourget: I know.

Mr. Green: I have not had them checked but I will be glad to do so and then let the hon. member have an answer to his question.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

371. To provide for the expenses incurred in constructing and supervising construction of married quarters, rental housing, schools and related services on behalf of the Department of National Defence, $720,000.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, although the minister's estimates were originally called as far back as June 6, I believe, today is really the first opportunity we have had to discuss in a general way the very important subject of housing in this country. It is not my intention to be in any way provocative. Instead I hope to make a straightforward examination of some of the facts that may be useful. It is not my intention to oppose what is being done but rather to urge this government to do more.

I suppose no other field has been the cause of so much mutual appreciation by members of the government, and perhaps that is understandable to a degree, as when they refer to their selfstyled marvellous achievements in the field of housing. The minister has himself on numerous occasions referred to the record number of housing starts, but how much of this is really due to government action? It is that aspect with which I should like to deal.

Let us now look at the facts. When parliament met on May 12 government funds had been exhausted. The Prime Minister had promised during the campaign, at which time these funds were exhausted, that more funds would be made available. Here again is another example of the government's flair for publicity which we have dealt with earlier, and I have no objection. The throne speech debate was set aside because of the so-called urgency of the situation.

The government requested and received from parliament $350 million and with the passing of this legislation much credit was taken by the government for its efforts in housing. They praised themselves for the efforts achieved by their agency lending program. Yet only a few days after this legislation was rushed through parliament the government slammed the door on agency loans and took unto themselves new authority, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to enter directly into the loan field in the larger centres.

This dropping of the agency loan aspect and changing of policy caused many Canadians genuine concern. After all, people in the lower income brackets were having difficulty enough trying to arrange their financing. As I have said on earlier occasions, the lending institutions will prove to be even more selective when handling their own funds. This will cause extra hardship for the lower income borrower.

However, may I pursue the matter of the $350 million that was rushed through parliament. As I have said, only a few days later the government's policy was changed and they took the position of residual lender only. As early as June 5, Dr. Stewart Bates, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, had this to say on this subject:

> It is anticipated by the government that this $350 million will keep us going for a year or two, and that is why we have stopped the agency arrangement at this moment of time and we are standing merely on residual loans to take care of those who cannot be picked up elsewhere. At the moment, we are leaving it to the banks and other companies to carry the program. It may be that by next September housing may be petering off in a way that the government does not like. If there has been a good demand for housing, if there are no unsold houses in December, it might be a wise policy for them to produce some more houses next winter.

Now, my point is this. How can the government take full credit for a house building program that is being supported largely by the banks and other lending institutions? Of course, there is another version of this change in government policy. Perhaps the government is seeking more control in the field of housing. If this is true, then the government should say so. If they are seeking the use of public funds to control the number of starts made in a given period of time, then this attempt to control should be made known to the public.

Perhaps their change in policy is an attempt to hold back funds in order to assist during a future period of unemployment. I would not necessarily argue with that kind of a proposition but if this is government policy then I think they should say so.

However, regardless of the government's policies or lack of policies, the hard fact remains that the national housing legislation, desirable though it is, has been incapable of assisting 50 per cent of the Canadian people. Unfortunately, it is the 50 per cent of our Canadian wage earners who are in the medium and lower income brackets. We all recognize the splendid contribution made by the National Housing Act since its inception, but I think all will agree that it no longer does the job that was originally intended. While the top 50 per cent of the Canadian earning scale are being well looked after, the 50 per cent of our people in the lower half of the income scale are desperately in need of homes and it would seem that there is no relief in sight for them. In fact, the move is the other way. While the sizes and quality of homes grow each year to meet the popular demand from the top half, the accommodation and facilities in the lower half grow steadily worse. At this point I should like to quote very briefly from a story written by Harvey Hickey, a well-known press gallery correspondent, which appeared in the Globe and Mail and which emanated from committee meetings held in the other place. The headline reads: "Thinks All New Houses Over $20,000 Shortly", and the article goes on to say in part:

> The point is rapidly being reached where it will be impossible to build a house for less than $20,000 in the Toronto area, the Senate finance committee was told today. This statement was made by L. A. Rice, president of the Toronto metropolitan home builders association—

There is a desperate need for low rental housing. As was pointed out at a recent conference of Ontario housing authorities at Niagara Falls, of the existing stock of four million dwelling units one million are over 50 years old. Half of these are in need of major repairs. It was also pointed out that one family in eight does not have private accommodation and that many of our people are living in substandard homes.

I believe that emphasis should be placed on the low rental aspect of housing. I believe greater emphasis should be placed on the federal - provincial - municipal partnership basis, which would contribute to a greater degree to slum clearance and the rehabilitation of substandard dwellings. This is the kind of investment plan which would pay handsome dividends in the form of reduced welfare expenditures, public health, police and fire protection costs. I know the initiative for such a partnership should come from the municipalities but I would suggest that the federal authorities have a greater responsibility in bringing to the attention of the municipalities the economic benefits of such projects. With 50 per cent of our people sorely in need of better housing accommodation I suggest there is little room for complacency by the government.

We have heard several proposals in recent weeks. One was that the three levels of government, in co-operation, could acquire substandard dwellings before they fell into complete decay, rehabilitate them and lease them to those families in dire need of shelter at truly low rental figures. I would be interested to know what the government thinks of this proposition.

There is also the matter I raised in the house earlier this session, the proposition of making the financing of older homes easier. In other words, the government has been urged to take action to create a used house market as fluid as the used car market. I am wondering what the government's attitude is on this subject and if it feels this would assist families in the lower income brackets. I am sure that all of us recognize that financing of this kind is very difficult.

Many of our lower income people are forced to pay exorbitant rates of interest in an attempt to acquire even substandard accommodation. Most of us are aware of the hopeless plight of the low income borrower. He is at the mercy of every loan shark in his community, and is denied assistance through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation because of a wage level barrier. I suggest this is not good enough for 1958, and I should like to know what the government intends to do about it.

I know it is not the responsibility of an opposition to outline policy for a government, but frankly our people are concerned about the apparent vacuum that seems to exist in so far as this government is concerned in the field of housing, and especially so soon after the election. The government must know that 50 per cent of our people are improperly housed and are unable to improve their position through the facilities of the National Housing Act, as it is presently constituted. This is a fact. I just want to repeat that. The government knows 50 per cent of our people are improperly housed and are unable to improve their position through the facilities of the National Housing Act as it is presently constituted, yet they do very little.

I know that the government will be quick to say, but look at this new minimum house project. Well, let us look at it. If we take the minister's own words, this minimum house was designed primarily for erection in the less populated areas. While we all recognize the need for better housing in some of the more sparsely populated areas, it would seem doubtful if this minimum house will likely do much to improve the situation.

In reply to a question I put to the minister concerning Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation's attitude to this type of construction in the larger centres, the minister very properly pointed out that he doubted very much whether these homes could be built for this price in the larger centres. Therefore, it would seem evident from the minister's own statements on this subject that this minimum house project will do nothing to improve housing conditions generally, except in some rural areas.

Without being unduly critical of the government's minimum house or those who designed it, I doubt very much if its design and specifications will measure up to the desires or to the rightful ambitions of our rural population. I think it is a serious mistake for the government to assume that because people live in small communities they will be satisfied with second class accommodation. Since it is unlikely that this minimum house will meet the standards desired by our rural people and cannot, according to the minister, be built at the prices announced in urban areas, I know you will understand my hesitation at being overenthusiastic about the project at this time. However, we will be watching the acceptance of this unit in the next few months. I am sure it is the hope of all of us, and I underline this, that because of the unprecedented high cost of standard housing our people will not be forced into this minimum house construction.

Again, I do not want to be unkind or unfair, but I respectfully suggest that mass production of this minimum house, having regard for all the circumstances, could well develop into the slums of tomorrow. I would remind the minister that up to this point the corporation has a proud record of upgrading housing generally throughout Canada. While I do not wish to be critical of the government in this regard, I suggest that there are many other avenues open to them to ensure a steadier flow of housing in the future.

I should like to review very briefly some of these points. First, all of us are well aware of the lack of stability in the flow of mortgage funds in our respective communities. I do not believe you have any better example of this than what has transpired in the last few months. Last fall the private funds dried up and the government moved in. Then government funds were exhausted and the government promised more. The private lending institutions put money into the field. Then parliament met and more funds were approved. The government decided to cancel out their program for agency loans, and then the private institutions rushed in and since May they have been carrying the bulk of the load.

I suggest that that sort of indecision, that sort of lack of stability in providing mortgage funds in this country, does tend to have an upsetting effect. I know the government will be quick to point out the number of starts. There are many reasons to account for the number of starts. I suggest that one is the desire of all our people to have better housing, and a second is the willingness of private lending institutions, as I have shown here, to rush into the field during the last few months.

Now, I have often dealt with this subject in the house. I think it is a matter that should have most careful scrutiny by the government in order to make sure that the house construction industry can move ahead in an orderly fashion, secure in the knowledge that mortgage funds will be available. I am sure that hon. members from all parts of the house know of the reluctance of many of the lending institutions to make loans in this or that area in this or that year. Builders may well develop plans for a project, only to find the lending institutions have temporarily, and often without notice, changed their lending policies in that particular area. I sincerely believe there is a real need for a special study of this matter to ensure, as I said earlier, a steadier flow of mortgage funds for house construction.

While I am on the subject of mortgage funds, and again I do not wish to be unduly critical, may I suggest that the corporation should give consideration to finding ways and means of processing loans more expeditiously. I suppose there is not a member of this house who has not had complaints, especially from the small builders, concerning what seems to be a needlessly long delay in the cash advances to the builders. How many times have we heard them indicate their preference for a project that was being financed through the regular financial institutions rather than through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? This preference resulted from the longer waiting period apparently required by the corporation to process these advances. The need for more expeditious processing becomes more apparent if the corporation is to continue playing a major role in financing.

Another point I should like to stress at this time is that the government could lower the down payment required and in this way assist in home construction. This, of course, only adds to the carrying charges and monthly payments but it does make it easier for many of our people to take their first step.

Then, too, the government could lower the interest rate. This would be a really worthwhile contribution towards lowering the cost of houses to our people. All of us remember the frequent outbursts of the present Minister of Finance when he was on this side of the house concerning interest rates. I am not going to delay the house by reading the minister's many comments concerning the sins of high interest rates. However, I suppose the government has become so involved with its own need for borrowing that it is afraid to lower the interest rates. Here again is proof of the fact that the public, that section of the public which can least afford it, has to pay for the folly of this free-spending government.

The government could lengthen the amortization period. The average life of a home, especially with the better care it is receiving today, is much longer than the 25-year amortization period. I think we have every reason to expect an increasing life for the homes being built today. Surely, it is necessary and desirable to lengthen this amortization period. The former government, on earlier occasions, did contribute to lengthening this period to its present 25 years through amendment to the National Housing Act, and also showed real leadership in lowering the downpayment provisions below what they used to be, as well as lowering the interest rates.

Our people are also genuinely concerned about this question of increasing land costs. I realize that one of the reasons for this increase in land costs is brought about by municipalities transferring what used to be their responsibility for bringing in the trunk sewers and other services, to the land developer. These costs are now being added to the price of the land and, naturally, find their way into the mortgage. Normally, these costs would be paid on the old standard local improvement basis through the municipality. So far as the home owner is concerned, he is not too disturbed. He pays off this additional amount over a 25-year period, rather than in the usually much shorter period under municipal financing.

However, there are many other factors that are contributing to the unusually high cost of serviced land throughout Canada, and it is to these problems that the government should be devoting their attention. Much greater use could be made of the section of the act that provides for land development on a joint co-operative basis, with the province and the municipality joining with the federal government, the latter paying 75 per cent of these costs. This legislation, where given effect, has proved very satisfactory, and I believe the government should be doing more in this field. Here again the initiative comes from the municipal or local level; but here again is an opportunity for the federal government to show leadership.

Another point I wish to make is this. The government could decrease the income requirements, thereby making the facilities of the National Housing Act legislation available to many more in the lower income categories. In this way, many of our people could make their own decision as to precisely the kind of obligations they would assume. I am sure that in the majority of cases their decision would be to buy a better home.

Mr. Chairman, there is much that could be done in the field of housing by this government. Why does it fail to act, in view of the very pressing needs of our people? Why does it choose to stand by and take credit for the house building program that is being instituted now, largely through the facilities of the lending institutions, and ignore the fact that 50 per cent of our people in the lower half of the income scale are improperly housed?

This is a time for bold and aggressive planning. This is a time for additional emphasis on research to find ways and means of, first, lowering the cost of housing and, second, making adequate housing facilities available to all of the Canadian people now in need. In its endeavours in this regard I am sure it will have the support of all hon. members in this chamber, regardless of party.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Nipissing is by nature cheerful and optimistic. I could not help feeling sorry for him as I noticed the sadness in his voice as he dealt with the housing situation in Canada today. I should hate to have him go back to North Bay in this terribly depressed frame of mind. Within the next 15 or 20 minutes I think I can make the world look infinitely better for him than it was when he rose to speak.

Whatever the faults of the government may have been, our housing policy has been one of our accomplishments of which we are extremely proud. Our only regret is that we have so little opportunity to tell the house and the Canadian people all about it. I would ask the hon. member, if he will, to think back to the situation a year ago or prior to June 10, 1957. Then he really had something about which to feel sad. Housing starts were falling off. Mortgage money was drying up. The house-building industry, which is Canada's largest, was heading for a depression. Thousands and thousands of builders across Canada would have been out of work last winter if something had not been done by the new government about this condition. Lumber mills would have been losing money and suppliers of other commodities would have been having an extremely difficult time if conditions had been allowed to continue as they were prior to June 10 of last year.

I am really surprised that the hon. member made the speech he has made today. His memory is extremely short. As everyone knows, within a few weeks of taking office the new government decided that something must be done to prevent a depression in the housebuilding industry and to help provide homes for those Canadians with modest incomes. We adopted the agency loan plan for small homes. There was available under the National Housing Act $150 million to be used on a new policy. We initiated the small homes loan plan. It was such a great success that last December we came back to the house and obtained an additional $150 million.

Mr. Garland: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Garland: Will the minister not admit that the only reason that it went so well was that the normal source of supply of funds had dried up?

Mr. Green: The normal source of supply had dried up before the Liberal government went out of power. They were doing absolutely nothing about the matter. We met this problem. As I pointed out, we provided an additional $150 million in December. By February that money had been going out so rapidly and houses had been started to such an extent across Canada in wintertime that we were obliged to stop loans for rental units during that month. By the time the new parliament assembled here in May practically all of the money had been used up. I have here the figures. By May $255,009,800 had been put out for small homes across Canada. Practically none of that money would have been spent and practically none of those homes would have been built if we had not adopted this small homes policy a year ago. It meant 26,030 units, small homes, for people with modest incomes.

We came to this new parliament during this session; one of the very first moves we made —I think it was within a week of the time the house assembled—was to bring in an amendment to the National Housing Act providing an additional $350 million in order that we could continue to encourage the construction of small homes. As of last week, $118,021,073 had been advanced. This is up to August 29. That amount was divided as follows. There was the matter of cleaning up the agency loan plan. Certain applications had been in when we ran out of money. We decided that it was only fair to enable those builders who had applied for money to get their loans from the funds that were voted in May. For that purpose $25,744,092 was advanced. That meant 2,163 additional small homes. Those are not rental units; those are small homes. In addition, for limited dividend companies which provide low rental units $21,304,281 has been advanced since May. That is infinitely more than had been advanced in a like period at any time since the National Housing Act became law. For our residual loans since May we have advanced $65,980,505. This is all since May of this year and the hon. member for Nipissing says we have been doing nothing— we have been sitting back and letting the housing situation deteriorate.

Now I am going to go to my prepared speech, Mr. Chairman. I am just a bit annoyed about the sadness with which the hon. member for Nipissing approached this problem. Before I get down to the speech which I have to read I may say that between January 1 and August 31 of this year $26,296,476 has been lent under the limited dividend schemes which is over $10 million more than was put out in the same time last year. I should also like to point out another fact which will cheer the hon. member, that loans in small centres in which he is particularly interested, from January 1 to July 31 loans have been made in respect of 14,581 units as against 7,531 units in 1957 and that in the month of July 1958 there were 1,000 more loans granted in small centres than there were in July 1957. These figures are going to be even more impressive in the future because we have a campaign going on to push these loans in the small centres, and every week these loans are increasing; by the time the hon. member gets back here next January we will be able to cheer him up even more on this particular point. And now to get down to this speech, because it explains what is going to happen from now on.

On May 20 of this year, by amendment to section 22 of the National Housing Act, parliament voted additional funds in an amount of $350 million for new housing through the direct lending programs of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. By the way, we were in indirect lending under our agency plan—it was our money that was going out through the offices of the banks and the lending institutions—now we are dealing direct with borrowers. The corporation was instructed to make direct residual loans on small homes to qualified applicants who are unsuccessful in obtaining loans from approved lenders. We then deliberately put ourselves in a residual position because we did not want to take over the business of providing all the mortgage money needed to build homes in Canada. This is the job of the lending institutions, and we have deliberately put ourselves into a residual position. Under the present policies, these loans are made as follows:

(a) To prospective home owners for small homes. Refusal letters from two approved lenders must be obtained if the property is in an area having a population in excess of 55,000. One refusal letter is required in other areas.

(b) To merchant builders for small homes, provided that the aggregate of direct loans since September, 1957 does not exceed 25 dwelling units. We put that limit on last summer that no builder could get more than 25 units, the idea being to spread the money out across the country and to as many different builders as possible and in particular to help smaller builders. The builder must obtain a refusal letter from each of two approved lenders that could normally be expected to make loans in the area. This is the plan under which the builders have been working from May until today.

(c) To limited-dividend corporation for low rental housing. Apart from these, direct loans are not available for rental housing. We believe in these limited dividend corporation houses. That is the way to get the cheapest rents and therefore to help people with the least money. They are particularly beneficial where a service club or a church forms a limited dividend corporation for this purpose.

The statistics of these residual loans which I have given to the house from time to time indicate clearly that there is a demand for National Housing Act financing of the smaller house, and it is the smaller house in which this government is interested.

[Mr. Green.]

Between May 20 and August 31 of this year the corporation has made 8,302 loans for small homes in an amount of $91.7 million including the balance of agency loans. This total comprises 1,593 loans for $16.6 million to home owners in communities of 55,000 population and under; 784 loans for $8.4 million to home owners in centres of more than 55,000 population; and 5,925 loans for $66.7 million to builders in all areas. These were builders who had not previously used their quota of 25 mortgages.

In addition, from January 1 to August 31, 1958 the corporation made 33 limited-dividend loans comprising 3,325 units in an amount of $26.3 million. Of these totals, nine loans for 646 units in an amount of $5 million were approved prior to May 20. The balance, or 24 loans for 2,679 units in an amount of $21.3 million, have been made since that date.

At the same time approved lenders have almost doubled their insured lending under the act and they are expected to continue to lend at a high rate for the remainder of the year. These are the approved lenders, making regular insured N.H.A. loans. During the 35 weeks ended August 31 approved lenders made 33,285 insured loans in an amount of $391.3 million. This volume compares with 18,743 loans for $212 million in the same period last year. Almost doubled, the committee will note, and these are the loans made by the lending institutions quite apart from the small home loan plan of the government. The 1958 aggregate of all loans—insured and direct—approved under the National Housing Act to August 31 represents 54,916 units, which is more than double the number financed in the same period last year. Indeed, the total in 1958 to date exceeds the volume for the whole of 1957.

Taking into consideration these activities for which there is federal sponsorship or federal participation together with the normal flow of residential construction outside the National Housing Act I am convinced that total starts in 1958 will be of the order of 150,000 units. I believe that as a result of the policy I am announcing in a few minutes that might reach 160,000. Even 150,000 would constitute a record year and compares with the previous record of 138,276 starts in 1955—the highest to date—127,311 starts in 1956 and 122,340 starts in 1957. This means that there will probably be 30,000 more housing starts in 1958 than there were in 1957. That, I can assure my hon. friend, is largely due to the way in which this government has handled the housing problem. We also expect completions, as distinct from starts, to reach approximately 150,000 units which again would be a record.

Because residual loans are restricted to small, basic houses—for example, a 3-bedroom bungalow is limited to 1,050 square feet—they are making a particularly valuable contribution to families of lower incomes. This is borne out by the most recent comparison of insured loans by approved lenders and direct loans by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the period January 1 to June 30, 1958.

Mr. Chairman, may I have permission to have printed in Hansard a table setting out figures for the average income, cost, loan and down payment for insured and direct loans.

The Chairman: Has the minister unanimous consent for the publication of this table in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the table is as follows:

	Insured loans	Direct loans	Per cent decrease
Average income ..	$ 6,148	$ 5,153	16.2
Average cost	15,453	13,402	13.3
Average loan	11,725	11,028	5.9
Average down payment	3,723	2,374	36.3

The hon. member mentioned that he would like to see the down payments decreased still further. I would be delighted to do that if I thought it were feasible. We did decrease the down payments in December. It will be observed that the average down payment under insured loans was $3,728 and the average down payment under direct loans was $2,374, a difference of approximately $1,400.

Commitments under section 22 of the National Housing Act from March 1954 to August 31 of this year total $505.9 million. Doubt has been expressed in some quarters that a new housing program of this magnitude could easily and quickly be absorbed into our economy. We have had to watch all the time to ensure that we did not break the market for small homes and did not assist in the construction of more homes than could be sold. This is something that my hon. friend as a businessman will realize has to be watched by the government. These doubts are dissipated, however, by statistics on completed and unsold houses which show that although completions are some 10,000 units higher than last year at the same time, completed and unsold dwellings were 2,028 in July or 8 per cent lower than in July, 1957.

I believe hon. members will agree that this adds up to a most encouraging picture. The government's actions have given a new and vigorous fillip to the housebuilding industry. Canadian families with lower incomes have been enabled to obtain their own new homes and, of paramount importance, the heavy volume of new house construction has had a tremendous impact upon the employment situation.

I do not think any Canadian will dispute that the small home policy of this government has meant thousands and thousands of jobs in the last year in Canada.

We are naturally pleased with the results. However, the government wishes to ensure that a supply of mortgage money adequate to maintain employment in the construction of small homes is available in the months ahead. The direct lending programs for homeowners and for limited dividend rental housing will, of course, continue and I am happy to inform the committee that as far as builder loans are concerned—and the merchant builders are the ones who are able to build a lot of houses quickly and that is what is needed to help create employment in the winter—an additional allotment of 25 residual loans will be made available to merchant builders, effective immediately. To be considered, completed and signed applications must be received by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation prior to December 31, 1958.

Many house builders and particularly the larger ones exhausted their allotment of 25 direct loans last winter. The government is acting to provide new quotas at this time so that builders in areas where demand is buoyant will not be delayed because of a lack of mortgage funds and will be able to proceed with another winter's operations.

The present quota of 25 to a builder will lapse. In other words, a builder who did not take advantage of the first allotment may now use only the second quota of 25. Similarly, if a builder has used ten of his original 25, he may now obtain only a total of 25, not 40. And if a builder has already used his full 25, he is still entitled only to an additional 25.

I must emphasize that this is a residual or backstop lending operation and is directed only toward the small home. I should also point out that the "minimum house" I announced to the house last week is only one type of dwelling unit that may be financed under the government's small home loan program. In other words, the financing arrangements I have been discussing today are not limited to minimum houses but may include others, provided the designs conform to the requirements already laid down as to floor area.

There are two other points. Previously, builders could qualify only if they had been engaged in house construction as merchant builders prior to September, 1957. Under the revised policy, builders may be admitted who operated for the first time subsequent to that time but prior to September 1, 1958.

Secondly, a builder will not receive direct loans if, at the time of application, he has more than five completed but unsold units comprising both insured and direct loans. The purpose of this restriction is, of course, to avoid direct lending to builders who have no market for their product.

Mr. Chairman, there can be no question of the impact already made by the government's actions in supplementing the flow of mortgage funds. We are equally certain that the current program, stimulated by this additional allotment of 25 loans to a builder, will ensure the construction of small homes in those areas where they are required and will, furthermore, make a vital contribution to the employment picture in Canada during the ensuing winter months.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I have three separate questions to ask the minister. Before doing so I should like to congratulate him on the move he has just announced. It sounds as though it may be of considerable assistance with respect to unemployment this winter at least in certain areas of which I can think.

The minister indicated six or seven weeks ago that he might make a statement on his estimates on a matter which was the cause of some controversy that raged several months ago, about the relative efficiency of the employees working for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as compared with standard civil servants. This will be the subject of my first question. The minister is in charge of both a department that engages stock civil servants and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We would appreciate very much having his opinion on the subject of the controversy that raged at that time. We would also like to hear his views about some of the suggestions that were made to the effect that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation employees should be brought under the civil service commission. I do not ask this question in an attempt to drag up a subject with which the minister perhaps does not want to deal.

Since the original controversy there has been quite a lot of talk going around in Ottawa. I have heard many pros and cons from civil servants and other people in the community. In a sense it is almost an Ottawa problem. I have heard some civil servants say some very biting things about the actual working conditions in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that would tend to ridicule the efficiency about which the director was so proud when he was before the committee in the other place. There must be another side to it. We would like to hear from the minister now.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I have been minister for only a little over a year but my experience has been that both the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Department of Public Works are extremely efficient. The corporation like, I think, most other crown corporations, is set up on a business organization basis and for that reason quite a few of its practices are different from those of a department. This is just one example of the faculty of Canadian people for working out a common-sense method of doing their business. A great deal of the publicity given in the press was sensational headline publicity and deserved to be considered as such. I have here the whole story about Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. From the peak of the staff employment in July 1956, when they had 2,369 people employed, to the end of April 1958, when they had 1,889 people employed, there had been a staff reduction amounting to 480 persons. At no time were there any mass dismissal or other such method used in reducing the staff. The reasons for the reduction were entirely those of greater efficiency and a change in the emphasis on the corporation's activities and the low trough of loan activities which occurred during the period from July 1956 to midsummer 1957. My memo does not say June 10, 1957 but it does say to the midsummer of 1957.

The staff reduction of 480 consisted of only 178 actual terminations owing to reductions in the establishment of various offices. This reduction of 178 took place over a period of 18 months, but the major portion was effected during the spring of 1957; for example, 118 in February 1957; 34 in April 1957; seven in March; and six in May. At the same time, during that same period, an additional 75 persons who had been hired did not complete their probationary period satisfactorily and consequently had their employment terminated. Then, there were 227 people who voluntarily resigned and were not replaced, so that the summary of the 480 works out in this way: employment terminated owing to establishment reduction, 178; employment terminated at the end of the probationary period, 75; voluntary resignations which were not replaced, 227; a total of 480.

The officials of the corporation point out that because of the drop in loan activity they would have been justified in dispensing with superfluous staff in the late months of 1956, but they did not do that because of the difficulty of obtaining employment. They kept the people on until the next spring.

As far as grading and salaries are concerned, the corporation endeavours to be as nearly as possible on the same basis as a government department. In other words, it follows the pattern set down by the civil service commission. This, indeed, is the story, and I must say that I do not believe either the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the civil service commission or the department deserves very much criticism. I think they are each doing a very good job in their own field.

Mr. Fisher: Before we leave this I would like to remind the minister that the original sensational charges were triggered by members of his own party.

One of the questions I would like to direct to the minister relates to the tremendously increased activity that he is talking about. I am sure it has to be true because of the figures. Is that being done without any increase in the staff of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Green: I am advised that with the additional loan impact total of 1957 that this year it has been necessary to take on temporary help to the number of about 120 this summer in order to substitute for employees on vacation. The corporation really has done a magnificent job in handling this small home loan plan.

Mr. Fisher: Is any consideration being given at this time to the proposition that has been mentioned in the house before, especially by Mr. Speaker when he was a private member, namely the question of the activities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation being directed toward construction or supporting the construction of university residences? I raise this matter because there has been some criticism, and also some support, of the fact that in its grants the Canada Council has given a considerable amount of money to universities for residential construction. This is all very good, but I have seen it suggested in several newspapers that such grants would not be necessary if there was some scheme such as Mr. Speaker advocated several years ago. Has the minister anything to say on that?

Mr. Green: This is one of the possible changes which is still under consideration. The Senate committee which investigated Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation recommended against any such policy being adopted.

Mr. Fisher: Because the Senate committee recommended against it I hope that is not the last word, Mr. Chairman.

My final question relates to the low cost homes which the minister announced. I am very intrigued with the plan. I hope one or two other plans will be developed within the same price range although I imagine in this particular plan there will be quite a number of adaptations. What I am asking really supports the point made by the member of the Liberal party who spoke and sort of asked or prayed that the government would try to give leadership in those smaller communities. I am thinking of the communities of 1,500 to 2,000 people where there are no lending institutions and quite often the builders have to go to larger communities nearby. I am thinking of it specifically in terms of my own constituency and of 10 or 15 communities where the office is a great distance away. I think of a place like Hornepayne which is some 380 miles away from Fort William. How is the corporation planning to link up with those small communities?

This is such a worth-while scheme and yet I am afraid it may founder on some of the doubts expressed by the hon. member who just spoke. How are you going to sell this plan in the smaller communities? I know that the minister challenged members to get out and do something about it and I hope to do so, but I would feel that it would have a much greater chance of success if there were a couple more field men operating in these smaller communities. I might point out to the minister that in my constituency is over one-third of all of Ontario and the office is tucked off in one corner in Fort William, not actually in my constituency. I do not think it is asking for too much, in relation to these small towns spread out to the eastward for over 300 miles, that there be some effort to cover them with field men in connection with these low cost homes. The nearest centres to the east are North Bay and Sudbury, a considerable distance away.

Mr. Green: Officials of the corporation are working on two additional sets of plans for these very low priced homes and it is expected that they will be ready in about a month. In addition, there are several practising architects working on similar plans. As I explained in the house some weeks ago, we have written to the mayor or reeve of every centre in Canada with a population of 1,500 or over pointing out the availability of the loans and the services that the corporation can render. In addition, we are willing to send a representative of the corporation to any municipality which wishes to have that done. There have been quite a few requests already for a visit of this type and the corporation is very glad to carry on that work. If additional field men are required we will see that they are engaged. We are very anxious to have the housing program used to a much wider extent than it has been in the smaller centres of Canada.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, this move by the government is very worth-while and I am hoping it will result in improved housing in small communities and also in rural areas throughout the country. We often hear it said that in certain large centres there are slum housing conditions. As one travels across the country one sees, no matter in what province, many rural homes that are in a very serious state which could well be described as slum conditions.

The national conference on winter employment was held in Ottawa some weeks ago and we have been looking forward to receiving the report of the conference. The report was promised yesterday by the Minister of Labour and has now been filed with the sessional papers office. I had understood that the report was to contain conclusions. It is not really a report of conclusions but merely a summary of proceedings. I was able to have the report in my own hands some days prior to it being tabled in the house and therefore I know that it does not arrive at any conclusions and is not the type of report I had in mind. But I am wondering whether the government has considered any incentives to endeavour to have as many houses as possible proceeded with during the winter months.

Mr. Green: I outlined the government's policy in that regard while the hon. member was out of the house.

Mr. Argue: I am very sorry. Would the minister be able to say whether there are particular incentives for companies engaging in winter construction? I do not mean only the fact that this program is now available and it is hoped that many of these houses will be built in the winter. Are there particular incentives along the lines suggested in the report of the conference which would encourage builders to construct homes during the winter months? The minister is quite right that I was out of the house when he referred to this particular feature.

Mr. Green: There is great incentive in the new policy because loans are only available up to December 31; also setting the number at 25 means that a builder can borrow money from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation up to approximately $250,000. We believe that this change in our small homes plan will result in the construction of a large number of homes during the winter. The work has to be started within a certain number of days after the application is made. The policy is deliberately designed so that the money must be used to build during the winter months. We had great co-operation from builders last year. It was largely because of the way in which they entered into the spirit of the plan for building these small homes in the winter time that the plan announced last August was so successful.

Mr. Argue: I am very pleased to hear that comment from the minister. Can he give the committee any indication at all as to how successful he thinks this plan will be in preventing what is sometimes called the normal or regular rise in unemployment in winter months? I notice that in the report of the conference the figure of 140,000 is used as being the additional number of persons who are unemployed during the winter months. Does the minister feel that the 140,000 can be wiped out entirely or reduced by half? Just how far does he think this very worth-while and important program he has been speaking about will be successful in reducing the figure of 140,000?

Mr. Green: This change in the plan should mean an additional 10,000 housing units being built during the winter months. If it does, that would call for about 40,000 men working directly on building. In addition, of course, there are the people who get employment making furniture and all the other items that are required to establish a home. No one can say just how many people will be engaged but we believe that this will be a great help as it was last winter and, as a matter of fact, as it has been all summer. The housebuilding industry in Canada, which is among the largest industries in the nation, has already had a tremendous year, the best year in its history. It may be that there will be 160,000 starts in Canada this year. I am not guaranteeing that but it just may happen.

Mr. Argue: The minister has made a very interesting statement and the figures he has quoted are undoubtedly impressive. If he could discuss with some of his colleagues in the cabinet an appropriate program for each of the departments which would go a substantial way toward reducing unemployment we might have a much better winter ahead than is now in prospect. The minister has stated what his department has done to help maintain the employment level that existed last winter and this summer. However, in spite of the good showing in home-building and in housing starts, as the minister knows very well, unemployment has been an exceedingly serious matter. I do not wish to detract from the value of the work the minister has undertaken, but merely express the hope that what is being accomplished in his department may be accomplished in other departments so that this very difficult question of winter unemployment may be solved.

Mr. Chairman, I shall tell you in advance that I am probably out of order. However,

I think it would be very wise if the Minister of Public Works could get the Minister of Labour in a little higher gear than he apparently seems to be. This house has had no report as yet from this conference on winter unemployment which was held on July 14 and 15. We have had no recommendations. It seems a reflection on parliament itself that at this very late date, almost two months after the conference was held, we merely get the proceedings of this conference tabled in this house.

Mr. Garland: I trust the minister was not too disturbed by my remarks.

Mr. Fisher: He likes people who whine.

Mr. Green: The hon. member is more cheerful already.

Mr. Garland: As I mentioned, I was not attempting to criticize but rather to urge the government to do more. Perhaps the minister did not hear my remarks in that connection. I noticed that the minister in dealing with this subject did not depart too far from his prepared text. So far as the announcement of the new policy being extended until December 31 of this year is concerned, and having regard to the continuing need for housing as well as the need for creating new jobs, we welcome it very much.

Mr. Fisher: One of the hon. members of the house most friendly to the minister's party placed the following resolution on the order paper earlier this session:

That in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of constructing suitable living quarters to provide accommodation, at reasonable rental rates, for non-resident members during the sessions.

I wonder if the government has given any consideration to that through its agency Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Green: We are really a great deal more interested in housing Canadians than members of parliament, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if the minister has given some thought—we all recognize the excellent job Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are doing—to finding some way of shortening the long waiting period for cash advances. I think most of us who have had anything to do with building are aware of this long waiting period which is a hardship to the smaller builder.

Mr. Green: I would be glad to look into that. As a matter of fact, it takes an average of just five days to process a loan. This is very fast work but there may be some way in which we can speed up the actual advance of the money.

Mr. Garland: Perhaps the minister misunderstood me. I am talking about cash advances, and I am not discussing the original approval of the loan. It is not in that connection. It is getting the money into the hands of the smaller builder faster.

Mr. Green: Apparently there is no delay once the title to the property is cleared. However, we shall be glad to look into the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. Garland: I think anyone who has had anything to do with this in a practical way knows that there is a long period of time which elapses. The big builder is able to take care of himself, but for a smaller builder who is building perhaps half a dozen or a dozen homes, it is a very real hardship.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This terminates the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

305. Operations—Including salaries and other expenses of staff post offices, district offices, railway mail service staffs, and supplies, equipment and other items for revenue post offices, including administration, and to authorize the re-appointment, effective the 16th day of September, 1955, of G. V. H. Christiaenssens as a postal clerk 2 in the Magog post office, at a salary of $2,700 per annum for the period from the 16th day of September, 1955, to the 31st day of March, 1956, and at a salary of $2,940 per annum for the period from the 1st day of April, 1956, to the 30th day of April, 1957, $101,387,706.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, on August 1 last, I asked the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) if he had received a petition protesting against the closing of the Fabre Station post office, which was established 33 years ago. Although the petition was not signed by all local residents, it was signed at least by the great majority of them. At that time, the minister replied in the affirmative.

In order to refresh his memory, I take the liberty of pointing out certain details in this connection. On behalf of the 29 people who had signed the petition sent to the Postmaster General, Mr. Ernest Demers wrote him the following letter:

Sir,

The signers of the attached petition have learned with much regret that, according to a notice received from Mr. W. J. Gagne, district director of postal services, North Bay, Ontario, file No. M-184, dated June 5, 1958, their Fabre Station post office, Quebec, Timiskaming county, would close on June 30, 1958, and be replaced by rural delivery.

Please note that this post office has been in existence for more than 33 years and serves 38 families.

Out of that number, 9 only are in favour of a rural mail delivery while 29 anxiously hope that the post office will remain. They do not want rural mail delivery which would delay for more than one day the delivery of our mail.

We therefore urge you, sir, to be kind enough to agree to the almost unanimous request of families served by this post office and to keep it in operation as in the past.

We would be most grateful to you.

Please accept, sir, the expression of our best wishes.

Yours truly,

Ernest Demers

The executive assistant to the Postmaster General answered as follows to the request I have just quoted:

Dear Mr. Demers:

This is to acknowledge receipt of the petition you sent to the Postmaster General on June 12 last in respect of the closing of the Post Office at Fabre Station and of the establishment of rural mail delivery.

Hon. Mr. Hamilton has taken note of your representations and will discuss the matter with your member of parliament, Mr. Paul Martineau, to whom you have forwarded a copy of your letter and of the petition.

I have in my hand a copy of that petition. It bears 29 signatures. I have also read the copy of a letter sent by Mr. Gagne to Mrs. Goulet, who was postmistress. Nothing in the file shows any serious reason, economic or otherwise, pointing to the necessity of closing that post office which seems to have been entirely satisfactory to the great majority of residents for 33 years.

I have found there nothing which would indicate that this was a matter of economy. I still think, though, there is a nigger in the woodpile inasmuch as the letter sent by the executive assistant to the Postmaster General contains the following words:

Hon. Mr. Hamilton has taken note of your representations and will discuss the matter with your member of parliament, Mr. Paul Martineau—

I wonder if this is not a political step rather than one designed to cut down departmental expenditures. Mrs. Goulet happens to be the wife of a former Liberal member of parliament, a man who was active in politics, though she herself was never so. We know, also, that it was just after the Conservative party had come into power that the post office at Fabre Station was closed in spite of the representations of the majority of the people of that community.

I would therefore like to ask the minister to provide a few explanations which would be such as to satisfy at least the people of Fabre Station who feel they should be treated as fairly as the other residents of this country.

Does the minister not intend answering my questions immediately?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think it might be a little bit easier and quicker if we heard the various questions first. Then I could deal with them altogether.

Mr. Caron: Suppose it is not on the same subject.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I know that everyone wants things speeded up.

Mr. Caron: If it is not on the same subject, I think it would be easier to answer each one separately.

Mr. Bourque: A short time ago, when the Postmaster General was before this house with his estimates I told him that I would ask him a couple of questions about some of the items that we had to deal with. One of those items was commemorative stamps. He was kind enough to write to me giving me all the necessary explanations. I want to thank him kindly for this explanation. I do not think it will be necessary for me to deal any further with this question.

I understand that it is the intention of the Post Office Department to revise the preferential rates granted newspapers, magazines, periodicals and all other publications that benefit from these cheaper rates, owing to the presumed heavy loss incurred in the transportation of these publications at preferential rates. When I say "publications" I mean newspapers, magazines, periodicals, directories, listings, technical books, et cetera, all the publications that come under the preferential postal rate. I understand that United States publications in millions of copies coming into Canada regularly, when mailed in the United States contribute nothing to the revenue of the post office but owing to their bulk add greatly to the cost of carrying this second class mail or, perhaps I should say preferential rate mail. These United States publications are in direct competition with our—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry to be obliged to interrupt the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, but this is a subject which is properly discussed under the first item, namely the administration branch which is responsible for the setting of rates and similar aspects of our postal operations. We are now on the operations section which deals with the day to day operations of the post office.

Mr. Bourque: Am I to understand that this matter comes under the next item? Am I to understand that I can deal with it on the next item?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): It comes under the previous item, namely that of administration, which was passed at the last sitting of the committee when these estimates were under consideration.

Mr. Bourque: Then I cannot speak on this item?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No. I am sorry because I appreciate hearing the views of the hon. member.

Mr. Caron: It can always be done by leave.

The Chairman: Order. If the hon. member is to be relevant to the item under discussion, it is quite correct that the only item to be discussed at present is item 305 which deals with operations.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I draw to your attention the fact that the hon. member is trying to discuss postal rates. Surely under the operations of the department, item 305, it is possible to do that because it deals here with district offices, railway mail service staffs, supplies, equipment and other items, including administration, and to authorize the reappointment of a certain person and so forth. Surely this is a matter that is going to take just a few minutes. I wish the Postmaster General would allow it to be discussed. It is a matter that has been on the mind of the hon. member for some time.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Perhaps we can reach an agreement. It is a fact that this matter should properly be discussed under the administration item. That is where it is to be dealt with. If we can reach an agreement I shall be glad to have the hon. member go ahead, but I just do not want a general debate to arise on the subject and to continue for several hours.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it will take that long.

Mr. Bourque: I thank the minister. These United States publications are in direct competition with our Canadian publications and many have so-called Canadian editions. They are a threat to the survival of our Canadian publications. United States publications account for a good part I believe, of the loss of $18 million which the post office has had to bear in the carrying of this preferential rate mail.

I should now like to make a plea to the Postmaster General on behalf of these Canadian publications. They inculcate in the minds of our Canadian citizens a true spirit of Canadianism. They promote Canadian unity, create a sense of pride in being a Canadian and, above all, they instil in every Canadian a love of Canada. They also spread Canadian knowledge and make us more conversant with things Canadian. They contribute, Mr. Chairman, to the formation of a truly Canadian mentality. Over and above that, they give employment to hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers. Many Canadian newspapers and publications find it extremely difficult to make a living with the present postal rates. An increase in postal rates would create severe hardship for them and perhaps cause many of them to discontinue publications, hence increasing unemployment.

United States publications are a detriment to our Canadian way of life. Our Canadian culture is seriously endangered by the reading of United States publications. They are making our citizens United States minded instead of being Canadian minded. Our children must be taught to believe in Canada. It is the greatest country in the world. It is the country that offers the youth the greatest advantages and the best future possible. We need Canadian publications to tell them so. By encouraging our Canadian publications we create more employment, thereby benefiting our national economy.

These workers pay all the taxes levied—municipal, provincial, federal, school and sales taxes—and they are happy to be able to contribute their share to the welfare of Canada. We need to help along our Canadian publications and ought not to burden them with a load they could not carry. Increasing the postal rates would cause many of them to fold up.

I should like the Postmaster General, if he can, to give us an idea what part of the $18 million that was lost by the post office last year can be attributed to Canadian publications and how much to United States publications. I think the people of Canada would be interested in knowing just what amount the Canadian publications would have to pay. It would be most unfair, in my opinion, to ask the Canadian publications to pay for a deficit that is in large part due to the United States publications which are coming in and which bring absolutely no revenue to Canada.

I asked the Postmaster General, the last time I was speaking, what the increase in postal rates will be—and I am shortening my speech, Mr. Chairman, so that I will not keep you too long—or what the cost per person would be per year for having two deliveries a day instead of one delivery. I believe the Postmaster General told me that he would have these figures to submit the next time his estimates came up for consideration. Might I have an answer now, because I have other things to carry on with. I have asked this before and I thought the Postmaster General would have this ready.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I will be glad to accommodate the hon. member if he has somewhere else to go. He devoted a considerable portion of his remarks to our Canadian publications, and the $18 million loss which was referred to by the Auditor General in his report. I think it is correct to say that that is an estimate rather than an exact figure. I think that point should be made because of what I am going to say next, which is that our accounting and our studies of this matter do not enable us to apportion whatever loss there might be on this operation between United States and Canadian publications. We have no breakdown in that respect.

The hon. member asked about the annual cost of two deliveries a day. If we were to restrict it to five days a week, the minimum cost would be $3,750,000 a year rising ultimately to, say, $4,340,000. If it was to be done twice a day, five days a week, with one delivery on Saturday the minimum figure would be $4,800,000 rising to $5,925,000. The rise is of course due to increased payment on account of salaries and wages as employees attain more seniority. I may add that on top of that the government would also be required to supply uniforms and equipment and bear various other costs entailed in this service.

Mr. Bourque: Suppose it were to cost $10 million more compared with one delivery a day. That would represent 59 cents per person per year based on a population of 17 million people. Does the minister not think that if for 59 cents we could have twice a day delivery it would not be a desirable thing to do, because in addition to providing more employment it is surely recognized that once a day mail delivery imposes a real hardship on the population which is becoming practically unbearable. I say that if for 60 cents a year we could have the benefits of twice a day delivery it would be well worth while for the post office to spend that sum. I am bringing these figures in to show what I am coming to.

The annual cost per year per person of the loan we are converting at the present time is $17 or, in the aggregate, $289,125,000 a year. Under the Liberal regime the same sum was borrowed at different times and it only cost the country $192,750,000 or $5.66 less per year per individual than is paid at the present time. If we can pay $96,375,000 more in interest under this regime than we paid for the same sum under the Liberal regime, surely we can spend 59 cents a year more per individual each year in order to get a twice a day mail delivery and have the people satisfied.

[Mr. Bourque.]

Mr. McWilliam: Mr. Chairman, the subject of twice a day delivery has been dealt with under the general item. I mention it only to show the minister's attitude toward mail delivery when he was an opposition member demanding twice a day service, as a preface to my opening remarks.

Some discussion took place previously with regard to postal services provided in rural areas. In the past I have urged the department to provide better rural mail services. In the majority of constituencies a large number of postal stations are served by bi-weekly or tri-weekly services and some by a once a week service. This low frequency service is out of step with the progress Canada has made in the past number of years. The situation is the same for tri-weekly service except that the waiting period is not quite as long. Why are many people living in rural areas subjected to inadequate mail services? Are they considered by the department as second class Canadians?

The minister might use the argument that the revenue does not warrant better service. This is a poor basis for argument in so far as postal services are concerned. Does the minister think that sufficient revenue is derived from postal patrons residing in street delivery areas to defray the costs of door to door delivery—I am sure he does not.

There are few, if any, postal areas that pay their own way if the costs of construction and maintenance of buildings used as post offices are taken into consideration—these costs are borne by the public works department—and also the cost of transporting mails to and from post offices by plane, train, trucks and other means of transportation.

Why do some Canadians enjoy modern, up to date mail services while other Canadians are served in the same manner, with the same degree of service as was available to our forefathers? In many rural areas the mail services have not been improved since the turn of the century.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member has been completely off this item since he started this speech. His speech relates to the transportation branch of the department. I think, however, that the hon. member might be allowed to continue in order to save time as long as we do not get involved in a debate on that subject.

Mr. McWilliam: I should have said at the beginning that I intended to make a passing reference to transportation but I believe I will be saving the time of the committee by continuing my remarks at this point. I am not going to list the mail routes that serve rural areas in the constituency of Northumberland-Miramichi on a twice a week and tri-weekly frequency, but I ask the minister to direct the attention of his officials to these areas with the end in view of improving services to daily frequency. I also request the minister to examine the scale of salaries that are paid rural postmasters because the remuneration paid in most cases is extremely low when compared with remuneration paid for the same number of duty hours in other fields either in the public service or in free enterprise.

In other departments of government part-time workers engaged for a few days each month aggregate more remuneration a year than what is paid some postmasters in rural areas who provide quarters and service six days a week for 52 weeks a year.

Charges of alleged political activities in support of the Conservative party have been made against a postmaster in Northumberland-Miramichi, who also holds a mail contract for a side service. Every member of parliament is aware of the Postmaster General's directive issued prior to the election warning them that they would be subject to dismissal if they took part in federal politics. I do not know if there is any foundation for this charge of political activity, nor do I intend to ascertain if this mail carrier was engaged in political activity in support of the Conservative party, my reason being that I am of the opinion that a mail carrier in his hours off duty should have the right to conduct himself as he sees fit.

It should be remembered that mail contracts are awarded to the lowest bidder. That was a policy strictly followed by the former Liberal government and one which, I trust, will be continued. The time of mail drivers, other than periods during which he performs the duties under his contract, should not be regulated as to his political activities by a directive issued by a minister of the crown any more than a contractor should not be directed not to accept any other form of employment in his off-duty hours.

There may have been charges of political activity made against mail drivers in support of the Liberal party. If any charges of alleged political activity have been filed with the department the officials should make sure that charges are fully substantiated before contracts are terminated.

Mr. Chairman, shortly after March 31 of this year I received a complaint, with the assurance that a sworn affidavit would be produced if requested, that a certain postmistress was openly canvassing votes for the Conservative party. This postmistress who is alleged to have made this canvass has provided splendid postal services for many years and continues to do so both as a postmistress and as a conveyor of mails as a contractor for a side service. In recognition of her past services I made repeated representations to the department a few years ago for an increase in remuneration but my efforts were unsuccessful.

I did not take any action on the charge made. No attempt was made to obtain a sworn statement because I felt that this postmistress was a victim of political pressure applied by a few people whom she classed as friends who incidentally, did not reside in this postal area and did not care if she jeopardized her position as postmistress or lost her mail contract.

I was surprised when I heard about the alleged actions in view of the splendid services rendered in the past and the fact that she never engaged in political activities in former years, keeping a strictly non-partisan attitude in keeping with her appointment as postmistress and her appointment each election year as a deputy returning officer for federal elections including the year 1958. In the best interests of the postal services and the patrons of this area I decided I would not take any action on the complaint.

The only reason these two cases of alleged political activity were brought before the committee is because the department has made a dismissal without justification for some unknown reason which appears to have a political taint. Mr. Chairman, on July 26 as found on page 2752 of Hansard of that date the member for Laurier asked the minister this question:

> May I ask the minister if following this statement and because of the directive referred to have there been any dismissals from the post office?

The member for Laurier was inquiring about dismissals due to political activities on the part of mail carriers.

The minister's answer found on the same page of Hansard was:

> In the case of rural mail carriers, Mr. Chairman, the answer is no.

The minister cannot make the same answer for the group of non-civil service postmasters and postmistresses. Perhaps the minister will tell the committee how many appointees in this group have been dismissed since March 31.

In the constituency of Northumberland-Miramichi the postmistress of a small revenue post office, namely, Baie Ste. Anne, has been dismissed. There are no reasonable grounds for this dismissal. On the contrary Mr. Chairman, all the known facts support the contention that the dismissal was totally unwarranted. When this postmistress took over the post office she did so after much persuasion by local postal patrons and on the request of area postal officials, after no other resident would accept the appointment. It was evident that this village would be without a post office if she did not accept the appointment. As a matter of fact this village was without a post office for a short period following the resignation of the former postmaster.

When this now dismissed postmistress accepted the appointment a part of her home was set aside and renovated to provide up to date service. Mail boxes and a general delivery wicket were installed at a considerable expense borne by the postmistress. The part of the home set aside for postal services was a self-contained unit and was accessible by an outside entrance used only by postal patrons. The accommodations provided were superior to the average accommodations found in most offices in rural areas. The post office was located in the centre of the community.

Since this postmistress accepted the appointment about 15 months ago the revenue of the post office tripled. District and area postal officials were completely satisfied with her performance of the duties involved. No reason was given the postmistress as to why her services were terminated. As far as she was concerned she never took the slightest part in any political activity and her services with the department were of the highest order.

The devotion to her postal duties as proven by the increases in revenue and the favourable declaration of the local postal patrons by their action in forwarding a signed petition requesting that no change be made are concrete proof of the efficient services rendered. Reliable information states that a petition signed by approximately 90 per cent of the postal patrons of this office requesting that the postmistress be retained was received by the department. The receipt of the petition is verified by the answer to my order paper No. 172. This petition was drafted and circulated by known supporters of the Conservative party and bears the signatures of a large number of supporters of the minister's own party.

It is stated that a copy of the petition was forwarded to the defeated Conservative candidate and when he was approached by a Conservative supporter, following receipt of the copy of the petition, it is alleged that the defeated candidate, who now administers both federal and provincial patronage, stated that he received the petition and that he had already recommended the dismissal of the postmistress.

Actions of this kind, Mr. Chairman, break down the morale of persons serving the public in the postal services. It places in jeopardy the appointment of non-civil service postmasters who are deemed to have cast a vote against this government, even though they never took the slightest part in politics.

This is the first time in my memory that a postmaster or a postmistress has been dismissed on trumped-up political reasons. It is the first time within my memory that anyone has been dismissed in the constituency of Northumberland-Miramichi for any reason other than inefficiency. In this case the people of Baie Ste. Anne are convinced that the action taken was purely of a political nature, one that had no foundation, one that was most unfair and unwarranted.

The husband of this postmistress is an active supporter of the Liberal party. He had no connection whatsoever with the post office. Surely, Mr. Chairman, a dismissal on this ground is out of keeping with our democratic system. My remarks on this dismissal have nothing to do with the newly appointed postmistress. She is a woman of splendid character and I would be the last person to criticize her or harm her good name.

This action is a new innovation in the Post Office Department and one that I would fight most strenuously if the Liberal party was in power. Non-civil service postal appointees should not be dismissed without cause, dismissed with no reason given, denied the opportunity of a right of appeal, dismissed on the recommendation of a defeated candidate of the party in power. With very few exceptions, the people of Baie Ste. Anne are indignant against the Post Office Department for such high-handed, unwarranted action meted out to one of their residents who gave splendid service and who is widely recognized as a person who never took part in politics of any kind. I feel sure the minister does not know the true facts of this case and, surely, he will have an independent investigation made, in view of the widespread protests, and if the facts are as I have presented them, then surely the course of justice will be followed and a reinstatement made. I urge, yes, Mr. Chairman, I demand that an independent survey be conducted toward bringing out the true facts surrounding this case to make sure that no injustice is done to this dismissed postmistress' good name, her character, integrity and ability.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Just before the hon. member resumes his seat will he tell me how long this dismissed postmistress held the position?

Mr. McWilliam: Mr. Chairman, I know exactly just what the Postmaster General is going to say. He is going to say that this woman's appointment—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Answer the question.

Mr. McWilliam: Restrain yourself and you will get an answer. He is going to say that this woman's appointment was never made permanent, but I say that is a very flimsy excuse, Mr. Chairman. She was sworn into office the same day as the Postmaster General was sworn in; she served faithfully for over a year, tripled the service there and it is the minister's responsibility to make that appointment permanent.

Mr. Houck: Mr. Chairman, when any group of civil servants are performing a splendid job I am not only willing but very happy indeed to say something on their behalf. I want to say to the Postmaster General and through the Postmaster General to his department that not only in Niagara Falls but in the Niagara district as a whole we have some of the finest civil employees that any department could have.

As the minister well knows, Niagara Falls is the outstanding tourist section of the country and not only in the Dominion of Canada but indeed in the world. Because of that fact our mail, especially in the summer, is exceptionally heavy with respect to the postal card service. I want to say to the minister, and I think he will agree with me —if he does not he can correct me if I am wrong—that all the men in the postal department, especially the postal men themselves, have to work four hours a day on every statutory holiday with the exception of Christmas and New Years. There is an old saying that the mail has to go through regardless of the weather.

I want to pay my respects to the postal men in Niagara Falls and district. They are a fine, courteous bunch. One thing has impressed me greatly, not only in Niagara Falls but in the area. Because of the great influx of tourists you will find that the letter carriers are stopped a dozen times a day when they are on their beat and asked for directions to various parts of the city and various parts of the province. These postal men are always courteous and willing to give advice. I say to the minister that we in Niagara Falls and in the Niagara district are indeed proud of his employees and I would plead with the minister and through him to his department to give consideration to increasing the small salaries they are receiving for the fine work they are performing.

Mr. Deschatelets: I have a very brief comment, Mr. Chairman. I have a letter from a Mrs. Leonora Starr, 129 Prospect street, Newmarket, Ontario, which contains, I think, a very interesting suggestion. Mrs. Starr has noticed that the United States postmaster is using on his cancellation stamp the words, "Pray For Peace". She has made the suggestion that we in Canada should adopt the same term or a similar term. I am leaving this suggestion with the Postmaster General and I hope he will give it his kind consideration.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Post Office Department.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with estimates. I am not sure at the moment whether it will be the supplementary estimates standing in the name of the Prime Minister which concern the federal district commission or those of the Department of Finance. Then, hon. members should be prepared to go on with the items in the further supplementary estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt here to indicate to the leader of the house that it would be useful for the Leader of the Opposition if as soon as the minister can indicate whether it is finance or the other that comes first he should advise us on this side of the house.

Mr. Green: I shall be very glad to do that. Then we shall take item No. 2 on today's order paper, second reading of the bill to amend the Customs Act and then item No. 3, second reading of the bill to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Mr. Chevrier: And on Friday?

Mr. Green: On Friday I believe the Prime Minister intends to move the first reading of the bill of rights and we hope it will be possible to conclude all business on Friday.

Mr. Chevrier: I can assure my hon. friend that we on this side of the house will co-operate to the fullest extent.

Mr. Green: Arising out of the last remark of the hon. member for Laurier, I should like to thank the members of both opposition parties very much for sitting past six o'clock today.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to say on behalf of this group that we shall co-operate in every way possible to the end desired.

At 6.35 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Thirteenth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Howe.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF UNITED STATES SENATORS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, possibly I can at this time make reference to the fact that in the gallery today there are two representatives of that impressive and powerful legislative body, the United States Senate. I refer to Senator George D. Aiken of Vermont and Senator Homer E. Capehart of Indiana. Both these gentlemen are here in Ottawa to meet with Your Honour and the Speaker of the other place for the purpose of laying the foundation for a joint committee of legislators representative of our two bodies.

I shall say no more than that. We welcome them for the purpose for which they are here. We welcome them as representatives of that great body which has such powerful legislative capacity and ability. We welcome them because they come from our neighbour, the United States of America, whose co-operation and adherence to freedom give hope to all mankind.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in the welcome the Prime Minister has expressed to the two representatives of the Senate of the United States who are visiting us today, both of whom I had the pleasure of meeting in the happy days when I lived in Washington. They are here on a mission which, if it can be accomplished—and I am sure it can—will make an important contribution to improving, even more, the good relations between our two countries. Their presence here today, Mr. Speaker, also reminds us that the congress of the United States has completed its work.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the C.C.F. I am very happy to join the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in welcoming these two distinguished senators from the United States, Senator Aiken of Vermont and Senator Capehart of Indiana. I am certain their visit will result in the establishment of the joint Canada-United States committee in such a form as to result in very great benefits to both nations in the years ahead.

I think we all realize that the prosperity of Canada is closely allied to economic conditions in the United States, and we believe that any procedure that will result in increased trade between our nations and a reduction of trade barriers will redound to the benefit of both countries. The Prime Minister has said that our nation, together with the United States, stands solidly for freedom, and we hope this committee will strengthen the processes of freedom in both nations. A few years ago I had the very great honour of being introduced on the floor of the Senate of the United States. Perhaps our procedures are a little more formal, but I know that our sentiments are just as sincere in welcoming wholeheartedly to our gallery these two distinguished senators from our neighbouring nation, the United States of America.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I may be permitted on this occasion to add my own very warm words of welcome, and to assure the house that if by any chance the senators from the United States have not heard the unanimous and warm greetings which have been extended to them, I shall be happy to convey these messages.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY UNIONS—JOINT LETTER FROM RAILWAY PRESIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour based upon reports in the press yesterday concerning the dispute between the non-operating employees of Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the railways themselves. Has the minister a statement to make in connection with the letter he has received from the presidents of the two railways?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on my return to Ottawa this morning I found on my desk a letter jointly signed by the presidents of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway relating to the report of the conciliation board set up in the non-operating railway employees' dispute. From the information I have, the latest development is that at a press conference in Montreal yesterday the railways indicated their intention to press for a 20 per cent freight rate increase and at the same time the union representatives indicated that the union is preparing for a strike vote. In the meantime we are watching the situation closely and the house can be assured that we shall remain in close touch with developments concerning this matter. That is all I can report at this time.

Mr. Chevrier: Arising out of the minister's statement, may I ask the Prime Minister a question, and I hope he will not reply that it is hypothetical. Having regard to the statement the Minister of Labour has made and the fact that the railways will apply to the board of transport commissioners for an increase in freight rates of approximately 20 per cent, will the Prime Minister indicate whether or not the government will suspend the coming into effect of such increase if it is granted by the board?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, of course, answered himself when in his opening words he stated that he hoped I would not refer to his question as hypothetical. That it is, and I do not intend to answer by way of anticipation.

Mr. Chevrier: Very practical.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I direct a question on the same subject to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether there was any discussion between himself and the president of the C.N.R. before the president of the C.N.R. associated himself with the president of the C.P.R. in saying that the railways would apply for a gigantic increase of 20 per cent in freight rates? I ask whether such a discussion has taken place, in view of the welcome action by the government last April 28 in disallowing the 3.6 per cent increase then granted.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The answer is no.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN FOR WINTER PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): May I ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Apparently $150,000 is to be spent by the government in an advertising campaign to assist winter employment. Can the minister indicate the approximate amount which will be spent in British Columbia? Would the minister indicate also whether or not any encouragement is to be given to local governments to participate in the campaign?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I regret to inform the hon. member that it is not possible at this time to give a breakdown of these expenditures by provinces, since most of the advertising and publicity material is contracted on a national basis. However, the way it works out is that in the end result the material is presented almost on a per capita proportion of population in each region.

So far as British Columbia is concerned, the campaign will be very active in that province. The officers of my department, I can assure the hon. member, have been in touch with the municipalities and with winter employment committees in most of the major centres of the province. I might add also that a research program involving both federal and provincial cooperation is now being evolved in order to throw light on the basic causes of seasonal unemployment in that province, and to suggest measures for dealing with the situation.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR FRENCH COPY OF REPORT OF CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I understand that he has now deposited with the Clerk of the house a summary of the proceedings of the winter employment conference which took place on July 14 and 15. May I ask the minister whether this summary of proceedings has been tabled in French and English.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker. It is available only in English.

Mr. Bourget: Then may I ask the minister whether he would be kind enough to have these proceedings translated so that copies in French may be available to the French members.

Mr. Starr: I shall be glad to do that.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ROCKCLIFFE AIR BASE—REPORTED DENIAL OF SCHOOL FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I have received representations from the parents at the Rockcliffe air base informing me that their children have not been accepted at Notre Dame separate school, and they have no other recourse but to send the children to the school at the air base.

Would the minister tell the house whether some space could not be made available for these children, or whether the children of separate school supporters could be compelled, because of the decision taken this week, to attend public schools?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): There are 28 French speaking children at Rockcliffe whose parents desire that they receive their education in the French language. We are trying to make arrangements with the separate school board of Ottawa to see whether they can be accommodated in some French speaking school in Ottawa.

Mr. Gour: I should like to ask another question of the minister, but before asking it I should like to inform the minister and all members of this house that this is not a question of politics.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that this is not a time to impart information. If he has a question he may ask it.

Mr. Gour: I will ask the minister a question. It would be very easy to have, in that school at the base—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is endeavouring to enter into an argument on this matter. If he has a supplementary question would he please ask it.

Mr. Gour: I will ask the minister to try to take steps to see that the French children can learn in the French language in that school, and that the Catholic people can have their religion taught in that school.

BRIDGES

TRAIL, B.C.—PROPOSED SECOND BRIDGE ACROSS COLUMBIA RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Strictly in order to receive information I wish to address a question on a matter of regional and local interest and importance in British Columbia to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister inform the house when the department of public works of British Columbia filed plans with his department for a proposed second bridge across the Columbia at Trail, and would the minister also inform the house of the developments to date with respect to approval of those plans?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member directed this question to the Minister of Transport, and it only came to my attention within the last few minutes. Under the circumstances I shall have to ask that he give me time to prepare a reply.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HAMILTON, QU'APPELLE—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL"

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Just before the house opened, Mr. Speaker, I was given a copy of a report that appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning. On a matter of privilege I should like to correct what I believe to be a very unfair impression given by this story. It is dated September 3, and the opening paragraph states as follows:

> Differences between the Ontario and federal government on what constitutes a proper roads to resources program in the province won't be put on public display yet.

I should like to state flatly that this is not the situation at all. The situation is that in Ontario the minister with whom I made the original arrangement is no longer in that position. The new minister has asked to examine the whole program, and a month ago he tried to get myself and various members of my department to examine one or two of the roads that are under discussion but I was unable to go at that time. There is no question at all of differences that have caused this delay.

The other statement to which I should like to take exception appears later on in the story, where it is stated:

> Mr. Hamilton indicated in an appearance before the mines, forests and waters committee this session that he did not feel Ontario's proposal was imaginative enough.

I think the correct impression is this, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the minister should state what privilege is involved in this second matter. It does not seem to me that it raises a question of privilege.

Mr. Chevrier: He would like to make a speech.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The fact is that I made it clear in the committee, Mr. Speaker, that Ontario pioneered this concept of mining roads and access roads, and any discussions we have had—

Mr. Pickersgill: That was in Hepburn's day.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —are entirely on questions of the material we have proposed. I should like to say flatly that this statement has completely misreported the whole significance of the efforts we are making to carry out this program.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Now that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has approved the action of the Hepburn government in Ontario, I wonder whether he would be good enough to do something for me. My question has to do with the questions remaining unanswered on the order paper. Question No. 182 was placed on the order paper some four weeks ago. It remains unanswered. I should like very much to get an answer to it today. It is a rather simple question. I should like to have the answer before the estimates are finally concluded. I wonder whether the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources could get that answer for me.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I shall look into the matter again, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): On the same subject, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that question No. 96 on the order paper remains unanswered. Recently I asked in French whether I could not get a reply. The request was ineffective and no action was taken. That is why I am rising now and asking the question in English; perhaps it will have more effect. Will the Secretary of State see that I get an answer before the end of the session?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have requested the officials of my department to make the necessary inquiries. As soon as I have the answer I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Chevrier: That may be next year.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO COMMUNICATIONS WITH PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare answered a question which I had put the previous day to the Minister of Labour, at which time he said that the province of Quebec was the only province which had not signed an agreement with the federal government in respect of the Unemployment Assistance Act.

I would now like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would he state whether during the course of the last fiscal year he at any time communicated in respect of this matter with the authorities in the province of Quebec, either by letter, telephone call or telegram?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, yes I did. I am sorry I do not have it with me today, but yesterday I had a copy of a letter which was written to the minister concerned in that province at the time we removed the .45 threshold on unemployment assistance, and I received an acknowledgment of that letter from the minister.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would it be possible for the minister to let us know the contents of that letter, or to table it?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I have no objection. It was merely an announcement.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—REPORTED RECOMMENDATION TO RAISE UNITED STATES TARIFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he would care to comment on an Associated Press dispatch to the effect that President Eisenhower was now considering a recommendation that the tariff on lead and zinc imports from Canada into the United States should be raised. The minister said he would have the answer available for the next day—that was Tuesday. I wonder if the minister can now give me a reply.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had the answer ready and I regret that I did not give it to the Leader of the Opposition yesterday. The position in regard to lead and zinc at the present time is as follows. Last April 24 the United States tariff commission recommended that increased tariffs should be imposed on imports of these products into the United States and at that time President Eisenhower deferred his decision on these recommendations pending congressional consideration of legislation that had been proposed to subsidize producers in the United States. On August 21 the United States congress rejected this proposed legislation. In view of this fact the United States administration is now studying what action, if any, it should take with respect to lead and zinc.

As far as the Canadian government's position is concerned, our views have already been expressed to the United States government on several occasions, making it abundantly clear that any increased tariffs or other measures restricting exports of these important products to the United States would be of the most serious concern.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Could I ask the minister a supplementary question. Has he made any inquiries or has he received any information with respect to the reported global plan which was mentioned in the United States congress for the allocation of base metal markets among western producers?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, that matter is under observation and study. I have nothing to report upon it today.

HARBOURS

ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO IMPROVEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Could the minister please inform the house as to the developments made to date in the harbour development at St. John's, Newfoundland?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is a question which would be more properly discussed on the estimates. As a matter of fact the consulting engineers are still working on plans for the development.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Has no actual work started on the project?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that under this government work cannot commence until plans are completed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, has the minister forgotten the tender he called on May 7 of this year, which subsequently had to be cancelled because he had no plans?

Mr. Green: I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that one dose of medicine would have been enough for the hon. member.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. May I ask the Minister of Labour if he would kindly inform the house what progress is being made with respect to the negotiations between the C.P.R. and the three unions on the west coast and, second, what progress is being made with respect to the strike of the longshoremen on the west coast?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in the dispute between the west coast steamships and the seafarers' international union and the other two unions involved, Mr. Eric Taylor has been mediating with the two officer unions and the S.I.U. He has reduced the matters in dispute to four points at the present time. He is still trying to see whether these four points can be amicably settled.

With reference to the longshoremen's strike in British Columbia, I wish to advise the hon. member that I have been in touch with the representatives of both parties to the dispute by telephone. The parties met briefly last Friday in an effort to arrive at some basis for negotiation but were not successful at that time. Since then I have contacted both parties in an effort to have negotiations resumed. I am receiving regular reports from the conciliation officer of the Department of Labour who is on the scene. As the situation now stands, the question of pensions is the major issue in dispute, and it is my hope that this matter may be brought to a point where at least discussion may be resumed in the near future.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister indicate what are the four points remaining unsettled between the west coast steamships and the three unions involved?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a responsibility of the minister, as I understand his responsibilities. He may answer if he wishes, however.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I ask this supplementary question only because the minister indicated that with respect to the longshoremen's strike the major issue in dispute is the question of pensions.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I have that information in my office. If the hon. member wishes it I will be glad to give it to him if he will contact me.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Supply—Finance

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

General administration—

112. Departmental administration, $2,369,041.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the Minister of Finance is not going to have quite as easy a time as the Prime Minister has had with respect to his estimates. In rising to speak on the first general item I want to discuss, and I may have to do it at some length, one aspect of the work of the minister and his department. Later there may be one or two other subjects on which I shall wish to say a few words.

What I want to talk about at this time is the conversion operation about which the minister recently spoke on the air and on which he has spoken previously. This operation is now coming to an end.

This, Mr. Chairman, is perhaps a good time to discuss this matter. We on this side have made no effort to bring about a discussion of it at an earlier stage in the session. Our reason for not doing so was that whatever we might have felt about the operation—and we are certainly critical of some phases of it—nevertheless once the government decided to put it into effect it seemed to us the part of responsibility not to raise criticisms and doubts while the campaign for reconversion was proceeding.

Now, however, we have reached what I believe is the last week of the campaign, so far as working days are concerned. I understand the campaign concludes on September 15. Perhaps because the campaign is in its closing stages this is a more appropriate time to discuss it than earlier.

We on this side certainly do not wish to be accused of being responsible in any way for weakening the efforts that are being put forward even during the remaining days of the campaign. The criticisms we are making now are not in any way, shape or form for that purpose, but we do think we have a responsibility to the house and to the country to make these criticisms. We feel we should ask the minister some questions which have not yet been answered in relation to this operation.

As the committee knows, the amount being refunded in this operation comes to $6,416 million, which represents about 40 per cent of our national debt. This gives some indication of the importance and the magnitude of the operation. The minister said over the air, I believe on Tuesday night, that $5 billion worth of bonds had already been converted, which leaves about $1,400 million as of that date which had not been converted.

This conversion operation covers the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth 3 per cent victory loans. The ninth does not mature until September 1, 1966 and the others mature at earlier dates. As the committee knows, for these victory bonds are being offered 25-year 4½ per cent bonds, 14-year 4¼ per cent bonds, 7-year 3¾ per cent bonds and 3¾-year 3 per cent bonds. The importance of this financial operation and its magnitude are very great and obvious, as I have said, and certainly the whole question warrants examination by this committee.

The operation has been interpreted by some in this country—especially, I think, by some banks and investment dealers and perhaps one or two advertising agencies—as bold, imaginative and courageous. It has been considered by some others as costly, unnecessary and unwise. Already some aspects of the operation have been criticized, and I think in some cases with justification.

I believe that a great deal of this criticism is based on the feeling that the Conservative leaders knew what they were saying when they campaigned so violently in the last election against the Liberal tight money policy. On March 15 of this year the Minister of Finance issued a statement on tight money which included these words:

> Under the new policy—

He was referring to Liberal monetary policy.

> —interest rates were successively advanced until they reached the highest rate in effect for over 20 years.

Later on in his statement he said:

> The provincial and municipal governments, farmers and businessmen who were obligated to pay the record high interest rate do not need to be told anything about this tight money policy.

He went on:

> Since it came into office on June 21, the government has sought to assist in bringing about a reduction in the interest rate prevailing.

These are excerpts from the minister's statement on March 15. What did the Prime Minister say at about the same time? Well, he said a good deal, but I shall quote only one sentence from a statement in Calgary on March 14, in which he said:

> Tight money is money, the interest rate of which makes it impossible for Canadian business to expand and develop.

In that statement, as indeed in other statements during the campaign, the Prime Minister attacked us on this side for high interest rates, and he claimed that this government had driven them down. There is no doubt in our minds and no doubt in the public mind what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance meant by tight money. What has the government done in this matter? In this conversion operation it has paid more for long-term government money, 4½ per cent, than at any time since the depression of the 1930's, and it has fixed those rates by issuing 25-year bonds which are not callable. Perhaps it was necessary to do that as the only way in which they could market them. This high interest rate, of course, is the main appeal to investors and holders of those bonds. A very good indication of that fact is given in the circular issued by a bond dealer, Gairdner and Company, in its bulletin circulated on August 22, 1958, from which I quote the following:

> The argument which for the average investor must top all the others is the 50 per cent improvement in yield from 3 per cent to 4½ per cent, if conversion is effected into the long-term 1983's.
> The conversion bonds, notably the 4½ per cent of 1983, enjoy a higher rate of interest than any offered for 25 years. During 20 of the past 25 years, long term Canada bonds stayed close to the 3 per cent level. The conversion bonds are non-callable which means that for each of the next 25 years their return will be higher than at any time in the past 25 years.

What a change, Mr. Chairman, this represents from the previous position of the government in this matter, and what a retreat from their earlier words. It is just another evidence of glaring inconsistency between partisan attack and governmental action, the kind of thing that destroys confidence in our democratic and parliamentary system.

Before March 31 of this year my hon. friends opposite used to take the view that budgetary surpluses were always bad, a view which, if it were carried into effect, would have made debt reduction impossible. Before March 31 provincial and municipal authorities, mortgage borrowers and small businesses were led to believe that tight money was bad, always bad, even when inflationary pressures were strong, and that an easy, cheap money policy was invariably desirable.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, Liberal monetary and financial policies have, I submit, over the years been sound and consistent. This is what the Liberal party had to say at its last convention on fiscal and monetary policy, and it is the principle that guides us now:

> The Liberal party believes that monetary policy should reinforce fiscal measures in working for steady economic progress. This is necessary in order to safeguard the purchasing power of the Canadian people's dollar in times of high activity; it is also necessary in order to stimulate business and employment if activity slackens.

This policy, Mr. Chairman, which has been firmly and consistently followed by Liberal governments, has been based since world war II on the white paper on employment and income issued in 1945 by the previous government, which presented a broad and full statement of objectives of economic and financial policies. I suggest that the present government should now try to correct misleading impressions which it has created in the Canadian public mind about monetary policy and debt management. We should now have a statement from the minister clearing up some of the confusion that has been created in the minds of the public in this matter, stating in a formal declaration by the minister what the government is now recognizing in fact by the nature of the operation it has put into effect; namely, that it has abandoned its rigid and unwise policies in regard to monetary matters; that it has abandoned the view that tight money is always wicked, and that it accepts the view that monetary management is a good mechanism of economic policy to be changed, of course with due care, as over-all economic conditions change, and that it is to be used to protect the public interest.

What we would like to know, Mr. Chairman, especially in the light of recent action, is whether this government now accepts the broad objectives of economic and financial policy which I have mentioned as embodied in the white paper on employment and income of 1945. If not, what are the basic views of the government on fiscal and monetary matters? It seems to me that a statement of this kind is the only way to clear up present doubts and confusion and remove criticism. Such a statement, Mr. Chairman, would be a useful—indeed, I think it is an essential—background for an understanding of any discussion of this conversion plan and perhaps for an understanding of the fund-raising operations which will follow this conversion plan.

I said at the beginning that there has been some criticism, a good deal of criticism, in the country of this operation. Perhaps in some cases that criticism has exaggerated the undesirable features of the operation, but much of it, I believe, has solid foundation. It certainly reflects confusion and anxiety in the public at large.

Objections and criticisms have also been raised, not by this party but by the C.C.F. party, in the house. None of this criticism has yet been dealt with by the minister except through interjections such as "nonsense", "rubbish", "untrue", which do not really add very much to our understanding of the matter. Nor did the statement of the Prime Minister launching the conversion operation throw very much light on the nature and meaning of that operation. In his broadcast statement to the nation on July 14 the Prime Minister gave the impression that the so-called conversion loan was for bondholders an investment in the future development of our country. That was his main theme, as the following quotation from the transcript of a recording of his statement will show. These are not excerpts from the press statement issued after the broadcast, which differ in some respects from the transcript of the broadcast itself, as the minister will discover if he compares the transcript of the broadcast with the press release issued on the statement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Copies of the actual text were available to all who wished them.

Mr. Pearson: That is right, and I am not attempting to make—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not seen the press statement to which my hon. friend refers, but the full text of the speech has been available ever since it was delivered.

Mr. Pearson: That is right. But we went to the trouble of making a transcript of the statement of the Prime Minister as it was actually given over the air. We compared it with the statement that was issued, and there are some differences in the two texts. I am quoting from the transcript we made of the actual words of the Prime Minister, and this is what he said:

> Its success will add greatly to the strength of Canada's national economy and all that means to the welfare and security of all our people. It will include the fullest development of our resources. It will mean bigger and better jobs. It will mean a higher standard of living for every Canadian. It will mean the achievement of a great Canada.

And again from the same broadcast:

> I ask that all Canadians, and everyone who holds victory bonds, will now reinvest in Canada's future for a further period in order to support a constructive program for the future of Canada, for you and for your children and your children's children.

This is very eloquent but it does not bear much relationship to this particular financial operation. It is a visionary picture to advocate, to justify and, if I may use the expression, to sell to the public what is essentially a refunding operation. The Prime Minister admitted that himself when in his broadcast he also said:

> And I should perhaps make it clear that a conversion bond such as this does not involve any new borrowing on the part of the government.

That one short sentence destroys the whole case of the Prime Minister. Since a conversion loan does not involve any new borrowing it does not of itself involve any new investment leading, as the Prime Minister claimed, to the fullest development of our resources, to bigger and better jobs, to a higher standard of living, to the achievement of a great Canada. This conversion operation, in short, is not even a loan, strictly speaking. It is a refunding of past loans, a conversion of bonds which, in a significant proportion, would not have been maturing for several years, eight years in the case of the longest victory loan, the ninth.

I think, therefore, that the Prime Minister in his broadcast to the nation did not give the real reasons which led the government to undertake this operation at this time. It appears to me that on this occasion at least the Minister of Finance used more sober and sensible words to describe the conversion operation in a statement issued by his department on July 14.

Mr. Benidickson: He stuck to the text.

Mr. Pearson: He did not indulge in so much high flown eloquence but he had this to say:

> The minister explained that the refinancing plan is primarily aimed at reorganizing the national debt with a view to putting it on a long term basis and reducing for the government the amount of refinancing to be done over the next few years.

In this house on the same day, July 14, the minister stated, as found at page 2203 of Hansard:

> This conversion offer will perform the major and essential task of clearing the way for an orderly program of debt management over the years ahead. It will not, however, provide us with any new cash.

That makes it clear, of course, that a conversion operation has no direct relation to new development and contradicts the argument presented by the Prime Minister to the public. The minister, however, at that time and since has been very vague about the basic reasons which caused him to announce this operation. What does he mean, for instance, when he says "this conversion offer will perform the major and essential task of clearing the way for an orderly program of debt management over the years ahead"? Does this orderly program of debt management simply mean that the government is now facing a series of heavy deficits during the years ahead, that its new cash requirements will be very great indeed during those years, and that this conversion offer will perform the major and essential task of clearing the way for meeting a rapid increase in the public debt?

That increase is apparent, Mr. Chairman, in the fact that the government's new cash requirements for this fiscal year alone will exceed $1,400 million. Furthermore, the huge budgetary deficit announced by the minister, which may be greater than announced by him, did not have anything to do with any vision of development or with any so-called special works program. It was largely due to the current recession and the consequent drop in government revenues and increased long term commitments, especially in the field of social security.

We have been warned by a well known financial economist, Mr. Harvey Perry, whom the minister knows as most of us do, that we might have a series of budgetary deficits until 1967, so the government would have to borrow important amounts each year during that period. Is it because the government accepts this view that it decided suddenly, after the budget was introduced in the house, to launch this conversion operation, thereby clearing the way for new and heavy borrowing in the years ahead?

Surely, Mr. Chairman, even at this late date in the session we are entitled to a sober and clear statement by the minister on the real reasons lying behind this major financial operation, especially after the Prime Minister's attempt on radio and television to dress up this so-called conversion operation in the patriotic colours of wartime emergency and grandiose national development. That is why I wish to ask the minister some questions. Perhaps he will be good enough to reply at the end of the discussion of this item of his estimates or at some time during that discussion convenient to him.

First, what is the cost of the operation? There has been a good deal of speculation about this. I know the difficulties in estimating the cost, but surely the government must now have some rough estimates even though precise figures may not be possible. Second, what is the cost of publicity, and what advertising agencies have been involved? I cannot say that I am much impressed by some of the advertising, especially that full page picture of the old lady with a new hat. It all must have cost a great deal of money and it has introduced, I admit, a new element into government financing in this country.

Mr. Bruce Hutchison had an amusing editorial—more than amusing; very shrewd —in the Victoria Daily Times on this aspect of the matter entitled "The Lady and the Hat." Perhaps the minister has read it. It included the following:

> A few years back any government advertisement was a cold, depressing statement of the facts and if it was a fiscal advertisement nobody but a bond dealer or an auditor bothered to read it.

Probably in the minister's eyes that justifies this new kind of advertising.

> Now we behold a life-size portrait of a quaint, twinkling lady with a funny hat who, we are told, has just bought one of the new bonds and safely arranged the security of her old age.
> Instead of boring us with statistics, the government announces, with a chuckle that the funny hat was bought with the premium on the bond. The lady, the reader, the whole nation is happy. The bond campaign becomes a great lark. Even the grim fiscal visage of Mr. Fleming relaxes as Canada goes deeper into debt.
> If high finance is such a jolly pastime why didn't we hear of it before? If debt is so profitable, so kindly to old ladies, by all means let us have more of it.

Well, we are likely to have more of it. That is the second question, the cost of publicity. Third, what is the amount of dealer commissions, bond issuing fees, delivery commission to banks and trust companies? Fourth, what is the total amount of premiums to bondholders? I know the minister cannot give us the exact figures.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Premiums?

Mr. Pearson: Total premiums to bondholders; cash bonuses. While the minister may not be able to give us exact figures, surely he can give us same indication of what this is costing the country, especially in the light of reports that have been circulating. I have seen reports in reputable journals, including reputable financial journals, that if this operation is fully successful it will cost as high as $100 million. I have seen reports varying from $70 million to $100 million. Dividing those reports into the categories of costs I have mentioned in my request to the minister, there have been representations that advertising will cost $2 million; that commissions to dealers and agents will cost between $25 million and $50 million. This commission ranges from a quarter of one per cent to one per cent plus a quarter of one per cent bond-issuing fee. I have seen reports that the cash bonuses to holders will be as low as $37 million or as high as $60 million. These bonuses range from 1¼ per cent to 2½ per cent.

Then I want to ask the question, what are the additional interest charges that taxpayers will have to pay, which have been estimated to be as high as $100 million per year for the next 25 years? It depends, of course, on how successful the operation will be, but we learned last Tuesday that $5 billion has been reconverted and most of it, I suppose, into the 25-year bonds. There are only a few days yet to go in this campaign, so the minister should have some reasonably accurate estimates of this.

Then, and this is an important question, perhaps the minister could give us some information on who holds these bonds and who will gain most from the conversion. Dr. Brewis, associate professor of economics at Carleton University, had this to say on this point in an article which I read on July 22:

> Only a very small proportion of the victory bonds are held by the man in the street. I do not pretend to know the exact proportion but it could be of the order of 10 or 15 per cent of the whole. The great bulk are known to be held by financial and other institutions and the success of the conversion will depend much more on their actions than on those of the private individual. To the extent moreover that the refunding is successful it will involve a transfer of income in favour of these institutions.

That is a quotation from Dr. Brewis's article. The Bank of Canada made its own breakdown on May 31, so far as the holdings of these bonds are concerned. The figures in that breakdown are as follows: the Bank of Canada, $1,300 million; the unemployment insurance commission, $300 million; the government, $100 million, and the chartered banks, $1,400 million. This gives a total held by the government and the chartered banks of $3,100 million. A leading supporter of the government in the other place raised this figure during a debate there a couple of weeks ago to $3,300 million. This leaves us with something over $3 billion to be accounted for.

What I should like from the minister is how this $3 billion-plus is divided as between institutional holders and private individuals. Again I know he cannot give us exact figures, but surely he must have some estimates of this. Surely he must have had some estimate of this kind of division before deciding on the terms of the loan or the kind of publicity campaign to be waged. Professor Brewis says that only 10 per cent to 15 per cent of this $3 billion is held by individuals.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think he said that.

Mr. Pearson: I am reading from his article.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Just refer back to the article and you will find he correctly said he did not know.

Mr. Pearson: The professor said it could have been of the order of 10 per cent or 15 per cent. He has made his estimate, and perhaps the minister will give us his. I have seen another estimate that perhaps half this amount would be held by institutions and perhaps half by individuals, which would mean that about $1,550 million would be held by each.

Now, there is certainly little need to try to convince the institutions to convert their bonds. Surely they must have been delighted with this windfall dumped into their laps by a government which told them how patriotic they would be if they accepted it. In order to see what can be the magnitude of the gifts—I use that word because I think it is the correct word—involved in certain individual cases, let us use an illustration which may well correspond to a concrete and real situation. Suppose, for instance, that a life insurance company is holding $40 million of the ninth victory loan bonds which it is converting into the new 25-year bonds. This company, in converting, would receive a cash adjustment of $600,000, plus about 12 per cent of $40 million representing the additional and unexpected interest income for the period until September 1, 1966, when its old bonds would have reached maturity. This means that in this case, hypothetical if you like but not very far from reality, the company would receive as a gift out of this conversion operation an amount exceeding $5 million, or over $600,000 a year for the next eight years.

Well, what about the individuals? If we are to assume, and I do not think it is unreasonable to assume, that half this $3 billion or $1.5 billion is held by individuals, it means that this is the only group at which this high pressure, expensive campaign could have been aimed. I ask the minister, therefore, are the results justifying it in terms of the amount of individual holdings being converted, in view of the amount of money and effort spent on it?

I should like to turn now to another aspect of the question, that is the economic effects of this conversion operation in so far as one is able to determine them. In the course of these remarks I want to ask the minister some more questions. Possibly the most immediate effect will be that interest rates to provincial governments, municipalities and private borrowers will go up. This raises a question which the minister should try to answer or at least give us the benefit of his opinion. Will this conversion cause a rise in long term rates? If so, can we also expect later an increase in short term rates? Will we in this country be in the strange and paradoxical position of having at the same time easy money, in terms of supply, and dear money in terms of interest rates, a result brought about not so much by market forces as by government action? What will be the effect of those higher interest rates during a period not of boom but of pause or recession, in terms of economic stability and prosperity? How will this help to meet mounting unemployment? How and to what extent will these rates contribute to effective control over potential inflationary pressures, and there is no more important aspect of the problem than that? The minister dealt with it at some length, and rightly so, in his broadcast on Tuesday.

Then what is going to happen to the real value of the new bonds? Will it be eroded by the cheating process of inflation over the years? There is another aspect of the question with which the minister should deal. When interest rates are higher in Canada than in the United States, more Canadians tend to borrow there and more people from the United States tend to lend here, and that pushes our exchange rate up and handicaps our exporters and as well increases import competition in the Canadian market.

I therefore ask the minister a final question on this aspect of the matter. Does he not think that the conversion loan will make interest rates higher in Canada than in the United States, thereby increasing the premium on the Canadian dollar? I am aware of the action taken recently in the United States has brought their interest rates down and in the last few weeks our exchange premium, probably because of that development, has gone down. But does he not think that the long term effect of this conversion, basing our interest rates at 4½ per cent, may have the possible effect of increasing the premium on the Canadian dollar?

What we want then, Mr. Chairman, is as full a statement as possible of all the reasons for this unprecedented operation; its advantages and disadvantages; its implications, direct and indirect, on our economy. There can be no intelligent appreciation and no intelligent discussion of the operation without a statement of this kind from the minister.

Finally there is one question I want to ask. I think I said "finally" a moment ago, but I assure the minister that this one is final. Why did the minister not announce this operation in his budget speech? At that time he described the government's borrowing program in the following terms, as found at page 1241 of Hansard:

> —during this fiscal year we shall need to sell bonds or other securities in a total amount of close to $3,400 million.

Of this amount $1,400 million was to meet the need for new cash to cover a deficit and $1,950 million to cover the marketable funded debt maturing during this year. Then less than a month later the minister announced the refunding loan amounting not to $1,950 million, as he indicated in his budget speech, but to $6,400 million. Why then did he not make that announcement in his budget, so as to permit us to have a full discussion in the course of that debate? Did he decide on June 17 not to take the house into his confidence then, or did he change his mind after June 17? If so, for what reason? I suggest that those are important questions, Mr. Chairman.

Perhaps in this connection I might quote from an editorial published in the Financial Post on July 19, which included this paragraph:

> It is interesting that this whole plan developed so rapidly. Only a little more than a month ago, the finance minister was talking about refunding on a bit by bit basis. This drastic big clean-up scheme originally evolved in a Toronto financial house, has brought a basic turn-around in government plans.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That editorial comment—dealing with the statement of fact—has absolutely no truth in it.

Mr. Pearson: The minister is not denying that there was a change in plan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am talking about that false statement in that editorial, about it being evolved in a Toronto bond house.

Mr. Pearson: We will leave out that statement because it has been described by the minister as false, and I accept the minister's statement. But the other statement stands, namely that there was a change in government plans between the time the minister made his budget speech and the day he announced this reconversion operation. We would like to know why this change was made and why it was not possible to give the house some indication of this operation in the budget speech. It certainly raises a very serious point.

I am sure the minister will want to clear up that point as well as some of the other points I have mentioned in this statement. For instance, some people would like to know why the minister felt it necessary to refund the eighth victory loan bond issue and the ninth victory loan bond issue at a time when there are still five years and eight years respectively before maturity in the case of these two issues. It has been contended that these bonds had been sold in good faith on terms agreeable to the buyers, to carry interest at 3 per cent to maturity. It has also been alleged that a great proportion of these bonds were held by banks and insurance companies and trust companies, which have agreed to convert them into the new 4½ per cent bonds, thereby receiving a direct bonus plus 1½ per cent more in interest per year for eight years in the case of the ninth victory loan bond, which alone represents a total of well over 12 per cent, as I have already stated, at 1½ per cent compounded annually for eight years.

We on this side of the house over recent weeks, as I have stated, have done and said nothing to increase any doubts the Canadian public might have as to some features of this conversion loan. In that respect I suggest we have acted responsibly. Even now, with the loan period nearly over, we are not opposing the purposes of this financial operation as an effort in debt management prior to an appeal for more money. Indeed, as I said, we do not have the main pertinent facts which would enable us to take a final position on this issue. However, we blame the government and the Minister of Finance for the present state of confusion and of some suspicion because adequate information has not been made available.

We are now requesting from the minister a full statement on the various features and implications of this huge conversion operation which is of such great immediate as well as long term significance to our economy. Perhaps if the minister had previously answered these questions—most of which, if they have not been raised in the house have been raised by the public and in the press—he would find it less difficult now to fully reach his objective. Perhaps it is not yet too late to provide these answers and ensure the successful completion of this operation which, once it has been decided on, all of us feel should be carried through to a successful conclusion.

Our criticism is that we were not given information on these matters in this house at an earlier time and that many questions are left unanswered, including these questions I have asked, even at this late date in the session. Our criticism is that if these questions had been answered previously the doubts and uncertainty that have arisen might have been removed; that this operation would have been carried on in a better atmosphere than has been the case, and some of these blitz tactics which we read about in the press might not have been necessary. Before the estimate is passed I hope the minister will clear up those points.

Mr. Howard: I should like to make one or two comments on the subject matter dealt with by the Leader of the Opposition, namely the conversion loan program. I do not think it is necessary at this time for us to go into as much detail as did the Leader of the Opposition, because I and others in the C.C.F. party at a prior time during this session dealt quite extensively with it and laid the groundwork then, by the legitimate complaints we raised, for the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition this morning. Actually all we are doing in the conversion loan program is borrowing money to pay off debts that we incurred by borrowing money in the first place. Incidentally, I may say that borrowing had been done under a Liberal administration.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments of the Leader of the Opposition, hoping to hear some new and enlightened approach to the financial problems of this nation but of course my expectations and hopes in that regard were probably not too well founded. After all, we cannot expect much from either the Conservative party or the Liberal party with respect to a different type of approach to our financial problems and to control of the money system in Canada, because they both endorse the economic system and financial system that operates in this country.

I did hear from the Leader of the Opposition a sort of simulated angered condemnation coupled with what was actually an endorsation of that program, but so long as we remain married to our present financial system we will continue to have these problems arise, we will continue to be forced into debt, not only as the government of Canada but we will also drive other public groups into debt, notably the provinces and, what is even more serious, the municipalities.

The opinion of the C.C.F. has been expressed a great number of times in this house and elsewhere in the country about the necessity of maintaining control of our own financial structure in our own hands instead of leaving it in the hands of outside interests who from time to time can do nothing more than assist us to drive ourselves deeper into debt and to raise interest rates for ourselves and the provinces and the municipalities, not to mention the interest rates which individual citizens have to pay when they borrow money for various purposes. There is an old saying which is applicable in this case, by a person who said he did not care who controlled and who made the laws of a nation so long as he controlled and was able to issue the currency, and that is precisely the dilemma in which we are at the present time.

The provincial statistics show over the years a drastic and steady annual increase in the debt of those provinces because they could do nothing else under the circumstances but go into debt in order to finance their various projects. Worse still, there has been a drastic and steady increase in the total debt of the municipalities generally and in the debt of individual municipalities. Not only has there been an increase in the actual total amount of debt; there has also been an increase in the per capita debt and in the interest rates paid, all because our federal government is unable or unwilling to deal in a sensible fashion with the control of the finances of this country.

I have nothing more to say at this time. One could, as I have said, reiterate what we in the C.C.F. have said on many occasions previously in this session, and point out the effect that this conversion loan program will have on the municipalities and on bond rates and what it is doing in so far as tight or loose money is concerned. But that would be merely repetition and probably would not serve too useful a purpose at this time and, so long as this government is in office, it would not serve too useful a purpose at any time in convincing the government that it is following the wrong road when it comes to the control of our own finances and our financial destiny.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on this bond conversion program. I was surprised when I heard that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance had gone on the air as bond salesmen, and I really wondered what had come over them. I noted at the time that the early radio, television and press comments on this conversion really hailed the program, and I thought perhaps I had been taught the wrong concepts of mathematics.

I realized that due to the slackening economy our short term interest rate was approaching an all-time low. In fact, about the middle of last month it did reach an all-time low when the Canadian bank rate stood at 1.12 per cent and treasury bills at .87 per cent. I could not get out of my mind, either, that the average interest on the unmatured bond debt or the total debt of Canada stood at something under 3 per cent—2.98 per cent to be exact as of last March—and that when you took into consideration that the new long term 4½ per cent bonds would bear interest at something over 1½ per cent above our average, you could not help but feel that we in Canada would be spending many additional millions of dollars in taxes to meet this interest alone.

Every old bond issue was eligible for conversion into the long term 4½ per cent bond issue on which the commission was the highest, namely 1 per cent. Certainly this was an inducement to channel all possible outstanding bonds into the high interest long term bonds, and the advertising emphasized that the long term, high interest bonds were most desirable. As we look at the advertising even on the application form for a bond we see that the printing respecting the 4½ per cent long term bonds is in the larger type and the printing with respect to the other bonds is in progressively smaller type.

There was a statement that there were too many maturing bonds overhanging the market and that there was a need for tidying up the bond market. It is true that the fifth victory bond issue would come due next January and, as we have an election every four years, the eighth bond loan would not come due until after the next election and the ninth victory loan was not likely to come due until the election after that. In my mind it would seem that the minister certainly wanted no overhang. In fact, he trimmed it back so far that by no stretch of the imagination would any of these maturities bother him in the future.

I witnessed two transactions made in a bank, one for $10,000 of the fifth victory loan issue and the other for $5,000 of the eighth victory loan issue. The bank converted both these victory loan bonds into the 4½ per cent long term bonds, and the bank's commission was $150. The client holding the $10,000 3 per cent victory loan bonds got new 4½ per cent bonds plus $250, $51 of which was accrued interest and $199 of which was a bonus free of income tax. The cost to the Canadian taxpayers, therefore, to change this one $10,000 bond to the new 4½ per cent bond was $350 which, of course, includes the $100 commission plus $250 bonus, including of course the accrued interest of $51. This, of course, does not include the proper apportionment of radio, television and advertising costs to convince this man to change his bonds.

This bank clerk had heard the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance make a great patriotic appeal to these victory bond holders to change their bonds to the 4½ per cent bonds. I think we should all help our country, and I could not help but be impressed with the upsurge of patriotism that must have been in this man's heart as he took $250 as a bonus plus a new bond with the realization that, thanks to the Minister of Finance, henceforth he would get $450 instead of $300 for the use of this part of his money.

I told a financial man that I thought some of these commissions were too high, and he admitted it. We were talking about the 1 per cent and the 4½ per cent bonds and he said, to quote his words, "It is a hell of a steal".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is a rule of this house that a letter may not be referred to in the house without disclosing the name of the writer of the letter. The reference to a letter or the reading of excerpts from a letter can indeed lead to a tabling of the letter. Before any hon. member attempts to quote something said by someone outside the house he should be prepared to divulge the name of the person involved and the source of his quotation. It is not proper to use anonymous quotations. I submit that it is in keeping with the procedure and dignity of this house that we have some knowledge as to just who made statements of this kind so the house may have an opportunity of judging what value is to be attributed to such statements.

Mr. Habel: Send for the gestapo.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I ask the hon. member that he bear in mind that he cannot make extraordinary anonymous statements of this kind without telling us the name of the author and revealing the source of such statements.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I can get such statements from many people in the bond market.

Mr. Gour: Yes, very many.

Mr. McMillan: Yes. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I have heard many interesting statements made in my own riding.

The Chairman: It is indeed out of order to read a letter in this house unless the name of the writer is given.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, at no time did I say it was a letter. I was simply relating what I was told by a financial man, and I do not think I should divulge his name.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, surely in spite of what the minister said it is quite in order for an hon. member to make a statement to the effect that he has received from someone a particular piece of information and for him to give that statement to the house on his own responsibility as a member of the house, without divulging the name of the person who gave it to him. That has been done many times, and I am sure it has been done by the minister himself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is not a matter of information. It is a statement of opinion; a pretty irresponsible opinion, too.

Mr. Habel: People still have a right to hold opinions in this country.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I think the profits for the bondholders have been excessive. It is true that there has been a graded scale of commissions on these bonds, but they have been so generous that some of the bondholders in Toronto have been ashamed. I saw an account to that effect in the paper the other day. Some have offered to forgo some of the bond commissions in connection with big sales, and they have also taken on some of their own advertising. There is no cause for wonder in my mind that they agreed to participate so readily in this bond conversion.

Mr. Benidickson: And cancelled their holidays.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did you want them to go on holidays?

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand an advertisement in connection with these bonds in the form of a cartoon. It shows a man looking into a store window which contains a suit and a sign which states, "A brand new suit plus cash bonus for your old suit". That gives an idea of what some of these bond houses think of the amount of commission they were paid. I also have in my hand a full page advertisement inserted by the government of Canada in a leading publication, to which advertisement reference was made by the Leader of the Opposition. It shows a picture of a lady. I do not know whether or not the minister considers this to be a typical lady. Beneath the picture we find these words.

> Look who's wearing her "immediate cash adjustment!" Gracious! What next? A body can hardly keep up with things these days. What with dogs spinning around in the sky and all. And now all this excitement about changing over your victory bonds. I was sorry to see mine go. Had it so long you know.

I do not know whether that refers to her old hat or her victory bonds. I continue:

> But when the young man at the bank explained that these new bonds paid more interest. Well! I know a good thing when I see it. And besides, he gave me a nice cash adjustment—which I straightaway spent on a new bonnet. Like it?

I suggest that we should refer to this as a "Fleming" hat. It has the Fleming patriotic price tag hanging from one side. The hat is black probably, I suspect, in mourning for the taxpayers. At the top of the hat we find a bird nestled near the crown. The bird has its mouth open and looks hungry. I think it is probably symbolic of the hungry friends of this government, who doubtless are not so hungry now.

I do not know what this conversion will cost. The Leader of the Opposition took up that matter a few moments ago. I have seen all kinds of estimates ranging between $70 million and $100 million, but according to a statement made by the senator from Hanover in the other place the commissions alone will be $25 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, surely it is within the knowledge of every hon. member of this committee that it is entirely out of order to quote statements made in the other house. The Leader of the Opposition did it this morning and he should know better. One probably cannot blame his followers for following that kind of example.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I probably should not quote what was said in the other place, but I can refer to what has been said outside the other place. The Minister of Finance has refused to give us an estimate of the cost of this bond issue and that seems very peculiar to me because the estimates for each year are brought down and the Department of Finance can have estimates for the $5 billion expenditure. I believe the minister has been withholding information that should be given to this parliament.

Another and probably the worst feature of these bonds is that they are not callable. This is an undesirable feature from the standpoint of the Canadian taxpayers. I suggest that what I can only label as "Fleming's furtive, fanatic fumbling financing" will keep the nose of the taxpayer on the grindstone for the next 25 years. Probably at the end of that time the government might give the poor old man the grindstone.

Mr. Carter: But he will not have a nose.

Mr. McMillan: But if we continue with this kind of financing he will have a much rougher and tougher stone.

As to the interest itself, let us suppose the average increase in interest is only 1 per cent. I believe I am modest in selecting 1 per cent. One per cent on $6.4 billion is $64 million a year. That will be the extra interest required if the average increase is only 1 per cent. That money must come from the taxpayers of Canada. This would mean an extra cost of approximately $16 per head of every family in Canada per year.

This high interest rate does not begin to give the average increase in interest that the taxpayer will have to pay because of this loan. Dominion government bonds are the senior security, and they set the pattern for other bonds. Certainly the provinces, counties and municipalities will all pay more for the money they borrow for the provision of roads, schools and other services.

According to the press, the minister said the other day that interest rates will not increase. I am acutely aware that the minister could be right. If this government continues its policy of trying to divert trade and carries out its further announced policy of restricting trade, as Mr. Bennett did in 1930; if our economy stands still or continues to contract, as it has already, there will not be the same great demand for money and interest rates on those borrowings might not go up; in fact, they could go down. If the government does not interfere with trade too much, however, I feel that all our provinces, municipalities and corporations will have to pay more for money. Our industries will have to pay more for money, not only to meet the extra taxation to pay the interest on those bonds; they will also have to pay more money for their long term borrowing. This will certainly increase the cost of production at a time when they are trying to enter the highly competitive markets of the world.

Our government advances money to crown corporations, and here I think they will have to charge more interest. I saw in the press the other day that the government loan to the dominion coal board had been renegotiated at an interest rate of 3½ per cent to 4 per cent. The loan to New Brunswick for the Beechwood project was made at cost or very little above. If the average interest rate goes up I would think the loan of $30 million on that project will have to be renegotiated. In case it is not, we know that the interest rate will be subsidized by the people of Canada. Eventually houses will cost more; services will cost more, and it will cost more to educate our children.

As late as last January the minister was willing to accept the estimates of his predecessor as to income for the last fiscal year. Had he not meddled with the budget he might have had a surplus. Instead of that he had a deficit of $39 million, and he drew on the cash accounts for $163 million. I know that all along the minister has said that we had just a mild recession.

What has occurred in Canada in this time of mild recession? First of all we have a billion dollar deficit. I think it will go over a billion dollars when we take into consideration the gyrations of bookkeeping and the final supplementary estimates. We have had a cost of close to $100 million in connection with the floating of this loan; therefore I think the deficit will be away over a billion dollars. All the money saved in the last 10 years has been spent, and our debt structure has been rolled back to that of 10 years ago. We have higher unemployment and increasing relief rolls in my part of the country, something we have not had for some years. We have had a rapid depletion of the unemployment insurance fund, and the fund is now out of actuarial balance. It is rapidly approaching the point of jeopardy, and we all know that money will be required to be placed in that account, which will have to come from general taxation. We have a high increase in the actual cost of government, with no adequate provision for unemployment. We have a stationary or a contracting economy. We have an outlook of similar or increasing deficits.

Finally, we have a loss of confidence among the people who handle the financing of this country. If that is not so, why did they demand such a high interest rate for loans? On top of all this—as if this was not enough for the Canadian people to bear—the Minister of Finance is coming along and asking Canadian taxpayers to assume upwards of $100 million extra a year at a time when short term money is practically at an all-time low.

In effect the minister said he did not have to take anybody's advice. I cannot imagine that any responsible person in the Department of Finance advised this financing. If they recommended anything more favourable to the taxpayers they could be overruled by the government. In support of the government's right and readiness to do so I can only quote the words of the Minister of Finance:

Let there be no question about that.

I know from the publication of the secret report that the Minister of Finance did not follow the competent advice of the Department of Trade and Commerce. In the budget there was a chance that the minister could have been right. In other words the economy could have picked up, but with respect to this loan he had no chance to be right. He has been wrong all the way. According to the press the minister spent a week end at Murray Bay with friends of the government, with the bondholders and financial men, and that was certainly a very expensive week end for Canadians.

The minister makes periodic statements—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Completely untrue.

Mr. Pearson: Were you not down to Murray Bay?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was not there any week end, as you know.

Mr. McMillan: The minister makes periodic statements telling us how well the loan is progressing. I admit that the loan is probably progressing very well, but the better it progresses and the more bonds that are sold at the high interest rate the worse it will be for the taxpayers of Canada. When the minister announced the loan one would think almost everybody in Canada owned a victory loan bond and almost everybody would benefit. The highest estimate I have seen showed that the man in the street held about 15 per cent of those bonds, and that the rest were held by banks, trust companies, insurance companies and other rich financial institutions.

For the most part the man in the street does not hold these bonds. The man in the street, the small businessman, the white collar worker and the working man, will have to pay more taxes to meet the greed of the wealthy friends of this government. If the minister had started out to make the rich richer and the poor poorer he could not have devised a much better method. These bonds are discriminatory against many other Canadians who hold other long term bonds. Their bonds did not go up six points or so as the victory bonds did. Most of them went down.

In the light of those high interest rates, I said earlier that the municipalities would likely be required to pay more interest on their debentures. I met some municipal officials who were here last week attending the meeting of the Ontario municipal association. A number of them talked about selling debentures. I was talking to those from my own home town, for instance. They had debentures of $400,000 which were to be issued for the extension of the high school and for other capital expenditures. Earlier they went to financial houses in Toronto, but because of the conversion loan which was in progress they were told to go home, that nothing could be done for them now. They were also told that their interest rates would likely be up considerably over the last debentures they had sold.

I was told by another corporation in the Niagara district that they were about to float a loan to build a sewage disposal plant. They say they will definitely not go ahead with this operation if interest rates are too high. This situation is multiplied all across Canada. Municipalities that want to go ahead with projects will certainly not do so if they have to pay high rates for money, and this will not help the unemployed to get work.

I have a copy here of the August 3 edition of the New York Times. I think our government should borrow money at a more favourable rate than does industry in the United States or Canada. It is true that in Canada industrial and corporate bonds have fallen in price to get in line with these high interest rates, but the average bond yield in the United States as of August 2, taking 40 of the better industrial bonds, was 3.742 per cent. On August 3, for instance, United States Steel 4 per cent 1983's were selling at 102½. Alcoa 4¼ per cent 1982's were selling at 106. Alcoa 3⅞ per cent 1983's and American Can 3¾ per cent 1988's were selling practically at par.

What about foreign government bonds? Belgium's 4 per cent 1962 short term bonds were selling a little above par. Various issues of Brazilian bonds at 3¾ per cent were selling just a little below or a little above par. Denmark's 4½ per cent 1962's were selling above par. Hamburg city's 4½ per cent 1966 bonds were selling at par, with the same interest rate as Canada's new loan. Norway's 4 per cent to 4¼ per cent bonds for periods of up to 10 years were all selling above par. Yet Canada is paying 4½ per cent, as much as the city of Hamburg.

What is the situation lately with respect to financing in the United States? I note in the press that in its monthly letter for August the First National City Bank of New York states that the Canadian plan accomplishes at one fell swoop what the secretary of the treasury, Robert B. Anderson, has been attempting to work out over an extended period of time, and that the United States should have considered such a plan. In July of last year the First National City Bank was advising the United States treasury to do the same thing. What did the United States treasury do? Mr. Anderson tried it in very small amounts representing a small percentage of the debt. While it is true that at the top of the boom in August of last year 91-day treasury bills stood at 4.17 per cent, by May of this year they stood at .62 per cent. The high rate was only very temporary. This shows how these rates can vary over a short term.

What has the United States done in the case of its last two bond issues? On May 15 they sold $1 billion, about one-third of one per cent of their debt, in 27-year 3¼ per cent bonds due May 15, 1985. They were sold to the public at a premium of about 50 cents per $100 and return 3.22 per cent. There was so much criticism of the treasury for selling an issue of $1 billion at such a high rate of interest that on June 15, in the refunding of $9.5 billion of notes and bonds coming due, the treasury sold two parcels, $1.8 billion in 11-month 1¼ per cent certificates and $7.4 billion in 6-year, 8-month bonds due February 15, 1965.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask that the hon. member be given such additional time as he may require?

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McMillan: I shall try to get over this quickly. The last issue to which I referred is to yield 2.58 per cent, and there was also $356 million redeemed in cash. I quote the same publication for July of this year:

> The decision to offer the 3¼ per cent bonds was taken in the face of much opposition, as it was argued that it would interfere with the federal reserve policy of credit ease by locking up into long term bonds funds needed by other borrowers—industry, state and local governments and home buyers.
> The further point was made that additions to the supply of long term issues will prevent interest costs from declining as much as needed to stimulate a revival of long term borrowing and encourage economic recovery. The idea is that the treasury should concentrate on selling short term issues to increase the liquidity of the economy.

How about Canada? A year ago I think our bonds were considered among the best in the world. Today we are racing very fast toward greater debt. The finance minister's insatiable demand for new money is making the financial people a little wary. They are losing confidence in the financial actions of the government. I think our finance minister has made our economy less liquid by freezing vast sums for a generation, thereby making us more dependent upon foreign capital in order to develop our resources.

You know, here in Ottawa we seem to get things a little out of focus. Much has been said about the cost of the printing bureau, and I would be the last one to condone any expenditures that were not justified. But the Minister of Finance, in extra interest alone over the rates we have been paying, has committed the Canadian taxpayer to the cost of building over 100 printing bureaus, one every three months, for the next generation, one almost every mile from here to Montreal.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is that statement the test of the hon. member's sense of responsibility?

Mr. McMillan: After the minister presented his budget last June I was impressed by the article written by Mr. Perry, the director of the Canadian tax foundation and a former senior official of the Department of Finance. Among other things he made the points that he believed the minister had overstated income by $75 million to $100 million, that the federal treasury would likely be worse off next year than this year, that our deficit would be close to $1 billion—we predicted it would go over $1 billion—and that a look at the prospects for the next decade left him not only disappointed but considerably shocked. This was all before the minister came out with his refunding operation.

The extra interest we will pay is enough to build the St. Lawrence seaway, the South Saskatchewan dam and extensions to railways, and then have money left over to pay for similar projects that might come along in future years. I heard a member of the Conservative party say that the government would go down in history. I say it will go down in history. I think Fleming's folly will be felt and will be discussed by taxpayers yet unborn. This government, in matters of finance, will be judged by the people of Canada in the light of the words of the Minister of Finance, words quoted so often in this house, "By their fruits ye shall know them."

I think the Minister of Finance, who has often bragged about this as being a great financial success in Canada, will only be able to brag about its bigness and nothing else. I think certainly the people of Canada will have much to regret before they are finished paying for these loans.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

Supply—Finance

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, as has already been said by a number of members of the C.C.F. party during this session, we feel that the government bond conversion policy has been a very serious blunder and that it will add a tremendous burden of interest to be borne by the ordinary people of this country, the municipalities and the provincial governments as well as the federal government. We all heard the strong statements made by the Minister of Finance on previous occasions with regard to the so-called tight money policy of the former administration and the high interest rates that were resulting from that policy, but with all the faults of the former administration never to my knowledge did they at one fell swoop so add to the interest burden of the Canadian people as has now been done by the reconversion loan.

Mr. Benidickson: Over a period of 25 years.

Mr. Argue: The government as well as the Conservative party have said in two election campaigns that it would do everything possible to ease the financial burden of the municipalities and the provinces. How often have we heard in this house from members of the Conservative party that the former government had gobbled up the lion's share of taxation revenue, had starved provincial governments, and that this in turn led to the starvation of municipal budgets. But by this very action the government is adding a huge burden of interest and carrying charges to the budgets of provinces and municipalities, and undoubtedly it will make the provision of essential services throughout the country more difficult in the years ahead.

The Minister of Finance gave no inkling in his budget speech that this was to be done. Because that policy was not set forth in the budget, parliament was denied the right of discussing this policy during the formal budget debate. We have therefore been obliged to wait until the dying days of this session for an opportunity to discuss, in a formal way, the effects of this policy on the Canadian economy. By its financial policy the government is not only adding to the cost of doing business in this country and the cost of financing the Canadian debt, but it is providing a huge windfall to big corporations and to the wealthy of this country. I am afraid that the government by this policy is making it more difficult instead of easier for the economy to recover from the recurrent recession.

[Mr. McMillan.]

During its short term of office the government has erected trade barriers and has increased interest rates, but has failed to deal with the unemployment problem. The great public works projects about which we have heard so much are, with some notable exceptions, almost non-existent. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance would care to comment on the government's public works projects. However, as far as the province of Saskatchewan is concerned I know that the province is prepared to pay 50 per cent of the cost of constructing further east-west highways or north-south highways on the same agreed basis as for the trans-Canada highway if the federal government will participate.

Here is a province in Canada that is prepared to use its financial resources on a joint basis with the federal government in order to help solve unemployment within that province, and the federal government have said no. They talk about a public works program, but when they have a chance to proceed with a substantial public works program, such as that to which I have referred concerning highways, the answer has been no.

When the minister replies I should like to know to what extent the conversion of Canada's bonds has taken place. I should like to know particularly when the savings bond campaign this fall is likely to start. I have in my hand the Winnipeg Tribune of Thursday, August 28, 1958.

Mr. Nasserden: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Nasserden: How many millions of dollars is the provincial government of Saskatchewan prepared to put into a highway program?

Mr. Argue: I am not the spokesman for the Saskatchewan government, and I do not know the answer to that question. However, I know the federal government have had firm offers from Saskatchewan to participate on an agreed basis—on an approximately 50-50 basis—with the federal government in building a second trans-Canada highway across Saskatchewan and in building main north-south highways connecting with the United States. No one—and not the hon. member for Rosthern above all hon. members—can argue that Saskatchewan has not done well in the construction section of the trans-Canada. Saskatchewan is the first province in Canada to complete its section of the highway.

Because Saskatchewan is the first province to complete its section of the highway we stand in this position. In 1958 we are the only province which can no longer obtain federal money for such a highway program. Saskatchewan's record is good. Saskatchewan is prepared, on a joint basis, to proceed immediately with a second trans-Canada highway going through Saskatchewan from east to west as well as with north-south roads. That statement may not answer the question asked by the hon. member with regard to dollar value, but I think it gives him a general idea of how much further the province of Saskatchewan is ahead of the hon. member's own government. This government have a works program that is still on the shelf.

Mr. Nasserden: If the hon. member would permit an observation—

Mr. Argue: Oh, no.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Argue: When I conclude the hon. member can make a 30-minute observation.

I was about to refer to an article appearing in the Winnipeg Tribune of August 28, coming from the Tribune Ottawa bureau. It talks of a very strong difference of opinion between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada with regard to the timing of the savings bonds campaign for this fall. I am sure the minister will be quite prepared to comment on this article.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will permit me, I will reply to it right now and say that it is a scurrilous article, devoid of truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I would not agree that it is a scurrilous article.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, it is.

Mr. Argue: I do not think that is a fair comment about the man who has written the article.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a very restrained comment.

Mr. Argue: I see that the minister is now getting back into his regular campaign style. The rumour was that we were all going to modify our approach to his estimates so we could finish some time either this week or next. The minister by his statement has now denied the truth of the article, so I do not think there is any point in my referring further to it.

I have made some reference to the problems with which the provinces are faced because of the increased interest rates resulting from the government's financial policy, and I want to refer very briefly to another aspect of that policy as it affects the provincial governments. Following the federal-provincial conference of last fall the government moved in this house to increase the amount of money, based on income tax, paid to the provinces, the increase being from 10 per cent to 13 per cent. Because of statements made by the Minister of Finance and because of the very definite promises made during the election campaign of assistance to the provincial governments, those governments believed that they would obtain an additional $62,203,000 as a result of this move. But because the Minister of Finance had in his statement and in his proposal a very definite joker, only the very minimum advantage has been gained from that proposal. There is no floor under the increase; therefore the amount going to the provinces is reduced as our economy slumps along during this period of recession.

Because our gross national product has not continued to increase, because we are in this state of recession, the benefit of this $62 million has not gone to the provinces. I would suggest to the minister that there should be placed in his legislation a floor which would provide a guarantee that at least 95 per cent —as has been provided in another instance— of this so-called increase will in fact go to the provincial governments. The Minister of Finance has not helped the provincial governments by this move as they were led to believe they would be helped; they have not received $62,203,000. Instead of having a further conference, as was very definitely promised, to help solve the difficulties faced by the provinces of this country, the government has made this new move to increase interest rates, which has brought about a very large increase in the financial burden of the provinces of Canada.

I am sure the Minister of Finance will make a very spirited defence of his policy, but the fact is that Canada today is in the greatest depression this country has seen since the thirties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: The members of the Conservative government can groan as loudly as they like, but if they had been in this house a few years ago they would have been very vocal in condemning the former government at a time when unemployment was a whole lot less than it is today. What a change in their attitude! Last session they all listened very carefully to everything that was said in this house; they were very attentive. They paid attention to every resolution brought in and promises galore were made, conferences were held and nothing was too good for the municipalities, for the provincial governments, for small business and for agriculture.

What is the government's score in so far as solving the major economic questions faced at this time by the Canadian people? Its score is zero. There is widespread and continuing unemployment and difficulty in the agricultural industry, and the government is now embarking upon a deliberate policy of making it more difficult for the provincial and municipal governments of this country to work out their budgets.

Mr. Benidickson: So far in this debate our discussion for the most part has been—and quite understandably so—on the point of the very big operation which the Minister of Finance announced with respect to the conversion of about 40 per cent of our matured debt.

The case of the opposition and the analyses from the opposition ranks were so well presented by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Welland, in such comprehensive and masterful ways, that I do not wish to say a great deal more on the subject. I was just wondering, however, if the thought would appeal to the minister that, by consent of course, on item 1 we might confine our debate at this stage to the conversion loan. There are, I am sure, other aspects which hon. members want to raise on item 1, and the Leader of the Opposition raised a number of questions to which I am sure the minister is prepared to reply. The ground work has been so well laid, and I am conscious of the fact that this may be the second last or third last day of this session that, as I say, I have very little to add; but—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I may say so, I think the suggestion of the hon. member is a good one. This seems to be the major subject so far as those in the opposition who have spoken thus far are concerned, and it might be well to continue with that particular subject to its conclusion in order to avoid a discursive sort of debate running to other subjects at this time.

Mr. Benidickson: I was thinking of Hansard and the opportunity for the public to get some sort of continuity in the debate on this subject. Of course I have some remarks to make on such matters as tight money, the Bank of Canada and so on, but I would not really want to relate them back, in view of that understanding, to the conversion loan. Therefore any remarks I might make at this point, if it is acceptable to the committee, might, along with the discussion of other hon. members, be confined to the conversion loan.

Although I could not possibly add very much to the extremely informed and inquiring remarks in the debate this morning respecting this conversion loan, my particular disturbance at the moment is chiefly the absence of a callable feature in the conversion loan opportunity which the minister has decided to make available to the investing public.

I would remind him that the last time, to my knowledge at any rate, when the wages of money were ever set at this rate was under a previous Conservative administration, I believe in 1934. There was a conversion loan then which was given promotion similar to that which we have had at this time, with advertising, ballyhoo and so on, under the previous Conservative administration, again at the same highest rate of 4½ per cent. But when they were converting the victory bonds of world war I on that occasion they did put in a proviso that within 10 years there would be an opportunity to call the bonds. The record shows that within 15 years subsequent administrations found that they could to the advantage of the taxpayers of this country pay off that obligation under the terms of the callable provision, and did so.

It disturbs me very much that we are obligated here for 40 per cent of our existing debt at a base of 4½ per cent interest. I thought the hon. member for Welland very clearly gave examples this morning of interest rates that are now being paid in other countries across the world. He mentioned, of course, the United States where rates might be low, but he also mentioned cities such as Hamburg and other places that are able to borrow money at less cost to the ultimate taxpayer than the Minister of Finance has decided to pay without interruption for 25 years. The lack of a callable feature disturbs me.

As I look at the biographical index the Minister of Finance will probably be 78 by the time these bonds come up for payment and redemption. I believe he has unnecessarily imposed a long term obligation on the people of Canada for a permanent 4½ per cent rate. I am also very disturbed about that. I am wondering what are the reasons for not having the usual feature of an opportunity for redemption after a certain period of time.

We know that a very small percentage of the individual people of Canada hold bonds and are given this opportunity for conversion. I do not wish to exaggerate that. In previous discussions of this subject—and only by question and answer, because the minister was not very informative on any occasion—I must say I rather doubted his assessment that there were two million Canadians holding this type of security. I have learned since, of course, that this is possible because more than two million Canadians during the war years did subscribe to victory bonds in denominations of $50 or $100. If my hon. friend's calculations are based on that fact I want to ask him to inform the committee what knowledge the Bank of Canada has as to the number of those people who in the last 12 years have gone to banks to cash in these relatively small items.

In the figure of two million I believe the minister included many institutions which by the average Canadian are not looked upon as anything other than financial institutions. I will not attempt to repeat the effective arguments that were made by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Welland about these facts; we know that is so.

I question whether or not this terrifically expensive advertising campaign—for instance, the lady in the hat and so on, and I have another one about which I wish to remind the minister—is really justified if it applies to the holders of these small $50 and $100 bonds. The Leader of the Opposition asked just who was conducting this campaign. We would like to know something about that in so far as the advertising fraternity is concerned. I believe it is being conducted by the former firms of one of the chief advisers of the Prime Minister.

One of the first advertisements that appeared in connection with this promotion is on my desk before me. I have here the Ottawa Citizen of July 15, 1958. The advertisement is addressed to all holders of victory bonds. On approximately 50 television stations and 152 radio stations this was promoted by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance as a patriotic objective.

The Leader of the Opposition explained that very effectively this morning. But I ask hon. members of this committee, if we are considering something in the nature of a patriotic endeavour, whether or not they think such a full page advertisement has been properly designed if such words as "confidence" "stability" and "progress" get much smaller type than the type announcing the fact that Hon. Donald M. Fleming, Minister of Finance, is promoting it? What is more likely to appeal to the holders of these bonds? Is it the big letters used in this full page advertisement for the name of the minister, or would they think the advertising agent was not political and was more likely selling a worth-while product if emphasis had been given to the words that now appear in smaller print, "confidence" "stability" and "progress"? I believe that is worthy of consideration. There has been a great promotion campaign undertaken with respect to this conversion.

Questions were raised in the debate this morning with respect to cost. The minister challenged the hon. member for Welland to disclose the name of an informant. The hon. member for Welland said he had some verbal information from somebody who was associated with the banking fraternity. May I say that I am familiar with someone who is connected with the communications fraternity. He told me that two days after the launching of this promotion all local banks in this country were sent telegrams, presumably paid for by the taxpayers. The first one ranged in length between 1100 and 1200 words, and my informant told me that the calculated cost of sending it to a very small community in Manitoba would be $22. This was followed by a night letter of over 800 words in length, and my friend did not tell me what the cost of that would be. We all know how many branches of Canadian banks there are across this country. There is a blitz on—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, may I ask my hon. friend who appears to have sent the wires of which he speaks?

Mr. Benidickson: Pardon?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Whose wires does he refer to?

Mr. Benidickson: The wires, of course, came from the agent of my hon. friend, the Bank of Canada. The wires were sent to all branches of the banking system as agents. Doubtless they would have been sent to all investment dealers as well. Perhaps my hon. friend had a gross rate with respect to this type of communication. When my hon. friend replies to some of the criticisms with which we are concerned here he could perhaps explain this to us.

After what we heard from the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Welland I believe we all recognize that it did not require this "hard sell" in so far as the institutional owners of these securities were concerned. They had a tremendous opportunity to improve their position.

The minister was on television last night I did not have the opportunity to see him, but I have talked to some others who did and I must say that they thought he was a pretty good salesman, and so on. Each of those hook-ups costs about $20,000, according to my information, and they are not designed to go to those 1,800,000 individual holders of $50 bonds I spoke about and the smaller number of people who hold $100 bonds. I would like the minister to give some indication of how many people we are attempting to approach who perhaps own $1,000 bonds, who are not institutional owners of government securities. Perhaps at this stage of the committee discussion the minister would deal with the bond conversion program. As for me, except for interrogation on this particular subject, I will not unduly harass him because of the calendar situation.

The Leader of the Opposition—I still think of him as minister for external affairs—raised several specific questions of the utmost importance to the people of this country. The minister should reply specifically to those questions. Of course I imagine we shall have an opportunity in committee of supply further to interrogate the minister, but I am prepared to defer questions of a more general or of a broader nature until we have disposed of the matter of the conversion loan. There is no item in the estimates with respect to the conversion loan; therefore we must deal with it on the first item in the estimates. There will no doubt be some others who have questions to ask the minister, but probably by consent they will direct their questions to the minister at this point on the conversion loan only. Their rights will then be unlimited with respect to other points of administration in regard to the Department of Finance.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I would like to address myself to another subject that has nothing to do with the conversion loan. I understood the minister to say that if there were no other speakers he might want to deal with that at once, and I shall reserve my privilege to continue with another subject later.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, if no other hon. members wish to address the committee on the Canada conversion loan of 1958, I shall now have very much pleasure in replying to some of the biting criticisms which have been heard in this committee today from the opposition benches with respect to this important national undertaking.

This morning the Leader of the Opposition complimented himself on, as he said, having acted responsibly in the days which have intervened since July 14 when the campaign was announced in this house until today. Mr. Chairman, having recognized that the Leader of the Opposition acted responsibly in his remarks in this house on July 14 and since by his silence, until today, one can only express great regret that today the hon. gentleman has chosen the opposite course. While one is ready to attribute to the hon. gentleman full credit for having spoken as he did on July 14 in a spontaneous utterance, one can only regret that apparently in the interval, and very recently, he has been permitting himself to be influenced by others.

I shall have something to say later, Mr. Chairman, about the compound of confusion and suspicion that characterized some of the utterances in this committee today. I say this to you. Although the estimates of the Department of Finance have been called several times or announced several times as about to be called at other stages of the session, in the light of the remarks that have been made here today, which if they are listened to or paid any attention to by the people of this country, could have harmful effects perhaps, it is well that the Canada conversion loan campaign was permitted to reach the present stage in its second last week before those harmful remarks, those mischievous remarks, those irresponsible remarks, were delivered in this house by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Let me review stage by stage the circumstances out of which the Canada conversion loan campaign issued. We as a government inherited from our predecessors the prospect of the maturity in rapid succession of a considerable series of bond obligations of this country. They are not confined to the Canada victory loans; but of the $10 billion in approximate figures that the people of Canada subscribed in response to appeals during the war in the nine victory loan issues, up to the present time four have matured and have been refunded or in part paid off. Five of them remain, and those five aggregate something over $6.4 billion, a tremendous share of the entire national debt.

As I pointed out in the statement made in this house on July 14, the difficulty is that these five series are falling due in rapid succession. One of them falls due at the beginning of 1959.

Mr. Pearson: Eight years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The next one is in 1960; the next one in 1962; the eighth in 1963; and the ninth in 1966. They are not the only bond maturities that fall due in those years. Indeed, there are numerous others, and we are faced with a situation where these maturities following one another in rapid succession must be met; for here we are dealing with something that is very precious, the credit of Canada. There is nothing that is more important to the well-being of the Canadian economy in all its aspects, in all its facets, than the national credit, of this country; for if that national credit is not maintained and safeguarded the credit of other institutions and individuals will correspondingly suffer, Mr. Chairman; for the national credit is basic to all our ideas of credit and all ideas of confidence in our country.

Mr. Benidickson: Still good because of surpluses of your predecessors.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we realize that my hon. friend should not be held too responsible for the things he is saying.

Mr. Pearson: Why does the minister not answer him, then? That is the only reply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is out of my friendship for him that I am not answering.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is with respect to a rapid succession of maturities virtually no room for manoeuvre on the part of the issuing authority. These are obligations which must be met as they fall due; otherwise serious and sometimes irreparable harm is done to the credit of the issuing authority. It is possible in some cases to anticipate a maturity and make an offer to those who hold bonds that will mature in the future to surrender them in return for some other form of security, normally under present circumstances in terms of a later maturity. But apart from that circumstance, Mr. Chairman, these maturities leave no room whatever for manoeuvring on the part of the national treasury.

We have other obligations which must also be met. As I indicated in the budget speech on June 17, it will be necessary for us to borrow. There is some leeway in the matter of choosing dates of issue of new securities designed to raise new money but, Mr. Chairman, as long as there is overhanging the national treasury a series of debt maturities following one another in rapid succession it will mean that the national credit will be a problem to preserve, and we will be faced as well with difficulty in raising new money as that becomes necessary.

That is the situation to which we fell heir. It is regrettable that these victory loan bonds were falling due in such rapid succession. It is regrettable that their maturities were not spaced out farther apart in the future. I am not going to be critical of those who were responsible for their issuance in time of war. Perhaps they did what they thought was best under the immediate circumstances.

Mr. Benidickson: Don't you think they did?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But we have fallen heir to the problem of meeting these obligations and there, Mr. Chairman, is the problem. You cannot claim to have any effective policy of debt management as long as you are faced with heavy maturities in rapid succession, and at the same time with the necessity of going into the market to borrow new money. Debt management policies mean that you will have some regard for the spacing of maturing obligations, that you will have some breathing space, some room for manoeuvring in putting out your issues in search of new money.

I should like to say a word now concerning the condition of the bond market. The government is a debtor. The government must continue to be a borrower. One C.C.F. member said today that as long as we are going to have the present system you are going to have situations of this kind where the government has to offer obligations to people in return for maturing obligations, or borrow further money from them. He was right. As long as we have a free system in this country that is exactly the situation that any government is going to face. It must go into the market and borrow money there. It cannot go into the market and compel people to hand over money. It can do that when it taxes, but not when it borrows. Borrowing assumes that you find someone with funds who is willing to lend his funds to you, and the government as a borrower must find persons who are willing to lend money.

Mr. Benidickson: Could I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will ask my hon. friend to defer his questions until later, if he does not mind. In our free system that is precisely the situation that will obtain. The alternative is to resort either to compulsion or to the printing press, the former of which would destroy our freedom and the latter of which would destroy the value of our currency and wreak untold damage upon obligations and persons with fixed incomes.

Mr. Benidickson: You recently went to the printing presses for $400 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will persist in remarks of that kind I will have to make some comment in reply thereto. I hope he will accept that suggestion.

I said I was going to say a word about the condition of the market. Interest rates in this country, after a period of relative stability for some years, began to rise at the end of 1955. During the war years federal government financing did not face the competition that it faces today in the short, medium and long term markets with others who are seeking to borrow in those markets; therefore it was relatively easy for the government during the war to maintain the rate of 3 per cent.

Anybody who knows anything of conditions in the market knows perfectly well that if these five issues of Canadian victory bonds had been permitted to remain outstanding until maturity without any effort being made to reduce the outstanding aggregate the federal treasury would have had to pay higher rates of interest in any attempt made then to refund them. So let it not be pretended that the rates in the Canada conversion loan represent something new in the way of an increase in the interest rate. Interest rates in this country began to rise at the end of 1955 and the former government experienced that increased cost in its borrowing starting at the end of 1955 and in 1956 and 1957, until the new government came into office.

Mr. Benidickson: Now we have the highest ever.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Interest rates continued at that higher level until the autumn of 1957. If my hon. friend is talking about interest rates I will remind him, if he wants to take his mind back to the last long term issue of the former government, an issue of $150 million of 41½-year bonds on September 15, 1956—it was nothing like the amount we are talking about here, $6.4 billion, the largest financial undertaking in Canada's history—that they put out that issue at a coupon rate of 3¾ per cent but they sold it at a discount, and their true rate was 3.9 per cent. That was their rate on a long term issue.

Mr. Benidickson: A 16-year longer term issue.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And, Mr. Chairman, it did not go nearly as well, even with that limited objective of $150 million, as our conversion loan issue has gone so far. If hon. members opposite want something further I remind them that on December 15, 1956, they put out a one-year issue and the effective rate on that issue—let us not be concerned about the coupon rate but the effective rate, having regard to the discount at which they sold it—was 4.31 per cent. There is the last borrowing of the former government in the open market, 4.31 per cent, and that issue involved $250 million, a mere fraction of the amount we are dealing with here.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, any legislative body in a free society that knows how the laws of supply and demand work, and that they work in the money market the same as they work in any commodity market, knows that the more money you have to raise at any particular time the greater the demand is and the greater the pressure on supply, and as a result you have to pay more. Well, Mr. Chairman, that was the situation which confronted us. Our last borrowing was in April, and we were successful in that borrowing. It will be remembered that we put out a series of four maturities last April and out of those realized the substantial total of $950 million. We paid an interest rate of 2.94 per cent on a one-year and two-month bond. We paid, and I am speaking here of effective yield, a rate of 3.35 per cent on the second bond, maturing in May, 1961. We paid an effective rate of 3.71 per cent on the bonds maturing in 1970, and on the longest term maturing in 1978, we paid an effective rate of 4.01 per cent to maturity. Those are the rates on the last borrowings by the federal government before we come to the Canada conversion loan three months later.

What had happened in that period? Well, we have seen in the market in recent years, Mr. Chairman, a trend toward the issue of short term maturities. The longer term maturities have not gone as well or as rapidly as the short term maturities. This is something any issuing authority, whether it is the federal, provincial or municipal government or private business, must take into account. There are some factors in the long range aspects of the problem which must be considered and be taken into account by any issuing authority.

Mr. Benidickson: Just for the record, it is not debatable—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I told my hon. friend that I would take his questions later, if he does not mind.

Mr. Benidickson: The statement of my hon. friend was really—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I indicated a while ago that I would take his questions later, if he can contain himself.

It was our expectation, as I indicated in the budget speech of June 17, that with the heavy borrowing program we faced this year, the heavy bond marketing program necessitated in addition by the heavy maturities within the period of this fiscal year as well as the necessity for raising substantial new amounts of money in the market to meet our obligations, both those represented by our budget debt and our non-budgetary necessities, we would go forward on a basis of spreading out these offerings to the public.

I stressed in my budget speech, Mr. Chairman, that there must be a relatively flexible approach to this problem on the part of the federal government. At page 1242 of Hansard for June 17, 1958, in the budget speech, this is what I said:

> Government policy regarding the management of the public debt cannot follow any rigid formula; it must be adapted to economic conditions and to market requirements. While I do not propose to place an undue burden on the longer term bond market, it is most desirable to keep our maturing debt reasonably spread out over the years. To refinance maturing issues cheaply in the short term market would only build up greater difficulties for ourselves two or three years hence. It will be our aim to offer acceptable volumes of longer term bonds whenever suitable opportunities occur, and to spread the remainder sensibly between short and mid-term maturities.

While the prospective increase in our debt will be quite substantial during the next year or two, the net burden of the public debt will remain well below what we carried quite easily only a few years ago.

I indicated there, Mr. Chairman, the necessity of preserving a measure of flexibility in our approach to this problem, and not being tied down to any rigid formula. What we have done since has been completely in keeping with that principle.

Now, it was a change in the market condition which was occurring at that time which necessarily had a very direct influence on our thinking and our approach to the problem of borrowing. Beginning on June 16, the day before the budget speech, there set in in the financial markets of the United States a rapid weakening which affected the strength of the bond market immediately, and that communicated itself to Canada as any weakness in the market in the United States does communicate itself to Canada. We had to take account therefore, of this weakening influence in the financial markets in the United States, a situation where yields were rising and the quoted values of securities of even the highest authority, the federal government, were dropping rapidly.

What happened in the United States in the middle of June continued, and has continued since. This situation was described in one of the leading financial periodicals in the United States, the regular letter of the Bankers' Trust Company, in these words:

The financial community has just witnessed a most unusual occurrence: the government bond market has undergone a precipitate drop—

Note these words, Mr. Chairman:

—a precipitate drop at a time when business activity is near its recession low following the sharpest decline since prewar days, and when the federal reserve has been furnishing reserves to the money market in massive amounts.

That is a United States estimate of the weakening that set in in the financial market there, and which had an immediate effect upon the values of government bonds in that country. We felt the result of that weakening and so, taking cognizance of the situation, we decided at that time to postpone any attempt to go to the financial markets of this country to borrow money on a new issue. In order to meet the temporary situation, as I fully explained to the house in my statement on July 14, we arranged temporary financing through the banks and the temporary financing is to continue until December.

In the meantime, Mr. Chairman, we undertook a measure by which we sought to bring, and I have no doubt have succeeded in bringing, abiding strength to the bond market in Canada, and for the purpose and with the result of strengthening the position of the federal government and other governments in that market. This is our concern, that for whatever causes the federal government may have to go to the market for borrowings, we shall go there on as favourable terms as we can obtain. No minister of finance of this country is ever going to go to the bond market on terms that are any more generous than he has to pay to borrow the money he requires.

Faced with this situation, we turned to the Canada conversion loan as the largest financial undertaking in Canadian history, and designed to bring strength to the whole structure of borrowings in this country.

I do not need to go over the ground I have covered in previous statements in the house. This measure offers us an opportunity to bring about some control over our debt maturities that could not have been accomplished in any other way. The Leader of the Opposition talked glibly this morning about debt management, yet he condemned the one effective way by which debt management policies may be put into effect in this country. What is the use of talking like that? It is action that is required, and this conversion loan will do more to make it possible for the government to have some control over debt maturities and put into effect policies of effective debt management than anything else that could have been done under the circumstances.

I have indicated, Mr. Chairman, how these rates are set. The Minister of Finance, in going into the market, goes there to make his borrowings on the most favourable terms he can obtain. Those from whom the money is to be borrowed naturally are looking for the best rate they can obtain, and it becomes a matter then of arriving, in accordance with the estimate of supply and demand in as fine a scale as human judgment will permit, at those terms which will attract the money that is required to be borrowed on behalf of Canada. That is the way it will always be as long as we have a free economy in Canada.

Of course, if we are asking people in this country, to lend money to us for a longer period, anybody who knows anything about the bond market in recent years knows that we must be prepared to offer inducements, for the longer term market in these recent times has been more elusive by far than has the short term market and the yield rates in the long term market have been substantially higher than those in the short term market.

Wanting as we did to postpone into the future the maturity of as much as possible of this $6.4 billion of debt, we naturally set the most attractive rate for the longest maturity. Therefore we established the rate of 4½ per cent as the coupon rate on the 25-year maturity. The shorter maturities have a lower rate of interest. Indeed on the shortest one of the new issues, namely the 3¼-year issue, we pay just 3 per cent, exactly the same rate as that on the victory loan bonds. That fact has not been mentioned in this debate. That fact has not been mentioned by hon. members opposite. They keep talking as though all of the new bonds are to be issued at 4½ per cent. The seven-year issue pays 3¾ per cent. The 14-year issue pays 4¼ per cent. Thus, Mr. Chairman, these maturities are adjusted with a view to tapping at these various periods of maturity the interests and convenience of those who hold these bonds so that if they do not wish to go into one of short maturity, they have other opportunities which may be attractive to them. In that way we will obtain conversion of just as much of this $6.4 billion as possible. The interest rates are realistically set with reference to these maturities and they are realistically set having regard to the factors at work in the financial market.

Something has been said, Mr. Chairman, about what the Leader of the Opposition called the premium or the bonus. He was referring to what is more properly called the adjustment payment. An adjustment payment had to be paid. How otherwise could you equate, for the purpose of qualifying for conversion into any of the new issues, five maturities at different periods which, although they had the same interest rates, were quoted at different values in the bond markets because of the different maturities? You could not equalize them except by some cash payment adjusted to the differences in the market price on those five outstanding victory loan issues. That was the function of the cash adjustment payment. Is fault to be found—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The minister's time has expired.

Mr. Benidickson: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee give the Minister of Finance unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank the committee, Mr. Chairman.

Those who are responsible for promoting the conversion are not to be blamed because they have sought to focus attention on the 4½ per cent coupon on the 25-year bond or on this cash adjustment payment. Naturally these offerings are put before those who hold these victory loan bonds in their most attractive form. But these are necessary factors in seeking the response. And what a response it has been. I will make this frank statement. Little did I think when this campaign was announced on July 14, facing as we did the period of the summer when a great many people are away from home, that by Labour day we would have reached the figure of $5 billion of conversions. I think that, in the eyes of all Canadians, is an achievement of which to be proud. It points to the confidence which Canadians have in their own country the best security in the world, the one that we want Canadians to look upon as the best security in the world. I refer to Canada's credit, Canada's promise to pay.

The response of the Canadian people has been magnificent. I am thankful, Mr. Chairman, that we obtained the conversion of the $5 billion before hon. gentlemen opposite today opened up their attack on Canada's conversion loan. Certain it is that, if the people of Canada pay any attention to these irresponsible attacks, they are not going to help us in our efforts in this final period, the last ten days of the campaign, to reach just as many as possible of these bond holders who have not yet converted their bonds. Our effort, Mr. Chairman, has been geared to a program in these last ten days to reach everyone that we can possibly reach. That is the reason for the publicity campaign. We want to reach every victory bond holder. Many of these bonds are held in small amounts. Many are in bearer form. They are scattered about in safety deposit boxes and other places of safekeeping. We must bring this message to every small bond holder. It is the small bond holder in particular whom we are trying to reach with the aid of this publicity campaign. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite complain of it.

An hon. Member: Shame on them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the degree of responsibility with which they have approached their part in this great national effort.

Mr. Pearson: We are to keep quiet?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pearson: We are to be gagged?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member prided himself today on having kept quiet on this subject since July 14. He prided himself on having kept quiet. Does he pride himself today on having unleashed this attack upon Canada's conversion loan?

Mr. Benidickson: It is not on the small investors; it is on the government's position.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This conversion loan, throughout the length and breadth of Canada has exceeded all our expectations. It was hailed everywhere in all parts of this country as a forward step that promised great good for Canada in the future. But there were exceptions.

Mr. Pearson: There certainly were.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There were three newspapers of anti-government persuasion which did not like it. However, I will say this for the newspapers across Canada. With relatively few exceptions they applauded the announcement and urged support. I will refer to only two of these newspapers, Mr. Chairman. Here is the Toronto Daily Star in its issue of July 15. It certainly is no supporter of the government. This is the editorial. I will pass over the parts in which they make a kindly reference to the television program of the previous night in which the Prime Minister and I had taken part and announced the campaign. They stated as follows:

> The big, new loan is a bold step. Over the next six years about $6½ billion in wartime victory bonds are coming due. To refund them as they come due would require floating very large new loans about every six months. This would have an unsettling effect on the bond market. Encompassing the whole caboodle in one vast issue—the greatest financial operation in Canada's history—should stabilize the bond market and make it easier for lesser governments, for instance, municipalities, to float what loans they require.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, were they not quoting the minister?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the Toronto Star, a leading Liberal newspaper. Let me give one more, Mr. Chairman. I will take time to give only one more. This is from the Montreal Star, a paper which does not pretend to give any measure of consistent support to this government. Here is what they said in their editorial of July 16:

> The government's decision to go all out and, in one huge operation, clean up its overhanging debt conversion program deserves to succeed. The timing is good and the plan, so far as can be judged, is an attractive one.

I said there were exceptions; there were three exceptions, and one of them, of course, was the Winnipeg Free Press. It seems now that after a good beginning on the part of the Leader of the Opposition on July 14, the Winnipeg Free Press has called the tune and the official opposition opposite have knuckled down and they are today following the line set by this publication.

Mr. Pearson: That is childish and the minister knows it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What the Leader of the Opposition is doing is childish, in following the line of the Winnipeg Free Press and not following the sound, responsible and patriotic line he followed in this house on July 14.

There was mention today of a biblical expression which I have used in this house on a number of occasions, "By their fruits ye shall know them." What then has been the effect of this Canada conversion loan on the condition I have described, which provided the background for our decision in that respect? The effect, if a comparison is required, is measured by the fact that conditions in the United States have continued as I described them earlier. There have been drops in some of the gilt edged federal securities over there of as much as 9 and 10 points on an issue in the period since last spring. What has been the result in Canada? What has been the condition which has followed this conversion loan? Mr. Chairman, I am thankful to say that we have stabilized the Canadian bond market.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benidickson: The non-victory loan bonds?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have achieved a degree of stability in the Canadian bond market which is the envy of the United States.

If I had time I could refer to many expressions of admiration for what has been done here which have been uttered in the United States. The benefits of the stabilization of the market will not only accrue to the federal government, they will also accrue to the provinces, to the municipalities and to private business in respect of the borrowing they must undertake.

Mr. Benidickson: The high interest rates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The effect has already been reflected in a most impressive drop in the rate we have to pay on short term money, the rate on treasury bills. In fact, the treasury bill rate in recent weeks has reached the lowest point in years in this country.

Mr. Benidickson: Then why is the long term the highest?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Much of the benefit of that condition is attributable to the Canada conversion loan.

It was pretended here today that somehow or other this had had the effect of causing the market to close to other borrowing authorities including the provinces and municipalities. Nothing could be further from the truth. The fact is that in the first eight months of this year, to August 31, the amount of public borrowing in Canada far exceeded that of 1957. Here are figures which were published in the press two days ago:

Total Canadian public bond financing during the first eight months of this year amounted to $2,321,844,865 compared with $1,416,177,420 for the same period last year.

Mr. Pearson: What has that to do with it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has this to do with it, that our conversion loan has not had the effect of squeezing other borrowers out of the market.

Mr. Pearson: How much of that is since July 14?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps not a great deal of it.

Mr. Benidickson: Give us the figures, then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because dealers have been devoting their efforts—and I am thankful for this, as I would have hoped the hon. gentlemen opposite would have been thankful—principally to making a great success of the conversion loan as the greatest financial undertaking in Canada's history. With that out of the way there will be every opportunity for other borrowing authorities to go into the market and expect the attention they would like to have.

There have been some criticisms with which I would like to deal fully and frankly. It is not a matter of choice on my part, believe me, that the remarks I am making are as long as they are, but hon. members opposite have evidently attached a great deal of importance to this matter. I think six or seven hon. members—

Mr. Pearson: Three.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend does not lead everybody in the opposition. I believe at least five or six hon. members have spoken on this matter today and I think in fairness I should deal with their criticisms.

I have referred to the fact that the Leader of the Opposition made a statement on July 14, which is to be found in Hansard at page 2203, and which I think was a model statement on the part of a responsible Canadian. He welcomed the announcement made that day and he called it an important statement. He said that it was the largest operation of its kind in our history, even in our wartime history, and I will read some of his words on that occasion:

He has emphasized—

Referring to myself.

—quite rightly that for it to be successful it will require the enthusiastic co-operation of everybody concerned, and as I said in my contribution to the budget debate, Mr. Speaker, all Canadians will hope that he will get that co-operation and all Canadians must hope that this operation will be a success.

That was a responsible statement. And then the Leader of the Opposition pointed to the fact that we in this country were entering upon some very difficult and complicated financing and——refinancing moves which the minister has outlined to the house previously, and this is the first and a very important stage in what he himself has called a major financial operation. I repeat that we as Canadians must all hope that this operation will be a success and that, above all, the stability of our currency will be maintained throughout the operation. Of course, while all of us hope that, we cannot but help feel anxious about the effect on monetary policy and on inflationary pressures of the operation which is now beginning. We hope that effect will not be harmful, and we hope these inflationary pressures will be held in check. We will all be following with great interest the progress of this very important refinancing campaign.

Mr. Pearson: We have been.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why, Mr. Chairman, why has the Leader of the Opposition fallen from the high sense of responsibility reflected in that statement to the low state of irresponsibility reflected in his remarks in this house this morning?

We will have to re-assess in the light of this experience the value and the importance we should attach to statements of the Leader of the Opposition in the future if it is going to be open to him to make such a complete somersault in his position and to abandon responsibility in favour of irresponsibility.

All members of the Liberal party in this house, however, are not quite in that category, and I wish to say, not to score any debating point but in a desire to pay a tribute to them, that there are two hon. Liberal members of this house who are mayors of their own municipalities and who have taken what I think is a patriotic and responsible course in commending this campaign to their people.

Firstly, the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean wrote to me on July 25 in reply to a letter which had gone out to all municipalities holding those bonds, in which he said the following:

I believe the city of Outremont holds approximately $290,000 of the bonds exchangeable for the new loan and at its next meeting of August 6 a resolution will be presented in order that these bonds may be converted immediately.

These bonds were converted and I thank the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean for the support he engendered on the part of his municipality.

Then the hon. member for Fort William, who is mayor of that important city, caused to be sent to me through the clerk of the municipality a statement that he had issued at the time of the announcement of the loan, saying that the mayor had requested this statement to be sent to me. The following is an extract from the monthly radio report of Mayor Hubert Badanai M.P., to the people of Fort William:

In his budget speech of June 17, the Minister of Finance made reference to the government's intention of offering large blocks of bonds to meet the government's commitment and spending for the fiscal year of 1958.

On July 14, Mr. Fleming announced the new conversion loan. The purpose of my reference to it, is to recommend to all present holders of victory bonds to avail themselves of the opportunity of converting the old for the new, which offers a higher and attractive rate of interest.

The support of all Canadians for the new loan has been asked and I feel it is my duty to support the Minister of Finance and the government to the end that this great financial transaction may be a great success from which directly or indirectly every Canadian will benefit.

Mr. Chairman, it is but a few days ago in this house that some C.C.F. members chose on a motion for interim supply to embark upon a very bitter attack upon the government and upon the Minister of Finance in particular for this Canada conversion loan. Things were said by them during the course of that debate which if they were said outside this chamber and without the benefit of the privilege of this chamber would be defamatory. At the very time they were bitterly making these statements I received a letter from the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Donald MacDonald. He wrote me as follows:

Dear Mr. Fleming:

President Jodoin has referred to my attention your letter of July 12, in which you advised of the new Canada conversion loan of 1958 offered by the government of Canada, and recommended the participation of the Canadian Labour Congress in this project.

You will, no doubt, be pleased to learn that the congress has decided as a matter of policy to convert all unmatured 3 per cent victory bonds presently included in its investment portfolio into the new conversion issue.

Trusting that this may prove of interest, I am

Yours sincerely,

Signed Donald MacDonald
Secretary-Treasurer

I thank the Canadian Labour Congress for that response to the Canada conversion loan.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I pass on to the criticisms we have heard on other accounts. We are told that this has been of benefit to the big investors and the big holders. I will come down in detail to answers to certain questions asked here today by the Leader of the Opposition and I will have an opportunity of exploding the baseless and misleading statements he made, but let me content myself with saying this. Our effort in this campaign, and one reason we have sought to make use of the various media of publicity, is to bring home to every holder of these bonds, even to the man who holds a $50 bond, the advantages that will accrue to him through this conversion and to see that he has the same opportunity of knowing about these advantages and making up his mind in the face of them as any holder of larger amounts of victory bonds.

Something was said about the commissions. I will have something to say specifically about that. I think it would be convenient at this point to turn to the series of questions that were asked today by the Leader of the Opposition. Apparently the brain trust in the Liberal headquarters has been working overtime and, of course, this means that the lamps have been burning brightly in the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Pearson: That is very funny. You have a great sense of humour.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am glad we can both laugh about it.

Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition challenged me to talk about the cost of the operation and the cost of the publicity. He gave his estimates of these various elements of cost. I wish to place on the record the figures I have on this and although they are not absolutely final as things stand at the moment they are from responsible sources and I ask that they be compared with the figures the Leader of the Opposition was content to plaster on the record without regard for the mischief that might thereby be created.

The hon. gentleman asked first of all about the cost of publicity and he said his figure was $2 million. The actual budget for publicity is $1,500,000. That is one fortieth of 1 per cent of the total amount we are seeking to convert. Let me say this. If we had let these five issues of victory bonds ride along to maturity we would then have had to face the problem of publicity costs for five new loans to provide the money to meet these maturities on a refunding or other basis. Here we are getting five campaigns rolled into one with all the savings that come in publicity in rolling those five into one.

In the second place I stress the fact that we conceive it to be our duty to carry this information to the man who is a small holder of bonds, the man who may not be very experienced in dealing with bonds and who may hold a bond valued at $50, $100 or $500. If we had not undertaken this publicity campaign we would have been accused by hon. members opposite of being interested only in seeking conversions by the large holders of these victory bonds.

The next question dealt with the dealers' commissions. I was told that we had not given adequate information to the house on various aspects of this Canada conversion loan. Mr. Chairman, I put all the information about the commissions on record in this house in reply to questions asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and that information is to be found in Hansard of July 30. There I pointed out that the commission paid is graduated according to the maturity. Naturally, when we are urging people to convert their bonds into the most distant maturity the harder selling is there and we wanted to create as much incentive as we could in that quarter. The rates of commission that have been set are entirely reasonable and realistic. They were one quarter of 1 per cent on the 3 per cent bonds, one half of 1 per cent on the 3¼ per cent bonds, three quarters of 1 per cent on the 4¼ per cent bonds and 1 per cent on the 4½ per cent bonds.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I was quick to add that we took out of the total the large amounts that would have been easier to be had by those who are doing the canvassing. What we did was to allow no commission whatever on conversions by the Bank of Canada. There is nothing to pay, of course, on conversions out of government accounts.

Mr. Pearson: What a concession!

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We allow no commission on conversions by chartered banks on their own account. And then, as to the large holdings, and this includes all of the large institutions in Canada, they are to be in a special account and on that special account the commission earnings are dropped. They get the one quarter of 1 per cent on the 3 per cent bonds but they get only one half of 1 per cent on the other three maturities. In that way we have taken steps to hold down the commissions and prevent easy commissions on the conversions of the larger holdings. That is all on record at page 2858 of Hansard of July 30, 1958. I pointed out there that the commission to this group is one quarter of 1 per cent on the 3 per cent bonds and one half of 1 per cent on all other maturities.

I was asked to compare these rates of commission with those on the Canada savings bonds campaigns of 1955, 1956 and 1957. The commission paid in each of those savings bonds issues was three quarters of 1 per cent and the issuing and redemption fee in all cases was one quarter of 1 per cent. I said then and I repeat now it is quite clear that the average rate of redemption paid in the total on the conversions on the Canada conversion loan of 1958 will be less than that paid on the Canada savings bond issues in any of those three years with which I was asked to compare them.

But the Leader of the Opposition was not satisfied with this statement. Whether he even looked at it before he made his speech today, I do not know, but his speech did not give any indication that he had. He went on to make his own estimate of the dealers' commissions. He said it would be $25 million to $50 million. Mr. Chairman, according to the best reckoning that can be made today by the responsible officers of the Bank of Canada the commissions—and this figure may be high—that have been incurred to date on the $5 billion of conversions are $14 million. The Leader of the Opposition said $25 million to $50 million. That is the test of his responsibility.

Then, he passed on to what he called the bonus, the premium. He really meant the cash adjustment payment which had to be paid, as I said, to equalize the outstanding issues in terms of market value. He put this premium at $37 million to $60 million. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that arithmetic, good arithmetic, is not one of the qualifications for admission to the Liberal board of strategy. The reckoning by responsible sources, Mr. Chairman, is that the premium will amount to—what he called the premium; what I call the cash adjustment payment—about $35 million. He was prepared to run that up to $60 million.

Then, on the interest charges—and here the Leader of the Opposition showed that undoubtedly in his days as a very competent and popular lecturer at the University of Toronto his field was certainly not mathematics.

Mr. Pearson: You are the last man who should talk about that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not learn any mathematics from the Leader of the Opposition; I will say that.

Mr. Pearson: You did not learn any mathematics, period.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He was very good on English constitutional history of the seventeenth century, and I will always be grateful to him. I regard it as a privilege to have been one of his students, and I say that in all sincerity. But as for mathematics, Mr. Chairman, so far as the Leader of the Opposition is concerned, that is a different story altogether. Here is what he had to say. He calculated the additional interest charges at $100 million. He is evidently stronger on multiplication than on any other form of mathematics. Mr. Chairman, responsible quarters have calculated today that the additional interest charges as compared with the charges on the present victory bonds—if that is a fair basis of comparison at all—on the $5 billion converted to date is $49 million and not $100 million as the Leader of the Opposition calculated.

Before I leave that subject, Mr. Chairman, may I remind hon. members that in talking about—

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a question just before he leaves that point? Will he explain how he got that figure of $39 million a year in interest charges?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is $49 million.

Mr. Pearson: Can he explain how he got that figure?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. I assure him I did not make the calculation myself.

Mr. Pearson: Where did you get it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): From responsible people at the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister explain how that figure is arrived at because it is a very important figure and will apply to the next 25 years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a very important figure and I wish the hon. member had attached importance to the subject before he embarked on his wild treatment of figures this morning.

Mr. Pearson: Why do you not tell us?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is asking about how it is related to the subscriptions for the four various issues, and I am going to give him a reply to his question on that point.

The next question was this: "Who held those bonds?" That is, held the bonds, let us say, on July 11, which was the last day of business, the Friday prior to the inauguration of this campaign on Monday, July 14. Mr. Chairman, some of his figures on this were not inaccurate. The Bank of Canada held approximately $1¼ billion; government accounts held approximately $435 million; chartered banks approximately $1.4 billion; and then the large institutions that we heard so much about today held about $1.2 billion; and then there are the other investors. These are your people in the rank and file of Canadians, these are your people who include small investors, very small businesses, everybody outside the class of large institutions, and when I say "outside the class of large institutions" in referring to that exempt names list, there were 1,200 included in it. Therefore, you see that all of the medium-sized as well as large institutions were included therein and not in the class of other investors. The figure of holdings on July 11 of those other investors, the small people in Canada, was, in round figures, $2.1 billion. Against that the Leader of the Opposition in this house today undertakes to quote as if it were fact the statement of a professor of Carleton University who said very truthfully that he did not know how much was held by the small investors in Canada. Never did the gentleman utter a truer statement than that.

But he went on from that point, having departed from a factual statement, to embark on an adventure into fancy and he said it might be 10 per cent or 15 per cent. Mr. Chairman, those figures show that not less than one-third of all of the outstanding victory bonds were held by people who can be described properly, in the ordinary sense of the word, as the small investors of Canada. How many of them were there? We have had today the most extraordinary statements made in this house by hon. members opposite about how few Canadians really hold those victory bonds. Mr. Chairman, no one can calculate exactly how many persons hold those outstanding victory bonds. Many of them are in bearer form. Large numbers of them are held by banks in safekeeping for their depositors, and in that case the figures which are shown here are the figures of the bank.

Now, a lot of the money that has been subscribed by the banks in the course of conversion has undoubtedly been the money of small depositors who leave their small victory bonds with the banks but no one knows the exact number. However, by long experience, those who have responsibility in the Bank of Canada and in the Department of Finance are able to make a rather shrewd estimate of the number of holders from the number and amounts of the certificates outstanding. Particularly is this the case in the small certificates. And here, Mr. Chairman, is the substance of statements issued by the Bank of Canada on August 12, that on the last count just before the Canada conversion loan was announced there were about 1,898,000, $100 pieces and 857,000, $50 pieces outstanding. It is on evidence like that that the estimate has been arrived at, that there were in this class of small investors in Canada holding one-third of the outstanding victory bonds approximately 2 million persons. That is, sir, the answer to hon. members opposite who talk about this conversion loan playing into the hands of big business. These shocking, irresponsible and reprehensible statements which were made here today about windfalls will remain on the record as a test of the responsibility of certain hon. members opposite.

Then, Mr. Chairman, what about insurance companies? Some of the large holdings were in the hands of insurance companies. The insurance companies acquire the bonds or convert them for the benefit of their hundreds of thousands of policyholders. And what about the trusts which are set up, the university endowments and all manner of trusts of that kind? These are trusts in most cases for persons of limited means, but in these figures they are bulked in together and railed at by hon. members opposite as the holdings of big business. If ever this house has seen misrepresentation of the facts, utter distortion of the facts, Mr. Chairman, it has seen it in the house today.

The next question I was asked by the Leader of the Opposition was, what will be the effect on interest rates, first, on the long term and short term maturities and then on the securities of provinces and municipalities? I cannot prophesy, Mr. Chairman, the course of interest rates over the next few years or, indeed, over the next period of months, but I will say, without fear of contradiction on the part of any responsible source in this country that the effect of the Canada conversion loan has been to stabilize the market and in that way it has contributed not only to preventing a further rise in interest rates but in checking it and turning the tide in that respect. That is the effect of this issue.

Mr. Benidickson: Nuts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No one can say that the effect of the Canada conversion loan will be isolated in the market. But let us remember that when the Canada conversion loan has stabilized the market in Canada today it has done so in the face of the situation in the United States bond market which has continued right to this time, described in the words of that journal from which I quoted earlier as a precipitate decline. In the face of that the Canada conversion loan has stabilized the Canadian market. As to the provinces and municipalities, in their borrowing operations they will derive the full benefit from these constructive results of the Canada conversion loan.

Next I was asked what will be the value of the new bonds. I think my hon. friend flattered me in inviting me to comment on the value of the bonds in market trading in the days to come, but just to emphasize what I have been endeavouring to say I want to say something about yields and the way in which the rise in yields in Canada compares with that in the United States in this period. I am going to compare July 11, the last business day before the conversion loan was announced, with yesterday, September 3, and I am now speaking of yields. The treasury bill rate in Canada has dropped by .2 per cent and in the United States the yield on treasury bills has risen in this period by 1.41 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Why the big interest rate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend would not understand today. Maybe if he and I talked tomorrow he would. Let us look at government issues and take Canadian 3 per cents of 1960. The yield on these in this period has dropped by .33 per cent. The yield on 2¾'s of 1968 has risen by .04 per cent. The yield on 3¼'s of 1979 has risen by .14 per cent. The yield on 3¾'s of 1998 has risen by .06 per cent. Could you have any better example than these figures of the stability achieved in the period since July 11?

Take the average of 10 provincial issues. The Canadian rate has risen by just .2 per cent. Taking the average of 10 municipal issues, the yield has risen by just .15 per cent. Taking the average of 10 public utility issues, the yield has risen by just .09 per cent and the yield on 10 industrial issues has risen by .13 per cent. Could you have any better example than that of the stability in this period?

Compare with these figures the increased yield figures in the United States market in the period from July 11 to September 3. I mentioned treasury bills. In the United States the rate is up from .96 per cent to 2.37 per cent, an increase of 1.41 per cent. Ours have been going down to the lowest rate in years. Theirs have gone up to the point where on September 3 they were two and a half times what they were on July 11. Look at United States treasury bonds and compare the rise there with the rise on Canadian issues. The yield on 2⅛'s of 1960 has gone up from 1.9 per cent to 3.22 per cent, a rise of 1.32 per cent. On 2½ per cent treasuries of 1968 the yield has gone up from 2.96 per cent to 3.66 per cent, a rise of .7 per cent. On 3¼ per cents of 1983 the yield has gone up from 3.27 per cent to 3.7, a rise of .43 per cent. On 3 per cents of 1995 the yield has gone up from 3.23 per cent to 3.48 per cent, a rise of .25 per cent, many times the extent of the rise in the yield on comparable Canadian securities in the Canadian market.

In the United States the average yield on 15 municipal issues has risen by .45 per cent in this period as against .15 per cent in Canada. In this period the increase in their rate of yield has been three times that in Canada. Taking an average of 40 public utility issues, the rise in the United States is .37 per cent compared with a rise of just .09 per cent in Canada. The rise in the United States has been more than four times the rise of the yield in Canada from public utility issues. Here is the average of 36 industrial issues in the United States. The rise there is .24 per cent, double the rise in yield of comparable securities in Canada. With these figures on the record, Mr. Chairman, I hope there will be an end to the irresponsible statements we heard this morning.

The Leader of the Opposition also dragged in the matter of the premium on the Canadian dollar. In his tenth question he asked whether the conversion loan will make interest rates higher in Canada and the United States and push up the premium on the Canadian dollar. If the hon. member had consulted the figures, Mr. Chairman, he would have known that on July 11, the last business day before the conversion loan was announced, the Canadian dollar was worth 1.041 in terms of the United States dollar. The premium has been dropping since and today the Canadian dollar is worth 1.023 in terms of the United States dollar. The premium on the Canadian dollar has been reduced by almost half since July 11. That is the full answer to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Benidickson: What is it going to be next month?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition's eleventh question was, why did you not announce this program in the budget speech? The simple answer is that we had not at that time undertaken the planning of the Canada conversion loan. We were aware of this large problem of the five victory loan issues aggregating $6.4 billion overhanging the market, acting as a weight on the market, and to that extent hampering the efforts of everyone in borrowing. We were aware of the problem and I referred in my budget speech at that time to the necessity for a flexible approach. It was in terms of a flexible approach that, with the change in conditions which set in the day before the budget speech and moved along rapidly in the days that followed, we undertook this constructive campaign.

His twelfth question was, why did you include the eighth and ninth victory loans in the general conversion offering? There are several reasons. Those who responded in time of war to Canada's necessity and subscribed to victory loan bonds were not divided into rigid categories. They were all persons who responded in that way. I do not think it would have gone very well if we had sought to discriminate now in the Canada conversion loan offering among the holders of different maturities of victory loan issues. In the second place, if we had to go to this tremendous effort and incur this expense in the course of promoting the campaign, does it not make good sense to include the five in the one operation rather than include only three in the one operation and still leave outstanding, to be faced when they fell due in 1963 and 1966, approximately another $2½ billion of maturing victory loan bonds of the eighth and ninth series? These are broadly the reasons.

There is another that I think might be mentioned and that is that these latter series of victory loan bonds have a callable feature. They are callable five years before maturity and from the point of view of the investor that uncertainty has a very unsettling effect. To the extent that this eighth and ninth series represent about $2.5 billion overhanging the market, with all the uncertainty attached to them and the depressing effect that has on values, surely it was good sense and good business to take in now all the outstanding series of victory loans.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, having detained the committee so long. I regret it sincerely. I regret the occasion. I was asked today why I did not reply on an earlier occasion to some of the statements made by members of the C.C.F. when they spoke in this house on August 5 and 6. To be quite frank, I can say to you that at that time I felt that statements of the kind that were made by them on those two days deserved only to be ignored, so far were they from the fact and from simple, decent, Canadian justice as between man and man. It would have suited me very well if it had not been necessary to say anything at all or to answer questions on this matter. It became necessary to deal with these matters fully in reply to the attacks that have been heard in this house today.

Mr. Chairman, let me conclude my remarks. We have had, I submit, such a response from the Canadian people as demonstrates, not only their confidence in Canada but their confidence in Canada as an object for their lending. This kind of confidence, this kind of response, is not confined simply to the kind of people who were the object of some rather haranguing statements made in this house today. Let me tell hon. members that the provinces and municipalities in this country were, themselves, substantial holders of Canada victory bonds, and their response has been what one would expect. Here is Newfoundland with various accounts, the Newfoundland savings bank, the Newfoundland workmen's compensation board, who held something over $3 million of these bonds. Up to August 25, they had converted 90 per cent of their holdings. I have no report from the province of Prince Edward Island, but I believe that province had holdings of $100,000 of Canada victory bonds. New Brunswick, with various provincial accounts, holds a total of $6,743,000 of victory bonds, and that grand province of New Brunswick converted all of its holdings of Canada victory bonds into the conversion loan.

Nova Scotia, with various accounts, held on July 14, $21,721,000 of victory bonds and as of August 25, they had converted $21,049,000 of them. Quebec, on July 14, in various provincial accounts, held $856,800, and they went out on the market and bought more victory bonds, and have converted $2,055,000.

The province of Ontario, with various provincial accounts including the provincial treasurer, the public trustee, the hydroelectric power commission, the Ontario veterinary college, the Ontario agricultural college and the workmen's compensation board, held $108,900,000 of victory loans and up to August 25 had converted $69,650,000. Manitoba, as of July 14 in various provincial accounts, held $26,824,000, and up to August 25 they had converted $25,591,000. Here is the province of Saskatchewan. I wish I could tell the story of conversion there, but I have a note that that province has requested that no publicity be given to its conversion, and I respect that request.

The total holdings of the government of Alberta were $74,231,000 in victory bonds, and up to August 25 they had converted $69,331,000. I have a similar request from British Columbia that no publicity be given to its figures on conversion and therefore I say nothing about that province.

The conversion activities on the part of other levels of government were not confined to the provinces. I am not going to delay the house now by giving the figures for the various municipalities, but perhaps there are one or two that might be of passing interest to the house. We have an hon. member here from the riding of Kenora-Rainy River who is the financial critic of the opposition. I note that the municipality of the town of Kenora, on July 14, held $175,000 of victory bonds, and bless them, they converted all of them.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the council of Kenora are very prudent gentlemen who would not want to miss an opportunity to increase by 50 per cent the wages of interest.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend has no right to interrupt my speech. I have the floor and I said I would answer his questions later. He will have his opportunity later to make any remarks he wishes to make.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

In the province of Saskatchewan, there are a number of municipalities for which I have a return here. I think they might be of interest to some hon. members of the house. Here is the rural municipality of Bratt's Lake which held $55,000 of victory bonds, and they have converted them all. Here is the town of Estevan, Estevan school unit No. 2, which held $266,000, and all this amount was sold during the course of the campaign. They got some benefit therefrom, apparently. Then, there is the city of Moose Jaw which held $538,000 of the bonds and up to August 25 had converted $510,000 of them. Here is the Moose Jaw union hospital which held $36,000 of the bonds and converted them all. Here is the city of Regina, and we have, first of all, the city sinking fund trustees who held $1,701,000 of victory bonds, and they have converted them all. The collegiate institute board of that city held $129,000, and converted them all.

So it goes, Mr. Chairman. This is a record that I say reflects very great credit on these municipal governments. I am not going to say very much about the speech delivered by the hon. member for Welland. It was a compound of gossip, and nothing more.

Mr. Benidickson: Without foundation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend had a friend who said so-and-so, and he had another man who had heard so-and-so, and another man who said so-and-so. I am glad that the hon. member has got some friends but I wonder if his friends will appreciate the responsibility that will be put upon the hon. member in the light of some of the things he said here, based upon these assertions with regard to the cost of this conversion loan that are not even on distant speaking acquaintance with the truth.

Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Benidickson: We cannot get the truth.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —my hon. friend for Welland had something to say about people trafficking in bonds. It was not very clear, I am sure, to anybody—perhaps not even to himself—what he was talking about. But, Mr. Chairman, as I said in the house the other day in reply to his question, we have insisted on rigorous adherence to these terms that were laid down at the outset, terms let me tell this committee of the whole house that were not—contrary to the false statement that was quoted from a certain journal in this house today by the Leader of the Opposition—put together in some Toronto broker's office. These terms, Mr. Chairman, were put together—

Mr. Pearson: At Murray Bay.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at Murray Bay either. That statement is no more true than is the false statement which the Leader of the Opposition quoted this morning. These terms were drafted in the place where terms of government bonds are drafted under this government and where they will continue to be drafted, namely on the part of the advisers of the government in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. Let me bury ten fathoms deep the falsehood appearing in that journal which the Leader of the Opposition quoted today with some evident satisfaction, that these terms were put together in some Bay street broker's office. Never was a statement in this house further from the truth than that one.

Mr. Benidickson: Was it St. James street?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know at the moment whether the hon. member is quite straight on his directions about St. James street or any other street. May I tell him for his immediate information that the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance are not located on St. James street. They are located on Wellington street in Ottawa.

Mr. Benidickson: They have branches down there.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They may have branches in St. James street. My hon. friend evidently knows more about that than I do because I have not been in those offices on St. James street and I have not any correspondence with them.

Coming back to the remarks of the hon. member for Welland, if one can apprehend what he was driving at, I should like to add this on the point. In accepting the terms and conditions of the Canada conversion loan all primary distributors agreed to arrange conversions with clients only on the basis outlined in the official prospectus. This kind of arrangement is a normal feature of any offering of new securities.

Dealers found there were some holders of victory bonds who preferred to sell their bonds rather than convert them and other investors who did not own victory bonds but wanted to buy new conversion bonds for cash. Sales and purchases of victory bonds did not always match off for each dealer each day and price fluctuations occurred which made it sometimes possible for investors to sell victory bonds for cash and buy conversion bonds for cash on more favourable terms than by a straight conversion. Such a situation was increasingly causing delays in conversion as some investors held off to see if they could obtain better terms, and it involved discrimination.

On August 7, on the strong recommendation of the national committee formed to promote the conversion loan, fixed prices were stipulated at which distributors might buy victory bonds from customers and sell conversion bonds for cash to customers. The effect of these prices was to put matched cash transactions and straight conversions on the same basis so far as dealer remuneration and investor cost are concerned. I am assured that the effect of this action has been the elimination of discriminatory treatment and a larger total response to the government's conversion offer.

Mr. Chairman, I was asked today by the Leader of the Opposition what the policy of the government is in relation to monetary questions. So far as questions of monetary policy enter into the Canada conversion loan and they do enter into it—let me make it abundantly clear that the policy of this government, as clearly enunciated by the Prime Minister in the broadcast on the night of July 14, is a policy of sound money.

What this government has said it intends to do, and to do in relation to this offering to the Canadian people, is to take such steps as are within the power of the government to maintain the stability and the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar and this campaign is to bring about a situation with reference to this large section of the public debt of Canada where we have some control over maturities, where we can apply policy of debt management. This Canada conversion loan fits into that policy and is going to strengthen our hands in carrying out that beneficent policy for the benefit of Canadians in the years to come.

Mr. Chairman, there has been criticism. I do not mind the personal criticism that has been directed at me. I will close my remarks today with this prophecy. Succeeding ministers of finance whether they be Liberal or whether they be Conservative will have reason to be thankful in these days ahead that the government of 1958 had the vision and the courage and the realism to undertake this, the greatest financial operation in Canada's history.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance has taken about two hours to deal with the questions we raised this morning.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Exactly one and a half hours.

Mr. Pearson: It is now twenty minutes to five, the clock can speak for itself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I started at ten minutes past three.

Mr. Pearson: He has taken that length of time to deal with the questions which we raised this morning and which he said we had no right to raise.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. I objected to the way you went about it and the irresponsible things you said.

Mr. Pearson: You said it was irresponsible on our part to raise the questions we raised in the way we did it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And to say the things you said.

Mr. Pearson: I hope the minister has not exhausted himself in this long distance performance because he is just at the beginning of his estimates and he is going to be here a long time dealing with them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We understand each other.

Mr. Pearson: The minister will need all the energy he has at his command. I am sorry he has found it necessary to use so much in his first performance on his estimates. During that time, as is customary over the years in this house, he indulged in a good deal of verbal ferocity and included in his remarks a good many jibes, one or two of them extremely cheap ones. As is his custom also, he mistakes, as he has done so often in the past, acid assertions for argument and vehemence for veracity. At this stage in our proceedings, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to correct—though perhaps as we go through his estimates there will be the chance to correct some of them—the misstatements that he has made this afternoon. He accused us on this side of the house of irresponsibility in the intervention that was made by us of this subject this morning. He accused us of irresponsibility in bringing this matter to the attention of the committee in the way in which we did. But during the weeks since the announcement was made in this house that there was to be this operation of a magnitude and importance never before seen in our country he has given us no information of any kind concerning it; nothing at all. Nothing at all!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: He has given no information to this house at all concerning this matter and when my hon. friends of the C.C.F. raised the matter in debate he said nothing about it. He has explained this afternoon that the reason why he said nothing about it was that their arguments were hardly worth-while replying to. He did say something, he intervened with such remarks as "Rubbish" and "Nonsense", but that is the contribution we have had from the Minister of Finance since July 14 until September 4 on this very important matter.

Today, however, he got up for two hours, or nearly two hours, and indulged in the kind of diatribe to which we have listened. What were we to do when his estimates came up? What were we to do during all these weeks—say everything is fine, the loan is going along, it is a wonderful operation and there is nothing in it to criticize? We were to say that we have complete confidence in the government and were to get finished and go home as soon as we got the minister's estimates through. That is what he would have liked us to do, but that is not our responsibility to the nation and that is not how we are going to discharge what we consider to be our responsibility to the nation.

The minister said that on July 14, when the announcement was first made about this loan, when I got up in the house after the announcement I adopted a position of high responsibility but now in speaking for my party that I have descended from what he considered to be those heights of responsibility.

I would remind the minister that when he made that announcement in the house it was without any prior information having been given to the leader of any other party. He did not take anybody into his confidence, even one hour before the announcement was made. He simply got up in this house and made the announcement and even at that time he did not tell the whole story. I am not complaining about that because it could not be done on motions. However, I said at that time—and the same stand was taken by the leader of the C.C.F.—realizing that this was an operation of the magnitude and importance which we now know it to be, that it was important in the national interest as it is today important in the national interest, that this operation should not fail.

In making that statement I said that I would follow this operation with interest. We have been following it with interest, we have been studying it, and as a result of the information we have acquired and of the studies we have made we have put forward our attitude in this regard in the words I used this morning—we have done it less than ten days before the end of the operation—when it has reached its last stages. It was better the debate should be done now, in view of the fact that if it had taken place four or five weeks ago perhaps there might have been misunderstandings and misleading impressions created by the criticism we were bound as an opposition to make to the way in which this operation was being conducted —not of the objective of the conversion, but to the methods.

If the minister had been fair he would have said when he got up to reply that twice when I spoke today I stated that we approved of the objective of the conversion. We believe that this effort should be successful, but we do not approve of some of the details and some of the ways in which it was being carried out. If that is irresponsibility I would remind the minister of some of the things he said in this house when he talked about financial matters in other days. I suggest to the minister that we have shown him a great deal more consideration in this matter than he ever showed his predecessor, the former minister of finance, when he talked about financial matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I recall what the minister used to say about tight money when the minister of the previous government made his statements and what he said about tight money during the election—how he pilloried us because of interest rates going up and what they were going to do to the national interest. What did he say this afternoon when he got up? I do not have his exact words, but I took them down as accurately as I could, because he was speaking very fast and very vehemently. He gave us to believe that it was not the minister who decided on these matters and it was not the department who decided on them—they got the best rates they could and the rates were fixed under outside conditions. That is how we get our interest rates in this country. But what did he say about the previous government when that government fixed interest rates in times of boom in order to combat inflation? What did he say about the operations of the government of that time in regard to interest rates?

The minister went on to say today that in these matters—and he quoted himself in his budget speech—they fell back on or they relied on a measure of flexibility. That is why, that is the excuse the minister gave the house this afternoon for telling us one thing in this house on June 17 in his budget speech and for telling us something else on July 14, when he made this announcement. He said there was a deterioration in the bond market in the United States, I believe he said that the day before the budget speech there was a change in conditions and that was why they probably had to change their plans. But what did he tell us in the House of Commons on the night he made his budget speech?

> —during this fiscal year we shall need to sell bonds or other securities in a total amount of close to $3,400 million.

The sum of $1,400 million of this amount would be required for new cash and $1,950 million was required to cover the marketable funded debt maturing during the year. Was that misleading the House of Commons or was it not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not.

Mr. Pearson: If the minister changed his mind at that time, in view of what was happening in the United States, if the minister had received information from the United States that the bond market there was deteriorating and that they might have to revise their plans, as he said the day before the budget, why did he have to include that statement in the budget speech that there was going to be needed for reconversion during the fiscal year $1,950 million, when four weeks later he asked for $6,400 million?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are off the track entirely.

Mr. Pearson: I suggest to him that the figures will speak for themselves.

I was amazed this afternoon to hear the minister question the accuracy of some of my figures—he, of all people, after what happened last January, to reflect upon anybody's mathematics. He attacked us because we put on the record a lot of figures which he claimed this afternoon he had been able to disprove. I suggest to him that I was being scrupulously fair and responsible in the way I approached this question. I said that during these weeks since the conversion announcement there had been reports appearing in increasing numbers in the press saying that it might cost this or it might cost that, that the commissions might amount to this or they might amount to that and that the total cost to the country might amount to this or might amount to that. I put the minimum and the maximum figures on the record as coming from reports which I had received and not from the Winnipeg Free Press, a paper which seems to worry my hon. friend so much that every time he gets up he has to talk about it and give it a little free advertising.

If these figures are all wrong, if they are misleading, why has the minister not corrected them before now by giving the right figures and making sure that he prevented this damage to the confidence about which he talks so much from occurring in this country with respect to the conversion loan? Why did he wait until September 4 to put these figures on record if he was trying to put this loan across, as he said, because it must be put across as it is a great national effort, and so on? Why did he allow these misleading reports to be circulated in the country? Why did he wait until the last day of the session when he was baited into it by the questions we asked?

In another part of his statement he put on record a lot of figures to show that the municipalities, who are going to pay more for their money, have converted their bonds into the new loan and because some of those municipalities are headed by two members on this side of the house, he paid them a special tribute as being loyal and patriotic Canadians. I ask, why should not any municipality take advantage of this windfall loan, which is the expression used by those who are trying to sell it?

What particular significance is there to be attached to that as a vindication of the policy of the government? The policy of the government in this matter will be determined by the results of this loan after it is finished and the effect it has on the money market and our economic prospects. We on this side are willing to let it stand on that basis. But to think that the Minister of Finance who used to talk so much on this side on every financial occasion and used his undoubted ability to marshal adjectives if not arguments to pillory the government should expect us to sit quiet and say nothing about this operation—because if we ask questions and make criticisms we are then considered irresponsible—is almost beyond belief. The test of irresponsibility in this matter will be the results of the government's operation. That will be a better test than anything that could be said on this side of the house and we are quite willing to let it rest on that basis.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question and I hope he will answer it in good temper.

An hon. Member: He might not.

Mr. McMillan: The minister is good natured most of the time—

Mr. Ricard: All of the time.

Mr. McMillan: —but frequently he reminds me of a patient of mine whose husband told me she was very even tempered, just mad all the time.

Mr. Ricard: Are you talking about yourself?

Mr. McMillan: The minister referred to the precipitous drop in bonds that occurred in the United States, I believe he said about June 15 or 16. I have in my hand a report to the effect that on June 15 and for some weeks afterwards the United States offered bonds at the alluring rate of 2⅝ per cent. I should like to ask the minister if that is correct and also I invite him to comment on the price of foreign bonds in the United States.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the last part of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Batten: He was not listening.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member mind repeating the last part of his question?

Mr. McMillan: I referred to the fact that after the precipitous drop in bonds in the United States, 6-year 8-months bonds sold for what the treasury board considered the high rate of 2⅝ per cent. Would the minister agree with that? I should also like to hear the minister comment on the fact that the bonds of Brazil, Norway, Sweden and Denmark are selling in New York more favourably than our own Canadian bonds are selling in Canada; that is, 4½ per cent bonds.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not accept the statement just made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McMillan: Here is the New York Times.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In any event we are discussing here, as I understand it, a comparison of yields on Canadian bonds in the Canadian market and United States government bonds in the United States market and testing the trends in these two countries in the light of what has been done. I do not want to stand here and hold forth on the way in which the values of the United States government issues have declined in the United States bond market. That is a proven fact. Indeed, one of the issues to which the hon. member referred this afternoon is selling today at either nine or ten points less than it was selling at immediately after issue. That is the extent of the decline in the United States in issues of the United States government. We do not take any satisfaction in that fact and I do not wish to enlarge on it. I would prefer to put it on the basis of the yields.

These comprehensive figures I gave on the yields accruing in the two countries on comparable issues show very clearly without repetition that the Canadian market has been stabilized and the United States market has been weakening and United States yields, in terms of the market values of these issues of United States government bonds, have been rising.

Mr. Benidickson: On this subject, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to reply at the moment to the Minister of Finance. Those of us who have sat with him over the years know a great deal about his type of criticism and the sort of governess, sermon-like type of speech he makes, such as that he delivered today, usually fairly long. I cannot compete with him in jaws that seem to have ball bearing hinges. But I will say that we have not had replies to some of the questions we asked earlier this afternoon and in particular the question I asked about why there was no callable feature in the bonds that were issued. I should like to hear from the minister in that respect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the conversion bonds are by deliberate decision not being given a callable feature because the callable feature does subtract something from the attractiveness of the bonds. I mentioned in my remarks that it creates a certain measure of uncertainty on the part of the investor. One of the elements in any investment is certainty. The investor who is being asked to take these conversion bonds will find them more attractive if there is certainty attached to them. I do not think my hon. friend would want to suggest that in attaching a callable feature to these bonds we should have been prepared to pay a higher rate of interest on them.

Mr. Benidickson: No, a lower rate would satisfy me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is part of the picture of compensating for a feature like a callable feature. This was a deliberate decision. We think we will get the best results without a callable feature.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, would the minister not agree that it will have the effect of fixing the rate of interest for the 25 years making it not possible to take a lower rate of interest?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Only if you made them callable at an early date. I do not think the Leader of the Opposition would suggest that we make it callable for most of its life.

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the hon. member has in mind something like the last five years. Concerning the benefit he ascribes to the callable feature in the event that interest rates should be lowered for money of that maturity at that particular time, the opinion that prevailed here is that that would not counterbalance the damage that would be done or the degree to which it would subtract from the attractiveness of the bonds without the callable feature.

As hon. members will realize we were trying to get the best deal we could weighing all the factors together.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get the minister going again because whenever he gets going we are exposed to a two-hour speech and he behaves like an offended virgin every time he is criticized. However, I do want to ask him a question or two.

I believe I indicated earlier that the last time we as a federal entity had been obliged to pay 4½ per cent interest it was again wages for money such as was introduced by a Conservative administration but even then—and I think it was 1934—they had a 10-year provision for a callable privilege. Succeeding Liberal governments with more prudent administration found circumstances under which they were able to pay off that high rate of bond indebtedness. I referred this morning to how old the minister would be 25 years from now. I cannot understand why he would commit the future taxpayers of Canada in the next generation to an unavoidable 4½ per cent obligation on debt which I think is not synonymous with thoughtful behaviour. A businessman hesitates twice when thinking in terms of a rate that goes much beyond 5½ or 6 per cent when he is asked to pay 6, 7 or 8 per cent for any investment he has in mind, an investment that might create unemployment at the present time. I just cannot understand the undeviating base that is being put on interest rates in this country for another 25 years because of the non-callable feature.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend has stated his opinion; I have stated mine. We are not in agreement on the point. If there are any questions I shall be glad to answer them, but I take it we have the facts on the subject before us, and my hon. friend and I have different opinions on the subject.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Chairman, I have a few points that I want to put on the record. The minister tried to emphasize the fact that he felt this conversion was going to stabilize the finances of this country and there would be no great rise in interest rates. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Toronto Star. I know before I mention it that the minister will probably object to anything coming from the Toronto Star. The heading is:

Ottawa Plan May Lift Cost of Borrowing

There is no question about that. If he objects to this one I will give him another one from the Gazette of Montreal which I understand is not considered to be a Liberal paper. The heading is:

High Cost of Living By Conversion.

The second paragraph reads:

It is an expensive effort, not only for the federal government, but for all other governments and corporations. The federal government is exchanging one set of fixed charges, the interest it must pay on victory bonds outstanding, for another, higher, set.

At the same time, it has established a higher base cost for credit. All other borrowing must now conform to these new rates at a subsequent higher cost to the borrowers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask my hon. friend the date?

Mr. Habel: July 16.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is it an editorial?

Mr. Habel: It is; it is by the financial editor.

Then, I have another clipping dated July 16, the title being:

Easy Money Hopes Gone With Conversion

Then I have another one from the Fundy Fisherman, dated August 13, 1958. The heading reads:

Big Bond Conversion Rough on Ordinary Man—Taxes To Rise With Living Costs

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is going to help the ordinary man.

Mr. Habel: I am sure it is going to help him. The minister emphasized the fact that this conversion had patriotic features, and that he had asked all the brokers to use the patriotic angle to get the people to convert their bonds. I have in my hand something that might surprise even the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. I wish the minister to understand that patriotism can be obtained if enough money is paid for it. The Aetna Casualty and Insurance Company, Hartford, Connecticut, converted $11 million plus another conversion of $3,626,000. The minister gave a long list of municipalities and provincial governments which had converted their victory bonds. I have here a list of the different companies which must have accepted the call with pleasure. As I said, the Aetna Casualty and Insurance Company, $11 million, and then another conversion of $3,600,000; the Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Company of New York, $1,200,000; the Milwaukee Insurance Company, $1,281,000; a Hong Kong firm, through its subsidiary in Toronto, $1,270,000; the British Phoenix Assurance Company Limited, $1,301,000; the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, $1,400,000; the Insurance Company of North America, Philadelphia, $2,235,000; the Federal Mutual Insurance Company and Hardware Insurance Company of Owatanna, Minnesota, $1,835,000; the Wellington Fire Insurance Company, $335,000; the Continental Life Insurance Company, $1,108,000; the Northern Electric Company, $5,200,000. We could go on in this way for another 15 minutes. This shows that when the minister claims that many little people will profit from this and that municipalities and other bodies have acted in a patriotic way, he forgot about all those companies which are benefiting so much from the conversion. I continue with the list: the Prudential Insurance Company, $42,000,000; Famous Players, $3,800,000; Canada Permanent Mortgage Company, $7,000,000; Federal Insurance Company, $2,800,000. The Manitoba government, of course, was mentioned in the list of those great patriots who had converted their loans.

The minister has claimed that we have been unfair in our criticism. I think the Leader of the Opposition was very fair in his remarks and the hon. member for Welland made a wonderful exposé that the country will understand much better than it will understand the speech made by the minister this afternoon. I hold in my hand, a clipping from the Ottawa Journal and the heading is:

Plan "Blitzes" To Pep Up Sale Conversion Bonds

They claim that in at least 80 cities there will be parades, bands and circuses to make sure that the subscribers convert their bonds. I have another clipping from the Globe and Mail of this morning. The heading reads:

Plan Record Bonfire of Cancelled Bonds

The people of this country, Mr. Chairman, will have a long time to remember that some day there might be a bonfire of those victory bonds that are now being converted. They will also recall the amount of money they will pay for the bonfire.

The minister himself admitted this, which appeared in the Toronto Star of July 19. The article states that the program will cost the federal treasury $30 million to $50 million to pay the cash bonuses to bond holders and also another $50 million in annual increased interest rates. Probably that is the bonfire that the Minister of Finance wants to have by calling what he claims to be a patriotic conversion. The firms in the United States as well as firms in Great Britain and the firm in Hong Kong certainly responded to his patriotic appeal. I have in my hand a copy of the August issue of The Rural Scene, and I will simply conclude by reading a paragraph or two. In an article on the conversion loan there is the following:

To urge such people to convert their bonds, which are soon to mature, into long term bonds, at a time when inflation is gathering momentum, is a cruel deception and unworthy of the government of a country.

The last paragraph reads as follows:

The person who cashes his victory bonds when he can do it, and invests the money in improving his own property or in some productive enterprise, will do more to halt inflation than he could possibly do by lending it to the government to spend on its ventures.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I understand that earlier in the afternoon the Minister of Finance mentioned that the city of Outremont, of which I have the honour to be the mayor, had converted its bonds for new bonds. We did hold $290,000 in victory bonds and we were getting interest amounting to $8,700 a year. By converting the bonds we will get interest amounting to $13,500 a year or 50 per cent more and we are getting $3,625 in cash. How could I as mayor let such a windfall pass by?

The conversion loan of $6,425 million will cost the government $17 in interest per person per year. The same amount borrowed by the previous Liberal government was costing the country $11.34 per person per year. That means that the government has now increased the interest paid to citizens of Canada, banks and other institutions by $5.66 per person per annum because the government will now be paying $289,125,000 in interest per year. The Liberals borrowed the same amount for $192,750,000 in interest per year. This means that the government is giving as a windfall, as manna from heaven, to citizens of Canada, banking institutions and bankers in the United States and all over the world $97,375,000 by way of increased interest per annum.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Untrue.

Mr. Bourque: If you can count, my dear Mr. Minister, you will come to the same figures. In addition to the increased interest, there is the cost of commissions, advertising and literature. Who is going to pay this $97 million? We cannot give away $97 million without somebody having to pay it back. It is the citizens of Canada who are going to have to pay it through income taxes. The minister has boasted today about the good deal he has made and what he has done for the citizens of Canada. Wait until the citizens of Canada have to pay this money through income taxes and the minister will realize whether or not he has made a good deal for Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Having regard to the speeches my hon. friend has made more than once about federal aid to municipalities, I am sure that on the basis on which he has approached this problem he will be glad to commend the federal government.

An hon. Member: Is that a threat?

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest to the minister quietly, dispassionately and coolly that he should analyse what the opposition has really said. What has been their criticism? He may agree with it or he may not but they have said, first, that the rate of interest is too high. It may or may not be too high.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Diplomat.

Mr. Crestohl: If the hon. gentleman can improve on that I challenge him to do so. The minister will also realize that the opposition has said that too much money is being spent on advertising. It may or may not be too much. That is purely a matter of opinion. The opposition has said that the cost generally is too high and the cost of advertising is too high. The minister may or may not agree. We have said that the commissions are too high. He may or may not agree. But he finds himself in the position where he must make a defence. In his parliamentary performance this afternoon he has made a good defence from the standpoint of debating. I think it was sharp in spots, unduly critical in other spots and that at other times his remarks were even a little unworthy of the minister. Just the same he made a two-hour defence—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): One and a half hours.

Mr. Crestohl: Well, it seemed longer to us. Nevertheless, at this stage when about 80 per cent of the conversion has been completed, a long defence of the kind he had to resort to this afternoon reminds me of the fact, which the minister as a lawyer will understand, that when you make a long defence it does not necessarily follow that it is a good defence. All I can say is that I am suspicious of long defences. I am astonished at the minister's long defence and the old French proverb, qui s'excuse s'accuse, applies to him perfectly.

The minister takes pride in the fact that 80 or 85 per cent of the sale has been completed. Of course; it is such a bargain, who would not want to buy? Surely the minister realizes, as I do, that if he wanted to sell more and do so faster all he had to do was to fix a five per cent return or perhaps a six per cent return and he would have had results very much faster. But this is my criticism, and this is what members of the opposition have said. The country has been called upon to make this financial effort. Why? I think the government found itself in difficulty. It has to meet its election promises, it has to meet a great deficit and it has launched into this great expense which I think the country will remember for a great many years to come.

Mr. Pearson: If we have exhausted that subject and ourselves, perhaps I can ask the minister if he can give the committee any information with respect to the commonwealth economic conference which I believe is to open on September 15, indeed, the day of completion of the conversion loan. Has the minister anything to report? During this session we have not so far received any substantial amount of information in connection with a conference which, in the words of the government, is one of very far-reaching importance indeed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will be very glad to deal with that subject. I think the Leader of the Opposition has probably overlooked the fact that, as I recall it, there was some discussion of it on the estimates of my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I am happy to deal with it. The conference will open in Montreal on Monday, September 15. It is expected to continue until Friday, September 26. It will thus run, it is expected, for two weeks. All of the commonwealth countries will be represented at the conference by ministers and delegations and the delegation from the United Kingdom, which will consist of five ministers and a number of advisers, will be accompanied also in an advisory capacity by six ministers drawn from various colonies in different parts of the world.

The agenda which the conference is likely to take up will be a very broad one. Trade is one subject, but trade is only one aspect. The agenda is expected to embrace broadly all questions pertaining to the economic relations of the various nations of the commonwealth. The meeting is to proceed in the Queen Elizabeth hotel. The secretary-general of the conference, by agreement of the commonwealth countries, is to be Mr. Sydney Pierce who, as hon. members will recall, has been latterly the deputy high commissioner of this country in the United Kingdom. A good deal of work has been expended by officials in preparation for this conference. The departments of government principally concerned are, of course, finance, trade and commerce and external affairs.

The conference is preceded by several conferences of officials of the commonwealth countries at various stages of preparation during the recent months. I shall be glad to answer any further questions if there are any.

Mr. Pearson: Who are the Canadian delegates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They have not finally been chosen yet. The cabinet will be making the selections. I can perhaps say that the ministers who have been associated in the preparations are my colleagues the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Secretary of State for External Affairs; the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Greenwood, and myself.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister tell us the agenda of the conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not in a position to state it in precise terms, but anything pertaining to economic relations within the commonwealth, I think, will find a place within the discussions that may be held there. The Leader of the Opposition will recall that the conference stems directly from the conference of finance ministers at Mont Tremblant held last September. At that conference an agenda was agreed upon and it appears in the official communique that was issued at the conclusion of that conference. This list of subjects forms a working basis for the agenda for this conference.

Mr. Pearson: There was an interruption a moment ago to the effect that this discussion was out of order, but I cannot think of anything more in order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I certainly do not take that position. I think it is entirely in order.

Mr. Pearson: After all, this is a conference on commonwealth economic relationships, to be presided over by the minister. It is a conference which has been put forward by the government as one of the most important to be held within the commonwealth, and one which will have far-reaching results on the economic, financial, and therefore on the political relationships of members inside the commonwealth. I think it is unfortunate that we have not had the kind of discussion about this conference, as important as it is, that has been had in the parliament at Westminster. I think it is unfortunate that even at this late date we can only be told in general terms what will be the nature of the subjects dealt with and the policy of the Canadian government in respect of these matters.

There is an impression which one gets from the press that, whereas a year ago this conference was being heralded as one of very great importance, primarily in respect of trade relationships between members of the commonwealth—we heard a great deal at that time about the diversion of trade that might result from a conference of that kind—latterly, that impression of a year ago seems to have disappeared and there seems to be a contrary impression, at least in the minds of the press, that perhaps the most important subject for discussion will be the financial relationships between the members and India and what certain members of the commonwealth can do in respect of strengthening what is now called international liquidity.

We all know that when the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom came to Washington and Ottawa a few months ago, he announced in press statements in both Ottawa and Washington that it was of vital importance to do something to put the underdeveloped countries of the world in possession of hard currency, thereby giving them a chance to develop. This suggestion has been taken up by other governments, notably by our own Prime Minister who made an announcement about it subsequently in this House of Commons as well as statements about it outside of the house. This seems to be one of the subjects which is going to loom up in the agenda of this conference. Of course, the minister knows that this is a subject which cannot be finally determined on a commonwealth basis. However, the preliminary discussions there might be quite useful, and perhaps more far-reaching results will be achieved at the meeting of the fund and the bank which will be held subsequent to the meeting.

As a matter of fact, as the minister knows, it has become the custom to have a meeting of commonwealth finance ministers before the meeting of the bank.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Right afterwards.

Mr. Pearson: Right afterwards, so presumably that will be discussed in a preliminary way. While the minister has said nothing which would indicate whether or not these reports are accurate, and I am thinking of a report in the Ottawa Journal of a few days ago, there does seem to be a desire now on the part of these newspapers to play down the results of this conference which had been heralded by a fanfare of trumpets a year ago. I have been to a lot of conferences and I know it is quite unwise, but perhaps quite natural, to exaggerate the importance of everything about the conference, prior to the opening of it; but you begin to realize that all the things you put forward in your own interests, the things that are going to be accomplished by your policies are not likely to result and therefore an element of caution is being introduced even at this late date. Perhaps that is realistic and sensible. We know very little in this house what the policy of the government is in respect of these matters. They know a good deal more in Westminster because they have discussed this in the House of Commons.

Indeed, reading the London Times only this morning, which is dated September 2—we get it pretty quickly these days by air—I notice a report from the political correspondent which is obviously officially inspired. It gives a lot more detailed information than we have been able to obtain in this house. It gives the agenda and it gives the British delegation. Then, it goes on to discuss in a very general way British policy in respect to some of these matters. The article then purports to give the agenda and it mentions first the question to which I referred, namely international liquidity. This report from the Times, which has all the earmarks of authenticity, goes on to say:

> The others items on the agenda will be the special and urgent help needed by India—

That is something that will be of interest to the Canadian government.

> —(and it is probable that the terms of the new British loan may not be announced until the conference); measures to stabilize commodity prices; the direction of economic expansion in the less developed countries, with new ways of providing capital and helping trade; technical assistance for these countries; economic and trading difficulties connected with agricultural and other primary production; the prospects and implications of the European common market and the proposed European free trade area; and arrangements for continuing commonwealth consultations and co-operation on economic matters.

This is a much more detailed agenda than we have received in this committee or than was given out after the meeting at Mont Tremblant last year. I, therefore, express some disappointment that we have not had the kind of discussion before a conference of this importance which I think perhaps we should have had. I know the minister could not fail to agree with me on this because he used to talk a good deal about the failure to have discussion in parliament before we, in our day, went to international conferences. I quote from Hansard of January 13, 1955, pages 153 and 154 when he had this to say about a commonwealth prime ministers' conference—which this conference is not—which was not heralded with all the fanfare of publicity with which this conference has been heralded. The minister had this to say, and I commend it to him as the policy that might now be followed:

> If parliamentary institutions enjoyed here in Ottawa the health that they ought to enjoy, no Canadian prime minister—

Or indeed no minister of finance, if I may interpolate that remark.

> —would go to an important commonwealth conference without having first invited a discussion in parliament on the position that he was going to take on behalf of his country in the deliberations of that conference. But such is the treatment that this government metes out to our Canadian parliament, such is the conspiracy of silence of this government on important national issues, such apparently is the minimum importance that this government attaches to this commonwealth prime ministers' conference, there is not to be a word said in this house even on the subject of the agenda. A fine demonstration of contempt for the parliament of Canada!

Then he goes on to say this:

> We might at least have had a debate on the subject, but apparently we are not going to have, even during the course of this discursive debate on the address, any statement of the position the Prime Minister is going to take in London.

Apparently we are not going to have a debate on this subject. But notwithstanding that fact I wish the minister and the government well as they approach what is certainly going to be an important conference, the nature of which is taking a rather different form from that which was visualized a year ago but the results of which will be of importance, I am sure, and I hope of advantage not only to Canada but to the commonwealth as a whole, an association which is still of primary importance in the world, the strengthening of which would be the primary purpose, I am sure of this or any other government, irrespective of party.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his closing words. The government will appreciate them very much. I think I should remind the Leader of the Opposition, in view of the fact that he spoke about debate, that I dealt with this subject in the budget speech, as will be found at page 1239 of Hansard of June 17. I reviewed the position and indicated the broad lines that we would be following at the conference in the matter of trade policy. It is all set out there very clearly.

The hon. gentleman also raised the question about emphasis at the conference. This from the beginning was always announced and regarded as a commonwealth trade and economic conference. At no time was there any suggestion that the conference should be confined to trade matters. Indeed, the economic matters on which, as a result of study, we find that commonwealth countries have common or mutual interests have been expanding and all of them are of high importance. Under developing conditions some of them are assuming more and more importance. I do not need to dwell here on questions of development of resources and the strains that have been created by programs of that kind and problems of exchange scarcities on the economic relations of countries of the commonwealth. I stressed in the budget speech that the commonwealth today is a very different commonwealth from that of 1932. Our approach to the problems that will confront us at the conference is very different from that of 1932.

My hon. friend spoke about the problem of liquidity. This is a very acute problem. It touches a good many of the economic factors in the situation and it touches on trade as well. I think it lies at the basis of a good many of the media that are used today which have the effect of restraining a trade, the whole problem of exchange restrictions and discrimination. These are associated and have been associated over the years, in the case of a number of commonwealth countries, with the exchange problem, the problem of exchange reserves. These problems must all be examined at this conference. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, there is such a multiplicity of problems of an economic nature which cannot be categorized as trade matters that it is small wonder that in the public comment on this conference the emphasis has come increasingly to be laid on the economic problems that will be submitted to the conference for discussion.

As to the agenda, I thought I was elucidating the matter by stressing the fact that the agenda is really so broad that any question of an economic nature of interest to commonwealth countries can be discussed under it. The annual meetings of finance ministers in times past have related to the position of sterling in the world. It has been customary for the chancellor of the exchequer to make a report on that matter. Then in recent years there has naturally been a good deal of interest in the commonwealth countries, particularly those that are shipping food products to the United Kingdom, in Britain's relationship to the developing free trade area in Europe. I touched on that matter in the budget speech. The agenda is a matter of public record. It is in the communique that was issued at the Mont Tremblant conference. I stressed that the study that has been given to the agenda in the interval has all been within the framework of that laid down under the communique issued a year ago.

Mr. Pearson: May I say just a final word. I do not quite recall the details of the agenda as it appeared after the Mont Tremblant conference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have sent for it. There were either seven or eight subjects.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to ask the minister this question. I know this has to be general. I also know that at these conferences we soon get away from generalities and into committees. The committees will deal with some very hard practical and significant matters. I wonder whether in these practical subjects, in these subsections of the agenda, special consideration will be given—and I am sure it will be because the minister rather indicated it—to matters which I think perhaps are of importance and that I know will be before the conference.

One is convertibility which he mentioned. Until we can make progress there we are going to have a hard time making progress in trade. As he knows, in recent years, progress has been made. However, it has been wavering progress and there have been difficulties which impeded it. I would hope now, because conditions are improving in the world, that a real push can be given toward convertibility.

Then related to that matter—and the London Times mentions this as a step further and perhaps it is on the agenda—is the relationship of at least some commonwealth countries to the European free trade area and the common market. I do not know of anything that will be more important in the long run, and maybe not such a long run. An effort has to be made to work out our relationships to this European development. It is primarily perhaps a problem for the United Kingdom because they have been engaged in a search for a solution for some time. But it is almost as important for Canada because if the United Kingdom—and surely this will be discussed at this conference—does not make an arrangement with the European free trade area, we will all be in trouble outside of the United Kingdom and maybe even the United Kingdom itself. At the same time I should hate to see the United Kingdom use the commonwealth association as a reason for not making the kind of arrangement with the European free trade area which I think is essential not only for the development of Europe but for the development of what I consider to be a major body of international economic policy, namely an Atlantic freer trade area.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I assure the hon. gentleman that the two subjects he has mentioned will be very prominent in the discussions at the conference. On our part we have given a good deal of thought, study and preparation to those subjects. There can be no doubt that liquidity is essential to our hopes of closer trade and economic relations and we have been doing all in our power to urge the Canadian point of view in that respect. I can give an unqualified assurance to the hon. gentleman to that effect.

He has said, and I entirely agree with him, that some progress has been made, and my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, has announced to this house that in the next few weeks several important steps in this direction will be taken by both the United Kingdom and Australia and so far as we are in a position to urge it upon other countries of the commonwealth at that conference we shall certainly be pressing them to take whatever steps they can take to promote liquidity.

As to Canada's interest in the European economic arrangements in the free trade area, there again, there can be no difference among us. I have stated the government's position on this matter. In the budget speech on June 17, at 1238 of Hansard for that date I said that this matter was one which we had studied very closely and about which we have been in frequent consultation and communication with the United Kingdom. It was very fully discussed at Mont Tremblant and is a matter of very great interest on political grounds, as stated by the hon. member, and it is also of very great importance on economic grounds. Several of the countries in the commonwealth share with Canada a very direct interest in it because of the possibility of its effect on their exports of agricultural products to the United Kingdom, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that it is regarded by the government as a very important project and that it will certainly have a place of high importance in the deliberations at the conference.

Mr. Crestohl: Under this item I would like to deal with another matter, and in this respect I would like to quote the minister as he was reported in the press to the effect that timing is a very important factor in many things. Having now heard from the minister in rather jubilant terms that the conversion loan is meeting with success and that the government is now in possession of an abundance of funds, and since my subject involves the spending of some of that money, I hope that my timing is appropriate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member gets any further into his topic I think I had better remind him that the conversion loan has not involved the raising of any new money. It is simply an exchange of new obligations for old, and we have not gone into the market for any new money at all. As I was trying to say earlier, that still remains before us.

Mr. McIlraith: Remind him of the big deficit we have to finance.

Mr. Crestohl: This matter may increase the deficit a little but I do not think so. The minister may have some doubts as to whether the subject I am raising falls under his jurisdiction because it deals with the moneys held by the custodian of enemy property. I raised the matter in the house some months ago and I was told that I should approach the Secretary of State since the custodian falls under his jurisdiction. I then took up the matter with the Secretary of State—I am glad to see he is now in the chamber—and he said that since it involved the spending of money I should address myself to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is one of the penalties for being the last department to be called.

Mr. Crestohl: Perhaps that might prove advantageous to the question I am about to raise. The Prime Minister on August 15 said that this matter was receiving the consideration of the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State, so I hope the minister will hear me on this subject.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure my hon. friend that I am familiar with the matter he is going to raise. I know he has raised it in the house and has corresponded with my department with respect to it. The matter is under consideration and the problem is the difference between the rights of the state and the rights of the individual having regard to the normal effect of seizures of property belonging to enemies in time of war. The case which my hon. friend is pressing involves an individual who, while a national of an enemy state—

Mr. Crestohl: Right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —nevertheless contends that he was not a willing supporter of the cause of that enemy state. The problem, furthermore, is not simplified by the fact that other countries to whose example we sometimes look have not followed a uniform course in similar matters, but I can tell the hon. member that the subject is under study and that we hope to come to some conclusion. My hon. friend will realize that the pressures of the session, as long as they last, mean that the amount of time left for personal study by a minister of some of these problems to which bulky files are attached is somewhat limited but if we ever get through with this session I can assure my friend that this is one of the files which is marked for what I hope will be an early decision.

Mr. Crestohl: I want to thank the minister for so fully and completely stating my case. I find I do not have to present any additional facts and I am pleased to hear the minister is giving the matter his active consideration.

It is also true, as the minister has said, that some countries have complied with the appeal which has been made and that other countries to which our country is closely attached have, in some cases, urged these other countries to release such assets. Since Canada has been a party to treaties urging other countries to release assets I am hoping Canada itself will act accordingly.

The matter, as the minister knows, has been outstanding for a great many years, and I am only fearful that perhaps it has been overlooked by the administration, certainly I know not intentionally. I am certain, however, that there is all the goodwill in the world on the part of the government with respect to the disposition of this problem, and if I can do anything to hasten the completion of the session I will certainly do so in order that the government may be able to attack this problem immediately.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going to make an appeal to the minister on another subject on behalf of the 425,000 people in the province of Newfoundland. The minister, of course, is aware that in the house of assembly of the province of Newfoundland yesterday a resolution was moved by the premier of the province, seconded by the leader of the opposition there, who is a member of the minister's own party and in fact is the leader of that party in the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Hodgson: Did that receive any consideration?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not hear the distinguished interruption of the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.). I would like to read the text of the resolution which was adopted in the house of assembly and which was transmitted yesterday evening to the Prime Minister, a copy of which I hold in my hand. I have the whole message to the Prime Minister and I feel I should perhaps put the entire message on the record. It reads as follows:

Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, P.C., M.P., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

In the Newfoundland legislature today I moved and Mr. Hollett the Leader of the Opposition seconded and the house unanimously adopted the following motion—

This is the text of the resolution:

Resolved the House of Assembly cordially welcomes the announcement of the Prime Minister, Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker made in the House of Commons on August 15, 1958, that the government of Canada would not accept the recommendations of the royal commission on term 29 until they have had opportunity to give the matter more careful study. The Prime Minister's announcement is all the more welcome to this house because of the reason he gave for it namely that there appeared to be dissatisfaction in Newfoundland with the size of the amount recommended. This house declares its warm appreciation of the Prime Minister's stand and expresses the hope that it will result in a substantial increase in the size of the amount ultimately to be paid to the province on a lasting basis. In the meanwhile we urgently request the government of Canada to seek without delay the necessary parliamentary authority to pay to Newfoundland in the present session as an interim measure at least the amount that has been recommended by the royal commission. This would enable the public services and public works of the province to be continued this year without interruption or reduction thereby preventing immediate widespread unemployment and would provide ample time before the next session of parliament for the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the government of Canada to give that further study announced by the Prime Minister.

The message was signed "J. R. Smallwood". I should like to repeat that this resolution was a bi-partisan resolution moved by the premier and seconded by the leader of the opposition, something not very usual in any of our legislative assemblies or in our parliament except on the most formal occasions. There is also other evidence I could adduce but I do not intend to take up the time of the committee in doing so. This may be taken to represent the substantial unanimity that exists in the province of Newfoundland on this very pressing question.

Lest it be thought this is a very late hour at which the assembly of Newfoundland is raising this question I will say no more than that a formal request was made, as the minister well knows, to the Prime Minister by the premier of Newfoundland in the same general terms as early as August 11, so this is not a last minute request. It is simply further evidence of how extremely urgent this is to the people—not to the government but to the people—of Newfoundland that there should be action to implement the recommendations of the McNair report at this session of parliament.

As we all know that would not be a complicated or difficult matter. All the government would have to do is bring in a message from His Excellency with a further supplementary estimate to deal with this matter before the appropriation bill is before us.

Nowhere in any public statement I have seen or heard of in any part of Canada since the report was published on July 25 is it suggested that the award is too large. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction in Newfoundland which has been supported by criticisms in other places. For example, the Fredericton Gleaner, a newspaper not exactly noted for its support of our party but which has been pretty consistent in its support of hon. gentlemen opposite, has supported the contention of the leader of the house and the leader of the opposition and many others in Newfoundland that the award is inadequate.

But that is not the question I seek to put before the minister or the committee at the present time. I am not seeking to debate the merits of the recommendation nor am I attempting to divert attention from the point. Since it has been suggested nowhere that the award is too large and as it is needed, as I shall seek to show, for absolutely essential services in the province of Newfoundland, we at this session and before it prorogues should meet this solemn obligation of the constitution. I describe it in that language because that is what it is.

This is not a report of an ordinary royal commission as hon. members well know. This royal commission was set up pursuant to the terms of union with Newfoundland and pursuant particularly to term 29 of the terms of union. Even though it may take a little time I feel I ought to refresh the memories of hon. members by putting the language of term 29 on the record because the whole of the subsequent argument, the whole case for urgent action, depends upon the legal and constitutional basis, the solemn obligation that our country entered into ten years ago, to carry out this term. Term 29 reads:

> In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the government of Canada will appoint a royal commission within eight years from the date of union to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of the province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you would like me to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the committee would bear with me for a moment. The Leader of the Opposition asked about the agenda for the commonwealth trade and economic conference and I told him I was sending for the reference to this subject in the Mont Tremblant communique. May I just put it on the record at this point with the consent of the committee?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if the minister would like to dispense with reading it, in placing it on the record, it would be agreeable to us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This will only take a moment, Mr. Chairman. The following is an extract from the communique referring to the commonwealth countries:

> They considered that the time is most opportune to assess these problems and opportunities jointly with particular reference to:
> (a) the significance for commonwealth countries of changes taking place in world trade;
> (b) measures to expand trade between commonwealth countries;
>
> (c) progress towards the common objective of freer trade and payments;
>
> (d) the progress and direction of economic expansion in the less developed countries of the commonwealth and the sources of capital and technical assistance that may aid in their further development;
>
> (e) economic and trade problems in regard to agriculture and other primary production;
>
> (f) the prospects and implications, especially for commonwealth countries, of the European Economic Community and the proposed free trade area;
> (g) arrangements for continuing commonwealth consultations on economic matters.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

Supply—Finance

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, when we rose at six o'clock for the dinner recess I had just put on the record for the benefit of hon. members the text of term 29 of the terms of the union between Canada and Newfoundland, and as briefly as I can I want to point out just precisely what it is that the commissioners were asked to do and what it is that the government of Canada is obligated to do under this solemn undertaking given at the time of union.

The purpose of the commission was to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland—and this is the important part—and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of Newfoundland for two purposes, first, in order to continue public services at the levels and standards they had reached. Now, I want to emphasize that point to all hon. members. This award, this recommendation, of the McNair commission, is not designed or intended to improve the services in Newfoundland. All that it is intended to do is to continue them at the level they have now reached, or that they had reached at the time the commissioners were taking their evidence. Therefore, this is not something to raise standards in Newfoundland at all. This is simply something that will enable the government in that province to continue the standards attained and to do so without having a provincial tax structure more burdensome than the tax structure on the average of the three maritime provinces.

I want to emphasize the fact that there was no thought in this provision of the terms of union that any award was to be made to bring the level of Newfoundland up to that of the highest province, or the Canadian average, or even up to the level of the other maritime provinces. All that it was to do under this particular provision was to continue the existing levels and standards of services, and to do that with a burden of taxation no heavier than that in the three maritime provinces. That is all the commission had the right or the power to award; but that is our solemn responsibility in this parliament to carry out one of the articles of the terms of union, to uphold one of the provincial rights of the government and the people of Newfoundland and I submit it is our duty to do so at the earliest possible date.

In order to save time although I would like very much to do it, I am not going to read what the commission said on this subject, though it is very brief. The commission found that the levels and standards of services of the province of Newfoundland were still far below those of the rest of Canada and below those of the maritime provinces. That evidence will be found particularly at pages 8 and 9 of the report, but I repeat, the commission had no power to recommend that anything should be done to improve those levels and standards. All they could recommend was that there should be sufficient financial assistance to continue those levels and standards. The commission found—and this will be found at page 37 of the report, but I do not intend even to read it; I will just allude to it—that the burden of taxation in the province of Newfoundland was approximately equal to the average burden of taxation in the three maritime provinces. I admit this is a very difficult thing to measure and the commission said so; but I do not think there would be very great quarrel anywhere with the conclusion of the commission on that point. That means, of course, that any deficiency in revenue to maintain the existing levels and standards should not be made up by increasing provincial taxation in Newfoundland, since it was already as burdensome as in the maritime provinces, but should be made up by additional financial assistance to which the province, I emphasize, has a constitutional right under the terms of union, under the British North America Act. The commission found the deficiency to be $8 million per annum. That will be found—and it is very briefly stated—on page 40 of the report.

As I said at the beginning, and I repeat so that it will be here at this point, there is a good deal of dissatisfaction in Newfoundland, expressed by the premier, by the leader of the opposition, and by many others, that this recommendation is too low. The provincial commission recommended to the federal commission a sum almost twice as great, but I do not want to enter into that question now because it is one that the Prime Minister has promised us would be carefully considered by the government. I think we, too, like the premier of Newfoundland and the leader of the opposition, are very grateful for that undertaking on the part of the Prime Minister, as the unanimous resolution of the legislature says they are, and that question I think should be debated at another time.

What we are seeking to put forward now is to urge the government to meet this request, this bi-partisan request from Newfoundland, and to make as an interim payment the amount recommended by the commission.

There are those who may think that $8 million a year, in addition to what the province has, is a very large sum of money, but I might point out that under term 28 of the terms of union provision was made during the first 12 years of union for transitional grants pending the determination of the permanent amount under term 29. For the first three years after confederation that transitional grant was $6,500,000, at a time when Newfoundland had roughly three-quarters of the population it has today. It may surprise some hon. members to realize how very rapid the increase in the population has been. Perhaps four-fifths would be a little more accurate than three-quarters. I have done my arithmetic rather rapidly. Those transitional grants were gradually to decrease until last year the amount was $1,400,000. This year it is $1,050,000, and it will be increasingly less next year.

I should like to point out to hon. members that last year, for various reasons which I am not going to enter into, the government of Newfoundland was not in a position to carry out many of the capital works which were planned for that year. That was not because of inclement weather or because the works did not need to be done, it was because finance was not available, and part of the reason why finance was not available was the steady decline in the amount of those transitional grants.

The award of the McNair commission is dated from April 1, 1957, which is, of course, the right date because that is the end of the eight-year period provided for in the constitution.

Therefore the amount that would be due at the present time is two years' instalment. It is provided in the report that the transitional grant should be deducted from the $8 million during the period of transitional grants so that the net amount that would be coming to the province this year and on which, since the report was published on July 25, the provincial authorities have been counting and have been expecting this parliament to make available to them, is approximately $13,500,000. I say again that this is a solemn obligation on the part of Canada, an obligation entered into at the time of union.

So much importance was attached to this solemn obligation that, as the hon. member for St. John's West will well recall, it was the policy of his party when he was in parliament some time ago to pledge themselves in advance at that time to carry out whatever the recommendations might be of the commission to be appointed, and there was some criticism of the Liberal government that the hon. gentleman will probably recall. I am not seeking to be controversial about this matter because I think the minister was showing a very commendable zeal for and interest in Newfoundland at that time, as he has since and as he did during the 1957 election campaign. I commend him for it. That was one of the principal grounds on which he urged the electors to elect him, so that he would be here to see that Newfoundland did get a fair deal in this matter. I would not be surprised if the hon. gentleman had had something to do with influencing the Prime Minister to look over the matter again to see if there could not be a larger award made to Newfoundland. But nobody knows better than the minister how urgently necessary it is that this money should be paid if the works so badly needed in Newfoundland at the present time both to raise the standards of that province to a higher level and to provide employment are to be carried on.

I know it has been argued that because Newfoundland has received $7½ million this year under the Atlantic provinces grants, as well as an additional payment similar to that made to all the other provinces because of the additional 3 per cent of the income tax, Newfoundland should have plenty of money to carry on this year. But let me remind hon. members what the situation is. The premier of the province, like the premiers of the other Atlantic provinces, had already announced his plans to use the Atlantic provinces grant in the same way that Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island can use them, not just to continue existing services but to improve services to bring them a little nearer to the level they have in Saskatchewan, and that is an entirely different thing. When the legislation covering the Atlantic provinces grants was introduced in the house we were told by the minister that their purpose was to raise levels in the Atlantic provinces.

What is going to happen this year has been explained very clearly in the budget speech delivered on Wednesday of last week, if I remember correctly, in the assembly at St. John's. The budget speech pointed out that if this payment under the McNair award was not made so that the province could use it for the purposes for which they are designed, to continue existing services, the Atlantic provinces grant in Newfoundland would have to be used to continue existing services and therefore could not be used for the purpose for which parliament intended it, namely to improve the situation in that province. Unless we act at this session we are going to be saying to Newfoundland, you have to use the Atlantic provinces grant to continue your existing services; you cannot use it the way the other Atlantic provinces can, to improve your services. And why? Because we in parliament are not carrying out our solemn undertaking, our constitutional obligation under the British North America Act. That is what we will be saying. I cannot believe that any member of this parliament having considered the facts, because these are facts, would want to do that.

In view of conditions in Newfoundland, which have been particularly adverse this year because of the failure of the fishery and because of the difficulty of disposing of the pulp and paper products of the only other large Newfoundland industry, there is no question that the economic situation is very serious. Maintenance of existing services is going to be more difficult this year than it has been any year since confederation, particularly during the coming winter. Capital works are very urgently needed indeed. The school population of Newfoundland in proportion to the whole population is higher than it is in any other province of Canada. The shortage of schools is more acute there than anywhere else. The shortage of roads and the condition of the roads are such that there is a more urgent need for new and improved roads there than in any other part of Canada.

I could go on about all the services. No one needs to take my view of them because it is set out in the report of the royal commission. It is set out in the budget speech in Newfoundland the other day and it is a matter of common knowledge to all those who are familiar with the situation in that part of Canada. If the provincial government does not receive this money, which we have an obligation to pay to them and which they have the right to receive under the constitution, it means that the capital works that have been planned for the two purposes of raising standards in the province, not to anything like the level in the rest of Canada but to raise them to some degree, and also of providing employment, which is going to be so badly needed during the coming winter, are going to be denied to the people of Newfoundland.

We all remember—it has been referred to a good many times in the house—the statement made by the Prime Minister in Charlottetown last February a statement he made everywhere else also, that no one was going to be allowed to suffer because of unemployment. If we do not make these payments available to the government and people of Newfoundland in this session of parliament, we in this parliament are going to be creating unemployment in Newfoundland next winter. There is just no escaping that. The facts are there for anyone to see.

It is for that reason that I make no apology for joining with the premier and the leader of the opposition in Newfoundland in making this appeal to the government to act now in conformity with the unanimous request of the house of assembly of Newfoundland, supported by the Liberal majority and the Conservative minority in that assembly who have joined together because they put the interests of Newfoundland above any partisan consideration. I may say that I am seeking to make this appeal in a completely non-controversial way in the hope that it will be received by the government in the same way and that action will be taken so that a provision may be included in the appropriation act which we will pass at the end of this session to carry out this solemn constitutional obligation to which the people of Canada gave their word on the eleventh of December, 1948, when the terms of union were signed. I think it is true to say that in the history of the modern world there has been no happier union of peoples anywhere than the union between Canada and Newfoundland.

I well remember how moved I was when sitting in the gallery on one of the anniversaries of confederation I heard the hon. member for St. John's West, the minister for Newfoundland, when he was in the first parliament after confederation, use words not dissimilar from those I have now uttered. The minister, we know, was a sincere and genuine opponent of union, but he recognized that it had come to stay. He had come to the conclusion that it was a good thing for both of us. I hold the view, and I have never hesitated to express it, that the biggest gainer as the result of union was the rest of Canada. Nevertheless, I think Canada and Newfoundland have both gained. I do feel, that we do not want any blemish on this harmonious union by any feeling in any quarter that there is any attempt whatever to fail to carry out the agreement for the union or even to delay action in carrying out the agreement.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in support of the appeal which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has made to the Minister of Finance, and to the government, to implement the recommendations of the royal commission on the economic position of Newfoundland by making an interim payment at this session. For all mainlanders confederation dates back to 1867; for Newfoundlanders confederation dates back to 1949. When confederation was being considered at that earlier date, Newfoundland decided not to join with the other provinces. There were several reasons for that, but one of the very important reasons was that Newfoundland had very small taxable resources. When consideration was being given to union with Canada in 1948, this same question was in everybody's mind: What would be the effect on provincial revenue of union with Canada? It was well known that the main sources of revenue would be taken away from Newfoundland and would be transferred to the federal government, while at the same time the province would be left with the responsibility for the most expensive public services such as roads, schools, hospitals, health measures and so on.

The opponents of confederation, as they did in 1867, painted a very dark picture, a picture in which they said Newfoundland would be stripped of most of its sources of revenue. Confederation would result in a heavier tax burden than prevailed at that time. This was, in essence, the same argument that had been used with great effect in 1867. Subsequently, a delegation came to Canada, after confederation, to study the federal setup and try to discover just what the impact of confederation would be on provincial revenues. They studied this question for three months, not only the members of the Newfoundland delegation, but federal cabinet ministers, departmental officials and financial experts of the Bank of Canada. After studying that question for three months they had to admit that it was impossible to foresee just what effect union with Canada would have on provincial revenues. Since it was impossible to foresee what that impact would be, term 29 was drafted and inserted into the terms of union. This term 29 made provision for a review after eight years of confederation of the financial situation in Newfoundland. It was hoped it might be possible, after looking back over the course of events during the first eight years, to see more clearly what might be needed to enable the provincial government to carry out its responsibilities in the future.

I do not believe anyone had any doubt at that time that confederation would be in the best interests of the people of Newfoundland. It might bring about an increase in prosperity. But I believe that thinking people everywhere had some doubts as to whether or not it would be a good thing for the government of Newfoundland. There was some doubt as to whether or not it might place the government of Newfoundland in a position where it would be financially impossible to discharge its obligations. Now, eight years have passed. Some time ago a royal commission was set up to make this review. Recently, the report of that commission was tabled in this house. I am not going to make any remarks concerning the merits of the recommendations or the basis upon which the commission arrived at their conclusions or the adequacy of their recommendations. I merely wish to point out that after reviewing the situation this royal commission did recommend some money was needed to assist the provincial government in carrying out its obligations, and that sum of money should take the form of an annual grant.

As my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has pointed out, the purpose of that grant recommended by the royal commission under term 29 was merely to continue the services at the same level as had been reached when the review was made. The provincial government knew that this would happen because term 29 was actually written into the terms of union. In preparation for that review, they put forth superhuman efforts to try to make the greatest possible improvement in our public services. Every province of Canada is striving toward the goal of improved standards of public service and improved standards of living. It is a sort of race with progress. In the early days of confederation the maritime provinces were out in front. But today, after 80 years, they are behind in that race.

Newfoundland entered that race 80 years behind the others and, therefore, we are saddled with that 80-year handicap. However, as I stated, the provincial government put forth a superhuman effort and although they made mistakes as was bound to happen they did achieve a great deal. It might be worth while to inform hon. members about some of the things that have been accomplished as a result of their efforts to extend the services in Newfoundland and compare them with the services in the maritime provinces, not compare them with the high standards of the central provinces but with the standards in the maritime provinces which, as I pointed out a few minutes ago, are still behind in the race for progress.

One of our great needs in Newfoundland is roads. Roads are more expensive to build in Newfoundland than elsewhere. It is probably twice as expensive to build roads in Newfoundland as it is to build them in any other province of Canada.

Mr. McPhillips: Oh, no; in British Columbia they are three times more expensive.

Mr. Carter: I will accept the hon. member's statement. I do not know anything about British Columbia. However, I know that they are far more expensive to build in Newfoundland than they are in Canada as a whole, having regard to average costs. In 1949 we had only 1,600 miles of road. After nine years of effort we now have 3,200 miles of road and of that 3,200 miles of road only 120 miles are paved. Let us compare our situation with that of Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia is only about half the size of Newfoundland, with an area of 22,000 square miles compared with an area of 42,200 square miles in Newfoundland. Yet Nova Scotia has 15,000 miles of road compared with 3,200 miles in Newfoundland. New Brunswick has 13,000 miles of road compared with 3,200 miles in Newfoundland. Even little Prince Edward Island with an area of 2,000 square miles, has 3,500 miles of road of which 400 miles are paved. Yet Newfoundland, with a population of over 400,000 people, still has only 3,200 miles of road.

We have one university compared with seven universities in Nova Scotia and six universities in New Brunswick. Hospital services have been more than doubled in the nine years and yet we are perhaps only within 50 per cent of what we actually need. As a result of that, Newfoundland is at least 25 years behind the rest of the maritime provinces in the standard and requirements of their public services just as the maritime provinces themselves are perhaps 25 years behind the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

The money provided by this grant under the terms of union which has been recommended by the royal commission is intended to enable Newfoundland only to continue 25 years behind the maritime provinces and 50 years behind the central provinces of Canada. I mention that matter in order to emphasize the fact so that hon. members will not confuse this grant under the terms of union—I refer to term 29—with the special grant for the Atlantic provinces which, as my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has pointed out, was intended and was granted by this parliament to improve the services.

Every province wants to improve its services. But if this money is not forthcoming, Newfoundland will be obliged to divert funds from the special grant from its original purpose intended by this parliament in order to maintain existing services, and the result of that procedure is going to be to retard progress in Newfoundland for at least two or three years. Not only will it retard progress but it will also nullify the plans of the government which were intended to cope with the unemployment situation in Newfoundland which today is double what it has been in the worst year since confederation. This term 29 and the recommendations under this term represented the final act of union. It was, as it were, the consummation of the marriage between Newfoundland and Canada. We all want that marriage to be successful. We all want it to be a happy one. However, it cannot possibly be a happy marriage unless Newfoundland is given the same consideration as that given to the other provinces. If Newfoundland is prevented by any action of this government from using the special grant to improve services, as the other maritime provinces are doing, then we shall fall still further behind the other maritime provinces in our efforts to strive for better standards of services for our people.

Nothing should be done, Mr. Chairman, by this parliament that is going to impede Newfoundland in its efforts towards progress. The government of Newfoundland, on being made aware that the special grants would be made available, worked out a program of improved services including better schools. Some of that money was also to be spent for hospitals and a great deal of it on roads. One of the roads I hoped would go to my own riding, which would open up a rich area, perhaps the only area of development in my riding in bay D'Espoir and connect it with the trans-Canada highway. These projects would create a large amount of employment and would do a great deal to stabilize the economy of Newfoundland and to minimize the effects of the recession which we are experiencing at this time. If that cannot be done, then everybody in Newfoundland is going to suffer.

I appeal to the government to give urgent consideration to our people not only because we are making the plea but because it is the right thing to do. I believe that is the only good reason for doing anything: we must be sure that it is right. I am sure that the minister and the Prime Minister want to do the right thing by Newfoundland. Withholding this grant at this time will, in my opinion—and I am sure my opinion can be substantiated by consultation with any expert on Newfoundland—strike a blow at the economy of Newfoundland from which it will take years to recover; and even if the grant were doubled next year or in some year in the future, it would still be impossible to undo or to repair the damage which will result if some interim grant is not made at this time.

The provincial government made its plans on the basis of this grant being made available for 1957. We are now into the fiscal year of 1958. It is therefore a year behind. Whatever conclusion the Prime Minister and the cabinet may reach as to the adequacy or inadequacy of these recommendations of the royal commission, I do not think that consideration should prejudice Newfoundland's right to receive interim payments on account for the last fiscal year and for this current fiscal year. I urge the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to take our appeal seriously and to accede to the requests which they have received from the premier of Newfoundland and from the leader of the Conservative party in Newfoundland which show that this is a matter which is far above party politics and party division. I am sure there is no better way in which to ensure the gratitude of Newfoundland than by taking this most needed action at this time.

Mr. Herridge: As a member from British Columbia, I wish very briefly to say that I have listened with interest and sympathy to the moving appeal of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on behalf of the people of Newfoundland. I thought his presentation of his case was statesmanlike and non-partisan and that his remarks must evoke from the minister and the members of this house a sympathetic response.

We in western Canada particularly enjoy many advantages not enjoyed by the people of the maritimes, especially in Newfoundland, and as a member representing a constituency in a province which enjoys many advantages to which the people of the maritimes look forward, I want to take this opportunity of asking the minister to give very serious consideration to the representations made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who I think did a masterly job in presenting the case of the people of Newfoundland.

Mr. Batten: I would like to say a few words at this time in support of the appeal made by my colleague, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and also by my colleague, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. There is at this time very little need to recount the proceedings leading up to the joining of Newfoundland with Canada. I suspect the story is well known and those who have read the official record in Hansard will be fully informed of what took place at that time. The Hon. George Drew, who was then leader of the Conservative party, on Monday, February 7, 1949, had the following to say:

> As has already been pointed out by the Prime Minister, the union of Newfoundland with Canada will represent the fulfilment of the great and challenging vision of those who met in Charlottetown on September 1, 1864, in the hope of bringing together the whole of British North America as one united nation. It will give reality to the dream of Sir John A. Macdonald, whose proposals to Newfoundland for confederation were not first made at the time of the Charlottetown conference but in fact were put forward to Newfoundland in 1858. It is well to remember the significance of the fact that these proposals which were put forward to Newfoundland in 1858 brought the first favourable official response to his contention that steps should then be taken to create a federal union.

Further down in his statement Mr. Drew had this to say:

> Macdonald, Cartier, and those associated with them, were disappointed that Newfoundland did not become part of Canada in 1867, but they never despaired of ultimate success.

Towards the end of his speech, he had this to say:

> It is essential that the union be one which appeals now, and will appeal in the years ahead, to the people of Newfoundland and to the people of Canada as something which united them in spirit and in friendship even more than it did in statutory form.

It was only two months following the statement of the Hon. Mr. Drew that Newfoundland did become part of Canada and as part of Canada there were naturally terms of union between us. I know that term No. 29 has already been placed on the record, but I want to repeat part of it again as follows:

> In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the government of Canada will appoint a royal commission within eight years from date of union to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of the province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards—

I repeat that, Mr. Chairman—> —at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

Obviously at the time these terms of union were signed it was impossible to look ahead to see what the effect of the terms of union would be on the province of Newfoundland and so, included in these terms of union was term 29 by which, after eight years, it would be possible with the help of experience in intervening years to look back on what had been done and to see how these terms of union had affected Newfoundland and what, if any, additional consideration should be given.

We know that in Newfoundland we have standards of public service which are not nearly up to the level of the standards here on the mainland. I could refer to many instances but I will just briefly mention two of them. Take, for example, our educational services, which are not nearly as good as that enjoyed by the people in any other Canadian province. We have a growing population with a great need for school expansion including those modern educational services which are being given in many places to the people of Canada.

I heard my hon. friend from Victoria, B.C., make an interjection when my colleague from Burin-Burgeo was speaking regarding the cost of highways. He may be perfectly correct in that the cost of the trans-Canada highway being built in British Columbia is much higher than it would be in Newfoundland but of course when you start to calculate the cost of that highway in any province I think you must consider not only the cost in dollars and cents per mile but the actual cost in dollars and cents per capita.

Earlier in the session I put some figures on the record which I would like to quote again. At page 409 of Hansard for May 23, 1958, I said:

> I point out that the project is becoming a very expensive one for my province, not only in the sense that Newfoundland is not an easy province in which to build a highway, but it is expensive also in terms of the amount of road which has to be built by a small population. The total length of the trans-Canada highway is about 4,500 miles. The total length of that highway in Newfoundland is 610 miles, which means that while the population of Newfoundland is only 3.7 per cent of the population of all the provinces which are now under the agreement, yet the proportion of the road which they have to build is 13.3 per cent, roughly three times as much.
> We could compare the cost of the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland with the cost in other provinces, for example in Alberta and in Ontario, where the number of miles per 10,000 of population is 2.8. In Manitoba the number of miles per 10,000 population is 3.7. In Saskatchewan the figure is 4.8 miles, in Nova Scotia 4.8, in British Columbia 5.7, in New Brunswick 7.1, in Prince Edward Island 7.3, while in Newfoundland the number of miles per 10,000 of population is 15.8.

I suggest to my hon. friend that while the actual cost per mile may be greater in British Columbia, the actual cost per capita in Newfoundland is far greater than in any other province of Canada. I could go on to talk about other services in Newfoundland and indicate that we still have a long way to go not only to reach the standards and levels of the maritime provinces but also to reach the standards and levels that obtain in the other provinces of Canada.

I could, of course, engage in a long speech and quote figures at length from the McNair report and also from the various briefs presented to that royal commission dealing with the situation that exists in Newfoundland but I shall not do so.

We live in a country that is known as a democratic country. We live in a country that is recognized for its practice of democracy. Democracy is, after all, an experiment in faith. It is an experiment in the faith that free men are able to retain their identity and maintain the fact that there is such a thing as unity in multiplicity. Perhaps the concept that there can be unity in multiplicity is the very basis of democracy. After all, the confederation of Canada in 1867 is a fact that goes to attest these ideas. It demonstrates that in a large country with many provinces covering a wide expanse those provinces have been able to unite to form one great nation. In 1949 Newfoundland entered that union and in doing so they, too, as an older dominion in their own right believed that there is such a thing as unity in multiplicity. Those who come from the province of British Columbia are proud that they come from that great province but I suggest to you that they are also proud because they are Canadians. We could go right across the country from Alberta to Prince Edward Island and in every province it will be found that people are proud to belong to their own province but at the same time are proud to be Canadians.

We in Newfoundland never hope to have the industrial development that exists in British Columbia. Newfoundland can never hope to be a Toronto or a Montreal. Yet, we do believe that we can be an integral part of this nation. We believe that with our God-fearing people who are resolute and determined we can make a significant contribution to this nation. We in Newfoundland are proud to be Newfoundlanders and I believe if this government gives to Newfoundland the assistance the people there deserve they in turn will be proud to be Canadians. I urge the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, the cabinet and hon. gentlemen of this committee to give serious consideration to the appeal made by the premier of Newfoundland, by the leader of the opposition and by the hon. members from Newfoundland here in the House of Commons on behalf of Newfoundland, for I assure you, gentlemen, that if we can give to Newfoundland the start that it deserves it will become a fine part of this country, and the loyalty to Canada on the part of the people of Newfoundland, if it is excelled in the future, will be excelled only by those who have always had the privilege of calling themselves Canadians.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest this evening to the remarks made by hon. members from the province of Newfoundland and those made by my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay West. I am not well acquainted with this question but I know sufficient about it to wonder why the government has failed to act in a way that would remove this important and justifiable complaint of the province of Newfoundland.

If the discussion had nothing to do with the terms of confederation, and that is far from the case, I think hon. members would be justified in asking such consideration from the federal treasury to help them improve their health services, their roads and educational services in that province. But it is clear from the terms of confederation that within eight years from the date of union, in April, 1949, there should be consideration by the government to providing to Newfoundland such revenues as are necessary to maintain the services prevalent at that time with a tax burden not greater than that borne by the citizens of the neighouring maritime provinces.

We have heard a great deal about national unity in this country. When the Liberal party was in power it heralded itself as the party of national unity and it was the Conservative opposition at that time, according to the Liberal members, who were bent on damaging national unity in this country. Up until this moment during this session we have seen the government take upon itself the cloak of the supporters of national unity and hon. members of the government have accused the opposition of not following policies in the interests of national unity when they were in power.

I believe if we can leave our politics aside hon. gentlemen in all parties would be found to be interested in maintaining and strengthening national unity. I believe that hon. members of this committee have great sympathy for the position being taken by the province of Newfoundland. That position is a very strong one stemming as it does from the unanimous report of the royal commission and the unanimous resolution passed by the Newfoundland house of assembly. This parliament should not allow this problem to go unsolved, should not allow this criticism to gain strength and should not permit to exist a disservice to national unity in Canada.

I have been called a lot of things in this house but I had never before been called a mainlander as I was tonight by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. However, I want to assure him that as one mainlander I have every sympathy for the problem put forward by the province of Newfoundland. I believe the province has an excellent and unanswerable case and that the parliament of this nation should fulfil in a generous way beyond question the terms of confederation with Newfoundland to the very letter and spirit of the agreement and if necessary should go beyond the terms of the agreement to make sure that the Canadian citizens living in the province of Newfoundland without exception are proud to be a part of this great nation.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to take up too much time of the committee at this moment but I wish to make it very clear at this stage that Newfoundland cannot afford to wait very long for definite action with respect to term No. 29 of the terms of union if we are to enjoy the full membership in the Canadian family to which we are entitled. Right now the provincial government and the entire legislature in Newfoundland regardless of party are awaiting with general concern the reaction of this government regarding the McNair report.

I wish to state that this is not a case of a have-not province looking for more money from Ottawa. It is also more than the mere fulfilment of a contractual obligation to be considered in the light of a transaction in the market place. It is rather the completion of a compact which brought two peoples together in an indissoluble union, and the success of that union depends on mutual satisfaction and, in respect of the weaker party to the union, upon their ability to find respect and happiness within the orbit of a great and growing nation.

Let me assure this committee, Mr. Chairman, with all the sincerity I can muster that Newfoundland's future as a province of Canada depends in a large measure on the action taken on this report. For some time we have heard much about this report and I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that Newfoundlanders had hopes that the cabinet would have given serious consideration to the McNair report and would have dealt with it swiftly because of its importance to Newfoundland.

Let me say as well that I had hoped as a Newfoundlander that this question of the revision of the financial term of union would be dealt with on a level that goes beyond party politics, or even the regional or provincial issues and differences that sometimes tend to keep us apart. I believe sincerely that it would be a real tragedy if the future of a great new province were to become the subject of petty haggling or even party politics. I hasten to add that I have not the slightest suggestion that this will be the case. Indeed, I have every reason to believe that the Prime Minister, his associates in the cabinet and indeed all members on both sides of this house have a high regard for Newfoundland. It is apparent that the vast majority of Canadians, both public men and private citizens, wish to see Newfoundlanders take their places as prosperous citizens in a prosperous province, sharing equally in all the undoubted benefits of Canadian citizenship.

It merely remains for me to assure this committee in all sincerity that the feeling is mutual. What Newfoundland seeks from this union is not charity. A people with more than 450 years of history behind them are much too proud for that. What we want is common justice and an opportunity to pull our weight as we have done in all cases in the past. It is not surprising, indeed it is understandable, that hon. members and all Canadians in general have little real knowledge of its people. After all, nine years of confederation is a relatively short period in which to educate a whole nation to the attributes of a neighbour and partner, particularly in view of the fact that the education job has to be done in the face of a previous century or more of false impressions and erroneous information. Obviously, in a single speech it is going to be impossible for me to correct all the current misconceptions which even this committee may share.

I do suggest to this committee, however, that as public men it would serve us well if we were to devote some time to a study of our newest province. I believe you will find its history fascinating and its people admirable. You might learn, as I did long ago, that while the problems of Newfoundland may seem gigantic by some yardsticks, our people do not in fact require a great deal more to make them self-sufficient and give them a happy life. Newfoundland today has a desperate, almost hopeless effort to catch up with the rest of Canada. Remember that virtually all of the remainder of the nation had at least 50 years of confederation behind it before Newfoundland entered the union, and thus from that moment on, although the pact was share and share alike, it is difficult to see how Newfoundland could hope to be anything but a half century behind in its basic services.

Let me put it this way. If I entered into a partnership with a member of this house and he had $50,000 at that time while I did not have a cent, and if we accepted the fact that we would share everything equally from that point on, it stands to reason that my so-called partner would always be $50,000 better off than I. That is precisely the position of Newfoundland relative to other provinces. We got the same deal as other provinces on the trans-Canada highway but our existing roads mileage was very low and below that of other areas of this country.

We get the same federal grants, the same rental programs and the same treatment generally, but we have so much farther to come in order to achieve equality that we never can hope to catch up under such an agreement. Newfoundland needs and is to have special aid, and there is a good case to be made for such an agreement. It is a case that needs no appeal to charity or unusual generosity. Rather, it is based on logic and above all justice. It is very true that Canada has given much to Newfoundland in the past nine years and I think that union has been a good thing for the vast majority of Newfoundlanders but it is equally true, although not as widely publicized that Newfoundland has given much to Canada.

Not all of this contribution can be measured in dollars and cents, although from the financial point of view the Newfoundland role has been substantial. However, perhaps the intangibles have been even more important. Over 400,000 good citizens, a practically debt-free people, assume the responsibility for their share of Canada's debt; the world's greatest fishing grounds, strategic defence bases, airports, water power and a strong hand in dealing with the United States. All this plus much more came to Canada through its union with Newfoundland, making the union truly a two-way street of mutual benefit. Given a fair measure of the nation's wealth, Newfoundland has a bright and promising future.

Newfoundland is not greatly different from other parts of Canada and its people are pretty much like those from other constituencies. We ask nothing more than the right to earn a decent living, through our own efforts, and to enjoy for ourselves and our families that degree of basic security that has come to be regarded as our right in a nation that has not forgotten the worth of the individual.

Therefore it is on this basis that I say and believe Newfoundland should have the support of the house in seeing that a good and just case exists for an upward revision of the terms of union and that, according to the report of the royal commission, Newfoundland finances are raised to a higher level.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I rise not to add to the argument made but merely to join in the appeal that has been made to the government to discharge the obligation undertaken under the pact of union with Newfoundland by implementing the recommendation of the royal commission, an appeal that has now been embodied in a resolution of the house of assembly of Newfoundland moved by the premier, seconded by the leader of the opposition and passed unanimously. This, Mr. Chairman, is not a matter of generosity but a matter of justice, and I refuse to believe that justice will not be done and without delay.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not going to say something about this matter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was about to, but is the hon. member for Welland going to speak on this subject?

Mr. McMillan: Not on Newfoundland.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with close interest to the remarks that have been made by hon. members on this subject. Admittedly it is a subject of very high importance and because of its importance, not just for one year but for years to come, it is one that requires the most careful consideration. On August 15 the Prime Minister was questioned in the house on the subject by the Leader of the Opposition and to the hon. gentleman's question the Prime Minister made the following reply, as found on page 3581 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, this royal commission was appointed by the last government, and apparently its recommendations are not acceptable to all. I have read criticisms of various leaders in Newfoundland respecting the amount recommended, and that being so the government must give the fullest consideration to the matter before announcing the course it will follow.

Then followed a supplementary question by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

By way of a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask if we are to take it the government does not intend to act at this session?

To that question the Prime Minister made the following reply:

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I have already said. Certainly this government has a responsibility to look thoroughly into the recommendations made. Those recommendations apparently not having the support of the leaders in Newfoundland, this re-emphasizes the necessity of the fullest consideration being given by the government before taking action.

That statement in the house by the Prime Minister was greeted by the premier of Newfoundland in the telegram dated August 23 that was read this afternoon by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Pickersgill: August 23? No, I do not think so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh yes, it was later on.

Mr. Pickersgill: I read the telegram embodying the resolution and no other.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has read one of these telegrams, it might not be amiss for me to read another that was received from Premier Smallwood by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit me to ask him to read the first telegram of August 11 from the premier? If he does not happen to have it with him, I will be glad to supply him with a copy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would be quite content if my hon. friend would read it himself.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is the beginning of the story and I am sure the minister does not want to be unfair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have tried to be very fair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend can put it on the record. I have here the telegram sent by Premier Smallwood to the Prime Minister on August 23. I do not propose to read all of it, although I will if that is desired. I am relating my remarks to what the Prime Minister had to say in the house and this is the part of the telegram that contains comment on the Prime Minister's statement in the house. The latter part of the telegram reads as follows:

I have already announced publicly that Newfoundland is grateful to you for your decision not to accept the recommendation of the McNair commission without giving it more careful consideration and I now request you to pay us the amount that is recommended while you take time to consider our request for improvement in the amount that will be paid to us on a lasting basis.

Last week the Prime Minister replied to Premier Smallwood by telegram dated August 26 reading as follows:

In reply to your telegram dated August 23. As you know, on behalf of the government of Canada I announced in House of Commons on August 15 the intention to give fullest consideration to report of royal commission on terms of union with Newfoundland and its recommendations before announcing course we will follow with respect thereto. I am glad to learn from your telegram that you approve this decision and have publicly announced that Newfoundland is grateful for it. We expect prorogation of parliament within very few days and it is quite impossible to complete full consideration of the royal commission's report in the meantime. Newfoundland is receiving $7,500,000 per annum as its share of the Atlantic adjustment grant and an additional three per cent of the yield from the personal income tax this year, neither of which would have been received by the province of Newfoundland had this government not come into office. These benefits, which incidentally exceed the amounts recommended by the royal commission, should enable you to meet the fiscal conditions described in your telegram pending final decision on recommendations of royal commission. Kind personal regards.

John G. Diefenbaker

The report of the royal commission on the terms of union with Newfoundland is an important document and the action that may be taken by parliament on that report is something that is going to play a very important role in the financial terms of union in the future and in the fiscal relations between the federal jurisdiction and the province of Newfoundland. It seemed to the government that in relation to so important a matter it was its duty to give the whole subject the fullest and most careful consideration, particularly as the recommendations of the royal commission are not satisfactory to the government of Newfoundland. That has been made very clear.

The amount recommended by way of annual payment by the royal commission is approximately half the amount that the government of Newfoundland asked for in its submission to the royal commission. It having been made perfectly clear that the recommendations of the royal commission are not acceptable to the provincial government of Newfoundland, it has seemed more clear to the federal government that we must approach the matter with very great care and concern. I have indicated that this is not a matter for one year but one that is going to be of continuing effect in the years to come. The royal commission has not set any particular period on the time within which the proposed annual payments of $8 million less transitional grants are to run. Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with a very large matter.

But principally because it is something that goes to the root of the terms of union and fiscal relations between the governments of Canada and Newfoundland, it has seemed to us that this is a matter that must have the most searching study. Under the pressures that have existed in the late days of the session it has simply been physically impossible for the government to complete its consideration of this report and the important question involved. The Prime Minister has made it clear that it is the government's intention to continue to give exhaustive consideration to the matter and to the recommendations of the royal commission. That is our intention in those days that lie before us, as soon as the pressures of this session are relieved.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister, of course, would not expect me to leave the question there. The minister I am sure, like the rest of us, has heard the old adage that half a loaf is better than no bread. What the minister is saying is that while the government considers whether or not they should increase the amount, because I cannot believe that the government is giving any consideration to decreasing the amount—at least, I hope that is not true. I cannot believe that the hon. member for St. John's West would sit in the government for a day if that were true. This consideration can only be as to whether or not the amount is to be increased. There is, in the minister's reply, no argument whatever to justify withholding from the province this amount recommended by the McNair commission of which one distinguished member was Professor John Deutsch who is perhaps better qualified than any person outside the public service or than most people in the public service to express a judgment on this matter.

Since the commission recognized that at least this amount was required, it does not seem to me there is any logic or any reason in the position taken by the minister. I am not seeking to be controversial. The minister read what I believe was the third message on this subject that was sent to the Prime Minister by the premier of Newfoundland. I have in my hand here a copy of the first message sent by the premier of Newfoundland to the Prime Minister on August 11. I make no apology for reading it because it does set out, in very clear terms it seems to me, the very modest request of this province. This is dated August 11, nearly four weeks ago. It should be remembered that while this report was not tabled until July 25, it was in the hands of the government very early in July.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have the dates right here.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let me put my hon. friend right about that. I do not know whether he is talking about the submission of the manuscript to the queen's printer, but certainly the report was tabled as soon as it was received from the printers. The Prime Minister had said he would do that and that was effectively done.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to enter into an argument with the minister because the documentation is all here. The Prime Minister told us in the house that the report had been received, I think it was July 10, but it was not tabled until July 25 pending receipt of the printed version of the French translation. For those two weeks the government had, by the Prime Minister's own statement, this report. Since August 11 the government has had before it a solemn request from the premier of the province, made on behalf of the government of that province, for its provincial rights under the constitution. This is the message that was sent by the premier to the Prime Minister on August 11:

Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker
Prime Minister of Canada
Ottawa

Your attention has no doubt been drawn to statements by myself and the leader of the opposition in our assembly respecting the inadequate nature of the recommendations of the royal commission on the revision of term 29 of the terms of union of Canada and Newfoundland. While I should like at a later date to make a formal submission to the federal government, I wish to stress the importance to the welfare of Newfoundland of immediate federal action on an interim basis. The commission has clearly shown that at least the amounts recommended are urgently needed to enable the provincial government to continue existing services. We plan to use our share of the Atlantic provinces grant largely for employment creating improvements in our public services. Our assembly was adjourned pending publication of the report and in order to complete our budget we need assurance that action will not be delayed in implementing the report. I appeal to you for action at the present session to discharge, at least on an interim basis, this solemn constitutional obligation of the union.

That was the appeal made by the premier to the Prime Minister on August 11. The premier renewed that appeal, as the minister pointed out, in the telegram he read dated August 23, and on August 26 the Prime Minister replied in the terms already given. I am not going to take up time by reading them. The refusal was on the ground that this matter required further study. That was stated from the start; that was what the provincial government wanted, further study of the matter. They also urgently needed the amount recommended by the commission, and needed it now for the reasons the premier sets out here, for the welfare of the province, for the maintenance of employment, for the maintenance of essential services. This is what is being denied them and being denied in spite of this unanimous appeal from the assembly, an appeal from the premier and the leader of the opposition, the leader of the Conservative party in the province. They have joined together to ask for something for which they have a right to ask, for their rights under the constitution. That is what it is, and nothing less than that.

I cannot believe that the government has fully appreciated what this means. The Prime Minister, replying on August 26, said that the province ought to be able to get along by using the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant and the extra three per cent under the tax-sharing arrangement. Every other province has the extra three per cent under the tax-sharing arrangement. Newfoundland should not have to use that rather small sum of money to continue existing services. They should be allowed, like the rest of the provinces, to use it to improve services. In so far as the Atlantic provinces grant is concerned, what the Prime Minister was saying in his reply was that, while Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick could use the Atlantic provinces grant to improve their services, Newfoundland has to use it to maintain existing services. The statement by the Prime Minister that they would receive more under these two payments than they would under this award is, in fact, not correct. I do not accuse the Prime Minister of any deliberate intent, but in fact so far as this particular year is concerned, that is not correct. The total grant under these two provisions amounts to about $9 million, if the minister's calculation of the three per cent is correct, whereas the grant coming since April 1, 1957 and now due to Newfoundland under this other arrangement up to the same terminal date, March 31, 1959, would be $13.5 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is counting in the two years, less the transitional payment?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, and from the date of the publication of the report until the Prime Minister's message of August 26, that is what the province had every reason to expect would be paid, and paid promptly without any further consideration.

Again I do not want to be controversial, and I do not want to be critical. I have sat on the treasury benches where the minister is now and I know what it is to listen to members of the opposition, more eloquent by far than I am, denouncing the government. I know what it is like at the end of the session, and how many pressures there are on ministers. I want to take a charitable view and I feel that the government has not really had time to consider adequately what it is doing, what this refusal is going to mean. There is no doubt whatever about it, if this money is not forthcoming the road program, or a large part of it, the school-building program, the hospital program of the province of Newfoundland will have to be cancelled this year. All those who would otherwise have found work, because of the failure of the fishery, because of the short work in the woods, will be on the dole. That is what is going to happen if this is not done. It is not as though we were asking for something that was a favour, we are asking for something that is a provincial right under the terms of union, under the British North America Act.

As I say, everyone in Newfoundland wants the government to go on and consider fully the whole implications of this report. However, there is no difficulty about doing that and making this interim payment at this time. As I said in my opening remarks on this subject, all the government needs to do—and I know the process very well—is to get a message from His Excellency and bring in an item in supply which, I feel perfectly confident, if recommended by the government, would pass. I know that I would be so happy to pass it that I would not say a single word about it.

Mr. Hees: Go easy.

Mr. Pickersgill: I make that suggestion not because it is going to do me any good personally—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —but because it is going to mean that the people I represent and the people that my friends from Newfoundland, including the minister, represent in Newfoundland, will have jobs next winter which they would not have if this money is not there and because the people of that province will have services which are still away below those that exist in other provinces, but nevertheless services to which any and every Canadian should be entitled.

Mr. McMillan: The Minister of Finance is very serene now and I want to ask him a couple of questions. This matter was raised previously. The Minister of Finance often seems to base his charges of waste and extravagance against the former government on the numbers of civil servants or the increased numbers of civil servants being employed in the various departments of government. When speaking on the budget I stated that about 70 more civil servants were employed in his department than in the time of his predecessor the previous year. The minister interrupted me to deny this statement. I would now ask the minister whether the number of civil servants is as reported in this blue book of estimates and whether it means what it says, namely that he has some 70 more civil servants. Then I have one other question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is wrong as I informed him when he made a similar remark during the course of the budget debate. The fact is that he has overlooked, and the blue book of estimates does not take account of, the number of positions that were increased in 1957-58 in the supplementary estimates of the former government. I want to make it quite clear that there has not been the increase that he has been referring to. As to the number of positions provided for by the estimates, let me tell him that the actual strength in the department at July 31, 1958 was 5,097 persons.

Mr. McMillan: I was not criticizing the minister because there were too many civil servants. I just noted that they added up to this figure, and I did not know whether this blue book meant what it said. I have one other question. It has to do with the bond issue and it is just one simple question. Does the minister know of any time in the marketing of Canadian bonds where a commission such as one per cent was paid on all or any part of a bond issue?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I had those figures this afternoon and I gave them to the hon. member. I referred to the fact that the costs of the savings bond issues of the last three years had amounted to one per cent. As a matter of fact, one of them was a fraction over that. Two of them were issued by the previous government. I must remind him that the figure which he is using, if he is talking about the Canada conversion loan on which I thought we had completed our discussion this afternoon, is not simply commissions. The figure includes the one-quarter of one per cent issuing fee. There are many cases of bond issues under the former government where the combination of commission and issuing fee has amounted to one per cent. For instance, I look back and I find this. I have already mentioned the Canada savings bond series No. 11 which was issued under the former government. That was put out on a commission of three-quarters of one per cent plus an issuing fee of a quarter of one per cent, making an aggregate of one per cent. Here is a previous Canada savings issue, No. 10, where the same rates apply. Here is a previous Canada savings bond series, No. 9, where the same rates apply. Here is Canada savings bond series, No. 8, and the rate there was higher. In that case the commission paid by the government was .87 per cent and the issuing fee was a quarter of one per cent making an aggregate of 1.125 per cent.

Mr. Denis: What year was that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was 1953. It was well within the period of the former government.

Mr. Pearson: Just to clear this matter up, will the minister tell us what is the maximum commission plus issuing fee in this recent conversion? I refer to the commission plus issuing fee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought we were over all that this afternoon.

Mr. Pearson: The minister must know the answer to that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I put it on the record this afternoon. It is all there on the record, the commissions—

Mr. Pearson: Plus issuing fee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. I referred to the issuing fee this afternoon. The issuing fee is one quarter of one per cent.

Mr. Pearson: And the maximum commission?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I gave the commissions on the various series. The commission on the 3¼ year 3 per cent bond is a quarter of one per cent. The commission on the seven-year bond, the 3¾ per cent bond is one half of one per cent. The commission on the 14-year 4¼ per cent bond is three-quarters of one per cent. The commission on the 25-year 4¼ per cent bond is one per cent. But I pointed out also that the commission does not apply to a very large block of the conversions and with respect to the conversions of all the larger subscriptions—1,200 of them—they go on the exempt list where the rates are one quarter of one per cent on the 3¼ year 3 per cent bonds and a half of one per cent on all the others. Because of the averaging, that brings the total rate down to a point where the cost averaged out in this way, including commission and the issuing fee, will be less than the percentage of cost in respect of commission and issuing fee in respect of any of these recent Canada savings bond series.

116. Administration of the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Veterans' Business and Professional Loans Act, the Fisheries' Improvement Loans Act and the Prairie Grain Producers' Interim Financing Act, $110,213.

Mr. Howard: I believe that under this vote comes the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. We discussed this matter in not too much detail on the estimates of the Department of Fisheries but I should like to suggest to the minister that the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act needs a bit of revision, especially in so far as the provisions applying to native Indian fishermen who are resident on a reserve. They find a great deal of difficulty in getting loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act from the banks because native Indians are not considered to be able to put up the required collateral. Invariably the Indian fishermen of whom I know who want to buy gill netters or to build a gill net boat and who need money for this purpose find that the only place where they might be able to get financial assistance is the fishing company for whom they may be working. This is a most unfortunate state of affairs, as the minister probably knows, for once a person becomes indebted to a particular company, especially if that person is a fisherman, it is most difficult to get away from the clutches of that company. There are many details of the act which require to be changed but I think one of the most important things in so far as native Indians are concerned is a revision in order that Indians may be able to borrow money under the act, if not from a bank then from a credit union; if not from a private source then through some treasury source.

I hope the minister will take this matter into consideration and will study the act to see whether or not it is possible to amend it so that native Indians will have a better opportunity to themselves finance their purchases and reconstruction of boats.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the hon. member that his remarks will be noted and that the matter will be considered.

Item agreed to.

122. Cost of telephone services at Ottawa for all departments, $1,287,000.

Mr. Pearson: I would just like to draw something to the attention of the minister. If I am correct this involves an increase of about $48,000 and I cannot help but recall the days when we were in office when the minister used to single out this item as one which should always be cut and he always asked, "Why are we spending so much money on telephones?" It is now $48,000 more.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think this was one of my favourites. I recall that it was a favourite of one of my colleagues and I think the Leader of the Opposition is confusing us, but may I remind him that the telephone services of all government departments are charged to this government line and to the Department of Finance. It is a burden which this department has to carry for all other government departments.

The increase is to cover general expansion of telephone facilities, increase in equipment, rental and salary assessment on Bell Telephone services in the Ottawa area. The government consolidated the Bell Telephone system, which now includes the main switchboard in the Bell Telephone building and the automatic switchboards at the experimental farm, Rockcliffe and Uplands airports. The Uplands switchboard was inaugurated late in 1957 with interconnections to each of the other switchboards. Service charges for the 1958-59 fiscal year are reflected in this estimate.

Mr. Pearson: I must apologize to the minister for mistaking him for one of his colleagues. May I say that this is a reasonable expenditure, in my opinion, even though it is $48,000 more.

Item agreed to.

University grants—

127. To authorize payments to the national conference of Canadian universities in accordance with the agreement entered into between the conference and the Minister of Finance on the 26th day of March, 1957, pursuant to vote 541, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1957, $17,100,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, on this vitally important item, I think that, in view of the stand taken by the province of Quebec, we should pause for a few moments to consider this matter of assistance to education, this assistance to universities.

We know that, in 1951, the Liberal party instituted a policy of assistance to universities by granting an average of 50 cents per capita and that it subsequently increased that grant. As early as 1951, there was unanimous agreement in this house on this subject. Indeed, we can see what the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) said at the time, by referring to page 5021 of Hansard. I quote:

(Text):

I commend the Prime Minister and the government for the speed with which they have dealt with this matter.

(Translation):

And here is what the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) had to say, as found on page 2633 of Hansard for 1951:

(Text):

—that the Prime Minister aroused high hopes on the part of Canadian universities.

(Translation):

And now, this is what Mr. Solon Low had to say, as found on page 4279 of Hansard for 1951:

(Text):

I say that we are very happy that the government is taking this step now to provide some form of interim assistance to the universities.

(Translation):

As can be seen from page 4279 for Hansard for 1951, the then member for Saskatoon, Mr. Knight, who had always advocated aid to universities, stated that this was a matter of prime concern to him and hastened to thank the Prime Minister for the good news.

This indicates that, in 1951, there seemed to be general unanimity among the parties represented in this house with regard to increased aid for universities. In 1957 the universities were still in such a position that the government of the day felt it had to do more and to grant a further increase of 50c.

There has been talk of urgency in respect of this matter. Here is what Mr. St. Laurent had to say on the subject. Before introducing this legislation he had stated, in a lecture delivered at the University of Toronto, and this is reproduced in Hansard for 1951, page 2633:

(Text):

I think many of us recognize increasingly that some means must be found to ensure our universities the financial capacity to perform the many services which are required in the interest of the whole nation.

(Translation):

In 1957, I note that the present Prime Minister himself made a rather significant statement which can be found on page 400 of Hansard, volume I. He said at the time:

I mentioned the need of Canadian universities. The need is becoming greater as the days go by. A survey was recently made to ascertain the degree to which universities in other parts of the world are dependent on grants from the state. In Great Britain 73.6 per cent of college income is from government grants. In the United States it is 58.6 per cent, and in Canada it is 42 per cent. More and more young and worthy students are being denied admission to university because they are unable to meet the ever-rising costs of tuition. In Canadian universities, of the total income today, or until the recent increase announced by the Prime Minister in November, 30 per cent comes from student fees. In the United Kingdom it is 10.7 per cent and in the United States it is 21.4 per cent. Unless action is taken to meet that situation it cannot but result in many outstanding and potential leaders in the sciences, in the arts, and in all the different phases of living, being denied an education; for more and more tuition rates are being raised and worthy students are finding greater and greater difficulty in proceeding to senior education.

At a national conference held in November 1956 in Ottawa on the crisis in the field of higher education in Canada, the representatives of Canadian universities, in a resolution passed unanimously, expressed:

The well-considered opinion that it was their urgent responsibility to warn Canadians that the problem of universities has become a critical issue of national importance which certainly hinders our development and our status as a nation, and that this problem can only be solved by the active and immediate assistance and co-operation of all government levels in Canada, with business, industry and private benefactors.

On May 10, 1951, Mr. Cyril James, vice-chancellor and principal of McGill University said, according to a report published in the Globe and Mail:

(Text):

A university education costs Canadian students more than in other countries.

A young Canadian from a family of modest circumstances has less chance of getting a university education today than a youth in any other country with which I am familiar.

He urged government to participate in the cost of education because work of the universities was of vital importance to the community, and government has not lived up to this responsibility in Canada during the last two decades, as far as education of civilians was concerned.

(Translation):

Mr. George Drew said this, which is found on page 4278 of Hansard of 1951:

(Text):

I am sure hon. members generally will welcome any measure of assistance given in this way to the universities of Canada.

(Translation):

The word "generally" referred no doubt to a very limited number of members, such as the then member for Labelle, now Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche), who was more interested in politics than in the welfare of students and their families, and of institutions of higher learning.

The present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) said, as recorded on page 488 of Hansard of February 19, 1951:

(Text):

I would like to say, however, that last year the resolution seemed to receive support from practically everyone who spoke, on all sides of the house. The same thing appears to be true today, so it would seem to me the time has now come to put an end to talk on the matter and let us have some action toward implementing it.

(Translation):

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) said also, as recorded on pages 484 and 485 of Hansard of February 19, 1951:

(Text):

I feel that some responsibility for education must be borne by the federal government, and I could give many reasons. One of the chief reasons is that the small provinces cannot today afford to give to their people the educational facilities to which they are entitled, or that they should have. . . . I am in wholehearted support of the resolution and I hope that for the interest of Canada and for the people as a whole, from one end of the country to the other, some means may be found whereby educational opportunities may equal to all people from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

(Translation):

I note that the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) said on December 1, 1953, as recorded on pages 506 to 509 of Hansard:

(Text):

What are they going to do about the problems that are facing universities in this country? Something must be done to maintain their strength, to enable them to develop, to enable them to go forward. In these days, owing to indirect action of the government, the high level of taxation and succession duties, universities are deprived of those moneys and private beneficence which at one time they used to get. I say it is the responsibility of the government to come to their assistance, and this is a reasonable proposition that is advanced by the presidents at the conference of universities.

(Translation):

I note on page 254 of Hansard of 1955 the following statement of the same minister:

The problem has increased alarmingly in the last few years. It is a problem, of course, which I am sure the government will have to look at in a far wider field within the next five to ten years, because we are just on the verge of a new problem with respect to universities.

He no doubt referred to the problem resulting from the increasing birth-rate and the large number of immigrants arriving in Canada.

And the same minister is reported as saying on page 5345 of Hansard, 1956:

Practically every university in the maritime provinces with the exception of one, is financed by private charity or by endowment.

For his part, Dr. Blair is reported as saying on page 5079 of Hansard, 1956, in questioning Mr. Gillis:

Is he aware that the universities have had to increase their fees and that some of the universities are running these courses at a loss? They are practically all running them at a loss. The hon. member made the statement they were in business. I cannot agree with that. They are not in business, and they are running these courses at a loss.

Mr. Low is reported as saying, on page 3401 of Hansard, 1956:

Yes, in another ten or twelve years the universities are going to be in exactly the same position. In fact, they are feeling the impact right now. Certainly we should look forward and make provision ahead of time for these heavy burdens that will have to be carried.

As for the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue)—the present house party leader of the C.C.F., reference to page 346 of Hansard, 1955, will show that he complained that the prime minister yielded to the Quebec premier's strait-jacketed nationalism to the extent of denying education to the other provinces.

As you can see, Mr. Chairman, sympathy is manifested on this matter by both sides of the house.

Furthermore, Monseigneur Lussier, rector of the University of Montreal, said that if a final solution was not found to the university problem, the universities would become bankrupt.

Those are the remarks of people of experience, people with a university background who appreciate what is done by the universities.

I state then that the government can be congratulated on having provided a further increase of 50 cents in university grants. This is a matter of prime importance.

To those who seem to feel that we in the province of Quebec who form the largest minority in Canada should stand apart from the others, I will say that in every country where there is a minority it is absolutely essential that that minority be intellectually superior to the majority to become equal to it in other fields. That is why we should consider that matter, not in so far as it concerns our own personal future but in so far as it involves that of generations yet to come.

The constitutional issue has been raised. On this point we all agree that section 93 of the constitution is clear and unequivocal and that it does vest the provinces with exclusive jurisdiction in the field of education.

What is the field of education? Does it mean putting up buildings? Does it mean scholarships awarded for supplementary studies? I believe that the "exclusive right in relation to education" means that the province, alone, shall exercise supervision. That is it: to supervise so that the subjects taught be in accordance with the needs of the province. There, in my mind, lies the problem. And as long as provinces maintain their authority with respect to the working out of school curricula, no constitutional problem can be said to exist. The mere fact of granting sums of money to facilitate the building of schools does not mean encroachment on the field of education and is not contrary to the spirit of section 93 of the British North America Act.

And besides, in that field—

Mr. Chairman, every time we say anything to the point, I see that the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) shakes with laughter, thus displaying the value of his culture.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) said, page 273 of Hansard for 1952. I apologize, but I have only the English version and could not find the other version.

(Text):

For instance, let us consider education. Education is the exclusive field of the provinces, granted to them by the British North America Act. While every province has always kept a jealous watch over its autonomy in the field of education, we, in the province of Quebec realize that it is the very foundation of our racial and religious survival,—

(Translation):

And the hon. member for Three Rivers continued:

(Text):

—and the population of the province of Quebec will never give up on that point. No doubt the federal government, with its millions in surpluses, will put forward very tempting offers of direct subsidies. They should know, though, as the leader of the opposition so well put it, that what the provinces need in this connection are not horse traders' gifts, but merely the respect of those ideas which served to inspire the fathers of confederation.

(Translation):

And, at pages 2543 and 2547 of Hansard for 1952-1953, the hon. member for Three Rivers said that education must be left entirely to the provinces; here is what that same member stated on another occasion that same year, at page 762 of Hansard:

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, like all other hon. members who have spoken on this subject, I am greatly alarmed by the difficult situation which the Canadian universities are in at the present time. Like all other hon. members in this house I have the greatest respect for my own alma mater, namely Laval University. I can easily picture all the problems that face this great institution at the present time, having regard to the increase in the cost of living, the increase in the cost of materials, and various other difficulties which the authorities of this great university must face at the present time. However, I am sorry to be the only voice so far which has been raised against this vote.

(Translation):

Therefore, the hon. member for Three Rivers, when he sat in the opposition, was opposed to the payment of grants to universities on the ground that such grants are unconstitutional and a violation of section 93 of the constitution of Canada. Later on, the hon. member for Three Rivers said—I quote from page 770 of Hansard for 1957:

Mr. Chairman, before recess I was stating my opposition to this item although, like other members of the house, I recognize the difficulties faced by Canadian universities. Quebec universities face such difficulties as do those of other provinces, and provincial governments have to make great efforts to help them.

However, he stated that he was going to vote but that he could not approve the appropriation for assistance to the universities in the 1957 estimates.

And according to the official record of 1951 —p.p. 905 to 908—the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche), said the following:

(Text):

Better known as the Massey commission, it (the royal commission on national development on the arts, letters and sciences in Canada) could more accurately and more realistically be described as the royal commission for the promotion of centralization in Canada. There is no point in trying to hide the truth: the investigation in itself was a breach of provincial autonomy, as are also the attempts to implement various recommendations inconsistent with our constitution, incompatible with the sovereigny of the provinces.

(Translation):

There again in the same speech, the hon. member for Labelle objected and categorically refused to vote in favour of estimates earmarked for assistance to universities, with the excuse that such action would be unconstitutional, and in this, being in the opposition, he was going against the wishes of his then leader, Mr. Drew.

Yet, on the same constitutional issue, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith), who was then president of the University of Toronto had this to say:

(Text):

Dr. Sydney Smith, then president of Toronto University, is reported in the Globe and Mail of May 7, 1951, as follows:

He noted that it cost the university $1,000 a year to keep one student in an art course. Yet the student pays a fee of $240.

Answering any argument that education is a provincial matter and therefore the federal government should keep out of it, he produced statistics which showed that 20 per cent of the 100,000 living alumni of the University of Toronto are in other provinces. The university is therefore making a national contribution. The same is true of all other Canadian universities.

(Translation):

Now, I should like to refer to the testimony of Mr. Cyril James, and I quote from page 512 of the 1953-54 session:

On the question of provincial rights, the brief said flatly: "There is no control of education, no infringement of provincial autonomy in the grants."

It said that: "Neither the members of parliament who voted unanimously for the grant, nor the universities of Canada which were equally unanimous in accepting it, entertained the remotest idea that the federal grant carried any implications of control."

The possibility of any future danger to provincial rights is obviated by the presence of a provincial representative on the joint federal-provincial commission which administers the grants, it added.

Then, further on we find this:

Dr. James said the land grant to Manitoba university was cited "because many men who participated in the confederation discussions were still active at that time."

And further:

..."it has never been suggested that in making such gifts the donors were legislating with respect to education"...

Similarly, while the Quebec government cannot legislate with regard to education in France, it nonetheless contributes generously to the Canadian students' house in Paris "and provides equally generous scholarships for students wishing to study in French universities."

And still further:

"It is difficult to see how the legality of such federal grants can be questioned without similarly calling into question a wide variety of governmental practices, provincial as well as federal, which have been part of our accepted tradition for many years."

Mr. Cyril James is an expert in the field of education, a man whose opinions generally carry much weight and I think he spelled out the problem as it should be when he said that no control in matters of curricula was implied. Moreover, he pointed out that the province of Quebec granted scholarships to students for studies in Paris, while at the same time giving assistance to the student house in Paris.

The Quebec government has done all that, and it claims that other governments do not have the right to intervene by offering grants to the provincial government itself, and I remember commending it for grants made to the university of Ottawa, to the St. Boniface college in Manitoba as well as to a college in the maritimes. This was excellent. I do not feel that in doing so he recognized that he was under any obligation to ask the Manitoba government, or the Ontario government or the various provincial governments in the maritime provinces for permission to grant subsidies or grants in aid to education.

Indeed, the present Prime Minister himself said on page 648 of Hansard for 1952 and I will quote only briefly:

(Text):

Simply paraphrasing a slogan of another day, the attitude of this party is: federal assistance ever, federal supervision never. That sums up our attitude on this matter.

(Translation):

That is why I am not in the least surprised to note that the present government has seen fit to increase those grants, in the face of ever increasing difficulties. In fact, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce stated, as will be seen on page 632 of Hansard for 1952:

(Text):

The answer lies in adequate financial support for education, with the federal authority providing the additional assistance that the provinces require—The provinces, unless blessed with unusual natural resources, are unable to maintain from their restricted fields of direct taxation the services required. Some people consider that federal support for education means inevitably federal control or interference. Ottawa should not be allowed to grip any part of the provincial educational system. Education is of national concern and merits support from the federal treasury. Education is not just one among many competing welfare services. It is basic to the development of a democratic society. Education is a right which should not be denied any child in Canada. Opportunity for higher education should be the privilege of every Canadian boy and girl.

(Translation):

And the minister concluded with these words:

(Text):

Present interest by the federal authorities can be increased and present federal aid to education can be enlarged without curtailing provincial jurisdiction and responsibility.

(Translation):

And the same minister also said, as will be seen in Hansard for the same year, page 632:

(Text):

The federal government has established a pattern of assistance without control and is showing an interest in education. Education is of national concern and merits support from the federal treasury.

(Translation):

Further, on page 625 of Hansard for 1952, we can read the following remarks made by the present Minister of Transport:

(Text):

Now, I believe that the federal government should make funds available on a sliding scale to help equalize the opportunity for education between the provinces . . . It would not be my intention that the federal government should take any part in the policy or administration of education. This field belongs to the provinces alone.

(Translation):

In the same debate the Minister of Veterans Affairs stated:

(Text):

I do not think for one moment that the federal government could or would interfere with laws made by the provinces concerning education. It is my belief, however, that this provision in the British North America Act is concerned chiefly with the curriculum and administration of the schools. We can still give financial aid and in no way interfere with the administration of the laws of the provinces.

(Translation):

Mr. George Drew also said, as can be seen on page 584 of the official record of the house for 1951:

(Text):

I would point out, however, that ways have been found of assisting in different fields, including the field of education, without in any way interfering with the division of constitutional responsibility.

(Translation):

I will refrain from giving other quotations because I see that my time is running out. Indeed, I could quote several people who expressed the opinion that the federal government should step in the field of education because provinces cannot alone bear the whole cost of it. All levels of government and business institutions should get together in order to give assistance.

In fact, I note the following remarks made by Mr. Knight, as taken from page 3445 of Hansard for 1956:

I know that education is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. I agree completely with that view so far as administration and curricula are concerned.

And that is the important point because, when the curricula are protected by the provinces, the federal government may intervene, give grants and even increase them, without encroaching on the field of education.

Mr. Maurice Breton, former member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, had this to say, as taken from page 394 of Hansard for 1953-54:

Education is what we are interested in. Let us consider the matter. Evidently, under section 93, the federal government could not set up a system of education in the province of Quebec or in any other province: it could neither create boards of education nor establish school curricula. All such things come strictly under provincial jurisdiction.

But does the wording as written mean explicitly that the federal government is not authorized to intervene, even in the interest of public order and good administration of the country, and give, without restrictions and unconditionally, to a public body in need the necessary grants to enable it to attain the purpose for which it was set up?

Mr. Chairman, I see that I have nearly run out of time and I hear some hon. members—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon you permitted the minister to continue for an hour and a half. Should I not be permitted to go a little further?

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for allowing me a few more minutes.

An hon. Member: Two minutes!

Mr. Caron: I said a few minutes. I know that the hon. member who has just interrupted me could not deal with that subject for more than two minutes owing to his state of mind but I have a lot more to say.

[Mr. Caron.]

Mr. Chairman, we know that it is not the first time that the federal government has given assistance in the field of education. In fact, in 1913, the federal government, led by Sir Robert Borden granted a sum of $10 million for agricultural schools. In 1919, under the government of Sir Robert Borden, a sum of $10 million was voted to help technical schools. In 1939, the government led by the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King granted a sum of $4,500,000 to help our youth.

In 1952 the Liberal administration approved a grant of $51 million under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act.

In 1951 the federal government made $7,500,000 available through a grant in aid to universities.

As you will note, these subsidies are by no means new. This is no recent policy. Indeed, we have seen that this has obtained for a considerable time.

Referring to the people of Quebec the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) made a few remarks which I felt I had to contradict in some respects but which were, in fact, quite true in others. These may be found on page 121 of Hansard for 1955:

The people of Quebec are suffering. They are subjected to double taxation and they are not enjoying the facilities in the field of education which they would like to have, which they ought to have and which they deserve as Canadian citizens.

In support of his arguments, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam referred to the survey that Mr. Enfield, then Liberal member for York-Scarborough, recorded in Hansard, on January 10, 1957, in connection with the total aid which the various federal departments had given to the provinces in the field of education. A study of that survey indicates that in 1955-56 the province of Ontario received $7,228,000, while the province of Quebec received only $2,952,000, which represents an enormous difference as compared to the other provinces. Actually, Quebec cannot afford to refuse the subsidies, because the population there is in need of education which the province is unable to provide.

I shall now refer to some excerpts of another survey recorded in Hansard by Mr. Knight, which indicates that in the province of Quebec, the cost of elementary and high school amounts to $139.48 per pupil, while in Ontario it amounts to $190.82.

The same survey shows that there were 1643 unqualified teachers because the school boards could not afford to pay higher salaries. That survey also showed that among pupils reaching grade 11, 9.4 per cent only are French-Canadian Catholics, while 41.8 per cent are Protestants, which shows that the situation that prevailed in 1947 has not changed very much.

It must be realized that it costs a man $1,300 a year, if he does not live in a university town, to send his son to the university. If we take the case of a father of five or six children, earning between $4,000 and $5,000 a year, how will he manage to give all his children the education which will permit them to fully develop their ability? He will have to ask certain members of his family to make enormous sacrifices so that the others may carry on their studies. Is it fair to ask a father in the province of Quebec for such a sacrifice when it is not requested of the head of a family in other provinces?

Grants where given to a provincial government should necessarily be subject to certain conditions. If the grants were made by the federal government, let us stop our fruitless fights, because we are losing precious material. Human values are being sacrificed to small party politics.

We must educate our men. They will then know how to defend the real rights of provinces and minorities. Let us eliminate true or false ignorance—and I am addressing myself more particularly to the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay)—and the threats of extinction will forever disappear, when we create enough men of good will to ensure mutual understanding. Only at such time will we be able to speak of a Canadian nation united in its diversity.

Mr. Chairman, I will conclude on this note. We are at this time concerned with an item which we are asked to approve by the Minister of Finance. I support that item, knowing as I do that our universities and educational institutions need assistance. They require that increased assistance which the federal government has just introduced. However there are some gentlemen who, during the last general election, in the province of Quebec, were quite content to leave the universities to struggle with their difficulties and preferred to see their own fellow citizens grow in ignorance rather than accept those measures of relief which would allow them to get ahead in the intellectual field. I was just wondering how they were going to vote on this measure.

There is talk of disappearance of race and religion. However, if the race was to have disappeared, it would have happened back in 1760, at a time when there were very, very few of us, a small group of rather uneducated people. At this time, however, we make up more than one fifth of the population of this country and if we refuse these university grants, we will endanger the very life of our province. Some day we will have to go along with the rest of Canada, as long as the federal government does not interfere with the educational program of our province. I know, Mr. Chairman, that we must reach that point some day and I therefore ask that a vote be taken immediately on that item.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: All those in favour of vote No. 127 will please rise? Those opposed will please rise?

Item agreed to: yeas, 105; nays, 0.

Mr. Peters: It is 10.30, Mr. Chairman.

Loans, investments and increase—

503. Loan to the Ottawa Civil Service Recreational Association, on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve, to assist in the construction of the W. Clifford Clark Memorial Recreation Centre, $300,000.

Mr. Howard: I point out, Mr. Chairman, that it is well past 10 o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the committee be willing to go forward and clean up the remaining items, Mr. Chairman? There are just about 10 items left altogether, including the supplementaries. I think there is nothing there that is controversial now.

Mr. Howard: Are these the further supplementary estimates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an item in loans and investments, and then there are the supplementaries.

Mr. Howard: We could precipitate a great deal of extra debate on these matters, and I would just as soon leave them over until tomorrow.

The Deputy Chairman: Since there must be unanimous consent to continue, I shall rise and report progress. Tomorrow, we will be starting on vote No. 503.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the leader of the house could tell us what the order of business will be for tomorrow. I presume the bill of rights comes first tomorrow. Can he tell us what will be the order of business afterwards?

Mr. Green: As I understand it, there will be speeches by the leaders of the three parties on the first reading of the bill of rights. When we get down to the orders of the day we shall commence with item No. 2—

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it proposed to have those speeches before orders of the day are reached?

Mr. McIlraith: There is introduction of bills.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know. But would the minister consider having orders of the day called first before the speeches?

Mr. Green: I am not in a position to say that tonight. I do not know that it makes very much difference. But according to the order paper these speeches would be made on the first reading. Then we shall take item No. 2, second reading of a bill to amend the Customs Act; item No. 3, a bill to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act; and then the completion of the estimates.

At 10.34 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

PRIVY COUNCIL

Federal District Commission—

672. To provide for interest charges on outstanding loans that were made for the purpose of acquiring property in the national capital district, $120,000.

LOANS, INVESTMENTS AND ADVANCES

Privy Council—

Federal District Commission—

694. To provide for loans to the federal district commission (hereinafter called "the commisson"), for the purpose of acquiring property in the national capital district that is not immediately required for the purposes of the commission; the loans to be made in such amounts and on such terms and conditions as the governor in council prescribes, except that when a property so acquired has been commenced to be used for a purpose of the commission, an amount equal to the cost of acquisition of the property shall be repaid from the national capital fund or other fund or account from which expenditures may be made for the purposes of the commission—further amount required, $4,500,000.

124. Government contributions to pension plans for employees engaged locally outside Canada, $100,000.

125. To provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for supplementing other votes for the payment of salaries, wages and other paylist charges, $1,500,000.

126. To provide for the government's contribution, as an employer, to the unemployment insurance fund in respect of government employees paid through the central pay office, $900,000.

University grants—

127. To authorize payments to the national conference of Canadian universities in accordance with the agreement entered into between the conference and the Minister of Finance on the 26th day of March, 1957, pursuant to vote 541, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1957, $17,100,000.

Miscellaneous grants—

128. Canadian association of consumers, $10,000.

129. Institute of public administration of Canada, $6,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 5, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF ORDERS OF THE DAY OVER INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

On the order:

Introduction of bills—The Prime Minister—Bill intituled: An act for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, last night the suggestion was made that first reading of this bill should be delayed until after orders of the day. If members of the house wish that course to be followed the government is quite agreeable.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

U.S.-CANADA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF JOINT MINISTERIAL COMMITTEE ON DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table an exchange of notes between the Canadian and United States governments concerning the establishment of a Canada-United States committee on joint defence. Hon. members will recall that the Prime Minister informed the house on July 11 of the agreement reached in the course of the visit of the President of the United States to Canada to establish a joint ministerial committee with authority to consider all matters bearing on the common defence of the North American continent. The exchange of notes which I am tabling today simply records the formal agreement of the two governments in this matter.

The decision of the two governments to establish such a joint ministerial committee stemmed from the recognition by both governments of the need to supplement existing channels of consultation in the defence field. It is intended that the committee will give periodic consideration not only to the military aspects of our common defence but also to the political and economic factors bearing on defence problems.

REPORTED SALE OF MILITARY AIRCRAFT TO U.S. FIRM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure to which minister I should address this question. Perhaps in the circumstances I might address it to the Prime Minister. I regret not having been able to give him notice but the matter was just brought to my attention. It arises out of a Canadian Press dispatch of September 4 to this effect:

Two Mustang fighters were flown out of Calgary yesterday as the vanguard of nearly 100 Canadian fighter planes which have been disarmed and sold to a New York group. . . . The planes have been sold by Crown Assets Corporation to J. H. DeFuria and F. J. Ritts of De Witt, N.Y., for an undisclosed sum. Included in the purchase are more than 40 Sea Furies only recently taken out of active Royal Canadian Navy service. Eventual destination of the planes is being kept secret.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether in fact this sale of 100 planes has been made and what steps have been taken to ensure that these planes do not reach an undesirable destination.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. gentleman had been able to give notice so I would have been in a position to give a complete statement. However, I will do that tomorrow and go into detail. Whatever sale was made was as a result of the property in question being declared surplus to the corporation. With respect to the latter part of the statement, I may say that every course will be followed to assure that the undesirable end to which the hon. member has made reference will be prevented.

COMMUNIST CHINA—REPORTED STATEMENT ON USE OF FORCE BY U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a session-ending question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement issued by President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Foster Dulles warning the government of China that the United States may use military force, including possible bombing of the Chinese mainland, if necessary to protect the islands it considers essential to the defence of Formosa; and in view of the minister's assurances on August 25 and August 30 that the Canadian government has made no commitment to become involved in the dispute between the communist government of China and the Chinese nationals on the offshore islands, can the minister indicate how unilateral action on the part of the United States government would affect Canada and its arrangements under the NORAD agreement? Can the minister inform the house whether the government has made representations to both parties in this dispute? Has the minister any information he can give to the house with respect to developments in this most disturbing situation?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I came into the house I received a copy of the question which the hon. member has now addressed to me. I would observe that the hon. member is seized of the situation and that he is quite correct in using the word "may", that the United States "may" use military force.

Coming to the question "can the minister indicate how unilateral action on the part of the United States government would affect Canada", may I say that I stated in the house, as the hon. member observed, on August 25 and 30 that we have made no commitment in respect of any dispute or conflict in the Taiwan straits. In addition to that, I would say that unilateral action on the part of the United States would not involve Canada in any possible conflict in that area.

With respect to the second part of the question I point out to the house that under the earlier co-ordinated air defence scheme in North America as well as under NORAD, our air force defence squadrons would be called upon to defend Canada against an attack on Canada by hostile aircraft.

With respect to the third question, I can tell the house that I have no information to give about the situation in the Formosa straits in addition to what has appeared in the newspapers. I can assure the house that we are keeping in close touch with the various capitals with respect to this situation.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): If I may, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary question because of this grave emergency and great danger to world peace. Will Canada consider making representations to both nations in opposition to any acts that might result in a global war?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): May I ask for an elaboration of that question, Mr. Speaker. What does the hon. member mean by "both nations"?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Argue: By "both nations" I mean the United States and red China.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): In reply to that question I would say that, as is well known in the house, we have no representation in red China. With respect to the United States, we have made our position very clear and we share with that country, and this has been explicitly expressed, their grave concern about the situation and the appreciation of the great need for restraint.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

REPORTED MOUNTED POLICE SECURITY GUARD IN WEST BLOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister inform the house as to why a most unusual procedure is followed, in that after six o'clock in the evening a member of the R.C.M.P. acts as security guard inside a government building on parliament hill, namely the west block? Why do employees of the House of Commons and Senate whose offices have been there for many years now have to sign in and sign out after six o'clock, though engaged in the work of the Senate and the House of Commons? Why, sir, do members of the House of Commons, keeping an appointment after six o'clock in the west block, have to be interrogated by the R.C.M.P. as to their business there, and sign in on the entry book before they are allowed to keep an appointment? This happened to me, sir, last night.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): This is a very interesting question. There may be many implications, but unfortunately it does not come under the Department of Public Works. We have not yet taken over the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Winch: I understood that all the buildings came under the Department of Public Works. I think, sir, that indirectly the matter of security and the employees of parliament comes under you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement of the minister, may I redirect my question now to the Minister of Justice?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, the hon. gentleman may redirect his question to me, but I cannot give him a complete answer at the moment. I was not aware until now that any member of parliament had been stopped. I shall have to look into the matter and see what the instructions are which have been issued to the security guard before I am able to answer. I shall do that right away and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Winch: Since when have the R.C.M.P. taken over the job of security in these buildings?

Mr. Fulton: That has been the case for some time. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are not in charge of security inside the centre block where the houses of parliament actually meet, but it is my understanding that for some time the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been in charge of security in the other buildings, that is the east and west blocks. I know that ever since I have been here I have been accustomed to seeing a mounted police constable at the door of the east block.

Mr. Winch: I am speaking of inside the building, not outside.

Mr. Fulton: The constable stands inside. The security staff or the protective staff of parliament operate only in the centre block, to my knowledge, and the security arrangements for the other buildings are not under the control of the protective staff of the house or the Senate.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have your indulgence to mention one fact. There seems to be some confusion about what the particular point is. The point concerns the House of Commons administration. Hon. members know that part of the west block was set aside for the use of the House of Commons staff, and it is the interference with the work of the House of Commons staff and the members in the performance of their duties that is at issue, as I understand it. This is quite a different thing from the point raised by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all; the point raised by the Minister of Justice was that, as I understood it, for some years the east and west blocks have been using the security services of the R.C.M.P. To my knowledge there has never been previous objection to that. If hon. members find that questioning by the R.C.M.P. in the west block is not acceptable, then I think—

Mr. McIlraith: That is not it; that is part of the House of Commons administration. It should be the protective staff.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member would permit me to complete the answer, I have just pointed out that this is the first time, to my knowledge, that the point has been raised or that anyone has found it objectionable. I was going on to say that if that is the case—if there is objection—then it seems to me I might have a discussion with His Honour, Mr. Speaker, about the matter and perhaps with the leaders of the parties to see if the present system is satisfactory or whether some other system might be worked out in so far as that portion of the west block is concerned which is assigned to the House of Commons staff.

Mr. Winch: I must not be misunderstood. The point is that there has always been a commissionaire at the door of the west block, and now there is an R.C.M.P. constable inside the door of the west block. Now, for the first time in history, the civil servants who have to work there at night because we are sitting have to sign in and sign out and state their business. Why the sudden change? That is all I am asking.

TRANSPORT

SAULT STE. MARIE—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN SUBWAY CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the subway now under construction at the Wellington street crossing of the Algoma Central Railway in Sault Ste. Marie stand to benefit to the extent of 80 per cent of the cost out of the grade crossing fund, as provided in the legislation passed at this session?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask this question. I have been in touch with the board of transport commissioners, who advise that the order approving construction of the subway on Wellington street was issued on January 22, 1957. As was made clear in the house when the estimates of this department were being considered and when the bill was presented, the legislation recently passed increasing the grant that may be made from the grade crossing fund does not apply to projects that were approved prior to January 31 of this year.

IMMIGRATION

WILLIAM HEIKKILA—POSSIBLE DEPORTATION FROM U.S. THROUGH VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the strong possibility that William Heikkila will once again be deported from the United States through the port of Vancouver, would the minister say whether the Department of Citizenship and Immigration will assume custody and control of that person or of any similar person during his or her temporary stay in Canada?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): This, of course, is a hypothetical question. The hon. member probably is aware, or should be aware, that the department is not responsible for the custody of such persons. The responsibility for their custody lies in the hands of the United States authorities, and they make their arrangements with the local police.

C. G. HANNA—INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSITION OF APPEAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I might ask the hon. lady if she would say whether the appeal of Mr. Hanna has yet been disposed of?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I do not think so. If it has been disposed of, this has happened so recently that I have not received any word of it.

TRADE

OIL—STATEMENT ON REPORTED EXTENSION OF U.S. IMPORT QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, several days ago the hon. member for Assiniboia asked me to comment on a press story which attributed to Mr. Weeks, secretary of commerce of the United States, certain remarks about United States policy regarding imports of oil.

We have been fully informed by the government of the United States about its plans to reorganize regulations respecting the import of oil into the United States east of the Rocky mountains, so far as those plans have progressed to date. Since the press report to which the hon. member referred Captain Carson, the administrator of the oil import control program, has announced that there will be no change in the import quotas until the beginning of 1959. In the interval the proposed new arrangements will be published to enable interested parties to make representations, in the light of which the United States government expects to put the proposal into final form.

I can assure hon. members that the Canadian viewpoint will be kept before the government of the United States at all times.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): As a supplementary question, may I ask whether the minister is able to tell from the information he now has whether the United States move is directed at increasing or reducing the so-called voluntary 15 per cent reduction of imports? In other words, is what is now being done in the United States a further danger to Canada or is it likely to be of assistance to us?

Mr. Churchill: I am not sure that I can give a complete answer to the hon. member's question, but the information I have received is that the Canadian position with regard to the export of oil to the United States is not endangered.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask as a supplementary question whether it is the intention of the government to put this matter on the agenda of the first meeting of the United States-Canada ministerial committee on defence?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, that will be taken into consideration.

BRIDGES

TRAIL, B.C.—STATEMENT ON PROPOSED SECOND BRIDGE ACROSS COLUMBIA RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked the following question:

> Will the minister inform the house when the department of public works of British Columbia filed plans with his department for a proposed second bridge across the Columbia at Trail, and would the minister also inform the house of the developments to date with respect to approval of those plans?

The answer is that on August 13, 1958, an application under the Navigable Waters Protection Act was received from the department of highways of the government of the province of British Columbia in respect of a highway bridge proposed to be built over the Columbia river at Trail.

The proposal is being studied by engineers of the department and we are awaiting a report from the district officials.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEASURE TO RECOGNIZE AND PROTECT HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-60, for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

He said: Mr. Speaker, because of the circumstances which have arisen, the lateness of the session and the desire of hon. gentlemen to have this matter given the fullest possible consideration, I propose on this occasion simply to follow the course that was taken in the first session of 1957 by the then prime minister, Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, and I shall refer to the bill in some detail, with the permission of the house.

Thereafter views will be expressed by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Assiniboia as the leader of his group and this measure will then remain until next session, to be introduced at the earliest possible date after full representations have been received from those organizations and individuals in our country whose interest over the years has been directed to the necessity for a bill of human rights and fundamental freedoms in our country.

I would be less than frank if I did not say that in introducing this bill I do so following years of endeavour in this regard, years of representations in which were joined others who were then in the house and by two such members in particular, Mr. M. J. Coldwell and Mr. Croll, who is now a member of the other place. I believe the introduction of this measure marks an important day for all Canadians, since it represents the attainment of a goal to which many had looked forward. It is a measure with respect to which, from 1942 onward, I have spoken in this house from time to time, and in support of which I have moved resolutions on a number of occasions.

To draft such a bill has been difficult. The desire has been to keep it strictly within the constitutional powers of the federal parliament. Its aim and purpose has been to give to parliament the opportunity of removing any future danger to the fundamental freedoms of our country, danger which has not been unapparent in the past.

The aim has also been to clothe this bill in simple language. I know there will be criticism of it in that regard, but I would point out that from the earliest biblical times those charters of freedom which have taken their places as landmarks in man's march to liberty, including the Gettysburg speech, were declarations of the rights of man phrased in vital but simple words; for, sir, human rights and fundamental freedoms require no grandiloquent words to contribute to their greatness and importance.

Today what I shall do is underline some of the steps that have been taken during the years in the advocacy of the need of a bill of rights, the necessity for a bill of rights, and the terms. Then I should like to refer to one or two matters for the purpose of assuring that the record in this regard be kept clear, to answer questions that will naturally arise such as why was a constitutional amendment not asked for rather than embodying those rights in a statute; what will happen to the other freedoms that are part and parcel of our constitutional rights which are not specifically included; what are the provisions in this bill that will assure the maintenance of the security of Canadians in the event of war or other similar national disasters?

This bill of rights and its form represent action to be taken by parliament to carry out one of the major principles of the charter of the United Nations which was designed to assure international co-operation and to ask for the promotion and encouragement of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

I said this represented the first step toward the achievement of what has been in the minds of Canadian people for many years. Indeed, two petitions were brought to parliament during the years 1947 and 1948, signed by 500,000 in one case and by more than 700,000 in the other, asking for legislation to assure the maintenance of fundamental freedoms in the federal jurisdiction. To that end two committees of parliament were set up which dealt at very great length with the issues, the needs as well as the suggested draftsmanship.

I would like to refer to the divisions of this bill. It consists of two parts, the first being the bill of rights as such. It makes very clear that this bill is entirely within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament. It states:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights and fundamental freedoms—

May I paraphrase those freedoms. They are the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law; the right of the individual to protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex; freedom of religion; freedom of speech; freedom of assembly and association; and freedom of the press.

I would point out that radio as such or broadcasting in general is not included, because freedom of the press has been defined as including freedom respecting broadcasting. Then in order to make doubly sure that there shall never be a challenge in the future there is provision which states that all the acts of the parliament of Canada enacted before or after the commencement of this portion of the bill and all orders, rules, regulations and laws in effect in Canada or in any part of Canada at the commencement of this part which are subject to be repealed, abolished or altered by the parliament of Canada, shall be construed and applied so as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe any rights of human freedom.

Then as to the rights of the individual; the right not to be subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; to be deprived of one's rights; to be informed as to the reason for his arrest; of his right to retain and instruct counsel; also the right not to be deprived of any right except after a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice; the right of an individual to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal for the determination of any criminal charge.

Then in so far as habeas corpus is concerned no one shall be deprived of the remedy by way of habeas corpus for the determination of the validity of his detention or his release if the detention is not lawful.

Then, sir, because of the fact that the United States and many other jurisdictions have adopted bills of rights since the United States did so by the first amendment to the constitution, so as to assure that other fundamental freedoms which are not specifically designated shall not by reason of their absence be considered to be non-existent there is a provision in part II which says:

> Nothing in part I shall be construed to abrogate or abridge any human right or fundamental freedom not enumerated therein that may have existed in Canada at the commencement of this act.

This section is placed in the bill to meet the situation to which I have already made reference. A similar section was recommended by the committee of parliament presided over by Senator Roebuck as necessary to meet the situation to which I have just referred.

Then during time of war provision is made, in keeping with the experience of the United States and also the practice and procedure in the United Kingdom, that in so far as the War Measures Act is concerned the effective sections in question, 3, 4 and 5, shall come into force only upon proclamation of the governor in council declaring that war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended, exists. Then in order to maintain the supremacy of parliament, provision is made that the proclamation declaring that war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended, exists shall be laid before parliament forthwith after its issue or, if parliament is not sitting, within the first 15 days thereafter.

In other words, while experience has shown both in the United Kingdom and in the United States that in time of war rights on occasion have to be placed in pawn as security for victory, that decision hereafter must be made not by the governor in council but by parliament, thereby restoring to the representatives of the people the right to declare whether or not, for a period to be designated during the progress of war or an international catastrophe similar thereto, any rights shall be deprived except in consequence of the act of parliament.

I mentioned a moment ago that I would refer to the need for a bill of rights, for there are those who say there is no need. I read recently that the Leader of the Opposition had taken the stand that there was no need. Well, I point out that all across this nation, as a result of experiences which I raise not for the purpose of controversy but simply as a requisite in order to ascertain whether there is a need, there has been a widespread demand for action of this kind in order to preserve and maintain rights against the invasion of an all-powerful state, and I refer at all times to the federal government and federal parliament.

The Canadian constitution, it is said, grants us those rights. Well, our constitution is largely made up of the British North America Act although there are traditions, liberties and prior statutes that are part and parcel thereof as well as that unwritten heritage which is ours. Under the British North America Act it is stated that the Canadian constitution is similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, but in the experience of the past it has been shown that this declaration does not in any way preserve and maintain fundamental freedoms or those civil liberties and human rights that should be binding on the parliament of Canada. I have here "Charters of our Freedom" prepared by the late Professor Trotter, in which he defines the question of civil liberties in these words:

> Civil liberty, or liberty of the person, means one's opportunity to live his own life free from arbitrary or illegal interference by government, or by other persons, with his movement, conduct and opinion. Enjoyment of such freedom by the members of a community can never be complete, for the very laws that safeguard the individual's liberties can do so only by placing restrictions on all persons to prevent them from conduct harmful to one another. Law guards the liberties of each of us by limiting the liberty of all. It must restrain even the rulers themselves in the exercise of their authority over their subjects.

There are many who contend that we do not need a bill of rights because parliament has in the past and can be trusted for the future to safeguard our rights and freedoms. But, sir, unfortunately that has not been the experience. The United States found it necessary to provide for a bill of rights after the constitution had been determined because immediately it became apparent that while fundamental freedoms were generally accepted as being part of the tradition and heritage of the United States and the original colonies, there were such invasions as made action necessary. Thomas Jefferson contended that it was far better and was the only safe course to have safeguards for personal freedom on the statute books than to trust to the discretion and whims of a majority.

History also reveals that few governments with large majorities want at any time to have their power restricted. I expressed that view sitting on the other side of the house on March 24, 1952. I repeat it today because then I was in a small opposition and today I am on the government side of the house with no small membership. Experience has shown that freedom is not always safe in the custody of an overwhelmingly powerful government supported by an overwhelming majority. Large parliamentary majorities do not always ensure omnicompetence in the preservation of freedom.

I want to refer to several examples in this regard, not for the purpose of bringing up the past but simply to provide enlightenment for the future. In December, 1945, some months after hostilities had ceased and without reference to parliament, three orders in council were passed and declared to be valid by the judicial committee of the privy council, which would have exiled to Japan some 7,000 people of Japanese origin, a large proportion of whom were Canadian citizens. The fact that the privy council said that this could be done, that it was lawful, following the end of hostilities indicates the need of some restraining influence and the declaration of some principle to assure that there shall not be repetition in the future.

On October 4, 1945 an order in council was passed which swept aside habeas corpus, which denied the right of an individual to counsel. Whatever the merits may have been of the action taken, events then and subsequently established that an invasion such as that of a primary fundamental right can be made by the parliament of Canada or under order in council.

As a further example I might cite the Foreign Exchange Control Act. Provision was made under that act that anyone who in the opinion of an official had broken the law, whether or not there was any justification, however illegally he was treated, had no right of recourse to the courts. Finally that was changed. It started under order in council, strong objection was raised here in the House of Commons, and a change was made in the law, Mr. Speaker, to provide that if illegal actions were taken under this act the individual had a right of recourse to the courts; but whatever his loss, whether it amounted to $10,000 or more, the amount he could recover in the courts in the event of his success was nominal damages of $1 and no costs.

Now, these are just examples. I am not covering the ground, but I am laying the basis for an argument that there is a need. There was an order in council passed setting up a committee to investigate Eldorado. The commission had the power to examine, legally or illegally, lawfully or unlawfully, and to deny an individual who was charged or examined the right of counsel, at the same time denying any right of appeal. Unless restrained, Mr. Speaker, the pathways of power lead to the degradation of the rights of individuals. We are all human and Lord Acton's famous aphorism, sometimes misquoted, that absolute power corrupts absolutely is true whatever your party affiliations may be.

Then in December, 1945, there was introduced the transitional powers bill, subsequently withdrawn but none the less within the power of parliament, whereby the cabinet was asking, by order in council, for the complete control of property in Canada; the forfeiting of property at its will; the control of transportation by railway, water, road and air; and control over business in Canada. Subsequently alterations were made in that bill. It was withdrawn and a new bill was substituted, but those are indications of what will happen when you have a powerful parliament unless there is an overriding declaration to preserve the rights of the individual.

I can think of another example, and I opposed this but I am not saying the stand was correct. I am not here to judge. Legislation was introduced in April, 1946, which provided that from then on no transportation company in Canada could operate civil air lines. This legislation went through, but later on it became inconvenient. There was not an order in council passed, but there was a minute of council passed that operation of the statute, which had become law, should be postponed.

I might cite another example. Again I say I am mentioning these cases merely as a basis for answering those who say that a bill of rights is not necessary. In 1946, a Mr. Oatman started an action against the wheat board for certain rights which he claimed. The case came finally before the court of appeal of Manitoba. He was then in a position to launch an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not know what the merits of the case were, whether he was right or wrong, but he was a Canadian who had the right of appeal to the courts. An order in council was passed denying him the right to appeal to the supreme court; indeed, it denied anybody else the right to commence a similar action, or to continue an action which he had legally started.

There are many other cases here before me, but I shall not make reference to them now. They do support the stand taken by the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association, representative of 97 per cent of the English and French newspapers of Canada, that experience of the past had shown that a bill of rights was necessary and ought to be brought into being. Bruce Hutchison, writing in 1947 between May 30 and June 3, used these words:

> —the people and parliament of Canada are beginning to think that safeguards are necessary because, in recent times, basic human liberties have been infringed in this country.

He said at another time in the same series of articles:

> Thus, after assuming for 80 years that liberty was safe in Canada without any sure legal guarantee, parliament has been compelled to realize that liberty has lately been infringed by the state in a fashion unforeseen by the framers of our constitution. The infringement as yet is small, but it can grow. The purpose of a bill of rights is to make sure that it does not grow.

I have here as well the views of one who, like Mr. Hutchison, has not been known as a supporter of the party to which I belong. I refer to Professor A. R. M. Lower of Queen's University. In an article entitled "Some reflections on a Bill of Rights", he pointed out the need for a bill of rights on the basis of past experience.

If it is accepted that there is a need, then the next question that arises is this. Should it be by a constitutional amendment? I pointed out at the beginning that we in parliament have certain powers under the constitution. I have referred to some of the things that took place which are unchallengeable. Should it be by statute or by constitutional amendment? If it were a constitutional amendment, that affected only the federal jurisdiction, it could be passed by both houses of parliament and would be subject to repeal at any time in the same way a statute could be repealed.

May I digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, and say this. If a statute is passed by parliament, the experience of the past has been that subsequent parliaments are extremely loath to make any changes in a declaration that provides for freedom on behalf of the individual. In any event, if a constitutional amendment were passed affecting only the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, it would be subject to repeal at any time by a vote of both houses as would a statute. On the other hand, I realize that there are many who feel that there should be a constitutional amendment binding on the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures.

All I have to say in that regard is this, Mr. Speaker. Let us clear our own doorstep first. In so far as a constitutional amendment would be concerned, the experience of 80 years indicates very clearly that the provinces, jealous of their jurisdiction, would not support a constitutional amendment applicable to themselves.

A group of distinguished Canadians submitted their views on a bill of rights to the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons in 1947. The list of those who urged members of parliament of all parties to establish a bill of rights contains the names of Canadians in every province, outstanding and distinguished in their respective fields including educators, legislators, newspapermen, representatives of labour and of industry. Indeed, it is a group of names that reads like a "Who's Who" in our country. They suggested that it should be by way of a constitutional amendment binding on the national government and the provinces.

I have answered that suggestion. We do not intend to refrain from proceeding with a bill of rights effective in the parliament of Canada or to delay that step, postpone it and ultimately not achieve action, when we have available here the power, the right and the exclusive jurisdiction to bring in a bill of rights within the constitutional power and the legislative ambit of the national government. Again I quote from Professor Lower in this regard:

> The question to be initially faced is whether a bill of rights should be a simple statute or whether it should be a constitutional amendment. The latter is preferable, but at our Canadian rate of proceeding it will take many years to effect. A statute, on the other hand, is repealable. Yet such a statute would constitute a declaration of principle, it would give a text from which to preach, it would form one additional hurdle for parliament to take when it next consented to abrogation of civil liberties, and would make that abrogation a much more solemn thing than it has hitherto been.

I am not going to refer in particular to the authorities on the division of power as between the federal government and the legislatures in respect of this subject. There have been a number of them in recent years. It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, to note that there was never a case in the privy council at the time when it was our supreme law body wherein an interpretation was given of the constitutional division with respect to civil rights. Some recent cases are the Saumur case, (1953) 2 Supreme Court Reports, 299; the Winner case, (1951) Supreme Court Reports, 887 which deals with interprovincial jurisdiction; the Birks case, (1955) Supreme Court Reports, 799; and the Switzman case, (1957) Supreme Court Reports, 285.

However, in reading these authorities one feels that the question as to the division of the constitutional power over fundamental freedoms has as yet been far from interpretation and delineation. That is another reason why we, proceeding in parliament to bring about the achievement of fundamental freedoms, must scrupulously respect whatever provincial jurisdiction exists in reference in whole or in part to this matter.

As I said a moment ago, a constitutional amendment which was passed by parliament in so far as those rights are concerned and which would permit of such a declaration being made by the federal parliament would be subject to repeal as is a statute. A constitutional amendment that went ahead and did not have regard to provincial jurisdiction whatever phase of provincial jurisdiction was concerned, would simply be declared ultra vires in so far as it infringed upon provincial jurisdiction. It is for these reasons that we have determined that the course to take is to place before parliament a statute covering those freedoms which are within the jurisdiction of parliament in so far as the laws that are passed by parliament in the days ahead are concerned, or that have been passed heretofore.

In the past there have been those who have stated that a bill or rights would make ineffective that unity of action which is necessary when our security is challenged in war. That matter has been covered by the section to which I have made reference, which gives to parliament, representing all the people, the right to take positive action when and if those freedoms must be infringed upon. Britain has had similar experience and in her tradition for freedom has followed a similar course. It is interesting to note that the bill of rights of the United States, in so far as fundamental freedoms are concerned, covers only those freedoms which are subject to legislation by congress. That is something which is often forgotten. In other words, the United States congress cannot legislate on the preservation of human freedoms except those which come within the ambit of the congress of the United States. The later provisions dealing with the civil rights of individuals and constitutional amendments may be construed as applicable to individual states, but the initial ones dealing with fundamental freedoms are entirely within the jurisdiction of legislation which can be passed by the United States congress.

I mentioned habeas corpus, and I referred to an instance when it was swept away by a simple order in council. It is well to understand the position taken by Britain and by the United States in this regard. In the United Kingdom the habeas corpus act has been suspended by the British parliament. It was done in 1715, in 1745 and in 1794; it was done with respect to Ireland in 1881. This was done in each case by an act of parliament, a suspending act of a temporary nature only, and it was followed in each case by an act of indemnity to protect the executive. In the first and second world wars there was no form of suspension of habeas corpus, but wide powers were conferred on the executive by the defence of the realm act and the emergency powers act in 1914 and 1939 respectively.

In the United States the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when, in the case of rebellion or invasion, public safety may require it. In 1863, when it was suspended, congress authorized the president to suspend the writ and the delegated power was exercised not only by President Lincoln during that war but by President Grant during the reconstruction period.

Sir, if parliament passes this statute it will be taking a step, a major step, forward to stop the erosion of the rights of the individual within the jurisdiction of the national government. It will do more than that. I do not wish to repeat what has been said on other occasions, but I think the house will allow me to quote from my words in 1947, and, in the light of the intervening years, this still constitutes my point of view. At page 3152 of Hansard for May 16, 1947, I said:

> What would a bill of rights do? It would establish the right of the individual to go into the courts of this country, thereby assuring the preservation of his freedoms.
> A bill of rights would be a contract between the individuals of Canada and the government of Canada. It would assert the right of the individual; it would assert the right of a minority to be protected in the exercise of its rights, against the majority. It would, above all, assure that each of us would have a legal right to be heard in the courts of this country.

Then in 1952, as recorded at page 720 of Hansard for March 24 of that year, I said:

> A bill of rights would deny the right of any majority to interfere with my serving God as my conscience demands. It would deny the right of any government to interfere with my right to speak or write so long as I did so within the law.

Later on I had this to say:

> A bill of rights would redefine the landmarks of liberty, which are almost erased as a result of the pathways of war becoming the permanent highroads of peace.

When I say that, sir, it is not in criticism of any political party in this country; it is a simple statement of fact. A similar situation arose in the United Kingdom because those pathways which are short-cuts in wartime are so easy to maintain that they tend to become the permanent institutions of peace.

A bill of rights would do something more; it would make parliament freedom-conscious. It would make parliament realize that rights are to be preserved. It would make parliament more cautious in passing laws that would have the effect of interfering with freedom. It would act as a landmark by means of which Canadians, through parliament, would have redeclared those things which have made Canada great. It would preserve those spiritual wells in legislative form without which freedom cannot survive. It would give to Canadians the realization that wherever a Canadian may live, whatever his race, his religion or his colour, the parliament of Canada would be jealous of his rights and would not infringe upon those rights which are dear to us all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The cynics will say it does not go far enough. It is a first step. As the Chinese say, every journey by mankind, even a journey over a thousand years, begins with just one step taken by some individual who sees the possibilities for the future and tries to make it possible to equalize the opportunities for those of his own generation. This bill will not do everything, but I do think fair minded Canadians will agree that it is a major step forward.

I can only hope that Canadians as a whole will give to parliament the benefit of their suggestions and ideas in the next few months so we shall be able to make such amendments in the bill to be presented to the next parliament as will still the heart stirrings of those who fear for freedom in our country, assuring always the maintenance of the constitutional rights of provincial jurisdictions.

It will be a landmark as well for Canadians. Realize this; that henceforth, except within the limitations that security demands, Canadians will know that their rights are not to be loosely disregarded, and parliament will have before it at all times the warning which is emphasized in this bill of rights, namely that fundamental rights and freedoms within the federal jurisdiction shall not be made light of by this or future parliaments.

I shall say no more at this time. I hope we will be enabled next session to discuss this question again fully and completely, and that out of the counsel of parliament and the representations of our fellow Canadians, whatever changes should be made in this bill of rights can be made in the bill then to be presented, always assuring that it shall be constitutionally within the powers of parliament and in no way can transgress the constitution.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house will have listened with the interest which the importance of the subject demands to the words of the Prime Minister in introducing this bill. I am sure that hon. members on all sides will approve the procedure which the government has adopted with regard to it, that is, giving it first reading in the closing hours of this session and then submitting it for examination and consideration at the next session of parliament.

There can be no more important questions than those of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and no questions more appropriate for parliamentary consideration. The existence and the free exercise of human rights and freedoms are the very roots of our democratic life. When these weaken, society becomes stagnant and finally servile.

It is of course true, as the Prime Minister has said, that only preliminary consideration by three members of the house can be given to this bill at this time, and no detailed analysis seems to be called for now. But, as the Prime Minister himself has indicated, it needs very careful study indeed. I am the more impressed by the necessity of this because, to me at least, it seems a little ambiguous and unclear in places, and its effect, especially in part II, might be other than is intended. It is also unclear in my mind as to the overriding effect of this bill on other legislation which might follow and the influence it might have on such legislation. That, of course, remains to be determined.

For instance, what would be the relationship of a bill of this kind to a bill which would give the governor in council power to take citizenship away from a Canadian if upon the report of a minister the governor in council was satisfied that such a Canadian did not at the time of taking the oath of allegiance intend to comply with that oath? Yet that is in a bill which we will be discussing immediately after this one. It is therefore very difficult to come to firm conclusions as to the contribution this bill can or should make to the objective we all have in mind, the more complete and the more assured protection of human rights in this country, than which, of course, there could be nothing more important.

As the Prime Minister has said, we will all have a chance to give a more considered opinion on this matter at the next session of parliament. Today, therefore, I shall confine my remarks to the general objectives of the bill which we on this side fully and warmly support, and to the general problem of the preservation and strengthening of fundamental rights and freedoms in our Canadian democratic society. I will try to treat this subject, and that objective, in the non-partisan and rational manner which its nature warrants.

In discussing fundamental freedoms there is one which is not usually enrolled with the others but which, in my view, should guide our consideration, namely freedom from illusion. We have to approach this subject, if we would approach it constructively, free from illusion, though not, I hope, free from ideals. Let us ask ourselves first, then, what is the present situation in Canada with respect to our rights and our liberties, and I am talking now about the rights and liberties of the individual, without which there can be no rights and liberties of the state. What is our heritage in this matter? Are our rights and freedoms threatened and, if so, what can we do about it?

Those who talk about rights and freedoms usually refer, and quite rightly, to their parliamentary and democratic foundations in the United Kingdom as something we have inherited and something which can protect us, as something very precious which is ours both in law and in custom. And, of course, this heritage is a matter for Canadian pride and satisfaction.

The two British contributions to this heritage which seem to be an indispensable part of every speech on this subject are Magna Carta and the bill of rights of 1688. But it is interesting, as an illustration of how things can develop in a way which was never intended, to realize that Magna Carta when signed was a feudal, not a people's, declaration or charter. The rights and liberties which it embodied were those which the feudal lords demanded only for themselves against a despotic king. It had no provisions which gave rights or protection to the people, and no thought of promoting their democratic progress. The law to be observed was feudal law, and the liberties to be guaranteed were feudal franchises.

So far as the 1688 bill of rights is concerned, it did not proclaim or guarantee abstract rights or enunciate lofty democratic principles. It was a strictly practical document designed to ensure that governmental abuses of arbitrary monarchs should not recur.

In the light of history what, then, is the importance in political and democratic development of documents such as Magna Carta and the bill of rights? What meaning has this development and such documents for us in Canada? Their importance lies not in what these things meant at the time, but what they were made to mean by later interpretation; in the slow progress toward popular and democratic rights, progress which would certainly have been most strenuously opposed by the barons of Runnymede and by the gentry who overthrew James II. Those documents became a symbol, and therein lies their importance for the future.

Therefore we ask ourselves, can this declaratory bill in its present form, and in our federal system, become such a symbol when the very limited authority behind it to deal with civil rights is specifically recognized in its own terms? Or—and this is another question—will this recognized limitation, enshrined in a federal statute, make progress perhaps more difficult, rather than less difficult, and hinder rather than help the effort to ensure that all Canadians, wherever they live and under whatever jurisdiction they may be, will have certain basic rights and fundamental liberties guaranteed to them, rights which cannot be diminished let alone destroyed by any legislative process from any Canadian source apart, of course, from temporary and necessary surrender during a period of war or national emergency.

That surely, Mr. Speaker, is the ideal we must seek to realize while preserving the constitutional rights of every province; while preserving also the necessity, which is a primary one but which can be abused, of ensuring the security of the state. Therefore I ask again, does this bill make any advance toward this realization? Can we do more, and how? Before we can even try to answer this question we have to consider a matter which the Prime Minister has touched on, namely the position in our country in regard to jurisdiction over these matters.

Where does the constitutional authority lie in our country to deal legislatively with civil rights and fundamental freedoms? Where lies the duty to protect and to strengthen, and the power to limit and perhaps restrict them? Does it lie in the parliament of Canada or in the legislatures of the provinces, or is it divided between them?

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is no easy question to answer with any precision, to find an answer that will cover all the circumstances. Certainly the judgments of the supreme court are not clear on the matter, though it may well be that important decisions will be made before long by that court in cases that have reached it or may in due course reach it.

The preamble to the British North America Act, which was quoted by the Prime Minister states that the provinces are united into one dominion "with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom". Deductions have been drawn from this and impressive legal arguments advanced on it to give the federal parliament the same power over civil rights that is possessed at the present time by the parliament of the United Kingdom. Those deductions and arguments are not, I believe, confirmed by legal decisions or by constitutional practice.

After all, Mr. Speaker, the words quoted are from the preamble and not from the operative part of the British North America Act which, in terms in the operative part, gives us a constitution not unitary like that of the United Kingdom but federal, which distributes the law-making power between the central parliament and the provincial legislatures. As we know, section 92 (13) of that act gives property and civil rights to the provinces. Civil liberty and rights, therefore, it can be argued and with impressive evidence to support the argument, are in the keeping of both the federal and the provincial legislatures.

Therefore the power of parliament in this matter may mean not so much what can be done but who can do it. The courts must decide, of course, in cases of dispute which is the authority; but as I have said, our court of last resort—at least in the decisions that I have been able to study—are not very clear in this matter, at least not very clear to a layman. Parliament, incontrovertibly, does have power to make certain actions criminal offences, and this can protect civil rights. Parliament also has the broad authority under "peace, order and good government", but how far do those powers go?

The Prime Minister mentioned one or two cases. Perhaps I can mention one or two. In 1938 the Alberta press control law reached the supreme court, and three members of that court, including Chief Justice Duff, held that provincial legislatures could not limit freedom of association or of debate or of the press, and that these matters were substantially subject to federal control. But in another case the Prime Minister mentioned, the Saumur case, in 1953 five of the justices of the supreme court agreed that a province had some legislative competence in connection with freedom of religion; three, in fact, of the supreme court justices took the definite position that freedom of religion was a civil right falling within provincial jurisdiction under the civil rights provision of the British North America Act. Yet the majority of the court also refused to deny federal legislative competence in the matter, and three positively affirmed it. So where do we stand? Can our civil liberties and rights be restricted by provincial laws by giving those laws a property label? If so, where could this lead us?

[Mr. Pearson.]

On the other hand, can provincial jurisdiction be made subordinate to federal laws in this field by general application, protecting all Canadian citizens in the exercise of their fundamental rights, with punishment for those who offend against them? The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that we do not know, certainly not beyond doubt; and until we do know the question is bound to arise in our minds of the right of the parliament in Ottawa to legislate on matters which are in doubt and which are often claimed by the provinces to be within their jurisdiction. Perhaps "right" is the wrong word. Perhaps the question is more concerned with one of constitutional propriety.

The Prime Minister, as I shall attempt to show later, in the past advocated clearing up this matter by submitting a draft bill to the supreme court to determine its constitutionality, or by requesting an opinion from the court on the powers of the federal parliament in this field. This idea at the moment at least seems to have been dropped.

Another method would be a conference—and this has been referred to in debates in this house in the past—with the provinces for the purpose of seeking an agreement on this fundamental question, and afterward either to amend the British North America Act by including within it a bill of rights or to pass a bill of a less fundamental character with provincial agreement. Which of these two procedures one prefers will depend a good deal on whether one has more trust in the courts or in parliament.

There is one factor, though, that concerns constitutional amendments. If it were an amendment which covered all aspects of this question, covered all Canadian citizens in the exercise of all their fundamental rights, I believe I am right in saying that such an amendment could not be made to the British North America Act in the present circumstances except by the United Kingdom. Therefore we Canadians, in respect of a matter which concerns the rights and liberties of all Canadians, would have to go to another jurisdiction to amend our constitution to make that possible. That is something out of which no Canadian takes satisfaction.

These points, I admit, are not settled in the bill before us and it was not the intention of the bill to settle them, as the Prime Minister has pointed out. This bill is of limited scope and claims to be restricted to rights strictly within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, whatever that jurisdiction may be.

In this respect, Mr. Speaker, this bill inevitably falls short of other proposals advanced in parliament since world war II for the protection of the rights and liberties of Canadian citizens, including some significant ones put forward by the Prime Minister himself, one of which at least he mentioned this morning. Therefore, though it may only be a short look, I should like to look at the record of discussions on this matter that have been held in parliament. I will go back no further than 1945.

In that year a member of the C.C.F. party, the then member for Winnipeg North, made a frontal attack on the problem of the rights and liberties of the individual in Canada by proposing that a bill of rights be incorporated in our constitution as part of the British North America Act. Whether or not you agree with it, the C.C.F. took a clear-cut position on the matter then, a position which I believe they have maintained since. But that initial C.C.F. proposal was dropped in view of the fact that the government of that time was about to introduce a citizenship bill, and it was thought that there would be a discussion of this matter on that bill. But in the next year, 1946, the then member for Lake Centre, the present Prime Minister, advocated in the house a bill or declaration of rights either independently of or to be included in the citizenship bill.

In 1947 a joint committee of the house and Senate, to which the Prime Minister has referred, examined the whole matter, and there was a very interesting debate in the house on the resolution setting up that committee. The present Prime Minister had this to say in that debate, as found at page 3150 of Hansard for May 16, 1947:

> Declarations regarding freedom do not assure the practice of freedom; unless the right remains for the individual or the nation to have his or its rights established under law, they are but pious declarations.

For that and for other reasons, no doubt, he argued at that time that the proposed joint committee should seek the co-operation of representatives of the provinces so that, and I quote again from page 3152, "a comprehensive bill of rights might be evolved either by way of constitutional amendment or by statute." For that purpose, as he mentioned a few moments ago, he had himself drafted a bill for the proposed committee which would have provided, to use his own words, "the assurance to Canadians" of the basic freedoms which he enunciated. He made a very powerful speech on that occasion, and I should like to quote one more paragraph from it. As found on page 3158 the present Prime Minister said:

> A declaration of a bill of rights in this country would be a positive declaration on the part of men and women of all political faiths in their belief in civil liberties. Whether the federal authority has the power or not to pass legislation respecting civil liberties, its passage would strengthen the hand of the Minister of Justice in the matter of the disallowance of any statute which would deny freedom anywhere in our country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the joint committee met in 1947 and again in 1948 having, without very much success—I hope the Prime Minister will have more success between now and next session—attempted to secure opinions from the attorneys general of the provinces and the deans of the law schools on the matters before it. The provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Alberta, Manitoba and New Brunswick gave no opinion. British Columbia and Nova Scotia took the position that these matters fell mainly within provincial jurisdiction. Those deans of law schools who replied—I am not sure whether or not the Secretary of State for External Affairs was one at that time; perhaps he had advanced beyond that stage—in general expressed the opinion that the federal parliament's power was limited in this matter.

Before the joint committee the then deputy minister of justice, Mr. Varcoe, made the following interesting but very cautious statement, and I quote from his evidence to be found on page 32 of the proceedings of the committee:

> You pass a declaration respecting those rights. What is that? It may be treated as a resolution of parliament, a mere declaration of the policy parliament would like everybody to adopt. It would be the equivalent, you might say, of a resolution of the two houses. I am talking of a bill of rights containing no penalty provisions and no sanctions—

That is true of this bill.

> —but which is a mere declaration that individuals shall have those rights. No. 1, it may be treated merely as a resolution; No. 2, it may be said to be no statute at all because it does not produce any legal consequences. Not producing any legal consequences, you cannot tell whether it is under dominion legislation or not.

Mr. Varcoe went on to say:

> When you have a division of legislative powers, you look at an act and you say, is it good or is it bad? It is good, depending upon the purpose and effect of the statute. If it has no effect and no legal purpose, then there is no way of testing whether it is good or bad.

I admit that this is a very careful approach to this problem. At that time the present Prime Minister did not approve of this cautious attitude to any great extent, and that is understandable because of his desire to get something done. In the debate in the House of Commons on April 11, 1948, the Prime Minister had this to say as found at page 2846 of Hansard:

> Here we are a sovereign nation among the nations of the world and promising as a signatory of the United Nations to uphold fundamental freedoms as one of the principal prerequisites for the success of the United Nations; yet the minister's attitude—

He was referring to the Liberal minister of justice.

—tonight raises a doubt whether Canada even internationally can do that which all the nations of the United Nations undertook to do when the charter was accepted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has brought up something there that only he can answer. Having accepted the universal declaration of human rights in the United Nations which, I think I am right in saying, was submitted by most other democratic countries in the world to their respective legislatures, why was that declaration of human freedoms not submitted to the parliament of Canada?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the declaration of human rights of the United Nations has been accepted by Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I think I am right that the declaration has been accepted. If I am wrong I will be corrected. It took some years, but I think it eventually was accepted by Canada. In any event, our hesitation in respect of this declaration, and I know something about this, arose from the fact that it included matters that were strictly within provincial jurisdiction. Therefore it could not be accepted with propriety by the Canadian delegation without having all of the provinces accept at least those parts of it which entrenched on provincial jurisdiction, and that was not done by all the provinces.

The declaration, however, is one thing. The United Nations bill of rights, which is still under discussion is something else. We made it very clear at the United Nations and I have no doubt that the present government is taking the same position that the bill could not be accepted in its present form because it would be unconstitutional for us. However to get back to the debate of 1948, on the following day, April 12, the present Prime Minister also had this to say as found at page 2856 of Hansard:

Some say that the right of the provinces to abrogate and interfere with the fundamental freedoms is inherent in the British North America Act, although the preamble to that act states that our constitution shall be similar to that of the United Kingdom. Those who contend that these rights rest in the provinces aver that we in this country must be a balkanized Canada whereby an individual may enjoy certain fundamental rights in one province while in another they may be denied. It is that question of legislative jurisdiction that I am asking the government of this country to submit to the supreme court.

This was in 1948.

If it is the law, then it denies to the individual that Canadian citizenship which should be the result of the measure introduced by the Prime Minister in 1944. To say that in one part of Canada a Canadian may enjoy freedom of religion and of speech and of association, all those great and abiding freedoms, and that in another province a Canadian may not enjoy them, is a denial of the possibility that we shall ever build a United Canada on the basis of equality of the individual before the law in all parts of the country.

During this discussion in the House of Commons the present Prime Minister proposed the two steps I have mentioned, one of which was a reference to the supreme court to find out, if possible, what powers the parliament of Canada had in this field and, second, the setting up of a standing committee of the House of Commons on civil rights, together with a civil liberties division in the Department of Justice. Neither of these steps is proposed in the bill before us.

This joint committee reported in 1948. It produced a very interesting report which I should like to read, but I do not believe I shall take the time of the house to do so. Two years later, in 1950—the Prime Minister made a reference to this—the Senate appointed its own special committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms with Senator Roebuck, who has always taken a great interest in this field, as chairman. This committee took voluminous evidence and heard many representations. It then came to the conclusion that an effective bill could only be worked out with the provinces for incorporation within the constitution, but that as an interim measure a declaration should be adopted limited to those rights within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. This was the view of the Senate committee at that time, and I take it that is the view embodied in the bill before us.

Then in the next year, 1951, Mr. Coldwell, following the consistent C.C.F. attitude on this matter, moved a resolution in this house which went further because it proposed to include in the Canadian constitution, by an amendment to the British North America Act, a declaration of human rights and liberties. The present Prime Minister, in the second session of that year when the house was discussing a bill to amend the Supreme Court Act, had this to say as recorded at page 1561 of Hansard for December 4, 1951. In again advocating the reference of a draft bill to the supreme court he said he did so to find out "what if any of the fundamental freedoms are within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament".

He brought the matter up again in 1952 with a draft bill which could be used for this purpose. Then, leaving out the intervening years when there was some discussion in the house but nothing new of significance, we find that in 1955 the present Prime Minister again placed his draft bill before the house and requested that it should be submitted to the supreme court for an opinion on constitutionality. During that discussion, and I recall that debate, the then minister of justice, Mr. Garson, used these words:

> The introduction of this deceptively simple but rather emotional issue into such a complex field creates a problem which . . . is an extremely difficult one. It is the problem of superimposing a bill of rights, after the United States fashion, upon the federal constitution of Canada, whose main feature, inherited from the constitution of Great Britain, is the sovereignty of its legislative bodies—

Mr. Garson went on to say:

> Now this feat . . . has never yet been accomplished in any country in the world. I might point out just one of its difficulties. It is one thing to withhold from the provincial legislative bodies legislative powers when the constitution of a country is originally formed. It is quite a different thing to withdraw from the provinces 88 years later provincial legislative powers on the strength of which at least the original provinces could argue that they entered confederation.

He said that this was involved in the issue before the house, the effect of this kind of action, whatever form it may take, upon provincial jurisdiction.

In dealing with the question of the reference to the supreme court, which used to occupy the attention of my right hon. friend, Mr. Garson said that when a question of constitutional interpretation comes before the court it usually comes in the form of a statute that has been passed. The idea Mr. Garson was expressing then was that the court should be asked to consider legislation which would deal with overt acts and not broad enunciations of desirable objectives; in other words, to consider a statute that dealt with the specific ways in which the various freedoms might be exercised or with acts which would be regarded as interference with those freedoms.

Then Mr. Garson went on to something else, and I should like to say a word about this because it seems to me to be a very important aspect of the whole question. He pointed out then what I should like to point out today, that the basic freedoms are more highly regarded and more secure to the individual in Canada than in any other country in the world, with the possible exception of Great Britain itself. We have managed to achieve that position—I am not suggesting it cannot be improved upon—without any fundamental bill of rights. Mr. Garson asked himself the question, as I ask the house, why are these rights and freedoms secure? Of course there have been infringements of them. The Prime Minister has mentioned a few from 1945 onward, and perhaps I could mention a few from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to hear them.

Mr. Pearson: In Mr. Bennett's regime there were some things done by order in council to which my hon. friend might easily take exception. However, by and large, there is no country in the world in which human rights and freedoms are more secure than in our own. Mr. Garson attempted to answer the question why in this way:

> Because they are protected by the British principle of the sovereignty of parliament. It is this British principle which the hon. member for Prince Albert proposes to abridge by attaching constitutional limitations to it in the manner of the bill of rights in the United States constitution.

I am not suggesting that the position taken by the Minister of Justice at that time, in all its details, is the correct one. I am not suggesting that the position in regard to rights and liberties in this country is perfect. It certainly is not perfect in its federal or in its provincial aspects. But I am suggesting that by the method we have followed over the years we have built up in this country a respect for freedom, a respect for human rights, which is not exceeded in any other free country in the world today. So we have to look at any proposal bearing on this matter in the light of the experience we have had. We have to be very sure before we make a change that it is going to be an effective change, and a change in the right direction.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Before one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to deal with some of the legal and constitutional aspects of this question of civil rights and fundamental liberties, and to trace in a brief way the parliamentary discussions of this subject since 1945, discussions which showed how very complicated the question is, especially in a federal system, and how it is possible for one's ideas to develop and even change in the consideration of this matter.

Our basic constitutional structure in Canada that we have inherited from Great Britain is based on parliamentary sovereignty, the sovereignty of the legislatures within their own jurisdictions. A bill of rights can be passed by this house in the ordinary way, but if it is no part of our constitutional structure it can be repealed or amended any time parliament so desires. I am not underestimating the importance of the argument advanced by the Prime Minister, that the very existence of a bill of this kind, dealing as it does with such important matters, may give some assurance that it will not be interfered with by subsequent legislation. But parliament remains supreme in our system and in the power given to it in our federal constitution. Under our system—and I do not think we would wish to change it—there is no absolute protection against anything that a parliament or a legislature can do within its own jurisdiction.

Have we suffered from this situation in the past? Other countries with their written constitutions and their fundamental constitutional acts can and do talk a great deal about their fundamental rights not to be touched by ordinary legislative action and, if so touched, to be protected and restored by the courts. That is the theory behind their constitutions, and the theory of parliamentary sovereignty lies behind ours.

Certainly our parliamentary system is different. If parliament defines a civil right or an individual freedom today, it becomes law and he who violates it breaks the law. That is how we have built up our edifice of fundamental freedoms and human rights. By the same token parliament can redefine and restrict a right tomorrow. But this may seem to be a theoretical weakness. Who can say that a Canadian's rights without a bill of rights are not as well established or as well protected as those of a citizen of the United States in Alabama or in Arkansas, even with his constitutional guarantees?

The measure of our rights and liberties as Canadian citizens is the enlightenment, the tolerance and the good sense of our society as it expresses itself not only in laws and in administrative practices but in social behaviour, customs and conventions. A wise, mature and confident free society will be jealous and vigilant to ensure the rights of its citizens, even if there are no written constitutional guarantees for that specific purpose. A fearful or a subdued people under an arbitrary or reactionary government will have no rights to guarantee, no matter how many resounding bills it may pass or how many eloquent declarations it may make.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard at the United Nations, advocating human rights and fundamental freedoms with eloquence and vehemence, men who were representing states whose people were ground down by dictators or in one or two cases states which actually recognize slavery in their constitutions.

No, Mr. Speaker; rights and freedoms are not established or protected merely or primarily or often at all by proclamations of beliefs or written constitutions, but by the slow, sure building of a sound and progressive social, political and economic structure of law, justice and understanding. That has been the British way and it has worked there; and on the whole it has worked with us too.

Not only do constitutional acts or bills of rights even in free democracies not always ensure the individual of the rights and freedoms which we consider to be fundamental; arbitrary and just administration can defeat even beneficent laws and weaken the protection they are supposed to give. Furthermore, legislatures themselves and their members, even under the law, can prejudice and even destroy an individual's rights, debase his dignity and weaken his security by arbitrary investigatory processes ostensibly for the purpose of securing facts and opinions on which to base good legislation.

We have witnessed across the border legislative investigations that have degenerated into circuses or persecutions or even witch hunts. We have seen efforts made to destroy men's reputations, to violate their rights by sensational charges based on the flimsiest and most hearsay evidence, without anything approaching due process of law. There have been sordid exposures of some of the worst aspects of our democratic processes where representatives of the people have tried to fix guilt by association or assertion, by innuendo or false evidence, on those who could not defend themselves. No bill of rights in our neighbouring country was able to save some of these men. But an aroused public could and did correct many of these excesses and abuses.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did not the Supreme Court of the United States make some decisions?

Mr. Pearson: Yes; the supreme court did make some decisions in the United States and the courts have stepped in; but they have stepped in sometimes after the damage has been done to the rights and dignity of the person affected. Neither the court nor the constitutional law of the country was able to prevent that injustice from being done or to prevent these rights from being violated. I mention this merely to indicate that a bill of rights, unless it is constitutionally guaranteed, cannot of itself prevent these abuses, nor is there any cause for Canadians to affect smugness or superiority in this matter or to pass by on the other side with an "it can't happen here" attitude.

The debasement of our legislative process which, if and when it occurs, is one way to deprive the citizen of his rights, can happen in any free country if we are not vigilant and alert to prevent it. A parliamentary committee can become a threat to the dignity and value of this legislative process just as a congressional committee can; and no Canadian bill of rights here, any more than the bill of rights in the United States, even though hallowed by history, tradition and experience, could of itself provide a remedy. Therefore it is not only law, but it is prejudice, injustice, fear and misunderstanding which can be the greatest menaces to democratic rights and freedoms. Against these, and the bad or merely careless people who foster and exploit them, a bill of rights cannot save us. It can help, along with a vigilant public opinion and a free and independent judiciary, but it alone cannot save us. The remedy here lies in destroying prejudice and injustice, and in eliminating fear and misunderstanding. It is not enough to express an ideal in a bill, valuable as that may be; it has to be protected in practice. The rights and freedoms of a citizen must be in his heart, to be passionately desired and in his actions, to be deserved.

A venerable and great American, Judge Learned Hand, had this to say a few years ago in one of his essays:

> I often wonder whether we do not rest our hopes too much upon constitutions, upon laws and upon courts.

This gentleman is still one of the greatest luminaries of the judicial system on the other side of the line. He continued as follows:

> These are false hopes; believe me, these are false hopes. Liberty lies in the hearts of men and women; when it dies there, no constitution, no law, no court can save it; no constitution, no court and no law can even do much to help it. But while it lies there it needs no constitution, no law, no court to save it.

I agree with the Prime Minister when he said this morning that the dangers to rights and freedom are always present. He quoted Professor Lower I believe twice this morning, and I wish to quote another paragraph, from Professor Lower's book The Spirit of our Institutions, as follows:

> The conflict between liberty and order is never-ending and humanity oscillates between the two. Left to himself, the average man might show small concern for the common good, and anarchy would ensue. But it is equally true that, left to himself, the governor, be he civil servant, minister, or prince, would show small concern for the freedom of the average man, and despotism would ensue.

It is therefore today a wise instinct that causes us to sound the alarm that the individual's rights are in danger; it is a wise instinct that prompts us to seek ways of protecting them against the forces that would weaken them, against the growing demands and pressures of the state, and not only of the state but of the state within the state. This is a time of bigness but not always a time of greatness. It is an age of consolidation of smaller units into big ones in every sphere of human activity, of concentration of power and authority. Against this bigness, this power, whether exercised by government or outside of government, the individual, the little man of the cartoonist, is having a hard time to maintain, let alone to strengthen, his rights as a free man, to keep control over his own activities, indeed to retain even a sense of his own identity—so easily can he become lost in the complicated social and economic society of our time.

This, in a free society, is partly his own fault, and it is partly our fault. He has asked and we have asked for security along with freedom. Indeed he might say to himself, our little man, of what avail is freedom if it is only freedom to fight to survive in a jungle of competitive existence? While that may be true, it is surely utterly unrealistic to ask the government to do the things for the individual which he now considers essential in the interests of his social and economic security and, at the same time, to expect the government not to grow big and powerful in the process and not to interfere more and more with our normal activities. So, Mr. Speaker, we ourselves are responsible for many of the pressures on our independence and for much of the weakening of our individual rights.

When the demand of the citizen for security is stronger than his desire for liberty and rights, then we are in danger, and no bills or declarations or constitutional guarantees will save us. So let us not deceive ourselves. This bill of itself may not be able to do very much. It is limited. I am not quarrelling with that fact at the moment, but it is limited in more ways than constitutionally—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the hon. gentleman mean when he says it is limited in more ways than constitutionally?

Mr. Pearson: I indicated this morning, Mr. Speaker, that by inclusion in the bill certain things are reserved to the federal parliament and by implication certain things are left to the provincial legislatures, and therefore by this kind of definition perhaps there may be a limitation which we do not have in mind at the present time. I am not putting this forward as a final conclusion but I do suggest, as I suggested at the beginning of my speech, that this bill will bear a great deal of examination, the kind of examination it is going to get between now and the next session, it has limitations, but this bill could do two things, and I think the Prime Minister mentioned them this morning; one, it could become a target and an objective. If I may quote Professor Lower again, he had this to say:

> A bill of rights at least gives us a mark to shoot at. One recognizes, of course, that no document will preserve liberty if the people are indifferent to it. Still, crutches do help a lame man to walk.

I would not like anyone to draw the inference from that statement that we are lame men in this country so far as our recognition of rights and liberty is concerned, but I am sure we all understand what Professor Lower was getting at.

Whether the present bill is in all respects adequate or satisfactory for the purpose we have in mind is something on which no doubt we will be asked to express our opinions at the proper time; but I do agree, without any qualification, that we in this house should all co-operate to make this the best bill possible, one that will be worthy of the objective we all have in mind, one that will be received with acclaim and without controversy.

When we come to the detailed consideration of the measure next session we on this side will have some positive and, I hope, some constructive suggestions which may assist to this end. Suggestions were invited by the Prime Minister this morning. Second, a bill of rights submitted in this way, examined in this way, by the publicity it gets or by the publicity which is created for it, draws attention to the importance of the subject and prepares the way for the thorough and detailed consideration which must follow.

As a prelude to that consideration I have only three suggestions to make, one of which was put forward this morning by the Prime Minister on behalf of the government; first, that there should be the widest possible circulation of the bill to organizations which have shown an interest in this question and to individuals such as deans of law schools with requests for their views and comments; second, that there should be set up next session to consider this bill a joint committee of both houses with broad powers, including the power to summon witnesses; third, and this is something even more important that might be done, that we should try to secure the support and co-operation of the provinces for any Canadian action in this field. Indeed, as a result of consultation with the provinces it might be possible to widen the action so as to include both the federal government and provincial governments in a joint declaration on individual rights and freedoms. Then indeed we would have a powerful symbol.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are the hon. gentleman's hopes in that direction, on the basis of his own experience?

Mr. Pearson: I would not like to put my hopes either very high or very low, but I have learned over the years not to give up the search for an objective because it does not seem easily attainable, I am sure the Prime Minister has learned that too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If we attain the same degree of success it will be all right.

Mr. Pearson: So I suggest to the Prime Minister that the bill be submitted to the provinces for their comments, and that before the next session of parliament he should invite the provinces to consider whether their respective legislatures should not join with the federal parliament in a truly national declaration on human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? I am interested in the suggestion. If that course were followed and the reaction was unfavourable would the hon. gentleman not then feel that this was the proper course?

Mr. Pearson: It might be, depending entirely on the results of the approaches that were made. I am suggesting now that approaches should be made. I am not suggesting that if those approaches did not result in favourable action, the results should be made public. But surely if we in this country want the kind of assurance with regard to rights and liberties in which the right hon. gentleman is interested and which, in the federal sphere, he has embodied in this bill, or so he feels; if we are going to have that on a national scale to cover all jurisdictions, then at some time or other this approach has to be made. I am putting forward the possibility, at least, of making that approach in connection with all the interest which will now be raised in this matter through the introduction of this bill. Between now and the next session of parliament consideration will be given to it by private organizations and individuals. Perhaps it is not too much to expect that the provinces will also give consideration now to this fundamental question in the light of the move that is being proposed by the federal government.

In conclusion may I just say that on behalf of my party I have been honoured and privileged to speak on this subject today. Liberalism with a small "l", working as it so often has through Liberal governments with a capital "L", stands for individual rights and freedoms. Its very name implies that. It has always recognized, however, that with every right goes a responsibility and with every freedom an obligation.

For one hundred and fifty years, and in many countries, progress toward national freedom, social justice and political democracy has been associated with the eternal principles of liberalism. Here in Canada our party can take pride in its contribution to the realization of those principles in our national life and our national development. That contribution is on the record.

We have, I admit, been cautious over the years in relying more on concrete acts than on academic declarations. We have also, of course, recognized our own special problem of federalism in Canada in respect of rights and liberties, and we have on occasion had to reconcile the demands of individual liberty and national security in ways which did not please everybody. But on the whole I believe our record in this great work of protecting and advancing the rights and freedoms of our citizens has been good. We desire to keep it so, and that spirit will govern our consideration of this matter.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the C.C.F. party throughout the years has stood for a bill of rights guaranteeing basic human rights and fundamental freedoms. Our record on this question is clear and consistent, and as far as I know without blemish or mistake. Thus we are pleased to associate ourselves with any move that may mean progress toward that very desirable end.

Reference has been made to the many aspects of human rights and fundamental freedoms which are the subject of this bill; the right of the individual to the protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex; freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and of association, and freedom of the press. Those are the objectives or part of the objectives, of the measure; and to whatever extent this bill goes in guaranteeing those freedoms we give it our full support.

The march to freedom throughout the world is a difficult one. Along that road are many barriers and many heartbreaks, much tyranny and human suffering, but I believe that Canada together with the civilized—yes, with all the nations of the world—is moving in that direction.

If this bill of rights were as good as human ingenuity could make it; if it were as perfect as possible, the struggle for what it endeavours to guarantee would not be over. It is a continuing struggle, and if one read nothing else to learn of that continuing struggle than the speeches of the present Prime Minister over the years, one would know of that struggle. It is a struggle which is going on in the Canadian House of Commons very day of this session; it is a struggle that comes about because of our division—and this is what we like in our free society—into different parties and into different groups with different responsibilities and different powers. It is the duty of the opposition in a free parliament so to conduct itself as to assure to the greatest degree it can those human rights and fundamental freedoms of which we are now thinking.

There are perhaps two schools of thought on this question. One is that those freedoms can be the better guaranteed if they are written into a bill of rights or into our constitution in concrete terms. Then there is the other school of thought toward which the Leader of the Opposition seemed to lean, that such a bill perhaps is unnecessary, or that our freedoms are best guaranteed by a free parliament and a continuing free parliament, without going to the additional work of providing such guarantees in the constitution itself.

No matter which school one accepts, parliament itself must remain free. Of course the duty of maintaining that freedom rests to a very large degree on the governor in council. As the Prime Minister said this morning I know, because of his long experience in parliament, perhaps even because of his experience in the government, there is the temptation for the executive council to take the quick road and the short cut. Therefore it is the duty of all, including the governor in council, to keep this temptation in the background.

But there is also a duty, I suggest, which falls upon the private members on the government side of the house, and because the government has such a tremendous majority in this parliament that duty becomes all the more important. That duty is not always, without question, to accept the advice of anyone within that party, whether it be a member of the cabinet, the party whip or anyone else; but when occasion arises, when feelings and convictions are strong, party considerations should be left in the background. That applies to all members, I am sure, but I think the responsibility is heavier on the government members because of this particular situation.

This morning the Prime Minister, in painting the background, in reviewing the history of acts of government in the past showing that a bill of rights is necessary, went over a great many of the times the Liberal government had interfered with individual freedom.

He could have included in that survey times when a Conservative government has interfered with individual freedoms.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I find the position I have to fill today a very difficult one, not only because I am speaking after the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition who have had a much greater training and longer experience in this field than I, but also because of the record of the leaders of the C.C.F. party in and out of the House of Commons in the past. It was the first leader of the C.C.F. party, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, who himself became the victim of a government that interfered with his own fundamental rights as well as that of others. I refer to the experience of the Winnipeg strike in 1919, and the immediate passage at that time of amendments to the Criminal Code and the Immigration Act. The amendment to the Criminal Code, which later became known as section 98, remained until 1936. The amendment to the Immigration Act gave the government the power to deport a foreign-born citizen without recourse to the courts and a fair trial. These were two instances of a government which interfered with human rights and fundamental freedoms.

One could mention the interference by the R.C.M.P. in a peaceful meeting at Regina in 1935, which subsequently became known as the Regina riot. I was quite a young boy at that time. I was a country boy who felt it was a great event to be allowed to come to the city once or twice a year. I saw those unemployed men walking the streets looking for food, looking for jobs, with a sign on their backs, "On To Ottawa". When they gathered on the market square the R.C.M.P. were turned on them and a riot took place.

One could mention, as has already been mentioned, the Alberta press act, which endeavoured with little success, because of a reference to the supreme court, to interfere with the freedom of the press. One could also mention the interference that has taken place in recent years as far as the rights of members of Jehovah's witnesses are concerned. One could also mention the padlock law.

The Leader of the Opposition has said that Canada's record may be good. Undoubtedly it is good. Maybe it is second only to the record of the United Kingdom, but it is a record in which there is a good deal that none of us is proud of today. I know that all of us would seek to remove any discrimination against persons because of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex. I know it has grieved us all recently and at other times to learn of the discrimination that has taken place in the great country to the south, discrimination in regard to the rights of citizens of that country because of their colour.

I was surprised and disturbed to see reports of race riots in the city of London, England. We know that Canada's record is not completely good in this regard, that there has been discrimination in this country because of colour. We saw on television a few nights ago coloured persons who came to Canada from the West Indies, who said they experienced certain discrimination in looking for places to live and in seeking employment in our country. In recent years, as the Prime Minister has said, Japanese Canadians have been deprived of their property, have been dispersed across this country and their rights have been interfered with.

There are many people who could make a contribution in the place I am today much better than I can. One person, the late J. S. Woodsworth, I have already mentioned. Another person is Angus MacInnis, who sat in this house as member for the constituency of Vancouver East from 1930 to 1953, and from 1953 to 1957 as the member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

I do not know of anyone I have met who was more fearless or more consistent in his fight for human rights and fundamental freedoms. His was a voice in parliament against what was being done to the Japanese Canadians in the late years of the war and immediately after, a voice without fear even though many people in the province of British Columbia told him that it was a foolish and ridiculous stand for him to take from the point of view of his own political welfare. But without fear, yes, without concern for himself in a political sense, he fought against that discrimination, and I understand that he was recently honoured by the University of British Columbia conferring on him a doctorate of laws degree arising out of his great service to the Canadian nation, including his service in fighting for the fundamental rights and freedoms of all Canadians no matter the colour of their skin.

The Leader of the Opposition has said very fairly that a resolution was moved in the house in 1945 by the member at that time for the constituency of Winnipeg North, Mr. Alistair Stewart. The Prime Minister is on the records of the House of Commons in earlier years as advocating the same objective, but as far as I have been able to ascertain Mr. Stewart was the first member of parliament to present a resolution to the house on the question. This resolution, as set forth in Hansard for the second session of 1945 at page 900, reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, there should be incorporated in the constitution a bill of rights protecting minority rights, civil and religious liberties, freedom of speech and freedom of assembly; establishing equal treatment before the law of all citizens, irrespective of race, nationality or religious or political beliefs; and providing the necessary democratic powers to eliminate racial discrimination in all its forms.

This motion was dropped on the assurance of the then secretary of state, now the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), that some of the things Mr. Stewart had presented in his motion would be discussed and dealt with in a citizenship bill that was to follow. Similar motions were moved in the house by Mr. Stewart on many occasions. I think he set forth most vividly in a few words the meaning and purpose of a bill of rights. These words are contained in a speech he delivered in the house on May 16, 1947. As found at page 3161 of Hansard he said:

We realize that there are two paths ahead, either one of which we as free agents may choose to follow as we will. One path leads to heights of splendour yet undreamed of; the other to the darkness of hatred and strife. One leads to a realm where the human spirit will rise triumphant over the bigotries and persecutions of our age, where racial discrimination and intolerance of another's religious beliefs will be regarded as crimes against all mankind; where freedom of speech will be the inalienable right of every citizen; where men will no longer exploit their fellowmen for private gain; where every man will be the master of his soul. That is one path we can choose. The other path can lead only to that spiritual desolation to which our enemies would have consigned us.

I trust and believe that parliament and the people of Canada are choosing the first path. There has been a good deal of discussion of this question in the house and in the committee of the Senate, and certain suggestions have been made as to what course might be followed. In addition to the suggestions that have come from the Senate, one province of Canada has a comprehensive bill of rights—I refer to my own province of Saskatchewan—which is enacted to protect certain civil rights and which was assented to on April 1, 1947. The Saskatchewan bill of rights is comprehensive and is supported by all the people of Saskatchewan no matter what their political persuasion. It deals with these fundamental rights; the right to freedom of conscience, the right to free expression, the right to free association, the right to freedom from arbitrary imprisonment, the right to elections, the right to employment, the right to engage in occupations, the right to own and occupy property, the right of access to public places, the right to membership in professional and trade associations, the right to education—a rather complete act, and one which I think has served a very useful purpose.

I have said that the Senate inquired into the possibility and advisability of a bill of rights. In their report in 1950 they had this to say about a basic conception:

As a result of its inquiries, your committee is assured that there are a very large number of persons in Canada who are deeply interested in the subject of human rights and fundamental freedoms and that much thought has been devoted by our citizens to the subject. That every man, woman and child has rights is generally accepted as axiomatic and that such rights should be protected is a conviction as universally held.

Your committee also agrees with this view, holding that every human being irrespective of mere classifications on account of race, creed, sex, caste or colour, and other like distinctions has rights which flow from his divine creation. The brotherhood of man results from the fatherhood of God, and a fundamental equality among men necessarily follows. Such rights are not created by men, be they ever so numerous, for the benefit of other men, nor are they the gift of governments. They are above the power of men to create. They may be violated by men, but not with impunity. They should be recognized and every care should be taken to preserve them inviolate.

Professor Frank Scott, an eminent authority, appeared before the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on human rights on April 25, 1950. Professor Scott is head of the law faculty of McGill University. He is a recognized authority on the question, and we in the C.C.F. are proud of the fact that for many years he was national chairman of our movement. He is perfectly bilingual, and I know he has always in mind in all aspects the rights of the people of the province of Quebec as well as the rights of all other Canadians. He had this to say in part in his submission to that committee:

Despite these advantages in a federal bill of rights, I do not personally consider that it would be as valuable a protection for human rights and fundamental freedoms as a bill of rights written into the constitution itself by an amendment to the B.N.A. Act. This is where a bill of rights belongs, in the fundamental law of the land.

The superior advantages of this method of protection seem obvious. There is first of all no problem of dominion-provincial jurisdiction to consider; it is just as easy to enumerate rights under provincial as rights under federal authority, since ultimately the constitution must be amended to give the bill the force of law. All that need be decided is which rights we wish to safeguard. In selecting these, we have the great advantage of the international declaration of human rights to guide us, as well as the very helpful draft which was included in the terms of reference of this committee, and others that are available.

The committee seemed to be impressed with the submission by Professor Scott, in their report they suggest that the course he outlined should be followed. For a number of years in this house Mr. M. J. Coldwell moved a motion asking for a bill of rights in a certain form. I had the honour of placing this resolution on the order paper during this session as a private member's resolution. It was not possible, nor was it desirable, to have the motion moved in the light of the government's own legislation or proposed legislation in this regard.

This resolution, I believe, will be of interest to members of this house as well as to people who make a great study of this whole question. The resolution in part is as follows:

That in the opinion of this house, consideration should be given to the advisability of taking whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to include therein the following heading and sections:

XII Human Rights

148. Notwithstanding anything in this act, it shall not be lawful for the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of any of the provinces to make laws:

(a) Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.

(b) Depriving any person of life or liberty by arbitrary or abusive measures, or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws.

(c) Requiring or imposing excessive bail or cruel or unusual punishment or exiling Canadian citizens.

(d) Subjecting any person to unreasonable interference with his or her privacy, family home or correspondence.

(e) Subjecting any person to arbitrary arrest or detention or denying to any person the right after arrest to be informed promptly of the charges against such person and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.

(f) Suspending the right of habeas corpus or depriving any person of a fair trial or the right to be represented by counsel.

We have looked over this bill, and we can say that it is not as comprehensive as we had expected and is not drafted in the form we had desired. The C.C.F. stand over the years has been consistent. It is that the British North America Act itself should be amended. We believe that if that were done it would provide a stronger guarantee, a more certain guarantee, than a bill of rights which becomes part of our statute law.

We also feel that there is a very serious omission in this bill, in that there is no right to employment, there is no guarantee that in employing persons there will not be discrimination.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether that is not a matter of provincial jurisdiction and legislative power?

Mr. Argue: I do not think that is entirely so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have that in the Saskatchewan act to which reference was made.

Mr. Argue: That is right, so the people of Saskatchewan will be fully protected in this regard, the one act being complementary to the other. We feel that it should be in this act as well. It may be that in a federal act it is impossible to apply it in all respects. I am not certain about that, but I would think this principle itself should be in this act for the guidance of the federal government.

There have been events this session that have been disturbing. We think the practice of allowing a member of parliament, by making a recommendation to a minister, to have an employee fired is wrong. It is an abridgment of human rights and fundamental freedoms. I have never used the power that I apparently have to recommend that a certain person be fired, which would mean that this would automatically take place and I have no intention of ever using that power. I think it is a power that is given members of parliament that should not be used, that should be discontinued and should be outlawed. A person who is employed by the federal government should be protected in his employment against any member of parliament who may wish him fired for one reason or another.

We are looking forward, therefore, to improvements in the legislation that has been presented to this house. We hope that in the days ahead, in the next session of parliament, we shall have a discussion that will lead to a stronger, more comprehensive measure, a measure that is more likely to accomplish the objectives that have been set forth. We feel that clause 2 of part I of the bill has not been set out in such a way as to fully guarantee those rights.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, a great many persons in the C.C.F. movement who have been in this House of Commons in years gone by no doubt could have done better at this time than I have done. However, I think the points I have made are consistent with the position that has been taken by the C.C.F. over the years. We put these forward as proposals that have received very careful and diligent consideration. We do not put them forward at this time as being the final considerations.

We feel that a committee dealing with this whole question should consider every suggestion that has been made in this debate, and after examining all these suggestions, after obtaining evidence from expert witnesses, after hearing from people in Canada who have made a comprehensive study of this question, that committee should bring forth a comprehensive bill of rights that will guarantee these fundamental rights and human freedoms to all Canadians.

It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that we support the outline that has been given of the procedure that will be followed in this connection.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: Although it has been agreed that this bill will not be proceeded with at the present session it is necessary, in order to give it a place on the order paper that the house give an order as to its second reading. Normally it would be read at the next sitting of the house, so I shall put that question to wind up this procedure. When shall this bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING VALUE FOR DUTY, APPEALS TO EXCHEQUER COURT, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, September 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Nowlan for the second reading of Bill No. C-51, to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two brief comments that I wish to make before the minister participates and concludes the debate on this particular bill. I should like to start my remarks off by making a specific reference to a specific industry, namely the textile industry which over the years has been injured and hurt by the dumping or the importation of goods which that industry can produce here in Canada. We know that the employees in the textile industry and the textile industry itself are quite concerned about and quite interested in the measures outlined in this particular bill. I think it has been fairly well shown by the comments of others—and the proof of this rests in past editions of Hansard—that the attitude in this regard of both the Liberal party and the Conservative party appears to be based upon who is in office and who is out of office. When the Tories were out of office we find references in Hansard to the fact that this type of legislation or similar legislation in years past was nothing but trampling on the rights of parliament, but when they are in office it is all right to participate further in such things and to extend these things of which they complained. I do not think that on one occasion in the years we have had such legislation and have had such comments about it, has this attitude changed. There has been no other attitude than that which I mentioned earlier, namely one based upon who is in office and who is out of office. The unfortunate thing is that there has been an unwillingness and probably an inability to come to grips with the basic problem that exists with respect to our imports and our exports.

In 1932 and 1933 when the C.C.F. was formed expression was given to this question of the controversy between the free traders and the protectionists. The general thought expressed was that that controversy was fast becoming obsolete. Twenty-five years later we still say that it is obsolete, and even more obsolete than it was when our organization was formed. We made suggestions in 1933. Those suggestions are even more applicable today than they were in those years. We suggested the establishment of import-export boards in order to enable us to make the best possible trading agreements with other countries. Naturally we, as are other countries, are obliged to rely on trade, either importing from or exporting to other countries. By the establishment of such import-export boards, by the study and the planning of requirements, we would be able to stop the exploitation of our primary producers and, in the final analysis, stop the exploitation of the consumers of Canada in this particular case.

While I mentioned textiles specifically at the start, there are other industries which have a like interest in this particular legislation. We submit that the bill itself or the extension of the things contained in the act at the moment which are objectionable will not help a great deal. They merely have the effect of aggravating and prolonging what is an antiquated system of dealing with our trade relationships with other countries in importing and exporting.

Over the years the C.C.F. has freely offered its proposals and its programs to governments in office and governments in the past have freely availed themselves of the things which we have proposed. Of course, in this regard our position is no different now from what it has been on other matters. We offer to the government free of charge this phase of the C.C.F. program. If the government will accept it and put it into effect we are sure that, as has happened with governments in the past that have accepted and put into effect our proposals, we shall be moving along the lines of ensuring to the greatest possible degree the things that we hope to ensure in this bill but which in effect we are not ensuring.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Certainly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to have his views in respect of two telegrams which have come to me. One is from George Burt, Canadian director U.A.W. and it reads as follows:

Canadian U.A.W. joins United Textile Workers (CLC) in urging passage of Bill C-51—

That is the bill which is before the house.

—preventing dumping of textiles on Canadian market. Dumping goes far beyond bounds of fair competition and government should protect textile industry and its workers from this practice.

Then there is one from J. Harold Daoust, Canadian director, textile workers of America which reads as follows:

Since 1951 our organization has been fighting for some anti-dumping regulations by the federal government. We feel that Bill C-51 is a step in the right direction. We urge you to do all in your power to see that this bill is passed.

Is the hon. gentleman in agreement with those telegrams?

Mr. Howard: First, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have not seen the wires.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: If the Prime Minister and his lackeys on the other side will just take five minutes to listen I will give them my opinions. You will recall that from the outset I pointed out that the textile industry—

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. member is transgressing the proprieties of the house in calling members of the house lackeys of the Prime Minister. I would ask him whether he could modify that statement.

Mr. Howard: I will not make any caustic comments as to whom they are lackeys of, Mr. Speaker, but I will withdraw the comment.

You will recall that from the outset I mentioned the textile industry and pointed out that so far as we are concerned the solution to this problem is the establishment, as I said earlier, of import-export boards in order that we can get the best possible trade relationships with other countries, something which we shall not be able to get so long as this legislation continues to be changed as it has been changed both by the party in office in years past and by the Liberals when they were in office.

Mr. Hazen Argue: Mr. Speaker, just before the minister speaks and closes the debate I would like to make a few comments. We in this group have opposed this bill in this debate because we feel that the principle within the bill, namely that of giving this kind of arbitrary power to the governor in council, is a mistaken one. We feel that this bill in its present form will not assist Canada economically. We feel that it is a throwback to the restrictive practices that have been followed by previous governments and by other Conservative governments. If we felt that this bill would solve the problem of unemployment, we would vote for it. However, we do not believe that this bill will solve the problem of unemployment; and we do not think that with the arbitrary powers it contains and in the light of the past records of Conservative governments, it will be of any material help in that regard. The net effect of the bill, we believe, does not warrant our support of it.

I spoke on the customs tariff bill in this session. At that time I placed on the record the C.C.F. program which we had developed, after very careful consideration, in the interests of depressed industries in this country. At that time I outlined a number of industries facing difficulty, including textiles and certain things which should be done to help them.

We believe that in the field of international trade there needs to be economic planning; we believe that the system of tariffs as such is fallen into disuse as an adequate instrument in our economy to maintain full employment; we believe that planning of our production at home and planning of our imports by contracts between nations concerned with trade, by quotas and even exclusive quotas under certain conditions and for certain periods, are much more scientific and are in the real interests of employees in textiles and other industries and therefore are much more in the interests of the working people of Canada than is the present bill under consideration.

We believe that this bill is not going to solve the problems of any Canadian industry. We do not think it is going to result in the unemployed in the textile industry being sent back to work; we think other much more fundamental measures must be taken.

We oppose dumping of goods into Canada by any country and we think there should be legislation to deal with such dumping. We do suggest however that the kind of legislation set forth in this bill is not likely to be used, certainly not exclusively, in order to deal with dumping but is more likely to be used in a mischievous way to protect Canadian industrialists and manufacturers against any kind of competition on the excuse that the competition which they must meet involves dumping and therefore, on second reading, we in this group must vote against the bill.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I had not intended to speak until the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) intervened in this debate to read telegrams from two trade union leaders. However, representing as I do a constituency of primary producers who have to sell everything they produce which is not consumed right at home on the world market at world prices, I should like to make quite clear my personal attitude which is, I believe, the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and this party generally with respect to this measure.

In 1904 Mr. Fielding introduced dumping legislation—the true dumping legislation—which has become the pattern for the whole world. The Liberal party has always stood for genuine anti-dumping legislation and has always supported it. It is our belief that because of that genuine anti-dumping legislation it has been possible when there have been Liberal governments in Canada and, curiously enough, only when there have been Liberal governments in Canada, to have expanding trade and with it expanding employment. On every occasion on which we have had a Tory government in this country since 1904 there has, in one way or another, been an attempt to restrict trade under the guise of anti-dumping legislation but it is not anti-dumping legislation at all, it is legislation, as Mr. Ralston put it in 1930, designed to keep cheap goods out of this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Why was it that the government of which he was a member waited until three days after the election, namely on June 13, 1957, to bring in the order in council respecting strawberries?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister is tempting me more than I have ever been tempted before to betray the secrets of the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I will leave that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a sham now.

Mr. Fulton: What was the policy? That is all we ask.

An hon. Member: We would not want you to commit yourself like that.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I know hon. members opposite would not want me to commit myself like that.

Mr. Fulton: What was the policy, that is all we are asking.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would allow me to finish my sentence and then I will be delighted to deal with his.

Mr. Fulton: I did not know you had started one.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister may not have learned, but the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has certainly already learned that there is such a thing as collective responsibility. I think we made a mistake in doing what we did about strawberries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: In saying that I am speaking only for myself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course I am speaking only for myself—that is the only proper constitutional position to take. I could go on and say a little more—I do not think that was the only mistake made by the administration of which I was a member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would go even further than that—I have never claimed to be infallible and I think I made some mistakes myself when I was a minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: But because after the election there was one deviation from a policy which had otherwise been pretty consistently pursued over the years—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the only one?

Mr. Pickersgill: —it does not seem to me that the deviation is the important thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was that the only time?

Mr. Pearson: Deviation has become the rule under this government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the only time?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, it is not the only time that anti-dumping legislation was used. It has been used quite consistently during the years and it is true that because of changed technological conditions the government of which I was a member did, I believe in 1955, bring in an amendment to the Customs Act to provide an addition to the set of rules of the anti-dumping legislation to deal with certain end of the run goods in the textile field and to deal with a technological problem which did not exist in 1904, which perhaps was not a very serious problem even as late as 1935.

What we are protesting in respect of this legislation is not anti-dumping but the arbitrary features of this legislation;—firstly the violation of the right of parliament and not the minister or the government to tax and, secondly, the violation of GATT and of our other international trade obligations and of the desirable policy of expanding trade by reducing trade barriers which over the years has always given us prosperity when followed and when departed from has always at least coincided with the disappearance of prosperity. It is for those reasons that no matter how eminent or how influential the supporters of this legislation outside the house may be, it seems to me that we have a duty inside this house to exercise our own judgment, uninfluenced by pressures from outside, as to what is best for the country as a whole.

There can be no question that no advantage will accrue to any industry from these changes in legislation unless it has the effect of keeping out goods from other countries. That is its purpose, that is its design. If that were not its design it would not be before us at all. In a country which depends for the income of one-third of its people on selling goods abroad—and I say that, representing as I do a province which depends for, I suppose, about 80 to 90 per cent of its income on selling its products outside of Canada—it is impossible for me to conceive that Canada, at a time when the United States has been giving an example of maintaining the policy of reciprocal trade agreements about which we were very worried, and at any rate holding the line in the right direction, that this country which has so much bigger stakes in foreign trade than has the United States should be moving in the opposite direction.

While it may be true that certain individual interests would for a brief period gain some small temporary advantage from these trade barriers it does seem to me that by the discouragement of trade, direct and indirect, which is bound to result from this legislation it will be bad for this country as a whole and in the long run bad for those also who would get a temporary immediate advantage.

Mr. Speaker: May I repeat for the information of the house that the minister will now close the debate.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to bring the debate, or at least this stage of the debate, to a conclusion after numerous and sundry delays. I wish there were more time in which to deal with this matter in the way in which I would, perhaps, have dealt with it if the temper of the house was such as to permit it. I should like to deal specifically with some of the arguments which were advanced from the other side of the house, particularly by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) but I do not think hon. members will expect me to go into too great detail or to speak for too long on this occasion.

This is a difficult bill on which to speak on second reading, as the Leader of the Opposition discovered, because it does refer to various clauses to which one has to refer in order to deal with the bill as a whole, and without violating the rule of the house and speaking as if we were in committee, we still have to refer to the clauses as the Leader of the Opposition did. I will follow that precedent because otherwise it is impossible to deal with this subject adequately.

It has been an interesting debate and rather a surprising one. I have heard so many things said about the Customs Act and about customs duties which bear no relation to fact whatsoever that I began to wonder whether we were debating the Customs Act or whether we were debating something in a field entirely foreign to that measure.

The Leader of the Opposition, of course, took a very pessimistic view of this bill. He foresaw the death of responsible government, the transference of power from parliament to the executive and, what is even worse, he saw power being exercised by a bureaucracy. Altogether this bill was going to have fatal consequences. The hon. gentleman also referred to section 38, to which the Prime Minister referred a few moments ago and he suggested that section 38 was, perhaps, wrong; that perhaps the Liberal party had been in error in leaving it on the statute books all these years. However, he told the house even if they did leave it on the statute books they never used it once after they came into power in 1935 until June, 1957. That, Mr. Speaker, raises an interesting question in political morality—whether it was right to have introduced it if the hon. gentleman can boast that he never used it until his party was on the way out. But that is something which the Leader of the Opposition can deal with.

Actually it was a speech full of forebodings. It reminded me of his speech on the C.B.C. prophesying doom and extinction. Now we have talk about the doom of the Canadian export industry and about the doom and extinction of the Canadian parliament as well. It seems as though the hon. gentleman is suffering from a psychosis of some kind. I suppose that if he were to visit a psychiatrist about it his trouble would be diagnosed as acute depression and melancholia following two shocks received one on June 10, 1957 and one on March 31 of this year. I suggest that the hon. gentleman and some of his friends should go to a psychiatrist. We hope this session will conclude in a few hours, perhaps, and I hope that as a result of the rest and leisure which will be available to them in the next few months they may recover some mental equilibrium and come back in January or February with a more optimistic outlook on life.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would you like to see us even more cheerful?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes. I suggest there would be a moral connotation in the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to never having used section 38 if it were not for the fact that it is absolutely inaccurate and wrong historically and not in accordance with the facts or the record of the situation. I am advised by my officials that section 38 as it stands in the statute book, and to which the Leader of the Opposition referred the other day as never having been used by the Liberals from 1935 until June 13, 1957, is the same as section 43 before the act was revised in 1952, and I have here in front of me various orders in council which were passed by the Liberal government under section 43 during the years between 1935 and 1953. I am not going to deal with them all. Incidentally I must thank the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) for this because he asked during the discussion of the estimates, as hon. members will recall, whether we had a record of these orders in council. I told him we had not, but I became interested in this matter and instituted a search as a result of which we have found some of the documents. There are undoubtedly many others which we have not found.

I have one here which, I think, will be of interest to the house. This order was passed on January 29, 1937, just before the coronation of Their Majesties King George V and Queen Elizabeth, an occasion on which all Canadians desired, of course, to exhibit their patriotism and plan various celebrations in connection with that auspicious event. The Liberal government of that day decided that it was not right that this great flow of international trade about which we have heard so much should be exercised by Canadian boys and girls who wanted to buy Union Jacks and pictures of the King and Queen at the time of the coronation. So they had an order in council passed pursuant to section 43 of the Customs Act with reference to coronation souvenirs and such articles as the pictures of any members of the royal family, the royal cypher, the royal coat of arms, the royal emblem, escutcheon, badge, crest, armourial bearings or insignia, any article or building connected with the coronation or any flag of any country within the British commonwealth, and providing that the value for duty of such articles should be increased by 100 per cent. The reference number of the order under which that was done is 192/157.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps that was Japanese dumping to take advantage of the coronation.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not questioning the morality of this decision or the correctness of the practice. The Liberal government of that day undoubtedly said that they should give some protection to Canadian manufacturers, though now we are told that protection to Canadian manufacturers is of no value at all.

And then later on, on May 6, 1939, you will remember, sir, that the King and Queen were coming to Canada, and the men and women of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific wanted to stand in the streets and wave to them, wave flags and greet them in the way all patriotic Canadian subjects would wish to do. But the Liberals passed another order in council under which they similarly kept out, in the same language as that to which I referred a moment ago, any pictures of the King and Queen, any armourial bearings, and anything of that nature including any flag of any country within the British commonwealth. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, little Johnny who wants to go to the side of the street and wave a flag with the Union Jack on it, or the Canadian Ensign, whatever it might be, as the King and Queen passed by, having to be told: those wicked Tories, that Tory Jack Pickersgill and that Tory Mackenzie King; all those Tories have made flags so expensive that I cannot buy one for you, you have to stand up at the side of the street and just wave your bare hands.

Mr. Pearson: Japanese Union Jacks.

Mr. Nowlan: I have numerous and divers others here, Mr. Speaker. Here is one dealing with bedspreads, counterpanes, made of artificial silk and cotton. I understand these are not the most expensive counterpanes in the world. Artificial silk and cotton counterpanes, I am told, are fairly cheap ones, the kind that members of parliament and cabinet ministers have to buy because they cannot afford to buy any others. This one is dated January 16, 1939. What it did, Mr. Speaker, was to put a fixed value of 32 cents a pound on that material coming into Canada at that time.

Mr. Fulton: By order in council.

Mr. Nowlan: These are orders in council followed by customs directives. We then come to cheap towels, a combination of terry and cotton, 34 cents a pound if they are 20 inches in width. If they are less than 20 inches they pay more, they pay 39 cents a pound.

There is something here, Mr. Speaker, that even a Tory government would not do. This deals with rayon and cotton ribbons for women's hats, under millinery. I do not think those are imported today. But in those days, and this was in June, 1939, the value of ribbons coming into Canada to decorate women's hats was increased. They put a value of $1.50 a pound on them, and I suspect there were very few ribbons brought in for those hats.

I want to put the record straight. After the end of 1939 very few of those orders were passed. At that time the war came along and the depressed condition which existed in this country during the so-called Bennett depression continued up until the outbreak of the war in 1939. When the war came along we changed into a war economy and those regulations and orders in council appeared to cease because there were no more of them. There was the strawberry one to which the Leader of the Opposition referred the other day. He said the only one was passed on the 21st day of March, 1949, which was after he and I came to this house, both of us having come in December, 1948. We increased the value of knitted woollen gloves, depending on their size and on the quantity of wool, from $4.22 a dozen to $5.95 a dozen.

Mr. Pearson: Before the minister leaves that, would he permit me to say I did say only after June, 1958, and I was wrong. I had intended to apologize to him when I got up to speak on the first clause of the bill, but I would like to tell him now that before making the statement I did phone an official of the government concerned in the matter and I got the information from him. After I made my statement he phoned and said that he had given me the wrong information.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought you had the same information as one well-known newspaper.

Mr. Nowlan: No one would ever suggest that the Leader of the Opposition would misstate anything or mislead the house in any way, shape or form. I was surprised to know that the Leader of the Opposition got this information from an official of the department. I saw it put out in black and white in another journal, the sort of family bible with which the Leader of the Opposition communes, and I assumed he got it from that.

Mr. Pearson: The minister will take my word that I did get in touch with an official of the government who is an expert in tariff matters and I did get the information from him, and later when he realized what I had said perhaps he looked it up again. He learned it was wrong, as I did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Favourite newspaper.

Mr. Pearson: Favourite newspaper has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Last week it was the minister's favourite newspaper.

Mr. Nowlan: I saw it spelled out in black and white and I wondered, of course. There were so many errors in those editorials I wondered whether perhaps the Leader of the Opposition had not made a mistake, which he had.

Mr. Fulton: What paper?

Mr. Pickersgill: The paper the minister quoted with approval on broadcasting.

Mr. Nowlan: Not the newspaper I happen to read once in a while.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister did not quote the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says that the fundamental principles of valuation have gone in this bill and for those old principles there is to be substituted executive action, bureaucratic administrative control. I want to say as positively as I can, Mr. Speaker, that the Leader of the Opposition is just as wrong in that analysis as he was in the statement with respect to the use of section 38 between 1935 and 1953. No one knows better than the Leader of the Opposition and myself how technical this matter is. You cannot deal with it in the house in such a way, I think, as to make it too obvious or too apparent just what arguments there may be. I am the first to admit that the subject is so technical that I cannot always appreciate it, and I have to be governed by information and advice which I get—and which I get naturally—from officials of whom this house well knows.

But the fundamental principle, as the Leader of the Opposition will admit, has always been the fair market value in the country of origin. This has been the principle under which tariff administration has been carried on in this country with such departures as may have been brought about under Bennett or Mackenzie King, or whoever it may be. This has been the fundamental principle. I think we can agree on that.

How is that fundamental principle established? There are two subprinciples to start with. In the first place, is it like goods; is it goods which are like the goods sold in the country of origin? If so, that value applies to them. That principle is maintained in this bill, Mr. Speaker. That principle is set forth in section 36 of this bill. It is true that there is a slight change in wording; it is true that there have been some administrative practices which have been going on throughout the years which have been codified and put into subsections, of section 36. Generally speaking, section 36 deals entirely and only with values of like goods. I say, Mr. Speaker, there has been no departure from the preceding practice or the existing law whatever in so far as section 36 is concerned.

We come to section 37. What is the situation there? We get similar goods, and that creates a much more difficult problem. Like goods, by custom practice and by custom law, means exactly like goods. There is no deviation whatsoever—there are some very minor ones such as difference in colour, perhaps, in textiles or something of that kind—but we have the words "like goods" accepted. They have to be like goods. The word "like" is spelled with a capital "L" to use a slang expression.

Then we come to similar goods, and the preceding government of which the hon. member was a member at one time shifted from similar goods to equivalent goods. Then, in 1955, they came back to the expression "similar goods". There again you run into great difficulties in interpretation. The words "similar goods" are not spelled with capitals all the way through. It means very similar, and you cannot follow that principle too far. Let me give one simple illustration. Fluid containers may have a different size in the United States from what they have in Canada. You may get a 12 ounce container in one country and a 10 ounce in the other. Are these similar or not? The product is similar; the container is similar whether it carries carrots or lima beans, but the size of the container is different. For customs administration you can say, what are two ounces? The importer may be getting a break, or he may be paying more because he is paying on the value of similar goods in the United States. Can you carry that to 15 ounces; can you carry it to 20 ounces? Of course, you cannot. You can only follow that "similar goods" principle in a very narrow line up or down when it comes to size. I use that simple illustration, but there are scores of others which could be used. Therefore, you cannot carry the "similar goods" practices too far and in the end you are driven to something else. The preceding government was driven to the use of subsection 6 of section 35 of the old act.

That was used by the preceding government and is being used today. When you look at subsection 6 of section 35 what do you find?

> When the value for duty cannot be determined under the preceding subsections for the reason that > (a) like or similar goods are not sold for use or consumption in the country of export, or > (b) there is no established market in the country of export for like or similar goods, > the value for duty of the goods shall be such value as the minister determines.

That is, if you like, administration by bureaucracy but that has been the administration which has gone on and is going on under Nowlan at the moment, which went on under McCann, which went on under Ilsley and which has gone on under every minister of national revenue since there has been a Department of National Revenue. Apparently hon. gentlemen opposite did not realize perhaps any more than I did, certainly any more than I did a few months ago, how the Customs Act has to be administered and the departmental practices which have to be worked out and which have been worked out and that instead of trying to make them more rigid and more embracing in this bill we are trying to codify them in accordance with the law that has been laid down by the courts. We have adopted the formulas and have made them more flexible than the practices are up to this minute because this bill has not yet been passed.

Mr. Crestohl: Will the minister allow a question on this very point? Was not the matter of similar quantities also one of the yardsticks in gauging the fair market value previously?

Mr. Nowlan: That question can be dealt with when we come to the clauses but that is true. You had to determine quantities and qualities and various other matters. As I have said, it was a very difficult thing and is today to apply the similar principle except on a fairly narrow front, shall we say, because they can only be similar when they are not too dissimilar. I also want to say that over 75 per cent of all Canadian imports, so I am told, will come in under the provisions of sections 36 or 37 of the bill, so when we hear of these great departures which are taking place I think they have to be related to the facts of the case and to the practices which have gone on.

The Leader of the Opposition also pointed out the other day how the principle of fair market value could be destroyed. I am not reading from Hansard now but I made notes which I think are correct. He said that section 38 of the bill could abrogate sections 36 and 37, the fair market value. Section 38 deals with certain specific goods and descriptions of them for manufacturing purposes and so on. I am told that never at any time under any administration have the goods described in section 38 been valued under the provisions of either section 36 or section 37. They have always been recognized to be a class by themselves and have been dealt with by administrative practices such as you find set forth in section 38.

Mr. Pearson: That is a new section.

Mr. Nowlan: That is the section which is bringing in the practices and I prefer to discuss it in detail when we are on the clauses. It is not exactly a new section because you will find—

Mr. Pearson: Section 38 (a) is not new but section 38 (b) is new.

Mr. Nowlan: It is similar to subsection 7 of section 35. That is one which would apply to it, and there are others. It is a combination of two or three where these practices have been carried out in the past and they have now been brought under section 38 for better administration and in accordance with the decisions which have been handed down, as I said the other day in my opening statement. So much for 36, 37 and 38, which I again say simply codify what has been done in the past. They do not create any additional bureaucratic practices whatsoever but place safeguards and limitations on practices which have been carried on, as I will attempt to show when we get to the committee stage.

We come now to section 39 which is the one new section in the bill, and it is one which undoubtedly involves a change of principle from what has been done during the last few years. We heard a great deal the other day about the Bennett buggy and the shades of Bennett were dragged forth from the tomb. It was suggested that perhaps those of us on this side of the house were a reincarnation of Bennett in attempting to bring this section back into being. We have been told about the evils and the wrongs which are done in trying to impose a valuation including cost plus. What does the section do? All it says is that in computing the value for duty you shall take the cost of production, which is clearly defined in the act as being the actual cost, plus a reasonable mark-up for gross profit, and the formula for arriving at gross profit is set forth in the bill before us. Therefore everything is done according to the code, according to the rules, instead of being done haphazardly as heretofore.

But this was not Bennett. We have heard a great deal about the purity of the Liberal government and with that I will not quarrel at the moment because this reinforces the argument. The same provision as found in section 39 of the bill was in the Customs Act of Canada when Mr. Mackenzie King came into power in 1935 and he kept it there until 1948 when GATT was introduced. This is not Bennett; this is Chevrier. This is not our friend from Bonavista-Twillingate. He was in the closet writing the speeches but he was not actually in the cabinet himself. The Leader of the Opposition was not even in the closet but he was not far removed. They talk about Bennett but the section which was taken out of the act in 1948 was more rigorous, more inflexible and more onerous. The Leader of the Opposition smiles.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Pearson: We will come to that when we get into committee.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to because I will deal with it there. This section is not nearly as stringent as that which was in the act up to 1948.

Mr. Pearson: Could I ask the minister a question? Will he not agree that in this section the British preferential qualification has been taken out?

Mr. Nowlan: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: Does that make it less or more onerous?

Mr. Nowlan: The British preferential qualification is taken out, although there is another section which still maintains it, but the section is more consistent with GATT. They prate and bray so much about GATT. If this act is going to be brought in, if we are evolving a new principle so far as tariffs are concerned, then certainly we cannot show discrimination, and it is drafted in that way.

Mr. Pearson: I do not want to interrupt the minister but will he permit me to ask this question? If he has taken it out in this section because of GATT, why does he leave it in another section?

Mr. Nowlan: I will deal with GATT when we are in committee. All I am saying, and I say it again, is that this section is not as onerous as the section which the magnificent, free trade, fair trade, international trade loving government, with which hon. members opposite were associated, had in the act from 1935 to 1948. All we are doing is restoring the principle which they took out because, rightly or wrongly, they apparently thought it was a violation of GATT. It was not because they were dissatisfied with the section. Not at all. It was not because of any great love for free trade or anything of that kind. It was because they believed, and we now believe they were misinformed, that it might be a violation of GATT.

I am certain that it is not a violation of GATT. I am advised that it is not a violation of GATT and we are restoring it. What is wrong with that? GATT is based on ordinary trading conditions. You will find that referred to all through GATT.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the minister is overlooking the fact that we disposed of the amendment dealing with GATT and, strictly speaking, I think it would be contrary to the rules to discuss that now. However, if the house is quite content to hear the minister, very well, although he had the opportunity to speak at that time, I believe.

Mr. Pearson: I hope the minister will be allowed to deal with this point because I think it would be helpful to hear what he has to say from the point of view of our discussions when we get into committee. I would suggest that he be allowed to continue to talk about it.

Mr. Speaker: If the house wishes; I just point out what I consider to be the correct position according to the rules.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not pressing GATT any further at the moment because it is not necessary. I simply say that that is why it was taken out in 1948 and we are putting it back again today. Why are we doing this? We are doing it because we believe in ordinary trading practices, we believe in fair market values. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how can you have a fair market value which does not represent cost-plus? How many people can carry on business if they are selling goods below the cost of production? I heard my hon. friend over there laugh. I wonder if he thinks business can be carried on in that way? What happens to a firm that does? They go out of business very quickly. They will go into bankruptcy. As a result of the chaotic market conditions in some countries, as a result of the breakdown of the distribution system, the wholesaling system and so on, we have a complete breakdown of the distribution of some goods and in order to dispose of inventories as quickly as possible, some industries will sell goods below the cost of production and a reasonable mark-up for profit. No industry can survive under those conditions, and employers cannot continue to give employment if they are to carry on under those circumstances. It is for that reason—

Mr. Crestohl: Will the minister allow a question? The minister seems to make so much of that cost-plus, and he is quite right, but he has not cleared up as to whether it is cost-plus in the country of manufacture or in Canada. There could be a very serious difference when you think of cost-plus in Japan, for example.

Mr. Nowlan: Oh, I quite realize that, and I think that could be very easily explained when we are in the committee stage. I did not think there was any misunderstanding on that score, but if there is we want to clear it up.

That is what this bill does, Mr. Speaker. The only new thing in the bill—as I said, everything else is simplification and this should be pointed out—is section 39. It should be pointed out also that under the section which was removed in 1948 there was no appeal; there was an arbitrary decision and there was no appeal from it. Today, under this section, there is an appeal, as there is in connection with practically every decision which has to be made here. I think it can be successfully argued that if you accept at all the principle of having fair market value under ordinary trading conditions, then you have to accept the principle that something should be produced on the basis of cost plus a reasonable profit. If you do that, then that is exactly what this government is doing by section 39.

There was one hon. member somewhere, I think it was the leader of the C.C.F. party, who referred to the manufacturers and industrialists who are going to benefit and profit by this measure. I, at least, appreciate the fact that the official opposition did not drag in the knights of St. James street or the barons of Bay street the way they used to do. We were told a few years ago that this legislation was for the benefit of the great Tory financiers who were in control of industry in this country, and who had the Conservative party under their thumbs. The opposition carefully steered away from this because they know it is not at the behest of any Tory manufacturer that this is being done, although many will appropriate it and would like to see it done.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister had better beware because I have a speech of Ian Mackenzie's here.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Ian Mackenzie was a member of the government which invoked this order in council, I must not forget that, and of the party which kept the section in until 1948.

This legislation is not being introduced as a cure-all for unemployment. You cannot correct unemployment merely by putting up the tariff because there are many other factors involved. However, I think it will assist in dealing with unemployment, and it will prevent the spread of unemployment in many industries which today are facing disaster. Its effects will be beneficial on the general economy of this country if it is administered in accordance with the general principles laid down in this bill. Let us please not go back into history. We can both point fingers. I am willing to admit that in the thirties somebody may have said, "We need customs tariff protection", and they said. "How much do you need?" and a sum was just pulled out of the air and put in the Customs Tariff. It has happened under both governments.

These are the people who are asking for this bill today. I do not subscribe to pressure groups, but I can almost scent one here because of the number of telegrams I have received within the last 48 hours from groups of employees. They come from places like Woodstock, Hamilton and Cornwall. Some messages refer to 400 people out of work, and some refer to 200. None of these telegrams come from capitalists. They are from the secretary or the president of a labour union, largely in the textile industry but in other industries as well. Here is one from Hamilton again and another from Cornwall. Altogether, I just checked it roughly, these are telegrams and messages from organizations representing employees who are on part-time or out of work in a depressed industry, and there are over a dozen of them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister a telegram from the Newfoundland federation of fishermen?

Mr. Nowlan: I have not, but I am quite sure that if the Newfoundland fishermen are as intelligent as the Nova Scotia fishermen, and I am quite sure they are, they will welcome legislation such as this. The Canadian Labour Congress represents a very wide classification, as my hon. friend knows. The other day great emphasis was placed on the textile industry, but this bill is not designed to cure the ills of the textile industry particularly; it is designed to help industry generally in Canada. Textiles undoubtedly is one industry which is facing unemployment and in which the provisions of this bill could be effective, but it is only one. The Canadian Labour Congress, in a brief submitted to me some short time ago, asked that action such as this be taken.

I am not sure whether the Leader of the Opposition or the member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) were present, but I recall the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who is not here now, meeting a great delegation of unemployed who came here from Windsor and Hamilton. I remember the thousands whom they represented. We heard so much about these people early in the session, and what did they want? They did not look like capitalists. They said, introduce legislation which will give us more employment, bring in legislation in the automobile business, in the farm machinery business, in the electrical appliance business and the textile business—all those were represented—which will give us work.

Here is a telegram from the international association of machinists in Lachine, Quebec, which suggests that a minimum value for duty should be imposed which would give a profit of some kind to the manufacturer which would enable him to maintain employment. Then, the international automobile workers of America international union, Oshawa submitted a brief to me urging that this be done. Then there are representations from the united automobile and aircraft workers of America at Windsor; the united association of journeymen plumbers and pipefitters, who submitted a brief urging that these things be done. These are only a few of the representations which we have received from all across Canada, from labour, from the farmer and all the rest.

I quite appreciate the dangers of raising tariff barriers. I realize the dislocation of international trade. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that under this bill and with this administration, those dangers are reduced to a minimum. In many ways, they will be dealt with far better than they were under the existing act. I am not criticizing anyone in saying that, but the machinery was such that they had to be dealt with more harshly. When this bill becomes law we will be able to assist employment in the various industries in Canada, and will be able to resist the greater spread of unemployment in these industries. I think that this legislation will be a good thing for Canada as a whole.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has been very patient. Before he sits down I wonder whether he will permit one more question?

Mr. Nowlan: If I can answer it.

Mr. Pearson: This bill is primarily, as he has indicated, for the purpose of clarification and simplification of the existing law. How then is it going to have a beneficial effect on unemployment?

Mr. Nowlan: Through section 39. That is the new element in the bill. I may say quite frankly that I never expected to see a bill of greater length than one page when we suggested that it be drawn. But the draftsman, as draftsmen do and quite properly, incorporated many things for legal effect and for clarification. Certainly I was as shocked as were hon. members opposite when I saw that the bill contained ten pages. I had foreseen a bill containing one section and that was all. I had not realized all the clarification and other explanations that would be necessary.

I say again that section 39 is the new element. When I say it is the only new thing, what I mean is this. We are not dealing now with appeal procedure and we are not dealing with the creation of a court to deal with obscene literature or other minor matters; whether minor or not, they are not part of the customs administration as a whole. We are dealing with the Customs Act, sections 36, 37, and 38, and I say that this section 39 is the one which introduces an entirely new principle, the first one since 1948.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Determination of value for duty.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the first part of this clause, dealing with section 35, carry?

Mr. Pearson: I would like to make some observations on clause 1. They cover more than 35 and 36 and I think perhaps it would be preferable if I made all my observations at this time because they will be very brief. They do not come up in consideration of any particular part.

The minister, during second reading of the bill, attempted to make two points which concern this clause. I am not going to deal with some of the other points but naturally they will come up when we get to the special clauses. His first point was that this proposed legislation was not substantially different from the present legislation and that it still retained fair market value as its cardinal consideration. Secondly, he contended that the bill did not contain any new provisions which violated GATT but was in conformity with the spirit and objectives of that very important international agreement which our country has signed, for the preservation of orderly commercial relations with other countries of the world.

These are two points and they cover more than the one section that I want to deal with. I feel that this particular bill does modify our system of valuation and if it is put into effect by the government—and I am sure they are going to put it into effect, otherwise they would not make these changes—then fair market value will become an exception rather than the general rule. I am not going to say any more about that at this time except to mention the three sections which seem to me to support that statement.

When I asked the minister the question: if this bill is merely a clarification and a simplification how would it have the effect on employment that he said he hoped it would have. Especially because of section 39 which he said was new. As we see it clause 40A (7) subclause (c) which replaces section 38 (1) of the present act is also important in regard to farm market value, as is clause 38 subsections (b), (c) and (d). Those are three clauses of this bill which we condemn—

Mr. Nowlan: I may be stupid, but the hon. gentleman spoke of three clauses. I have only got 40A and 38.

Mr. Pearson: And 39. There is one other matter on which I want to spend a little more time because it may be somewhat difficult to refer to it again. I refer to the relation between this bill and the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The minister said the other day, and repeated it this afternoon that, in accordance, no doubt, with advice he has received, that this bill does not violate any of the provisions of GATT. This is a very important matter because if it does in fact violate that agreement we are ourselves subject to retaliation should this bill become law; also we shall certainly be in a much weaker position when we attempt to invoke the clauses of GATT against other countries with regard to practices which they may see fit to introduce against our exports.

There are two articles of GATT which are especially relevant to the questions raised by this bill. Article 7 describes the general method which should be used in determining the value for duty, and article 19, which is the so-called escape clause, entitles a country to suspend its obligations under the agreement under certain circumstances. As to article 7, I want to put this on the record because we on this side think we should relate some of the clauses in this bill to this particular article of the agreement. Article 7 in subsection 2(a) reads as follows:

> The value for customs purposes of imported merchandise should be based on the actual value of the imported merchandise on which duty is assessed, or of like merchandise, and should not be based on the value of merchandise of national origin or on arbitrary or fictitious values.

Then, subsection (c) which follows goes on:

> When the actual value is not ascertainable in accordance with subparagraph (b) of this paragraph, the value for customs purposes should be based on the nearest ascertainable equivalent of such value.

That means in simple language that you have to use fair market value if you possibly can, and if you cannot use it you are given other alternatives which can be applied, but only and after an effort has been made to find fair market value. Those are the general principles. It is true that article 6 does contain an anti-dumping provision which states very specifically that safeguards against dumping are allowed under certain conditions, but only in the form of a special duty as described in section 1, not in the form of a special system of valuation. Section 7 of article 6 has this to say:

> No measures other than anti-dumping or countervailing duties shall be applied by any contracting party in respect of any product of the territory of any other contracting party for the purpose of offsetting dumping or subsidization.

Then there is the escape clause which I have mentioned, and I want to put that on the record because we will be referring to it later. It is defined in part in paragraph 1A of article 19 as follows:

> If, as a result of unforeseen developments and of the effect of the obligations incurred by a contracting party under this agreement, including tariff concessions, any product is being imported into the territory of that contracting party in such increased quantities and under such conditions—

I emphasize these words, because they are not the words of the bill—

> —as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers—

The word there is "threaten".

> —in that territory of like or directly competitive products, the contracting party shall be free, in respect of such product, and to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent or remedy such injury, to suspend the obligation in whole or in part or to withdraw or modify the concession.

That is a clause which has been used by certain governments as an escape from their obligations under GATT when the conditions are applicable and we have taken in Geneva, and I am sure the minister takes the same view now, a very watchful position with regard to the application of this clause. We have done our best to prevent governments, and especially the United States, invoking this clause in a way which would do damage to our exports and to our agricultural exports especially.

A country cannot use this clause unless goods are imported under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers and when it does use the clause it exposes itself to retaliation as indicated in subsection 3(a). I do not wish to put this clause on the record now because I do not want to take up much more time, but with these clauses of GATT in mind I want to look at the bill to see to what extent its clauses violate these provisions in the agreement or to what extent they are not in harmony with the objective and spirit of the general agreement.

The minister has said there is no such violation. We on this side contend that there is a violation, and that is a very important difference between us.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I could call it five o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to section 53 of standing order 15, to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed with the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether with the unanimous consent of the house order No. 27, which is for third reading of Bill No. S-15, respecting Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited, a bill of which I am the sponsor, might be considered at the present time.

Mr. A. D. McPhillips (Victoria, B.C.): I object.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's suggestion can only be followed if there is unanimous consent, and since there is an objection we will have to proceed with order No. 26 first.

An hon. Member: A family quarrel.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, this bill will only take a matter of seconds, I am sure. It is not controversial at all and I wonder if I could ask that it be proceeded with. It is not controversial in any way and we will still have time to deal with the other bill.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this is expected to be the last private members' day and since this bill, which is a very important one, will take only a moment, I would hope that there would be withdrawal of any objection—I am sure there will be—and that there would be unanimous consent to deal with it at this time because otherwise this company will be placed in an impossible position.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, some hon. members have been interested in this bill, as this whole group were, and discussed it on second reading quite extensively and were anxious for it to go to committee. The committee having performed its function, we are in hearty agreement with having this bill moved to the top so that we can deal with it immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to item No. 27 on the order paper being taken ahead of item No. 26?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MID-CONTINENT PIPELINES LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. S-15, respecting Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited—Mr. Rynard—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Capital.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to speak very briefly on this bill because we gave it very serious consideration prior to second reading and expressed our doubts and fears, and wanted a thorough examination of the company's witnesses by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. That took place yesterday, and because the company's witnesses have satisfied our objections, firstly, by indicating that now the primary purpose of this bill is the transportation of oil; secondly, it will be a common carrier for the transport of oil; thirdly, because there were satisfactory explanations given to the members of the committee who queried the company's witnesses on several other aspects of the bill which concerned us; and, fourthly, because this company intends to act as a common carrier of oil from Saskatchewan to other places, we in this group are willing to support the bill at this time. I might say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I was very pleased to be told that within the reasonable foreseeable future the government of Saskatchewan expects to see an increase in oil production by two or three times, and it is in an effort to work together to that end that we endorse this legislation at this time.

WILLIAM HARRISON TERRY

The house resumed, from Friday, August 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. SD-199, for the relief of William Harrison Terry—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, the last time this committee dealt with this bill I just had the opportunity to get to my feet. At that time I was dealing with the very dangerous precedent that was set by the action taken on this particular bill. I reviewed briefly the history of the bill. Most of us are familiar with the fact that it was passed by the committee of the other house. It was turned down by the committee of this house. It was recommitted, reheard and now it is back before us again.

The reason I believe it is setting a rather dangerous precedent, Mr. Chairman, is that if this is carried through to its logical conclusion we would find that a case of this kind could come up, be presented and if it was successful, fine. If it were not successful, then the sponsors could say, "We will produce another witness and have another go at it, and if that is not sufficient then we will produce another witness and go through it all again". This could go on ad nauseam and make it even a greater farce than it is and have, as one member expressed it, divorce by automation. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in the future I think we should exercise more care along this line.

Let me deal with the case itself. From the evidence given at various hearings that it has had we are told that there were two reasons why the petitioner in this case first became suspicious of the circumstances. The first was he had noticed that his children were referring to the co-respondent as Uncle Al. The second reason he gave was neglect of the children and the fact that he was not satisfied with the way in which the children were being raised. He said these were the factors which caused him to have certain suspicions and to engage the services of certain private detectives to investigate and compile grounds for divorce.

Now, with regard to the two reasons he gave, it was also established through evidence given that the co-respondent in this case had been a friend of the family for a period of some 15 years, I believe long before the husband and wife separated in the first instance. Furthermore, there was no hint of any kind that the co-respondent in this case had been a factor when the husband and wife separated originally, because at that time although things had come to such a pass that the husband and wife felt compelled to separate and take up separate homes there was no suspicion in any way, shape or form that the co-respondent and the woman were carrying on illicit relations.

In addition to this, the oldest child appeared before the committee. I do not know whether he made the same impression on other members of the committee as he did on me, but he certainly did not appear to me to be a child who had been neglected at any time.

In regard to his training,—and that specifically was one of the matters that the petitioner mentioned—he took exception to the table manners that the youngster was developing. I assume it was not only table manners but manners in general because I think you will find that as a rule with children growing up their table manners are no better or no worse than any of their other manners.

I certainly feel that the boy made a very good impression on the committee and his evidence raised considerable doubt in my mind as to the validity of the reasons given when this investigation was first started. I would also say that it would be quite a normal thing for a child to refer to a friend of the family as uncle Alec when the boy, who is now 19, had known him since he was four years old. I do not think one should take anything improper out of that fact.

According to the evidence, these detectives were engaged on January 11 and over a period of six to seven months they kept a constant watch on the respondent and co-respondent. But I think one of the most significant things about the whole case was that while they claimed to have watched these two people over this long period they apparently had no idea they were being watched and thus would be acting perfectly normally. They would not have their guard up if they were implicated in anything wrong.

In spite of this fact not one bit of evidence was given by any of the five so-called detectives to indicate any sign of affection between these two people during all this long period. Where you have people who are supposed to be indulging in what these people were alleged to have been doing, I ask the committee if it is normal that there should be no sign of affection? They were never known to place their arms around each other, never known to embrace or to kiss each other during that time.

In a case of this kind where you have some witnesses testifying one way and others testifying completely the opposite and are not able to rely on completely contradictory evidence, you then have to look at other factors. I think one very important point in this case is a comparison of the witnesses. We must remember that on the one side there were five full-time or part-time detectives, five people who are commonly refered to as professional witnesses. They were there for one express purpose, to testify to certain things. On the other hand, you have the testimony of people who were not professional witnesses. Furthermore, they are under the added disadvantage that they do not have the benefit of notes as to times, dates and places that are available to the professional witnesses.

I am sure that if any hon. member of this committee was asked where he was on the night of July 9 last year he would be very fortunate indeed if he could remember. It would be something extraordinary if you could remember even where you were at that time, let alone any of the particulars. I am sure that a good lawyer could make you look pretty silly on cross-examination if you tried to remember too many details.

As I say, the five detectives all had notes and referred to them on various occasions. In spite of that, however, there were many instances where they gave contradictory evidence. Some of them have been mentioned already. First of all, there was contradictory evidence as to footsteps on the stairs. One heard this, another heard that and another heard something else. There was contradictory evidence as to the covering on the stairs. Some thought they were covered with a carpet, some thought they were not, some thought they were covered with linoleum, and apparently they were not too sure what was on the stairs.

This was a very important factor, particularly in relation to the evidence given in respect to the sound of footsteps on the stairs. There would be a considerable difference in the noise caused by the footsteps of people going up or down the stairs depending upon whether they were covered with a carpet or were bare. The same thing was true of the hallway. Some of them thought there was a carpet and others thought not. In fact, I think the chairman of the committee mentioned that the witnesses even disagreed as to the layout of the hallway itself and where the stairs were going down into the basement.

There was contradictory evidence whether the lights were on or off. I suggest to the committee that they should consider which parties should know whether the lights were on or off, these professional people who go there for an express purpose or other people who may be surprised by the entry of a group of men. There was contradictory evidence as to the lights both inside and outside. One witness said that the house was in total darkness and was in a very dark location on the street and that as a result they would have been able to tell if there were any lights on in the house. Another of the professional witnesses stated that there was a street light right in front of the door. Surely these are matters on which there should be no conflict whatsoever.

Another very vital point on which there was conflicting evidence had to do with the doorbell. Some of the witnesses stated that they rang twice, that they rang the doorbell once for a period of about a minute and then rang it for a shorter period. We found that it was not a ring at all because the doorbell was of the chiming type and chimed twice for the front door and once for the back door.

There was conflicting evidence as to the clothes worn by the various parties. There was conflicting evidence as to what happened when this couple was being followed by two detectives. One stated that they used two cars and the other stated that each had his own car. There was also other conflicting evidence. The detectives were supposed to have watched these premises on previous occasions. They claimed that in some cases they had watched the house all night long but we find that on one occasion they were chased away from the area by the police. If they were chased away once, why were they not chased away on other occasions? Under the circumstances it is stretching the credibility of hon. members to ask them to believe in whole or even in part the evidence submitted by these various witnesses.

We had evidence given before the committee to the effect that the back door was not watched on all occasions. One of the witnesses went further and admitted that it was quite possible for a person or persons to go out the back door and cross the backyard to this hotel where the cars were parked without even being seen from the front. It appears that the only time the back door was watched was on the night of August 30, and strangest of all is the fact that as soon as some activity was observed in the house the ones who were delegated to watch the back door immediately left their post and raced around to the front door. It was submitted in evidence also, and I do not think it was refuted in any way, that apparently while they tried to break the front door in the back door was unlocked all the time. This evidence proves that any number of people could have left by the back door while they were trying to break in the front door. All in all, in my opinion, the evidence submitted by these five professional witnesses certainly left a great deal to be desired.

On the other hand, we have the evidence given by the respondent and co-respondent. I think all hon. members can agree that they were either telling the truth or they were the two best liars that have ever appeared before a committee. I do not believe that there is any other conclusion we can draw from the evidence given by these two witnesses. It is possible that they are not telling the truth, but again I say that is stretching the imagination a little bit. They both gave their testimony and stood up to a very rigorous cross-examination. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, they both acquitted themselves very well. Mention was made of the fact that the co-respondent, on one or two minor matters, was crossed up, particularly in regard to the day in question and the fact of whether he did or did not have lunch. But, Mr. Chairman, I am sure all hon. members realize that that "cross-up", if you want to call it that, occurred at the end of two hours and twenty minutes of cross-examination, without a single break, by a very capable lawyer and by a group of capable lawyers who were members of the committee. Anyone who has had experience with cross-examination knows that if you have a prefabricated story you are going to get crossed up on more than one little point in a period of over two hours.

In a case like this, when you have evidence that is as contradictory as that given, you are faced with a situation where you have to believe one thing or the other. You cannot believe part of one story and part of the other. It comes down to a straight matter of credulity. Who are you going to believe?

I would suggest what happened in this case, if I may, Mr. Chairman. These detectives were hired away back in January. I do not know the cost of the detectives in a case of this kind, but I can assume it is fairly high. I submit that what could have happened, and what possibly did happen, was that the detectives bled the petitioner dry by keeping this case going and going. I believe that finally the petitioner laid down an ultimatum, either you get the goods or you get off the payroll and I will get somebody else. This is the reason we have these doors being smashed down and the attempt to make a case out of the fact that one party was found upstairs and the other party in the basement. I suggest that if detectives, three or five or whatever number was working on this case, cannot come up with a better case than this then they either have not done a very good job or there was not very much upon which to work in the first place.

I submit that the explanation given by the respondent and co-respondent is the logical explanation. These are things that could well have happened. I am sure that over a period of seven or eight months many hon. members were in far more compromising positions than the one in which these two people were found on that day, yet this does not mean they were guilty of anything. Once again I say that the stories given by the two witnesses for the defence are logical. These things could have happened, and I believe they did happen. I say, Mr. Chairman, that this bill should be thrown out.

Mr. McCleave: Earlier this afternoon, I was put on the spot in connection with a bill on which every party in this house agreed. We set it aside at that time. It is a principle of law, in at least eight of the provinces of Canada, that a person can come into court, ask for relief and get justice or get hurled out. At least they know where they stand. It so happens that in two provinces the people are so unfortunate that they have to come to parliament for a divorce and have their affairs dragged through the House of Commons. This should be a forum for the highest form of debate, not the lowest. We have gone into all these matters in the committee, and the committee has made a decision. I think that in fairness to the people concerned we should accept that decision or we should throw out the bill. We should submit the matter to a vote this afternoon.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

Mr. Montgomery: I should like to say a few words on this case. Like the chairman of the committee, I think it is unfortunate that these cases have to come to parliament. Some of them are very close to the borderline, and this is one bill for which I cannot vote. I do not believe there is sufficient evidence to prove adultery. I have had considerable experience in listening to evidence, and when the evidence points as consistently to innocence as it does to guilt in any set of circumstances, then the petitioner would never succeed in a court of law. I know it is true that in parliament we are not bound by the ordinary rules of procedure that govern courts. We are not bound to refuse to grant a divorce if adultery is not proven because we can grant a divorce upon any ground. Personally, I am not satisfied that there was any ground proven upon which a divorce should be granted. I have read the evidence carefully. Many of the other members heard the witnesses the second time, although I did not have that privilege. As a result of shrewd inquiries made, I do not think there is much change. The second evidence was not recorded. In view of that situation, I certainly could not vote to support the case. I certainly shall be obliged to vote against it and I felt that I should put myself on record before doing so.

I do not believe that this parliament should be made a place in which to grant a divorce for something which has not been proved. If there are other grounds upon which this marriage should be dissolved, then the parties should come forward and substantiate the claim on those grounds. But I sincerely believe that there are no grounds of adultery on which to grant this divorce. Nothing was proved. The circumstances in which the detectives found these people point to innocence as well as to guilt, but more towards innocence. These people were good people. Why should we break up two families? That is something that could happen as a result of our granting a divorce. By doing so it would mean that we have refused to believe the evidence of the respondent and the person involved. I think it is only fair to give the benefit of the doubt to those who deserve it. I shall therefore be obliged to vote against this bill.

Mr. McPhillips: As the committee will know, this matter was first resolved by the committee with the dismissal of the petition. There was a recommittal and some further evidence was heard, particularly the evidence of the co-respondent. The hon. member who has just taken his seat undertook to express his views on the matter from his experience. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that I happen to be a lawyer with 31 years of experience. In my experience I have never before heard such an unmitigated liar as was that co-respondent when he came before the committee. This case has been proved to a point where, I submit, any court of law would decree a divorce. As the hon. member for Halifax stated, it is a travesty of justice if people are to be put in a different position when they come to parliament for divorce from that in which they are placed in the ordinary courts of the land. This thing is proved to the hilt. We have the committee report. Why now in committee of the whole are we going to challenge it? In my opinion, there is no question about it that this divorce has been proved to the hilt.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Howard: As was indicated by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, no evidence having been taken or no transcription having been made of the comments in the committee, those of us who were not on the committee are obliged to weigh this matter in the balance and be guided by the opinions expressed by hon. members who were on the committee. After listening to what has just been said by all the hon. members who have just spoken, and in view of the indication given by the Prime Minister just a few moments ago during this private members' hour that these may be the last hours of this session, it appears to me that we should consider spending what few remaining moments we have in this private members' hour in considering as much as we possibly can of the business of the public.

What I mean by that is this. If we were to dispose one way or the other of this particular bill that is before us, we would easily be in a position of allowing to stand the public bills that are listed on the order paper in the names of private members so that we could spend the remaining time in this hour in considering the business which was interrupted at five o'clock. By so doing we would be accomplishing two things. We would be giving more time and consideration to the general public's business and we would also be giving an expression of opinion, one way or another, to the petitioners in this case by dealing with this particular divorce. If the discussion on this bill is to proceed up until six o'clock, I do not think there is a doubt in anybody's mind that it will not be revived again this session, and the petitioner will have an answer in that regard. But in order to expedite things and in order to assist in giving the petitioner an answer from this House of Commons and from this committee considering it now, where the discussion can be more informal than it can be in the house, I would move:

That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: yeas, 4; nays, 39.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Peters: This afternoon some mention has been made of justice being done in this case. On the majority of previous occasions when we were dealing with previous bills and were asked to approve private bills for the relief of so and so, many of those cases were not contested. That would be an indication that at least to the parties concerned it was not a very serious matter whether the charges in the submission were proved or not because they were not interested in contesting the action in any case. That many of them could be contested, I think it is generally agreed. However, some of them are not contested.

This one was contested. It would therefore be an indication that the respondent in this particular case did not think that justice would be served by this case not being opposed. Fundamentally she has come to parliament and asked parliament to hear her side of the story and to give her relief which is exactly the opposite of the relief for which the petitioner is asking in this action.

If justice is to be done it means that there must be no doubt in the minds of members, or no reasonable doubt, that this matter is in order. But it is my contention in this case that there is a very great deal of wrong not only in respect of the submissions made by the many persons who participated in the case but in the circumstances surrounding the allegation of adultery. I believe that justice cannot be done while there is any doubt in anyone's mind that adultery was in fact committed and that it was proved to have been committed by the evidence submitted to the committee. I have looked up the definition of the word "adultery" in Webster's dictionary and it is very definite. It does not mean two people who know each other, or two people who have been exposed to certain circumstances or conditions. Adultery means sexual relationship between two people —a man and a woman—and in this case it does not seem to have been a probability. Therefore I suggest that justice cannot be done by granting a divorce.

We heard a number of witnesses, I believe seven at least, and they were in my opinion a motley crew. My colleague from Timmins has mentioned the length of time the investigators were working on the case, and it was certainly a lengthy period. The inference can therefore be drawn that the motive for taking such a long time was the monetary return which would accrue to these witnesses and also the fact that they could not find any evidence to establish adultery.

One of the investigators, Peter Rosen, makes his living at this kind of work and he came to the committee with so little use for justice that he told us he directed the operation on this particular night and instructed the people with him to break down the door of the house in question, which was locked. The house belonged to a lady and was a private residence but that night he instructed his colleagues to break the law by breaking down a door. One of the other witnesses said that he was scared of this sort of thing; he knew it was against the law and so he did not push very hard. Mr. Rosen, it appears, was not strong enough to bust down the door and that is the kind of evidence that we are asked to accept. Yet some hon. members will stand up in this chamber and say, "We want to see justice done." This man to whom I have referred has so little regard for the law and for justice that I believe in fact the only thing for which he had any regard was the payment for the type of evidence he procured.

A second man, Irving Gore, age 31, was also from Montreal and was a salesman by profession. This young man appeared to be a little too sharp and I suggest that he had other reasons for attending at this residence on the night in question. He said that he did not do this type of work normally but merely did so at the request of Mr. Rosen. He said he did not get paid for doing it but he was inconsistent in this respect because on other occasions apparently he had been paid for doing similar work. This man did not have too much initiative because he was directed to go to the back door and to watch it, I suppose having some knowledge that the front door was to be entered either by ringing the bell or by breaking down the door. He apparently did not try to turn the door knob on the back door and no one contradicted the witness who said that door was open and had not been locked at all. I therefore say that he went there on this occasion for personal reasons and not only because Mr. Rosen had invited him to do so, and in my opinion he was a very untrustworthy witness.

Then there were George and Don Kennedy. George Kennedy, age 31, was also a salesman, this time for one of our crown corporations. Frankly, I think we should be able to pay these people enough money that they do not have to traipse around doing this type of work, but I do think this fellow gave quite reliable evidence, although the joke was made in committee that you have to be rather cautious about the people with whom you travel on T.C.A. because there may be investigators who have certain information from the other jobs on which they might be engaged. I think he was very indiscreet, to say the least, to participate in this type of work, particularly in respect of a divorce case such as the one with which we are dealing and which has already received so much publicity. However, George Kennedy was a comparatively reliable witness. He was under instructions and he got paid for this work, and therefore he was to report exactly what he had been told to investigate. He kept a record in a book of what he did and his testimony was very straightforward. He told us what was written in the book although I am not too sure that this was exactly what he saw.

Don Kennedy was an insurance investigator and I think most people who know investigators in this business have found that they do not normally work on such matters as this as a sideline. His evidence was very pat and had obviously been prepared as he would prepare a report on an investigation into an insurance adjustment matter or other work in his field. Nothing was left to chance—there was no danger of this witness ever being crossed up in respect of his investigation or evidence because he had been very sure to know exactly what he was talking about. This witness was also paid for the job he was hired to do and his evidence was directed towards one end, which in this case was divorce. The evidence of this man, probably more than anyone else's evidence, should be considered in the light of something we have heard in many contested divorce cases to the effect that one must always take with a grain of salt the evidence of a paid investigator.

On the other hand, there were three witnesses, Mr. Leslie Harvey Saunders, age 30, of Dorval, Quebec, who was an executive and a witness called on behalf of the petitioner—and I must apologize for not remembering that witness or his evidence, so I am not in a position to discuss it—next, Mr. George Rolland Foucher, who was an investigator. In respect of this man I would say that anyone who heard his evidence and only his evidence in committee could give any credence to the story he told, particularly in view of the manner in which he told it. I thought his manner of presentation was poorer than that of any other witness.

An hon. Member: You are not doing too well yourself.

Mr. Peters: The co-respondent in this case was not before the Senate but was before the committee and the respondent herself appeared before the committee. In my opinion, her evidence substantiated her remarks. She gave straightforward evidence and yet her evidence was not so pat that you would think she had sat down and read it a few moments before but that she was thinking back to the time this allegation took place. I think she gave good evidence. She was never shaken in my opinion in any detail, and the remarks she made were not disputed in the main by any other witness.

The co-respondent, on the other hand, testified at length and caused his lawyer some concern on many occasions because rather than letting the lawyer lead the witness, the witness was sometimes leading the lawyer's questions. This type of witness makes a very bad impression on any group of people who are sitting in as a jury on this type of case. On many occasions he made statements beyond what he was called upon to make. This was continually being brought to his attention by the chairman, and I think the chairman should be given a great deal of credit for the advice which he gave not only to the witness but to counsel, because, with his legal training and in his capacity as chairman he did an exceptional job in seeing that the questioning was kept to the point. On a number of occasions he had to tell this witness that he was not to answer questions before he was asked and that he was not to anticipate questions which might not be put to him at all. But he did make a number of statements and those statements are now evidence and they have not been refuted. We have discussed a number of them and I do not propose to go into detail on them—

An hon. Member: Five minutes.

Mr. Peters: Only four.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Peters: One particular item of evidence presented by the co-respondent which could have been corroborated by investigation but which could not be because of the constitution of the committee and its functions was the matter of the gasoline receipt. The co-respondent went to great lengths to say that he had had some trouble with the income tax the year before, and during this trouble with the income tax they had laid down the law to him that he must keep receipts for gas, hotel and other expenditures as he went around the country. So he said he kept those gas receipts together with hotel and motel accommodation receipts in a big bag at home, and when he was phoned up by a lawyer he decided he had better bring out some of them for the dates in question—the 10th and the 11th—and for certain other days, and looking in this bag of receipts he found he had a receipt for gasoline for Pembroke on the 10th of the month. He indicated that it was his pattern to go into an area and spend three or four days there before returning to his centre of operations in Montreal, and he gave me the impression that in that bag of receipts there might legitimately have been one for the 11th and the 12th from the Pembroke area. I think that because he made this statement, and because this statement could not be challenged, it was an obligation on the committee, and one the committee must exercise, to have investigated those receipts.

He pointed out something else, that he had in his possession an order from all the companies that he had dealt with. He said he had been informed by other representative district managers in the same company that he belonged to that in this company they kept order forms in loose leaf form from various companies, and he pointed out that he had asked his New York office to send him a copy of those forms for the past year. He indicated that though he would not—

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. My question is this: having made it quite clear, as he has, that he is opposed to this divorce based on his failure to approve the evidence adduced by the petitioner, does he not think that having had most of a two-hour period to make that point it would be a fairer procedure if he would let the question go to a vote rather than talk it out?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: Remember somebody else's human rights.

Mr. Peters: This matter I am raising now has not been raised before the committee, and they have no knowledge of this particular matter.

I was talking about this form that the company had produced, and I think any lawyer would consider that it was fairly acceptable evidence, evidence which the co-respondent himself did not exactly want to produce but which he was willing to produce, and did agree before the committee that he would produce if necessary. I think a lawyer or a judge, if he was presented with this type of evidence would agree that it was not only a record stating that so and so called on such and such for the purpose of taking an order, but that it was returned to a central office where a third party in this matter was to compile this evidence in booklet form, and that this evidence came back in the form of a copy. This evidence came in from the United States office and would indicate that an outside party had adjudicated the value of the evidence contained in this booklet, and this would have been impartial evidence. I think the committee has the right to have their inspectors examine this type of evidence so that a decision could be made on this particular case, and I am inquiring—

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair.

Mr. McCleave: I know how bitterly this has been argued out, and the attitudes and the opinions which have been taken, but there is still a majority and I appeal to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton and to the hon. members of the C.C.F. group who have spoken not to take the law into their own hands on this. We have had two of these hearings. The evidence was presented, we had two hours of discussion and there was a very able presentation of the case. I appeal to the minority to let the house vote on the motion, at which time the committee can either throw out this request or grant it, but not to take the law into their own hands.

Mr. Peters: I have a few more remarks I would like to make at the next sitting of the committee with regard to this bill. I am not saying I am opposed to it, but I have some more remarks to make.

Mr. McCleave: Kangaroo justice; kangaroo courts.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: The time for consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business on which it was engaged when it was interrupted at five o'clock.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VALUE FOR DUTY, APPEALS TO EXCHEQUER COURT, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-51, to amend the Customs Act—Mr. Nowlan—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Determination of value for duty.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: We are discussing clause 1.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, before five o'clock I was dealing with clause 1 in relation to GATT. I want to attempt to show that there are some provisions in this bill which in our opinion do constitute a violation of this international agreement. In our view, it is quite clear, notwithstanding what the minister has said, that section 38(b), which I think is a new one, does violate GATT directly. Subsection (a), as a matter of fact, I think can also be interpreted as a violation.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member. We are dealing with section 38. Is he going back to the beginning, or can he begin at the beginning so that we shall get an orderly procedure? I do not object so long as we know where we are going.

Mr. Pearson: I would be quite willing to wait until we reach the sections, but it would mean that each time we got to a section I would have to talk about the relation to GATT. If the minister is willing—

Mr. Nowlan: Would it be all right if we considered section 38, or whichever one the hon. member prefers?

Mr. Pearson: The three sections which we think are violations of GATT directly are 37, 38 and 39. I was starting with 38 because I thought it was the most important section in regard to its relationship to GATT; that is, section 38(b), because section 38(b) in this bill is not limited to goods imported under such conditions as to cause or threaten injury to domestic producers. There is no qualification of that kind, and therefore this particular provision does not seem to us to be covered by article XIX of GATT. Surely there cannot be a much clearer violation of GATT than section 38(b) which says:

> Where in any case or class of cases (b) the goods imported—

And then there is a whole list of conditions under which the goods would be imported, and it goes on to say that "the value for duty shall be determined in such manner as the minister prescribes." We would be very interested to see how the minister can relate that particular provision to our obligations under GATT.

We have not yet received from the minister in previous discussion of this bill any explanation about it; but whatever may be the intentions of the government in respect of the application of this section, we on this side can hardly accept a section that we think is a violation of GATT and therefore incompatible with Canadian interests. Perhaps the wording of this section does not correspond with the intention of the government in regard to it. Perhaps we will find that out when we discuss the section.

The second section which we think is a violation of GATT is section 39 which, in our opinion, violates two provisions of GATT, namely article VII because of the use of the concept of cost of production plus a reasonable gross profit determined by the governor in council which, in our view, is equivalent to the fixing of arbitrary values. It also, in our view, violates article VI, paragraph 7 of GATT because a measure other than the anti-dumping duty is provided for the purpose of offsetting dumping in this particular section.

Now, whether section 39 is covered by the escape clause, which is article XIX of GATT, depends on the meaning of three words in the section, namely "material" and "may be". The section reads:

> Where the minister is satisfied that material injury has been or may be caused to any industry in Canada,—

And so on. The GATT language is not injury that may be caused; the words used are "serious injury", and if material injury is not equivalent to serious injury or if "may be caused" is not equivalent to "threaten", which is the GATT language, section 39 is not covered by the escape clause and therefore it is a violation of GATT. If the minister had desired to be absolutely certain in this clause that GATT was not being violated, surely he should have used the language of GATT, he should have used the words "threaten serious injury".

The final section which we think violates GATT is section 37, which is new. When it is interpreted in the light of the very arbitrary and vague definition of cost of production and gross profit contained in section 35 and section 34, it appears to us clear that for all practical purposes the value for duty determined under this provision in section 37 will be arbitrary. Moreover, in section 37 no reference is made to actual or potential injury to domestic producers. Therefore, it follows that section 37 is contrary to article VII of GATT and that it is not even covered by the escape clause. It is a direct violation of an international agreement which we have accepted in the provisions of GATT.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the three clauses which we think do violate our undertakings under GATT. The minister may be able to remove our apprehensions in respect of one or possibly two, but on the wording of section 38(b) it is impossible for us to reconcile this in any way, shape or form with GATT.

These are the general observations that I want to make with one other matter that covers several clauses. Before five o'clock the minister read out a list of orders which were passed by the previous government under, I think, section 38 which before—whatever the date was—was section 43. I told him then that I had made quite a serious mistake in suggesting that only one order was passed by the previous government under that section; but the point I want to make is this.

If this clause, if this section, if this law could be used for the purpose for which it was used and which the minister indicated, to prevent the dumping into Canada of goods from foreign countries, if it could be used so effectively as that when the emergency required it to be used, and I think that was the only time we used it, if it was adequate for this purpose at that time, perhaps the minister will explain when we come to the sections why it is necessary to make all these changes now?

Mr. McIlraith: I want to raise one point as to 35 (1) (b), the definition of the words "cost of production". I admit frankly that I find it difficult to understand this language. "Cost of production" is defined in this way:

> "Cost of production" means an amount that in accordance with good business principles and practices fairly reflects the manufacture or production costs of the goods at the time of shipment to Canada.

What concerns me is this. Cost of production is something that I think I can understand and I can understand departmental officials seeking to ascertain what it is, but instead of this definition helping to clarify the matter it seems to me that it only confuses it and introduces new and, if I may say so, what appear to be irrelevant criteria. You will note that it does not say that cost of production means an amount that in accordance with good business principles and practices means production costs, which would be a useless repetition of language but would at least be understandable, but says that the cost of production merely reflects production costs. If it reflects production costs, from what does it reflect them and what other factors does it reflect as well as production costs?

It seems to me that this is a definition of an important phrase that is only confusing. Indeed, if one were so minded I think one could attempt to ridicule it but that is not my purpose at all. The point I wish to make is that instead of the definition clarifying or being helpful or laying down any criteria that would be useful in the understanding of this phrase it lays down in a way that is not understandable a definition that is utterly meaningless and permits the introduction, I respectfully suggest, of any criteria that any administrative officer might wish to use. The idea that the cost of production merely reflects production costs is a pretty discouraging definition. I wonder whether the minister could clarify what was intended there and whether he would give some consideration to attempting to clarify the language used?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, on this matter I am advised that the language used here is the language which has been adopted by the courts in defining costs, particularly in connection with income tax cases but also in other matters where business costs have had to be determined. Where there are so many variables entering into the picture, as the hon. gentleman well knows, you cannot exactly tell what the cost may be but it reflects the cost, and at least this language has the approval of the courts. I am advised that it was put in for that reason and if it does not clarify it I can only say that it was hoped that it would. The actual costs that enter into these matters are simply the direct costs of material, labour and factory overhead. But then, of course, you have depreciation and other things entering into the picture and that is why the word "reflects" is used.

Mr. McIlraith: I quite appreciate the minister's answer. I am familiar with some of the court decisions on what cost of production means but I am wondering whether it would not have been better to leave the definition of cost of production to the decisions of the courts. I may say frankly that I have more confidence in the definition as determined by the courts than I have in the definition as set out here in paragraph (b). That is my whole point.

Mr. Pearson: On this question perhaps the minister will explain why it was necessary, notwithstanding what he has said, to depart from the present definition in section 35 (7) of the present law which reads as follows:

> Where the value for duty cannot be determined . . . the value for duty shall be the actual cost of production of like or similar goods at the date of shipment to Canada—

I am a layman but it seems to me that is a more practical and sensible definition than the one in the amendment which refers to good business principles and practices fairly reflecting manufacturing costs. How anyone here can determine, for instance, what is a good business practice or principle on the part of an exporter in Hong Kong is difficult for me to understand. Why did we depart from the rather simple and practical language of the present section 35 (7)?

Mr. Nowlan: As the hon. gentleman has said, perhaps the other definition had the virtue of simplicity. I can assure him that I am very much of a layman myself when it comes to dealing with matters of customs law, but the very fact that it was simple made it impossible to apply. Take the word "actual". How do you get the actual cost when you have a machine producing perhaps four or five different commodities or types of goods and it is impossible to ascribe the proportion of depreciation between them? The department was running into difficulties with respect to establishing the actual cost. It was felt that this was a much more practical approach to the matter and one which achieved the same thing but at least avoided trying to do the impossible, walking into a court and proving the actual cost.

Mr. McIlraith: Does the minister's answer not clearly illustrate that what we should not inject into the bill is this cost of production factor? We should have stayed with the value for duty.

Mr. Nowlan: We did not inject it into the bill. It has been in the legislation for many years.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, it has been in the act for many years but in quite a different form because it was a subsection of section 35 and it was a criterion laid down for establishing duty to be applied only when the other procedures could not be followed, including the fair market value.

Mr. Nowlan: The principle was used. You had to use it sometimes.

Mr. Crestohl: During the discussion of subclause 1 having to do with the question of determining the value of production I think the minister said that it would not infringe any of the terms of GATT. I believe the minister said that he obtained a legal opinion that the bill does not contravene any of the GATT regulations. Could the minister table that legal opinion?

Mr. Nowlan: I did not say I had obtained a legal opinion. I said that in my opinion this was not a violation of GATT, and of course that was based on discussions and all the other matters that go into the drafting of a bill. If my hon. friend misunderstood me I am sorry, but I certainly did not say I had obtained a legal opinion to that effect.

Mr. Crestohl: The minister knows that I respect his own legal views but since this is a matter which might involve international situations and an international treaty or contract, does the minister not think that it would be wise for him to obtain a legal opinion tc bolster his position? I really think the matter is a serious one and a legal opinion in the record certainly would be very helpful to his position which now leaves considerable doubt whether or not Canada may be violating an international agreement.

I think the minister, for his own comfort and peace of mind, should get a legal opinion to support our position in so far as Canada is concerned.

Mr. Nowlan: I shall deal with GATT when we come to section 37.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion on section 35?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. There is section 35 (c) which defines gross profit. It says:

"gross profit" means the fair market value of the goods when sold in the circumstances described in section 36, minus the cost of production.

This seems to us to be a rather arbitrary way of defining profit. Perhaps the minister will explain why this definition is put in this way. There is an additional, and what I consider to be an important, weakness in this definition, quite apart from the consideration which I have just mentioned. The clause reads, and I will repeat it:

"gross profit" means the fair market value of the goods when sold in the circumstances described in section 36, minus the cost of production thereof.

According to this definition it is supposed to apply to all sections of the bill. I take it gross profit can be determined only when it is possible to measure the fair market value of the goods when sold in the circumstances described in section 36. I am going to stick to my notes very carefully here because this is a complicated matter. I may say I found some difficulty in understanding it when it was being explained to me. If that is the definition of gross profit which is going to be used to determine the value for duty under sections 37 and 39 of this act, only where the conditions and circumstances described in section 36 will not be found, the definition of gross profit is limited to the conditions of section 36, but it does not apply to that section since the fair market value will be used there. On the other hand, the definition will apply to sections 37 and 39 where it does not fit.

Now does that not really make nonsense of this definition of gross profit? It seems to me it makes the definition not only useless, but if interpreted in this legal sense it could prevent the application of section 37 and perhaps even section 39 because of its non-applicability to those sections.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion on section 35?

Mr. Pearson: Does the minister not think there is something in the point I have raised? Is this not going to lead to difficulty if the bill is passed in this way?

Mr. Nowlan: The Leader of the Opposition said he had difficulty in understanding it when he first read it. I have great difficulty in following it at the moment. Frankly, of course, gross profit applies to sections 37 and 39. I am not exactly certain just what problem the Leader of the Opposition had in mind in raising that question. I have discussed it on various occasions, and I did not find the problem arising which he apparently has in mind.

Mr. Pearson: In a word, I will put it this way, and if the minister thinks there is no difficulty, we will go on.

Mr. Nowlan: There is difficulty right through.

Mr. Pearson: This represents an illogicality which could cause serious difficulty in the application of this measure. Gross profit means the fair market value of the goods when sold under the circumstances described in section 36. Now, those circumstances cannot apply in respect of sections 37 and 39, and therefore how can you possibly apply this definition to those sections and how can those sections be implemented?

Mr. Nowlan: The term "gross profit" is found in sections 37 and 39 and those are the only places where that term is used. You have similar goods in section 37, and in section 39 you have the new clause to which my hon. friend has taken such great objection. The conditions applied, of course, are referred to as the circumstances described in section 36, that is dealing at arm's length and so on, when they can be applied. It certainly does not apply in section 36, and it only applies in sections 37 and 39.

Mr. Pearson: It applies to sections 37 and 39 under the conditions laid down in section 36, and those circumstances are not applicable in sections 37 and 39.

Mr. Nowlan: Some of us are confused between similar goods and like goods. There is a difference between like goods and similar goods, and to that extent there must be a difference. Mention is made of no sales at the time when the goods were shipped to Canada; no purchasers located at the place from which the goods were shipped to Canada, and all the rest of those circumstances described in section 36 which must be found in sections 37 and 39, if possible, in order to determine the gross profit.

Mr. Pearson: I can only hope that the minister and his department do not get into trouble in the application of this section. If the minister is satisfied that it is workable, then we will wait and see what happens next year. We had an amendment to move to this section, but if the minister is satisfied, we will move on.

Mr. Nowlan: I can assure my hon. friend the minister did not draft it, anyway.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on section 36?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I find myself in some difficulty with section 36. It seems to me, perhaps, that the section is replacing paragraphs (2) and (3) of the present section 35. My difficulty is simply this: There seem to be three criteria set out here, and one is that under the new provisions, the selling price of like goods in the country of export will serve to determine the value for duty. Then there is a paragraph which says, if the producers in the country of export are located at the same place as the point of shipment of the goods imported into Canada; that is one of the criteria. The second one is if these purchasers are dealing at arm's length with the vendor or exporter, and that principle is fairly clear. The third one is that these producers are at the same or at substantially the same trade level as the Canadian importer.

My difficulty arises particularly with the first of these criteria mentioned. My point is that the whole purport of adding these three additional criteria seems to be to have the effect of restricting the application of the fair market principle. It is that difficulty with which I am concerned. I should like the minister to try to explain what he is seeking to do by this change.

Mr. Nowlan: These criteria to which the hon. member referred, you will find of course qualified to some extent by 2 (a) and (b) in the bill on page 2. I am advised that these criteria have always been applied by the department in interpreting and administering section 35 of the existing act.

Mr. McIlraith: Could the minister tell me whether or not they have the effect of in any way restricting the application of the fair market principle? My whole difficulty arises from the fear that the minister, in this bill, is getting away from the fair market principle and introducing another principle which is objectionable.

Mr. Nowlan: No, there is no thought of restricting that in any way, shape or form, Mr. Chairman. There have been difficulties about certain administrative practices. There have been some questions raised in the courts about certain matters, and this has been done to clarify the procedure which has been carried on throughout the years. Certainly, there is no thought of restricting in any way, shape or form the application of it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any more discussion on section 36? Is there any discussion on section 37?

Mr. Pearson: Section 37 replaces subsections 4 and 5 of the present section 35. I feel that the conditions in this new section 37 are much more rigid than are the conditions of the existing law, and that the result of that may well be that similar goods will serve much less often than they do at present as the basis of comparison for determining the value for duty. This afternoon the minister indicated how important that was because like goods these days are not very often like. When similar goods are used as a basis of comparison under this section the fair market value will not apply, I suggest, as it does at the present time and that instead, under this section, use will be made of the cost of production of the imported goods plus the percentage of gross profit made on similar goods.

I have here an illustration which will show how this rule could apply in practice. The minister may be able to remove—and I hope he will be able to do so—our worry on this score. If we assume that the cost of production of goods imported is one dollar and that the cost of production of similar goods is fifty cents and that the amount of gross profit made on the similiar goods in the home market is five or ten per cent, then I take it that under the section that percentage would be applied to the cost of production of the goods imported so that the value for duty of the goods imported would be one dollar plus 10 per cent or $1.10. I can see that in theory a case can be made for the application of that principle and that practice. It may have merit on the theoretical ground. But it seems to me that in practice, if there is a material difference between the cost of production of the goods imported and that of the so-called similar goods, then surely section 37 could not apply because the goods compared would not in fact be similar goods and new section 38 would have to be used. Is that right?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: That increases our worry about the use of this section and the introduction of new rigidity into our present evaluation procedure. If this is going to result in a switch from section 37 to section 38, may I say this. Perhaps I will wait until we get to section 38, at which time we shall be able to tell the minister what we think of that particular section. But here again

I suggest that section 37 minimizes the fair market value principle that has been applied in the past and emphasizes—and we think it is an undesirable development—the cost of production principle.

Mr. Nowlan: In the first place, the Leader of the Opposition suggested that there were not so many goods of like kind that were sold today as there were of similar kinds. I am advised that the situation is just the reverse and that there are many more cases of like goods than there are of similar ones. One of the reasons is the rigidity of the practice which has heretofore prevailed and which prevailed up until tonight in dealing with similar goods. As I ventured to say this afternoon, similar goods to be like have to be absolutely like. Similar is defined very closely. As I said this afternoon, you get your package of lima beans, for instance, and you have a 12-ounce package. The Americans use a 10-ounce package. Where they manufacture for us, they ship a 12-ounce package but they do not sell anything but the 10-ounce package in the United States. In that case we can use the similar one, applying in the larger quantity. That is fine. You get the same price for that, the 12-ounce here and the 10-ounce there. But if they reverse their views, then you get perhaps 14 on the similar use, in the illustration I used this afternoon, and you soon get into a situation where your similar goods perhaps will not apply; at least it is not under existing procedure. Whether that practice is justified or not, I do not know; we think it has been.

Under this section, the provisions of section 37, you will find contained approximately the same provisions or the basis of them as set forth in sections 35 (4), 35 (5) and 35 (7). These are the sections which have been used and incorporated in the new section 37 including the practice which has had to be applied in dealing with this section. What happens is this. If you could not use section 37 you were driven to the very harsh subsection in section 35. You have your choice. You take section 34 (4) of the present act or section 35 (5). If you could not apply those, and very often you could not do so, then you were faced with a situation where you had to fix the duty. That we felt was too harsh a rule. This is an ameliorating section. I may assure the hon. member that is the intention of it, to increase the protection, not to make it harsher. It is to ameliorate an existing practice which has grown up. Therefore you have this formula which at least will give some valuation. You may say it is hard to apply; perhaps it will be, but it cannot be any more difficult than is the practice which we go through today and where in the end you are driven to the minister in fixing the value himself.

Mr. Pearson: The minister said that the intention is to ameliorate the harsh practices under the act under section 35 (4) and (5) which deals with similar goods. I would point out to the minister that in this subsection the principle adopted is the fair market value in both cases whereas the principle adopted in this section 37 is the cost of production. Why should not this section read as follows? Would the minister consider the matter and tell me what is wrong with this kind of amendment? Why should not that section read as follows:

> Subject to section 38, where like goods were not sold for home consumption, or were not sold for home consumption in the circumstances described in section 36, but similar goods were so sold, the value for duty shall, notwithstanding any invoice or affidavit to the contrary, be the fair market value of such similar goods.

Why do we not use that test?

Mr. Nowlan: As I tried to say a few moments ago, that is the law today. That is the law with respect to similar goods, that it shall be the fair market value. But the department has found in administrative practice that the margin of goods, the quantity of goods, the volume of similar goods to which you can apply that fair market rule is so small that we are forced to go to the other section and so this other definition, this other practice has been brought into being in order to correct the situation.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any more discussion on section 37?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we discuss section 38?

Mr. Nowlan: That is the problem of applying a Buick price to a Chevrolet. You reach that problem in trying to value similar goods. That is what happens.

Mr. Pearson: The minister thinks that the application of the cost of production is going to be easier.

Mr. Nowlan: We think so. We think it is going to be fairer.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we discuss section 38?

Mr. Pickersgill: On section 38, can the minister explain why the wording has been changed at the end of the new subsection (a). It appears that (a) corresponds to clause 6 of the existing section 35. Clause 6 of section 35 reads as follows:

> (6) When the value for duty cannot be determined . . . the value for duty of the goods shall be such value as the minister determines.

And the end of the new section reads as follows:

—the value for duty shall be determined in such manner as the minister prescribes.

Mr. Nowlan: The reason for that is the very laudable desire of this government to make this act more generous and more workable and to safeguard the taxpayers. Under the existing section there would be no right of appeal but in the new section as it is now there will be a right of appeal and we have drafted it deliberately, so as to provide for that right of appeal.

Mr. Pickersgill: That seems to be quite a laudable thing to have done. Naturally I have no criticism of it. But there does seem to be a more fundamental criticism that I would like to make and in view of the complicated nature of this subject I will try to make it as explicitly as possible and to stick pretty closely to the wording of my notes and not to try any freewheeling.

Mr. Nowlan: I haven't any notes, that is the trouble.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no one to prompt me as has the minister. It does appear to us that if the application of clauses (b), (c) and (d) were limited to the conditions mentioned in clause (a), then there would be relatively little objection to section 38, since all the special cases mentioned in the subsequent clauses would merely make the general provision in clause (a) more explicit and, as I have said, this would help to clarify the act and possibly to reduce the administrative complexity.

I admit I put this forward with some hesitation because I have never had anything to do with administering the Customs Act which I gather is more complicated, though perhaps it does not get him into any more trouble, than the administering of the Immigration Act.

As these clauses are presently worded, their application does not seem to be limited by the conditions in clause (a) and they therefore seem to us to be unacceptable because of the very wide discretionary powers they give to the minister. As the clauses now read it appears that the value of the goods which are not fully manufactured or which are used or are not of prime quality or which constitute a job will be determined as the minister prescribes, or if the minister is of the opinion that there is an unusual situation he shall determine the value of duty.

As I said before, we do not minimize the complexity of the varied circumstances which can arise under this section and the fact that there are all kinds of special cases which do and inevitably must arise when there is as much trade as there is coming into this country and that in many of these cases the circumstances cannot possibly be covered by any general rules or principles which even the wisest of us could devise. We do feel, however, that the provisions contained in this section are too wide and arbitrary and that they would greatly and unduly restrict the application of the fair market principle.

There does not seem to be any good reason why that principle should not be applied whenever possible to the most important sector of goods which are not fully manufactured or are not of prime quality and as the clauses now read they seem to have the effect of reducing the power to tax which belongs exclusively to parliament, which power we do not wish to see abridged and they do not appear to us to be in conformity with the spirit and objectives of GATT.

We think it might be possible to improve this section somewhat by an amendment and therefore, without further ado, I am going to move a rather lengthy amendment of which I shall send a copy to the minister immediately, to the following effect.

That in section 38 all the words after "cases" in line 26 be deleted and replaced by the following:

"The value for duty cannot be determined under section 36 or 37 for the reason that like or similar goods are not sold in the country of export or are not sold in such country in the circumstances described in those sections, and in particular but without restricting the generality of the foregoing,

(a) where the goods are imported

(i) are intended to be assembled, packaged or further manufactured in Canada or are intended to enter into the course of manufacture in Canada,

(ii) are used or obsolete goods,

(iii) are not prime quality goods as known in the trade, or are known in the trade as remnants, close-outs or discontinued lines or are surplus goods,

(iv) constitute a job lot, or

(v) are intended to be used directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods and like goods are not sold in the country of export,

(b) where like goods are leased but not sold in the country of export, or

(c) the minister is of the opinion that by reason of unusual circumstances the application of sections 36 and 37 is impracticable, the value for duty shall be determined in such manner as the minister prescribes."

I admit this is very complex, but most of it is a repetition of what is already in the clause. There are one or two minor variations but it is all made dependent upon the main provision.

Mr. Pearson: While the minister is studying the improving amendment to this section may I point out, because I made a good deal of this in my previous discussion of the subject, that this section 38 is the part of the bill to which we took greatest exception, particularly section 38 (b), I ask the minister to consider the attitude of this government if the United States government had a section of this kind in its legislation which read, "Where in any case or class of cases the goods imported" and I go down to (v):

—are intended to be used directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods and like goods are not sold in the country of export.

The minister could determine the duty in such manner as he likes. That would mean that if we were exporters of some semi-manufactured goods to the United States and if the United States had a provision of this kind the customs people in that country could fix any duty they wished on that Canadian import, and they would not have to prove under this section that any damage was done to the United States producers. All they would have to do is to decide that goods were in the process of manufacture and they could apply arbitrary customs duties as they desired. Surely that is directly contrary to GATT.

Mr. Nowlan: I notice that this section 38 is one which has caused some concern to the newspapers and has even caused a good friend of the Leader of the Opposition, Michael Barkway, some concern as evidenced when he spoke a week ago about international trade. These unfortunate suspicions to which I referred this afternoon, which have coloured the imaginations of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the bill, are particularly noticeable when we are dealing with section 38, and I think if they would only divest themselves of the suspicions and look upon this bill in the same broad, generous and christian way in which the government has looked upon it they would find that their suspicions were unfounded.

Mr. Pearson: The minister is beginning to talk like Mr. C. D. Howe.

Mr. Pickersgill: He is sitting in the same seat.

Mr. Nowlan: Then I think they would have no such worries, but the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will notice that I have not studied his amendment as yet because I am having it looked over by the officers. It is not, I think, one which the government can accept, however, because it concerns all these classes, it is a catch-all section which deals with various classes and, for instance, subsection (a) has no reference at all to subsection (b) in any way, shape or form. Subsection (a) would cover goods from a country where this is no freedom of economy, for example a country behind the iron curtain, in which case it would be impossible to determine value. Or it could cover a lot of cases where we have such things as architects' plans.

Mr. Pickersgill: Do not speak of the subject.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, that is an unfortunate example which perhaps I should not have brought up, but there might be a case where plans were prepared in the United States from blueprints and were sent here to a subsidiary company for use, and it would be impossible to find the cost. There might be thousands of hours spent in preparing these plans in the United States and if we were to apply sections 36 and 37, we would then have to apply section 38 of the act. This is the relevant section to enable us to fix a duty in such a case.

As I have said, we would like to be perfectly fair in fixing values and, as the opposition has said, we agree that the most fair way is by taking the fair market value, but there are cases where fair market value would create hardship and where fair market value would even work the other way, where you could get goods coming in from foreign countries, such as countries behind the iron curtain, and where you could not possibly fix a fair market value. In such a case the minister certainly would have a right to fix a value on which the duty is going to be imposed on such goods.

I can give the committee hundreds of examples and with regard to one of them I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that if the United States government—the secretary of the treasury, whoever he is—were to impose excessive duties under this section we might say that under the test of fair market value the value for duty might very easily be too high, and the intention, far removed from the dark clouds of suspicion which so spoiled the dinners of hon. gentlemen opposite, is to use that as a relieving section and to fix duties when circumstances justify at a lower rate.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said we were suspicious before, but I can tell him we are twice as suspicious now. What he has been trying to say is that this is a clause to enable him to give secret abatements of duty. He has suggested he could reduce the valuation below fair market value. I am in favour of having duties reduced, but at the same time there should be a standard applicable to all, and a standard that is known.

Mr. Pearson: We think this amendment will bring it into harmony with GATT. We think it is now in violation of GATT.

Mr. Nowlan: The government cannot accept the amendment. We think it will render the section inoperative and destroy the whole purpose of the section.

Amendment (Mr. Pickersgill) negatived: Yeas, 26; nays, 72.

Mr. Crestohl: Before we leave this section I should like to ask the minister to look at subclause (d). The minister is of the opinion that in unusual circumstances the value for duty shall be determined as he prescribes. I think, however, that those who export to Canada from other countries should also know precisely the basis for calculating the duties, and if there are mysteries—and there appear to be mysterious aspects to this—other countries are not given the basis on which they are able to calculate the value for duty which they should have.

I should like to make one other observation to the minister, namely that as we proceed the matter is becoming more complicated and more difficult to understand. The other day I referred to Philadelphia lawyers and I spoke about cruelty to lawyers. I might have added cruelty to ministers and deputy ministers and officials in expecting them to be able to establish value for duty according to the terms of this bill. I would ask the minister to explain to the house what is meant by unusual circumstances. If he could do this, I think it would be helpful.

Mr. Nowlan: I will give the hon. member an example—correspondence courses—the LaSalle course, for example. How much do you charge for books and how much do you allow for tuition? There are hundreds of individual examples which I could give, including obsolete machinery, goods coming from behind the iron curtain and so on. I appreciate what the hon. member says about there being cruelty to the minister, and it would be unless the minister had very capable officials who have the experience and the background necessary to enable them to do this work. This practice has been carried on by the department for several years and in the great majority of cases which come forward under this section which says that where the value for duty cannot be fixed it will be determined by the minister, it means, in effect, that it will be fixed by the officials because, in most cases the minister knows nothing about them.

As to the public knowing, the rules applying to different classes are always available in the departmental offices and any exporter or importer can go to the offices and be satisfied—at least he will be told—as to the basis on which the duty is imposed.

Mr. Crestohl: May I give an example. Let us assume that an exporter in the United States wants to ship something to Canada. He should go to the Canadian authorities in the United States and ask them what will be the value for duty of this article which he wishes to send to Canada. I do not think there is an official in the United States in the Canadian service who would be in a position to tell that exporter what the value for duty will be, or what the basis for calculating will be. That is the example I would like the minister to deal with.

Mr. Nowlan: There are millions of dollars worth of goods coming across every day. I do not think many exporters have much difficulty in determining the basis of duty. There are individual cases, of course, as the hon. member said. In a case such as that, if information is not available, the person—usually it is a person in Canada who is worrying about the duty because he would have to pay it—in the United States could write the office of the Department of National Revenue in Ottawa and the information would be supplied to him forthwith.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I am going to move an amendment which I am sure the government will want to accept. As my leader and others of my colleagues have pointed out, this new section 38 is one of the sections which bestows arbitrary powers upon the minister. The government has announced a policy of expansion of trade with Britain and with the commonwealth. In view of that announcement we would hope that there would be no intention whatever to use the powers granted under this clause to restrict goods coming in from Britain and from commonwealth countries. However, in view of the forthcoming trade conference, we feel that we should make our position abundantly clear without any shadow of doubt whatsoever. Therefore, I move:

That the new section 38(b) be amended by adding the words "And not entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff" after the word "imported" in line 32.

Mr. Nowlan: My hon. friend is undoubtedly sincere in trying to help the importation of British goods. I simply point out that the amendment would prejudice the British or anyone else who benefits by the preferential tariff, because we would have to apply the value for duty, and they would be prejudiced rather than helped. If he wants to push the amendment why, of course, we will have to defeat it, because there is no question about it, the amendment is just negativing what the hon. member had in mind. It is also a fact that today we cannot distinguish between one country and another. I hope when he thinks it over he will drop his amendment because otherwise he will defeat his own purpose.

Mr. Carter: Can the minister give us an illustration so that we can understand the point he has just made because it is certainly not clear from anything he has said. He has just made the statement that it was a negative of what we were trying to accomplish but he did not illustrate it in any way at all.

Mr. Nowlan: Goods could be coming in from Great Britain which would receive preferential treatment or a reduction below the fair market value. If you say this shall not be applied to goods which benefit under the preference then, of course, you could not apply it at all. That is the trouble.

Mr. Pearson: Surely, Mr. Chairman, the minister is assuming that this section is going to be used in a way which would reduce tariffs. It could be applied the other way.

Mr. Nowlan: Not if you say it cannot apply to certain classes of goods.

Mr. Pearson: If it is not applied to certain classes of goods coming from British commonwealth countries under the British preferential treatment, then other sections will have to apply. But for the minister to say we would be defeating our case by moving this amendment because invariably it would be applied in such a way as to reduce the value on British goods, then I say that in the past customs officers have not operated in that way.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Carter) negatived: yeas, 24; nays, 73.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion on section 38?

Mr. Pearson: Section 39 is an important section. It is new and it is contrary to GATT.

The Deputy Chairman: It is rather hard to hear the hon. member speaking because of the noise in the chamber. Will hon. members please keep their voices down?

Mr. Pearson: Hon. members are not going to expedite the business of the committee in this way. There are a good many sections in the bill. We are going to deal with them with the seriousness to which they are entitled.

As I say, this is one of the most important sections in the bill. In our view, it is a violation of GATT because under the GATT escape clause it has to be proven that the country's trade was being affected by imports introduced under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury. We cannot understand why the minister did not transfer to this section the language of the GATT agreement. What he has said is:

> Where the minister is satisfied that material injury has been or may be caused to any industry in Canada.

The GATT language is, "to cause or threaten serious injury". That is the first weakness of this provision, and a weakness which will make it very difficult to bring it within the terms of GATT, a weakness which we hope to rectify by an amendment which would replace the words used by the words in GATT. Surely there should not be any difficulty about that. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move:

> That, in section 39, the words "material injury has been or may be caused to any industry in Canada, or any portion thereof, by reason of the importation of any new or unused goods or class of such goods" be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "serious injury has been caused to, or threatens, domestic producers by reason of the importation of any new or unused goods or class of such goods not entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff".

Before this amendment is put, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should add some words about the last part of it which exempts goods entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff. This qualification is embodied in another section of this bill. It is in a parallel section of the present act and the minister said this afternoon that it was taken out of this section so that it would conform to GATT. But it is in another section of the bill. Therefore, it seems to me that with the qualifying words we have used in the amendment, which are the words used in the GATT escape clause, there can be no possibility of this section being charged as a violation of GATT. Therefore we do ask the minister to include this qualification in this particular part of the bill.

Mr. Nowlan: The words "material injury", of course, are the words which are used in the dumping section of GATT and that is why that phrase was used here. The expression "material injury" is the expression used there and for that reason it was adopted by the draftsmen here.

Mr. McIlraith: What is that reference?

Mr. Nowlan: Personally I would have no objection to substituting the words which are suggested by the Leader of the Opposition but I certainly cannot accept the final qualification with respect to the British preference because I think the Leader of the Opposition is overlooking something. It is true that we have got that phraseology in one of the subsections which we have borrowed from the present act. I am told that section was put in there in 1932 at the time of the negotiations during the first imperial conference. It was put in at the request of the United Kingdom and has been kept there ever since. Since it was in before GATT and is part of it it has been accepted, and we feel that the use of that is not in any way creating any further differences or creating a preference between one country and another.

But if you incorporated a new section and used that phrase we believe we would be having direct trouble with GATT and would be open to charges respecting it. Therefore we have not used it. Frankly, we do not think that section 39 is a violation of GATT at all. GATT has sufficient references to fair market value and ordinary course of trade procedures. Paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 36 of the bill refers to the ordinary course of trade. A man who is a manufacturer must have a certain amount of profit by way of return in addition to his actual costs. Section 39 requires that the value for duty be not less than that which obtains in the ordinary course of trade. The cost of production has a bearing on the general agreement and in a brief I have here it says that the final act stipulates that such duties shall not be levied unless the effect of the dumping is such as to cause or threaten material injury.

These conditions have been written into section 39 and are to apply before the cost of production basis may be used. Paragraphs 2 (a) and 2 (b) of article VII of GATT require that the actual value in the ordinary course of trade be taken as the criterion of value. Surely the ordinary cost of trade infers that a reasonable amount will be earned over the cost of production. Section 39 of the bill provides for the addition of an amount representing gross profit having regard to the gross profit generally earned in that particular trade or business in the country of export. If you turn to the interpretative notes of the general agreement you will find the following with respect to article VII:

> The wording of subparagraph (a) and (b) permits a contracting party to assess duty uniformly either (1) on the basis of a particular exporter's prices of the imported merchandise, or (2) on the basis of the general price level of like merchandise.

Section 39 is intended merely to assess duty on the general price level of like merchandise and nothing more. This is interesting. At the review session of GATT in 1955 customs experts from all over the world, including some of our own, examined the cost of production clauses appearing in the legislation of several members of GATT, and there are cost of production clauses. Whatever they may have said verbally or whatever their thinking may have been, there was no reference in the report whatsoever to the inclusion of these cost of production clauses which have crept in between the former review and the one which took place in 1955.

I think my hon. friends must have rationalized this as consonant with GATT when they passed in 1953 what is in this bill section 40A (7) (a) establishing the fair market value at the end of the season, having in mind the values and so on at that time. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate expressed some misgivings or some doubt about it this afternoon, but at any rate the same principle is embodied there. That may be a matter of argument.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would suggest it was.

Mr. Nowlan: I am suggesting that it is. Certainly the government of the day must have rationalized that and said to themselves that it was not a violation of GATT or they would not have brought it before parliament for enactment. I think the same reasoning which would justify that also justifies section 39 in so far as GATT is concerned.

Mr. Pearson: In so far as the first part of the minister's argument was concerned, which dealt with the inclusion of the words "not entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff" he has said that the provision in the existing law was accepted by GATT because it was there at the time the GATT agreement became effective. But I would remind the minister that when we signed GATT we had to make a good many changes in our customs law to conform to GATT, and he will remember the one case he mentioned this afternoon. He said we did not make this change until 1948. We made it in 1948 because although it was in the law before the GATT agreement was concluded it was inconsistent with GATT and we changed it. If this clause is inconsistent with GATT in respect of this bill which is new, then surely it is inconsistent with GATT in respect of a clause which was there when GATT was signed. I am not going to argue that point. The minister has another view on it.

I understood him to say that the amendment would be acceptable to him if the British preferential reference at the end is dropped and the wording of the clause is changed to conform to the exact words of the GATT escape clause, thereby making it more difficult for this clause to be invoked in the future.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to have a look at it.

Mr. Pearson: It would be the amendment I have submitted but taking out the words at the end "under the British preferential tariff". It would just change the wording to conform with the actual wording of GATT. Perhaps the minister would let it stand.

Mr. Nowlan: Have you got another copy there?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I can send my copy over to the minister.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 40 carry?

Mr. Caron: This is one of the sections, Mr. Chairman, which is objectionable. This section further extends the arbitrary powers given to the minister by this bill. We have already contended that it would be practically impossible to obtain sufficient information to determine cost of production and gross profit, especially as they are defined in this bill. In most cases where these concepts should apply to the determination of value for duty under sections 37 and 39, the minister will be in a position to say that sufficient information has not been furnished or is not available and he will, therefore, be authorized to prescribe the value for duty.

The minister will have that same power and will be able to suspend the application of section 36 if he can claim simply that sufficient information has not been furnished to determine the fair market value. With such wording, the minister is not even obliged to seek the information and when it has been furnished he can still claim that it is not sufficient. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, may I move:

That the words "has not been furnished" be deleted and replaced by the expression "cannot be obtained".

Mr. Nowlan: We cannot accept that amendment. This is designed to cover a situation, for instance, such as I described in connection with the iron curtain countries. You perhaps cannot get information there at all. There are some cases, not many, where you just cannot get the information. The man refuses to give it. This would not be a question of not obtaining it, it would be a matter of it being refused. The department today is driven sometimes to fairly desperate straits because of the failure to get information on which you can determine the fair market value. This is, shall we say, a somewhat persuasive section. It works both ways.

In so far as the iron curtain countries and other places are concerned, it will be used to get information. If we cannot get it, then we will have to impose values as we see fit. But armed with this section you can go to a manufacturer or a producer and say, we want the information. Without this he can, and very often has in the past, say I will not give it to you; what are you going to do about it? We cannot, therefore, accept the amendment.

Mr. Crestohl: Can the minister tell us in what way section 40 differs from subsection (d) of section 38?

Mr. Nowlan: Is this section 38, or is this the old act?

Mr. Crestohl: Section 38 of this bill, at the top of the page.

Mr. Nowlan: I am sorry, but I do not follow the hon. member.

Mr. Crestohl: How does section 40 differ from subsection (d) of section 38? In both cases the minister has authority to determine where the information is not available?

Mr. Nowlan: I did not follow the hon. member, but I see now the subsection to which he is referring is on page 2 of the bill. As I said, section 40 is to get information where the information is either impossible to get or is refused. The other section to which the hon. member is referring is to give relief from the imposition of a duty which otherwise would be based on value, and the example I gave of the architect's plans and other things would come under that.

Mr. McIlraith: Before we leave section 40, do I understand the minister correctly that the proposed amendment would take away from him an obligation that he now proposes to place on the importer; that is, that the use of the expression "cannot be obtained" would take away from the department the right to force on the importer the obligation to furnish the information? Was that his point? He wants to be in a position to force the importer to provide the information?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, where it is refused, and that is the reason why I think the amendment would negative that.

Mr. Caron: I was of the opinion that the words "cannot be obtained" counteracted the example the minister gave us a while ago. However, I do not press the amendment, and if it is the wish of the committee I am willing to withdraw the amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member permission to withdraw the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Caron) withdrawn.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on 40A?

Mr. Pearson: This subsection, Mr. Chairman, corresponds to the present section 35, subsection 8, except that in our opinion it introduces a change which we think is likely to lead to further administrative difficulties. The minister, in discussing the previous sections, does not feel that way about it, so we will just make our position known and let it go.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on 40B? We will go back to section 39.

Mr. Nowlan: Perhaps we could allow clause 1 to stand, because that contains section 39.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 stand by unanimous consent of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 2—Appeals to Exchequer Court on questions of law.

Mr. McIlraith: I have a couple of questions I want to ask on this clause. The extension of time, of course, for appeal from 30 days to 60 is quite good. What concerns me is this: If the minister will look at the proposed section 45 (c), he will find it reads as follows:

> Any person who entered an appearance in accordance with subsection (2) of section 44, if he has a substantial interest in the appeal and has obtained leave from the court or a judge thereof,

The point about which I want to ask the minister for an explanation is this: The minister requires the person seeking an appeal to obtain leave from the court or a judge thereof, and that is the practice now as I understand it. But he has also added the words, "if he has a substantial interest in the appeal". As I read this subsection it places on the person appealing an obligation not only of obtaining his order for leave to appeal but also, when he comes into court on the hearing of the appeal, to prove his substantial interest. It seems to me that that is at best confusing, and possibly going farther than the minister intended. I wonder if he would just explain that phrase?

Mr. Nowlan: I think the hon. member has misconceived the intent. The proving of the interest has to be done, or the intention of the subsection anyway is that, when he applies for leave to appeal. He would not have to prove his interest again after he went to court. The hon. member will realize that this is an improvement over the practice heretofore applicable.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister has stated what I thought was his intention quite clearly. I am not sure the subsection provides that that would be one of the criteria applied on any application for leave to appeal, and in the light of that I am a little curious why these words were put in. I quite agree that no judge or court would grant the leave if there were no substantial interest shown in an appeal, and I am just curious about it. I do not propose pressing it by an amendment, but I wonder if the minister would have a further look at it.

Mr. Nowlan: I am told by a gentleman who has had very substantial experience before the appeal board in the last few years that there have been many people applying for leave to appeal, and who have appealed, who had very little interest in the appeal. As the hon. member knows, there are various inducements that perhaps sometimes enter into these matters. It was felt that the parties themselves, the minister, the deputy minister and the other person should appeal automatically without leave. Where anyone else applied for leave, he had to satisfy the judge that he had a substantial interest. If that was the intention of the draftsman whom I presume will represent the department in appeals, I am quite certain that question will never be raised.

Mr. McIlraith: I am quite happy to leave this thing to the courts or to the judge. I think that is the proper practice but it seems to me that the wording here restricts the number of persons who can apply to a judge and restricts them improperly. I am concerned with that point.

Mr. Nowlan: It is to cut out frivolous appeals, or frivolous in effect.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, the costs will cut those off. It seems to me the matter should be left to the determination of the judge of the court. That is the point. Notwithstanding the assurance he has given, I wish the minister would take another look at the language used in that subsection perhaps before it is dealt with in another place.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any more discussion on section 45?

Mr. McIlraith: Just before clause 2 carries, may I say that my remarks—and I will not repeat them—are of course applicable where similar language is used in the other subsections.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 5 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we go back to clause 1?

Mr. McIlraith: Before we do that, may I make a request?

Mr. Pearson: We have been rushing too fast.

Mr. McIlraith: Will you hold section 47?

Mr. Nowlan: Surely.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps we could go back to the other one, section 47.

The Deputy Chairman: That is clause 4?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. Could we leave that for a moment and come back to it?

Clause 4 stands.

On clause 1—Determination of value for duty.

The Deputy Chairman: Going back to clause 1, we are considering an amendment to clause 1.

Mr. Nowlan: I am told that we cannot take that amendment with that wording as it is, because it would get us into difficulty into some other part of the act. We cannot accept the words "domestic producers". That is too narrow an interpretation, too narrow a phrase and it could easily get us into serious trouble. I am quite satisfied of the fact that we are not violating GATT by using those words. If we are doing so, then the hon. gentleman has certainly made his point in connection with it. Certainly I am not trying to be punctilious about the wording. I should like to have achieved wording that would be satisfactory to the Leader of the Opposition as he well knows. But in view of the technical difficulties involved, I am obliged to say that we could not accept that amendment.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps it would save time if we go to the amendment I originally submitted and have it disposed of.

Mr. Nowlan: Very well.

Amendment (Mr. Pearson) negatived: yeas, 23; nays, 74.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 1 carry?

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: I believe the hon. member for Ottawa West had a question with regard to clause 4.

On clause 4—Invoice to show fair market value.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one point that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister, namely part of the new proposed section 47, subsection (1). The particular phrase with which I am concerned is "determined in accordance with sections 36 to 40B", where they appear as proposed new sections. The point is this. The section proposes that the fair market value of the goods to which it relates shall be determined in accordance with those sections indicated. As I read the bill, all these sections except section 36 do not recognize fair market value as the basis. They provide for either ministerial discretion or cost of production plus profit. One of them—that is section 40—deals with conditions when the fair market value is not available. It therefore seems to me that fair market value cannot, as this section provides, be determined in accordance with sections 37, 38, 39, 40, 40A and 40B for the very simple reason that these sections authorize exceptions to the fair market value principle and have in fact nothing to do with the fair market value. If I am right, this section 47 will apply only to the conditions described in section 36 and not to the others. I wonder whether the minister would mind explaining at this point how he intends to overcome this difficulty.

Mr. Nowlan: I am told that is language which was borrowed from the existing legislation.

Mr. McIlraith: The terminology "sections 36 to 40B" is new and different.

Mr. Nowlan: That is true.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the point.

Mr. Nowlan: There was fair market value in this previously. You had ministerial discretion and you had various matters, as the hon. member will recall. As I said, that language has been borrowed and was used in the thing heretofore. It might be that value for duty would have been happier language. Some consideration perhaps should have been given to that instead of fair market value. At least that is the language which has been used.

Mr. McIlraith: The very point is that most of the language is borrowed but that the wording "section 38 to 40(b)" is not borrowed. That wording is new and sections 36 to 40(b) do not relate, as I understand it, to the terminology "fair market value". I just do not know how the minister is going to get over that difficulty in this section.

Bill reported.

Mr. Nowlan moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is put to the house I would just like to say a word. We do not propose to divide the house on third reading, but I want to make clear once again our position in this matter. We have carried a lot of provisions, a lot of sections and subsections tonight, and perhaps we may have lost sight of the over-all objective of this bill in the haste in which we have operated. The doubts and fears we had about this bill and its effects on our customs practice and legislation and thereby on our trade have not been removed.

Mr. Nowlan: They must have been largely dissipated, though.

Mr. Pearson: If anyone could dissipate them, then it would be the minister, because he is a very plausible person and a very good debater. He disarms the opposition in an engaging way, but in this case his efforts have not succeeded in so far as I am concerned, and our objections to this bill remain. The minister has said this bill is primarily one of simplification and clarification, but I think we have shown without any doubt that it is more than that. I feel certain we have shown there are some very important new provisions in this bill.

Mr. Nowlan: Section 39.

Mr. Pearson: Section 39 and some others. If it is going to have the effect which the minister hoped it would have it is much more than a bill of simplification and clarification.

Before six o'clock the minister pointed out that we had used the provisions in the old section 38 in such emergency cases as the importation of flags and patriotic souvenirs at one time or another under the Liberal administration, and it is quite true, as I said in my opening statement, that in past years under our administration there have been circumstances when we thought it was appropriate to take care of cases by means of this section. I would have thought that in case of necessity for an emergency measure, assuming that these provisions were used in those days for such a purpose they should be quite adequate for the government today, and it has not been shown to us why it has been necessary to make all these changes.

Some of the simplifications and clarifications have perhaps improved the customs and anti-dumping legislation to a certain extent, and the minister has said that some of these provisions will be used to lower the value, and thereby ease the import of goods into Canada. It has not been our experience, however, in years past that legislation of this kind has very often been used for that purpose, and therefore we remain opposed to this bill in the sense that it does give increased power over the most important matter of the imposition of value which affects duty and thereby affects taxation.

We feel that the trend is in the direction of the restriction of trade rather than the expansion of trade; we feel this bill, if passed, will have the opposite effect to the trend in the United States, when congress down there is in fact taking action during this session which will help to expand rather than restrict trade. We think that at this time, on the eve of the commonwealth economic conference there should be no move of this kind which could be interpreted as restrictive, and for those reasons we remain opposed to the bill.

We will see how it works out in practice but the minister seems to me, on occasion, to adopt an attitude which I confess I have experienced before now on the other side of this house. Perhaps I might put it this way without offence to him. For the details of customs legislation let fools contest, what's best administered is best.

I am sure the department over which the minister presides will administer this legislation to the best of its ability, honestly and sincerely, but we do think the principles behind the legislation are wrong, and we therefore remain opposed to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DISCRIMINATION, REVOCATION OF CITIZENSHIP, ETC.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-58, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

She said: Mr. Speaker, in speaking on second reading of this bill I have a few general remarks to make. I think the bill with the explanatory notes pretty well stands on its own feet, but I have noticed certain remarks have been made about it and certain expressions of reservations have been voiced by members and others.

Subsection (1) of section 19 of the present act gives the governor in council power to revoke the citizenship of naturalized Canadians for the various reasons enumerated in that subsection. Briefly the grounds are that the person has: 1, assisted an enemy of Canada in time of war; 2, obtained his citizenship by false representation or fraud; 3, has resided outside of Canada for six years and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada; 4, has resided outside of Canada for two years in a country of which he was a citizen before he became a Canadian citizen and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada; 5, while out of Canada has shown disaffection or disloyalty to Her Majesty; or 6, has been convicted by a Canadian court of an offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to Her Majesty.

A natural-born Canadian citizen cannot lose his Canadian citizenship for any of these reasons and many naturalized Canadians and natural born Canadians as well feel very strongly that these provisions discriminate against the naturalized Canadian citizen and consequently the citizenship of a naturalized Canadian is sometimes referred to as being second class citizenship.

The amendment will repeal the existing subsection (1) of section 19 altogether, but it must be noted that under the amendment the naturalized Canadian citizen can still have his Canadian citizenship revoked by the governor in council if he is charged with a treasonable offence and, being abroad, fails to return to Canada and stand trial for that offence. If such person does return to Canada and is convicted, he will suffer the punishment prescribed under the Criminal Code or the Official Secrets Act for the offence but he will not be subject to loss of citizenship.

An alien seeking Canadian citizenship must satisfy a court that he has the necessary qualifications required by the law for Canadian citizenship, which include such things as good character, an adequate knowledge of English or French, an adequate knowledge of the responsibility and privileges of Canadian citizenship. These qualifications are set out in section 10 of the act and it will be noted that the bill proposes amending paragraphs (f) of subsection (1) of section 10 to require the applicant to satisfy a court that he intends to comply with the oath of allegiance set forth in the second schedule.

Representations have been made to me since the first reading of this bill to the effect that the new proposed paragraph (c) of clause 19(1) might be misinterpreted. Provision, of course, is made for enquiry into any case under section 19(4) of the act. However, after serious consideration, I feel it is only proper to remove any doubt as to the intention of this bill, and therefore when we come to the appropriate section I shall ask one of my colleagues to move that this paragraph be deleted from the bill.

Under the existing act difficult questions of law and fact sometimes arise in relation to the question of whether a naturalized or natural born Canadian citizen has ceased to be a Canadian citizen. The bill provides machinery whereby these difficult cases can be referred to a court or a commission for study and a ruling. The act provides that any commission established under subsection (4) of section 19 must be presided over by a person who holds or has held high judicial office. So, therefore, whether the question is referred to a court or a commission the issue will be dealt with by a competent tribunal. This guarantees the naturalized Canadian a greater security in his new citizenship, and will encourage him in a fuller and more useful participation in Canadian life.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I must say that the hon. lady by her explanation has somewhat disarmed me and to a considerable extent shortened any observation I might otherwise have made, because I was very interested to observe that after the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) made an oblique reference to this legislation in the debate on another bill there was a good deal of fluttering on the benches opposite—

Mr. Green: Smiling.

Mr. Pickersgill: And I imagine it occurred to the minister that to introduce a bill of rights and a bill providing for thought police on the same day was not consistent, and I am very glad the hon. lady has had second thoughts about her thought police. It does seem to me that what is left of the bill is so little—that we are only going to have two classes of naturalized persons who will not be on that basis—that once we have a naturalized person he should have all the rights of a natural born person. That, I may say, is a principle about which I know there are a good many administrative inconveniences, but the hon. lady under her bill is removing from the lists of revocable cases all those people who have permanently withdrawn their connection from Canada anyway. It seems to me that the number of persons who come under the new section 19 is so small that we may just as well take the bad with the good.

I do think the hon. lady should consult with the Minister of Justice and with the law officers of the crown to see whether some way could be found to make it clear that a person who gets citizenship by fraud never was a citizen, in other words, we would not be taking it away from him, in the same way as a distinction is made between annulment and divorce. It could be got around in that way, and we would be able to boast that once you became a naturalized Canadian citizen you had all the rights of a Canadian born citizen, and it seems to me that the advantages of having that would be so great that we should go the whole hog and do that.

Perhaps I have not studied this to the extent that I might have done, but I do not believe it would be competent for us to amend the bill in committee. To accomplish what I have in mind I have an amendment to move on second reading which seems to me to fill all the requirements of citation 382 of Beauchesne and I hope we can dispose of it quickly without any long discussion about it, and have the sense of the house on the principle of this amendment. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas):

> That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house declines to give second reading to this bill because it fails to provide that naturalized citizens shall have equality of rights and status with natural born citizens."

Mrs. Fairclough: Of course, this amendment comes as somewhat of a surprise, but looking at it quickly it seems to me that it could have no other effect than to kill the bill, and as such it seems to me it is out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I admit that the intention of the amendment would kill the bill, but that would have been the effect of an amendment framed in almost precisely similar terms which the Speaker ruled in order after quite extensive argument two days ago which had precisely the same force. This is a resolution declaratory of a principle differing from the policy and provisions of the bill and it seems therefore to me to be quite competent, and I would suggest to the hon. lady that instead of spending a lot of time in discussing the point of order we divide the house on the amendment and get it over with.

Mrs. Fairclough: It seems to me that Your Honour should rule on this. I will maintain the position I took at first, that is that this has the effect of killing the bill and I ask Your Honour to consider it very carefully.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is debatable. The hon. lady could speak on it if she wishes. She could speak on it all night because a minister speaking to an amendment is not limited as to time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker may I address you briefly on the point of order and support the position taken by my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It may appear, Mr. Speaker, that the point raised is not unlike that presented a couple of days ago upon which Mr. Speaker at that time made a ruling. But I would respectfully invite you, Mr. Speaker, to consider these aspects of the point raised by the amendment.

My hon. friend, the mover of the amendment, seeks to bring his amendment within the rule that it is competent to an hon. member to introduce on second reading an amendment that asserts a contrary principle. That position, of course, is still subject to the necessity of proving relevancy. In my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, this amendment does not assert a contrary principle. It purports, rather, to give a reason for outright opposition to the motion for second reading.

An amendment that does no more than assert a negative is, of course, clearly out of order. An amendment that merely gives a reason, Mr. Speaker, for asserting opposition to the motion for second reading is clearly out of order. My hon. friend, therefore, must satisfy you, Mr. Speaker, that his motion does more than create a negative, that it does more than simply give a reason for opposing the motion and that it does set up a contrary principle still relevant to the main motion. In my respectful submission neither in substance nor in form does this amendment set up a contrary principle. It is simply a statement that the house should decline to give second reading to the bill because, and here is the reason:

> —it fails to provide that naturalized citizens shall have equality of rights and status with natural-born citizens.

That is an attempt to give a reason, Mr. Speaker, why the motion should not pass; it is an attempt to set up a reason for a negative. There is no contrary principle set up there, Mr. Speaker; the amendment has not been drawn in that form. It has neither that form nor that effect.

So far as the ruling of Mr. Speaker the other day is concerned, although it is not open to debate on this occasion I respectfully submit to you that it is no support for the ruling that the mover of this motion is asking you to make today. The amendment clearly does not assert a principle contrary to the principle of this bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, do you desire to hear my reply, and I will try to make it very brief? The first point raised by the Minister of Finance was the question of relevancy. This bill seeks to reduce the disabilities under which certain naturalized citizens suffer. We suggest that they should all be removed. Therefore, there can be no question about the relevancy of it. It is simply going a little farther than the government is prepared to go in the bill, but in the same direction.

It is certainly more than a negative. It is indeed even more positive than the bill. It is going farther in the same direction and it is not seeking to negative this bill so much as to urge the government to bring in a bill which will do a little more in the same relevant field than this one does.

The minister said that to be in order it was necessary for an amendment to be contrary. That, of course, is not the word in Beauchesne. Citation 382 of Beauchesne reads in part:

> —a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from,—

I do not argue that this is adverse to, but I do argue—as it palpably is—that it is differing from, and it is differing from, but relevant, and it certainly is declaratory of a principle, the principle being that naturalized citizens should have equality of rights and status with natural born citizens. It does seem to me that it satisfies all of the requirements that the Minister of Finance suggested would have to be satisfied.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, the principle of the bill in one form or another does state that there are two different classifications of Canadian citizens which are to be treated differently under certain circumstances. If it is possible to avoid dividing the house on the matter, of course, it would be preferable. I am just addressing myself to the minister directly. I have a proposed amendment to one of the sections and if the minister could possibly see her way to accept the proposed amendment then we do not have—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): We are talking on a point of order.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, you are perfectly right, but I am suggesting that perhaps we can avoid dividing the house. If you want to insist on dividing the house, all right. I am making a proposition that we can avoid making an issue of this in the house if I could have some assurance that this amendment would be considered.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order.

Mr. Crestohl: All right, if you insist on dividing the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Does the hon. member wish to say something more before I make my ruling? If he does, I would be happy to hear him. At page 531 of May's Parliamentary Practice, sixteenth edition, we find the following:

> —nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee.

In my opinion this amendment does not oppose the principle of the bill; it anticipates the committee stage and therefore I rule it out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if Your Honour would permit—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): The ruling has been made.

Mr. Pickersgill: Your Honour is not prepared to have any comment made at all?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): The ruling has been made.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to make a few comments on second reading, since it is a few minutes past ten o'clock, I wonder whether you would like to ascertain the wishes of the house with respect to proceeding?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Would the house agree to give unanimous consent to continue for a while?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: I am thinking specifically, Mr. Speaker, of hon. members in terms of this bill. Today in speaking on another bill that will have an effect similar to the effect of sections of the Canadian Citizenship Act, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) indicated that he hoped the bill of rights when it became law would make parliament more cautious in developing its legislative program, would make parliament more concerned with the rights and freedoms of individuals. This is one of the first opportunities—I would say the first opportunity—that we have had, following the declarations of the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), with respect to the bill of rights to consider legislation which has a somewhat parallel course to that announced in the bill of rights today. In our consideration of this bill we should follow the thoughts expressed by the Prime Minister earlier today when he said parliament should become more cautious in the future and more concerned with the rights and freedoms of individuals when it considers legislation.

I might add that even though I am trespassing a bit in this, the general thoughts that I have and which the C.C.F. have with respect to this bill follow the same thoughts expressed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in that we feel that naturalized citizens should have equality of rights and status under the act as natural born citizens have, and I would hope that the minister would undertake to make some statement. I am sure it would meet with the unanimous approval of the house if she would express the thought that it is the hope of the government, if not today, if not on this bill then at some time in the immediate future, to move in the direction of placing natural born Canadian citizens and people who become citizens under this act on the same basis.

I must say that I also appreciate the minister indicating that she intends to ask one of her colleagues to move an amendment for the deletion of a particular clause. If she does not have the wording already prepared I would be quite prepared to send it over to her because we have somewhat the same idea in mind. She will not have any difficulty in getting support for that.

There is one thing I had hoped would happen ever since the speech from the throne indicated that amendments to the citizenship act would be introduced to clear up certain discriminatory features. I think it would have been much more acceptable if the minister could have introduced legislation to remove the inconsistencies that exist all across the country with respect to people becoming citizens. I refer to the questions they are asked in the various courts across the nation and the lack of guidance to judges in asking questions of prospective citizens. We know that even in the same province different rules are applied in one part of a province as opposed to another because of the attitude of the judge conducting the inquiry into the citizenship application. We find that it is relatively easier in some areas than in others to become a Canadian citizen because no general guidance is given judges in the act and they are pretty well on their own. It would have been nicer if the minister could have introduced a more extensive bill at this time to do away with these inconsistencies. There are a number of features in the bill itself that we may want to deal with in the committee stage but for the time being I will not say any more.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, as the two previous speakers have already mentioned I think it is somewhat significant that the citizenship bill should come up for debate on the same day as the bill of rights, and if I heard correctly this is not the first time this coincidence has happened. I think I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) mention today that in 1945 a similar coincidence developed when a resolution for a bill of rights was introduced on the same day that the citizenship act was adopted. I rather pay some attention to this strange coincidence, and I should like to consider this matter from that standpoint and not at all from a party standpoint as it does not have any political significance whatever. I am confident that a matter of this kind will be considered purely on its merits by the house and by the minister who has all the sympathy necessary for considering citizenship in Canada.

Actually the premise of what I should like to say exists in the bill itself. The bill does classify citizens so far as losing their citizenship is concerned. The bill indicates that under certain conditions a naturalized citizen can lose his citizenship but no indication is given that for the same offences or under the same conditions a natural-born citizen will also lose his citizenship.

Let me illustrate what I mean. It is suggested that when a naturalized citizen commits the offence of treason or commits an offence against the Official Secrets Act he can lose his citizenship. A native born citizen can also commit treason and can also be found guilty of an offence against the Official Secrets Act. If a natural born citizen and a naturalized citizen both commit the offence of treason and are found guilty of the same offence I think the punishment should be the same for both.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he not realize that the essence of the offence is refusing to come back to Canada to be tried?

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Crestohl: Certainly I realize that, but the same thing applies to a natural born citizen who may commit the offence of treason and leave the country. If a notice is sent to him under the bill and he does not come back to face either a preliminary inquiry or a trial, nowhere is it indicated that the natural born citizen will lose his citizenship under these circumstances.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I suggest to the hon. member that he cannot lose it unless he takes up citizenship in some other country.

Mr. Crestohl: Then the legislation should clearly state so. My submission is that it should apply to both who commit the same offence and fail to return to Canada. The natural born and the naturalized citizen should be treated in the same way and punished identically for having committed the same offence. I think my proposition is quite clear and simple and I do not think I am asking for anything that is not reasonable under the circumstances. I think the legislation should so provide. Otherwise, what are we doing? We are actually creating a cleavage between two classes of citizens. We are creating different rights for different types of citizens and that is not just a simple matter. I should like to point out that one of our provinces has made the difference even clearer. In the province of Quebec the election act adopted in 1952, I believe, has this provision:

> When, upon application for the entry or for the striking off of names, the board of revisors comes to the conclusion that a person entered on an electoral list is not a Canadian citizen by birth, it may require such person to show by his certificate of naturalization or citizenship that he has the status of a Canadian citizen—

It is a perfectly proper provision in so far as having the right to vote is concerned, but here a difference is created between a citizen who is naturalized and one who is natural born. The naturalized citizen must produce his documents in order to be entered on the lists. A natural born citizen is not obliged to produce his documents. If the one is called upon to produce his naturalization papers, the other should be called upon to produce his birth certificate. Why should the one be believed and not the other? I am only citing this to show that if our citizenship law does create a difference the province has taken advantage of it and I think to the detriment of good law, good citizenship and equal rights.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) today spoke so feelingly and so passionately about the equal rights of citizens, I was reminded that this is the first time I have heard him emphasize equal rights for all citizens. I emphasize that to the minister of immigration. This bill does not allow for equal rights to all citizens. It draws a line of demarcation. It may be a very thin line and the difference may be very subtle, but at the same time it is palpable.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that there are many painful memories which are still fresh in the minds of many people as a result of the fact that in some countries there was more than one class of citizenship. Certainly the history of the last 100 years should cause hon. members of this house to be horrified by the possibility of fostering in Canada, in even the subtlest form, two different classes of citizens. Whether or not we admit it, whether or not we like to admit it, I think if hon. members would look at the clauses of the bill they would find that there is that difference which I am pleading should be changed or eliminated. I have already given an illustration to show that if a similar offence were committed by both classes, the punishment should be identical.

I should like to point out also, Mr. Speaker, to hon. members that if we allow that difference to be created in one level of our law, other differences can also be created. For example, what is there to prevent parliament from adopting a bill to the effect that only natural born citizens shall be eligible for membership in Her Majesty's privy council? It is possible, by law, to say that only those who are born in this country shall qualify to serve in Her Majesty's privy council. We do not want that. If we adopt such a principle in one bill we do not know how it may work in another bill in the future.

If there are going to be two classes of citizens, one natural born and one naturalized, what is going to prevent parliament from enacting a law that only native born citizens can serve as judges in Her Majesty's courts or even be entitled to election to the House of Commons? I am very fearful of the possibilities that we are, by this bill, fostering. There now exists a difference in our citizenship. I shall, Mr. Speaker, when we are dealing with the bill in committee, move an amendment which the minister may consider. I appeal to all hon. members in the house to consider it because it is far beyond party lines. I should like to recommend it to the minister. I do not know whether I have permission to speak about it at this stage, but I shall not. I should like to make my appeal now to all hon. members to disregard party lines. I think this transcends all politics, all party lines, especially in view of the warm, genuine, sincere appeal made today by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party in the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to congratulate the hon. lady, Mr. Speaker, for the very gracious speech she made in introducing this new Canadian Citizenship Act. I was glad to hear of the removal of paragraph (c) because that improved the bill somewhat but there is a most objectionable feature remaining and that is in clause 2, which reads:

> The governor in council may, in his discretion, order that any person—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order; I shall have to remind the hon. member that on second reading we discuss the principle of the bill and not the clauses of the bill.

Mr. Badanai: In any event, this clause is a dangerous weapon placed in the hands of the minister who may, in effect, order the deportation of any naturalized Canadian citizen who may happen to be supporting some unpopular political party. This is not a move towards achieving equality of status between natural born Canadian citizens and naturalized citizens. Those who were naturalized would be placed in a position of second-class citizens. No amount of oratory to the contrary will convince anyone that this bill is not discriminatory and that it will not create two classes of citizens, one that can be deported at the discretion of the minister, and the other that will continue to enjoy the rights of citizenship which, in this bill, are denied the naturalized citizens.

We on this side of the house thought all along, and were encouraged to believe, that what the government had in mind was to make sure that all Canadians, whatever their origin, would have complete equality in Canada. This bill, Mr. Speaker, does nothing to fulfil the hopes, the expectations of the people who came here from foreign shores, and I am one of them. I am not speaking for myself, I am speaking for the citizens who have adopted this country as their own, and who live in the district of Thunder bay in which my riding is located. I express the sincere hope that the hon. lady, who has shown a keen interest in citizenship and immigration may consider an amendment to this objectionable clause.

As has been indicated already, this morning, the Prime Minister spoke very eloquently about a bill of rights, a measure which has been proposed for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms of all Canadians and which, amongst other things, will guarantee the right of the individual to the protection of the law without discrimination because of race, origin, colour, religion or sex. It is quite clear that the Canadian Citizenship Act contravenes that principle of the bill of rights introduced by the Prime Minister. Surely, the minister realizes this is clear discrimination, and I respectfully submit this bill should be reconsidered and changed to conform with the principle expressed in the bill of rights.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, just a word or two. I am opposed in principle to any legislation or proposed legislation whose implementation may tend to set up two distinct classes of citizens.

In my constituency there are thousands of new Canadians. I try to serve their interests as well as those of all natural born Canadian citizens. Since the principle of this bill is dangerous to national unity and tends to create racial discrimination, I feel unable to accept its principle.

If the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) does not wish to amend that bill in line with the principle set out by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), I will have to vote against its adoption.

(Text):

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill and to add my criticism of the clause in it which has to do with citizenship of all Canadians. The constituency which I represent has, I think, almost every group of peoples of foreign extraction. As a result we have a great many certificates of Canadian citizenship alloted each year. I can honestly say that within the last 12 months in five sittings of our citizenship court over 2,000 certificates have been given to new Canadians. I feel that these new Canadians are good citizens of our country. I feel that they should not be discriminated against in the form of differentiation between one type of citizen and another type of citizen. In other words, I feel that we are even suggesting that a second class type of Canadian citizen is being legislated against.

I know there will be a great deal of misgivings and certainly a great many disappointments among those lucky 2,000 citizens in the last 12 months who have received these certificates which they hoped they would receive and which they have prayed for. In order to be able to qualify for them they have been good citizens. I feel that they are being discriminated against. I can see no reason why they should be treated in that way.

I have here a newspaper article which I should like to read. It is an article that appeared in a newspaper published in Hamilton which I believe is the hon. lady's home city. I should just like to read part of this article and to say that I concur in what is said. It reads as follows:

> The Conservative government will soon bring the rights of "naturalized" Canadians into line with those of "natural-born" citizens.
> Chief aim of the government is to eliminate the feeling among many new Canadians that "naturalized" citizenship is insecure—a feeling prompted by clauses of the Canadian Citizenship Act which appear to discriminate against the newcomer.
>
> The act provides that the status of naturalized citizens—those born abroad and subsequently nationalized—is subject to review at any time by the government. It may cancel citizenship for reasons such as:
>
> Residence abroad for six years without maintaining "substantial connection" with Canada.

It is rather ambiguous, Mr. Speaker, according to my understanding of its terms.

> Conviction by a Canadian court of "any offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to Canada."
> Showing oneself, while abroad, "by act or speech disaffected or disloyal to Her Majesty".
> The natural born Canadian, on the other hand, can lose his citizenship only if he becomes a citizen of another country.

There is a vast difference in the two arrangements, as between Canadian born and natural-born citizens.

> Acting Citizenship and Immigration Minister Davie Fulton said Tuesday he was impressed with the argument that the present act discriminates against the naturalized citizen.
> Amendments to the act probably will come when the Commons meets early next year.

If this article which I have read is correct, I might say that I agree wholeheartedly with the previous acting minister of citizenship and immigration. Should this bill pass in the form in which it is now, I am afraid that when I go home I would prefer that the present government acted under this bill and not the opposition.

(Translation):

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words to explain the reasons why I will vote against passage of Bill C-58, an act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

This morning the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) with a great deal of grandiloquence, put before the house a bill for the recognition and protection of the rights of man and fundamental freedoms. We know that that legislation is very close to his heart and that he has been speaking about it for a long time, as have a certain number of hon. members who used to sit on this side of the house when the Liberal party was in power.

This evening, the government, through the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) is proposing the passage of Bill C-58.

In my opinion, this bill is an encroachment upon the rights of Canadian citizens of foreign origin who have come here to co-operate with us, native Canadians, in the welfare of our fellow-citizens and in the development of our country. I am surprised at the stand taken by the minister in introducing such a bill, because we know that she has children, she is Canadian and, I admit, a model wife. Indeed, this bill will deny certain rights to our fellow-citizens who have come from other countries to join with us in the building of the Canadian nation.

As I said a moment ago, the Prime Minister put before us this morning a bill aiming at the protection of human rights and the prevention of any "discrimination" whatsoever.

This evening, as I said, we are asked to pass a bill which tends precisely to discriminate against a certain category of Canadians.

If we accept in this country that some fellow citizens who came from abroad to join us and add to the Canadian nation, we must consider them as Canadians, as our own people.

When a foreigner wants to establish himself in Canada, he has to put in an application. I realize that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration then proceeds to make a serious inquiry and that the applicant is admitted only if he is a desirable citizen, able to adapt himself to our Canadian way of life. Five years after he is admitted to Canada, a person of foreign origin declares his intention to become a Canadian citizen and during the following year, the minister may still make another inquiry in this case, which means that, following the investigations made before his admission to this country and during the six years he has resided here, we should be able to judge if such person could become a good Canadian citizen or should be returned to his home country.

Serious investigations were made in each case and in this connection, Mr. Speaker, I must say I have always wondered why it has been impossible for members, as well as for the persons concerned, to know why certain applications from immigrants wishing to take up residence in Canada were turned down.

I am one of those who believe that immigration is necessary in a country as large as ours. That is my personal opinion, but I do not believe that with a population of 17 million people, we can manage to make of our country what we would like it to become, if we do not let in the many immigrants who have decided to take up residence here. On the other hand, if we accept them, they must enjoy the same protection as that enjoyed by our natural born citizens.

I understand this bill divides our Canadian citizens in two categories: those who are natural born and those who came later to take up residence here.

Mr. Speaker, it would be disgraceful if we Canadians allowed a government policy of discrimination against new Canadians. You can rest assured that I will vote against the proposed amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act.

As I see it, if a man is a Canadian, then, regardless of his ethnical and geographical origin, if he is good enough to have been acceptable as a Canadian, he is good enough to enjoy the legal rights of a Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I will vote against this amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act.

(Text):

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I will not detain the house more than a minute but I wish to go on record as explaining our opposition to the second reading of this bill on the very simple grounds—and they are the same grounds which were outlined in the amendment which was submitted but which was not in order—that the bill failed to provide that naturalized citizens have equality of rights and status with natural born citizens. It does not in any way confirm the essential principle of citizenship in this country, that there shall be only one class of citizens in Canada, in a country which has no room for first, second or third class Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I think that is all I need to say to indicate the fundamental reason, and it is a good reason, why we oppose second reading of this bill.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has just said a few words which convey to me the keynote of the opposition to this bill. He has said that he has sought to explain his opposition, but I say to him that he can seek to explain to the many hundreds of thousands of people in this country who have obtained their citizenship, having come here from other lands, why he opposes the liberalization of the rules which now exist and which have existed for a long time. He and his colleagues and those who have joined with them from his right have really found nothing to criticize in this bill.

Mr. Howard: Do not be too sure.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am never sure, my friend.

Mr. Howard: That makes two of us.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, one and a half.

Mrs. Fairclough: I may say that if it can be shown to me that in some respect this bill could be improved or if I can be convinced that there should be an amendment, I am willing to receive such a suggestion. I think I have already demonstrated that it is my announced intention to remove a clause, which I do not believe was a bad clause, but which I am removing because I think it might be misinterpreted and because of the wish to impress upon these people who are relative newcomers to our land that we want them to enjoy the privileges which we enjoy.

Nothing in this bill imposes anything; there is no restriction imposed whatsoever. Everything that has been done in amending the citizenship act by this bill has been towards the removal of restrictions and discriminations which existed in the old act.

Two or three things were said by various members in the course of debate. The member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) said that he sought equality of citizenship. This bill goes a long, long way towards establishing that equality. In so far as the applications for citizenship are concerned, it is true that different judges in different courts across this country may have differing conceptions as to what constitutes a proper basis for the award of citizenship. That is the decisions are in their hands. There may be room for improvement in the manner in which these courts are conducted but so long as applicants appear before the judges of this land the matter is in their hands and we cannot interfere with their judgment. In any event, if we decide to alter the manner in which citizenship is awarded, that is a matter for regulations under the act.

The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) I know felt very strongly about this bill, but even he seemed to feel that instead of making concessions it was imposing additional discriminations. I am sure on reflection he will see that is not true, but the main part of his remarks seemed to me to be directed towards an argument in favour of imposing restrictions on natural-born Canadians rather than removing them from those who are naturalized. I doubt very much that that would go down too well with either natural-born or naturalized Canadians.

The only reasons left why revocation of citizenship can be carried out are treason and fraud and in the former case not even treason, if the person stays here in Canada or returns to Canada to face the charges laid against him. So there remains only fraud, and I cannot see why any of us should feel that we should overlook misrepresentation on the part of people applying for citizenship. That is the only circumstance which would cause the revocation of citizenship of a naturalized Canadian, and may I say furthermore that if there is an attempt to deprive any naturalized citizen of his citizenship he has recourse to the courts. He may appeal and there is provision under section 19(4) of the act for a hearing of his case. He may plead that he has been unjustly dealt with and he will have a proper hearing by a proper court.

It was said, I think again by the hon. member for Cartier, that this thing could get slightly out of hand, and we might get to a position where a person could not stand for election to the House of Commons unless he was a natural-born Canadian; that it might be possible that he would not be eligible for appointment to the privy council. I am sorry I did not bring down the figures but there are many hundreds of thousands of voters in this country who are naturalized citizens, and it seems to me that the answer to the fears expressed by the hon. member for Cartier lies in the power and the privilege which is accorded to citizens to exercise their franchise. I can feel no fear in my heart that this discrimination now or at any time will be foisted upon the people of Canada by any government and I am sure that the hon. member will agree with me that any government which attempted to do that would not last past the next election.

May I just say in answer to the fears of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) that in no place in this bill is deportation mentioned. There is nothing in this bill about deportation at all. As I said before, this bill does not create discrimination; it corrects discrimination which presently exists.

I do not think I have ever heard such foolish arguments against a piece of legislation or such an attempt to misrepresent what has been attempted as I have heard tonight. If those new Canadians who were mentioned by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Mitchell) were pleased to receive their citizenship certificates—and I know they all were—then they should be doubly pleased now, because the circumstances in which they will enjoy Canadian citizenship will be improved. The only reason that I can think of that the hon. member may fail to please his constituents would be because he had failed to understand the import of this bill.

The intention of the bill is to place new Canadians on a par with natural born Canadians. All of us have been in this country a relatively short time. There are few who can trace their ancestry back through people who have been here for more than five generations; there are few who can do that for even five generations, and at the rate at which we have been welcoming people into Canada there are today in Canada so many people who have come here from other countries that it would be very hard indeed to calculate offhand the number of those who are natural born and those who are naturalized.

It takes a peculiar kind of courage to tear up roots and go to a new land. It takes a special kind of initiative to start a new life, and frequently it takes boundless energy to establish oneself in a new country. These were qualities that were possessed by our forefathers, those people who made this country what it is today. Because of that we recognize those qualities in those who seek naturalized status in Canada, and because of that we welcome these newcomers as kindred souls. It is true there may be among them those who will betray their fellows. It was ever thus. We have among us, among our natural born, those who would betray us, unfortunately.

However, we have faith. We have faith in these new people; we have faith in these newcomers and we are willing to give them evidence of that faith. We believe that in the amendments to this act which we propose in this bill we are giving them just that evidence.

The house divided on the motion (Mrs. Fairclough) which was agreed to on the following division:

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: Mrs. Fairclough, seconded by Mr. Monteith (Perth), moves that I do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee—

Mr. Pickersgill: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the leader of the house can tell us what we will be doing tomorrow.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, if this is to be the procedure, what is the intention with respect to the closing of the house? The citizenship bill must go before the Senate, so is it the intention to carry on tomorrow, send the bill to the Senate and then carry on next week? What is the situation? If I have your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader whether we could not finish the bill this evening in order that it may go to the Senate and the house can prorogue tomorrow?

Mr. Caron: Why did you call a vote if you wanted to finish?

Mr. Green: Of course, the house has no control over what the Senate will do. It is the intention of the government to carry this bill through the various stages.

Mr. Howard: If I may raise a point, Mr. Speaker, after a procedural matter had been dealt with I rose about ten minutes after ten to speak on second reading and asked if you would ascertain whether it was the desire of the house to carry on further and conclude this bill. I proceeded with the thought in mind that we would conclude all stages of the bill this evening in order that it might go to the other place in the morning.

Mr. Winch: That was our understanding.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the will of the house to continue?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Pearson: We moved an amendment to second reading of the bill which was ruled out of order. We now have to consider the moving of amendments to clauses of the bill when we get into committee and we need time to give consideration to that before going on. Perhaps this bill could be the first item of business tomorrow morning. That might make it possible to get it to the Senate in time.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we are going to commence with estimates, then take this bill and then item No. 1 on today's order paper, which is consideration of amendments made by the Senate to the broadcasting bill.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the house leader when the government, in consultation with the Leader of the Opposition, expects prorogation to take place?

Mr. Habel: Some time in December.

Mr. Green: It is hoped that there will be prorogation late tomorrow afternoon. That, of course, will depend on the house and the Senate.

At 11.19 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 4.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FORT YORK HISTORIC SITE

Question No. 182—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Is there any agreement between the federal government and city of Toronto requiring that lands of Fort York be maintained as a historic site?
2. Has the federal government received from the city of Toronto a request for authority to use Fort York lands as a right of way?
3. If so, has any decision been reached?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. The letters patent dated 7th May, 1909 by which the crown in right of Canada transferred to the city of Toronto the lands of Fort York contain the following provision:

"To have and to hold the same unto the corporation, its successors and assigns, upon and subject to the following trust and condition, namely; that the site of the old fort situate upon the said lands shall, as far as possible, be restored to its original condition, as shown on the attached copy of a plan of it, prepared by G. Nichols, government engineer, and dated Quebec, 24th June, 1816, and that the same shall be preserved and maintained in such conditions forever.

"Provided that upon the breach by the corporation, its successors and assigns of the trust and condition to which the grant hereby made is subject as aforesaid, such grant shall immediately become and be null and void, and it shall be lawful for us, our heirs, successors and assigns, in, to and upon the said lands hereby granted (or any part thereof in the name of the whole) to re-enter, and the same to have again, repossess, and enjoy as of our former estate therein anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

2. No official request has been received from the city of Toronto for authority to use Fort York lands as a right of way.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Pursuant to the obligations placed upon the chairman by the rules of the house, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in English and in French the third report of the standing committee on public accounts. I do not intend to move concurrence in this report.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONCLUSION OF PRESENT SESSION—SITUATION IN FAR EAST

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as one can now look to the hope of termination of this session, I thought I ought to make a few general remarks as to the probable date of commencement of the next session.

I know we cannot always predict the end of a session. Many circumstances arise that make it rather difficult to determine. But as it appears to be generally agreed that today we can expect to conclude this session, I should like to say this. I have been here for 18 years, and I have never seen any session in which there has been harder and more arduous application to an extremely heavy program than has been the case this session. I express the hope that unless international or national problems of major urgency require the calling together of parliament at an earlier date, the next session will not be convened before the month of January. As a matter of fact, some indication is given as to the degree of application to their duties by hon. members when it is realized that since October 14 last, parliament has been sitting for 171 days, and that for a considerable portion of that period extra hours have been the rule rather than the exception.

I believe in parliament. I believe that when parliament is sitting—and when I say this I speak for myself and, I am sure, for my colleagues—there is a feeling of strength to the government of the day, when that government has the benefit of the presence of parliament where, after all, we are all working to the same end. In a community of council and in common dedication, parliament has its greatest strength.

I mentioned that the international situation might make necessary the calling of the next session of parliament at an earlier date. In that connection I think the house will permit me to make a reference to the present international situation which, while disquieting today, has in recent months revealed grounds for encouragement. We have had during the summer striking evidence of the extent to which international agreement is possible by negotiation under the United Nations. The prospects for progress on disarmament are, I think, better than they have ever been before. In the past month we have seen what the United Nations has been able to achieve in the Middle East toward the reduction in tension, and the general move toward the settlement of that problem. What has been achieved in that area is as yet tentative rather than final.

However, at this time there is in the Far East a situation which is most disquieting. The most alarming aspect there is that it seems difficult to envisage a satisfactory settlement of a dispute which has attained such threatening proportions. I think the world wants to be assured that nothing will be left undone to prevent any action that might result in the world sliding into disastrous consequences. Surely it is not beyond our capacity in the light of the experience in recent months in other parts of the world to find some means whereby in this dispute in the Far East the good offices of the United Nations might be invoked.

As far as Canada is concerned, I think Canadians as a whole would expect that their representatives will not fail at this time to explore every avenue for the settlement of the grave situation which today prevails, and it is in that spirit that I suggest the United Nations might have an opportunity and an appointment with responsibility in this direction.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Prime Minister that this session appears to be approaching its terminal stages. I also agree with him that it has been a hard working but an interesting one. I can certainly understand him when he says that this has been the most interesting session he has had in his 18 years of parliamentary experience.

It is unfortunate that we are closing the session at a time when international tension in the Far East has increased, especially in view of the fact, as the Prime Minister has indicated, that during the earlier part of the summer tension in other parts of the world seemed to have decreased. It is not wise to be too optimistic when tension decreases, and it is certainly not wise to be too pessimistic at a time when tension appears to increase; but the situation which the Prime Minister has mentioned in the Far East in respect of Quemoy, Matsu and the offshore islands certainly does give cause for great anxiety.

The Prime Minister has mentioned the possibility of the good offices of the United Nations being invoked in this tense situation, a situation which he said had reached distressing proportions; indeed they are dangerous proportions. Anything that can be done, of course, in that direction should be done. We are all aware, I think, of the great success to which the Prime Minister also referred of the United Nations in its intervention in the Middle East. I confess that the action of the assembly on that occasion resulted in more constructive progress than I thought might be the case when the assembly was called together. I know we all rejoiced at its success on that occasion.

If intervention by the United Nations in the Far East in this particular situation should meet with success we would certainly also rejoice. But it is perhaps going to be a little more difficult in this case because intervention there would be intervention by the United Nations in respect of a dispute between two governments, each of which claims to be the government of China, and in that sense this is a dispute which is a civil conflict. The United Nations has recognized one side in that conflict as the government of China and not the other. That is a complicating feature of the situation.

I have had some personal experience in this connection, because I did once take part in negotiations within the United Nations as a member of the committee searching for a formula for a Korean armistice. Those negotiations took place with representatives of the Chinese communist government, and we did not recognize that government. On the other hand, when they met with us, they did not recognize us, and we had to deal with them in adjoining rooms. Another indication of the difficulty is that when a settlement was sought in Indochina it had to be done outside the United Nations, because red China was involved there.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Nevertheless, without underestimating the difficulties, I agree that if anything can be done with regard to this matter in the United Nations it should be done; perhaps it is something which the Canadian delegation to the forthcoming assembly could pursue.

The situation is dangerous because among other things such a high proportion of the army of nationalist China has now been concentrated on these two small islands. I am told that more than one-third of Chiang Kai-shek's best troops are there. That is creating a situation where the defence of these islands is becoming more and more important to the defence of Formosa, and it is to the defence of Formosa that the United States has committed itself, not the defence of these islands. But the two things are becoming more closely intertwined.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said on behalf of the government, and I agree with him wholeheartedly, that we are not committed in this matter. We are not committed, but we are certainly concerned, and if anything happens out there to involve the United States we will be more than concerned; we could hardly help being involved if only because of the fact that we, quite rightly, have a North American air command for defence purposes. As the Prime Minister has said, it is a dangerous and tense situation.

The right hon. gentleman also mentioned the prorogation of parliament. I should like to ask him whether in view of possible international and, indeed, domestic developments he has considered adjourning rather than proroguing at this time. This would make it easier for us to meet in the event of an emergency.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The question of whether we should adjourn or prorogue is one that I think should be viewed from the standpoint of practical realities and the interpretation which would be given to any action of that kind. Were we to adjourn, the interpretation placed upon it might be other than the interpretation placed upon prorogation. If events should make it necessary the calling of parliament would not be long delayed; I think it would be possible to call parliament together just as quickly as it would be after a mere adjournment.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I am sure everyone has listened with great interest to the Prime Minister's statement with respect to this session which is about to conclude and with respect to the possibilities for next session, but I am sure the portion of his statement to which we paid even closer attention was his reference to the international situation, because without doubt there is great public concern regarding this developing situation with respect to Formosa and the adjacent islands.

We were very interested to hear the Prime Minister say that our representatives at the United Nations will not fail to explore every avenue in dealing with this situation, and his reference to the possibility of invoking the good offices of the United Nations. I think that is very interesting, particularly in view of the forthcoming meeting of the general assembly. The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition referred to the successful action of the United Nations in dealing with the difficult and tense Middle East situation, and on that account I just want to ask one question before closing.

Is the government of Canada prepared to give leadership to the world in an effort to prevent further unfortunate developments in this crisis by proposing that the whole question be referred to the general assembly of the United Nations for action soon and, in so doing, earn the gratitude of all mankind?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the question that has been asked by the hon. gentleman is a very large one. I went a considerable way in my opening remarks, and having regard to the distance I went I am sure the hon. gentleman would not expect me to answer to a greater extent and give more information than was given in the earlier stage. I thank him for his suggestion, and also for having underscored the necessity of steps being taken to bring about a solution of the situation the seriousness of which the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman have not exaggerated in their descriptions.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CRIMINAL CODE—STATEMENT RESPECTING DISPOSITION OF BILL C-32

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement in regard to the government's intentions in connection with Bill No. C-32, item No. 3 on the order paper. On December 21 last, during the session of parliament that was then in progress, I introduced Bill No. 241, an act to amend the Criminal Code dealing with the slaughtering of animals. At that time I referred to the growing demand for action that would compel all slaughterers of food animals to adopt humane methods of killing, and indicated that it was the view of the government that some action in this field was desirable.

At the time the bill was introduced I pointed out that there were a number of considerations that had to be borne in mind and a number of difficulties to be overcome before we could be sure we had satisfactory legislation. For this reason we said we would only give the bill first reading at that time, and then leave it to stand over to this session so that all those interested could consider the draft legislation and make their representations or suggestions in connection therewith.

I was particularly concerned, of course, to have the comments of the provincial attorneys general, since the provinces are responsible for the enforcement of the Criminal Code. We received comments from six of the provinces, all of which contained some criticism or suggestion which we did our best to meet in redrafting the measure. We also received comments from one or two of the humane societies and the council of meat packers, but apart from these we received very few suggestions from individuals or organizations.

I accordingly introduced this session a new bill, No. C-32, which was given first reading on June 25. This bill includes modifications which were suggested by the limited number of comments we had received.

Notwithstanding our conscientious attempts to provide legislation that would meet the situation we nevertheless, since June 25, have received strong representations from a large number of sources to the effect that it is not satisfactory. I must inform the house that most of these representations received after the introduction of Bill No. C-32 this session are from persons or organizations we had not previously heard from, or alternatively they raised points not raised in the earlier submissions, and that it would have been most helpful if we could have received them subsequent to the introduction of the bill at the previous session and prior to the introduction of the new bill at this session. It was for that purpose that we had allowed it to stand over after first reading last year. However, the fact is that we did not receive them until after we had introduced Bill No. C-32, and the result is that we are now faced with a number of conflicting representations and points of view, many of them involving new considerations of real substance which frankly it has not been possible to reconcile or resolve in the time at our disposal since they were received.

The submissions which raise new considerations deal with such points as the problem of providing for those cases where slaughter, or preparation for slaughter, is carried out in conformity with certain religious ritual; the designation of approved appliances; the availability in Canada of equipment necessary particularly in the case of certain classes of animals; the desirability of defining "humane method" in advance so those installing certain devices will know for certain that the expenditures made will not be thrown away; the problem of legislating in such a way that large commercial slaughterhouses will be covered without at the same time imposing conditions which it is impracticable or impossible for small concerns or individual farmers to comply with, all matters which present real problems when criminal legislation is concerned.

Strong representations on one or all of these matters have been received from religious organizations, from humane slaughter societies, from small packers, from large packers and from individual farmers and farm organizations, representations of a nature and from sources which are entitled to careful consideration. Unfortunately, as I say, they were received after Bill No. C-32 was introduced.

In the face of these comments and objections I have come reluctantly to the conclusion that it is not possible at this time to find a legislative formula that would resolve all the difficulties that are involved. I wish to assure the house that we in the Department of Justice have tried conscientiously to find such a formula, and express my regret that we have been unable to do so. Accordingly I have come to the conclusion that it would not be in the public interest to proceed with Bill No. C-32 at this session.

We are still convinced, however, that it is desirable that some action be taken. It is our present feeling that the best way to proceed would be to place the matter before a committee of parliament in order that evidence and opinions of all those concerned may be heard and studied, in the expectation that in this way and with the assistance of members of parliament themselves we may work out a satisfactory method of meeting the problem. Accordingly it is our intention to introduce a further draft proposal at the next session which will be placed before the appropriate committee of the house, or possibly of both houses, for their study and consideration.

It is my hope that in the meantime all concerned will give the matter further consideration and prepare their submissions, so that at an early date next session the committee may proceed with its study and hear evidence which should be helpful in enabling parliament to determine the best course to follow in bringing about a solution.

I cannot conclude, Mr. Speaker, without expressing my appreciation for the co-operation I have received from interested organizations. I should also add that it is a matter of great satisfaction to me that a number of the large meat processing plants have already installed humane devices for the slaughter of food animals.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement deals with a matter which we had anticipated would have been brought before the house this session. Indeed, the minister himself indicated that; but in the circumstances I do not think anyone can object to the stand he has taken and the course he proposes. We on this side have noted with satisfaction his reaffirmation of the desirability of action in this matter, a matter which has aroused great public interest in the country. I think the course he has suggested, namely that the subject should be referred to a committee at the next session of the house, is a good one.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we are disappointed that circumstances have made it difficult if not impossible for the minister to proceed with the bill at this time. We know that Canadians generally abhor cruelty and inhumane actions in the slaughter of animals. I am sure the people of Canada are sympathetic to the principle of the bill and desirous that action should be taken.

I appreciate the difficulties the minister has outlined and some of the considerations that must, of course, enter into any such measure, particularly with reference to conformity to religious ritual. We do not think there should be any undue consideration of the monetary cost of installing whatever equipment is necessary for the humane slaughter of animals. We would certainly resist any pressure that might be applied on this ground. We are pleased that the minister has not dropped the bill permanently but will reintroduce the subject at the next session of parliament by referring it to a committee of the house, in the hope that some satisfactory solution may be obtained.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche).

Since the session might well end in two or three weeks—or even possibly today—may I point out that on the 24th of June I had a question placed on the order paper. It was No. 125. Later on, I had another one, No. 163, inserted on the 18th of July. May I ask the Secretary of State if I could obtain an answer today, or if this is not practicable, would he be good enough to approach the minister concerned so that I could have a reply by return mail?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I take due note of the question put by the hon. member for Dollard.

TRADE

URANIUM—ACTION TO EXPEDITE SIGNING OF BILATERAL AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce this question. What steps is the government taking, in the light of the highly competitive uranium market, to expedite the signing of bilateral agreements which are an essential prerequisite before we can develop markets for Canadian uranium?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are fully aware of the competition respecting uranium throughout the world, and we want to maintain ourselves in a satisfactory position because of the supplies of uranium we have in Canada. We have every intention of pursuing very actively the negotiation and signing of bilateral agreements where that is possible.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister comment on reports that negotiations are now going on between Japan and South Africa for the purchase of a sizeable amount of uranium oxide, and on reports that the U.S.S.R. has now offered to sell uranium on the open market?

Mr. Churchill: I have no comment which would be helpful at this moment. We are quite aware of the fact that South Africa has substantial supplies of uranium, and the Leader of the Opposition has simply drawn attention to the competitive nature of the marketing of uranium throughout the world. We are fully aware of that, and intend to maintain our position if at all possible.

IMMIGRATION

APPLICATION BY SONS OF FREEDOM TO EMIGRATE TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that this session of the house is now coming to a close and also in view of the importance of the Doukhobor question in British Columbia, is the Minister of Justice able to make a progress report on the situation? Can he tell the house what is now taking place and whether or not he has yet received any official communication from the Soviet embassy relative to the acceptance by that country of the Doukhobors, almost 3,000 of whom, I understand, have now agreed to leave Canada under the financial agreement announced some time ago by the Minister of Justice?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall deal with the last part of the question first. I can say that we have received no direct communication from the Russian embassy or from any individual Doukhobor or representative group of Doukhobors, including the sons of freedom sect, on the subject of negotiations with the Russian government. I believe it is a matter of public knowledge—if it is not I can confirm it now—that a small group of the Doukhobor leaders did visit Ottawa recently and apparently paid a visit to the Soviet embassy. They did not contact or attempt to contact myself or any representative of the federal government.

I have received no report directly on the results of that visit but I have had a report from the attorney general of British Columbia within the last few days that a delegation waited on him after the visit to the Soviet embassy and reported to him that they had been given a very friendly reception there, although he did not receive any report as to any conclusive results of that visit. The attorney general tells me that he is informed—I think this has been stated in the press—that the Doukhobors feel very definitely that a considerable number will be returning to Russia and that there will be agreement with the Soviet authorities to receive them, but we have no direct information on that point.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED SALE OF MILITARY AIRCRAFT TO U.S. FIRM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition directed a question to the Prime Minister concerning the export of used fighter aircraft to United States purchasers and in his answer the Prime Minister said, among other things, that he would give a detailed answer today. In view of that fact and in view of further press comment on the subject this morning, I wonder whether the Prime Minister or some minister of the government is able to give us the precise details on this subject.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): These aircraft, Mr. Speaker, were declared surplus two years ago, and they have been advertised for sale. At last a purchaser has been found. These aircraft have been moved from Alberta to the United States. There is no secrecy as to the destination, and they will be sold, I am informed, only to citizens of the United States. The Department of National Defence has no further requirement for this type of aircraft.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if I might be permitted a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My concern is not with the fact that the department declared them surplus; my concern has to do with the dangers inherent in an improper ultimate use of the aircraft. Would the minister go a little further than he has gone, and tell us whether or not export permits were granted, and whether when they were granted there was consideration by cabinet, or a committee of it, of the implications of this sale before permits were granted; whether or not an order in council was passed, and if so would he table it, and what steps have been taken by the government to ensure that there is no re-export from the United States, bearing in mind the fear I expressed earlier.

Mr. Pearkes: The sale was made through the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. I understand that no export permits are required for that type of equipment going to the United States.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the order in council? The minister did not say anything about that.

Mr. Pearkes: No order in council is necessary for such a sale.

Mr. Pearson: Was any action taken to ensure that these planes would not be exported to an undesirable destination?

Mr. Pearkes: I am informed that these aircraft will not be sold to anyone but a citizen of the United States.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask who informed the minister of this?

Mr. Pearkes: One of the officials of my department.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

FEDERAL LIQUOR EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a question I should like to direct to the Secretary of State. On September 3 a question of mine was passed as an order for return, and I wonder if the Secretary of State could indicate whether or not it will be possible to answer that question before this session ends?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): I shall be able to table this answer today.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPLY TO REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if a reply has yet been sent to the telegram from the premier of Newfoundland transmitting the text of the resolution adopted unanimously by the house of assembly two days ago, and which was moved by the premier and seconded by the leader of the opposition.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is that a reply has not yet been sent. I had hoped that it would be, but it has not because of the rush of events in the last two days. As the decision had been made that there would be no further legislation introduced at this session and no additional estimates following the estimates that are now before the house, the answer will be obvious.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it, then, what the Prime Minister is saying is that the government does not intend to comply with the request?

Mr. Speaker: I think this is a matter that necessarily comes up in consideration of the estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are quite right, sir, and I thank you.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

550. Departmental administration—further amount required, $20,775.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to draw the minister's attention to the text of the communique issued at the conclusion of the federal-provincial conference on November 26, and particularly to the last two paragraphs in that communique, which read as follows:

> Possible changes in the tax-sharing arrangements act were discussed but it was understood that no endeavour would be made to reach conclusions on this matter prior to further consideration of the subject by the dominion government in the light of the public statements made by the provincial representatives in open sessions and the discussions which took place in committee.
> All delegations wish to express their pleasure at the opportunity which the conference afforded to put their views before the others who were present. It was agreed that a subsequent meeting be held as soon as possible in the new year in accordance with the proposal made by the dominion government in calling this conference.

Well, as I look at the calendar on the table I find that this is September 6. This conference has neither met nor have we been able, despite repeated requests throughout the session, to get any indication as to when the conference might be called or indeed if the conference will be called at all. All hon. members are aware of the fact that one Saturday morning in January last the minister came into the house and read the text of a telegram he had sent to the premiers of the ten provinces indicating that the federal government in its wisdom, as a unilateral act, was going to make a change in the tax-sharing arrangement to increase the base on which the share of the income tax of the provinces was calculated from 10 per cent to 13 per cent. We all remember that the minister had some difficulty with his arithmetic, and he spent most of the next week correcting it, but that is a minor matter.

The major matter is that the preceding parliament had passed an act, valid for one year only, an act which applies to the fiscal year in which we are now, and an act which will expire not long after the opening of the next session if it comes, as the Prime Minister in his prognostication suggested it would, some time in January.

I said this in the budget debate, and I would remind the minister that no reply was given at that time. I said I felt that it was a deliberate design of the government to have it happen this way, so that next January the provinces would be faced with another take it or leave it, unilateral proposition. That appears to be what is in contemplation.

There is, of course, an alternative which would be even less acceptable, I should think, to the provincial governments, namely that the government should just allow the legislation to lapse and go back to the previous arrangement. It may be that, in view of the staggering proportions of the minister's deficit, that is his secret intention. However, I am not seeking to speak the minister's mind; I am only seeking to speak my own.

It seems to me that this is a strange way to proceed, that it is a strange way to treat the provinces after this undertaking that the conference would be convened as early as possible, or as soon as possible in the new year. I know if that communique had been issued by the present Prime Minister's predecessor or by the predecessor of the Minister of Finance that conference would have been held long ago. The plain meaning of those words was that it would be early in the new year and I could look up statements in the proceedings which would confirm that impression. But for some reason or another, despite what all the provincial governments undoubtedly believed was an undertaking that this conference would be held, there has been no conference and no hint of a conference from the federal government.

We have had, of course, several statements attributed to the premier of Ontario that the conference would be held at this date or at that date, but it seems evident that the premier of Ontario is perhaps not as much in the confidence of the present administration as he may have been when this conference was held a year ago, or as he may have been even as late as January, or as his officials may have been at that time. But what we know, and all we know—because we have been kept completely in the dark about this matter and there are very few places where it is possible under the rules to debate it, and this happens to be one of them—about this extremely important matter is what we have read. The minister from Newfoundland had this to say on May 4, 1947, as reported in the St. John's News. I just happened to have his comment here; I could just as well have quoted any other minister.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Did the hon. member say 1947?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should have said 1957; I thank the hon. gentleman for the correction. This statement is in direct quotation marks. It was a statement made by the hon. gentleman at St. Stephen, New Brunswick. No, I am mistaken; it was a statement made by the Prime Minister at St. Stephen, New Brunswick. The hon. member for St. John's West was asked for a comment, and this is what he said:

> —our party if returned to power will give the Atlantic provinces and the municipalities a better deal than they have now.

So far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned the minister's party has carried out that undertaking, and I have always given them credit for that fact. But what I am drawing attention to is the statement of the Prime Minister and what the minister said. The minister went on to say this, and I may say that I just picked this report up; I happened to have it here, but I could find this same statement from half a dozen other ministers, including the Minister of Finance. The minister went on to say:

> "The federal government during the past eight years has been in a position where the revenue collected by them leaves no room for the provinces or the municipalities to finance the improvements and maintenance of necessary public services.
> "They will continue to suffer from shortage of schools, electrification and good roads—

And these are the words I wish to emphasize.

—unless there is a redistribution of the taxation powers. This our party hopes to bring about.

That was the policy. It was the policy enunciated by Mr. Drew when he was the hon. gentleman's leader, when he sat over here on this side of the house in another parliament. It was the policy enunciated by the present Prime Minister. It was the policy repeated ad nauseam by the Minister of Finance when he sat over here on this side of the house. I refer to the policy that there was to be a redistribution of these tax sources. Where is it? When is it going to happen, or what is going to happen?

I do not think anybody believes that this particular feature of Tory policy is ever going to be translated into action. When the minister made that confession last January that he had to follow Mr. Harris's policy and that all that he could do was pay a small dividend on Mr. Harris's policy, I believe that was the real and practical turning point.

I must say that I commend the government for their wisdom and good sense in adopting Mr. Harris's policy, because it was a sound policy and theirs was never a sound policy, but the fact is that they only did it in this unilateral fashion. They only did it for one year. No provincial government now knows, nor does this parliament, what is going to happen at the end of the year. Before very long I think the minister should come clean and tell us what the policy of the federal government is with respect to this tax-sharing problem, and particularly with respect to the statute which is going to expire this year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The house has been given from time to time all the information that is available on this subject. The important measures that were passed by parliament last January for fiscal assistance to the provinces have been an important contribution to strengthening the fiscal position of the provinces and the municipalities during this year. The Atlantic adjustment grants providing $100 million payable at the rate of $25 million per annum over the next four years commenced on April 1. Each of the four Atlantic provinces is receiving benefits from that source, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland at the rate of $7½ million per annum and Prince Edward Island at the rate of $2½ million per annum.

The other measure of fiscal aid to the province approved by parliament in January on the motion of the government was the increase from 10 per cent to 13 per cent in the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax. That has been of assistance to all of the provinces. That is the position. The provision for the increase to the provinces from 10 per cent to 13 per cent in the yield from the personal income tax was provided by parliament for one year.

The reasons for inability to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference at the beginning of the year were stated at that time and were discussed fully in this house. I am sure there is no advantage in repeating now what was said then. The government is well aware that the provision by way of increase from 10 per cent to 13 per cent applies only to the present year. Whatever measures are proposed by the government in relation to calling a conference on this subject of fiscal relations between the dominion and the provinces will be announced in due course. I have nothing I can usefully add on that subject today.

The hon. member has spoken of the budget. I think I should recall in that respect that the budget deficit estimated when I spoke in the budget debate on June 17 was $648 million. In the discussion of amendments to the Excise Tax Act, when we increased exemptions from the sales tax on fuel oil when used in logging, lumbering and mining operations involving further decreases in taxation of an estimated $2 million, I stated at that time that they would increase the deficit by that amount to $650 million. The sums included in the further supplementary estimates which have been tabled, which have been discussed in part and which will be further discussed today, involve further increases in expenditures. My estimate at this time of the deficit in the light of these increased commitments, is of the order of $700 million.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have one or two questions. Of course the minister did not answer the most important question I asked, and I repeat it. Is it the intention of the government to allow this legislation to lapse without putting anything in its place, or is it the intention to continue the 13 per cent? That is not an academic question. We are in the month of September and every provincial government, like the federal government, has to have some basis upon which to plan its finances. I should think after the 15 months or so during which the minister has been in office he would realize that for a provincial government that is an increasingly difficult problem; and to leave the provinces in doubt as to whether this additional 3 per cent is going to be continued or whether something is going to be put in its place does not seem to me the fair way of dealing with the provinces, by agreement, about which we used to hear so much when we were on the other side of the house and the hon. gentleman was over here.

This 3 per cent was given not after consultation with the provinces, but it was simply a decision of the federal government, a decision they made and which they could unmake. I should not say unmake because they made it for only one year, but if it is not made again the provinces go back to the 10 per cent. I think surely that, at least, should be cleared up, and surely the minister could tell us whether it is the intention, before new legislation is introduced, to have a conference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have dealt with that question. I said that when it is appropriate for the announcement to be made it will be made. I have indicated that these considerations as to the position of the provinces are in the mind of the government. We showed that in January, when in the face of urgent requests from the provinces we moved to ask parliament to increase the fiscal payments to the provinces without waiting for the time when it would be possible to reconvene the conference. We have not overlooked and do not intend to overlook the need which the provinces will have to know what they are going to receive in the next fiscal year so the provincial treasurers may plan their budgets accordingly.

Mr. Pickersgill: What the minister is saying is that in his own good time and out of his own superior wisdom he will condescendingly let the provincial treasuries know whether he is going to give them anything and, if so, what it is going to be; and that in the meantime this House of Commons, from which he is craving supply at this moment, has no right to know anything about it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not what the minister said at all. That is not the spirit in which the minister spoke at all. The minister I think indicated an understanding attitude toward the problem.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will leave it at that.

Mr. Pearson: This further item of departmental administration makes it possible for me to return to a matter which I raised the other day in connection with the conversion loan. I shall do so very briefly in order to make sure that the record is straight and that there is no misunderstanding concerning the matter.

The other day I asked the minister a question. I did not make a statement, I asked him a question as to what were the additional interest charges the taxpayers will have to pay, and I went on to mention charges which had been estimated to be as high as $100 million per year for the next 25 years. Then in order to make it quite clear that this was an estimate made by someone else I said that, of course, the amount would depend on how successful the operation will be. We learned last Tuesday, that $5 billion had been reconverted and most of it, I suppose, would be into the 25-year bonds.

During the luncheon recess on the day of that debate the minister got his own figures from the Bank of Canada. He brought them into committee in the afternoon. On the basis of those figures he challenged my mathematics. I must say I thought he was brave in bringing up our comparable ability at mathematics. Mine is certainly not great, as he indicated, but his own record speaks for itself. He and his supporters got a good deal of pleasure from the discrepancy between the figure I reported as having been estimated by a certain source at $100 million and his Bank of Canada figure of $49 million. I do not begrudge the minister his moment if not of truth, at least of amusement over this comparison, but I have had an opportunity to look into the matter a little further and I think it should now be cleared up.

If the figure of $6.4 billion is taken—that is the objective of the loan and it is undoubtedly on that basis that the estimate I gave to the minister was made—and if the calculation is made on the basis of the success of the loan and the conversion into 25-year bonds where the interest rate is 1½ per cent greater, the amount—and I am sure the minister's mathematics will agree with mine here—of extra interest charged to the taxpayer will be $96 million. So this particular estimate made on that basis of calculation was $4 million out; it should be $96 million instead of $100 million.

The minister gave his figure of $49 million, but he did not explain it or justify it. I suppose he explained it to this extent; he said that the amount was based on the $5 billion converted to date, which is a very different basis of calculation from the one taken in the calculation I gave. He gave the impression that our calculations were made on the same basis, which was not valid.

Assuming that all the bonds in the amount mentioned by the minister, that is to say $5 billion, have been converted—all of them—into 25-year bonds, the additional interest charge which would have to be paid on the basis of calculation he used would be $75 million. That is, assuming there was a 100 per cent conversion from the victory bonds to the 25-year bonds in the amount of $5 billion, the additional annual interest charge would be $75 million and not $49 million. Therefore if the minister's figure, given to him as he states by the Bank of Canada, of $49 million is accurate, then the government has failed to reach its major objective, which was to convert the old bonds into the new 25-year bonds, by that amount.

The difference, therefore, was not due to any error in arithmetic on my part but to the calculation which the minister made on a basis which brings about a figure of $49 million only. But this does have serious implications because I suggest it means that not as high a proportion of these bonds in the $5 billion total is being converted to the 25-year bonds as is desirable.

Before I sit down I would like to ask the minister another question on this point. Is he in a position to say whether the new conversion bonds will be supported at par, or will their value be allowed to fluctuate and find its own level on the market? That, as the committee knows, is an important question which is of great interest to bondholders and also to this committee, because the answer the minister gives will throw some light upon the monetary policies which will be applied in our country in the future, and in the very near future, when some monetary questions will have to be decided.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has approached his excursions into the field of arithmetic on the assumption that the conversion is going to be complete and that it is all going to be put into the 4½ per cent bonds. There are four issues offered to all holders of victory bonds, and the rate of interest vary on all. Those who choose the 3-year 3 per cent bonds will receive exactly the same interest as they have been receiving. There will be no interest increase on them whatever. On the seven-year 3¾ per cent bond the increase is only three-quarters of one per cent over the rate on the victory bond. On the fourteen-year bond the increase is 1¼ per cent. It is only on the 25-year bond that the increase is 1½ per cent.

I shall be very glad to give the committee in round figures the results of the conversion to date. These, of course, are not absolute figures, but they will be sufficient to guide the hon. gentleman and enable him, I think, to correct his miscalculation of the interest rates. Of the $5 billion subscribed the following are the approximate amounts subscribed in each of the four categories: for the three-year bond, $1 billion; for the seven-year bond, $1 billion; for the 14-year bond, $1.2 billion and for the 25-year bond, $1.8 billion. These are the round figures, and they make up the $5 billion aggregate subscription to Wednesday of this week.

At no time did I say that most of the subscriptions were going into 4½ per cent bonds. What I said was that more were going into the 4½ per cent bonds than into any of the other three categories. I did say it was the hope of the government that as many as possible should go into the 25-year bonds because that has the effect of postponing maturity and enabling succeeding ministers of finance to have that much firmer degree of control for debt management. So I think the hon. gentleman can without too much difficulty reconcile the figures which I gave on Monday with a revision of his own calculation.

As to the second question he raised, I do not propose to go into detail, nor do I propose to attempt to prophesy all the steps which may be taken in the future, either the near future or the distant future, in the matter of giving through the normal operations of the Bank of Canada general or limited support to the bond market on Canadian issues, whether conversion or other loans. As the hon. gentleman is aware, this is a bond of the same nature as other outstanding issues with the exception of Canada savings bonds. The Canada savings bond has a redeemable feature. It is redeemable on demand at any time at the option of the holder for 100 cents on the dollar simply by presenting it at any chartered bank.

That feature has not, of course, been attached to this bond. These are bonds of an ordinary nature, not savings bonds, and their value will depend in the days to come on the strength of the credit of the government of Canada as well as on the terms of the bonds themselves. This will establish the intrinsic value of these bonds subject to such fluctuations as do occur from time to time. However, we think we have by this major operation gone a long way toward bringing about stability in the market for Canadian bonds.

Mr. Pearson: I thank the minister for the information he has given but I certainly intend to correct the statement, which he repeated, that my figure was a miscalculation. It was no miscalculation at all. Why do I have to read again what I said? I said: "I want to ask the minister what are the additional interest charges the taxpayers will have to pay, which have been estimated to be as high as $100 million." That estimate has appeared in the press and that is where I read it; in a reputable journal too, and it was not the Winnipeg Free Press.

Then I went on to say, being particularly cautious, that the final figure would depend, of course, on the amount of bonds converted and into what maturity they were converted. Then the minister came back with his figure of $49 million without any explanation at all. He has given us his explanation this morning, and it is an important explanation.

Indeed, it does explain where he gets his figure of $49 million. The figure of $100 million was obviously based on the assumption that the operation would be completely successful and that the conversion would be entirely into the 25-year bonds.

I am sure it was the desire of the government to get as high a proportion of this conversion into the long term bonds as possible. I am sure that was the desire in order to make it easier for future financing. What we have learned this morning is of importance; that of the $5 billion converted, $1.8 billion has gone into the 25-year bonds and smaller amounts into the earlier maturities. Therefore, the calculation made on that basis does come to this figure of $49 million. To that extent it is true that the burden on the taxpayer will be easier. But to that extent also the operation has not been as successful, I assume, as the government would have liked it to be. However, there is still another week to go, and perhaps there will be more 25-year bonds taken out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We think this has been highly successful. We did not think for one minute that every holder of victory bonds would convert into the 25-year maturity. For instance, bonds in the case of many institutions are not normally purchased for periods of 25 years; they usually operate in the shorter term market. We think the response, with 36 per cent of the conversions in terms of the amount up to Wednesday of this week going into the 25-year bond, is a highly satisfactory result. There should not be any impression, therefore, that there has been a lack of success or any disappointment over the results. The results in all respects have been most highly successful.

I shall simply make this further observation with regard to interest yield. There has been a great deal of loose talk, and some of it in this house, about an increase in interest rates of 1½ per cent. From the figures I have given the committee it will be quite clear that as of the close of the market on Wednesday of this week the net increase in interest on the aggregate of conversions, far from being 1½ per cent has been a fraction under one per cent.

Mr. Carter: Before this item carries I want to refer the minister to a question which I placed on the order paper on July 1, question No. 143. This question was in two parts. Part 1 reads as follows:

How many loans have been granted to persons, companies or firms in Newfoundland by the industrial development bank in each year since 1950?

Part 2 reads:

What is the amount of each loan?

On August 18 as reported in Hansard on page 3754, the minister gave the following answer:

1. 1950, 1; 1951, 1; 1952, 1; 1953, nil; 1954, 1; 1955, 1; 1956, 1; 1957, 2; 1958, 2.

2. It is not in the public interest to disclose this information, which is a matter of customer and bank relationship.

Just because the minister makes that statement it does not automatically follow that he is right, because I do not think the minister is any less fallible than the rest of us.

It would certainly be in the public interest to know the amount of loans made by this bank in any fiscal year or in any calendar year. If it is correct that there was only one loan in each of six years in the nine-year period, that might perhaps justify what the minister said, though I would point out to him that we were not asking who got the loans and we had no interest in knowing who the customers were, but rather we wanted to know only the amounts of the loans. I do not think the minister could claim it would not be in the public interest to tell the committee what was the total amount of the loans granted in that nine-year period, and I ask him to give that information to the committee at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend may not appreciate that the industrial development bank is not an adjunct of the Department of Finance at all. The industrial development bank is a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada. It operates as an independent institution. I have no control over the industrial development bank. Some hon. members speak and act as though I had. I wish to make it clear that the industrial development bank is a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada and is responsible to the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada has a separate, independent status created by a statute of this parliament. The industrial development bank, it is true, reports from time to time as to the extent of its lending operations. Those reports appear publicly from time to time.

As to its operations in Newfoundland or in any other province, I believe that information may be available from the bank sources; but if it is, it is available to my hon. friend just as much as it is to me, because of the fact the bank operates independently of the government and independently of the Department of Finance.

When this question was asked, appearing as question No. 143 of this session, I take it the bank had a very good reason for not giving the amount, because it would have tagged each individual loan. It is not as though there had been a large number of loans so that the answer to the second question would not have disclosed the affairs of each particular individual borrower. I think my hon. friend will appreciate that it is not quite fair to expect a bank which operates in this independent way to disclose its individual operations and transactions with its customers. It makes its reports to the Bank of Canada and gives general disclosure of its operations, but not of any individual transaction.

Mr. Carter: As I understand it the Bank of Canada is an instrument of federal government fiscal policy—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no. I wish to correct my hon. friend on that, Mr. Chairman. The Bank of Canada has an independent status under legislation enacted by this parliament, and it has powers that are conferred upon it directly by parliament.

Mr. Carter: Is the government going to make the amendment promised by the Minister of Justice during the last campaign?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To what amendment does my hon. friend refer?

Mr. Carter: An amendment to the Bank of Canada Act. I believe the industrial development bank could play a much more useful role than it is playing at the present time. At present all it can do is lend money to individuals for capital industrial investment. That is not the great need at this time, particularly in Newfoundland. Whether or not the industrial development bank is a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada, it has been set up to give the public a service which they cannot get from the regular chartered banks. If it is not doing that there is no justification for its existence.

At the present time I fail to see that it is doing very much more than the ordinary commercial banks are doing and in so far as Newfoundland is concerned, as the record of that question shows, it has been of very little use at all. What we want to achieve is better use of this bank, and we want to enable it to function in a way that will be of greater benefit particularly to the smaller business people in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend can complain as he wishes if he thinks the industrial development bank is making loans in fields in which it should be operating, but I would ask him before he makes such criticisms to consult the statute under which this bank operates, because this bank's powers of lending are defined and prescribed strictly by parliament. I am informed that the bank receives many applications that are completely outside the scope of operations in which the bank is permitted by parliament to engage.

The annual report of the industrial development bank for the fiscal year 1957 is available. It shows the classification of provinces in terms of aggregate statistics. It shows that to September 30, 1957—that is to say the close of the bank's fiscal year at September 30 a year ago—the gross authorization on loans, investments and guarantees for Newfoundland was $475,000 less calculations and reductions. The gross authorizations during the fiscal year 1957 amounted to $255,000. The current authorizations at September 30, 1957, were $433,000, and the amount of loans outstanding in Newfoundland at September 30, 1957, was $315,000.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister, but I know that information is in the report. What the minister said confirms my complaint to the effect that the bank is restricted in its operations by an act of parliament. I believe that act should be opened and broadened so the scope of the bank's operations could be extended, particularly to meet the needs of the small businessmen in Canada.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a few minutes of the time of the committee because I know the minister is very anxious to complete his estimates, and I do not blame him for that.

By the end of this month the commonwealth trade and economic conference will have taken place in Montreal; in fact the minister told us it would take place between September 15 and 26. A few days later, on October 6, another very important conference will be held in New Delhi and the Minister of Finance will attend as a representative of Canada in his capacity as Minister of Finance. I know he will have great responsibilities at both conferences. One of the most important items on the agenda at the New Delhi conference will be that of expanding the operations and functions of the international monetary fund and the world bank.

Early in the year we knew something was to be done, but of course we did not know how it was to be accomplished. There were rumours in the spring that perhaps there would be an increase in the price of gold. An interesting article on this subject appeared in the Montreal Gazette of Wednesday, June 4, 1958, one paragraph of which I wish to cite:

> The possibility that the United States might so act—

—to increase the price of gold. I continue:

> —was widely rumoured last week. Plenty of evidence could be marshalled to support such a move. The most persuasive is the threat of a squeeze on international short term credit if the American recession deepens.

Of course this threat has materialized. I continue:

"The simple reason for the thoroughly undesirable squeeze on liquidity is that since pre-war days, the dollar price of many commodities entering into international trade has trebled while the dollar price of gold has stood still "says The Economist, London.

That is an extract from an article which appeared in The Economist of London. Now, Mr. Chairman, we were informed in a statement by the Prime Minister in the house on July 25 that he favoured increasing the quotas of the international monetary fund and the international bank. In a very clear statement the Prime Minister outlined what he thought should be done. Of course this was not new because earlier in the month, on the occasion of the visit of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Mr. Macmillan, this was mentioned. On June 13 the Ottawa Journal had the following report of a press conference with Mr. Macmillan:

Mr. Macmillan said a commonwealth development bank "to mobilize the potential savings of the commonwealth and to direct investment" would be discussed at the Montreal conference. Commonwealth free trade and the bank were "only my hopes and dreams".

Prime Minister Macmillan addressed members of the house and the Senate in this chamber on June 13, and on June 14 the following report appeared in the Financial Post:

Macmillan's Ottawa talks concentrate on finances.

1. Action by the international monetary fund to increase, perhaps double, the reserves of the free world.

2. Action by the world bank to bring at least a corresponding increase in the capital available for undeveloped countries.

Again this did not tell us exactly what would happen. We were still hoping there would be an increase in the price of gold. Mr. Macmillan went across the border to visit the United States, and on June 14 the following article appeared in the New York Times:

Officials believed Mr. Macmillan's optimism reflected success in "selling" to President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles his ideas for increasing the "liquidity" of the western world so that the challenge of Soviet exports might be met through increased trade between the western powers and the underdeveloped nations of Africa and Asia.

Following this, in fact on August 27, an article appeared in the Globe and Mail containing the following:

Today—

The reference is to July 26.

—Mr. Eisenhower instructed treasury secretary Robert Anderson to back moves at New Delhi to throw more resources behind the fund and bank.

We are told also that this will be done through increasing quotas and increasing the liquidity of the world bank and the monetary fund. However, in the same month an article appeared in the Montreal Gazette, part of which reads as follows:

This year the optimists are counting upon decisions reached at the commonwealth trade and economic conference here in mid-September to serve as a lever to pry the gold price into public debate. Once the issue is in the open, they believe, the chances for persuading American acceptance of a higher price are good.

I am not going to read the whole article, but only a few more extracts. In the article there is the following:

There is only one difficulty. However cogent, however strongly put, none of them answer the main American objection to a higher gold price. An increase would inflate American currency. Inflation, admittedly, is already present. But so far the government is still hopeful of keeping it under a measure of control. Deliberate inflation, such as would follow from a higher gold price increase, remains thoroughly undesirable. Moreover, the Americans are already convinced that the advantages of a higher price for gold—with the exception of those applying to the producers—can be pretty well supplied by expanding the functions of the international monetary fund and the world bank.

That is when we learned that this was to be done. I can understand the position of the minister when he goes to the commonwealth trade and economic conference. I can also understand the position of Britain in this matter. It will certainly be difficult to contradict the United States. I can see also why what I am about to read was added to this article:

Further, they would seem to have convinced the Canadian government of that point.

The United States would seem to have convinced the Canadian government that this was not the time for an increase in the price of gold, but that instead the functions of the international monetary fund and the world bank should be expanded by increasing quotas. The article continues:

The proponents of a higher gold price cite finance minister Fleming as their strong hope in pushing it through. Mr. Fleming may have preferred a higher price for gold but if so it hasn't been evident in his public pronouncements. Rather, the indications are that Mr. Fleming, like the Americans, favours the broader use of existing world monetary agencies.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): From what paper did my hon. friend read that last quotation?

Mr. Dumas: From the Montreal Gazette of August 21. I am not here to blame the minister, because I know pressure is being put on the United Kingdom and Canadian governments not to insist on an increase in the price of gold. Nevertheless I am hoping that the minister will discuss this matter at the commonwealth trade conference with other commonwealth countries. I am sure it can be discussed. Even if the United States does not like it, it is not their conference but our conference. Therefore I hope the minister will discuss the matter. I am not saying that the minister should go to New Delhi and try to raise that point very strongly, because I think it is understood before he goes there that this question should not be brought up. In the Northern Miner of two days ago the following article appeared:

> There can't be any change by Britain in the price of gold so long as it owes money to the international monetary fund. By the same token, it would be impolite to even talk about it.

That is the position the Americans are taking. However, we know that this is a very important question for the commonwealth. After all, we know that an increase in the price of gold would do much good. In the same article in the Montreal Gazette about which the minister asked me there is the following:

> There is no question that a higher price for gold would have been a proper step in the pre-war world. But the world has changed. Statesmen must deal with things as they are.

We still think there should be an increase. I do not wish to take any more time of the house, but will conclude by saying that we know that the need for reserves of some kind against the vagaries of international trade and capital movements remains undisputed. Gold therefore continues to be accepted as such a reserve, and is also prized as a means for effecting final settlement between countries. This is very true because we know that the international monetary fund, for example, expresses exchange parities in gold, and also that a portion of the subscription payments to the fund must be in gold or United States dollars and that it is specified that payment must be in United States dollars of the present gold content. The possibility that reserves of gold may now be inadequate has arisen largely because inflation has increased trade values at a rate much greater than the growth of gold reserves.

Were inflation to continue it would sooner or later become inevitable that the very retention of gold for use in international settlements would depend on a rise in the price. In the event that reserves are already inadequate, an increase in the price of gold should render international trade freer, more flexible and larger in volume. A higher gold price need not lead to inflation, owing to the divorce of money from gold. We are not on the gold standard now. This need not be inflationary, either, through its effects on public finance, given prudence in domestic fiscal policy.

[Mr. Dumas.]

Even if the minister has made up his mind not to insist at New Delhi on a rise in the price of gold, I know he is anxious to do it. I know that last fall he must have been very anxious to discuss this matter. I know that the minister, when he was on this side of the house, often blamed previous finance ministers for not having insisted on a rise in the price of gold. When he was saying that he did not know for certain that these ministers had not insisted on an increase in the price of gold. In fact we are sure they did. If the minister says they have not—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not seen evidence of it.

Mr. Dumas: —we are told that they did. The minister may have mentioned this subject at the meeting last fall, but if he did nothing came of it. He is going on October 6 to New Delhi, and he will have another chance. As I explained before, we can appreciate that there may be difficulties. However, I still say that this subject should be thoroughly discussed at the forthcoming commonwealth conference. If the minister feels that other finance ministers have not done their duty in regard to the monetary fund, he will have an opportunity to bring that out. When he goes to New Delhi he can ask for an increase in the price of gold, and when he comes back he can tell us that he has attained his objective.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As the hon. gentleman has indicated there have been proposals put forward, both by the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, in favour of an increase in the capital of the international bank for reconstruction and development, and also in the capital available to the international monetary fund. My hon. friend is aware of the statement that was made within recent days by President Eisenhower and the secretary of the treasury of the United States, Mr. Ralph Anderson.

It is quite clear that this proposal of an increase in the capital of these two important international institutions will be discussed at the meeting at New Delhi which opens on October 6. I hope to be in attendance at the meetings of the boards of governors of both these institutions. While the subjects are bound to be discussed at those annual meetings, it does not necessarily follow that final decisions will be taken at that time. The meetings normally last about five days. It may be that the board of governors will give a general expression of its views in relation to the subject and leave the matter for further discussion and further action at the executive level.

What an increase in the capital of the institutions will mean in terms of a possible increase in the contribution of gold to the fund on the part of contributing members of either institution remains to be seen. That will be determined entirely in relation to the terms that will be established and attached to any increase in the capital, and the form that the increase will take.

My hon. friend referred to some rumour that was current not very long ago that there was to be an increase in the price of gold. All I can say is that I have no information as to the source or grounds of the rumour. I think in general my hon. friend will agree that in the light of the position I have taken in this house over the years, and the things I have said in this house, I am not unaware of the interests of Canada as a gold producer.

Mr. Argue: I have one matter I should like to raise before the item carries. I have a letter from Ralph Loomer, of Falmouth, Nova Scotia, in which he encloses a copy of a letter that was received by the credit unions in Nova Scotia. The credit union letter reads in part as follows:

> Within the last few days many of you have had a visit or some form of communication from your bank advising of a new schedule of rates on all cheques cleared through the banks for credit unions and their centrals, such new schedule to become effective on November 1, 1958.
> This new schedule of rates will adversely affect the entire credit union movement across Canada, including the caisses populaires and their federation in the province of Quebec. The greatest effect will be felt by the leagues, central credit unions, co-operative credit societies and credit unions offering a personal chequing service. The organizations that will be most adversely affected will be those central organizations with secondary chequing being cleared through the centrals.
>
> This new schedule sets forth new rates that in some cases present a serious problem for the credit union movement. For us in Nova Scotia the picture looks something like this at the present time.
>
> 1. The clearing fee of 2½ cents per item which we are now paying will be increased to 5 cents per item or just doubled. We expected to clear this year something between 25 and 30 thousand cheques.
> 2. The service charge will be 10 cents per item both debit and credit as compared to no service charge at present.

The letter is quite lengthy and I do not intend to read anything further from it. If the minister knows anything about this particular matter now I would appreciate him giving us his opinion. If he has no information I would appreciate him looking into this question to see if the banks will reconsider the position they have taken. I think he will agree with me that the credit union movement of this country is performing a very worth-while service to its membership, and that anything that would add to its financial costs by way of clearing fees to the banks should not be enacted. I would hope the minister would use his good offices to have these charges revert, if possible, to their previous level.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be glad to look into it, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

553. To provide for the expenses of a royal commission on Newfoundland, including the payment, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, of honoraria or allowances as may be authorized by the treasury board to officers, clerks or employees permanently employed in the civil service for services rendered by them to the commission, $10,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was grateful to His Honour Mr. Speaker for pointing out that I would have an opportunity to pursue the inquiry, though there is not much point in pursuing the inquiry itself, which I made to the Prime Minister this morning about his reply to an appeal made to him by unanimous vote of the house of assembly of Newfoundland, contained in a resolution which was moved by the premier and seconded by the leader of the Prime Minister's own party in Newfoundland and which was transmitted to the government, making a request that the province should be given what is its undoubted right by this parliament this session. I had not much hope the other evening when the Minister of Finance replied to the appeals to the government which were made by all the Liberal members from Newfoundland who were present in Ottawa at that time to accede to this unanimous request of the house of assembly. But the minister did not slam the door tight; that was left for the Prime Minister this morning. Despite this unanimous request; despite the fact that the leader of his own party in the house of assembly in Newfoundland had seconded this motion and that all the Conservative members had supported it, he indicated that no attention was going to be paid to the request.

This is an extremely serious matter. While there is nothing an opposition can do in the circumstances except protest, I certainly do so, and I have no doubt that my friends from Newfoundland on this side of the house will join in that protest. What is this request that the Prime Minister has turned down, and turned down for no valid reason whatsoever? It is a request made as long ago as August 11 in the first instance and made again by the assembly, as I have said, two days ago. It is a request that as an interim payment the amount recommended by the royal commission which was set up to complete the work of union should be paid and paid immediately. Why? Here are the premier's words in his original message of August 11:

> I wish to stress the importance to the welfare of Newfoundland of immediate federal action on an interim basis. The commission has clearly shown that at least the amounts recommended are urgently needed to enable the provincial government to continue existing services.

That is what we are denying or rather what the government is denying, because I certainly take no part in it and we on this side of the house have shown by our speeches the other night that we take no part in it. May I say that I appreciate the support that was given to the position taken by the Liberal members and by our leader. I refer to the support that was given by the hon. gentlemen in the corner. We have shown that we feel this action should have been taken.

What is it that is being denied or refused? It is money that is urgently needed to continue existing services, not to have any kind of improvement but to continue existing services. I want to be fair about this matter. The Prime Minister said this in his reply to the appeal and the Minister of Finance the other night put it on Hansard. I will read it from Hansard; I may say that I am reading from page 4623:

> We expect prorogation of parliament within very few days and it is quite impossible to complete full consideration of the royal commission's report in the meantime.

This is the part to which I wish particularly to draw attention.

> Newfoundland is receiving $7,500,000 per annum as its share of the Atlantic adjustment grant and an additional three per cent of the yield from the personal income tax this year, neither of which would have been received by the province of Newfoundland had this government not come into office. These benefits, which incidentally exceed the amounts recommended by the royal commission, should enable you to meet the fiscal conditions described in your telegram pending final decision on recommendations of royal commission.

That is the reply. I do not contest that Newfoundland is receiving the Atlantic provinces grant. I do not contest that Newfoundland, like the other provinces, is getting the extra 3 per cent. But all those other provinces are getting these things to improve their services, to ameliorate their conditions. What does the Prime Minister say to Newfoundland? He says to Newfoundland, "You can take what the other provinces—every one of them richer than Newfoundland—can use for improvements and you must use it to continue your existing services." That is what this government is saying. That is the sympathetic attitude they have taken to the unanimous request of the legislature in which their own party joined.

That is the situation; there is no way whatever of getting around it. This feeble excuse that the government did not have time to consider the recommendations of the report is no excuse whatsoever. Unless the Minister of Finance, the minister from Newfoundland or the Prime Minister is going to tell us that the government is considering cutting down this award, there is no excuse. If they are considering the possibility of cutting it down, then I think they ought to be honest and frank enough to get to their feet and say so. But if they are not considering cutting it down, and if all they are considering is either keeping it as it is or increasing it, there is no ground under the sun for denying the minimum amount recommended by the commission.

No reason was given either by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance the other night. I cannot understand why the government should have taken this attitude. Knowing that they would have no debate, knowing that there would be no difficulty about getting this vote through, I cannot conceive of a reason why the government should take the attitude they have taken or why they should not have acceded immediately to this request for what is, after all, the right of the newest province of Canada. I venture to say that if Ontario or Quebec had been asking for their rights, and if the premier and leader of the opposition in the legislature of Ontario had sent a joint appeal to have something done to which they had a right under the British North America Act, there would have been no similar hesitation on the part of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I venture to suggest that if the same request had come from the premier of Quebec seconded by the leader of the opposition in that assembly there would have been no hesitation at all, if it was their right, as this is. But because it is Newfoundland this attitude is taken. I am not going to assign reasons; I am not going to impute motives. I will leave the government to explain this matter themselves.

It seems to me that more than from any other member of the government, the one from whom we ought to have that explanation is the minister who represents the province of Newfoundland in the government of Canada. The minister sat silent the other night when we on this side of the house representing the province of Newfoundland made our appeals to the government. I am not criticizing him for that. I recognize the fact that, while the matter was still under consideration, while the government had not reached a final conclusion, the minister under the doctrine of collective responsibility had no other course to follow. I found myself at times in the same position as that in which the minister found himself that evening, and I offer no criticism on that score.

But the decision has now been taken; it has now been announced. The government has said no to Newfoundland. It has said no to the unanimous request of the province. It seems to me that "no" should be explained, that we should know why this reasonable request has not been met. That is the more true, Mr. Chairman, when one thinks of the fact that the Prime Minister himself clearly recognized what the situation was at the time of the provincial conference last November. At that conference the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick both suggested that Newfoundland should not participate in the proposed Atlantic provinces grant because Newfoundland's case was a separate and different one.

The Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

Mr. Pearson: We would be prepared to continue.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the committee give unanimous consent to continue this sitting after one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the sitting continue after one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would suggest to the minister that he try to exercise a little of his influence on some of his supporters who do not seem to understand what an important question is now before the committee, particularly when we are sitting at an hour not prescribed by the house.

As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, this position was recognized clearly and explicitly by the Prime Minister at the federal-provincial conference last November. At that time the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick said or implied—in fact I think there is no doubt, but I do not want to be unfair to them and I do not want to waste time in reading that part of the record so I say "said or implied"—that Newfoundland should not participate in the Atlantic provinces grant because the Newfoundland situation was being considered by a royal commission. This is what the premier of Newfoundland had to say in reply to this contention, as reported at page 100 of the proceedings:

Yesterday Premier Stanfield in his magnificent speech, and Premier Flemming in his magnificent speech, each had a paragraph of identical meaning referring to Newfoundland. You, Mr. Prime Minister, referred specifically to Newfoundland but in other terms, I am happy to say.

I got the impression from these two friends of mine that they are under the impression that so far as this conference is concerned Newfoundland might as well not be here, that our case is being taken care of by the royal commission. That is not so.

No matter what the royal commission recommends, no matter if they recommend the full amount we have asked for and if you and your colleagues recommend that amount to parliament and parliament passes it, all it will do will be to enable us, to enable the government of Newfoundland, to continue—

And I emphasize this once again.

—to continue the present levels and standards of our public services which are a quarter of a century behind the maritimes. That is all it can do at the most.

That is why I noted so carefully your words yesterday—

This is addressed to the Prime Minister.

—when you did not by any manner of means suggest that Newfoundland had no place in this conference today and yesterday. I thank you and Newfoundland thanks you for that.

Later on, as recorded lower down the page, he had a further comment—I am going to read as little as possible in order to take as little of the time of the committee as possible—to the effect that as the result of certain things into which I will not go at the moment, Newfoundland was left behind in the North American progress, and then the premier went on to say the following:

We ask the Canadian government this simple question: Do you really think, does Canada think, does the parliament of Canada really think, does the Prime Minister think, that Canada has done its duty to the new province when it implements the recommendations of the royal commission which will enable it to maintain our present levels and standards?

Is that all? Are we not to be invited to future fiscal conferences? Does that settle Newfoundland's case, just the implementing of the report of the royal commission? Are we not part of this fiscal conference when the Prime Minister said yesterday that he will recommend to parliament some additional and special consideration for the Atlantic provinces? In adopting the new term "Atlantic provinces" did he not include Newfoundland? I am sure he did. Was that not something separate and apart altogether from the royal commission? Surely the recommendations of the royal commission have nothing to do with this fiscal conference, nothing whatever.

The Prime Minister replied, as recorded at page 101, as chairman of the conference in the following words:

I will say no more at this time, but I would point out to the premier of Newfoundland that when I used the expression "the Atlantic Provinces" I anticipated what his views would be in regard to the use of that expression.

I think that clearly indicates that the Prime Minister at that time understood quite clearly that the Atlantic provinces grants were intended to be available to Newfoundland in the same way and for the same purpose as they are available to the three maritime provinces; that is, to make improvements in their services and not merely to continue the existing situation; and that there is no connection, and should be no connection whatsoever, between the two subjects.

Then we had the telegram to the premier of Newfoundland on August 26 saying, in effect: "You got these Atlantic provinces grants which you would not have got if we had not been in office, but you cannot use them like the other Canadians can use them. You have to use them for existing services because we are not going to give you what you have a right to have," that is to say the award of this royal commission. That is what the Prime Minister is saying. He is saying, "You are a second class province; you are not entitled to your rights". That is what it is, and let there be no mistake about it whatsoever.

I am the more surprised that this decision should have been announced in the final way in which it was announced this morning, because I have looked over some of the things said in the past by the minister from Newfoundland when he sat on this side of the house. On April 23, 1951, as will be found at page 2306 of Hansard, there is one sentence which I would like to read from a long speech by the minister which in large part supports this particular sentence. He referred to term 29, and having quoted it he said:

> That section gave a term of eight years within which this royal commission should be appointed. But it has been my opinion from the beginning that the financial terms have been inadequate.

The minister went on to point out that the previous government should do something about this at a time when they were supposed to be derelict in their duty in not doing it, and that is the position—I am sure he will correct me if I am wrong—which he consistently took during that parliament and which was taken also by his associate the late Gordon Higgins, who also spoke eloquently on this subject in the house. Thereafter the minister became a candidate for parliament and in 1957 was successful in being re-elected. He became a member of the government, and the representative of the province of Newfoundland in the government.

I could quote many other citations similar to this one but on May 1, 1957, the St. John's Telegram quotes the minister to the following effect:

> If elected, Mr. Browne said, he would "fight personally to see that we get better terms from Ottawa (under terms of union which come up for revision this year) and to convince our party of the justice of our case". He wants to fight personally because Newfoundland's "financial future depends on how parliament treats the report of the royal commission at the next session."

That was in 1957; that was what the minister said, and it is perhaps more than anything else why he got elected. If I remember rightly both newspapers in St. John's supported the hon. gentleman because they felt that Newfoundland needed advocates of its cause on both sides of this house. Perhaps I would not have agreed with their support of the hon. gentleman, but I agree that we do need advocates for Newfoundland on both sides of the house, and I am anxious to hear what that hon. gentleman is advocating for Newfoundland, because we have not had any evidence of that as yet.

It is not as though the minister said this before the election and then said something else afterwards, because on June 11, 1957—a day that many of us will remember, particularly on this side and perhaps on the other side of the house too, for a long time to come—the minister made a statement about his election and, again to quote from the St. John's Telegram, he is reported as follows:

> Personally he was extremely happy that through its representation in parliament, Newfoundland's interests will be protected especially in the matter of the financial compensation that we should receive and expect from the federal government.

This, therefore, is not a new matter for the hon. gentleman and I think we should be told by him why it is, and with what justification, that this course has been taken, at least with his tacit approval however much he may have fought against it in the cabinet. He has to share the collective responsibility for this slap in the face to the whole house of assembly and the whole province of Newfoundland which he and I were both elected to represent. I also think he should tell us what he is going to do about getting that consideration which was promised by the Prime Minister in reply to the question of the Leader of the Opposition on August 15, and which in large part, despite other preoccupations, could have been given between July 10 and September 6, the approximate two months during which the government had this report in its possession.

I do not rest my case there because I am willing, as I say, to give the government a year or even two years to consider the report if this interim payment is made, if the basic amount is paid, but what we do protest against is this pointblank, blunt refusal to accede to the request, the well merited request, made by the premier and the leader of the opposition of Newfoundland for what is the right of the government and people of that province.

Mr. Carter: I would be failing in my duty to my constituents and my province if I did not add my voice to the protest which has been raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and I want to protest all the more vigorously because neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of Finance nor any spokesman for the government has given one single reason why this interim payment should not be made.

I want to put on record seven reasons why interim payments should be made. My first reason is that these payments have been recommended by a royal commission after a very thorough study of the economic circumstances and the needs of Newfoundland. My second reason is that this assistance is one of Newfoundland's rights, emanating as it does from term 29 of the terms of union, and was recommended as such by the commission. In the third place, Newfoundland has not received any payment which has not also been granted to other Atlantic provinces. Not a single cent has gone to Newfoundland which has not also gone to the others. However, refusal of this grant prevents Newfoundland from making full use of grants in the way the other provinces are able to make use of them.

My fourth reason is that the grants are long overdue. They are overdue by more than a year. My fifth reason is that the grants have been requested by an unanimous resolution of both parties in the Newfoundland legislature, the government as well as the Conservative opposition. That request has been made in the full knowledge of Newfoundland's needs and of the urgency of the situation, which was sufficiently great to put this matter beyond the ordinary lines of party division.

My sixth reason is that the government has itself appealed to the provincial governments to do everything possible to work out a program of public works in order to provide more employment during the winter months. The government of Newfoundland has complied with that request and developed a program of works which would create employment, particularly during the winter months, but now by its action the federal government has nullified those efforts on the part of the provincial government to comply with this government's own request.

My seventh reason is that Newfoundland is faced with the prospect of the worst winter this year that it has experienced since the hungry thirties. By granting this request for an interim payment the federal government would not be committing itself in any way; neither would the granting of an interim payment interfere with the federal government's wish to give the fullest consideration to the recommendations of the commission. However, by its refusal the federal government has decided to condemn Newfoundland to a retarded rate of progress and to condemn Newfoundlanders to unnecessary hunger, hardship and suffering.

I therefore appeal again to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. John's West, to use his influence with his colleagues in the cabinet in order to have this decision reversed.

Mr. Batten: I want to add my voice to the protests that have been made here this morning by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. It does seem to me that there are no grounds at all for this refusal by the present government to acknowledge the findings of the McNair royal commission and thereby give Newfoundland what we think is a final settlement of that agreement entered into in 1949.

I could agree with the Prime Minister that maybe there is good reason for taking time just now to study this report further, and I have no objection to that; but I do believe it is only fair and just that an interim payment should be made now so as to avoid the hardship that will come to Newfoundland during the coming winter.

I can see no reason why we have not heard from the hon. member for St. John's West; I do not know why he has not given us the benefit of his opinion in this instance. I believe I am speaking for all Newfoundlanders when I say we ask for nothing which is not our right, and at this time we come to the Canadian parliament asking for nothing more than justice without equivocation.

There is little need to recount the facts concerning term 29. That has already been done. There is no occasion now to comment once more on the foresight of those who included this term in the terms of union, or to restate the significance which Newfoundlanders have attached from the very beginning to this particular term of the agreement. Implementation of the recommendations of the McNair royal commission in the manner, the speed and the degree in which it is done will be a measure of the desire of the Canadian government to honour an obligation undertaken on behalf of the Canadian people.

I listened with some concern to the very definite statement made by the Prime Minister today; and while I can agree that he may require more time to study this document and give further consideration to the case, I can see no reason why an interim payment could not be made so that Newfoundland might be able to carry on over the present year at least. I was talking to an hon. member yesterday following a previous discussion in this house, and he gave me the idea that he was of the opinion that this was all a one-way street.

May I tell the committee that the union of Newfoundland with Canada was not a one-way street. I believe the stature of Canada as a nation was enhanced when Newfoundland joined Canada in 1949. It was a section of this land, formerly a dominion in its own right, which elected by a free vote of its people to become a part of Canada and the tenth province of this federation. It is true that Newfoundland has received many social benefits and also the services of government departments which have become highly specialized over the years. These have been a great blessing to Newfoundland, but it must not be concluded that because of that fact there has not been something else going in the other direction. Over the last eight years Newfoundland has been making a substantial contribution to the Canadian economy on a commercial, financial and economic basis, and I submit that this contribution is capable of measurement because Newfoundland, unlike the other provinces of Canada, did not grow with confederation. It elected years ago to maintain its independence, and because of that fact it is now possible to measure the contribution which Newfoundland has been able to make to the Canadian economy.

It should be remembered, too, that when Newfoundland became a province of Canada it did so at a time when it was enjoying the greatest prosperity it had ever enjoyed. There was no time in the history of the province when its condition was as happy as in 1949, so the union of Newfoundland with Canada was not a device to avoid the risk of financial peril. It was a desire on the part of Newfoundland and the people there to become a part of this great nation. It is now the duty of this committee to affirm and consummate its obligation with respect to clause 29 of the terms of union agreed to in 1949. We find the present government unwilling to honour that obligation.

I say again the union of Newfoundland with Canada enhanced Canada as a nation. It added 400,000 people to the population of this country. If these people had been brought here from some European country a considerable amount of money would have been paid to bring them and establish them here as Canadian citizens. But not only did they not have to be brought and established here; they brought with them many things of benefit to Canada. They brought to Canada an addition to its area of 155,000 square miles of territory, adding a considerable area to the portion of Canada below the 60th parallel, Labrador with 112,000 square miles and Newfoundland with 43,000, approximately twice the size of Nova Scotia or approximately 80 per cent of the total combined area of the other three maritime provinces. From a military standpoint the union brought with it control of the north Atlantic approaches to North America as well as a major protection to the security of Canada.

We have only to look at the mineral resources to see something of the further contribution Newfoundland has made to Canada. In the last few years we have heard a great deal about the iron resources of the United States, the Mesabi range, and about where iron resources will be found in the future. Those who have taken the trouble to read the report of the Paley commission of 1952 will have some idea of the need for iron ore in the United States and Canada. In 1953 Bell island alone was able to provide 40 per cent of the total Canadian production of iron ore. In that year the total production was 6.5 million tons. In 1955 this one mine alone was able to provide 45 per cent of the total iron ore production of Canada.

Oh, yes; Newfoundland has made a substantial contribution to the Canadian economy. This does not take into account the other tremendous iron ore reserves that exist in Newfoundland and Labrador. Looking at it from another point of view, when the reserves are further developed in Labrador, and when Bell island has assumed still more importance, Canada will be making a great demand on the production which will be available from these sources. The iron ore mines of Bell island produce an ore which has an extremely high silica and phosphorous content. The ore of Labrador has a comparatively low silica and phosphorous content. If we are going to develop our mines on Labrador there will be need to develop further the mines of Bell island so there may be a mixture of these two ores for the blast furnaces of Europe. One could go on and talk about copper, zinc and lead and the contribution of these resources Newfoundland is able to make to the Canadian economy, thus increasing Canada's mineral production.

It has often been said that the forest products of Canada are her very greatest resource. In Canada we produce many tons of newsprint each year. Newfoundland with a population of only 2.5 per cent of the total Canadian population has increased newsprint production in Canada by 10 per cent since union in 1949. On this island we have considerable forest resources, and the same is true of Labrador. These are adding much to the economy of Canada. I still contend that in the union of Newfoundland with Canada it was able to make a real contribution to the economy of the country.

Our fishing industry is important to Newfoundland and to Canada. In 1954 Newfoundland was able to produce 29.8 per cent of the total landings for that year, not an insignificant amount. It has been said, too, and

I believe with a great deal of merit, that any domestic market is far better than a foreign market. On the island of Newfoundland there is a domestic market of $200 million each year. Many of the things Newfoundland bought before 1949 came from other parts of the world. Today between 85 and 90 per cent of the imports of Newfoundland come from the Canadian mainland.

I believe that in consideration of the fact that the union of Newfoundland with Canada was not a one-way street in the first place, and second because what is being asked for now is only a consummation of the terms of union entered into in 1949, further consideration should have been given this request; and it could have been given on a non-partisan basis since the suggestion made to the Prime Minister was made not by the premier of Newfoundland alone but one in which he was joined by the leader of the opposition in that province.

The request that it made of this committee today is made by the people of Newfoundland. In 1949 they thought whatever agreement was entered into would be honoured by the federal government. I say again that what we are asking now is nothing more than justice without equivocation.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I wish to associate myself with what has been said by hon. members from Newfoundland regarding this payment to that province. I agree wholeheartedly with what has been said by those hon. gentlemen.

I have learned that the legislature of Newfoundland has unanimously agreed that this house be requested to pay to Canada's newest province, England's oldest colony, the amount that has been recommended by the royal commission on Newfoundland's finances after a careful study of term 29. I also understand that many expenditures set up in the estimates of Newfoundland for the fiscal year cannot be met without an interim payment from the federal government. By making this payment the Prime Minister and his cabinet should not be deterred from giving consideration to the recommendations contained in the McNair report relative to increasing the amount beyond $8 million per annum.

In view of the above I hope the Prime Minister and his colleagues will give further consideration at the earliest possible date to the joint request of the legislative assembly of Newfoundland. Thus far it seems that the request is like a voice crying in the wilderness. We are asking only that Newfoundland be treated as any other province and extended the same rights. Our joining the other nine provinces made our relationship with Canada a two-way street of mutual benefit. I feel, therefore, that I must join in the protest of the hon. members who have spoken before me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this subject was discussed at considerable length in committee of supply two days ago. At that time the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said he was speaking in a non-partisan tone and making an appeal to the government. On behalf of the government I responded to that appeal in, I think, a like spirit and indicated that the government viewed this as a serious matter calling for very careful consideration. At no time has there been any refusal whatever of any just claim on the part of Newfoundland.

But today the hon. member has unleashed a very bitter attack on the government, and has made some charges based apparently on the assumption that there has been some refusal on the part of the government. There has not. This report remains, in the view of the government, a report relating to a matter of very great importance to fiscal relations between Canada and Newfoundland. It is a matter that affects fiscal relations not simply today but in the years to come. It is a matter which, if it is to receive justice, must have the most careful consideration.

I placed on the record two days ago two of the telegrams which have been exchanged between the premier of Newfoundland and the Prime Minister of Canada. I drew attention to the fact that the premier of Newfoundland had publicly expressed gratitude for the position taken by the Prime Minister of Canada in this house in stating that this matter, because of its importance, should and would receive very careful study on the part of the government. In my remarks I enlarged on the fact that under the pressures of the session it simply had become impossible to give to this large question that careful consideration which it merits, and on that and the Prime Minister's statement today hon. members opposite have mounted their attack this morning.

You will not have forgotten, Mr. Chairman, that there were two factors in the situation which led the government to indicate that action by way of provision of an item in the estimates would not be possible in the dying days of the present session. The first, of course, is one I have mentioned, that the matter is a very large one and the report must receive careful and thorough study. The other, however, was one that the Prime Minister emphasized and which has received further emphasis, not mentioned by hon. members opposite, within the past twenty-four hours. That further fact is that the report has not been received with acceptance by the government of Newfoundland. Indeed, the report has been the subject of the bitterest attacks on the part of the premier of Newfoundland.

Had this been a report whose recommendations had been accepted by the government of Newfoundland the matter might have appeared in a different light, but we are asked now to take action to fulfil for this year the full extent of the recommendations in the report while that report is still denounced by the recipient government. To proceed in the way that we have been challenged today to proceed would, I think, hardly be regarded as responsible in the light of the existing condition. I emphasize that the report has not been accepted at any time. Immediately it was made public it was received with strong expressions of dissatisfaction and critical comment in Newfoundland by the premier of that province.

If anything had been lacking in the expressions of dissatisfaction and criticism on the part of the government of Newfoundland at that time, certainly that lack has been filled since, for today's noon editions of the Ottawa papers carry reports of statements made in the Newfoundland legislature yesterday by the premier of Newfoundland. I shall read just a few extracts from the report. It is a Canadian Press dispatch from St. John's dated September 6:

> Premier Smallwood says the McNair royal commission that recommended Newfoundland should receive an additional $8 million annually from the federal government "was a dead loss". "This is the first time I said it publicly", he told the legislature yesterday. "The work of the royal commission was a dead loss. And the commissioners are also a dead loss. I recommended the appointment of some of those commissioners—God forgive me."
> The commission consisted of chairman Chief Justice John B. McNair of the New Brunswick supreme court, Chief Justice Sir Albert Walsh of the Newfoundland supreme court and Professor John Deutsch.
> It was appointed by the last Liberal government in Ottawa to determine how much Newfoundland needs to keep public services at their present level.
>
> Provision for the commission was made in term 29 of the terms of union with Canada, signed in 1949 when a Liberal government was in Ottawa.
>
> Premier Smallwood surprised some members by announcing, "I'm glad that there was a change of government in Ottawa" following the last federal election. "I was glad the minute it happened. Twenty-two years in power is too long...I don't think it's good that they got such a majority. They should have got a substantial majority but not that big."
> He assured he house, "In Newfoundland I'm a Liberal. But I am a confederate before I am a Liberal. My prime interest in life is to see confederation succeed regardless of what complexion the federal government is."

Then he proceeded, as this article indicates, to attack various features of the report and some of the statements made in the report concerning conditions in Newfoundland. The article makes mention of the fact that the opposition leader, Mr. Malcom Hollet, had said earlier that the commission might have recommended more if they had seen conditions in the White bay area. Then the article continues:

> "That's the trouble", Mr. Smallwood said. "They wouldn't go. You couldn't budge them. They practically mutinied when we tried to show them pictures of our institutions."

These are but a few of the statements that could be taken from this report, and these are the words of the premier of Newfoundland delivered not months ago, not weeks ago, but only yesterday in the legislative assembly of Newfoundland. These are attacks on his part delivered against the report, and this is the report that we as a government in the dying stages of this session are expected to adopt and to ask the house to implement.

I think a great deal more consideration must be given to this situation, to the report, its recommendations and the conditions that can be given to the matter under the pressure of this particular time. We would not be doing justice to this large subject to act now in the way we have been asked to act in the face of these crushing attacks delivered against the report by the premier of Newfoundland himself. Surely it is not to be said that we are somehow in default in not moving to implement the report when the report, so far from meeting with satisfaction on the part of the government of Newfoundland, has evoked such bitter and crushing attacks by the premier of that province.

I have only this to say in conclusion, and it is a repetition of what I said on Thursday and earlier today. There has been no refusal on the part of the government to consider this matter. On the contrary, there has been the plainest undertaking on the part of the government to give this matter that careful consideration which it merits, having regard to the importance of the subject involved and the interests of Newfoundland in her fiscal relations with the federal government. That careful study will be given. That careful study which the subject warrants could not be given under the pressures of these recent days and in the dying minutes of this session.

Mr. Pearson: I am amazed at the argument advanced by the Minister of Finance in explaining the refusal of the government to make this grant available to Newfoundland for this year so that Newfoundland can make up its budget on the basis of this amount, which it had every reason to expect, as an interim amount. The argument the minister used the other night, or one of the arguments he used, was to this effect. Well, Newfoundland was getting its share from the Atlantic provinces grants for the improvement of services, and that should be enough for the maintenance of services.

At least he has not repeated that argument today, but what he has done to support his case is this. He has quoted from the current edition of the Ottawa Journal, repeating the argument that because the Newfoundland government and the opposition there are disappointed at the amount recommended by the royal commission, because they think it should be much more and because Mr. Smallwood has expressed himself so forcibly on that score, they should be given nothing at all.

The reconsideration which the Newfoundland government and the Newfoundland house of assembly want is a reconsideration upward. In other words the argument is that because you in Newfoundland asked for more as a long-term proposition, we will give you nothing now. There is no escape from that conclusion. We are not asking the government to decide on a long-term policy at this time. We are asking the government to live up to its pledge to implement that particular recommendation of the report which will make it possible for Newfoundland now to maintain its services. That is all we are asking.

Obviously they are not going to get that. The minister has said, why should we be asked to consider this matter in the dying days of this session? The fact is that in the dying days of this session they put in the supplementary estimates an item of $40 million for grain growers and one of $8½ million for universities—we are not complaining about that—they were able to do that in the dying days of this session but they were not able to do this for Newfoundland in the dying days of this session. The report making this recommendation was in the hands of the government on July 10 and the session was not dying on July 10, though the government may have felt like dying at that date.

In any event that is the situation, and no amount of specious argument on the part of the minister can alter the facts. What the government says is this; because you want a loaf, we are not going to give you half a loaf. That is the situation. We will let it stand at that.

Item agreed to.

University grants—

669. To provide that the rate of $1.00 mentioned in vote 541 of the Appropriation Act No. 1, 1957, is struck out and the rate of $1.50 is substituted therefor; and that a new agreement may be entered into accordingly with effect from the first day of April, 1958, between the national conference of Canadian universities and the Minister of Finance; the amount provided for in vote 127 of the main estimates for the present fiscal year to be applied to the purpose of this vote; additional amount required, $8,500,000.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is the item under which it is proposed by the government that the rate of $1 provided in vote 541, which has already been approved, should be struck out and the rate of $1.50 substituted therefor for aid to Canadian universities. I think I should say a brief word on this subject and in relation to some of the considerations that have been raised in this house in regard to it.

The grants to universities from federal sources were initiated in the fiscal year 1951-52. At that time the grant was less than $8 million. It was fixed at the rate of 50 cents per capita of population in Canada. That amount was raised one and a half years ago to $1 per year. Item 669 now before the committee proposes that it should be increased by a further 50 cents per capita to a total of $1.50. That will raise the appropriation this year to something over $25½ million.

When this was announced in the house a few days ago the hon. member for Laurier asked me whether there had been any indication on the part of Quebec that these amounts would be accepted by that province. I gave a negative answer. The first year these grants were made available by parliament, in 1951-52, they were accepted by the universities of the province of Quebec, but not since then. In the meantime, in accordance with the provisions of the vote year by year and latterly in accordance with the terms of the agreement between the Minister of Finance and the national conference of Canadian universities, which governs the distribution of these amounts, the unclaimed portion has been accumulating. As the portion of the total grant available to the institutions of higher learning in Quebec has not been accepted by them, the amount allocated for that province has been accumulating. By the end of this fiscal year, March 31, 1959, the amount that will have accumulated for the institutions of higher learning in the province of Quebec will amount to about $15 million. The accumulation will become more rapid by reason of the increase that is now proposed.

I wish to make it clear on behalf of the government that we would wish the institutions of higher learning in Quebec to have the benefit of the provision intended on their behalf by parliament. The province of Quebec has more than a quarter of the population of Canada. Last year it had one-third of the students of all of Canada attending institutions of higher learning. Quebec pays its full share of taxes out of which this vote is made available, and the matter has been the subject of representations made by our members of parliament from Quebec.

Let me make it abundantly clear, Mr. Chairman, that this government will always scrupulously respect the terms of the Canadian constitution. It is plainly recognized that education is a field of jurisdiction exclusively assigned to the provinces under the British North America Act. As long as this government is in office there will never be any attempt made to trespass on that jurisdiction exclusively vested in the provinces.

The distribution of these sums is governed by an agreement which is referred to in the main estimates. It is an agreement that was entered into between the then minister of finance, my predecessor Mr. Harris, on March 26, 1957 and the national conference of Canadian universities, which is an incorporated body. Some change is anticipated before long in the constitution of that body, but it will not basically affect the provision for distribution of these sums through the national body that represents the Canadian universities. The agreement is in fairly general terms, but it is the document that now governs the method of distribution under the provision made by parliament year by year through the item in the estimates.

I emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that in reference to this subject of the basis of distribution this present government makes no rigid approach. We adopt no take it or leave it attitude in regard to this basis of distribution. The agreement which has been in effect now for a year and a half stipulates that the amount to be allotted to any province is determined in accordance with the population of the province. It is a straight per capita reckoning. The sum is provided on a population basis for the institutions of higher learning of any province, and is then to be distributed among those institutions in accordance with the student enrolment in courses as defined by this agreement.

Now I say, Mr. Chairman, of this agreement in relation to the attitude of the present government, that while the formula contained in the present agreement has not so far been such as to be viewed with favour in the province of Quebec, if there is any formula or modification of the present agreement which anyone cares to put forward which would permit the institutions of higher learning in the province of Quebec to participate, and which is in keeping with the national interest, we as a government are prepared to give it serious consideration.

In order to make more clear the government's position with respect to the constitutional issues that may be regarded by some as here involved, let me close by saying this.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

(Translation):

The government respects and will always scrupulously respect, the constitution of this country. We recognize and we respect the provinces' absolute jurisdiction in the field of education. The increased grants proposed by the government are merely a necessary aid to universities, without government infringement upon a single provincial responsibility. As long as this government is in power, it will never encroach upon education, which is a provincial matter.

Mr. Chevrier: Will you always respect provincial rights as did the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent?

(Text):

Mr. Pearson: I wish to take the time of the committee for a few moments, Mr. Chairman, to talk about this very important subject. I regret that it has to be done at this hour, without benefit of luncheon, but I think it is a good thing that we should be sitting right through in this way in order to complete our work. This is an important matter, and I think I should say a few words about it.

There is no doubt that in this country in the field of higher education we are approaching—I do not think the word is too strong—a crisis in the sense that there are increasing costs, increasing needs and inadequate income to meet those costs and those needs. The obligations of government in this respect are greater than ever, and this includes the obligations of the federal government in this field of higher education, always having regard to what my hon. friend has just emphasized, the paramount necessity of respecting the authority, control and jurisdiction of the provinces in the field of education.

There has never been any desire on the part of anyone on this side to interfere with that control or that jurisdiction. When these grants to universities were initiated by Mr. St. Laurent and his government in 1951, that was made quite clear. Mr. St. Laurent was scrupulous in never departing from that principle.

When my hon. friend affirms, as he has affirmed—I wish I could affirm it as eloquently in French as he did—the policy and principle of the government he is, I am sure he will admit, carrying on the policy and principle that was followed by the previous government in this field. When he says they would welcome a formula which would make it possible for Quebec to accept this kind of assistance, I can assure him that when we were in office certainly we would have welcomed any formula which would have made that possible; indeed, we certainly sought such a formula.

Now, the need is apparent and the obligation of even the federal government is apparent in connection with this matter, subject to the qualification I have made. At the present time in this country 11.3 per cent of our income is spent by all levels of government on education, and 23.1 per cent goes to defence. The needs, as I say, are increasing. The universities must expand to meet those needs, and unless financial considerations prevent it they will expand. The Gordon commission, in its report on education, estimated that in the fall of 1964 there would be an enrolment in our universities of 113,000 students. In 1955 the bureau of statistics presented a projected university and college enrolment in Canada which estimated that in a 10-year period, which would be the fall of 1964, that enrolment would reach 128,900 students. I think the figure at present is something between 80,000 and 90,000.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The figure, when the term closed last spring, was just around 81,000, and that was a 10 per cent advance over the total of the year before.

Mr. Pearson: This shows the problem with which we are faced in the expansion of university education in this country. We are faced with the same problem in respect of capital requirements to take care of this expansion. An estimate has been made that for the next five years $314 million will be required to take care of this essential capital expansion, so the question arises at once, where is this money to come from?

In 1956 of the amount expended on university education in Canada, 6 per cent came from endowments, a decrease in percentage though an increase in absolute terms and 28 per cent came from fees. That is a high proportion of the expenditure compared with 11 per cent in the United Kingdom coming from fees. This is a heavy burden on student fees as compared with the United Kingdom. Provincial governments were providing 40 per cent of the cost and the federal government is now providing 15 per cent of the cost of higher education in this country. About 55 per cent is coming from governmental sources, while in the United Kingdom 70 per cent of the cost of university education comes from government. Other sources in this country provide 11 per cent.

Over the years the federal government has assisted in university education. When I was looking into this matter I was surprised to find how much had been done for higher education by the federal government, in the form of direct aid, in the form of scholarships and so on. I do not desire to detain the committee by going into it, but the direct aid has been substantial since world war II. There has been aid to veterans and their children, vocational assistance and the officer training plan, which is a very important contribution. There have been the national research council scholarships, scholarships given by a federal agency which have been accepted I think without question by all the provinces. This has amounted to about $25 million. Then there is assistance to universities through departmental grants for research and for extension work in health, agriculture, labour, fisheries and transport.

There is, therefore, nothing new about assistance to universities by the federal government, and that assistance has been accepted in some form by all provinces.

Then we have the grants in aid about which we are talking on this particular item. As the minister pointed out, those were instituted in 1951. In 1958 these grants amounted to something over $17 million, and the minister proposes to add $8.5 million more for that purpose. We on this side most warmly and heartily support that increase. There is also the assistance given by the Canada Council of $1 million a year in scholarships. Capital assistance for construction from the Canada Council up to March 31, shared by 12 institutions, has reached the amount of $4 million. This help to universities, as the minister has said, began in 1951, and I think it is not inappropriate at this time to pay a sincere tribute to Mr. St. Laurent for his interest in this matter and for all that he did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Nothing I could say would equal in eloquence the tribute paid to Mr. St. Laurent at the conference of Canadian universities in 1956 by the chairman of the conference, who is now the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On that occasion in paying tribute to the wise and far-sighted leadership of Mr. St. Laurent he had this to say:

> The aid that his government has extended to the Canadian universities has been given without a hint of a tendency of a suggestion of a suspicion of a trend towards a desire to undermine their academic freedom.

And he concluded as follows:

> We thank you, sir, in a mood of gratitude not unalloyed by an expectation of benefits to come.

Those benefits came shortly after. They were then doubled, and today are being increased by this amount in the estimates. We certainly welcome this measure.

There is one feature I would like to call to the attention of the minister which perhaps could be improved upon. I agree that the grants should be increased, and they are now being increased. They should be increased without any strings attached to them, and that is the case here. I am sure care has been taken to ensure that there should be no suspicion of any strings being attached by the manner in which they are being distributed through the council of Canadian universities. However, the present formula for allocating these grants, as the minister pointed out, is based on the population of each province and, within any province, those amounts are distributed in proportion to the number of students attending approved higher educational institutions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In accordance with the definition in the terms of the agreement.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, as defined, which makes them acceptable. Perhaps this formula could be altered as recommended by the national conference of Canadian universities, because in its present application the provinces with small populations but high proportions of university students do suffer. The grant for 1957-58 for Ontario per student—perhaps the minister could give me the exact figure, because I was not able to get it—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For Ontario, $252 for 1957-58.

Mr. Pearson: I had $238, but the student grant for Nova Scotia was only $148. That is of course due to the passionate desire of the young men and women in that province to have a university education, and no doubt the ease with which they qualify for such education. But perhaps the government could look into the formula recommended by the universities to see if it could be made somewhat more equitable in its distribution.

We have put forward some proposals in this field, and I just want to place them on the record, which will only take a very short time. We have proposed that the federal government should provide 2,500 Canadian scholarships and 7,500 bursaries every year to students who can pass an open examination conducted in both official languages. That would make it possible, I believe, for any young Canadian to get a university education who could qualify for it on the basis of this kind of competitive examination, and it would surely ensure that no young Canadian would be prevented from so doing because of a lack of funds.

I admit this will be an expensive scheme to put into effect. If it were put into full effect with the students studying at universities for four years it would require $25 million in assistance each year. This would be done by competitions conducted by the university association and so on. We have also proposed interest-free loans from the first university year until one year after graduation, which would constitute a revolving fund from which students could benefit, from the interest which would begin one year after they left college. I think it would be advisable for a scheme of this kind not to be restricted to Canadians who have just left school. It also could become a most important part of our adult education.

I believe this proposal should commend itself at least to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because in concluding my remarks I refer to what he said in March, 1958. This will also show that while we welcome this item because it increases the grant, it does not implement the promises made in the election campaign by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, presumably speaking for the government. On March 4, 1958, as reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald he outlined a stepped-up program of assistance comprising the following three points: urgent increase in fellowships, bursaries and scholarships. That is something I have mentioned. Next, that federal government grants to universities be increased from $1 to $1.50 per head and that is being done, and that the distribution should be based on a national average. Finally, and this is important, a possible amendment to the federal housing act to allow financial assistance to universities for residential construction which could be repaid on a self-liquidating basis.

My hon. friend probably knows that this latter point is one of the most important problems facing the universities in their capital construction program, and if the National Housing Act could be used in this way it would be a great help to them.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs repeated these proposals in Vancouver on March 22, and on that date the press quoted him as saying also that these proposals were for 1958-59. The report goes on to say that when the minister made them on this date he was cheered by more than 1,000 students. He might well have been cheered, because he said that the grants would be $1.50 per head of population instead of $1, and that there would be $6,250,000 to finance 10,000 new scholarships, bursaries and fellowships in 1958-59, eventually increasing to $25 million for 40,000 scholarships.

These were the proposals he brought forward three weeks before the election. He also promised amendments to the National Housing Act, which I have mentioned, and as a member of a government with a great interest in higher education he put forward this program as something which would be implemented in 1958-59. This is not being done. We welcome however this increase of 50 cents in the amount of the grant, and we will be very glad indeed to support it.

Mr. Herridge: As a member of a group which during the years has unceasingly urged increases in the amount of the grants to higher education we wholeheartedly support this estimate of $8½ million to increase the grants to universities by 50 per cent. I was going to make somewhat extended remarks on this item, but I will not be cruel enough to detain the committee at this time for more than a few minutes.

I must say, however, that as a group we recognize the vital importance of providing more money for universities, and that we are pleased the government has recognized this necessity by increasing this grant during this session. I am sure its good will in this respect will receive the general approval of the country.

There are two aspects of this matter, and I suppose the one which strikes the majority of us first is that Canada's fast development requires increasing numbers of highly trained Canadians to take part in that development in administration, in technical spheres and so on. We are going to require more and more of these trained Canadians, and as a result we are going to require larger and larger grants to Canadian universities in days to come.

We are very pleased that the government has seen fit to continue the practice established by the former prime minister of these grants for distribution to the universities. We think this non-partisan approach to this question is the correct one and that it will receive general approval. We trust these increased grants will do something in the first instance to improve some of the low salaries now being paid to some of the very good men who are serving in universities across Canada, and we trust also it will help to check the rising student fees. I noticed an article in the Gazette a few days ago which said, "College fees still rise, and students still enrol." We hope this will do something to check this rise in fees which has prevented many Canadians from going to universities in recent years.

Before concluding I want to emphasize one aspect of this question, and I intend to speak on it at greater length because I think this is an aspect to which greater attention should be paid. As I have said, we appreciate the need for technical training and we need men who are technically qualified, but the role of a university is much greater in our view than that of merely contributing material benefits to our civilization. In our society the individual is of prime and first importance, as he is in every free society. I think this is one thing we must always keep in our minds when we incline to worship the goddess of success and the goddess of materialism, and count everything in terms of dollars and quantities.

Universities are not developed primarily to produce merchant princes in large numbers. Go through history and you will find there is very little known about merchant princes of the past. Those who have contributed to civilization and culture are those who have contributed to the arts, to music, to painting, sculpture, design, literature and architecture. Those are the aspects of civilization which are lasting and eternal, not the activities of the merchant princes who receive the general applause of North American society. Our universities should also be recognized as breeding grounds for the development of civilized, cultured, creative-thinking individuals. It is great individuals who have provided all the treasures of the ages, and we trust that in the application of these extended grants all Canadians will want to see this aspect of our universities progress and develop.

Mr. McWilliam: Mr. Chairman, the remarks made by the leader of our party have set out this party's attitude on grants in aid to universities and the proposed increase. My hon. friend also made certain suggestions with regard to further aid.

The present formula, including this year's increase, will grant up to approximately $725 per student in some provinces. In other provinces the amount will be as low as $220 This is a most inequitable formula, particularly as it affects the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, as the hon. member for Algoma East has pointed out.

My remarks will deal with the service rendered by the small universities and their financial plight, and the group of high school students whose standards would enable them to continue their education but who are unable to do so for financial reasons. The further supplementary estimates contain an item in the amount of $8.5 million covering a 50 per cent increase in the amounts of the grants in aid, bringing the total amount paid to $25,600,000 based on the rate of $1.50 per head of population.

This increase is a most welcome and badly needed one, and meets half way the request made by the national conference of Canadian universities. This 50 per cent increase is a substantial one in the light of present revenues, and it will provide further financial assistance which will pay big dividends in the years ahead. The number of eligible Canadian universities is 91. However, seven of these are in Quebec province, which reduces the number that will receive grants this year to 84.

In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia there are 19 eligible universities as compared with 10 in the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta and three in Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. Ontario has a total of 30. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia together have as many institutions eligible for grants in aid as have British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Newfoundland combined, despite a much smaller population. New Brunswick has more eligible universities than either British Columbia or Alberta, while Nova Scotia ranks third behind Ontario and Saskatchewan.

In April of this year the national conference of Canadian universities submitted a four-clause brief to the government. The clauses read as follows:

(1) To double the federal grants in aid to universities of Canada.

(2) To agree to some modification of the present formula of these grants to make the rates between one university and another more equal.

(3) To provide financial help towards capital expenditures for departments in the physical and biological sciences.

(4) To provide greater federal support for fundamental scientific research and for graduate studies within universities.

The request contained in clause 2 of the brief asks for a modification of the present formula toward making the rates between one university and another more equal, but apparently no action in this regard is contemplated this year. I take it from the minister's recent answer to a question I asked him on orders of the day, when he stated that no change was contemplated, that this is the case. His answer was just a "no", but I imagine that reply would not go beyond the present year and that there may be changes in the future.

In summary, the brief states that the present system shows weaknessess in that universities in some provinces receive far less per student than those in other provinces. The rates in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are among the lowest, the top rate per student being $481 and the lowest $148. The summary also states that there is failure to make any provision for the wide differences in the cost of educating students in the various disciplines. While the increase in grants rises annually in accordance with the increase in student enrolment, in 1956-57 the average grant per student was $221 and in 1957-58 it was $205, a difference amounting to $16 less per student.

The opinion has been expressed that this submission favours the larger universities. I refer, of course, to the submission of the national conference of Canadian universities. In my opinion it would be a serious mistake to increase the per student grant to large universities at the expense of the smaller institutions. Most of the larger universities are endowed and many of them receive grants from provincial governments; their tuition fees are higher and their large enrolments qualify them for the major portion of the grant.

On the other hand the small universities which are not endowed are continually facing critical financial problems which retard expansion and in many cases are in difficulties in meeting current expenses. The present level of federal grants in aid in many cases are the difference between carrying on and closing the doors.

In the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia where there is a proportionally large number of universities, the majority, like most Atlantic province institutions, are in the small university group. The smaller universities enrol students who in many cases cannot afford to go to a larger university. In this respect these institutions are performing a great service to Canada in providing higher education for a group who otherwise would be denied the opportunity. While the present percentage of qualified students attending universities is low, being only 7 per cent out of a possible 31 per cent, it would be much lower if small universities were not offering the opportunity. Increased grants make it possible for small universities to carry on and extend the opportunity for a larger enrolment among the group with limited financial means, which comprises practically all students in the group between the 7 per cent now attending and the 31 per cent eligible.

The government should give every consideration toward making it possible for the group who have the academic qualifications but who lack the financial aid to continue their education thus providing equality of opportunity. I wish to take this opportunity to publicly express, once again, the gratitude of the people of New Brunswick to one who has done more than any other single person in assisting young men and young women to acquire a higher education. I speak of that great benefactor, Lord Beaverbrook.

Any submission to the government to change the formula of payments should be given the most serious consideration, keeping in mind the financial plight of the small universities, and in particular the group they serve. If any change is made in the formula of payments the quota for small universities should be increased to bring about an equality of opportunity.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, just one word. I thank the Leader of the Opposition and other hon. members who speaking for themselves and their parties have commended this proposed increase represented by the present item. I believe I should make one comment on the matter that has been raised. It has to do with the formula for division of the provincial allotment among the universities or institutions of higher learning in the provinces.

It is quite true the present formula which we have inherited from the agreement of March, 1957 and which was in effect indeed since the grants were first instituted in the fiscal year 1951-52, has created wide disparities in the amounts allotted per student by reason of the fact that the proportion of population in attendance at institutions of higher learning varies so widely from province to province. The Leader of the Opposition referred to Nova Scotia. Under the present formula Nova Scotia receives the lowest per student award. On the other hand, under the existing formula Newfoundland receives by far the highest. For the year 1957-58 the distribution ran all the way from a low of $148 per student enrolled in Nova Scotia to a high of $421 per student enrolled in Newfoundland.

This matter has been studied, and as the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi mentioned it was the subject of representations made on behalf of the governing body of the national conference of Canadian universities to the government when they met the Prime Minister and myself several months ago.

This has been a troublesome and difficult matter. No one wishes to see these wide differences. However, in seeking to bring about a greater measure of equality on a per student basis very serious difficulties are encountered because of the difference in educational forms in each of the provinces, and the difference in definitions of "institutions of higher learning" in the various provinces. It is because of the wide difference that exists attributable to differences in provincial approach that it has not yet been found possible to devise a formula which will maintain general justice as among the different provinces with a greater measure of equality in the allotment per student.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Finance.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

670. To provide for contributions to the provinces, pursuant to agreements entered into or to be entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, by Canada with the provinces, of amounts equal to one-half of the amounts confirmed by the provinces as having been spent by them for campground and picnic area developments—further amount required, $1,500,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of points I wish to bring up very briefly, and these relate to matters that were under consideration at the time the minister's regular estimates were before the committee and on which we did not have information because at that time the minister had not been able to supply it to us. It related to two employees in the Cape Breton highlands national park, and I should like to read the question and answer as given by the minister as recorded at page 4516 of Hansard. It will be recalled that I had a starred question on the order paper for about two months which was finally answered by the minister on Wednesday last, though I had asked for an answer before the minister's regular estimates were before us.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): What has that to do with this item?

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister wish to raise a point of order?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): What has that to do with this item? I was asking you.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister wishes to raise a point of order about this, Mr. Chairman, I must confess this matter has nothing whatever to do with the particular item now before us. These are unfinished matters we were considering, and they are unfinished through no fault of our own because we were seeking information from the minister which he could not give us at the time his estimates were before us, although I am not criticizing him for that. I am bringing this matter up now solely because I thought it would be much more convenient to the house if I brought it up in committee of supply when the minister could perhaps dispel some of my misgivings and shorten the whole proceedings. If the minister insists on his point of order, I will not have the right to bring it up here and I shall be forced to bring it up on the second reading of the appropriation bill. From the point of view of getting through the business quickly, I think it might be much better to exercise a little latitude and dispose of it here, but I am in the hands of the committee. Does the minister want me to go ahead?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think it is up to the chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Unless someone raises a point of order the chair is quite willing.

Mr. Pickersgill: In that case I shall proceed. I am not going to raise the point of order! When the minister quite properly intervened I was beginning to read the questions I had asked and the answers the minister gave, as found on page 4516 of Hansard for September 3. The first question was:

Were George P. LeBlanc and Alex P. Boudreau dismissed from the Cape Breton highlands national park effective June 10, 1958?

The answer given by the minister to that question was:

Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes.

The second question was:

How long had each of these employees been employed by the national park?

The answer to that question was as follows:

George P. LeBlanc was continuously employed from April, 1951, to the date of his dismissal. Alex P. Boudreau was originally taken on strength on October 6, 1954. Mr. Boudreau was struck off strength on February 14, 1955 and was again taken on strength on May 11, 1955. He was continuously employed from that date to the date of his dismissal.

The third question was:

What was the reason for dismissal in each case?

The answer was:

The answer to question No. 3 is that the dismissal in each case was made on the basis of a declaration by an hon. member that the employee had taken an active part in politics.

I have here, sir, a telegram which I received on September 4, the day following the minister's answer, which reads as follows:

J. W. Pickersgill, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Population of North Inverness flabbergasted at declaration Hamilton re George LeBlanc and Alex Boudreau. Five thousand people can swear these two were never active in politics apart from going out to vote. Press for immediate investigation.

Simon P. Boudreau.

I also have a copy of a letter sent to the hon. member for Laurier purporting to have been addressed—I must not say anything I cannot prove—to the minister on June 16, 1958 from Cheticamp, Inverness county, Nova Scotia. It reads as follows:

Hon. Alvin S. Hamilton,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Honourable and dear sir:

We were somewhat surprised at your recent statement in the House of Commons to the effect that no employee of the federal government had been dismissed for reasons of political affiliation.

We, the undersigned, George P. LeBlanc and Alex P. Boudreau, have been employed as carpenters by the department of northern affairs in the Cape Breton highlands national park for seven years and three years respectively. Our work has always been highly satisfactory as can be ascertained by contacting Mr. Atkinson, the recently transferred park superintendent.

On June 10 we were notified that our services would no longer be required. Upon being asked the reason for our dismissal the new park superintendent, Mr. Brown, produced the following letter:

Definite allegations of participation in political activity have been made against the following three employees who are employed in the Cheticamp side of the park in seasonal positions. These are Alex P. Boudreau, George P. LeBlanc and Peter H. Poirier. These men should be released immediately and replacements obtained on the advice and recommendations of the local adviser.

There is a query over the signature because apparently they could not read it but they have taken it to be "B. M. Strong". I am not altogether surprised that they could not read the signature. The letter continues:

If getting out to vote on election day is considered being engaged in political activities, then we must of course plead guilty. However, we were not aware that federal government employees had as yet been deprived of their right to vote. As to other political activities, we are prepared to swear that neither of us, while employed by the federal government has ever given publicly any indication as to which side he was on. Our only guilt would seem to stem from the fact that we were appointed by a Liberal administration. Furthermore, we are prepared to provide you with a sworn statement bearing the signatures of 500 people in this community to the effect that nobody really knows which way we voted in the last election.

I would hope that would be true.

A dismissal of this type is a black mark against our reputation which we are not prepared to ignore. Unless your department acts immediately to erase it, we shall be forced to have recourse to legal means.

Yours very truly,

George P. LeBlanc,
Alex P. Boudreau.

The minister stated in reply to my question —I want to be very exact—"the dismissal in each case was made on the basis of a declaration by an hon. member that the employee had taken an active part in politics." I am not going to repeat now what the hon. member for Laurier said earlier in the session, but he indicated the historic reasons for permitting dismissals in this fashion, a procedure, I may say, which I, like the hon. member for Laurier, think is antiquated and should be discontinued, no matter who is in office. People should not be dismissed on the simple declaration of a member of parliament that he knows these persons to have been engaged in political activities.

The hon. member for Laurier read a lot of authorities, Sir Robert Borden, Mr. Meighen, Mr. Mackenzie King and a good many others, to the effect that the reason a declaration by a member of parliament was accepted and a declaration by anyone else was not accepted was that such a declaration could be debated right here in parliament in the face of the accuser. The minister did not tell us what member of parliament it was who made this declaration. It does seem to me that the very least the minister could do in this case is to tell us what member made this written declaration, because it has to be a written declaration, and table it in the house so that every hon. member will have the opportunity to see it, so that we, who are responsible to all the taxpayers of Canada for the way in which public moneys are expended, will have the full and proper opportunity to see what in fact the situation is that is alleged by the hon. member and so that he, whoever he may be, will have the opportunity to defend his conduct.

I agree with what was said the other evening by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I agree completely that this procedure is something that belongs to another age. I do not care whether it was done by Liberals or Conservatives. I do not think it should be done any longer. I have no hesitation in saying that and I have no hesitation in adding that I was not aware of this practice during the time I have been a member of parliament until after June 10, 1957.

Mr. Cardiff: Would you like a few concrete examples of what took place?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I am not particularly interested. Of course, if the hon. gentleman wants to make one of his rare speeches I would be very glad to let him do so, and I would not care whether it was done by Liberals or Conservatives. I do not say that the practice is necessarily wrong but I say that it is an antiquated practice.

Mr. Cardiff: You would think that nobody but the Conservatives ever did it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that nobody ever did it but the Conservatives. The hon. gentleman was not listening.

Mr. Cardiff: Oh yes, I was.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said it was done in the past.

Mr. Cardiff: You are making a big fuss over nothing. You are taking a lot of time on a lot of things that do not amount to anything.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman's interventions are always, of course, of an exceptionally high order, Mr. Chairman. Only yesterday we heard eloquent speeches from the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party about human rights, and yet today the chief whip of the government says that the dismissal of two men because of accusations we have not seen in this parliament is a matter of no consequence.

Mr. Cardiff: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, a small matter.

Mr. Cardiff: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to misrepresent the hon. gentleman, but the record will speak for itself.

Mr. Cardiff: I just asked a simple question, and you would not answer it.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman will repeat his question, I will answer it.

Mr. Cardiff: Go on with your speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to repeat that I am not seeking to condemn any previous governments or any previous politicians, but I think this is the type of practice about which I should like to see the Prime Minister or anyone else undertake a reform. I should like to see investigations of these charges of political activity conducted by some impartial person. So far as I am concerned, I hope I never belong to a government in the future that carries on this practice. There may be many hon. members who think that is not a very serious thing for me to say because my political prospects are not very good.

However, I am serious about this matter, and I do not want to be diverted from the point. The point is that the minister allowed two employees to be fired from a national park, on his own statement, because some unnamed hon. member in this house made accusations. We know nothing about them, and again I say I believe we in this house are entitled to have that information so that we can form a judgment as to whether or not that was justified. These people say it was not. I am not taking their part. I have never seen these men in my life. I do not know anything whatever about them, except what I have before me here.

This is not an isolated case, of course. The minister has had other instances, and I want to say something about another one about which the minister did not bring down a return until just after his estimates were through. Before that, however, I have another letter here signed by Thomas Williams and William Asseff of Smelt Brook, Victoria county, Cape Breton. This was written on August 28, and it reads:

> I know you are not the member for Victoria-Cape Breton North—but I am writing this letter to you to see if you can help us to get our jobs back on the Cape Breton Highlands national park.
> I, Thomas Williams, of Smelt Brook, and William Asseff of South Harbour, Victoria county, were laid off our jobs on the 26th of August at 12 o'clock. There were two more men hired in our position that were on another job at the launchway at Smelt Brook.
> Peter A. MacIntosh went to work on the launchway on the 26th of August and was hired on the park on the same day. Mr. Ernest Briand who was sub-foreman on the launchway was given one or two weeks to have someone placed as foreman so he could work with the national parks.

I ask you, sir, is this a fair way for a free Canadian to be treated or are we going to have the privilege of a free vote taken away from us.

I ask then why, when there's no complaints in the superintendent's office, were we laid off our jobs and two more men hired in our place. I ask, Mr. Member, will you ask this in parliament and send me the answers?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the entire letter?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the entire letter, and I would be glad to send it to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have never been one to read parts of a document.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, but you read so fast at the end.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know that hon. members want to get through, and I am trying to accommodate them. I apologize also for my voice. It needs a rest.

I want to go to another case, and this is a case which was discussed on the minister's estimates on the last evening they were before the house. He told me I would find the answers to my questions, which he did not answer—I should not say he refused to answer them, except by remaining in his seat—when this return was brought down. It was a return to a motion made by the hon. member for Ottawa West and it related to the dismissal, as I put it, or the failure to re-engage, as the minister put it at one point though he changed his ground as he went along, of a certain Mrs. A. E. Woodman of Jasper.

I have here this return and the first letter on this file is a letter to the superintendent of the national park from Mrs. Woodman, which is dated January 6. I will only read the text of the letter, and not the names, but I shall read the full text.

Having been an attendant at the Jasper information bureau for several summers, perhaps a formal application is not necessary. However, just for the record, I shall be available for service on June 1st, 1958 or earlier if required.

To this, Mrs. Woodman received the following reply dated January 21:

Thank you for your letter of January 6th making application for employment at the Jasper information bureau this summer.

We will be pleased to have you back again at the bureau this year and you will be contacted at a later date as to when your duties will commence.

That is the whole letter. Then, on June 2, and this is the next letter on the file, there is a letter addressed to Mr. Strong, chief of the national parks service, Norlite building, Ottawa. It reads:

For the past four years I have been on the summer staff at the information bureau here. This year I applied and was accepted quite early in the year. Yesterday Mr. Pettis informed me that, in a letter from Dr. Horner, M.P. for Jasper-Edson, he received orders to discharge me because my name was associated with the Liberal party. Dr. Horner told him who was to replace me. Will you give this matter your attention, please, it is now too late for me to secure other summer work; my husband is a world war I veteran and we live on a small C.N.R. pension—he was refused work this year too but no reason given. Are we living in a Gestapo age? An early reply will be appreciated.

Then, on June 9, Mrs. Woodman wrote the minister in the following terms:

May I ask for your consideration? I shall be as brief as possible.

Are you aware that patronage has reared its ugly head in Jasper national park?

I am not a civil servant but for the past four years I have given satisfactory service as an attendant in the information bureau here.

This year I applied for the same position early in the year and was given a letter of acceptance. On June 2, I was informed that Dr. Horner, M.P. for Jasper-Edson had objected to me being given employment as I was an active member of the Liberal organization in Jasper.

Mr. Pettis gave me a letter which stated—

Perhaps I do not need to read that again because I read it. Then the letter goes on:

I understand Mr. Pettis' position—

Perhaps I should read that because I am breaking the continuity.

Mr. Pettis gave me a letter which stated, "I have been instructed by my head office in Ottawa to withdraw our offer of employment to you in the Jasper information bureau for the forthcoming season". I understand Mr. Pettis' position but this letter gives a wrong impression—I was never "offered" employment in the bureau, I applied in writing and was accepted in writing; I was informed that my work would start June 14, 1958—therefore I was discharged, most unfairly, too late in the season to secure another employment.

My husband is a veteran of world war I and we live on a small C.N.R. pension; he applied for the attendant's job at the park west gate but he was not given work of any kind—why? We can only assume that he too is being penalized for my political associations.

We have lived in Jasper for sixteen years and I feel sure, Mr. Hamilton, that you and other members of the cabinet believe in justice and a square deal for every "fellow Canadian" of Mr. Diefenbaker's.

Will you investigate this matter of my discharge from the service? I will appreciate hearing from you.

To this, the minister replied on June 14 in the following terms:

I wish to acknowledge and thank you for your letter of June 9th.

It has been government policy for many years to discharge or not employ people who have actively participated politically. By your own admission you state in your letter, "We can only assume that he too is being punished for my political associations." Under the circumstances, I have no choice in the matter but to concur with the action taken by my departmental officials.

Then there is another letter here of June 19 to Mr. Pettis from Mrs. Woodman which

I do not think I will read because it talks about getting legal advice and so on. Then there are several letters from the Liberal candidates to which reference was made by the minister. I am not going to take any more time to read this file because it is, of course, the property of the house and is available to everyone to read. After I had raised this matter in the house I received a letter from Mrs. Woodman whom I have never met and whom I do not know at all, on August 19 in the following terms:

Dear Mr. Pickersgill:

Thank you for bringing my case out in the open and insisting on an admission from Mr. Hamilton that I was hired and then "told later not to report".

I am sending you copies of my letters from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, including my acceptance for work at the information bureau and my discharge, written in such a way that it gives the impression that an offer of work had just casually been withdrawn; nothing could be more wrong—I was never "offered" work—I asked for it and was discharged just twelve days before I expected to begin work, too late to get other full time summer employment here.

The enclosed copy of a letter from Dr. Hugh Horner, M.P. for Jasper-Edson, is a masterpiece of contradiction, it was not marked "confidential" so I do not hesitate to pass it on to you to be used as you see fit.

I have been a member of the Liberal party all my "voting" life and I just hope I am still around to do my small bit when the next election comes around.

Thank you again for your support.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Here is a letter that I have already read into the record from Mr. Pettis the superintendent to Mrs. Woodman. Then here is the letter to Mrs. Woodman that purports to be from the hon. member for Acadia, and I say "purports to be" because I have only received this from the lady herself and have not, of course, been able to verify it in any way. But the hon. gentleman is a member of this house and if he wishes to deny the letter he has the right to do so. The letter reads as follows:

Ottawa, June 9, 1958.

Mrs. A. E. Woodman,
Jasper, Alberta.

Dear Mrs. Woodman:

The Prime Minister has requested that I reply to your letter of June 2nd—

This astonished me and I put a motion on the order paper asking for the correspondence between Mrs. Woodman and the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister offered no objection to the motion which was passed. But I inquired this morning and the correspondence had not yet been tabled. I am not seeking to make anything of that fact at all. I know what preoccupations there have been. The rest of the letter follows:

The Prime Minister has requested that I reply to your letter of June 2nd, which was addressed to him with regard to the position on the tourist information bureau at Jasper.

When asked for recommendations to fill these positions I found that I could not accept your name because of your political activity. For the record I would like it to be known that the Conservative party do not intend to practice patronage as the old Liberal regime did.

I think there is a beautiful irony there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I continue:

We feel that a person's politics should not be of any influence in being accepted for any position. However, the general rule is that any employee of the government, civil servant or otherwise, should not take part in any political activity.

Yours sincerely,

Hugh M. Horner, M.D., M.P.

That is the whole of that letter. What I want to say is this. This lady was not employed by the government at the time of the general election. It is true that she had applied for a position and had been told that in June a casual position, a summer seasonal position, would be hers. She was a free citizen, not an employee of the government all during the election campaign. She surely had a right, if she wanted to, to engage in political activities just as any other free citizen has. The day when free citizens are not going to be allowed to engage in political activity is a day that I am sure neither the Prime Minister nor the minister on reflection wants to see happen here. If it is going to be said that no one is to be employed subsequently in the public service because he has engaged in political activity, there are a great many employees who would never be engaged in the public service. It seems to me to be an absolutely preposterous suggestion to say that because someone has been active politically and subsequently applies for a position, that should make any difference whatsoever in that position.

I quite agree with the view that a public servant, while a public servant, should not engage in political activity. I do not agree with the view that is expressed by some parties that they should. But the idea that people should be penalized because when they were not public servants they engaged in political activity seems to me to be wholly preposterous. Before we grant any more money to the minister I think we are entitled to have from him an explanation of these two cases.

I admit he has had no notice here of this other case. I would not want to press that one because I admit that the minister has not heard of it before. I do not want to be unfair. But of these two cases the minister has had ample warning and ample knowledge, namely the cases of these two gentlemen George Leblanc and Alexander Boudreau in the Cape Breton Highlands park. I think we should have the declaration of the member of parliament who is responsible for this laid before us and read into the record so that we know what we are talking about. In the case of Mrs. Woodman I think we should hear from the minister what justification he thinks there is for penalizing people because at a time when they were not public servants they engaged in political activity.

Mr. Argue: As my name has already been mentioned in this discussion, I want to say that I am indeed shocked by the practice that apparently is being followed. I do not think members of parliament should be given the right or the responsibility of informing on public employees and recommending that they be dismissed and that the government should subsequently take that recommendation as full reason for dismissing such an employee. Surely it is part of the fundamental right of every Canadian, if he is to be dismissed from a position, to know why he has been dismissed and he should have some recourse of appeal. Members of parliament should not be given this right to jettison the economic position of Canadians and to interfere in their personal right of employment if they are giving good service.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate at one point in his remarks said that he would not say that what has been done is wrong but he would say that it is antiquated. I am quite prepared to say that it is wrong. Not only is it antiquated but it is wrong. It is wrong on moral grounds. It is wrong from the standpoint of efficient government administration. It can do nothing but undermine the morale of public employees. If this practice is carried on of a member of parliament informing the minister and having people fired, it makes a mockery out of any other move by this parliament by way of a bill of rights. If parliament is sincere—and I believe it is—in wanting a bill of rights to guarantee human freedoms, then the practice of this government in this regard strikes at the very foundation of human freedoms in this country.

I can tell the government that if they continue this practice and if individual members of parliament on the government side of the house accept this as a prerogative and exercise it they will be hounded by members of the opposition in this house, session in and session out, because this is a matter of great importance to the welfare and to the freedom of the people of Canada, and we are not going to take this kind of interference with human freedoms without a continuous and energetic protest.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not going to reply?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think it is only fair to the house to repeat some of the statements and allegations which have been made here today. I think anyone who knows the political history of the last 25 or 30 years will look on this change of government after 22 years of one administration as one of the greatest steps forward in the improvement of the treatment of casual workers for the government which has ever taken place in the history of any democratic country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This matter, as admitted by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who raised it, is completely out of order. He took advantage of the situation which had been fully discussed in the estimates when they were before the house, and in the interest of getting things accomplished we made no objection, but I would just like to put the whole thing in perspective. Many hon. members recall with personal interest the things which happened in Saskatchewan in 1934 when the government changed in that province; many of us remember with personal interest when the federal government changed in 1935 and when at these various parks and institutions where the government employed casual help, not just one here and two there but the whole outfit was dismissed out of hand.

An hon. Member: Remember Ontario in 1935.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): And there are hon. members in this house who had members of their families who lost their jobs. When you think of the thousands of employees in the national parks and the northern affairs department and particularly the number employed as casual labourers, and especially remembering that the hon. member after searching up and down this country from one end to the other can come up only with two cases in Cape Breton, one case in Jasper, this new case of which I do not know and one, or is it two, other cases in some other place—at any rate just a few cases—I think it is a matter of a tribute which should be paid to this government. I say this especially in view of the fact that if we had adopted the attitude with respect to casual labourers which was taken by the previous administration, there would have been no delay after last June; there would have been a 100 per cent change.

To my knowledge there was almost no change made in the employees of the national parks after last June. We kept all those appointees, casual employees as they were, even though traditionally, particularly in the eastern areas, there would have been a complete change-over. When the winter work program started last winter those same men, not appointed by this government, were kept on to do their work.

An hon. Member: What about these cases?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The appreciation of what we have done is well known in some of these areas. I have also intimated in this house that in some cases instead of using the traditional methods of hiring people, members of parliament have asked members of the churches of both principal faiths in this country to recommend persons to the superintendent who most need this casual labour.

These things in the minds of the people of Canada will, I think, indicate as clearly as anything that this government has taken a tremendous step forward. We have a new profession of faith on the part of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who sat in the closet working for the previous administration for many years, advising them at the highest level, and then took his place as a minister of the crown, but not once did he stand on his feet in this house and make a declaration the like of which he made today—

An hon. Member: Judas.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The government has gone forward and I know investigations are being carried out in accordance with the policies laid down in the various departments and because of some of these investigations delays have occurred.

The Woodman case was discussed on my estimates and I do not think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was quite right in bringing it forward at this time, because he did not give the facts which were disclosed.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister will permit me to say so, the only reason I brought it up again was that the report had not been tabled and I did not previously have the information.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am not going to debate that little point but I would just like to point out to the committee that the Woodman case concerned a woman who had been actively political whether at the time of her dismissal or not. If we just let our minds go back, and of course hon. members do not know this lady, she was employed by the parks department during the general election and before, and it was all right when she was working for the Liberal government to take part in that sort of activity, but when a new government comes along she should have enough sense not to go out and actively oppose the then government in the current election. One could not blame the sitting member for recommending her dismissal in that case, and I asked him some pointblank questions in this regard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask a purely factual question? The minister said she was employed during the June election, but she was to report for work on June 14, 1958 according to the return, and the election of 1957 was on June 10. Is the minister stating as a fact she was employed before June 10, 1957, or is that merely a supposition?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member knows I have not the file before me but it is true she was employed for the previous four or five years in the reception booth of the park and in June she certainly would be on duty. I think, therefore, the member was wrong in bringing up this matter on this vote, which has nothing to do with it and he has not achieved the purpose which he would like to have achieved. You cannot make the people of Canada swallow this idea that now the Liberals are in opposition they have suddenly changed their spots and have become as virtuous as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would lead us to believe.

This government by its actions has alleviated the problems of the civil servants and has raised the civil service level and that of the casual workers of the government to a new high, and I would say that I hope this will be the end of the subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister give us the name of the member on whose recommendation the action was taken in the Cape Breton Highlands case?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, that hon. member was the member for Inverness-Richmond.

Mr. Grills: I have been listening with considerable interest and amusement to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in his remarks about political patronage. He mentioned two people who asked him to reinstate them, and I would inform him that dozens of people in Hastings South have asked me to get them reinstated in jobs they lost in 1935. They were fired in 1935 without a trial and without any consideration, and they now want to get their jobs back which were lost during a Liberal regime. I think he has made an error today because his party were past masters in this sort of thing. As far as the hon. member for Assiniboia is concerned, he has no sins to answer for as he has never had the opportunity.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Terminable services—

663. To provide for payments to western grain producers of $1 per acre up to a maximum of 200 acres per farm in accordance with regulations of the governor in council, $40,000,000.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, I seem to detect some eagerness on the part of some hon. members to speak on this item which is to provide the money to make these payments of $1 an acre to western farmers up to $200 per farm.

The Prime Minister made a detailed statement on this matter a week ago today in which he made reference to the long term farm program on which we are engaged. He pointed to the part which this particular proposal is intended to play, and he also discussed the scheme itself in some detail. For these reasons I do not think I should take up the time of the committee for too long in speaking on the matter today.

However, I should like to say that the government gave very long and detailed consideration to the problems of western grain producers. The western members of parliament in this party—and they constitute all the hon. members concerned except one—were consulted on numerous occasions with regard to this question and they gave us very valuable advice in connection with it.

The so-called deficiency payments which were asked for by the western wheat pools and by other western farm organizations were considered very thoroughly. I say "so-called deficiency payments" and I would just like to say a word on that. These requests made by the wheat pools and other western organizations were not, strictly speaking, for deficiency payments at all. I am sorry about the confusion that exists over the term "deficiency payments". A deficiency payment is one which is made to make up the price to a certain predetermined level if the price falls below that level. This is one of the three methods used under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act in order to put floor prices into effect. As I say, the request was not for a deficiency payment of this sort but for the fixed payment of so much a bushel on the two previous past crops.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister say whether or not the proposition of the wheat pools was based on a formula and, if so, how this formula was arrived at, because my understanding is that they had a definite formula.

[Mr. Grills.]

Mr. Harkness: That is correct, but it has nothing to do with the point I am making now, that it was not a request for deficiency payments. What I am trying to do is to clear up the confusion that exists over the term.

The Chairman: It would be appreciated by the Chair if members kept their voices a little lower. There is far too much noise in the committee at the present moment.

Mr. Harkness: As I said, the request of the western farm organizations for this payment was very carefully studied and it presented two very grave disadvantages. First of all, under payments of the kind requested, the people who would receive the largest benefits would be the largest producers, and the people who would get the smallest benefit would be those who needed help most, that is, the smaller producers. In addition, those who were hailed out or who lost their crops by any other means would receive no payment at all under the so-called deficiency payments requested, and people who had fed the major portion of their grain to livestock would similarly receive no payment. Those are very serious disadvantages. It would not make for a fair distribution, and it would not give the major portion of the money to the people who needed it most.

A second serious disadvantage is that if this payment had been put into effect with respect to oats and barley there is no question but that the United States would have reacted in one of two ways. Either that country would have placed an embargo against the entry of Canadian oats and barley into the United States or it would have been required by its own customs act to place against Canadian oats and barley a countervailing duty equivalent to the amount of the deficiency payments. Thus we would have been no better off than before. In fact, we would have been much worse off. That situation is one which made payments of the sort requested highly undesirable; it was the type of thing which would actually have done the Canadian western economy more harm than good.

The plan of acreage payments which we propose under this item is the best method, I think, which could possibly have been devised to meet the cash difficulty which it is admitted exists in western Canada is due to two short crops, a short crop this year and a short crop last year. I think it must be borne in mind that farmers, and grain farmers in particular, depend on two things: the size of the crop produced and the price received per bushel. During this year and last year the number of bushels produced have been considerably reduced and income has therefore been reduced, even though the price was similar to that of previous years. In fact, the price is down a little, too. But I think we must always keep in mind that the most important determining factor is the size of the crop. It is much better, for example, to have a 40-bushel crop and get $1 a bushel than to have a 10-bushel crop and to get $2 a bushel for it.

As a result of short crops the small farmers particularly in western Canada have had very little grain to deliver. The acreage payment which we propose to put in effect will give most assistance to these small farmers who need assistance most at the present time. In commenting on the statement made by the Prime Minister, the only criticism made by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to this scheme was, really, that it was not based on any formula or principle. This is not the case. The principle upon which these payments are based is to extend the greatest amount of assistance to those who need it most, that is, to the small farmers. That is the basic principle underlying this type of payment and, of course, there is a definite formula. The formula is to make payments of $1 an acre up to a maximum of 200 acres in order to accomplish the purpose which I have enunciated in stating the principle of the proposal.

The fact that it will accomplish this purpose can I think be shown by considering the size of farms in western Canada. This is a matter which was raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia, and I will comment on his statement later. As reported in Hansard for October 28, 1957, at page 462 I gave a breakdown of the number of cultivated acres—the size of farms in western Canada as far as cultivated acreage is concerned—and looking at that table we see there are, or were, in that area, 230,854 permit book holders and of these, 31,299 had less than 100 cultivated acres, that is, 13 per cent of the total had less than 100 cultivated acres. The next group are those having between 100 and 199 cultivated acres, and they amount to 63,272 of these farmers, that is, 27 per cent. If you add those two groups together you have 94,571, or over 40 per cent of all the permit book holders among farmers in western Canada who have less than 200 acres in cultivation. You have a large number of others in the next group, 200 to 299 acres. The total amounts to 51,000 people in this category, but a large number of those in this group probably little more than 200 acres in cultivation. As a matter of fact, their average is 246 acres.

Taking these figures altogether I think it becomes clear that this type of payment provides payment on the total acreage in cultivation of over 40 per cent of all the farmers in western Canada and provides payment on nearly all up to 50 per cent. That seems to me to be much the fairest way in which assistance could be provided to western farmers and their admitted cash deficiency made up at this time.

The hon. member for Assiniboia in commenting on the statement made by the Prime Minister stated that this payment which was going to be made was less than 10 per cent of what the farm organizations out there had requested. That is a completely incorrect statement and I am surprised at the hon. member for making that remark and another statement with which I shall deal in a moment.

Mr. Argue: It is absolutely true.

Mr. Harkness: The wheat pools requested total payments amounting to $228 million.

Mr. Argue: On one year.

Mr. Harkness: No, covering the two crop years, and the payment being made of course, is very much more than 10 per cent of that.

The hon. member for Assiniboia in complaining about the size of this payment also made the statement that the average cultivated acreage of farms in Saskatchewan exceeded 500 acres, a statement which I questioned at the time and which is completely incorrect. I have before me figures as to the average size of cultivated acreage for western farms. In Manitoba it is 232 acres, in Saskatchewan it is 392 acres and in Alberta it is 299 acres. Those are the average sizes of farms in the three prairie provinces. In other words, the size of the farms out there is much smaller than the average person particularly in eastern Canada always seems to believe and smaller than the hon. member for Assiniboia, who should have known better, stated.

There are one or two other points I should like to make. There were some complaints made in western Canada stirred up particularly by hon. members of the opposition parties that the Agricultural Stabilization Act affected eastern farmers far more than it affected western farmers because western wheat, oats and barley were not included under the act. That is true only to the extent that some people in western Canada specialize in the growing of grain and do not produce livestock, dairy products and so forth. I might point out that the payment being made to those western farmers now will certainly at least balance up the payments made to other farmers under this act from which a number of farmers have received no benefit because they grow nothing except wheat.

In connection with this point, however, I should emphasize that the amount of benefit which accrues from the Agricultural Stabilization Act cannot be measured by the actual amount of money which is being paid out under that act. As an example, take the case of butter. The amount of money we pay out in order to keep the price of butter at its present level bears no relationship whatever to the great benefit that price confers on all of the 69 per cent of Canadian farmers who are engaged in the dairy business. The same thing applies to any other payment made under the Agricultural Stabilization Act or otherwise in order to assist the agricultural industry. The benefits which derive are very much wider than the actual amount of money involved.

In closing I might just say that the money which will be paid out under this scheme will be distributed by the Canadian wheat board on the basis of the cultivated acreage shown in the current permit books for 1958. The Canadian wheat board has the organization, the set-up and facilities and the information to be able to make these payments more efficiently and expeditiously than any other agency.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister would, I am sure, be very disappointed if I did not say a few words at this time on this item of his estimates but I will do my best not to detain the committee. There are some things, however, that I feel it is necessary to say in regard to what is involved in this item, not in terms of policy, I suggest—because it does not represent policy—but in terms of short term, short range action, how it will be applied and what it covers. In so far as these payments will help to make up for declining farm income and put in circulation extra dollars where they are sorely needed then they meet our approval and will secure our support.

We have put forward, although not in this house, our own views in connection with agricultural policy. There will be an occasion, if not this session then next session, for us to discuss our views in this house because the Prime Minister last Saturday indicated that in the next session we would hear from the government in regard to long range agricultural policies. Certainly that is not involved in this item today. That is one of the reasons for which we criticized it. Furthermore, this action by the government must be a disappointment to western grain producers in the light of statements that have been made by spokesmen of the present government during recent years. Such a reaction of disappointment is natural and inevitable in view of the policies put forward by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture when they were in opposition.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The Prime Minister's policy in those days as stated in the House of Commons was to overcome by government action—in so far as it should be done by government action—the cost-price squeeze, to restore to the farmer a fair share of the national income based upon a formula of parity, taking into account the relationship between the cost of production on the one hand and the prices farmers must pay on the other.

Notwithstanding what the Minister of Agriculture has said the payments provided in this item are based on no discernible or rational principle. If there is any principle involved it is only a one based on a grant to be made to people who need it and for short term. There is no principle involved in this item which is of a general application over a period of years. Certainly this grant is not related to cost of production or prices and it is not related to any principle of parity. Indeed, when the Prime Minister referred to this matter a week ago today he did not even mention the idea, the principle of parity although he did in that statement dismiss the principle of deficiency payments and the principle—if it is a principle—of a two-price system.

The references to parity made by the Prime Minister on previous occasions were certainly absent last Saturday and they were absent from the statement made today by the Minister of Agriculture. Instead, we were subjected to some general statements and philosophical observations in the statement made by the Prime Minister concerning the difficulties of agriculture and the necessity of the government doing something about it next session on a long term basis. When I speak about the precise language the Prime Minister used with respect to this matter in the past, I have in mind in particular the words he used in the house on March 12, 1956. As found on page 2021 of Hansard, the present Prime Minister had this to say:

> The squeeze which the farmer suffers results from the disparity in the relationship between the prices of farm products and the prices the farmer has to pay. When they are in proper relationship parity is established, and it is parity that the farm organizations across this country are asking for today. Not charity but parity.

Those were the words of the present Prime Minister at that time. I suggest that in the action taken by the government on this occasion the farmers are getting neither charity nor parity. Certainly the Prime Minister made no effort last Saturday to relate his payments to a formula for parity about which he spoke in such feeling terms in the debate to which I have referred. In the speech from which I have just quoted the Prime Minister defined parity and left no doubt in the minds of those of us who were in the house at that time that the establishment of a system of parity prices would prove a solution to the problem of agriculture. Indeed, as found at page 2026 of Hansard for the same day, the Prime Minister moved an amendment in these words:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

"in the opinion of this house consideration should be given by the government to the advisability of introducing during the present session legislation to create a parity of prices for agricultural products at levels to ensure producers a fair price-cost relationship."

That same theme was developed in the election campaign of 1957. I find it necessary at this time to refer only to a few of the Prime Minister's speeches in that campaign. Some of them have already been referred to in the house. According to the Ottawa Journal of May 9, 1957, the Prime Minister told a Brantford audience that the Conservatives if elected will "maintain a flexible price support program to ensure an adequate parity for agricultural producers, based on a fair price-cost relationship". I take it that the prairie farmers were not excluded from that reference. Then, on April 25, 1957, in his opening speech in that campaign the Prime Minister outlined an agricultural policy. I quote from the press statement that was issued:

We will assure the farmer of his fair share of the national income—

"We will assure".

—by maintaining a flexible—and I underline the word "flexible"—

These are the Prime Minister's words.

—price support program to ensure an adequate parity for agricultural producers based on a fair price-cost relationship.

It is fair to conclude from that, of course, that the Prime Minister had the western producer in mind as well as other agricultural producers. Last session the Minister of Agriculture introduced his agricultural stabilization measure and defended it as fulfilling all the election pledges of his party.

Mr. Harkness: And it did.

Mr. Pearson: In the light of what I have just quoted, in the light of the Prime Minister's statement in the house in 1956 when he advocated an agricultural policy based on parity prices, and he defined what parity prices were and I have given the definition, how can the Minister of Agriculture say that the agricultural stabilization measure introduced last session fulfilled all the election pledges of his party? The minister in explaining that legislation, and I refer to Hansard for December 14, 1957, page 2398, stated that a guaranteed price could be provided through purchase of the commodity, paying deficiency payments, and other price support payments determined by the governor in council. What has happened to these deficiency payments? On Saturday last the Prime Minister dismissed deficiency payments for western agriculture because they, and I quote from page 4346 of Hansard of this session, "are not in the long run interest of either the western grain producer or the nation as a whole."

Mr. Harkness: I just finished explaining that they are not deficiency payments; these are flat payments.

Mr. Pearson: They are indeed. I am just trying to explain that the agricultural policy of the government when it was in opposition and when it was talking about policy during the election campaign was a policy based on parity and deficiency payments.

Mr. Harkness: We have deficiency payments in effect for a large number of commodities.

Mr. Pearson: I do not think even the ingenuity of the Minister of Agriculture will be able to prove to the house that the action embodied in this item and the policy they have adopted up to the present in regard to agriculture meets the promises made by the Prime Minister and himself during the election campaign and previously in the house. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, last Saturday when the Prime Minister spoke there was no clarion call for parity. There was no ringing declaration for deficiency payments. There was no formula to guarantee a cost-price relationship, no principle advanced to produce a fair share of the national income for the farmer. And that is what my hon. friends talked about so much during the election campaign and previously in the house.

Therefore we are now entitled to ask the Prime Minister whether he has repudiated his election promises to the prairie farmers on this matter. We are entitled as well to point out that the agricultural policy for the western farmer proposed by the Prime Minister when in opposition is now a virtual shambles. I have no doubt the hon. member for Assiniboia will be able to help me confirm that fact when he gets up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You should speak about a shambles and promises.

Mr. Pearson: Deficiency payments are out. Parity is out. A fair share of the national income is not mentioned. What is to be the substitute? This one-shot operation which when it ends, so far as we know, is to be replaced by what? We do not know. We do know that it is not based on any kind of principle enunciated in the house or throughout the country by the Prime Minister or Minister of Agriculture. We remind the Prime Minister of his statement in the house that he was laying down as an agricultural policy for the Conservative party of that day "not charity but parity".

I will conclude, Mr. Chairman, by referring to one editorial expression of opinion on this matter, not from the Winnipeg Free Press although they have some interesting references to it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is where your speech came from; your speech has the appearance of Winnipeg Free Press authorship.

Mr. Pearson: My right hon. friend is really almost morbidly and unhealthily preoccupied by what the Winnipeg Free Press says. Why does he worry so much about the Winnipeg Free Press?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Because apparently it is my hon. friend's adviser in all things.

Mr. Pearson: I am glad the Prime Minister said "apparently" because that, of course, covers almost any statement he can make. I am sure he really thinks that it is more apparent than real. However, I would not hesitate to take good economic advice from whatever source I could get it, and I commend that to my right hon. friend and to the Minister of Finance. I certainly do not know where he is getting his agricultural advice.

Mr. Harkness: You had better go to another source if you want good economic advice.

Mr. Pearson: I do not know where he is getting his advice at the present time but it is not really very impressive when what results from it is this one-shot $40 million operation which as far as it goes will help the grain producers but will leave them high and dry as to what is going to happen in the future. The Toronto Globe and Mail is not a paper normally too friendly to our party but in commenting on this particular vote in its issue of September 4 it had this to say:

> Its effect will be neither prophylactic nor therapeutic—it will prevent nothing, neither will it cure. It will do little, considering the price of farmland and tractors, to help him increase the size of his establishment. And rather than protect him from inflation, it will subject him and everybody else to more inflation, because he will not produce with it, just consume.

Then, this editorial ends with these words:

> Isn't it time, in short that they stopped looking upon the small farmer, and the small farmer stopped looking upon himself, as a charity case?

I am sure the small farmer does not look upon himself as a charity case, but I am not so sure the government does not look upon the small farmer in this sense if this is the best he can get from the government on agricultural policy.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the amount of money that is involved in this item, and the absence of any formula based on the cost of production, means that the government has abandoned the many promises it made to the Canadian people over the years to provide a system of prices based on parity. The members of the government, for many years, have said to the farmers of this country that if they were elected they would immediately embark upon a policy that would provide such parity prices. This policy—this lack of policy—demonstrates that the Conservative party has finally abandoned the principle of parity and, in the words of the Minister of Agriculture himself, is not providing even deficiency payments to the prairie grain producers.

The type of payment that is being provided by this motion is the worst possible type of payment that could be made. It is a bad type of payment because it is inapplicable, because it is not based on a formula tied to the cost of production, and because it smacks of a handout. The government's position in the past has been very clear. The Conservative party had a handbook in the 1957 election, entitled "Agriculture"—

An hon. Member: And very good.

Mr. Argue: It is very good; before the election what they said was wonderful, but since the election the performance—

Mr. Harkness: Wonderful, too.

Mr. Argue: —ten per cent. The handbook says:

> Regular motions have been introduced into the house by Mr. Diefenbaker in order to secure for the farmer a more satisfactory share of the national income. April 8, 1941:
>
> "Immediate steps should be taken to create a parity of prices as between agriculture and other products in order to improve the position of Canadian agriculture so that it may receive a just and fair return."

On March 23, 1953, another motion by the Prime Minister:

> Consideration should be given by the government to the advisability of introducing during the present session legislation to provide floor prices for agricultural products at such levels as to ensure producers of a fair price-cost relationship.

Where is the floor price for wheat, oats and barley based on the fair price-cost relationship? It is nonexistent. As a matter of fact, the floor price gets worse every year in terms of purchasing power. In recent years the initial prices with the exception of oats, which was reduced a couple of years ago, have remained the same and every year the cost of production goes up. On March 12, 1956, just two years ago the Prime Minister moved in this house a motion that legislation should be introduced to create a parity of prices for agricultural products at levels to ensure producers of a fair price-cost relationship. I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture believes in parity prices? Does the minister believe that there should be a parity of prices for agricultural products at levels to ensure a fair price-cost relationship? I do not think he does.

Mr. Harkness: We provided that in the stabilization bill.

Mr. Argue: A parity of prices—what an emasculation of the English language. Parity prices, which are based on equity, which are based on a price formula related to the cost of production, but what the minister has brought in is a bill, a so-called stabilization bill, that provides floors on a moving average based on market prices. He calls that parity prices. The Prime Minister, speaking at Kipling, May 17, 1957, is reported in the Regina Leader-Post as having said that by electing the Conservative party the farmers would get parity prices, cash advances on farm-stored grain. Cash advances have been provided and the farmers want to know when the promise to provide parity prices will be implemented.

The Minister of Agriculture has quarrelled with the term "deficiency payments", as being used by the Saskatchewan wheat pool. He says that what they are asking for is a flat payment. I do not care whether he wishes to call it a flat deficiency payment or some other kind of a deficiency payment, but it is much more adequate than anything the government is proposing in this legislation. It is based on a precise formula, that is that there shall be a deficiency payment sufficient to bring prices up to the level that prevailed over the eight-year period from 1947 to 1955. The Saskatchewan wheat pool pointed out that since 1947 the cost of production has gone up by 50 per cent, while the price of wheat has fallen by 21 per cent. They are not asking for parity prices. If they were asking for parity prices, they would probably be asking for well over $2 a bushel. They are not asking for any compensation because of the increase in the cost of production, even though the increased cost of production has been more than 50 per cent. However, they are asking that there shall be protection of their returns so that with the tremendous increase in the cost of production year after year, they do not have to take a lower and lower price in the succeeding years.

They are not asking for a continuing price but a floor price based on an eight-year average from 1947 to 1955. If the farmers were given everything for which they asked they would still be hard-pressed in meeting this rapid increase in the cost of production. The Saskatchewan wheat pool is heading this drive requesting a deficiency payment of 27 cents a bushel for the 1955-56 wheat crop and a deficiency payment of 36 cents a bushel for the 1956-57 wheat crop. The minister says that the legislation he is providing will do more for the people who need it most. I challenge that statement. I do not think it is correct. The Saskatchewan wheat pool, in their proposition, would provide a basis of payment relating to the marketing of grain up to a maximum of $1,500 per farmer, depending upon the amount of grain that he has produced.

The Minister of Agriculture went on to say that the reason the government is doing this is not because of any change in the cost of production; it is not because of any fall in price levels, but it is because of a short crop last year and this year. Then, the minister says farm income depends on the size of the crop. This is not as correct as saying that farm income depends on marketings. If the farmer markets more grain, he gets more money. Farm marketings have not been low in recent years, and have not been low in this period to which the farm organizations allude. As a matter of fact, even in the year that has just passed there was more wheat marketed than in the long term average. The wheat pool has this to say:

> Moreover, in the last five years while the agricultural problem has been building up, western farmers have delivered more wheat to country elevators than they have on the average for the last 35 years. Canadian exports, likewise, have been above the long-term average in the last two years . . .
> In short, western farmers have been selling better than average crops during these years of surplus. And they have found, nevertheless, that the cost-price squeeze is forcing them into bankruptcy.

That is a very strong term. Does the minister think that $200 will save the farmers from bankruptcy?

> The disparity between farm costs and farm prices is the major problem. Farm groups are suggesting that it be solved by deficiency payments on wheat, oats and barley delivered during the crop years 1955-56 and 1956-57.

The Prime Minister has offered them a dollar an acre up to $200. In making his statement announcing the $40 million he outlined what he called a comprehensive long term agricultural program. I do not think there was anything really new in it. I do not think there is anything in it that meets the basic problem of the farmer's rising cost of production and falling prices for grain. The first problem the Prime Minister talked about was wheat exports as well as promotion and market development. Yet in recent years we have been marketing more than an average crop each year and exporting more than an average crop while the farmers go bankrupt. So continuing our exports at the good levels of previous years is not going to correct this problem of the price-cost squeeze.

Then the second plank is a comprehensive crop insurance program. I would be most pleased if such a program were brought about. But what does crop insurance mean? It means at the very best that the farmers will get a smaller income in time of crop failure than if they had a crop. Hence at the very best it will give them less money than when they have a crop. They have had good crops. They have sold good crops. Yet they are going broke. A crop insurance program is not going to cure that situation.

The third point, a food bank for deficit areas in time of crop failure. That is a good program. That is part of sound agriculture. But it does not meet the current price cost squeeze at all.

The fourth plank is long term program of farm loans. That above all will not solve the farm problem. The farmers in western Canada now are much more concerned about paying the debts they have than about getting more debts. While long term credit at low interest rates will be of value in building an economic unit, it is certainly no cure for the problem at hand.

The fifth plank is the means of meeting the small farm problem which the government has talked so much about. The government has under consideration ways and means of improving the level of living of farmers on small farms by means of better land use. That will not do very much. The farmer on a small farm is probably the best authority about how to use his land most efficiently and he is using it efficiently. He is using it so efficiently that he has marketed the biggest crop in history in recent years. So that is not going to get him out of this mess.

The government is going to encourage the formation of economic farm units. The problem is that we have the small farm. Now they say they are going to get him a bigger farm. It means only one thing, namely that there will be fewer farmers. When you get one farmer on a bigger piece of land, there is less land for somebody else because the supply of land is fixed. When you divide it up into bigger units, you have fewer farms. So what they say is that they are going to help the small farmer by getting rid of him and leaving the land to larger farmers on economic units.

As the sixth plank, plans are already under way for a national conservation conference. Judging by the accomplishments of some recent conferences, I do not think too much hope can be given to the producers on the basis of a conservation conference to deal with the whole question of the price-cost squeeze and the economic position of the farmer.

What has been the reaction to this in western Canada? The other day I put on the record some of the comments of Mr. James Paterson, head of the Interprovincial Farm Union Council. I notice that other prominent persons in Saskatchewan have been making statements. I have here in my hand a clipping from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of September 2. It is entitled "Ottawa 'Deficiency' Payment Piddling, Van Vliet Thinks".

—said Professor H. Van Vliet, head of the farm management department of the university, "reminds me of the Bennett nickel-payment of the 'thirties'." That is, he considered it too "piddling" to be worthy of much attention.

One of the very best agricultural economists in the province of Saskatchewan, the head of the agricultural economics department at the University of Saskatchewan, a man of many years experience in agriculture and in farm economics, a man who is not given to making exaggerated statements, calls the payment piddling. R. B. Bennett, when the pressure was on in 1931 and western grain producers were in a squeeze, brought in a payment of five cents a bushel on wheat. If the government had brought in a five cent a bushel payment on wheat for the two years that the wheat pool is asking about it would have amounted to about $35 million. That would have been almost as much as the government is now providing for; and if they had made comparable payments on oats and barley, it would be more. A five cent payment based on purchasing power of 1931, related to the quantities of wheat marketed in the years 1956-57, and extended to oats and barley, would have meant more today than the $40 million based on the $1 an acre that we have under consideration. This is no better treatment in 1958, in terms of the cost of production and the value of money and the agricultural prices, than R. B. Bennett's five cents a bushel which did the Conservative party in those years more damage than good.

Mr. Nasserden: Why did it do more damage?

Mr. Argue: Because it was not enough. It was something like the $6 increase in the old age pension. Every old age pensioner was glad to get it but it was far short of what was justified and needed and it made him so angry that he voted against the people who had provided the inadequate increase.

I do not think that this payment meets the situation. I do not think it is nearly enough. The second vice president of the Saskatchewan farmers union is reported in the newspapers as saying that he is giving Saskatchewan farmers advice to take the $200 they are paid and invest it in a return railway ticket to Ottawa so that they can all come down here in a mass delegation and impress upon the government the need to provide deficiency payments in keeping with the requests of the farm organizations. This payment of a dollar an acre will mean $200, of course, to the majority of farmers. Will that solve the economic crisis which he faces? How much money is it? It is 55 cents a day. I ask the government to consider how far 55 cents a day will go towards providing the farmer and his family with an income and how far it will go towards paying the cost of production of agriculture in this country?

The position the Prime Minister has taken in this house until recent months in advocating a system of parity prices, a system of support prices, based on a fair price-cost relationship was clearly a good one. It is just as valid today as it was in 1941 and in the subsequent years when he moved these motions. It is needed just as much now and we are apparently just as far away from getting it as we ever have been.

I would hope the government will meet the request of farm organizations for deficiency payments based on what I consider to be a reasonable formula, a system which does not ask for an ever increasing amount related to an increase in cost of production but which merely says there will be support prices which will not allow a further deterioration in the prices of wheat, oats and barley.

A few years ago we had a strenuous debate in this house at the end of the United Kingdom wheat agreement, resulting in the provision of $65 million from the national treasury into that pool. This $65 million was not then felt to be adequate from the standpoint of western farmers, but the need today is much greater than it was then because, since that time, the price of farm products has deteriorated by a very large amount.

Mr. Harkness: Livestock prices are away better than they were at that time and so are dairy prices.

Mr. Argue: The minister did not say when his party was advocating parity prices that the parity prices for grain producers would be forgotten about if the market for cattle appeared to be improved. No, Mr. Chairman, the farmers of western Canada will not be satisfied until the government provides them with a floor price, a continuing one, at a reasonable level and until they feel the government has fulfilled its many promises to provide parity prices. The sum of $200, as I said a few days ago, is worth just $200, and to that extent is welcome, but $1 per acre is a very small part of the amount of money necessary at this time even in the face of very large markets to give to the people on the prairies a standard of living which compares reasonably well with that of other Canadians.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to take up the time of the committee at great length, but having listened to the two speeches made by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia, there are a number of matters to which I think reference should be made.

I have listened to my hon. friend from Assiniboia on many occasions and he is the most generous man with other people's money I have ever known. He is all for the reduction of taxes, the almost removal of income tax on average incomes, but when it comes to generous promises and statements with regard to what he would do in the circumstances, he has no equal in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think that tribute is due to him because he brought up an example a little while ago as a passing jibe at the Liberal party, that having increased the old age pension by $6 per month they had thereby annoyed the old age pensioners who, while pleased to receive that amount, found it convenient and proper to vote against the Liberal party. I would say to the hon. gentleman that if the amount of promises resulted in votes in keeping with the exaggeration of the promises made by C.C.F. members before the last election, the numbers in his party would not have been reduced from some 25 to 8, because as I remember it those irresponsible promises indicated $75 per month for the old age pension. The people cannot be deceived by such promises which are made simply for political purposes.

One of the major reasons—and I say this with great respect to the hon. gentleman to whose advocacy I have always paid the strictest regard—for the diminution of national support for the party he represents is the irresponsible nature of the promises made by those associated with him.

I take second place to no one—

Mr. Pickersgill: In making promises.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in my desire to see that agriculture shall receive its fair share of the national income, and that has been the purpose and the aim of the government which I have the honour to lead. We have gone forward in the last 15 or 16 months during which time we have been in office to a degree that has met with the support of farmers generally across Canada as well as other citizens.

I know it is a great tribute to us that it is expected that all the promises we made would be completely implemented within the short time we have been in power. I ask my hon. friend to go across this country and to see whether the reaction he finds is not that never before in Canada has there been in such a short period of time during which a government has been in power when so many of its promises made to the electorate of the country have been carried out.

No matter what is done, my hon. friend will always say it is not enough. This will be the case no matter what course is followed. For years he was advocating, and in this he joined with the rest of us, the Saskatchewan dam project, but when we proceeded as one of our first acts to implement our promises in that regard we receive from him that qualified approval that we have not done enough in rendering at least $75 million available to the people of Saskatchewan.

One of the first acts of this government when it assumed office was to commence a review of the agricultural policies and these studies have been productive of legislative and administrative action which has materially benefited agricultural producers in all parts of Canada. I point out to my hon. friend that while I am not among those who accept in their entirety the Gallup polls which are taken from time to time, since this parliament began we have received an increase in support from the farmers as well as from other citizens of Canada because this government has gone ahead in an endeavour to bring about a new concept of implementation of promises made at any time heretofore. One of the first acts of this government when it assumed office in the development of our agricultural policy was the legislation passed under the title of the Agricultural Stabilization Act which provides Canadian farmers with a degree of security they had not known before.

I should like to review briefly what this measure has achieved for Canadian farmers. As hon. members know, the Agricultural Stabilization Act provides for the mandatory stabilization of the price of nine key commodities at not less than 80 per cent of their average price for the preceding ten years. These nine commodities represent 65 per cent of the farm cash income apart from western cereal grains. This act also provides for the stabilization of prices of non-mandatory commodities at levels fixed by the governor in council.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

The effective prices fixed for the mandatory commodities have been about 100 per cent of the previous ten years average for butter and cheese, 85 per cent for eggs, 84 per cent for hogs and 80 per cent for cattle, sheep and wheat, oats and barley outside the wheat board area. Then other commodities for which stabilization is not mandatory have also been brought under the act at prices reaching up to 90 per cent of the ten year average for soy beans, 93 per cent for sugar beets and 110 per cent for wool.

The steps taken under this act have been successful in preventing serious price declines in several commodities. In others they have provided a measure of price assurance for farms which has enabled them to plan their operations with a high degree of confidence.

"Done nothing", he said. "Taken no steps in a year to implement the promises." But the hon. member will remember that under the stabilization act regard is had to the cost of production so as to bring about as far as possible that degree of security for the farmer which will bear a fair relationship to the cost of production.

In so far as the prairie farmers are concerned, while support was given to the measure when it was first introduced by the hon. gentleman and by those associated with him, it was always subject to some suggestion that it was not enough or that there was something wrong with it. The hon. gentleman has fine ability but he is developing a carping attitude. No matter what is done he always has to carp, he always has to indulge in some small criticism. This is not in keeping with what he used to be, and I point this out to him as one who has listened to him throughout the years with interest and admiration. The hon. member has developed a tendency which is dangerous to one so young as he, an attitude of continual carping, a continual dealing with small things, never prepared to say that anything is right or that steps are being taken in the direction of improvement.

To meet the specific regional problems of our prairie farmers, interest-free cash advances to the amount of $34.5 million were provided to some 50,000 farmers on their farm-stored grain. I have already referred to the South Saskatchewan dam irrigation project, which is a major matter of benefit to agriculture. I can also refer to the steps that have been taken to prevent the dumping into Canada of agricultural products so as to preserve for the Canadian farmers their proper markets and to safeguard them against this type of competition which bears no relationship to actual cost. These are some of the things that we have done. These are the courses that we have mapped out. Our objective is unchanged, namely to raise agriculture and the other economies of our country to a level in keeping with the general situation prevailing within our country and internationally.

Today the hon. member grudgingly admitted —I think it was a grudging admission, by his attitude and his manner of speech—that last year as a result of a vigorous export policy by the Department of Trade and Commerce Canadian exports of wheat rose to 317 million bushels, the highest in five years, at a time when other exporting nations had experienced major declines in their sales.

These are some of the things that we have been able to achieve in a matter of 15 months or slightly more, during a portion of which time we were absent from our duties because of an election campaign. These are some of the things which we have done. I set out the plan for the future and the course to be followed at the election as we proceeded step by step, and in the meantime made provision to assist, in particular, the small farmers by payments as provided in the estimates now before us.

I listened with interest, also, to the Leader of the Opposition. He dealt with agricultural matters. He spoke of the cost-price squeeze. I do not seem to remember that at any time when he was in a position to do something on behalf of western farmers or on behalf of farmers in general across Canada he showed anything like the enthusiasm which he is displaying today. We talk about promises. I have some here. These are the agricultural promises made by the hon. gentleman in his speeches across the country, things which could have been done, action which could have been taken during the years in which the government to which he belonged was in power. During all those years we asked for some action. Today when action is being taken and when a course is being followed which will bring about the rehabilitation of agriculture to a state which it has not enjoyed in recent years, the answer given by the hon. gentleman is that from the paper from which he quotes so frequently, or from the group of advisers who served him so ill only a few months ago by the advice they gave him then. It is an interesting attitude, the one shown by the hon. gentleman. He is ambidexterous, if I may use that expression. He says: "Oh, it is $40 million, but it is not worth while considering; it has no principle."

The principle was set forth by the Minister of Agriculture, and I set it forth the other day. It is a provision that is meant to meet an immediate situation. The amount in question is, as I stated the other day, more than the amount which for so many years represented the request on the part of hon. members of the C.C.F., the amount that would have to be paid into wheat board funds in order to secure for the farmer under a two-price system a fair and proper return for that portion of his wheat production which is used in Canada.

We have taken this step. We intend to carry out by gradual stages a policy to bring about the achievement of that which we advocated through the years. My friend the hon. member for Assiniboia talks about marches on Ottawa. That is something he has been trying to get the farmers to do for months. I have read the speeches he made out there. He called on the western farmers to march on Ottawa and they told him to march back to Ottawa by himself. All over western Canada he has been bringing about that new form of democracy that consists in having the farmers march. He spoke about it again today. He said the $200 could be used by the average farmer to buy a return ticket.

Mr. Argue: It was the second vice-president of the Saskatchewan Farmers' Union who made that statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman has been able to produce one or two but he has not been too successful on the whole. He went out to western Canada. He talked to the farmers and urged them to march. "On to Ottawa!" was his cry, but he came back by himself.

Mr. Chairman, this is part of an agricultural policy designed, as the Minister of Agriculture said a moment ago, to meet an immediate situation. When the next session arrives we intend to introduce a measure for which the farmers have asked from the earliest days in western Canada, something which has also been requested by farmers in other parts of Canada, an insurance plan to bring about the assurance of at least a modicum of income, that degree of income which will not cost the farmer too much to assure himself of, and through which during the dark days of drought the farmer may be assured of at least a fair and reasonable rate of return. That is one of the things that came about under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That met the situation in the western provinces to a degree. That legislation was placed on the statute books as a result of the initiative of the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner. It has been expanded, it has served a successful purpose and has been beneficial. Farmers generally are today asking for something further in that direction and it is because they are asking for that we intend to provide the opportunity at the next session of parliament of taking this further step.

I am not going into the question of deficiency payments. I dealt with that on the other occasion and I am not going to take the time of the committee to deal with it again. I pointed out that during the election campaign and prior thereto I had stated at no time that deficiency payments would be introduced. At no time did I directly or indirectly promise deficiency payments. What I said was that this was one of the suggestions made by the farmers that would receive the fullest and most sincere consideration. We gave it that consideration for weeks on end. We listened to the views of economists. We discussed the general situation in so far as international trade is concerned. I placed our reasons before the house when I mentioned the particular item of $40 million. At that time I explained that deficiency payments applied to deliveries of grain would fail to help those producers most in need and would require very large subsidies from the federal treasury.

My friend the hon. member for Assiniboia talks about 10 per cent. What he is asking for apparently is $400 million. If $40 million is being given at this time by way of advance, is it 10 per cent?—

Mr. Harkness: Less than 10 per cent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, less than 10 per cent. Let us be reasonable. Does my hon. friend suggest that there should be made available at this time over $400 million? That is the kind of argument that brought about the situation in which he and his party find themselves today. No farmer with whom I am familiar in the western provinces has been other than reasonable throughout the years. They have not asked for the impossible. They have requested a reasonable return. I speak for the large body of those in the western provinces who throughout the years have known that when I spoke to them I have represented the facts as they were.

The government made a careful study of this matter. The serious implications for our export trade have not been answered. The subject was conveniently neglected by hon. gentlemen who have spoken. Deficiency payments to producers will be classed as a producer subsidy and grain entering export trade may be liable to countervailing duties in certain countries.

When we tried to do something on behalf of the farmer by bringing in anti-dumping legislation my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition said, "Of course I am for it, but we are against it". On both sides of the question in so far as GATT is concerned of which he spoke so eloquently, were we to enter into the scheme that is advocated in the form in which it is suggested we would find ourselves immediately in difficulties in our export trade.

Mr. Gour: You are out of order speaking about GATT.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as our exports to the United States of oats and barley are concerned, as I said previously, close to 100 per cent of our export trade in oats is to the United States and one-quarter of our export trade in barley is to the United States. To bring into effect these payments on these two particular grains would result in action being taken against us which would be nothing but detrimental to the Canadian farmers as a whole.

We gave the fullest and most complete consideration to this question. I myself know something of the western farmer and his problems. I know it from those days long ago, the earliest days. I know the difficulties experienced by the farmers in those early days when we went on to land that was entirely virgin. I experienced those days and I know those difficulties. That is one of the reasons why the policies we have enunciated were designed in order to meet that condition.

We took steps at the last session in so far as cash advances are concerned and also under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. This session we took steps, as we have since we came into power, to meet the terrific competition that farmers are receiving through imports of agricultural products from other countries being dumped into the markets here to the detriment of Canadians. We have taken the necessary steps at this session. We took action with respect to rehabilitation through the South Saskatchewan river dam. In addition to that we made provision for an immediate situation. At the next session our further unfolding of the program that was enunciated will be carried out to the end that agriculture will be able to attain that position wherein a degree of fairness and justice will be assured not only to farmers in western Canada but to farmers generally throughout the country.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on these estimates I should like to say at the outset I am in full agreement with the principle of the motion to make payments to the western grain producers for which approval is sought in the estimates that are before us. I am grateful to the Prime Minister for introducing this legislation and to the ministers who were so instrumental in drafting a formula under which payments will be made on an acreage basis so that every farmer will benefit. The $40 million proposed in the estimates will be of assistance to the western grain growers who have been labouring hard under the price squeeze in which they have found themselves over the last few years. One must be a grain grower to know what it means to produce under such a cost of production. Taking into consideration the so-called price squeeze that has been with us for a long time, without any attempt having been made in the past to prevent it or cope with it, this payment cannot be expected to rectify all the evils of the past. However, it is reasonable to assume that the $40 million proposed as payment for one year will have an effect on western agriculture and will alleviate some of the hardships experienced in the past. Indeed, it will go much further than the agricultural policy that we heard so much about last winter, namely the ten cent increase in the initial price which money in the first place belongs to the farmer.

Had steps been undertaken in the past or even as late as 1955 when it was apparent then as it is now that the price the farmer was receiving for his produce was away out of line proportionately with the prices he had to pay, the situation would not have been as grim as it is now. Consequently the effect of this payment at the present time would have been much more beneficial as the need would not have been as great as it is now.

With the way the situation is now it will be expected that the forthcoming payment should correct all the shortcomings of past years but it must be admitted this is almost impossible without putting too big a burden on the treasury in one year. The part I like most about the action taken, and I know it is appreciated by many farmers, is the fact that this is only one part of a long range program for Canadian agriculture. As stated by the Prime Minister, under this policy, among other benefits, the farmer will find protection from such hazards as drought, frost and crop failures of various kinds.

This is a policy which has been advocated over the years by farm organizations and authorities on agriculture. If it is implemented it is hoped it will put agriculture on a sounder economic basis. In my opinion this program will go a long way towards achieving the ultimate goal, namely to give the farmer a fair return for his investment and labour and to place him in the same position as other segments of our nation by giving him a fair return for his investment and labour.

I would be failing in my duty if in connection with this estimate I did not mention the agricultural amendments implemented during this session, namely P.F.A.A. cash advances and others. All these acts were amended to meet changing conditions in agriculture and I know that if changes should be necessary in the future in connection with what we are now discussing they will be forthcoming.

Finally, I should like to say that I am pleased that this estimate has been brought in at this time. If it had been introduced last winter or before March 31 it would have been classified as just election bait but now it will serve as a clear indication that the government is concerned with the welfare of all sections of our country. On behalf of the western grain growers and myself I should like to ask the house to approve the estimate before us to provide for payments to western grain producers in accordance with the regulations of the governor in council.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, in replying to the Prime Minister's announcement of this policy a few days ago our leader had this to say, as found on page 4348 of Hansard for August 30:

> I am thinking particularly at this moment of the fisherman who has also had his hard times, and who perhaps will look with a certain amount of envy to this kind of action taken by the government for the grain producers.

Naturally, Mr. Chairman, we do not object to this legislation but, as has been pointed out, our fishermen can suffer from the failure of the fisheries just as farmers suffer from the failure of crops. My purpose in rising at this time is to call to the minister's attention the fact that the fishery has failed this year in many parts of Newfoundland, and we hope that the same consideration and assistance will be given to the fishermen as is being given to the farmers under this legislation.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, as a western farmer I had intended to take part in the discussion of this supplementary payment of $40 million to the prairie grain producers. No statement is necessary from me now. I want to thank the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture for answering opposition statements so fully. The statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture will be very carefully studied by prairie farmers and I suggest that they will be well received when considered in relation to the government's long range agricultural policy.

There is one important aspect of the government's farm policy that I should like to emphasize for a moment because it is a part of the long range program. I refer to the farm cost survey on the prairies late this fall. I want to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce on his announcement of July 19 of this farm cost survey. On July 19, as found at page 2469 of Hansard, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> I believe it will meet a very great need because we are always encountering the problem of cost and income in so far as agriculture is concerned.

Such an inquiry into farm costs is greatly needed in the formulation of the government's long term agricultural policy. Such a step should have been taken years ago by the previous government. The fact that they did not undertake such a survey and did not have any definite figures explains why their agricultural policies during 22 years lacked any long range objective.

There has been a great deal of loose talk about farm costs. I say "loose talk" because definite figures are not available. When I was in Ottawa with the prices board in the 1940's the question of average farm costs was always coming up and no one had a definite answer, not even the farm organizations. I recall one conference of prices board officials with farm groups when the question of the cost of producing a bushel of wheat was raised. There were almost as many different answers as there were farmer representatives in the room.

I mention this, Mr. Chairman, in this committee to emphasize the importance of the farm cost survey this fall. The undertaking of this farm cost survey indicates the determination of this government to tackle and solve Canada's farm problems. I am sure that the prairie farmers will accept this $40 million supplementary payment in the spirit in which the government is paying it, as immediate help in a problem that can only be solved by a long range program, such as a program of better farm credit, national crop insurance, better land use and greater wheat sales, which this government is undertaking. The farm cost survey this fall is, as I said before, an indication of this government's determination to tackle the farm problem and to solve it.

Mr. Nasserden: In rising to take part in this debate, I am reminded of a day many years ago in the history of our country when the minister of agriculture saw his sincere efforts to help misunderstood by those whom he sought so diligently to assist. I refer, of course, to the five-cent payment to which reference has been made in this debate, a payment that was made during the period when the Hon. Robert Weir was minister of agriculture. This payment went to the farmers who produced the grain, but did not go to farmers who did not have those bountiful crops of grain. It is for this reason we have this estimate based on an acreage payment which will go out to farm people, and which will give them something to make up the difference between the sale price and the cost of production.

During the past several days I have had reason to think back over the past 20 years during which I have been actively engaged in the agricultural industry. Before that, I recall doing the chores on my father's farm. I recall various responsibilities from time to time, and particularly those which resulted from service in positions which resulted in one being continually confronted with the problems of agriculture. On this occasion I should like to put on record, for this parliament and for succeeding parliaments as well, the acceptance of the government's action, with the usual reservation that they pursue this whole matter of farm security and the attempt to ensure that the people engaged in this industry shall enjoy a fair share of the national income. The Prime Minister did a creditable job today and a few days ago in presenting the overall agricultural situation in this country, that is as creditable a job as anyone could do before the report of the price spreads commission is made public and before the survey that is now being conducted into farm living costs and costs of production in these various areas of Canada where agriculture forms the basic industry is completed.

It seemed to me that as he spoke the other day, and again today, he spoke as no other man in the recent history of our industry or of our parliament has spoken on behalf of those engaged in the agricultural industry. He spoke with a feeling that came from recognition of how closely the farm people of this country are confined to overalls. This is one of the reasons why I am convinced that the legislation which will follow will be the type that will endure for many years to serve this industry that is basic to Canada's economic welfare. From the very beginning, I have been one of those who has held the view that our first consideration should be the adoption of those measures which will help to build a sound national policy and which will apply with equality to farm people in every segment of our industry and in all parts of the country.

What is of even more importance is the fact that this session has resulted in the development of some of the bases of that agricultural policy, and of equal importance is the fact that even now the remaining part of that program is only awaiting the application of a reliable basis upon which to put these things into operation for the benefit of the people in all parts of Canada. The present item in the estimates is a short terms measure which will be welcomed by the farmers in western Canada, especially in the light of the long term objectives which have remained untouched over a period of years by those who today form the opposition group in parliament. I do not think that anyone in western Canada will seriously consider this assistance as peanuts, as was suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia the other day, nor do I believe his reference to it as a pittance will go down very well with many thinking farm people. At the same time, I acknowledge that does not mean that the needs of the western farmer have been fully met.

The stabilization bill fulfils a widespread need in many parts of this country, and it will become increasingly important as the production of livestock continues to increase in our province. Earlier in the estimates we had an item of $17,500,000 to reimburse the eastern feeder for his purchases of western grown grains. This measure is designed to help the eastern farmer, but at the same time it is an incentive to the movement of western grown grains which the western Canadian farmers certainly appreciate.

This session of parliament has granted, almost to the last detail, those things for which the farmers in western Canada have asked. There has been the amendment to the P.F.A.A. to which all who produce grain in western Canada contribute on every bushel they sell. The problem of crop insurance and farm credit has been under study, and the Prime Minister has held out hope that those things will be brought before us at the next session of parliament.

The government must have had a good reason for deciding that farms of 200 acres or less were the ones upon which to base their short term assistance. Some people in western Canada will be disappointed that the government did not decide on a unit that could more properly be described as an average size farm in grain growing areas. I have given this matter a great deal of consideration, and have come to the conclusion that perhaps as a result of this choice the government has allowed a principle to be established upon which farm people will be able to build a powerful case when the ranks are finally closed as between farmers in all parts of Canada, and when they come armed with the statistical data to establish their right to a full and fair share of the national income.

From each of the western provinces there have been those who have devoted themselves diligently and faithfully to their constituents in this matter. It has been a source of satisfaction to be associated with them in the agricultural caucus of our party. I think it is only fitting that on this occasion so near the end of the session I should express the appreciation and satisfaction that has come to us all as members from other parts of Canada have shown the same desire and capacity to envision a truly national policy for agriculture.

If I have one regret in this whole matter I hope that I may be pardoned. It is that the constituency of Assiniboia did not have a representative in the government caucus to speak for the people of that great grain growing area of Saskatchewan. Their representative in the commons could only ask the question: "When?" It did not matter how many times he asked that question, it did not add a single dollar to the amount embodied in this estimate. In fact, the hon. member for Assiniboia seems to have forgotten—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. In this item 663 I do not see anything mentioned about the hon. member for Assiniboia. I would greatly appreciate it if the hon. member would stick to item 663.

Mr. Nasserden: The policy of this government in providing funds to purchase wheat for disposal in certain areas where we might not otherwise be able to secure a commercial market is one that should assist in the reduction of our wheat carry-over; and to the extent to which that carry-over is reduced, deliveries will be increased from farms in western Canada. This should have a relieving effect on the problems arising in those areas where yields have been above normal. It would appear to me at this time there should be little wheat left on farms at the end of this crop year, owing to natural crop conditions as well as the marketing policy and disposal plans of the government.

I should like to say also that I am one of those in western Canada who produce grain. Our harvest started about two weeks ago, and I have had to curb my impatience to hear again the rhythm of harvest machinery, a tune that shells out Canada's second largest single export item. That should be a reminder to people in all parts of this country that we are fortunate in Canada indeed to have the cereal producing areas within our borders.

I should also like to say that it should be a reminder to people in all parts of this country that without these resources of cereals we would be bidding in the export market today for bread grains. Maybe then people in this country would appreciate the value of a bushel of wheat in relation to the incomes that they enjoy today.

During the past two weeks, awaiting the introduction of this measure, I have had the leisure to re-examine the history of the party that first won my loyalty at a time when there were few indeed who were giving it a second thought as an instrument through which to achieve some of the principles important to the industry in which I found myself. During that period I have taken the trouble to re-examine the history of the farm organizations and the industry in which I find myself, and to chart the progress that has been made from time to time as a result of the dedicated efforts of those organizations. Being as closely associated with some of that history as I have been, any assessment of farm legislation on my part is naturally critical. Yet, taking all things into consideration, I find that I am almost unwillingly enthusiastic about the measure of achievement that has been chalked up by the members of this government at this session of parliament that today records a breadth and sum of achievement never before achieved by any party anytime hitherto in the history of our country.

Mr. Argue: I enjoyed the remarks of the Prime Minister immensely, Mr. Chairman. I do not think he has been in better form except perhaps on that famous day of January 20, I think it was. I know that in relation to the seriousness of the debate and the degree of concern one sees, the Prime Minister puts every effort into his speech. He is a tremendous orator. There is no doubt about that. He has the largest bag of tricks of any hon. member in this house. We appreciate that fact from knowing the hon. gentleman for many years. I do not know whether, when he was in the opposition, his criticism was carping but it was consistent. He was the most critical that I think has ever sat in the opposition, even more critical perhaps than the present Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Green: Oh, no. Leave me out of this.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was a neck and neck race.

Mr. Argue: How the Prime Minister used to needle the government. He would get the Right Hon. C. D. Howe so angry that he would make statements that were so unparliamentary that I would not want to repeat them. The Prime Minister is a very able politician. He knows when things are going well in the house and the minister conducting the legislation is doing an excellent job, that the legislation is airtight and that he then does not have to pay this meticulous attention to the debate of the house. But I do not recall a Prime Minister who began a debate originally by a very long statement—an almost unprecedented statement by way of length—on motions regarding an item that was to be passed in the estimates by one of his colleagues and, after having made a very long statement and after having outlined in addition to the temporary policy, the long range vision of what might be done in many years ahead, comes into the house and makes a very strong statement on the item itself.

I think I have known the Minister of Agriculture as long as I have known the Prime Minister. He being an Alberta man or a prairie man and conversant with the grain problem, I thought that probably he would be taking a much more prominent position in this debate than that which he has taken so far. As I say, when the case is very weak, the Prime Minister makes up for it by pulling out all the tricks. He ridiculed the C.C.F.; and when I am the only member from the prairies on the opposition side that is not hard to do. The Prime Minister has 47 of the 48 members. I do not really think that is because the C.C.F. did such a bad job in the opposition. I think it is because our hon. friends in the official opposition, when they were in the government, did such a terrible job and the people on the prairies were so anxious to get rid of them they said, this is the party that probably has the best chance. The farmers today are caught in the price-cost squeeze. The C.C.F. candidates were caught in a political squeeze. But I do not think that pointing out that the Conservatives have 47 members from the prairies, the C.C.F. have one member and the Liberal have no members is really a good sound argument in favour of anything.

I do not think that by following this course the Prime Minister is really doing himself justice. Oh, I can remember when he was the lone wolf from Saskatchewan, the one Conservative member. That was also mentioned in this house, and he was not allowed to forget that it was the policies of R. B. Bennett which had made it impossible to elect a Conservative in Saskatchewan either provincially or federally with the exception of my hon. friend. But he built for himself a good reputation in this house as the only Conservative from Saskatchewan, the reputation of being in the opinion of many Saskatchewan people a very forceful and authentic voice of the true wishes of the people of that province.

I have no hesitation in saying today that I believe in advocating and in championing the deficiency payments for which the farm organizations have asked and not only the farm organizations but the boards of trade, the retail merchants associations, the municipal associations, the teachers associations and some of the church conferences which have passed on this question and that I am no less speaking for them at this time than was the Prime Minister when he spoke on other matters in other days.

I say this because I believe the people of Saskatchewan without reference to party believe that the prairie people are entitled to something more than is contained in these estimates.

I thought as the Prime Minister was talking that we were back to the throne speech because he referred to a great many things which had gone on during this session, but there was one reference which I noticed he did not make. He did not say "I am still for parity prices". He forgot all about parity prices and all about his statements in the past. I think the Prime Minister used to be in favour of parity prices, in fact I know he was. The Minister of Agriculture never was, never has been and is not today. If there are some things which make us excited in this house, one thing which makes the Minister of Agriculture excited is an argument on parity prices.

Mr. Harkness: It does not affect me at all.

Mr. Argue: He sees in parity prices a great danger to the country. He says, "Look at the Americans who tried it." That did not prevent the Prime Minister himself over the years from advancing this policy day after day.

The Prime Minister has said that the farmers today enjoy a degree of security never before known. I will let the farmers themselves decide whether or not that is true, whether they are better off today with the average price of a bushel of wheat at $1.23 or whether they were better off in 1943 after the price of wheat had been increased to $1.25 a bushel. I will let them judge whether they enjoy a greater degree of security than ever before in the light of the reduced final payment on the 1956-57 crop year by 5 cents or 6 cents a bushel. I will let them decide whether they are in a better position with a continuing increase in cost of production.

The Prime Minister has said the government has kept its promises; he has talked about the commitments the government has made and some of them have been met. When they have been met we have fully supported such legislation, but some of the promises have not been kept. We were going to have a report on the old age pension system in the United States within three or four months after the appointment of Dr. Clark. We have heard nothing of it yet and I thought we were going to have immediate action after the receipt of the report. We knew there was going to be a federal-provincial conference; we knew that, the government said so, but it has not taken place. So that promise has not been kept. There was going to be no suffering from unemployment in this country—the Prime Minister said that too. He said, "No unemployed person will suffer under this administration" or words to that effect, but we still have very, very widespread unemployment and a great many people think that this coming winter will be—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: I am out of order—the Prime Minister was out of order and other members were out of order. The Prime Minister dragged in everything but the kitchen sink and I am at least sticking to some of the promises made by the government.

The Prime Minister made a great to-do about what he said was my general reaction to anything done by the government, that it is not enough and that it should be a lot more. I would say that is a reasonably consistent stand which I take, although I know of many, many things, probably most things passed in this house, which I have supported without question, because almost every item which goes through this house goes through unanimously.

I think, however, that the role of the opposition is as important as is the role of the government. The role of the government is to bring forth legislation and that of the opposition is to criticize such legislation and to point out its weaknesses. I believe that more could be done for western agriculture than is being done and that more could be done now. I would say to the Prime Minister that when I am fully satisfied with everything the government does, then I will cease to be of any value as a member of this House of Commons because it is the duty of members of parliament to do their best to improve the legislation before the house.

The Prime Minister said I am always trying to promote a march on Ottawa. I believe I mentioned that a couple of years ago—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: More recently.

Mr. Argue: No, I think I have used the words "mass delegation" since that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh no.

Mr. Argue: If the Prime Minister would just hear me, I would say, with respect to his suggestion that I have been promoting a march of the farmers on Ottawa, that I am not denying that nor am I agreeing with it. All I am saying is that I believe I used the word "march" a couple of years ago but to the best of my knowledge I have since referred to it as a mass delegation.

Mr. Churchill: To Ottawa.

Mr. Argue: I would remind the Prime Minister that while he can take his pick and he can use any word he likes, certainly all statements about mass delegations to Ottawa do not emanate from me. They are from other people who are interested in sending a mass delegation to this city, and I know from acquaintance with the directors of the Saskatchewan wheat pool that at their general meetings over the last few years they have asked their board of directors to so press the deficiency payment policy approved by their organization upon the government that they would get a decision from the government and, failing a favourable decision, to undertake the organization of a mass delegation to Ottawa. It is not something new; it has happened before, and in fact it happened in 1942 when the Prime Minister was a member of the opposition. It can happen again, depending, I am sure, on what kind of legislation is forthcoming from the government in the days ahead. The farm organizations have carefully considered the question and they are advocating deficiency payments and they are dissatisfied with the item now before the house. They consider that if these requests are not met they will send an organized mass delegation, which is their right in a free country, to wait on this parliament and on this government in Ottawa.

I have no hesitation in repeating that I believe prairie people generally do not feel that this sum of $40 million is adequate and that they are asking for deficiency payments as set forth by their farm organizations.

Mr. Churchill: I shall not detain the committee over long, but I do think in view of some remarks which have been made this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Assiniboia that a few facts should be placed on the record which will be helpful to those people who will be reading this debate with a great deal of interest because the subject is of very considerable importance to the farm population of western Canada.

In view of the representations that have been made to us during the last 14 months and the importance attached to this subject I think it would be helpful if some pertinent facts were inserted amid the remarks that have been made this afternoon. When the representatives of the farm organizations—the pool organizations—came to see us in January to present a brief relating to deficiency payments and other matters they pointed out that several countries of the world were making deficiency payments to their wheat growers. This argument has been used on many occasions and it is very plausible until we examine it carefully. They drew our attention to the fact that the following countries assisted their wheat growers from a figure of $2.06 a bushel up to as high as $4.03 per bushel. They listed the following countries:

Ireland	Germany
United Kingdom	Brazil
Belgium	Italy
Japan	Norway
Austria	Switzerland

They said to us: this is the type of support which is given elsewhere. But with the exception of Italy, which now and again exports some wheat, the other nine countries are all steady annual importers of wheat, and the deficiency payment as used in those countries is used as a stimulus to production. They are trying to raise the level of production so that they may cut down their imports, and that is why they have made use of these deficiency payments. A deficiency payment used for this purpose in a country such as Canada which is a great exporter of wheat would not be anything like as helpful.

The deficiency payment asked for by the farm organizations was based on a bushel payment idea, which means that those who had wheat to deliver in the years 1955, 1956 and 1957 would be the ones who would get the benefit. They paid little attention to those who were in the position of having little or no wheat to deliver. Yet one of the basic problems facing western agriculture has been the variability of income due to the variability of crop conditions. Everyone in western Canada is familiar with that situation, and people throughout Canada should be conscious of it, too, because as the income of western agriculture declines the whole economy of Canada suffers, and it can decline anywhere between $150 million and $200 million a year depending on the crop that is harvested. This is really the basic problem affecting agriculture.

I do not overlook the problem raised by several hon. members and by representatives of the farm organization with regard to the cost-price squeeze. That is a pressing and perplexing problem, and it has to be met in so far as it can be met. Nevertheless the basic problem is this one of the variability of income and I should like to indicate some figures with regard to it. We are familiar with periods of high income and periods of low income on the prairies and although technological improvements and marketing techniques have tended to reduce this variability, for the foreseeable future it will remain a feature of any western farm economy not rigidly controlled.

A comparison of income per farm over a period of years must recognize the fact that the average size of farms has been increasing rapidly and that the "statistical" average income of all farms is much less than that of bona fide commercial farms, as a result of the inclusion of many very small farms in accordance with the census definition.

The average income per farm in the prairie provinces adjusted to constant dollars—1948-57=100—varied between $1,714 and $6,631 during the period 1935-57. The average for the period was $4,255 and in 1957 was only fractionally lower at $4,242. The pattern of the changes was one of rapid if sporadic, increase from 1935-52, followed by a fairly steady decline. However, even expressed in constant dollars, income per farm in 1957 was still one third above the 1935-44 ten year average.

Income per improved acre adjusted to a constant dollar value—1948-57=100—also varied widely during the period under review, from a low of $8.47 to a high of $22.96 per acre. In 1957 adjusted income per acre was $13 as compared with an average of $15.85 for the ten year period.

The average annual income per acre from wheat, adjusted to a constant dollar value—1948-57=100—for the prairie provinces fluctuated between $10.91 and $33.02. The average for the ten years was $20.95 and for 1957 was $18.85.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I refrained from making any comment on this vote but I, like my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo, would have liked to point out that not only in agriculture but in the oldest industry of Canada, the fisheries, fluctuations in price of this character take place. What the minister is doing now is making a long academic discourse, and it seems to me to be quite out of order and unrelated to this item.

Mr. Churchill: On the contrary, I am putting on the record facts, something which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has always strenuously avoided. He deals so much with theory and gets so aroused emotionally over various problems that it is difficult for him to deal with the facts of a situation, and that is exactly what I am dealing with on this occasion.

Mr. Pearson: A point of order has been raised, and perhaps the minister could sit down long enough for it to be determined.

The Deputy Chairman: There is no question but that the Chair has allowed quite a lot of latitude this afternoon, but I think, that hon. members should come back to this item No. 663, because if the chair allows latitude to one it has to allow it to another.

Mr. Churchill: There was considerable discussion with regard to the cost price-squeeze and all those other matters affecting the income of prairie farmers, and these points I have mentioned are related to that.

The Deputy Chairman: There was no objection raised when that happened, but now an objection has been voiced the Chair must bring members back closer to this particular item.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, it is extraordinarily difficult when the Chair is obliged to restrict a speaker after allowing so much latitude but I shall certainly respect the ruling. May I make a few comments with regard to marketings and exportings of wheat which are related to this problem. The hon. member for Assiniboia mentioned that and said that over the years marketings had remained very constant but may I point out that these marketings would not have remained at the high level at which they have been the last few years had it not been for a vigorously pursued export policy. That was dealt with by the Prime Minister who indicated that we had set a record this year of 317 million bushels of wheat for export of which 23 million bushels constituted an increase in our cash sales and 32 million bushels represented loans and gifts to the Colombo plan countries.

The suggestions for deficiency payments have run into enormous sums of money but it is sometimes overlooked that we are now expending a considerable amount of financial support. Let me just illustrate that. In this vote there is provision for $40 million. There were excess storage charges on wheat running between $35 million and $40 million. During the course of the last crop year approximately $50 million was expended by way of outright gifts or long term loans for the export of wheat. The payments for this year under P.F.A.A. may run between $25 million and $30 million. During the course of one year we have expended approximately $150 million to $160 million in support of western agriculture over and above the advantages that accrue from low freight rates on grain moving to our ports.

The long range program is part and parcel of this vote which we are considering today. In conclusion I would suggest that in that the essential and most important factor is to press on with an export program with respect to wheat that will reduce the surplus that has been hanging over our heads in this country for some time. That surplus was reduced during the course of this crop year by over 100 million bushels of wheat and in the coming crop year it may be reduced by an equal amount or more. However, we will still be left with a considerable surplus of wheat in Canada. Unless that surplus of wheat is moved there cannot be marketings and deliveries by farmers to the elevators and hence there will be a reduction in the income of the individual farmer.

By and large our program and this assistance is aimed at assisting the smaller farmer in western Canada who deserves that type of assistance and who will constantly receive the sympathetic attention of this government.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, the sum of $1,898,604,644.89 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-61, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1959.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, what is the total amount? Will the minister tell us that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. The total amount provided for by this bill is $1,898,604,644.89. It is the amount appropriated now, the three earlier appropriation acts for the fiscal year 1958-59 having already appropriated sums totalling $1,866,884,889.11, making a grand total of appropriations including the main, supplementary and further supplementary items of $3,765,489,534.00.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Schedules A, B and C, inclusive, agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Churchill.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the house would allow me to make a suggestion at this time. In view of all the circumstances, if the house is agreeable, prorogation could take place at eight o'clock this evening. That could be achieved by simply adjourning at the conclusion of whatever business remains provided the membership of the house will consent. I am merely placing this suggestion before the house at this time to the end that we might be able to arrange for the presence of the representative of the Governor General for prorogation.

Mr. Pearson: So far as the opposition is concerned, I hope we can arrange the remaining business of the house to make that possible. We shall try to ensure that our criticism from now on is not carping.

Mr. Speaker: I take it there is unanimous consent that the house will continue with government orders until they have been completed, then rise until eight o'clock, if there is any interval, and reconvene at eight o'clock in the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DISCRIMINATION, REVOCATION OF CITIZENSHIP, ETC.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-58, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two very brief general observations on clause 1. When the bill was before the house for second reading, as Your Honour is aware, I sought to move an amendment to the second reading of the bill which Your Honour ruled out of order on the ground that it was anticipating the committee stage. In order to save time I should like to give notice now that when we come to clause 2 I propose to move an amendment in committee in which I shall seek to accomplish what Your Honour told us from the chair could be accomplished in committee, because I understood that to be the sense of Your Honour's ruling.

But I should like to say that we voted against second reading of the bill for two reasons. First, although it appears on the surface to move a long way, and it has moved somewhat in the direction we think it ought to go, towards giving equality of status to naturalized citizens with natural born citizens, we think it should go the whole way or that it is not worth doing at all. Second, although when the hon. lady moved second reading she told us that she intended to strike out subparagraph (c) of clause 2 of the bill, that of course had not been done at the time of second reading and we were voting on the bill as it was before the house and we did not feel that we could vote for a bill containing that clause, with the interpretation that we placed upon it. I believe that the hon. member for Cartier wishes to make an observation or two on clause 1.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I want to address myself to the use of the word "intend" in the bill because I think it has some very significant connotations which perhaps are not very obvious at first sight. I was pleased to hear the minister say that she would withdraw subparagraph (c) of clause 2 because it does use the word "intend" and, as the minister said, it is really difficult to risk using the word "intend" because it might be misunderstood. It is difficult to know what a person intends. You do not know what is in that person's mind and you cannot base any conclusions on it. The minister was quite right in saying she would withdraw subparagraph (c) of clause 2 which now reads as follows:

> The governor in council may, in his discretion, order that any person other than a natural born Canadian citizen shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if, upon a report from the minister, he is satisfied that such person...
> (c) did not, at the time of taking the oath of allegiance set forth in the second schedule, intend to comply with such oath.

As I say, I agree wholeheartedly with the minister that it is difficult to know what a person intends at a particular time. We also find the word "intend" in subsection 1 of section 10 of the act which reads as follows:

> The minister may, in his discretion, grant a certificate of citizenship to any person who is not a Canadian citizen and who makes application for that purpose and satisfies the court that—

Then there are about ten items and I do not intend to read them all because I want to save the time of the committee. With the exception of the last one they are all palpable and factual so that the court can at the time know the fact that the applicant has complied with each one of these items. I will refer to two or three for illustration only. The court can know, under subparagraph (a), that the applicant has attained the age of 21. Proof of that can be made. Under subparagraph (b) the court can know that he has resided in Canada for a period of at least one year. Proof of that can be made. Under paragraph (c) proof can be made that he has acquired Canadian domicile, and so on down the line. But then we come to the last subparagraph and we see that the court must be satisfied that he intends to have his place of domicile permanently in Canada.

In clause 1 of the bill now before us we see that the words "intends to comply with the oath of allegiance set forth in the second schedule" are used. The minister has rightly withdrawn subparagraph (c) of clause 2 and I see no reason for the retaining in the legislation of the words "intends to comply with the oath of allegiance." It is very nebulous and it does not fall into the same category of factual items that can be proven to the court. I regard this as a somewhat dangerous provision to add. The minister has deleted a great many of the obstacles that existed in the previous act by bringing forward this bill. But I think there is a catch. I do not say that the minister intends it to be so but I think there is a catch when after the applicant has complied with all other requirements you provide that the court must also be satisfied that the applicant intends to comply with the oath of allegiance.

That is not a factual thing and it is difficult to know at any time whether the person intends to comply. Someone will have to judge that. Someone will have to read the applicant's mind at the time. Does he intend to comply? By simply saying, "I do not think he intends to comply", I say that whoever will be in that position will be able to nullify all the factual requirements already complied with by the applicant. I respectfully submit to the minister that this addition is not necessary. It adds nothing to the legislation and it creates a problem because someone will have to read the applicant's mind. He may then say, "I do not think you intend to comply" and thus nullify all the other factual requirements.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Would there not be the same proof required as there would be in respect of the earlier subsection to which he made reference—that the applicant intends to have his place of domicile in Canada? The individual applying for naturalization will be asked, "What do you intend to do"? He says, "I intend to stay in Canada; my plan is to remain here and establish a domicile." Is not intent in this case the same, something which has to be determined by the surrounding circumstances at the time as necessary to be established before it could in any way be determined?

Mr. Crestohl: The Prime Minister is quite right, but I think that the word is superfluous in that clause.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But it has been there for a long time.

Mr. Crestohl: He must first of all prove factually that he has lived in Canada over a number of years; that he has a domicile in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That he intends to.

Mr. Crestohl: A man can say I intend to do so; quite right. However, when the granting of citizenship is going to depend upon whoever will sit in judgment saying, I do not believe the intention, that is a danger spot. It is very dangerous authority to place in the hands of someone, to judge whether an applicant who has complied with countless requirements should then have his application refused because that person will say, I am not quite sure you intend to keep the oath that you are taking. I think that is a very dangerous clause, and I do not believe it adds any prestige to the act. I do not think it is a fact which anybody could possibly prove or disprove, as to what a person's intent may be. After you have satisfied all the requirements, your hope of citizenship may be washed away because someone will say, I do not believe you intend to follow the oath. Who is the mind reader who will be able to draw that conclusion to nullify the application?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who is the mind reader who determines the question of intent as to domicile?

Mrs. Fairclough: I think the hon. member for Cartier attacks this thing from a peculiar position. This word "intends" in this particular clause is not at all the same as in the clause which we propose to remove. It must be taken in conjunction with the final wording in subsection (1) of section 10 which says that the applicant, amongst other things, should satisfy the court about a great many things. I draw the hon. member's attention to the words in paragraph (d) which says that he must be of good character. I ask the hon. member, how does one prove that one is of good character? It is probably easy to prove you are not of good character. You could probably have evidence of being a bad character, but I doubt that you could really produce evidence to prove that you are of good character. Again, therefore, it is a case of what is in a person's mind. When you ask a person to prove that he is of good character or to satisfy the court that he is of good character, I think it is quite proper that you should ask him also to satisfy the court about other things. Has he the intention to live a proper life in this country, to stay in this country?

I cannot get too excited about a person who has attained the position in life where he has been appointed a judge in our courts misinterpreting the examination or conversation which he may have with a prospective citizen. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if you are not going to have some such safeguard, if you are not going to signify to the judge the type of examination which you hope he will make of applicants for citizenship, you may just as well grant the applicant his citizenship without any examination whatever. You may as well grant it merely because he applies for it and has been in the country the requisite number of years. You may say, very well, you have been here for five years and now if you wish to be a Canadian citizen we are not going to ask you what your intentions are, we are not going to ask you whether you intend to live in this country, whether you intend to apply for a passport and then leave this country. There are a great many angles to it. I submit, in all sympathy with the hon. member's concern, that this is a matter for the judges in the courts to decide, as they have done in the past. This is merely an indication to the judges that we hope they will be careful in awarding citizenship to these applicants.

Mr. Crestohl: May I point out to the minister that I do not believe the comparison is a good one in so far as proving good character is concerned. Certainly, before a man's application is considered it is carefully investigated by our security officers. Reports are obtained from all the courts as to whether or not this man has a criminal record. Security officers investigate everywhere, and these facts are placed before the judge. The judge has factual evidence.

This is the only item in twelve requirements that is not factual, but upon which one has to rely by just guessing. May I point out to the minister also that if this were left to a judge perhaps some cure might be obtained, but sometimes these things are not done by a judge. They are done by a minister, by a deputy minister or by departmental officials. If one simply says, I do not think that this man will keep his oath of allegiance, that is sufficient to disqualify him from citizenship. I think that is a barrier that is difficult to overcome. It should not exist in a piece of legislation. As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said the other night, we want to eliminate policing the mind, and this approaches an attempt to police one's mind. If you say that a man will not qualify for citizenship, not on the ground of facts but on one's thoughts, that is a very dangerous thing.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—revocation of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like, if the hon. lady would allow me, to move an amendment—

An hon. Member: The minister has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: All right; it will just complicate things.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sorry there is a misunderstanding here. I indicated before that when clause 2 was being considered I intended to move an amendment to the house. I think the committee was well aware of this intention. I shall, therefore, ask my colleague the Minister of Agriculture to move:

That Bill C-58, an act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act, be amended

(a) by adding the word "or" at the end of line 25 thereof,

(b) by striking out the word "or" at the end of line 28 thereof, and

(c) by striking out lines 29, 30 and 31 thereof.

Mr. Harkness: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the hon. lady say what the effect of that amendment is?

Mrs. Fairclough: It is to eliminate clause (c) of the proposed subsection (1) of section 19.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: I indicated earlier that I intended to move an amendment. Since the occupant of the chair has changed since I last spoke, I would just recall that last evening on second reading I sought to move the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house declines to give second reading to this bill because it fails to provide that naturalized citizens shall have equality of rights and status with natural born citizens."

I will not trouble to read the Speaker's ruling on that amendment when it was ruled out of order—you have no doubt acquainted yourself with it—on the ground that it would anticipate amendments which could be moved in committee. I may say that I had not thought, until the Speaker gave that ruling, that it would be possible to make an amendment in committee that would achieve that object. But Mr. Speaker having directed my mind in that direction, I applied my mind to it and I think Mr. Speaker has proved to be right. I have an amendment which does, in fact, achieve the objective which the Speaker told us could be achieved in committee. Therefore without more ado I will move as follows:

That section 2 as amended be amended by striking out all the words after "19. (1)" in line 12 to the end of the section and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) A Canadian citizen other than a natural born citizen shall not lose his citizenship for any cause for which a natural born citizen would not lose his citizenship.

(b) Where it is established to the satisfaction of the court that a person has obtained a certificate of naturalization or Canadian citizenship by false representation or fraud or by concealment of material circumstances such certificate shall be revoked and such person shall be deemed never to have been a Canadian citizen."

In support of this amendment I should like to say that the (a) part of it makes it quite clear that once a person has become a naturalized citizen he has exactly the same status as does a natural born citizen and that he cannot lose—that, of course, is indicated in the act in every other respect except one—he cannot lose his citizenship for a cause for which a natural born citizen could not lose his citizenship.

Then in section (b) I applied my mind in the direction in which I indicated last night in an aside to the Minister of Justice I thought it might be applied; that is to say, taking the analogy of nullity as opposed to divorce. It is clear that what is meant in the proposed bill and what is intended is that if a certificate of naturalization or citizenship is acquired by fraud or misrepresentation of the material circumstances, the person who obtained it never was a citizen. What this amendment says is that he never was a citizen and that the certificate was not a valid certificate. I am not a lawyer and I do not know too much about these things, but I would suppose that if someone obtained a birth certificate by fraud and it was found that it was fraudulent, he would no longer be a natural born citizen of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: You could not very well say you had never been born.

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Fulton: That is what you are trying to say here.

Mr. Pickersgill: No. What I am saying here is that he never was a citizen because he did not comply properly with the law that he is required to comply with to become a citizen. The only difference between what I am suggesting and what the hon. lady is putting forward in her bill, now that she has taken out that highly objectionable section (c) which really would have instituted thought police in so far as these naturalized citizens were concerned, is that it will no longer be competent to revoke the citizenship of the person who has been charged with the offence of treason, is outside the country and does not come back to be tried.

That is the sort of thing that happens once in a great while. It is perhaps desirable to be able to do this. However, if we are going to take away all the other reasons, why leave this one? The main purpose of this whole exercise, as I take it—and I think the house is not divided on this point any longer—is to give complete equality, the psychological feeling of equality. If a natural born person is a traitor, we cannot divest him of his citizenship. Therefore are we really going to be losing very much if once in a generation there happens to be a naturalized person who is charged with treason and is outside of Canada and whom we cannot strip of his citizenship? It does not seem to me that the country is going to suffer very much compared with what we are trying to do in this legislation. In other words, we are trying to give to the naturalized citizens of this country a feeling that once they are naturalized they are equal of the natural born citizens.

I think I have made my point and I do not want to trespass further on the time of the committee. I have tried to make this suggestion in a completely non-controversial way because I think all of us are looking to the achievement of the same objective. I may say that if the Minister of Justice finds any technical defect in the amendment, I should be happy indeed to yield to his very much superior knowledge of these matters in making any textual changes in it. But I would hope that in principle it would be acceptable to the government.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sorry to say that this amendment which is proposed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is not acceptable. I think that one of the things we hope our new citizens will acquire, along with their citizenship, is a pride in that citizenship. I think they realize when they take the oath of allegiance that by so doing they owe that allegiance to the crown and that having done that voluntarily they must abide by the oath they have taken. Unlike the natural born Canadian, the naturalized Canadian is a person who comes to this country owing allegiance to a foreign power. On acquiring Canadian citizenship a naturalized person, by his very act, deliberately forsakes his allegiance to the foreign power and by oath gives his allegiance to the crown. If that person chooses then, in deliberate violation of his oath, to do acts which lead to his being charged with treason, surely it is not expecting too much that he will return at least voluntarily to answer to charges before the court. The natural born person on the other hand automatically owes allegiance to the crown from birth. If by his deliberate act he declares allegiance to a foreign power, he thereupon loses his Canadian citizenship also. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong this debate. This is a point on which I feel rather strongly. I am sorry, but I cannot accept the hon. member's amendment.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to ask the minister a question. The minister speaks in terms of a naturalized citizen who has committed an offence, leaves the country and does not come back for trial and therefore should lose his citizenship. I agree with that. But assuming that a natural born citizen also commits the offence, also leaves the country and also does not come back to trial, why treat him differently from the way in which you treat a naturalized citizen? He has committed the same offence. He has left the country the same as has the naturalized citizen, and he does not come back for trial. They are both on an equal footing. They have done the same thing. Why differentiate as between the one and the other?

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Pickersgill) negatived: Yeas, 17; nays, 55.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mrs. Fairclough moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Before the bill passes, Mr. Speaker, there are one or two observations I wish to make. We moved an amendment which was ruled out of order but we were told it could be moved in committee, which was done. More important, however, we could not vote for a bill which included section 19(c). True, the minister indicated that this objectionable clause would be removed, but it was there when we were asked to vote and therefore we could not support second reading.

However, that section has now been removed and, as this bill does go some distance, though not as far as we think it should go, towards achieving the objectives we have in mind, we will vote for it on third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BROADCASTING

ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS—CONTINUANCE OF C.B.C.—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. C-55, respecting broadcasting.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister please tell us what are the amendments?

Mr. Nowlan: There are two amendments to the bill, one dealing with the section about Canadian interest or ownership. It never was the intention to interfere in any way with stations which already held a licence, and there is at least one of these stations, and possibly more, which because of the fact that their shares—namely the shares of a particular company operating a radio station—are owned by a company the shares of which are listed on a stock exchange that it might be impossible from time to time to establish the fact that they are 75 per cent Canadian controlled. The bill was therefore amended in the Senate as a result of inquiry made by the senators and I appeared before them and after discussing the matter I realized there was the possibility of some prejudice against two or three stations presently in operation in this country. I therefore agreed to this amendment.

The other amendment is one to which reference was made during debate to the effect that the president and vice-president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should hold office during good behaviour rather than for seven years.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): The two amendments to this bill mentioned by the minister are quite acceptable to us. The first amendment, which will prevent any interference, is something which should be approved. So far as the second amendment is concerned, this is in exactly the same terms as we advanced in this house when we were discussing that part of the bill, and we naturally support it. I cannot, however, refrain from expressing my disappointment and that of my colleagues that we were not as persuasive in our advocacy of this change as were the senators. I do not want to mention at this late stage consideration of high constitutional principles in the relationship between the House of Commons and the Senate, but it is regretted that the amendment put forward in the house by us was rejected while the same amendment put forward by the Senate was accepted. With these few observations I wish to express on our part the acceptance of the amendment which we believe will improve the bill.

Mr. Nowlan: It was the persuasion of the hon. member in the house which, I am sure, laid the groundwork for the amendment from elsewhere.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): We have no objections to the amendments before us but we do feel, as parliament feels, that Canadian broadcasting should be in the hands of Canadian corporations. I realize that this amendment as it has been explained would mean that great hardship on these two or three particular stations might be avoided, but I wonder whether, if these stations should apply for an expansion of their privileges, such as an increase in their power and other facilities—in other words, if they should appear before the board asking for an extension of their power—they would then find themselves in a different position. I think it is one thing to say we will not interfere with them in their existing form but there is some difference as to the procedure which might be followed if they ask for an extension of power for their station, and so on.

I am wondering if the minister in a few words could tell us the intention with regard to that particular subject. Will it be considered in the very broad terms of this amendment which allow the governor in council a great deal of leaway in laying down the conditions?

Mr. Nowlan: I cannot, of course, speak for the board of broadcast governors as to what they might do in a specific case. Each application would depend on the circumstances, as the hon. member knows. All I can say is that the companies which appeared before the Senate committee and presented their arguments were perfectly satisfied with this amendment which was brought about in conjunction with the companies as between the Senate and the Department of Justice. I am sure that the circumstances in each particular case will be taken into consideration. There are only four as far as we know that could be affected, and their interests will be safeguarded.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister care to give the house the names. If he would prefer not to do so—

Mr. Nowlan: There would be no objection. I think there is one station in Toronto, another in Montreal and possibly one in Windsor. Frankly I have forgotten where the other two stations are.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Before the sitting is suspended I should just like to say a word in my capacity as leader of the house by way of thanks to both the opposition parties and in particular to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr.

Chevrier) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) for the co-operation they have shown throughout the session.

I suppose we sometimes think that many harsh words are said across the floor of the house, words that are very rude and which perhaps we regret—I am speaking for members on both sides, now, not only for those who happen to support the government. It may be of some comfort and encouragement to hon. members if I tell them that some weeks ago one of the representatives here from another commonwealth country told me he believed that the Canadian House of Commons was the most polite democratic assembly in the world, and he said the debates were in far better temper and conducted in an atmosphere of far more friendliness than in any other democratic parliament. That may or may not be true. However, I have great confidence in his judgment.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, it is very true that there has been a very good spirit in the house throughout the session. I think we shall all go back to our homes in different parts of Canada tonight, tomorrow or next week feeling that we have made many new friends during this session and that we have renewed old friendships, and this is the spirit in which a democratic country is best governed. For my part I should like to express thanks to the members of both the opposition parties.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, when the leader of the house caught your eye a moment ago I was also rising and for a similar purpose: to express our thanks to the house leader for the manner in which he has conducted the business of this house during the session. I want to express our thanks to him for his co-operation and for his understanding, because at all times I have found that co-operation has existed to the highest degree. He has fulfilled the task which the government has given to him with competence and efficiency and it is appreciated on this side of the house.

I should not like to see the house prorogue without at the same time expressing on behalf of the official opposition our thanks to you, Mr. Speaker, for the manner in which you have presided over our deliberations. I had occasion to say this at a previous session and I am only too pleased on this occasion to repeat that you have shown fairness and equity in your capacity as Speaker of this house, and those of us who sit on the opposition benches appreciate it to the fullest extent.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I feel I should say something with regard to the Deputy Speaker of the House (Mr. Sevigny). The way in which he has acquitted himself of his duties as such came as no surprise to us. He has done so not only with competence but also with great courtesy, following thereby in the footsteps of his distinguished father. I am pleased to express our thanks to him.

I would also like to avail myself of this opportunity to express my sincere thanks to the leader of the house.

(Text):

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): It would appear in order for me at this time to apply for membership of this newly established mutual admiration society. I am pleased to agree with the remarks that have been made as to the very fine co-operation we have received from the leader of the house in arranging the business during this session. To many of us he is a friend of long standing, and it is a pleasure to work with him in his new capacity. We have been fortunate in the person who has been the leader of the house in previous years, but I do not think we have ever had a better relationship, better understanding and closer working relationship than we have had with the present house leader.

I realize that from time to time members in various quarters of the house may have been impatient about the length of the speeches and the length of the session, but in relation to the work which has been done, this session has been one of the shortest in the history of Canada. It has been a session in which we have passed the largest number of estimates, and we have also passed a great many bills. I think the government and its members have given a spirited defence of the legislation which they have presented, and in the tradition of the opposition we think we have presented constructive criticism, constructive alternatives and, when necessary, firm opposition against certain acts and certain legislation.

I also wish to agree most wholeheartedly with the remarks which have been made about Your Honour. We in this group are closer to you, at least geographically, than any other party in the house and I think that has been a real advantage for us. We have come to know Your Honour better and to realize your very good qualities. I said in the last parliament that you had proceeded fairly and had meted out the rules in an equitable manner to all members. I want to say on behalf of the C.C.F. group that you have maintained in our minds the great prestige that you had in the last parliament and we look forward to a continuance of this very fine relationship for the good of the Canadian nation in the years ahead.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the house. I shall simply say that the epitome of parliamentary government is the relationship that has been evidenced here during the session and more particularly in these last few moments when each of us speaks as he feels. I do not want to say more than that I believe in this session we have endeavoured to carry out to the highest degree possible the parliamentary system, with the realization that while the government has a large majority at no time has it endeavoured intentionally to bring about a denial of that equality of opportunity which is of the essence of our system.

Mr. Winch: And I thought all the time we were fighting!

Mr. Speaker: May I say on behalf of myself and, if I may, on behalf of the Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees and also the deputy chairman of the committees of the whole, how deeply we appreciate what has been said by hon. members. I am all too conscious of my own deficiencies. I am bound to err and even when I am right I am bound to give offence to one side or the other. Therefore I deeply appreciate the fact that you will tolerate me to the extent you have.

I should like to take this opportunity of saying I hope to see all hon. members before they leave and immediately after we rise I hope that all hon. members will enter the door of room 16 which is wide open and that those who cannot come then will perhaps come after prorogation. Thank you very much indeed.

Mr. C. E. Rea (Spadina): Perhaps I may be allowed to thank hon. members for the co-operation I received when I was sitting in the chair because at times there were rather difficult and borderline rulings to make.

I should also like to express my thanks to the three clerks for their kindness, patience and the very excellent words of wisdom they offer to those who will listen.

May I also be the first to wish all hon. members a merry Christmas.

Mr. Pierre Sevigny (Longueuil): I should like to join Mr. Speaker and add my own thanks to those expressed by the deputy chairman for the kind reception you have given to my somewhat novice decisions during the current session. I owe a great debt of gratitude to you all for your forbearance, to Mr. Speaker for his guidance and to the clerks for all the guidance they gave. I may have been wrong at times and when I was duly corrected it was always quite pleasant. I surely consider it an honour to have presided over the committees during this session.

(Translation):

I wish to thank the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and all those who a moment ago showed by their applause their appreciation of such services as I might have rendered during this session. You may rest assured that at all times I appreciated the co-operation of Mr. Speaker and that of hon. members. Thanks to their advice and their encouragement, I have been able on occasion to improve my rulings.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say briefly that the kindly references made by the leader of this group to yourself are extended also to the Deputy Speaker, the deputy chairman of committees, the officials of the house, and with respect to the kindly references he made to the government side of the house, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I want to say I do not want government members to assume that we think we are burying the government.

At 6.26 p.m. the sitting was suspended until 8.00 p.m. this day.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, September 6, 1958.

Sir:

To these bills the royal assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In Her Majesty's name, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General doth assent to these bills.

Then the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have approved certain expenditures for the public service, and the application of certain amounts in the accounts, of the year ended March 31, 1958.

The Commons also have voted supplies required to enable the government to defray certain expenses for the public service of the year ending March 31, 1959.

In the name of the Commons I present to Your Honour the following bills:

An act for approving certain expenditures authorized for the public service, and the application of certain amounts in the accounts, of the financial year ended the 31st March, 1958.

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1959.

To which bills I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

To these bills the Clerk of the Senate, by command of the Deputy Governor General, did thereupon say:

In Her Majesty's name, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General thanks her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to these bills.

Prorogation of Parliament

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

After which the Deputy Governor General was pleased to close the first session of the twenty-fourth parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The twenty-fourth parliament has commenced with a most active and noteworthy session.

We have been glad to welcome this summer Her Royal Highness the Princess Margaret on her visit to Canada. We look forward with great pleasure to the presence in Canada next year of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen on the occasion of the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway.

During this present session you have welcomed and heard in parliament the President of the United States, the President of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Prime Minister of Ghana. These visits have provided a valuable and timely opportunity for discussions of problems of mutual interest and for an exchange of impressions on broader issues.

My government has been encouraged by indications of progress during the last few months in the field of disarmament and by recent developments in the Middle East situation but the general outlook remains uncertain and in particular, the current tension in the Far East is a source of deep concern.

My government took an active role at the emergency special session of the general assembly of the United Nations in promoting measures that would serve as a basis for a comprehensive effort to reduce tension and improve conditions in the Middle Eastern area.

My ministers have welcomed the announcement by the United States and United Kingdom governments of their readiness to suspend tests of nuclear weapons for one year while negotiations for a political agreement take place; they hope that as a result there will emerge an effective agreement among the nuclear powers continuing the suspension of testing under effective international supervision. The prospect of further technical talks to examine possible safeguards against surprise attack gives ground for hope of additional progress in this important field of disarmament.

My ministers welcome the approval you have given to the important agreement for the integration of the air defence of North America. Measures are being worked out to ensure that such defence is maintained on an efficient and economical basis consistent with the rapid technical changes in this field. Furthermore, arrangements have been initiated for closer consultation by ministers with members of the United States administration in the field of defence policy.

Your support of programs to provide practical assistance to the peoples of the less developed regions of the world through the medium of the United Nations, under the Colombo plan and under special arrangements for the West Indies and Ghana has been further evidence of the desire of Canadians to participate in international programs of economic as well as humanitarian importance.

You have had laid before you a report on the international conference on the law of the sea held in Geneva early this year and the five conventions agreed upon by that conference. My ministers will support the early convening of a second international conference on the law of the sea to deal with the important questions left unsettled at Geneva.

My government has been gratified to observe the improvement in the general economic conditions in Canada. It will continue its efforts to increase employment and ameliorate the condition of those temporarily unable to find work.

During the present session you have enacted measures of major benefit to the people of Canada.

You have authorized an increase in the public funds made available under the National Housing Act to ensure the further progress of our housing program.

You extended for a further six weeks during this year the period during which seasonal benefits were paid under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

You have provided for increases in the pensions of former members of the civil service, the armed forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

You have reviewed and improved the Veterans Insurance Act, the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act and the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act, and increased the benefits payable thereunder.

As a further interim measure to meet the needs of the grain producers in the prairie provinces, pending the working out of long term measures, you have provided an acreage payment to such producers. The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act has been revised in the light of experience in its operation. The benefits of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act have been extended to an increased number of farmers. The lending power of the Canadian farm loan board has been enlarged. The Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act has been amended, and the amounts payable under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act have been increased.

You have approved the necessary arrangements with the government of Saskatchewan for carrying out the South Saskatchewan project and provided for the immediate commencement of construction of the main dam in this important undertaking.

You have made provision for the establishment of an office to assist small business in Canada.

You have provided a needed increase in the support furnished by parliament for the universities of Canada.

The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act has been amended to set a definite and earlier date for the commencement of the payments authorized by it.

You have completely revised the legislation relating to taxes on estates, making it more equitable and practical as well as alleviating the burden on smaller estates. You have revised the Income Tax Act, and increased the exemptions from sales tax under the Excise Tax Act.

The National Capital Act which you have passed will make possible the more effective continuation of the long term development and improvement of the national capital and its immediate environs.

You have passed an important act to provide for the regulation of broadcasting in Canada and to ensure the continued operation of a national broadcasting system that will furnish a varied and comprehensive service of a high standard that is Canadian in content and character.

In the Parole Act you have created an orderly and permanent basis for the reform and rehabilitation of those confined to penitentiaries and their integration into society as useful citizens.

There has been placed before you a bill of rights for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Canada coming within the jurisdiction of parliament. There will now be an opportunity for this measure to receive careful study before action on it is finally taken by parliament.

Other measures enacted at this session include acts to approve the income tax conventions with Belgium and the Belgian Congo, the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act, the British Columbia Coast Steamship Service Act, an act to incorporate the lakehead harbour commissioners and an act to authorize the construction of a bridge between Campobello island and Maine. You have also amended the Railway Act, the Indian Act, the Criminal Code, the Penitentiary Act, the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, the Loan Companies Act, the Trust Companies Act, the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, the Customs Tariff, the Customs Act, the Judges Act, the Financial Administration Act, the Yukon Act and the National Parks Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

My ministers welcome the approval you have given for the operation of a simultaneous translation system in the House of Commons.

Your committees have been more active than for many years past and show promise of contributing to the greater effectiveness of parliament in the future.

I thank you for the provision you have made for all the essential public services and payments in the current fiscal year and in addition for the approval granted for the payments made under special warrants last year.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the Commons:

I pray that divine Providence may continue to bless, protect and guide our nation.

This concluded the first session of the twenty-fourth parliament.
